ſent away into another world; for the dead know nothing of the affairs of this life; a good man indeed after death knows more of God and Chriſt, of the doctrines of grace, and myſteries of providence; but he knows nothing of the affairs of his family he has left behind: ſome underſtand this of a man on his death-bed whilſt alive, who when he is told of the promotion of his ſons to honour, or of the increaſe of their worldly ſubſtance, takes no notice of it; either being deprived of his ſenſes by the diſeaſe upon him; or thro' the greatneſs of his pains and agonies, or the intenſeneſs of his thoughts about a future ſtate, does not advert to what is told him, nor rejoice at it; which in the time of health would have been pleaſing to him: but the firſt ſenſe ſeems beſt: and they are brought low, that is, his ſons; or are diminiſhed[u]; leſſened in their numbers, one taken off after another, and ſo his family decreaſes; or they come into low circumſtances of life, are reduced in the world, and brought to ſtraits and difficulties, to want and poverty: but he perceiveth it not of them; he is not ſenſible of their troubles, and ſo not grieved at them; ſee Iſ. lxiii. 16. or when he is told of them on his death-bed, he does not advert to them, or regard them, having enough to grapple with himſelf, and his mind intent on his everlaſting ſtate, or carried above them in the views of the love, grace, and covenant of God; ſee 2 Sam. xxiii. 5.

℣. 22. But his fleſh upon him ſhall have pain, &c.] Either he ſhall be chaſtened with ſtrong pains on his ſick and dying bed; which is the reaſon why he neither rejoices at the happineſs of his family, nor is diſtreſſed at their misfortunes; having ſo much pain in his fleſh and bones to endure himſelf; or as Guſſetius [x] renders it, for this his fleſh and ſoul ſhall have pain and grief, while he lives, becauſe he cannot know how it will be with his family, when he is dead; but rather this is to be underſtood of a man when dead; and ſo it is a continuation of the deſcription of death, or of the ſtate of the dead; thus Aben Ezra interprets it, of his fleſh upon him, that is, his body ſhall melt away, rot and corrupt, meaning in the grave; ſo the word is uſed of marring and deſtroying, in 2 Kings, iii. 19. to which the Targum inclines, "but his fleſh, becauſe of worms upon him, ſhall grieve;" and ſo Jarchi, troubleſome is the worm to a dead man, as a needle in quick fleſh; pain and grief are by a proſopopeia attributed to a dead body; ſignifying, that could it be ſenſible of its caſe, it would be painful and grievous to it; and his ſoul within him ſhall mourn; either whilſt he lives, becauſe of his afflictions and terrors, the days being come, in which he has no pleaſure, and the time of death drawing nigh; or his dead body, as the word is uſed in Pſ. xvi. 10. ſaid to mourn by the ſame figure; or his ſoul, becauſe of his body being dead; or rather his breath, which at death fails and pines away [y].

CHAP. XV.

JOB's three friends having in their turns attacked him, and he having given anſwer reſpectively to them; Eliphaz who began the attack firſt enters the liſts with him again, and proceeds upon the ſame plan as before, and endeavours to defend his former ſentiments, falling upon Job with greater vehemence and ſeverity; he charges him with vanity, imprudence and unprofitableneſs in his talk, and acting a part unbecoming his character as a wiſe man; yea with impiety and a neglect of religion, or at leaſt as a diſcourager of it by his words and doctrines, of which his mouth and lips were witneſſes againſt him, ℣. 1, 6. he charges him with arrogance and a high conceit of himſelf, as if he was the firſt man that was made, nay as if he was the eternal wiſdom of God, and had been in his council; and, to check his vanity, retorts his own words upon him, or however the ſenſe of them, ℣. 7.—10. and alſo with ſlighting the conſolations of God; upon which he warmly expoſtulates with him, ℣. 11.—13. and in order to convince him of his ſelf-righteouſneſs, which he thought he was full of, he argues from the angels, the heavens, and the general caſe of man, ℣. 14—16. and then he declares from his own knowledge, and from the relation of wiſe and antient men in former times, who made it their obſervation, that wicked men are afflicted all their days, attended with terror and deſpair, and liable to various calamities, ℣. 17—24. the reaſons of which are their inſolence to God, and hoſtilities committed againſt him, which they are encouraged in by their proſperous circumſtances, ℣. 25, 26, 27. notwithſtanding all, their eſtates, riches, and wealth, will come to nothing, ℣. 28—30. and the chapter is cloſed with an exhortation to ſuch, not to feed themſelves up with vain hopes, or truſt in uncertain riches, ſince their deſtruction would be ſure, ſudden, and terrible, ℣. 31—35.

℣. 1. Then anſwered Eliphaz the Temanite, &c.] Or, who was of Teman, as the Targum, the firſt of Job's friends and comforters, the oldeſt of them, who firſt began the diſpute with him; which was carried on by his two other companions, who had ſpoken in their turns; and now in courſe it fell to him to anſwer a ſecond time, as he here does, and ſaid, as follows.

℣. 2. Should a wiſe man utter vain knowledge, &c.] As Job had been thought to be, or as he himſelf thought he was, which he might ſay ſarcaſtically; or as he really was, not worldly wiſe, nor merely wiſe in things natural, but in things divine; being one that had the fear of God, which is the beginning of wiſdom, and wiſdom itſelf; believed in Chriſt, and walked wiſely and circumſpectly before men; now it is not becoming ſuch a man to utter vain knowledge, or ſuch knowledge as is like the wind, or as the Targum, windy knowledge; empty, not ſolid, nor ſatisfying, but ſwells and puffs up, and is knowledge falſly ſo called; but it does not appear that Job did utter ſuch vain and fruitleſs things, as deſerved to be compared to the wind: and fill his belly with the eaſt-wind; which is noiſy and bluſterous, rapid and forcible, bearing all before it, and very infectious in hot countries; and ſuch notions Job according to Eliphaz ſatisfied himſelf with, and endeavoured to inſinuate them into others; which were nothing but great ſwelling words of vanity, and tended to ſubvert the faith of men, and overthrow all religion, and were very unwholſome, infectious and ruinous to the minds of men, as ſuggeſted.

℣. 3. Should he reaſon with unprofitable talk, &c.] That is, the wiſe man, ſuch a man as Job; does it become him to talk ſuch idle ſtuff? that which is falſe, and fooliſh, and frothy, that does not miniſter grace to [u] יצערון ὀλιγοι γενωνται, Sept. minuuntur, numero pauci ſunt, Druſius. emarcida luget, Schultens.

[x] Ebr. Comment. p. 605.

[y] תאבל

to the hearer, and is not for the uſe of edifying; as whatever is untrue, unwiſe, vain, and empty, muſt be uſeleſs and anſwer no good end; nothing is profitable but what tends to increaſe ſolid wiſdom and ſpiritual knowledge, and to exerciſe grace, and influence an holy life; wherefore what are profitable to the ſouls of men, are the doctrines of the word of God, and the experiences of the grace of God, communicated by his people one to another; and nothing but theſe, or what agrees with them, ſhould come out of the mouth of a wiſe and good man; nor can ſuch an one expect to convince men of their errors, or reprove them for their ſins with ſucceſs, who deals in words of no profit; or with ſpeeches wherewith he can do no good; but may do a great deal of hurt both to himſelf and others; but the ſame thing is here ſignified in different words.

℣. 4. Yea, thou caſteſt off fear, &c.] Not of man; a ſlaviſh fear of man is to be caſt off, becauſe that brings a ſnare, deters men from their duty, and leads into ſin; tho' there is a fear and reverence of men which ought to be given to them, fear to whom fear, Rom. xiii. 7. but here the fear of God is meant, which is to be underſtood of the grace of fear, of which Job was poſſeſſed; that could not be caſt off, for this is not what is in a man naturally, or is by the light of nature, and ariſes from natural conviction, which may be caſt off as was by Pharaoh; but this is a bleſſing of the covenant of grace, ſure and firm, and is one of the gifts of grace, that are without repentance; it is a part of internal grace, which can never be loſt; it is improved and increaſed by freſh diſcoveries of the grace and goodneſs of God, and is an antidote and preſervative againſt apoſtacy: perhaps the whole worſhip of God may be meant, external worſhip, or outward religion in the form of it, which is ſometimes ſignified by the fear of God; Eccl. xii. 14. Iſ. xxix. 13. and it is caſt off when it is neglected and not attended to, or when men become prophane, after they have made a profeſſion of religion; but as neither of theſe can be thought to be the caſe of Job; rather the meaning of Eliphaz may be, that Job did not ſhew that reverence to God he ſhould, as his words may ſeem, in ch. xiii. 20, 21, 22, or that by his way of talk and reaſoning, and by the notions he had imbibed and gave out, and the aſſertions he laid down, all religion would be made void among men; for if, as he had ſaid, God deſtroys the perfect and the wicked, and the tabernacles of robbers proſper, and the juſt men are laughed to ſcorn, ch. ix. 22, and xii. 4. 6. who would fear God? it might be inferred from hence, that it is a vain thing to ſerve him, and there can be no profit got by keeping his ordinances, and walking before him; this is the way to put an end to all religion, as if Eliphaz ſhould ſay, and diſcourage all regard unto it: and reſtraineſt prayer before God; prayer is to be made to God and to him only, it is a part of religious worſhip, directed to by the light of nature; and ought to be performed by every man; it is a ſpecial privilege of the ſaints, who have a covenant-God on a throne of grace to go to, and can pray in a ſpiritual manner for ſpiritual things; and eſpecially is to be obſerved in times of trouble, in which Job now was, and never to be diſuſed: now this charge either reſpects Job himſelf, that he left off praying, which can hardly be ſuppoſed; or that he drew out prayer to a great length, as ſome underſtand the words [w] like the tautologies of the heathen; or he diminiſhed prayer, as others [x], leſſened the times of prayer, and the petitions in it: or rather it may reſpect others; not that it can be thought he ſhould lay his injunctions on thoſe over whom he had any authority, forbidding his ſervants, or thoſe about him to pray; but that by his manner of reaſoning he diſcouraged prayer, as Eliphaz thought, as a uſeleſs thing; for if God laughs at the trials and afflictions of the innocent, and ſuffers wicked men to proſper, who would pray to him, or ſerve him? ſee ch. x. 23. and xii. 6.

℣. 5. For thy mouth uttereth thine iniquity, &c.] Which was in his heart, and ſo was an evidence againſt him, and proved him perverſe, and made good the above charges exhibited againſt him: or thine iniquity teaches thy mouth [y]; the wickedneſs that was in his heart prompted his mouth to ſpeak the things he did, ſee Matt. xii. 34. and this, as it was an inſtance of his folly, Prov. xv. 2. ſo a proof of his caſting off the fear of the Lord; for if that had been before his eyes, he would have bridled his lips, and not uttered all the wickedneſs of his heart: for he that bridleth not his tongue, his religion is vain, James i. 26. and thou chuſeſt the tongue of the crafty; coloured over things under ſpecious pretences of religion and godlineſs, ſo that the ſimple and ignorant took him for a holy good man, when he was at heart an hypocrite; in this light Eliphaz puts Job, as one that walked and talked in craftineſs, and was a deceitful worker, and impoſed upon men with falſe gloſſes and plauſible pretences.

℣. 6. Thine own mouth condemneth thee, and not I, &c.] Or ſhews thee to be a wicked perſon, guilty of things charged upon thee; out of thine own mouth thou art convicted, there needs no other evidence to be brought againſt thee, that is ſufficient; and thou ſaveſt me, and any other the trouble of paſſing the ſentence of condemnation upon thee; thou haſt done it thyſelf, thine own mouth is judge and jury, and brings in the verdict, and pronounces it, as well as is the witneſs, as follows, and is inſtead of a thouſand witneſſes, ch. ix. 20. yea, thine own lips teſtify againſt thee; and therefore there were no need of producing any other teſtimony; what he had ſaid, ſhewed that his talk was vain and unprofitable, unbecoming a wiſe man, and tending to make null and void the fear of God among men, to diſcourage all religious exerciſes, and particularly prayer before God.

℣. 7. Art thou the firſt man that was born? &c.] The firſt Adam, who was created in wiſdom and knowledge, and had a large ſhare of underſtanding in things natural, civil, and moral; knew much of God and his perfections, of the works of nature, and of the wiſdom and power of God diſplayed in them; one inſtance of which is his giving names to the creatures; doſt thou think thou art that ſelf-ſame individual perſon, the father of all mankind, who had ſuch a ſtock and fund of knowledge, until, by ſeeking after more, and that unlawful, he loſt much of what he had? doſt thou imagine that thou haſt lived ever ſince, and ſeen or known every thing that was done in all ages from the beginning, and haſt gathered a large ſhare of knowledge from long experience, and by making ſtrict obſervations on men and things in ſuch a length of time? or, as as the Targum, "Waſt thou born with the firſt man, without father and mother?" and haſt thou exiſted ever ſince? or, Waſt thou born before Adam? before the firſt man [z]? Art thou the wiſdom and ſon of God, who was before Abraham, before Adam, before any creature whatever, was in the beginning with God, and was God? What doſt thou make thyſelf to be, Job? thou a mere man, doſt thou make thyſelf to be the eternal God? for to be before the firſt man, or to be the firſt-born of every creature, or to be born before every creature, is expreſſive of eternity, as is the following phraſe: or waſt thou made before the hills? or exiſted before they did? as is ſaid of the Son of God, Prov. viii. 25. what is before the hills and mountains is eternal; the eternal God and his eternity are thus deſcribed, Pſ. xc. 2.

[w] תגרע tuliſti, V. L. traheres, Cocceius; multiplicaſti, ſo ſome in Bar Tzemach. [x] Imminues, Montanus; imminuiſti, Bolducius; diminuis, Schmidt; minuis, Schultens. [y] יאלף עונך פיך docuit iniquitas tua os tuum, V. L. Pagninus, Bolducius; docebit, Montanus; docet, Piſcator, Cocceius; ſo Tigurine verſion.

℣. 8. Haſt thou heard the ſecret of God? &c.] Or, in the ſecret of God [a], in his cabinet-council, what was ſaid and done there? haſt thou ſtood in the council of God? haſt thou been one of his privy-council, or counſellors, and been let into all the ſecrets of God, of his purpoſes and providence, and into the reaſons of all his adminiſtrations, that thou talkeſt ſo freely, and boldly, and confidently as thou doſt? Indeed Chriſt, the Son of God, was the Angel of the great council; the counſel of peace was between him and his Father; yea, he was in his boſom, and privy to all his thoughts, deſigns, and decrees, and knew every thing, what would be, and the reaſons thereof; as well as the nature of his Father, his perfections, mind, and will, which he has declared: but could Job pretend to this, or any thing like it? no ſurely. Indeed there are ſome ſecrets of God which he makes known to his people, and no doubt, in ſome meaſure, Job was acquainted with them; ſuch as the ſecrets of God's love, and of the covenant of his grace which are with them that fear him; and ſuch an one Job was, and with whom, in times paſt at leaſt, the ſecret of God was, even his everlaſting love in the open manifeſtation of it to him; which is a ſecret in the heart of God, till revealed and ſhed abroad in the hearts of his people; and ſo the myſteries of God, as ſome render the word [b], the doctrines of the goſpel, the myſteries of the kingdom of heaven, the knowledge of them, is given to the ſons of men; Job was acquainted with them, with the incarnation of Chriſt, redemption by him, and the reſurrection of the dead; the ſecrets of providence, though they may not always be known now, they will be hereafter; yea, God does nothing but he reveals his ſecrets to his ſervants the prophets, as he did to Abraham his friend; and as for the purpoſes of God, which are the ſecret things that belong to him, and can never be known unleſs revealed, and when fulfilled, even thoſe, ſuch as relate to the election of men, their redemption by Chriſt, and effectual vocation, are made known by God's ſaving and calling them according to them: and doſt thou reſtrain wiſdom to thyſelf? not keep it to himſelf without communicating it to others, which to do is to impriſon the truth, and detain it in unrighteouſneſs; as men have freely received, they ſhould freely give; but he arrogated and aſcribed wiſdom to himſelf, monopolized it, and would allow no man to have any ſhare of it but himſelf; he reckoned ſo highly of himſelf, as if he was the only wiſe man in the world; thus what he charged his friends with, Eliphaz retorts upon himſelf, ch. xii. 2. as he does his own words in the following verſe.

℣. 9. What knoweſt thou that we know not? &c.] Which are pretty near the words of Job to his friends, ch. xii. 3. and xiii. 2. and to the ſame ſenſe is what follows: what underſtandeſt thou, which is not in us? in our hearts, minds, and underſtanding; or among us, which one or other, or all of us, have not: yet all men have not knowledge alike; ſome that profeſs themſelves to be wiſe, and to have a large ſhare of knowledge, are fools; and ſuch who think they know ſomething extraordinary, and more than others, know nothing as they ought to know; and ſuch who have gifts of real knowledge, have them different one from another; even of the things known there is not a like degree of knowledge, and particularly in ſpiritual things; ſome are little children in underſtanding, ſome are young men and know more, and ſome are fathers, and know moſt of all; an equality in knowledge belongs to another ſtate, to the latter day-glory, when the watchmen ſhall ſee eye to eye, and all ſhall know the Lord, from the leaſt to the greateſt, and eſpecially to the ultimate glory, when ſaints will know as they are known.

℣. 10. With us are both the grey-headed, &c.] The grey-headed man, or one that is ſo, it is in the ſingular number; grey hairs are a ſign of old age, and an emblem of wiſdom, ſee ch. xii. 12. to which words Eliphaz may be thought to refer; Job there ſuggeſting as if wiſdom was with him, being an antient man: and very aged men; or man rather; Mr. Broughton renders it, and all grey, as if the other word only ſignifies one that has a mixture of grey hairs on him, but this one all whoſe hairs are turned grey: much elder than thy father; or greater, as the ſame learned man renders it; and ſo Aben Ezra and Bar Tzemach ſay in the Arabic language the word ſignifies, and may deſign a third perſon. Ben Gerſom thinks that Eliphaz was older than Job, and that his other two friends were younger than he, or Zophar only was younger than he; one of the Targums paraphraſes the words thus, "but Eliphaz who is grey, and Bildad who is aged, are with us, and Zophar who is greater in days than thy father;" it appears that they were very old men by what Elihu ſays, ch. xxxii. 6, 7. though it may be, Eliphaz may not barely have reſpect to themſelves and their age, but to their anceſtors, their fathers, from whom they had their knowledge, when they were but of yeſterday, and knew little, and ſo pleads antiquity on their ſide; and it has been obſerved that Teman, from whence Eliphaz was, was famous for wiſdom, and wiſe men in it, at leaſt it was ſo in after-times; and if ſo early, the obſervation would be more pertinent, and the ſenſe might be thought to be; that we have at Teman men as antient and as wiſe as at Uz, in the ſchools of the one as in the ſchools of the other, and ſo have the opportunity of gaining as much wiſdom and knowledge as Job: or it may be, the meaning only is this, that we have on our ſide the queſtion as many antient and learned men, or more, than Job can pretend to; and thus, as before, antiquity is pleaded; but is not a ſure rule to go by, at leaſt by truſting to it men may be led aſide; for though truth is the good old way, and is the oldeſt way, yet error is almoſt as old as truth; it follows ſo cloſe upon the heels of it, that it is difficult, in ſome caſes, to diſcern which is firſt, [z] So Mercerus, and ſome in Vatablus, Schmidt, Jarchi & Bar Tzemach.

[a] בסוד אלוה in ſecreto dei, Pagninus, Montanus, Cocceius, Schultens.

firſt, though truth always is; there is the old way which wicked men have trodden, and a pretence to antiquity, if not carefully obſerved, may lead into it, ſee Jer. vi. 16. Job xxii. 15.

℣. 11. Are the conſolations of God ſmall with thee? &c.] Meaning either thoſe which Eliphaz and his friends had adminiſtred, when, upon his repentance and reformation, they promiſed him great and good things that ſhould befall him and his family, and that his latter end ſhould be greater than his beginning; which Job ſlighted, took no notice of, nor entertained any hope concerning it; and theſe they called the conſolations of God, not only becauſe great, as things excellent have the name of God added to them to expreſs their excellency, but becauſe they were adminiſtred in the name of God, and were according to the word and will of God, at leaſt as they thought: Ben Gerſom renders it, the conſolations of theſe; theſe were Bildad and Zophar; ſo Bar Tzemach; or, as others, theſe conſolations [b] which I and my friends have ſuggeſted; but not human, rather divine conſolations are meant; and this is a freſh charge againſt Job, that he made light of ſuch, even the conſolations of God, Father, Son, and Spirit, who are each of them comforters; ſaints may and ſhould comfort one another, and miniſters of the goſpel are Barnabaſes, ſons of conſolation; but God is the great comforter, it is he only can ſpeak and apply comfort to purpoſe; and his conſolations are not to be accounted ſmall, if it be conſidered from whence they come, from the great God, the Creator, to creatures, duſt and aſhes, ſinful ones, on whom they are beſtowed, ſuch as are undeſerving of them, yea, deſerving of the wrath of God, and the curſes of his law; and alſo the nature of theſe comforts, as that they are ſtrong conſolations, and effectual through the power and grace of God, and are everlaſting, the matter and foundation of them being ſo; and though they may be refuſed through unbelief, as being too great in the view of a ſinful creature for himſelf, yet they can never be accounted ſmall, or ſlighted and deſpiſed by a gracious ſoul; nor can it be thought they were by Job, ſince he was ſo diſtreſſed with the arrows of the Almighty, a ſenſe of divine wrath, and was ſo deſirous of the divine preſence, and even begged he might take comfort a little: is there any ſecret thing with thee? any ſecret wiſdom and knowledge which they were ſtrangers to; or any ſecret way of conveying comfort to him they knew not of; or any ſecret ſin in him, any Achan in the camp, that hindered him from receiving comfort, or put him upon ſlighting what was offered to him.

℣. 12. Why doth thine heart carry thee away, &c.] To ſuch conceit of thyſelf, and contempt of others, and even to ſlight the conſolations of God; the heart being deceitful and wicked, ſometimes carries away good men to ſay and do thoſe things which are unbecoming; and if, in any inſtance, this was Job's caſe, it was owing to his own heart, which carried him beyond due bounds; for whenever any man is tempted to do evil, he is drawn away of his own luſt, and enticed, James i. 14. and what do thine eyes wink at? conniving at and ſhutting his eyes againſt his own ſins and iniquities, unwilling to ſee them, and be convinced of them, and own them; or ſhutting them againſt the charges and reproofs of his friends, and all the light and evidence with which they came; or rather, as careleſly attending to them, and ſcoffing and ſneering at them: ſome render it, what do thine eyes aim at [c]? as men, when they take an aim at a mark, wink with or ſhut one eye; what are thy deſigns? what haſt thou in view? what wouldſt thou be at, talking and behaving in ſuch a manner as thou doſt?

℣. 13. That thou turneſt thy ſpirit againſt God, &c.] Not againſt men, his friends only, but againſt God himſelf, being filled with wrath and indignation at him; ſhewing the enmity of his heart unto him, and committing hoſtilities upon him, ſtretching out his hand, and ſtrengthening himſelf againſt him, running upon him, on the thick boſſes of his buckler, as after expreſſed: and letteſt ſuch words go out of thy mouth? as in ch. ix. 22. and x. 3. and xii. 6. and xiii. 22—27.

℣. 14. What is man that he ſhould be clean? &c.] Frail, feeble, mortal man, or woful man, as Mr. Broughton renders it; ſince he is ſinful, whereby he is become ſuch a weak and dying creature: this queſtion, as well as the following, is put by way of contempt, and as leſſening man in a comparative ſenſe, and in order to abate any high conceit of himſelf; who is not naturally clean, but the reverſe, being conceived and born in ſin; nor can he be ſo of himſelf, nor by any means he is capable of; and however clean he may be in his own eyes, or in the eyes of others, yet is not clean in the ſight of God, and ſtill leſs pure than him, his Maker, as in ch. iv. 17. and indeed cannot be clean at all, but through the grace of God, and blood of Chriſt, which cleanſes from all ſin: and he which is born of a woman; a periphraſis of man, ch. xiv. 1. that he ſhould be righteous? as no man is naturally; there is none righteous, no not one; though man originally was made righteous, yet ſinning he loſt his righteouſneſs, and all his poſterity are without any; nor can they become righteous of themſelves, or by any works of righteouſneſs done by them; and though they may truſt in themſelves that they are righteous, and may appear outwardly ſo before men, yet by the deeds of the law no fleſh can be juſtified or accounted righteous in the ſight of God, and much leſs be more juſt than he, as in ch. iv. 17. nor can any of the ſons of men be made or reckoned righteous, but by the obedience of Chriſt, or by that juſtifying righteouſneſs that is in him: what Eliphaz here ſays concerning the impurity, imperfection, and unrighteouſneſs of men are very great truths; but if he aims at Job, as he ſeems to do, he miſſes his mark, and miſtakes the man, and it is in vain with reſpect to him, or as a refutation of any notions of his; for Job aſſerts the corruption and depravity of human nature as ſtrongly as it is expreſſed here, ch. xiv. 4. nor does he ever claim, but diſclaims ſinleſs perfection, ch. ix. 20. nor did he expect to be perſonally juſtified before God by any righteouſneſs of his own, the imperfection of which he was ſenſible of, but by the righteouſneſs of his living Redeemer, ch. ix. 30, 31. and xix. 25. but what he pleaded for was the integrity and uprightneſs of his heart in oppoſition to hypocriſy he was charged with; and the holineſs and righteouſneſs of his life and converſation, in oppoſition to a courſe of living in ſin, or to his being guilty of ſome notorious ſin or ſins for which he was afflicted, as was inſinuated. Eliphaz here recurs to his oracle, ch. iv. 17, 18. and expreſſes it much to the ſame ſenſe.

℣. 15

[b] תנחומות אל conſolationes iſtorum virorum, Vatablus; conſolationes iſtæ. ſo ſome in Druſius. collimant, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Cocceius; ſo Broughton.

[c] ימון

℣. 15. Behold, he putteth no truſt in his ſaints, &c.] In holy men, ſet apart for himſelf by his grace, whoſe ſins are expiated by the blood of his Son, and whoſe hearts are ſanctified by his Spirit, and who live holy lives and converſations, as Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob; theſe, though he truſts many of them with much, as the prophets of old, with the meſſages of his grace and will, and the miniſters of the word with treaſure, in their earthen veſſels, the ſacred depoſitum of the glorious goſpel, with gifts of grace, fitting them for their work, and with the care of the ſouls of men; yet he truſts none of them with themſelves, with the redemption and ſalvation of their ſouls, with the regeneration and ſanctification of their hearts, and with their preſervation to eternal glory; he has put thoſe into the hands of his Son and Spirit, and keeps them by his power through faith unto ſalvation: the Targum renders it, in his ſaints above, in the ſaints in heaven, in glorified men; he is there their all in all, as their happineſs ſo their ſafety and protection; ſee an inſtance of his care and preſervation of them after the reſurrection, when in a perfect ſtate, Rev. xx. 8, 9. or this may be underſtood of the angels, who ſometimes are called ſaints, Deut. xxxiii. 2. who though they have been truſted with many things to impart to the ſons of men, yet not with the ſalvation of men, nor even with the ſecret of it; they were not of God's privy-council when the affair was debated and ſettled; nor with other ſecrets, as the day and hour of the laſt judgment, the coming of the Son of Man: or the ſenſe may be, he putteth no perfection or ſtability [d] in them, that is, perfection in compariſon of his; for if theirs were equal to his, they would be Gods, which it is impoſſible to be, or for God to make them ſuch; and likewiſe ſuch ſtability as to have been able to have ſtood of themſelves, which it appears they had not, ſince many of them fell, and the reſt needed confirming grace, which they have by Chriſt, the head of all principalities and powers: yea, the heavens are not clean in his ſight; heaven-born men, partakers of the heavenly calling, whoſe hearts and affections are ſet on heavenly things, and have their converſation in heaven; yet theſe, in the ſight of a pure and holy God, and in compariſon of him, are impure and unholy; or they of heaven, as Mr. Broughton renders it, the inhabitants of heaven; the angels on high, as the Targum paraphraſes it; theſe are charged by him with folly, and they, conſcious of their imperfection with reſpect to him, cover their faces with their wings, whilſt they celebrate the perfection of his holineſs, who is ſo glorious in it; though the natural heavens may be intended, at leaſt not excluded, and the luminous bodies in them, as Bildad ſeems to explain it, ch. xxv. 5, 6. the ſtars are reckoned the more denſe and thick part of the heavens, the moon has its ſpots, and by later diſcoveries, it ſeems the ſun is not without them, and the heavens are often covered with clouds and darkneſs, and the preſent ones will be purified with fire at the general conflagration, which ſuppoſes them unclean, and they ſhall paſs away, and new ones ſucceed, which implies imperfection in the former, or there would be no need of others; this is the proof Eliphaz gives of what he had ſuggeſted in the preceding verſe.

℣. 16. How much more abominable and filthy is man, &c.] In his natural, corrupt, and unregenerate eſtate; man, as a creature, was not abominable, but becoming ſinful he is; he is ſo in himſelf, caſt out to the loathing of his perſon, being full of wounds, bruiſes, and putrifying ſores, yea, like a dead corrupted carcaſs, for he is dead in treſpaſſes and ſins; and he appears to be corrupt by the abominable works done by him, as all the works of the fleſh are; yea, he is abominable to himſelf, when made ſenſible of his ſtate and caſe; he then abhors himſelf, and repents of his ſins, he loaths his ſins, and himſelf for them; and muſt be much more ſo in the ſight of God, who is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, as man is nothing elſe than a maſs of ſin, and therefore muſt be filthy; for ſin is of a defiling nature, it defiles the body and all its members, and the ſoul with all its powers and faculties: man is naturally and originally filthy, being conceived in ſin, and ſhapen in iniquity; nor can a clean thing be brought out of an unclean; he is internally and univerſally unclean, his heart is a ſink of ſin, deſperately wicked, and wickedneſs itſelf; his mind and conſcience are defiled, and there is no place clean; and this appears outwardly in his actions, in his life and converſation, which is filthy alſo; for if the plowing of the wicked is ſin, and the righteouſneſſes of men are filthy rags, how impure muſt the immoral actions of wicked men be? man is ſo impure, that nothing but the blood of Chriſt can purify his heart, and purge his conſcience from dead works, and make white his outward converſation-garment: which drinketh iniquity like water; it is as natural to him to commit iniquity, as it is for a man to drink water when he is thirſty, and he does it with equal guſt, delight, and pleaſure; as cold water is delightful to a thirſty ſoul, ſo is ſin to a ſinner, a ſweet morſel he holds in his mouth; divers luſts are divers pleaſures, though theſe pleaſures are but for a ſeaſon: ſin, like water, is eaſy to be come at, it is near at hand, it eaſily beſets men, and is all around them, and they eaſily give into it; every one turns to his wicked courſe as readily as the horſe ruſhes into the battle; and the phraſe may be expreſſive of the abundance of ſin committed, like large draughts of water greedily taken down by a man a-thirſt, and repeated again and again; moreover, as water drank enters into men, and is taken down as an harmleſs thing, yet often proves very hurtful and pernicious to them when drank whilſt they are hot, and occaſions diſorders, which iſſue in death; ſo ſin, though it may ſeem harmleſs, and be pleaſing and refreſhing, going down like water, yet it works like poiſon, and is the gall of aſps within a man, and ends in eternal death, if grace prevents not. This is the concluſion and application of the whole to man, arguing from the greater to the leſſer, and ſo proving the impurity and imperfection of man, and that he cannot be clean and righteous before God of himſelf.

℣. 17. I will ſhew thee, hear me, &c.] Here Eliphaz proceeds to illuſtrate and make plain, to clear and defend his former ſentiment and propoſition, and into which the reſt of his friends came; that only wicked, and not righteous men are afflicted of God, eſpecially in ſuch a manner as Job was; and he propoſes to ſhew things worthy of his regard, and not ſuch vain and unprofitable things which Job had uttered; and in order to ſtir up and engage his attention, he ſays what follows: and that which I have ſeen I will declare; what he had been

[d] לא יאמין non poſuit ſtabilitatem, Pagninus; immutabilitatem, ſive perfectionem abſolutam, Vatablus; firmum opus non produxit, Tigurine verſion; non crediturus eſſet firmitatem, Junius & Tremellius.

2

been an eye-witneſs of himſelf; the ſame he had obſerved, ch. iv. 8. and ſuch teſtimonies are moſt regarded, and reckoned moſt authentic and creditable, eſpecially when they come from men of character; ſee Luke i. 1, 2. 1 John i. 1.

℣. 18. Which wiſe men have told from their fathers, &c.] Men wiſe in the beſt ſenſe, not to do evil, but to do good; not worldly wiſe men, but ſuch who have wiſdom, ſound wiſdom in the inward parts; who are wiſe to ſalvation, and who are partakers of divine and ſpiritual wiſdom; and ſuch men, as they would never tell an untruth, ſo they would never report a falſe or a fooliſh thing they had heard, nor any thing but upon a good teſtimony, what they have received from their fathers, who were alſo wiſe and good men; and therefore ſuch a teſtimony, though not ocular, but by tradition, deſerves regard: and have not hid it; their fathers did not hide it from them, and what they have received from their fathers, they did not hide it from their children; and ſo it came to be handed down from one to another with great truth, exactneſs, and certainty, and to be depended upon, ſee Pſ. xliv. 1. and lxxviii. 3, 4.

℣. 19. Unto whom alone the earth was given, &c.] Who were entruſted with the government of whole kingdoms and nations; and therefore not mean men, but perſons of great conſequence, and to be credited; being ſuch as were appointed by God, and by him put into ſuch an high office, for which they were qualified by him; and being obſerved to be ſuch by men, were made choice of by them to take the government of them: this is not to be reſtrained to the land of Canaan, and to Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, to whom it was given, and to their poſterity; and who it is very probable at this time did not yet enjoy it; but it reſpects more and larger tracts of land, and the rulers of them, and at a greater diſtance of time, and very likely Noah and his ſons, to whom the whole earth was given, and by whom it was repleniſhed, and among whom it was divided; this ſeems oppoſed to what Job had ſaid, ch. ix. 24. and no ſtranger paſſed among them; either there was no wicked man among them, a ſtranger to God and godlineſs; or an enemy that invaded them, paſſed through them, diſturbed and diſpoſſeſſed them of their power and ſubſtance; which ſhews how wiſe and good men are regarded by the Lord, and not diſtreſſed and afflicted as wicked men be; as well as ſerves to ſtrengthen the credit of their character, and the report received and derived from them by tradition, and tacitly glances at Job's diſtreſs and diſturbance by the Chaldeans and Sabeans; next follows the account of the things either ſeen by Eliphaz, or handed down from ſuch credible perſons now deſcribed.

℣. 20. The wicked man travaileth with pain all his days, &c.] Either to commit iniquity, which he is at great pains to do, and even to wearineſs; and, agreeable to the metaphor uſed, he conceives it in his heart, he travails with it in his mind, and he brings forth falſhood and a lye, what diſappoints him, and which iſſues in death, eternal death, ſee Pſ. vii. 14. James i. 14, 15. or to get wealth and riches, in obtaining of which he pierces himſelf through with many ſorrows; and theſe being like thorns, in uſing them he gets many a ſcratch, and has a good deal of trouble, pain and uneaſineſs in keeping them, inſomuch that he cannot ſleep comfortably through fear of loſing them; wherefore he does not enjoy that peace, comfort, and happineſs it may be thought he does; and beſides all this, he has many an inward pain and gripe of conſcience for his many ſins and tranſgreſſions, which lie at the door of conſcience, and when it is opened ruſh in, and make ſad work, and put him to great pain and diſtreſs; for otherwiſe this cannot be ſaid of every wicked man, that they are in outward pain and diſtreſs, or in uncomfortable circumſtances, at leaſt in appearance; for of ſome it is ſaid, they are not in trouble as other men, neither are they plagued like other men, Pſ. lxxiii. 5. they live wholly at eaſe, and are quiet, and die ſo, at leaſt ſeemingly: ſome reſtrain this to ſome particular perſon whom Eliphaz might have in view; the Targum paraphraſes it of wicked Eſau, who it was expected would repent, but did not; others think that he had in his eye ſome notorious oppreſſor, that had lived formerly, or in his time, as Nimrod, the mighty hunter and tyrant, or Chedorlaomer, who held for ſome years ſeveral kings in ſubjection to him; but it is much if he does not deſign Job himſelf; however, he forms the deſcription of the wicked man in ſuch a manner, that it might as near as poſſible ſuit his caſe, and in many things he plainly refers to it: and this is a ſad caſe indeed, for a wicked man to travail in pain all his days in this life, and in the world to come to ſuffer the pains of hell-fire to all eternity; the pains of a woman, to which the alluſion is, are but ſhort at moſt, but thoſe of the wicked man are for life, yea, for ever; and among the reſt of his pains of mind, eſpecially in this world, what follows is one, and which gives much uneaſineſs: and the number of years is hidden to the oppreſſor; Mr. Broughton renders it, ſoon numbered years; that is, few, as the years of man's life at moſt are but few, and thoſe of the oppreſſor fewer ſtill, ſince bloody and deceitful men do not live out half the days of the years of man's life, but are oftentimes cut off in the midſt of their days; and be they more or fewer, they are all numbered and fixed, and the number of them is with God, and him only; they are fixed and ſettled by the decree of God, and laid up in his purpoſes, and reſerved for the oppreſſor; but they are a ſecret to him, he does not know how long he ſhall live, or how ſoon he may die, and then there will be an end of his oppreſſion and tyranny, and of his enjoyment of his wealth and riches unjuſtly got; and this frets him, and gives him pain, and makes him uneaſy; whereas a good man is eaſy about it, he is willing to wait his appointed time, till his change comes; he is not ſo much concerned to know the time of his death, as to be in a readineſs for it. The Targum paraphraſes this of Iſhmael the mighty: the oppreſſor is the ſame with the wicked man in the preceding clauſe.

℣. 21. A dreadful ſound is in his ears, &c.] Or a voice, or ſound of fears [a], of what cauſes fears; and which are either imaginary; ſometimes wicked men fear when there is no cauſe or occaſion for it; they fancy an enemy at their heels, and flee, when none purſues them; they are a Magor Miſſabib, a fear to themſelves and all about them; like Cain, who fancied and feared, that every man that met him would ſlay him; ſuch is the effect of a guilty conſcience: or real; and theſe either extraordinary ſounds, ſuch as were made in the ears of the Syrian hoſt, hoſt, which cauſed them to flee, and leave their tents, and all their ſubſtance in them, 2 Kings vii. 6. or ordinary, as the ſound of the trumpet, the alarm of war, wars and rumours which are very terrible, eſpecially to ſome perſons; or ſounds of fears, reports of one calamity after another, which cauſe fears; and ſo may reſpect Job's troubles, and the dreadful ſound of them in his ears, brought by one meſſenger of bad tidings after another: but there is a more dreadful ſound than either of theſe, which is ſometimes in the ears of wicked men; the terrors of the law of God broken by them, the menaces and curſes of it, and a ſound of hell and damnation, which continually rings in their ears, and fills them with horror and black deſpair; and ſo the Targum, "the voice or ſound of the fears in hell is in his ears;" and among the reſt of his fears what follows is one, and ſo ſome connect the words, that [u] in proſperity the deſtroyer ſhall come upon him; either God the lawgiver, whoſe law he has tranſgreſſed, and who is able, as to ſave his people, ſo to deſtroy the wicked, ſoul and body in hell; and deſtruction from the Almighty, Job himſelf ſays, was a terror to him, ch. xxxi. 23. or a deſtroying angel, ſuch an one as went through the land of Egypt, and deſtroyed the firſt-born, and into the camp of Iſrael, when they committed ſin, and were deſtroyed of the deſtroyer; or ſome enemy, plunderer, and robber, ſuch as the Sabæans and Chaldæans were, and to whom reſpect may be had; or even the devil himſelf, Apollyon, the deſtroyer of the ſouls of men, and who ſometimes wicked men fear will come and carry them away, ſoul and body, to hell; or it may be death is meant, which kills and deſtroys all men; and wicked men are afraid that in the midſt of all their peace and proſperity ſudden deſtruction by death ſhould come upon them, like a thief in the night, and remove them from all their enjoyments; and whether they are or no under any fearful apprehenſions of this, it certainly will be their caſe.

[a] קול פחדים ſonitus timorum, Pagninus, Montanus, Bolducius; to the ſame ſenſe Godurcus, Junius & Tremellius, Mercerus, Cocceius, Schmidt, Schultens.

℣. 22. He believeth not that he ſhall return out of darkneſs, &c.] When he lies down at night he deſpairs of ever ſeeing the light of the morning through fear of an enemy, a robber, a murderer, or of one diſaſter or another, Deut. xxviii. 66, 67. or when he is in any affliction and calamity, which is often ſignified by darkneſs, he can't perſuade himſelf that he ſhall ever be delivered out of it, and reſtored to his former condition again: and here Eliphaz ſeems to glance at Job, who had no hope of his being brought into ſuch a ſtate of proſperity he had been in; whereas good men, when in darkneſs, believe they ſhall be brought again to the light, as the church in Mic. vii. 8, 9. or the infidel, who knows he muſt be laid in the dark and ſilent grave; the heathen man, ſuch as were many of the neighbours of Eliphaz, the Idumeans, among whom he dwelt, who were without the hope of a glorious reſurrection; and which is an article of pure revelation, and which the idolatrous heathen were ſtrangers to, and ſo believed it not, or any deliverance from the grave; or this may reſpect the blackneſs of darkneſs, the outer darkneſs, the darkneſs of hell, which when once a wicked man is caſt into, and enveloped with, he deſpairs, as he well may, of ever being delivered out of it: and he is waited for of the ſword; or by them that kill with the ſword, as the Targum, who lie in wait for him, to rob him, and kill him; or in his own apprehenſion, he ſeems to have nothing but drawn ſwords about him, or a ſword hanging over his head, or the judgments of God ready to fall upon him for his ſins; for he having killed others with the ſword, muſt expect to be killed with it himſelf.

℣. 23. He wandereth abroad for bread, &c.] Either as a plunderer and robber, he roves about to increaſe his worldly power and ſubſtance; or rather being reduced to poverty, wanders about from place to place, from door to door, to beg his bread; which is a curſe imprecated on the poſterity of wicked men, Pſ. cix. 10. ſaying, where is it? where is bread to be had? where ſhall I go for it? where lives a liberal man that will give it freely and generouſly? by this queſtion it ſeems as if it was difficult for ſuch a man to get his bread by begging; he having been cruel and oppreſſive to others, unkind and ungenerous in his time of proſperity, now finds but few that care to relieve him; and indeed a man that has not ſhewn mercy to the indigent, when in his power to have relieved them, cannot expect mercy will be ſhown to him; this he does, wanders about, ſeeking food, whereſoever he is [w]: he knoweth that the day of darkneſs is ready at his hand; either that a day of affliction and adverſity is coming upon him, perceiving his affairs to grow worſe and worſe, or to be immediately and already on him, which obliges him to wander about for bread; or that the day of death is at hand, which he is made ſenſible of by one ſymptom or another; or rather it may be the day of everlaſting darkneſs in hell, the wrath of God to the uttermoſt he has deſerved; he finds the day of judgment is at hand, and the judge at the door, and in a ſhort time he muſt receive the reward of eternal vengeance for the wicked deeds he has done; for ſo the words may be rendered, that the day of darkneſs is prepared by his hand [x]; by the evil works his hand has wrought, and ſo has treaſured up to himſelf wrath againſt the day of wrath, and righteous judgment of God.

℣. 24. Trouble and anguiſh ſhall make him afraid, &c.] Either his preſent troubles ſhall frighten him, they being ſo very diſmal, terrible and diſtreſſing, and make him fear that others were coming on, more dreadful and formidable; or thoſe troubles he fears will be his portion hereafter, theſe terrify him beyond meaſure, even that indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguiſh that ſhall come upon every ſoul of man that doth evil, Rom. ii. 8, 9. they ſhall prevail againſt him as a king ready to the battle; that is, trouble and anguiſh ſhall prevail againſt him; he will be no more able to reſiſt them, than a very inferior force, or even a ſingle man is able to reſiſt a warlike king, attended with a numerous army, and theſe ſet in battle-array; ſuch a man's troubles will come upon him as an armed man, againſt which he cannot ſtand; the Targum is, "they ſhall ſurround him as a king prepared for a footſtool;" who being taken by the enemy ſhall be uſed as a footſtool to mount on horſeback; and as the word has the ſignification of a globe or ball, ſee Iſ. xxii. 18. ſome think it has reſpect to the manner of kings, when taken captive, put into an iron cage, as Bajazet was by Tamerlane; or into an iron hoop, bound hand and foot, and hung up in chains; or, as Ben Gerſom thinks, to the manner of drowning perſons, who uſed to be tied hand and foot, as if rolled up in the form of a globe, [u] Vaſtatorem invaſurum eum, Junius & Tremellius. ſuis factis, Tigurine verſion; per manum ſuam, Schmidt.

[w] So Noldius in Ebr. Concord. part. p. 27.

[x] בידו

globe, and ſo caſt into the water; but rather the reference is to an army, beſieging a place all around in the form of a ball or globe, ſo that there is no eſcaping them; or rather it may be to a king drawing up his army in ſuch a form, ready to engage in battle; or putting it in ſuch a poſition when incamped or intrenched, waiting the motion of the enemy; ſee 1 Sam. xxvi. 5. and ſuch are the troubles that ſurround and prevail againſt a wicked man, ſee Iſ. xxix. 3. the reaſons of the wicked man being brought into ſuch a woful condition follow.

℣. 25. For he ſtretcheth out his hand againſt God, &c.] Being an hater of him, an enemy to him, yea enmity itſelf againſt him; an enemy in his mind, which appears by his wicked works, which are ſo many acts of hoſtility againſt God; all ſins are againſt God, his nature, his will, his law, and all his remonſtrances, exhortations, cautions, and inſtructions; but ſome are more daring and impudent than others, or are committed in a more open, bold, and audacious manner, as were thoſe committed by the inhabitants of Sodom, and thoſe who are ſimilar to them; eſpecially ſuch as ſtrike at the being of God and his perfections, his providence and government of the world; and ſuch as deny theſe may moſt truly be ſaid to ſtretch out their hands againſt God, and ſtrike at him: and this may regard not only ſins committed againſt the light of nature, and the law of God, but againſt the evangelic revelation, the doctrines of the goſpel, and the ordinances of it; for ſuch who deny the one, and reject the other, openly oppoſe themſelves to God, and expoſe themſelves to his wrath and vengeance; for of how much ſorer puniſhment ſhall ſuch be thought worthy, who trample Chriſt and his blood under foot, deſpiſe and diſobey his goſpel: and ſtrengtheneth himſelf againſt the Almighty; by hardening his heart againſt him as Pharaoh did; by putting on a bold and brazen countenance, by ſetting his mouth againſt God in heaven, and ſuffering his tongue to walk through the earth, fearing neither God nor man; by entering into a friendſhip with the world, and making alliances with the enemies of God, even by making a covenant with death, and an agreement with hell; all which is egregious folly and madneſs: for a ſinful man to oppoſe himſelf to God, is to ſet briars and thorns to a conſuming fire; for a weak feeble creature to ſet himſelf againſt the Almighty, who can cruſh him in a moment, and ſend him down to hell, is the height of folly; let the potſherds ſtrive with the potſherds of the earth, but not man with his maker; who ever ſtrengthened or hardened himſelf againſt him, and proſpered?

℣. 26. He runneth upon him, even on his neck, &c.] As a fierce and furious enemy runs upon another with great wrath and fury; as the he-goat in Daniel's viſion ran upon the ram, in the fury of his power, that is, Alexander upon Darius; which inſtance Bar Tzemach refers to; and as an adverſary, who throws down his weapons, and goes in to cloſer quarters, and takes his antagoniſt by the throat, or round the neck, in order to throw him down to the ground; in ſuch a bold and inſolent manner does the wicked man encounter with God; he makes up to him, and flies in his face, and moſt audaciouſly attacks him: or he runs upon him with his neck [y]; with a ſtretched-out neck, in the moſt haughty manner, with a neck like an iron ſinew, and with a brow like braſs: upon the thick boſſes of his bucklers; alluding to ſhields, imboſſed in the middle, where they are thicker than in the other parts, and uſed to have a ſpike of iron ſet in the middle; ſo that it was daring and dangerous to run upon them: theſe may deſign the perfections of God, denied by the wicked man; or his providential diſpenſations, deſpiſed by him; or his purpoſes and decrees ridiculed, replied unto, and diſputed; or the flaming ſword of juſtice, and the curſes of a righteous law, in defiance of which wicked men go on in ſin: or with the boſſes of his bucklers [z]; with all his family, as Schmidt; or employing all his wealth and riches, his power and authority, againſt God, and the intereſt of religion in the world. Some underſtand this of God, meeting the wicked man, ſtretching out his hand, and ſtrengthening himſelf againſt him, as if he, God, ran upon the wicked man, and upon his neck, and took him by it, and ſhook him; as in ch. xvi. 12. and upon the thick boſſes of his buckler, his bones and nerves, as Mr. Broughton; or on his power and wealth, which are not able to ſecure him from the vengeance of the Almighty; but the former ſenſe ſeems beſt.

℣. 27. Becauſe he covereth his face with his fatneſs, &c.] He has no fear of God, nor ſhame for his ſin; he bluſhes not to riſe up againſt God in the manner he does, becauſe his eyes ſtand out with fatneſs; or rather his face is covered with it, that is, he abounds in riches, he enjoys great proſperity, a large affluence of all good things; and this makes him haughty and imperious, neither to fear God, nor regard man, like Jeſhurun, who when he waxed fat, was grown thick, and covered with fatneſs, kicked againſt God, and his providences, ſinned and rebelled againſt him; forſook God which made him, and lightly eſteemed the rock of his ſalvation, Deut. xxxii. 15. and to the ſame purpoſe is the following clauſe: and maketh collops of fat in his flanks; a deſcription of a very fat man, and one that pampers the fleſh, and indulges himſelf in eating and drinking; and, figuratively, of one that abounds in the good things of this world, and which make him vain and proud, and lead him on to commit ſin in a bold and daring way, promiſing himſelf impunity in it, but without any juſt ground for it, as the following verſes ſhew; perhaps ſome reſpect may be had to Job's children feaſting with one another in their proſperity, which led on to ſin, and iſſued in their ruin, as Eliphaz would ſuggeſt.

℣. 28. And he dwelleth in deſolate cities, &c.] This is either a continuation of the account of the wicked man's proſperity, which makes him haughty; ſuch is his might and power, that he deſtroys cities and palaces, built and enjoyed by others, and then out of the ruins of them builds greater cities and more noble palaces, to perpetuate his name to poſterity; which ſenſe agrees with ch. iii. 14. and with the Targum, "and he makes tabernacles in deſert cities, that he may dwell in houſes which were not inhabited;" and ſo Ben Gerſom: and hence becauſe of his ſucceſs among men, and the grandeur he lives in, his heart is lifted up, and his hand is ſtretched out againſt God; or elſe this may expreſs the ſinful courſe of life ſuch a man lives, who chuſes to dwell in deſolate places, and deſerts, to do hurt to others, to ſeize upon travellers as they paſs by, and rob and plunder them of their ſubſtance, ſubſtance, ſitting and waiting for them in ſuch places, as the Arabian in the wilderneſs, Jer. iii. 2. which is the ſenſe of ſome, as Aben Ezra obſerves; or rather this points at the puniſhment of the wicked man, who though for the preſent may be in great proſperity, poſſeſſed of large cities and ſtately palaces, yet or but[a], for ſo the particle may be rendered, he dwelleth in deſolate cities; in ſuch as ſhall become deſolate, being deſtroyed by a ſuperior enemy, that ſhall come upon him; or through his ſubjects forſaking him, not being able to bear his tyranny and cruelty; or he ſhall be driven from his dominions by them, and beobliged to fly, and dwell in deſert places; or he ſhall chuſe to dwell there, through the horrors of a guilty conſcience; or beſt of all, he ſhall be reduced to ſuch diſtreſs and poverty, that he ſhall not have a houſe fit to dwell in; but ſhall inhabit the parched places in the wilderneſs, in a ſalt land, and not inhabited, Jer. xvii. 6. as follows: and in houſes which no man inhabiteth, which are ready to become heaps; ſuch as have been deſerted by their former inhabitants, becauſe come to decay, and ready to fall down upon them, and become heaps of ſtones and rubbiſh.

[y] בצואר ereCto collo, V. L. Piſcator; duro collo, Druſius, Michaelis; cum cervice, Cocceius, Schmidt, Schultens.
[z] בעבי גבי כגניו cum craſſitie umbonum clypeorum ſuorum, Cocceius; ſo Schmidt, Michaelis, Schultens.

℣. 29. He ſhall not be rich, &c.] Though his heart is ſet upon it, he is determined at any rate to be rich; he labours for it with all his might and main, and yet ſhall not attain what he is ſo deſirous of; many who take a great deal of pains to be rich, and even in a lawful way, and are men of underſtanding in trade and buſineſs, and yet riches are not their portion; and ſome who get a great deal, yet don't grow rich; what they get, they put into a bag of holes, and it drops through as faſt as they put in; what they get in one ſinful way, they conſume in another, and ſo are always poor; and others, though they have amaſſed together a vaſt ſubſtance, yet ſtill are but poor men, not uſing what they have either for their own good, or the good of others; and not being content with what they have, but always craving more, and ſo are even poor in their own account, not having what they would have: however, ſuch a man is not rich towards God; for in godly and ſpiritual things, he is deſtitute of the true riches of grace, and has no title to the riches of glory; and as for his earthly riches, theſe ſhall not endure, though he may be rich for the preſent, he will not be always ſo; and this ſenſe the next clauſe confirms; neither ſhall his ſubſtance continue; or his ſtrength[b]; his power and might, a rich man's wealth being his ſtrong city, in which he places his truſt and confidence; riches are called ſubſtance, though they are but a ſhadow, yea, mere non-entities, things that are not, in compariſon of heavenly things; ſee Prov. xxiii. 5. and viii. 22. at leaſt they are not an enduring ſubſtance; they are uncertain things, here to-day, and gone to-morrow; that make themſelves wings, and fly away from the owners of them; or they are taken away from them, and are not like the riches of grace, which are durable riches; or like thoſe of glory; but by one means or another, are taken out of the hands of the poſſeſſors of them, and they are reduced to poverty: and this their ſubſtance ſhall not riſe; or rather, not riſe again[c], as the word may be rendered; notwithſtanding all the pains they may take, their ſubſtance ſhall not riſe, grow, and increaſe; or not riſe up to the former pitch it did, but being fallen into poverty there they lie: neither ſhall he prolong the perfection of it upon the earth; though indeed there is no perfection in the creature, nor in creature-enjoyments, nor in outward riches and ſubſtance; ſuch as have had the largeſt ſhare of them, as David and Solomon, have declared they have ſeen an end of all perfection, and that all things, the higheſt enjoyments, are vanity and vexation of ſpirit; yet when men are got to the ſummit, and height, and perfection of outward happineſs, as they or others may think, this is not prolonged, or continued long in the earth, or they continued in it; but often are ſuddenly caſt down from the pinnacle of honour, wealth, and riches; hence ſome render the words, and their proſperity ſhall not be fixed into the earth[d]; ſhall not take root, though it may ſeem to do, Jer. xii. 2. and ſo ſhall not ſpread itſelf as a tree well rooted does; and as does the ſpiritual proſperity, perfection, and fulneſs of good men, which they have in and by Chriſt; being rooted in the love of God, in the grace of Chriſt, and having the root of the matter in them, they caſt forth their roots as Lebanon, and their branches ſpread, and they are full of the fruits and bleſſings of grace, Hoſ. xiv. 5, 6.

℣. 30. He ſhall not depart out of darkneſs, &c.] Out of the darkneſs of poverty, calamity, and diſtreſs he comes into, and indeed he deſpairs of it himſelf, as in ℣. 22. and in a ſpiritual ſenſe he departs not out of the darkneſs of ſin, out of the dark ſtate of unregeneracy; nor will he depart out of the blackneſs and darkneſs reſerved for him hereafter, when he is once come into it: the flame ſhall dry up his branches; alluding either to a violent drought and heat, which dries up paſtures, herbs, and trees, and the branches of them; or to a wind, as the Septuagint, a burning wind, in the eaſtern countries, which conſumed all green things; or to a flaſh of lightning, which ſhatters, ſtrips, and deſtroys branches of trees: here it may ſignify the wrath of God, like a flame of fire conſuming the wealth and ſubſtance, and families of wicked men; whoſe children particularly may be compared to branches, and ſo reſpect may be had to Job's children, who were ſuddenly deſtroyed by a violent wind, which threw down the houſe in which they were: and by the breath of his mouth ſhall he go away; out of the world, a phraſe expreſſive of death; either becauſe of the breath of his own mouth, as ſome in Jarchi, becauſe of his blaſphemies againſt God and his people, becauſe of his curſing and ſwearing his mouth is full of, and the many vain, fooliſh, and idle words which come out of it, and for which he will be condemned; or rather "by the breath of the mouth of God," as the Targum; either according to his purpoſe and decree, and by his order, and the word that goes out of his mouth; the wicked man ſhall be obliged to depart out of the world at once, being ſtruck dead by him, as Ananias and Sapphira were; or by his powerful wrath and vengeance, whoſe breath is as a ſtream of brimſtone, and with which he will ſlay the wicked of the earth, and particularly will conſume the wicked one, Antichriſt, even with the ſpirit of his mouth, and with the brightneſs of his coming, Iſ. xi. 4. 2 Theſſ. ii. 8.

℣. 31. Let not him that is deceived truſt in vanity, &c.] Every wicked man is deceived, either by Satan,

[a] So the Annotator of the Aſſembly of Divines.
[b] חילו ejus robur, Mercerus; potentia ejus, Druſius.
[c] לא יקום neque reſurgent opes ejus, Schmidt. V. L. & non pangetur in terram proſperitas eorum, Schultens, [d] ולא יטה לארץ נטלם nec mittet in terra radicem ſuam,

Satan, who deceives the whole world, deceived our firſt parents, and deceives all their poſterity, not only prophane ſinners, but many profeſſors of religion alſo; or by their own hearts, which are deceitful and deſperately wicked; or through the deceitfulneſs of ſin, which promiſes profit, pleaſure, and liberty, and iſſues in ruin, pain, and bondage; and through the deceitfulneſs of riches, which promiſe that ſatisfaction they do not give: and ſuch as are deceived in this manner are prone to truſt in vanity; in men, who in every ſtate, high or low, are altogether vanity; and in creature-enjoyments, in outward riches and wealth, which are all vanity and vexation of ſpirit; and in their own hearts, and the vanity of their minds, which to do is extreme folly; and in their righteouſneſs and external privileges, which will be of no ſervice to them, as to their acceptance with God, and eternal happineſs; and therefore truſt in whatſoever is vain and empty, and affords no ſolid ſatisfaction, real pleaſure, and advantage, is here dehorted from; unleſs the words will be allowed to be juſtly rendered, as I think they may, truſt not in him that is deceived by vanity[c]; by any of the above vain things, ſince he muſt himſelf be a vain man, and therefore not to be confided in; to which ſenſe the Targum inclines; "he will not (or ſhould not) believe in a ſon of man, (or in a man) who errs through falſhood;" the reaſon diſſuading from it follows: for vanity ſhall be his recompenſe; all that a man gets by truſting in vanity, or by truſting in a man deceived, is nothing but emptineſs and vanity; he gets nothing ſolid and ſubſtantial, that will be of any advantage to him here or hereafter; and yet this he will not eaſily believe; and ſo Beza reads the words, he that is deceived by vanity will not believe that vanity ſhall be his recompenſe.

℣. 32. It ſhall be accompliſhed before his time, &c.] Either the recompence or reward of his truſting in vanity, in vain perſons or things, the puniſhment of ſuch a truſt, the ſorrows and troubles following upon it; theſe ſhall come upon the wicked man before his day[f], as it may be rendered; before the day of his death, even before his old age; before the evil days come in a courſe of nature, and thoſe years in which he has no pleaſure: or his life, and the days of his life, ſhall be filled up[g]; or be at an end before his time; not before the time fixed in the decree and purpoſe of God, ch. xiv. 5. but before his own time, that he and his friends thought he might have lived, and as his healthful conſtitution promiſed; or before the then common term of human life; and ſo the phraſe is expreſſive of an immature death: and his branch ſhall not be green; but dried up and wither away; his wealth and riches, his children and family, be utterly extinct; inſtead of being like a branch, green and flouriſhing, ſhall be like a dry ſtick, uſeleſs and unprofitable, only fit for burning; ſee ℣. 30.

℣. 33. He ſhall ſhake off his unripe grape as the vine, &c.] Either the wicked man himſelf ſhall ſhake off or loſe his ſubſtance; or God ſhall ſhake off from him all that was dear and valuable to him; or he ſhall be ſhaken by one providence or another, juſt as a vine is ſhaken by a violent wind and tempeſt, and its unripe grapes are battered off by an hail-ſtorm, or plucked off by the hand, or drop off through rottenneſs; ſo it is ſignified by this metaphor, that a wicked man ſhould be ſtript of his wealth and riches in a ſudden manner; or his children ſhould be ſnatched from him in their youth, before they were well grown up to maturity, and ſo like the unripe grape; perhaps reſpect is had to Job's caſe, both with regard to his ſubſtance and his family: and ſhall caſt off his flower as the olive; which tree when ſhaken in a violent manner, drops its flower, and ſo brings forth no fruit; it is obſerved by naturaliſts[h], that theſe two trees, the vine and the olive, flouriſh much about the ſame time, and often ſuffer much by ſtorms and tempeſts, which deſtroy their fruits, and eſpecially when rain falls in the time of their flowering; the ſame thing is intended in this clauſe as in the former.

℣. 34. For the congregation of hypocrites ſhall be deſolate, &c.] Hypocrites are ſuch who ſeem to be, and would be thought to be what they are not; they are outwardly righteous before men, but inwardly very wicked; have a form of godlineſs, but are deſtitute of the power of it; pretend to much religion, and to be worſhippers of God, when it is only in outward appearance, and not in reality and ſincerity: and ſuch as theſe have been in the congregations of the righteous, in all ages; but here Eliphaz ſpeaks of a congregation of them, a ſociety, a family of them; and very probably has his eye upon Job's, and would repreſent hereby, that he, the head of his family, and his children, when living, and his ſervants and aſſociates, were all hypocrites, and now become deſolate, reduced to want and poverty, and in diſtreſſed circumſtances: or were ſolitary[i] and alone, as the word is rendered in ch. iii. 7. deſtitute of friends, and of the comforts of life; and perhaps reference may be had to the future ſtate of ſuch, when they ſhall aloud be bid to depart from God, have no ſociety with angels and ſaints, but ſhall have their portion with thoſe of the ſame character with them, hypocrites, in the higheſt degree of torment and miſery, Matt. xxiv. 51. and fire ſhall conſume the tabernacles of bribery; either ſuch tents, or houſes, as were built with money taken as bribes; ſee Hab. ii. 12. or where ſuch who received bribes dwelt; unjuſt judges, who took a gift that blinds the eyes, to pervert juſtice. Job is afterwards by Eliphaz repreſented as if he was an oppreſſor, a wicked magiſtrate, and guilty of ſuch like crimes as here pointed at, ch. xxii. 6—9. and the fire ſaid to conſume the dwelling-places of ſuch, may be underſtood either of material fire, ſuch as came down from heaven, and deſtroyed Job's ſheep; or figuratively, the wrath of God often compared to fire, which would appear in one way or another, to the utter ruin of ſuch perſons, their habitations, and thoſe that dwelt in them.

℣. 35. They conceive miſchief, &c.] That is, ſuch wicked perſons, as before deſcribed; they meditate ſin in their minds, and contrive how to commit it, and form ſchemes within themſelves to do miſchief to others: and they bring forth vanity; or ſin; for luſt when it is conceived bringeth forth ſin, and that is vanity, an empty thing, and neither yields profit nor pleaſure in the iſſue, but that which is uſeleſs and unſerviceable, yea hurtful and ruinous; for ſin when it is finiſhed, bringeth forth death, death, even death eternal, Jam. i. 14, 15. and their belly prepareth deceit; their inward part frames and deviſes that which is deſigned to deceive others, and in the end proves deceitful to themſelves: the alluſion is to a pregnant woman, or rather to one who ſeems to be ſo, and whoſe conception proves abortive, and ſo deceives and diſappoints herſelf and others; ſee Pſ. vii. 14.

[c] בשו נתעה per vanitatem deceptus, Beza; ſo Tigurine verſion. [f] בלא יומו ante diem ſuam, Vatablus, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator. [g] המלא complebitur, Montanus; implebitur, Schultens, [h] Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 16. c. 25. l. 17. c. 2, 24. [i] גלמוד ſolitarium, Montanus; and to the ſame Senſe Vatablus, Beza, Tigurine verſion, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Druſius, Cocceius.

CHAP. XVI.

THIS chapter and the following contain Job's reply to the preceding diſcourſe of Eliphaz, in which he complains of the converſation of his friends, as unprofitable, uncomfortable, vain, empty, and without any foundation, ℣. 1, 2, 3. and intimates that were they in his caſe and circumſtances, he ſhould behave in another manner towards them, not mock at them, but comfort them, ℣. 4, 5. though ſuch was his unhappy caſe, that whether he ſpoke or was ſilent, it was much the ſame; there was no alloy to his grief, ℣. 6. wherefore he turns himſelf to God, and ſpeaks to him, and of what he had done to him, both to his family, and to himſelf; which things as they proved the reality of his afflictions, were uſed by his friends as witneſſes againſt him, ℣. 7, 8. and then enters upon a detail of his troubles, both at the hands of God and man, in order to move the divine compaſſion, and the pity of his friends, ℣. 9—14. which occaſioned him great ſorrow and diſtreſs, ℣. 15, 16. yet aſſerts his own innocence, and appeals to God for the truth of it, ℣. 17, 18, 19. and applies to him, and wiſhes his cauſe was pleaded with him, ℣. 20, 21. and concludes with the ſenſe he had of the ſhortneſs of his life, ℣. 22. which ſentiment is enlarged upon in the following chapter.

℣. 1. Then Job anſwered and ſaid;] As ſoon as Eliphaz had done ſpeaking, Job ſtood up, and made the following reply.

℣. 2. I have heard many ſuch things: &c.] As thoſe Eliphaz has been diſcourſing of, concerning the puniſhment of wicked men; many inſtances of this kind had been reported to him from his preceptors, and from his parents, and which they had had from theirs, as well as Eliphaz had from his; and he had heard theſe things, or ſuch like, told many times from one to another, as Ben Gerſom interprets it; or frequently, as the Vulgate Latin verſion, yea he had heard them his friends ſay many things of this kind; ſo that there was nothing new delivered, nothing but what was crambe millies cocta, the ſame thing over and over again; inſomuch that it was not only needleſs and uſeleſs, but nauſeous and diſagreeable, and was far from carrying any conviction with it, or having weight and influence upon him; that he only gave it the hearing, and that was all, and ſcarce with any patience, it being altogether unapplicable to him: that wicked men were puniſhed for their ſins, he did not deny; and that good men were alſo afflicted, was a very plain caſe; and that neither good nor hatred, or an intereſt in the favour of God or not, were not known by theſe things; nor could any ſuch concluſion be fairly drawn, that becauſe Job was afflicted, that therefore he was a bad man: miſerable comforters are ye all; his friends came to comfort him, and no doubt were ſincere in their intentions; they took methods, as they thought, proper to anſwer ſuch an end; and were ſo ſanguine as to think their conſolations were the conſolations of God, according to his will; and bore hard upon Job for ſeeming to ſlight them, ch. xv. 11. to which Job here may have reſpect; but they were ſo far from adminiſtring divine conſolation, that they were none at all, and worſe than none; inſtead of yielding comfort, what they ſaid added to his trouble and affliction; they were, as it may be rendered, comforters of trouble, or troubleſome comforters, [k] which is what rhetoricians call, an oxymoron; what they ſaid, inſtead of relieving him, laid weights and heavy preſſures upon him, he could not bear; by ſuggeſting his afflictions were for ſome enormous crime and ſecret ſin that he lived in the commiſſion of; and that he was no other than an hypocrite; and unleſs he repented and reformed, he could not expect it would be better with him; and this was the ſentiment of them one and all: ſo to perſons under a ſenſe of ſin, and diſtreſſed about the ſalvation of their ſouls, legal preachers are miſerable comforters, who ſend them to a convicting, condemning, and curſing law, for relief; to their duties of obedience to it for peace, pardon, and acceptance with God; who decry the grace of God in man's ſalvation, and cry up the works of men; who lay aſide the perſon, blood, and righteouſneſs of Chriſt, the conſolation of Iſrael, and leave out the Spirit of God the comforter, in their diſcourſes; and indeed all that can be ſaid, or directed to, beſides the conſolation that ſprings from God by Chriſt, thro' the application of the Spirit, ſignifies nothing; for if any comfort could be had from any other, he would not be as he is called, the God of all comfort; all the creatures and creature-enjoyments, even the beſt are broken ciſterns, and like the deceitful brooks Job in ch. vi. compares his friends to, that diſappoint when any expectations of comfort are raiſed upon them.

℣. 3. Shall vain words have an end? &c.] Or words of wind [l], vain empty words, great ſwelling words of vanity, mere bubbles that look big, and have nothing in them; here Job retorts what Eliphaz had inſinuated concerning him, and his words, ch. xv. 2. 3. and he intimates ſuch worthleſs diſcourſes ſhould have an end, and a ſpeedy one, and not be carried on to any length, they not bearing it; and wiſhes they were at an end, that he might hear no more of them; and ſuggeſts that it was weak and fooliſh in them, to continue them; that if they could ſpeak to no better purpoſe, it would be beſt to be ſilent: or what emboldeneth thee that thou anſwereſt? when men are engaged in a good cauſe, have truth on their ſide, and are furniſhed with arguments ſufficient to defend it; this animates and emboldens them to ſtand up in the defence of it, and to anſwer their adverſaries, and to reply when there is occaſion; but Job could not imagine, what ſhould encourage and ſpirit up Eliphaz to anſwer again, when he had been ſufficiently confuted; when his cauſe was bad, and he had no ſtrong reaſons to produce in the vindication of it: or what has exaſperated rated or provoked thee [l] to make reply? here Job ſeems to have thought that he had ſaid nothing that was irritating, tho' it is notorious he had, ſuch were his grief and troubles; and ſo well aſſured he was of his being in the right, that the harſh and ſevere words and expreſſions he had uſed, were not thought by him to have exceeded due bounds, ſuch as ch. xii. 2. 3. and xiii. 2. 4.

[k] מנחמי עמל conſolatores moleſtiæ, Vatablus, Druſius, Mercerus, Cocceius, Schmidt, Michaelis; moleſti, Beza, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Codurcus, Tigurine verſion; moleſtiſſimi, Schultens. [l] לדברי רוח verbis venti, Beza, Bolducius, Mercerus, Schmidt, Michaelis.

℣. 4. I alſo could ſpeak as ye do, &c.] As big words, with as high a tone, with as ſtiff a neck, and as haughtily and loftily; or ought I to ſpeak as you do [m]? that I ought not, nor would you think I ought, if you were in my caſe; or being ſo, would I ſpeak as you do [n]? no, I would not, my conſcience would not ſuffer me: if your ſoul were in my ſouls ſtead; in the ſame afflicted ſtate and condition, in the ſame diſtreſſed caſe and circumſtances; not that he wiſhed it, as ſome render the words, for a good man will not wiſh hurt to another; only he ſuppoſes this, as it was a caſe ſuppoſeabe, and not impoſſible to be a fact, ſome time or another, in this ſtate of uncertainty and change; however it is right to put ourſelves in the caſe of others in our own imagination, that ſo it may be conſidered in the proper point of view, and we may better judge how we ſhould chuſe to be treated ourſelves in ſuch circumſtances, and ſo teach us to do that to others, as we would have done to ourſelves: I could heap up words againſt you; talk as faſt as you to me, and run you down with a great torrent of words; Job had a great fluency, he talked a great deal in his afflicted ſtate, too much as his friends thought, who repreſent him as dealing in a multitude of words, and as a very talkative man, ch. viii. 2. and xi. 2. and what could he have done, had he his health, and in proſperous circumſtances as formerly? he could have brought many charges and accuſations againſt them, as they had againſt him: or would I heap up words againſt you, or ought I &c. no, it would not be my duty, nor would I do it; humanity and good ſenſe would never have allowed me to do it; but on the contrary, I would have joined myſelf with you, in a ſocial free and familiar manner in words, [p] in a friendly conjunction with you, ſo the words may be read and paraphraſed; I would have come and paid you a viſit, and ſat down by you, and entered into a kind and compaſſionate confabulation with you about your caſe and condition, and done all I could to comfort you; I would have framed and compoſed (as the word uſed ſignifies) a ſet diſcourſe on purpoſe; I would have ſought out all the acceptable words, and put them together in the beſt manner I could for you [q]; had I the tongue of the learned, I would have made uſe of it, to have ſpoken a word in ſeaſon to you: and ſhake mine head at you; by way of ſcorn and deriſion, that is, he could have done it as well as they; ſhaking the head is uſed as a ſign of contempt, Pſ. xxii. 8. Lam. ii. 15. or would I, or ought I to ſhake my head at you [r] if in my caſe? no, I would not, as I ought not, I would have ſcorned to have done it; or the ſenſe may be, I would have ſhook my head at you, in a way of pity, bemoaning, lamenting, and condoling your caſe [s]; ſee Job xlii. 11. Nahum iii. 7.

℣. 5. But I would ſtrengthen you with my mouth, &c.] Comfort them with the words of his mouth; ſo God ſtrengthens his people with ſtrength in their ſouls, when he anſwers them with good and comfortable words; an angel ſtrengthened Chriſt as man when in an agony, comforting him, ſuggeſting comfortable things to him; ſo one ſaint may ſtrengthen and comfort another when in diſtreſs, whether of ſoul or body; ſee Pſ. cxxxviii. 3. Luke xxii. 43. 32. and thus Job had ſtrengthened and comforted others, with his words in former times, as Eliphaz himſelf owns, ch. iv. 3. 4. and ſo he would again, were there a change in his circumſtances, and objects preſented; and the moving of my lips ſhould aſſwage your grief; words uttered by him, which are done by the moving of the lips, ſhould be ſuch as would have a tendency to allay grief, to ſtop, reſtrain, forbid and leſſen ſorrow; at leaſt that it might not break out in an extravagant way, and exceed bounds, and that his friends might not be ſwallowed up with overmuch ſorrow.

℣. 6. Though I ſpeak, my grief is not aſſwaged, &c.] Tho' he ſpoke to God in prayer, and intreated for ſome abatement of his ſorrows, he got no relief; and tho' he ſpoke to himſelf in ſoliloquies, his ſorrow was not repreſſed nor leſſened; he could not adminiſter comfort to himſelf in the preſent caſe, tho' he might to others in like circumſtances, if his own were changed; and though I forbear ſpeaking, hold my peace, and ſay nothing, what am I eaſed? or what goes from me [t]? not any thing of my trouble or grief; ſometimes a man ſpeaking of his troubles to his friends gives vent to his grief, and he is ſomewhat eaſed; and on the other hand being ſilent about it, he forgets it, and it goes off; but in neither of thoſe ways could Job be releaſed: or it may be his ſenſe is, that when he ſpake of his affliction, and attempted to vindicate his character, he was repreſented as an impatient and paſſionate man, if not as blaſphemous, ſo that his grief was rather increaſed, than aſſwaged; and if he was ſilent that was interpreted a conſciouſneſs of his guilt; ſo that let him take what courſe he would, 'twas much the ſame, he could get no eaſe nor comfort.

℣. 7. But now he hath made me weary, &c.] Or it hath made me weary [u]; that is, my grief, as it may be ſupplied from the former verſe; or rather God, as appears from the next clauſe, and from the following verſe, where he is manifeſtly addreſſed; who by afflicting him had made him weary of the world, and all things in it, even of his very life, ch. x. 1. his afflictions were ſo heavy upon him, and preſſed him ſo hard, that his life was a burden to him; they were heavier than the ſand of the ſea, and his ſtrength was not equal to them; he could ſcarcely drag along, was ready to ſink and lie down under the weight of them: thou haſt made deſolate all my company, or congregation [w]; the congregation of ſaints that met at his houſe for religious worſhip, as ſome think, which now thro' his affliction was broke up, whom Eliphaz had called a congregation of hypocrites, ch. xv. 34. which paſſage Job may have reſpect unto; or rather his family, his children, which were taken away from him: the Jews ſay [x], ten perſons in any place make a congregation; this was juſt the number of Job's Children, ſeven ſons and three daughters; daughters; or it may be he may have reſpect to his friends, that came to viſit him, who were moved and ſtupified as it were at the ſight of him and his afflictions, as the word[r] is by ſome tranſlated, and who were alienated from him; were not friendly to him, nor adminiſtered to him any comfort; ſo that they were as if he had none, or worſe.

---

[l] כה ימריצך quid exacerbat te, Junius & Tremellius; ſo Codurcus, Schultens. [m] ככם אדברה ſicut vos loqui deberem? Schmidt. [n] Etiam ego ut vos loquerer? Cocceius; ſo Broughton. [o] אחבירה עליכם במלים nectere deberem nexus contra vos verbis? Schmidt. [p] Adjungerem me ſuper vos in ſermonibus, Montanus, Bolducius; ſo Vatablus, Cocceius. [q] Vobis enim aptum ſermonem accommodarem, Tigurine verſion; ſo Codurcus. [r] אניעה-ראשי & caput meum quaſſarem ſuper vobis, Cocceius; movere deberem ſuper vos caput meum? Schmidt. [s] So Tigurine verſion and Bar Tzemach, κινησας φα καρη. Hom. Il. 17. v. 200. [t] כה מני יהלך quid a me abit, Junius & Tremellius, Schultens. [u] Dolor meus, V. L. ſo Aben Ezra & Cocceius. [w] עדתי meam congregationem, Pagninus; conventum meum, Montanus, Bolducius. [x] Vid. Druſium in loc.

℣. 8. And thou haſt filled me with wrinkles, &c.] Not thro' old age, but thro' affliction, which had ſunk his fleſh, and made furrows in him, ſo that he looked older than he was, and was made old thereby before his time; ſee Lam. iii. 4. for this is to be underſtood of his body, for as for his ſoul, that thro' the grace of God, and righteouſneſs of Chriſt, was without ſpot or wrinkle, or any ſuch thing: which is a witneſs againſt me; as it was improved by his friends, who repreſented his afflictions as proofs and teſtimonies of his being a bad man; tho' theſe wrinkles were witneſſes for him, as it may be as well ſupplied, that he really was an afflicted man: and my leanneſs riſing up in me; his bones ſtanding up, and ſtanding out, and having ſcarce any thing on them but ſkin, the fleſh being gone: beareth witneſs to my face; openly, manifeſtly, to full conviction; not that he was a ſinful man, but an afflicted man; Eliphaz had no reaſon to talk to Job of a wicked man's face being covered with fatneſs, and of collops of fat on his flanks, ch. xv. 27.

℣. 9. He teareth me in his wrath, who hateth me, &c.] By whom is meant not ſatan as Jarchi, tho' he is an enemy to, and an hater of mankind, eſpecially of good men; nor Eliphaz, as others, who had, fallen upon Job with a great deal of wrath and fury, tearing his character in pieces, which Job attributed to his hatred of him; but it rather appears from the context, that God himſelf is intended, of whom Job had now a miſtaken notion and apprehenſion; taking him for his enemy, being treated by him, as he thought, as if he had an averſion to him, and an hatred of him; whereas God hates none of his creatures, being his offspring, and the objects of his tender care, and providential regard: indeed ſin is hateful to him, and makes men odious in his ſight, and he hates all the workers of iniquity, and thoſe whom he paſſed by, when he choſe others; tho' they are ſaid to be hated by him as Eſau was, yet not with a poſitive but a negative hatred; that is, are not loved by him; and conſidered as profane and ungodly perſons, and as ſuch fore-ordained to condemnation; for ſin may be ſaid to be hated, but good men never are; God's choſen ones, his children and ſpecial people, are the objects of his everlaſting love; and tho' he may be angry with them, and ſhew a little ſeeming wrath towards them, yet never hates them; hatred and love are as oppoſite as any two things can poſſibly be; and indeed ſtrictly and properly ſpeaking, there is no wrath nor fury in God towards his people; tho' they deſerve it, they are not appointed to it, but are delivered from it by Chriſt; and neither that nor any of the effects of it ſhall ever light on them; but Job concluded this from the providence he was under, in which God appeared terrible to him, like a lion or any ſuch fierce and furious creature, to which he is ſometimes compared, and compares himſelf, which ſeizes on its prey, and tears and rends it to pieces; Iſ. xxxviii. 13. Hoſ. v. 14. thus God permitted Job's ſubſtance to be taken from him by the Chaldeans and Sabeans; his children by death, which was like tearing off his limbs; and his ſkin and his fleſh to be rent and broken by boils and ulcers: Job was a type of Chriſt in his ſorrows and ſufferings; and tho' he was not now in the beſt frame of mind, the fleſh prevailed, and corruptions worked, and he expreſſed himſelf in an unguarded manner, yet perhaps we ſhall not find in any part of this book, things expreſſed, and the language in which they are expreſſed, more ſimilar and to be accommodated to the caſe, and ſorrows, and ſufferings of Chriſt, than in this context; for tho' he was the ſon of God's love, his dear and well beloved ſon, yet as he was the ſurety of his people, and bore and ſuffered puniſhment in their ſtead, juſtice behaved towards him as tho' there was a reſentment unto him, and an averſion of him; yea, he ſays thou haſt caſt off and abhorred, thou haſt been wroth with thine Anointed or Meſſiah, Pſ. lxxxix. 38. and indeed he did bear the wrath of God, the vengeance of juſtice or curſe of the righteous law; and was ſuffered to be torn in every ſenſe, his temples with a crown of thorns, his cheeks by thoſe that plucked off the hair, his hands and feet by the nails driven in them, and his ſide by the ſpear; and his life was torn, ſnatched and taken away from him in a violent manner: he gnaſheth upon me with his teeth; as men do when they are full of wrath and fury: this is one way of ſhewing it, as the enemies of David, a type of Chriſt, and the ſlayers of Stephen his proto-martyr did, Pſ. xxxv. 16. Acts vii. 34. and as beaſts of prey, ſuch as the lion, wolf, &c. do: mine enemy ſharpeneth his eyes upon me; the Targum adds as a razor. Here again Job conſiders God as his enemy though he was not, miſinterpreting his dealings with him; he repreſents him as looking out ſharp after him, inſpecting narrowly into all his ways and works and actions, ſtrictly obſerving his failings and infirmities, calling him to an account, and afflicting him for them, and dealing rigidly and ſeverely with him for any ſmall offence: his eyes ſeemed to him to be like flames of fire, to ſparkle with wrath and revenge; his face, as he imagined, was ſet againſt him, and his eyes upon him to deſtroy him; and thus the eye of vindictive juſtice was upon Chriſt his antitype, when he was made ſin and a curſe for his people, and the ſword of juſtice was awaked againſt him, and thruſt in him.

℣. 10. They have gaped upon me with their mouth, &c.] Here Job ſpeaks of the inſtruments which God ſuffered to uſe him ill; and he has reſpect to his friends who came with open mouth againſt him, loading him with calumnies and reproaches, laying charges to him he was not conſcious of, and treating him with ſcorn and contempt, which ſuch a geſture is ſometimes a token of, Lam. iii. 46. and ii. 15. and in which manner alſo Chriſt was uſed by men, on whom the reproach of them that reproached God and his people fell, and who exhibited falſe charges againſt him of various ſorts; and he was the reproach of men and the contempt of the people, who laughed him to ſcorn, opened their mouths in deriſion; they ſhot out the lip and ſhook the head, and mocked and ſcoffed at him; yea, they gaped upon him with their mouth as a ravening and a roaring lion, Pſ. xxii. 6—7—13; to which the alluſion is here, when they cried out themſelves and called upon others to join them, ſaying, Crucify him, crucify him: they have ſmitten me on the cheek reproachfully; to be ſmitten on the cheek is a reproach itſelf, and is a ſuffering not very patiently endured. Hence Chriſt, to teach his followers patience, adviſed when they were ſmitten on the one cheek to turn the other, that is, to take the blow patiently; and it is not the ſmart of the ſtroke that is ſo much regarded as the ſhame of it; the affront given, and the indignity offered; ſee 2 Cor. xi 20, 21. Mat. v. 39. ſo that the phraſe may be taken for reproaching him; and indeed it may be rendered, dered, they have ſmitten on the cheek with reproach [a]; they reproached him, which was the ſame as if they had ſmitten him on the cheek; they ſmote him with their tongues, as Jeremiah's enemies ſmote him; they threw the dirt of ſcandal and calumny at him, and which is the common lot of God's people; and tho' ſince they are reproached for Chriſt's ſake, for the goſpel's ſake, and for righteouſneſs-ſake, they ſhould not be diſturbed at that; but rather reckon themſelves happy, as they are ſaid to be, and bind theſe reproaches about their necks as chains of gold, and eſteem them greater riches than all the treaſures of Egypt. This was literally true of Job's antitype, the Meſſiah, for as it was foretold of him that he ſhould give his cheek to thoſe that plucked off the hair, and they ſhould ſmite the judge of Iſrael with a rod upon his cheek. Iſ. l. 6. Mic. v. i. ſo this was done unto him by the ſervants of the high-prieſt in his hall, and by others, Matt. xxvi. 67. John xviii. 22. they have gathered themſelves together againſt me; Job's friends got together in order to viſit him and comfort him, but it proved otherwiſe, and he viewed it in no other light than as a combination againſt him: the words may be rendered, they filled themſelves againſt me [b]; their hearts with wrath and anger, as the Targum; their mouths with reproaches and calumnies, and their eyes with pleaſure and delight, and ſatisfaction at his miſeries and afflictions; and ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion, "they are ſatiated with my puniſhments; though rather this may reſpect the high ſpirits they were in, the boldneſs and even impudence, as Job interpreted it, they ſhewed in their conduct towards him, their hearts being ſwelled with pride and haughtineſs and paſſion [c]; ſee Eſth vii. 5. Acts v. 3. or elſe their numbers that came againſt him; ſo Mr. Broughton, renders the words, they came by full troops upon me; Job's three friends being great perſonages, very probably brought a large retinue and train of ſervants with them; who obſerving their maſter's conduct, behaved in an indecent manner towards him themſelves, to whom he may have reſpect, ch. xxx. 1. this was verified in Chriſt his antitype, whom Judas, with a multitude of men, with ſwords and ſtaves, even with a band of ſoldiers, came to apprehend in the garden; and when Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles, and people of Iſrael, were gathered againſt him to do what God had determined ſhould be done, Matt. xxvi. 46. John xviii. 3. Acts iv. 27, 28.

[r] Stupefeciſti, Tigurine verſion; ſo Jarchi.

℣. 11. God hath delivered me up to the ungodly, &c.] The evil or wicked one, for it is in the ſingular number; and deſigns either Satan, into whoſe hands God had not only delivered his ſubſtance, but his perſon, excepting his life; though it may be, and which is an objection to this ſenſe, Job as yet knew it not; or elſe Eliphaz, or the ſingular number being put for the plural, as the next clauſe explains it, all his friends, whom he in turn calls evil and wicked men, becauſe of their treatment of him; or elſe the Sabæans and Chaldeans are intended, who were ſuffered to plunder him of his ſubſtance: the words are very applicable to Chriſt, who was delivered to the Gentiles, and into the hands of ſinners and wicked men, and that by the determinate counſel and foreknowledge of God, who with wicked hands took him, and crucified him, Matt. xx. 19. and xxvi. 45. Acts ii. 23. or God ſhut him up, or delivered him bound [d], as the word ſignifies; which was literally true of Chriſt, who was bound by the Jews, and delivered firſt to the high-prieſt, and then to the Roman governor, in ſuch circumſtances, John xviii. 12, 13. Matt. xxvii. 2. and turned me over into the hands of the wicked; ſignifying the ſame as before, unleſs it ſhould be rendered, and cauſed me to decline, or come down by the hands of the wicked [e]; that is, from his former ſtate of proſperity and happineſs, into the low circumſtances in which he was, and which he was brought into by the means of wicked men, God ſuffering it ſo to be.

℣. 12. I was at eaſe, but he hath broken me aſunder, &c.] He was in eaſy and affluent circumſtances, abounding with the good things of this life, lay in his neſt, as his expreſſion is, ch. xxix. 18. quietly and peaceably, where he expected he ſhould have died; and he was eaſy in his mind, had peace of conſcience, being a good man that feared God, and truſted in his living Redeemer, enjoying the preſence of God, the light of his countenance, and the diſcoveries of his love, ſee ch. xxxix. 2, 3, 4, 5. but now he was broken to pieces, he was ſtripped of his worldly ſubſtance; his family was broken up, and not a child left him; his body was broken, and full of ruptures through boils and ulcers; and his ſpirits were broken with his afflictions, and a ſenſe of divine diſpleaſure; the arrows of God's wrath, in his apprehenſion, ſtuck in him, and the poiſon thereof drank up his ſpirits. Mr. Broughton renders it, I was wealthy, and he hath undone me; though once ſo opulent, he was now broken, and become a bankrupt. It may be applied to Chriſt, his antitype, who, though rich, became poor to make his people rich, 2 Cor. viii. 9. and whoſe body was broken for them; and he was wounded and bruiſed for their tranſgreſſions, and whoſe heart was broken with reproach: he hath alſo taken me by the neck, and ſhaken me to pieces; as a combatant in wreſtling, who is ſtronger than his antagoniſt, uſes him; or as a giant, who takes a dwarf by his neck or collar, and ſhakes him, as if he would ſhake him to pieces, limb from limb; or hath daſhed or broken me to pieces [f]; or to ſhivers; as glaſs or earthen veſſels daſhed againſt a wall, or ſtruck with a hammer, fly into a thouſand pieces, can never be put together again; ſo Job reckoned of his ſtate and condition as irrecoverable, that his health, his ſubſtance, his family could never be reſtored as they had been: and ſet me up for his mark; to ſhoot at, of which he complains ch vii. 20. a like expreſſion is uſed by the church in Lam. iii. 12, 13. and a phraſe ſimilar to this is uſed of Chriſt, Luke ii. 34. and in conſequence of this are what follow.

℣. 13. His archers compaſs me round about, &c.] Satan and his principalities and powers caſting their fiery darts at him; or rather his friends ſhooting their arrows, even bitter words, reproaches and calumnies; or the various diſeaſes of his body, his boils and ulcers, which were ſo many arrows ſhot into him, in every part of him all around, and gave him exquiſite pain and anguiſh; beſides the arrows of the Almighty, or that painful ſenſation he

[a] בחרפה cum opprobrio, Beza, Vatablus, Druſius; ſo Schmidt, Michaelis, Schultens; with reproaches, Broughton.
[b] יתמלאון impleverunt ſeſe, de Dieu. [c] Vid. De Dieu in loc. [d] יסגירני vinctum me tradidit, Grotius, Michaelis, Schultens. [e] ירטני divertere fecit a vita, Pagninus; declinare me facit, Beza, Druſius, Mercerus. [f] יפצפצני confregit me, V. L. Pagninus; minutatim con regit me, Tigurine verſion; ſo Schultens, Jarchi & Ben Gerſom.

he had of the wrath of God. This alſo is true of Chriſt, the antitype of Job and of Joſeph; of the latter of which it is ſaid, the archers ſorely grieved him, and ſhot at him, but his bow abode in ſtrength, Gen. xlix. 23, 24. ſo Satan and his miniſters threw their fiery darts at Chriſt when on the croſs, and the ſcribes and prieſts, his emiſſaries, ſurrounded him there, and ſhot out their reproachful and blaſphemous words at him, and the juſtice of God ſmote him, and the law of God caſt its curſes on him. Guſſetius renders the words, his great ones [g]; and ſuch Job's friends were, men of great ſubſtance, and lived in great credit and honour; ſome have ſuppoſed them to be kings, and ſuch were thoſe that oppoſed Chriſt, and diſtreſſed him, the rulers of the people, civil and eccleſiaſtic: he cleaveth my reins aſunder; by cauſing his arrows to enter into them, Lam. iii. 13. the conſequence of which muſt be death; a man cannot live, at leaſt long, after this is his caſe; though ſome think this is to be underſtood of the diſorder of the ſtone in his reins or kidneys, which was very diſtreſſing to him: and doth not ſpare; ſhews no mercy or pity, tho' in ſuch ſad circumſtances and dreadful agonies; thus God ſpared not his own Son, Rom. viii. 32. he poureth out my gall upon the ground; which is done by piercing the gall-bladder with a ſword, or any ſuch inſtrument, ſee ch. xx. 25. which muſt iſſue in death; and the deſign of both theſe clauſes is to ſhew, that Job looked upon his caſe irretrievable, and he here makes uſe of hyperbolical expreſſions to ſet it forth by.

℣. 14. He breaketh me with breach upon breach, &c.] Upon his ſubſtance, his family, and the health of his body, which came thick and faſt, one after another; referring to the report of thoſe things brought by one meſſenger upon the back of another, ſee Ezek. vii. 26. he runneth upon me like a giant; with great fury and fierceneſs, with great ſtrength and courage, with great ſpeed and ſwiftneſs, cauſing great terror and diſtreſs; he not being able to reſiſt him, any more than a dwarf a giant, and no more, nor ſo much a match for him; ſee Iſ. xlii. 13.

℣. 15. I have ſewed ſackcloth upon my ſkin, &c.] Which he very probably put on when he rent his mantle, or ſat in aſhes; which actions were uſually performed together in times of diſtreſs and ſorrow, ſee Gen. xxxvii. 34. and this was no doubt a voluntary action of his, like that of the king of Nineveh and his ſubjects; though ſome have thought that Job was ſo reduced, that he had no cloaths to wear, and was obliged to put on ſuch coarſe raiment, which is not probable; and it ſeems, that he put this next to his ſkin, which muſt be very uneaſy to one that had been uſed to ſuch ſoft apparel, as it ſeems did alſo the kings of Iſrael in time of mourning, 1 Kings xxi. 27. 2 Kings vi. 30. it is not only obſerved by ſeveral Jewiſh writers, that the word here uſed in the Arabic language ſignifies ſkin, as we render it, as Aben Ezra, Ben Melech, and others; but the ſkin of the wound, the thin ſkin which is drawn over a wound when it is healing, as Ben Gerſom and Bar Tzemach; which being tender, muſt be very unfit to bear ſuch rough raiment upon it; nay, Schultens obſerves, that the Arabic word more properly ſignifies torn ſkin [h], as Job's ſkin muſt be full of ruptures thro' the boils and ulcers upon him; he himſelf ſays, that his ſkin was broken, and become loathſome, ch. vii. 5. now to have ſackcloth put on ſuch a ſkin muſt be intolerable: the phraſe of ſewing it to it, is very unuſual; though it may ſignify no more than an application of it, a putting it on him, and clothing himſelf with it; yet it ſeems to denote its ſticking cloſe to him, as if it was ſewed to his ſkin, through the purulent matter of his boils clotting and cleaving to it; for he ſays in the above place, that his fleſh was clothed with worms and clods of duſt; and thoſe running into one another, were like one ſcab, and, as it were, a garment to him; his diſeaſe bound him about as the collar of his coat, and his ſkin was as black as ſackcloth itſelf, ch. xxx. 18—30. the deſign of the expreſſion is both to ſhew the wretched and miſerable condition he was in, and his great humiliation on account of his preſent circumſtances; and that he was not that proud and haughty man, or behaved under his affliction in the inſolent manner Eliphaz had ſuggeſted, ch. xv. 12, 13, 25, 26. but was one that humbled himſelf under the mighty hand of God, which is farther confirmed by the next clauſe: and defiled my horn in the duſt; as he did when he ſat in aſhes, as he afterwards repented in duſt and aſhes; and it was uſual in the times of mourning to put duſt or aſhes upon the head; which may be meant by his horn, the horn of a beaſt, to which the alluſion is, being in the head; and this may be put for the whole body, which ſometimes, on ſuch occaſions, was rolled in duſt and aſhes, ſee Joſh. vii. 6. Mic. i. 10. and the horn being an emblem of grandeur, power and authority, may denote that Job now laid aſide all the enſigns of it, and was content to have his honour laid in the duſt, and lie low before God, and not lift up his horn unto him, and much leſs ſtretch out his hand againſt him; the Targum is, "I ſprinkled my glory in or with duſt."

℣. 16. My face is foul with weeping, &c.] On account of the loſs of his ſubſtance, and eſpecially of his children; at the unkindneſs of his friends, and over his own corruptions, which he felt working in him, and breaking forth in unbecoming language; and becauſe of the hidings of the face of God from him: the word uſed in the Arabic language [i] has the ſignification of redneſs in it, as Aben Ezra, and others obſerve; of red wine, and as Schultens adds, of the fermentation of it; and is fitly uſed to expreſs a man's face in exceſſive weeping, which looks red, and ſwelled, and blubbered: and on my eyelids is the ſhadow of death; which were become dim through weeping, ſo that he could ſcarcely ſee out of them, and like a dying man could hardly lift them up; and ſuch was his ſorrowful condition, that he never expected deliverance from it, but that it would iſſue in death; and which he ſuppoſed was very near, and that he had many ſymptoms of it, of which the decay of his eye-ſight was one; and he was ſo far from winking with his eyes in a wanton and ludicrous way, as Eliphaz had hinted, ch. xv. 12. that there was ſuch a dead weight upon them, even the ſhadow of death itſelf, that he was not able to lift them up.

℣. 17. Not for any injuſtice in my hands, &c.] Came all thoſe afflictions and calamities upon him, which occaſioned ſo much ſorrow, weeping, mourning and humiliation; he does not ſay there was no ſin in him, not any in his heart, nor in his life, nor any iniquity done by him, he had acknowledged theſe these things before, ch. vii. 20. and ix. 20, 30, 31. but that there was nothing in his hands gotten in an unjuſt manner; he had taken away no man's property, nor injured him in the leaſt in a private way; nor had he perverted juſtice as a public magiſtrate, by taking bribes or accepting perſons, and could challenge any to prove he had, as Samuel did, 1 Sam. xii. 3. alſo my prayer is pure; he prayed, which diſproves the calumny of Eliphaz, ch. xv. 4. and his prayer was pure too; not that it was free from failings and infirmities, which attend the beſt, but from hypocriſy and deceit; it came not out of feigned lips, but was put up in ſincerity and truth; it ſprang from an heart purified by the grace of God, and ſprinkled from an evil conſcience; it was put up in the faith of Chriſt, and as a pure offering through him; Job lifted up pure and holy hands, and with theſe a pure and holy heart, and for pure and holy things; ſo that it was not for want of doing juſtice to men, nor for want of devotion towards God, that he was thus afflicted by him; compare with this what is ſaid of his antitype, Iſ. liii. 9.

[g] Ejus magnates, Comment. Ebr. p. 773. רביו ejus magni, Montanus.

[h] על גלדי ſuper laceram cutem, Schultens; cutis eaque læſa & ulceribus percuſſa, Stockius, p. 188. גלד cutim percuſſit, Hottinger. Smegma Orient. p. 135. Stockius, ib.

[i] חמרמרדה intumuit, V. L. Tigurine verſion; fermenteſcit, Schultens.

℣. 18. O earth, cover not thou my blood, &c.] This is an imprecation, wiſhing that if he had been guilty of any capital crime, of ſuch acts of injuſtice that he ought to be puniſhed by the judge, and even to die for them; that his blood when ſpilt might not be received into the earth, but be licked up by dogs, or that he might have no burial or interment in the earth; and if he had committed ſuch ſins as might come under the name of blood, either the ſhedding of innocent blood, though that is ſo groſs a crime, that it can hardly be thought that Job's friends even ſuſpected this of him; or rather other foul ſins, as injuſtice and oppreſſion of the poor; the Tigurine verſion is, my capital ſins, ſee Iſ. i. 15, 18. then he wiſhes they might never be covered and concealed, but diſcloſed and ſpread abroad every where, that all might know them, and he ſuffer ſhame for them; even as the earth diſcloſes the blood of the ſlain, when inquiſition is made for it, Iſ. xxvi. 21. and let my cry have no place; meaning, if he was the wicked man and the hypocrite he was ſaid to be, or if his prayer was not pure, ſincere and upright, as he ſaid it was, then he deſired that when he cried to God, or to man, in his diſtreſs, he might be regarded by neither; that his cry might not enter into the ears of the Lord of hoſts, but that it might be ſhut out, and he cover himſelf with a cloud, that it might not paſs through, and have any place with him; and that he might not meet with any pity and compaſſion from the heart, nor help and relief from the hand of any man.

℣. 19. Alſo now, behold, my witneſs is in heaven, &c.] That is, God, who dwells in the heavens, where his throne is, and which is the habitation of his holineſs, and from whence he beholds all the ſons of men, and their actions, is the all-ſeeing and all-knowing Being; and therefore Job appeals to him as his witneſs, if he was guilty of the things laid to his charge, to bear witneſs againſt him, but if not to be a witneſs for him, which he believed he would, and deſired he might: for my record is on high; or my teſtimony; that can teſtify for me; who is an eye-witneſs [k], as ſome render it, before whom all things are naked and open; who has ſeen all my actions, even the very inmoſt receſſes of my mind, all the thoughts of my heart, and all the principles of my actions, and him I deſire to bear record of me; ſuch appeals are lawful in ſome caſes, which ought not to be common and trivial ones, but of moment and importance, and which can't well be determined in any in other way; ſuch as was the charge of hypocriſy againſt Job, and ſuſpicions of his having been guilty of ſome notorious crime, though it could not be pointed at and proved; ſee 1 Sam. xii. 3, 4. 2 Cor. i. 13. Phil. i 8.

℣. 20. My friends ſcorn me, &c.] Not that they ſcoffed at his afflictions and calamities, and at his diſeaſes and diſorders, that would have been very brutiſh and inhuman, but at his words, the arguments and reaſons he made uſe of to defend himſelf with, ſee ch. xii. 4. but mine eye poureth out tears unto God; in great plenty, becauſe of his very great ſorrows and diſtreſſes, both inward and outward; and it was his mercy, that when his friends ſlighted and neglected him, yea bore hard upon him, and mocked at him, that he had a God to go to, and pour out not only his tears, but all his complaints, and even his very ſoul unto him, from whom he might hope for relief; and what he ſaid, when he did this, is as follows.

℣. 21. Oh that one might plead for a man with God, &c.] That is, that one might be appointed and allowed to plead with God on his account; or that he be admitted to plead with God for himſelf; or however, that there might be a hearing of his caſe before God, and that he would decide the thing in controverſy between him and his friends, when he doubted not but it would be given on his ſide: as a man pleadeth for his neighbour; uſing great freedom, and powerful arguments, and having no dread of the judge, nor fear of carrying the cauſe for his neighbour; ſo Job wiſhes, that either one for him, or he himſelf might be freed from the dread of the divine Majeſty, and might be ſuffered to ſpeak as freely to his caſe, as a counſellor at the bar does for his client. The words will admit of a more evangelic ſenſe by obſerving that God, to whom Job ſays his eye poured out tears, at the cloſe of the preceding verſe, is to be underſtood of the ſecond perſon in the God-head, Jehovah, the Son of God, the Meſſiah; and then read theſe words that follow thus, and he will plead for a man with God, and the ſon of man for his friend; which laſt clauſe perhaps may be better rendered, even the ſon of man, &c. and ſo they are expreſſive of Job's faith, that though his friends deſpiſed him, yet he to whom he poured out his tears, and committed his caſe, would plead his cauſe with God for him, and thoroughly plead it, when he ſhould be acquitted. The appellation, the ſon of man, is a well-known name for the Meſſiah in the New Teſtament, and is not altogether unknown in the Old, ſee Pſ. lxxx. 17. and one part of his work and office is to be an advocate with the Father for his friends, whom he makes, reckons, and uſes as ſuch, even all the Father has given him, and he has redeemed by his blood; for theſe he pleads his blood, righteouſneſs and ſacrifice, to the ſatisfaction of the law, and juſtice of God, and againſt Satan, and all enemies whatever, and for every bleſſing they want; and for which work he is abundantly fit, becauſe of the dignity of his perſon, his nearneſs to God his Father, and the intereſt he has in him. Guſſetius [l] goes this way, and obſerves, that this ſenſe has not been taken notice of by interpreters, terpreters, which he ſeems to wonder at; whereas our Engliſh annotator on the place had it long ago, and Mr. Caryll after him, though diſapproved of by ſome modern interpreters.

[k] עדי oculatus meus teſtis, Schultens.

[l] Ebr. Comment. p. 320, 321.

℣. 22. When a few years are come, &c.] As the years of man's life are but few at moſt, and Job's years, which were yet to come, ſtill fewer in his apprehenſion; or years of number [m], that are numbered by God, fixed and determined by him, ch. xiv. 5. or being few are eaſily numbered: then I ſhall go the way whence I ſhall not return; that is, go the way of all fleſh, a long journey; death itſelf is meant, which is a going out of this world into another, from whence there is no return to this again, to the ſame place, condition, circumſtances, eſtate and employment as now; otherwiſe there will be a reſurrection from the dead, the bodies will riſe out of the earth, and ſouls will be brought again to be united with them, but not to be in the ſame ſituation here as now: this Job obſerves either as a kind of ſolace to him under all his afflictions on himſelf, and from his friends, that in a little time it would be all over with him; or as an argument to haſten the pleading of his cauſe, that his innocence might be cleared before he died; and if this was not done quickly, it would be too late.

CHAP. XVII.

IN this chapter Job not only enlarges upon the reaſon given in the preceding chapter, why he was deſirous of an advocate with God, and one to plead his cauſe with him for him, ℣. 1. but adds other reaſons taken from the uſage of his friends, from the impoſſibility of any but a divine perſon being his ſurety; and of any one being provided and appointed as ſuch but by God himſelf; from the inſufficiency of his friends to judge of his cauſe, and from the condition and circumſtances he was in, ℣. 2—7. then he takes notice of the effects his preſent caſe would have on good men, that though they might be aſtoniſhed at it, they would be filled with indignation againſt hypocrites, and would not be moved and ſtumbled by his afflictions to apoſtatize from and deſert the good ways of God, ℣. 8, 9. after which he addreſſes his friends, and either calls upon them to renew the diſpute with him, or repent of their notions, and join with him in his ſentiments, ℣. 10. and laſtly deſcribes his ſtate and circumſtances, according to his apprehenſion of things, obſerving the ſhortneſs of his life, and the darkneſs of the diſpenſation he was under, thro' one thing and another, ℣. 11, 12. that he had nothing but the grave in view, which, and its attendants, he had made very familiar with him, ℣. 13, 14. and that he had no hope of reſtoration to a better condition, as to his outward circumſtances, and that he, and his hopes his friends would have him entertain, and they alſo, would go down together to the grave, and there ſhould lie in the duſt, and reſt together till the morning of the reſurrection, ℣. 15, 16.

℣. 1. My breath is corrupt, &c.] Through the force of his diſeaſe, which made it have an ill ſmell, ſo that it was ſtrange and diſagreeable to his wife, ch. xix. 17. paſſing through his lungs, or other parts, which were affected with ſome diſorder, or as frequently is the caſe of dying perſons, and ſo Job thought himſelf to be. The word [n] uſed has the ſignification of pain, even of the pains of a woman in travail; and ſo may ſignify, that Job drew his breath with great pain, as people troubled with an aſthma do, or dying perſons in the hiccups, or juſt fetching their laſt breath; or my ſpirit [o], as it may be rendered, that is, his vital ſpirits which were exhauſted and ſpent, there were ſcarce any left in him; or my mind [p], or ſoul, which was overwhelmed with grief, and ſo diſturbed, that he was not himſelf, but in a manner diſtracted with the terrors of God, and the ſeverity of his hand upon him: my days are extinct; here Job corrects himſelf; he had ſpoken of a few years before, but it is as if he ſhould ſay now, why do I talk of a few years, when I have but a few days to live, and even thoſe are as good as gone? meaning not only his days of proſperity, which were at an entire end, as he thought, but the days of his natural life; the lamp of life was almoſt burnt out, the oil was ſpent, the wick was juſt extinguiſhed, it was like the ſnuff of a candle going out: the graves are ready for me; the place of his fathers ſepulchres, the burial-place of his anceſtors, where many graves were; or he may have reſpect to various things into which the dead are put, as into ſo many graves; as beſides their being rolled up in linen, as was the way of the eaſtern countries, there was the coffin, a ſort of a grave, and which ſometimes was made of ſtone; and then the place dug in the earth, more properly called the grave, and often over that a ſepulchral monument was erected; ſo that there was grave upon grave. Job does not ſeem to have any reſpect to the uſage of kings, and great perſonages, preparing ſtately monuments for themſelves whilſt living, ſuch as the pyramids of Egypt, built by and for their kings, as is ſuppoſed; for the words, are ready, are not in the text, only ſupplied, though they are alſo by the Targum; they are very ſhort and ſignificant in the original text, the graves for me, or they are mine; the grave is my property, my houſe, where I expect ſhortly to be, and there to abide and dwell until the reſurrection, and which was deſirable to him; a grave to me; that is all that I deſire, or can expect; here, he wiſhed to be, as he did not doubt he quickly ſhould be; and it is as if he ſhould ſay, I am ready for that, and ſo Jarchi paraphraſes it; and happy is the man that is ready for the grave, for death, and eternity, for the coming of his Lord, having the grace of God wrought in him, and the righteouſneſs of his living Redeemer on him, which was Job's caſe; ſuch an one ſhall go into the nuptial chamber at once, and be received into everlaſting habitations.

℣. 2. Are there not mockers with me? &c.] Meaning not irreligious perſons, ſuch as make a mock at ſin, a jeſt of religion, a laugh at good men, ſneer at the doctrines and ordinances of God, and ſcoff at things future, as the coming of Chriſt, the reſurrection of the dead, and a future judgment; with whom it is very uncomfortable to be, as well as with any ſort of prophane men, and ſuch there were no doubt in Job's time; but he ſeems to deſign his friends, by whom he thought himſelf mocked, and who were, as he imagined, ſcorners of him, ch. xii. 4. and xvi. 20. and therefore for this reaſon intreats his caſe might be heard, and his cauſe pleaded: and doth not mine eye continue in their provocation? or lodge all night[q]; his ſenſe is, that they were continually provoking him with their words, their ſcoffs and jeers, their cenſures and calumnies, and the weak reaſons and arguments they made uſe of to ſupport their charges and ſuſpicions; theſe dwelt upon his mind not only in the day-time, but in the night, ſo that he could not get a wink of ſleep for them; their words were ſo teizing and diſtreſſing, and they acted ſuch a cruel part to him, and ſtuck ſo cloſe to him, and hung upon his thoughts, that he could not get clear of them in the night-ſeaſon; but his mind ran upon them, which kept him waking that he could not cloſe his eye-lids for thinking of them.

2 ment,

[m] שנות מספר anni numeri, Montanus, Vatablus, Bolducius; numbered days, Broughton; ſo Tigurine verſion. [n] Pineda. [o] רוחי ſpiritus meus, V. L. Pagninus, Montanus, Junius & Tremellius, &c. [p] Anima mea, Piſcator. Schmidt.

℣. 3. Lay down now, &c.] A pledge that thou wilt provide a ſurety, appoint and admit one to plead for me, and that thou wilt hear my cauſe, and determine it; or put now, or put I pray thee[r], thy heart and mind to me, and my caſe, to my petition and requeſt, and grant it: put me in a ſurety with thee; appoint, provide and place a ſurety for me with thee, and let him appear to do his work and office: ſuch an one Jeſus Chriſt is; he is of God the Father's appointing to be the mediator between God and men, and who himſelf voluntarily engaged and agreed to be the ſurety of the better teſtament; and this was known to the Old Teſtament-ſaints, and to Job; and his prayer was the prayer of faith: and this work and office Chriſt performs; he was ſurety for his people from eternity; he drew nigh to God on their account, and ſtruck hands with his Father, or covenanted and agreed with him about the ſalvation of his people, and the manner of it; he gave his word, his bond, to his Father for them, that he would ſave them; and upon that ſuretyſhip-engagement of Chriſt, all the Old Teſtament-ſaints were pardoned, juſtified and glorified; he promiſed and bound himſelf to pay all their debts, to ſatisfy for all their ſins, to bring in an everlaſting righteouſneſs for them, and to bring them all ſafe to heaven and happineſs; in order to which, he put himſelf in their room and ſtead, and laid down his life a ranſom for them; upon which Job might ſay, and ſo may every believer, what follows, who is he that will ſtrike hands with me? that will enter the liſts, litigate and diſpute the point with me, or bring any charge or accuſation againſt me, having ſuch a ſurety to anſwer for me, ſuch an advocate to plead my cauſe, ſuch a mediator between God and man, who has made reconciliation for ſin, brought in everlaſting righteouſneſs, and ſatisfied law and juſtice, ſee Rom. viii. 33, 34. or elſe the ſenſe is, who is he beſides him that is a ſurety of God's appointing and providing, can ſtrike hands with me? or be a ſurety for me? there is no other Mediator, Saviour or Redeemer beſides him; if he had not undertaken the cauſe of his people, and the redemption of them, it muſt have ceaſed for ever, no other was equal to ſuch a work; ſo that here is another reaſon uſed with the Lord to provide a ſurety, ſince no other could to any purpoſe.

℣. 4. For thou haſt hid their heart from underſtanding, &c.] That is, the hearts of his friends, and therefore they were unfit to undertake his cauſe, or be ſureties for him, or be judges in it. It is the ſame thing as to hide underſtanding from their hearts, which God ſometimes does in a natural ſenſe; when men like not the knowledge of him, as attainable by the light of nature, he gives them up to reprobate minds, minds void of knowledge and judgment in things natural; and ſometimes in a ſpiritual ſenſe, he hides mens hearts from the knowledge of things divine and evangelical, and even this he does from the wiſe and prudent of this world; yea, ſometimes he hides the knowledge of his providential dealings with men, from his own people, as he did from Aſaph, Jeremiah, Habakkuk, and others; and, as it ſeems from Job's friends, who therefore miſtook his caſe, and were very unfit and inſufficient to determine it: therefore ſhalt thou not exalt them; to ſuch honour and dignity to be umpires, arbitrators or judges in the caſe of Job; this God had reſerved for another, Elihu, or rather himſelf, who decided the controverſy between Job and his friends, and declared in his favour, and that they had not ſpoken the thing that was right of him, as his ſervant Job had done, ch. xlii. 7.

℣. 5. He that ſpeaketh flattery to his friends, &c.] As Job's friends did to him when they promiſed great outward proſperity, and a reſtoration to his former ſtate, and to a greater affluence upon his repentance and reformation; or when they ſpoke deceitfully for God, pretending great regard to the honour of his juſtice and holineſs, and therefore inſiſted on it, that he muſt be a wicked man and an hypocrite, that was afflicted by him, as Job was: even the eyes of his children ſhall fail; ſo hateful are ſome ſins to God, and particularly deceitful tongues, and flattering lips, that he will puniſh them in their poſterity; the eyes of their children ſhall fail for want of ſuſtenance, and whilſt they are looking in vain for ſalvation and deliverance out of trouble, ſee Exod. xx. 4.

℣. 6. He hath made me alſo a by-word of the people, &c.] Either Eliphaz, or God; for whatſoever befel him, whether more immediately by the hand of God, or by any inſtrument, he aſcribes it to him, as being ſuffered in providence to befal him; as when he became a by-word or proverb to the people in common, to whom an example might be ſet by one or more of Job's friends. The name of Job is to this day a by-word or proverb among men, both for his poverty and his patience; if a man is deſcribed as very poor, he is ſaid to be as poor as Job; or if very patient under his afflictions, he is ſaid to be as patient as Job; but as neither of theſe are to the diſgrace of Job, ſomething elſe ſeems rather intended here, even ſomething to his reproach; as when a man was repreſented as a very wicked man, or an hypocrite, it uſed to be ſaid, ſuch an one is as wicked a creature, and as arrant an hypocrite, as Job: and aforetime I was as a tabret; the delight of the people, who when he appeared in the public ſtreets, came out and went before him, ſinging, and dancing, and beating on tabrets, and ſuch like muſical inſtruments, ſtruments, to expreſs their joy upon the ſight of him; but now it was otherwiſe with him, and he whom they could not ſufficiently extol and commend, now knew not well what to ſay bad enough of him; ſuch a change in the ſentiments and conduct of men, muſt needs be very chagrining: or afore-time I was as a lord, as Ben Gerſom, from the uſe of the word in Dan. iii. 2. as he ſuppoſes; he was like a lord or nobleman, or as one in ſome high office, and now as the offſcouring of all things; or it denotes what he was before them, the people in their ſight at preſent, and ſhould be: the word uſed is Tophet, which Aben Ezra takes to be the name of a place, and as it ſeems of that place where children were offered to Molech, and which place was in being, and ſuch practices uſed by the Canaanites in the times of Job; and this place which was alſo called the valley of Hinnom, being afterwards uſed for hell, led the Targum to paraphraſe the words thus, and hell from within ſhall I be; and ſo Sephorno, in appearance hell to all that ſee me; and in general it may ſignify that he was, or ſhould be avoided, as any unclean place, very ungrateful and diſagreeable, as that place was; or as any thing abominable, and to be loathed and rejected, and this way go ſeveral interpreters[s]; though ſome think reſpect is had to the puniſhment of tympanization, in which ſufferers were beat upon in ſeveral parts of their bodies, as if men were beating upon a tabret or drum, which gave great pain and torment, ſee Heb. xi. 35, 37. and with ſuch-like cruelty and indignity Job ſuggeſts he was, or ſhould be uſed; and therefore begs for a ſurety, for one to interpoſe and plead on his behalf, let the carriage of men to him be what it will, that is here referred to; compare with this Pſ. lxix. 11.

[q] תלן pernoctat, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Druſius, Schmidt, Michaelis, Schultens. [r] שימה נא pone hunc, Montanus; pone quæſo, Pagninus, Piſcator, Mercerus, Cocceius, Schmidt; ſub. cor tuum, Vatablus.

℣. 7. Mine eye alſo is dim by reaſon of ſorrow, &c.] Through exceſſive weeping, and the abundance of tears he ſhed, ſo that he had almoſt loſt his eye-ſight, or however it was greatly weakened and impaired by that means, which is often the caſe, ſee Pſ. vi. 7. and xxxi. 9. and all my members are as a ſhadow; his fleſh was conſumed off his bones, there were nothing left ſcarcely but ſkin and bone; he was a mere anatomy, and as thin as a lath, as we commonly ſay of a man that is quite worn away, as it were; is a walking ſhadow, has ſcarce any ſubſtance in him, but is the mere ſhadow of a man; the Targum interprets it of his form, ſplendor and countenance, which were like a ſhadow; ſome interpret it my thoughts[t], and underſtand it of the formations of his mind, and not of his body, which were ſhadows, empty, fleeting, and having no conſiſtence in them through that ſorrow that poſſeſſed him.

℣. 8. Upright men ſhall be aſtoniſhed at this, &c.] Such as were upright in heart, and in their walk and converſation, ſincere and honourable in their profeſſion of religion, theſe would be amazed at the afflictions of Job, and the unkindneſs of his friends; it is hereby ſuggeſted, that it would be then, and in ages to come, a matter of ſurprize to truly gracious perſons, when they ſhould hear of ſuch ſore afflictions laid upon ſo good a man, and be told what cenſures, calumnies and reproaches were caſt upon him by his friends; this would be ſo aſtoniſhing, that they would not know how to believe it, and ſtill more at a loſs how to account for it, that ſuch things ſhould be permitted in providence, there being reaſon to believe the truth of them: and the innocent ſhall ſtir up himſelf againſt the hypocrite; that is, ſuch, who though they are not free from ſin, yet live holy and harmleſs lives and converſations among men, ſo that they are not chargeable with any groſs iniquity, or what is ſcandalous and unbecoming their character; theſe ſhall riſe up with indignation againſt ſuch perſons as pretend to a great deal of ſanctity and devotion, and yet have no charity or love to an afflicted ſaint, but cenſure and reproach him, and add affliction to his affliction. Thus Job retorts the charge of hypocriſy his friends brought againſt him upon them; for he ſeems tacitly to deſign them, and delivers theſe words as a kind of ſolace to himſelf; that though he was thus uſed by them at that time, yet good men in future time would have different apprehenſions of him, and riſe up and vindicate his name and character.

℣. 9. The righteous alſo ſhall hold on his way, &c.] He that is righteous, not in appearance but really, not in a legal but in an evangelic ſenſe; who is juſtified by the righteouſneſs of Job's living Redeemer, who lives by faith on his righteouſneſs, and in conſequence of that in holineſs of life and converſation; ſuch an one being in Chriſt the way of righteouſneſs and ſalvation, and walking in the paths of faith, holineſs and truth, and in all the tracks of religious worſhip, private and public, he will perſevere therein, and will not on any account depart out of the right way into which he has been led and directed. This is oppoſed to a going back, as ſome do, and to a turning to the right-hand or the left, as others, and to a ſtanding ſtill, being ſtumbled, offended and diſcouraged; and it ſuppoſes a progreſs, a going forward in the way, ſo as not to be moved out of it by their own, or the afflictions of others, by the reproaches and perſecutions of men, the temptations of Satan, the ſnares, riches, honours and pleaſures of the world, or through darkneſs, deſertion and unbelief; they may indeed have many ſlips and falls, and be almoſt, but not altogether, out of the way, and never finally or to perdition; which is owing not to their conduct and care, might and ſtrength, but to the power of God, and the ſupplies of his grace, to Chriſt and his ſtrength, and to the Spirit and his influence, guidance and direction: and he that hath clean hands ſhall be ſtronger and ſtronger; or add ſtrength[u]; increaſe in it. This character is oppoſed to one of an immoral life and converſation, and deſcribes one that is not guilty of any notorious crime, that does not live in any known ſin, but in the general courſe of his life is upright and ſincere, holy, harmleſs and inoffenſive; ſuch a man as he is already a partaker of ſpiritual grace and ſtrength, and ſo as he wants more, it is given him; his ſpiritual ſtrength is renewed, he goes from one degree of it to another, and even whilſt walking in the way of God, he finds an increaſe of it; yea, that itſelf is ſtrength unto him; as his day is his ſtrength is, to aſſiſt him in religious ſervices, to enable him to reſiſt his enemies, and endure afflictions, and continue in the good ways of God.

℣. 10. But as for you all, do ye return, and come now, &c.] This is an addreſs to his three friends, all and every one of them, who he perceived were nettled with his reply, and were either departing, or preparing for a rejoinder; and being conſcious of his innocence, and ſatisfied of the goodneſs neſs of his cauſe, and having nothing to fear from them, boldly challenges them to go on with the diſpute; for tho' they were three to one, he was a match for them all; or elſe he calls upon them to turn and repent of what they had ſaid to him, to relinquiſh the bad notions and ill opinion they had of him, and to retract their hard ſpeeches and unjuſt cenſures, and return to a friendly and amicable converſation; or however, that they would come and ſit down quietly, and patiently hear what he had farther to ſay to them for their information and inſtruction, which they ſtood in great need of: for I cannot find one wiſe man among you; that took his caſe right, was capable of judging of it, and ſpeaking pertinently to it, and of adminiſtring comfort to him in it; they were phyſicians, but not ſkilful ones; comforters, but miſerable ones; had not the tongue of the learned, to ſpeak a word in ſeaſon; diſputants, but wranglers, and knew not where the pinch of the controverſy lay; and their arguments were weak and worthleſs, and their judgment and ſenſe of things not deſerving any regard, ſee 1 Cor. vi. 5.

[s] Schmidt, Michaelis, Schultens. [t] יצרי cogitationes meæ, Pagninus, Bolducius, Codurcus, ſo Ben Gerſom. [u] יוסיף אמץ addet fortitudinem, Pagninus, Montanus.

℣. 11. My days are paſt, &c.] Or paſſed away or paſſed over [w]; not that they had paſſed over the time fixed and appointed by God, for there is no paſſing the bound ſettled by him, ch. xiv. 5. but either the common term of man's life was paſſed with Job, or he ſpeaks of things in his own apprehenſion; he imagined his death was ſo near, that he had not a day longer to live; his days, as he before ſays, were extinct, were at an end, he ſhould never enjoy another day; and therefore it was folly to flatter him with a promiſe of long life, or encourage him to expect it; which he may mention as a proof of there being not a wiſe man among them, ſince they all ſuggeſted this in caſe of repentance; or his meaning is, that his good days, or days of goodneſs, as Jarchi interprets it, were paſt; his days of proſperity were at an end, and evil days were come upon him, in which he had no pleaſure; nor had he any reaſon to believe it would be otherwiſe with him: my purpoſes are broken off; Job doubtleſs had formed in his mind great deſigns of good things, natural, civil and religious, concerning the enlargement of his temporal eſtate, the ſettlement of his children in the world, making proviſion for the poor, ſupporting and enlarging the intereſt of true religion, the reformation of his heatheniſh neighbours, and the ſpread of divine truths among them; but now they were all fruſtrated, he was not in a capacity of carrying them into execution, and was obliged to drop them, and think no more of them, nor was there with him any proſpect of ever renewing them; they were rooted up [x], or plucked up, as ſome render the word, ſo that there was no likelihood of their ever riſing up again, and coming to any effect: even the thoughts of my heart; or the poſſeſſions [y] of it, as the thoughts are; they are the things of a man, which eſpecially belong to him; they are the inheritance of his mind, what none have a right unto, and a claim upon, but himſelf, nor can any know but himſelf, and to whom he diſcovers them: now the thread of theſe is broken off at death, they then ceaſe; not that the mind or ſoul of man ceaſes to be, or ceaſes to be a thinking being, it ſtill thinks; but only its thoughts are not employed about the ſame things in a future ſtate, or in the ſtate after death, as in this, ſee Pſ. cxlvi. 4.

℣. 12. They change the night into day, &c.] Meaning either his friends, by what they had ſaid unto him, or the thoughts of his heart, which comes to the ſame ſenſe; theſe being in the night-ſeaſon employed about what had been ſaid to him in the day, inſomuch that he could get no ſleep, the night was as broad day unto him; or they put the day before the night, contrary to the order of nature, as Noldius [z] obſerves, whereas the night is before the day, Gen. i. 5. his friends promiſing him long days, and an age clearer than noon-day, as bright as the morning, ch. xi. 17. when the night of death was coming on, and he was haſtening to the dark and ſilent grave: the light is ſhort, becauſe of darkneſs; the morning-light, or light of the day, when that comes continues but for a ſhort time, becauſe of the darkneſs of the evening, which quickly follows; or becauſe of the darkneſs of affliction, which fills it up, and makes it uncomfortable; or the light of proſperity, could it be enjoyed, is but ſhort, becauſe of the darkneſs of adverſity; or the light is near [a], as in the original text; though Jarchi interprets the word ſhort, as we do; Noldius renders it, the light is rather nearer than darkneſs [b]; after the night has been ſpent without ſleep, the morning-light is nearer than darkneſs; that may ſoon be expected, and ſo an end to ſleep and reſt.

℣. 13. If I wait, the grave is mine houſe, &c.] Not that Job put an if upon, or made a doubt of waiting upon God in private or public; or of waiting for him, his gracious appearances to him, anſwers of prayer, performance of promiſes, and deliverance out of trouble; and eſpecially of waiting his appointed time till his change came, and hoping and expecting eternal life and happineſs; all which he determined to do, and did, ſee ch. xiii. 15, 16. and xiv. 14. and xix. 25, 26, 27. but, he ſays this with reſpect to the advice of his friends, which ſhould it be taken, the iſſue of it would be no other than what he here ſuggeſts; they had intimated, that if he repented and reformed, he might hope for and expect a peaceable tabernacle, and a proſperous habitation, a fine houſe, and affluent circumſtances, ch. v. 24. and viii. 6. Now, ſays he, ſhould I liſten to this, and endeavour to cheriſh ſome hope and expectation of ſuch things, and put myſelf in a waiting poſture for them; alas, how ſoon would it be over, for what other houſe can I rationally expect but the grave? and this is what I have concluded upon; I think of no other houſe than that, which is man's long home, the houſe appointed for all living; there I ſhall dwell, and make my abode until the morning of the reſurrection, and I look for no other; and if I ſhould, I am well aſſured I ſhould be diſappointed: I have made my bed in the darkneſs; in the dark grave, where the light of the body is extinct, and where the light of the ſun comes not; in houſes there are divers apartments, ſome for work and buſineſs, as is the ſhop; others for eating and drinking, as the dining-room; and others for ſleep and reſt, as the bed-chamber; now in the houſe of the grave, there is no mention of any but the latter; for there is no work and device in the grave, nor eating and drinking there; but it is a bed where the weary ſaint ſaint lies down and reſts upon from all his toil and labour, until he awakes at the reſurrection: now Job had ſettled the matter with himſelf, he had laid it out in his own mind, and taken a kind of pleaſure in the proſpect of it; that he had got a houſe to remove into, when he was diſlodged from the earthly houſe of his tabernacle, and where he had made himſelf, in his own thought, an eaſy bed, on which he ſhould lay his weary limbs, and take his ſleep and reſt, until the heavens be no more.

[w] עברו tranſierunt, Pagninus, Montanus, &c. [x] נתקו evulſæ ſunt, Pagninus, Montanus, Piſcator; radicitus evulſæ ſunt, Michaelis. [y] מורשי poſſeſſiones, Montanus, Vatablus, Piſcator, Cocceius, Schmidt; hæreditariæ poſſeſſiones, Schultens; ſo Druſius & Michaelis. [z] Ebr. Part. Concord. N°. 1931. [a] קרוב propinquam, Pagninus, Montanus; ſo Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, &c. [b] Ib. p. 642.

℣. 14. I have ſaid to corruption, thou art my father, &c.] Not to the corruptible ſeed, of which he was begotten; nor to the corruption or purulent matter of his boils and ulcers, and the worms his fleſh was now clothed with, ch. vii. 5. but to that corruption his body would turn to in the grave, lying long enough to ſee it, which Chriſt's body did not, Pſ. xvi. 10. that is, to the pit of corruption [c], as it may be rendered, meaning the grave, ſo called becauſe in it dead bodies corrupt and putrefy: in houſes are families conſiſting of various perſons, of different relations, who dwell together in friendſhip and harmony, very lovingly and familiarly, as father and mother, brother and ſiſter; ſo in the grave, the dwelling-houſe of men, there are inhabitants that dwell together, as if they were familiar friends and acquaintance; and with theſe Job claims kindred, ſuch as corruption, rottenneſs, duſt and worms, and theſe he ſpeaks unto, not only very familiarly, but very reſpectfully; the note of Bar Tzemach is, "I honour the grave as a ſon a father, that it may receive me quickly;" yea, he ſpeaks as not aſhamed of the relation, but is fond of it; I called or cried [d], that is, aloud, with great vehemency and affection: to the worm, thou art my mother and my ſiſter; theſe are the rather mentioned, becauſe the relation is near, and they are very loving and tender, and abide in the houſe, ſee Prov. vii. 5. he calls theſe his mother and ſiſter, as the above Jewiſh commentator obſerves, becauſe he might lie in their boſom; by all this Job would repreſent how familiar death and the grave were to him, and how little he dreaded them; yea, how deſirable they were to him, ſince he ſhould be at home, and among his relations and friends.

℣. 15. And where is now my hope? &c.] Not the grace of hope, which was in his heart; and though it might ſometimes be low in exerciſe, it could not be loſt; it is an anchor, ſure and ſtedfaſt, and is one of the graces that always abides, and never diſappoints and makes aſhamed; nor the object of hope, eternal glory and happineſs in another world, that is laid up in heaven, and for which he was looking and waiting by faith; but his hope of outward happineſs, and of being reſtored to his former ſtate of proſperity, or a better, which his friends encouraged him to; this had no place in him, nor did he ſee any reaſon to cheriſh it, all ground and foundation of it was removed, as he apprehended; there was nothing on which he could build ſuch an hope as that, ſee ch. vi. 11. and xix. 10. as for my hope, who ſhall ſee it? that is, which his friends would have him hope for, a fine houſe, a large eſtate, a numerous family, honour and reſpect among men, long life, and an abundance of outward peace and happineſs; this he was firmly perſuaded he ſhould never ſee, being juſt going into the grave, nor his friends that ſuggeſted theſe things to him, nor any body elſe; though indeed what he himſelf truly hoped for, might be rightly thus deſcribed, being things not ſeen by the eye of the body, nor by carnal ſenſe and reaſon, but are the inviſible glories and realities of another world, for hope that is ſeen is not hope, &c. Rom. viii. 24, 25. 2 Cor. iv. 18. Heb. xi. 1. but Job does not deſign theſe, but the former.

℣. 16. They ſhall go down to the bars of the pit, &c.] He himſelf, and his friends, and the hopes they would have him entertain; theſe ſhould all go down together to the grave, and there lie barred and locked up; theſe hopes ſo as never to riſe more, and the bodies of himſelf, and his friends, till looſed by him, who has the keys of hell and death: or the bars ſhall go down to the grave; the members of his body, as Jarchi, which are the bars of it, as ſome in Bar Tzemach; the ſtrength and ſupport of it, as particularly the bones, theſe ſhall go down to the grave, and there turn to rottenneſs and duſt; and therefore, as if he ſhould ſay, as he elſewhere does, what is my ſtrength that I ſhould hope, ch. vi. 11. when our reſt together is in the duſt; which is man's original, and to which he returns, and in which the dead lie and ſleep until the reſurrection; and where they are at reſt from all adverſity and affliction of body, mind and eſtate; from all the troubles and vexations occaſioned by wicked men, and from all diſputes, wranglings, contentions and animoſities among friends, which would be the caſe of Job, and his friends, when their heads were laid in the duſt, and which he ſuppoſed would quickly be; and therefore it was in vain for them to feed him with hopes of outward happineſs, and for him to entertain them; it beſt became them both to think of death and the grave as near at hand, where their controverſies would be buried, and they would be good friends, and lie quietly together, and take their reſt until they ſhould awake and riſe to everlaſting life.

CHAP. XVIII.

IN this chapter is Bildad's ſecond reply to Job, in which he falls with great fury upon him, very ſharply inveighs againſt him, and very highly charges him; the charges he brings againſt him are talkativeneſs and inattention to what was ſaid to him, ℣. 1, 2. contempt of his friends, impatience under his affliction, and pride and arrogance, as if the whole world, the courſe of nature and providence, and God himſelf, all muſt give way to him, ℣. 3, 4. nevertheleſs, he is aſſured of the miſerable ſtate of a wicked man, ſooner or later, which is deſcribed by the extinction of his light of proſperity, ℣. 5, 6. by the defeat of his counſels, being enſnared in a net laid for him, ℣. 7—10. by the terrible judgments of the ſword, famine and peſtilence, by one or the other of which he is brought to death, the king of terrors, ℣. 11—14. by the deſtruction of his habitation, and of his poſterity, ſo that he has none to bear his name, or perpetuate his memory, ℣. 15—17. by his being

[c] לשחת foveam, Pagninus, Montanus, Tigurine verſion, Druſius, &c.

[d] קראתי vocavi, Montanus; clamavi, Mercerus.

ing driven out of the world, leaving no iſſue behind him, to the aſtoniſhment of all that knew him, ℣. 18—20. and the chapter is cloſed with this obſervation, that this is the common caſe of wicked and irreligious perſons, ℣. 21.

℣. 1. Then anſwered Bildad the Shuhite, and ſaid.] Who, next to Eliphaz, ſpoke before, and now in his turn attacks Job a ſecond time, and more roughly and ſeverely than before; now he gives him no advice or counſel, nor any inſtructions and exhortations for his good, nor ſuggeſts that it might be better times with him again, as he had done before; but only heaps up charges againſt him, and deſcribes the miſerable circumſtances of a wicked man, as near to Job's as he could; thereby endeavouring to confirm his former poſition, that wicked men are puniſhed of God, and to have this concluſion drawn from it, that Job muſt needs be a wicked man, ſince he was ſo greatly afflicted.

℣. 2. How long will it be ere ye make an end of words? &c.] Becauſe theſe words are expreſſed in the plural number, ſome think more perſons than one are addreſſed, either Eliphaz and Job together, who are complained of as taking up all the time, and having all the talk to themſelves, that another could ſcarce put in a word; Bildad could ſay this with a better grace, becauſe his diſcourſes were but ſhort; or elſe all his friends, whom he blames for not ſtopping Job's mouth at once, and for lengthening out the diſpute with him; as if he ſhould ſay, why are you ſo complaiſant to him, to wait till he has done ſpeaking, ere you reply? why don't you without any ceremony interrupt him, and not ſuffer him to go on with his prate, a man that is ſo inſufferably rude as to reckon us all as beaſts? and to what purpoſe is it, to talk to ſuch a man that is ſo hardened and incorrigible, ſo proud and conceited? it is all labour in vain, and mere beating the air; it is high time to have done talking, and to put an end to the diſpute, when things are at ſuch a paſs with him as they are: or elſe the words are directed to Job, and his friends that were with him, who might now and then ſpeak a word in his behalf, though their words are not recorded; or however by their looks or geſtures might ſhew their approbation of Job's defences: that there were others preſent beſides Job and his three friends, it is probable; yea, it is certain that Elihu was preſent all the while, but he was not altogether of Job's mind; nor does it appear that he had any to take his part, for his brethren, acquaintance, kinsfolk, and familiar friends, ſtood at a diſtance from him, and his maids and men-ſervants uſed him ill; and even his own wife was not very kind to him, as he declares in the following chapter; wherefore it ſeems beſt of all to underſtand theſe words as ſpoken to Job alone, the plural being uſed for the ſingular, according to the idiom of the tongue in which they were ſpoken; and ſo are a charge of loquacity againſt him for talking too much, and too long, unleſs it had been to better purpoſe; and in like manner Bildad begins his firſt reply to Job, ch. viii. 2. a late interpreter renders the words, how long will you lay ſnares with words[e]? uſe cautious words, ſet ſnares with words to catch, lie upon the catch, and lay hold upon a word, and improve it to diſadvantage, which is imprudently or inadvertently dropped: mark, and afterwards we will ſpeak; or let us ſpeak[f]; after we have well conſidered things, got a right underſtanding of them, and thoroughly digeſted them, and have well concerted things, and have thought very cloſely what reply to make to them; and ſo the words are a tacit reflexion of Bildad's on his other two friends, that they ſpoke before they thought, and therefore ſome things impertinently, which Job took the advantage of againſt them; wherefore it would be right for the future to mark and conſider things well before-hand, and then ſpeak, as they then would with greater propriety, and more to the purpoſe: public ſpeakers eſpecially, or ſuch who are engaged in public ſervice, or in a public diſpute, ſhould meditate before-hand what to ſay, leſt they deliver what is crude and indigeſted, and may be turned againſt them. Our Lord indeed directed his diſciples, when called before kings and governors for his ſake, not to premeditate what they ſhould anſwer; but that was an extraordinary caſe, and they were promiſed to have extraordinary aſſiſtance, whereby ſome great ends were to be anſwered, the confuſion of their enemies, and the confirmation of the chriſtian religion. But the words ſeem rather directed to Job, and to carry in them a charge of inattention to what was ſaid to him by his friends; and therefore Bildad exhorts him to mark and obſerve what they ſaid to him, to liſten attentively to that, and well conſider it, and then it would be an encouragement to them to proceed in diſcourſing with him. Job is repreſented like ſome hearers that ſtop their ears to the voice of the charmer charming ever ſo wiſely; or that are careleſs and inattentive to what they hear, and let it paſs, and never think of it more; whereas hearers of the word ſhould be ſwift to hear, and liſten with attention, and take care that they let not ſlip what they have heard, and that they meditate upon it in order to get inſtruction by it, and when they hear in ſuch a manner, it is an encouragement to ſpeak; or elſe the ſenſe is, act wiſely[g], like an honeſt man, and ſhew yourſelf to be a wiſe man, a man of underſtanding, that well weighs and conſiders things, and rightly takes them in, and receives inſtruction by them, and talks like a ſenſible man: then afterwards we will ſpeak; or otherwiſe if you go on to talk in the fooliſh manner you do, it is to no purpoſe to carry on the diſpute; the beſt way is to put an end to it at once.

℣. 3. Wherefore are we counted as beaſts, &c.] This ſeems to refer to ch. xii. 7. where Job ſends them to the beaſts, to get knowledge and inſtruction; and therefore it was concluded he reckoned them as ſuch, and put them on a level with them, yea made them inferior to them; or to ch. xvii. 4, 10. where they are repreſented as deſtitute of wiſdom and underſtanding, and therefore it is ſuppoſed were counted by Job no other than as beaſts. Man by the fall is indeed become like them, and ſome are more brutiſh than they, and all are brutiſh as to ſpiritual knowledge and underſtanding; and thoſe that are moſt ſenſible of themſelves, are ready to acknowledge their ignorance, that they are more brutiſh than any, and eſpecially are as a beaſt before God; and particularly with reſpect to knowledge of the methods of providence, in regard to his dealings with the righteous and wicked; ſee Pſ. lxxiii. 22. and which was the caſe in controverſy verſy between Job and his friends; but yet ſelf-ſufficient perſons don't care to have their underſtandings in any thing called in queſtion, but like the Phariſees ſay, are we blind alſo? John ix. 40. and take it very hard that they ſhould be reckoned like beaſts, void of underſtanding, when they are the people, and wiſdom will die with them: and reputed vile in your ſight? as wicked and profligate perſons, the moſt abandoned of mankind, ſuch as are juſtly deſpiſed by good men, ſee Pſ. xv. 4. Dan. xi. 21. or unclean [h], filthy, polluted and defiled, as all men are by nature, and as they are in all the powers and faculties of their ſouls; nor can they make themſelves clean, their hearts or their hands; nothing ſhort of the grace of God, and blood of Chriſt, can cleanſe from ſin; yet ſelf-righteous perſons think themſelves clean and pure when they are not waſhed from their ſins, and take it ill of others to be reputed unclean perſons: or ſhut [i], ſtopped up, as the hearts of men are from God and Chriſt, and the true knowledge of them, and divine things, until opened by him, who has the key of the houſe of David, and opens, and no man ſhuts; or hidden [k], referring to ch. xvii. 4. having a covering over their hearts, and a vail over the eyes of their underſtandings, ſo that the things of providence were hid from them, as ſometimes the things of grace are from the wiſe and prudent; but to be thought that this was their caſe, is reſented by Bildad.

[e] Schultens. [f] ואחר נדבר & poſtea loquamur, Piſcator, Mercerus, Cocceius. [g] חבינו diſerte agatis, Schultens.

℣. 4. He teareth himſelf in his anger, &c.] Or his ſoul [l], meaning Job, and referring to what he had ſaid in ch. xvi. 9. Now, ſays Bildad, it is neither God nor man that tears you, it is you yourſelf; repreſenting Job as a mad-man, rending his clothes, tearing his fleſh, and even his very ſoul; for by his paſſion which he expreſſed, whether to God or his friends, it did himſelf the moſt hurt, he broke his peace, and ſpoiled his comfort, and ruined his health, and made himſelf the moſt unhappy of mankind, by giving looſe to his paſſion, to his wrath and anger, which ſlays and kills a man, ch. v. 2. here a charge of impatience is ſuggeſted, contrary to the character given of Job, James v. 11. ſhall the earth be forſaken for thee? through fear of thee, becauſe of thy rage and fury; doſt thou think that the inhabitants of the earth will flee before thee, at thy ſtorming, rage and wrath? before God none can ſtand when he is angry; there is no abiding his indignation when his fury is poured out like fire, and perſons of the greateſt rank will flee to the rocks and mountains to hide them from his face and fury; but what doſt thou think, or make thyſelf to be, to be as deity, that the inhabitants of the earth ſhould flee before thee, and forſake it? or when thou dieſt, doſt thou think that all the inhabitants of the earth will die with thee, and ſo it will be forſaken for thy ſake? taking the hint from what Job had ſaid, ch. xvii. 16. or doſt thou think thyſelf a man of ſo much importance and conſequence in the earth, that when thou dieſt there will not be a man left of any worth and notice, that all had as good die with thee? or will God drop the government of the world on thy account? will he no more employ his care and providence in concerning himſelf in the affairs of the world, but let all things go as they will, and ſo the earth, as to his providential regards to it, be forſaken for thy ſake? will God neither do good to good men, nor puniſh bad men? which muſt be the caſe according to thy doctrine; but will God counter-act this method of his providence, he has always taken in the earth, that thou mayeſt appear not to be an evil man, as might be concluded from thine afflictions, but a good man notwithſtanding them? and ſhall the rock be removed out of his place? which is not uſual, nor can it be done by man; it may be done by God, who touches the mountains and they ſmoke, and at whoſe preſence they drop and move, as Sinai did, and as the mountains and hills will flee away at the preſence of the judge of all the earth, when he appears; but no ſuch phænomenon can be expected upon the preſence and ſight of a man; much leſs can God himſelf, who is often called a rock, and is immoveable, unalterable and unchangeable in his nature, perfections, purpoſes and the counſels of his will, be made to act contrary to either of them; nor will he do it for the ſake of any man; he does all things after the counſel of his own will; he takes a conſtant courſe in providence, in the government of the world, and canſt thou think that he will go out of his uſual way for thy ſake, in puniſhing wicked men, and rewarding good men? you may as ſoon imagine that a rock will be removed out of its place, as the ordinary courſe of providence will be altered on thy account; to ſuppoſe this is preſumption, pride and arrogance, which is what Bildad means to faſten upon Job.

℣. 5. Yea, the light of the wicked ſhall be put out, &c.] Or nevertheleſs [m]; notwithſtanding all this diſregard and inattention to us, and contempt of us, and all the rage, and wrath, and pride, and haughtineſs diſcovered, as if the laws of nature, and ſtated methods of providence, muſt all give way to juſtify a man in ſuch circumſtances as ſhew him to be wicked; this will certainly be his caſe, his light ſhall be put out; meaning not the light of his eyes, or his corporal light, which ſometimes has been the caſe of wicked men, as was of the Sodomites, ſince this, through accident, or old age, is common to good and bad man; but rather moral light, the light of nature, with which every man is enlightened that comes into the world; by which he can diſcern things natural and civil, and in ſome degree things moral and religious, though in a very dim manner; and which, when it is abuſed, may be taken away, and men be given up to judicial blindneſs, and to a reprobate mind, a mind void of ſenſe and judgment. Cocceius thinks, light of doctrine may be intended, ſpeculative and notional light and knowledge of divine things, as of God, and his perfections, which may be more clearly diſcerned by revelation than by the light of nature; and of Chriſt, his perſon, offices and grace; and of the goſpel, and the ſeveral doctrines of it, which men may be enlightened into, and yet be wicked men, as Balaam, and others; which knowledge may be loſt, and light put out, as in the man that had but one talent, and neglected it, and in the idol-ſhepherd, Matt. xxv. 29. Zech. xi. 17. to which may be added the light of joy, or a flaſh of natural affections that ſometimes is to be obſerved in hypocritical perſons, or notional profeſſors, which in time is loſt, and comes to nothing, as in Herod and the ſtony ground-hearers, Mark vi. 20. Matt. xiii. 20. but as for the true ſpiritual light, and experimental knowledge, that can never be loſt or put out, but ſhines more and more unto the perfect day: but it ſeems beſt by light here to underſtand ſtand outward proſperity, for as darkneſs is often put for adverſity, ſo light for proſperity in civil things, ſee Eſth. viii. 16. but then, though this in wicked men is often put out, and they are reduced to diſtreſſed circumſtances, yet not always; and it ſometimes is the caſe of good men, and was the caſe of Job, which Bildad had his eye upon, ſee ch. xxix. 2, 3. and the ſpark of his fire ſhall not ſhine; all his carnal reaſonings, the effects of the light of nature, and all his ſchemes, eſpecially religious ones built upon them, ſhall all come to nothing, and be of no effect or uſe unto him, ſee Iſ. l. 11. or the ſenſe is, that he ſhall be reduced to ſo low a condition in things civil, that he ſhall have no light nor heat, nor joy and comfort, in this ſenſe; no not ſo much as a ſpark of outward happineſs ſhall be left him.

[h] נטמינו immundi, Druſius, Piſcator, Michaelis; ſo Broughton. mus, Hebræi in Mercer. [k] So the Targum.
[m] גם attamen, nihilominus, Cocceius, Schultens; ſo the Targum.
[l] Clauſi ſumus, Montanus; obturati ſumus, Hebræi in Mercer. [l] נפשו animam ſuam, Pagninus, Montanus, &c.

℣. 6. The light ſhall be dark in his tabernacle, &c.] Not the light of the eye, in the tabernacle of his body, rather the light of nature and reaſon in him; and when that light that is in a man becomes darkneſs, as our Lord ſays, how great is that darkneſs! Matt. vi. 23. but beſt of all, it deſigns the light of proſperity in his houſe and family, which ſhould be quite obſcured: and his candle ſhall be put out with him; which ſometimes ſignifies the ſpirit of man, his rational ſoul, called the candle of the Lord, Prov. xx. 27. which, tho' it dies not when man dies, yet its light is extinct with reſpect to the things of this life, and all its thoughts and reaſonings are no more about civil matters, and the affairs of this world; in that ſenſe this light is put out, and thoſe thoughts periſh with him, Pſ. cxlvi. 4. but more frequently it is uſed for outward proſperity, which if it continues with a man as long as he lives, as it often does, yet when he dies, it ceaſes and is no more; it does not deſcend with him into the grave, and he cannot carry it into another world, but it is put out in obſcure darkneſs; ſee ch. xxi. 17. Prov. xx. 20.

℣. 7. The ſteps of his ſtrength ſhall be ſtraitened, &c.] As a man in health can take large and ſtrong ſteps, and travel in the greatneſs of his ſtrength; ſo in proſperity he can, and does take large ſteps in obtaining fame and reputation among men, in amaſſing ſubſtance to himſelf, and towards ſettling his family in the world; he is like one in a large place, and walks at liberty, goes in and out at pleaſure, and none can controul him; he walks in pride, and with an high and lifted up head, and with contempt of others, and his will is his law, and he does as he pleaſes; but in adverſity, as his ſtrength is weakened in the way, he cannot take the ſtrides he did, his way is hedged up with thorns, he is preſſed on every ſide, and ſurrounded with troubles, ſo that let him turn himſelf which way he will, he can find no way to eſcape: and his own counſel ſhall caſt him down; as Ahitophel's and Haman's did, which iſſued in their ruin; what wicked men ſometimes plot and deviſe, with a view to their own good, and the injury of others, proves the deſtruction of themſelves; when they have contrived to raiſe themſelves upon the ruins of others, it has been the means of caſting them down from the ſtate and condition they were in, inſtead of raiſing to an higher, even down to deſolation, and into the moſt miſerable circumſtances.

℣. 8. For he is caſt into a net by his own feet, &c.] He goes into it of himſelf, incautious and imprudent; the counſels, ſchemes and methods he takes to hurt others, iſſue in his own ruin; the pit he digs for them, he falls and ſinks into himſelf; and the net which he has ſpread and hid for others, in it is his own foot taken; and the ways and means he takes to do himſelf good, to amaſs riches and advance his family, being illicit ones, prove ſnares and nets unto him, thoſe leading him into many fooliſh and hurtful luſts, which bring him to perdition, Pſ. ix. 15. 1 Tim. vi. 9. even the various ſins and tranſgreſſions he commits are ſnares unto him, by which he is enticed and drawn in: for in the tranſgreſſion of an evil man there is a ſnare, Prov. xxix. 6. theſe promiſe him peace, and pleaſure, and liberty, but give neither; they are nets in which he is entangled, and cords by which he is held, Pſ. ix. 15, 16. into which his own feet carry him: ſome render it, he goes with a net at his feet [n], or with his feet in a net; he can't go where he would, or do as he pleaſes; he is reſtrained by the providence of God; as the devils are held in chains, ſo the feet of wicked men are entangled in a net, that they cannot move and act as they are deſirous of: and he walketh upon a ſnare; laid for him, and hidden to him, and therefore walks on boldly and unconcerned, not being apprehenſive of any danger, though greatly expoſed to it; he walks on as on firm and good ground, and in a broad road, but deſtruction and miſery are in his ways; yet he walks on of himſelf willingly, and with all his ſtrength, pleaſing himſelf in the path he treads, not dreaming of the miſchief that awaits him; or upon a thicket [o] of thorns and briars, his ſins and iniquities with which he is entangled, and out of which he can't extricate himſelf, or afflictive providences with which his way is hedged up; though the former ſenſe ſeems beſt; Mr. Broughton renders it, a platted gin.

℣. 9. The gin ſhall take him by the heel, &c.] And hold him faſt, ſo that he ſhall not be able to get away, eſpecially out of ſuch as are ſet by God himſelf; for God has his nets, and ſnares, and gins for wicked men, and ſuch plenty of them, that he even is ſaid to rain them on them; yea, he himſelf is a gin and a ſnare unto them, and out of his hands there is no eſcaping, wherefore it is a terrible thing to fall into them, ſee Ezek. xii. 13. and xxxii. 3. Pſ. xi. 6. Iſ. viii. 14, 15. and the robber ſhall prevail againſt him; either robbers literally taken, ſuch as the Sabeans and Chaldeans, to whom Bildad may have reference, who prevailed againſt Job, and plundered him of his ſubſtance; and ſuch as theſe, as the word ſignifies, are thirſty ones [p], who thirſt after the wealth and riches of men, and after their blood for the ſake thereof, blood-thirſty ones; Mr. Broughton renders it, the ſavage, barbarous, wild and uncivilized, that lived in deſart places, and were like wild beaſts, let their hair grow long, to make them look more terrible and formidable, which ſome take to be the ſignification of the word, and render it horrid [q] or terrible, ſee the note on ch. v. 5. or elſe the devil may be meant, who is like a roaring lion, terrible and frightful, and who, as he was a murderer from the beginning, ſo a thief and robber, that comes to kill and deſtroy, and whom God ſuffers to prevail over the children of diſobedience, and in whom he works powerfully, being the ſtrong man armed, that has poſſeſſion of them and their goods, and keeps them in peace; and who has his ſnares, which he

[n] כי שלח ברשת ברגליו nam it cum reti in pedibus ſuis, Cocceius. [o] על שבכה in perplexo, Cocceius.
[p] צמים ſitibundos, Montanus; ſitibundus, Tigurine verſion. [q] Horridus, Junius & Tremellius, Cocceius, Schmidt.

he lays ſuited to the tempers and diſpoſitions of men, and in which they are taken alive, as beaſts of prey, and are detained by him at his pleaſure, 2 Tim. ii. 26.

℣. 10. The ſnare is laid for him in the ground, &c.] Or hidden [r] there; for, as Solomon ſays, in vain the net is ſpread in ſight of any bird, Prov. i. 17. and in vain it is to lay a ſnare publickly in the ſight of any creature, it will not then come near it, but ſhun and avoid it; and therefore it is laid under ground, or hid in the earth, or in ſome private place, where the creature, it is deſigned for, may be thought to come, or into which it is decoyed; or the cord [s], that which is faſtened to the ſnare or net, and which the fowler holds in his hand, and pulls with, as he finds occaſion and opportunity offers; but this is hid as much as poſſible, that it may not be ſeen: and a trap for him in the way; in which he is uſed to walk, by the road-ſide, or in it; Mr. Broughton renders it, a pitfall on the way-ſide, ſuch as is dug for beaſts to fall into and be taken. The whole of this is deſigned to ſhow how ſuddenly and ſecretly wicked men are taken in nets, and ſnares, and gins, either of their own or others laying, and whilſt they are crying peace, peace, ſudden deſtruction comes upon them; ſee Eccl. ix. 12. 1 Theſſ. v. 3.

℣. 11. Terrors ſhall make him afraid on every ſide, &c.] Make him a Magor Miſſabib, as Paſhur was a terror to himſelf, and all his friends about him; theſe terrors may be either the terrors of the judges of the earth upon wicked men, who are, or ſhould be, a terror to evil doers, and of whom wicked men are afraid, leſt they ſhould be taken and puniſhed by them; to this ſenſe is the note of Sephorno: or elſe the terrors of a guilty conſcience, which drive a man to his wit's end, that he knows not what to do, nor whither to go; theſe terrify him night and day, and make an hell upon earth unto him; or the terrors of the righteous law of God broken by him, its menaces and curſes threatening him with death and everlaſting damnation; or the terrors of the judgments of God on earth, which by their fore-runners appear to be coming on it, by reaſon of which mens hearts fail for fear of them; or terrible apprehenſions of the wrath of God for ſin, here and hereafter, together with the terrors of death, which fall upon them, and of an awful judgment yet to come. Now Bildad had obſerved, that Job had ſaid ſome things concerning the terrors he was ſometimes poſſeſſed of, ch. vi. 4. and vii. 14. and ix. 28. and therefore would ſuggeſt from hence, that he muſt be a wicked man, ſince this is the caſe of ſuch; but it is eaſy to obſerve, that good men are ſometimes ſurrounded with terrors as well as others, ſo that this is no proof of a man's character and ſtate, ſee Pſ. lxxxviii. 15, 16. Lam. ii. 22. and ſhall drive him to his feet; to take to his feet and run, in order to get rid of his terrors if poſſible, but in vain; theſe cauſe him not to run to God, to his feet, to the throne and footſtool of his grace, but from him, to the rocks and mountains to hide him from his wrath, though there is no going from his ſpirit, nor fleeing from his preſence; and terrors will alſo have ſuch an effect upon wicked men as to cauſe them to flee from men, as in Cain, who not only went from the preſence of the Lord, but from the ſociety of men, and became a fugitive and vagabond, and afraid of every one he met with, leſt he ſhould kill him; and ſometimes wicked men flee when none purſue, and even at the ſound of a ſhaking leaf, Prov. xxviii. 1. Lev. xxvi. 36. or ſhall ſcatter him at his feet [t], either at the feet of the robber, or cauſe him to fall to the ground, in the place where his feet ſtood. Mr. Broughton renders it, ſhall preſs him at his feet, ſhall follow at his heels; and keep cloſe to him where-ever he goes, and overtake and ſeize him.

℣. 12. His ſtrength ſhall be hunger-bitten, &c.] Or ſhall be famine [u], or hunger, that is, ſhall be weakened by it; famine is a ſore evil, and greatly weakens the natural ſtrength of men; want of food will ſoon bring down the ſtrength of the ſtrongeſt man, when the ſtay and the ſtaff, the ſuſtenance and ſupport of man's nature is taken from him: many of the Jewiſh writers, by his ſtrength, underſtand his children, who are, as Jacob ſaid of Reuben, his might, and the beginning of his ſtrength, Gen. xlix. 3. and when grown up are his protection and defence; and for theſe to be diſtreſſed with hunger, or deſtroyed by famine, is a ſore judgment; ſo the Targum paraphraſes it, his firſt born ſon; Jarchi interprets it, his ſon; and Ben Gerſom, his ſeed or offspring: and deſtruction ſhall be ready at his ſide; or to his rib [w]; that is his wife, as the Targum and Jarchi explain it, the Jews calling a man's wife his rib, becauſe the woman was originally made out of one of the ribs of man; and if this could be thought to be the ſenſe of the word here, and what is given by them of the former clauſe, both make up a compleat account of the deſtruction of a wicked man's family, his wife and children: but rather it ſignifies ſome calamity, diſtreſs and trouble at hand, ready prepared for wicked men, juſt going to be inflicted on them; for God has ſtores of vengeance for them, and has made ready his bow, and prepared inſtruments and arrows of death and deſtruction for them, as well as there is everlaſting fire prepared, and blackneſs of darkneſs reſerved for them in the world to come; for it can hardly be thought that this ſhould be underſtood literally of any diſeaſe in the ſide, as the pleuriſy, &c. which is threatening, or any mortal wound or ſtab there, ſuch as Joab gave Amaſa under the fifth rib.

℣. 13. It ſhall devour the ſtrength of his ſkin, &c.] Or the bars of his ſkin [x], the ſtrength and ſupport of his body, for which his ſkin may be put, as the bones; or the branches of his ſkin [y], the veins, which like ſo many branches run under, and may be ſeen through the ſkin: now theſe, it, famine, or want of food, devours, and deſtroys the ſtrength and beauty of the ſkin, cauſe it to be black like an oven, Lam. iv. 8. and v. 10. bring a man to a mere ſkeleton, to ſkin and bones, waſte and conſume the members of his body, his fleſh, and blood, and bones; the Targum, Jarchi, and Aben Ezra, by his bars or branches underſtand his children, which are his bars, the ſtrength of him, and are to him as branches to a tree, proceeding from him; and if we render it, as ſome do, he ſhall devour [z], or eat, that is, the wicked man, it points to us the moſt horrible ſcene in a famine, which is ſhocking and

[r] טמון abſconditus, V. L. Pagninus, Montanus, Junius & Tremellius, &c. Tigurine verſion, Mercerus, Druſius, Cocceius, Schmidt.
[s] חבלו funis ejus, Montanus, Mercerus, Piſcator, Schmidt.
[t] הפצרהו diſpergent eum, Pagninus, Montanus, Beza, Grotius, Schultens.
[u] רעב fames, Beza.
[w] לצלעו coſtæ ejus, Montanus, Vatablus, Michaelis.
[x] בדי עורו vectes cutis ſuæ, Tigurine verſion, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Schultens, [y] Ramos cutis, Montanus, Vatablus, Druſius, Mercerus, Schmidt; ramos corporis ipſius, Cocceius.
[z] יאכל comedet, Pagninus, Montanus, Mercerus.

and ſhuddering; and yet what has been, as in the ſieges of Samaria and Jeruſalem, a parent's eating and devouring his own children, 2 Kings vi. 28, 29. Lam. iv. 10. but rather, the it is the firſt-born of death, in the next clauſe, which is to be ſupplied from thence here: even the firſt-born of death ſhall devour his ſtrength; and ſo Mr. Broughton tranſlates the whole verſe, "a ſtrange death ſhall eat all the branches of his body, all its branches ſhall it eat;" which the Targum interprets of the angel of death, him which has the power of death: but rather it ſignifies not what preſides over death, but what death firſt produces, which are corruption and rottenneſs, duſt and worms; theſe are the firſt-born of death, or the firſt-fruits and effects of it, and which devour and deſtroy not the ſkin only, but the whole body and all its members: or the firſt-born death [a]; death, which is a firſt born, it is the firſt-born of ſin; ſin is its parent, luſt conceives ſin, and that brings forth death; death is the child of ſin, and is its firſt-born, and ſin entered into the world, and death by ſin; and this is what devours and deſtroys the ſtrength of men. Some underſtand by firſt-born death, a premature one, death before the uſual time, or common courſe of nature; wicked men don't live out half their days; and when they are taken off in their youth, in the prime of their days, and ſtrength, and amidſt all their wealth, riches and pleaſures, this is the firſt, or firſt-born death, as that is a ſecondary one which is late, in the time of old age. This is the ingenious thought of Pineda; but perhaps rather, as the firſt-born is the chief and principal, ſo here may be meant, the chiefeſt of deaths, the moſt hard, cruel and ſevere; the firſt of thoſe, that death has under it, which are principally the ſword, famine, peſtilence, and the noiſom beaſt, ſee Rev. vi. 8. it is commonly thought that famine is intended, ſpoken of in the context; but why not rather ſome thing diſtinct from it, and particularly the peſtilence? ſince that is emphatically called death by the Jews, and in the paſſage laſt referred to, and is the terror by night, and the arrow that flies by day, even the peſtilence that walks in darkneſs, and the deſtruction that waſtes at noon-day; by means of which thouſands, and ten thouſands of wicked men fall at the ſides of good men, when it does not affect them; and ſo may be the evil particularly threatened to a wicked man here, ſee Pſ. xci. 5, 6, 7.

℣. 14. His confidence ſhall be rooted out of his tabernacle, &c.] That which his confidence was placed in, his wealth and riches, his family, particularly his children, in all which he placed his confidence of future proſperity and happineſs; theſe ſhould be all taken away from him, and his houſe cleared of them all; or his good, ſound and healthful conſtitution, on account of which he promiſed himſelf long life, this he ſhould be deprived of, and it ſhould be taken out of the tabernacle of his body; or his hope and confidence of eternal happineſs in another world, this ſhould periſh, and be as the giving up of the ghoſt: or the words may be rendered, he ſhall be rooted out of his tabernacle, which was his confidence [b]; that is, his ſoul ſhall be taken out his body by death, in which it dwelt as in a tabernacle, and where he hoped to have had a long continuance; death is a rooting of a man out of it, and even out of the world, ſee Pſ. lii. 5. and it ſhall bring him to the king of terrors; either famine, by which his ſtrength is weakened, or deſtruction that is at his ſide, or the firſt-born of death, or his vain confidence: or this may be the ſenſe, thou (O God) wilt bring him, or cauſe him to go to the king of terrors [c]; to death; all men are brought unto it, but not all unto it as a king of terrors; as good men, ſuch as Simeon, the apoſtle Paul, and others, but wicked men. Death is a king, it reigns, it has a large empire, even the whole world; its ſubjects are numerous, all, high and low, rich and poor, great and ſmall; and the duration of its reign is long, it reigned from Adam to Moſes, from Moſes to the coming of Chriſt, and from thence to this day, and will to the end of the world, and it reigns with an irreſiſtible power: and this king is a king of terrors to wicked men; it is, as Ariſtotle [d] calls it, the moſt terrible of terribles; it is terrible to nature, being a diſſolution of it; and it muſt be terrible to mere natural men, who have nothing to ſupport them under it, and no views beyond the grave to comfort them, and cauſe them to go chearful through it; but, on the other hand, have not only the bitterneſs of death to endure, but have terrible apprehenſions of a future judgment that comes after it. Some render it, the king of darkneſs [e], extreme darkneſs, blackneſs of darkneſs, utter darkneſs, which wicked men at death are brought unto. Jarchi interprets it of the king of dæmons, the devil; and to be brought to him is to be brought to hell and eternal damnation: ſo ſome render it, terrors ſhall bring him to his king [f], the devil; or rather, terrors ſhall come upon him like a king [g], in a very grand, powerful and formidable manner.

℣. 15. It ſhall dwell in his tabernacle, &c.] What ſhall dwell in it is not ſaid; there are various conjectures about it, and different ſupplements are made; the Targum is, "his wife ſhall dwell in a tabernacle not his;" and to the ſame purpoſe Jarchi; as if it was one part of the puniſhment of a wicked man, that he ſhould leave a widow behind him, and no houſe of his own for her to dwell in; but this is the caſe of the widows of many good men, who themſelves, in their life-time, have no houſes of their own, and ſome no certain dwelling-places, yea, have lived in caves and dens of the earth; the mother of our Lord, who ſeems to have been a widow at his death, was taken by one of his diſciples to his own home, which ſhows ſhe had none of her own. The Vulgate Latin verſion is, "his neighbours ſhall dwell in his tabernacle;" which ſome underſtand of their coming into it after his death, to mourn and bewail him; but as ſuch a viſit of his family upon his deceaſe, cannot be called dwelling, ſo this is rather a benefit and favour to his family, than a diſtreſs: rather it may ſignify, that ſuch neighbours whom he had oppreſſed, and who hated him for his tyranny and cruelty, now ſhould dwell in his houſe; what he had built, ſtrangers ſhould inhabit, which is a puniſhment of ſin and ſinners, Deut. xxviii. 30. Aben Ezra ſupplies it thus, a ſtrange or evil beaſt ſhall dwell in it, as they do in deſolate places; and it is frequently given as a ſign and token of deſolation in countries, cities and palaces, that they are become the habitations of wild and ſavage creatures, ſee Iſ.

[a] בכור מות primogenita mors, V. L.
[b] Michaelis.
[c] De Dieu.
[d] Ethic. l. 3. c. 9.
[e] למלך בלהות ad regem caliginum, Cocceius,
[f] Schmidt.
[g] Inſtar regis, Schultens; quaſi rex, V. L.

Iſ. xiii. 19—22. and xxxiv. 11, &c: Zeph. ii. 14. but it ſeems beſt to ſupply it from the context, either thus, famine, hunger, want of food ſhall dwell in it; poverty and want ſhall come like an armed man into it, and take poſſeſſion; there ſhall appear all the marks and ſigns of penury and diſtreſs; or deſtruction ready at his ſide ſhall take up its abode in it, and it ſhall be called the houſe of deſtruction, as a certain city is called the city of deſtruction, becauſe devoted to it, Iſ. xix. 18. or the firſt-born of death, ſome deadly diſeaſe, as the peſtilence; or death itſelf, the king of terrors, who is ſometimes repreſented as a perſon coming up into the windows of a palace, and entering it, and cutting off great numbers; ſo that it goes ill with him that is left in a tabernacle, where he has his habitation, Jer. ix. 21. Job xx. 26. or terror, as Ben Gerſom; every one of the terrors before mentioned, ſo that no body will care to dwell in it, but forſake it as an haunted houſe: in ſhort, from the whole it may be gathered, that the curſe of God ſhould alight upon it, and remain in it, as it does in the houſe of the wicked; the ſame with the flying roll in the viſion of Zechariah, the curſe of God's righteous law, which enters into the houſe of the thief and perjurer, and conſumes it, Prov. iii. 33. Zech. v. 4. the reaſon follows, becauſe it is none of his; not by right, being bought or built with mammon of unrighteouſneſs, with money not honeſtly got, and therefore ſhall not proſper; or becauſe it is no longer his, he being taken from it by death, the king of terrors, and that not knowing or owning him any more as its maſter or proprietor, and therefore ſtrangers ſhall dwell in it; or becauſe there is none that ſhall be after him, becauſe he ſhall have none left, or he ſhall have no ſurvivor [h], all his family being taken away by death; and therefore nothing but deſolation and deſtruction ſhall be ſeen in it, ſee Amos vi. 9, 10. brimſtone ſhall be ſcattered upon his habitation; that is, his houſe ſhould be burnt down by lightning, which is often ſulphurous, and ſometimes very ſenſibly has the ſmell of brimſtone in it [i]. Bildad may refer either to the fire of heaven that deſtroyed Job's ſheep, which was of this kind; or rather to the deſtruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, by a ſhower of fire and brimſtone from heaven, a fact well known in thoſe times. Moreover, brimſtone ſcattered upon the wicked man's dwelling-place, may denote the deſolation of it, that it ſhould lie in ruins, and be unfit to be inhabited; and the deſolation of places is ſometimes ſignified by their being ſalt, brimſtone and burning pitch, Deut. xxix. 23. Iſ. xxxiv. 9. yea, this may be carried farther, and denote the eternal damnation of all in his houſe, ſeeing the burning of Sodom with brimſtone, was an example to ungodly men ſuffering the vengeance of eternal fire, Jude ℣. 7. and which is ſometimes expreſſed by brimſtone, and a lake burning with fire and brimſtone, Rev. xx. 10. and xxi. 8. and xiv. 10, 11. Some [k] think reſpect is had to the luſtration of houſes with ſulphur, to drive away dæmons, and remove impurity, to make them fit to dwell in [l]; and others think it refers to the burning of ſulphur in houſes at funerals, to teſtify and exaggerate mourning [m].

℣. 16. His roots ſhall be dried up beneath, &c.] Wicked men are ſometimes compared to trees; to trees of the wood, barren and unfruitful; to trees without fruit, twice dead, plucked up by the roots; and ſometimes to green bay-trees, very flouriſhing for a while, and which on a ſudden periſh, and come to nothing, ſee Cant. ii. 3. Jude ℣. 12. Pſ. xxxvii. 35, 36. and ſuch a ſimile is here uſed; and by his roots may be meant his family, from whence he ſprung, which now ſhould be extinct with him, ſee Iſ. xi. 1. Dan. xi. 7. or his ſubſtance, which being greatly increaſed, he ſeemed to take root in the earth, and not only to be in a proſperous, but in a ſtable, ſettled condition; but now, Ephraim like, he ſhould be ſmitten, and his root dried up; all his wealth, and all the reſources of it, ſhould be exhauſted, be no more, ſee Jer. xii. 2. Hoſ. ix. 16. and above ſhall his branch be cut off; his children that ſprung from him, as branches from a tree, and were his glory and beauty, theſe ſhould be cut off; referring no doubt in both clauſes to Job's preſent circumſtances, whoſe root in the time of his proſperity was ſpread out by the waters, but now dried up, and on whoſe branches the dew lay all night, but now cut off, ch. xxix. 19. ſo the Targum, "his children ſhall be cut off out of the earth, and from heaven his deſtruction ſhall be decreed;" both clauſes ſignify the utter deſtruction of the family of the wicked man, root and branch, ſee Mal. iv. 1. It is a beautiful deſcription of a tree ſtruck with thunder and lightning, and burnt and ſhattered to pieces, and agrees with the preceding verſe.

℣. 17. His remembrance ſhall periſh from the earth, &c.] Not only are the wicked forgotten of God in heaven, and are as the ſlain he remembers no more, unleſs it be to pour out his wrath upon them, and puniſh them for their ſins, for which great Babylon will come up in remembrance before him; but of men on earth, and in the very places where they were born, and lived all their days, Eccl. viii. 10. and ix. 5. yea, thoſe places, houſes and palaces, towns and cities, which they have built to perpetuate their memory among men, periſh and come to nought, and their memorial with them, Pſ. ix. 5, 6. and xlix. 11. and he ſhall have no name in the ſtreet; much leſs in the houſe of God, ſtill leſs in heaven, in the Lamb's book of life; ſo far from it, that he ſhall have none on earth, no good name among men; if ever his name is mentioned after his death, it is with ſome brand of infamy upon him; he is not ſpoken of in public, in a court of judicature, nor in any place of commerce and trade, nor in any concourſe of people, or public aſſembly of any note, eſpecially with any credit or commendation; ſuch is the difference between a good man and a wicked man, ſee Prov. xi. 7.

℣. 18. He ſhall be driven from light into darkneſs, &c.] Either from the light of outward proſperity formerly enjoyed by him, into the darkneſs of adverſity; or rather from the light of the living, the light of the preſent life, to the darkneſs of death, and the grave, the land of darkneſs, and of the ſhadow of death, ch. x. 21, 22. and even into utter darkneſs, blackneſs of darkneſs, the darkneſs of hell, eternal darkneſs; oppoſed to the light of the divine preſence, and the inheritance of the ſaints in light, poſſeſſed by them to all eternity; which the wicked man is deprived of, and will have no ſhare in, but ſhall be driven from the preſence of God, and by him; for ſo the words may be rendered, they ſhall drive him [n], God, Father, Son and Spirit; God by the eaſt-wind and ſtorm of his wrath ſhall carry him away, and hurl him out

[h] So Syr. Ar. & Schmidt.
[i] Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 35. c. 15. Vid. Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 35. c. 15. Theocrit. Idyll. 25. ℣. 95. Homer. Odyſſ. 22. prope finem.
[k] Scheuchzer. Phyſic. Sacr. vol. 4. p. 709, 710.
[l] Vid. Menochium de Repub. Heb. l. 8. c. 6 col. 792.
[m] Vid. Menochium de Repub. Heb. l. 8. c. 6 col. 792.
[n] יהדפהו expellent eum, Pagninus, Montanus; ſo Figurine verſion, Vatablus, Mercerus, Druſius, Schultens, Cocceius, Schmidt.

out of his place, and ſhall caſt the fury of his wrath on him, and not ſpare, nor ſhall he flee out of his hands, though he fain would, ch. xxvii. 21, 22. or the angels, good or bad, ſhall drive him into endleſs torments, or ſhall by the divine order take him and caſt him into outward darkneſs, where are weeping, wailing, and gnaſhing of teeth; thus are the wicked driven againſt their will, and muſt go whether they will or no, and like beaſts to the ſlaughter, are driven in their wickedneſs, in order to ſuffer the puniſhment due unto it, when the righteous hath hope in his death, Prov. xiv. 32. and chaſed out of the world; or caſt out of it, as an unclean or excommunicated perſon, of which the word here is ſometimes uſed [o]; and not only chaſed out of his own place, out of his own houſe, and out of his own country, but even out of the world, ſo as to have no place any more in it, ſee ch. xx. 8, 9.

℣. 19. He ſhall neither have ſon nor nephew among his people, &c.] Neither ſon, nor ſon's ſon, or grandſon; ſo the Targum, Jarchi and Bar Tzemach; that is, he ſhall be childleſs, and have no heirs, ſucceſſors or ſurvivors to inherit his eſtate, bear and perpetuate his name among the people of his country, city, or neighbourhood. Bildad reſpects no doubt the preſent caſe of Job, who had loſt all his children; but he was miſtaken if he thought he ſhould die ſo, for he had after this as many children as he had before: nor any remaining in his dwellings; being all dead, or fled from them, thro' the terror, deſolation and deſtruction in them. Aben Ezra and Bar Tzemach interpret them places, in which he was a ſojourner or ſtranger; and Mr. Broughton, nor remnant in his pilgrimage.

℣. 20. They that come after him ſhall be aſtoniſhed at his day, &c.] At the day of his calamity and diſtreſs, ruin and deſtruction, ſee Pſ. xxxvii. 13. Obad. ℣. 12. it would be extremely amazing to them how it ſhould be, that a man who was in ſuch flouriſhing and proſperous circumſtances, ſhould be brought at once, he and his family, into ſuch extreme poverty, and into ſuch a diſtreſſed and forlorn condition; they ſhould be, as it were, thunder ſtruck at it, not being able to account for it: by theſe are meant, ſuch as are younger than the wicked man, and that continue longer than he, yet upon the ſpot when his calamity befel; or elſe poſterity in after-times, who would be made acquainted with the whole affair, and be ſurprized at the relation of it: as they that went before were affrighted; not that lived before the times of the wicked man, for they could not ſee his day, or be ſpectators of his ruin, and ſo be affrighted at it; but his cotemporaries, who are ſaid to be thoſe that went before, not with reſpect to the wicked man, but with reſpect to younger perſons or poſterity that were after; ſo Bar Tzemach interprets it, which were in his time, or his cotemporaries; and Mr. Broughton, "the preſent took an horror;" a late learned commentator [p] renders the words, weſtern and eaſtern; as if all people in the world, eaſt and weſt, would be amazed and aſtoniſhed at the ſudden and utter deſtruction of this wicked man.

℣. 21. Surely ſuch are the dwellings of the wicked, &c.] As before deſcribed; as that the light ſhould be dark in them; a wicked man's confidence ſhould be rooted out of them; every thing ſhocking and dreadful ſhould dwell in them; brimſtone ſhould be ſcattered on them, they ſhould be utterly conſumed, and none remaining in them, ℣. 6, 14, 15, 19. The Targum repreſents theſe as the words of the perſons aſtoniſhed and affrighted, who at the ſight of ſuch a diſmal ſpectacle ſhould utter them, prefacing them thus, "and they ſhall ſay, but theſe are the dwellings, &c." and this is the place of him that knoweth not God; the place that he ſhall be driven to when chaſed out of the world, even a place of darkneſs and miſery, ℣. 18. or this is the caſe of him that knoweth not the Omnipotent, as Mr. Broughton tranſlates the words; that is, which is above deſcribed in the ſeveral particulars of it; this is ſooner or later the caſe of every wicked man, as Bildad ſuppoſed it now was Job's caſe, at leaſt in part, or would be hereafter: one that knows not God, is the periphraſis of a wicked man, that has no knowledge of God, at leaſt no practical knowledge of him, that lives without God in the world, or like an atheiſt; ſuch ſhall be puniſhed with everlaſting deſtruction by him, ſee 2 Theſſ. i. 8, 9. either one whom God knows not [q], ſo ſome render the words; for though God by the perfection of his omniſcience knows all men, good and bad, yet there are ſome he knows not ſo as to approve of, love and delight in, ſee Matt. vii. 23. or rather that have no knowledge of God, who though they may know there is a God, yet do not worſhip and glorify him as God; and though they may profeſs to know him, yet in works they deny him, and however have no ſpiritual and experimental knowledge of him; don't know him in Chriſt, as the God of all grace, and as their God in him; they don't know him, ſo as to love him, fear, worſhip and obey him.

CHAP. XIX.

THIS chapter contains Job's reply to Bildad's ſecond ſpeech, in which he complains of the ill uſage of his friends, of their continuing to vex him, and to beat, and bruiſe, and break him in pieces with their hard words, and to reproach him, and carry it ſtrange to him, ℣. 1—3. which he thought was very cruel, ſince, if he was miſtaken, the miſtake lay with himſelf, ℣. 4. and if they were determined to go on at this rate, he would have them obſerve, that his afflictions were of God, and therefore ſhould take care to what they imputed them, ſince he could not get the reaſons of them, or his cauſe to be heard, though he vehemently and importunately ſought it, ℣. 5—7. and then gives an enumeration of the ſeveral particulars of his diſtreſs, all which he aſcribes to God, ℣. 8—12. and he enlarges upon that part of his unhappy caſe, reſpecting the alienation of his neareſt relations, moſt intimate acquaintance and friends from him, and their contempt of him, and the like treatment he met with from his ſervants, and even young children, ℣. 13—19. all which, with other troubles, had ſuch an effect upon him as to reduce him to a mere ſkeleton, and which he mentions to move the pity of theſe his friends, now converſing with him, ℣. 20—22. and yet after all, and in the midſt of it, and which was his great ſupport under his trials, he expreſſes his ſtrong faith in his living

[o] יגדרו excommunicabunt eum, Schmidt, Michaelis; ſo Codurcus. quem non agnoſcit Deus ſortis, Junius.

[p] Schultens.

[q] לא ידע אל

living Redeemer, who ſhould appear on the earth in the latter day, and be his Saviour, and in the reſurrection of the dead through him, which he believed he ſhould ſhare in, and in all the happineſs conſequent on it; and he wiſhes this confeſſion of his faith might be written and engraven, and be preſerved on a rock for ever for the good of poſterity, ver. 23—27, and cloſes the chapter with an expoſtulation with his friends, diſſuading them from perſecuting him any longer, ſince there was no reaſon for it in himſelf, and it might be attended with bad conſequences to them, ver. 28, 29.

℣. 1. Then Job anſwered and ſaid.] Having heard Bildad out, without giving him any interruption; and when he had finiſhed his oration, he roſe up in his own defence, and put in his anſwer as follows.

℣ 2. How long will ye vex my ſoul, &c.] Which of all vexation is the worſt; not only his bones were vexed, but his ſoul alſo, as David's was, Pſ. vi. 2, 3. His body was vexed with boils from head to feet; but now his ſoul was vexed by his friends, and which denotes extreme vexation, a man's being vexed to his very heart: there are many things vexatious to men, eſpecially to good men; they are not only vexed with pains of the body, as others, and with loſs of worldly ſubſtance; but even all things here below, and the higheſt enjoyment of them, as wealth, wiſdom, honours, and pleaſures, are all vanity and vexation of ſpirit, as they were to Solomon; but more eſpecially, truly good men are vexed with the corruptions of their hearts, which are as pricks in their eyes and thorns in their ſides, and with the temptations of Satan, which are alſo thorns in the fleſh and fiery darts, and with the converſation of wicked men, as was the ſoul of righteous Lot, and with the bad principles and practices of profeſſors of religion; and ſometimes as Job was, they are vexed by their own friends, who ſhould be their comforters, but prove miſerable ones, as his did, and even vexatious, and continued ſo to the wearing him out almoſt; and ſo ſome render the words, How long will ye weary my ſoul [c], with repeating their inſinuations that he was a wicked and hypocritical man, and therefore was afflicted of God in the manner he was; and which, knowing his own innocency, extremely vexed him: and break me in pieces with words; not his body, but his ſpirit; which was broken, not by the word of God, which is like an hammer that breaks the rocky heart in pieces; for ſuch a breaking is in mercy, and not an affliction to be complained of; and ſuch as are thus broken are healed again, and bound up by the ſame hand that breaks; who has great regard to broken ſpirits and contrite hearts; looks to them, and dwells with them, in order to revive and comfort them: but, by the words of men; Job was ſmitten with the tongues of men; as Jeremiah was, and was beaten and bruiſed by them, as any thing is beaten and bruiſed by a peſtle in a mortar, as the word [d] ſignifies, and is ſometimes rendered, Iſ. liii. 5. 10. theſe muſt be not ſoft but hard words, not gentle reproofs, which being given and taken in love, will not break the head, but calumnies and reproaches falſly caſt, and with great ſeverity, and frequently, which break the heart. See Pſ. lxix. 20.

℣ 3. Theſe ten times have ye reproached me, &c.] referring not to ten ſections or paragraphs, in which they had done it, as Jarchi; or to the five ſpeeches of his friends, in which their reproaches were doubled; or to Job's words, and their anſwer as Saadiah; for it does not denote an exact number of their reproaches, which Job was not ſo careful to count; but it ſignifies that he had been many times reproached by them; ſo Aben Ezra, and in which ſenſe the phraſe is often uſed, ſee Gen. xxxi. 7. Numb. xiv. 22. it is the lot of good men in all ages to be reproached by carnal and profane ſinners, on account of religion, and for righteouſneſs-ſake, as Chriſtians are for the ſake of Chriſt and his goſpel; and which Moſes eſteemed greater riches than all the treaſures of Egypt; but to be reproached by friends, and that as an hypocrite and a wicked man, as Job was, muſt be very cutting; and this being often repeated, as it was an aggravation of the ſin of his friends, ſo likewiſe of his affliction and patience: Ye are not aſhamed, ſo that ye make yourſelves ſtrange to me; they looked ſhy at him; would not be free and friendly with him, but carried it ſtrange to him, and ſeemed to have their affections alienated from him. There ſhould not be a ſtrangeneſs in good men one to another, ſince they are not aliens from the commonwealth of Iſrael, and ſtrangers to the covenants of promiſe, to the grace of God, and communion with him; ſince they are fellow-citizens, and of the houſhold of God; belong to the ſame city, ſhare in the ſame privileges, are of the ſame family, children of the ſame father, and brethren one of another, members of the ſame body, heirs of the ſame grace and glory, and are to dwell together in heaven to all eternity; wherefore they ſhould not make themſelves ſtrange to each other, but ſhould ſpeak often, kindly, and affectionately one to another, and freely converſe together about ſpiritual things; ſhould pray with one another, and build up each other on their moſt holy faith, and by love ſerve one another, and do all good offices mutually that lie in their power, and bear one another's burdens, and ſo fulfil the law of Chriſt: but inſtead of this, Job's friends would ſcarcely look at him, much leſs ſpeak one kind word to him; yea, they hardened themſelves againſt him, as ſome [e] render the word; had no compaſſion on him, or pity for him in his diſtreſſed circumſtances, which their relation to him obliged unto, and was due unto him on the ſcore of friendſhip; nay, they mocked at him, which, is the ſenſe of the word according to Ben Gerſom [f]; and of this he had complained before, ch. xii. 4, and xvii. 2. and with ſome [g] it has the ſignification of impudence and audaciouſneſs, from the ſenſe of the word in the Arabic language, ſee Iſ. iii. 9. as if they behaved towards him in a very impudent manner: or, though they knew him, as the Targum paraphraſes it, yet they were not aſhamed to reproach him; though they knew that he was a man that feared God; they knew his character and converſation before his afflictions came on him, and yet traduced him as an hypocrite and a wicked man. Whatever is ſinful men ſhould be aſhamed of, and will be ſooner or later; not to be aſhamed thereof, is an argument of great hardneſs and impenitence; and among other things it becomes ſaints to be aſhamed of their making themſelves ſtrange to one another. Some render it interrogatively [h], are ye not aſhamed? &c. you may well be aſhamed

[c] תגיון defatigabitis, Schmidt, Michaelis. Schultens.
[d] תדכאונני obtundetis, Vatablus, Piſcator, Schmidt; ſo Michaelis, Schultens.
[e] תהכרן לי induraſtis facies veſtras contra me, Vatablus; ſo Broughton.
[f] Erubeſcitis ſubſannare me Pagninus. Druſius; ſo Schultens.
[g] So Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator.

2

aſhamed, if you are not; this is put in order to make them aſhamed.

℣. 4. And be it indeed that I have erred, &c.] Which is a conceſſion for argument-ſake, but not an acknowledgment that he had erred; though it is poſſible he might have erred, and it is certain he did in ſome things, though not in that reſpect with which he was charged; humanum eſt errare, all men are ſubject to miſtakes, good men may err; they may err in judgment, or from the truth in ſome reſpect, and be carried away for awhile, and to ſome degree with the error of the wicked, though they ſhall be turned from it again; they may err in practice, and wander from the way of God's commandments; and indeed, their ſtrayings and aberrations of this ſort are ſo many, that David ſays, Who can underſtand his errors? Pſ. xix. 12. and they may err in words, or make a miſtake in ſpeech; but then no man ſhould be made an offender for a word; for he muſt be a perfect man that is free from miſtakes of this kind: now Job argues that ſuppoſing this to be his caſe in any of the above inſtances; yet, ſays he, mine error remaineth with myſelf; I only am chargeable with it, and anſwerable for it; it is nothing to you, and why ſhould you trouble yourſelves about it; it will not be imputed to you, nor will you ſuffer on account of it; or, admitting I have imbibed an error, I do not publiſh it abroad; I keep it to myſelf; it lies and lodges in my own breaſt, and no body is the worſe for it: or let it remain, or lodge with me [k]; why ſhould my miſtakes be publiſhed abroad, and all the world be made acquainted with them? or, elſe this expreſſes his reſolution to abide by what his friends called an error; and then the ſenſe is, if this is an error which I have aſſerted, that God afflicts both good and bad men; and that afflictions are no argument of a man's being an hypocrite and a wicked man, I am determined to continue in it; I will not give it up, I will hold it faſt; it ſhall remain with me as a principle never to be departed from; or it may be rather his meaning is, that this notion he had imbibed would remain with him, and was likely to do ſo, for any thing they had ſaid, or could ſay to the contrary.

℣. 5. If indeed ye will magnify yourſelves againſt me, &c.] Look and talk big, ſet up themſelves for great folk, and reſolve to run him down; open their mouths wide againſt him, and ſpeak great ſwelling words in a bluſtering manner; or magnify what they called an error in him, and ſet it out in the worſt light they could: and plead againſt me my reproach; his affliction which he was reproached with, and was pleaded againſt him as an argument of his being a wicked man; if therefore they were determined to go on after this manner, and inſiſt on this kind of proof, then he would have them take what follows.

℣. 6. Know now that God hath overthrown me, &c.] He would have them take notice that all his afflictions were from the hand of God; and therefore ſhould take care to what they imputed any acts of his, whoſe ways are unſearchable, and the reaſons of them not to be found out; and therefore, if a wrong conſtruction ſhould be put upon them, which may be eaſily done by weak-ſighted men, it muſt be diſpleaſing to him. Job had all along from the firſt aſcribed his afflictions to God, and he ſtill continued to do ſo; he ſaw his hand in them all, whoever were the inſtruments, it was God that had overthrown him, or caſt him down from an high to a very low eſtate; that had taken away his ſubſtance, his children, and his wealth: or hath perverted me [l]; not that God had made him perverſe, or was the cauſe or occaſion of any perverſeneſs in him, either in his words or in his actions, or had perverted his cauſe, and the judgment of it; Job could readily anſwer to thoſe queſtions of Bildad, Doth God pervert judgment? or doth the Almighty pervert juſtice? and ſay, no, he doth not; but he is to be underſtood in the ſame ſenſe as the church is; when ſhe ſays, ſee Lam. iii. 9. he hath made my path crooked; where the ſame word is uſed as here; and both ſhe and Job mean, that God had brought them into croſs, crooked, and afflictive diſpenſations: and hath compaſſed me with his net; and which alſo deſigns affliction, which is God's net, which he has made, ordained, and makes uſe of; which he lays for his people, and takes them in, and draws them to himſelf, and prevents them committing ſin, and cauſes to iſſue in their good; ſee Lam. i. 13. Ezek. ii. 13.

℣. 7. Behold I cry out of wrong, &c.] Or of violence [m], or injury done him by the Sabeans and Chaldeans upon his ſubſtance, and by Satan upon his health; this he cried out, and complained of in prayer to God, and of it as it were in open court, as a violation of juſtice, and as being dealt very unjuſtly with: but I am not heard; his prayer was not heard; he could get no relief, nor any redreſs of his grievances, nor any knowledge of the reaſons of his being thus uſed; ſee Hab. i. 2. I cry aloud, but there is no judgment; notwithſtanding his vehement and importunate requeſts; and which were repeated time after time, that there might be a hearing of his cauſe; that it might be ſearched into and tried, that his innocence might be cleared, and juſtice done him, and vengeance taken on thoſe that wronged him; but he could not obtain it; there was no time appointed for judgment, no court of judicature ſet, nor any to judge. Now ſeeing this was the caſe, that the hand of God was in all his afflictions; that he had complained to him of the injury done him; and that he had moſt earneſtly deſired his cauſe might be heard, and the reaſons given why he was thus uſed, but could get no anſwer to all this; therefore it became them to be cautious, and careful of what they ſaid concerning the dealings of God with him, and to what account they placed them; of which he gives a particular enumeration in the following verſes.

℣. 8. He hath fenced up my way that I cannot paſs, &c.] A metaphor taken from travellers, who not only meet with obſtacles and obſtructions in their way, which make it difficult; but ſometimes with ſuch incloſures and fences, that they are at a full ſtop, and cannot paſs on, and know not what courſe to ſteer: the people of God are not inhabitants of this world, but pilgrims, ſtrangers, and ſojourners in it, and travellers through it; they are bound for another country, and are travelling to it; and though their way for the moſt part is indeed troubleſome, but generally paſſable, or made ſo; yet ſometimes not only is their way hedged up with afflictions, and they hedged about with them, that they cannot eaſily get out, and get through and paſs on; and it is with much difficulty, and with being much ſcratched and torn they do bruſh through; but they alſo at other times find God has built up a wall a wall againſt them, and encloſed them with hewn ſtones, and ſo fenced up their way that they cannot paſs on; ſuch difficulties preſent as ſeem inſurmountable, and they are at a ſtand, and know not what way to take; which was now Job's caſe, ſee Lam. iii. 5. 7. 9. and this may not only reſpect the way of his walk in this world, but his way to God, either to the throne of his grace, or the tribunal of his juſtice: the way to God, as on a throne of grace, is only through Chriſt, the living way; which, tho' more clearly revealed under the goſpel-diſpenſation, and therefore called a new way, yet was known under the former diſpenſation, and made uſe of; in which ſaints may have acceſs to God, with boldneſs and confidence: but ſometimes this way ſeems by unbelief to be fenced up, though it is always open; and eſpecially when God hides his face, and is not to be ſeen, nor is it known where to find him, and how to come up to his ſeat; and which alſo was Job's caſe, ch. xxiii. 3. and whereas he was very deſirous of having his cauſe heard and tried at the tribunal of God, his way was ſo ſhut up, that he could not obtain what he ſo much deſired, and knew not therefore how to proceed, and what courſe to take: and he hath ſet darkneſs in my paths; and was like a traveller in a very dark night, that cannot ſee his way, and knows not what ſtep to take next; ſo good men, though they walk not in the ways of darkneſs, in a moral ſenſe, as unregenerate men do; yet even while they are walking in the good ways of truth and holineſs, and while they are paſſing thro' this world, God ſometimes withdraws the light of his countenance from them, ſo that they walk in darkneſs, and have no light, which is very uncomfortable walking; and when God may be ſaid to put darkneſs into their paths, he not granting them the light of grace and comfort they have ſometimes enjoyed; and ſo it is with them when under ſuch dark diſpenſations of providence, as that they cannot ſee the end of God in leading them in ſuch ways; and then their caſe is ſuch as it now was Job's; that they cannot ſee any way of getting out of it; as the Iſraelites at the Red ſea, and Paul and the mariners when in a ſtorm, and all hope of being ſaved was gone.

[k] אתי תלין mecum maneat, Beza; to the ſame ſenſe, Mercerus, Schmidt, Junius and Tremellius, Piſcator, Michaelis, Schultens. [l] עותני pervertit me, Montanus, Mercerus; ſo Vatablus, Druſius, Schultens. [m] חמס violentiam, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, &c. injuriam, Montanus.

℣. 9. He hath ſtript me of my glory, &c.] The metaphor of a traveller may be ſtill continued, who falling among thieves is ſtripped of his cloaths, to which the alluſion may be: Job was not ſtripped of his glory in a ſpiritual ſenſe, not of the glorious robe of Chriſt's righteouſneſs, nor of the graces of the Spirit, which make ſaints all-glorious within; but in a civil ſenſe, and is to be underſtood not merely of his rich apparel, or of his robe, which he might wear as a civil magiſtrate, as an enſign of honour, and which made him look glorious; but either of his wealth, riches, and ſubſtance, which are a man's glory, and which he too often and too much glories in, though Job might not; ſee Pſ. xlix. 16. Gen. xxxi. 1. or of his children, Hoſ. ix. 11. Eſth. v. 11. and indeed of every thing that made him look magnificent among men; as an abundance of this world's good, a numerous family, fine cloaths, ſumptuous living, and a ſtately palace; all which Job might have had, but was now ſtripped of all by one means or another; and whoever were the inſtruments, he aſcribes it all to God, as being according to his ſovereign will and pleaſure; and theſe things are very properly and ſignificantly expreſſed by cloaths a man is ſtripped of, becauſe they are outward, things as garments are, adorn and make externally glorious, as they do, and of which a man may be as ſoon and as eaſily deprived, as to be ſtripped of his cloaths, by one or more of ſuperior power to him: and taken the crown from my head; meaning much the ſame as before, either his wealth and riches, which are the crown of a wiſe man, Prov. xiv. 24. or his children, which are the crown of old men, Prov. xvii. 6. or every thing that gave him honour, reputation, and eſteem with men; all was taken away from him, and his honour laid in the duſt. Some from hence have wrongly concluded, that Job was a king, and wore a royal diadem, of which he was now deprived, miſtaking him for Jobab a king of Edom, Gen. xxxvi. 33. but he had and wore a better diadem, and which he did not loſe, but held faſt, even his righteouſneſs, juſtice, and integrity, ch. xxix. 14. and much leſs could the crown of life, righteouſneſs, and glory, to which he was entitled, be taken from him.

℣. 10. He hath deſtroyed me on every ſide, &c.] To be troubled on every ſide is much, as the apoſtles were, 2 Cor. iv. 8. but to be deſtroyed on every ſide, and all around, is more, and denotes utter deſtruction; it may have reſpect to the ruin of his ſubſtance and family, which were all demoliſhed at once; his oxen and aſſes, which were on one ſide, his camels on another, his ſheep on another, and his children on another, and all deſtroyed in one day, and perhaps in a few hours; and alſo to his body, which God had made, and had faſhioned together round about; but now he had ſuffered it to be ſmitten with ulcers from the crown of his head to the ſole of his feet; and this earthly tabernacle of his was demoliſhing on every ſide, and juſt falling down; for the alluſion is either to the demolition of a building, or to the rooting up of a tree, and ſo continued in the next clauſe; comparing himſelf to a tree, that is dug about on all ſides, and its roots laid bare, and theſe and all their fibres cut off, ſo that it is utterly deſtroyed from growing any more, but becomes dead; and this Job thought to be his caſe: and I am gone; or am a dead man, juſt going out of the world, the way of all fleſh; and becauſe of the certainty of it, and of its being very quickly, in a few minutes, as it were, he ſpeaks of it as if it already was: wherefore it follows, and my hope he hath removed like a tree; not like a tree that is cut down to its roots which remain in the ground, and may ſprout out again, ch. xiv. 7. nor like a tree that is taken up with its roots, and removed to another place, and planted in another ſoil, where it may grow as well or better; but like a tree cut off from its roots, or pulled up by the roots, and laid upon the ground, when there can be no hope of its ever growing again; and ſo the hope of Job was like that; not his hope of ſalvation, of the reſurrection of the dead, and of eternal life, which was ſtrong and firm, ch. xiii. 15, 16. and xix. 25, 26, 27. nor can a good and well-grounded hope be removed; not the grace of hope, which is an abiding one; nor the ground of hope, which is Chriſt and his righteouſneſs, upon which hope as an anchor, being caſt, is ſure and ſtedfaſt; nor the object of hope, eternal glory and happineſs laid up in heaven: but this is to be interpreted of Job's hope of a reſtoration to outward happineſs, which his friends would have had him entertain, in caſe of repentance and reformation; but Job, as he was not ſenſible of his need of the one, as his friends underſtood it, he had no hope of the other, ſee ch. vi. 11. and xvii. 15.

℣. 11. He hath alſo kindled his wrath againſt me, &c.] In this and ſome following verſes, the metaphor is taken from a ſtate of warfare, in which enemies

mies are engaged in an hoſtile way; in which way Job apprehended God was come forth againſt him; he imagined, that the wrath of God, which is comparable to fire for its force and fury, was kindled againſt him; that it began to appear, and was burſting out in a flame upon him, and all around him, to conſume him; he thought his afflictions were in wrath, which is often the miſtaken apprehenſion of good men, ſee Pſ. xxxviii. 1. and lxxxviii. 7. 16. and that the terrors of it were ſet in battel-array againſt him, ch. vi. 4. and he counteth me unto him as one of his enemies; all men are by nature enemies to God, yea, enmity itſelf, and ſo are his own people whilſt unregenerate, until the enmity of their hearts is ſlain, and they are reconciled to God by his ſpirit and grace; but as Job was truly a gracious man, and poſſeſſed of the fruits of the Spirit, he muſt among the reſt of his graces have the love of God in his heart; and he was ſenſible and conſcious to himſelf that he was no enemy to God, and could appeal to him as the ſearcher of hearts, that he knew he loved him; nay, he could not believe that God reckoned him his enemy, when he had given ſuch a teſtimony of him, and of his fear of him, that there was none like him; and when Job ſo ſtrongly truſted in him for ſalvation, and believed he ſhould enjoy him for ever: but his ſenſe is, that God treated him, by afflicting him in the manner he did, as if he was one of his enemies; had he really been one, he could not have uſed him he thought more roughly and ſeverely; ſo that judging according to the outward appearance of things, it might be concluded, as it ſeems it was by his friends, that he was a wicked man, an hypocrite, an enemy to God and godlineſs; but whereas Job thought that God dealt with him as with an enemy, he was miſtaken; ſince when God afflicts his people, he deals with them as with ſons, Heb. xii. 7.

℣. 12. His troops come together, &c.] Afflictions which are many, and of which it may be ſaid as was at the birth of Gad, who had his name from the word here uſed, a troop cometh; Gen. xxx. 11. and theſe ſometimes come together, or follow ſo quick one upon another, that there is ſcaree any interval between them, as did Job's afflictions; and they are God's hoſts, his troops, his ſoldiers, which are at his command; and he ſays to them as the centurion did to his, to the one go and he goes, and to another come and it comes: and raiſe up their way againſt me; as an army, when it comes againſt a place, throws up a bank to raiſe their artillery upon, that they may play it to greater advantage; or make a broad cauſeway, for the ſoldiers to march abreaſt againſt it; or an high caſt up way, as the word [y] ſignifies, over a ditch or dirty place in a hollow, that they may the better paſs over: ſome read it, they raiſe up their way upon me [z]; he oppoſing and ſtanding in the way was cruſhed down by them, and trampled upon, and over whom they paſſed as on an high way, and in a beaten path; ſee Iſ. li. 23. but moſt render it, againſt me; for Job looked upon all his afflictions, as Jacob did, to be againſt him, to militate againſt him, and threaten him with ruin, when they were all working for him, even for his good: and encamp round about my tabernacle; as an army round about a city when beſieging it. Job may have reſpect to the tabernacle of his body, as that is ſometimes ſo called, 2 Cor. v. 1. 2 Pet. i. 13, 14. and to the diſeaſes of it; which being a complication, might be ſaid to encamp about him, or ſurround him on all ſides.

℣. 13. He hath put my brethren far from me, &c.] As it is one part of buſineſs in war, to cut off all communication between the enemy and their confederates and auxiliaries, and to hinder them of all the help and aſſiſtance from them they can; ſo Job here repreſents God dealing with him as with an enemy, and therefore keeps at a diſtance from him all ſuch from whom he might expect comfort and ſuccour, as particularly his brethren; by whom may be meant ſuch who in a natural relation are ſtrictly and properly brethren; for ſuch Job had, as appears from ch. xlii. 11. who afterwards paid him a viſit, and ſhewed brotherly love to him; but for the preſent the affliction that God laid upon him, had ſuch an influence on them as to cauſe them to ſtand aloof off, and not come near him, and ſhew any regard unto him; and as this was the effect of the afflicting hand of God, Job aſcribes it to him, and which added to his affliction; ſee Pſ. lxix. 8. and mine acquaintance are verily eſtranged from me; ſuch as knew him in the time of his proſperity, and frequently viſited him, and converſed with him, and he with them; but now things having taken a different turn in his outward circumſtances, they carried it ſtrange to him, as if they had never been acquainted with him: ſi fueris felix, &c.

℣. 14. My kinſfolk have failed, &c.] Or ceaſed [a], not to be, or that they were dead, which is ſometimes the ſenſe of the word; but they ceaſed from viſiting him, or doing any good office for him; thoſe that were near [b] him, as the word uſed ſignifies; that were near him in relation, and were often near him in place, in his own houſe, in company and converſation with him, now ceaſed to be near him in affection; or to come nigh him, to converſe with him and comfort him, and ſympathize with him, which might be expected from perſons nearly related: and my familiar friends have forgotten me; ſuch as were well known to him, and he to them, and who not long ago were very loving and friendly to him, and very freely and familiarly converſed with him; but now they forgot him; the friendſhip that ſubſiſted between them, the friendlineſs with which they had viſited him, and the favours they had received from him, they ſo ſlighted, and neglected him, that it ſeemed as if he was forgotten, as a dead man, out of mind; or as if they did not remember that there ever was, or at leaſt that there now was, ſuch a man in the world as Job: Theſe could not be true friends; for a friend loves at all times, and a brother is born for adverſity, Prov. xvii. 17. a real friend loves, and continues to love in adverſity as well as in proſperity; and ſuch an one, who ſometimes ſticks cloſer to a man than a brother, is born and deſigned to be of ſervice to him in a time of trouble; but ſo it was ordered by divine providence, and according to the will of God, that Job ſhould meet with ſuch treatment from his brethren, relations, acquaintance, and familiar friends, for the trial of his faith and patience.

℣. 15. They that dwell in mine houſe, &c.] Not his neighbours, as the Septuagint; for though they dwelt near his houſe, they did not dwell in it; nor inmates and ſojourners, lodgers with him, to whom he let out apartments in his houſe; this can't be ſuppoſed ſuppoſed to have been his caſe, who was the greateſt man in all the eaſt; nor even tenants, that hired houſes and lands of him; for the phraſe is not applicable to them; it deſigns ſuch who were inhabitants in his houſe. Job amidſt all his calamities had an houſe to dwell in; it is a tradition mentioned by Jerom [c], that Job's houſe was in Carnea, a large village in his time, in a corner of Batanea, beyond the floods of Jordan; and he had perſons dwelling with him in it, who are diſtinct from his wife, children, and ſervants after mentioned; and are either ſtrangers [d], as the word ſometimes ſignifies, he had taken into his houſe in a way of hoſpitality, and had given them lodging, and food, and raiment, as the light of nature and law of God required, Deut. x. 18, 19. Job xxxi. 32. or elſe proſelytes, of whom this word [e] is ſometimes uſed, whom he had been the inſtrument of converting from idolatry, ſuperſtition, and profaneneſs, and of gaining them over to the true religion; and whom he had taken into his houſe, to inſtruct them more and more in the ways of God, ſuch as were the trained ſervants in Abraham's family: theſe, ſays he, and my maids count me for a ſtranger; both the one and the other, the ſtrangers he took out of the ſtreets, and the travellers he opened his doors unto, and entertained in a very generous and hoſpitable manner; the proſelytes he had made, and with whom he had taken ſo much pains, and to whom he had ſhewn ſo much kindneſs and goodneſs, and been the means of ſaving their ſouls from death; and his maidens he had hired into his houſe, to do the buſineſs of it, and who ought to have been obedient and reſpectful to him, and whoſe cauſe he had not deſpiſed, but had treated them with great humanity and concern; the Targum wrongly renders the word, my concubines; yet theſe one and another looked upon him with an air of the utmoſt indifference, not as if he was the maſter of the houſe, but a ſtranger in it, as one that did not belong unto it, and they had ſcarce ever ſeen with their eyes before; which was very ungrateful, and diſreſpectful to the laſt degree; and if they reckoned him a ſtranger to God, to his grace, to true religion and godlineſs, this was worſe ſtill; and eſpecially in the proſelytes of his houſe, who owed their converſion, their light and knowledge in divine things, to him as an inſtrument: I am an alien in their ſight; as a foreigner, one of another kingdom and nation, of a different habit, ſpeech, religion, and manners; they ſtared at him as if they had never ſeen him before, as ſome ſtrange object to be looked at, an uncommon ſpectacle, that had ſomething in him or about him unuſual and frightful; at leaſt contemptible and to be diſdained, and not to be ſpoke to and familiarly converſed with, but to be ſhunned and deſpiſed.

[y] ויסלו aggerant, Cocceius, Schultens; ſtraverunt, Montanus, Schmidt; a מסלה via ſtrata & elevata, Mercerus, Druſius. [z] עלי ſuper me, Pagninus, Montanus, Mercerus, Schmidt, Michaelis. [a] חדלו deſierunt, Pagninus, Montanus, Vatablus, Mercerus, Druſius, Piſcator, Schmidt, Michaelis; ceſſant, Schultens. [b] קרובי propinqui mei, Pagninus, Montanus, &c.

℣. 16. I called my ſervant, &c.] His manſervant, whom he had hired into his houſe, and who waited upon his perſon, and had been his truſty and faithful ſervant, and was dear unto him, and he had ſhewn him much reſpect and kindneſs in the time of his proſperity; him he called to him, to do this and that and the other thing for him as uſual; and of whoſe aſſiſtance and ſervice he might ſtand in more need, being ſo greatly afflicted in body as well as in other things; and who ought to have been obedient to his call in all things, and have ſerved him with all readineſs and chearfulneſs, with all heartineſs, ſincerity, integrity, and faithfulneſs; and given him the ſame honour and reverence as before; but inſtead of all this, it is obſerved, and he gave me no anſwer; whether he would or would not do what he ordered him to do; he took no notice of him, he turned a deaf ear to him, and his back upon him; he came not near him, but kept his place where he was, or walked off without ſhewing any regard to what he ſaid to him; he neither anſwered him by words, nor by deeds, neither ſignified his readineſs to do what he was ordered, nor did it. In ſome caſes it is criminal in ſervants to anſwer again, when they thwart and contradict their maſters, or reply in a ſawcy, ſurly, and impudent manner; but when they are ſpoke to about their maſter's buſineſs, it becomes them to anſwer in a decent, humble, and reſpectable way, declaring their readineſs to do their maſter's will and pleaſure: I entreated him with my mouth; which is an aggravation of his inſolence and diſobedience; ſuch was the low condition Job was reduced unto, and ſuch the humility of his mind under his preſent circumſtances, that he laid aſide the authority of a maſter, and only intreated his ſervant, and begged it as if it was a favour, to do this or the other for him; nor did he ſignify this by a look and caſt of his eye; or by a nod of his head, or by the direction of his hand; but with his mouth he ſpake unto him, and let him know what he would have done; and this not in an authoritative, haughty, and imperious manner; but with good words, and in ſubmiſſive language, as if it was ſomething he was beholden to his ſervant for, rather than obedience to be performed.

℣. 17. My breath is ſtrange to my wife, &c.] Being corrupt and unſavoury, through ſome internal diſorder; ſee ch. xvii. 1. ſo that ſhe could not bear to come nigh him, to do any kind office for him; but if this was his caſe, and his natural breath was ſo fœtid, his friends would not have been able to have been ſo long in the ſame room with him, and carry on ſo long a converſation with him; rather therefore it may ſignify the words of his mouth, his ſpeech along with his breath, which were very diſagreeable to his wife; when upon her ſoliciting him to curſe God and die, he told her ſhe talked like one of the fooliſh women; and when he taught her to expect evil as well as good at the hand of God, and to bear afflictions patiently: or elſe the ſenſe may be, my ſpirit [f], his vital ſpirit, his life was weariſome and loathſome to his wife; ſhe was tired out with him, with hearing his continual groans and complaints, and wiſhed to be rid of him, and that God would take away his life: or elſe, as ſome render it, my ſpirit is ſtrange to me, becauſe of my wife [g]; and then the meaning is, that Job was weary of his own life, he loathed it, and could have been glad to have it taken from him, becauſe of the ſcoffs and jeers of his wife at him, her brawls and quarrels with him, and ſolicitations of him, to curſe God and renounce religion: though I intreated her for the children's ſake of mine own body; this clauſe creates a difficulty with interpreters, ſince it is generally thought all Job's children were dead. Some think that only his elder children were deſtroyed at once, and that he had younger ones at home with him, which he here refers to; but this does not appear: others ſuppoſe theſe were children of his concubines;

[c] De loc. Heb. fol. 89. M.
[d] זרי peregrini, Schmidt, Schultens. Vatablus, Schmidt, Schultens; anima mea, Cocceius.
[e] Apud Rabbinos, paſſim.
[f] רוחי ſpiritus meus, Junius & Treme propter uxorem meam, Schmidt.
[g] לאשתי

concubines; but this wants proof, that he had any concubine; and beſides an intreaty for the ſake of ſuch children could have no influence upon his proper wife: others take them for grand-children, and who indeed are ſometimes called children; but then they could not with ſtrict propriety be called the children of his body; and for the ſame reaſon it cannot be meant of ſuch that were brought up in his houſe, as if they were his children; nor ſuch as were his diſciples, or attended on him for inſtruction: but this may reſpect not any children then living, but thoſe he had had; and the ſenſe is that Job intreated his wife, not for the uſe of the marriage-bed, as ſome ſuggeſt [h]; for it can hardly be thought, that in ſuch circumſtances in which he was, there ſhould be any deſire of this kind; but to do ſome kind office for him, as the dreſſing of his ulcers, &c. or ſuch things which none but a wife could well do for him; and this he entreated for the ſake of the children he had had by her, thoſe pledges of their conjugal affection; or rather, ſince the word has the ſignification of deploring, lamenting, and bemoaning; the clauſe may be thus rendered, and I lamented the children of my body [i]: he had none of thoſe indeed to afflict him; and his affliction was, that they were taken away from him at once in ſuch a violent manner; and therefore he puts in this among his family-trials; or this may be an aggravation of his wife's want of tenderneſs and reſpect unto him; that his breath ſhould be unſavory, his talk diſagreeable, and his ſighs and moans be weariſome to her, when the burden of his ſong, the ſubject of his ſorrowful complaints was the loſs of his children; in which it might have been thought ſhe would have joined with him, being equally concerned therein.

℣. 18. Yea, young children deſpiſed me, &c.] Having related what he met with within doors from thoſe in his own houſe, the ſtrangers and proſelytes in it, his maidens and men-ſervants, and even from his own wife, he proceeds to give an account of what befel him without; young children, who had learned of their parents, having obſerved them to treat him with contempt, mocked and ſcoffed at him, and ſaid, There ſits old Job, that naſty creature, with his boils and ulcers; or uſing ſome ſuch contemptuous expreſſion, as wicked man; ſo ſome tranſlate the word [k]; he was ſcorned and contemned by prophane perſons, who might twit him with his religion, and aſk where was his God? and bid him obſerve the effect and iſſue of his piety and ſtrict courſe of living, and ſee what it was all come to, or what was the fruits of it: the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it fools, that is, not ideots, but ſuch as are ſo in a moral ſenſe, and ſo ſignifies as before; and as theſe make mock at ſin, and a jeſt of religion, it is no wonder that they deſpiſed good men: the word is rendered by a learned man [l], the moſt needy clients, who were dependent on him, and were ſupported by him; but this coincides with ver. 15. I aroſe, and they ſpoke againſt me: he got up from his ſeat, either to go about his buſineſs, and do what he had to do; and they ſpoke againſt him as he went along, and followed him with their reproaches, as children will go after perſons in a body they make ſport of; or he roſe up in a condeſcending manner to them, when they ought to have roſe up to him, and reverenced, and honoured him; and this he did to win upon them, and gain their good-will and reſpect; or to admoniſh them, chaſtize and correct them for their inſolence and diſreſpect to him; but it ſignified nothing, they went on calling him names, and ſpeaking evil againſt him, and loading him with ſcoffs and reproaches.

℣ 19. All my inward friends abhorred me, &c.] Or the men of my ſecret [m]; who were ſo very familiar with him, that he imparted the ſecrets of his heart, and the moſt private affairs of life unto them, placing ſo much confidence in them, and treating them as his boſom-friends; for this is always reckoned a great inſtance of friendſhip, Job xv. 15. and yet their minds were ſet againſt him; their affections were alienated from him; they abhorred the ſight of him, and declined all converſation with him, even all of them; not one ſhewed reſpect unto him: and they whom I loved; or this whom I loved [n]; this and that, and the other particular friend, that he loved more than others: though all men are to be loved as the creatures of God, and as fellow-creatures, and eſpecially good men, even all the ſaints; yet there are ſome that engroſs a greater ſhare of love than others, among natural and ſpiritual relations; as Joſeph was more loved by his father than the reſt of his children; and even by our Lord, John was loved more than the other diſciples: and ſo Job, he had ſome particular friends that he loved above others; and yet theſe not only turned away from him in the time of his adverſity, and turned their backs on him, and would have nothing to ſay to him for his comfort, nor afford him any relief of any kind in his diſtreſs, but were turned againſt him, and became his enemies; and, as David ſays of ſome that he had a love for, for my love, they are my adverſaries, Pſ. cix. 4.

℣ 20. My bone cleaveth to my ſkin, and to my fleſh, &c.] Or, as to my fleſh [o], as Mr. Broughton and others render the words; as his bones uſed to ſtick to his fleſh, and were covered with it, now his fleſh being conſumed and waſted away with his diſeaſe, they ſtuck to his ſkin, and were ſeen through it; he was reduced to ſkin and bone, and was a mere ſkeleton, what with the force of his bodily diſorder, and the grief of his mind through the treatment he met with from God and men, ſee Lam. iv. 8. and I am eſcaped with the ſkin of my teeth; meaning not as ſome underſtand it, his lips which covered his teeth; for thoſe cannot be properly called the ſkin of them; rather the fine poliſh of the teeth, which fortifies them againſt the hurt and damage they would receive by what is eat and drank; though it ſeems beſt to interpret it of the ſkin of the gums, in which the teeth are ſet; and the ſenſe is, that Job had eſcaped with his life, but not with a whole ſkin, his ſkin was broken all over him, with the ſores and ulcers upon him, ſee ch. vii. 5. only the ſkin of his teeth was preſerved, and ſo Mr. Broughton renders it, I am whole only in the ſkin of my teeth; every where elſe his ſkin was broken; ſo the Targum, "I am left in the ſkin of my teeth." Some have thought that Satan, when he ſmote Job from head to feet with ulcers, ſpared his mouth, lips, and teeth, the inſtruments of ſpeech, that he might might therewith curſe God, which was the thing he aimed at, and propoſed to bring him to, by getting a grant from God to afflict him in the manner he did.

[h] R. Levi Ben Gerſom; ſo ſome in Vatablus. [i] והנותי deploro, Cocceius; & miſerans lugeo, Schmidt; & miſeret me, Michaelis; comploro, Schultens. [k] עוילים iniqui, Pagninus, Montanus; homines nequam, Tigurine verſion; ſo Ben Gerſom. [l] Clientes egentiſſimi, Schultens. [m] מתי סודי viri ſecreti mei, Montanus; homines ſecreti mei, Cocceius, Schmidt; viri arcani mei, Beza, Mercerus; homines arcani mei conſilii, Michaelis. [n] וזה & quem, V. L. & hic ſeu is quem, Mercerus, Druſius. [o] בעורי ובבשרי cuti meæ ut carni meæ; Tremellius, in one edition of his verſion.

℣. 21. Have pity upon me, have pity upon me, &c.] Inſtead of calumny and cenſure, his caſe called for compaſſion; and the phraſe is doubled, to denote the vehemence of his affliction, the ardency of his ſoul, the anguiſh of his ſpirits, the great diſtreſs he was in, and the earneſt deſire he had to have pity ſhewn him; and in which he may be thought not only to make a requeſt to his friends for it, but to give them a reproof for want of it: O ye my friends; as they once ſhewed themſelves to be, and now profeſſed they were; and ſince they did, pity might be reaſonably expected from them; for even common humanity, and much more friendſhip required it of them, that they ſhould be pitiful and courteous, and put on bowels of mercy and kindneſs, and commiſerate his ſad eſtate, and give him all the ſuccour, relief, and comfort they could, ſee ch. vi. 14. for the hand of God has touched me; his afflicting hand, which is a mighty one; it lay hard and heavy upon him, and preſſed him ſore; for though it was but a touch of his hand, it was more than he could well bear; for it was the touch of the Almighty, who toucheth the hills, and they ſmoke; and if he lays his hand ever ſo lightly on houſes of clay, which have their foundation in the duſt, they cannot ſupport under the weight of it, ſince they are cruſhed before the moth, or as eaſily as a moth is cruſhed.

℣. 22. Why do ye perſecute me as God, &c.] As if they were in his ſtead, or had the ſame power and authority over him, who is a ſovereign being, and does what he pleaſes with his creatures, and is not accountable to any for what he does; but this is not the caſe of men, nor are they to imitate God in all things; what he does, is not in all things a warrant to do the like, or to be pleaded and followed as a precedent by them; they ſhould be merciful as he is merciful, but they are not to afflict and diſtreſs his people becauſe he does, and which he does for wiſe ends and reaſons; for ſuch a conduct is reſented by him, ſee Zech. i. 15. God perſecuted, or purſued and followed Job with one affliction after another, and hunted him as a fierce lion does his prey, ch. x. 16. but this was not a reaſon why they ſhould do the ſame. Some read the words, why do ye perſecute me as thoſe[p]? you that profeſs to be my friends, why do ye perſecute me as thoſe before-mentioned, as thoſe wicked men; or with thoſe, with ſuch reproaches and calumnies; but the original will not bear it: and are not ſatisfied with my fleſh? It was not enough that he was afflicted in his body and his fleſh was ulcerated from head to feet, and was clothed with worms and clods of duſt; they were not content that his children, which were his own fleſh, were tore away from him, and deſtroyed; and that his ſubſtance, which is ſometimes called the fleſh of men, ſee Mic. iii. 3. and Rev. xvii. 16. was devoured, and he was ſpoiled and plundered of it; but they ſought to afflict his mind, to wound his ſpirit, by their heavy charges, and accuſations, by their calumnies and reproaches, and hard cenſures of him; he ſuggeſts, that they dealt with him more cruelly than ſavage beaſts, who, when they have got their prey, are ſatisfied with their fleſh; but they, who would be thought to be his friends, were not ſatisfied with his.

℣. 23. O that my words were now written, &c.] Not his things[q], as ſome render it, his affairs, the tranſactions of his life; that ſo it might appear with what uprightneſs and integrity he had lived, and was not the bad man he was thought to be; nor the words he had delivered already, the apologies and defences he had made for himſelf, the arguments he had uſed in his own vindication, and the doctrines reſpecting God and his providence, which he hadlaid down and aſſert'd; and was ſo far from being aſhamed of them, or retracting them, that he wiſhes they had been taken down in writing, that poſterity might read and judge of the controverſy between him and his friends; but rather the words he was about to deliver in the following verſes, expreſſing his faith in Chriſt, in the reſurrection of the dead, and in a future ſtate of happineſs and glory; theſe he wiſhes were written, that they might remain as a ſtanding teſtimony of his faith and hope; for what is written abides, when that which is only ſpoken is ſoon forgot, and not eaſily recalled: O that they were printed in a book! not written on looſe ſheets, which might be loſt, but in a book bound up, or rolled up in a volume, as was the cuſtom of antient times; though this cannot be underſtood of printing properly taken, which has not been in uſe but little more than three hundred years, but of engroſſing, as of ſtatutes and decrees in public records; and the word for ſtatutes comes from this that is here uſed.

℣. 24. That they were graven with an iron pen, and lead in the rock for ever.] Or that they were written with an iron pen and lead, that they were cut or hewn out in a rock for ever; not with both an iron and leaden pen, or pencil; for the marks of the latter are not durable, and much leſs could it be uſed on a rock according to our verſion; but the ſenſe ſeems to be, that they might be written with an iron pen, which was uſed in writing, Jer. xvii. 1. upon a ſheet of lead, as the Vulgate Latin verſion; for it was uſual in antient times, as Pliny[r] and others relate, for books to be made of ſheets of lead, and for public records to be engroſſed, as in plates of braſs, ſo ſometimes in ſheets of lead for the perpetuity of them; or elſe it refers to the cutting out of letters on ſtones, as the law was on two tables of ſtone, and filling up the inciſions or cuttings with lead poured into them, as Jarchi ſuggeſts; ſo Pliny[s] ſpeaks of ſtone pillars in Arabia and the parts adjacent, with unknown characters on them: alſo this may have reſpect to the manner of writing on mountains and rocks formerly, as the Iſraelites at, or quickly after the times of Job did. There are now in the wilderneſs through which the Iſraelites paſſed, hills called Gebel-el-mokatab, the written mountains, engraved with unknown antient characters, cut into the hard marble rock; ſuppoſed to be the antient Hebrew written by the Iſraelites for their diverſion and improvement, which are obſerved by ſome modern travellers[t]. In the laſt age, Petrus a Valle and Thomas a Novaria ſaw them; the latter of which tranſcribed ſome of them, ſome of which ſeemed to be like to the Hebrew letters now in uſe, and others to the Samaritan; and ſome agreed with neither[u]; and[x] Coſmas the Egyptian, who wrote A. D. 535, declares on his own teſtimony, that all the manſions of the Hebrews in the wilderneſs were to be ſeen in ſtones with Hebrew letters engraved on them, which ſeemed to be an account of their journies in it. The inſcription on a ſtone a ſtone at Horeb, brought from thence by the above-mentioned Thomas a Novaria, and which Kircher [w] has explained thus "God ſhall make a virgin con-"ceive, and ſhe ſhall bring forth a ſon," is thought by learned men to be of a later date, and the explication of it is not approved of by them [x]. Job may have in view his ſepulchre hewn out of a rock, as was uſual, and as that was our Lord was laid in; and ſo his wiſh might be that the following words were his funeral epitaph, and that they might be cut out and inſcribed upon his ſepulchral monument, his rocky grave; that every one that paſſed by might read his ſtrong expreſſions of faith in a living Redeemer, and the good hope he had of a bleſſed reſurrection.

[p] So Ben Gerſom. [q] מלי res meæ, Polychronius apud Pinedam in loc. [r] Nat. Hiſt. l. 13. c. 11. Alex. ab Alex. l. 2. c. 30. Pauſaniæ Meſſenica, ſive, l. 4. p. 266. & Bœotica, ſive, l. 9. p. 588. [s] Nat. Hiſt. l. 6. c. 28 & 29. [t] See a Journal from Cairo, &c. in. 1722. p. 45, 46. and Egmont and Heyman's Travels, vol. ii. p. 171. 181. [u] Antiq. Eccleſ. Orient. p. 147. [x] Apud Montfaucon, tom. 2. p. 205.

℣. 25. For I know, &c.] The particle כי, which is ſometimes rendered by the copulative and, by an adverſative but, and ſometimes as a cauſal particle for, ſhould not be rendered here by either; but as an explanative, to wit, or namely, as it is by Noldius [y], in connection with the preceding words; in which Job wiſhes ſome words of his were written in a book, or engroſſed on ſheets of lead, or were cut out on ſome rock, and particularly were engraved on his tombſtone; namely, theſe following, I know that my Redeemer liveth, &c. and to this agrees Broughton, how that my Redeemer liveth; let theſe be the words, written, engraved, and cut out there: by my Redeemer, he means not any mere man that ſhould riſe up and vindicate him; for the account of his then living, and of his ſtanding on the earth in the latter day, will not agree with ſuch an one; nor God the father, to whom the character of a Redeemer is ſeldom or ever given, nor did he ever appear or ſtand on earth, nor was his ſhape ſeen at any time, Joh. v. 37. but the Son of God, the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who is our Goel, the word here uſed, our near kinſman, and ſo our Redeemer, to whom the right of redemption belonged; and who was ſpoken of by all the holy prophets, from the beginning of the world, as the Redeemer of his people, who ſhould redeem them from all their ſins; from the law, its curſes and condemnation; from Satan, and his principalities and powers; from death and hell, and everlaſting deſtruction; and that by giving himſelf a ranſom for them: all which was known in the times of Job, ch. xxxiii. 24. and known by him, who ſpeaks of him as living; he then exiſted not only as a divine perſon, as he did from all eternity, but in his office-capacity as Mediator, and under the character of a Redeemer; for the virtue of his future redemption reached to all the ages before it, from the foundation of the world; beſides, the epithet living points at him as the living God, as he is, Heb. iii. 12. and ſo equal to the work of redemption, and able to redeem, and mighty to ſave; of whom it is ſaid, not that he has lived, or ſhall live, but liveth, ever lives; and ſo an expreſſion of the eternity of Chriſt, who is from everlaſting to everlaſting, the ſame to-day, yeſterday, and for ever; and who, though he died in human nature, yet is alive, and lives for evermore; he has life in and of himſelf, as he is God over all bleſſed for ever; and has life in him for all his people, as Mediator; and is the author of ſpiritual life in them, and the donor of eternal life to them; and becauſe he lives, they ſhall live alſo. Now Job had an intereſt in him as the living Redeemer, and knew he had, which is the greateſt bleſſing that can be enjoyed; an intereſt in Chriſt is of infinitely more worth than the whole world, and the knowledge of it exceeds all others; this knowledge was not merely ſpeculative, nor only approbational and fiducial, though ſuch Job had, ch. xiii. 15, 16. but the knowledge of aſſurance of intereſt; to know Chriſt as a Redeemer of men, and not our Redeemer is of no avail; the devils know him to be a Redeemer, but not their's: men may have an intereſt in Chriſt, and as yet not know it; intereſt is before knowledge; it is neither knowledge nor faith that gives intereſt, but God of his grace gives both intereſt and knowledge: and ſuch a knowledge as here expreſſed, is a peculiar favour; it is owing to an underſtanding given to know him, that is true, and that we are in him that is true; and to the ſpirit of wiſdom and revelation, in the knowledge of Chriſt, and to the teſtimony which he bears; and ſuch knowledge will ſupport under the greateſt afflictions and ſoreſt trials; under the ill uſage of friends, and the loſs of neareſt and deareſt relations, and in the views of death and eternity; all which was Job's caſe: and that he ſhall ſtand at the latter day upon the earth, appear in the world in human nature; he the ſeed of the woman, and born of one, be made fleſh, and dwell among men, and converſe with them, as Jeſus did; who ſtood upon the land of Judea, and walked through Galilee, and went about doing good to the bodies and ſouls of men; and this was in the laſt days, and at the end of the world, Heb. i. 1. and ix. 26. as a pledge of this there were frequent appearances of the Son of God in an human form to the patriarchs; nor need it ſeem ſtrange, that Job, tho' not an Iſraelite, had knowledge of the incarnation of Chriſt, when it is ſaid to [z] be the opinion of the Indian Brachmans, that God often appeared in the form and habit of ſome great men, and converſed among men; and that Wiſtnavius, whom, they ſay, is the ſecond perſon of the Trine-une God, had already aſſumed a body nine times, and ſometimes alſo an human one; and that the ſame will once more be made by him; and Confucius, the Chineſe philoſopher [a] left it in writing, that the Word would be made fleſh, and foreſaw the year when it would be: or, he ſhall riſe the laſt out of the earth [b]; and ſo it may reſpect his reſurrection from the dead; he was brought to the duſt of death, and was laid in the grave, and buried in the earth, and was raiſed out of it; and whoſe reſurrection is of the greateſt moment and importance, the juſtification, regeneration, and reſurrection of his people depending on it: but this is not to be underſtood, as if he was the laſt that ſhould riſe from the dead; for he is the firſt-fruits of them that ſleep, and the firſt-born from the dead, the firſt that roſe to an immortal life; but that he who as to his divine nature, is the firſt and the laſt; or that, in his ſtate of humiliation is the laſt, the meaneſt, and moſt abject of men [c]; or rather, who, as the public and federal head of his people, is the laſt Adam, 1 Cor. xv. 45. and who did riſe as ſuch for their juſtification, which makes the article of his reſurrection an unſpeakable benefit: or, he ſhall ſtand over the earth in the latter day [d], in the laſt times of all, in the cloſe of time, at the end of the world, at his appearing and kingdom, when he ſhall come to judge the quick and dead; thoſe that will be alive, and thoſe that will be raiſed from the dead, who will meet him in the air over the earth, and ſhall be for ever with him; and even then he ſhall ſtand upon the earth; for it is expreſsly ſaid, that

[w] Prodrom. Copt. c. 8. p. 201. 207. Lipman. Confut. p. 429, &c.
[z] Huet. Alnetan. Quæſt. l. 2. c. 13. p. 234.
[a] Martin. Sinic. Hiſt. l. 4. p. 131.
[x] Vide Hottinger. præfat. ad Cipp. Hebr. p. 6, 7, 8. Wagenſeil. Carmin.
[y] ואני nempe ego, Nold. Ebr. Concord. partic. p. 696. N° 1750.
[b] ואחרינקו עפר יעלם
[c] Noviſſimus i. e. miſerrimus & abjectus, Bolducius; ſic ultimus qui poſtremus ex pulvere (terra) ſurget, Nold. ib. miſerorum, Ciceron. Orat. pro Flacco 74.
[d] Supra pulverem, Cocceius, Schultens.

that when he ſhall come, and all the ſaints with him, his feet ſhall ſtand on the Mount of Olives, Zech. xiv. 4, 5. or, he ſhall ſtand againſt the earth at the latter day [c]; in the reſurrection-morn, and ſhall exerciſe his authority over it, and command the earth and ſea to give up their dead; and when at his all-commanding voice the dead ſhall come out of their graves, as Lazarus came out of his, he ſhall ſtand then upon the duſt of the earth, and tread upon it as a triumphant conqueror, having ſubdued all his enemies, and now the laſt enemy death is deſtroyed by the reſurrection of the dead: what a glorious and enlarged view had Job of the bleſſed Redeemer!

℣. 26. And though after my ſkin, worms deſtroy this body, &c.] Meaning not, that after his ſkin was wholly conſumed now, which was almoſt gone, there being ſcarce any left but the ſkin of his teeth, ver. 20. the worms in his ulcers would conſume what was left of his body, which ſcarce deſerved the name of a body; and therefore he points to it, and calls it this, without ſaying what it was; but that when he ſhould be entirely ſtripped of his ſkin in the grave, then rottenneſs and worms would ſtrip him alſo of all the reſt of his fleſh and his bones; by which he expreſſes the utter conſumption of his body by death, and after it in the grave; and nevertheleſs, though ſo it would be, he was aſſured of his reſurrection from the dead: yet in my fleſh ſhall I ſee God; he believed, that though he ſhould die and moulder into duſt in the grave, yet he ſhould riſe again, and that in true fleſh, not in an aerial, celeſtial body, but in a true body, conſiſting of fleſh, blood and bones, which ſpirits have not, and in the ſame fleſh or body he then had, his own fleſh and body, and not another's; and ſo with his fleſhly or corporeal eyes ſee God, even his living Redeemer, in human nature; who, as he would ſtand upon the earth in that nature, in the fulneſs of time, and obtain redemption for him, ſo he would in the latter day appear again, raiſe him from the dead, and take him to himſelf, to behold his glory to all eternity: or out of my fleſh [f], out of my fleſhly eyes; from thence and with thoſe ſhall I behold God manifeſt in the fleſh, my incarnate God; and, if Job was one of thoſe ſaints that roſe when Chriſt did, as ſome ſay [g], he ſaw him in the fleſh and with his fleſhly eyes.

℣. 27. Whom I ſhall ſee for myſelf, &c.] For his pleaſure and profit, to his great advantage and happineſs, and to his inexpreſſible joy and ſatisfaction, ſee Pſ. xvii. 15. and xvi. 11. and mine eyes ſhall behold, and not another; or a ſtranger [h]; theſe very ſelf-ſame eyes of mine I now ſee with, will behold this glorious perſon, God in my nature, and not the eyes of another, of a ſtrange body, a body not my own; or as I have ſeen him with my ſpiritual eyes, with the eyes of faith and knowledge, as my living Redeemer, ſo ſhall I ſee him with my bodily eyes after the reſurrection, and enjoy uninterrupted communion with him, which a ſtranger ſhall not; one that has never known any thing of him, or ever intermeddled with the joy of ſaints here, ſuch ſhall not ſee him hereafter, at leaſt with pleaſure; like Balaam, they may ſee him, but not nigh, may behold him, but afar off: though my reins be conſumed within me; or in my boſom [i]; the word though may be left out, and be read, my reins are conſumed within me; or, within my boſom: and both being the ſeat of the affections and deſires, may ſignify, his moſt earneſt and eager deſire after the ſtate of the reſurrection of the dead; after ſuch a ſight of God in his fleſh, of the incarnate Redeemer, he believed he ſhould have, inſomuch that it eat up his ſpirits, as the Pſalmiſt ſays, zeal for the houſe of God eat up his, Pſ. lxix. 9. it was not the belief of reſtoration of health, and to his former outward happineſs, and a deliverance from his troubles, and a deſire after that, which is here expreſſed; for he had no faith in that, nor hope, nor expectation of it, as appears by various expreſſions of his; but much greater, more noble, more refined enjoyments, were experienced by him now, and ſtill greater he expected hereafter; and his words concerning theſe were what he wiſhed were written, and printed, and engraven; which, if they only reſpected outward happineſs, he would never have deſired; and though he had not his wiſh in his own way, yet his words are written and printed in a better book than he had in his view, and will out-laſt engravings with an iron pen on ſheets of lead, or marble rocks. The Vulgate Latin verſion ſeems to incline to this ſenſe, "this here "is laid up in my boſom," that is of ſeeing God in my fleſh; ſo the Tigurine verſion, rather as a paraphraſe than a verſion, which is my only deſire.

℣. 28. But ye ſhould ſay, &c.] Here Job directs his friends what uſe they ſhould make of this confeſſion of his faith; they ſhould upon this ſay within themſelves, and to one another, Why perſecute we him, ſeeing the root of the matter is found in me? Why ſhould we purſue him with hard words, and load him with cenſures and reproaches, as if he was an hypocrite, when it appears, by what he ſays, that he has truth in the inward parts, the true grace of God is in him; that he is rooted in the love of God, and in the perſon of the Redeemer; that he has the Spirit of God in him, and the divine ſeed which has taken root in him, and brings forth fruit: or that the root of the word [k] is in him; the word of God has a place in him, and is become the engrafted word; the root-doctrines, the principal and fundamental truths of religion are believed and profeſſed by him, ſuch as reſpect the incarnation of the Meſſiah, his reſurrection from the dead, and coming to judgment, the reſurrection of all the dead in the ſame body, a future ſtate of happineſs, in which ſaints will enjoy the beatific viſion; ſince theſe things are firmly believed by him, though he may differ from us in ſome points about the methods of divine providence, let us ceaſe from perſecuting him any farther; ſee Rom. x. 8, 9, 10.

℣. 29. Be ye afraid of the ſword, &c.] Not of the civil magiſtrate, nor of a foreign enemy, but of the avenging ſword of divine juſtice; leſt God ſhould whet the glittering ſword of his juſtice, and his hand ſhould take hold of judgment, in order to avenge the wrongs of the innocent; unleſs the other ſhould alſo be conſidered as his inſtruments: for wrath bringeth the puniſhments of the ſword, or ſins of the ſword [l]: the ſenſe is, either that the wrath of men in perſecuting the people of God, puts them upon the commiſſion of ſuch ſins as deſerve to be puniſhed

4

[c] Adhibebit ſuam vim pulveri, Tigurine verſion. Coccèius, Schmidt, Schultens; ſo Guſſetius, p. 446.

[f] מבשרי e carne mea, Tigurine verſion, Mercerus, Piſcator, Alienus, Pagninus, Montanus, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Mercerus; extraneus, Druſius.

[g] Suidas in voce Ιωβ, & Sept. in ch. xlii. 17.

[h] זר Pagninus, Montanus, &c.

[i] ברחקי in ſinu meo, Cocceius; fundamenta negotii ſalutis, Tigurine verſion.

[k] ישרש דבר radix verbi, Montanus, Mercerus, Schmidt, Michaelis; radix ſermonis, Michaelis; ſo Cocceius, Schultens.

[l] עונת חרב iniquitates gladii, Montanus, Schmidt, puniſhed with the ſword, either of the civil magiſtrate, or of a foreign enemy, or of divine juſtice; or elſe the wrath of God brings on more puniſhments for their ſins by means of the ſword; and to this ſenſe is the Targum, "When God is angry for iniquities, he ſends thoſe that ſlay with the ſword:" that ye may know there is a judgment; that is executed in the world by the Judge of all the earth, who will do right; and that there is a future judgment after death, unto which every thing in this world will be brought, when God will judge the world in righteouſneſs by Chriſt, whom he has ordained to be judge of quick and dead; and which will be a righteous judgment, that none can eſcape; and when Job ſuggeſts, the controverſy between him and his friends would be determined; and it would be then ſeen who was in the right, and who in the wrong; and unto which time he ſeems willing to refer his cauſe, and to have no more ſaid about it; but his friends did not chuſe to take his advice; for Zophar the Naamathite ſtarts up directly, and makes a reply, which is contained in the following chapter.

CHAP. XX.

ZOPHAR and his friends, not ſatisfied with Job's confeſſion of faith, he in his turn replies, and in his preface gives his reaſons why he made any anſwer at all, and was ſo quick in it, ver. 1, 2, 3. and appeals to Job for the truth of an old eſtabliſhed maxim, that the proſperity of wicked men and hypocrites is very ſhort-lived, ver. 4, 5. and the ſhort enjoyment of their happineſs is deſcribed by ſeveral elegant figures and ſimilies, ver. 6, 7, 8, 9. ſuch a wicked man being obliged, in his life-time, to reſtore his ill-gotten goods, and at death to lie down with the ſins of his youth, ver. 10, 11. his ſin in getting riches, the diſquietude of his mind in retaining them, and his being forced to make reſtitution, are very beautifully expreſſed by the ſimile of a ſweet morſel kept in the mouth, and turned to the gall of aſps in the bowels, and and then vomited up, ver. 12—16. the diſappointment he ſhall have, the indigent and ſtrait circumſtances he ſhall be brought into, and the reſtitution he ſhall be obliged to make for the oppreſſion of the poor, and the uneaſineſs he ſhall feel in his own breaſt are ſet forth in a very ſtrong light, ver. 17—22. and it is ſuggeſted, that not only the hand of wicked men ſhould be upon him, but the wrath of God alſo, which ſhould ſeize on him ſuddenly and ſecretly, and would be inevitable, he not being able to make his eſcape from it, and which would iſſue in the utter deſtruction of him and his in this world, and that to come, ver. 23—28. And the chapter is concluded with this obſervation, that ſuch as before deſcribed is the appointed portion and heritage of a wicked man from God, ver. 29.

℣. 1. Then anſwered Zophar the Naamathite, &c.] Notwithſtanding the ſad diſtreſſed condition Job was in, an account of which is given in the preceding chapter, enough to pierce an heart of ſtone, notwithſtanding his earneſt requeſt to his friends to have pity on him, and notwithſtanding the noble confeſſion of his faith he had made, which ſhewed him to be a good man, and the excellent advice he gave his friends to ceaſe perſecuting him for their own good, as well as for his peace; yet, regardleſs of theſe things, Zophar ſtarts up and makes a reply, and attacks him with as much heat and paſſion, wrath and anger as ever, harping upon the ſame ſtring, and ſtill repreſenting Job as a wicked man and an hypocrite; and ſaid as follows.

℣. 2. Therefore do my thoughts cauſe me to anſwer, &c.] Or to return, [a] and appear upon the ſtage again, and enter the liſts once more with his antagoniſt; he ſuggeſts, as if he had intended to have ſaid no more in this controverſy, but obſerving what Job had ſaid laſt, could not forbear replying: therefore becauſe he had repreſented him and his friends as cruel perſecutors of him, as men devoid of all humanity, pity, and compaſſion, and endeavoured to terrify them with the puniſhments of the ſword, and the judgment of God to come; theſe occaſioned many thoughts in him, and thoſe thoughts obliged him to give an anſwer; they came in ſo thick and faſt upon him, that out of the abundance his heart ſuggeſted to him he could not but ſpeak, he was full of matter and the ſpirit within him, the impulſe upon his mind conſtrained him to make a reply; and he ſeems deſirous of having it underſtood, that his anſwer proceeded from thought; that he did not ſpeak without thinking, but had well weighed things in his mind; and what he was about to ſay, was the fruit of cloſe thinking and mature deliberation: and for this I make haſte; becauſe his thoughts crowded in upon him, he had a fulneſs of matter, an impulſe of mind, promptitude and readineſs to ſpeak on this occaſion, and for fear of loſing what was ſuggeſted to him, he made haſte to give in his anſwer, perhaps obſerving ſome other of his friends riſing up before him. The Targum is, "becauſe my ſenſe is in me;" and ſo other Jewiſh writers [b]; he apprehended he had a right ſenſe of things, and underſtood the matter in controverſy full well, and therefore thought it incumbent on him to ſpeak once more in it: Guſſetius [c] renders it, becauſe of my diſquietude; the uneaſineſs of his mind raiſed by what Job had ſaid, that he would have them know and conſider there was a judgment; and he intimates he had conſidered it, and was fearful that ſhould he be ſilent, and make no reply, God would condemn him in judgment for his ſilence; and therefore he was in a hurry to make anſwer, and could not be eaſy without it; and for his reaſons for ſo doing, he farther explains himſelf in the following verſe.

℣. 3. I have heard the check of my reproach, &c.] He took it that Job had reproached him and his friends, by repreſenting them as hard-hearted men, and perſecuting him wrongly in a violent manner; and he had obſerved the check or reproof given for it, by bidding them beware of the ſword, and leſt the puniſhment of it ſhould be inflicted on them; and if that ſhould not be the caſe, yet there was a righteous judgment they could not eſcape. Now Zophar heard this, but could not hear it with patience; he could not bear that he and his friends ſhould be inſulted, as he thought, in this manner; and and therefore it was he was in such haste to return an answer; though some [d] think he here pretends to a divine oracle, like that which Eliphaz makes mention of in the beginning of this dispute, ch. iv. 12, &c. which he had from God, and from which he had heard the correction of his reproach [e], or a full confutation of the thing Job had reproached him with; and being thus divinely furnished, he thought it his duty to deliver it: and the spirit of my understanding causeth me to answer; or his rational spirit, his natural understanding, furnished him at once with an answer; he had such a clear insight into the controversy on foot, and such a full view of it, that he thought himself capable of speaking very particularly to the matter in hand, and to the conviction and confusion of Job; nay, his conscience, or the spirit of his conscience, as Mr. Broughton renders it, not only readily dictated to him what he should say, but obliged him to it; though some think he meant the Holy Spirit of God, by which he would be thought to be inspired; that he out of his understanding [f], enlightened by him, caused him to answer, or would answer for him, or supply him with matter sufficient to qualify him for it; and this he might observe to Job, in order to raise his attention to what he was about to say.

[a] יְשִׁיבֻנִי reducant me, q. d. in ſcenam; Cocceius, Junius, & Tremellius, Piſcator, Druſius. [b] Ben Gerſom, Bar Tzemach, Sephorno; and ſo Montanus. [c] Ebr. Comment. p. 246.

v. 4. Knowest thou not this of old, &c.] Or from eternity [g], from the beginning of time, ever since the world was; as if he should say, if you are the knowing man you pretend to be, you must know this I am about to observe; and if you don't know it, you must be an ignorant man, since it is an ancient truth, confirmed by all experience from the creation; not that Job could know it so early, he was not the first man that was born, nor was he made before the hills, but was of yesterday, and comparatively knew nothing; but the sense is, that this about to be delivered was an old established maxim, of which there had been numerous instances, since man, or Adam was placed upon earth; referring to the putting of Adam in Eden to dress the garden, and keep it; and every man, ever since, is placed on earth by the ordination, and according to the will of God, where and for purposes he pleases: the instances Zophar might have in view, are perhaps the expulsion of our first parents out of paradise, the vagabond state of Cain, the destruction of the old world by a flood, and of Sodom and Gomorrah by fire from heaven; which shew that God, sooner or later, gives manifest tokens of his displeasure at sin and sinners, by his punishment of them for it. What he means is as follows.

v. 5. That the triumphing of the wicked is short, &c.] Their outward prosperity and felicity, of which they make their boast, and in which they glory and triumph for a while; at first Job's friends set out with this notion, that the wicked never flourished and prospered, but it always went ill with them in providence; but being beat out of that, they own they may be for a small time in flourishing and prosperous circumstances, but it is but for a small time; which may be true in many instances, but it is not invariable and without exception the case: the sense is, it is but a little while that they are in so much mirth and jollity, and triumph over their neighbours, as being in more advantageous circumstances than they; this is said in the original text to be from near [h]; it is but a little while ago when it began; and as the Targum paraphrases it, it will be quickly ended: and the joy of the hypocrite but for a moment; the word wicked, in the former clause, may signify the same person here called the hypocrite; but inasmuch as that signifies one restless and troublesome, one that is ungodly, and destitute of the fear of God, that has nothing in him but wickedness, who is continually committing it, and is abandoned to it; it might be thought not to hit the character of Job, whom Zophar had in his view, and therefore this is added as descriptive of him: an hypocrite is one who seems to be that he is not, holy, righteous, good and godly; who professes to have what he has not, the true grace of God, and pretends to worship God, but does not do it cordially, and from right principles; and who seeks himself in all he does, and not the glory of God: now there may be a joy in such sort of persons; they may hear ministers gladly, as Herod heard John, and receive the word with joy, as the stony-ground-hearers did; they may seem to delight in the ways and ordinances of God, and even have some tastes of the powers of the world to come, and some pleasing thoughts and hopes of heaven and happiness; as well as they triumph in, and boast of their profession of religion and performance of duties, and rejoice in their boastings, which is evil; but then this is like the pleasures of sin, which are but for a season, or like the crackling of thorns under a pot, which make a great noise and blaze, but soon over, Eccl. vii. 6. and so their joy in civil as well as religious things. It is possible Zophar might be so ill-natured as to have reference to Job's triumph of faith, ch. xix. 25. and by this would suggest, that his faith in a living Redeemer, and the joy of it he professed, would be soon over and no more; which shows what spirit he was of.

v. 6. Though his excellency mount up to the heavens, &c.] Though in worldly grandeur and glory, he should arrive to such a pitch as the Assyrian monarch was ambitious of, as to ascend into heaven, exalt his throne above the stars of God, and be like the most High; or be comparable to such a tree, by which the greatness of Nebuchadnezzar's kingdom is expressed, the height whereof reached unto heaven, Is. xiv. 12, 14. Dan. iv. 11. and his head reach unto the clouds; being lifted up with pride, because of his greatness, and looking with contempt and scorn on others; the Septuagint version is, if his gifts ascend up to heaven, &c. which well agrees with an hypocrite possessed of great gifts, and proud of them; as Capernaum was highly favoured with external things, as the presence of Christ, his ministry and miracles, and so said to be exalted unto heaven, yet, because of its impenitence and unbelief, should be brought down to hell, Matt. xi. 23.

v. 7. Yet he shall perish for ever like his own dung, &c.] Not only in this world, but in the world to come, both in his outward substance here, and in his body in the grave, and in his soul to all eternity, and that in the most shameful and disgraceful manner; he shall perish in his own corruption, and like his own dung inevitably, which is never returned to its place again: dead bodies were reckoned by the ancients as dung, and the carcases of men are rather to be cast out than dung [i]; and

[d] Schmidt. [e] מוסר כלמתי correctionem ignominiæ meæ, Pagninus, Montanus; so Schmidt, Michaelis. [f] מבינתי ex intelligentia mea, Junius & Tremellius, Piscator, Mercerus, Drusius, Schmidt, Michaelis. [g] מני עד ab æterno, Junius & Tremellius, Drusius, Codurcus, Schmidt, Michaelis. [h] מקרוב de propinquo, Pagninus, Montanus, &c. [i] Heraclitus apud Strabo. Geograph. l. 16. p. 539.

and the Arabians uſed to bury in dunghils even their kings[k]; to which ſome[l] think the alluſion is: they which have ſeen him ſhall ſay, where is he? ſuch as formerly gazed at him in his proſperity, with wonder and amazement at his grandeur and greatneſs, now being removed from his outward ſplendor, or from the world by death, aſk where he is, not being able to ſee him in his former luſtre, nor in the land of the living; ſee ch. xiv. 10.

℣. 8. He ſhall fly away as a dream, and ſhall not be found, &c.] Either as a dream which is forgotten, as Nebuchadnezzar's was, and can't be recovered; or as the matter and ſubſtance of a dream, which, though remembered, is a mere illuſion; as when a hungry and thirſty man dreams he eats or drinks, but awaking finds himſelf empty, and not at all refreſhed; what he fancied is fled and gone[m], and indeed never had any exiſtence but in his imagination, Iſ. xxix. 8. yea, he ſhall be chaſed away as a viſion of the night; either the ſame as a nocturnal dream, or what a man fancies he ſees in his dream; or like a mere ſpectre or apparition, which is a mere phantom, and when followed and purſued, vaniſhes and diſappears; ſo ſuch a man before deſcribed is chaſed out of the world, and is ſeen in it no more, ſee ch. xviii. 18. the firſt clauſe, according to Sephorno, refers to the generation of the flood, and the ſecond to the ſlaying of the firſt-born of Egypt in the night.

℣. 9. The eye alſo which ſaw him, ſhall ſee him no more, &c.] In this world, concerned in the affairs of life, and buſy in worldly employments, and eſpecially in the grandeur he ſometimes was, if not removed by death: but the former ſenſe ſeems moſt agreeable by what follows, neither ſhall his place any more behold him; the men of his place, as Ben Gerſom, thoſe that lived in the ſame place he did; or he ſhall not be ſeen, and known, and acknowledged any more as the maſter, owner and proprietor of the houſe he formerly dwelt in; this ſeems to be taken from Job's own words in ch. vii. 10. The above Jewiſh commentator interprets this verſe of Pharaoh and the Egyptians, whom Moſes and the Iſraelites would ſee no more, Exod. x. 29. and xiv. 13.

℣. 10. His children ſhall ſeek to pleaſe the poor, &c.] In this and ſome following verſes, the miſerable ſtate of a wicked man is deſcribed and which begins with his children, who are often viſited in wrath for their parents ſins, eſpecially when they tread in their ſteps, and follow their example; and it is an affliction to parents to ſee their children in diſtreſs, and particularly on their account, and even to be threatened with it. According to our verſion, the ſenſe of this clauſe is, that after a wicked man's death, his children ſhall ſeek to gain the good-will and favour of the poor who have been oppreſs'd by him, that they may not reproach them, or take revenge on them, or apply to the civil magiſtrate to have juſtice done them; but Jarchi renders the words, "the poor ſhall oppreſs or deſtroy his children;" and ſo the margin of our bible, who being enraged with the ill uſage of their parents, ſhall fall upon them in great wrath, and deſtroy them, Prov. xxviii. 3. and the ſame Jewiſh writer reſtrains the words to the men of Sodom, who were oppreſſive and cruel to the poor: or rather the ſenſe is, that the children of the wicked man ſhall be reduced to ſuch extreme poverty, that they ſhall even ſeek relief of the poor, and ſupplicate and intreat them to give them ſomething out of their ſmall pittance; with which others in a good meaſure agree, who render the words, his children ſhall pleaſe being poor[n]; it ſhall be a pleaſure and ſatisfaction to thoſe they have been injurious to, to ſee their children begging their bread from door to door, ſee Pſ. cix. 5, 10. and his hands ſhall reſtore their goods; or for his hands, &c.[o] and ſo are a reaſon why his children ſhall be ſo reduced after his death, as to need the relief of others, becauſe their parent in his life-time was obliged to make reſtitution of his ill-gotten goods, ſo that in the end he had nothing to leave his children at his death; for this reſtitution ſpoken of is not voluntary, but forced. Sephorno thinks, reference is had to the Egyptians lending jewels and other riches to the Iſraelites, whereby they were obliged to repay 600,000 men for their ſervice.

℣. 11. His bones are full of the ſins of his youth, &c.] Man is born in ſin, and is a tranſgreſſor from his womb; and the youthful age is addicted to many ſins, as pride, paſſion, luſt, luxury, intemperance and uncleanneſs; and theſe are ſometimes brought to mind, and men are convinced of them, and corrected for them when more advanced in years, and if not ſtopped in them, and reformed from them, they are continued in in old age; and the effects of them are ſeen in bodily diſeaſes, which a debauched life brings upon them, not only to the rottenneſs and conſumption of their fleſh, but to the putrefaction of their bones; though this may be underſtood of the whole body, the bones, the principal and ſtronger parts, being put for the whole, and denote that general decay and waſte which gluttony, drunkenneſs and uncleanneſs bring into, ſee Prov. v. 11—14. Some interpret this of ſecret ſins[p], as the word is thought to ſignify, which if not cleanſed from and pardoned, will be found and charged on them, and be brought into judgment, and they puniſhed for them, Pſ. xc. 8. Eccl. xii. 14. which ſhall lie down with him in the duſt; to be in the duſt is to be in the ſtate of the dead, to lie in the grave, where men lie down and ſleep as on a bed; and this is common to good and bad men, all ſleep in the duſt of the earth, but with this difference, the ſins of wicked men lie down with them; as they live in ſin, they die in their ſins; not that their ſins die with them, and are no more, but they continue on them, and with them, and will riſe with them, and will follow them to judgment, and remain with them after, and the guilt and remorſe of which will be always on their conſciences, and is that worm that never dies: of ſuch it is ſaid, that they are gone down to hell with their weapons of war; with the ſame enmity againſt God, againſt Chriſt, and his people, and all that is good, they had in their life-time: and they have laid their ſwords under their heads; in the grave, and ſhall riſe with the ſame revengeful ſpirit they ever had againſt the ſaints, ſee Rev. xx. 8, 9. but their iniquities ſhall be upon their bones; both them, and the puniſhment of them, Ezek. xxxii. 27. The Jewiſh commentator, laſt mentioned, interprets the whole verſe of Balaam, who died at the age of 33, and whoſe proſperity died with him, he leaving nothing to his children; and ſo he interprets the following verſes of the curſe he was forced to hide, which he would gladly have pronounced, and of the the riches he received from Balak falling into the hands of the Iſraelites.

[k] Strabo, ib. [l] Pineda in loc. [m] Σκιας οναρ ανθρωποι, Pindar. Pythia, Ode 8. [n] בניו ירצו דלים filii ejus placabunt, mendici, Montanus. [o] So the Engliſh annotator. [p] עלומיו ejus occultis, Montanus, Vatablus, Schmidt.

℣. 12. Though wickedneſs be ſweet in his mouth, &c.] Which may reſpect ſome particular ſin, and by the context it ſeems to be the ſin of covetouſneſs, or of getting riches in an unlawful way, which is very ſweet and pleaſing to wicked men, whilſt they are in ſuch purſuits, that ſucceed; and ſo Mr. Broughton renders it by wrong; though it may be applied to ſin in general, which is wickedneſs, or an evil[q], being contrary to the pure and holy nature, will and law of God; and it is evil in its effects on men, it having deprived them of the image and glory of God, and expoſed them to his wrath, to the curſes of his law, and to eternal death. Now this is ſweet to an unregenerate man, who minds and ſavours the things of the fleſh, whoſe taſte is not changed, but is as it was from his birth, and who calls ſweet, bitter, and bitter, ſweet; ſuch a man has the ſame delight in ſin, as a man has in his food, drinks up iniquity like water, and commits ſin with greedineſs; for it is natural to him, he is conceived, born, and brought up in it; beſides, ſome ſins are what are more particularly called conſtitution-ſins, which ſome are peculiarly addicted to, and in which they take a peculiar delight and pleaſure; theſe are like the right-hand or right-eye, and they can't be perſuaded at any rate to part with them: though he hide it under his tongue; not for the ſake of concealing it, nor by denying, diſſembling or excuſing it, but for the ſake of enjoying more pleaſure in it; as a gluttonous man, when he has got a ſweet morſel in his mouth, don't let it go down his throat immediately, but rolls it under his tongue, that he may have all the pleaſure of it he can; ſo a wicked man deviſes ſin in his heart, keeps it on his mind, revolves it in his thoughts, and his meditation on it is ſweet; and he is ſo far from hiding it from others, that he openly declares it, freely tells of it, and takes pleaſure in ſo doing: fools make a mock at ſin; it is their diverſion and recreation.

℣. 13. Though he ſpare it, &c.] Not that he feeds ſparingly on it, for he eats of it freely and plentifully, with great eagerneſs and greedineſs; it deſigns the gratefulneſs of it to him; he does not ſpit it out as loathſome, having taſted of it, but retains it as ſweet and pleaſant; he ſpares it as Saul did Agag, and as a man ſpares his only ſon; ſin being a child, a brat of a wicked man, and therefore it is dear unto him: and forſake it not; as he never will, until he is fully convinced of the evil of it, and it becomes exceeding ſinful to him, and ſo loathſome and diſagreeable; and he is reſtrained from it by the grace of God, and enabled by it to deſert it, for ſuch an one only finds mercy, Prov. xxviii. 13. but keep it ſtill within his mouth; like an epicure, that will not ſuffer his food quickly to go down his throat into his ſtomach, that he may have the greater pleaſure in taſting, palating and reliſhing it; as Philoxenus, who wiſhed his throat as long as a crane's, that he might be the longer in taſting the ſweetneſs of what he eat and drank; ſo the wicked man keeps ſin within his mouth, not by reſtraining his mouth from ſpeaking evil, rather by a non-confeſſion of it, but chiefly by continuing and perſiſting in it, that he might have all the pleaſure and ſatisfaction he has promiſed himſelf in it.

℣. 14. Yet his meat in his bowels is turned, &c.] Or his bread[r], to which ſin is compared, being what the ſinner lives in, and lives upon; what he ſtrengthens himſelf in and with, and by which he is nouriſhed unto the day of ſlaughter, and by means of which he grows and proceeds to more ungodlineſs, though in the iſſue he comes into ſtarving and famiſhing circumſtances; for this is bread of deceit, and proves to be aſhes and gravel ſtones; it promiſes pleaſure, profit, liberty and impunity, but is all the reverſe; as meat turns in a man's ſtomach when it don't digeſt with him, or rather his ſtomach turns againſt that, and inſtead of its being pleaſant and agreeable to him, it diſtreſſes him and makes him uneaſy; ſin being compared to meat in the bowels, denotes the finiſhing of ſin after it has been conceived in the mind, and compleated in the act: it is the gall of aſps within him; which is bitter, though not poiſon; which yet Pliny[s] ſuggeſts, but it ſeems[t] it is not fact. Sin is an evil and bitter thing, and produces bitter ſorrow, and makes bitter work for repentance in good men, Jer. ii. 19. Matt. xxvi. 75. and fills with diſtreſs inexpreſſible and intolerable in wicked men, as in Cain and Judas in this world, and with black deſpair, weeping and gnaſhing of teeth, and dreadful horrors of conſcience in the world to come to all eternity; the effect of it is eternal death, the ſecond death, inevitable and everlaſting ruin and deſtruction.

℣. 15. He hath ſwallowed down riches, &c.] Not his own, but another's, which he has ſpoiled him of and devoured, with as much eagerneſs, pleaſure and delight as a hungry man ſwallows down his food; having an exceſſive and immoderate love of riches, and an inſatiable deſire after them, which make him ſtick at nothing, though ever ſo illicit to obtain them; and when he has got them into his poſſeſſion, thinks them as ſafe as the food in his belly, and never once dreams of refunding them, which yet he muſt do, as follows: and he ſhall vomit them up again; that is, make reſtoration of them, not freely but forcedly, with great reluctance, much pain of mind, and gripes of conſcience: God ſhall caſt them out of his belly; he ſhall oblige him to caſt them up again, by working upon his heart, making his mind uneaſy, loading his conſcience with guilt, ſo that he ſhall have no reſt nor peace until he has done it; though they are as meat in his belly within him, they ſhall not remain with him; though they are in his houſe, in his coffers, or in his barns, they ſhall be fetched out from thence.

℣. 16. He ſhall ſuck the poiſon of aſps, &c.] Or the head of aſps[u]; for their poiſon lies in their heads, particularly in their teeth[w]; or rather is a liquor in the gums, yellow like oil[x]; according to Pliny[y], in copulation the male puts his head into the mouth of the female, which ſhe ſucks and gnaws off thro' the ſweetneſs of the pleaſure, then conceives her young, which eat out her belly: this is to be underſtood not of the man's ſin, then it would have been expreſſed either in the paſt or preſent tenſe, as if that was ſweet unto him in the commiſſion of it, ſucked in like milk from the breaſt, or honey from the honey-comb; ſuch were his contrivances and artful methods, and the ſucceſs of them in getting riches, but in the iſſue proved like the poiſon of aſps, aſps, pernicious and deadly to him, which cauſed him to vomit them up again; for poiſon excites vomiting: but of the puniſhment of his ſin; for putting men to death by the poiſon of aſps, was a puniſhment inflicted by ſome people upon malefactors; and however, it is certain death, and immediately and quickly diſpatches, and without ſenſe; ſo the wages of ſin is death, and there is no avoiding it, and it comes inſenſibly on carnal men; they are not aware of it, and in no pain about it, until in hell they lift up their eyes as the rich man did: the viper's tongue ſhall ſlay him; though it is with its teeth it bites, yet when it is about to bite, it puts out its tongue, and to it its poiſon is ſometimes aſcribed; though it is ſaid [z] to be quite harmleſs, and therefore not to be underſtood in a literal ſenſe, but figuratively of the tongue of a detractor, a calumniator and falſe accuſer, ſuch an one as Doeg; but cannot be the ſenſe here, ſince the fall of the perſon here deſcribed would not be by any ſuch means; but the phraſe, as before, denotes the certain and immediate death of ſuch a wicked man; for the bite of a viper was always reckoned incurable, and iſſued in ſudden death, ſee Acts xxviii. 3—6.

[q] רעה malum, Pagninus, Montanus, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, &c. Montanus, Beza, Schmidt. [r] לחמו panis ejus, Pagninus, [s] Nat. Hiſt. l. 11. c. 37. [t] Scheuchzer. Phyſic. Sacr. vol. 4. p. 711. Philoſoph. Tranſact. abridged, vol. 2. p. 819. [u] ראש פתנים caput aſpidum, V. L. Montanus. [w] Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 11. c. 37. Ælian. Hiſt. Animal. l. 9. c. 4. [x] Philoſoph. Tranſact. ut ſupra. [y] Ib. c. 67.

℣. 17. He ſhall not ſee the rivers, &c.] Of water, or meet with any to aſſuage his thirſt, which poiſon excites, and ſo makes a man wiſh for water, and deſire large quantities; but this ſhall not be granted the wicked man; this might be illuſtrated in the caſe of the rich man in hell, who deſired a drop of cold water to cool his tongue, but could not have it, Luke xvi. 24. though rather plenty of good things is here intended, ſee Iſ. xlviii. 18. as alſo by the following expreſſions: the floods, the brooks of honey and butter; or cream; which are hyperbolical expreſſions, denoting the great profuſion and abundance of temporal bleſſings, which either the covetous rich man was ambitious of obtaining, and hoped to enjoy, ſeeking and promiſing great things to himſelf, which yet he ſhould never attain unto; or elſe the ſenſe is, though he had enjoyed ſuch plenty, and been in ſuch great proſperity as to have honey and butter, or all temporal good things flowing about him like rivers, and floods, and brooks; yet he ſhould ſee them no more, ſo Broughton reads the words; and perhaps Zophar may have reſpect to the abundance Job once poſſeſſed, but ſhould no more, and which is by himſelf expreſſed by ſuch like metaphors, ch. xxix. 6. yea even ſpiritual and eternal good things may be deſigned, and the plenty of them, as they often are in ſcripture, by wine, and milk, and honey; ſuch as the means of grace, the word and ordinances, the bleſſings of grace diſpenſed and communicated thro' them; ſpiritual peace and joy, called the rivers of pleaſure; the love of God, and the ſtreams of it, which make glad his people; yea, eternal glory and happineſs, ſignified by new wine in the kingdom of God, and by a river of water of life, and a tree of life by it, ſee Iſ. lv. 1. and lxvi. 12. Joel iii. 18. Pſ. xxxvi. 8. and xlvi. 4. Rev. xxii. 1, 2. which are what carnal men and hypocrites ſhall never ſee or enjoy; and whereas Zophar took Job to be ſuch a man, he may have a principal view to him, and object this to the beatific viſion of God, and the enjoyment of eternal happineſs he promiſed himſelf, ch. xix. 26, 27. Bar Tzemach obſerves, that theſe words are to be read by a tranſpoſition thus, he ſhall not ſee rivers of water, floods of honey, and brooks of butter.

℣. 18. That which he laboured for ſhall he reſtore, &c.] This explains what was before figuratively expreſſed by vomiting, ℣. 15. and is to be interpreted either of that which another laboured for; ſo the Targum paraphraſes it, "another's labour;" and Mr. Broughton renders it, he ſhall reſtore what man's pain gat; and then the ſenſe is, that that which another got by his labour, coming by ſome means or another into the hand of this rapacious, covetous, wicked man, he ſhall be obliged to reſtore to him again; or the hire of the labourer being detained in his hands, he ſhall be forced to give it to him, as the Egyptians by lending the Iſraelites their jewels of gold and ſilver, reſtored to them the wages due to them for all their labour among them for many years; or elſe this is to be underſtood of what the wicked man himſelf had laboured for, who with much toil and labour, as well as trick and artifice, had got the wealth of others into his hands; but ſhould be obliged to make reſtoration of it again, and along with that alſo what he had laboured for, and had got even in an honeſt and lawful way, the mammon of unrighteouſneſs corrupting and marring his whole ſubſtance: and ſhall not ſwallow it down; or not have time to devour it, as Mr. Broughton; he ſhall be obliged ſo ſoon to reſtore it, that it ſhall be as if he had never had it; he ſhall have no enjoyment of it, at leaſt no comfort, pleaſure and ſatisfaction in it: according to his ſubſtance ſhall the reſtitution be; the law of Moſes required, in ſome caſes, four-fold, in others, five-fold, and ſometimes ſeven-fold was exacted; and if a man had not ſufficient to pay, all his ſubſtance was to go towards payment, and by this means what he lawfully got, went along with that which was obtained in an illicit way, as before, ſee Exod. xxii. 1. Prov. vi. 31. and he ſhall not rejoice therein; not in the reſtitution he is forced to make, it being greatly againſt his will; nor in his ill-gotten ſubſtance, at leaſt but for a little while, as in ℣. 5. he ſhall neither enjoy it, nor have delight and pleaſure in it, nor glory of it, as men are apt to do; Mr. Broughton reads this in connexion with the preceding clauſe thus, "and never rejoice in the wealth for which he muſt make recompence."

℣. 19. Becauſe he hath oppreſſed, and forſaken the poor, &c.] Having oppreſſed, cruſhed and broken the poor to pieces, he leaves them ſo without pity and compaſſion for them, and without giving them any relief; he firſt by oppreſſion makes them poor, or however poorer ſtill, and then leaves them in ſuch circumſtances; for this does not ſuppoſe that he once was a favourer of them, and afforded them aſſiſtance in their neceſſities, and afterwards forſook them; but rather, as Ben Gerſom gives the ſenſe, he does not leave the poor until he has oppreſſed and cruſhed them, and then he does; Mr. Broughton's reading of the words agrees with the former ſenſe, he oppreſſeth and leaveth poor: becauſe he hath violently taken away an houſe which he built not; an houſe which did not belong to him, he had no property in or right unto, which, as he had not bought, he had not built; and therefore could lay no rightful claim unto it, and yet this he took in a violent manner from the right owner of it, ſee Mic. ii. 2. or and, or but ſhall not build it [a], or buildeth it not; he took it away with an intention to pull it down, and build a ſtately palace in [z] Scheuchzer, ut ſupra, p. 712.

[a] ולא יבנהו & non ædificabit eam, Pagninus, Montanus; & non ædificat eam, Cocceius, Schultens; non autem, Beza; ſed non, Schmidt, Michaelis.

in the room of it; but either his ſubſtance was taken from him, or he taken away by death before he could finiſh it, and ſo either through neglect, or want of opportunity, or of money, did not what he thought to have done.

℣. 20. Surely he ſhall not feel quietneſs in his belly, &c.] Or happineſs in his children, ſo ſome in Bar Tzemach; rather ſhall have no ſatisfaction in his ſubſtance, though his belly is filled with hid treaſure, it ſhall give him no contentment; he ſhall be a ſtranger to that divine art, but ever have a reſtleſs craving after more, which is his ſin; but rather puniſhment is here meant, and the ſenſe is, that he ſhall have no quiet in his conſcience, no peace of mind becauſe of his ſin, in getting riches in an unlawful way: he ſhall not ſave of that which he deſired; of his deſirable things, his goods, his wealth, his riches, and even his children, all being gone, and none ſaved; reſpect may be had particularly to Job's caſe, who was ſtripped of every thing, of all his ſubſtance and his children.

℣. 21. There ſhall none of his meat be left, &c.] Not in his belly, all ſhall be caſt up; none of his ſubſtance left for himſelf or others; none of his riches for his children or heirs, all being conſumed: or this may reſpect either the profuſeneſs or niggardlineſs of his living, that he ſhould live in great luxury himſelf, but take no care of the poor; or elſe keep ſo mean a table, that there would be nothing left for the poor, not ſo much as a few crumbs to fall from it; but the firſt ſenſe ſeems beſt; though ſome render the words, there ſhall be none left for his meat [b], or his ſubſtance; he ſhall leave no children, have no heirs, all his family ſhall be cut off, ſee ch. xviii. 19. therefore ſhall no man look for his goods; for there ſhall be none to look for them; or rather there ſhall be none to look for, all being gonē: a man in good circumſtances of life, his heirs expect to enjoy much at his death, but when he is ſtript of all, as Job was, his relations and friends are in no expectation of having any thing at his death; and therefore don't think it worth their while to look out, or make an enquiry whether there is any thing for them or no, ſee ℣. 28.

℣. 22. In the fulneſs of his ſufficiency he ſhall be in ſtraits, &c.] For though he may not only have a ſufficient competency to live upon, but even a fulneſs of temporal bleſſings, have as much as heart can wiſh, or more, even good things, and plenty of them laid up for many years; yet amidſt it all ſhall be reduced to the utmoſt ſtraits and difficulties, either through fear of loſing what he has, inſomuch that his abundance will not ſuffer him to ſleep in the night, nor to enjoy an hour's pleaſure in the day; or being ſo narrow-ſpirited, notwithſtanding his fulneſs, that he cannot allow himſelf to eat of the fruit of his labours, and rejoice therein; or fearing, notwithſtanding all his plenty, that he ſhall come to want and poverty; or rather whilſt he is in the moſt flouriſhing circumſtances, and in the heighth of his proſperity, he is on a ſudden as Nebuchadnezzar was, diſpoſſeſſed of all, and reduced to the utmoſt extremity; the Targum is, "when his meaſure is filled, he ſhall take vengeance on him:" every hand of the wicked ſhall come upon him; or of the labourer, as the Targum, the hire of whoſe labour he has detained, or has taken away from him, that which he laboured for; and ſo Broughton, "the hand of the injured or grieved;" ſuch as he had been injurious to, and had grieved by his oppreſſions of them; or rather every troubleſome wicked man, the hand of every thief or robber; reſpect ſeems to be had to the hand of the Sabeans and Chaldeans, that had been on Job and his ſubſtance.

℣. 23. When he is about to fill his belly, &c.] Either in a literal ſenſe, when he is about to take an ordinary meal to ſatisfy nature; or in a figurative ſenſe, when he is ſeeking to increaſe his worldly riches, and his barns and coffers, and endeavouring to get ſatisfaction therein: God ſhall caſt the fury of his wrath upon him; or ſend it out on him [c]; out of the treaſures of it, which are laid up with him, Deut. xxxii. 34, 35. into his conſcience, and fill him with a dreadful ſenſe and apprehenſion of it, and that with great force and violence, and caſt it, and pour it on him like fire, or any ſcalding liquor, which is very terrible and intolerable. This intends the indignation of God againſt ſin, and his juſt puniſhment of it, according to the rigour of his juſtice; ſometimes it is only a little wrath and diſpleaſure he ſhews, he does not ſtir up all his wrath; but here it is threatened he will caſt it, and pour it in great plenty, even the fury of it, in the moſt awful and terrible manner: and ſhall rain it upon him while he is eating; ſignifying, that the wrath of God ſhall be revealed from heaven againſt him, from whence rain comes; that it ſhall fall on him from above, unſeen, ſuddenly, and at an unawares, and come with a force and violence not to be reſiſted, and in great abundance and profuſion. The alluſion ſeems to be to the raining of fire and brimſtone on Sodom and Gomorrah, the inhabitants of which were indulging themſelves in gratifying the fleſh, when that judgment came upon them, Luke xvii. 28, 29. and ſo it was with the Iſraelites, when they ſinned againſt God in the wilderneſs, Pſ. lxxviii. 30, 31. perhaps Zophar may glance at Job's children being ſlain while they were eating and drinking in their elder brother's houſe. Some render it, upon his food [d]; his meat, a curſe going along with it, whilſt he is eating it, his table becoming a ſnare unto him; or upon his wealth and riches; he is endeavouring to fill his belly, or ſatisfy himſelf with; and others, upon his fleſh, as the Targum; or into his fleſh, as Broughton, and ſo many of the Jewiſh commentators [e]; meaning his body, filling it with diſeaſes, ſo that there is no ſoundneſs in it, but is in pain, and waſting, and conſuming; and Job's caſe may be referred to, his body being full of boils and ulcers.

℣. 24. He ſhall flee from the iron weapon, &c.] The ſword, for fear of being thruſt thro' with it; the flaming ſword of juſtice, God ſometimes threatens to take, and whet, and make uſe of againſt ungodly men; the ſword of God, as Bar Tzemach obſerves, is hereby figuratively expreſſed; fleeing from it, or an attempt to flee from it, ſhews guilt in the conſcience, danger, and a ſenſe of it, and a fear of falling into it, and yet there is no eſcaping the hand of God, or fleeing from his preſence: and the bow of ſteel ſhall ſtrike him through; that is, an arrow out of a bow, made of ſteel or braſs, of which bows were formerly made, and reckoned the ſtrongeſt and moſt forcible, ſee Pſ. xviii. 34. ſignifying, that if he ſhould eſcape the dint of a weapon, weapon, a ſword, or ſpear uſed near at hand, yet as he fled, he would be reached by one that ſtrikes at a diſtance, an arrow ſhot from a bow; the ſenſe is, that if a wicked man eſcapes one judgment, another will be ſure to follow him, and overtake him and deſtroy him, ſee Iſ. xxiv. 17, 18. Amos v. 19.

[b] אין שריד לאכלו non erit ſuperſtes hæres qui ejus bonis fruetur; ſo ſome in Mercer. Druſius. יישלוח בו mittet in eum, Pagninus, Montanus, Schmidt; ſo Mercerus, Piſcator. [d] בלחימו in cibum illius, Tigurine verſion. [e] Aben Ezra; Ben Gerſom, Bar Tzemach; in carne ejus, Pagninus, Montanus; ſuper carnem ejus, Beza; in carnem ejus, Druſius, Mercer. Schmidt.

℣. 25. It is drawn and cometh out of the body, &c.] That is, the arrow with which a wicked man is ſtricken through; either it is drawn, and comes out of the quiver, as Broughton; or rather is drawn out of the body of a wicked man, being ſhot into it, and that in order that he may be cured of his wound if poſſible, but to no purpoſe, ſince it follows: yea, the glittering ſword cometh out of his gall; being thruſt into it, which being pierced and poured out, is certain and immediate death, ſee ch. xvi. 13. Some render it, yea, the glittering ſword out of his gall, he ſhall go away, or is gone [f]; that is, he ſhall die, or is a dead man, there is no hope of him, when the arrow has tranſfixed his body, and the ſword has penetrated into his gall, and divided that: terrors are upon him; the terrors of death, the plain ſymptoms of it being upon him; the terrors of an awful judgment, which follows after it; the terrors of the dreadful ſentence of condemnation that will then be pronounced, go ye curſed, &c. and the terrors of hell and eternal death, ſignified by utter darkneſs, unquenchable fire, and the never-ceaſing torments of it. Some by them underſtand devils, thoſe terrible ſpirits, which haunt wicked men in their dying moments, and are ready to carry them to the lake which burns with fire and brimſtone, where they are to be companions with them for ever. The word is ſometimes uſed of gigantic perſons, who are ſometimes terrible to others; and ſince theſe are mentioned along with weapons of war, Bar Tzemach interprets them of men of ſtrength and power, men of war or ſoldiers, whoſe fear falls on others.

℣. 26. All darkneſs ſhall be hid in his ſecret places, &c.] In ſuch places of ſecreſy, where he may promiſe himſelf ſafety, he ſhall find more calamities of all ſorts; or every kind of judgments ſhall find him out, and come upon him, ſometimes ſignified by darkneſs, ſee Iſ. viii. 22. or utter darkneſs, the blackneſs of darkneſs; everlaſting wrath, ruin and deſtruction are laid up and reſerved in God's ſecret places for him, and lie hid among his treaſures of vengeance, which he in due time will bring forth from thence, and puniſh the guilty ſinner with, Jude, ℣. 13. Deut. xxxii. 34, 35. or all this ſhall be becauſe of ſecret ſins, as Ben Gerſom interprets it; and ſo Mr. Broughton renders the words, for his ſtore; that is, for the ſtore of his ſins, as he explains it, which however privately and ſecretly committed, ſhall be brought into judgment; and there the hidden things of darkneſs will be brought to light, and ſentence paſs upon men for them: a fire not blown ſhall conſume him; not blown by man, but by God himſelf; which ſome underſtand of thunder and lightning, ſuch as fell on Job's ſheep and ſervants, and conſumed them, and which may be glanced at; and others of ſome fiery diſtemper, a burning fever, hot ulcers, carbuncles, &c. ſuch as were at this time on Job's body; but the Targum better, of the fire of hell; and ſo many of the Jewiſh commentators [g], as well as Chriſtian; the Septuagint verſion renders it, unquenchable fire; and ſo Mr. Broughton; and ſuch the fire of hell is ſaid to be, Matt. iii. 12. Mark ix. 43, &c. and which is a fire kindled by the breath of the Lord, like a ſtream of brimſtone, Iſ. xxx. 33. it ſhall go ill with him that is left in his tabernacle; not only it ſhall go ill with the wicked man himſelf, but with thoſe he leaves behind him, that dwell in the houſe he formerly lived in, with his poſterity; God ſometimes puniſhing the iniquities of the fathers upon the children.

℣. 27. The heaven ſhall reveal his iniquity, &c.] Either God the maker and poſſeſſor of heaven, who dwells there, and is ſometimes ſo called, Dan. iv. 26. Luke xv. 18. who ſees and knows all things, even thoſe that are moſt ſecret, as well as more openly committed, and will make all manifeſt, ſooner or later; or elſe the angels of heaven, the inhabitants of it, ſo the Targum; who in the laſt day will be employed in gathering out of Chriſt's kingdom all that offend, and do iniquity, Matt. xiii. 41, 42. or the judgments of God deſcending from heaven, or appear there, and are owing to it; ſuch as drowning the old world by opening the windows of heaven, the burning of Sodom and Gomorrah by fire and brimſtone from thence, and the deſtruction of perſons by thunder and lightning, and the like; which judgments falling upon men, ſhew them to be guilty of crimes deſerving of the wrath of God, ſee Rom. i. 18. and the earth ſhall riſe up againſt him; when that becomes barren for the ſins of men, and nothing but things hurtful to man riſe up out of it; when it diſcloſes the blood of murdered perſons, and will at laſt give up the wicked dead that are buried in it; the Targum is, "the inhabitants of the earth;" and may be interpreted of their enmity, oppoſition and hoſtility.

℣. 28. The increaſe of his houſe ſhall depart, &c.] Either his children, or his ſubſtance. Some interpret it, as Kimchi [h] obſerves, of the walls of his houſe, becauſe of what follows, they ſhall flow away, &c. as if he ſhould ſay, the ſtones of his houſe ſhall fall down, and his habitation ſhall be deſtroyed, according to Mic. i. 6. where a dilapidation is expreſſed by a flow, or pouring down of ſtones: and his goods ſhall flow away in the day of his wrath; in the day of the wrath of God upon him, which will come upon him like water ſpilt on the ground, of no more uſe and ſervice to him; the Targum interprets it of oil and wine, which ſhall flow away and ceaſe, and ſo Mr. Broughton renders it, fruits for his houſe; all deſirable and uſeful ones, ſee Rev. xviii. 14.

℣. 29. This is the portion of a wicked man from God, &c.] All before related, and which is very different from the portion of a good man, which is God himſelf, both here and hereafter; the wicked man has indeed his portion from God, which he has aſſigned him, but his portion is not himſelf; nor is it with him, nor with his people, but it is at moſt and beſt in this life, and but a worldly one, and hereafter will be with devils and damned ſpirits; and a dreadful portion it is to be baniſhed from the preſence of God to all eternity, and take up an everlaſting abode with ſuch company: and the heritage appointed unto him by God; it is not only a portion allotted to him, but an inheritance to abide continually with him; and this by the irreverſible decree and appointment of God, who

[f] יהלך abibit e vivis; ſo ſome in Michaelis; abit, Schultens. Sepher Shoraſh. rad. יבל.

[g] Jarchi, Sephorno, and others.

[h] Se-

who has fore-ordained ungodly men to condemnation, and made, appointed and reserved them to the day of wrath and destruction. Some chuse to render the clause, and the inheritance of his word or words [i] is unto him by God; that is, punishment shall be inflicted upon him, and continue with him as an inheritance, because of his words, his indecent words, hard speeches and blasphemies uttered by him; referring as 'tis thought, to the words which had dropped from the lips of Job.

CHAP. XXI.

THIS chapter contains Job's reply to Zophar's preceding discourse, in which, after a preface exciting attention to what he was about to say, ℣. 1—6. he describes by various instances the prosperity of wicked men, even of the most impious and atheistical, and which continues with them as long as they live, contrary to what Zophar had asserted in ch. xx. 5. ℣. 7—15. as for himself, he disapproved of such wicked men as much as any, and owns that destruction comes upon them sooner or later, and on their posterity also, ℣. 16—21. but as God is a God of knowledge, and needs no instruction from any, and is a sovereign Being, he deals with men in different ways; some die in great ease, and peace, and prosperity, and others in bitterness and distress, but both are alike brought to the dust, ℣. 22—26. and whereas he was aware of their censures of him, and their objections to what he had said, he allows that the wicked are reserved to the day of destruction, which is future, and in the mean while lie in the grave, where all must follow; yet they are not repaid or rewarded in this life, that remains to be done in another world, ℣. 27—33. and concludes, that their consolation with respect to him was vain, and falshood was in their answers, ℣. 34.

℣. 1. But Job answered and said.] In reply to what Zophar had asserted concerning the prosperity of the wicked, being only for a short time; the contrary to which he most clearly proves, and that in many instances their prosperity continues as long as they live; that they die in it, and it is enjoyed by their posterity after them.

℣. 2. Hear diligently my speech, &c.] The following oration or discourse he was about to deliver concerning the prosperity of wicked men; to which he desires tneir closest attention, that they might the better understand the force of his reasoning, the evidences and proof of facts he should give; whereby, if their minds were open to conviction, they would clearly see their mistake, and that truth lay on his side: and let this be your consolations; or this shall be your consolations [k]; meaning, either that they would receive instruction and benefit by his discourse, which would yield them pleasure and comfort; and to an ingenuous mind, to be convinced of an error, to have mistakes rectified, and to get knowledge of the truth, it is a real satisfaction, and affords pleasure; or else, that whereas their end in paying him a visit was to comfort him, and they had taken methods, as they thought, in order to it, but in Job's opinion to very little purpose, yea they were, as he says, miserable comforters; now he observes, that if they would but be silent, and attentively listen to what he had to say, that would be in the room of all comforts they could give unto him; it would be a consolation to him, and be reckoned by him, instead of all they could give, or could propose to him, if he might have but this favour to be heard with candour, diligence and attention.

℣. 3. Suffer me that I may speak, &c.] To go on with his discourse, without any interruption, until he had finished it; as he before craves their attention, here he intreats their patience to hear him out, as well as to give him leave to begin; they might by their gestures seem as if they were breaking up and departing; or they raised a tumultuous clamour, to hinder his proceeding to reply; or he might fear, that if he was allowed to speak, they would break in upon him before he had done, as they had already; or bear me, as several of the Jewish commentators explain the phrase; tho' what he was going to say might sit heavy upon their minds, and be very burdensome, grating and uneasy to them; yet he intreats they would endure it patiently, until he had made an end of speaking: and after that I have spoken, mock on; as they had already, ch. xii. 4. and xvii. 2. they had mocked not at his troubles and afflictions, but at his words and arguments in vindication of his innocence; and now all he intreats of them is, that they would admit him to speak once more, and to finish his discourse; and then if they thought fit, or if they could, to go on with their scoffs and derisions of him; if he could but obtain this favour, he should be easy, he should not regard their mockings, but bear them patiently; and he seems to intimate, that he thought he should be able to say such things to them, that would spoil their mocking, and prevent it for the future; so the Greek version renders it, thou shalt not laugh; and the words being singular, have led many to think, that Zophar, who spoke last, is particularly intended, though it may respect every one of his friends.

℣. 4. As for me, is my complaint to man? &c.] Job had been complaining, and still was, and continued to do so after this, but not to them, his friends, nor any other man; his complaint was made to God, and of him he thought he was hardly dealt with by him, he could not tell for what; he had desired to know the reason why he contended with him in such a manner, but could get no satisfaction; when his friends came first to visit him, they said nothing to him, nor he to them; and when he did speak, it was not to them, but to God, of whom he complains, and expostulates with him, why he had ever been born, or had not died as soon as born, and not have lived to have seen such unhappy days, and endured so much affliction and trouble: and if it were so; that he had made his complaint to man, since it would have been in vain, and to no purpose, he should have got no relief, nor obtained any satisfaction: why should not my spirit be troubled? or shortened [l]; or, as the Targum, be straitened; for as comfort and joy enlarge the heart, trouble contracts and straitens ſtraitens it; or is my prayer [m] or petition to men? it was not, tho' he was reduced ſo low, and was in ſuch a diſtreſſed condition; he had aſked nothing of men, not of theſe his friends, neither to give him of their ſubſtance, nor to help him out of the hands of his enemies, ch. vi. 21, 23. he had poured out his complaint before God, and had directed his prayer to the God of his life; he had deſired to ſpeak to none but the Almighty, and to reaſon only with him; he had petitioned him to take cognizance of his caſe, and to admit of a hearing of it before him, and to have it determined by him; he had complained of wrongs and injuries done him, and begged to be redreſſed and righted, but got no anſwer; God did not think fit to anſwer him, but hid himſelf from him, and continued ſo to do: and if, if this be the caſe, as it really was, why ſhould not my ſpirit be troubled? is there not reaſon for it? Some think Job's meaning is, is my diſputation, as the Vulgate Latin verſion, or is my diſcourſe concerning human things, things within the compaſs of human knowledge and reaſoning? or, to be attained to by the force of that, without divine revelation? no, it is concerning divine things; concerning the myſteries of Providence, with reſpect to good and bad men; concerning the living Redeemer, his incarnation, reſurrection, &c. and faith in him; concerning the general reſurrection, the final judgment, and a future ſtate of happineſs: or does my complaint, petition or diſcourſe ſavour of that which is human, and is intermixed with human frailty? if it be ſo, it ſhould be borne with, it ſhould be conſidered I am but a man, and liable to err; and eſpecially great allowances ſhould be made in my preſent circumſtances, being under ſuch ſore afflictions; and it may be reaſonably thought, that though the ſpirit may be willing to behave in a better manner, the fleſh is weak, and much muſt be imputed unto that; and it will not ſeem ſo extravagant to indulge a troubled ſpirit ſo ſeverely exerciſed; perſons under afflictions generally think they do well to be troubled, and that there is reaſon enough for it, and ought to be borne with, and not to be reproached and rallied on that account.

[i] נחלת אמרו hæreditas eloquii ejus, Pagninus, Montanus; verborum ejus, V. L. impie dictorum ejus, Codurcus.
[k] ותהי זאת & hoc erit consolationes vestræ, Beza, Mercerus; so Jarchi; idque pro consolatione vobis, Tigurine version; pro consolationibus vestris, Schultens. [l] תקצר abbreviabitur, Montanus, Vatablus, abbreviaretur, Drusius, Cocceius, Michaelis.

3

℣. 5. Mark me, &c.] Or look at me [n]; not at his perſon, which was no lovely ſight to behold, being covered with boils from head to foot, his fleſh clothed with worms and clods of duſt, his ſkin broken, yea ſcarce any left; however he was become a mere ſkeleton, reduced to ſkin and bone; but at his ſorrows and ſufferings, and conſider and contemplate them in their minds, and ſee if there was any ſorrow like his, or any one that ſuffered as he did, and in ſuch pitiful circumſtances; or that they would have a regard to his words, and well weigh what he had ſaid, or was about to ſay, concerning his own caſe, or concerning the providences of God with reſpect to good and bad men, and eſpecially the latter: and be aſtoniſhed; at what had befallen him, at his afflictions, being an innocent man, and not chargeable with any crime for which it could be thought that theſe came upon him; and at the different methods of Providence towards good men and bad men, the one being afflicted, and the other in proſperous circumſtances, ſee ch. xvii. 8. and lay your hand upon your mouth; and be ſilent, ſince ſuch diſpenſations of Providence are unſearchable, and paſt finding out; and as they are not to be accounted for, are not to be ſpoken againſt: and it would have been well if Job had taken the ſame advice himſelf, and had been ſtill, and owned and acknowledged the ſovereignty of God, and not opened his mouth in the manner he had done, and curſed the day of his birth, and complained of hard treatment at the hand of God; perhaps his ſenſe may be, that he would have his friends be ſilent, and forbear drawing the characters of men from the outward dealings of God with them. This phraſe is uſed of ſilence in ch. xxix. 9. and xl. 4. thus Harpocrates, the god of ſilence with the heathens, is always pictured with his hand to his mouth.

℣. 6. Even when I remember, &c.] Either the iniquities of his youth he was made to poſſeſs; or his former ſtate of outward happineſs and proſperity he had enjoyed, and reviewed his preſent miſerable caſe and condition, and called to mind the evil tidings brought him thick and faſt; of the loſs of his ſubſtance, ſervants and children, which were ſo terrible and ſhocking; or when he reflected on the inſtances of Providence, he was about to relate in the following verſes: I am afraid, and trembling taketh hold on my fleſh; which is ſometimes the caſe of good men, both with reſpect to the judgments of God upon the wicked, and with reſpect to what befals, or is coming upon, the people of God, Pſ. cxix. 120. Hab. iii. 16. and even the different treatment of good and bad men in this life, as that the one ſhould be ſeverely afflicted and diſtreſſed, and the other be in ſuch proſperous and happy circumſtances, is not only a ſore temptation to them, but ſhocks their minds, and makes them ſhudder and ſtagger at it, and gives them great pain and uneaſineſs, Pſ. lxxiii. 2, 3, 12, 13, 14, 16. Jer. xii. 1, 2.

℣. 7. Wherefore do the wicked live, &c.] Which queſtion is put either to God himſelf, as not knowing how to account for it, or to reconcile it to his divine perfections; that he a holy, juſt and righteous Being, ſhould ſuffer ſuch wretches to live upon his earth, who had been, and ſtill were, continually ſinning againſt him, tranſgreſſing his law, and trampling under foot his power and authority; when he a man that feared the Lord, as God himſelf had borne witneſs of him, laboured under ſuch heavy affliction, that he ſeemed rather to die than live: or elſe it is put to his friends, to whom he appeals, for the truth of it, as Zophar had to him, about the ſhort time of the proſperity of the wicked, ch. x. 4, 5. and deſires them to try how they could make ſuch undeniable facts comport with their own principles, that wicked men are always, and only afflicted to any great degree, and not holy and good men; but if ſo, it is aſked, why do they live, even live at all? why is not their breath ſtopt at once, that breathe out nothing but ſin and wickedneſs? or why are they lively? as Mr. Broughton renders the word; that is, briſk, chearful and jocund, live merrily, having an abundance of this world's good things; call upon themſelves to eat, drink and be merry, and indulge themſelves in all the gratifications of ſenſual pleaſures and delights; live at eaſe, in peace and outward comfort, and are not in trouble as other men, having nothing to diſturb, diſquiet and diſtreſs them; nay, not only

[m] ישיחי precatio mea, Druſius. Piſcator, &c.

[n] פנו אלי reſpicite ad me, Pagninus, Montanus, Junius & Tremellius, only live comfortably, but live long; whilſt a righteous man periſhes or dies in his righteouſneſs, the wicked man prolongs his life in his wickedneſs, Eccl. vii. 15. as it follows: become old; live to a conſiderable old age, as Iſhmael did, to whom he may have reſpect, as well as to ſome others within his knowledge; or are durable[n], not only in age, as the ſinner is ſuppoſed to die, and ſometimes does die an hundred years old, or more, but in wealth and riches, in outward proſperity; for though ſpiritual riches are only durable riches, in oppoſition to temporal ones, yet theſe ſometimes endure with a wicked man, and he endures with them as long as he lives, as may be ſeen in the inſtances of wicked rich men in Luke xii. 16—20. and xvi. 19, 22. with which agrees what follows: yea, are mighty in power? are in great authority among men, being kings, princes, civil magiſtrates, ſee Pſ. xxxvii. 35. are advanced to great dignity and honour, as the twelve princes that ſprung from Iſhmael, and the race of kings and dukes that came from Eſau. Mr. Broughton renders it, be mighty in riches, greatly increaſe in them; and ſo the Targum, poſſeſs ſubſtance or riches.

℣. 8. Their ſeed is eſtabliſhed in their ſight with them, &c.] Which is to be underſtood not of ſeed ſown in the earth, and of the permanence and increaſe of that, but of their children; to have a numerous progeny, was reckoned a great temporal bleſſing, and to have them ſettled happily and comfortably in the world, was an additional one; and what contributed ſtill more to their felicity was, that they were well ſettled during their life, or they yet living, and with their eyes beholding their proſperous and ſtable condition: and alſo with them; near them, in the ſame neighbourhood, or at no great diſtance from them; or even in like circumſtances with them, equally as well ſettled, and as proſperous as themſelves, as this phraſe is ſometimes uſed, ſee Pſ. cvi. 6. and their offſpring before their eyes; their childrens children, as the Targum, and ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion; ſo that proſperity attends not only wicked men and their children, but alſo their grandchildren, and they live to ſee theſe grown up and ſettled in the world, and in thriving circumſtances; all which muſt give them pleaſure, and be matter of honour and glory to them, Prov. xvii. 6. Now this is diametrically oppoſite to Zophar's notion of the ſhort continuance of the proſperity of wicked men, and of the low and miſerable condition of their children, ch. xx. 5, 10. 21. 26, 28.

℣. 9. Their houſes are ſafe from fear, &c.] Of enemies beſetting them, entering into them, and pillaging and plundering them; of thieves and robbers breaking into them, and carrying off their ſubſtance: or their houſes are peace[o]; their families live in peace among themſelves, or enjoy all proſperity, which the word peace frequently ſignifies; they have peace and proſperity within doors, and are free from fear, or devoid of fear from any thing without: neither is the rod of God upon them; neither his rod of chaſtiſement, which is upon his own people, and with which he ſcourges every ſon, though in love, for their good, and which was now upon Job, ch. ix. 34. nor any ſore judgment, as famine, plague, ſword, or any other; no not even the common afflictions and troubles that men are exerciſed with.

℣. 10. Their bull gendereth, and faileth not, &c.] As the wicked man's proſperity is deſcribed before by the increaſe and comfortable ſettlement of his children and grand-children, and by the peace and ſafety of all within doors; here it is farther ſet forth by the increaſe of his kine in the fields, one part being put for the whole, his oxen and aſſes, his camels and ſheep, things in which the riches of men chiefly lay in thoſe times and countries; and he was reckoned an happy man, when theſe brought forth abundantly; ſee Pſ. cxliv. 13, 14, 15. their cow calveth, and caſteth not her calf; both male and female ſucceed in propagating their ſpecies, and ſo in increaſing the wealth of their owner; this is ſometimes promiſed as a temporal bleſſing, Exod. xxiii 26.

℣. 11. They ſend forth their little ones like a flock, &c.] Of ſheep, which are creatures very increaſing, and become very numerous, Pſ. cxliv. 13. to which a large increaſe of families may be compared, Pſ. cvii. 41. for this is not to be interpreted of their kine ſending or bringing forth ſuch numbers as to be like a flock of ſheep; but of the families of wicked men being increaſed in like manner; and the ſending them forth is to be underſtood either of the birth of their children, being ſent out or proceeding from them, as plants out of the earth, or branches from a tree; or of their being ſent out not to ſchool to be inſtructed in uſeful learning, but into the ſtreets to play, and pipe, and dance; and it may denote, as their number, ſo their being left to themſelves, and being at liberty to do as they pleaſe, being under no reſtriction, nor any care taken of their education; at leaſt in ſuch a manner as to have a tendency to make them ſober, virtuous, and uſeful in life: and their children dance; either in an inartificial way, ſkip and friſk, and play like calves and lambs, and ſo are very diverting to their parents, as well as ſhews them to be in good health; which adds to their parents happineſs and pleaſure: or in an artificial way, being taught to dance; and it ſhould be obſerved, it is their children, the children of the wicked, and not of the godly, that are thus brought up; ſo Abraham did not train up his children, nor Job his; no inſtance can be given of the children of good men being trained up in this manner, or of their dancing in an irreligious way; however this proves in what a jovial way, and in what outward proſperity and pleaſure wicked men and their families live; which is the thing Job has in view, and is endeavouring to prove and eſtabliſh.

℣. 12. They take the timbrel and harp, &c.] Not the children, but the parents of them; theſe took theſe inſtruments of muſic into their hands, and played upon them whilſt their children danced; thus merrily they ſpent their time: or, as Jarchi and Aben Ezra, they lift up the voice with the tabret and harp; that is, whilſt they played on theſe with their hands, they ſung ſongs with their mouths; they uſed both vocal and inſtrumental muſic together, to make the greater harmony, and give the greater pleaſure, like thoſe in Amos vi. 5, 6. and rejoice at the ſound of the organ; a muſical inſtrument, very pleaſant and entertaining, from whence it has its name in the Hebrew tongue; but of what form it was cannot be with certainty ſaid; that which we now ſo call, is of later invention, and unknown in thoſe times: probably Job may have reſpect to Jubal, the inventor of this ſort of muſic, and others of the poſterity of Cain before the flood, who [n] עתקו durant, Mercerus, Cocceius, Michaelis; edurant, Schultens. & Tremellius, Schultens.

[o] שלום pax, Montanus, Junius who practiſed it, and were delighted in it; in which they were imitated and followed by wicked men after it, and in Job's time, Gen. iv. 21.

℣. 13. They ſpend their days in wealth, &c.] Or in good [p]; not in the performance of good works, or in the exerciſe of that which is ſpiritually good; or in ſeeking after ſpiritual good things, or eternal happineſs; but in earthly good, in the enjoyment of the temporal good things of this life, and which to enjoy in a moderate and becoming manner is not criminal but commendable; but theſe men, and ſuch as they, ſeek no other good, but worldly good; their language is, who will ſhew us any good? any outward good; the way to get it, how to come at it, and be put in the poſſeſſion of it: ſuch place all their happineſs in ſuch ſort of good, and ſpend all their time either in getting it, or in enjoying it, and in nothing elſe; not in ſpiritual exerciſes, in prayer, or praiſe, in their own houſes, in private; nor in an attendance on the worſhip of God in public; it denotes alſo their continuance in proſperity unto the end of their days; for there is a various reading; we follow the Keri, or margin, but the Cetib, or writing is they become old [q]; in wealth, or good things, and which is followed by many; they live all their days in the midſt of wealth and riches, and die in ſuch circumſtances, contrary to what Zophar had aſſerted in ch. xx. 5. and in a moment go down to the grave; the houſe appointed for all living, man's long home, into which he is ſaid to go down, becauſe let down and interred in the earth; hither wicked men muſt come after all their wealth, riches, proſperity, and pleaſure; and hither they deſcend in a moment; ſuddenly, no previous change being made in their outward circumſtances; and without any preſage, or forenotice of it, without any lingering diſeaſe and ſickneſs leading on to it, there being no bands in their death, nothing to hinder and reſtrain from dying; but they drop at once into the grave, without ſickneſs or pain: or in reſt, or quietly [r]; being wholly at eaſe and quiet as in ℣. 23. not only free from acute pains, and grievous diſtempers, as burning fevers, and violent tortures, and racks of the ſtone, and other diſtreſſing diſorders; but without any diſtreſs of mind, ignorant of their ſtate and condition, and unconcerned about it; as they are at eaſe from their youth, and ſettled on their lees, they remain ſo, and go out of the world in like manner; and as ſheep are laid in the grave, die ſenſeleſs and ſtupid, having no thought in their laſt moments what will become of them in another world: ſome render it, they go down to hell [s]; the ſtate and place of the wicked after death; which, though true, ſeems not ſo agreeable to Job's ſcope and deſign, which is not to deſcribe the puniſhment of the wicked, but their eaſy circumſtances in life and in death; and ſo the Jewiſh commentators generally underſtand it. Aben Ezra's note is, "in a moment, without afflictions;" Jarchi, "quietly without chaſtiſements;" and Bar Tzemach, "without evil diſeaſes;" having nothing to diſtreſs them in body or mind, when many a good man lies long on a bed of languiſhing, tortured with diſeaſes, chaſtened with ſore pain, and his life gradually draws near to the grave, and to the deſtroyers.

℣. 14. Therefore they ſay unto God, &c.] Whilſt in health and life, amidſt all their outward proſperity, and becauſe of it; for worldly riches, have this tendency, to make men proud and inſolent, and not only to behave ill to their fellow creatures, and to ſlight and deſpiſe them; but even to forſake God, and lightly eſteem their creator and benefactor; yea, even to kick againſt him, and oppoſe him, to ſet their mouths againſt him, and ſpeak very contemptuouſly and blaſphemouſly of him, as in the following words; which though not expreſly uttered and pronounced, which yet may have been by ſome, however are conceived in the mind, and inwardly ſpoken; and by their lives and converſations outwardly declared and abundantly proclaimed: depart from us; not as to his general preſence, which cannot be, and without which they would not be able to ſubſiſt; God is every where, and near to every one, and all live, and move, and have their being in him; nor as to his ſpiritual preſence, which wicked men know nothing of, and are unconcerned about; but they don't chuſe to have him ſo near them as that their minds ſhould be converſant about him; they don't care to have him in their thoughts, they are deſirous if poſſible of baniſhing him out of their minds; they would live without thinking of God, or thinking that there is a God in the world, for ſuch a thought makes them uneaſy; they don't love to have their conſciences awakened by him, ſo as to check and accuſe for what they do; they had rather have them cauterized or ſeared, as with a red hot iron, and be paſt feeling, that they may go on in their ſinful courſes without controul: this is the juſt character of a worldling, who is afraid he ſhall be a loſer by God and religion, ſhould he attend thereunto; and therefore, as the Gergeſenes for a like reaſon deſired Chriſt to depart out of their coaſts, ſo ſuch deſire God to depart from them; and of the epicure, whoſe God is his belly, and that only, and moſt righteouſly will it be ſaid to ſuch at the laſt day, depart from me; this will be a juſt retaliation: for we deſire not the knowledge of thy ways; the ways which God preſcribes, directs, and enjoins men to walk in, even the ways of his commandments; theſe are unknown to men, until ſhewn and taught them; but wicked men don't deſire to be inſtructed in them; they have no pleaſure and delight neither in them, nor in the knowledge of them; they fancy there is no pleaſure to be had in them, and they think they have got into a much more pleaſant way, which they have choſen, and their ſouls delight in; though deſtruction and miſery are in it, and it leads into it: they wilfully affect ignorance of the ways of God; they don't care to come to the light, leſt their deeds ſhould be reproved, their conſciences be made uneaſy, and they not able to go on ſo peaceably and quietly in their own ways.

℣. 15. What is the Almighty, that we ſhould ſerve him? &c.] Who is he [t], as ſome render it; or what is there in him, in his nature, in his excellencies and perfections, that ſhould oblige us to ſerve him? One would think, the attribute of Almighty, they own and acknowledge, is ſufficient to engage to it, ſince he is the lawgiver that is able to ſave and to deſtroy, even to deſtroy with an everlaſting deſtruction, both body and ſoul in hell, who obey him not; but fulneſs of riches, power, and authority, ſwell the mind with pride, and put men on aſking ſuch queſtions, and running ſuch lengths as theſe; ſee Exod.

[p] בטוב in bono, Pagninus, Montanus, Junius & Tremellius, &c.
[q] יבלו vetuſtate terent, Montanus; veteraſcunt, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Mercerus; vetuſti fiunt, Cocceius; ad ſenectam deterunt, Schultens.
[r] ברגע quiete, Pagninus; in quicte, Vatablus.
[s] שאול ad inferna, V. L. ad infernum, Cocceius; in infernum, Schmidt.
[t] מה quis eſt, V. L.

Exod. v. 2. Prov. xxx. 9. The queſtion is big with atheiſm, and ſuggeſts, there was nothing in God excellent or worthy of any regard, or on account of which he ſhould be ſerved and worſhipped; as if he was a mere idol, which is nothing in the world; and that he was indeed nothing in it, neither did good nor evil, nor concerned himſelf with the affairs of men; had forſaken the earth, and took no notice of what was doing in it; at leaſt, the queſtion ſuppoſes, that ſuch think themſelves under no obligations to ſerve him, and ſhews them to be ſons of Belial, without a yoke; that they neither are nor can be ſubject to the law of God without his grace; they are not willing God ſhould reign over them, nor to be obedient to his commands and ordinances; but are for freeing themſelves from all obligations to him, and chooſe to ſerve divers luſts and pleaſures; be the vaſſals of ſin and Satan, rather than be the worſhippers of God: and what profit ſhould we have if we pray unto him? Prayer is one part of the ſervice of God, and may be here put for the whole: this, as all the reſt, is very diſagreeable to a natural man, who, as he is biaſſed entirely by profit and gain, thinks there is nothing to be got by religious exerciſes; he obſerving, that the worſhippers of God, as to external things, fare worſe than thoſe who do not pray unto him, or do not ſerve and worſhip him; ſee Mal. iii. 14. though there is much profit, and many things, and thoſe moſt excellent and valuable, got by prayer; for whatſoever good men aſk in prayer, believing, they receive, Matt. vii. 7. and xxi. 22. The Targum is, "if we pray in his word," in the name of the eſſential Word, the Son of God; whereas to aſk or pray in his name, is the only way of ſucceeding; and ſuch who do aſk in faith in his name, have what they aſk for, John xiv. 15. and xvi. 23, 24.

℣. 16. Lo, their good is not in their hand, &c.] Though it is in their poſſeſſion for the preſent, it is not in the power of their hands to keep, nor to carry it with them when they die; God that gave it, can take it away when he pleaſes; and therefore it might be profitable to them to ſerve him and pray unto him: or their good is not by their hand; they do not obtain their happineſs by their works, as in the Tigurine verſion; and to the ſame ſenſe Mr. Broughton, "lo, their wealth cometh not by their own power;" it is not got by their own induſtry, diligence, care, and labour; by their own wiſdom, knowledge, underſtanding, and cunning; for riches are not always to men of underſtanding, but come from God, who gives them to whom he pleaſes, and can take them away again if he thinks fit; and therefore men are dependent upon him for what they have, and ſhould be thankful to him, and ſerve him, and pray for the continuance of good things to them. Jarchi reads the words by way of interrogation and admiration, lo! is not their good in their hand? verily it is, eſpecially in their own opinion; their hands are full of it; they want nothing of God; they ſee no need of praying to him; hence the above words, which Job expreſſes his diſapprobation of: the counſel of the wicked is far from me; the counſels of their hearts; the thoughts of their mind; the words of their mouth; the above impious ſayings were ſuch as were deteſted and abhorred by him; their ſenſe and judgment of things, their choice from deliberate conſultation with themſelves, preferring temporal good to ſpiritual good, and earthly things to heavenly ones, outward wealth and riches, to the knowledge, ſervice, and worſhip of God, and communion with him; theſe were what he diſliked; their courſe of life, which was according to this world, and Satan the god of it, their company and converſation, were ſuch as he carefully ſhunned and avoided; he choſe not to come into their aſſembly, or to have any fellowſhip with them; to walk in the counſel of the ungodly, or ſtand in the way of ſinners, theſe things were an abomination to him; ſee Pſ. i. 1. This Job ſays to exculpate himſelf, and wipe off any calumny that might be caſt upon him, as if by what he had ſaid concerning the outward proſperity of the wicked, that he was a patron and defender of them, and an advocate for them.

℣. 17. How oft is the candle of the wicked put out, &c.] Job here returns, as Jarchi obſerves, to his former account of the conſtant and continued proſperity of wicked men; and puts queſtions tending to prove the ſame. Bildad had ſaid, that the light and candle of the wicked would be put out, ch. xviii. 5, 6. Job referring to this, aſks how often this is the caſe? meaning by the candle of the wicked, not his ſoul or ſpirit, which cannot be put out, or become extinct, as to be no more; nor the light of nature in his ſoul, though that may be put out in a great meaſure, and he be given up to judicial blindneſs and hardneſs of heart; but either his natural life, which, like a candle burns for a while, and then becomes extinct, or rather his outward proſperity and happineſs: if the queſtion relates to the former, to the natural life of wicked men; it is not whether they die, that is no queſtion; all die, good and bad; but whether they die in common ſooner than others, or whether the inſtances of the brevity of the life of wicked men were frequent, or but ſeldom; or, is this always the caſe? it is not, it is rare, and not common; they live as long as other men, and oftentimes longer; they live and become old, as Job before obſerves; they prolong their days in their wickedneſs; or, if this refers to the latter, the proſperity of the wicked, the queſtion is, is that for the moſt part a ſhort-lived proſperity? it is not, it is but rarely ſo; wicked men generally ſpend all their days in wealth, as before obſerved; ſo Ramban interprets how oft, that is, how ſeldom; and to the ſame ſenſe Mr. Broughton, "not ſo often is the candle of the wicked put out;" and how oft cometh their deſtruction upon them? not eternal, but temporal deſtruction, calamities and diſtreſſes; theſe are threatened them; but they are not executed on them immediately; and therefore their hearts are ſet in them to do evil: generally ſpeaking, they have their good things here; they are filled with hidden treaſure, which they enjoy whilſt they live, and leave the reſt of their ſubſtance to their babes; they are not deſtroyed on every ſide, as Job was; their ſubſtance, their cattle, their ſervants, their children, and their own health. Job aſks how often this is their caſe, as had been his; and his ſenſe is, and what experience teſtifies, it is but rarely the caſe of wicked men; he ſeems to refer to what is ſaid, ch. xviii. 12. God diſtributeth ſorrows in his anger; or rather, how oft doth he diſtribute ſorrows in his anger? but ſeldom; he is angry with the wicked every day, and reſerves wrath for them, and many ſorrows ſhall be to them, but not for the preſent; thoſe are future, and even ſuch, as of a woman in travail, as the word uſed ſignifies, and which ſhall come upon them ſuddenly and certainly, and there will be no avoiding them; ſee Pſ. xxxii. 10. Hoſ. xiii. 13. 1 Theſſ. v. 3. but does God frequently diſtribute or portion out ſorrows to them now? he does not; they have their portion of good things in this life; does he uſually uſually give them ſorrow of heart, his curſe unto them? he does not; it is very ſeldom he does; they are not in trouble, nor plagued as other men; they are not men of ſorrows and acquainted with griefs; they are generally ſtrangers to them, and live merrily all their days, ver. 12. reſpect ſeems to be had to the concluſion of Zophar's ſpeech, ch. xx. 29.

℣. 18. They are as ſtubble before the wind, &c.] Or how oft are they as ſtubble, &c. or how oft does God do the above things, ſo that they are, or become, as ſtubble before the wind [u], and as chaff that the ſtorm carrieth, or ſteals away [x]; haſtily, ſuddenly, at an unawares like a thief: wicked men are comparable to ſtubble and chaff; for the vanity of their minds, their emptineſs of all good things; for their lightneſs, the levity and inconſtancy of their hearts, their principles and practices; for their uſeleſneſs and unprofitableneſs to God and men, to themſelves and their fellow-creatures; for their being fit fuel for everlaſting burnings, their end like theſe being to be burned; and whoſe deſtruction is inevitable and irreſiſtible, and can no more be withſtood and prevented, than ſtubble and chaff can ſtand before a ſtrong wind and a ſtormy tempeſt: but is this their common caſe now? are they uſually toſſed to and fro with the wind of adverſity, and the ſtorms of deſolating judgments? are they not, on the other hand, ſeen in great power, and ſpreading themſelves like a green bay tree; taking root, increaſing in outward proſperity, and bringing forth the fruit of it? ſee Pſ. xxxvii. 35, Jer. xii. 2.

℣. 19. God layeth up his iniquity for his children, &c.] This is a prevention of an objection which Job foreſaw his friends would make, and therefore takes it up, and anſwers to it; you will ſay, that, be it ſo, that the wicked are for the moſt part proſperous, and their proſperity continues; God does not puniſh them now for their ſins in their own perſons, yet he will puniſh them in their children, for whom he reſerves the puniſhment of their iniquity: this way go many of the Jewiſh commentators [y], in which they are followed by many Chriſtian interpreters [z]; and as it ſeems very rightly; now this Job grants, that ſo it is, God takes notice of the iniquities of men, and lays them up in his mind, and puts them down in the book of his remembrance; he reſerves the puniſhment of their iniquities for their children, iniquity being often put for the puniſhment of it; this is laid up among his ſtores of vengeance, and is treaſured up againſt the day of wrath; and when they have filled up the meaſure of their father's ſins by their own tranſgreſſions, the deſerved puniſhment ſhall be inflicted, according to Exod. xx. 5. but this will not clear the caſe, nor ſupport the notions and ſentiments of Job's friends, who had all along given out, that wicked men are puniſhed themſelves as well as their children; and that, if they are at any time in proſperous circumſtances, it is only for a little while; and therefore agreeable to ſuch notions God ſhould take other methods with them, not puniſh their children only, but themſelves, as Job argues in anſwer to the objection in this and the following verſe: he rewarded him, and he ſhall know it; or he ſhould reward him, and he ſhould know it [a]; and ſo the word ſhould is to be put inſtead of ſhall in the next verſe, which directs to the true ſenſe of theſe clauſes; and the meaning of Job is, that according to the ſentiments of his friends, God ſhould reward a wicked man whilſt he lives in his own perſon, and not in his poſterity only; he ſhould render to them a juſt recompenſe of reward of their evil works, the demerit of their ſins; and in ſuch a manner, that they ſhould know it, be ſenſible of it, and feel it themſelves, and perceive the evil of ſin in the puniſhment of it; ſee Hoſ. ix. 7.

℣. 20. His eyes ſhall ſee his deſtruction, &c.] Or ſhould ſee his deſtruction [b]; calamities coming upon himſelf and upon his children; or otherwiſe it will not affect him: but when a man has a perſonal experience of affliction as puniſhments of his ſin, or with his own eyes ſees his children in diſtreſſed circumſtances on his account, this muſt ſenſibly affect him, and be a ſore puniſhment to him; as it was to Zedekiah to have his children ſlain before his eyes, Jer. lii. 10. and he ſhall drink of the wrath of the Almighty; or he ſhould drink [c] of it now, according to the principles of Job's friends, even he in perſon, and not his poſterity only; the wrath of God is on account of ſin, and dreadful to bear: if the wrath of a temporal king is as the roaring of a lion, what muſt be the wrath of the Almighty God, the King of kings, and Lord of lords? this is frequently in ſcripture compared to a cup, and is called a cup of trembling, of wrath and fury; and of which all the wicked of the earth ſhall drink ſooner or later, Pſ. lxxv. 10. but this they ſhould do now, according to the notions of Job's friends, whereas they do not; waters of a full cup, though not in wrath indeed, are wrung out to the people of God, and as they apprehend, in wrath, when the wicked drink wine in bowls, and the cup of their proſperity overflows.

℣. 21. For what pleaſure hath he in his houſe after him, &c.] As, on the one hand, the proſperity of his children after his deceaſe gives him no pleaſure and delight, ſo on the other hand, the calamities and diſtreſſes of his family for his ſins and theirs give him no pain or uneaſineſs; he knows nothing that befals them, and it is no part of his concern; and let what will befal them, he cares not for it; he feels it not, he is not ſenſible of it; and therefore to object that ſignifies nothing; ſee ch. xiv. 21. or, what buſineſs has he with his houſe after death? the affairs [d] of his family do not at all concern him, one way or another; he is not affected with them; he can neither conſider their happineſs as a bleſſing, nor their calamities as a puniſhment to him: when the number of his months is cut off in the midſt? the years, the months, and the days of the lives of men are numbered, and determined by the Lord, ch. xiv. 5. which, when finiſhed, the thread of life is cut off in the midſt, from the reſt of the months, which a man or his friends might have expected he would have lived; or rather, when his number of the months is fully up [e]; when when the calculation of them is compleat, and the full number of them is perfected; the ſenſe is, what cares a wicked man for what befals his family after his death, when he has lived out the full term of life in great outward happineſs and proſperity; has lived to be full of days, of months, and years, to a full age, even to an age that may be truly called old age?

[u] יהיו כתבן ut ſint velut palea, Tigurine verſion; ſo Broughton, quoties ſunt, Junius & Tremellius; quoties fiunt, Piſcator, Michaelis. [x] גנבתו furatus eſt eam, Montanus; ſuffuratur, Vatablus; furatur, Druſius, Cocceius, Schultens. [y] Nachmanides, Jarchi, Ben Gerſom, Bar Tzemach. [z] Beza, Cocceius, Schultens. [a] ישלם אליו וידע redderet illi, & (hoc) ſciret, Beza; retribueret ipſi potius, & ſentiret, Cocceius. [b] יראו עינו כרין videret ejus oculi exitium ſuum, Beza, Cocceius. [c] ישתה biberet, Beza, Cocceius. [d] So Schultens. [e] הצצו integro numero calculis ducti ſunt, Cocceius; cumulatam ſortem habuerint, Schultens.

℣. 22. Shall any teach God knowledge? &c.] Who is a God of knowledge, and knows all things, that teaches men knowledge? will any one take upon him to teach him the path of judgment, and the way of underſtanding, how he ſhall govern the world, and diſpoſe of men and things in it? ſee Iſ. xl. 13, 14. Will any one be ſo bold and audacious as to pretend to direct and inſtruct him, whom he ſhall afflict, and whom not, and when he ſhall do it, and in what manner? Should not theſe things be left to him, who does all things after the counſel of his own will? ſhall his dealings with men in an outward way of providence be the criterions of the characters and eſtates of men, as if love and hatred were to be known by thoſe things, and therefore God muſt be taught what he ſhould do in order to fix them: ſeeing he judgeth thoſe that are high; not the high heavens, as the Targum, nor the angels in them, though he has judged them that ſinned, and caſt them down to hell; but the high ones on earth, kings, princes, and civil magiſtrates, ſuch as are in high places, and are lifted up with pride above others: God is above them; he is higher than the higheſt, and judges them; he is the judge of all the earth, that will do right, the governor of the univerſe, and who over-rules all things for his own glory and the good of his creatures; and therefore none ſhould pretend to direct him, what is fit and proper to be done by him, who is a ſovereign, and diſtinguiſhes men in his providence, in life, and at death, as follows; but their characters, as good or bad men, are not to be determined thereby.

℣. 23. One dieth in his full ſtrength, &c.] Man is born a weak feeble creature, and it is by degrees, and through various ſtages of infancy, childhood, and youth, that he arrives to his full ſtrength in manhood; and, when he does, ſometimes ſo it is, that his ſtrength is not weakened in the courſe of his life by a train of diſorders and diſeaſes, as it is in ſome; but death ſeizes and carries him off in the prime of his days, and in the fulneſs of his ſtrength; for no ſtrength of man, even the greateſt, is a ſecurity againſt death — Thouſands die before they come to their full ſtrength, and multitudes after it begins to decay; and when it is almoſt waſted, through the force of diſtempers, or the infirmities of old age, and others as here, when their ſtrength is in its higheſt vigour and utmoſt perfection, and all as God pleaſes: the words may be rendered in the ſtrength of his integrity, or of his perfection[f]; in the Targum and Ben Gerſom, and ſo Mr. Broughton, in his very perfection; and the word is ſometimes uſed in a moral and ſpiritual ſenſe, of the integrity of a man's heart, and the uprightneſs of his ways and walk, and of the perfection of his ſtate godward; ſee ch. i. 1. and ii. 4. and iv. 6. and ſuch a man who is upright in heart and converſation, who is truly gracious, ſincerely a good man, and perfect thro' the compleat righteouſneſs of Chriſt, he dies ſuch, his integrity continues with him to the laſt; and his graces being brought to maturity, he comes to his grave like a ſhock of corn in its ſeaſon, and is found in the perfect righteouſneſs of his living Redeemer: but it ſeems beſt to take the words in a natural and literal ſenſe, as before; or to interpret them of the fulneſs of outward felicity, which ſome men arrive unto, and die in the midſt of, when they have got to the higheſt pitch of honour and grandeur, and attained to the greateſt degree of wealth and riches, it could well be ſuppoſed they would; and then, when in the perfection of it, have been taken away by death; both theſe ſenſes may ſtand together: it follows, being wholly at eaſe and quiet; in eaſy circumſtances, having an affluence of all good things, and nothing to diſturb them, nor are in trouble as others, or plagued as they be; having all that heart can wiſh, or more, and without any pains of body, at leaſt any long and continued ones; whilſt others are attended with them, days, and months, and years, before their death, ch. xxxiii. 19. whereas theſe go down to the grave in a moment, feeling little or no pain, and are quiet and eaſy in their minds, thoughtleſs of a future ſtate, and unconcerned how it will be with them in another world; having no ſight nor ſenſe of ſin, of the evil nature and juſt demerit of it, feel not the weight and burden of it in their conſciences; have no concern or grief of mind, for ſins of omiſſion or commiſſion, no godly ſorrow for it, or repentance of it, nor any fears of wrath and ruin, hell and damnation; but as they are at eaſe from their youth, with reſpect to thoſe things, ſo they live and ſo they die, ſecure, ſtupid, and ſenſeleſs. Some interpret this of good men[g]; and it is not to be wondered at, that a man that dies in his integrity, in the perfection of grace, holineſs, and righteouſneſs, ſhould be at eaſe and quiet; who has an intereſt in the God of peace, whoſe peace is made by the blood of Chriſt, his peace-maker, and who has a conſcience-peace ariſing from a comfortable view of the peace-ſpeaking blood, righteouſneſs and ſacrifice of the Mediator; who knows his ſtate is ſafe, being intereſted in everlaſting love, in an unchangeable covenant in God, as his Covenant-God, in Jeſus his living Redeemer; and knows where he is going, to heaven, to happineſs and glory, to be with God, with Chriſt, with holy angels and glorified ſaints: but the former ſenſe ſeems beſt, of a man, dying in eaſy circumſtances, without pain of body, or diſtreſs of mind, whether we underſtand it of a good man or bad man, though the latter is rather meant.

℣. 24. His breaſts are full of milk, &c.] As this is not literally true of men, ſome verſions read the words otherwiſe; his bowels or inteſtines are full of fat, as the Vulgate Latin and Septuagint; and others, his ſides or ribs are full of fat, as the Syriac and Arabic; the words for ſide and fat being near in ſound to thoſe here uſed; and ſo it deſcribes a man fat and plump, and fleſhy, when death lays hold upon him, and not waſted with conſumptions and pining ſickneſs, as in the caſe of ſome, ch. xxxiii. 21. the word for breaſts is obſerved by ſome[h], to ſignify, in the Arabic language veſſels, in which liquors are contained, and in the Miſnic language, ſuch as they put oil in, out of which oil is ſqueezed; and ſo are thought here to intend ſuch veſſels as are milked into; and therefore render it by milk-pails; ſo Mr. Broughton, his pails are full of milk[i]; which may denote the abundance of good things enjoyed by [f] בעצם חמו in fortitudine perfectionis ſuæ, Pagninus; ſo Junius and Tremellius, Piſcator; in fortitudine integritatis ſuæ, Montanus, Bolducius; ſo Druſius, Mercerus.

[g] So Schmidt.
[h] See Kimchi, Sepher Shoraſh. rad. עטן, and Jarchi and Ben Melech in loc.
[i] עטיניו mulctralia ejus, Montanus, Beza, Junius, & Tremellius, Piſcator, Mercerus, Bolducius, Druſius, Cocceius, Schmidt.

by ſuch perſons, as rivers of honey and butter; contrary to Zophar's notion, ch. xx. 17. and a large increaſe of oil and wine, and all temporal worldly good; amidſt the plenty of which ſuch die: his bones are moiſtened with marrow; not dried up through a broken ſpirit, or with grief and trouble, and through the decays of old age; but being full of marrow, are moiſt, and firm and ſtrong; and ſo it intimates, that ſuch at the time when death ſeizes them, are of an hale, healthful, robuſt, and ſtrong conſtitution; ſee Pſ. lxxiii. 4. 7.

℣. 25. And another dieth in the bitterneſs of his ſoul, &c.] Either another wicked man; for there is a difference among wicked men; ſome are outwardly happy in life, and in the circumſtances of their death, as before deſcribed; and others are very unhappy in both; their life is a ſcene of afflictions which embitter life, and make death eligible; and in the midſt of which they die, as well as oftentimes in bitter pains, and terrible agonies of body, as well as in great diſtreſs and horror of mind and black deſpair, as Judas and others: and never eateth with pleaſure, or of any good, or any good thing[y]; either he has it not to eat, or what he has is not good, but like huſks which ſwine eat, of which the prodigal would fain have filled his belly, when in extreme poverty, ſuch as thoſe words may deſcribe; or elſe having what is good, has not an heart to eat of it; and ſo they deſcribe a miſer, living and dying ſuch; ſee Eccl vi. 2. or rather the caſe of a man, who, through diſtempers and diſeaſes of body, has loſt his appetite, and cannot with any pleaſure taſte of the richeſt dainties; ſee ch. xxxiii. 20. Some[z] interpret this and the two preceding verſes, as what ſhould be the caſe according to the ſentiments of Job's friends, who objected, that God puniſhed the iniquities of wicked men, not in their own perſons, but in their children; according to which, a wicked man then ſhould die in the perfection of happineſs, without weakneſs or want, in all quietneſs, eaſe, peace, and proſperity; and not in poverty and diſtreſs: but as the two preceding verſes reſpect a wicked man and his caſe and circumſtances at death, agreeable to the whole context; ſo this relates to thoſe of a good man, whom the Lord often deals bitterly with in life, as he did with Naomi, and was now the caſe of Job; ſee Ruth i. 20. Job iii. 20. and who die in very poor and diſtreſſed circumſtances; ſo that nothing is to be concluded from ſuch appearances, with reſpect to the characters of men as good or bad, and eſpecially ſince both are brought into a like condition by death, as follows.

℣. 26. They ſhall lie down alike in the duſt, &c.] Such as have lived and died in great outward proſperity, or in more unhappy circumſtances; theſe are levelled by death, and brought into the ſame ſtate and condition; are laid on duſty beds, where there is no difference between them, their reſt together is in the duſt; here they dwell, and here they lie and ſleep until they are awaked in the morning of the reſurrection: and the worms ſhall cover them; theſe are the companions alike unto them, and ſweetly feed on the one as on the other; the earth is their bed, and worms are their covering; even ſuch who uſed to lie on beds of down, and were covered with coverings of ſilk, have now the ſame bed and covering as thoſe who uſed to lie on beds of ſtraw, and ſcarce any thing to cover them; worms are ſpread under them, and are ſpread upon them; they are both their bed and their covering, Iſ. xiv. 11.

℣. 27. Behold, I know your thoughts, &c.] God only truly, really, and in fact, knows the thoughts of men; this is his peculiar prerogative, he only is the ſearcher of the hearts, and the trier of the reins of the children of men. Chriſt, the eternal Logos, or Word, by his being a diſcerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart, appears to be truly God. No man knows the things of a man, or the thoughts of his heart, but himſelf, and ſuch to whomſoever he reveals them; but a wiſe and underſtanding man, a careful obſerver of men and things, may make ſome ſhrewd gueſſes at the thoughts of others, by hints and half words, or ſentences expreſſed by them; by the ſhew of their countenance, which is the index of the mind, and by the geſtures and motions of their bodies; by theſe they may in a good meaſure judge whether they like or diſlike, approve or diſapprove of what is ſaid to them: and thus Job knew the thoughts of his friends, that they were different from his, that the ſentiments of their minds did not agree with his; and though he had ſo clearly proved his point, yet he ſaw by their looks and geſtures that what he had ſaid was not ſatisfactory to them; that they did not think it a ſufficient confutation of their arguments, and a full anſwer to their objections: and the devices which ye wrongfully imagine againſt me; that he was an hypocrite, a wicked man, guilty of crimes, and which they were deviſing to produce againſt him, and charge and load him with, as Eliphaz does in the following chapter; he knew they meant him in all that they had ſaid concerning wicked men, and their afflictions, and what would be their portion at death, and after it; and though they did not name his name, they might as well have done it, ſince he was the man they ſtruck at in all, particularly in ch. xx. 5, 29.

℣. 28. For ye ſay, &c.] Or have ſaid, or I know that ye ſay; or that yé are about to ſay[a]; it is in your hearts and minds, and juſt ready to come out of your lips, and what you will ſay next: where is the houſe of the prince? of the righteous man, as the Syriac and Arabic verſions; or of the good and liberal man, as others[b]; of ſuch as are of a princely and ingenuous ſpirit, who are made willing, free, or princes, in the day of the power of the grace of God upon them; and are endowed and upheld with a free and princely ſpirit; where is the houſe, or what is the ſtate and condition of the families of ſuch? are they the ſame with that of wicked men in the next clauſe? is there no difference between the one and the other? according to your way of reaſoning, Job, there ſhould not be any: or elſe this is to be underſtood rather of a wicked and tyrannical prince, who has built himſelf a ſtately palace, which he fancied would continue for ever; but where is it now? it lies in ruins; having reſpect perhaps to ſome noted prince of thoſe times: or rather either to Job himſelf, who had been a prince, and the greateſt man in all the eaſt, but in what condition were his houſe and family now? or elſe to his eldeſt ſon, whoſe houſe was blown down with a violent wind: and where are the dwelling places of the wicked? of the mighty men before the flood, which are now overthrown by it; or of the king and princes, and nobles, and great men of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the other cities, cities of the plain deſtroyed by fire and brimſtone from heaven; or of Job, his tent or tabernacle, and the ſeveral apartments in it; or of the reſt of his children and ſervants, reſpecting rather, as before obſerved, the ſtate and condition of his family, than his material houſe: theſe queſtions are anſwered by putting others.

[y] טובה bonum, Pagninus, Mercerus; ſo Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator & Bar Tzemach; de bono, Cocceius, Michaelis, Schultens. [z] Bar Tzemach. [a] כי תאמרו vos dicere, Junius & Tremellius; nempe vos dicturos, Piſcator; ſo Schmidt, Schultens. [b] נדיב liberalis, Montanus; boni & liberalis hominis, Tigurine verſion; ingenui, Schultens.

℣. 29. Have ye not aſked them that go by the way? &c.] Did you not aſk every traveller you met with on the road the above queſtion? not which was the way to Job's houſe, which they knew very well, but in what condition that and his ſons were? or what was the caſe of him and his family? and what was his character? or what was thought of him now ſince his unhappy circumſtances? and do ye not know their tokens? by which it might be known, in what a plight he and his family were, and what were the marks, ſigns, and characters they gave of him: Have ye not aſked, &c. the ſenſe ſeems to be this, that if they had not aſked, they might and and ſhould have aſked of travellers the above things relating to himſelf and family, and then they would not have needed to put the above queſtion about his houſe and tabernacles; or, if they had enquired of his character of any travellers, they would have given them it; that he was a generous hoſpitable man, a man truly good, ſtrictly juſt and upright, and not the wicked man and the hypocrite as they had traduced him; for Job's houſe had been open to ſtrangers and travellers, and he was well known by them, and they were ready to give him a good character, ſee ch. xxxi. 32. or, if they had enquired of them concerning the ſtately houſes and palaces of wicked men that had lived in times paſt, whether there were any of them ſtanding; they could have told them they were, and where they were, and given them ſuch ſigns and tokens, and ſuch proof and evidence of them they could not deny; and indeed, if they had been enquired of about the thing in controverſy between Job and his friends concerning the proſperity of the wicked, and the afflictions of the godly, as they by travelling became acquainted with perſons and things, and made their obſervations on them, they could have eaſily pointed out inſtances of wicked men living and dying in proſperous circumſtances, and of good men being greatly afflicted and diſtreſſed, if not all their days, yet great part of them; and they could have given ſuch plain ſigns and tokens, and ſuch clear and manifeſt proofs of thoſe things, as could not have been gainſaid: and this may be underſtood of travellers in a ſpiritual ſenſe, and who are the beſt judges of ſuch a caſe, and are travellers through the wilderneſs of this world, and paſs through many tribulations in it; and, being bound for another and better country, an heavenly one, are pilgrims, ſtrangers, and ſojourners here; have no abiding, but are paſſing on in the paths of faith, truth, and holineſs, till they come to the heavenly Canaan; if any of thoſe who are yet on the road, and eſpecially if ſuch could be come at who have finiſhed their travels, and the queſtion be put to them, they would all unite in this doctrine, which Abraham, the ſpiritual traveller is repreſented delivering to the rich wicked man in hell; that wicked men have their good things in this life, and good men their evil things, and particularly would agree in ſaying what follows.

℣. 30. That the wicked is reſerved to the day of deſtruction, &c.] That is, that they are ſpared, witheld, reſtrained, as the word [d] ſignifies, or kept and preſerved from many calamities and diſtreſſes, which others are expoſed unto; and ſo are reſerved, either unto a time of greater deſtruction in this life, or rather to eternal deſtruction in the world to come; which is the ſame with the day of judgment, and perdition of ungodly men, when they will be deſtroyed ſoul and body, in hell, with an everlaſting deſtruction, as the juſt demerit of ſin; or of that ſinful courſe of life they live, being the broad way, which leads to and iſſues in deſtruction, and for which there is a day appointed, when it will take place; and unto that day are the wicked reſerved, in the purpoſe and decree of God, by which they are righteouſly deſtined to this day of evil, and by the power and providence of God, even the ſame chains of darkneſs, in which the angels are reſerved unto the ſame time, being fitted and prepared for deſtruction by their own ſins and tranſgreſſions; and unto which they are kept, as condemned malefactors are in their cells, unto the day of execution, they being condemned already, tho' the ſentence is not yet executed; in order to which they ſhall be brought forth to the day of wrath; the wrath of God, which is very terrible and dreadful, and is revealed from heaven, againſt all unrighteouſneſs and ungodlineſs of men, and is here expreſſed in the plural number wraths[e], either as denoting both preſent and future wrath; or the vehemency of it, it being exceeding fierce and vehement; and the continuance and duration of it, there will be wrath upon wrath, even to the uttermoſt, and for ever; and for this a day is fixed, againſt which day wicked men are treaſuring up wrath to themſelves, and they ſhall be brought forth at the day of judgment, to have it poured forth upon them. This is the true ſtate of the caſe with reſpect to them, that, though ſometimes they are involved in general calamities, as the old world, and the men of Sodom and Gomorrah; and ſometimes good men are delivered from them, as Noah and Lot were, or are taken away by death, from the evil to come; yet for the moſt part, generally ſpeaking, wicked men eſcape preſent calamities and diſtreſſes, and are not in trouble as other men, but live in eaſe and pleaſure all their days; nevertheleſs, wrath and ruin, and everlaſting deſtruction will be their portion.

℣. 31. Who ſhall declare his way to his face? &c.] Jarchi and Aben Ezra think, that Job here returns to God, and ſpeaks of him, as in ver. 22. ſignifying, that no man can or ought to preſume to charge the ways of God in his providence with inequality or injuſtice, in ſparing the wicked now, and reſerving them to wrath and deſtruction hereafter; ſince he is a ſovereign Being, and does what he pleaſes, and none can hinder him, nor ought any to ſay to him, what doſt thou? nor does he give an account of his matters to the children of men; but this reſpects the wicked man, and deſcribes his ſtate and condition in this life, as being poſſeſſed of ſuch wealth and riches, and living in ſuch grandeur and ſplendor, and advanced to ſuch places of honour and glory, as to be above the reproof of men; tho' his way, his courſe of life, is a very wicked one, and he ought to be told to his face the evil of his way, and the danger he is expoſed to by it, and what what will be the ſad conſequence of it; his relations and friends, his neighbours and acquaintance ſhould labour to convince him of his evil, and reprove him to his face, and endeavour to reclaim him from it; but how few are there that have courage and faithfulneſs enough to do this, ſince they are ſure to incur his diſpleaſure and hatred, and run the riſque of their lives, as John Baptiſt loſt his for his faithfulneſs in reproving Herod to his face, for taking to him his brother Philip's wife? and who ſhall repay him what he hath done? bring him to an account for his crimes, and to juſt puniſhment for them; who will venture to bring a charge againſt him, or enter an action at law, bring him before a court of judicature, and proſecute him, and get judgment paſt upon him? as ſuch a man is above all reproof for his ſins, he is out of the reach of puniſhment for them; he lives with impunity, none can puniſh him but God; and being lifted up with his greatneſs, he neither fears God, nor regards man.

[d] יחישך prohibebitur, Pagninus, Montanus, Bolducius; ſo Beza, Vatablus, Mercerus; ſubtrahitur, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Cocceius; ſubducitur, Schultens. [e] עברות irarum, Pagninus, Tigurine verſion, Cocceius, Schulens.

℣. 32. Yet ſhall he be brought to the grave, &c.] Or and, or yea he ſhall be brought, &c [a]. for the meaning is not, that though he is great in life he ſhall be brought low enough at death; for Job is ſtill deſcribing the grand figure wicked men make, even at death, as well as in life; for he is not only brought to the grave, as all men are, it being the houſe appointed for all living, and every man's long home; but the wicked rich man is brought thither in great funeral pomp, in great ſtate, as the rich ſinner was buried, Eccl. viii. 10. Luke xvi. 22. or to the graves [b], the place where many graves are, the place of the ſepulchres of his anceſtors; and in the chiefeſt and choiceſt of them he is interred, and has an honourable burial; not caſt into a ditch, or buried with the burial of an aſs, as Jehoiakim was, being caſt forth beyond the gates of the city, Jer. xxiii. 19. and ſhall remain in the tomb; quiet and undiſturbed, when it has been the lot of others to have their bones taken out of their grave, and ſpread before the ſun, ſee Jer. viii. 1, 2. and even ſome good men, who have had their graves dug up, their bones taken out and burnt, and their aſhes ſcattered about, as was the caſe of that eminent man John Wickliff here in England. The word for tomb ſignifies an heap [c], and is ſometimes uſed for an heap of the fruits of the earth; which has led ſome to think of the place of this man's interment being in the midſt of a corn-field; but the reaſon why a grave or tomb is ſo called is, becauſe a grave through a body or bodies being laid in it, riſes up higher than the common ground; and if it has a tomb erected over it, that is no other than an heap of ſtones artificially put together; or it may be ſo called from the heaps of bodies one upon another in a grave, or vault, over which the tomb is, or where every part of the body is gathered and heaped [d]; from this ſenſe of the word, ſome have given this interpretation of the paſſage, that the wicked man ſhall be brought to his grave, and abide there, after he has heaped up a great deal of wealth and riches in this world; which though a truth ſeems not to be intended here, any more than others taken from the different ſignification of the word tranſlated remain. It is obſerved by ſome to ſignify to haſten [e], from whence the almond-tree, which haſtens to put forth its bloom, has its name, Jer. i. 10—12. and and ſo give this as the ſenſe, that ſuch a man being of full age, is ripe for death, and comes to his grave, or heap, like a ſhock of corn in its ſeaſon. Others obſerve, that it ſignifies to watch; and ſo in the margin of our bibles the clauſe is put, he ſhall watch in the heap [f], which is differently interpreted; by ſome, that he early and carefully provides himſelf a tomb, as Abſalom in his life-time ſet up a ſepulchral pillar for himſelf; and Shebna the ſcribe, and Joſeph of Arimathea, hewed themſelves ſepulchres out of the rock; and others think, the alluſion is either to ſtatues upon tombs, as are ſtill in uſe in our days, where they are placed as if they were watching over the tombs; or to bodies embalmed, according to the cuſtom of the Eaſtern countries, eſpecially the Egyptians, which were ſet up erect in their vaults, and ſeemed as if they were alive, and there ſet to watch the places they were in, rather than as if buried there; or, according to others, he ſhall be watched, or the keeper ſhall watch at, or over the tomb [g], that the body is not diſturbed or taken away; but the ſenſe our verſion gives is beſt, and moſt agrees with the context, and the ſcope of it, and with what follows.

℣. 33. The clods of the valley ſhall be ſweet unto him, &c.] Where he lies interred, alluding to places of interment at the bottom of hills, and mountains, and under rocks, in plains and vales, ſee Gen. xxxv. 8. and by this ſtrong figure is ſignified, that the dead wicked man lying in the clods of the valley in his grave, is in great repoſe, and in the utmoſt eaſe and quiet, feels no pains of body, nor has any uneaſineſs of mind concerning what befals his poſterity after his death, ch. xiv. 21. and every man ſhall draw after him, as there are innumerable before him; which either reſpects the pomp at his funeral proceſſion, vaſt numbers being drawn and gathered together to gaze at it, as is common at grand funerals; and particularly it may deſcribe the multitude that go before the corps, as well as thoſe that follow after it; but rather as he is before repreſented as brought to his grave, and laid there, this clauſe is added, to denote the univerſality of death, it being common to all; thouſands and ten thouſands, even a number which no man can number, have gone before him by death into another world, as every man that comes after him muſt; and ſo this may prevent an objection to the grandeur of a wicked man, that after all he dies; but then death is no other than what is common to all men, to the vaſt multitudes that have gone before, and will be the caſe of all that come after, to the end of the world.

℣. 34. How then comfort ye me in vain, &c.] This is the concluſion Job draws from the above obſervations: his friends came to comfort him, and they took methods for it as they thought, but miſerable comforters were they all; what they adminiſtered for comfort was in vain, and to no purpoſe; nor could any be expected from them, on the plan upon which they proceeded; they ſuggeſted, he was a bad man becauſe of his afflictions, and and they exhorted him to repentance and reformation, and then promiſed him happineſs and proſperity upon it; which could not be expected, as appeared from the face of things in providence; ſince according to the above inſtances and proofs, wicked men enjoy proſperity, and good men had uſually a great ſhare of adverſity: ſeeing in your anſwers there remaineth falſhood; all their replies to Job were filled with theſe intimations and ſuggeſtions; that wicked men were only, and always afflicted; or if they were at any time in proſperity, it was but for a little while; that good men were ſeldom or never afflicted, at leaſt as Job was, or but a little afflicted, and for a little while: now Job had proved the contrary to all this, and therefore no conſolation could be hoped for from men that held ſuch tenets; comfort only ſprings from truth, and not falſhood; a man that ſpeaks the truths, or delivers out the truths of God's word, he ſpeaks to comfort and edification; but he that brings nothing but error and falſhood, can never be the means and inſtrument of true ſolid comfort to any. Job having thus fully proved his point, and confuted the notions of his friends, it might have been thought they would have ſat down in ſilence, and made no farther anſwer; but Eliphaz riſes up a third time, and makes a reply as follows.

[a] והוא & ipſe, Pagninus, Montanus, &c. [b] לקברות ad ſepulchra, V. L. Montanus, Vatablus, Druſius, Beza, Mercerus, Michaelis, Schultens; in ſepulcra, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator. [c] על גדיש ſuper acervo, Montanus, Codurcus; ſo Bolduciue, Mercerus. [d] Vid. David de Pomis Lexic. ſol. 14. 3.
[e] ישקוד feſtinabit, Pagninus; ſo ſome in Vatablus, and Ben Melech. [f] Vigilabit, V. L. Tigurine verſion, Montanus; vigilat, Michaelis, Schultens; erit tanquam vigil, Bolducius. [g] Vigilabitur, Beza; vigilatur, Coceius; ſo Calovius.

CHAP. XXII.

THIS chapter contains the third and laſt reply of Eliphaz to Job, in which he charges him with having too high an opinion of himſelf, of his holineſs and righteouſneſs, as if God was profited by it, and laid thereby under obligation to him, whereas he was not, ℣. 1—3. and as if he reproved and chaſtized him, becauſe of his fear of him, whereas it was becauſe of his ſins, ℣. 4, 5. an enumeration of which he gives, as of injuſtice, oppreſſion, cruelty to the poor, and even of atheiſm and infidelity, for which ſnares and fears were around him, and various calamities, ℣. 6—14. and compares his way and courſe of life to that of the men of the old world, and the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah, and ſuggeſts, that his end would be like theirs, unleſs he repented, ℣. 15—20. and then concludes with an exhortation to him to return to God by repentance, and to reform, when he ſhould ſee happy times again, and enjoy much outward and inward proſperity, and be an inſtrument of doing much good to many, ℣. 21—30.

℣. 1. Then Eliphaz the Temanite anſwered and ſaid.] As Eliphaz was the firſt that entered the liſts with Job, being perhaps the oldeſt man, and might be reckoned the wiſeſt, ſo he gives the lead in every courſe of diſputation; and here inſtead of replying to Job's arguments and inſtances, at which he was very angry, betakes himſelf to calumny and reproach, and to draw invidious conſequences, inſtead of making uſe of ſolid reaſons for conviction and confutation.

℣. 2. Can a man be profitable unto God? &c.] Eliphaz imagined that Job thought ſo, by his inſiſting ſo much on his integrity, and complaining of his afflictions; and that God was beholden to him for his holineſs and righteouſneſs, and that inſtead of afflicting him, ſhould have heaped honours and happineſs upon him; whereas there is not any thing a man can do, or does, by which God can be profited; which is a very great truth, though miſapplied to Job through a wrong conſtruction of his words and meaning. No man, even the beſt of men, and by the beſt things they can do, can be profitable to God; as for bad men, they are altogether unprofitable to themſelves, and to others, and ſtill leſs profitable to God; and as for good men, their goodneſs extendeth not to the Lord; it comes from him, it is his own previouſly; it is of no avail and advantage to him, who is perfect and all-ſufficient; when they have done all that they are commanded, they are bid to ſay, and very truly, we are unprofitable ſervants; they do indeed glorify God, and are the means of others glorifying him by their good works; but then they add no glory to him, which he had not before; they only declare the glory of God by the light of their grace and works, as the heavens and luminaries in them do by their light and luſtre; they worſhip God as they ought to do; but then he is not worſhipped by them as though he needed any thing of them; it is they, and not he, that get by worſhip; it is good for them, and they find their account in it, to draw near to him, and wait upon him, and worſhip him; what are all their prayers and praiſes to him? the benefit redounds to themſelves: ſome men are very ſerviceable to promote the intereſt of religion, either by their purſes, or by their gifts and talents, fitting for public uſefulneſs; but then, what do they give to God but what is his own? of thine own have we given thee, ſays David; or what do they do for him? it is for the good of themſelves, and others. Some are uſeful in the converſion of men to God, either by the public miniſtry of the word, or in private life by diſcourſe and converſation; but then the profit of all this is to men, and not unto God; there is nothing that a man can do, by which he can make God his debtor, or lay him under an obligation to him, which he would, if he could be profitable to him; but whatever he does, it is but his duty, and what God has a prior right unto; and therefore men can merit nothing at the hand of God, no not the leaſt mercy; it is by the grace of God a good man is what he is, and does what he does, ſee Pſ. xvi. 2. Luke xvii. 10. Acts xvii. 25. 1 Chron. xxix. 14. Rom. xi. 35, 36. the Targum paraphraſes it, can a man teach God? and ſo Mr. Broughton; ſee ch. xxi. 22. as he that is wiſe may be profitable unto himſelf? or though, or indeed, truly he that is wiſe, &c [h]. A man that is worldly wiſe, is profitable to himſelf and his family, by gathering wealth and riches; and a man that is wiſe, and has a large underſtanding of natural things, may be profitable to himſelf by enriching his mind with knowledge, increaſing the pleaſure of it, and getting credit and fame among men by it, and may be profitable to others by communicating his knowledge to them, ſee Prov. ix. 12. Eccl. vii. 11. and one that is ſpiritually wiſe, or has the true grace of God, and wiſdom in the hidden part, which is no other than real godlineſs, gets great gain; for godlineſs is that to him, and is profitable for all things, having the promiſe of the preſent and and future life; and he that has an intereſt in Chriſt, the wiſdom of God, is a happy man indeed, ſince he has that, the merchandize of which is better than ſilver, and the gain thereof than fine gold; one that is wiſe unto ſalvation, and is a wiſe profeſſor of religion, and walks wiſely and circumſpectly, has great advantages; he builds his ſalvation on the rock Chriſt, and is ſafe and ſure; he is concerned to have the oil of grace, with the lamp of a profeſſion, and ſo is always ready to meet the bridegroom; and being careful of his converſation, keeps his garments that his ſhame is not ſeen; and ſo a wiſe miniſter of the word, one that inſtructs[i], or gives inſtructions to others, as the word here ſignifies; or one that cauſes to underſtand, or is the means of cauſing men to underſtand, ſuch a man is profitable to himſelf, and to others, ſee Dan. xii. 3.

[h] כי immo, Beza; profecto, Schultens.

℣. 3. Is it any pleaſure to the Almighty that thou art righteous? &c.] It is not; the Lord indeed takes pleaſure in his people, not as ſinners, but as righteous; and as they are conſidered ſuch in Chriſt, he is well pleaſed for his righteouſneſs-ſake, and with it, being agreeable to his nature, will and law; and with his people in Chriſt, in whom they are accepted, having imputed the righteouſneſs of his Son unto them, and ſo they ſtand before him unblameable and irreproveable; and he takes pleaſure in the work of his own hands upon them, called the good pleaſure of his will, in the new man formed after his image in righteouſneſs and true holineſs, in the graces of his Spirit, and in the exerciſe of them, faith, hope, love, humility, fear of God, &c. it is a pleaſure to him to hear their prayers and praiſes, and to obſerve their ready and chearful obedience to his will; but then all this gives him no new pleaſure, or adds any thing to the complacency of his mind; he would have had as much delight and pleaſure within himſelf, if there had never been an holy angel in heaven, or a righteous man on earth; he has no ſuch pleaſure in either, as to be made more happy thereby, or ſo as to receive any gain or profit from it, as the next clauſe explains it. Some render it, that thou juſtifieſt thyſelf[k], or that thou art juſt, or ſeemeſt to be righteous to thyſelf[l]; a ſelf-righteous perſon is not pleaſing to God; it is no pleaſure to him when a man ſeeks for juſtification by his own works, or reckons them his righteouſneſs; the Publican that confeſſed his ſin was rather juſtified with God, than the Phariſee that applauded his own righteouſneſs; ſuch that are conceited of their own righteouſneſs, and deſpiſe others, are an offence to God, a ſmoke in his noſe, Iſ. lxv. 5. Luke xviii. 9, 14. for the righteouſneſs of ſuch is not real righteouſneſs in the account of God, and according to his law; it has only the ſhadow and appearance of one, but is not truly ſo; and beſides, to ſeek righteouſneſs this way, is going contrary to the revealed will of God, to the goſpel-ſcheme of juſtification by faith in Chriſt's righteouſneſs, without the works of the law, and is a ſetting aſide his righteouſneſs, and fruſtrating and making null and void the death of Chriſt, and therefore can never be pleaſing in the ſight of God: or is it gain to him that thou makeſt thy ways perfect? no man's ways are perfect before God, even the beſt of men have defects in their works, and failings in their walk and converſations: ſome mens ways are indeed clean in their own eyes, and perfect in their own conceit; and if Eliphaz thought Job ſuch an one, he was miſtaken, ſee ch. ix. 20. there are others, who are in a ſenſe unblameable in their walk and converſation; that is, are not guilty of any notorious crime, but exerciſe a conſcience void of offence towards God and man, walk in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameleſs; and yet this is no gain to God; for what does ſuch a man give to him? or what does he receive of his hands? ſee ch. xxxv. 7. This was indeed Job's caſe and character.

℣. 4. Will he reprove thee for fear of thee? &c.] That is, chaſtize, correct and afflict for fear that hurt ſhould be done unto him; no, he will not; for as the goodneſs of men does not profit him, the ſinfulneſs of men does not hurt him, ſee ch. xxxv. 6, 8. Kings and civil magiſtrates ſometimes chaſtize offenders, not only to do juſtice to them, but through fear of them, leaſt if ſpared, or connived at, they ſhould be hurtful to the ſtate, and overturn it; but though ſin is an act of hoſtility againſt God, and ſtrikes at his being and government, yet he is in no fear of being ruined or dethroned, or of having his government taken out of his hands, and therefore does not chaſtize men on that account: or for thy fear[m], for thy fear of God, thy piety; or for thy religion, as Mr. Broughton tranſlates the word. Job had often ſuggeſted that good men, ſuch that truly feared God, are afflicted by him, and therefore his own afflictions were no objection to his character, as a man that feared God, and eſchewed evil, ch. i. 1. and in this ſenſe Eliphaz uſes the word, ch. iv. 6. and here he intimates, as if according to the notion of Job, that God afflicted him, and other good men, becauſe they feared him, and which he obſerves as a great abſurdity; whereas, on the contrary, he chaſtized him for his ſins, as the following verſe ſhews; but tho' God does not afflict men for their goodneſs, but for ſins, yet they are only ſuch that fear him, and whom he loves, that he chaſtizes in a fatherly way, ſee Heb. xii. 6, 7. will he enter with thee into judgment? that is, will he in reverence to thee, out of reſpect to ſo great a perſon (ſpeaking ironically) in condeſcenſion to one of ſo much conſequence, will he regard thy requeſt, ſo often made, as to come into judgment with thee, and to admit of thy cauſe being pleaded before him, and to give the hearing of it, and decide the affair in controverſy? or rather, will he not plead againſt thee, and condemn thee for thy ſins, as follow? in this ſenſe it is to be deprecated, and not deſired, ſee Pſ. cxliii. 2.

℣. 5. Is not thy wickedneſs great? &c.] It muſt be owned it is, it cannot be denied. Indeed, the wickedneſs of every man's heart is great, it being deſperately wicked, full of ſin, abounding with it; out of it comes forth every thing that is bad, and the wickedneſs of actions is very great: ſome ſins are indeed greater than others, as thoſe againſt God, and the firſt table of the law are greater than thoſe againſt men, or the ſecond table; ſome are like crimſon and ſcarlet, are beams in the eye, whilſt others are comparatively as moats; yet all are great, as committed againſt God, and as they are breaches of his law; and eſpecially they appear ſo to ſenſible ſinners, to whom ſin is made exceeding ſinful; and they ſee and own themſelves to be the chief of ſinners, and as ſuch intreat for pardon on that account, ſee Pſ. xxv. 11. and thine iniquities infinite? ſtrictly ſpeaking, nothing is infinite finite but God; ſins may be ſaid in ſome ſenſe to be infinite, becauſe committed againſt an infinite God, and cannot be ſatisfied for by a finite creature, or by finite ſufferings, only through the infinite value of the blood of Chriſt; here it ſignifies, that his iniquities were innumerable [n], as ſome verſions, they were not to be reckoned up they were ſo many; or more literally, there is no end of thine iniquities [o]; there is no ſumming of them up; and it may denote his continuance in them; Eliphaz ſuggeſts, as if Job lived in ſin, and allowed himſelf in it, and was going on in a courſe of iniquity without end, which was very uncharitable; here he charges him in a general way, and next he deſcends to particulars.

[i] משכיל. [k] כי תצדק quod juſtifices te, Junius & Tremellius. [l] Quum juſtus es apud teipſum, Schmidt; quod tibi juſtus eſſe videris, Michaelis. [m] המיראתך an de religione tua, Junius & Tremellius; ob timorem tuum, ſo ſome in Druſius; num ob pietatem tuam, others in Michaelis.

℣. 6. For thou haſt taken a pledge from thy brother for nought, &c.] It can hardly be thought that it was for nothing at all, on no conſideration whatever, or that nothing was lent, for which the pledge was taken; but that it was a ſmall trifling ſum, and comparatively nothing, not to be ſpoken of; or it was borrowed for ſo ſhort a time, that there needed not any pledge for it; and it was unkind to take it, eſpecially of a brother, whether in nature, or in religion, whether a near kinſman, or friend, or neighbour. Some render the words, thou haſt taken thy brother, or brothers for a pledge [p]; them themſelves, their perſons, as a ſecurity for what was lent, in order to ſell them, and pay off the debt with the money, or detain them as bondmen till it was paid, 2 Kings iv. 1. Matt. xviii. 25. If Eliphaz ſaid this, and what follows, only as conjectures, as ſome think, or upon ſuppoſition, concluding from his afflictions that thoſe things, or ſomething like them, had been done by him; it is contrary to that charity that thinks no ill, and hopes the beſt; and if they are poſitive aſſertions of matters of fact, as they rather ſeem to be, delivered upon hear-ſay, and ſlender proof; it ſhews a readineſs to receive calumnies and falſe accuſations againſt his friend, and can ſcarcely be excuſed from the charge of bearing falſe teſtimony againſt him, ſince Job does in the moſt ſolemn manner deny thoſe things in ch. xxxi. and ſtripped the naked of their clothing; not ſuch as were ſtark naked, becauſe they have no clothes to be ſtripped of; but ſuch that were poorly clothed, ſcarce ſufficient to cover their nakedneſs, and preſerve them from the inclemencies of weather; theſe were ſtripped of their clothing, and being ſtripped, were quite naked and expoſed, which to do was very cruel and hard-hearted; perhaps it may reſpect the ſame perſons from whom the pledge was taken, and that pledge was their clothing, which was no uncommon thing, ſee Exod. xxii. 26. Deut. xxiv. 13.

℣. 7. Thou haſt not given water to the weary to drink, &c.] To a weary thirſty traveller, to whom in thoſe hot countries cold water was very refreſhing, and which in deſert places was not to be had in common, or any where; rich men were poſſeſſed of their wells and fountains, and were kept for their own uſe, and it was a kindneſs and favour to obtain water of them; and yet a cup of cold water is one of the leaſt favours to be given to a poor man, and to deny it him in diſtreſs was very inhuman, and was very far from Job's character: and thou haſt withholden bread from the hungry; bread, which ſtrengthens man's heart, and is the ſtaff of life, without which he cannot ſupport; and this is not to be withheld from, but given even to an enemy when hungry; and to deny it to a poor neighbour in ſuch circumſtances, is very cruel; the charge is, that Job would not give a poor hungry man a morſel of bread to eat; which muſt be falſe, being directly contrary to what he ſtrongly aſſerts, ch. xxxi. 17.

℣. 8. But as for the mighty man, he had the earth, &c.] A large ſhare and portion of it, which Job could not hinder him from the enjoyment of, becauſe mightier than he, or otherwiſe he would have done it; or Job was content he ſhould have what he had, and gave him more than what of right belonged to him; for when any cauſe came before him as a judge, or civil magiſtrate, between a rich man, and a poorer man, relating to a field, or piece of land, he always gave the cauſe to the rich and mighty, and ſo he had the land, as is ſuggeſted: and the honourable man dwelt in it; peaceably, quietly, and undiſturbed, tho' he had no juſt title to it; or the man accepted of face or countenance [q], who was reſpected becauſe of his outward circumſtances, wealth and riches, power and authority; and ſo Job is tacitly charged with being a reſpecter of perſons in judgment, which was not good; and in general theſe phraſes denote partiality in him, that he was favourable to the mighty and powerful, and unkind and cruel to the poor and needy. Some [r] underſtand all this of Job himſelf, that becauſe he was the mighty man, or man of arm's [s], he made uſe of his power and might, and ſtretched out his arm, and graſped and got into his poſſeſſion, by force and violence, the houſes, and lands, and eſtates of others, and became the greateſt man in all the eaſt, and the earth in a manner was his alone; and becauſe he was reſpected for his greatneſs and riches, he was confirmed therein, and dwelt ſecurely: or rather, taking the words in this ſenſe, they may be conſidered as an aggravation of Job's ſins, both before and after charged upon him; as that when he was the mighty and honourable man, and though he was ſuch, and had it in the power of his hands to do a great deal of good to the poor and needy; yet took a pledge from his indigent brother, ſtript thoſe that were almoſt naked, of their clothing, and would not give a poor weary traveller a cup of water, nor a morſel of bread to an hungry man; yea, abuſed his power and authority which he had, to the oppreſſion of the widow and fatherleſs, as in the following verſe.

℣. 9. Thou haſt ſent widows away empty, &c.] Either out of their own houſes, which he ſpoiled, and devoured, and ſtript, and cleared of all that were in them, as did the Scribes and Phariſees in Chriſt's time, Matt. xxiii. 14. or out of his own houſe, when they came to him, as a rich man, for charity; as they came to him wanting relief, they went away ſo; if without food and clothing, they were bid to depart without giving them any thing to feed and clothe them with; or if they came to him as a civil magiſtrate to have juſtice done them, and to be delivered out of the hands of their oppreſſors, they could not obtain any, but were diſmiſſed without it; how contrary is this to ch. xxix. 13. and xxxi. 16. and the arms of the fatherleſs have been broken; not in a literal ſenſe, as if when refuſing to go out, when their mothers, the widows had had their houſes ſpoiled, and they ſent empty out of them; theſe laid hold on ſomething within them, and would not depart, and ſo had their arms broken by the mighty man, the man of arms; but in a metaphorical and figurative ſenſe, their ſubſtance, and goods, and poſſeſſions, left them by their fathers for their ſupport, theſe were taken away from them, and ſo they were as impotent and helpleſs, as if their arms had been broken; or their friends on whom they relied for their ſuſtenance, theſe were either ruined, and ſo could not help them; or elſe their affections were alienated from them, and would not. This indeed is not expreſsly charged upon Job, but it is intimated, that it was done with his knowledge and conſent, good-will, and approbation; at leaſt that he connived at it, and ſuffered it to be done when it was in his power to have prevented it, and therefore to be aſcribed unto him; but how foreign is all this to Job's true character, ch. xxix. 12—17. and xxxi. 16—22?

[n] Ἀναρίθμητοι, Sept. [o] אין קץ לעונותיך non eſt finis iniquitatibus tuis, Pagninus, Montanus, &c. [p] החבל אחיך πιεχυραζες τες αδελφες σε, Sept. capies in pignus fratres tuos, Montanus. [q] נשוא פנים acceptus faciebus, Montanus; vel facie, Vatablus, Beza, Junius & Tremellius, Druſius, Mercerus. [r] Jarchi, Ramban, Bar Tzemach, Sephorno. [s] איש זרוע viro brachii, Pagninus, Montanus, Bolducius, Vatablus, Druſius, &c.

℣. 10. Therefore ſnares are round about thee, &c.] Not what occaſion ſin, draw into it, and iſſue in it, as inward corruptions, the temptations of Satan, and the things of this world, but puniſhments; becauſe of the above ſins charged upon Job, therefore evils, calamities, and diſtreſſes of various kinds came upon him, beſet him, and encompaſſed him all around, ſo that there was no way left for him to eſcape; it may refer to the Sabæans and Chaldeans ſeizing on his cattle, and carrying them away; to the fire that fell from heaven upon his ſheep, and conſumed them; to the great wind that blew down the houſe in which his children were, and deſtroyed them; and to the boils and ulcers that were all over his body: and ſudden fear troubleth thee; thoſe things, at leaſt ſome of them, were what he feared, and they came ſuddenly upon him, and gave him great trouble and diſtreſs, ch. iii. 25. and iv. 5. and preſent fear frequently, on a ſudden, darted into his mind, and gave him freſh trouble, he was afraid of his preſent ſorrows, and of farther and future ones, ch. ix. 28. and perhaps Eliphaz might think he was afraid of hell and damnation, and of ſudden deſtruction from the Almighty coming upon him, ch. xxxi. 23. ſee Iſ. xxiv. 17, 18.

℣. 11. Or darkneſs, that thou canſt not ſee, &c.] &c.] Or darkneſs is round about thee, thou art enveloped in it; meaning either judicial blindneſs, and darkneſs, and ſtupidity of mind, which muſt be his caſe, if he could not ſee the hand of God upon him, or the ſnares that were about him, or was not troubled with ſudden fear; or elſe the darkneſs of affliction and calamity, which is often ſignified hereby, ſee Iſ. viii. 22. Lam. iii. 1, 2. afflictive diſpenſations of providence are ſometimes ſo dark, that a man cannot ſee the cauſe and reaſon of them, or why it is he is brought into them; which was Job's caſe, and therefore deſires God would ſhew him wherefore he contended with him, ch. x. 2: nor can he ſee, perceive, or enjoy any light of comfort; he is in inward darkneſs of ſoul, deprived of the light of God's countenance, as well as he is in the outward darkneſs of adverſity, which is a moſt uncomfortable caſe, as it was this good man's; nor can he ſee any end of the affliction, or any way to eſcape out of it, and which were the preſent circumſtances Job was in: and abundance of waters cover thee; afflictions, which are frequently compared to many waters, and floods of them, becauſe of the multitude of them, their force and ſtrength, the power and rapidity with which they come; and becauſe over-flowing, overbearing, and over-whelming, and threaten with utter ruin and deſtruction, unleſs ſtopped by the mighty hand of God, who only can reſiſt and reſtrain them; Eliphaz repreſents Job like a man drowning, over-flowed with a flood of water, and covered with its waves, and in the moſt deſperate condition, ſee Pſ. lxix. 1, 2.

℣. 12. Is not God in the height of heaven, &c.] The heaven is high, it has its name from its height, and is noted for it; ſome of the heavens are higher than others, as the heaven of heavens, the third heaven, the habitation of angels and glorified ſaints; and here God dwells, this is the habitation of his holineſs, and the high and holy place he inhabits; his throne is in heaven, in the heaven of heavens is his throne, where he in an eſpecial manner manifeſts his glory, and the luſtre of it; he is not indeed confined here, the heaven of heavens cannot contain him, he is every where; yet this is his court and palace, where his reſidence and retinue be, and angels behold his face, and wait upon him; and becauſe this is the principal ſeat of his majeſty, it becomes one of his names, Dan. iv. 26. Luke xv. 18. and the words here will bear to be rendered, is not God the height of the heavens[t]? or, as the Vulgate Latin verſion, higher than the heavens? he is above them, more exalted than they, being the Creator of them, ſee Heb. vii. 26. and behold the height of the ſtars, how high they are; or the head or top of the ſtars[u], which Ben Gerſom interprets of the ſupreme orb, or that high and vaſt ſpace in which the fixed ſtars are, or the higheſt of them, which are at the greateſt diſtance; according to Mr. Huygens[w], a cannon-ball diſcharged would be 25 years in paſſing from the earth to the Sun, from Jupiter to the Sun 125 years, from Saturn 250, and from the Sun to the Dogſtar 691,600 years; and if therefore it would be ſo long going to the neareſt of the fixed ſtars, how great muſt be the diſtance of them from our earth, which are ſo much higher than the Dogſtar, as that is from the Sun? But, though theſe are ſo exceeding high, yet God is higher than they, ſee Iſ. xiv. 13, 14. the truth contained in theſe words, was what both Eliphaz and Job were agreed in, let them be ſpoken by which they will, ſome aſcribing them to the one, and ſome to the other; from whence Eliphaz repreſents Job drawing an inference very impious, blaſphemous and atheiſtical.

℣. 13. And thou ſayeſt, how doth God know? &c.] What is done on earth, the works of the children of men, their ſinful actions, when he dwells at ſuch a diſtance, and ſo remote from the earth, as the height of the ſtars, and higheſt heavens be; not that Job ſaid this expreſsly with his lips, but in his heart; Eliphaz imagined and ſuppoſed that ſuch was the reaſoning of his mind; it was an invidious conſequence he had drawn from what Job had ſaid concerning the afflictions of the godly, and the proſperity of the wicked; which he interpreted as a denial of the providence of God, as if he had no regard to human affairs, but things took took place in a very diſorderly and confuſed way, without any regard to right or wrong; and he concluded, that Job was led into theſe ſentiments by the conſideration of the diſtance of God from the earth; that dwelling in the higheſt heavens, he could not, and did not ſee what was done here, and therefore men might commit all manner of ſin with impunity; that their ſins would never be taken notice of, or they be called to an account for them; which are the very language and ſentiments of the moſt abandoned of men, ſee Pſ. x. 11, 14. and lxxiii. 11, 12. and xciv. 5—10. Ezek. ix. 9. can he judge through the dark clouds? if he can't ſee and know what is done, he can't judge of it, whether it is good or bad, and ſo can neither juſtify nor condemn an action. By the dark cloud is not meant the matter, or corporal maſs, with which man is covered, as a Jewiſh commentator [x] interprets it; rather the cloudy air, or atmoſphere around us; or that thick darkneſs in which Jehovah dwells, clouds and darkneſs being around him, Pſ. xcvii. 2. but all this hinders not his ſight of things done here below; what is thick darkneſs to us, is pure light to him, in which alſo he is ſaid to dwell, and with which he covers himſelf as with a garment; and the darkneſs and the light are both alike to him, he can ſee and judge through the one as well as the other.

[t] גבה שמים ſublimitas cœlorum, Bolducius; altitudo cœli, Michaelis; altitudo cœlorum, Schultens. [u] ראש כוכבים caput ſtellarum, Montanus, Bolducius, Mercerus, Cocceius; verticem ſtellarum, V. L. Tigurine verſion, Michaelis, Schultens. [w] Coſmotheoros, l. 2. p. 125, 137.

℣. 14. Thick clouds are a covering to him that he ſeeth not, &c.] Thus Job is made to ſpeak, or to reaſon as atheiſtical perſons, or ſuch who are enclined to atheiſm would, who take God to be altogether ſuch an one as themſelves; as that becauſe thick clouds hide objects, as the ſun, and moon, and ſtars, from their ſight, therefore they muſt hide men and their actions from the ſight of God; whereas there is nothing between God and man to hide them from him, let them be what they will, clouds as thick and as dark as can be imagined, yet his eyes are upon the ways of man, and ſees all his goings, nor is there any darkneſs that can hide from him, ch. xxxiv. 21, 22. and he walketh in the circuit of heaven; within which he keeps himſelf, and never looks down upon the earth, or takes any notice of what is done there; quite contrary to Pſ. xiv. 3. and xxxiii. 13, 14. as if he only took his walks through the ſpacious orb of heaven, and delighted himſelf in viewing the celeſtial manſions, and the furniture of them, but had no regard to any thing below them; whereas, though he walks in the circuit of heaven, he alſo ſits upon the circle of the earth, Iſ. xl. 22. Eliphaz ſeems here to aſcribe the ſentiments, perhaps of the Zabians in former times, to Job, and ſince adopted by ſome philoſophers; that God only regards the heavenly bodies, and ſupports them in their beings, and regulates and directs their motions, and leaves all things below to be governed and influenced by them, as judging it unworthy of him to be concerned with things on earth. Indeed the earth, and the inhabitants of it, are unworthy of his notice, and care, and of his providential viſits, but he does humble himſelf to look upon things on earth as well as in heaven, Pſ. viii. 4. and cxiii. 6. to make Job reaſon after this Epicurean manner, was doing great injuſtice to his character, who moſt firmly believed both the Being and Providence of God, and that as extending to all things here below, ſee ch. xii. 13—25.

℣. 15. Haſt thou marked the old way which wicked men have trodden?] The evil way that wicked men have walked in ever ſince man apoſtatized from God, the way of Cain and his deſcendants, who were of the wicked one, and lived wicked lives and converſations; the way of the old world, as Mr. Broughton renders the phraſe here, the imagination of the thoughts of whoſe hearts was evil, and that continually; who filled the earth with rapine and violence, and all fleſh corrupted their way with all manner of impurity and wickedneſs, and indulged themſelves in the gratification of their ſenſual luſts, and pleaſures; and were, as the apoſtle Peter calls them, the world of the ungodly; and here, men of wickedneſs, or iniquity [y]; ſuch who gave themſelves up to it, and were immerſed in it; theſe trod the paths of ſin, and made it a beaten road; they frequented this way, they walked continually in it; their life was a ſeries and courſe of iniquity, in which they obſtinately perſiſted, and proceeded from evil to evil, to more and more ungodlineſs. Now Job is aſked if he had marked this their way and courſe of life; the evil of their way ſhould have been marked, in order to avoid it; it being an old way, ſhould not recommend it; and the end of it, which was ſudden ruin and deſtruction, ſhould be marked to deter from it: but it is ſuggeſted, that Job kept in this way, and obſerved it himſelf, and walked in it; for the words may be rendered, truly thou keepeſt the old way, or the way of the world [z]; trod in the ſteps of wicked men, was a cloſe follower of them, and companied with them; in like manner is Job charged by Elihu, ch. xxxiv. 7, 8. and this ſenſe agrees with what goes before.

℣. 16. Which were cut down out of time, &c.] Sent out of time into eternity, time being no more with men, and they no longer in time, when death ſeizes upon them; or before time [a], before the common term of life, which according to the courſe of nature, and human probability, they might have arrived unto: as this is ſpoken of the men of the old world that lived before the flood, when the lives of men were very long; it is highly probable there were many that were deſtroyed by the general deluge, who had it not been for that, might have lived many hundreds of years according to the uſual courſe: or without time [b], without any delay, ſuddenly, at once, at an unawares; for though they had notice of the flood, they did not regard it, but lived careleſs and ſecure; and it came upon them without any farther warning, and ſwept them away, when they were cut down, as trees by the ax laid to the root of them, to which wicked men in great power, and flouriſhing circumſtances are ſometimes compared, Pſ. xxxvii. 35, 36. or like graſs by the ſcythe, which it is not able to reſiſt, and to which all men are like for their numbers and weakneſſes, and who are cut down by death as eaſily as the graſs is by the mower, ſee Pſ. xxxvii. 1, 2. and xc. 5, 6. Some render it wrinkled [c], as in ch. xvi. 8. as bodies when dead are, and eſpecially ſuch as are drowned, and have been long floating in the water, as thoſe that periſhed by the flood were, for to ſuch the words have reſpect, as appears by what follows: whoſe foundation was overflown with a flood; either of water, or of fire and brimſtone, as Jarchi obſerves; the former is moſt likely to be meant; for by the flood, or univerſal verſal deluge, all that was thought firm and permanent, and might be called a foundation, was overflown and carried away, as houſes, goods, furniture, wealth and riches, and every thing that men had a dependance upon for the ſupport and comfort of life; yea, the earth itſelf, on which they dwelt, and was reckoned terra firma, this being founded upon, and over the waters; or, as the apoſtle Peter deſcribes it, it ſtanding out of the water and in the water, 2 Pet. iii. 5, 6. or their foundation was a flood poured out[d]; what they thought were ſolid, and firm, and durable, and built their hopes of happineſs upon, were like a flood of water, poured, diſſipated and ſcattered, and which diſappeared and came to nothing: and ſuch is every foundation that a man builds his hope, eſpecially of eternal happineſs upon, ſhort of Chriſt, the only ſure foundation laid in Zion, his perſon, grace, blood, and righteouſneſs; every thing elſe, let it ſeem ever ſo firm, is as ſand, yea as water, as a flood of water that ſpreads itſelf, and quickly comes to nothing.

[x] Peritzol. [y] מתי און viri iniquitatis, Montanus, Mercerus; ſo Druſius, Michaelis. תישמור profecto viam ſeculi ſervas, Schultens. [z] הלא רח עולם [a] ולא עת ante tempus tuum, V. L. Mercerus; ante tempus, Cocceius, Schultens. [b] Sine mora, Cocceius; in momento, Codurcus. [c] קמטו corrugati ſunt, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Bolducius, Cocceius.

℣. 17. Which ſaid unto God, depart from us, &c.] Chuſing not to be admoniſhed of their ſins, nor be exhorted to repentance for them, nor be inſtructed by him in the way of their duty, nor to attend the worſhip and ordinances of God, nor be under his rule and government; the ſame is obſerved by Job of wicked men, but to a different purpoſe; he makes this to be the language of ſuch who were in very proſperous circumſtances, and continued in them, notwithſtanding their impiety; here by this Eliphaz deſcribes ſuch perſons who were cut off, and deſtroyed for their wickedneſs, ſee ch. xxi. 14. and what can the Almighty do for them? that is, for us; for theſe are either the words of the wicked continued, being ſo ſelf-ſufficient, and full of good things, having as much, or more than heart can wiſh, that they ſtood in no need of any thing from God; nor could they imagine they ſhould receive any profit and advantage from him, by liſtening to his inſtructions, or obeying his will; they had ſuch low and mean thoughts of God, that he would neither do them good nor evil; they expected no good from him, and feared no ill at his hands; they aſcribed all the good things they had to their own care, induſtry, and diligence; and when any ill befel them, they attributed it to chance, and ſecond cauſes, thinking nothing of God: as theſe are the words of Eliphaz, they may be rendered, what has the Almighty done to them, or againſt them[e]? what injury has he done them, or ill-will has he ſhown them, that they ſhould treat him in ſo contemptuous a manner? ſo far from it, that he has beſtowed abundance of good things on them, as follows, ſee Jer. ii. 5.

℣. 18. Yet he filled their houſes with good things, &c.] With temporal good things, with this world's good, with plenty of providential goodneſs; earthly enjoyments are good things in themſelves, and in their effects, when rightly uſed, and theſe wicked men have their ſhare of; this is their portion, they have their good things in this life, and a large abundance of them oftentimes; their hearts are filled with food, and ſhould be with gladneſs and thankfulneſs; their bellies are filled with hidden treaſures; their out-houſes with corn and wheat, and ſuch like fruits of the earth; their ſhops with all manner of goods; their dwelling-houſes with gold and ſilver, with rich furniture, and all precious ſubſtance; and all this is from God, every good gift comes from him; the earth is full of his goodneſs; though theſe men ſay, what can the Almighty do for them? this ſhows, that what they have they are not deſerving of; and what is beſtowed upon them is not from any merit in them, but according to the ſovereign will and pleaſure of God; and this is an aggravation of their wickedneſs, that notwithſtanding he has loaded them with his benefits, and indulged them with ſuch a plenty of good things, yet they ſpurn at him, rebel againſt him, and bid him depart from them; which conduct of theirs, Eliphaz expreſſes his abhorrence of: but the counſel of the wicked is far from me; ſuch impious reaſonings, and wicked practices, he was far from juſtifying; he had them in the utmoſt deteſtation, and could not but abhor ſuch vile ingratitude; he makes uſe of Job's words, ch. xxi. 16. which he thought he could do to better purpoſe, and with greater ſincerity.

℣. 19. The righteous ſee it, and are glad, &c.] Not the counſel of the wicked, nor their outward proſperity, but their ruin and deſtruction, which is ſure and certain; though it may ſometimes ſeem to linger, it is often public and viſible to the view of every man, being made public examples, ſee Pſ. xci. 8. and which is matter of joy and gladneſs to truly good and righteous men; who have the righteouſneſs of Chriſt on them, his grace in them, and in conſequence of that live ſoberly, righteouſly and godly; theſe rejoice at the vengeance of God on wicked men, Pſ. lii. 5, 6, 7. and lviii. 10. not that the miſery of their fellow-creatures is pleaſing to them as ſuch; this would be brutiſh and inhuman, as well as contrary to the grace of God, and to their character as good men, and alſo would be diſpleaſing to God, Prov. xxiv. 17, 18. but partly becauſe they themſelves, through the grace and goodneſs of God, have been kept from ſuch ſins as bring to ruin and deſtruction; and partly becauſe they are delivered out of the hands of theſe wicked men, who were diſtreſſing to them; and chiefly becauſe of the glory of the divine perfections, particularly the holineſs and juſtice of God diſplayed herein; for God is known and glorified by the judgments which he executeth, ſee Pſ. ix. 16. Rev. xviii. 20. and xix. 1, 2, 3. and the innocent laugh them to ſcorn; ſuch as are upright and ſincere, live holy and harmleſs lives and converſations, tho' not entirely free from ſin; theſe deride them for their impieties, and obſerve to them the juſtneſs of the divine judgments upon them. The Jewiſh writers, many of them[f], reſtrain theſe words to Noah and his ſons, who ſaw with their eyes the flood that deſtroyed the world of the ungodly, and rejoiced at it, and had them in their turn in deriſion, who had made a mock at Noah's building of the ark, and at his exhortations to them; but tho' the characters of righteous and innocent agree with Noah, who was juſt and perfect in his generation, yet not with all his ſons; and it is beſt to underſtand this of good men in general; though it muſt be obſerved and owned, that the deſtruction of the wicked by the flood, is before ſpoken of, and their character deſcribed. The word ſaying is by ſome ſupplied at the cloſe of this verſe, and ſo the following words are what the righteous are repreſented as ſaying, upon ſight of the deſtruction of the wicked.

℣. 20.

[d] נהר יוצק יסודם fundamentum eorum ut flumen diffluxit, Tigurine verſion; fluvius effuſus fundamentum eorum, Codurcus, Beza; to the ſame ſenſe Druſius, Mercerus, Cocceius, Schultens. [e] ומה יפעל שדי למו & quid fecerat omnipotens illis? Piſcator. [f] Aben Ezra, Ben Gerſom, Sephorno, & alii.

℣. 20. Whereas our ſubſtance is not cut down, &c.] As your's is; Noah and his family were preſerved in the ark, and the creatures with him, and ſufficient ſuſtenance was laid up for them all, when every thing relating to the wicked was deſtroyed: but this may be thought too reſtrictive, as well as what follows too ſubtle, that this ſhould reſpect the human ſpecies not being cut down and utterly deſtroyed in the flood, but preſerved in and reſtored by Noah and his family; it may perhaps be thought better to interpret theſe words as the words of Eliphaz and his friends, joining with the righteous and the innocent, putting themſelves in their number, and rejoicing with them at the deſtruction of the wicked, and as having a particular regard to Job's caſe, and the difference between him and them; his ſubſtance being cut down, and he ſtripped of all; whereas they were not deprived of their's, but it continued with them, and they in the full poſſeſſion of it; the reaſon of which difference was, he was a wicked man, and they righteous and innocent; but by others, who alſo take them to be the words of the righteous triumphing over the wicked, they are rendered thus; is not he cut off that roſe up againſt us[s]? Our enemy and adverſary, he is no more, he can do us no more hurt, and we are delivered out of his hand: but the remnant of them the fire conſumes; which Aben Ezra, Ben Gerſom, and others, interpret of the deſtruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the other cities, by fire; which would have had ſome appearance of truth, if the deſtruction had been of the whole world, and as general as the flood was, or more ſo, and had cleared the world of the remnant of the ungodly, whereas it was only of a few cities: rather it may be, Eliphaz glances at the caſe of Job, as different from him and his friends, that when their ſubſtance was untouched, the remnant of Job's was conſumed by fire; what were left by the Chaldeans and Sabeans, were deſtroyed by fire from heaven; though if it could be thought that Eliphaz had knowledge of the general conflagration at the laſt day, and had that in view, it would afford a better ſenſe; but it may be he does not mean material, but metaphorical fire, the fire of divine wrath, which will conſume the wicked, root and branch, and leave them nothing.

℣. 21. Acquaint now thyſelf with him, and be at peace, &c.] Not with the righteous and innocent, but with God, as the following verſes ſhew: from ſevere charges and cenſures, Eliphaz proceeds to advice and exhortations, and ſeems to be in a better temper, and to talk in a more kind and gentle manner, only he goes upon a falſe ſuppoſition and miſtaken notion, that Job was a bad man; had he had a proper object to have directed his diſcourſe to, it would have been excellently ſaid; and as it is, it is not without its uſe: this firſt exhortation ſuppoſes unacquaintance with God, and an eſtrangedneſs from him; which is the caſe of every man from the womb, and in a ſtate of nature and unregeneracy. Acquaintance with God begins at converſion, when he is made known, not only as the God of nature and providence, but as the God of grace and peace in Chriſt; and it is carried on by prayer, which, is a converſe with God, and by attendance on his worſhip and ordinances, in which men walk before him, and have fellowſhip with him: this is ſometimes interrupted and dropped for a while, through temptation or ſin; when there ariſes on account thereof, a ſhyneſs and backwardneſs to draw nigh unto God, until he calls and invites them to take with them words, and return unto him; an acquaintance with God is not kept up when prayer before him is reſtrained; which Eliphaz charges Job with, ch. xv. 4. and, when ſaints forſake the aſſembling of themſelves together, or neglect public worſhip, or grow indifferent to it; and it is renewed again by prayer, and a freſh attendance on the above things; in which frequent viſits are made between God and his people, mutual ſecrets communicated, a holy freedom, familiarity, and boldneſs contracted, and communion with God enjoyed: men may alſo acquaint themſelves with him yet more and more by the contemplation of his works, by reading and hearing his word, and by converſation with good men, miniſters, and others. The Jewiſh commentators[h] generally interpret it, uſe or accuſtom thyſelf with him, to walk in his ways, and obſerve his commands: and be at peace; not make his peace with God, which a creature cannot do; only Job's living Redeemer could do that, and he has done it; but be eaſy and ſtill under the afflicting hand of God, quietly ſubmit to it, and patiently endure it, and not murmur at it; or, as Aben Ezra interprets it, as a promiſe of God, thou ſhalt be in peace, or thou ſhalt have peace; all outward proſperity and happineſs, which is often ſignified by this word; or inward peace of mind, which comes from God, and through an acquaintance with him, and from Chriſt, his blood, righteouſneſs, and ſacrifice, by whom the acquaintance with God is opened and maintained; and it is had in a way of duty, in attendance on the ordinances of God, which are paths of peace; and alſo eternal peace hereafter, when acqaintance with God will be no more dropped, nor interrupted, but continue for ever: thereby good ſhall come unto thee; temporal good things, neceſſary and convenient, the promiſe of which is annexed to godlineſs, or an acquaintance with God; ſpiritual good things, the bleſſings of grace, all things pertaining to life and godlineſs, and eternal good things; that far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, which afflictions peaceably and patiently borne, work for, and bring unto.

℣. 22. Receive, I pray thee, the law from his mouth, &c.] Not the law of Moſes; for it is a queſtion whether that was as yet, or could come to the knowledge of Job; rather any doctrine, as the word ſignifies, any revelation of the mind and will of God, made unto the patriarchs in former times, and which was handed down from one to another, and was to be received as coming from the mouth of God, not as the word of man, but as the word of God; and as ſuch to be received with meekneſs and and reverence, with readineſs, chearfulneſs, and gladneſs; and not only to be attended to but obeyed: and lay up his words in thine heart; as a rich treaſure, very valuable, and preferable to gold, ſilver, and precious ſtones, laid up in cheſts and cabinets becauſe of their value, and that they might not be loſt, but be preſerved ſafe and ſure, and that they might be come at, and made uſe of on proper occaſions; as the words of God and doctrines of the ſcriptures may be, againſt the temptations of Satan, the luſts of the fleſh, and for the inſtruction of ourſelves and others; and therefore ſhould be retained in our minds, hid in our hearts, and dwell richly in us; and, unleſs they are in the heart, and have a place there, they will be of little avail to have them in the head or on the tongue; but

[s] אם לא נכחד קימנו annon exſcinditur qui inſurgit contra nos, Schmidt, Michaelis.

[h] Ben Gerſom, Bar Tzemach.

[h] Aben Ezra, 3

but if they come with power into the heart, and have a place there, they work effectually, and influence the life and converſation: theſe Job had, and had a great value for them; ſee ch. vi. 10. and xxiii. 12.

℣. 23. If thou return to the Almighty, &c.] Which ſuppoſes a departure from him; and that is by ſinning againſt him, which ſhould be repented of, confeſſed, and pardoning grace and mercy be implored, by all thoſe that have back-ſlidden, and return to God; to which they are encouraged by his being the Almighty, who has power to forgive ſins, alſo to cauſe all grace to abound, and to ſave to the uttermoſt; he is not a God that is prayed and returned to, that cannot ſave, or whoſe hand is ſhortened, or his ear heavy; the word is ſhaddai, which ſignifies, who is ſufficient, all-ſufficient; whoſe grace is ſufficient to reſtore and receive back-ſliders, pardon their ſins, accept their perſons, ſupply their wants, and preſerve them ſafe to his kingdom and glory: thou ſhalt be built up; reſtored to his former happineſs, have all his breaches repaired and made up; his body, which was like a building out of repair and dropping down, become hale and healthful; his family, which was in a ruinous condition, being deprived of his children as well as ſubſtance, be increaſing again through a like number of children; by which means families are built up, Ruth iv. 16. and by having a large affluence of good things, abundantly greater than he had before; and alſo in a ſpiritual ſenſe, be edified, and built up in his ſoul, through the light of God's countenance, the diſcoveries of his love, the comforts of his ſpirit, an application of precious promiſes, and divine truths, and a communication of grace, and the bleſſings of it: thou ſhalt put away iniquity far from thy tabernacle; not commit it himſelf, nor connive at it in others, nor ſuffer it in his family, ſuggeſting, as if he had ſo done in times paſt; or remove men of iniquity, wicked men, from his houſe, and not allow them to dwell there; though rather this ſeems to be ſpoken by way of promiſe, and as an encouragement to return to the Almighty; upon which all evils and calamities, the effects of ſin and iniquity, ſhould be removed from his houſe, and the apartments of it, they were now full of.

℣. 24. Then ſhalt thou lay up gold as duſt, &c.] Have ſuch plenty of it, as not to be counted: and the gold of Ophir as the ſtones of the brooks; which was reckoned the beſt, probably in Arabia; not in the Eaſt and Weſt-Indies, which were not known to Job; though ſome take this to be an exhortation to deſpiſe riches, and as a diſſuaſion from covetouſneſs, rendering the words, put gold upon the duſt, or earth [i]; and trample upon it, as a thing not eſteemed by thee, as Sephorno interprets it; make no more account of it than of the duſt of the earth; let it be like dirt unto thee, and among the ſtones of the brooks, Ophir [k]; that is, the gold of Ophir, reckon no more of it, though the choiceſt gold, than the ſtones of the brook; or thus, put gold for duſt, and the gold of Ophir for the flint of the brooks [l]; eſteem it no more than the duſt of the earth, or a flint-ſtones; the latter clauſe I ſhould chuſe rather to render, and for a flint the rivers of Ophir, or the golden rivers, from whence the gold of Ophir was; and it is notorious from hiſtorians, as Strabo [m] and others, that gold is taken out of rivers; and eſpecially from the writers of the hiſtory of the Weſt-Indies [n].

℣. 25. Yea, the Almighty ſhall be thy defence, &c.] In temporal things, ſecure the plenty of gold and ſilver poſſeſſed of; ſurround and protect by his providence, that there ſhall be no danger of the Sabeans and Chaldeans, or others, breaking in and ſtealing it away; and in ſpirituals, preſerve from all enemies, ſin, Satan, and the world; be a wall of fire about him, his fortreſs, his tower, and place of defence; or keep him as in a garriſon, thro' faith unto ſalvation; or, as others render the words, and let the Almighty be, or he ſhall be thy gold, or golds [o]; all thy gold, the ſame word being uſed, as in the preceding verſe; treat earthly riches, gold and ſilver, with contempt, and reckon God to be thy trueſt riches; eſteem him as gold, and more precious than that, and put thy confidence in him; his grace is compared to gold, for its luſtre, value, and duration, and is more precious than gold that periſheth, Rev. iii. 18. 1 Pet. i. 7. the righteouſneſs of Chriſt is, for its excellency, called the gold of Ophir, and cloathing of wrought gold, Pſ. xlv. 9. 13. and he himſelf is much more precious than the gold of Ophir, and the gain that comes by him, than fine gold, Cant. v. 11. Prov. iii. 14, 15. the doctrines of the grace of God are comparable to gold, ſilver, and precious ſtones; yea, to be preferred unto them, 1 Cor. iii. 12. Pſ. xix. 11. and cxix. 72. Prov. viii. 10. God is inſtead of all riches to his people; and they that have an intereſt in him, ſhare in the riches of grace, and are entitled to the riches of glory; all are theirs: and thou ſhalt have plenty of ſilver; or God ſhall be, or let him be to thee ſilver of ſtrength [p]; or inſtead of ſilver, which is the ſtrength of men, in which they confide for buſineſs or war; but God is to his people infinitely more than what ſilver or gold can be to them.

℣. 26. For then ſhalt thou have thy delight in the Almighty, &c.] In the perfections of his nature, in the works of his hands, in his word and worſhip, in communion with him, and in the relation he ſtands in to his people as their covenant-God and father; this would be the caſe when Job ſhould be more and better acquainted with God, and with the law or doctrine of his mouth, and the words of his lips, and ſhould return unto him with his whole heart; and when his affections ſhould be taken off of all earthly riches; when he ſhould look upon gold as duſt, and the gold of Ophir as the ſtones of the brook, and God ſhould be to him his gold and his ſilver; then and not till then could he have true delight and complacency in God: and ſhalt lift up thy face unto God; in prayer, as Sephorno interprets it, with an holy confidence, boldneſs, and chearfulneſs; as a believer in Chriſt may, having on his righteouſneſs, and having his heart ſprinkled from an evil conſcience by his blood; ſuch a one can appear before God, and lift up his face to him, as without ſpot, ſo without confuſion, ſhame, and bluſhing, without a load of guilt upon him, without fear of wrath or puniſhment, and of being repulſed; ſee ch. xi. 15.

℣. 27.

[i] ושית על עפר בצר pone aurum ſuper pulverem, Codurcus; in pulvere aurum, Cocceius; abjice humi aurum, Beza; ſo Grotius. [k] ובציר נחוליכם אפיר & inter ſaxa torrentium Ophir, Codurcus. [l] Pro rupe aurum Ophirinum, Junius & Tremellius; ſo Schultens. [m] Geograph. l. 11. p. 344. [n] Pet. Martyr. Decad. 3. l. 4. [o] בצריך lectiſſimum aurum tuum, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator; ſo Vatablus, Schmidt, Schultens; ſo R. Sol. Urbin. Ohel Moed, fol. 23. 2. [p] וכסף תועפות לך & argentum fortitudinum tibi, Montanus, Cocceius, Schmidt.

℣. 27. Thou ſhalt make thy prayer unto him, &c.] To God, and him only; for not a creature, angels or men, are to be prayed to; and this is to be done in a ſupplicating, intreating way, as the word ſignifies; not pleading merit but mercy, not preſenting prayers and ſupplications for a man's own righteouſneſs-ſake, but for the Lord's mercy's-ſake, and for the ſake of Chriſt and his righteouſneſs; and prayer is to be made in this manner frequently, to be multiplied, as the word alſo ſignifies; prayer ſhould be made always, and without ceaſing; and this is not only a duty, but a privilege; and as ſuch is it here obſerved, even as a benefit and bleſſing to be enjoyed; as it is when a man can come to God as his father through Chriſt the mediator, with boldneſs and confidence, in the faith of him, and to God as on a throne of grace, where he may find grace and mercy to help him in time of need, and eſpecially it is ſo when attended with the ſucceſs following: and he ſhall hear thee; as he does hear thoſe that pray to him in the name of Chriſt, in the exerciſe of faith, and in the ſincerity and uprightneſs of their hearts; and anſwers their requeſts, fulfils their deſires, and gives them what they aſk of him; for he is a God hearing prayer, and ſooner or later, in his own time and way, grants the petitions of his people: and thou ſhalt pay thy vows; the ſacrifices of praiſe and thankſgiving which he promiſed to offer up to God, ſhould he grant him the deſires of his heart; and theſe being granted, he would be laid under obligation to perform his promiſes; ſo that this alſo is to be conſidered as a benefit and bleſſing; for it does not ſo much regard the payment of vows, as it is deſigned to obſerve to him, that he ſhould have that done for him which would be a ſufficient ground and reaſon for paying his vows, or making good what he promiſed in the time of his diſtreſs; ſince what he then requeſted, and was the condition of his vow, ſhould now be granted; ſee Pſ. lvi. 12, 13. and lxvi. 13, 14.

℣. 28. Thou ſhalt alſo decree a thing, and it ſhall be eſtabliſhed unto thee, &c.] Strictly ſpeaking this is only true of God, whoſe decrees are unfruſtrable, whoſe counſel ſhall ſtand, and the thoughts of his heart be eſtabliſhed to all generations; and frequently ſo it is, according to an uſual ſaying, man appoints, but God diſappoints: this may be underſtood of Job, either as a civil magiſtrate, that he ſhould decree a thing in a court of judicature with ſo much wiſdom and equity, that it ſhould ſtand firm and ſure, and, though made on earth, ſhould be ratified in heaven, as the decrees and doctrines of the apoſtles of Chriſt are ſaid to be, Matt. xvi. 19. ſee Prov. viii. 15. or, as a private man in civil affairs, ſignifying that he ſhould be ſo guided by the Lord, and proſpered and ſucceeded in all his ways and works; that what he determined to do, and formed a ſcheme for the execution of, it ſhould be brought about and confirmed; he committing his ways to the Lord, his thoughts ſhould be eſtabliſhed, or his purpoſes and deſigns effected, ſee Pſ. i. 3. Prov. xvi. 3. or rather as a praying man; and ſo it agrees with what goes before, that he ſhould lift up his face to God, and pray unto him with ſucceſs, and have juſt occaſion to praiſe him, or pay his vows to him, ſince he ſhould have the deſires of his heart; whatever was upon his mind, and he prayed in faith for, he ſhould have it; as Elias prayed, both that it might not rain, and that it might rain, and both were according to his word, or the decree of his lips in prayer; ſee 1 Kings xvii. 1. Jam. v. 17, 18. and the light ſhall ſhine upon thy ways; which is the reaſon of all things proſpering and ſucceeding, and being eſtabliſhed according to his wiſh and will; the light of grace ſhining in him, to put him upon, and inſtruct him in denying and avoiding that which is ſinful, and doing that which was juſt and good; and the light of the word without him, being a light unto his feet, and a lamp to his paths, to guide and direct him, and eſpecially the light of God's favour and bleſſing on him, ſucceeding him in all his ways and works, and making them proſperous.

℣. 29. When men are caſt down, &c.] Wicked men are brought down from a ſtate of proſperity to a ſtate of adverſity, are in low circumſtances, great ſtraits and difficulties: then thou ſhalt ſay, there is lifting up; that is, for himſelf and his; when others are in adverſity, he ſhould be in proſperity; when others are caſt down, into a very low eſtate, and diſtreſſed condition, he ſhould be exalted to a very high eſtate, and be in affluent circumſtances, ſee Pſ. cxlvii. 6. or elſe the ſenſe is, when thou and thine, and what belong to thee, are humbled and brought low, then thou mayeſt promiſe thyſelf a reſtoration and change for the better; and boldly ſay, they will be lifted up, and raiſed up again, ſince God's uſual method is to exalt the humble, and to abaſe the proud, Luk. xiv. 11. or rather, this may reſpect the benefit and advantage that humble perſons would gain by Job, and his prayers for them, and may be rendered and interpreted thus; when they have humbled[q] themſelves, and bowed themſelves low at thy feet, and eſpecially before God; then thou ſhalt ſay; pray unto God for them, that there may be a lifting up, raiſing them up out of their low eſtate, and thou ſhalt be heard: and he ſhall ſave the humble perſon; that is low of eyes[r], humble in his eyes; who is ſo preſſed with troubles and diſtreſs, that he hangs down his head, looks upon the ground, and will not lift up his eyes, but is of a dejected countenance; or that is low in his own eyes, has humble thoughts of himſelf, eſteems others better than himſelf, and lies low before God under a ſenſe of his ſinfulneſs and unworthineſs, and caſts himſelf entirely upon the grace and mercy of God; ſuch a one he ſaves in a ſpiritual ſenſe, out of his troubles and afflictions; he does not forget the cry of ſuch humble ones, but remembers them, and grants their deſires: and he ſaves the lowly and humble with a ſpiritual and eternal ſalvation; gives more grace unto them, and, and meetens them for glory, and at laſt gives glory itſelf; raiſes them on high to ſit among princes, and to inherit the throne of glory; the meek ſhall inherit the earth, the new heavens and earth, wherein dwelleth righteouſneſs, Jam. iv. 6. Matt. v. 5.

℣. 30. He ſhall deliver the iſland of the innocent, &c.] But where is there ſuch an iſland, an iſland of innocent perſons? it ſeems to be better rendered by others, the innocent ſhall deliver the iſland[s]: good men are ſometimes, by their counſel and advice, and eſpecially by their prayers, the means of delivering an iſland or country from ruin and deſtruction: but the word rendered iſland is a negative q כי השפילו quum humiliaverint, Montanus, Cocceius, Michaelis.

r שח עיניים demiſſum oculis, Montanus, Beza, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator; humilem oculis, Vatablus.
s ימלט אי נקי innocens inſulam liberabit, Montanus; ſo Pagninus, Vatablus.

gative particle, as in 1 Sam. iv. 21. Prov. xxxi. 4. and ſignifies not; and ſo in the Targum; which is "a man that is not innocent ſhall be delivered:" in like manner Jarchi interprets it, and ſo do Noldius[t] and others"; and the ſenſe is, that Job, for he is the perſon ſpoken of, as appears from the following clauſe, ſhould not only be beneficial by his prayers, to humble and good men, but even to the wicked, ſuch as were not innocent and free from fault and puniſhment, but guilty, and obnoxious to wrath and ruin; and yet ſuch ſhould eſcape it, at leaſt for the preſent, thro' the prayers and interceſſion of Job; or God ſhould do this for Job's ſake and his prayers: and it is, or he is delivered by the pureneſs of thine hands; either by his good works, ſetting a good example, which being followed, would be the means of the prevention of preſent ruin; or by his lifting up pure and holy hands in prayer to God for a ſinful people; which God often attends to and hears, and ſo delivers them from deſtruction; as the Iſraelites were delivered through the prayer of Moſes, when they had made the golden calf, and worſhipped it; ſee Pſ. cvi. 33. though ſometimes God will not admit of an interceſſor for ſuch perſons, Ezek. xv. 1.

CHAP. XXIII.

THIS and the following chapter contain Job's reply to the laſt oration of Eliphaz; in this he firſt declares his preſent ſorrowful eſtate and condition, ℣. 1, 2. wiſhes he knew where to find God, as a judge ſitting on a throne, before whom he might lay his cauſe, and plead it, and have his judgment and final deciſion paſſed upon it; when he doubted not but he would deal favourably with him, and both admit him and ſtrengthen him, to plead his own cauſe, and would acquit him for ever from the charges laid againſt him, ver. 3—7. in order to which he ſought for him every-where, but could not find him, but contents himſelf with this, that God knew his way; and that, after trial of him, he ſhould ſhine like pure gold, and appear to be no apoſtate from him, but one ſincerely obedient to his commands, and a true lover of his word, ver. 8—12. and as for his afflictions, they were the reſult of the unalterable purpoſes and appointments of God: but what gave him the greateſt uneaſineſs was, that there were more of that ſort yet to come, which filled him with fears and faintings, with trouble and darkneſs, ver. 13—17.

℣. 1. Then Job anſwered and ſaid, &c.] In reply to Eliphaz; for though he does not direct his diſcourſe to him, nor take any notice of his friends; yet, as a proof of his innocence, againſt his and their accuſations and charges, he deſires no other than to have his cauſe laid before God himſelf, by whom he had no doubt he ſhould be acquitted; and, contrary to their notions, he ſhews in this chapter, that he, a righteous man, was afflicted by God, according to his unchangeable decrees; and in the next, that wicked men greatly proſper; ſo that what he herein ſays, may be conſidered as a ſufficient anſwer to Eliphaz and his friends; and after which no more is ſaid to him by them, excepting a few words dropped by Bildad.

℣. 2. Even to-day is my complaint bitter, &c.] Job's afflictions were continued on him long; he was made to poſſeſs months of vanity; and, as he had been complaining ever ſince they were upon him, he ſtill continued to complain to that day, even after all the comforts his friends pretended to adminiſter to him, as Jarchi obſerves: his complaints were concerning his afflictions, and his friends ill uſage of him under them; not of injuſtice in God in afflicting him, though he thought he dealt ſeverely with him; but of the greatneſs of his afflictions, they being intolerable, and his ſtrength unequal to them, and therefore death was more eligible to him than life; and he complained of God's hiding his face from him, and not hearing him, nor ſhewing him, wherefore he contended with him, nor admitting an hearing of his cauſe before him: and this complaint of his was bitter; the things he complained of were ſuch, bitter afflictions, like the waters of Marah, the Iſraelites could not drink of; there was a great deal of wormwood and gall in his affliction and miſery; and it was in a bitter way, in the bitterneſs of his ſoul he made his complaint; and what made his caſe ſtill worſe, he could not utter any complaint, ſo much as a ſigh or a groan, but it was reckoned provocation, or ſtubbornneſs and rebellion by his friends; ſo ſome render the word [x], as Mr. Broughton does, this day my ſighing is holden a rebellion: there is indeed a great deal of rebellion oftentimes in the hearts, words and actions, conduct and behaviour, even of good men under afflictions, as were in the Iſraelites in the wilderneſs; and a difficult thing it is to complain without being guilty of it; though complaints may be without it, yet repinings and murmurings are always attended with it: and my ſtroke is heavier than my groaning; or my hand [y], meaning either his own hand, which was heavy, and hung down, his ſpirits failing, his ſtrength being exhauſted, and ſo his hands, weak, feeble, and remiſs, that he could not hold them up through his afflictions, and his groanings under them, ſee Pſ. cii. 5. Heb. xii. 12. or the hand of God upon him, his afflicting hand, which had touched him and preſſed hard upon him, and lay heavy, and was heavier than his groanings ſhewed; tho' he groaned much, he did not groan more, nor ſo much as his afflictions called for; and therefore it was no wonder that his complaint was bitter, nor ſhould it be reckoned rebellion and provocation; ſee ch. vi. 2, 3. and xix. 24.

℣. 3. O that I knew where I might find him, &c.] That is, God, who is underſtood, though not expreſſed, a relative without an antecedent, as in Pſ. lxxxvii. 1. Cant. i. 2. John xx. 15. Jarchi ſupplies, and interprets it, my judge, from ver. 7. and certain it is, Job did deſire to find God as a judge ſitting on his throne, doing right, that he might have juſtice done to him: indeed, he might be under the hidings of God's face, which added to his affliction, and made it the heavier; in which caſe, the [t] Concordant. Ebr. Part. p. 25. N°. 135.

[u] אי נקי non innocentem, Druſius, Piſcator, Michaelis; non inſontem, Schultens; to the ſame ſenſe, Beza, Mercerus, Codurcus, Junius, & Tremellius.

[x] מרי exacerbatio, Montanus, Vatablus, Schmidt; exaſperatio, Mercerus, Druſius; pertinacia, Bolducius; contumacia habetur, Cocceius; rebellionem haberi, Junius & Tremellius; rebellio eſt, Piſcator, Codurcus.

[y] ידי manus mea, Montanus, Vatablus, Mercerus, Druſius, Michaelis.

the people of God are at a loſs to know where he is, and how to find him, as Mr. Broughton renders the words here; they know that he is every where, and fills heaven and earth with his preſence; that their God is in the heavens, his throne is there, yea, the heaven is his throne; that he is in his church, and among his people, where they are gathered together in his name, to wait upon him, and to worſhip him; and that he is to be found in Chriſt, as a God gracious and merciful; all which Job knew, but might, as they in ſuch circumſtances are, be at a loſs how to come at ſenſible communion with him; for when he hides his face, who can behold him? yet they cannot content themſelves without ſeeking after him, and making uſe of all means of finding him, as Job did, ℣. 8, 9. ſee Cant. iii. 1, 2, 3: that I might come even to his ſeat; either his mercy-ſeat, from whence he communes with his people, the throne of his grace, where he ſits as the God of grace, diſpenſing his grace to his people, to help them in time of need; the way to which is Chriſt, and in which all believers may come to it with boldneſs, in his name, through his blood, righteouſneſs, and ſacrifice; they may come up even to it, in the exerciſe of faith and hope, though the diſtance is great, as between heaven and earth, yet by faith, they can come into the holieſt of all, and by hope enter within the vail; and, though the difficulties and diſcouragements are many, ariſing from their ſins and tranſgreſſions: or elſe his judgment-ſeat, at which no man can appear and ſtand, without a righteouſneſs, or without a better than his own, by which none can be juſtified in the ſight of God; who, if ſtrict to mark iniquity, the beſt of men cannot ſtand before him, at his bar of juſtice; indeed, in the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, a believer may come up to the judgment-ſeat of God, and to him as judge of all, and not be afraid, but ſtand before him with confidence, ſince that is ſufficient to anſwer for him, and fully acquit him: but Job here ſeems to have a peculiar reſpect to his caſe, in controverſy between him and his friends, and is ſo fully aſſured of the juſtneſs of his cauſe, and relying on his innocence, he wiſhes for nothing more than that he could find God ſitting on a throne of juſtice, before whom his cauſe might be brought and heard, not doubting in the leaſt, but that he ſhould be acquitted; ſo far was he from hiding himſelf from God, or pleaſing himſelf with the thoughts that God was in the height of heaven, and knew nothing of him and his conduct, and could not judge through the dark clouds, which were a covering to him, that he could not ſee him; that he was not afraid to appear before him, and come up even to his ſeat, if he knew but where and how he could; ſee ch. xxii. 12, 13, 14.

℣. 4. I would order my cauſe before him, &c.] Either as a praying perſon, direct his prayer to him, and ſet it in order before him, ſee Pſ. v. 3. or elſe as pleading in his own defence, and in juſtification of himſelf; not of his perſon before God, ſetting his works of righteouſneſs in order before him, and pleading his juſtification on the foot of them; for, by theſe no fleſh living can be juſtified before God; but of his cauſe, for, as a man may vindicate his cauſe before men, and clear himſelf from aſperſions caſt upon him, as Samuel did, 1 Sam. xii. 5. ſo he may before God, with reſpect to the charges he is falſly loaded with, and may appeal to him for juſtice, and deſire he would ſtir up himſelf, and awake to his judgment, even to his cauſe, and plead it againſt thoſe that ſtrive with him, as David did, Pſ. xxxv. 1. 23. and xliii. 1. and fill my mouth with arguments; either in prayer, as a good man may; not with ſuch as are taken from his goodneſs and righteouſneſs, but from the perſon, office, grace, blood, righteouſneſs, and ſacrifice of Chriſt, and from the declarations of God's grace, and the promiſes of his word; or elſe as in a court of judicature, bringing forth his ſtrong reaſons, and giving proofs of his innocence, ſuch as would be demonſtrative, even convincing to all that ſhould hear, and be not only proofs for him, and in his favour, but reproofs alſo, as the word [c] ſignifies, to thoſe that contended with him.

℣. 5. I would know the words which he would anſwer me, &c.] Being a God, hearing and anſwering prayer, who always hears, and ſooner or later anſwers the petitions of his people in his own way; and which, when he does, they know, take notice, and obſerve it: or then he ſhould know the reaſon why the Lord contended with him, and what were his ſins and tranſgreſſions, which were the cauſe of his afflictions; things he had deſired to know, but as yet had no anſwer, ſee ch. x. 2. and xiii. 22, 23. and underſtand what he would ſay unto me; what judgment he would paſs upon him, what ſentence he would pronounce on him, whether guilty or not, and by which judgment he was content to ſtand or fall; as for men's judgment, the judgment of his friends, or to be judged by them, he required it not, as he did not underſtand upon what ground they went, or that it was a good one; but the judgment of God he ſhould pay a deference to, as being always according to truth, and the reaſon of which, when he ſhould have a hearing before him, and a deciſive ſentence by him, he ſhould clearly perceive; ſee 1 Cor. iv. 3.

℣. 6. Will he plead againſt me with his great power? &c.] God will not plead againſt his people at all, but for them; much leſs will he plead againſt them with his great ſtrength, uſe all his power to run them down, cruſh, and oppreſs them; for he is a great God, and of great power; he is mighty in ſtrength, and there is no contending with him, or anſwering of him, ch. ix. 3. 9. 19. nor will he deal with them according to the ſtrict rigour of his juſtice, nor ſtir up all his wrath nor contend for ever with them in ſuch a way; for then the ſpirits would fail before him, and the ſouls that he has made; whatever he does with others, making known his power on the veſſels of wrath, he will never act after this manner with the veſſels of mercy: no, but he would put ſtrength in me; to pray unto him, and prevail with him to lay hold on him, and not let him go without the bleſſing, as Jacob did, Hoſ. xii. 3, 4. or to ſtand before him, and plead his own cauſe with him, in ſuch a ſtrong and powerful manner as to bear down all the accuſations and charges brought againſt him: or he will ſet his heart upon me [d]; deal mildly and gently, kindly and graciouſly, and not with his great ſtrength and ſtrict juſtice; or will not put ſins upon me, as Jarchi, or lay charges to him, however guilty of them, as his friends did, or impute ſuch to him he never committed: God is ſo far from doing this to his people, that he does not impute their ſins to them they have committed, but to his Son,

I

[c] תוכחות increpationibus, V. L. and ſo Montanus, Beza, Mercerus, Druſius, Schultens.

[d] ישם בי ipſe apponeret ad me animum, Junius & Tremellius; ſo Piſcator, Coccéius, & Aben Ezra.

Son, much leſs will he lay upon them more than is right, ch. xxxiv. 23. Some take the ſenſe of the words to be this, in anſwer to the above queſtion, will he plead againſt me with his great power? let him do it, only let him not ſet upon me[e], in an hoſtile way, and then I do not decline entering the liſts with him; which expreſſes great boldneſs and confidence, and even too much, and muſt be reckoned among the unbecoming expreſſions Job was afterwards convinced of; but this he utters in his paſſion, in order the more clearly to ſhew, and the more ſtrongly to aſſert his innocence.

℣. 7. There the righteous might diſpute with him, &c.] That is, at his ſeat, either at his mercy-ſeat, where even God allows ſinners to come and reaſon with him, for pardoning grace and mercy, upon the foot of his own declarations and promiſes, and the blood, and ſacrifice of his Son, Iſ. i. 18. or at his judgment-ſeat, pleading the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, which is fully ſatisfactory to law and juſtice. Job moſt probably means himſelf by the righteous or upright man, being conſcious to himſelf of his ſincerity and integrity; and relying on this, he feared not to appear before God as a judge, and reaſon his caſe before him, diſpute the matter with him, and in his preſence, which was in controverſy between him and his friends, whether he was an hypocrite or a ſincere good man: ſo ſhould I be delivered for ever from my judge; either from thoſe who judged hardly of him, and were very cenſorious in the character they gave of him; and from all their condemnation of him, and calumnies, and charges they faſtened on him; or from him that judgeſt me[f], from any one whatever that ſhould wrongly judge him, friend or foe; or rather from God himſelf, his judge, from whom he ſhould depart acquitted; and ſo Mr. Broughton renders the words, ſo ſhould I be quit for ever by my judge; for, if God juſtifies, who ſhall condemn? ſuch an one need not regard the condemnations of men or devils; being acquitted by God he is for ever juſtified, and ſhall never enter into condemnation; God's acquittance is a ſecurity from the damnatory ſentence of others.

℣. 8. Behold I go forward, but he is not there, &c.] Job here returns to what he had ſaid before, ℣. 3. as Jarchi obſerves, where he expreſſes his earneſt deſire after God, that he might know where he was, and come up to his ſeat; here he relates the various ways he took to find him, and his fruitleſs ſearch of him. Cocceius thinks, by theſe phraſes forward and backward, are meant times future and paſt; and that the ſenſe is, that Job looked into the future times of the Meſſiah, and the grace promiſed him, his living Redeemer, that ſhould ſtand on the earth in the latter day; and that he looked back to the ages before him, and to the firſt promiſe made to Adam; but could not underſtand by either, the reaſon why good men were afflicted; and by the right hand and left, the different diſpenſations of God to men, granting protection with his right-hand, and diſtributing the bleſſings of his goodneſs by it; and with his left-hand laying afflictions and evils upon them; and yet, neither from the one nor the other, could he learn the mind and will of God concerning men, ſince love and hatred are not to be known by theſe things: but rather with the Jewiſh commentators in general, we are to underſtand places by theſe various expreſſions; even the ſeveral parts of the world, eaſt, weſt, north, and ſouth; which Job went through, and ſurveyed in his mind, to find God in, but to no purpoſe; for, when a man ſtands with his face to the riſing ſun, the eaſt is before him, and, if he goes forward, he goes eaſtward; and behind him is the weſt, and, if he goes that way, he goes backward; ſo the eaſtern ſea is called the former ſea, and the weſtern, or Mediterranean ſea, the hinder ſea, Zech. xiv. 8. and a man, in this poſition, will have the north on his left-hand, and the ſouth on his right; ſee Gen. xiii. 9. now Job ſays, that he went forward, that is, eaſtward; but, ſays he of God, he is not there, or is not[g]; meaning not that he was not in being, did not exiſt; for he moſt firmly believed the exiſtence of God, or that he was, but as we rightly ſupply, he was not there, that is, eaſtward; and yet the greateſt, the moſt glorious, and moſt gracious appearances of him were in the eaſt; man was made in the eaſt; the garden of Eden was planted eaſtward; here God appeared to Adam, both before and after his fall; and it was in the eaſt, Chriſt, the ſecond Adam, was born; his ſtar appeared in it, and his goſpel was firſt preached in the eaſtern parts; in the eaſt Job now lived, and had been the greateſt man in it; but now God did not appear to him, as the Vulgate Latin verſion, not in a kind and gracious manner; nor could he find him at his throne of juſtice here, as he wiſhed for; he was there, though Job ſaw him not; for he is everywhere; indeed, he is not confined, or limited to any place; for as the heaven of heavens cannot contain him, ſo much leſs any part or corner of the earth: and backward, but I cannot perceive him; or underſtand where he is, or get intelligence of him, and of the reaſon of his diſpenſations, eſpecially concerning himſelf.

℣. 9. On the left-hand, where he doth work, but I cannot behold him, &c.] The northern part of the world, where his ſeat is, or the circle of the earth, ſays Bar Tzemach, and who has ſtretched out the north over the empty place, ch. xxvi. 7. Jarchi's note is, when he created it, he did not make it the place of his throne: God works every-where in a way of providence, but in ſome places more eminently, than in others; the northern part of the world is obſerved to be more inhabited than the ſouthern, and the people of it to be more active in war and buſineſs than elſewhere; and more and greater things are done by God among them as inſtruments than among any other; and Mr. Caryl obſerves, that the goſpel has ever more generally and more clearly been preached here than in the ſouthern parts of the world; and perhaps by the northern chambers in Ezekiel's viſion, ch. xlii. 1. were deſigned the proteſtant churches in the northern parts, as it is well known the proteſtant doctrine is called the northern hereſy: but what Job meant by God's works in the north, is not eaſy to ſay; but as this refers to ſome place where God had been uſed to work either in the way of providence or grace, it was the moſt likely one to find him in, and yet Job could not behold him, or get any ſight of him, either as on a throne of grace or juſtice: he hideth himſelf on the right-hand, that I cannot ſee him; or he covereth the right hand[h], the ſouthern parts parts of the world; he covers the face of the ſouth with his face, that I cannot ſee him, ſo Jarchi; this is ſaid becauſe the ſouth is covered with the waters of the ocean, as Bar Tzemach obſerves; what we call the South-Sea: or rather the meaning is, that God covered himſelf on the right hand, or on the ſouth, as with a garment, as the word ſignifies; wrapped himſelf up either in light inacceſſible, as with a garment, or with clouds of darkneſs, that he could not be ſeen; and if he hides himſelf, as he often does from the beſt of men, who can behold him? ch. xxxiv. 29. ſee ch. ix. 11.

[e] Schultens. [f] משפטי, a judicante me, Beza, Pagninus, Montanus, Bolducius, Vatablus, Cocceius. [g] ואיננו & non ipſe, Montanus, Druſius, Bolducius. [h] יעטף ימין operiet dextram, Montanus, Junius & Tremellius; ſo Cocceius, Druſius, Schmidt, Schultens, & Broughton.

℣. 10. But he knoweth the way that I take, &c.] This he ſeems to ſay in a way of ſolace to himſelf, comforting and contenting himſelf that though he could not find God, nor knew where he was, or what way he took, nor the reaſons of his ways and diſpenſations with the children of men, and with himſelf, yet God knew where he was, and what way he took; by which he means either the way he took, being directed to it for his acceptance with God, his juſtification before him, and eternal ſalvation; which was his living Redeemer, he looked unto by faith for righteouſneſs and eternal life: or rather the way and manner of life he took to, the courſe of his converſation, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord, in the paths of piety and truth, of righteouſneſs and holineſs; and this God knew not barely by his omniſcience, as he knows all the ways of men, good and bad; his eyes are upon them, he compaſſes them, and is thoroughly acquainted with them; but by way of approbation, he approved of it, and was well pleaſed with it, it being ſo agreeable to his revealed will, ſo pure and holy; thus the Lord knows the way of the righteous, Pſ. i. 6. when he hath tried me, I ſhall come forth as gold; as pure as gold, as free from droſs as that, appear quite innocent of the charges brought againſt him, and ſhine in his integrity. He was as valuable and precious as gold, as all God's people are in his eſteem, however reckoned of by others; they are precious ſons of Zion, comparable to fine gold; not that they have any intrinſic worth in themſelves, they are in no wiſe better than others by nature; but through the grace of God beſtowed on them, which is as gold tried in the fire; and through the righteouſneſs of Chriſt imputed to them, which is gold of Ophir, and clothing of wrought gold; and on account of both, they are like a maſs of gold, and are the choſen of God, and precious: this gold he tries, the Lord trieth the righteous; and which he does by afflictive providences; he puts them into the furnace of affliction, which is the fiery trial to try them; and hereby their graces are tried, their faith, hope, love, patience, &c. their principles and doctrines they embrace, whether they be gold, ſilver, and precious ſtones, or whether wood, hay, and ſtubble; the fire tries every man's work, of what ſort it is, and whether they will abide by them and their profeſſion alſo, whether they will adhere to it; and by this means he purges away their droſs and tin, and they come out of the furnace as pure gold in great luſtre and brightneſs, as thoſe in Rev. vii. 13, 14. now Job was in this furnace and trying; and he was confident that as he ſhould come out of it, he ſhould appear to be, he may have reſpect to his trial at the bar of juſtice, where he deſired to be tried, and be brought under the ſtricteſt examination; and doubted not but he ſhould be acquitted, and ſhine as bright as gold; nay, theſe words may be given as a reaſon why God would not be found by him as his judge to try his cauſe, becauſe he knew his uprightneſs and integrity, and that he muſt go from him acquitted and diſcharged; and therefore, for reaſons unknown to him, declined the judging of him; to this purpoſe Jarchi interprets the words, which may be rendered, for he knoweth the way that I take[a]; and therefore will not be ſeen by me, nor appear to judge me: he hath tried me; again and again, and has ſeen the integrity of my heart, as Sephorno interprets it, and well knows my innocence; ſee Pſ. xvii. 3. and if he would try me again, I ſhall come forth as gold; quite clear of all charges and imputations; I'm able to ſtand the ſtricteſt ſcrutiny: this he ſaid as conſcious of his uprightneſs, and of his ſtrict regard to the ways and word of God, as follows; but this was a bold ſaying, and an unbecoming expreſſion of his to God; and of which he afterwards was aſhamed and repented, when God appeared and ſpoke to him out of the whirlwind.

℣. 11. My foot hath held his ſteps, &c.] Trod in the ſteps he has walked in; he followed God cloſely, imitated him in acts of holineſs and righteouſneſs, of mercy, kindneſs, and beneficence; and he continued therein, as he ſet his foot in the ſteps of God, which were to him for an example, he perſiſted therein; as he followed on to know him, ſo to imitate him, and walk worthy of him: his way have I kept; the way he preſcribed him, and directed him to walk in, the way of his commandments, which he obſerved conſtantly, and kept; though not perfectly, yet with great delight and pleaſure, and ſo as not to be chargeable with any groſs neglect of them, but in ſome ſenſe to walk in all of them blameleſs, as not to be culpable before men: and not declined; from the way of God, did not turn aſide from it to the right or left, or go into crooked paths with wicked men, or wickedly depart from his God, his ways and worſhip, as David ſays, Pſ. xviii. 21.

℣. 12. Neither have I gone back from the commandment of his lips, &c.] From any of the commandments his lips had uttered; meaning not the ten commandments given to Iſrael, which perhaps as yet were not given, or had not come to the knowledge of Job; ſome ſpeak of the ſeven commandments, given to the ſons of Noah; ſee the note on Gen. ix. 4. It ſeems to deſign any and every commandment that God had given to Noah or Abraham, or any of the patriarchs, before the times of Job, and which he had knowledge of, and which he carefully obſerved, kept cloſe to, and did not deviate from; but made it the rule of his walk and practice: I have eſteemed the words of his mouth more than my neceſſary food; the words of the Lord, the doctrines of grace that came from his mouth, are food for faith; there are in them milk for babes, and meat for ſtrong men; they are ſavoury, ſalutary, and wholeſome words, by which the people of God are nouriſhed up unto eternal life; and they are eſteemed by them more than the food that is neceſſary and convenient for their bodies; ſee Prov. xxx. 8. for as the ſoul is preferable to the body, ſo the food of the one is preferable to the food of the other, and is ſweeter, as the words of God

[a] כי quia, Pagninus, Montanus, Mercerus, Piſcator, Michaelis; nam, Tigurine verſion, Cocceius, Schultens.

God are, to the taſte of a believer, than honey, or the honey-comb: or I have hid, or laid up, the words of his mouth [b]; he had laid them up in his heart, in order to meditate upon them, and receive comfort and ſpiritual nouriſhment from them when he ſhould want it, as men lay up their food in a proper place againſt the time they want it for their ſupport and refreſhment; and Job was more careful to lay up the one than the other; ſee Pſ. cxix. 11. here Job meets with, and has reſpect unto the advice of Eliphaz, ch. xxii. 22. and ſignifies that he had no need to have given him it, he had done this already.

℣. 13. But he is in one mind, &c.] Either with reſpect to his commandments, every precept remains in full force, he never alters the thing that is gone out of his lips, or delivers out other commandments different from, or contrary to what he has given; and therefore Job thought it his duty to abide by them, and not decline from them; which is the ſenſe of a Jewiſh commentator [c], connecting the words with the preceding: or with reſpect to his diſpenſations towards Job in afflicting him; which he continued notwithſtanding his innocence, becauſe he is a ſovereign Being, and does whatſoever he pleaſes; he is unchangeable in his purpoſes and decrees; he is not to be wrought upon by any means to alter his fixed courſe; he is not to be contradicted nor reſiſted; and this was the reaſon why he would not be found by him, though he ſought him ſo earneſtly and diligently, and why he would not hear him, and would not appear to try his cauſe, though he knew he was innocent, becauſe he was determined to go on to afflict him; and he never changes his mind, or alters his counſels on any account whatever. The Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, for he is alone; and ſo the Targum, "if he is alone, or the only one;" there is none with him to adviſe him, for with whom took he counſel? or to perſuade him to be of another mind, and take contrary meaſures, who might be applied to, to uſe their intereſt with him to act in a different manner; but he is alone, there are none with him that have any influence upon him, and can prevail with him to do otherwiſe than he does; ſome tranſlate the words, if he acts againſt one [d]; againſt a man in a hoſtile way, if he ſets his face againſt him, and comes upon him as an enemy; and ſo Mr. Broughton, yet when he is againſt me, who can ſtay him? notwithſtanding my innocence and integrity, though I keep his ways, and do not go back from his commandments. Some think there is a redundancy of a letter, which we tranſlate in, and then the words will be read thus: but he is one; the one only living and true God; this is the voice of reaſon and revelation, hear, O Iſrael, the Lord thy God is one Lord; for though there are three perſons in the godhead, father, ſon, and holy ghoſt, theſe three are one God; and ſo the words are expreſſive of the unity of the divine being; but this ſeems not to be Job's ſenſe: Aben Ezra ſays, the truth is, that the letter ב is not added, is no redundancy, and ſhould be read he is in one; but ſays he, I cannot explain it, there is a great myſtery in it: what the Jew underſtood not, may be more clear and plain to us Chriſtians, who are taught the myſtery of the in-being of the divine perſons in each other, the father is in the ſon, and the ſon is in the father, as they are divine perſons; though in what manner they are, we are not able to explain; beſides God was in Chriſt, as mediator, reconciling the world, chooſing his people in him, and bleſſing them with all ſpiritual bleſſings in him; though the true ſenſe ſeems to be what is before given, agreeable to our verſion, that God is in one mind, purpoſe, and deſign; that his decrees are unchangeable and invariable, that he always acts according to them, and never alters them: and who can turn him? turn his mind, or cauſe him to change his counſel, and alter his purpoſes; or turn his hand, or ſtop and ſtay it from the execution of them; it is not to be done by force and power, for there is no power equal to his, and much leſs ſuperior to his; which muſt be the caſe, if any could turn him: and though he may be turned by the prayers of his people, and by the repentance of men, ſo as to repent himſelf, and not do what he has threatened to do; yet this is no change of his mind and counſels, only an alteration in the courſe of his providence, or a change of his outward dealings with men, according to his unchangeable will; ſee Iſ. xiv. 27. Dan. iv. 35. and what his ſoul deſireth, even that he doth; that is, what he himſelf deſireth earneſtly and vehemently; he has done all things in creation according to the good pleaſure of his will; and he does all things in providence according to the counſel of it, and as ſeems beſt in his ſight; and ſo he does all things in grace, chooſes whom he will, predeſtinates to the adoption of children according to the good pleaſure of his will; redeems whom he pleaſes, and calls by his grace, and brings to glory whomſoever he will be gracious to; ſee Pſ. cxv. 3.

℣. 14. For he performeth the thing that is appointed for me, &c.] The ſame word is uſed as at the end of ℣. 12. where it is rendered, my neceſſary food; or appointed food, a certain portion of it; food convenient, daily bread; and this has led ſome interpreters to take it in the ſame ſenſe here, and render it, he performeth my neceſſary things [e], or things neceſſary for me; ſupplies me with the neceſſaries of life, to which agrees the Targum, and ſo Mr. Broughton; "becauſe he hath furniſhed me with my daily bread, and many ſuch graces are with him;" and which he did according to his unchangeable purpoſes and decrees, and according as his ſoul deſired, and it pleaſed him; and this laid Job under greater obligation ſtill to have regard to his commandments, and the words of his mouth; but rather it is to be underſtood of the decrees and purpoſes of God relating to Job, to his perſon, caſe, and circumſtances, throughout the whole courſe of his life hitherto: and indeed all things relating to every individual perſon, as to him, are appointed of God; and whatever he appoints, he performs: all things relative to their temporal life, the birth of perſons into the world, and their continuance in it; all the incidents in life, the places of their abode, their employments, callings, and occupations; their riches and poverty, proſperity and adverſity; all their afflictions, and which Job has a ſpecial regard to, the kind and nature of them, their meaſure and duration, and the end and uſe of them; and death itſelf, which cloſes all things here, that is appointed of God, the time and circumſtances of it, ſee Eccl iii. 1, 2. and ſo all things relative to the ſpiritual and eterna nal ſalvation of men; to ſave men is the determinate will of God; the perſons ſaved are appointed by him to it, and Chriſt is ordained to be the redeemer and ſaviour of them; whoſe coming into the world for that purpoſe was at the appointed time called the fulneſs of time, and his going out of it, or his ſufferings and death, by which ſalvation was accompliſhed, were in due time, and by the determinate counſel and foreknowledge of God. The converſion of men is according to the appointment of God; they that are called are called according to his purpoſe; the time of converſion, the place where, and means whereby, are all fixed in the decrees and purpoſes of God, and have their ſure and certain accompliſhment; and the ſeveral viciſſitudes of diſtreſs and comfort in ſpiritual things are as God has determined; all the times of his people are in his hands, and diſpoſed by him; times of temptation, darkneſs, and deſertion, and times of peace, joy, and comfort; the everlaſting happineſs itſelf is a kingdom prepared in the purpoſes of God from the foundation of the world, and is an inheritance obtained according to the purpoſe of him who has predeſtinated unto it; and ſeeing God is all-wiſe, all-knowing, all-powerful, faithful and true, what he appoints muſt certainly be performed: and many ſuch things are with him; beſides what were appointed for Job, and performed upon him, there were innumerable inſtances in the world of God's appointments, and the performance of them, both with reſpect to good things, and evil things, mercies and bleſſings, afflictions and troubles: or beſides what God had performed with reſpect to Job, eſpecially with regard to his afflictions and ſufferings, there were ſtill many more things to come, which were ſecret in his breaſt, and which he had decreed and appointed, and would in due time be performed; though Job knew not as yet what they were, whether good or evil things, though he ſuppoſed the latter.

[b] צפנתי abſcondi, Pagninus, Montanus, Vatablus, Bolducius; recondidi, Tigurine verſion, Beza, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Druſius, Mercerus, Cocceius, Michaelis, Schultens; ſo Broughton. [c] Sephorno. [d] והוא באחד ſed ſi ipſe contra unum agit, Junius & Tremellius; ſo Piſcator, Cocceius. [e] כי ישלים חקי quia perfecit neceſſaria mea, Vatablus; ſo Nachmanides, Ben Gerſom, Sephorno.

℣. 15. Therefore am I troubled at his preſence, &c.] Not at his gracious preſence, which he wanted, and every good man deſires; but at his appearance as an enemy, as he apprehended him, laying and continuing his afflictive hand upon him, and indeed at his appearance as a judge to try his cauſe; for though he had moſt earneſtly deſired it, yet when he thought of the ſovereignty of God, and the immutability of his counſels, and of his perfect knowledge of all things; and he not knowing what he had with him, and to bring out againſt him, when he came to the point, might be troubled and ſhrink back, ſee Pſ. lxxvii. 3. when I conſider, I am afraid of him; when he conſidered his terrible majeſty, his ſovereign will, his unalterable purpoſes, his infinite wiſdom, and almighty power, his ſtrict juſtice, and ſpotleſs purity; he was afraid to appear before him, or afraid that ſince many ſuch things were with him he had already experienced, there were more to be brought forth, which might be greater and heavier ſtill.

℣. 16. For God maketh my heart ſoft, &c.] Not tender as Joſiah's was, or as the heart of every penitent is, when God makes it humble and contrite by his Spirit and grace, or takes away the ſtony heart, and gives an heart of fleſh; though Job had ſuch an heart, and God made it ſo; but he means a weak, feeble, fearful heart, preſſed and broken with afflictions, that could not endure and bear up under the mighty hand of God; but became as water, and melted like wax in the midſt of him, and was ready to faint, and ſink, and die away: and the Almighty troubleth me; by afflicting him; afflictions cauſe trouble, and theſe are of God; or he aſtoniſheth [a], amazes me, throws me into the utmoſt conſternation, the reaſon of which follows.

℣. 17. Becauſe I was not cut off before the darkneſs, &c.] That is, it was amazing to him, and troubled him when he thought of it, that he was not cut off by death, before the darkneſs of afflictions, or this dark diſpenſation came upon him; as ſometimes righteous ones are taken from the evil to come, as Methuſelah was before the flood; and Job wonders this was not his caſe, or at leaſt he wiſhes it had had been; for ſo Aben Ezra ſeems to underſtand and read the words, why was I not cut off, &c. as if it was a wiſh, and expreſſive of his deſire, that this had been done; which is what he had expoſtulated with God about at firſt, in the third chapter, and death was what he always deſired, and ſtill continued to wiſh for: or elſe the ſenſe is, that he was amazed that he was not cut off, becauſe, at, through, or by darkneſs [b], by means of his afflictions; he wondered how he was ſupported under them, and carried through them, that they did not preſs him down to death; how ſuch a poor waſted creature as he was, reduced to ſkin and bones, ſhould ever be able to endure what he did: neither hath he covered the darkneſs from my face; that I ſhould not ſee and feel the afflictions I do; or rather, he hath covered the darkneſs from my face, for the word neither is not in the text, tho' repeated by many interpreters from the foregoing clauſe; and then the ſenſe is, though I am ſenſible of the darkneſs of affliction upon me, yet he has covered it ſo from me, that I cannot ſee an end of it, or any way to eſcape out of it; or which is the ſenſe Druſius gives, he hath covered death and the grave from me, which is a ſtate of darkneſs, a land of darkneſs, or darkneſs itſelf, as he calls it, ch. x. 21, 22. that he could not ſee it, and enjoy it; he wiſhed for death, but could not have it, it was hid from him. Cocceius renders the words very differently, he, that is, God, hath covered himſelf with darkneſs from my face; and interprets it of divine deſertion, which troubled and terrified Job; and becauſe he thus covered himſelf as it were with a cloud, this was the reaſon why he knew not where he was, and could not find him, when he made the moſt diligent ſearch for him, and this grieved and aſtoniſhed him, ſee Lam. iii. 44.

[a] הבהילני me attonitum reddidit, Vatablus; conſternavit me, Druſius, Mercerus, Cocceius, Michaelis; externavit me, Schultens. [b] מפני החשך propter tenebras, Pagninus, Piſcator, Cocceius; ſo V. L. a tenebris, Druſius; a præſentibus tenebris, Beza.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXIV.

THIS chapter contains the ſecond part of Job's anſwer to the laſt diſcourſe of Eliphaz, in which he ſhews that wicked men, thoſe of the worſt characters, proſper in the world, and go through it with impunity; he lays down this as a certain truth, that though no time is hid from God, yet they that are moſt familiar with him, and know moſt of him, do not ſee, and cannot obſerve any days of his for judging and puniſhing wicked men in this life, ℣. 1. and inſtances in men guilty of injuſtice, violence, oppreſſion, cruelty and inhumanity to their neighbours, and yet God lays not folly to them, or charges them with ſin, and puniſhes them for it, ℣. 2—12. and in perſons that commit the moſt atrocious crimes in ſecret, ſuch as murderers, adulterers, and thieves, ℣. 13—17. he allows that there is a curſe upon their portion, and that the grave ſhall conſume them, and they ſhall be remembred no more, ℣. 18, 19, 20. and becauſe of their ill treatment of others, tho' they may be in ſafety and proſperity, and be exalted for a while, they ſhall be brought low, and cut off by death, but generally ſpeaking are not puniſhed in this life, ℣. 21—24. and concludes with the greateſt aſſurance of being in the right, and having truth on his ſide, ℣. 25.

℣. 1. Why, ſeeing times are not hidden from the Almighty, &c.] Which ſeems to be an inference deduced from what he had ſaid in ch. xxiii. 14. that ſince all things are appointed by God, and his appointments are punctually performed by him, the times of his carrying his purpoſes and decrees into execution, cannot be hidden from him; for as he has determined what ſhall be done, he has determined the time before appointed for the doing of them; as there is a purpoſe for every thing under the heavens, there is a time ſet for the execution of that purpoſe, which muſt be known unto God that has fixed it; for as all his works are known to him from the beginning, or from eternity, the times when thoſe works ſhould be wrought, muſt alſo be known to him. The Vulgate Latin verſion reduces the words to a categorical propoſition, times are not hidden from the Almighty; either temporal things, as Sephorno interprets it, things done in time, or the times of doing thoſe things; no ſort of time is hid from God; time reſpecting the world in general, its beginning, duration and end; all ſeaſons in it, day and night, ſummer and winter, ſeed-time and harveſt, which are all fixed and ſettled by him; the ſeveral diſtinct ages and periods of time, into which it has been divided; the old and new world, the legal and goſpel-diſpenſation, the various generations in it; the four great monarchies of the world, their riſe, and duration, and end, with all other leſſer kingdoms and ſtates; time reſpecting the inhabitants of the world, their coming into and paſſing out of it in ſucceſſive generations, the time of their birth, and of their death, and of adverſity and proſperity, which interchangeably take place during their abode in it; and particularly the people of God, the time of their redemption by Chriſt, of their converſion by the grace of God, and all their times of darkneſs, deſertion, temptation and afflictions, and of peace, joy and comfort; time, paſt and future, reſpecting the church of God, and the ſtate of it, and all things relative thereunto; and the times of Iſrael's affliction in a land not theirs, 400 years, and of their 70 years captivity in Babylon, were not hidden from the Almighty, but foretold by him; the ſuffering times of the church under the New Teſtament; the ten perſecutions of it by the Roman emperors; the flight and nouriſhment of it in the wilderneſs for a time, and times, and half a time; the treading down of the holy city 42 months; the witneſſes propheſying in ſackcloth 1260 days; the killing of them, and their bodies lying unburied three days and a half, and then riſing; the reign of antichriſt 42 months, at the end of which antichriſtian time will be no more; the time of Chriſt's coming to judgment, which is a day appointed, though unknown to men and angels, and the reign of Chriſt on earth 1000 years; all theſe times are not hidden from, but known to the Almighty, even all time, paſt, preſent and to come, and all things that have been, are, or ſhall be done therein. Several Jewiſh commentators [c] interpret theſe words as an expoſtulation or wiſh, why are not times hidden, &c. if they were, I ſhould not murmur at it, that thoſe that know him don't know what ſhall be; but he knows the times and days in which wicked men will do wickedneſs, why is he ſilent? Mr. Broughton, and others [d], render them, why are not, or why ſhould not times be hidden by the Almighty? that is, be hidden in his own breaſt from men, as they are; for the times and ſeaſons, it is not for man to know, which God has put in his own power, Acts i. 6. as the times of future troubles, of a man's death, and the day of judgment; it is but right and fit on many accounts, that they ſhould be hid by him from them; but others of later date tranſlate the words perhaps much better, why are not certain ſtated times laid up, or reſerved by the Almighty [e]? that is, for puniſhing wicked men in this life, as would be the caſe Job ſuggeſts, if it was true what his friends had aſſerted, that wicked men are always puniſhed here: and then upon this another queſtion follows, why do they that know him not ſee his days? that know him not merely by the light of nature, but as revealed in Chriſt; and that have not a mere knowledge of him, but a ſpiritual and experimental one; who know him ſo as to love him, believe in him, fear, ſerve and worſhip him; and who have a greater knowledge of him than others may have, and have an intimate acquaintance and familiarity with him, are his boſom-friends; and if there are fixed times for puniſhing the wicked in this life, how comes it to paſs that theſe friends of God, to whom he reveals his ſecrets, can't ſee and obſerve any ſuch days and times of his as theſe? but, on the contrary, obſerve, even to the ſtumbling of the greateſt ſaints, that the wicked proſper and increaſe in riches. Job ſeems to refer to what Eliphaz had ſaid, ch. xxii.

[c] Aben Ezra, Nachmanides, & Simeon Bar Tzemach.
[d] מדוע נישדאי quinam ab omnipotente, Beza; ſo Junius & Tremellius.
[e] Quare ab omnipotente non ſunt recondita in pœnam ſtata tempora, Schultens.

xxii. 19. which he here tacitly denies, and proves the contrary by various inſtances, as follows.

℣. 2. Some remove the land-marks, &c.] Anciently ſet to diſtinguiſh one man's land from another, to ſecure property, and preſerve from encroachments; but ſome were ſo wicked, as either ſecretly in the night to remove them, or openly to do it, having power on their ſide, pretending they were wrong ſet; this was not only prohibited by the law of God, and pronounced an accurſed thing, Deut. xix. 14. and xxii. 17. but was reckoned ſo before the law was given, being known to be ſuch by the light of nature, as what was now, and here condemned, was before that law was in being; and ſo we find that this was accounted an execrable thing among the heathens, who had a deity they called Jupiter Terminalis, who was appointed over bounds and land-marks; ſo Numa Pompilius appointed ſtones to be ſet as bounds to every one's lands, and dedicated them to Jupiter Terminalis, and ordered that thoſe that removed them ſhould be ſlain as ſacrilegious perſons, and they and their oxen devoted to deſtruction [f]: ſome render it, they touch the land-marks [g], as if to touch them was unlawful, and therefore much more to remove them: they violently take away flocks, and feed thereof; not content with a ſheep or a lamb, they took away whole flocks, and that by force and violence, openly and publickly, and ſlew them, and fed on them; or elſe took them and put them into their own grounds, or ſuch as they had got by encroachments from others, where they fed them without any fear of men; which ſhows the effrontery and impudence of them.

℣. 3. They drive away the aſs of the fatherleſs, &c.] Who are left deſtitute of friends, and have none to take care of them, and provide for them; and who having one aſs to carry their goods for them, from place to place, or to ride upon, which though a creature of no great worth, yet of ſome uſefulneſs, this they drove away from its paſture, or however from its right owner; and who having but one, 'twas the more cruel and inhuman to take it from him, ſee 2 Sam. xii. 3, 4. they take the widow's ox for a pledge; or oxen, the ſingular for the plural, with which her lands were ploughed, for a ſingle ox could be but of little ſervice: ſome render it a cow [h], by the milk of which ſhe and her family were chiefly ſupported, as many poor country-families are by the means of a good milch cow; and to take this, on which her livelihood depended, and retain for a pledge, was very barbarous; when the law concerning pledges took place among the Jews, in the times of Moſes, which it ſeems was in being before with others; whatſoever was uſeful to perſons, either to keep them warm, or by which they got their bread, were not to be taken, at leaſt not detained for a pledge, ſee Exod. xxii. 26, 27. Deut. xxiv. 6, 12, 13.

℣. 4. They turn the needy out of the way, &c.] Either in a moral ſenſe, out of the right way, the way of righteouſneſs and truth, by their ill examples, or by their threatenings or flatteries; or, in a civil ſenſe, out of the way of their livelihood, by taking that from them by which they got it; or, in a literal ſenſe, obliging them to turn out of the way from them, in a ſupercilious and haughty manner, or cauſing them, through fear of them; to get out of the way, that they might not meet them, leſt they ſhould inſult them, beat and abuſe them, or take that little from them they had, as follows: the poor of the earth hide themſelves together; who are not only poor in purſe, but poor in ſpirit, meek, humble and lowly, and have not ſpirit and courage to ſtand againſt ſuch oppreſſors, but are eaſily cruſhed by them; theſe through fear of them hide themſelves in holes and corners in a body, in a large company together, leſt they ſhould fall into their cruel hands, and be uſed by them in a barbarous manner, ſee Prov. xxviii. 28.

℣. 5. Behold, as wild aſſes in the deſert, &c.] The word as is a ſupplement, and may be omitted, and the words be interpreted literally of wild aſſes, as they are by Sephorno, whoſe proper place is in the wilderneſs, to which they are uſed, and where their food is provided for them, and which they diligently ſeek for for them and their young; and ſo the words may be deſcriptive of the place where the poor hide themſelves, and of the company they are obliged to keep; but the Targum ſupplies the note of ſimilitude as we do; and others [i] obſerve it to be wanting, and ſo it may reſpect wicked men before deſcribed, who may be compared to the wild aſſes of the wilderneſs for their folly and ſtupidity, man being born like a wild aſs's colt, ch. xi. 12. and for their luſt and wantonneſs, and for their unſubjection to God and his laws, and their unteachableneſs. Perhaps ſome regard may be had to the wild Arabs that were in Job's neighbourhood, the deſcendants of Iſhmael, called the wild man, as he is in Gen. xvi. 12. who lived by plunder and robbery, as theſe here: they go forth to their work; of thieving and ſtealing, robbing and plundering, as their trade, and buſineſs, and occupation of life, and as naturally and conſtantly as men go to their lawful employment, and as if it was one: riſing betimes for a prey; getting up early in a morning to meet the induſtrious traveller on the road, and make a prey of him, rob him of what he has about him; for they can't ſleep unleſs they do miſchief: the wilderneſs yieldeth food for them, and for their children; though they are lurking in a wilderneſs where no ſuſtenance is to be had, yet by robbing every one that paſſes by, they get a ſufficiency for them and their families: though ſome underſtand all this of the poor, who are obliged to hide themſelves from their oppreſſors, and go into the wilderneſs in droves like wild aſſes, and as timorous and as ſwift as they in fleeing; and are forced to hard ſervice, and to riſe betimes to earn their bread, and get ſuſtenance for their families; and who in the main are obliged to live on berries and roots, and what a wild deſart will afford; but the word prey is not applicable to the pains and labours of ſuch induſtrious people, wherefore the former ſenſe is beſt; and beſides, there ſeems to be one continued account of wicked men.

℣. 6. They reap every one his corn in the field, &c.] Not the poor, who are obliged to reap the corn of the wicked for them without any wages, as ſome; but rather the wicked reap the corn of the poor; they are ſo inſolent and impudent, that they don't take the corn out of their barns by ſtealth, but whilſt it is ſtanding in the field; they come openly and reap it down, as if it was their own, without any fear of God or men: it is obſerved, [f] Dion. Halicarnaſſ. & Feſtus apud Sanctium in loc. Vid. Rycquium de Capitol. Roman. c. 14. Ovid. Faſti, l. 2.

[g] יסיגו attigerunt, Pagninus, Bolducius; attingunt, Vatablus.
[h] שור pro bove fœmina, vacca, Bolducius.
[i] Aben Ezra, Ben Gerſom, Bar Tzemach.

ſerved, that the word [k] ſignifies a mixture of the poorer ſorts of corn, which is ſcarce any thing better than food for cattle; yet this they cut down and carry off, as forage for their horſes and aſſes at leaſt. Some of the antient verſions taking it to be two words, render them, which is not their own [l]; they go into a field that is not theirs, and reap corn that don't belong to them, that they have no right unto, and ſo are guilty of great injuſtice, and of doing injury to others: and they gather the vintage of the wicked; gather the grapes off of the vines of wicked men, which are gathered, as the word ſignifies, at the latter end of the year, in autumn; and though they belong to wicked men like themſelves, yet they ſpare them not, but ſeize on all that come to hand, whether the property of good men or bad men; and thus ſometimes one wicked man is an inſtrument of puniſhing another: or the wicked gather the vintage [m]; that is, of the poor; as they reap where they have not ſown, they gather of that they have not planted.

℣. 7. They cauſe the naked to lodge without clothing, &c.] That is, ſuch as are poorly clothed, thinly arrayed, have ſcarce any thing but rags, and yet ſo cruel the wicked men above deſcribed, that they take theſe away from the poor, and even their bed-clothes, which ſeem chiefly deſigned; ſo that they are obliged to lodge or lie all night without any thing upon them: that they have no covering in the cold; neither in the day-time, nor in the night, and eſpecially the latter; and having no houſe to go to, and obliged to lay themſelves down upon the bare ground, had nothing to cover them from the inclemency of the weather; for even in hot countries nights are ſometimes cold, and large dews fall, yea ſometimes it is a froſt, ſee Gen. xxxi. 40.

℣. 8. They are wet with the ſhowers of the mountains, &c.] They that are without any clothes to cover them, lying down at the bottom of a hill or mountain, where the clouds often gather, and there break, or the ſnow at the top of them melts thro' the heat of the day; and whether by the one or by the other, large ſtreams of water run down the mountains, and the naked poor, or ſuch who are thinly clothed, are all over wet therewith, as Nebuchadnezzar's body was with the dew of heaven, when he was driven from men, and lived among beaſts: and embrace the rock for want of a ſhelter; or habitation, as the Targum; having no houſe to dwell in, nor any raiment to cover them, they were glad to get into the hole of a rock, in a cave or den there, and where ſome good men in former times were obliged to wander, Heb. xi. 38. and whither mean perſons in the time and country in which Job lived, were driven to dwell in, ſee ch. xxx. 6.

℣. 9. They pluck the fatherleſs from the breaſt, &c.] Either on purpoſe to ſtarve it, which muſt be extremely barbarous; or to ſell it to be brought up a ſlave; or by obliging the mother to wean it before the due time, that ſhe might be the better able to do work for them they obliged her to. Mr. Broughton renders the words, of miſchievouſneſs they rob the fatherleſs; that is, through the greatneſs of the miſchief they do, as Ben Gerſom interprets it; or through the exceeding miſchievous diſpoſition they are of, of which this is a flagrant inſtance; or "they rob the fatherleſs of what remains for him after ſpoiling," or devaſtation, through the plunder of his father's ſubſtance now dead, which was exceeding cruel: and take a pledge of the poor; either the poor himſelf, or his poor fatherleſs children, ſee 2 Kings iv. 1. or what is upon the poor [o], as it may be rendered; that is, his raiment, which was commonly taken for a pledge; and by a law afterwards eſtabliſhed in Iſrael, was obliged to be reſtored before ſun-ſet, that he might have a covering to ſleep in, Exod. xxii. 26, 27. ſee the note on ch. xxii. 6.

℣. 10. They cauſe him to go naked without clothing, &c.] Having taken his raiment from him for a pledge, or refuſing to give him his wages for his work, whereby he might procure clothes to cover him, but that being with-held, is obliged to go naked, or next to it: and they take away the ſheaf from the hungry; the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, ears of corn, ſuch as the poor man plucked as he walked through a corn-field, in order to rub them in his hand, and eat of, as the diſciples of Chriſt, with which the Phariſees were offended, Luke vi. 1. and which, according to a law in Iſrael, was allowed to be done, Deut. xxiii. 25. but now ſo ſevere were theſe wicked men to theſe poor perſons, that they took away from them ſuch ears of corn: but it is more likely that this ſheaf was what the poor had gleaned, and what they had been picking up ear by ear, and had bound up into a ſheaf, in order to carry home and beat it out, and then grind the corn of it, and make a loaf of it to ſatisfy their hunger; but ſo cruel and hard-hearted were theſe men, that they took it away from them, which they had been all, or the greateſt part of the day, picking up; unleſs it can be thought there was a cuſtom in Job's country, which was afterwards a law among the Jews, that if a ſheaf was forgotten by the owner, and left in the field when he gathered in his corn, he was not to go back for it, and fetch it, but leave it to the poor, Deut. xxiv. 19. but theſe men would not ſuffer them to have it, but took it away from them; or the words may be rendered, as they are by ſome, the hungry carry the ſheaf [p]; that is, of their rich oppreſſive maſters, who having reaped their fields for them, and bound up the corn in ſheaves, carry it home for them; and yet they do not ſo much as give them food for their labour, or wages to purchaſe food to ſatisfy their hunger, and ſo dealt with them worſe than the oxen were, according to the Jewiſh law, which were not to be muzzled when they trod out the corn, but might eat of it, Deut. xxv. 4.

℣. 11. Which make oil within their walls, &c.] Not the poor within their own walls; as if the ſenſe was, that they made their oil in a private manner within the walls of their houſes, or in their cellars, leſt it ſhould be known and taken away from them; for ſuch can't be thought to have had olive-yards to make oil of; rather within the walls of their rich maſters, where they were kept cloſe confined to their work, as if in a priſon; or within the walls and fences of their olive-yards, where their olive-preſſes ſtood; or beſt of all within the rows [q] of their their olive-trees, as the word ſignifies, where having gathered the olives, they preſſed out the oil in the fats; and this they did at noon, in the heat of the day, as the word [r] for making oil is obſerved by ſome to ſignify, and yet had nothing given them to quench their thirſt, as follows: and tread their wine-preſſes, and ſuffer thirſt; after having gathered their grapes from their vines for them, they trod them in the wine-preſſes, and made their wine, and yet would not allow them to drink of it to allay their thirſt.

[k] בלילו migma ſuum, Bolducius; farraginem ejus vel ſuam, Tigurine verſion, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Cocceius, Michaelis. [l] Ουκ αυτων, Sept. non ſuum, V. L. ſo the Targum, and Aben Ezra, Grotius, Codurcus. [m] וכרם רשע ילקשו & in vinea (aliena) vindemiant impii, Tigurine verſion; vineaſque vindemiant impii, Caſtalio. [n] במשך per devaſtationem, ſome in Munſter; poſt vaſtationem, Tigurine verſion; ſo Nachmanides & Bar Tzemach. [o] על עני ſuper inopem, Cocceius, Schultens; ſo Ben Gerſom. [p] ורעבים נשאו עמר & famelici geſtant manipulum, Tigurine verſion, Mercerus; ſo Schultens, Michaelis. [q] בין שורתם inter ordines, Mercerus, Piſcator, Cocceius; ſo Sephorno, and ſome in Eliæ Tiſhbi, p. 241.

℣. 12. Men groan from out of the city, &c.] Becauſe of the oppreſſions and injuries done to them, ſo that not only the poor in the country that were employed in the fields, and olive-yards, and vine-yards, were uſed exceeding ill; but even in cities, where not only are an abundance of people, and ſo the outrages committed upon them, which made them groan, were done openly and publickly, with great inſolence and impudence, but where alſo courts of judicature were held, and yet in defiance of law and juſtice were thoſe evils done, ſee Eccl. iii. 16. and the ſoul of the wounded crieth out; that is, the perſons wounded with the ſword, or any other inſtrument of vengeance, ſtabbed as they went along the public ſtreets of the city, where they fell, theſe cried out vehemently as ſuch perſons do; ſo audacious, as well as barbarous, were theſe wicked men, that inſulted and abuſed them: yet God layeth not folly to them; it is for the ſake of this obſervation, that the whole above account is given of wicked men, as well as what follows; that though they are guilty of ſuch atrocious crimes, ſuch inhumanity, cruelty and oppreſſion in town and country, unheard-of, unparalleled iniquities, ſins to be puniſhed by a judge, yet are ſuffered of God to paſs with impunity. By folly is meant ſin, not leſſer ſins only, little fooliſh, trifling things, but greater and groſſer ones, ſuch as before expreſſed; all ſin is folly, being the breach of a law which is holy, juſt and good, and expoſes to its penalty and curſe; and againſt God the lawgiver, who is able to ſave and to deſtroy; and as it is hurtful and prejudicial, either to the characters, bodies, or eſtates of men, and eſpecially to their immortal ſouls; and yet God that charges his angels with folly did not charge theſe men with it; that is, he ſeemed in the outward dealings of his Providence towards them, as if he took no notice of their ſins, but connived at them, or took no account of them, and did not take any methods in his providence to ſhew their folly, and convince them of it, nor diſcover it to others, and make them publick examples, did not puniſh them, but let them go on in them without controul; and this Job obſerves, in order to prove his point, that wicked men are not always puniſhed in this life.

℣. 13. They are of thoſe that rebel againſt the light, &c.] The light of nature, acting contrary to the dictates of their own conſciences, in being guilty of the inhumanity, barbarity and cruelty they were chargeable with in the above inſtances; or the light of the law, as the Targum; though as yet the law of the ten commandments was not in being; or however was not known to theſe perſons; or againſt God himſelf who is light, and in him no darkneſs at all, is clothed with it, and is the father of lights unto his creatures, the light of lights, and the light of the world, from whom all light, natural, ſpiritual, and eternal, ſprings; which is the ſenſe of moſt of the Jewiſh commentators [s]; and every ſin is a rebellion againſt God, and betrays the enmity of the carnal mind to him, is an act of hoſtility againſt him, and ſhews men to be enemies in their minds to him: they know not the ways thereof; the ways of light, but prefer the ways of darkneſs to them; or the ways of God, the ways of his commandments, which he has preſcribed for men, and directed them to walk in; theſe they know not, are wilfully ignorant of, deſire not the knowledge of them, and will be at no pains to get any acquaintance with them; or they approve not of them, they are not pleaſing to them, and they chuſe not to walk in them: nor abide in the paths thereof; if at any time they are got into the paths of light, truth and righteouſneſs, or in the ways of God's commandments, and do a few good actions, they don't continue therein, but quickly go out of the way again, leave the paths of righteouſneſs to walk in the ways of darkneſs, Prov. ii. 13. Some interpreters underſtand theſe words entirely of natural light, and of men who are like owls and bats that flee from the light, who are authors of the works of darkneſs, and do what they do in the dark ſecretly, and hate the light, and don't chuſe to come unto it, that their deeds may not be reproved; and ſo now Job enters upon the account of another ſett of men different from the former, who did what they did openly, in the face of the ſun, and before all men; but theſe he is now about to deſcribe, are ſuch who commit iniquity ſecretly and privately, and inſtances in the murderer, adulterer, and thief, in the following verſes.

℣. 14. The murderer riſing with the light, &c.] The light of the morning, before the ſun is riſen, about the time the early traveller is ſet out on his journey, and men go to diſtant markets to buy and ſell goods, and the poor labourer goes forth to his work; then is the time for one that is uſed to commit robbery and murder, to riſe from his bed, or from his lurking-place, in a cave or a thicket, where he has lain all night, in order to meet with the above perſons: and ſo killeth the poor and needy; takes away from them the little they have, whether money or proviſions, and kills them becauſe they have no more, and that they may not be evidence againſt him; it may be meant of the poor ſaints and people of God, whom the wicked ſlay out of hatred to them: and in the night is as a thief; kills privately, ſecretly, at an unawares, as the thief does his work; or the as here is not a note of ſimilitude or likeneſs, but of reality and truth; and ſo Mr. Broughton renders the words, and in the night he will be as a thief; in the morning he is a robber on the highway, and a murderer; all the day he is in his lurking-place, in ſome haunt or another, ſleeping or carouſing; and when the night comes on, then he acts the part of a thief; in the morning he not only robs, but murders, that he mayn't be detected; at night he only ſteals, and not kills, becauſe men are aſleep, and ſee him not.

℣. 15. The eye alſo of the adulterer waiteth for the twilight, &c.] Not of the morning, which would not give him time enough to ſatiate his luſt, but of the evening, that he may have the whole night before him to gratify his impure deſires, and that theſe may be indulged in the moſt private and ſecret manner; and having fixed the time in the evening with his adultereſs, he waits with impatience, and earneſtly wiſhes and longs for its coming, and diligently looks out for the cloſe of day, and

[r] יצהירי meridiati ſunt, V. L. ſo Bolducius, Schultens. Tzemach.

[s] Aben Ezra, Ben Gerſom, Sephorno, Bar

and takes the firſt opportunity of the darkneſs of the evening to ſet out on his adventure, ſee Prov. vii. 7—9. and the eye is particularly obſerved, not only becauſe that is the inſtrument by which the twilight is diſcerned, and is induſtriouſly employed in looking out for it, but is full of adultery, as the apoſtle Peter expreſſes it, 2 Pet. ii. 14. it is what is the inlet to this ſin, the leader-on to it, the caterer for it, and the nouriſher and cheriſher of it, ſee ch. xxx. 1. ſaying, no eye ſhall ſee me; no eye of man, which ſuch an one is careful to guard againſt; and eſpecially the eye of the huſband of the adultereſs, whoſe raging jealouſy will not ſpare the adulterer, but take revenge on him by an immediate diſpatch of him. And few care to have it known by any, that they are guilty of this ſin, becauſe it brings diſhonour and reproach upon them, which cannot be wiped off; the fact of Abſalom going into his father's concubines in the ſight of all Iſrael, and lying with them in the face of the ſun, is the moſt notorious inſtance of this kind to be read; uſually both ſexes chuſe the utmoſt ſecreſy. Potiphar's wife took the opportunity to tempt Joſeph when none of the men of the houſe were within; and when Amnon intended to force his ſiſter, he ordered all the men to be had out of the room: and moreover, the adulterer fooliſhly fancies, that God ſees him not, or at leaſt is not concerned about that; though there is no darkneſs where ſuch workers of iniquity can hide themſelves from his all-ſeeing eye, the darkneſs and the light are both alike to him. Theſe men are like the oſtrich, which thruſting its head into a thicket, as Tertullian [t] obſerves, fancies it is not ſeen; ſo children cover their faces, and becauſe they ſee none, think that no body ſees them; and as weak and childiſh a part do ſuch act, who imagine that their evil deeds, done in the dark, are not ſeen by him, before whom every creature is made manifeſt, and all things are naked and open: and diſguiſeth his face; puts a maſk upon it, that he may not be known by any he meets, when upon his amorous adventure, as harlots uſed to cover themſelves with a vail, Gen. xxxviii. 14, 15.

℣. 16. In the dark they dig thro' houſes, which they had marked for themſelves in the day-time, &c.] Which ſome underſtand of adulterers laſt mentioned, who having obſerved where beautiful women dwell, mark their houſes, and the way to them, and the beſt way into them, and in the dark get in at windows, or by breaking open doors get to the perſons they luſt after; but as ſuch ſteps would be neither ſafe nor prudent, ſo they are not neceſſary; ſuch ſort of perſons get admittance in an eaſier way, either by bribing ſervants, or by a previous agreement with the adultereſs herſelf: rather this is to be underſtood of the thief and his companions, before ſpoken of; or deſigns another ſort of thieves, ſuch as are guilty of burglary, houſe-breakers, who in the day-time go about and obſerve ſuch houſes as are full of money, plate, and rich goods, ſee ch. iii. 15. and take diligent notice of the way to them, and which is the beſt and eaſieſt part to get into them, and perhaps ſet on them a private mark that they may know them; theſe they break up, the walls, or doors, or windows, and get in at them, and rob, and plunder, and carry off all they can; the ſame ſins were committed, and the ſame methods of committing them were uſed, formerly as now; there was a law in Iſrael concerning houſe-breaking, Exod. xxii. 2. and our Lord alludes to it, Matt. xxiv. 43, 44. Some render the words, they ſeal up, or ſhut up themſelves in the day; [u] in their caves, and dens, and lurking places, and don't appear, and ſcarce ever ſee the light, and therefore it follows: they know not the light; it is ſeldom or ever ſeen by them, or they don't approve of it, like it, and love it, being not for their purpoſe; whilſt it is light they can do nothing, that manifeſtly diſcovers and betrays them, and therefore they hate it; and in a figurative ſenſe they know not, or do not approve of the light of nature, which checks and controuls ſuch evil actions, and accuſes them of them; nor the light of God's word, or holy law, which forbids them, and therefore they deſpiſe it, and caſt it away from them, and will not be ſubject to it; nor God himſelf, who is light, and againſt whom their carnal minds are enmity; and whatever knowledge they have of him, or profeſs to have, in works they deny him, and live without him, as atheiſts in the world.

℣. 17. For the morning is to them even as the ſhadow of death, &c.] It is as diſagreeable, and as hateful, and as terrible to them as the groſſeſt and thickeſt darkneſs can be to others. The word יחדו is to be rendered either alike or altogether, and not even as in our verſion: the morning is to them equally or together [w]; that is, to the murderer, robber, thief, adulterer, and houſe-breaker, as the ſhadow of death; alike diſagreeable to them all; or the ſhadow of death is to them together or alike as the morning; what the morning is to others, exceeding pleaſant and delightful, that to them is the ſhadow of death, or the darkeſt night; they love darkneſs rather than light: if one know them, they are in the terrors of the ſhadow of death; they are frightened unto death, they are in as great terror as a man is, to whom death is the king of terrors; and who is ſenſible of the near approach of it, the plain and manifeſt ſymptoms of it being upon him: this is the caſe of the murderer, adulterer, and thief, when they are catched in the fact; or are known by ſuch who are capable of giving notice of them, detecting them, and bearing witneſs againſt them: or he, each and every one of theſe, knows the terrors of the ſhadow of death [x]; the darkeſt night, which ſtrikes terrors into others, is known by them, is delighted in by them, is familiar with them, and friendly to them, and is as pleaſing as the brighteſt day to others.

℣. 18. He is ſwift as the waters, &c.] Or upon the face of the waters [y]; which ſome interpret of another ſett and ſort of wicked men, guilty of like crimes, not on land, but upon the mighty waters; pirates, ſuch that commit robberies upon the high ſeas, who generally chuſe the ſwifteſt veſſels to run from place to place for their prey, and to carry off their booty when purſued; whoſe manner of life is deteſtable to other perſons; and eſpecially they are curſed by thoſe on land, who ſuffer by robbing the ſhips of their goods they ſend abroad; but theſe men beſt like ſuch a manner of life, and prefer it to any thing by land, to agriculture or cultivation of vineyards, which they

[t] De Virgin. Veland. c. 17.

[u] חתמו למו σφραγισαν εαυτες, Sept. includunt ſeſe, ſome in Mercerus; ſo Druſius; ſemet ſigillant, Schultens.

[w] Pariter, Pagninus, Montanus, &c.

[x] יכיר בלהות צלמות agnoſcit terrores umbræ mortis, Mercerus, Cocceius; ſo Codurcus, Schmidt.

[y] על פני מים ſuper faciem aquarum, Mercerus, Bolducius, Beza, Druſius, Schultens.

they have no regard unto, as is ſuppoſed to be intimated by the following clauſes; but it is greatly to be queſtioned, whether there were any ſuch perſons, or that ſuch practices obtained ſo early as the times of Job. Schultens thinks Sodomites are meant, who are moſt profuſe to luſt, and flow in it like water, plow the accurſed field, by going after ſtrange fleſh, and have no regard to lawful marriage, or honeſt wives, comparable to vines and vineyards; but I ſhould rather think thoſe guilty of the ſin of Onan are meant, who have no regard to the propagation of poſterity. Others, as Ben Gerſom, are of opinion, that this refers to the above perſons, murderers, adulterers, and thieves; who, being conſcious of their crimes and due deſerts, and in danger of being taken up, and brought to juſt puniſhment, flee to the ſea with all the haſte they can, take ſhipping, and go abroad into foreign parts; where they dwell in deſolate and uncultivated places of the earth, which are curſed, or nigh unto curſing, and never more ſee pleaſant fields, gardens, orchards, and vineyards: though others ſuppoſe that theſe words deſcribe the temper and diſpoſition of ſuch wicked perſons, who are unſtable as water, carried about as any light thing upon the water with every wind of temptation, run ſwiftly into evil, and make haſte to commit ſin; though it ſeems beſt of all, to interpret the words as reſpecting the ſtate of wicked men at death, who then paſs away ſwiftly and ſuddenly as gliding waters, and are lighter or ſwifter than the waters, as Mr. Broughton renders the words: their portion is curſed in the earth; that part and portion of the good things of this world they have, is with a curſe; their very bleſſings are curſed, and what they leave behind has a curſe entailed on it, and, in proceſs of time, is blaſted, and comes to nothing; for the curſe of the Lord is in the houſe of the wicked, Prov. iii. 33. he beholdeth not the way of the vineyards; as in their life-time they had no regard to the way of good and righteous men, of whom Jarchi in a myſtical ſenſe interprets the vineyards; ſo at death they are taken away from all their worldly enjoyments they ſet their hearts upon; their places know them no more, and they no more ſee their fields, and vineyards, and oliveyards, and take no more walks unto them nor in them.

℣. 19. Drought and heat conſume the ſnow-waters, &c.] Melt the ſnow into water, and dry up that, which is done eaſily, quicky, and ſuddenly: ſo doth the grave thoſe which have ſinned; all have ſinned, but ſome are more notorious ſinners than others, as thoſe here meant; and all die and are laid in the grave, and are conſumed; hence the grave is called the pit of corruption and deſtruction, becauſe bodies are corrupted and deſtroyed in it, and which is the caſe of all, both good and bad men; but the metaphor here uſed to expreſs it by, of the conſumption of ſnow-water by drought and heat, denotes either that the death of theſe perſons is ſudden and violent, and in ſuch a manner are brought to the grave, conſumed there; that they die a ſudden death, and before their time, and don't live out half the days, which, according to the courſe of nature, they might have lived; or it was expected by them and others they would; whereas they are ſnatched away, as the word ſignifies, as ſuddenly and violently as ſnow-waters are by the drought and heat; or elſe, that their death is quick, quiet, and eaſy, as ſnow is quickly diſſolved, and the water as ſoon, and as eaſily dried up by the drought and heat; they do not lie long under torturing diſeaſes, but are at once taken away, and ſcarce feel any pain; they die in their full ſtrength, wholly at eaſe, and quiet; which ſenſe well anſwers Job's ſcope and deſign, ſee ch. xxi. 23. Pſ. lxxiii. 4. Some render the words, in the drought and heat they rob, and in the ſnow-waters[z]; that is, they rob at all times and ſeaſons of the year, ſummer and winter; and this is their conſtant trade and employ; they are always at it, let the weather be what it will: and they ſin unto the grave, or hell[a]; they continue in their wicked courſe of life as long as they live, until they are brought to the grave; they live and die in ſin.

℣. 20. The womb ſhall forget him, &c.] His mother that bore him; or his wife, by whom he had many children; or his friend, as Gerſom, who had a tender and affectionate reſpect for him; theſe all, and each of them, either becauſe of his wicked life and infamous death, care not to ſpeak of him, but bury him in oblivion; or becauſe of his quiet and eaſy death, are not diſtreſſed with it, but ſoon forget him; unleſs this is to be underſtood of the womb of the earth, in which being buried, he lies forgotten, to which the next clauſe agrees; though ſome interpret it of God himſelf, the word having the ſignification of mercy[b]; who, though mercy itſelf, is rich and abundant in it, yet has no mercy for, nor ſhews any favour to, ſuch men; but they lie in the grave among thoſe whom he remembers no more, in a way of grace and favour, Pſ. lxxxv. 5. the worm ſhall feed ſweetly on him; for being brought to the grave at once, without any waſting diſtemper, is a fine repaſt for worms, his breaſts being full of milk, and his bones moiſtened with marrow, and full of fleſh; or the worm is ſweet, unto him[c]; he feels no pain by its feeding on him, and ſo the ſenſe is juſt the ſame with that expreſſion, the clods of the valley ſhall be ſweet unto him, ch. xxi. 33. he ſhall be no more remembered; with any mark of honour and reſpect; his memory ſhall rot with him, whilſt the righteous are had in everlaſting remembrance; or rather dying a common death, and not made a public example of: and wickedneſs ſhall be broken as a tree; that is, wicked men, who are wickedneſs itſelf, extremely wicked, and are like to a tree, ſometimes flouriſhing in external proſperity, having an affluence of the things of this world, and always like barren and unfruitful trees, with reſpect to grace and good works; theſe, when the ax of death is laid to the root of them, they are cut down, and their ſubſtance comes to nothing, and their families are deſtroyed, and ſo they become like trees ſtruck with thunder and lightening, and broken into ten thouſand ſhivers; or, as the trees in Egypt were broken to pieces, by the plague of hail, Exod. ix. 25.

℣. 21. He evil-intreateth the barren, that beareth not, &c.] Here Job returns, to give ſome farther account of the ſins of ſome wicked men, who proſper in this world, and go through it with impunity; and ſpeaks of ſuch that uſe their wives ill, becauſe they are barren, upbraid them with it, and are churliſh to them on account of it; or uſe them ill that they may be barren, and bear no children, having no pleaſure in them, as not in vineyards, before, ver. 18. and ſome interpret this of deflouring virgins, who never bore children, and of uſing methods

[z] ב deficit; ſo ſome in Simeon, Bar Tzemach. uſque ad ſepulchrum, Mercerus; ſome in Druſius. Bolducius; ſo Tigurine verſion, Grotius.

[a] שאול חטאו, ad infernum uſque peccarunt, Schmidt;

[b] רחם miſericordia, V. L. miſeratio, Montanus, methods to make them abortive, when with child: the word we tranſlate evil intreateth, ſometimes ſignifies joining to, or being a companion of others, as in Prov. xiii. 20. hence various ſenſes are given; ſome, he joins himſelf to a barren woman, that he may have no children, being not deſirous of any; others, he joins himſelf to, and is a companion of harlots, who are commonly barren; and, like the prodigal, ſpends his ſubſtance among them. Some interpreters take this and the following verſe, as expreſſive of the puniſhment of wicked men; ſo Mr. Broughton renders the words, he adjoineth the barren [d], and gives the ſenſe of them thus; God ſends after him a barren wife, that he ſhall have no help by children; but, though a numerous offspring has been reckoned an outward happineſs, and not to have any an infelicity, yet it has been the caſe of many good men and women to be childleſs; wherefore love and hatred are not known hereby: beſides, ſuch a ſenſe is contrary to the ſcope and deſign of Job, which is to prove, that wicked men often go unpuniſhed in this life; wherefore, rather the meaning is, that a wicked man uſes ill ſuch, who having not only loſt their huſbands, but having been barren, and ſo childleſs, have none to take their part, and to protect and defend them from the abuſes of ſuch men: the Targum renders the word, he breaketh, and ſo ſome underſtand it [e]; he breaketh the barren, tears them to pieces, ruins and deſtroys them, as to their outward ſubſtance, becauſe they have no children to help them; with which agrees what follows, and doth not good to the widow; does not make her glad and chearful, as Job did, who made the widow's heart to ſing for joy, ch. xxix. 13. does not relieve and aſſiſt her when in diſtreſs, either by counſel and advice, or by adminiſtring to her neceſſities; but on the contrary, afflicts and oppreſſes her; takes her ox, or her raiment for a pledge, and plunders her houſe, and devours the ſubſtance of it; for more is intended than is expreſſed.

[c] מתקו dulceſcit ei, Beza, Piſcator; ſuavis, Cocceius; ſo Michaelis, Schultens.

℣. 22. He draweth alſo the mighty with his power, &c.] Such a wicked man not only mal-treats the weak, the helpleſs, and the defenceleſs, but even attacks the mighty and powerful; ſuch as are in great power and authority, and abound in wealth and riches, only ſomewhat inferior in both to himſelf; wherefore, by his ſuperior force, he draws them to be of his party, to join with him in acts of rapine and violence, oppreſſion and cruelty; or he draws them by power or policy, or by both, as the wicked man does the poor with his net, Pſ. x. 9. and ſo makes a prey of him and his ſubſtance. Some underſtand this of the puniſhment of wicked men, and interpret it, as Jarchi does, of God's drawing him to puniſhment; God ſometimes does indeed draw and hurl the mighty from their ſeats; though they are ſet in high, yet in ſlippery places, and are brought down to deſtruction in a moment; and he will draw them all to his judgment-ſeat hereafter, whether they will or no, and ſend them into everlaſting puniſhment; but the former ſenſe is beſt: he riſeth up, and no man is ſure of life; he riſes up in the morning, either from his bed, or from his lurking-place, where he was all night with a murdering intention, and no man he meets with is ſafe, but in the utmoſt danger of his life, ver. 14. or, he riſes in the world to great power and dignity, and increaſes in wealth and riches, which he abuſes to the hurt of others; ſo that they flee from him and hide themſelves, not caring to truſt their life with him, Prov. xxviii. 28. or he riſeth up againſt a man in an hoſtile way, and againſt whomſoever he does, they are in the utmoſt jeopardy, and cannot be ſecure of their lives; though this alſo is by ſome interpreted as the puniſhment of a wicked man, who, when he riſes in the morning, truſteth not his own life [f], as the words may be rendered, and as they are in the margin of our bibles; but his life is in ſuſpence, being ſurrounded with a thouſand dangers, and has no aſſurance of it, and is in continual fear, and often fears where no fear is; ſee Deut. xxviii. 66. or, if a man riſes up againſt him, the wicked tyrant and cruel oppreſſor, he the tyrant is not ſure of his life, but may be ſlain by him that riſes up againſt him; but the former ſenſe is beſt.

℣. 23, Though it be given him to be in ſafety, &c.] or he gives him [g], that is, it is God gives the wicked man to be in ſafety, notwithſtanding all his wickedneſs; for Job having deſcribed the wicked man, now repreſents him as in the greateſt proſperity: ſafety is of God in every reſpect, not only the ſafety of good men, both in a way of providence, and in a way of grace, but even of bad men; thoſe are often preſerved from the incurſions and depredations of others, and their goods are kept, and they poſſeſs them in peace, and they dwell ſecure and confidently without care. The Vulgate Latin verſion is widely different, "God gives him place of repentance, and he abuſes it to pride;" though the Targum ſomewhat agrees with it, "he gives to him repentance, that he may truſt, or be confident and be ſupported:" ſo God gave ſpace to repent to the old world; to whoſe caſe ſome Jewiſh writers apply the context, ſee Gen. vi. 3. Luke xvii. 26, 27. whereon he reſteth; being in proſperity and ſafety, he truſts to it, and depends upon it, it will ever be the caſe; he has much goods laid up for many years, and therefore ſings requiem to his ſoul, ſaying, take thine eaſe; to-morrow will be as this day, and much more abundant; things will always be as they are, or better: yet his eyes are upon their ways; or and his eyes [h], that is, the eyes of God, which are upon all men good and bad; and upon all their ways and works; theſe are upon the wicked man and all his courſes; not to puniſh him now for his ſins; for, though he ſees all his wicked actions, not one eſcapes his notice, yet he lays not folly to him, nor charges him with it, nor inflicts puniſhment on him for it; nay, his eyes are upon him to proſper and ſucceed him in all he does; which is the uſual ſenſe of the phraſe, unleſs where there is an explanation, or any thing ſaid to ſhew the contrary; ſee Deut. xi. 12. Some give a different ſenſe of the words, as that ſuch that fear the wicked man give him gifts, that they may be in ſafety, in which they truſt; or he gives them his hand, or his word, or both, that they ſhall be, on which they rely; but his eyes are upon them, watching their ways and works, to take every opportunity and advantage againſt them; but the former is beſt.

℣. 24. They are exalted for a little while, &c.] To ſeats of honour, to places of profit and truſt, to great wealth and riches, to be highly eſteemed among among men, and to have a large affluence of the good things of life; ſee Mal. iii. 15. though this exaltation, dignity, and glory, wealth and riches, laſt but for a little time; this life at longeſt being but ſhort, like a vapour that appears, and ſoon vaniſhes away; and then all a man's honours, and glory, riches and ſubſtance, are at an end, who is ſoon cut down as the graſs, and withers as the green herb, Pſ. xxxvii. 2. but as this pretty much falls in with the ſentiment of Zophar, or ſeems to do ſo, ch. xx. 5. rather this phraſe, for a little while, may be joined with what follows, a little while and they are gone; out of the world, to their own place, and death puts an end to all their proſperity, to all their outward enjoyments, which yet they retain till death: or they are not [i]; in the land of the living, in their houſes and ſhops, and places of trade and commerce; they are no more about their buſineſs, and in their callings of life, nor in the poſſeſſion of their worldly eſtates; the places which knew them, know them no more; and this comes to paſs in a very little time; their honour is ſhort-lived, and their earthly portion is not for ever: and brought low; not diminiſhed in their ſubſtance in life, nor leſſened in their honour and grandeur, nor are brought into poverty and diſgrace; but are brought at laſt to death, and laid low in the grave, and are fed upon by worms, and reduced to rottenneſs and duſt: they are taken out of the way, as all others; out of the world, by death, and out of the way of others; who come in their room, and were hoping for their death, and waiting for their poſts of honour, and places of profit, or for their worldly eſtates; and out of the way of doing more miſchief, and eſpecially to good men: or they are cloſed or ſhut up [k]; that is, in the grave, where they lie impriſoned until the reſurrection-morn, and out of which priſon none can releaſe themſelves; nor will they be releaſed, until Chriſt, who has the keys of the grave, unlocks it, and ſets the priſoners free; but then all this is no other than what befals the reſt of mankind; all die, and muſt die, and all are brought to the grave, and laid in that, and ſhut up in it, which is the houſe appointed for all living: and cut off as the tops of the ears of corn; when they are fully ripe at harveſt-time; it being uſual in ſome places, as I have ſomewhere read, when they gather their corn, only to cut off the ears of corn at the top, which is very eaſily and quickly done; and ſo this may denote the quiet and eaſy death of wicked men, and when they are come to a full age, and are like a ſhock of corn in its ſeaſon, ch. v. 26.

[d] רעה עקרה conſociat ei ſterilem, Junius & Tremellius. [e] Pagninus, Montanus, Bolducius, Piſcator, Mercerus, Druſius. [f] יאמין בחייו non fidit ſuæ vitæ, Tigurine verſion, Piſcator; ſo V. L. [g] יתן לו dat ei, Piſcator, Mercerus, i. e. Deus, Beza, Druſius, Michaelis. [h] ועיניהו & ejus, Pagninus, Montanus, Bolducius, Beza, Cocceius, Schultens.

℣. 25. And if it be not ſo now, &c.] If this is not the caſe of men of ſuch wicked lives as above deſcribed, do not proſper in the world, and increaſe in riches, and do not paſs through the world with impunity, and die quietly, in the full poſſeſſion of their honour and wealth: who will make me a liar? where is the man, let him ſtand forth and appear, and diſprove what has been ſaid, and make out the doctrine delivered to be falſe doctrine, and a lie? for no lie is of the truth: and make my ſpeech nothing worth; vain, uſeleſs, and unprofitable; truth is valuable, like gold, ſilver, and precious ſtones; but error is as wood, hay, and ſtubble, and nothing worth, yea, to be deteſted and rejected; or let him make what I have ſaid to ſtand for nothing [l]; let him ſhew if he can, that it is impertinent, and not to the purpoſe, that it does not prove the point for which it is brought: thus Job was willing to have what he had ſaid tried by every method that could be made uſe of, that it might appear whether what he had ſaid was true or falſe, worthy to be regarded, or worthleſs; and he here bids defiance to his friends, or to any other, and triumphs over them, as having gained his point; and, as it appears by the ſequel, he had, at leaſt in a great meaſure, and however with reſpect to this matter, that good men are afflicted in this life, and wicked men proſper; of which there are many inſtances.

CHAP. XXV.

THIS chapter contains Bildad's reply to Job, ſuch an one as it is; in which, declining the controverſy between them, he endeavours to diſſuade him from attempting to lay his cauſe before God, and think to juſtify himſelf before him, from the conſideration of the majeſty of God, deſcribed by the dominion he is poſſeſſed of; the fear creatures ſtand in of him; the peace he makes in his high places; the number of his armies, and the vaſt extent of his light, ℣. 1, 2, 3. and from the impoſſibility of man's being juſtified with him, or clean before him, argued from thence, ℣. 4. and which is farther illuſtrated by a compariſon of the celeſtial bodies with men, and by an argument from the greater to the leſs, that if they loſe their luſtre and purity in his ſight, much more man, a mean, deſpicable worm, ℣. 5, 6.

℣. 1. Then anſwered Bildad the Shuhite, &c.] Not to what Job had juſt now delivered, in order to diſprove that, that men, guilty of the groſſeſt crimes, often go unpuniſhed in this life, and proſper and ſucceed, and die in peace and quietneſs, as other men; either becauſe he was convinced of the truth of what he had ſaid, or elſe becauſe he thought he was an obſtinate man, and that it was beſt to let him alone, and ſay no more to him, ſince there was no likelihood of working any conviction on him; wherefore he only tries to poſſeſs his mind of the greatneſs and majeſty of God, in order to deter him from applying to God in a judicial way, and expecting redreſs and relief from him; and ſaid as follows.

℣. 2. Dominion and fear are with him, &c.] Not with man, as Sephorno interprets it, as that with him is power to rule over the imagination (the evil figment of his heart) to chuſe the good, and refuſe the evil; and with him is fear of puniſhment, and alſo the fear of God to reſtrain him from evil; but with God, as may eaſily be perceived from the whole context, though his name is not expreſſed in this clauſe, and not till ℣. 4. this dominion he is poſſeſſed of is univerſal; his kingdom rules over all, over all the angels, good and bad; over all men, over all the nations of the world, and the great men in it, the kings and princes of it; and over all, of every age, ſex, and condition: and it is abſolute and uncontroulable; he governs according to his will, and is not to be controuled in his ways; nor is he accountable to any for what he does,

[i] ואיננו & non ipſe, Montanus, Bolducius; & non ſunt, Schultens. Montanus; clauduntur, Piſcator. Piſcator, Mercerus, Cocceius, Michaelis, Schultens.

[k] יקפצון claudentur, Pagninus,

[l] לאל ad nihilum, Pagninus, Montanus; ſo Junius & Tremellius, does, and his kingdom is an everlasting one, and his dominion for ever and ever: and by the fear that is with him, is not meant actively, with which he fears; for he is afraid of none, be they ever so great and mighty, ch. xxii. 4. but passively, with which he is feared; for holy and reverend is his name, and so his nature, and all that belong to him; he is feared by the angels in heaven, who cover their faces before him, and cast their crowns at his feet, and by the saints on earth, in whose assemblies he is served with reverence and godly fear; and should be stood in awe of by all the inhabitants of the world, because of the glory of his nature, the greatness of his works, and the goodness of his providence: He maketh peace in his high places; in the high places of his earth, and among the great men of it, creating and commanding peace, and causing war among them to cease, whenever it is his pleasure; and in the regions of the air, where, though there are often thunder and lightening, storms and tempests of wind, hail and rain, yet, when he says, Peace, be still, all is serene and quiet; and in the orbs of the heaven, the sun, moon, and stars, which know their appointed times and seasons, and keep their place or course, and do their work and office in the easy and most chearful manner; and among the angels in the highest heaven, which are properly his high places, who, though their numbers are so great, and they themselves thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers, and have various offices and different work assigned them, readily do his will, and are in the utmost harmony and concord among themselves, shew no reluctance to him, nor any discord to each other: now Bildad would have Job consider whether he could think himself so significant, that cognizance would be taken of him and his cause, by so great, glorious, and majestic a Being; or, that he would suffer his high places, where peace reigned, to be disturbed by his noise and brawl.

℣. 3. Is there any number of his armies? &c.] His armies in heaven, the heavenly host of angels, which are innumerable; there are more than twelve legions of them, thousand and ten thousand times ten thousand, employed in a military way, for the safety and preservation of the saints; see Gen. xxxii. 1, 2. Ps. xxxiv. 7. and the sun, moon, and stars, often called the host of heaven, the latter of which cannot be numbered, and which fought in their courses against Sisera, Judg. v. 20. and his armies on earth, all the inhabitants of it; yea, every creature, even the smallest insect in it, which are without number: thus, frogs, lice, flies, and locusts, were the armies of God, with which he fought against Pharaoh and the Egyptians, see Joel ii. 11. 20. and upon whom doth not his light arise? either natural light, that grand luminary the sun, which rises on all, the evil and the good, nor is any thing hid from the light and heat of it; or moral light, the light of nature, with which every one that comes into the world is enlightened by him; or the light of providential goodness, which is unto all, and over all his creatures; the whole earth is full of it, and all the inhabitants have a share in it; nor is any thing hid from his all-piercing, all-penetrating, all-seeing eye, who is light itself, and dwells in light inaccessible, and from which light nothing can be hid.

℣. 4. How then can man be justified with God?] Since he sees all his ways and works, his secret as well as open sins; either be more just than he, as Eliphaz expresses it, ch. iv. 17. which no man in his senses will say; or just as he is, and upon a level with him, or in comparison of him, or before him, and in his sight: and this is what Job himself denies, ch. ix. 2. for however righteous a man may be in his own sight, or in the sight of others, he cannot of himself be justified in the sight of God; nor can any be justified with him by his own righteousness, because the best righteousness of man is imperfect; and, if Bildad thought this was the sentiment of Job, he mistook him; for, what he meant by coming to the seat of God, and ordering his cause before him, ch. xxiii. 2, 3. to which Bildad seems to refer, and being judged by him, when he doubted not but he should be acquitted, was no other than the justification of his cause, and not of his person before God; or that he should be cleared of the imputation of hypocrisy, and of being the sinner and wicked man, and guilty of very bad things, though secret and private, for which he was afflicted; for otherwise Job knew full well that he could not be justified with God by his own personal righteousness, for he knew himself to be a sinner, and owns it; nor did he think himself perfect, and his righteousness a compleat one; and therefore he expected not to be justified by it; he knew his living Redeemer, and believed in him for righteousness, and expected the justification of his person, and his acceptance with God, only by him; and in this way there are many that are justified with God secretly, in foro dei, in the court of God, and in his sight, who always beholds his people as righteous in Christ, and openly, in foro conscientiæ, in the court of confcience, when they believe in him; and who will be publicly justified, and declared righteous at the day of judgment: or how can he be clean that is born of a woman? which suggests a doctrine, that Job as firmly believed as Bildad did, that all men are unclean by natural generation, or as they are born into the world; their ancestors being such, the more immediate, and the more remote, which may be traced up to the first man and woman, ch. xiv. 4. so that as no man is clean and pure as God is, or in comparison of him, or in his sight; they can neither be naturally clean, nor so of themselves, by any means or methods they can make use of; but then they may be, as many are, clean by the blood of Christ, and grace of God, through which his people are cleansed from all their sins, and all their iniquities, and are without spot before the throne and in the sight of God.

℣. 5. Behold even to the moon, &c.] If all things that are glorious and illustrious in the lower world, and which are between that and the region of the moon, are beheld; or all from the seat of the divine majesty, down to that glorious luminary, are viewed, they lose all their lustre and brightness, when compared with the divine Being; and it, even that itself shineth not; it is darkened, confounded, and ashamed; it hides its beautiful face, and draws in its borrowed and useful light, at the approach of him, who is light itself, and in whom is no darkness at all: or it tabernacles not[n]; has no tabernacle to abide in, as is said of the sun, Ps. xix. 4. or does not expand and spread its light, as a tent[o] or tabernacle is spread; it does not diffuse, but contracts it.

[n] ולא יאהיל & non ponet tabernaculum, Montanus, Bolducius; so Schmidt, Schultens. [o] Non expandet lumen suum in modum tentorii, Complutenses apud Bolduc.

it. No mention is made of the ſun, not becauſe that ſhines in its own light, which the moon does not; but perhaps, becauſe the controverſy between Job and his friends was held in the night, when the moon and the ſtars were only ſeen, and therefore only mentioned; otherwiſe, what is here obſerved equally holds good of the ſun as of the moon; ſee Iſ. xxiv. 23. yea, the ſtars are not pure in his ſight; as there are ſpots in the ſun and in the moon, ſeen by the eye of man, aided and aſſiſted, ſo ſuch may be ſeen by God in the ſtars alſo, and in theſe, both in a natural and in a myſtical ſenſe; as by them may be meant the angels of heaven, even thoſe are not pure in the ſight of God, and in compariſon of him, the moſt perfectly pure and holy Being; ſee ch. iv. 18. and xv. 15.

℣. 6. How much leſs man, that is a worm, &c.] Whoſe original is of the earth, dwells in it, and is ſupported by it, and creeps into it again; who is impure by nature and by practice, weak and impotent to do any thing that is ſpiritually good, or to defend himſelf from his ſpiritual enemies; and is mean and deſpicable, as even the beſt of men are, in their own eyes, and in the eyes of the world: and, if the beſt of men are comparable to ſuch creatures, and our Lord himſelf, in human nature, was content to be called a worm, and no man; what muſt the worſt of men be, or man be in and of himſelf, without the grace of God and righteouſneſs of Chriſt, by which he can be only clean and righteous! ſee Iſ. xli. 31. Pſ. xxii. 6. and, if the celeſtial bodies above-mentioned are eclipſed of all their brightneſs and glory, in the preſence of God; what a contemptible figure muſt man make in the court of heaven, who, in compariſon of them, is but a worm, and much more ſo, as appearing before God? and the ſon of man, which is a worm; which is repeated with a little variation for the confirmation of it; or it may ſignify, that even the firſt man was no other than of the earth earthy, and ſo are all his ſons. The Targum is, "how much more man, who in his life is a reptile, and the ſon of man, who in his death is a worm?" to which may be added, that he is in his grave a companion for the worms; and indeed it appears by the obſervations made through microſcopes, that man, in his firſt ſtate of generation, is really a worm[p]; ſo that, as Pliny ſays[q], one that is a judge of things, may pity and be aſhamed of the ſorry original of the proudeſt of animals. By this ſhort reply of Bildad, and which contains little more than what had been before ſaid, it is plain that he was tired of the controverſy, and glad to give out.

CHAP. XXVI.

IN this chapter Job, in a very ſarcaſtic manner, rallies Bildad on the weakneſs and impertinence of his reply, and ſets it in a very ridiculous light; ſhewing it to be quite fooliſh and ſtupid, and not at all to the purpoſe, and beſides, was none of his own, but what he had borrowed from another, ver. 1—4 and if it was of any avail in the controverſy, to ſpeak of the greatneſs and majeſty of God; of his perfections and attributes; of his ways and works; he could ſay greater and more glorious things of God than he had done, and as he does, ver. 5—13. beginning at the lower parts of the creation, and gradually aſcending to the ſuperior and celeſtial ones; and concludes with obſerving, that after all, it was but little that was known of God and his ways, by himſelf, by Bildad, or by any mortal creature, ℣. 14.

℣. 1. But Job anſwered, and ſaid, &c.] In a very ſharp and biting manner: one would wonder, that a man in ſuch circumſtances, ſhould have ſo much keenneſs of ſpirit, and deal in ſo much irony, and be maſter of ſo much ſatire, and be able to laugh at his antagoniſt in the manner he does; and ſaid, as follows.

℣. 2. How haſt thou helped him that is without power, &c.] This and the two following verſes either are to be underſtood of God, as many do, by reading the words, who haſt thou helped, God[r]? a fine advocate for him thou art repreſenting him as if he was without power, and could not help himſelf, but ſtood in need of another; as if he had no arm, and could not ſave and protect himſelf, but needed one to riſe and ſtand up in his behalf, when he is God omnipotent, and has an arm ſtrong and mighty, and there is none like his; and, as if he wanted wiſdom, and one to counſel him, when he is the all-wiſe God, and never conſults with any of his creatures, or admits them to be of his council; and as if his eſſence[s], or what he is, as he is, had been very copiouſly and plentifully declared in a few words by him; in ſuppoſing which he muſt be guilty of the greateſt arrogance, ſtupidity, and folly; and therefore he aſks him, who it was he uttered ſuch things unto, and by whoſe ſpirit he muſt be aided in ſo doing? ſee ch. xiii. 7, 8. or elſe Job refers to the cauſe undertaken by Bildad; and which he, in a ſarcaſtic way, repreſents as a very weak and feeble one, that had neither ſtrength nor wiſdom in it, and was as weakly and as fooliſhly ſupported, or rather was entirely neglected and deſerted, Bildad having wholly declined thething in controverſy, and ſaid not one word of it; therefore Job ironically aſks him, in what, or wherein haſt thou helped[t]? what good haſt thou done to this poor tottering cauſe of your's? or what light haſt thou thrown upon it? and to what purpoſe is any thing that has been ſaid by thee? Some are of opinion, that Job refers to Bildad's friends, whom he repreſents as weak and ſtupid, as men of no argument, and had no ſtrength of reaſoning, and were as poorly aſſiſted and defended by Bildad: but, why not to Bildad himſelf? for the ſenſe of the queſtion agreeable enough to the original text, may be put after this manner; a fine patron and defender of a cauſe thou art; thou canſt help and ſave a dying cauſe without power, and with a ſtrengthleſs arm, or without any force of argument, or ſtrength of reaſoning; thou canſt give counſel without any wiſdom, without any ſhew or ſhare of it, and in half a dozen lines ſet the thing in a true light, juſt as it is and ſhould be; a wonderful man indeed thou art! though I chuſe to join with ſuch interpreters, who underſtand the whole of

[p] Lewenhoeck apud Scheuchzer. Phyſic. Sacr. vol. 4. p. 721. Vid. Philoſoph. Tranſact. Abridged, vol. 2. p. 912, 913.
[q] Nat. Hiſt. l. 7. c. 7.
[r] מה עזרת cui auxiliatis es, Pagninus, Montanus; ſo Tigurine verſion.
[s] הנשיות eſſentiam, Montanus, of Job himſelf, who was without might and power, a weak and feeble creature in body and mind, being preſſed and broken with the weight of his affliction, but was poorly helped, ſuccoured, ſtrengthened, and comforted with what Bildad had ſaid: it is the duty of all good men, and it is what Job himſelf had done in former times, to ſtrengthen weak hands and feeble knees, by ſympathizing with perſons under affliction, by bearing their burdens and infirmities, by ſpeaking comfortably unto them, and telling them what comforts they themſelves have received under afflictions, ſee ch. iv. 3, 4. but miſerable comforters of Job were Bildad and his friends: how ſaveſt thou the arm that hath no ſtrength? the ſenſe is the ſame as before, that he had done nothing to relieve Job in his bodily or ſoul-diſtreſſes, and ſave him out of them; nor had contributed in the leaſt towards his ſupport under them; and be it that he was as weak in his intellectuals as he and his friends thought him to be, and had undertaken a cauſe which he had not ſtrength of argument to defend; yet, what had he done to convince him of his miſtake, and ſave him from the error of his way?
[t] Qua nam re adjuviſti? Vatablus; quid auxiliatus es? Druſius.

℣. 3. How haſt thou counſelled him that hath no wiſdom? &c.] A man deprived of wiſdom has need of counſel, and it ſhould be given him; and he does well both to aſk and take it; and be it ſo, as if Job ſhould ſay, that I am the fooliſh and unwiſe creature you take me to be, what counſel and advice have you given me? what a wiſe counſellor have you ſhewn yourſelf to be? or rather, what a miſerable part have you acted under this character? and how haſt thou plentifully declared the thing as it is? the thing in controverſy, ſet it forth in a clear light, and in a copious manner, when he had not ſaid one word about it, namely, concerning the afflictions of the godly, and the proſperity of the wicked; thus jeering at him, and laughing at the ſhort reply he had made, and which was nothing to the purpoſe.

℣. 4. To whom haſt thou uttered words? &c.] That others know not; doſt thou think thou art talking to an ignorant man? be it known to thee, that he knows as much, and can ſay as much of the divine Being, of his glories, and of his wondrous ways and works as thyſelf, or more? or doſt thou conſider the circumſtances he is in thou art ſpeaking to? one under great affliction and diſtreſs, to whom it muſt be unſuitable to talk of the greatneſs and majeſty of God, of his power, and ſtrength, of his purity, holineſs, and ſtrict juſtice; it would have been more proper and pertinent to have diſcourſed concerning his loving-kindneſs, grace, and mercy, his pity and compaſſion towards his afflicted people, his readineſs to forgive their ſins, and overlook their failings; and concerning the promiſed Redeemer, his righteouſneſs and ſacrifice, and of the many inſtances of divine goodneſs to the ſons of men, and in ſuch like circumſtances, by raiſing them up again, and reſtoring them to their former happineſs. Some things of this nature would have been more pertinent and ſuitable, and would have been doing both a wiſe and friendly part: and whoſe ſpirit came from thee? Not the ſpirit of God; doſt thou think thyſelf inſpired by God? or that what thou haſt ſaid is by the inſpiration of his Spirit? or that thou ſpeakeſt like ſuch who are moved by the Holy Ghoſt? nor indeed was it his own ſpirit, or the words and things uttered were not of himſelf, or flowed not from his own knowledge and underſtanding of things, but what he had borrowed from Eliphaz; for he had delivered very little more than what Eliphaz had ſaid, ch. iv. 17, 18. and xv. 14, 15. or elſe the ſenſe is, whoſe ſpirit has been reſtored, revived, refreſhed, and comforted by what thou haſt ſaid? The word of God has ſuch efficacy as to reſtore the ſoul, to revive it when drooping, and as it were ſwooning away and dying, ſee Pſ. xix. 7. and xxiii. 3. and the words of ſome good men are ſpirit and life, the ſavour of life unto life, and are as life from the dead, very refreſhing and comforting; but no ſuch effect followed on what Bildad had ſaid. Mr. Broughton renders the words, whoſe ſoul admired thee? thou mayeſt admire thyſelf, and thy friends may admire thee, at leaſt thou mayeſt think they do, having ſaid in thine own opinion admirable things; but who elſe does? for my own part I do not; and, if ſaying great and glorious things of God are to any purpoſe in the controverſy between us, I am capable of ſpeaking greater and better things than what have been delivered; and for inſtance, let the following be attended to.

℣. 5. Dead things are formed from under the waters, &c.] It is difficult to ſay what things are here meant; it may be underſtood of lifeleſs things, as Mr. Broughton renders it; things that never had any life, things inanimate, that never had at leaſt an animal life, though they may have a vegetable one; and ſo may be interpreted of grains of corn, and which indeed die before they are quickened; to which both Chriſt and the apoſtle allude, John xii. 24. 1 Cor. xv. 36. and which, as they cannot grow without water, and their fructification and increaſe are owing to the earth being plentifully watered with rain, may be ſaid to be formed under the waters; and of theſe Aben Ezra and Ben Gerſom interpret the words; and the latter alſo makes mention of herbs, plants, and trees in the ſea, particularly almug trees, as being probably intended; to which may be added, corals, and other ſea-plants, formed from under the waters; yea, ſome make mention of woods and foreſts there; but the laſt mentioned writer ſeems inclined to think, that metals and minerals may be intended; and it is well known, that much of gold is taken out of rivers, as alſo pearls and precious ſtones; and that iron is taken out of the earth, and braſs molten out of ſtone; and that the ſeveral metals and minerals are dug out of mountains and hills, from whence fountains and rivers flow; but as the word uſed has the ſignification of ſomething gigantic, it has inclined others to think of ſea-monſters, as of the great whales which God made in the ſeas, and the leviathan he has made to play therein: and or with the inhabitants thereof; the innumerable company of fiſhes, both of the larger and leſſer ſort, which are all formed in and under the waters: but why may not giants themſelves be deſigned, ſince the word is ſometimes uſed of them, Deut. ii. 11. and iii. 11. and ſo the Vulgate Latin, and the Septuagint verſion here render the word, and may refer to the giants that were before the flood, and who were the cauſes of filling the world with rapine and violence, and ſo of bringing the flood of waters upon it; in which they periſhed with the inhabitants thereof; or their neighbours; of whom ſee Gen. vi. 4. and vii. 23. and the ſpirits of theſe being in priſon, in hell, as the apoſtle Peter ſays, 1 Pet. iii. 19, 20. which is commonly ſuppoſed to be under the earth, and ſo under the waters, in which they periſhed; they may be repreſented as in pain and torment, and groaning and trembling under the ſame, as the word here uſed is by ſome thought to ſignify, and is ſo rendered [t]; though as the word Rephaim is often uſed of dead men, Pſ. lxxxviii. 10. Iſ. xiv. 9. and xxvi. 14, 19. it may be underſtood of them here, and have reſpect to the formation of them anew, or their reſurrection from the dead, when the earth ſhall caſt them forth; and eſpecially of thoſe whoſe graves are in the ſea, and who have been buried in the waters of it, when that ſhall deliver up the dead that are therein, Rev. xx. 13. which will be a wonderful inſtance of the mighty power of God. The Targumiſt ſeems to have a notion of this, or at leaſt refers unto it, paraphraſing the words thus, "is it poſſible that the mighty men (or giants) ſhould be created (i. e. recreated or regenerated; that is, raiſed from the dead); ſeeing they are under the waters, and their armies?"

℣. 6. Hell is naked before him, &c.] Which may be taken either for the place of the damned, as it ſometimes is; and then the ſenſe is, that though it is hidden from men, and they know not where it is, or who are in it, and what is done and ſuffered there; yet it is all known to God: he knows the place thereof, for it is made, ordained, and prepared by him; he knows who are there, even all the wicked dead, and all the nations that forget God, being caſt there by him; he knows the torments they endure, for the ſmoke of them continually aſcends before him; and he knows all their malice and envy, their enmity to him, and blaſphemy of him; for thither are they gone down with their weapons of war, and have laid their ſwords under their heads, Ezek. xxxii. 27. or for Hades, the inviſible world of ſpirits, or ſtate of the dead, as the Septuagint verſion renders the word; though that is unſeen to men, it is naked and open to the eye of God; or for the grave, in which the bodies of men are laid; which is the frequent ſenſe of the word uſed, Pſ. lxxxviii. 11, 12. Iſ. xxxviii. 18. and though this is a land of darkneſs, and where the light is as darkneſs, yet God can look into it; and the duſt of men therein is carefully obſerved and preſerved by him, and will be raiſed again at the laſt day; who has the keys of death and hell, or the grave, and can open it at his pleaſure, and cauſe it to give up the dead that are therein: and deſtruction hath no covering; and may deſign the ſame as before, either hell, the place of the damned, where men are deſtroyed ſoul and body with an everlaſting deſtruction; or the grave, which the Targum calls the houſe of deſtruction, as it ſometimes is, the pit of deſtruction and corruption; becauſe bodies caſt into it corrupt and putrify, and are deſtroyed in it; and there is nothing to cover either the one or the other from the all-ſeeing eye of God; ſee Pſ. cxxxix. 7—10. Prov. xv. 11. as hell is ſuppoſed to be under the earth, and the grave is in it, Job is as yet on things below, and from hence riſes to thoſe above, in the following words.

℣. 7. He ſtretcheth out the north over the empty place, &c.] The northern hemiſphere, which is the chief and beſt known, at leaſt it was in the time of Job; when the ſouthern hemiſphere might not be known at all; though if our verſion of ch. ix. 9. is right, Job ſeems to have had knowledge of it. Scheuchzer [u] thinks the thick air fartheſt north is meant, which expands itſelf every where, and is of great uſe to the whole earth. But if the northern hemiſphere is meant, as a learned [w] man expreſſes it, it "was not only principal as to Job's reſpect, and the poſition of Arabia, but becauſe this hemiſphere is abſolutely ſo indeed, 'tis principal to the whole; for as the heavens and the earth are divided by the middle line, the northern half hath a ſtrange ſhare of excellency; we have more earth, more men, more ſtars, more day (the ſame alſo Sephorno, a Jewiſh commentator on the place obſerves) and which is more than all this, the north pole is more magnetical than the ſouth:" though the whole celeſtial ſphere may be intended, the principal being put for the whole; even that whole expanſion, or firmament of heaven, which has its name from being ſtretched out like a curtain, or canopy, over the earth; which was done when the earth was Tohu, empty of inhabitants, both men and beaſts, and was without form and void, and had no beauty in it, or any thing growing on it; ſee Gen. i. 2, 6, 7, 8. and hangeth the earth upon nothing; as a ball in the air [x], poiſed with its own weight [y], or kept in this form and manner by the centre of gravity; and ſo ſome Jewiſh writers [z] interpret nothing of the center of the earth; and which is nothing but ens rationis, a figment and imagination of the mind; or rather the earth is held together, and in the poſition it is, by its own magnetic virtue, it being a loadſtone itſelf; and as the above learned writer obſerves, "the globe conſiſteth by a magnetical dependency, from which the parts cannot poſſibly ſtart aſide; but which, howſoever thus ſtrongly ſeated on its center and poles, is yet ſaid to hang upon nothing; becauſe the creator in the beginning thus placed it within the Tohu, as it now alſo hangeth in the air; which itſelf alſo is nothing as to any regard of baſe or ſuſtentation." In ſhort, what the foundations are on which it is laid, or the pillars by which it is ſuſtained, cannot be ſaid, except the mighty power and providence of God. The word uſed ſeems to come from a root, which in the Syriac and Chaldee languages ſignifies to bind and reſtrain; and may deſign the expanſe or atmoſphere, ſo called from its binding and compreſſing nature, על in or within which the earth is hung; ſee Pſ. xxxii. 9.

℣. 8. He bindeth up the waters in his thick clouds, &c.] The clouds are of his making; when he utters his voice, or gives the word of command, there is a multitude of waters in the heavens; and the vapours he exhales from the ends of the earth and forms them into clouds, and they are his chariots, in which he rides up and down in the heavens, and waters his gardens and plantations on earth; ſee Jer. x. 13. Pſ. civ. 3. which may be ſaid to be thick in compariſon of the air, in which they are; otherwiſe they are but thin, and the thinner they are, the greater wonder it is, that the waters, and ſuch a heavy body of them, ſhould be bound up in them, as there often is; and which is ſtill more marvellous: and the cloud is not rent under them; under the waters, and through the weight of them; which if it was, would fall in vaſt water-ſpouts, and were ſuch to fall upon the earth, as

[t] יחוללו gemunt, V. L. cruciabuntur, Bolducius; cruciantur, dolore contremiſcunt, Michaelis; intremiſcunt, Schultens. Vid. Windet. de vita Funct. Stat. p. 90.
[u] Phyſic. Sacr. vol. 4. p. 724.
[w] Gregory's Notes and Obſervations, &c. c. 12. p. 55.
[x] Terra pilæ ſimilis nullo fulcimine nixa, Ovid. Faſt. 6.
[y] Circumfuſo pendebat in aere tellus, ponderibus librata ſuis—— Ovid. Metamorph. l. 1. fab. 1.
[z] Ben Gerſom & Bar Tzemach in loc.

as it may be ſuppoſed they did at the general deluge, they would deſtroy man and beaſt, and waſh off and waſh away the things of the earth: but God has ſo ordered it in his infinite wiſdom, and by his almighty power, that clouds ſhould not be thus rent, but fall in ſmall drops and gentle ſhowers, as if they paſſed through a ſieve or colander, whereby the earth is refreſhed, and made fruitful; ſee Job xxxvi. 26—29 and xxxvii. 16.

℣ 9. He holdeth back the face of his throne, &c.] His throne is the heaven of heavens; the face of it, or what is before it, is the ſtarry and airy heavens; this face of his throne is ſometimes held back, or covered with clouds, that ſo his throne is ſo far from being viſible, that even the face of it, or the outſide or external appearance of it, is not to be ſeen as follows: and ſpreadeth his cloud upon it; and both he and his throne are inviſible; clouds and darkneſs are round about him, and his pavilion round about are dark waters, and thick clouds of the ſkies, Pſ. xviii. 11. and xcvii. 2. and even the light in which he dwells, and with which he clothes himſelf is impervious to us, and is ſo dazzling, that itſelf covers and keeps back himſelf and throne from being ſeen by mortals. The Targum ſuggeſts, that what is here ſaid to be done, is done that the angels may not ſee it; but theſe always ſtand before the throne of God, and always behold the face of God himſelf.

℣. 10. He hath compaſſed the waters with bounds, &c.] Not the waters above the firmament, compaſſed by that, as if Job was contemplating on and diſcourſing about what is done in the heavens above; though the Targum ſeems to incline to this ſenſe, paraphraſing the words, "he hath decreed that the firmament ſhould be placed upon the face of the waters unto the end of light, with darkneſs;" but the waters of the ſea, Job deſcending now to conſider the waters of the great deep, and the wonderful reſtraint that is laid upon them; which is as aſtoniſhing as the binding up of the waters in the clouds without being rent by them; for this vaſt and unwieldy body of waters in the ocean, Jehovah manages with as much eaſe as a mother or nurſe does a new-born infant, makes the cloud its garment, and thick darkneſs a ſwadling band for it, ch. xxxviii. 8, 9. he has as it were with a compaſs drawn a line upon the face of it; he has broke up for it its decreed place, and ſet bars, and doors, and bounds to its waves, that they may come no farther than is his pleaſure, as is obſerved in the ſame place; the bounds he hath compaſſed it with are the ſhores, rocks, and clifts, ſo that the waters cannot return and cover the earth, as they once did; yea, which is very ſurprizing, he has placed the ſand, as weak and fluid as it is, for the bound of the ſea by a perpetual decree; ſo that though its waves toſs and roar, they cannot prevail, nor paſs over it; which muſt be owing to the almighty power, and ſovereign will of God, who has given the ſea a decree that its waters ſhould not paſs his commandment; and it muſt be aſcribed to his promiſe and oath that the waters no more go over the earth to deſtroy it; ſee Pſ. civ. 9. Jer. v. 22. Prov. viii. 27, 29. Iſ. liv. 9. until the day and night come to an end; that is, as long as there will be the viciſſitudes of day and night, till time ſhall be no more, as long as the world ſtands; for that thoſe ſhall continue ſo long are the ordinances of God, which ſhall never depart; and the covenant he has made, which ſhall never become void; wherefore as long as they remain, the ſea and its waters will be bounded as not to overflow the earth, Gen. viii 22. Jer. xxxi. 35, 36. and xxxiii. 20, 25. or until the end of light with darkneſs[a]; until both theſe have an end in the ſame form and manner they now have; otherwiſe after the end of all things there will be light in heaven, and darkneſs in hell. Aben Ezra interprets it thus, "unto the place which is the end of light, for all that is above it is light, and below it the reverſe;" he ſeems to have reſpect to the place that divides the hemiſpheres, where when one is light the other is dark; and ſo others ſeem to underſtand it of ſuch places or parts of the world, as are half day and half night, and where one half of the year is light, and the other dark; but the firſt ſenſe is beſt.

℣. 11. The pillars of heaven tremble, &c.] Which may be underſtood either of the air, the lower part of the heavens, which may be thought to be the foundation, prop, and ſupport of them, and is ſometimes called the firmament, and the firmament of his power, Pſ. cl. 1. and which ſeems to tremble when there are thunder and lightnings, and coruſcations in it; or elſe the mountains, which reaching up to the heavens, look as if they were the pillars and ſupport of them; and are indeed ſaid to be the foundations of heaven, which move and ſhake and tremble at the preſence and power of God, and at any expreſſions of his wrath and anger, and particularly through earthquakes and ſtorms, and tempeſts of thunder and lightning; ſee 2 Sam. xxii. 8. Pſ. lxviii. 8. which are meant by what follows: and are aſtoniſhed at his reproof; his voice of thunder, which is ſometimes awful and terrible, aſtoniſhing and ſurprizing; and to ſet forth the greatneſs of it, inanimate creatures are repreſented as trembling, and aſtoniſhed at it; ſee Pſ. civ. 17. ſome interpret this figuratively of angels, who they ſuppoſe are employed in the direction of the heavens, and the motion of the heavenly bodies; and who they think are the ſame which in the new teſtament are called the powers of heaven ſaid to be ſhaken, Matt. xxiv. 29. and to be the ſeraphim that covered their faces upon a glorious diſplay of the majeſty of God, and when the poſts of the door of the temple moved at the voice of him that cried, Iſ. vi. 1—4. but if a figurative ſenſe may be admitted of, the principal perſons in the church, ſometimes ſignified by heaven in ſcripture, may be thought of; as miniſters of the word, who are pillars in the houſe of God; yea, every true member of the church of God, is made a pillar in it; and theſe tremble, and are aſtoniſhed oftentimes when the Lord rebukes them by afflictions, though it is in love and kindneſs to them, Prov. ix. 1. Gal. ii. 9. Rev. iii. 12.

℣. 12. He divideth the ſea with his power, &c.] As at the firſt creation, when the waters were cauſed to go off the face of the earth, and were ſeparated from it; and the one was called earth, and the other ſeas, Gen. i. 9, 10. or it may reſpect the diviſion of thoſe waters into divers ſeas and channels in the ſeveral parts of the world, for the better accommodation of the inhabitants of it, in reſpect of trade and commerce, and the more convenient ſupply of them with the various produce of different countries, and the tranſmitting of it to them: ſome ſome have thought this has reſpect to the diviſion of the Red Sea for the children of Iſrael to walk in as on dry land, when purſued by the Egyptians, ſuppoſed to be meant by Rahab in the next clauſe; rather it may deſign the parting of the waves of the ſea by a ſtormy wind, raiſed by the power of God, which lifts up the waves on high, and divides them in the ſea, and daſhes them one againſt another; wrinkles and furrows them, as Jarchi interprets the words, which is ſuch an inſtance of the power and majeſty of God, that he is ſometimes deſcribed by it, Iſ. li. 15. Jer. xxxi. 35. though the word uſed is ſometimes taken in a quite different ſenſe, for the ſtilling of the waves of the ſea, and ſo it is by ſome rendered here, he ſtilleth the ſea by his power [b]; the noiſe of its waves, and makes them quiet, and the ſea a calm, which has been exceeding boiſterous and tempeſtuous, and is taken notice of as an effect of his ſovereign and uncontroulable power, Pſ. lxv. 7. and cvii. 25—29. and may be obſerved as a proof of our Lord's divinity, whom the winds and ſea obeyed, to the aſtoniſhment of the mariners, who were convinced thereby that he muſt be ſome wonderful and extraordinary perſon, Matt. viii. 26, 27. and by his underſtanding he ſmiteth through the proud; the proud waves of the ſea, and humbles them, and makes them ſtill as before; or the proud monſtrous creatures in it, as whales and others, particularly the Leviathan, the king over all the children of pride, ch. xli. 34. ſee Pſ. lxxiv. 13, 14. The word uſed is Rahab, one of the names of Egypt, Pſ. lxxxvii. 4. Iſ. li. 8. and ſo Jarchi interprets it of the Egyptians, who were ſmitten of God with various plagues, and particularly in their firſt-born, and at laſt at the Red-ſea, where multitudes periſhed, and Pharaoh their proud king, with his army; who was an emblem of the devil, whoſe ſin, the cauſe of his fall and ruin, was pride; and the picture of proud and haughty ſinners, whoſe deſtruction ſooner or later is from the Lord; and which is an inſtance of his wiſdom and underſtanding, who humbles the proud, and exalts the lowly.

[a] עד תכלית אור עם חשך uſque ad finem lucis cum tenebris, Cocceius, Michaelis; ſo Targum & Sept.

v. 13. By his ſpirit he hath garniſhed the heavens, &c.] The viſible heavens, with the ſun, moon and ſtars with which they are ſtudded and beſpangled, and look exceeding beautiful; and the inviſible heavens, with angels, the morning-ſtars, and glorified ſaints, who eſpecially in the reſurrection-morn will ſhine not only like ſtars, but as the ſun in the firmament of heaven; and the church which is the heaven below is garniſhed with goſpel-miniſters, adorned with the gifts and graces of the Spirit of God: his hand hath formed the crooked ſerpent; becauſe Job in the preceding clauſe has reſpect to the heavens and the ornament of them, this has led many to think that ſome conſtellation in the heavens is meant by the crooked ſerpent, either the galaxy, or milky way, as Ben Gerſom and others; or the dragon-ſtar, as ſome in Aben Ezra [c]: but rather, Job deſcends again to the ſea, and concludes with taking notice of the wonderful work of God the Leviathan, with which God himſelf concludes his diſcourſe with him in the cloſe of this book, which is called as here the crooked or bar-ſerpent, Iſ. xxvii. 1. and ſo the Targum underſtands it, "his hand hath created Leviathan, which is like unto a biting ſerpent." Some underſtand it of the crocodile, and the epithet agrees with it, whether it be rendered a bar-ſerpent, as ſome [d]; that is, ſtraight, ſtretched out, long, as a bar, the reverſe of our verſion; or fleeing [e], as others; the crocodile being, as Pliny [f] ſays, terrible to thoſe that flee from it, but flees from thoſe that purſue it. Jarchi interprets it of Pharaoh, or Leviathan, both an emblem of Satan, the old ſerpent, the devil, who is God's creature, made by him as a creature, though not made a ſerpent, or a devil, by him, which was of himſelf. Some have obſerved the Trinity of perſons in theſe words, and who doubtleſs were concerned in the creation of all things; here is Jehovah, of whom the whole context is; and his ſpirit, who, as he moved upon the face of the waters at the firſt creation, is here ſaid to beautify and adorn the heavens; and his hand, his ſon, the power and wiſdom of God, by whom he made all things.

v. 14. Lo, theſe are parts of his ways, &c.] This is the concluſion of the diſcourſe concerning the wonderful works of God; and Job was ſo far from thinking that he had taken notice of all, or even of the chief and principal, that what he obſerved were only the extremities, the edges, the borders, and outlines of the ways and works of God in creation and providence; wherefore, if theſe were ſo great and marvellous, what muſt the reſt be which were out of the reach of men to point out and deſcribe? but how little a portion is heard of him? from the creatures, from the works of creation, whether in heaven, earth, or ſea; for tho' they do declare in ſome meaſure his glory, and tho' their voice is heard every where, and ſhews forth the knowledge of him; even exhibits to view his inviſible things, his eternal power and godhead; yet it is comparatively ſo faint a light, that men grope as it were in the dark, if haply they might find him, having nothing but the light of nature to guide them. We hear the moſt of him in his word, and by his ſon Jeſus Chriſt, in whoſe face the knowledge of him, and his glorious perfections, is given; and yet we know but in part, and propheſy in part; it is but little in compariſon of what is in him, and indeed of what will be heard and known of him hereafter in eternity: but the thunder of his power who can underſtand? meaning not literally thunder, which though it is a voice peculiar to God, and is very ſtrong and powerful, as appears by the effects of it; ſee ch. xl. 9 Pſ. xxix. 3—9. yet is not ſo very unintelligible as to be taken notice of ſo peculiarly, and to be inſtanced in as above all things out of the reach of the underſtanding of men; but rather the attribute of his power, of which Job had been diſcourſing, and giving ſo many inſtances of; and yet there is ſuch an exceeding greatneſs in it, as not to be comprehended and thoroughly underſtood by all that appear to our view; for his mighty power is ſuch as is able to ſubdue all things to himſelf, and reaches to things we cannot conceive of. Ben Gerſom not amiſs applies this to the greatneſs and multitude of the decrees of God; and indeed if thoſe works of his which are in ſight, cannot be fully underſtood by us, how ſhould we be able to underſtand things that are ſecret and hidden in his own breaſt, until by his mighty power they are carried into execution? ſee 1 Cor. ii. 9.

CHAP.

[b] רגע הים pacavit mare, Bolducius; quieſcit mare ipſum, Vatablus; ſo Sept. and Ben Gerſom. [c] So Dickinſon. Phyſic. vet. & vera, c. 9. §. 23, p. 137. [d] נחש ברח ſerpentem vectem, Pagninus, Cocceius; oblongum inſtar vectis, Schmidt; oblongum, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator; longa trabe rectior. Vide Metamorph. l 3. fab. 1. v. 78. [e] Fugacem, Montanus, Vatablus; fugiens, Codurcus. [f] Nat. Hiſt. l. 8. c. 25.

CHAP. XXVII.

THOUGH Job's friends were become ſilent, and dropped the controverſy with him, he ſtill continued his diſcourſe in this and the four following chapters; in which he aſſerts his integrity, illuſtrates and confirms his former ſentiments; gives further proof of his knowledge of things, natural and divine; takes notice of his former ſtate of proſperity, and of his preſent diſtreſſes and afflictions, which came upon him, notwithſtanding his piety, humanity, and beneficence, and his freedom from the groſſer acts of ſin, both with reſpect to God and men, all which he enlarges upon. In this chapter he gives his word and oath for it, that he would never bely himſelf, and own that he was an hypocrite, when he was not, but would continue to aſſert his integrity, and the righteouſneſs of his cauſe, as long as he lived, ℣. 1—6. for to be an hypocrite, and to attempt to conceal his hypocriſy, would be of no advantage to him, either in life, or in death, ℣. 7—10. and was this his character and caſe, upon their principles, he could expect no other than to be a miſerable man, as wicked men are, who have their bleſſings turned into curſes, or taken away from them, and they removed out of the world in the moſt awful and terrible manner, and under manifeſt tokens of the wrath and diſpleaſure of God. 11—23.

℣. 1. Moreover Job continued his parable, &c.] Having finiſhed his diſcourſe concerning the works and ways of God, and the diſplay of his majeſty, power and glory in them, he pauſes a while, waiting for Zophar, whoſe turn was next to riſe up, and make a reply to him; but neither he, nor any of his friends, reaſſumed the debate, but kept a profound ſilence, and choſe not to carry on the diſpute any further with him; either concluding him to be an obſtinate man, not open to conviction, and on whom no impreſſions could be made, and that it was all loſt time and labour to uſe any argument with him; or elſe being convicted in their minds, that he was in the right, and they in the wrong, though they did not chuſe to own it; and eſpecially being ſurprized with what he had laſt ſaid concerning God and his works, whereby they perceived he had great knowledge of divine things, and could not be the man they had ſuſpected him to be from his afflictions: however, though they are ſilent, Job was not, he added to take or lift up his parable [a], as the words may be rendered; or his oration, as Mr. Broughton, his diſcourſe; which becauſe it conſiſted of choice and principal things, which command regard and attention, of wiſe, grave, ſerious and ſententious ſayings, and ſome of them ſuch, as not eaſy to be underſtood, being delivered in ſimilies and figurative expreſſions, as particularly in the following chapter, it is called his parable; what are called parables being proverbial phraſes, dark ſayings, allegorical or metaphorical expreſſions, and the like: and which way of ſpeaking Job is here ſaid to take, and lift up, which is an eaſtern phraſeology, as appears from Balaam's uſe of it, Numb. xxiii. 7. and xxiv. 3, 15. and may ſignify, that he delivered the following oration with great freedom, boldneſs and confidence, and with a high tone and loud voice; to all which he might be induced by obſerving through the ſilence of his friends, that he had got the advantage of them, and had carried his point, and had brought them to conviction or confuſion, or however to ſilence, which gave him heart and ſpirit to proceed on with his oration, which he added to his former diſcourſe: and ſaid; as follows.

℣. 2. As God liveth, &c.] Which is an oath, as Jarchi obſerves, and is a form of one frequently uſed, ſee 2 Sam. ii. 27. and iv. 9. and is uſed by God himſelf, who becauſe he can ſwear by no greater, ſwears by himſelf, and by his life, which ever continues, as in Ezek. xviii. 3. and many other places; and ſo the angel of the Lord, even the increated angel, Dan. xii. 7. Rev. x. 6. and ſo ſhould men, when they ſwear at all, it ſhould be in this manner, ſee Jer. iv. 2. though this ought not to be but in caſes of moment and importance, for the confirmation of the truth, and to put an end to ſtrife, when it cannot be done any other way than by an appeal to God; as was the preſent caſe with Job, it being about hypocriſy, and want of integrity his friends charged him with; and ſuch a caſe can only be determined truly and fully by God, who is here deſcribed as the living God, by whom men ſwear, in oppoſition to the idols of the Gentiles, which are of gold, ſilver, wood and ſtone, and without life and breath, or to their deified heroes, who were dead men; but the true God is the living God, has life in and of himſelf, and is the fountain of life to others, the author and giver of life, natural, ſpiritual and eternal, and who himſelf lives for ever and ever; and as ſuch is the object of faith and confidence, of fear and reverence, of love and affection; all which ſwearing by him ſuppoſes and implies: it is a ſaying of R. Joſhuah, as Jarchi on the place relates it, "that Job from love ſerved God, for no man ſwears by the life of a king, but who loves the king:" the object ſwore by is further deſcribed, who hath taken away my judgment; not the judgment of his mind, or his ſenſe of judging things, which remained with him quick and ſtrong, notwithſtanding his afflictions; nor correction with judgment, which continued with him; but as the Targum paraphraſeth it, "he hath taken away the rule of my judgment;" that is, among men, his ſubſtance, wealth and riches, his former affluence and proſperity, which whilſt he enjoyed, he was reckoned a good man; but now all this being taken away by the hand of God as it was, he was cenſured as a wicked man, and even by his friends; or rather it is a complaint, that God had neglected the judgment of him, like that of the church in Iſ. xl. 27. that he did not ſtir up himſelf to his judgment, even to his cauſe, did not vindicate him, tho' he appealed to him, did not admit him to his judgment-ſeat, nor give his cauſe a hearing, and decide it, though he had moſt earneſtly deſired it; nor did he let him know the reaſon of his thus dealing and contending with him; yea he afflicted him ſeverely, tho' righteous and innocent, in which Job obliquely reflects upon the dealings of God with him; tho' he does not charge him with injuſtice, or break out into blaſphemy of him; yet this ſeems to be one of thoſe ſpeeches which God diſapproved of, and is taken notice of by Elihu with a cenſure, ch. xxxiv. 5. and the Almighty, who hath vexed my ſoul; with whom whom nothing is impoſſible, and who could eaſily have relieved him from his diſtreſſes; and who was Shaddai, the all-ſufficient Being, who could have ſupplied him with all things temporal and ſpiritual he wanted; yet inſtead of this vexed his ſoul with adverſity, with afflictions very grievous to him, his hand touching and preſſing him ſore: or hath made my ſoul bitter [b]; dealt bitterly with him, as the Almighty did with Naomi, Ruth i. 21. Afflictions are bitter things, they are like the waters of Marah, they are wormwood and gall, they cauſe bitter diſtreſs and ſorrow, and make a man go and ſpeak in the bitterneſs of his ſoul; and theſe are of God, to whom Job aſcribes his, and not to chance, and fortune; they were bitter things God appointed for him, and wrote againſt him.

[a] ויוסף שאת משלו & addidit aſſumere ſuam parabolam, Pagninus, Montanus.

℣. 3. All the while my breath is in me, &c.] So long the oath of God would be upon him, or he bound himſelf under it: and the Spirit of God is in my noſtrils; which ſignifies the ſame thing. The breath of a man is his ſpirit, and this is of God the father of ſpirits; he firſt breathed into man the breath of life, and he became a living ſoul or ſpirit; it is he that gives life and breath to every man, and continues it as long as he pleaſes, which is a very precarious thing; for it is in his noſtrils, where it is drawn to and fro, and ſoon and eaſily ſtopped; nor will it always continue, it will ſome time not be, it will go forth, and then man dies, and returns to the earth; but as long as there is breath, there is life; ſo that to ſay this, is the ſame as to ſay, as long as I live, or have a being; and whilſt that continued, Job looked upon himſelf under the oath he had taken by the living God.

℣. 4. My lips ſhall not ſpeak wickedneſs, &c.] This is the thing he ſwears to, this the matter of his oath, not only that he would not ſpeak a wicked word, not any thing corrupt, unſavoury, unchaſte, prophane and idle, nor ſpeak evil of his neighbours and friends, or of any man; but that he would not ſpeak wickedly of himſelf, as he muſt do, if he owned himſelf to be a wicked man, and an hypocrite, as his friends charged him, and they would have had him confeſſed; but he ſwears he would not utter ſuch wickedneſs as long as he had any breath in him: nor my tongue utter deceit; which reſpects the ſame thing; not merely any fallacy or lye, or what might impoſe upon and deceive another, which yet he was careful of; but ſuch deceit and falſhood as would be a belying himſelf, which would be the caſe ſhould he ſay, that he was devoid of integrity and ſincerity.

℣. 5. God forbid that I ſhould juſtify you, &c.] Not but that he counted them righteous and good men Godward; he did not take upon him to judge their ſtate, and to juſtify or condemn them with reſpect to their everlaſting condition; but he could not juſtify them in their cenſures of him, and ſay they did a right thing in charging him with wickedneſs and hypocriſy; nor could he juſtify them in all their ſentiments and doctrines which they had delivered concerning the puniſhment of the wicked in this life, and the happineſs that attends all good men; and that a man by his outward circumſtances may be known to be either a good man or a bad man; ſuch things as theſe he could not ſay were right; for ſo to do would be to call evil good, and good evil; and therefore he expreſſes his utmoſt abhorrence and deteſtation of ſhewing his approbation of ſuch conduct as theirs towards him, and of ſuch unbecoming ſentiments of God, and of his dealings, they had entertained; and to join in with which would be a prophanation and a pollution, as the word uſed by him ſignifies; he could not do it without defiling his conſcience, and prophaning truth: until I die, I will not remove my integrity from me; Job was an upright man both in heart and life, through the grace of God beſtowed on him; and he continued in his integrity, notwithſtanding the temptations of Satan, and his attacks upon him, and the ſolicitations of his wife; and he determined through the grace of God to perſiſt therein to the end of his life; tho' what he chiefly means here is, that he would not part with his character as an upright man, which he had always had, and God himſelf had bore teſtimony to; he would never give up this till he gave up the ghoſt; he would never ſuffer his integrity to be removed from him, nor remove it from himſelf, by denying that it belonged to him, which his friends bore hard upon him to do. So Jarchi paraphraſes it, "I will not confeſs (or agree) to your ſaying, that I am not upright;" the phraſe, till I die, ſeems rather to belong to the firſt clauſe, though it is true of both, and may be repeated in this.

℣. 6. My righteouſneſs I hold faſt, and will not let it go, &c.] Meaning not his perſonal righteouſneſs, or the righteouſneſs of his works, as his juſtifying righteouſneſs before God, and for acceptance with him; which no man that is convinced of the inſufficiency of, as Job was, will hold faſt, but renounce, and deſire, with the apoſtle Paul, not to be found in it, Phil. iii. 9. Indeed the righteouſneſs of his living Redeemer, which was his, and he might call ſo, this he knew, and knew he ſhould be juſtified by it, and which he laid hold upon by faith in the ſtrong exerciſe of it, and would not drop it, or become remiſs in it, but retain it, and conſtantly make mention of it, and plead it as his juſtifying righteouſneſs with God; but here he intends the righteouſneſs of his cauſe, which he always maintained ſtrongly, and was determined he ever would, and never give way, or let it drop, but continue to affirm, that he was a righteous man, and that it was not for any unrighteouſneſs he had done to any man, that God dealt thus with him; he had wronged no man, he had done juſtice to all men, as well as he was not devoid of the fear of God, and piety towards him; and this character of himſelf he would never give up, but defend to the uttermoſt: my heart ſhall not reproach me ſo long as I live; not that he imagined he ſhould or could live without ſin, ſo that his conſcience could never charge, accuſe or upbraid him with it; for there is no man, let him live a life ever ſo harmleſs and inoffenſive to God and man, but his heart will ſmite him, and condemn him for his ſins committed in thought, word and deed: but Job's ſenſe is, that he would never deny his integrity, or renounce the righteouſneſs of his cauſe, and own himſelf to be an inſincere and unrighteous man; ſhould he do this, he ſhould ſpeak contrary to his own conſcience, which would accuſe and reproach him for ſo ſaying, and therefore he was determined it never ſhould; for as long as he lived, he neither could nor would ſay any ſuch thing. Some render the laſt phraſe, for my days [c], or concerning them; for my courſe of life, all my days, ſo Jarchi; for that my heart ſhall not reproach me, as being conſcious to himſelf he had lived in all good conſcience to that that day, and truſted he ever ſhould; but the ſenſe before given is beſt.

[b] חמר נפשי affecit amaritudine animam meam, Pagninus. Montanus, Mercerus, Michaelis; ſo Sept. propter dies meos, Munſter; vel propter dies vitæ meæ, Michaelis; de diebus meis, Schultens.

[c] מימי

℣. 7. Let mine enemy be as the wicked, &c.] Job in this, and ſome following verſes, ſhews, that he was not, and could not, and would not be a wicked man and an hypocrite, or however had no opinion and liking of ſuch perſons; for whatever his friends might think of him, becauſe he had ſaid ſo much of their outward proſperity in this world; yet he was far from approving of, or conniving at their wickedneſs and hypocriſy, or chuſing them for his companions, and joining with them in their actions, or imagining they were really happy perſons; ſo far from it, that he would not be in their condition and circumſtances for all the world; for if he was to wiſh a bad thing to the greateſt enemy he had, he could not wiſh him any worſe than to be as a wicked and unrighteous man; that is, to be a wicked and unrighteous man; which it is impoſſible for a good man to wiſh, and indeed would be a needleſs wiſh, ſince all that are enemies to good men as ſuch, muſt be wicked; and ſuch were Job's enemies, as the Chaldeans and Sabeans; but that they might be as ſuch, in their ſtate and circumſtances, or rather as they will be in the conſequence of things, moſt wretched and miſerable; for they are always under the diſpleaſure of God, and hated by him; and whatever fulneſs they may have of the things of this world, they have them with a curſe, and they are curſes to them, and their end will be everlaſting ruin and deſtruction; wherefore the Septuagint verſion is, as the overthrow of the ungodly, and as the perdition of tranſgreſſors; though ſome take this to be a kind of an ironical imprecation, and that by the wicked man here, and unrighteous in the next clauſe, he means himſelf, whom his friends reckoned a wicked and unrighteous man; and then the ſenſe is, I wiſh you all my friends, and even the worſt enemies I have, were but as wicked Job is, as you call him; not that he wiſhed they might be afflicted in body, family and eſtate, as he was, but that they were as good men as he was, and partook of as much of the grace of God as he did, and had the ſame integrity and righteouſneſs as he had, ſee Acts xxvi. 29. and ſuch a wiſh as this, as it ſerves to illuſtrate his own character, ſo it breathes charity and good-will to others; and indeed it cannot be thought the words are to be taken in ſuch a ſenſe, as that he wiſhed the ſame evils might be retorted upon his enemies, whether open or ſecret, which they were the means of bringing upon him, which was contrary to the ſpirit of Job, ch. xxxi. 29, 30. Some conſider them not as an imprecation, but as a prediction, mine enemy ſhall be as the wicked[c]; and may have reſpect to his friends, who were ſo ready to charge him with wickedneſs, and ſuggeſts, that in the iſſue of things they would be found, and not he, guilty of ſin and folly, and to have ſaid the things that were not right, neither of God, nor of him, which had its accompliſhment, ch. xlii. 7. and he that riſeth up againſt me as the unrighteous; which is but another way of expreſſing the ſame thing; for an enemy, and one that riſes up againſt a man, is the ſame perſon; only this the better explains what enemy is intended, even an open one, that riſes up in an hoſtile manner, full of rage and fury; and ſo a wicked and an unrighteous man are the ſame, and are frequently put together as deſcribing the ſame ſort of perſons, ſee Iſ. lv. 7.

℣. 8. For what is the hope of the hypocrite, &c.] In religion; who ſeems to be what he is not, a holy and righteous man; profeſſes to have what he has not, the grace of God; pretends to do what he does not, worſhip God ſincerely and fervently, and does all he does to be ſeen of men; though ſuch a man may have an hope, as he has, of an intereſt in the divine favour, and of eternal glory and happineſs, what will it ſignify? what avail will it be unto him? what will it iſſue in? Job was of the ſame mind in this with Bildad and Zophar, that ſuch a man's hope is as the ſpider's web, and as the giving up of the ghoſt, ch. viii. 14. and xi. 20. however he may pleaſe himſelf with it in this life, it will be of no ſervice to him at death; for it is not like that of the true believer's, that is ſure and ſtedfaſt, and founded upon the perfect righteouſneſs and ſacrifice of Chriſt; but upon his outward ſubſtance, fanſying, that becauſe God proſpers him in this world, he is highly in his favour, and ſhall enjoy the happineſs of the world to come; and upon his external profeſſion of religion, and round of duties performed by him, but he'll find himſelf miſtaken: though he hath gained; great wealth and riches under a guiſe of religion, and by that means making gain of godlineſs, and taking the one for the other; ſo the Targum, "becauſe he hath gathered the mammon of falſhood;" and alſo has great gifts, and a great deal of head-knowledge, being able to talk of, and diſpute about moſt points of religion, and ſo has gained a great name among men both for knowledge and holineſs, and yet all will not ſtand him in any ſtead, or be of any advantage to him: when God taketh away his ſoul? out of his body by death, as a ſword is drawn out of its ſcabbard, and which is as eaſily done by him; or as a ſhoe is plucked off from the foot, as Aben Ezra, and what he has a right to do, and will do it: and this taking it away ſeems to be in a violent manner, though not by what is called a violent death, yet againſt the will of the perſon; a good man is willing to die, is deſirous of it, and gives up the ghoſt cheafully; but an hypocrite is not willing to die, being afraid of death, and therefore his life or ſoul is taken from him without his conſent and will, and not in love but in wrath, as the latter part of this chapter ſhows. Now Job had an hope which bore him up under all his troubles, and which he retained in the moſt killing and diſtreſſed circumſtances, and which continued with him, and ſupported him in the views of death and eternity, ſo that he could look upon death, and into another world, with pleaſure, and therefore could be no hypocrite, ſee ch. xiii. 15, 16. and xix. 25—27.

℣. 9. Will God hear his cry when trouble cometh upon him?] No, he will not, he heareth not ſinners, and ſuch as regard iniquity in their hearts, Pſ. lxvi. 18. every man has trouble more or leſs in this life, even the beſt of men; and generally ſpeaking they have the moſt, and wicked men the leaſt; but when death comes, he is a king of terrors to them, and they find ſorrow and trouble; and eſpecially at the day of judgment, when they will cry for mercy; and hypocrites, as the fooliſh foolish virgins, will cry, Lord, Lord open unto us; but when they call for mercy, the Lord will not answer, but laugh at their calamity, and mock when their fear cometh, Prov. i. 26, 28. but God hears the cries of his people when in trouble, whether in life, or in death, and is a present help unto them, and when strength and heart fail, he is their portion, and will be so for evermore; and though sometimes they think he does not hear them, as Job sometimes complains, yet he makes it appear that he does sooner or later, and so Job describes himself as one that calleth upon God, and he answereth him, ch. xii. 4. and therefore might conclude he was no hypocrite.

[c] יהי כרשע איבי erit ut impius inimicus meus, Pagninus, Montanus, Bolducius; ſo Junius & Tremellius, Broughton, & Ramban.

℣. 10. Will he delight himself in the Almighty? &c.] That is, the hypocrite? no, he will not; he may seem to delight in him, but he does not truly and sincerely; not in him as the Almighty, or in his omnipotence, into whose hands it is a fearful thing to fall, and who is able to destroy soul and body in hell; nor in his omniscience, who searches and knows the hearts of all men, and the insincerity of the hypocrite, how covert to men soever he is; nor in his holiness, which at heart he loves not; nor in his ways and worship, word, ordinances and people, though he makes a shew of it, Is. lviii. 2. will he always call upon God? God only is to be called upon, and it becomes all men to call upon him for all blessings, temporal and spiritual; and this should be done in faith, with fervency, in sincerity and uprightness of soul, and with constancy, always, at all times both of prosperity and adversity; but an hypocrite does not, and cannot call upon God in a sincere and spiritual manner; nor is he constant in this work, only by fits and starts, when it is for his worldly interest and external honour so to do. Now Job was one that delighted in God, was uneasy at his absence, longed for communion with him, sought earnestly after him, frequently and constantly called upon him, though he was wrongly charged with casting off the fear of God, and restraining prayer before him, and therefore no hypocrite. Some understand [f] all this as affirmed of the hypocrite, setting forth his present seeming state of happiness; as that he has a hope of divine favour, and of eternal felicity; has much peace and tranquillity of mind in life, and at death; is heard of God when trouble comes, and so gets out of it, and enjoys great prosperity; professes much delight and pleasure in God, and his ways, and is a constant caller upon him, and keeps close to the external duties of religion; and yet notwithstanding all this, is in the issue, when death comes, exceeding miserable, as the following part of the chapter shows.

℣. 11. I will teach you by the hand of God, &c.] To serve God, and speak truth, says one of the Jewish commentators [g]; rather the works of God, and methods of his provdence, with wicked men and hypocrites; the wisdom of God in his dispensations towards them; the reasons why he suffers them to live in outward prosperity and happiness, and what in the issue will be their case and circumstances; wherefore some render the words, I will teach you the hand of God, or of, or concerning the hand of God [h]; and so Mr. Broughton, of God, his hand; not his works of nature which his hand had wrought, of which he had discoursed in the preceding chapter; but his works of providence, and those more mysterious ones relating to the afflictions of the godly, and the prosperity of the wicked. Job had been a teacher and instructor of others in the times of his prosperity, and his words had upheld, strengthened and comforted many, ch. iv. 3, 4. and he was not the less qualified for, nor the less capable of such an office now in his adversity, which had been a school to him, in which he had learned many useful lessons himself, and so was in a better capacity of teaching others. Thus some render the words, I will teach you, being in or under the hand of God [i]; under his mighty hand, his afflicting, chastizing hand, which had touched him, and pressed him sore, and yet had guided and instructed him in many things, and particularly relating to the subject he proposed to instruct his friends in; who, though they were men of knowledge, and in years, yet he apprehended needed instruction; and he undertook to give them some by the good hand of God upon him, through his help and assistance, and under the influences and teachings of his Spirit. The Targum is, "I will teach you by the prophecy of God;" see Ezek. i. 3. and iii. 14. that which is with the Almighty will I not conceal; meaning not the secret purposes and decrees of God within himself, which cannot be known, unless he reveals them; rather secret truths, which are not obvious to every one, the mysteries of the kingdom, the wisdom of God in a mystery, the knowledge of which the Lord vouchsafes to some of his people in a very peculiar manner; though the mysteries of Providence seem chiefly intended, which those that carefully observe, attain to an understanding of, so as to be capable of instructing others; and indeed what is in reserve with God for men among his treasures, whether of grace or glory, for his own peculiar people, or especially of wrath and vengeance, for wicked men and hypocrites may be here designed; and whatever knowledge men have of the mysteries of nature, providence and grace, which may be profitable unto others, and make for the glory of God, should not be concealed from men, see ch. vi. 10.

℣. 12. Behold, all ye yourselves have seen it, &c.] As they were men of observation, at least made great pretensions to it, as well as of age and experience, they must have seen and observed somewhat at least of the above things; they must have seen the wicked, as David afterwards did, spreading himself like a green bay-tree, and the hypocrites in easy and flourishing circumstances, and good men labouring under great afflictions and pressures, and Job himself was now an instance of that before their eyes: why then are ye thus altogether vain? or become vain in vanity [k]; so exceeding vain, so excessively trifling, as to speak and act against the dictates of their own conscience, against their own sense, and what they saw with their own eyes, and advance notions so contrary thereunto; as to affirm that evil men are always punished of God in this life, and good men are succeeded and prospered by him; and so from Job's afflictions drew so vain and empty a conclusion, that he must be a wicked man and an hypocrite.

℣. 13. This is the portion of a wicked man with God, &c.] Not to be punished in this life, but after death. This is what Job undertook to teach his friends, and is the purport of what follows in this chapter. A wicked man is not only one that has been so from the womb, and is openly and notoriously riouſly a wicked man, but one alſo that is ſo ſecretly, under a maſk of ſobriety, religion and godlineſs, and is an hypocrite, for of ſuch Job ſpeaks in the context; and the portion of ſuch a man is not what he has in this life, which is oftentimes a very affluent one as to the things of this world, but what he has after death, which is baniſhment from the preſence of God, the everlaſting portion of his people, a part in the lake which burns with fire and brimſtone, the wrath of God to the uttermoſt, the ſecond death, and a dwelling with devils and wicked men, ſuch as himſelf, even a portion with hypocrites, which of all is the moſt dreadful and miſerable, Matt. xxiv. 51. and this is with God, is appointed by him; for God has appointed the wicked, the veſſels of wrath, fitted by their ſins for deſtruction to the day of evil, to everlaſting ruin and deſtruction; and it is prepared by him for them, as for the devil and his angels, and for them it is reſerved among his treaſures, even blackneſs of darkneſs, damnation, wrath and vengeance: and the heritage of oppreſſors which they ſhall receive of the Almighty; theſe are ſuch who are either oppreſſors of the poor in their natural and civil rights, taking from or denying to them what of right is their due; or oppreſſors of the ſaints in their religious rights and privileges, furious perſecutors of them; and who, being powerful, are terrible, as the word ſignifies: there is an heritage, or an inheritance for thoſe, which is entailed upon them, and will deſcend unto them, as the firſt-born of their father the devil, as children of diſobedience, and ſo of wrath, and like an inheritance will endure: and this they ſhall receive; it is future, it is wrath to come, and it is certain there is no eſcaping it; it is their due deſert, and they ſhall receive it; it is in the hands of the almighty God, and he will render it to them, and they ſhall moſt aſſuredly inherit it.

[f] Schultens. [g] Simeon Bar Tzemach. [h] ביד אל manum Dei, Beza, Cocceius; de manu Dei, Mercerus, Piscator, Drusius, Schmidt, Michaelis, Schultens. [i] In plaga Dei fortis versans, Junius & Tremellius, Michaelis, Schultens; vel evanescitis, Montanus, Bolducius, Beza, Mercerus, Drusius, Piscator, Cocceius. [k] הבל תהבלו vanitate vanescitis, Pagninus, Junius & Tremellius, Schultens.

℣. 14. If his children be multiplied, &c.] As it is poſſible they may; this is one external bleſſing common to good men and bad men. Haman, that proud oppreſſor, left ten ſons behind him, and wicked Ahab had ſeventy: it is for the ſword; for them that kill with the ſword, as the Targum; to be killed with it, as in the two inſtances above; Haman's ten ſons were ſlain by the ſword of the Jews, and Ahab's ſeventy ſons by the ſword of Jehu, or thoſe he ordered to ſlay them. The children of ſuch wicked perſons are oftentimes put to death, either by the ſword of the enemy, fall in battle in an hoſtile way, which is one of God's four ſore judgments; or leading a moſt wicked life, commit ſuch capital crimes as bring them into the hand of the civil magiſtrate, who bears not the ſword in vain, but is the miniſter of God, a revengeful executioner of wrath on wicked men; or elſe they die by the ſword of the murderer, being brought into the world for ſuch, and through their riches become their prey, Hoſ. ix. 13. or if neither of theſe is the caſe, yet they at laſt, let them proſper as they will, fall a ſacrifice to the glittering ſword of divine juſtice, whetted and drawn in wrath againſt them; the ſword of the enemy ſeems chiefly intended: and his offspring ſhall not be ſatisfied with bread; ſuch of them as die not by the ſword, ſhall periſh by famine, which is another of God's ſore judgments; though this may reſpect the grandchildren of wicked men, whom God viſits to the third and fourth generation; the Targum paraphraſes it, his childrens children, and ſo Sephorno; to which agrees the Vulgate Latin verſion: the ſenſe is, that the poſterity of ſuch wicked men, when they are dead and gone, ſhall be ſo reduced as to beg their bread, and ſhall not have a ſufficiency of that for the ſupport of nature, but ſhall die for want of food.

℣. 15. Thoſe that remain of him, &c.] Of the wicked man after his death; or ſuch that remain, and have eſcaped the ſword and famine: ſhall be buried in death; the peſtilence, emphatically called death by the Hebrews, as by us the mortality, ſee Rev. vi. 8. This is another of God's ſore public judgments on wicked men, and is ſuch a kind of death, by reaſon of the contagion of it, that a perſon is buried as ſoon as dead almoſt, being infectious to keep him; and ſo Mr. Broughton tranſlates the words, "his remnant ſhall be buried as ſoon as they are dead;" or the diſeaſe of which ſuch die being ſo very infectious ſometimes, no one dares to bury them for fear of catching it, and ſo they lie unburied; which ſome take to be the ſenſe of the phraſe, either that they ſhall be hurried away to the grave, and ſo not be embalmed and lie in ſtate, and have an honourable and pompous funeral, or that they ſhall have none at all, their death will be all the burial they ſhall have: or elſe the ſenſe is, they ſhall die ſuch a death as that death ſhall be their grave; and they ſhall have no other, as the men of the old world that were drowned in the flood, and Pharaoh and his hoſt in the Red-ſea, and Korah, Dathan and Abiram, who were ſwallowed up in the earth, and ſuch as are devoured by wild beaſts; and if this laſt could be thought to be meant, we have all the four ſore judgments of God in this and the preceding verſe, ſword, famine, peſtilence, and evil beaſts: and his widows ſhall not weep; leaving more than one behind him, polygamy being frequent in thoſe times; or elſe theſe are his ſons wives, left widows by them, as Bar Tzemach thinks, they being the perſons immediately ſpoken of, dying by various deaths before mentioned; but whether they be his widows, or theirs, they ſhall weep for neither of them; either becauſe they themſelves will be cut off with them; or their huſbands dying ſhameful deaths, lamentation would be forbidden; or they would not be able to weep through the aſtoniſhment and ſtupor they ſhould be ſeized with it at their death; or having lived ſuch miſerable and uncomfortable lives with them, they ſhould be ſo far from lamenting their death, that they ſhould, as Jarchi interprets it, rejoice at it; the Septuagint verſion is, "no one ſhall have mercy on their widows."

℣. 16. Though he heap up ſilver as the duſt, &c.] Which as it denotes the great abundance of it, collected together, ſo it expreſſes the biaſs and diſpoſition of ſuch a man's mind, that he can't be content without amaſſing great quantities of it, and alſo his diligence and ſucceſs therein, ſee 1 Kings x. 27. Pſ. xxxix. 6. Hab. ii. 6. and prepare raiment as the clay; not merely for uſe, but pomp and ſhow, to fill his wardrobes with; and formerly raiment was part of the treaſure of great men; the phraſe ſignifies that he might have ſuch a variety of raiment, and ſuch large quantities of it, that he would value it no more than ſo much clay; or elſe that his riches, conſiſt of what it would, would be both polluting and troubleſome to him; the Septuagint verſion reads gold inſtead of raiment, as in Zech. ix. 3. where like expreſſions are uſed of Tyre.

℣. 17. He may prepare it, &c.] Raiment; beginning with that firſt, which was mentioned laſt, which is frequent in the Hebrew and Eaſtern languages; ſuch things may be done, and often are, by by wicked men: but the just shall put it on; the wicked man will either have no heart, or have no time to wear it, at least to wear it out, and so a just man shall have it, as the Israelites put on the raiment of the Egyptians, which they begged or borrowed, and spoiled them of, Exod. xii. 35. and oftentimes so it is in Providence, that the wealth of wicked men is by one means or another transferred into the families of good men, who enjoy it, and make a better use of it, Prov. xiii. 22. and the innocent shall divide the silver; have a part of it at least, or divide the whole between his children, or give a part of it to the poor; so money that is ill gotten, or ill used, is taken away, and put into the hands of one that will have mercy on the poor, and liberally distribute it to them, Prov. xxviii. 8.

℣. 18. He buildeth his house as a moth, &c.] Which builds its house in a garment by eating into it, and so destroying it, and in time eats itself out of house and home, and however does not continue long in it, but is soon and easily shook out, or brushed off; so a wicked man builds himself an house, a stately palace, like Arcturus [1]; so some render the words from ch. ix. 9. a palace among the stars, an heavenly palace and paradise, and expects it will continue for ever; but as he builds it with the mammon of unrighteousness, and to the prejudice and injury of others, and with their money, or what was due to them, so by his sins and iniquities he brings ruin and destruction upon himself, and his family, so that his house soon falls to decay, and at least he and his posterity have but a short-lived enjoyment of it. This may be applied in a figurative sense to the hypocrite's hope and confidence, which is like a spider's web, a moth-eaten garment, and a house built upon the sand; the Septuagint version here adds, as a spider, ch. viii. 13—15. Is. li. 8. Matt. vii. 26, 27. and as a booth that the keeper maketh; either a keeper of sheep, who sets up his tent in a certain place for a while, for the sake of pasturage, and then removes it, to which the allusion is, Is. xxxviii. 12. or a keeper of fruit, as the Targum, of gardens and orchards, that the fruit is not stolen; or of fig-trees and vineyards, as Jarchi and Bar Tzemach, which is only a lodge or hut pitched for a season, until the fruit is gathered in, and then is taken down, see Is. i. 8. Lam. ii. 6. and it signifies here the short continuance of the house of the wicked man, which he imagined would continue for ever, Ps. xlix. 11.

℣. 19. The rich man shall lie down, but he shall not be gathered, &c.] That is, the wicked rich man; and the sense is, either he shall lie down upon his bed, but shan't be gathered to rest, shall get no sleep, the abundance of his riches, and the fear of losing them, or his life for them, will not suffer him to compose himself to sleep; or else it expresses his sudden loss of them, he lies down at night to take his rest, and it is not gathered, his riches are not gathered or taken away from him, but remain with him: he openeth his eyes; in the morning, when he awakes from sleep: and it is not; by one providence or another he is stripped of all substance; or rather this is to be understood of his death, and of what befals him at that time: death is often in scripture signified by lying down, sleeping and taking rest, as on a bed, see ch. xiv. 10, 12. rich men die as well as others; their riches can't profit them, or be of any avail to them to ward off the stroke of death, and their death is miserable; he is not gathered, or shall not gather [m], he can't gather up his riches, and carry it with him, Ps. xlix. 15, 16. 1 Tim. vi. 7. he openeth his eyes in another world, and it is not, his riches are not with him; or, as the Vulgate Latin version, he shall find nothing; or rather the meaning is, he is not gathered; to his grave, as Jarchi and Ben Gersom; and so Mr. Broughton, he is not taken up, i. e. as he interprets it, to be honestly buried. He is not buried in the sepulchres of his ancestors, which is often in scripture signified by a man being gathered to his people, or to his fathers; but here it is suggested, that notwithstanding all his riches, he should have no burial, or what is worse than that, when he dies he should not be gathered to the saints and people of God, or into God's garner, into heaven and happiness: but he openeth his eyes; in hell, as the rich man is said to do, and finds himself in inexpressible torment: and he is not; on earth, in his palace he built, nor among his numerous family, friends and acquaintance, and in the possession of his earthly riches, but is in hell in the most miserable and distressed condition that can be conceived of. Some think this last clause respects the suddeness of his death, one opens his eyes, and looks at him, and he is not; he's dead, in the twinkling of an eye, and is no more in the land of the living; but the former sense is best.

℣. 20. Terrors take hold on him as waters, &c.] The terrors of death, and of an awful judgment that is to come after it; finding himself dying, death is the king of terrors to him, dreading not only the awful stroke of death itself, but of what is to follow upon it; or rather these terrors are those that seize the wicked man after death, perceiving in what a horrible condition he is in, the terrors of a guilty conscience lay hold on him, remembring his former sins with all the aggravating circumstances of them; the terrors of the law's curses, lighting upon him, and of the wrath and fury of the Almighty pouring out on him and surrounding him, and devils and damned spirits all about him. These will seize him as waters, like a flood of waters, denoting the abundance of them, terror on every side, a magor missabib will he be, and coming with great rapidity, with an irresistible force, and without ceasing, rolling one after another in a sudden and surprising manner: a tempest stealeth him away in the night; the tempest of divine wrath, from which there is no shelter, but the person, blood and righteousness of Christ; this comes like a thief, suddenly and unexpectedly, and steals the wicked man out of this world; or rather from the judgment-seat, and carries him into the regions of darkness, of horror and black despair, where he is surrounded with the aforesaid terrors; this is said to be in the night, to make it the more shocking and terrible, see Luke xii. 19. and may have respect to that blackness that attends a tempest, and to that blackness of darkness reserved for wicked men, Jude 13.

℣. 21. The east wind carrieth him away, &c.] Which is very strong and powerful, and carries all before it; afflictions are sometimes compared to it, Is. xxvii. 8. and here either death, accompanied with the wrath of God, which carries the wicked man sore against his will out of the world, from his house, his family, his friends, his possessions and estates, and carries him to hell to be a companion with devils, and share with them in all the miseries of that that dreadful ſtate and place. The Septuagint and Vulgate Latin verſions render it, a burning wind, ſuch as are frequent in the eaſtern countries, which carry a man off at once, ſo that he has only time at moſt to ſay I burn, and immediately drops down dead, as Thevenot, and other travellers, relate; which is thus deſcribed, "It is a wind called Samiel, or Poiſon-wind, a very hot one, that reigns in ſummer from Moſul to Surrat, but only by land, not upon the water; they who have breathed that wind, fall inſtantly dead upon the place, though ſometimes they have time to ſay, that they burn within. No ſooner does a man die by this wind, but he becomes as black as a coal; and if one take him by his leg, arm, or any other place, his fleſh comes from the ſame, and is plucked off by the hand that would lift him up[n]:" and again, it is obſerved, that in Perſia if a man in June or July breathes in certain hot ſouth-winds that come from the ſea, he falls down dead, and at moſt has no more time than to ſay he burns[o]. Wicked men are like chaff and ſtubble, and they can no more reſiſt death, than either of theſe can reſiſt the eaſt-wind; and they are as eaſily burnt up and conſumed with the burning wind of God's wrath, as they are by devouring flames; and though wicked men and hypocrites may think all will be well with them, if they have but time to ſay, Lord have mercy on us; they may be carried off with ſuch a burning wind, or ſcorching diſeaſe, as to be able only to ſay, that they burn, and not in their bodies only, but in their ſouls alſo, feeling the wrath of God in their conſciences: or this may have reſpect to the devouring flames of hell they are ſurrounded with upon dying, or immediately after death, ſee Iſ. xxxiii. 14. and he departeth; out of the world, not willingly, but whether he will or no, he muſt depart; or rather, he will be bid to depart, and he will depart from the bar of God, from his preſence, into everlaſting fire prepared for the devil and his angels: and as a ſtorm hurleth him out of his place; this is done either at death, when as a ſtorm hurls a tree, or any other thing out of its place, ſo is the ſinner forced out of his place in a tempeſtuous manner, through the power and wrath of God, ſo that his place knows him no more; and he is huried into hell, and everlaſting deſtruction, juſt as the ſinning angels were hurled out of heaven, and caſt down into hell, and there will be no place found in heaven for them any more; or rather this will be his caſe at judgment, which immediately follows, where the wicked ſhall not ſtand, or be able to juſtify themſelves, and make their caſe good; but with the ſtorm of divine wrath and vengeance ſhall be hurled from thence, and go, being driven, into everlaſting puniſhment.

[1] כעש quasi Arcturi, Junius & Tremellius; so Aben Ezra.

[m] יאסף nihil secum auferet, V. L.

℣. 22. For God ſhall caſt upon him, and not ſpare, &c.] Caſt his ſins upon him, which will lie as an intolerable weight upon his conſcience; and his wrath upon him, which being poured out like fire, he will not be able to bear it; and deſerved puniſhment on him, which like a talent of lead, will bear him down to the loweſt hell; and this will be done without ſhewing any mercy at all; for tho' the wicked have much of ſparing mercy in this world, they have none in the next; there is ſparing mercy now, but none in hell; God that ſpared not the angels that ſinned, nor the old world, nor Sodom and Gomorrah, will not ſpare them; he that made them, will have no mercy on them; and he that formed them, will ſhew them no favour: he would fain flee out of his hands; in whoſe hands he is, not as all men are, being the works of his hands, and ſupported by him; much leſs as his people are, ſecure there; but in his hands as an awful and terrible judge, condemning him for his ſins, and ſentencing him to everlaſting puniſhment; and a fearful thing it is to fall into the hands of the living and almighty God; there is no getting out of them, though fleeing he flees, as the phraſe is, with all his might and main, with all the ſwiftneſs he can; it is all to no purpoſe; he is where he was, and muſt continue in the torment and miſery he is in, to all eternity; his worm of conſcience will never die, nor the fire of divine wrath be ever quenched; though he will deſire death ten thouſand times over, he ſhall not find it, it ſhall flee from him, Rev. ix. 6.

℣. 23. Men ſhall clap their hands at him, &c.] In a way of joy and triumph, ſcorn and deriſion, ſee Lam. ii. 15. Nahum iii. 19. either at the time of his death, being glad they are rid of him, Pſ. lii. 5, 6. or rather hereafter, to all eternity, while the wrath and vengeance of God is pouring on him; and this will be done by all righteous men evermore; not pleaſing themſelves with the ſhocking ſcene, nor indulging any evil paſſion in them, from which they will be entirely free; but rejoicing in the glory of divine juſtice, which will be diſplayed in the everlaſting deſtruction of wicked men, ſee Rev. xviii. 20. and xix. 1, 2. and this need not be reſtrained to good men only, but aſcribed to angels alſo; for it may be rendered imperſonally, hands ſhall be clapped at him; or joy be expreſſed on this occaſion by all in heaven, angels and ſaints, who will all approve and applaud the divine procedure againſt wicked men as right and juſt; yea, this may expreſs the glorying of divine juſtice, and its triumph in the condemnation and deſtruction of ſinners: and ſhall hiſs him out of his place; from the bar and tribunal of God, where he ſtood, and was condemned; and as he goes to everlaſting puniſhment, expreſſing abhorrence and deteſtation of him, and his crimes, and as pleaſed with the righteous judgment of God upon him. Now this is the wicked man's portion, and the heritage he ſhall have of God at and after death, though he has been in flouriſhing circumſtances in life; all which Job obſerves to ſhew, that he was no friend nor favourer of wicked men, nor thought well of them, and their ways, though he obſerved the proſperity they are attended with in their preſent ſtate; and as for himſelf, he was not, and would not be ſuch a wicked man, and an hypocrite, on any account whatever, ſince he was ſure he muſt then be miſerable hereafter to all intents and purpoſes.

[n] Thevenot's Travels into the Levant, par. 2. b. 1. ch. 12. p. 54.

[o] Ib. b. 3. ch. 5. p. 135.

CHAP. XXVIII.

THE deſign of this chapter is either to ſhew the folly of ſuch, who are very diligent in their ſearch and purſuit after earthly things, and neglect an enquiry after that which is infinitely more valuable, true wiſdom; or rather to obſerve, that though things the moſt ſecret, and which are hidden in the bowels of the earth, may be inveſtigated and diſcovered by the ſagacity and diligence of men, yet wiſdom cannot, eſpecially the wiſdom of God in his providences, which are paſt finding out; and particularly in what concerns the proſperity of the wicked, and the afflictions of the righteous; the reaſon of which men ſhould be content to be ignorant of for the preſent, and be ſtudious to poſſeſs that wiſdom which is attainable, and be thankful for it, if they have it; which lies in the fear of the Lord, and a departure from evil, with which this chapter concludes. It begins with ſetting forth the ſagacity of men in ſearching and finding out uſeful metals, and other things the earth produces; the difficulty, fatigue and labour that attend ſuch a ſearch, and the dangers they are expoſed unto in it, ℣. 1—11. then it declares the unſearchableneſs of wiſdom, its ſuperior excellency to things the moſt valuable, and that it is not to be found by ſea or land, or among any of the creatures, ℣. 12—22. and that God only knows its way and place, who has ſought it out, prepared and declared it, ℣. 23—27. and that which he has thought fit to make known of it, and is moſt for his glory and the good of men, is, that it is to fear God, and depart from evil, ℣. 28.

℣. 1. Surely there is a vein for the ſilver, &c.] Silver is mentioned firſt, not becauſe the moſt valuable, for gold is preferable to it, as braſs is to iron, and yet iron is mentioned firſt in the next verſe; but becauſe ſilver might be firſt known, or was firſt in uſe, eſpecially in the coinage of money; we read of pieces of ſilver, or ſhekels of ſilver, in the times of Abraham, but not of any golden coin; and among the old Romans, ſilver was coined before gold [p]; it has its name from a word which ſignifies deſire, becauſe it is deſirable to men, it anſwering to various uſes and purpoſes; and ſometimes the deſires and cravings of men after it are enlarged too far, and become criminal, and ſo the root of all evil to them: and now there is a vein for it in the earth, or a mine in which it may be dug for, and found, in which it runs as veins in a man's body, in certain ramifications, like branches of trees, as they do; and the inhabitants of Hiſpaniola, and other parts of the Weſt-Indies, when found out by Columbus, which abounded with gold mines, declared that they found by experience, that the vein of gold is a living tree, (and ſo the ſame perhaps may be ſaid of ſilver) and that it ſpreads and ſprings from the root, which they ſay extends to the center of the earth by ſoft pores and paſſages of the earth, and puts forth branches, even to the uppermoſt part of the earth, and ceaſes not till it diſcovers itſelf unto the open air; at which time it ſhews forth certain beautiful colours inſtead of flowers, round ſtones of golden earth inſtead of fruits, and thin plates inſtead of leaves [q]; ſo here there is a vein, or a going out for the ſilver [r], by which it makes its way, as obſerved of the gold, and ſhews itſelf by ſome ſigns and tokens where it may be found; or rather this egreſs is made for it, by opening the mine where it is, digging into it, and fetching it out of it, and from whence great quantities are often brought. In Solomon's time it was made as the ſtones in Jeruſalem, 1 Kings x. 27. and a place for gold where they fine it; there are particular places for this moſt excellent of all metals, which has its name in Hebrew from its yellow colour; all countries do not produce it; ſome are famous for it, and ſome parts of them, as the land of Havilah, where was gold, and that gold was good, Gen. ii. 11, 12. and Ophir, hence we often read of the gold of Ophir, ſo called from the place where it was found, as in this chapter, ℣. 16. and now the Spaniſh Weſt-Indies; but nearer to Job than theſe gold was found; there were not only mountains that abounded with gold near to Horeb, in the deſert of Arabia [s]; but it was to be found with the Sabeans [t], the near neighbours of Job; yea, the Ophir before referred to was in Arabia. Some underſtand this of the place where pure gold is found ready fined, and needs no melting and refining; and of ſuch Pliny [u] ſpeaks, and of large lumps and maſſes of it; but for the moſt part it lies in ore, which needs fining; and ſo here it may intend the place where it is found in the ore, and from whence it is taken and had to the place where it is fined; for melting places uſed to be near where the golden ore was found; and ſo when Hiſpaniola was firſt found by Columbus, the gold that was dug out of the mountains of Cibana, and other places, were brought to two ſhops, which were erected with all things appertaining to melt and fine it, and caſt into wedges; and ſo early as that, in theſe two ſhops, were molten yearly three hundred thouſand pound weight of gold [w].

℣. 2. Iron is taken out of the earth, &c.] Very eaſily, and in great plenty, and is more common, being in moſt countries, is nearer the ſurface of the earth, and here ſaid to be taken out of the duſt [x]; which being melted in a furnace produces iron, a metal very ſerviceable for various uſes, and without which there is ſcarce any thing to be done, and therefore was with braſs of early invention. Tubal-Cain, a ſon of Lamech, ſuppoſed to be the Vulcan of the heathens, a worker in iron, is ſaid to be the inſtructor of every artificer in braſs and iron, Gen. iv. 22. and braſs molten out of the ſtone; out of a braſſy ſtone, called Cadmia, as Pliny ſays, and alſo out of another, as he obſerves [y], called Chalcites, found in Cyprus, where was the firſt invention of braſs, according to him, and hence perhaps copper had its name; but it is plain from ſcripture, the places before referred to, that it was invented elſewhere, and long before Cyprus was known, or a ſtone melted becomes braſs, ſee Deut. viii. 9. and xxxiii. 25. of theſe four metals was the image in

[p] Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 33. c. 3.
[q] Peter Martyr. Decad. 3. l. 8.
[r] מוצא exitus, Pagninus, Montanus, Mercerus, Druſius, Michaelis; egreſſio, Vatablus.
[s] Hieron. de loc. Heb. fol. 90. A.
[t] Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 6. c. 28.
[u] Ut ſupra, c. 4.
[w] P. Martyr. Decad. 1. l. 10.
[x] מעפר e pulvere, V. L. Montanus, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Cocceius, Michaelis, Schultens.
[y] Nat. Hiſt. l. 34. c. 1, 2.

in Nebuchadnezzar's viſion, which repreſented the four monarchies of the world, Babylonian, Perſian, Grecian, and Roman, Dan. ii. 32, 33. and to them are compared, and by them are repreſented many things in ſcripture.

℣. 3. He ſetteth an end to darkneſs, &c.] Some underſtand this and what follows of God, who, by making the luminaries, has fixed the periods and revolutions of light and darkneſs, of day and night; or who has determined the times before appointed, for the diſcoveries of things in nature, as mines of gold, ſilver, and precious ſtones, how long they ſhould lie in darkneſs, and then be brought to light, and who ſearches out the perfection of all things in nature; and makes them known to men, when he himſelf and his ways are not to be found out unto perfection by men; but rather this is to be underſtood of the miner that digs for the above metals, who, when he opens a mine, lets in natural light, or carries artificial light along with him, and ſo puts an end to the darkneſs which had reigned there before, even from the creation: and ſearcheth out all perfection; ſearches thoroughly the mines he opens, and gets all he can out of them, and ſearches perfectly into the nature of the ore; he finds, and tries, and proves it, what it is, its worth and value: the ſtones of darkneſs, and the ſhadow of death; ſearches and digs through them, to get at what he is ſeeking; or brings ſtones, precious ſtones, to light, which lay in darkneſs from the beginning, and in ſuch places which were the ſhadow of death, and looked diſmal and horrible, and even threatened with death, to get into and fetch them out: ſo ſpiritual miners that ſearch into the mines of the ſcriptures, ſhould not be diſcouraged with darkneſs and difficulties that may attend their ſearch; but ſhould continue it, in order to find out truths that have lain in darkneſs, more precious than gold and ſilver, and the richeſt gems; and ſuch who ſearch for them in like manner as miners do, ſhall find them, Prov. ii. 4, 5.

℣. 4. The flood breaketh out from the inhabitant, &c. So that there is no inhabitant [z]] Of the mine, as the miner may be ſaid to be who lives there continually; and, when a flood of water ariſes, which is an uſual thing in mines, he is obliged to flee, and make haſte to ſave his life: even the waters forgotten of the foot; ſuch as never any foot of man touched, or was acquainted with, being ſubterraneous water, and never ſeen with the eye of man before, and who before knew not there were ſuch floods under ground [a]. A like figurative expreſſion in Pſ. cxxxvii. 5. they are dried up, they are gone away from men; tho' ſuch a flood of waters riſe apace, and flow in with great force, and threaten the miners lives, and the ruin of their works; yet they are not diſcouraged, but by means of engines, pumps, and buckets, and ſuch like things, draw up the waters, and clear the mines of them; and they are gone from the workmen, who return to their work again, and go on with their mining: and ſo ſometimes ſpiritual miners are interrupted by a flood of Satan's temptations, the world's perſecutions, and various afflictions; but, by the aſſiſtance of the Spirit and grace of God, whereby a ſtandard is lift up againſt them, they get clear of them, and receive no hurt by them, but go on chearfully in the work of the Lord, Iſ. lix. 19. Rev. xii. 15, 16.

℣. 5. As for the earth, out of it cometh bread, &c.] That is, bread-corn, or corn of which bread is made, particularly wheat; which falling, or being caſt into the earth, riſes up and brings forth fruit, and when ground into flour, makes fine bread; and to this ſame original the pſalmiſt aſcribes bread, which ſtrengthens man's heart, Pſ. civ. 14, 15. The Weſt-Indians formerly made their bread of roots of the earth, particularly one called jucca [b]; ſo Cæſar's ſoldiers in diſtreſs made bread of a root called chara, ſteeped in milk [c]: and under it is turned up as it were fire; coal, which is fewel for fire; for, as in the earth are mines for gold and ſilver, iron and braſs, out of which they are dug, or the ore of them, ſo there is coal under the earth; which, when turned up, or dug, is taken for firing; or brimſtone, or ſulphurous matter, which is eaſily inflammable; and ſometimes the ſame earth, the ſurface of which is covered with corn, out of which bread cometh, underneath are coal, or ſulphur, and ſuch like combuſtible matter: ſome think precious ſtones are meant, which glitter and ſparkle like fire; ſee Ezek. xxviii. 14.

℣. 6. The ſtones of it are the place of ſapphire, &c.] In ſome parts of the earth its ſtones are a quarry of ſapphires, put here for all precious ſtones: this is a moſt excellent precious ſtone, of a ſky colour with golden ſpecks, and was one of the ſtones in the breaſt-plate of the high-prieſt; and by which are repreſented the pavement under the feet of the God of Iſrael, the throne of Chriſt, his bowels and affections for his people, the comelineſs of them, and the glory of his church in the latter day, Exod. xxiv. 10. and xxviii. 18. Ezek. i. 26. Cant. v. 14. Lam. iv. 7. Iſ. liv. 11. and it hath duſt of gold; ſome parts of the earth abound with the duſt of gold; its duſt is gold, or it hath gold as plenty as duſt; though ſome think this refers to the ſapphire in the preceding clauſe, which, as Pliny ſays [d], has pulvis aureus, duſt of gold in it, and ſhines and ſparkles with golden points, or ſpecks; and ſo ſay other writers [e]; but the word uſed rather ſignifies clods, lumps, and maſſes of gold, which better agree with the earth; and beſides, no very good reaſon can be given why there ſhould be ſuch a particular deſcription of the ſapphire; whereas the earth is the original of that, and of all the other things before ſpoken of.

℣. 7. There is a path which no fowl knoweth, &c.] A path made by miners to the gold, ſilver, braſs, and iron ores; to the places where gems and precious ſtones lie; the way to which was never ſeen, and could never have been diſcovered by the moſt ſharp-ſighted fowl, as the eagle [f]; which ſome think is particularly intended; and the Greek word for an eagle ſeems to be derived from the word uſed in the text: this fowl, the king of birds, as it is the ſwifteſt, it is the moſt quick-ſighted of any; but, though it is eager, and looks out ſharp after its prey, and which it beholds at a great diſtance, and in the moſt ſecret lurking places, and flies unto it, and ſeizes upon it at once, yet it never could look into the bowels of the earth, or diſcover a track leading thereunto; in this it is outdone by the the diligent and laborious miner, who is not at a loſs to make his way into the inmoſt and darkeſt receſſes of the earth: which the vulture's eye hath not ſeen; which is next to the eagle, and ſome of them are of the ſpecies of it, and is a very ſharp-ſighted creature, even to a proverb, as well as voracious, which makes it diligent to ſearch everywhere for its prey; and yet this creature's ſharp and piercing eye never ſaw the path the miners make by digging into the earth, in order to get metals and minerals from it. Some underſtand this path of ſubterraneous paths in nature, made of God, through which rivers of water paſs that were never ſeen by creatures of the quickeſt ſight; it may rather be applied to the paths of God in providence, which are unſearchable and paſt finding out, by men of the moſt ſagacious and penetrating capacities, though they will hereafter be made manifeſt; and alſo to his paths of love, grace, and mercy towards the ſons of men, which are the deep things of God, ſearched into and revealed by his Spirit, or otherwiſe could not be known; as well as to the ways and paths of righteouſneſs and holineſs, of faith and truth, of the word and ordinances God has revealed, as his mind and will his people ſhould walk in, which otherwiſe would not be known, and are not by carnal men; and eſpecially to the principal way and path, Chriſt Jeſus, who is the way to the Father, the way to everlaſting happineſs, the way of life and ſalvation, the high way and way of holineſs, in which men, though fools, ſhall not err, and of which ſome things are ſaid, in Iſ. xxxv. 8, 9. which greatly agree with what are ſaid of this path, here and in the following verſe: this way of peace is not known by carnal men, nor the things of it diſcerned by natural men, though ever ſo ſagacious; ſee Rom. iii. 17. Matt. xi. 25. 1 Cor. ii. 14.

[z] מעם גר qui accolas non fert, Tigurine verſion; dimiſſo accola, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator; ut non ſit accola, Mercerus. [a] Vid. Senecæ Nat. Quæſt. l. 5. c. 15. [b] P. Martyr, Decad. 1. l. 1. [c] Cæſar. Comment. bell. civil. l. 3. c. 48. [d] Nat. Hiſt. l. 37. c. 9. [e] Ruæus de gemmis, l. 2. c. 2. [f] עיט ad id alludit aquilæ Græcum vocabulum αετος, Bochart. Hierozoic. par. 1. l. 1. c. 9. col. 59. Broughton renders it, a kite.

℣. 8. The lions whelps have not trodden it, nor the fierce lion paſſed by it.] Or upon it [c]; ſuch creatures that are exceeding fierce and cruel, hungry and voracious, eager after their prey, range here and there in purſuit of it, ſearch every hole and corner, and rove in dens and caves of the earth; yet theſe never traverſed ſuch ways and paths the miners make to get out the wealth and riches of the earth. Wicked men are ſometimes compared to lions, for their cruelty and oppreſſion exerciſed on the ſaints, breathing out threatenings and ſlaughter againſt them, Pſ. lvii. 4. and particularly tyrannical princes and perſecutors, as the kings of Aſſyria and Babylon, and Nero the Roman emperor, Jer. l. 17. 2 Tim. iv. 17. theſe never trod the way of holineſs, nor walked in the path of truth, nor knew the wiſdom of God in a myſtery, nor the Lord of life and glory, and the way of life and ſalvation by him; which is a way the unclean walk not in, or perſons of ſuch a temper and diſpoſition; ſee Iſ. xxxv. 8, 9. The former clauſe may be rendered as it is by ſome, the children of pride [f], and as it is in ch. xli. 34. which is the only place beſides this where it is uſed; and ſo the Septuagint verſion, the children of proud-men; and may be accommodated to ſelf-righteous perſons, who are proud boaſters of themſelves and of their works, and go about to eſtabliſh their own righteouſneſs, and deſpiſe and will not ſubmit unto the righteouſneſs of Chriſt; theſe tread not in, nor walk upon the good old way, and the only way of life, righteouſneſs, and ſalvation by Chriſt.

℣. 9. He putteth forth his hand upon the rock, &c.] The diſcourſe is carried on concerning the miner, and digger in the earth for metals and precious ſtones; who meeting with a rock or flint, and a ridge of them, is not diſcouraged, but goes to work therewith, and with his hammer in his hand, lays upon the rock or flint, and beats it to pieces, and with proper inſtruments cuts through it; and uſing fire and vinegar, as Pliny [g] obſerves, makes his way into it, and oftentimes by ſplitting it, diſcovers gold [h] or ſilver, or precious ſtones in it: he overturneth the mountains by the roots; or turns them up from the roots; he roots them up, he undermines them; he turns up the earth at the roots of them, to get what is hid at the bottom, or in the bowels of them. Some underſtand this, and what is ſaid in the following verſes, of God, and of wonderful things done by him; ſo Jarchi, Aben Ezra, and others; and to whom indeed ſuch things are ſometimes aſcribed in ſcripture: he touches the hills, and they ſmoke; lays his hand on the rock, and removes it out of its place; it was he that ſmote and opened the rock at Horeb, and the waters guſhed out; yea, turned the rock into ſtanding water, and the flint into a fountain of water: and he, in a figurative ſenſe, has laid his hand on the rock Chriſt, and ſmote him with the rod of juſtice, whereby the bleſſings of grace come flowing down upon his people; and he it is that puts forth his hand of powerful and efficacious grace upon the rocky hearts of men, and with the hammer of his word, breaks them to pieces, and takes away the ſtony heart, and gives an heart of fleſh: and he alſo, in a literal ſenſe, overturns hills and mountains by their roots, through ſtorms, and tempeſts, and earthquakes; and figuratively, kingdoms and ſtates, that lie in the way of his intereſt; for what are theſe mountains before the great Zerubbabel? they ſoon and eaſily become a plain; and ſo breaks through all difficulties, which proverbially may be ſignified by removing mountains, that ſeem to obſtruct and hinder the converſion and ſalvation of his people; he makes thoſe mountains a way, and his high ways are exalted; ſee Cant. ii. 8. Iſ. xlix. 11. Zech. iv. 7. but the former ſenſe is beſt, and moſt agreeable to the context.

℣. 10. He cutteth out rivers among the rocks, &c.] By cleaving rocks aſunder in order to find out things of value in the cliffs of them; or by cutting his way through them, the miner opens a courſe for rivers and floods of water, to drain off from his mines, and ſo can go on with his works more comfortably, and with ſucceſs; though ſometimes they ſink through high rocks, till they go ſo far below their baſis, that they can go no farther for water, in ſome places forty or fifty fathom deep [i]; and his eye ſeeth every precious thing; in the cliffs of the rock, or at the bottom of the rivers and floods as they go off, or in the mines he digs, even gold or ſilver, or precious ſtones: hence came the fable of Lynceus, and from him the phraſe of Lynceus eyes [k], who was ſaid to ſee all things under the earth, becauſe he was the firſt that ſearched for metals, as braſs, ſilver, &c. and in ſearch of them carried lamps or links under the earth [l]. This verſe is alſo by ſome aſcribed to God, who is ſaid to

[c] עליו ſuper eam, Schultens.
[f] בני שחץ filii ſuperbiæ, Montanus, Beza, Bolducius, Vatablus
[g] Nat. Hiſt. l. 33. c. 4. — Montem rumpit aceto, Juvenal Sat. 10. v. 153.
[h] Ibid
[i] Philoſ. Tranſact. Abridged, vol. 2. p. 469.
[k] Horat. Sermon. l. 1. ſatyr. 2. v. 90.
[l] Palæpha de incredib. c. 10.

to cleave the fountain and the flood, and to dry up mighty rivers; and alſo to open rivers in high places, in hills, mountains, and rocks, as well as ſometimes in the middle of the vallies, Pſ. lxxiv. 15. Iſ. xli. 19. and who, in a ſpiritual ſenſe, has cut out and opened the river of his pure love and grace, which flows from the throne of God and the Lamb; and the fulneſs of grace in Chriſt, which is as rivers of water in a dry land; and the graces of the Spirit in his people, which flow out of them as rivers of living water; and his word and ordinances in his church, which are the rivers of pleaſure he makes his ſaints to drink of in it: and his eye of omniſcience, which ſees all things in particular, ſees all the precious things in nature; the precious things of heaven, and earth, and ſea, the precious things brought forth by the ſun and moon; and the precious things of the ancient mountains and everlaſting hills, the gold, ſilver, and precious ſtones that lie hid in the bowels of them, Deut. xxxiii. 13—16. and who alſo ſees all precious perſons, and things, in a ſpiritual ſenſe; he beholds his precious Son, his precious blood, righteouſneſs, and ſacrifice with delight and pleaſure; and his eye of love, grace, and mercy is upon the precious ſons of Zion, comparable to fine gold, jewels, and precious ſtones; and ſees all the precious graces of the Spirit in them, with acceptance and good-will.

℣. 11. He bindeth the floods from overflowing, &c.] As the miner finds ways and means of cutting through rocks, and draining and carrying off the waters in his mine; ſo he makes uſe of other methods of reſtraining and keeping back the waters from coming into and overflowing his works, and even from weeping[m], as in the original text; he binds them up ſo firmly, and ſtops every avenue and paſſage ſo cloſe, that the waters cannot ſo much as ooze, or diſtil and drop as a tear from the eye: and the thing that is hid bringeth he forth to light; the ſeveral metals and minerals, gems and precious ſtones that lay hid in the boſom of the earth, are fetched out, and brought to light by the diligence and labours of the miner; the ſame that are called ſtones of darkneſs, and of the ſhadow of death, ver. 3. This verſe is likewiſe by ſeveral interpreted of God, and of what is done by him in the things of nature and providence; he it is that at firſt ſhut up the ſea with doors; made the cloud its garment, and thick darkneſs its ſwadling bands, in which he wrapped and bound it, as an infant, and ſtill ſets bars and doors to it, and ſays, hitherto ſhalt thou come, and no further, Job xxxviii. 8—11. and in a ſpiritual ſenſe, he reſtrains the floods of affliction from overflowing and overwhelming his people; and, when the temptations of Satan come in like a flood upon them, his Spirit ſets up a ſtandard againſt them, which keeps them off from doing them any hurt; and, when the wrath of perſecutors riſes up againſt them, and threatens them with deſtruction, he withholds thoſe proud waters from going over their ſouls and overwhelming them: and ſo likewiſe it is he that bringeth hidden things to light, things in nature men had never ſeen or known before; things in providence dark and intricate; things in grace, out of the ſight of the moſt penetrating underſtanding: he reveals the ſecrets of his love and grace to them that fear him; the glorious ſcheme of ſalvation by Chriſt, which was hid in himſelf, in the thoughts, purpoſes, and counſels of his heart; the myſteries of his goſpel, hid from the wiſe and prudent; and life and immortality itſelf, or the way to it, which he has brought to light through the goſpel; yea, he brings to light all the hidden things of a man's heart, and ſets them before him, and convinces him of them in a loving way, and if not now, he will hereafter bring to light the hidden things of darkneſs, and make manifeſt the counſels of the heart, 1 Cor. iv. 5. but, as before obſerved, it is beſt to underſtand the whole paragraph of miners; of their ſagacity in opening mines, and ſearching into the bowels of the earth, where none were ever before them; and of their indefatigableneſs, induſtry, and labour therein, and of the ſucceſs that attends them; Job's deſign being to ſhew, that things rich and valuable, and moſt remote from the ſight of men, may, by diligent application, be inveſtigated and obtained; yet ſuch wiſdom is not attainable, as to underſtand the reaſon of the various dealings of God, with the ſons of men, both good and bad; and therefore after all he had ſaid on the above ſubject, ſtill the queſtion is as follows.

℣. 12. But where ſhall wiſdom be found? &c.] Though there is a vein for ſilver, a track where that lies, and is to be come at, and a place where gold is found, and where it may be fined, and parts of the earth, out of which braſs and iron, and bread-corn may be produced, and even from whence may be fetched brilliant gems and precious ſtones; which, though attended with many difficulties, in cutting through rocks, draining rivers, and reſtraining the waters, yet are got over through the art and ſkill, induſtry, diligence, and labour of men; ſo that their eyes behold every precious thing their minds deſire, and they bring to light what have been laid up in darkneſs from the creation of the world: but, though theſe things may be found by ſearch and labour, the queſtion is, what vein is there for wiſdom, or where is the place in which that may be found? by which may be meant the wiſdom of God, as a perfection in him; which, though diſplayed in ſome meaſure in the works of creation and providence, yet not compleatly, and eſpecially in his dealings with the children of men; in all which there is undoubtedly the wiſdom of God; yet it is ſuch a depth as is unfathomable by mortals: ſuch are God's dealings with men in a way of diſtinguiſhing grace and mercy, as that he ſhould take no notice of any of the whole body of apoſtate angels that ſinned againſt him, but doomed them all to deſtruction; and yet there ſhould be a philanthropy, a love of men in him, and ſuch as to give his Son to die for them, and redeem them from ruin and deſtruction; alſo that he ſhould make a difference among men, and ordain ſome to eternal life, whilſt others are foreordained to condemnation and death, when all were in the ſame ſituation, condition, and circumſtances; and ſuch likewiſe were his dealings with the Iſraelites, and other nations of the world, part of which Job was not a ſtranger to; as his chuſing them to be his peculiar people before all others, and beſtowing peculiar favours upon them, not becauſe they were more in quantity, or better in quality, but becauſe this was his pleaſure; when he ſuffered all other nations to walk in their own ways, for many hundreds of years, and winked at the times of their ignorance; and yet, after a long courſe of time, rejected the people of the Jews, and and wrote a lo-ammi on them, and took out from the Gentiles a people for his name; ſo that they who were not a people, were called the people of God, and the Jews were broken off, and the Gentiles grafted in; and when the fulneſs of them is brought in, there will be a turn again, and then all Iſrael ſhall be ſaved: upon all which the apoſtle breaks out in this exclamation, which may ſerve as a comment on this text, Oh the depth of the riches, both of the wiſdom and knowledge of God, how unſearchable are his judgments, and his ways paſt finding out! Rom. xi. 33. particularly here may be meant the wiſdom of God in his dealings with men good and bad, in afflicting good men, and in ſuffering the wicked to proſper: this is a fact Job had fully proved, and it cannot be denied; and there is no doubt much of the wiſdom of God herein; he does all things well and wiſely; as he cannot do an unjuſt thing, ſo neither an un-wiſe one; though his wiſdom is unſearchable, his judgments are a great deep, and not to be fathomed by men, not only not by weak men and wicked men, but even by the wiſeſt and beſt of men, as Aſaph and Jeremiah: and this being the caſe, Job ſuggeſts to his friends, that the dealings of God with him, and the reaſons of them, and his wiſdom in them, were not to be ſearched out by them; and that they ſhould forbear imputing his afflictions to hypocriſy, or to ſecret ſins indulged by him; but to leave all, without making raſh cenſures and wrong conſtructions, until the time ſhould come when the judgments of God ſhould be made manifeſt; ſuch wiſdom and knowledge as to account for God's different dealings with men, being too wonderful, too high to attain unto, and quite out of their reach. The Jews, as particularly Jarchi, underſtand by wiſdom the law, not to be found in the depth or in the ſea; and illuſtrate the words by Deut. xxx. 11—14. but it is much better to interpret it of the goſpel, to which the apoſtle applies the above paſſage, Rom. x. 6, 7. in which there is a glorious diſplay of the wiſdom of God, in all the truths and doctrines of it; that it is a myſterious wiſdom, hidden wiſdom, hid from the wiſe and prudent, and not to be attained unto by the light of nature and carnal reaſon; it contains the deep things of God, which the Spirit of God alone ſearches and reveals; but why may not Chriſt, the wiſdom of God, be thought of? ſince many things are ſaid in the following verſes, as are of wiſdom, as a divine perſon, in Prov. viii. 13, 14, 15. in whom all the treaſures of wiſdom and knowledge are hid, and on whom the ſpirit of wiſdom and counſel reſts, as Mediator; and who, as a divine perſon, is the only wiſe God, and our Saviour: and to this queſtion in Job's time, where ſhall wiſdom be found? the only anſwer to be given is, that he, the logos, or wiſdom, was with God, as one brought up with him, rejoicing always before him; and that he lay in his boſom, Prov. viii. 30. John i. 1. 18. and to the ſame queſtion in our time it muſt be returned, that he is in heaven at the right-hand of God; but that there is no coming at the true knowledge of him by the light of nature, or by the law of Moſes, but by means of the goſpel, and through the ſpirit of wiſdom and revelation in the knowledge of him. The firſt of theſe ſenſes reſpecting the wiſdom of God in his different dealings with men, good and bad, is moſt generally given into by interpreters, and ſeems to ſuit well with the preceding diſpute between Job and his friends: but if we look forward in the chapter, we ſhall find this queſtion repeated, and an anſwer given to it as in the negative, ſo in the affirmative, that God knows the place of it; that he has ſearched it out, ſeen it, and and declared it; and it is this, the fear of the Lord, that is wiſdom, and to depart from evil is underſtanding, ver. 20. 23. 27, 28. by which it ſhould ſeem, that this wiſdom is ſupernatural wiſdom, or underſtanding in men; which lies in the fear of God, and the effects of it; in a ſpiritual knowledge of God and Chriſt, or of God in Chriſt; and in that godlineſs which is profitable in all things; and in that wiſdom which comes from above, and is oppoſed to that which is earthly, ſenſual and deviliſh, and is not to be found in carnal hearts, nor its worth known by carnal men, nor to be obtained by any thing in nature ever ſo valuable, but is the gift of God, the wiſdom he makes men to know, in the hidden part, Pſ. li. 6. and where is the place of underſtanding, to attain to the underſtanding of the myſteries of providence, or of Chriſt, or of the goſpel; or to have a ſpiritual underſtanding of divine things, and experience of them, which only is the gift of God, 1 John v. 20. for, by wiſdom and underſtanding are meant one and the ſame, as they often are, whether underſtood as a thing or perſon; ſee Prov. i. 2. and ii. 2. and iii. 13. and viii. 12. 14.

[m] מִבֶּכִי a fletu, Montanus, Bolducius, Junius & Tremellius, Michaelis, Schultens; ſo Broughton; a ſtillatione, Vatablus, Mercerus, Druſius.

℣. 13. Man knoweth not the price thereof, &c.] The worth and value of it, what price to ſet upon it, or offer and give for it; nor does he know where to find an equivalent to it, or what is a valuable conſideration for it: as for the wiſdom of God in his dealings with men, if a man was to give all the ſubſtance of his houſe to know the ſecret reaſons of them, it would utterly be contemned; yea, if he had all the riches in the world in his poſſeſſion, and would offer them on that conſideration, he would not be able to attain the knowledge of them: or the order thereof °; the order of divine providence, the wiſe diſpoſal of things, and the reaſons thereof. In the firſt ſenſe it is applicable to all the things before-mentioned; to ſpiritual wiſdom in men, ſupernatural grace, experimental religion, and real godlineſs; the worth of which is not known by carnal men, they deſpiſe it, and ſcoff at it; and to the goſpel, which is reckoned fooliſhneſs by them, and is of no account; and ſo is Chriſt himſelf rejected and diſſallowed of men, tho' choſen of God, and precious both to him and them that believe, who only know the price and value of him: neither is it found in the land of the living; meaning not wiſdom, though that in every ſenſe is not from below, or earthly, but from above, and heavenly, but the price of it; and the ſenſe is, that there is nothing in the whole globe that is equal to its worth; or can be propoſed as a valuable conſideration for it.

℣. 14. The depth ſaith, It is not in me, &c.] That is, the deep places of the earth, that are dug in it, the mines, and the like, could they ſpeak, they would ſay there are no metal, nor minerals, no rich treaſures of gold and ſilver ore, of pearls and precious ſtones, in the bowels of it, that are of the value of wiſdom, or to be compared to it: and the ſea ſaith, It is not with me; had that a voice to ſpeak, it would freely declare, that there is nothing in its vaſt compaſs, at the bottom of it, or to be got out of it, as corals that grow in it, and pearls pearls fiſhed from thence after mentioned, that are a ſufficient price for wiſdom. Some underſtand theſe words, the former part of miners and colliers, and ſuch ſort of men, that dig and live in the depths of the earth; and the latter part of mariners, that are employed on the ſea, who are generally ignorant and carnal men, and void of the knowledge of wiſdom in every view of it; but the ſenſe firſt given is beſt.

° ערכה ordinem ejus, Montanus, Bolducius.

℣. 15. It cannot be gotten for gold, &c.] Having in general ſaid that there is nothing in the whole compaſs of the terraqueous globe, nothing that is upon the ſurface of the earth, or in the bowels of it, or in the vaſt ocean, that is an equivalent price for wiſdom, Job deſcends to particulars, and inſtances firſt in gold, that being the moſt valuable of metals; the word here uſed for it ſignifies ſhut up [w], becauſe it is firſt ſhut up in the earth, out of which it is dug, and when taken from thence, and refined, and made into coins or veſſels, it is ſhut up among the treaſures of men; the words may be more literally rendered, gold ſhall not be given inſtead of it [x]; as a ſufficient price, or valuable conſideration for it: neither ſhall ſilver be weighed for the price thereof; in former times this metal uſed to be delivered in buying and ſelling, not by the number and value of pieces, but by weight, in rude maſſes and lumps, and even when coined into ſhekels; ſee Gen. xxiii. 16.

℣. 16. It cannot be valued with the gold of Ophir, &c.] Which is often ſpoken of in ſcripture as choice gold, if not the beſt; ſee the note on ch. xxii. 24. the ſenſe is, that the gold of Ophir is not of the value of wiſdom, or of the ſame worth with that, and ſo not ſufficient to purchaſe it: with the precious onyx and ſapphire; two precious ſtones that were in the breaſt-plate of the high-prieſt, of which ſee the notes on Exod. xxviii. 9, 18, 20. but not ſo precious, or of ſuch value as wiſdom. Pliny [y] ſpeaks of the onyx ſtone as in Arabia, near which Job lived, and who doubtleſs was acquainted with it and its worth, and alſo with the ſapphire he makes mention of before ℣. 6. ſee the note there. The word for valued is by ſome rendered ſtrowed [z], as goods are when they are expoſed to ſale; but wiſdom ſhould not be laid, or put on a level with theſe, though ſo excellent and precious.

℣. 17. The gold and the cryſtal cannot equal it, &c.] Cryſtal was found in an iſland of the Red Sea, ſituated before Arabia, called Neron, and in another, which from a gem found in it bears the name of Topazion, and may be thought therefore to be well known by Job; and though it is not now of ſo much account, it formerly was very valuable. Pliny [a] makes mention of a cryſtal veſſel, ſold for 150,000 ſeſterces, about 1250 pounds ſterling; and of two cryſtal cups broke by Nero in his fury, on hearing of ſome loſſes, to puniſh the then preſent age, that no other men might drink out of them: ſome render it amber, which is found in Pruſſia, and being at a great diſtance from Job's country, might be the more valuable there; and Pliny [b] ſpeaks of it as had in as great eſteem as gems: the Septuagint, Vulgate Latin verſions, and others, tranſlate it glaſs [c]; which had its original from Phœnicia, near Judea; ſo Pliny ſays [d], from the lake Cendevia, within the roots of mount Carmel, in Phœnicia, near Judea, ſprings the river Belus, from whence glaſs came firſt; and he ſpeaks of Sidon (a city in Phœnicia) as famous for it; and Tacitus [e] obſerves, that the river Belus glides in the Jewiſh ſea, and about the mouth of it ſand is gathered and mixed with nitre, and boiled into glaſs; and this being near the country where Job dwelt, it is thought he had knowledge of it; and from this paſſage ſome [f] have concluded the great antiquity of glaſs; and if it is true what Ælianus [g] relates, that when the monument of the ancient Belus, (the firſt king of Babylon) was dug up by Xerxes, the ſon of Darius, that there was found a glaſs urn, where lay a body in oil, it muſt be in uſe before the times of Job. An Arabic chronologer [h] affirms what he had from men converſant in hiſtory, that in Egypt after the flood, there were men learned in various ſciences, and among the reſt in alchymy, and had knowledge of burning glaſſes; though the invention of theſe, and of a glaſs globe is aſcribed to Archimedes [i], who lived ſomewhat later than 200 years before Chriſt. There was great plenty of glaſs very early in Ethiopia, after mentioned, in which they encloſed their dead, that they might be ſeen through it [k]; and if it was in uſe in Job's time, and eſpecially if it was then a late invention, it might be highly valued, and therefore placed here with things of the greateſt worth. In the times of Nero, Pliny ſays [l], two ſmall glaſs cups were ſold for 6000 ſeſterces, or 45 pounds ſterling, and according to others near 50 pounds; and the ſame writer relates, that in the times of Tiberius an art was found out to make glaſs flexile and malleable; but was ordered to be deſtroyed, leſt the value of gold, ſilver, and braſs ſhould be leſſened by it. The Targum renders the word here uſed a looking glaſs; ſee the note on Joſh. xi. 8. Some think the diamond or adamant is meant, and others that it is a general name for all ſorts of precious ſtones, they being clear, tranſparent, and lucid, as the word ſignifies: and the exchange of it ſhall not be for jewels of fine gold; ſet in fine gold; or veſſels of it, more valuable than gold itſelf, being made of gold, purified, refined, and wrought by art into curious forms; and yet wiſdom is ſo valuable as not to be exchanged for theſe. Mr. Broughton takes this fine gold, or gold of Phaz, to be the ſame with Feſs in Barbary, which had its name from a heap of gold there found when its foundation was laid; for Feſs with the Arabs ſignifies gold [m].

℣. 18. No mention ſhall be made of coral, or of pearls, &c.] Coral is a marine plant, is as hard as a ſtone, and of ſuch value as to be reckoned among precious ſtones; ſee the note on Ezek. xxvii. 16. In Arabia Felix, on the ſhore of the Red-ſea, is a place called Coralia [n]; it may be from coral found there. Pearls are from ſhell-fiſh taken out of the ſea, though theſe ſeem rather intended in the next clauſe: the words Ramoth and Gabiſh are left untranſlated by ſome, and by others are taken for precious ſtones, though unknown, ſo called becauſe they are found in high places, which both words ſignify. The Targum renders the firſt by Sandalchin, chin, and ſeems to be the ſame with the Sardonyx, a precious ſtone found in Arabia, and which found there is by Pliny [o] ſaid to excel. Junius and Tremellius render it by Sandaſtros; which, as Pliny ſays [p], ſome call Garamantis, being bred in a place of that name in India; and he alſo obſerves, that it is found in Arabia towards the ſouth, and has ſhining golden drops in the body of it; it is a ſort of a carbuncle. Gabiſh ſeems to have ſome affinity with Chabazios, mentioned by Orpheus [q] as a precious ſtone; but whatever precious ſtones are meant, as it is hard to determine what, they are not to be ſpoken of with wiſdom, or to be compared to it: for the price of wiſdom is above rubies; or rather pearls, as Bochart [r] ſeems to have abundantly proved, who renders the words, "the extraction of wiſdom is greater than the extraction of pearls;" and ſo the Targum; there being, as he thinks, an alluſion to the extraction of pearls out of the ſea by divers into it [s]; who get them thro' much art, difficulty, and danger; and he obſerves, that there is a double extraction, or drawing them out, firſt of the ſhell-fiſh out of the ſea, and then of the pearls out of the ſhells; but the drawing out of wiſdom, or the attainment of that, is more difficult, and ſuperior to it, as well as attended with greater advantage; ſee Prov. iii. 15. and the note on Lam. iv 7. and though of pearls ſome are very large, Oviedo [t] ſpeaks of one that weighed 31 carats, and another 26; ſome as big as hazel nuts, and even as a middling walnut, and of very great price, as that bought by pope Paul at 44,000 ducats [u]; that by Philip the ſecond, of the ſize of a pigeons egg, valued at 144,000 ducats; that drank by Cleopatra at a draught, reckoned worth 80,000 pounds ſterling, and that of the emperor of Perſia, bought at 110,400 pounds [w]; yet the price of wiſdom is above them.

[w] סגור συγκλεισμον, Sept. concluſum, Tigurine verſion; clauſum, Bolducius. [x] לא יתן-תחתיה non dabitur pro ea, V. L. Montanus, Schultens. [y] Nat. Hiſt. l. 37. c. 6. [z] תסלה verbum ſignificat ſternere, Michaelis. [a] Ut ſupra, c. 2. [b] Ib. c. 5. [c] זכוכית υαλος, Sept. vitrum, V. L. Tigurine verſion, Cocceius. [d] Ut ſupra, l. 36. c. 26. Joſeph. de bello Jud. l. 2. c. 10. §. 2. [e] Hiſt. l. 5. c. 7. [f] Neri præfat. ad lib. de re vitriaria. [g] Var. Hiſt. l. 12. c. 3. [h] Abulpharag. Hiſt. Dynaſt. p. 33. [i] Vid. Fabritii Bibliothec. Gr. l. 3. c. 22. §. 11. 15. [k] Diodor. Sic. l. 2. p. 102. Herodot. Thalia, ſive l. 3. c. 24. [l] Ut ſupra. [m] Leo African. Deſcript. Africæ; l. 3. p. 273. [n] Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 6. c. 28.

℣. 19. The topaz of Ethiopia ſhall not equal it, &c.] Not Ethiopia Abyſſina, or that which lies beyond Egypt in Africa; for as Ludolphus [x] ſays, there are no gems found there, or very rarely; but Cuſh, as the word is, or Arabia Chuſæa, the ſame with the country of Midian, and the parts adjacent; ſee Hab. iii. 7. hence Zipporah, the wife of Moſes, who was of that country, is called an Ethiopian woman, Numb. xii. 1. and this was near Job's country, who knew the produce of it; and here the Topaz is found, as many writers obſerve. Diodorus Siculus ſays [y] in Ophiodes, an iſland in the Arabian gulph, belonging to the Troglodytes, the topaz is found, which is a very clear ſtone, pleaſant to the ſight, like to glaſs, and affording a wonderful golden colour; and with him Strabo [z] agrees, who relates there is an iſland called Ophiodes, from its being freed from ſerpents by the king's orders, which killed men that came thither for topazes; which he ſays is a clear ſtone of a golden colour, and ſo refulgent, that it is not eaſy to ſee it in the day-time, being ſo ſurrounded with light; but at night it is ſeen by thoſe that gather it, who ſet a veſſel for a ſign, and then dig for it in the day-time; and he adds a multitude of men are hired by the kings of Egypt, to gather and keep theſe ſtones, and men from ſtealing them; and according to Archelaus [a], the topaz is found in Chitis, an iſland in Arabia, where the Troglodytes digging for herbs and roots find it; and as Juba relates [b], there is an iſland called Topazion, in the Red-ſea, 300 furlongs from the continent, which is cloudy, and is therefore often ſought for by navigators; whence he ſays it had its name Topazion, which in the language of the Troglodytes ſignifies to ſeek, and the topaz itſelf in their language ſo ſignifies; in the Samaritan verſion of Exod. xxxix. 10. it is called Dachetah, from the Arabic word [c] Dachatz, the language of the Troglodytes, which ſignifies to ſeek and ſearch by removing the earth with the foot. This iſland ſeems to be the ſame with Topazos, which Pliny [d] ſays is an iſland of the Arabians, and gave name to a gem, meaning the topaz; but the truth rather is, that the gem gave name to the iſland: upon the whole, it is no wonder, as Braunius [e] obſerves, that this gem ſhould be called by Job the Arabian topaz. The Targum here calls it a green pearl; and ſome have thought the emerald is meant, which is of that colour; and the emeralds of Ethiopia are praiſed by ſome, according to Juba [f]; and in Egypt were emerald mines the Ethiopians laid a claim to [g]; and there were emeralds alſo in Arabia, as the above Juba relates; however be this what it may, as it is moſt likely to be the topaz, it is not equal in value to wiſdom, no not the largeſt topaz ever known; not even that of the great Mogul, which weighs more than 157 carats, valued at 271,500 French pounds [h]; and according to Tavernier [i] it weighs almoſt 158 carats, and was bought at Goa for almoſt 272000 florins: neither ſhall it be valued with pure gold; that is moſt refined and freed from droſs; they are not to be laid together as of equal value; the ſame word is uſed here as in ℣. 16. ſee the note there.

℣. 20. Whence then cometh wiſdom? and where is the place of underſtanding?] The ſame queſtions as in ℣. 12. repeated to ſet forth the ſuperior excellency of wiſdom, and to carry on the diſcourſe, and lead on to other things concerning it.

℣. 21. Seeing it is hid from the eyes of all living, &c.] Meaning not the beaſts of the field, as ſome interpret it; this makes the ſentiment jejune and trifling; but rational creatures, men, ſo the Septuagint, Eve is ſaid to be the mother of, Gen. iii. 20. wiſdom as a perfection in God, diſplayed in his works of creation and providence, is but imperfectly known by men; and the ſecret reaſons of his providential dealings with men, good and bad, are hid from all at preſent; and as for ſpiritual wiſdom or godlineſs, and the goſpel of Chriſt, and Chriſt himſelf, they are hid from the eyes of all natural and carnal men, though ever ſo wiſe and prudent in other things: and kept cloſe from the fowls of the air, or heaven [k]; either the devils ſo called, becauſe they dwell in the air, and are the poſſe or power of the air, Eph. ii. 3. and becauſe of their ravenous and cruel diſpoſition, and ſwiftneſs to do miſchief; ſee Luke viii. 5, 12. or rather the holy angels, as Jarchi, whoſe habitation is in heaven, and who are ſwift to do the will of God, and

[o] Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 37. c. 6. l. 5. c. 6. col. 681, &c. in P. Martyr. Decad. 3. l. 2. and Oviedo de Occident. Ind. c. 4. and Nat. Hiſt. l. 9. c. 35. Dictionary on the word Pearl. [p] Ib. c. 7. [q] περι λιθων, p. 240. [r] Hierozoic. par 2. l. 3. c. 2. [s] Of fiſhing for Pearls in this way, ſee the Account of it in Vartoman. Navigat. l. 3. and with nets, Ælian. de Animal. l. 15. c. 8. Vid. Plin. [t] Ut ſupra. [u] P. Martyr, Decad. 3. l. 10. [w] See Chambers's [x] Hiſt. Ethiop. l. 1. c. 7. [y] Bibliothec. l. 3. p. 172. [z] Geograph. l. 16. p. 529. [a] Apud Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 37. c. 8. [b] Apud ib. [c] Vid. Caſtel. Lex. Heptaglott. col. 686, 693. [d] Nat. Hiſt. l. 6. c. 29. [e] De veſt. Sacerdot. Heb. p. 649. [f] Apud Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 37. c. 5. [g] Heliodor. Ethiop. l. 8. 1. & 9. 6. [h] Scheuchzer. Phyſic. Sacr. p. 747. [i] Apud Braunium de veſt. Sacerdot, Heb. p. 649, 650. [k] השמים cæli, Pagninus, Montanus, &c.

and are repreſented as having wings like fowls; though theſe know much, yet the wiſdom of God in his providence, in the doctrines of the goſpel, and Chriſt himſelf, the wiſdom of God, are in a good meaſure hid from them; at leaſt their knowledge is imperfect, and they are deſirous of prying more into theſe things: unleſs men of the moſt piercing and penetrating geniuſſes, that ſoar aloft in the things of nature, and make the greateſt diſcoveries therein, and yet know nothing of divine and ſpiritual things, of the arcana's of providence or of grace, ſhould be meant.

℣. 22. Deſtruction and death ſay, &c.] Meaning the dead that are in the pit of deſtruction, the grave; not their dead bodies there, devoid of life and ſenſe, and know not any thing, but their ſouls; either the damned in hell, or the ſaints in heaven: the Targum is, the houſe of deſtruction, and the angel of death; or rather it regards ſuch as are dead, who whilſt alive had only a report of this wiſdom; wherefore if their records and writings, or traditions handed down from them, are enquired into, the reſult of the information they will give concerning it, will amount to no more than this: we have heard the fame thereof with our ears; it has been reported to us there is ſuch wiſdom, but what it is we know not; and this is all that we can ſay about it.

℣. 23. God underſtandeth the way thereof, &c.] And he only; not the way that men can come at the knowledge of wiſdom, which at preſent appears to be paſt finding out; but rather the way which wiſdom itſelf takes, and is in the deep, and its footſteps not known by any other, and the grounds and reaſons of its taking ſuch a courſe it does; which are only underſtood by the Lord: it may be applied to ſpiritual wiſdom in men, and the way to come at it; which God only knows and inſtructs in, and is his ſpecial and peculiar gift; and to Chriſt, the wiſdom of God, and the way which he has taken in the council and covenant of grace and peace, for the ſalvation of his people; and which he took in time, in the aſſumption of human nature, and by ſufferings and death to obtain it for them: and he knoweth the place thereof; the ſeat of wiſdom within himſelf, the ſource of all his dealings with men, his ſovereign will and pleaſure in his own heart; the place of ſpiritual wiſdom and knowledge, the heart of a regenerate man, where his goſpel is, and has come with power, and took place and works effectually; and where Chriſt, the Logos, the wiſdom of God is, even with himſelf, and in his boſom, as in the times of Job, and now at his right hand, in human nature.

℣. 24. For he looketh to the ends of the earth, &c.] In this and ſome following verſes, reaſons and proofs are given, which abundantly ſhew that God muſt know the way and place of wiſdom; ſince all the parts and places of the earth, even to the ends of it, are ſeen by him, and all creatures and things in it; nor is there any thing in heaven, earth, and hell, that is hid from him; and therefore if there is a way to it, or a place for it, he muſt needs know it; where its direction is, or where it ſteers its courſe, and takes up its abode: and ſeeth under the whole heaven; the fowls of the air, the beaſts of the field, the inhabitants of the world, and all that is done in it; every thing falls under the eye of his omniſcience, and under the notice of his providence, which extends to all creatures and things throughout the whole earth, and under the compaſs of the heavens; and ſince all places and perſons are obvious to his view, and all ſubject to his all-wiſe and diſpoſing providence, and are ordered, directed, and governed, according to his ſovereign will and pleaſure; the path of wiſdom, and the place of underſtanding he muſt be acquainted with; and particularly his all-ſeeing eye, and all powerful providence, are concerned in the following things, and in which there are wonderful proofs of his knowledge and wiſdom.

℣. 25. To make the weight for the wind, &c.] He indeed makes the wind itſelf, holds it in his fiſts, and brings it forth out of his treaſures, and lets it go, or reſtrains it at his pleaſure; he gives it an inclination to this or that, or the other point of the heavens, and a force to blow with, greater or leſſer, as he pleaſes, either for the good and benefit of men, or for the puniſhment of them; he raiſes the ſtormy wind, which fulfils his word and his will; and he makes it ſubſide and become a calm when he thinks fit; he can make it heavier or lighter, add to or take from its weight, ſo that it becomes more or leſs preſſing on bodies it meets with; he can make a rough wind, and ſtay that in the day of his eaſt-wind; he can make the rain in ſome ſenſe a weight to it; he can wet its wings with it, and bear it down, and cauſe it to reſt and be ſtill; and he that knows from whence it comes, and whither it goes, though we do not, being wholly under his direction, muſt know the way and place of wiſdom: and he weigheth the waters by meaſure; or, in a meaſure[k]; in the hollow of his hand, where he poizes them; ſee Iſ. xl. 12. ſome, becauſe there is a ſeeming impropriety in weighing by, or with a meaſure, render it out of a meaſure[l]. Mr. Broughton tranſlates the words, and held the waters in a meaſure; in his hand, as before, or in the ſea; weight and meaſure being both applied to the waters, may denote the perfect and exact knowledge God has of them, and of his great and diligent concern in providence about them, he ordering and diſpoſing of them according to his will; and which is greatly the ſenſe of the word uſed for weighing; and ſo the Targum paraphraſes it, "the waters he prepares (orders or diſpoſes of) by meaſure." Theſe waters, as they ſeem to be diſtinguiſhed from rain in the next verſe, may deſign the waters of the ſea and rivers; with theſe the earth at firſt was covered, which being ordered off of it, and a place provided for them, they were gathered into it, and meaſured and bounded in it by ſhores and ſand, that they might not overflow the earth; which is a wonderful inſtance of the providence of God, in weighing and meaſuring the waters; of which alſo there was a ſingular inſtance at the general deluge, when the windows of heaven were opened, and the fountains of the great deep broke up, which overflowed the whole earth, and the higheſt mountains in it; and after a time went off at the command of God, and the earth was dry as before: the tides, the ebbing and flowing of the ſea, and the flux and reflux of rivers, from and to the ſame place, are ſurprizing things, and wholly owing to the power and providence of God; the cauſes and reaſons of which are unknown to us, but are are well known to him, who weighs and measures the waters, which flow in a regular course; and who therefore must know the way and place of wisdom and understanding.

[k] במדה in menſura, V. L. Pagninus, Montanus, Bolducius, Beza. [l] Ex menſura, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Mercerus.

℣. 26. When he made a decree for the rain, &c.] Decreed within himself that he would give it; for rain is his gift alone, and which none of the vanities of the Gentiles can give, and a wonderful blessing to the earth it is; and which God bestows on all sorts of men, both good and bad, and causes it to fall sometimes on one place and sometimes on another, sometimes in greater sometimes in lesser showers; and according to his sovereign pleasure, he gives or witholds it; the effects of which are quickly seen. Mr. Broughton renders the clause, he made a bound for the rain, and a way for the lightning of thunder, or the lightning and the thunder, as Ben Gersom, who thinks the copulative ו, and, is wanting. Thunder is from God, it is his voice, and the word here used is in the plural number, voices [m], signifying various claps of thunder; and lightning generally accompanies it, which, though first perceived, they are both at once, the eye doing its office quicker than the ear; and a cloud also is usual; and so some render the word for lightning, as in Zech. x. 1. it may signify the way of the lightning out of the thunder-cloud, and attending claps of thunder; the thunder breaks the cloud, and makes a path for the lightning: the Targum is, "a path for the lightnings, which run with the voices or thunders;" but, though the course or path, the lightning steers, is very quick and very extensive from east to west, and cannot be traced by us, God that made it knows it, and he knows the path and place of wisdom. Sepborno interprets this of the thunder and lightnings at the giving of the law, which he understands by wisdom, as do other Jewish writers: Pliny [n] speaks of thunder and lightning as chance-matters; but Seneca [o] more truly ascribes them to divine power and providence, as here.

℣. 27. Then did he see it, and declare it, &c.] His own wisdom, when he made and executed his decrees concerning rain, lightning, and thunder; he saw it in himself, and as it appeared in the works of his hands, which he looked on and approved of, and saw that all was very good; and he declared it to others, by his works of nature and providence; for they declare the glory of God, and particularly the glory of his wisdom: he prepared it, yea, and searched it out; he prepared it in his counsels, according to which he wrought all things in the creation, and still does in providence; and his searching out denotes his perfect knowledge of it, and the way and course of it, or he takes with it, though it is unsearchable, and past finding out by us. Mr. Broughton understands this of a person, as do some others, even Christ, the wisdom of God; rendering the words, then he saw her, and shewed her, &c. and so the passages in Prov. viii. 27, 28, 29, 30, 31. may be a comment on these words and the foregoing; for when the above decrees were formed in the divine mind, then he saw his wisdom, his logos, his eternal Son; for he was by him, and with him, and in him, lying in his bosom; he looked at him in creation, and made man after his image, the idea he had formed of his human nature, and made all things for his sake; and he viewed him with the utmost delight and pleasure, as being the express image of his person; he declared him to be his only begotten Son, saying, this day I have begotten thee, Ps. ii. 7. he made him known to the angels, as the Targum here expresses it, and what he designed to do by him, and with him; which occasioned the revolt of many of them from him; and he declared him to Adam as soon as there was an opportunity and occasion for it; he prepared him in his eternal purposes to be the Redeemer and Saviour of his people, to be the head of the church, and the judge of quick and dead; he searched him out in his infinite wisdom, and found him, singled him out, laid help on him, with his holy oil anointed him, and appointed him to be the ransomer of his chosen ones, Job xxxiii. 24. Ps. lxxxix. 19, 20.

℣. 28. And unto man he said, &c.] What follows; unto Adam, so some render it, as Mr. Broughton; taking what is after delivered to be said to the first man; either by suggesting it to his mind and conscience, and inscribing it on his heart, where the law of God was written, and by which he was directed to fear God and avoid evil; or by the express command he gave him not to eat of the fruit of the tree of knowledge; thereby instructing him to fear him, and abstain from evil; which, had he done, would have been his highest wisdom, and a proof of it, and of his understanding; but it seems best to understand it in general of the sons of men, as the Targum and others: this is the substance of what God says in his works, which are done that men might fear him, and stand in awe of him, Ps. xxxiii. 6, 7, 8. Eccl. iii. 14. and in his word, and by his prophets, and their ministry in all ages; whereby it appears, that this is the whole of men to fear God and keep his commandments, Eccl. xii. 14. Some render the words, but unto men he said [p]; though he knows his own wisdom, and the way and place of it, the course it steers in providence, and has seen, observed, and shewn it; has prepared, disposed, ordered, and searched it out, and perfectly knows it, and the causes and reasons of it; yet he has not thought fit to make these known clearly to men; who therefore must be content they should be secrets to them, and attend to the wisdom which is revealed, and is of the greatest importance and consequence to them; namely, what follows, behold, the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom; by which is meant, not a fear of his wrath, and of eternal damnation, but an affection for God with reverence of him; such as is peculiar to children, a godly filial fear; and which is consistent with strong faith, great joy, and true courage; is opposite to pride and self-confidence, and takes in the whole worship of God, both external and internal: and it is called the fear of the Lord, because he is the object and author of it; it is not from nature, or in men naturally, but comes from the grace of God, and is a gift of it; it is wrought in conversion, and is increased by the discoveries of the love and goodness of God; and is that wisdom which God makes his people know, in the hidden part; no man is wise till he fears the Lord; and when that grace is put into him, he begins to be wise, for this is the beginning of wisdom, Prov. i. 7. and ix. 10. and is a principal part of it, and very profitable to men, both for this

[m] קולות vocum, Piscator, Mercerus, Drusius. Quæst. l. 2. c. 13. 31 Junius & Tremellius, Piscator.

[n] Nat. Hist. l. 2. c. 43.

[o] Nat.

[p] ויאמר εἶπε δε, Sept. dixit autem, Tigurine version, Beza; dixit vero, this life, and for that to come; and therefore it is their higheſt wiſdom to be concerned for it: the heart of God, is towards them that fear him; his eye is upon them; his hand communicates to them; his ſecret is with them; he ſets a guard of angels about them; cauſes the ſun of righteouſneſs to ariſe on them, and he has laid up much for them, for time and eternity: and to depart from evil is underſtanding; this is the fruit and effect of the fear of the Lord, through which men have an hatred of ſin, and an averſion to it, and are careful not to commit it; through it they depart from evil, and abſtain from all appearance of it; ſee Prov. viii. 13. and xvi. 6. and it puts them upon a regard to God and his commandments, and to all that is good; and which is an evidence and proof of a good underſtanding, Pſ. cxi. 10. Now Job ſuggeſts by this, that his friends ſhould be ſolicitous about, and ſatisfied with ſuch wiſdom and underſtanding as this, and not pry into the ſecrets of providence, and the wiſdom of that, which are not to be found out; and ſo ceaſe to charge him with being an hypocrite, and a wicked man, becauſe of the dealings of God with him, which were not to be accounted for: and by this Job appears to be a good man, and had an experience of what he here expreſſes; that he was one that feared God and eſchewed evil, according to the teſtimony given of him, ch. i. 1. 8. and this he gave proof of in his former life and converſation; of which an account is given in the following chapter.

CHAP. XXIX.

IN this chapter Job gives an account of his former life, and wiſhes it was with him now as then; and which he deſcribes with reſpect to his own perſon, and the favours he perſonally enjoyed, whether temporal or ſpiritual, ver. 1—5. with reſpect to his family and domeſtic affairs, ver. 5, 6. with regard to the eſteem he had from men of every age and ſtation, ver. 7—11. the reaſons of which were the mercy and compaſſion he ſhowed to the poor, the fatherleſs, and the widow, and the juſtice he adminiſtered in the execution of his office as a magiſtrate, ver. 12—17. in which honour and proſperity he expected to have lived and died, ver 18, 19, 20. and which he further deſcribes by the reſpect he had among men, and the power and authority he exerciſed over them, ver. 21—25.

℣. 1. Moreover, Job continued his parable, &c.] Or added to take it up [q], that is, he took it up again, and went on with his diſcourſe; he made a pauſe for awhile, waiting to obſerve whether any of his three friends would return an anſwer to what he had ſaid; but perceiving they were not inclined to make any reply, he began again, and gave an account of his former life, in order to ſhew, that he was far from being the wicked man, or being ſo accounted by others, as his friends had repreſented him; and ſaid as follows.

℣. 2. Oh that I were as in months paſt, &c.] Which is either an earneſt wiſh for reſtoration to his former ſtate of outward proſperity; which he might deſire, not through impatience and diſcontent under his preſent circumſtances, or from a carnal and worldly ſpirit; but either, that the preſent reproach he lay under from his friends might be taken off, he obſerving, that they accounted him a wicked man and an hypocrite, becauſe of his afflictions; wherefore he judged, if theſe were removed, and he was in as proſperous a condition and in as good circumſtances as before, they would entertain a different opinion of him; or, that his words might be better attended to, as they were by men, both young and old, and even princes and nobles before, it being a common caſe, that what a poor and diſtreſſed man ſays is not regarded; or that he might be in a capacity of doing good to the poor and fatherleſs, the widow and the oppreſſed, as he had formerly; or, this wiſh is only made to introduce the account of his former life, by which it would appear, that he was not the man his friends had repreſented him to be, from the favour he was in with God, and from the reſpect ſhewn him by men, and the many good things done by him: but ſince, by various expreſſions, which before had dropped from his lips, it appears, that he had no hope nor expectation of ever being reſtored to his former outward happineſs; this may be conſidered as a wiſh for the return of ſpiritual proſperity, wiſhing he was in as good frames of ſoul, and as much in the exerciſe of grace, and was as holy, as humble, as ſpiritual, and heavenly-minded, as he was when he had ſo much of the world about him; and that he had but the like communion with God, and his gracious preſence with him, as he had then. The ſtate of the Lord's people, God-ward, is always the ſame; his election of them ſtands ſure; the covenant of grace with them is unalterable; their intereſt in a living Redeemer always continues; grace in them is a principle, permanent and perpetual; but there may be, and often is, an alteration in their frames, and in the exerciſe of their graces, and in the open regard of God unto them; their graces may be low in exerciſe; there may be a decay of the life and power of godlineſs; their frames may change, and the preſence of God may be withdrawn from them, and they may have no view of intereſt in ſalvation, at leaſt not have the joys of it; wherefore, when ſenſible of all this, may be deſirous it might be with them as it was before; that God would turn them again, and cauſe his face to ſhine upon them, that they might be comfortable; the particulars of Job's former caſe follow, which he deſires a renewal of: as in the days when God preſerved me; either in a temporal ſenſe; God having ſet an hedge of ſpecial providence about him, whereby he and his, his family and ſubſtance were remarkably preſerved; but now this was plucked up, and all were expoſed to ravage and ruin; or in a ſpiritual ſenſe, as he was both ſecretly and openly preſerved, and as all the Lord's people are, in Chriſt, and in his hands, and by his power, ſpirit, and grace: the Lord preſerves their ſouls from the evil of their own hearts, ſin that dwells in them, that it ſhall not have the dominion over them; from the evil that is in the world, that they ſhall not be overcome by it, and carried away with it; and from the temptations of Satan, ſo as not to be devoured and deſtroyed by him, and from a final and total falling away; he preſerves them in his own ways, ſafe to his kingdom and glory; but ſometimes all this does not appear ſo evident unto them, as it might might not to Job at this time; who obſerved the workings of his corruption, and the breaking out of them, in paſſionate words, wiſhes, and curſes, and the temptations of Satan, who was buſy with him to go farther lengths, even to blaſpheme and curſe God; ſo that he might fear that God his defence was departed from him, the return of which he was deſirous of; ſee Iſ. xlix. 14, 15, 16.

[q] ויוסף שאת addidit aſſumere, Montanus, Bolducius, Mercerus; addidit tollere, Dr...

℣. 3. When his candle ſhined upon my head, &c.] Which may be underſtood either of outward proſperity, ſometimes ſignified by a candle, ch. xviii. 5, 6. and xxi. 17. and may be called the candle of the Lord, becauſe it is from him, it is of his lighting and ſetting up; and its ſhining on his head may denote the large meaſure and degree of it poſſeſſed by him, in alluſion to torches carried on high to light with; or lamps, or candles, ſet up in the higher part of the houſe to give the more light; or to the ſun in the firmament, and eſpecially when in its meridian, and ſhines cleareſt right over our heads, and caſts no ſhadow: or elſe it may be underſtood of light in a figurative ſenſe, not of the light of nature in men, which, though called the candle of the Lord, Prov. xx. 27. yet in man's fallen ſtate, ſhines not clearly; and with reſpect to this there was no difference in Job than heretofore; but rather it is the light of grace, the true light, which had ſhone upon him and in him, but now not ſo clearly as formerly, and as he could wiſh for; or elſe the word of God, which is a light unto the feet, and a lamp to the path; or it may be beſt of all, the favour of God, the light of his countenance he had before enjoyed, having had a comfortable diſplay of his love, a clear view of intereſt in it, and had the bleſſings of it beſtowed upon him, and enjoyed by him; and nothing was more deſireable by him, as is by every good man, than the return of the light of God's countenance; and that he might be remembered with his ſpecial favour, as his people are; and, as he had been in times paſt: and when by his light I walked through darkneſs; that is either by the light of outward proſperity, he had eſcaped thoſe calamities, diſtreſſes and dangers, and got over thoſe difficulties which attended others, though now ſurrounded with them; or by the light of divine grace, or of the word of God, and eſpecially by and in the light of God's countenance, he walked chearfully and comfortably, without any fear of the darkneſs of affliction and calamities, or of the dark valley of the ſhadow of death, or of the prince of darkneſs, or of the darkneſs of hell and damnation; but now clouds of darkneſs being about him, and he without the light of God's countenance, could not ſee the way in which he walked, and therefore wiſhed that that again might be lifted up upon him.

℣. 4. As I was in the days of my youth, &c.] Either taken literally, he being one like Obadiah, that feared God from his youth upward; or figuratively, for his former ſtate of proſperity, when he was like a tree in autumn laden with ripe and rich fruit, and in great abundance; and ſo ſome render the words in the days of my autumn, or autumnity[r]; though it may reſpect the time of his firſt converſion, the infancy and youth of his ſpiritual ſtate, who, when firſt regenerated, was as a newborn babe, and then became a young man, and now a father in Chriſt, his living Redeemer: and Job wiſhes it was with him as in his youth, or in the early days of his converſion, at which ſeaſon, generally ſpeaking, there are great zeal and fervency of ſpirit, a flow of love and affection to God and the beſt things; large diſcoveries of his love, much ſenſible communion with him, and enjoyment of his preſence; wherefore ſuch returning ſeaſons are deſireable; ſee Jer. ii. 2, 3. when the ſecret of God was upon my tabernacle; either the ſecret power and providence of God, which was upon his houſe and family, and all that belonged to him; or the ſecret of his love, which was manifeſted to him, and is from everlaſting to everlaſting, on them that fear the Lord, as Job did; who had ſecret communion with God, his fellowſhip was with him; he dwelt in the ſecret place of the Almighty, and was taken into his ſecret chambers, where he had the greateſt familiarity with him, ſee Pſ. xxv. 14. Some obſerve the word for ſecret is uſed for an aſſembly[s], and take the ſenſe to be, that the aſſembly of the ſaints and people of God was in his tabernacle or houſe; there they met together for religious worſhip, and where Job had often a comfortable opportunity, and wiſhes for the ſame again, ſee Pſ. xlii. 1, 2, 3, 4.

℣. 5. When the Almighty was yet with me, &c.] Not merely by his powerful and providential preſence, as he is with all men; but in a ſpecial manner by his gracious preſence, which is a wonderful and diſtinguiſhing favour; but ſometimes the people of God are without it, at leaſt they think ſo, and which was now Job's caſe, ſee ch. xxiii. 2, 3. 8, 9. and therefore he deſires he would return to him, and ſhew him his face and favour: When my children were about me; as olive plants about his table, in their youth; when he looked at them with great delight and pleaſure, as his growing hopes; and, when grown up, and were not far from him, but were round about him, and lay near his heart, and whoſe welfare, temporal and ſpiritual, he was ſolicitous for; but now they were all taken away from him, and were no more: the word for children ſignifies alſo ſervants[t], and may take in them, of whom he had many to do his work and buſineſs; to attend upon him, to wait his orders, and execute them, and guard his perſon; but now many of them were ſlain by the Sabeans and Chaldeans, and by fire from heaven; and thoſe he had were very diſreſpectful to him, ſee ch. xix. 15, 16.

℣. 6. When I waſhed my ſteps with butter, &c.] Not the ſteps of his houſe or palace; for to have done this, or his ſervants by his orders, as it would have been a very great impropriety, ſo a piece of great prodigality, which Job could never have been guilty of; but either his footſteps, the prints of his feet; and the ſenſe be, that his cattle produced ſuch a vaſt quantity of milk, that when his ſervants brought it from the fields to the dairy, their milk-pails ran over in ſuch abundance, that Job could not ſtep out of his houſe, and take a walk in his fields, but he ſtepped into puddles of milk, of which butter was made: this is an exaggerated phraſe, like that by which the land of Canaan is deſcribed, as flowing with milk and honey; or rather this is to be underſtood of the waſhing of his feet, which are the inſtruments of ſtepping or walking. It was uſual in thoſe times, in the eaſtern countries, to to waſh their feet upon travelling, or at feſtivals: but then this was commonly done with water, not with butter, ſee Gen. xviii. 4. and xix. 2. Luke vii. 44. and the meaning can only be, that Job had ſuch abundance of milk, or butter made of it, that he could, if he would, have waſhed his feet in it; indeed, they had uſed to anoint the feet with ointment; but whether cream or butter was any ingredient in it, and ſo the part is put for the whole, is not certain, ſee Luke vii. 38. Job xii. 3. beſides, that would have been more properly expreſſed by anointing than waſhing; it ſeems to be an hyperbole, an expreſſion like that of Zophar, in ch. xx. 17. ſignifying the vaſt abundance of the increaſe and produce of Job's kine; who is ſaid to waſh his feet in milk or butter, as Aſher is ſaid to dip his feet in oil, becauſe of the great plenty of it, Deut. xxxiii. 24. the ſpiritual meditation upon the words may be this; the feet of the beſt of ſaints need waſhing, there being many failings and infirmities in their walk and converſation; in which they gather much pollution and filth daily; the proper waſh for this is the blood of Chriſt, of which the laver in the tabernacle and temple was a type, at which the prieſts waſhed their hands and feet; but the word of God, called the ſincere milk of the word, is the inſtrument or means of waſhing, or of directing ſouls to the fountain opened to waſh in; ſo that with reſpect to that, the feet of ſaints, as the eyes of Chriſt, may be ſaid to be waſhed with milk: and the rock poured me out rivers of oil; another hyperbolical expreſſion, like that in Deut. xxxii. 13. where honey is ſaid to be ſucked out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock; as honey may be got out of a rock, becauſe bees may make their neſts and hives there, where it is laid up by them; ſo oil, in like manner, may be had from the flinty rock, olive trees growing on hills, mountains, and rocks, which yield oil in great abundance; near Jeruſalem was a mount called Olivet, from thence: the land of Edom, or Idumea, where Job lived, abounded with cragged mountains and rocks; and there might be in Job's eſtate, ſuch on which olive-trees grew in great plenty, as to produce vaſt quantities of oil: it is a very fanciful thought of Bolducius, that this rock was no other than a ſtone veſſel, in which was oil, ſomewhat like the alabaſter box in Matt. xxvi. 7. and which was plentifully poured on Job, when he was anointed high-prieſt; and another learned man [n], tho' he rejects the notion of its being a veſſel for ſacred uſe, yet is willing to allow it was an oil-veſſel for common uſe: as to the ſpiritual ſenſe, it may be obſerved, that a rock in ſcripture often ſignifies a divine perſon; it is an emblem of Chriſt, as oil alſo is of the ſpirit of God and his grace; and which flows from Chriſt, who is full thereof, and that in ſuch great abundance, as to be expreſſed by rivers; ſee 1 Cor. x. 4. Matt. xxv. 3, 4. John i. 14. 16. and vii. 38.

[r] בימי חרפי in autumno dierum mearum, Hottinger. Theſaur. Philolog. p. 507. in diebus autumnitatis meæ, Schultens; ſo the word ſignifies in Arabic, vid. Golium, col. 1415. Lud. Capell. in loc.
[s] בסוד in ſocietate Dei, Pagninus, Beza; ſocietas Dei, i. e. congregatio, Bolducius; ſo Jarchi.
[t] נעריי Juvenes mei, Tigurine verſion; vel famuli vel filii, Mercerus, Druſius; ſo Jarchi.

℣. 7. When I went out to the gate through the city, &c.] Job having deſcribed his former ſtate of happineſs by the perſonal favours he enjoyed, and by the proſperity of his family, and his abundance of plenty at home; proceeds to give an account of the honour and reſpect he had from men of every age and rank abroad: though he had an affluence of the things of this world, he did not indulge himſelf at home in eaſe and ſloth; but went abroad to take care of the public welfare, maintain public peace, and adminiſter public juſtice among his neighbours; performing the office of a civil magiſtrate, which is often expreſſed in ſcripture by going in and out before the people: Job went out from his own houſe to the gate of the city, where a court of judicature was kept, as it was uſual in thoſe times and countries to hold them in the gates of the city; ſee Zech. viii. 16. and to which he paſſed through the city, very probably, in great pomp and ſplendor, ſuitable to his office and character, which drew the eyes and attention of the people to him; by which it ſhould ſeem that his houſe was on one ſide of the city, and the gate where juſtice was adminiſtred was on the other; though it may be rendered over the city, [o] and the ſenſe be, that he paſſed along as he that was over the city, the chief man in it, and preſident of the court of juſtice, ſee 2 Kings x. 5. when I prepared my ſeat in the ſtreet; where he ſat, not as a teacher, though he was an inſtructor, not only of his family, but of his neighbours, as Eliphaz himſelf teſtifies, ch. iv. 3, 4. and it was uſual for ſuch to have ſeats to ſit upon, as thoſe had who ſucceeded Moſes, and are ſaid to ſit in his chair; and it was uſual to call to men and inſtruct them in open public places; hence wiſdom is ſaid to utter her voice in the ſtreets, in the opening of the gates, at the entry of the city, at the coming in at the doors, Prov. i. 20, 21. and viii. 3. but Job here ſpeaks of himſelf as a civil magiſtrate, as a judge upon the bench, who had a ſeat or throne erected for him to ſit upon, whilſt he was hearing and trying cauſes; and this was ſet up in the ſtreet under the open air, before the gate of the city, where the whole city might be convened together, and hear and ſee juſtice done to their neighbours; in ſuch a ſtreet before the gate of the city, Ezra read the law to Iſrael; and in ſuch an one Hezekiah got the people of Iſrael together, and ſpoke comfortably to them when invaded by Sennacherib; ſee Neh. viii. 2, 3. 2 Chron. xxxii. 6. and the Arabs to this day hold their courts of juſtice in an open place under the heavens, as in a field, or in a market-place [p]; and it is right that courts of juſtice ſhould be open and acceſſible to all.

℣. 8. The young men ſaw me, and hid themſelves, &c.] Through a veneration of him; which was much, ſince young men, through a vain conceit and opinion of themſelves, are apt to treat their ſuperiors in age with ſlight, neglect and contempt; or through fear, leſt he ſhould ſpy them, and call them to him, and examine them cloſely concerning their conduct and behaviour, and reprove them for their youthful follies he might have knowledge of: and the aged aroſe and ſtood up; as he paſſed by them, to ſhew their reſpect unto him; or when he came into court, they roſe up, and continued ſtanding until he had took his ſeat; and even then kept the ſame poſture, attending to his counſel and inſtruction, to his definitive ſentence and deciſion of matters in debate; though they were venerable perſons themſelves, and ſuch as before whom young men were to ariſe, Lev. xix. 32. and were alſo men of wiſdom and prudence, ch. xii. 12. yet theſe men roſe and ſtood up, paying a deference to Job's ſuperior ſenſe and judgment.

℣. 9. The princes refrained talking, &c.] Who were in court before Job came in, and were either talk-talking with one another about indifferent matters, or were giving their opinion in a caſe before them; but no ſooner did Job make his appearance, but they left off talking, and would not proceed any further; they laid a reſtraint upon their words, and curbed themſelves from ſpeaking any more till they had heard his opinion: and laid their hand on their mouth; as a token of ſilence, Judg. xviii. 19.

[n] Fortunat. Schacch. Elæochryſm. Myroth. l. 2. c. 79. p. 715.

[o] עלי קלת super civitatem, Pagninus, Montanus, Schmidt; ſuper urbe, Schultens.

[p] Norden's Travels in Egypt and Nubia, vol. 2. p. 140, 141. 158. See Joſeph. Antiq. l. 18. c. 5. §. 6.

℣. 10. The nobles held their peace, &c.] Theſe may be in ſome reſpects inferior to the others; not princes of the blood, or ſons of kings, who were properly princes, and yet great perſonages, of a noble extraction, and of conſiderable families: ſome think the leaders and generals of armies are meant, commanders and captains, and ſuch like military officers, thoſe ſons of Mars, who are generally bold and daring, boiſterous and bluſtering, and full of talk; and yet even theſe held their peace in the preſence of Job; or their voice was hid[r]; it could not be heard: and their tongue cleaved to the roof of their mouth; ſo that they had no uſe of it, and it was as if they had none, ſee Ezek. iii. 26. Here are various expreſſions made uſe of, ſignifying the profound ſilence of great perſonages whilſt Job was preſent; and this ſilence was owing either to a conſciouſneſs of their own weakneſs, and leſt they ſhould, by ſpeaking before him, betray it, and he ſhould expoſe them; or to the deſire they had of hearing Job's opinion firſt, which was as an oracle to them, and uſually determined matters in debate before them; ſuch high ſentiments did they entertain of Job's good ſenſe and abilities.

℣. 11. When the ear heard me, then it bleſſed me, &c.] The ear of the common people aſſembled together to hear cauſes tried, and how they would go; when they heard Job give his opinion in court, or the definitive ſentence paſſed by him as a judge, they all applauded his wiſdom and juſtice; they highly praiſed and commended him; in which ſenſe the word bleſſed is uſed, Prov. xxxi. 28. or they wiſhed a bleſſing on him; they prayed for his welfare, as it becomes people to do for thoſe that are in authority, eſpecially wiſe and faithful magiſtrates; or they accounted him a bleſſed man, and called him ſo, Luke i. 48. as he was, both in a temporal ſenſe, being bleſſed with a great plenty of earthly things, and alſo bleſſed with all ſpiritual bleſſings in Chriſt, with an abundance of grace, and with a title to eternal glory; as well as he was bleſſed as a magiſtrate, with great wiſdom and with great integrity and uprightneſs in the diſcharge of his office; and when the eye ſaw me, it gave witneſs to me; of his gracefulneſs and gravity, of his honeſty and faithfulneſs, of his good behaviour among his neighbours, and of his wiſe conduct in the courts of judicature.

℣. 12. Becauſe I delivered the poor that cried, &c.] This honour and eſteem he had not, becauſe of his grandeur and riches, becauſe of his worldly wealth and ſubſtance; but becauſe of the goodneſs of his diſpoſition, and becauſe of the good he did to men, his acts of pity and compaſſion to the poor, and of the juſtice he did to all men; the poor and the afflicted, when they cried to him for help he delivered them out of the hands of their oppreſſors: and the fatherleſs; the care and defence of which belongs to judges and civil magiſtrates, ſee Pſ. lxxxii. 1, 2, 3, 4. and him that had none to help him; as the poor and fatherleſs ſeldom have; there is power on the ſide of the oppreſſors of them, but they have few or none to take their parts, and to be their comforters, Eccl. iv. 1. in theſe inſtances Job imitated God, and was a follower of him, as a dear child of his; who, when this and the other poor man cries unto him, he hears, ſaves, and delivers out of all their troubles; he is the helper, yea, the father of the fatherleſs, and the judge of the widow; and, when there is no help from men, he is a preſent help in times of need.

℣. 13. The bleſſing of him that was ready to periſh came upon me, &c.] That were ready to periſh through the oppreſſion of others, or through want of the neceſſaries of life, or through falſe charges brought, and through falſe witneſs bore againſt them, and ſo liable to a ſentence of condemnation to death, or having it paſſed upon them; but Job taking their part, and ſearching thoroughly into their cauſe, not only reſpited them from deſtruction, but cleared them from the charges laid againſt them, and which brought the bleſſing of thoſe perſons on him; who bleſſed God for him, and bleſſed him, wiſhed a bleſſing on him in their prayers to God, who had been ſuch a happy inſtrument of their deliverance from ruin and deſtruction; ſee Prov. xxiv. 11, 12. and xxxi. 5, 6. and I cauſed the widow's heart to ſing for joy; by relieving her wants, defending her cauſe, and puniſhing thoſe that oppreſſed her; which is the reverſe of the character Eliphaz gives of Job, ch. xxii. 9.

℣. 14. I put on righteouſneſs, and it clothed me, &c.] Not the righteouſneſs of his living Redeemer, the robe of righteouſneſs, and garment of ſalvation he had from him; though he had put on that by faith, and it was his clothing in the ſight of God, which covered his perſon, and covered all his ſins from the avenging eye of divine juſtice; and in which he was preſented before God unblameable and irreprovable in his ſight, and with which he was adorned and beautified, being made perfectly comely through it, and compleatly juſtified by it; but legal righteouſneſs in the adminiſtration of his office as a magiſtrate; he put it on, that is, he exerciſed it, and he exerciſed it conſtantly from morning to night, and day after day; as a man puts on his clothes in a morning, and keeps them on all the day, and which he is always repeating; and it was as viſible in him, and to be ſeen and obſerved by all, as the clothes on his back; and it covered him all over as a garment does; no blemiſh was to be ſeen in him, or blame to be caſt upon him, throughout the whole courſe of his adminiſtration; and this was a fence unto him againſt all calumny and reproach, as garments are againſt the inclemency of the weather; ſee 1 Sam. xii. 3, 4, 5. ſo a godly converſation in the exerciſe of graces and virtues, and in the performance of duties both to God and man, is ſometimes expreſſed by a putting them on, as garments are put on; ſee Eph. iv. 24. Col. iii. 10. 12. 14. and theſe are an outward clothing to appear in before men, and ſhould be ſhewn forth with meekneſs and wiſdom, ſo as to be beheld by men; and ſhould be continually exerciſed and conſtantly performed; and then they are a covering with reſpect to men, and they appear harmleſs, blameleſs, and without rebuke, in the midſt of a crooked and perverſe generation; and thus, by well doing, put to ſilence the ignorance of fooliſh men, and ſuch to the bluſh, thoſe who falſly accuſe their good converſation: and this in every ſenſe was Job's caſe: my judgment was as a robe and diadem; ſuch as the high-prieſt among the Jews wore in the execution of his office whic which made him look grand and majeſtic; and it was uſual in Job's time, as it is in our's, and has been the cuſtom in all ages and countries, for judges and civil magiſtrates, to be clothed in a different manner from others, as it is proper they ſhould, to command an awe and reverence of them among the common people, and make them reſpectable to them: but Job did not ſo much regard his purple robe he was clad in, or the diſtinguiſhing turbant he wore on his head, or whatever it was, and which might bear ſome reſemblance to a mitre or a diadem; as it was his great concern to adminiſter juſtice, which he reckoned his greateſt honour, and was more ornamental to him than all the ſhowy enſigns of his office; and it was this which gave him honour and eſteem among all ſorts of men, high and low: and his regard to the poor, before obſerved, did not ariſe from a fooliſh commiſeration of them as poor men, and in order to get himſelf a name for his pity to them, but proceeded upon a principle of juſtice and equity, which he made the rule of his adminiſtration; he did not countenance the poor in his cauſe right or wrong; not the quality of the perſon, but the righteouſneſs of his cauſe was what he attended to; and he took his part not merely becauſe he was a poor man, but ſeeing his cauſe was juſt.

[r] נחבאו occultabatur, Druſius; occultabat ſe, Piſcator.

℣. 15. I was eyes to the blind, &c.] Either in a literal ſenſe: there was a law in Iſrael againſt putting a ſtumbling-block before the blind, and a curſe pronounced on thoſe that cauſed them to wander out of the way; which implied, that they ought to remove all impediments out of their way, and ſhould lead, guide, and direct them in the right way; and this Job might do, if not in his own perſon, yet by his ſervants, and ſo was as eyes unto them, and eſpecially by taking care of, and providing for perſons in ſuch circumſtances: or rather in a civil ſenſe; ſuch who were in perplexity and diſtreſs, oppreſſed by their neighbours, but did not know how to get juſtice done them, what ſteps to take, or methods to purſue, to obtain their right or ſecure it; theſe Job inſtructed with his good advice and counſel, and put them into a way of proceeding, whereby they could be extricated out of their difficulties, and peaceably enjoy their own, ſee Numb. x. 31. and it might be true of him in a ſpiritual ſenſe; that he was eyes to his blind heathen neighbours among whom he dwelt; who were ignorant of God, and of the living Redeemer, and of the way of life and ſalvation by him, and of their miſerable and loſt eſtate, and of their need of a Saviour; not being acquainted with the nature of ſin, and the ſad conſequences of it, and with the way of atonement for it, nor with the mind and will of God, and the worſhip of him; all which he might be a means of enlightening their minds with: Eliphaz owns he inſtructed many, ch. iv. 3. thus miniſters of the goſpel are eyes to the blind; for though they cannot give eyes, or ſpiritual ſight to men, which is only from the Lord, yet they may be inſtruments of opening blind eyes, and of turning men from darkneſs to light, as the word preached by them is a means of enlightening the eyes, Acts xxvi. 18. Pſ. xix. 8. whereby men come to ſee their loſt eſtate, and the way of ſalvation by Chriſt: and feet was I to the lame; either in a literal ſenſe, as David was to Mephiboſheth, when he ſent for and maintained him at his own table, ſo that he had no occaſion to ſeek for his bread elſewhere; and Job might make a proviſion in ſome way or another for ſuch ſort of perſons: or rather in a civil ſenſe, ſuch who were engaged in law-ſuits, and had juſtice on their ſide, but for want of friends or money, or both could not carry them on; theſe Job ſupported and ſupplied, and carried them through their ſuits, and got their cauſe for them.

℣. 16. I was a father to the poor, &c.] Not in a literal ſenſe; for his children were rich as well as himſelf, while he had them; but in a civil ſenſe, he was the patron of the poor; he was an advocate for them, he took their part, he pleaded their cauſe, defended their perſons, and ſecured the little property they had; he had the pity and compaſſion of a father for them, and ſupplied their wants; he fed them and clothed them; he did not eat his morſel alone, but gave them a part of it, and warmed them with the fleece of his flock: and the cauſe which I knew not I ſearched out; any cauſe that was brought before him, he knew nothing of before, and which, upon the opening of it, did not appear plain and eaſy, but had its difficulties; this he cloſely examined, and ſearched thoroughly into the merits of, till it appeared plain to him on which ſide the truth and juſtice of it lay; he did not hurry it over, and paſs ſentence, having only in a ſuperficial manner conſidered it, as is too often the caſe; but after a long examination of the contending parties, and of the witneſſes on both ſides, to whom he gave an impartial hearing, he pronounced the deciſive ſentence; ſee Prov. xxv. 2. and xxix. 7. Some think this refers to his diligent ſearch and enquiry after cauſes that were not brought before him; he did not wait for application to be made to him, but hearing of, or upon enquiry finding, that there were perſons oppreſſed and diſtreſſed by cruel men, he of himſelf voluntarily offered his aſſiſtance, ſearched into their cauſe, made himſelf maſter of it, and freed them from their diſtreſſes; ſo different were his behaviour and character from that of the unjuſt judge, Luke xviii. though others chuſe to render the words, the cauſe of him that I knew not, &c.[a] of a ſtranger, of one that he had never ſeen before, of one that was moſt unknown to him in the world; the cauſe of ſuch an one he took as much pains with to get the true knowledge of, and do juſtice to, as of the deareſt relation, the neareſt neighbour, and the moſt intimate friend and acquaintance that he had.

℣. 17. And I brake the jaws of the wicked, &c.] Their jaw-teeth, or grinders, alluding to beaſts of prey, who have ſuch teeth, very large; the meaning may be, that Job confuted the arguments which wicked men made uſe of in their own defence, and againſt the poor, expoſed the weakneſs of them, and made them ineffectual to anſwer their purpoſes; or diſabled tyrants and cruel oppreſſors from doing any further hurt and damage to the fatherleſs and helpleſs; was an inſtrument in the hand of God, of breaking the power, and weakening the hands of ſuch perſons, and hindering them from doing the miſchief they otherwiſe would; ſee Prov. xxx. 14. Pſ. iii. 7. and lviii. 6. and plucked the ſpoil out of his teeth; as David took the lamb out of the mouth of the bear and lion that came into his father's flock, and carried it off: thus Job delivered the poor out of the hands of ſuch monſters in nature, comparable to beaſts of prey, and ſaved them them from being utterly ruined by them, and obliged them to reſtore unto them what they had in an unrighteous manner taken from them.

[a] 'דעתי' quem non cognoveram, Junius & Tremellius, Michaelis; ignotiſſimi, Schultens.

℣. 18. Then I ſaid, I ſhall die in my neſt, &c.] Job, amidſt all his proſperity knew he ſhould die, death and the grave being appointed for all men; and he often thought of it, and of the manner of it; but he concluded that death was as yet at ſome diſtance from him, as appears from the following clauſe; and that when the time was come, he ſhould not die on the ground, but in the city in which he lived [m], in his houſe, and on his bed; that he ſhould die with all his children about him. like a bird in its neſt full of young; whereas now he was ſtript of them all, and like to die childleſs; that he ſhould die amidſt all his outward enjoyments, in an affluence of good things, in honour, credit, and eſteem among men; whereas now he was deprived of all his ſubſtance, and had in contempt by friends and foes; and that he ſhould die in great tranquillity of mind, and peace of ſoul, in the enjoyment of the divine preſence, and under rich diſcoveries of his love and grace; whereas now God had hid himſelf from him, and the arrows of the Almighty ſtuck faſt in him. Job now had dropped his former confidence, and yet after all he did die in all the circumſtances he believed he ſhould; ſee ch. xlii. 10—17. and this confidence might riſe not from any mercenary ſpirit in him, as if this would be the fruit and reward of his integrity and uprightneſs, juſtice and faithfulneſs, and as due unto him on that account; but from the promiſes of God, which to the patriarchs were uſually of temporal bleſſings, as types of ſpiritual ones; though it may be there was in this ſomewhat of the infirmity of the fleſh, as in David, Pſ. xxx. 7. and an inattention to the uncertainty of all temporal enjoyments; nor might he then be ſo well acquainted with the doctrine of the croſs, he now had an experience of: and I ſhall multiply my days as the ſand; which is not to be numbered, an hyperbolical expreſſion, to denote the long life he expected to enjoy, and which was promiſed to good men; and which Job, notwithſtanding his preſent deſpair of it, was favoured and ſatisfied with, Pſ. xci. 16. Job xlii. 16, 17. Some verſions render it, as the Phœnix [n], a bird of that name, ſpoken of by many writers as a very long-lived one; ſome ſay it lived 500 years [o], others 540 [p], others 660 [q]; yea ſome, and ſo the Jewiſh writers, as Jarchi and others [r], make it to live 1000 years, and ſome ſay [s] more; and it is reported of it, though not with ſufficient evidence, that there is never but one of the kind at a time; which, perceiving its end drawing near, it makes a neſt of caſia, frankincenſe, and other ſpices, and ſets fire to it, and burns itſelf in it, and that out of its aſhes comes forth an egg, which produces another; and ſome of the ancient writers, as Tertullian [t] particularly, have made uſe of this as an emblem of the reſurrection; and to which ſome think Job has here reſpect; that he ſhould live long like this bird, and then die and riſe again; but inaſmuch as this ſeems to be a fabulous bird, and that there is not, nor ever was, any ſuch in being, it can't well be thought that Job ſhould allude unto it; though his making mention of his neſt, in the former clauſe, may ſeem to favour it, and which has induced ſome to give into it [u]: others render it, as the palm-tree [w]; between which and the phœnix there is thought to be ſome likeneſs on account of duration [x], and both in the Greek tongue have the ſame name; the palm-tree is an ever-green, and endures a long time; Pliny [y] ſpeaks of a palm-tree in his time at Delos, ſaid to have been there from the days of Apollo, which is ſuppoſed to be 1400 years; and it is obſerved [z], that this tree does continue two or three hundred years; and this verſion may ſeem to be countenanced and confirmed by what follows: but ſince the Hebrew word here uſed is never uſed but of ſand, it is beſt ſo to underſtand it here, ſeeing it as fully anſwers Job's purpoſe; which was to expreſs his confidence of a very long life. Sand is frequently uſed in ſcripture for what is innumerable; ſo ψαμμοκοσια in Ariſtophanes [a], for what can't be numbered, and are equal to a mountain of ſand.

℣. 19. My root was ſpread out by the waters, &c.] According to our verſion, and others, Job here and in the following verſes, gives the reaſons of his hope and confidence of his long life, and quiet and comfortable death amidſt all his proſperity and happineſs; which were founded upon his flouriſhing circumſtances, and the great reſpect that was ſhewn him among men; and this is the ſenſe, if we read the words in the paſt tenſe, as we and many others do; or in the preſent tenſe, my root is ſpread, &c. as others; but there are ſome interpreters, both Jewiſh and Chriſtian [b], that render them in the future tenſe, here and to the end of the chapter; and ſo they are a continuation of Job's hope and truſt in the times of his proſperity, that things would always continue as they were with him, and much more abundantly; and indeed all is true of Job, in every ſenſe, and all may be taken into the account; and that theſe words, and the following, as they deſcribe what had been, and at the then preſent time, when he concluded the above in his mind, was his caſe, ſo they may alſo declare what he believed would be always his caſe to the end of his days. Here he compares himſelf to a tree well rooted and happily ſituated by plenty of water, and which may be expreſſive both of his temporal and ſpiritual proſperity: his outward proſperity ſeemed to him to have been well ſettled and eſtabliſhed, being like a tree that had taken root, and was like to continue, being watered with the favour and bleſſing of God, which maketh rich; and as to his ſpiritual eſtate, he was like a tree planted by a river of water, to which good men are often compared in ſcripture, Pſ. i. 3. Iſ. xliv. 4. Jer. xvii. 7, 8. they are in general called trees of righteouſneſs, and are ſometimes likened to particular trees, as to olives, cedars, and palm-trees; and ſome think, as Pineda, that it is to the latter Job here has reſpect; the laſt clauſe of the preceding verſe being in the Latin Vulgate verſion ſo rendered as to countenance this ſenſe; and it may be obſerved that this tree having thick long leaves, and fruit full of juice, juice, and its wood ſpongy, requires much water; and, as Pliny [b] ſays, delights in watery places; nor is it content with rain, but is better ſatisfied with waters flowing about it; hence it is often found neceſſary to dig about it, and lay its roots open, that the waters may more eaſily come at them, and flow about them [c]; and ſo the words here in the original text are, my root was, is, or ſhall be open to the waters [d]: good men, as they are rooted in the love of God, and in the perſon of Chriſt, ſo they have, as Job had, the root of the matter in them, the truth of grace, or a principle of grace; which is watered, and kept alive and flouriſhing, by the love and favour of God ſhed abroad in the heart; by freſh ſupplies of grace out of the fulneſs of Chriſt, who is the fountain of gardens and well of living waters; and by the means of grace, the word and ordinances, the ſtill waters to which ſaints are led, and by which they are made to lye down, and where they are watered, refreſhed, and comforted: and the dew lay all night upon my branch; ſo that the water being at his root below, and the dew on his branch above, he muſt be in a fruitful and flouriſhing condition: the dew is a great bleſſing to the earth, to trees, herbs, and plants, and the cauſe of great fertility; and this may reſpect Job's temporal happineſs, in the health and proſperity of his children, who were to him what branches are to a tree; and in the affluence of worldly good things, with which through the bleſſing of God, as dew upon him, he abounded; and may alſo have regard to his ſpiritual affairs: believers in Chriſt are branches in him, as Job was one; and the dew of divine grace and favour lies upon them continually, even in the darkeſt ſeaſons; which revives and refreſhes their ſouls, and makes them fruitful in the exerciſe of grace, and performance of good works; ſee Prov. xix. 12. Hoſ. xiv. 5, 6, 7. the dew falls in the night, and the ſooner it falls the longer it lies, and is moſt uſeful: ſome render the words, upon my harveſt, or mowing [e]; the dew is of great uſe in harveſt-time; mowers and reapers chuſe the morning to work in, when the ſtalks are moiſtened by the dew; and which is of uſe to keep the ears of corn from ſhedding by ſwelling the fibres, and ſo retaining the grains in their proper places [f]; ſee Iſ. xviii. 4.

[m] So Rufus Virginius uſed to call the Villa where he dwelt, Senectutis ſuæ Nidulum, Plin. l. 6. Ep. 10. [n] כהול ſicut Phœnix, Pagninus; ſo Mercer. Piſcator. [o] Herodot. Euterpe, ſive l. 2. c. 73. Pompon. Mela de ſitu orbis, l. 3. c. 9. Philoſtrat. vita Tyanæi, l. 3. c. 14. Ælian. de Animal. l. 6. c 58. Tacit. Annal. l. 6. c. 28. [p] Solin. Polyhiſtor. c. 46. [q] Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 10. c. 2. [r] Bereſhit Rabba, §. 19. fol. 15. 2. Yalkut in loc. par. 1. fol. 152. 2. [s] Vid. Texelii Phœnix, l. 2. c. 1. p. 140. [t] De Reſurrectione, c. 13. Vid. Clement. Rom. Ep. 1. ad Corinth. p. 60. & Felli Not. in ib. [u] Vid. Tentzelii Diſſert. de Phœnice, &c. §. 5. [w] ὡσπερ φοινικος, Sept. ſicut palma, V. L. [x] Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 13. c. 4. [y] Ib. l. 16. c 44. [z] Vid. Scheuchzer. Phyſic. Sacr. l. vol. 4. p. 757. [a] Acharneſ. act. 1. ſc. 1. & Scholia in ib. [b] Jarchi, Ben Gerſom, Bar Tzemach, Schmidt, Schultens.

℣. 20. My glory was (is or ſhall be) freſh in me, &c.] Or new [g]; renewed day by day, having freſh additions made unto it; which was true of Job's temporal honour from among men; as a prince and civil magiſtrate, he had the honour given him that was due unto him, and this was continually increaſing; and alſo of his ſpiritual glory, which lay as every good man's glory does, in the grace of God wrought in him, and in the righteouſneſs of Chriſt put upon him, Pſ. xlv. 9, 13. which grace is renewed and increaſed in them by the holy ſpirit, and is therefore called the renewing of the holy Ghoſt; and which righteouſneſs is revealed from faith to faith, from a leſſer degree of it to a greater: and my bow was renewed in my hand; is or ſhall be; meaning either his authority as a civil magiſtrate, increaſing daily to the terror of evil doers, and to the praiſe, profit, and defence of them that did well; or his ſtrength, as Gerſom interprets it, his ſpiritual ſtrength, as in Iſ. xl. 31. where the ſame word is uſed as here; ſo that he grew ſtronger and ſtronger in faith and other graces, and went from ſtrength to ſtrength; the bow was a warlike inſtrument, and required ſtrength to draw it, and is put for it; ſee Gen. xlviii. 22. and xlix. 24.

℣. 21. Unto me men gave ear, &c.] Or give ear, or ſhall give ear, being all ear; all attention to him, liſtening to what he ſaid with the utmoſt diligence and earneſtneſs; even all ſorts of men, high and low, rich and poor, princes, nobles, and common people; this they had done, and Job concluded they ſtill would do the ſame; ſee ℣. 9, 10. and waited; patiently, without any wearineſs, with pleaſure and delight, without giving any interruption, or wiſhing his diſcourſe was ended; and though continuing ever ſo long, were not impatient until it was finiſhed: and kept ſilence at my counſel; which was the thing waited for, and which when given, it was to the higheſt ſatisfaction; they acquieſced in it, and ſhewed their approbation of it by their ſilence, not having any thing to object to it, any alteration to be made in it, or any thing to be added to it; but being ſo compleat and full, they were ready to take it at once, and act according to it; Job's counſel being like that of Ahitophel, which was as the oracle of God.

℣. 22. After my words they ſpake not again, &c.] Did not or would not make any reply to them; they did not attempt to change and alter them, to add unto them, or take from them, or in any wiſe to correct them, and much leſs to contradict them, and treat them with contempt; or differed not, as Mr. Broughton renders it; differed not from them, but agreed to them; and differed not among themſelves, but united in what Job ſaid, as being full to the purpoſe, after which nothing more could be ſaid; ſee Eccl. ii. 12. and my ſpeech dropped upon them; his prophecy, as Jarchi, propheſying being expreſſed by dropping, Amos vii. 16. his doctrine dropped from his lips like the honey-comb, and was ſweet, grateful, and delightful to his hearers, as the church's lips, Cant. iv. 11. or rather like the rain, as in Deut. xxxii. 2. when it falls and drops gently and eaſily, and ſo penetrates and ſoaks into the earth, and abides and does good: in like manner, when good and ſound doctrine drops upon the hearers, ſo as to enter into their hearts, and work effectually in them, it does them good, and they rejoice at it, and are far from having any thing to ſay againſt it.

℣. 23. And they waited for me as for the rain, &c.] The former rain, as appears by the following clauſe, which fell in autumn, about October, after ſeed-time, in order to nouriſh and cheriſh it, and bring it up; now as the huſbandman waited for this, was in daily expectation of it, and greatly deſired it, and longed for it; ſee Jam. v. 7. ſo the people waited for Job, for his coming into their public aſſemblies, whether civil or religious, and longed to hear him ſpeak, for their counſel and inſtruction, for their comfort and direction in all things they ſtood in need of: and they opened their mouth wide as for the latter rain; which fell in the ſpring about March, in the time of harveſt, which was of uſe to plump the grains of corn, and make them fuller, and the flour finer; now Job's hearers opened their mouths, as the dry and parched earth gapes for rain; or the huſbandman, or the gardener, as the Targum, opens his mouth, and aſks asks and prays for rain; or as a hungry and thirsty man opens his mouth to take in refreshment, or expresses thereby his desire of it; or as persons somewhat deaf open their mouths to hear the better, there being a way through the mouth to the internal ear, as anatomists [h] observe; which lies through the Fallopian duct, out of the palate, to the internal cavity of the ear, called the concha; wherefore such persons naturally open their mouths when they would hear attentively; all which expresses the eager desire of Job's hearers after his doctrine, which, like the rain, would be useful, profitable, and edifying to them; their view was not to indulge their curiosity, to please their ears, but to affect their hearts, and instruct their minds.

[b] Nat. Hiſt. l. 13. 4. [c] Palladius apud Scheuchzer, ut ſupra, p. 759. [d] פתוח אלי מים aperta ad aquas, Montanus Bolducius, Mercerus, Cocceius, Schmidt, Michaelis, Schultens. [e] בקצירי in meſſe mea, Montanus, Tigurine verſion; in ſegete mea, Cocceius; ſo the Targum. [f] Vid. Scheuchzer, ut ſupra. [g] חדש nova, Mercerus, Piſcator, Michaelis, Schultens.

℣. 24. If I laughed on them, they believed it not, &c.] Not that he at any time laughed at them, by way of derision; but when in a chearful frame of mind, or in a merry mood, he used freedom and familiarity, and jested with them; but they could not believe that he did jest, or was in jest, he being a man always of such gravity and seriousness, that they concluded the smile on his countenance, and the pleasant turn of his expression, had a serious meaning in them; or such familiarity with them, was so pleasing to them, that they could scarcely for joy believe that he did condescend to indulge such an air of pleasantry: or, as Mr. Broughton renders it, and so some others to the same sense, they would not be bold [i]; familiarity with them did not breed contempt, as it sometimes does; they did not presume upon it, and grow bold and insolent, and make him their equal, and jest with him again; but still there was an awe upon them, and they behaved with reverence to him; and to shew how great it was is the design of the expression: and the light of my countenance they cast not down; they did not ruffle his mind, or disturb the serenity of it; or cause him to change his countenance, through any bold and indecent behaviour towards him, encouraged by the freedom and pleasantry he used with them; they did not put him to shame, or provoke him to anger and displeasure by any unbecoming deportment; they kept their distance, they did not detract from his authority and majesty, or in the least lessen that, but behaved with the same reverence and regard to him they ever did; see Gen. iv. 6.

℣. 25. I chose out their way, &c.] When his friends and neighbours came to him for advice in things civil, he marked out their way for them, directed what steps to take, what methods to pursue for their good; they desired him to chuse for them, preferring his judgment to their's, and were determined to abide by his choice of ways and means, and to follow his counsel; and in religious matters, he instructed them in their duty, both towards God and men, and proposed unto them what was most eligible, both with respect to doctrine and practice; and sat chief in all their public assemblies; he presided in their councils and courts of judicature; and when met together for religious worship, he sat in the chair of the teacher, and instructed them; he was chief speaker, as the heathens said of the apostle Paul, Acts xiv. 12. and dwelt as a king in the army, or troop [k]. Mr. Broughton renders it with a garrison; Job was surrounded with multitudes of persons, that waited upon him on one account or another, who were ready to receive his words, and be obedient to them, as a king or general in the midst of an army, surrounded by his general officers and the whole army encamped about him, doing him honour, and ready to obey whatever commands or instructions he should give them: some conclude from hence that Job was really a king, as being not a note of similitude, but of truth and reality, as in Matt. xiv. 2. and so he might be; for in those times and countries, every city almost had its king; though this is not necessarily supposed here; for the phrase seems only to denote the authority and influence Job had over men by his advice and instruction, which were as much regarded as from a king; and the majesty he appeared in, and the reverence in which he was had: as one that comforteth the mourners; which some restrain to the king in his army, and connect them therewith thus, when he comforteth the mourners [l]; the soldiers mourning for some loss sustained, and slaughter made among them; whose minds the king or general, by a set speech endeavours to cheer, and comfort, and allay their fears, and animate them to intrepidity and fortitude, when all eyes are upon him and attentive to him; and so attentive were Job's hearers to him. Bar Tzemach observes, that the copulative ו, or and, is wanting, and so is a clause by itself, and expresses something distinct from the former, and may be supplied, and I was as one that comforteth the mourners; as a wise man that comforteth them, as Aben Ezra explains it; like one that made it his business to visit mourners in affliction, on account of the death of a relation, and the like; see Job xi. 19. and speaks comfortable words to them, to support them under their sorrow; when such an one used to speak alone, and all stood silent before him, and attentive to him; and in a like position was Job, when he gave his instructions to those about him; and he was, no doubt, a comforter of mourners himself, being either in temporal afflictions, or in spiritual troubles; comforted those that were cast down in either sense, and was a type of Christ, who was appointed to comfort all that mourn in Zion.

CHAP. XXX.

JOB in this chapter sets forth his then unhappy state and condition, in contrast with his former state of prosperity described in the preceding chapter: things had taken a strange turn, and were just the reverse of what they were before; he that was before in such high esteem and credit with all sorts of men, young and old, high and low, rich and poor, now is had in derision by the meanest and basest of men, whose characters are described, ver. 1—8. and the instances of their contempt of him by words and gestures, are given, ver. 9—14. he who enjoyed so much ease of mind, and health of body, is now filled with distresses of soul, and bodily diseases, ver. 15—19. and he who enjoyed so much of the presence of God, and communion with him, and of his love and favour, was now distre-

[h] Scheuchzer, ut supra.

[i] לא יאמינו non tamen sibi sumebant audaciam, Michaelis; neque tam audaces fiunt, Reimar apud Schultens.

[k] בגדוד in agmine, Montanus, Bolducius; in turma, Mercerus, Drusius, Cocceius, Michaelis, Schultens.

[l] כאשר quando, Junius & Tremellius, Drusius; quum vel quando, Schmidt.

diſregarded, and, as he thought, cruelly uſed by him, who not only had deſtroyed his ſubſtance, but was about to bring him to the grave, ver. 20—24. all which came upon him, though he had a ſympathizing heart with the poor, and them that were in trouble, and when he expected better things, ver. 25—28. and he cloſes the chapter, lamenting his ſad and ſorrowful circumſtances, ver. 29, 30, 31.

℣. 1. But now they that are younger than I, have me in deriſion, &c.] Meaning not his three friends, who were men in years, and were not, at leaſt all of them, younger than he, ſee ch. xv. 10. and xxxii. 6, 7. nor were they of ſuch a mean extraction, and ſuch low-lived creatures, and of ſuch characters as here deſcribed; with ſuch Job would never have held a correſpondence in the time of his proſperity; both they and their fathers, in all appearance, were both great and good; but theſe were a ſett of profligate and abandoned wretches, who, as ſoon as Job's troubles came upon him, derided him, mocked and jeered at him, both by words and geſtures; and which they might do even before his three friends came to him, and during their ſeven days ſilence with him, and whilſt this debate was carrying on between them, encouraged unto it by their behaviour towards him; to be derided by any is diſagreeable to fleſh and blood, though it is the common lot of good men, eſpecially in poor and afflicted circumſtances, and to be bore patiently; but to be ſo uſed by junior and inferior perſons, is an aggravation of it; as Job was, even by young children, as was alſo the prophet Eliſha, ſee ch. xix. 18. whoſe fathers I would have diſdained to have ſet with the dogs of my flock; either to have compared them with the dogs that kept his flock from the wolves, having ſome good qualities in them which they had not; for what more loving or faithful to their maſters, or more vigilant and watchful of their affairs? or to ſet them at meat with the dogs of his flock; they were unworthy of it, though they would have been glad of the food his dogs eat of, they living better than they, whoſe meat were mallows and juniper-roots, ver. 4. and would have jumped at it; as the prodigal in want and famine, as thoſe men were, would fain have filled his belly with huſks that ſwine did eat; but as no man gave them to him, ſo Job diſdained to give the meat of his dogs to ſuch as thoſe; or to ſet them over [m] the dogs of his flock, to be the keepers of them, to be at the head of his dogs, and to have the command of them; ſee the phraſe in 2 Sam. iii. 8. or elſe to join them with his dogs, to keep his flock with them; they were ſuch worthleſs faithleſs wretches, that they were not to be truſted with the care of his flock along with his dogs. It was uſual in ancient times, as well as in our's, for dogs to be made uſe of in keeping flocks of ſheep from beaſts of prey, as appears from Orpheus [n], Homer [o], Theocritus [p], and other writers: and if the fathers of thoſe that derided Job were ſuch mean, baſe, worthleſs creatures, what muſt their ſons be, inferior to them in age and honour, if any degree of honour belonged to them?

℣. 2. Yea, whereto might the ſtrength of their hands profit me, &c.] For though they were ſtrong, luſty, hale men, able to do buſineſs, yet their ſtrength was to ſit ſtill and fold their hands in their boſoms, ſo that their ſtrength was of no profit or avail to themſelves or others; they were ſo ſlothful and lazy, that Job could not employ them in any buſineſs of his to any advantage to himſelf; and this may be one reaſon, among others, why he diſdained to ſet them with the dogs of his flock to keep it; for the fathers ſeem to be intended all along to ver. 8. though it matters not much to which of them the words are applied, ſince they were like father like ſon: in whom old age was periſhed? who did not arrive to old age, but were ſoon conſumed by their luſts, or cut off for their ſins; and ſo the ſtrength and labour of their hands, had they been employed, would have been of little worth; becauſe the time of their continuance in ſervice would have been ſhort, eſpecially being idle and ſlothful: ſome underſtand it of a lively and vigorous old age, ſuch as was in Moſes; but this being not in them, they were unfit for buſineſs, ſee ch. v. 26. or they had not the endowments of old age, the experience, wiſdom, and prudence of ancient perſons, to contrive, conduct, and manage affairs, or direct in the management of them, which would make up for lack of ſtrength and labour. Ben Gerſom, Bar Tzemach, and others, interpret the word of time, or the time of life, that was periſhed or loſt in them; their whole courſe of life, being ſpent in ſloth and idleneſs, was all loſt time.

℣. 3. For want and famine they were ſolitary, &c.] The Targum interprets it without children; but then this cannot be underſtood of the fathers; rather through famine and want they were reduced to the utmoſt extremity, and were as deſtitute of food as a rock, or hard flint, from whence nothing is to be had, as the word ſignifies ſee ch. iii. 7. fleeing into the wilderneſs in former time deſolate and waſte: to ſearch and try what they could get there for their ſuſtenance and relief, fleeing through fear of being taken up for ſome crimes committed, or through ſhame, on account of their miſerable condition, not caring to be ſeen by men, and therefore fled into the wilderneſs to get what they could there: but ſince men in want and famine uſually make to cities, and places of reſort, where proviſion may be expected; this may be interpreted not of their flying into the wilderneſs, though of their being there, perhaps baniſhed thither, ſee ver. 5. but of their gnawing [q], or biting the dry and barren wilderneſs, and what they could find there; where having ſhort commons, and hunger-bitten, they bit cloſe; which, though extremely deſolate, they were glad to feed upon what they could light on there; ſuch miſerable beggarly creatures were they: and with this agrees what follows.

℣. 4. Who cut up mallows by the buſhes, &c.] Which with the Troglodytes were of a vaſt bigneſs [r]; or rather upon the buſh [s] or tree; and therefore cannot mean what we call mallows, which are herbs on the ground, and grow not on trees or buſhes; and beſides, are not for food, but rather for medicine: though Plutarch [t] ſays, they were the food of the meaner ſort of people; ſo Horace [u] ſpeaks of them as ſuch; and the word in the original is near in ſound to a mallow; but it ſignifies ſomething ſalt,

[m] עם כלבי ſuper canes, Noldius, p. 739. N°. 1825.
[n] De lapidibus, Hypoth. ver. 53, 54.
[o] Iliad. 10. ως κυνες περι μηλα, &c. v. 183. & Iliad. 12. v. 303. & Idyl. 6. v. 9, 10.
[p] χ' αμιν εςι κυων φιλοποιμνιος, &c. Idyll. 5. v. 106.
[q] הערקים ציה qui rodebant in ſolitudine, V. L. rodentes ſiccitatem, Schultens.
[r] Diodorus Siculus, l. 3. p. 175.
[s] על שיח ſuper virgulto, Montanus, Schultens; ſuper arbuſtum, Bochart.
[t] In ſympoſio ſeptem ſap.
[u] ——— me paſcunt olivæ.
Me cichorea leveſque malvæ. Carmin. l. 1. Ode 31. & Epod. Ode 2.

ſalt, wherefore Mr. Broughton renders it ſalt herbs; ſo Grotius, ſuch as might grow by the ſea-ſide, or in ſalt marſhes; and in Edom, or Idumea, where Job lived, was a valley of ſalt, ſee 2 Kings xiv. 7. Jarchi ſays it is the ſame with what the Syrians in their language call kakuli, which with them is a kind of pulſe; but what the Turks at this day call kakuli, is a kind of ſalt herb, like to alcali, which is the food of camels [x]: the Septuagint render the word by Alima; and by ſeveral modern learned men, what is intended is thought to be the halimus of Dioſcorides, Galen, and Avicenna; which is like unto a bramble, and grows in hedges and maritime places; the tops of which, when young and tender, are eaten, and the leaves boiled for food, and are eat by poor people, being what ſoon filled the belly, and ſatisfied; and ſeem to be the ſame the Moors call mallochia, and cry about the ſtreets, as food for the poor to buy [y]: however, it appears upon the whole to be the tops, or leaves of ſome ſort of ſhrub, which mean people uſed to gather and live upon. The following ſtory is reported in the Talmud [z] concerning king Jannai, who "went to Cochalith in the wilderneſs, and there ſubdued ſixty fortified towns; and, upon his return, he greatly rejoiced, and called all the wiſe men of Iſrael, and ſaid unto them, our fathers eat malluchim (the word uſed in this text of Job) at the time they were employed in building the ſanctuary; ſo we will eat malluchim on remembrance of our fathers; and they ſet malluckim on tables of gold, and they eat;" which the Gloſs interprets herbs; the name of which, in the Syriac language is kakuli; the Targum is, who plucks up thorns inſtead of eatable herbs. Some [a] render the word nettles, ſee ver. 7. juniper-roots for their meat, or bread [b]; with the roots of which the poor were fed in time of want, as Schindler * obſerves: that bread may be, and has been made out of roots, is certain, as with the Weſt-Indians, out of the roots of ages and jucca [c]; and in particular juniper-roots in the northern countries have been uſed for bread [d]; and there were a people in Ethiopia above Egypt, who lived upon roots of reeds prepared, and were called Rhiſophagi [e], root-eaters: ſome render the words, or juniper-roots to heat, or warm with [f], as the word is uſed in Iſ. xlvii. 14. and coals of juniper have in them a very great and vehement heat, ſee Pſ. cxx. 3, 4. but if any part of the juniper-tree was taken for this purpoſe, to warm with when cold, one ſhould think the branches, or the body of the tree, ſhould be cut down, rather than the roots dug up: another ſenſe is given by ſome [g], that meat or bread is to be underſtood of the livelihood theſe perſons got by digging up juniper-roots, and ſelling them: there are others that think, that not the roots of juniper, but of broom [h] are meant, whoſe rape, or navew, or excreſcence from the roots of it, ſeem to be more fit for food. All this agrees with the Troglodytes, whom Pliny [i] repreſents as thieves and robbers, and when preſſed with famine, dig up herbs and roots: cutters of roots are reckoned among the worſt of men, by Manetho [k].

℣. 5. They were driven from among men, &c.] From towns and cities, and all civil ſociety, as unfit to be among them; not for any good, it may be obſerved, but for crimes that they had done, like our felons, and tranſported perſons: they cried after them as after a thief; as they were driven and run along, the people called after them, ſaying, There goes a thief; which they ſaid by way of abhorrence of them, and for the ſhame of them, and that all might be warned and cautioned againſt them; and generally ſpeaking, ſuch as are idle and ſlothful, and thereby become miſerable, are pilferers and thieves.

℣. 6. To dwell in the cliffs of the valleys, &c.] or brooks [l], in ſuch hollow places as were made by floods and ſtreams of waters: in caves of the earth, and in the rocks; where they betook themſelves for fear of men, and through ſhame, being naked and miſerable, and not fit to be ſeen: Job has reſpect to the Horites and Troglodytes, his neighbours, who dwelt in ſuch places chiefly.

℣. 7. Among the buſhes they brayed, &c.] Like wild aſſes; ſo Sephorno, to which wicked men are fitly compared, ch. xi. 12. or they cried, or groaned [m], and moaned among the buſhes, where they lay lurking; either they groaned through cold, or want of food; for the wild aſs brays not but when in want, ch. vi. 5. under the nettles they were gathered; or under thiſtles [n], as ſome, or under thorns, as [o] others; under thorn-hedges, where they lay either for ſhelter, or to hide themſelves, or to ſeize upon a prey that might paſs by; and ſo were ſuch ſort of perſons as in the parable in Luke xiv. 23. it not being uſual for nettles to grow ſo high as to cover perſons, at leaſt they are not a proper ſhelter, and much leſs an eligible one; though ſome render the words, they were pricked [p], bliſtered, and wounded, a word derived from this being uſed for the ſcab of leproſy, Lev. xiii. and ſo puſtules and bliſters are raiſed by the ſting of nettles; the Targum is, "under thorns they were aſſociated together;" under thorn-hedges, as before obſerved; and if the juniper-tree is meant in a preceding verſe, they might be ſaid to be gathered under thorns when under that; ſince, as Pliny [q] ſays, it has thorns inſtead of leaves; and the ſhadow of it, according to the poet [r], is very noxious and diſagreeable.

℣. 8. They were children of fools, &c.] Their parents were fools, or they themſelves were ſuch; fooliſh children, or fooliſh men, were they that derided Job; and their deriſion of him was a proof of it: the meaning is not that they were ideots, or quite deſtitute of reaſon and natural knowledge, but that they were men of ſlender capacities; they were Nabal-like, which is the word here uſed of them; and indeed it may eaſily be concluded, they could not have much knowledge of men and things, from their pedigree, education, and

---

[x] Scheuchzer. Phyſic. Sacr. vol. 4. p. 760.
[y] Ibid. vid. Reineſium de Lingua Punic. c. 9. S. 20, 21.
[z] T. Bab. Kidduſhin, fol. 66. 1.
[a] David de Pomis Lexic. fol. 80. 3.
[b] לחמים panis eorum, Montanus, Michaelis, Schultens.
* Lexic. col. 1775.
[c] Pet. Martyr. de Angleria, decad. 1. l. 1. Diod. Sic. l. 3. p. 159.
[d] Olaus Magnus, de ritu gent. Septent. l. 12. c. 4.
[e] Hillerus apud Schultens in loc. רתמים. Mercerus, Druſius, & Guſſetius, p. 839.
[f] Ad calefaciendum ſe, Pagninus; ſo Kimchi Sepher Shoraſh. rad. רתם. Mercerus; ſo Ben Gerſom; gemebant, Michaelis; ſo Broughton.
[g] שרש רתמים radix geniſtarum, Michaelis, Schultens; ſo ſome in Noldius, p. 193. Schultens.
[h] נחלים torrentium, Tigurine verſion, Pagninus, Montanus, &c.
[i] Nat. Hiſt. l. 37. c. 8.
[k] Apoteleſm. l. 5. v. 183.
[l] Sub ſentibus, V. L. ſub vepreto aliquo, Tigurine verſion; ſub vepribus, Cocceius; ſub ſpina, Vatablus, ſo Ben Gerſom; they ſmarted, Broughton.
[m] ינהקו clamabant, Vatablus, Schultens.
[n] תחת חרול ſub carduis, Vatablus, so Broughton.
[o] Sub ſentibus, V. L. ſub vepreto aliquo, Tigurine verſion; ſub vepribus, Cocceius; ſub ſpina, Vatablus, ſo Ben Gerſom; they ſmarted, Broughton.
[p] יספחו pungebantur, Junius & Tremellius; ſe ulcerant, Guſſetius, p. 505.
[q] Nat. Hiſt. l. 16. c. 24.
[r] Juniperi gravis umbra ——— Virgil. Bucolic. Eclog. 10.

and manner of living before deſcribed; though rather this may ſignify, their being wicked men, or children of ſuch, which is the ſenſe of the word fool frequently in the Pſalms of David, and in the Proverbs of Solomon; and men may be fools in this ſenſe, as having no underſtanding of divine and ſpiritual things, who yet have wit enough to do evil, though to do good they have no knowledge: yea, children of baſe men, or men without a name [k]; a kind without fame, Mr. Broughton renders it; an infamous generation of men, famous for nothing; had no name for blood, birth, and breeding; for families, for power and authority among men, having no title of honour or of office; nor for wealth, wiſdom, nor ſtrength, for which ſome have a name; but theſe men had no name, but an ill one, for their folly and wickedneſs; had no good name, were of no credit and reputation with men; and perhaps, ſtrictly and literally ſpeaking, were without a name, being a ſpurious and baſtardly breed; or living ſolitary in woods and deſarts, in cliffs and caves; they belonged not to any tribe or nation, and ſo bore no name: they are viler than the earth; on which they trod, and who were unworthy to tread upon it; and out of which their vile bodies were made, and yet were viler than that, which is the baſeſt of the elements, being moſt diſtant from heaven the throne of God [l]; they were not ſo valuable as ſome parts of the earth, the gold and ſilver, but were as vile as the droſs of the earth; and viler than that; they were cruſhed and bruiſed, and broken more than the earth, as the word [m] ſignifies; they were as ſmall and as contemptible as the duſt of the earth, and the mire of the ſtreets, and more ſo; or than the men of the earth, as Aben Ezra obſerves, than the meaneſt and worſt, and vileſt of men: Mr. Broughton renders it, baniſhed from the earth; ſmitten, ſtricken, and drove out of the land where they had dwelt, ver. 5. whipped out of it, as ſome tranſlate the word [n], as vagabonds; as a lazy, idle, pilfering ſett of people, not fit to be in human ſociety; and by ſuch baſe, mean, low-lived people were Chriſt and his apoſtles ill-treated; ſee Matt. xxiii. 33. and xxvii. 27. 39. 44. Acts xvii. 5.

℣. 9. And now am I their ſong, &c.] The ſubject of their ſong, of whom they ſung ballads about the ſtreets, in public places, and at their feſtivals and merriments, as Chriſt the anti-type of Job was the ſong of the drunkard, Pſ. lxix. 12. ſee Lam. iii. 14. or the meaning may be, they rejoiced in his afflictions and calamities, and made themſelves merry with them, which was cruel and inhuman, as David's enemies did in his, and thoſe abject, mean, baſe people, like thoſe that derided Job: and ſo the Edomites rejoiced over the children of Judah, in the day of their deſtruction, and as the inhabitants of popiſh countries will rejoice over the witneſſes when ſlain, and make merry, Pſ. xxxv. 15, 16. and Obad. ver. 12. Rev. xi. 9, 10. yea, I am their by-word; all their talk was about him continually, and at every turn would uſe his name proverbially for an hypocrite, or a wicked man; and thus Chriſt, of whom Job was a type, became a proverb in the mouth of the Jews, Pſ. lxix. 11. and as the Jews themſelves now are with others, Jer. xxiv. 9.

℣. 10. They abhor me, &c.] As it is no wonder they ſhould, ſince his inward and moſt intimate friends did, ch. xix. 19. they abhorred him, not for any evil in him; Job was ready enough to abhor that himſelf, and himſelf for it, as he did when ſenſible of it, ch. xlii. 6. but for the good that was in him, ſpoken or done by him; which carried in it a reproof to them they could not bear; ſee Amos v. 10. they abhorred him alſo becauſe of his preſent meanneſs and poverty, and becauſe of his afflictions and diſtreſſes, and particularly the diſeaſes of his body; ſo Chriſt was abhorred by the ſcribes, phariſees, and elders of the people, the three ſhepherds his ſoul loathed, and their ſoul abhorred him for his meanneſs and for his miniſtry; and even by the whole nation of the Jews, by the body of the people, particularly when they preferred Barabbas, a thief and a murderer to him; ſee Zech. xi. 8. Iſ. xlix. 7. they flee from me; as from ſome hideous monſter, or infectious perſon, as if he had the plague on him, or ſome nauſeous diſeaſe, the ſtench of which they could not bear; ſo Chriſt his anti-type was uſed by his people; when they ſaw him in his afflictions they hid their faces from him, did not care to look at him, or come nigh him, Iſ. liii. 3. and ſpare not to ſpit in my face; not in his preſence only, as ſome think, which is too low a ſenſe, but literally and properly in his face, when they vouchſafed to come near him; in this opprobrious way they uſed him, than which nothing was a greater indignity and affront; and we need not ſcruple to interpret it in this ſenſe of Job, ſince our Lord, whoſe type he was in this and other things, was ſo treated, Iſ. l. 6. Matt. xxvi. 67. and xxvii. 30.

℣. 11. Becauſe he hath looſed my cord, &c.] Not his ſilver cord, for then he muſt have died immediately, Eccl. xii. 6. though it may be underſtood of the looſening of his nerves through the force of his diſeaſe, and the afflictions he endured from God and man, ſee ver. 17. or rather, of the ſhattered ſtate and condition of his family and ſubſtance; which, whilſt he enjoyed, he had reſpect and reverence from men; but now all being looſed, ſcattered and deſtroyed, he was treated with deriſion and ſcorn; or better ſtill, of his power and authority as a civil magiſtrate, by which, as with a cord, he bound many to ſubjection and obedience to him, and which commanded reverence of him; but this being now looſed and removed from him, perſons of the baſer ſort behaved in an inſolent manner towards him; there is a keri, or a marginal reading of this clauſe, which we follow; but the cetib, or written text, is his cord; and ſo Mr. Broughton renders it, he hath looſed his ſtring; which he explains of the ſtring or rein of his government, that holdeth baſe men from ſtriving with the mighty, and which comes to the ſame ſenſe; for the power and authority Job had as a governor, were of God, and which he had now looſened; the alluſion may be to the ſtring of a bow, which being looſed, it cannot caſt out the arrow; and reſpect may be had to what Job had ſaid, ch. xxix. 20. my bow was renewed in my hand; it then abode in ſtrength, and its ſtrength was renewed; but now he had loſt his power and ſtrength, at leaſt it was greatly weakened, [k] בלי שם abſque nomine, Pagninus, Montanus, Vatablus; ſo Beza, Mercerus, Piſcator, Druſius, Michaelis, Cocceius.

[l] See Weemes's Obſervat. Natural. c. 3.
[m] נכאו contriti, Montanus, Bolducius; ſo the Targum.
[n] Flagellati, Schultens.

ened, that he could not defend himself, nor punish the wicked: and afflicted me; that is God, who is also understood in the preceding clause, though not expressed. Job's afflictions were many, and there were second causes of them, who were the movers, instruments, and means of them, as Satan, the Sabæans and Chaldæans, yet they were of God, as the appointer, orderer, and sender of them; and so Job understood them, and always as here ascribed them to him; wherefore there was a just cause for them, and an end to be answered by them, and it became Job patiently to bear them, and to wait the issue of them: now, on this account, the above persons were emboldened and encouraged to use Job in the ill manner they did: they have also let loose the bridle before me; the restraints that were upon them when Job was in his prosperity, and had the reins of government in his hand; these they now cast off, and shewed no manner of reverence of him, nor respect for him; and the bridle that was upon their mouths, which kept them from speaking evil of him while he was in power, now they slipt it from them, and gave themselves an unbounded liberty in deriding, reproaching, and reviling him; see Ps. xxxix. 1. and this they did before him, in his presence and to his face, who before were mute and silent.

℣. 12. Upon my right hand rise the youth, &c.] Springeth, as Mr. Broughton translates the word; such as were just sprung into being, as it were; the word [n] seems to have the signification of young birds that are not fledged; have not got their feathers on them, but are just got out of the shell, as it were; and such were these young men: some render the word the flower [o]; as if the flower of men, the chief and principal of them were meant, such as were Job's three friends, who are here distinguished from the mean and baser sort before spoken of; but the word even in this sense signifies young men, who are like buds and flowers just sprung out, or who are beardless boys, or whose beards are just springing out; so the young priests are in the Misnah [p] called the flowers of the priesthood: now such as these rose up, not in reverence to Job, as the aged before did, but in an hostile way, to oppose, resist, reproach, and deride him; they rose up on his right-hand, took the right-hand of him, as if they were his superiors and betters; or they stood at his right-hand, took the right-hand to accuse him, as Satan did at Joshua's; see Ps. cix. 6. Zech. iii. 1. they push away my feet; they brought heavy charges and violent accusations against him, in order to cast him down, and trample upon him; nor would they suffer him to stand and answer for himself; he could have no justice done him, and so there was no standing for him. If this was to be understood literally, of their pushing at him to throw him down to the ground, or of an attempt to trip up his heels, so that his feet were almost gone, and his steps had well nigh slipped, it was very rude and indecent treatment of him indeed: and they raise up against me the ways of their destruction; as in besieging a town, mounts, forts, and batteries are raised to destroy it, so those persons made use of all ways and means to destroy Job; or they trod upon him, and made him as a path or causeway to walk upon, in order utterly to destroy him. Mr. Broughton renders the words, they cast upon me the causes of their woe; imputed all their calamities and miseries to him, reproached him on that account, and now were resolved to revenge themselves on him.

℣. 13. They mar my path, &c.] Hindered him in the exercise of religious duties; would not suffer him to attend the ways and worship of God, or to walk in the paths of holiness and righteousness; or they reproached his holy walk and conversation, and treated it with contempt, and triumphed over religion and godliness: they set forward my calamity; added affliction to affliction, increased his troubles by their reproaches and calumnies, and were pleased with it, as if it was profitable as well as pleasurable to them, see Zech. i. 15. they have no helper; either no person of note to join them, and to abet, assist, and encourage them; or they needed none, being forward enough of themselves to give him all the distress and disturbance they could, and he being so weak and unable to resist them; or there is no helper against them [q]; none to take Job's part against them, and deliver him out of their hands, see Eccl. iv. 1.

℣. 14. They came upon me as a wide breaking in of waters, &c.] As when a wide breach is made in the banks of a river, or of the sea, the waters rush through in great abundance, with great rapidity and swiftness, and with a force irresistible; and in like manner did Job's enemies rush in upon him in great numbers, overwhelming him in an instant, and he not able to oppose them; or, as when a wide breach is made in the wall of a city besieged, the besiegers pour themselves in, and bear down all before them: and thus Job, in a like violent manner was run upon, and bore down by the persons before described: in the desolation they rolled themselves upon me; as when a breach is made in a bank of a river, or of the sea, the waters roll themselves, one wave and flood over another; or, as when a breach is made in a wall, in the broken place they tumble; as Mr. Broughton renders it; the soldiers tumble one over another in haste, to get possession, and seize the plunder: in such like manner did Job's enemies roll themselves on him, in order to crush and destroy him; and it may be rendered, because of the desolation [r], because of bringing calamity on him in order to make him desolate; they came pouring in upon him with all their numbers, force, and strength, to bear him down, and crush him to the earth, as grass may be rolled upon, and beaten down by heavy bodies.

℣. 15. Terrors are turned upon me, &c.] Not the terrors of a guilty conscience, for Job had a clear one, and held fast his integrity; nor the terrors of a cursing and condemning law; for he knew he was justified by his living Redeemer, and his sins forgiven for his sake; nor the terrors of death, for that he had made familiar to him, and greatly desired it; nor the terrors of a future judgment, for there was nothing he was more solicitous for, than to appear before the judgment-seat of God, and take his trial there; but the afflictions that were upon him from the hand of God that was turned on him, who now hid his face from him, and withheld the influences of his grace and favour, and appeared as an enemy, and as a cruel one to him; the reason of all which he knew not, and this threw him into consternation of mind, and filled him with terror.

[n] פרחח pullities, Schultens.
[o] Flos, Schmidt, Michaelis.
[p] Misn. Sanhedrim, c. 1. §. 7.
[q] למו adversus illos, Beza, Schmidt, Michaelis; so Noldius, p. 514.
[r] חרת שאה Pro desolatione, Pagninus, Montanus; propter vastationem, Noldius, p. 773. N°. 1864.

terror. Some [s] read the words, "my glory is turned into terrors," inſtead of being in the honour and glory, proſperity and happineſs, he had been in, he was now poſſeſſed of terrors and diſtreſſes of various kinds: others render the words, he is turned againſt me, as terrors, or into terrors, or with them [t]; God cannot be turned or changed in his nature, in his will, counſel, purpoſes, and decrees, nor in his love and affection to his pepple; but he may turn in the outward diſpenſations of his providence according to his unchangeable will, as from evil to good, Jonah iii. 9. ſo from doing good to evil, Iſ. lxiii. 10. this is complained of by the church, Lam. iii. 3. and deprecated by Jeremy, ch. xvii. 17. or there is a turn, terrors are upon me; there was a very viſible turn in Job's affairs in many reſpects, in his health, ſubſtance, and family, and particularly in this; whilſt he was in his office as a civil magiſtrate, and in all the glory of it, he was a terror to evil-doers; and young men, when he appeared, hid themſelves for fear of him; but now thoſe impudently riſe up againſt him, and are terrors to him: or there is an overthrow [u], an overturning of things, as of his civil and temporal affairs, ſo of his ſpiritual ones; inſtead of that peace, ſerenity, and tranquillity of mind he had enjoyed; now nothing but terror and diſtreſs of mind on account of his afflictions and troubles: they purſue my ſoul as the wind; terrors one after another; they purſued him cloſely, with great ſwiftneſs, and with a force irreſiſtible, like the wind; they purſued his ſoul, his life, and threatened the taking away of it: the word for ſoul is not the uſual word for it; it ſignifies my principal one, as in the margin, as the ſoul is the principal part of man, the immortal breath of God, the inhabitant in the tenement of the body, the jewel in the cabinet, immaterial and immortal, and of more worth than the whole world; or my princely one, being of a princely original, is from God the Father of ſpirits, of a noble extract: Mr. Broughton renders it my nobility, having princely rule and government in the body; that uſing the members of the body as its inſtruments; and eſpecially it may be ſaid to have ſuch rule, when grace is implanted in it, as a ruling governing principle; and the Targum is, my principality or government: it may be rendered, my free [w], liberal, ingenuous, and munificent one: Job had ſuch a generous and beneficent ſoul; but now all means of exerciſing generoſity, and liberality were cut off from him; and particularly, he had had a free ingenuous one, as he was actuated by the free Spirit of God, Pſ. li. 12. where this word is uſed; but now terrors purſuing him, a ſpirit of bondage unto fear was brought upon him: ſome [x] conſider it as an apoſtrophe to God, thou purſueſt my ſoul, O God, &c. but rather the meaning is, a diſtreſs or affliction purſued it, or every one of the above terrors: and my welfare paſſeth away as a cloud; or my ſalvation [y]; not ſpiritual and eternal ſalvation, that was firm and ſtable, being fixed by the unalterable decree of God, ſecued in the covenant of grace, and engaged for to be wrought out by his living Redeemer, and of which he had an application by the Spirit of God, and was poſſeſſed of the bleſſings of it; and though the joys and comforts of it, and views of intereſt in it, may go off for a while, yet Job ſeems to have had a ſtrong faith of intereſt in it, and a lively and well-grounded hope of its being his, ch. xiii. 15, 16. and xix. 25. but his temporal ſalvation, health, and happineſs, were gone ſuddenly, ſwiftly, utterly, entirely, totally, as a cloud diſſolved into rain, or diſſipated by the rays of the ſun, or driven away with the wind, ſo as to be ſeen no more; nor had he any hope of its being reſtored to him: ſome underſtand this, as Sephorno, of the ſalvation with which he had ſaved others; but it was no more in the power of his hands, and the remembrance of it was gone from thoſe who ſhared in it; ſee Hoſ. vi. 4. and xiii. 3. Iſ. xliv. 22.

℣. 16. And now my ſoul is poured out upon me, &c.] Either in prayer to God for help and deliverance; or rather he was diſſolved as it were in floods of tears, becauſe of his diſtreſs and anguiſh; or his ſpirits were ſunk, his ſtrength and courage failed, and his heart melted, and was poured out like water; yea, his ſoul was pouring out unto death, and he was, as he apprehended, near unto it; his body was ſo weakened and broken by diſeaſes, that it was like a veſſel full of holes, out of which the liquor runs away apace; ſo his life and ſoul were going away from him, his vital ſpirits were almoſt exhauſted: the days of affliction have taken hold upon me; afflictions ſeize on good men as well as others, and on them more than others; and there are certain times and ſeaſons for them, appointed and ordered by the Lord; and there is a limited time, they are not to continue always, only for ſome days, for a time, and but a little time, and then they will have an end; but till that time comes, there can be no deliverance from them; being ſent they come, coming they ſeized on Job, they laid hold on him, they caught him, as Mr. Broughton renders it, and held him faſt, and would not let him go; nor could he get clear of them, 'till God delivered him, who only can and does deliver out of them in his own time and way.

℣. 17. My bones are pierced in me in the night-ſeaſon, &c.] Such was the force of his diſeaſe, that it pierced and penetrated even into his bones, and the marrow of them; and ſuch the pain that he endured in the muſcles and tendons about them, and eſpecially in the joints of them, that it was as if all his bones were piercing and breaking to pieces; he was in a like condition the ſick man is deſcribed in ch. xxxiii. 19. and as David and Hezekiah were, Pſ. vi. 2. Iſ. xxxviii. 13. and what aggravated his caſe was, that this was in the night-ſeaſon, when he ſhould have got ſome ſleep and reſt, but could not for his pain: ſome render the words by ſupplying them thus; God, or the diſeaſe, or the pain, pierced my bones in the night-ſeaſon; or the night pierced my bones from me; ſo Mr. Broughton; but rather they may be rendered, and the ſenſe be, "in the night-ſeaſon every one of my bones pierce the fleſh that is upon me:" his fleſh was almoſt waſted and conſumed, through the boils and ulcers on him, and he was reduced to a mere ſkeleton; and when he laid himſelf down on his bed, theſe pierced through his ſkin, and ſtuck out, and gave him exquiſite pain: and my ſinews take no reſt; being contracted; or his nerves, as the word in the Arabic language ſignifies, as is obſerved by Aben Ezra, Jarchi, Doneſh, and others; which were looſened and the animal ſpirits were ſunk, and he ſo low and diſpirited, diſpirited, that he could get no reſt: or the pulſatile veins and arteries, as Ben Gerſom and Elias Levita[a], in which the pulſe beats, and which beats with leſs ſtrength when perſons are aſleep, than when awake; but ſuch was the force of Job's diſeaſe, that it beat even in the night, when on his bed, ſo ſtrongly, that he could take no reſt for it; the pulſe beats, as phyſicians ſay[b], ſixty times in a minute, and double the number in a burning fever, and which might be Job's caſe. Some take the word in the ſenſe of fleeing or gnawing[c], as it is uſed ℣. 3. and interpret it either of his enemies, who purſued after him, and had no reſt in their beds, but went out in the night to enquire and hear what they could learn concerning him and his illneſs, whether it was become greater[d]; or who devoured him by their calumnies and detractions, and could not ſleep unleſs they did miſchief to him: ſee Prov. iv. 16, 17. or of the worms with which his body was covered, and which were continually gnawing, never reſted, nor ſuffered him to take any reſt; the Targum is, they that gnaſh at me, reſt not.

[s] So ſome in Bar Tzemach in loc. [t] הֶהָפַךְ עָלַי בְּלֶהוֹת converſus eſt contra me, ſicut terrores, Schmidt; in meros terrores, vel cum terroribus, Michaelis. [u] Everſio, Schultens. [w] נְדִבָתִי principalem meam, Mercerus; meam principem, Vatablus, Piſcator; meam ſpontaneam, Pagninus, Montanus, Michaelis; meam ultroneam, Druſius; generoſum meum ſpiritum, Schultens. [x] Schmidt. [y] יְשׁוּעָתִי ſalus mea, Pagninus, Montanus, &c.

℣. 18. By the great force of my diſeaſe is my garment changed, &c.] Either the colour of it, thro' the purulent matter from his ulcers, running down upon it, or penetrating through it; or by reaſon of it he was obliged to ſhift himſelf, and to have change of raiment very frequently; or the ſupplement of my diſeaſe may be left out, and the ſenſe be; with great force, through main ſtrength, and with much difficulty, his garment was changed, was got off from him, ſticking ſo cloſe to him, and another put on: it bindeth me about as the collar of my coat; his diſeaſe encompaſſed him about on all ſides as the collar or edge of his coat encompaſſed his neck, and cleaved as cloſe, and was as tight unto him as that, and threatened him perhaps with a ſuffocation or ſtrangling; ſee ch. vii. 15. the alluſion is to garments uſed in the eaſtern countries, which were only open at top and bottom; at the top there was a hole to put the head through when put on, and a binding about it, and a button to it, or ſome ſuch thing, which kept it tight about the neck; ſee Exod. xxviii. 32.

℣. 19. He hath caſt me into the mire, &c.] As Jeremiah was literally; here it is to be underſtood in a figurative ſenſe; not of the mire of ſin, into which God caſts none, men fall into it of themſelves, but of the mire of affliction and calamity; ſee Pſ. xl. 2. and lxix. 2. and which Job here aſcribes to God; and whereby he was in as mean, abject, and contemptible a condition, as if he had been thrown into a kennel, and rolled in it; and he ſpeaks of it as an act of God, done with contempt of him, and indignation at him, as he apprehended it. Some Jewiſh writers[e] interpret it, he taught me in the mire, or it taught me; his diſeaſe, his ulcers, taught him to ſit down in the mire, or in the midſt of aſhes, ch. ii. 8. but though this reading might admit of a good ſenſe, as that Job was taught, as every good man is, many uſeful leſſons in and by afflictions; yet it ſeems to be a ſenſe foreign from the words: and I am become like duſt and aſhes; a phraſe by which Abraham expreſſes his vileneſs, meanneſs, and unworthineſs in the ſight of God, Gen. xviii. 27. Job through the force of his diſeaſe looked like a corps, or one half dead, and was crumbling and dropping into the duſt of death and the grave, and looked livid and aſh-coloured; and even in a literal ſenſe was cover'd with duſt and aſhes, when he ſat among them, ch. ii. 8. though here it chiefly reſpects the miſerable, forlorn, and contemptible condition in which he was.

℣. 20. I cry unto thee, and thou doſt not hear me, &c.] Which added greatly to his affliction, that though he cried to the Lord for help and deliverance, yet he turned a deaf ear to him; and tho' he heard him, as undoubtedly he did, he did not anſwer him immediately; at leaſt not in the way in which he deſired and expected he would: crying is expreſſive of prayer, and ſuppoſes diſtreſs, and denotes vehemence of ſpirit: I ſtand up; in prayer, ſtanding being a prayer-geſture, as many obſerve from Jer. xv. 1. ſee the note on Matt. vi. 5. or he perſiſted in it, he continued praying, was inceſſant in it, and yet could obtain no anſwer; or this ſignifies ſilence, as ſome[f] interpret it; he cried, and then ceaſed, waiting for an anſwer; but whether he prayed, or whether he was ſilent, it was the ſame thing: and thou regardeſt me not; the word not is not in this clauſe, but is repeated from the preceding, as it is by Ben Gerſom and others; but ſome read it without it, and give the ſenſe either thus, thou conſidereſt me whether it is fit to receive my prayer or no, ſo Sephorno; or to renew my ſtrokes, to add new afflictions to me, as Jarchi and Bar Tzemach; or thou lookeſt upon me as one pleaſed with the ſight of me in ſuch a miſerable condition, ſo far from helping me; wherefore it follows, ℣. 21. Thou art become cruel to me, &c.] Or turned, or changed[g], to be cruel to me. Job ſuggeſts that God had been kind and gracious to him, both in a way of providence, and in ſhewing ſpecial love and favour to him, in a very diſtinguiſhing manner; but now he intimates his affections were changed and altered, and theſe were alienated from him, and his love was turned into an hatred of him; this is one of the unbecoming expreſſions which dropped from his lips concerning God; for the love of God to his people is never changed; it remains invariable and unalterable, in all diſpenſations, in every ſtate and condition into which they come; there may be ſome of God's diſpenſations towards them, which may have the appearance of ſeverity in them; and he may make uſe of inſtruments to chaſtiſe them, which may uſe them cruelly; but even then his bowels yearn towards them, and being full of compaſſion delivers out of their hands, and ſaves them, Jer. xxx. 14. and xxxi. 20. Hoſ. xi. 8, 9. with thy ſtrong hand thou oppoſeſt thyſelf againſt me; God has a ſtrong hand and arm, and none like him, and ſometimes he puts forth the ſtrength of it, and exerts his mighty power in afflicting his people, and his hand preſſes them ſore, and they can ſcarcely ſtand up under it; and then it becomes them to humble themſelves under the mighty hand of God, and patiently bear it; and ſometimes they take him to be their adverſary, an enemy unto them, and filled with hatred of them, indignation againſt them, ſetting himſelf with all his might and main to ruin and deſtroy them; and this is a ſad caſe indeed, to have ſuch apprehenſions of God, though unjuſt ones; for, as if God be for us, who ſhall be againſt us? ſo if he be againſt us, it ſignifies little who is for us; for there is no contending with him, ch. ix. 3, 4.

℣. 22.

[a] In Tiſhbi, p. 67. So Lud. Capellus in loc. [b] Scheuchzer. Phyſic. Sacr. vol. 4. p. 764. [c] ועקי & rodentia mea, Schultens; fugientia membra mea, ſo ſome in Michaelis. [d] Vid. Bar Tzemach in loc. [e] Vid. Jarchi & Bar Tzemach in loc. [f] Jarchi, Ben Gerſom, and Bar Tzemach. [g] תהפך mutatus es, V. L. Tigurine verſion; verſus es, Beza, Piſcator; ſo Druſius, Cocceius, Vatablus, Michaelis, Mercerus, Schultens.

℣. 22. Thou liſteſt me up to the wind, &c.] Of affliction and adverſity, to be carried up with it, and toſſed about by it, as chaff or ſtubble, or a dry-leaf, being no more able to ſtand up againſt it, than ſuch things are to oppoſe the wind; though ſome interpret this of God's lifting him up in his ſtate of proſperity, in which he was very viſible and conſpicuous to all, and enjoyed much light and comfort; but then he raiſed him to ſuch an eſtate, with a view to caſt him down, and that his fall and ruin might be the greater; and ſo this is obſerved as a proof of his being become cruel to him: thou cauſeſt me to ride upon it; ſeemingly in great pomp and ſtate, but in great uncertainty and danger, being at beſt in a ſlippery place, in very fickle circumſtances, as the event ſhewed; or rather the ſenſe is, that he was ſwiftly carried into deſtruction, as if he rode on the wings of the wind to it, and was hurried thither at once, as ſoon as he was taken up with the tempeſt of adverſity: and diſſolveſt my ſubſtance; his outward ſubſtance, his wealth and riches, his family, and the health of his body, all which as it were melted away, or were carried away as with a flood; and ſo as the metaphor of a tempeſtuous wind is uſed in the former clauſe, here that of an overflowing flood, which removed from him what ſeemed to be the moſt ſolid and ſubſtantial: the word is ſometimes uſed for wiſdom, and even ſound wiſdom, Prov. ii. 7. Mic. vi. 9. wherefore ſome have interpreted it of his being at his wit's end, of loſing his reaſon and underſtanding, and which were at leaſt diſturbed and confounded by his afflictions; but his diſcourſes and ſpeeches ſhew the contrary, and he himſelf denies that wiſdom was driven from him, ch. vi. 13.

℣. 23. For I know that thou wilt bring me to death, &c.] Quickly and by the preſent affliction upon him; he was aſſured, as he thought, that this was the view and deſign of God in this providence, under which he was to bring him to death and the grave; that he would never take off his hand till he had brought him to the duſt of death, to that lifeleſs duſt from whence he had his original; otherwiſe, that he would be brought thither ſooner or later, was no great maſter-piece of knowledge; every man knows this will be the caſe with him as with all; death is become neceſſary by ſin, which brought it into the world, and the ſentence of it on all men in it, and by the decree and appointment of God, by which it is fixed and ſettled, that all ſhould die; and this is confirmed by all experience in all ages, a very few excepted, only two perſons, Enoch and Elijah: ſometimes the death of perſons is made known to them by divine revelation, as to Aaron and Moſes; and ſometimes it may be gathered to be nigh from the ſymptoms of it on the body; from growing diſeaſes, and the infirmities of old age; but Job concluded it from the manner of God's dealing with him, as he thought in wrath and indignation, determining to make an utter end of him: and to the houſe appointed for all living; the grave, which is the houſe for the body when dead to be brought unto and lodged in; as the houſe not made with hands, eternal in the heavens, is for the ſoul in its ſeparate ſtate, until the reſurrection-morn; which houſe or grave is man's long home, Eccl. xii. 5. and this is prepared and appointed for all men living, ſince all muſt die; and all that die have a houſe or grave, though that is ſometimes a watry, and not an earthy one; however the duſt of every body has a receptacle provided for it, where it is reſerved until the time of the reſurrection, and then it is brought forth, Rev. xx. 13. and this is by divine appointment; the word uſed ſignifies both an appointed time and place, and is often uſed of the Jewiſh ſolemnities, which were fixed with reſpect to both; and alſo of the people or congregation that attended them; the grave is the general rendezvous of mankind, and both the time when and the place where the dead are gathered and brought unto it, are fixed by the determinate will and counſel of God.

℣. 24. Howbeit he will not ſtretch out his hand to the grave, &c.] Or, verily [h], truly he will not, &c. I am well aſſured he never will, meaning either he never would ſtretch out his hand to ſhut up the grave; or rather keep it ſhut, and prevent Job from going down into it; or to open it, and fetch him out of it when in it: God is indeed able to do either of theſe, and has done it; ſometimes when perſons are brought as it were to the gates of death and the grave, he ſays to them return; yea, when they are brought to the duſt of death, he prevents them going into the grave, by reſtoring them to life before carried thither, as the Shunamite's ſon, Jairus's daughter, and the widow's ſon of Naim, even when he was carrying to his grave; ſome have been laid in the grave, and God has ſtretched out his hand, and raiſed them up again; as the man that was laid in Eliſha's grave, and Lazarus after he had lain in the grave ſome days; but ſuch things are not uſually done; in common when a man dies, and is laid in the grave, he riſes not again, till the heavens be no more; and this Job was perſuaded would be his caſe: though they cry in his deſtruction; that is, though the friends and relations of the ſick perſon, or the poor that he has been kind and bountiful unto, ſhould cry unto God, whilſt he is deſtroying him by the diſeaſes upon him, and which threaten him with deſtruction, that he would ſpare his uſeful and valuable life; yet he is inexorable, and will not hear, but go on with what he intends to do, and takes him off by death, and lays him in the grave, the pit of deſtruction, ſo called becauſe it waſtes and conſumes bodies laid in it; and when once laid there, all cries for a reſtoration to life again are vain and fruitleſs. Some take theſe words as expreſſed in a way of ſolace, as if Job comforted himſelf with this thought under his preſent afflictions, that when once he was brought to death and the grave, there would be an end of all his ſorrow; the hand of the Lord that was now ſtretched out on him in a terrible way, would be no longer ſtretched out on him; he would then ceaſe to afflict him, and he ſhould be where the weary are at reſt; and ſo the laſt clauſe is read with an interrogation, is there any cry, or do any cry, in his deſtruction [i]? no, when death has done its office, and the body is laid in the grave, there is no more pain nor ſorrow, nor crying; all tears are wiped away, and there is no more ſenſe of afflictions and ſufferings; they are all at an end. Mr. Broughton renders theſe words as to the ſenſe the ſame, and as in connexion with the following ones, and prayed I not when plague was ſent? when hurt came came to any, thereupon cried I not? and so do some others [k].

[h] אך verum, Mercerus; profecto, Druſius, Bolducius; ſane, Tigurine verſion.

[i] אם בפידו להן ישוע aut clamant aliqui poſt obitum ſuum? Tigurine verſion; ſi in contritione ejus eis clamor? Montanus, Bolducius.

℣. 25. Did not I weep for him that was in trouble? &c.] In outward trouble, whether personal in his own body, or in his family, or in his worldly affairs, or from wicked men, the men of the world; or in inward trouble, in soul-trouble, on account of in-dwelling sin, the breakings forth of it, the lowness of grace, as to exercise, the hidings of God's face, and the temptations of Satan: or for him that is hard of day [l]; with whom times are hard, the days are evil, with respect either to things temporal or spiritual; now Job had a sympathizing heart with such persons; he wept with them that wept; his bowels yearned towards them; he felt their sufferings and their sorrows, which is a God-like frame of soul; for God, in all the afflictions of his people is afflicted; a disposition of mind like that of the living Redeemer, who cannot but be touched with the feeling of the infirmities of saints, having been in all points tempted as they; and is a fruit of the Spirit of God, and very becoming the relation the saints stand in to one another, being members of the same body, and of each other; and therefore, when one member suffers, all the rest should sympathize with it, and being brethren, should be loving, pitiful, and courteous to each other; and should consider that they also are in the body, and liable to the same distresses, whether outward or inward: was not my soul grieved for the poor? in general, and especially for the Lord's poor, for such in all ages have been chosen and called by him; for these Job was grieved at heart, when he saw their distress through poverty; and he not only expressed his concern for them by tears and words, but by distributing liberally to their necessities ch. xxxi. 17—20. and by which he shewed his grief was real, hearty, and sincere, as here expressed; his soul was grieved, and he was sorry at his very heart for them: some render the words, was not my soul like a pool of water [m]? not only his head and his eyes, as Jeremiah's on another account, but his soul melted, and flowed like water with grief for them; and others, as Mr. Broughton, did not my soul burn for the poor? with sorrow for them, and an ardent desire to relieve them; see 2 Cor. xi. 20. now this was the frame of Job's mind in the time of his prosperity, very different from that in Amos vi. 4, 5, 6. and was certain and well known; he could appeal to all that knew him for the truth of it, it being what none could deny that had any knowledge of him; yea, he could appeal to an omniscient God, he was now speaking to for the truth of it; nay, it is delivered in the form of an oath, if I did not weep, &c [n]. as in ch. xxxi. 16—22.

℣. 26. When I looked for good, &c.] As he thought he might reasonably expect it, since he had shewn such a sympathizing spirit to persons in trouble, and such pity and mercy to the poor: in the time of his prosperity, he looked for a continuance of the good things he enjoyed, and expected to have had them for many years to come, and to have died in the possession of them, ch. xxix. 18. and even in his adversity, though he had received evil things at the hand of God, which he took patiently; yet at first he did not think they would always continue, but that there would be a turn of affairs, and he should again receive good at his hands; and he had been looking for it, as good men have reason to expect it; since God is good and does good, and especially to his own people, and has laid up goodness for them that fear him, and such an one Job was; and has promised good things unto them, both temporal and spiritual; for godliness and godly men have the promise of this life, and of that which is to come; but Job was disappointed in his expectation; for, says he, then evil came unto me, the evil of affliction, one upon the back of another, even when in the height of his prosperity; and since repeated evil, new afflictions came upon him by the appointment, order, and direction of God: and when I waited for light; for the light of outward prosperity, such as he had formerly enjoyed; and for the light of God's countenance, which he most earnestly sought after, and longed for, and was in a waiting posture for it, as good men have reason to be; since light is sown for them in the purposes and decrees of God, in his counsel and covenant, in his gospel, and the promises of it; and therefore should wait for the springing of it up, as the husbandman does for the springing up of the corn sown in the earth, and lying under the clods; and seeing that to the upright there arises light in darkness; and though God hides his face from them for a moment, he will have mercy on them, and therefore should wait his time to be gracious to them; but Job had waited long, and, as he thought, to no purpose: for there came darkness; the darkness of adversity, still thicker and darker, and no appearance of spiritual light and favour, or any discoveries of the love of God to him, or enjoyment of his presence; see Jer. viii. 15. Is. lix. 9.

℣. 27. My bowels boiled, and rested not, &c.] All contained within him, his heart, lungs, and liver, in a literal sense, through a violent fever burning within him; or figuratively, being under great distress and trouble, by reason of his afflictions, outward and inward, see Jer. iv. 19. Lam. i. 20. the days of affliction prevented me; came sooner upon him than he thought; he did not expect the evil days to come, and the years draw nigh in which he should have no pleasure, until he was more advanced in years, and the time of his dissolution was at hand; they came at once, and unawares upon him, when he looked not for them: some render the word met me [o], unexpectedly; or rather, they rushed upon me [p], in an hostile way; came in troops, and invaded and surrounded him, see ch. xix. 12.

℣. 28. I went mourning without the sun, &c.] So overwhelmed with grief, that he refused to have any comfort from, or any advantage by the sun; hence Mr. Broughton renders it, out of the sun; he did not chuse to walk in the sun-shine, but out of it, to indulge his grief and sorrow the more; or he went in black attire, and wrapped and covered himself with it, that he might not see the sun, or receive any relief by it: or I go black, but not by the sun [q]; his face and his skin were black, but not through the sun looking upon him and discolouring him, as in Cant. i. 6. but through the force of his disease, which had changed his complexion, and made him as black as a Kedarene, or those that dwell in the tents of Kedar, Cant. i. 5. and he

[k] Junius & Tremellius.
[l] לקשה יום ob durum dic, Montanus, Mercerus, Drusius; cui dura erant tempora, Junius & Tremellius; ei cui durus dies, Cocceius.
[m] עצמה restagnavit, some in Mercerus.
[n] אם לא בכיתי si non deflevi, Tigurine version; si non flevi, Piscator.
[o] קדמני occurrerunt mihi, Piscator, Cocceius.
[p] Incursarunt me, Schultens.
[q] בלא חמה non propter solem, Vatablus; non a sole, Junius & Tremellius, Drusius, Mercerus; non ob solem, Piscator.

he alſo walked without the ſun of righteouſneſs ariſing on him, with healing in his wings, which was worſt of all: I ſtood up, and I cried in the congregation; either in the congregation of the ſaints met together for religious worſhip, where he cried unto God for help and deliverance, and for the light of his countenance, ver. 20. or ſuch was the extreme anguiſh of his ſoul, that when a multitude of people got about him to ſee him in his diſtreſſed condition, he could not contain himſelf, but burſt out before them in crying and tears, tho' he knew it was unbecoming a man of his age and character; or he could not content himſelf to ſtay within doors and ſoothe his grief, but muſt go abroad and in public, and there expreſſed with ſtrong cries and tears, his miſerable condition.

℣. 29. I am a brother to dragons, and a companion to owls.] Or oſtriches, as the Targum, Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, Syriac, and Arabic verſions; either he was obliged to dwell with ſuch perſons as were comparable to theſe creatures, for their devouring words, hiſſing noiſe, and venemous ſpeeches, or for want of compaſſion, and for their cruelty, as David is ſaid to be among lions, Pſ. lvii. 4. or alſo, he was like unto them, being ſolitary and alone, all his friends and acquaintance ſtanding at a diſtance from him, as theſe creatures love loneſome and deſolate places; or becauſe of the wailing and howling noiſe they make, to which his mournful notes bore ſome reſemblance, ſee Mic. i. 8. and the note there; or becauſe when theſe creatures cry and howl, and make a noiſe, no mercy is ſhewn them, none pities or regards them; and ſo it was with him; though he ſtood and cried in ever ſo public a manner, none had any compaſſion on him.

℣. 30. My ſkin is black upon me, &c.] Either through deep melancholy, as may be obſerved in perſons of ſuch a diſpoſition through grief and trouble; or rather through the force of his diſeaſe, the burning ulcers, and black ſcabs with which he was covered, as the Jews were through famine, in their captivity, Lam. iv. 8. & v. 10. and my bones are burnt with heat; with the heat of a burning fever; which not only made his inwards boil, but reached to his bones, and dried up the marrow of them. Galen ſays [r] that bones may become ſo dry as to be crumbled into ſand: the Syriac verſion is "my bones are burnt as his who is in a hot wind;" ſuch as were common in the eaſtern countries, which killed men at once, and they became as black as a coal [s].

℣. 31. My harp alſo is turned to mourning, &c.] Which he uſed, as David, either in religious worſhip, expreſſing praiſe to God thereby, or for his recreation in an innocent way; but now it was laid aſide, and inſtead of it, nothing was heard from him, or in his houſe, but the voice of mourning: and my organ into the voice of them that weep; another inſtrument of muſic, which had its name from the pleaſantneſs of its ſound, and was of early uſe, being firſt invented by Jubal, Gen. iv. 21. but not that we now ſo call, which is of late invention: thoſe inſtruments which Job might have and uſe, both in a civil and in a religious way, were now, through afflictions, become uſeleſs to him, and neglected by him; or theſe expreſſions in general may ſignify, that inſtead of mirth and joy he was wont to have, there were nothing now to be heard but lamentation and woe; ſee Lam. v. 15. Amos viii. 10.

CHAP. XXXI.

IN this chapter Job gives an account of himſelf in private life, of the integrity and uprightneſs of his life, and his holy walk and converſation, with this view, that it might be thought, that the afflictions which were upon him, were not on account of a vicious courſe of life he had indulged unto, as was ſuggeſted; and he clears himſelf from various crimes which it might be inſinuated he was guilty of, as from unchaſtity; and he obſerves the method he took to prevent his falling into it, and the reaſons that diſſuaded him from it, ver. 1—4. from injuſtice in his dealings with men, ver. 5—8. from the ſin of adultery, ver. 9—12. from ill uſage of his ſervants, ver. 13, 14, 15. from unkindneſs to the poor, which he enlarges upon, and gives many inſtances of his charity to them, ver. 16—23. from covetouſneſs, and a vain confidence in wealth, ver. 24, 25. from idolatry, the worſhip of the ſun and moon, ver. 26, 27, 28. from a revengeful ſpirit, ver. 29, 30, 31. and from inhoſpitality to ſtrangers, ℣. 32. from covering his ſin, ℣. 33. and fear of men, ℣. 34. and then wiſhes his cauſe might be heard before God, ver. 35, 36, 37, and the chapter is cloſed with an imprecation on his head if guilty of any injuſtice, ver. 38, 39, 40.

℣. 1. I made a covenant with mine eyes, &c.] Not to look upon a woman, and wantonly gaze at her beauty, leſt his heart ſhould be drawn thereby to luſt after her; for the eyes are inlets to many ſins, and particularly to uncleanneſs, of which there have been inſtances, both in bad men and good men, Gen. xxxiv. 2. 2 Sam. xi. 2. ſo the poet [t] repreſents the eye as the way through which the beauty of a woman paſſes ſwifter than an arrow into the hearts of men, and makes impreſſions there; ſee 2 Pet. ii. 14. hence Zaleucus ordered adulterers to be puniſhed, by plucking out the eyes of the adulterer [u]; wherefore Job, to prevent this, entered into a ſolemn engagement with himſelf, laid himſelf under a ſtrong obligation, as if he had bound himſelf by a covenant, made a reſolution in the ſtrength of divine grace, not to employ his eyes in looking on objects that might inſnare his heart, and lead him to the commiſſion of ſin; he made uſe of all ways and means, and took every precaution to guard againſt it; and particularly this, to ſhut or turn his eyes from beholding what might be alluring and enticing to him: it is ſaid [x] of Democritus, that he put out his eyes becauſe he could not look upon a woman without luſting after her: why then ſhould I think upon a maid? of corrupting and defiling her, ſince he had made a covenant with his eyes, and this would be a breach of that covenant: and therefore, beſides the ſin of luſting after her, or of corrupting her, he would be a covenant-breaker, and ſo his ſin would be an aggravated one: or he made a covenant with his eyes, to prevent any impure thoughts, deſires, and inclinations in him; for the eye affects the heart, and ſtirs up luſt in it, and excites unclean thoughts and unchaſte deſires: this ſhews, that the thought of

[r] Apud Bartholin. de Cruce, §. 12. p. 107. de Heron. & Leand. v. 92, &c.

[s] See the note on ch. xxvii. 21.

[t] Muſæus

[u] Ælian. Var. Hiſt. l. 13. c. 24.

[x] Tertullian. Apolog. c. 46.

of ſin is ſin; that fornication was reckoned a ſin before the law of Moſes; and that Job better underſtood the ſpirituality of the law than the phariſees did in the time of Chriſt, and had the ſame notion of luſt in the heart being fornication and adultery as he had; and that good men are not without temptation to ſin, both from within and from without; and therefore ſhould carefully ſhun all appearances of evil, and whatſoever leads unto it, and take every neceſſary precaution to guard againſt it.

℣. 2. For what portion of God is there from above? &c.] What good portion, as the Targum paraphraſes it, can impure perſons expect from God? ſuch who indulge themſelves, and live in the ſin of uncleanneſs, cannot hope to have any part in God, or a portion of good things from him; he is above, and in the higheſt heavens, and every good thing comes from thence, and from him there; and particularly the ſpiritual bleſſings, wherewith he bleſſes his people, are in heavenly places in Chriſt, and from thence come to them; and here a ſpecial reſpect may be had to God himſelf, who is the portion of his people, both in life and at death, and to all eternity; but men that live a vicious courſe of life, cannot conclude they have any part in God and Chriſt, nor in the grace of God, and the bleſſings of it, nor enjoy communion with him: and what inheritance of the Almighty from on high? heaven is an inheritance which belongs to the children of God, and he, as their heavenly Father, has bequeathed it unto them; this is from the Almighty God, God all-ſufficient; he has choſen this inheritance for them, and appointed them unto it; this is laid up by him, and reſerved in heaven for them; and he gives both a right unto it, and a meetneſs for it, and will put them into the poſſeſſion of it: but then impure perſons, as fornicators and adulterers, have no inheritance in the kingdom of God and of Chriſt, Eph. v. 5. and this was a reaſon with Job, and what had an influence on him, to be careful to avoid the ſin of uncleanneſs. Some underſtand the words as a queſtion concerning what would be the portion and heritage of a wicked man, a corrupter of virgins; the anſwer to which is given in the next verſe, deſtruction and a ſtrange puniſhment; this is their portion from God, and the heritage appointed to them by him; ſee ch. xx. 29.

℣. 3. Is not deſtruction to the wicked? &c.] It is even to ſuch wicked men, who live in the ſin of fornication, and make it their buſineſs to inſnare and corrupt virgins; and which is another reaſon why Job was careful to avoid that ſin; wickedneſs of every ſort is the cauſe of deſtruction, deſtruction and miſery are in the ways of wicked men, and their wicked ways lead unto it, and iſſue in it, even deſtruction of ſoul and body in hell, which is ſwift and ſudden, and will be everlaſting: this is laid up for wicked men among the treaſures of God's wrath, and they are reſerved for that, and there is no way of deliverance from it but by Chriſt: and a ſtrange puniſhment to the workers of iniquity; the iniquity of fornication and whoredom, Prov. xxx. 20. who make it their buſineſs to commit it, and live in a continued courſe of uncleanneſs and other ſins; a puniſhment, ſomething ſtrange, unuſual, and uncommon, as the filthy venereal diſeaſe in this world, and everlaſting burnings in another; or alienation[y], a ſtate of eſtrangement and baniſhment from the preſence of God and Chriſt, and from the ſociety of the ſaints to all eternity; ſee Matt. xxv. 44. 2 Theſſ. i. 9. Luke xvi. 26.

℣. 4. Doth not he ſee my ways, and count all my ſteps?] That is God, who is above, and the Almighty that dwells on high; he looks down from heaven, and beholds all the ways, and works, the ſteps and motions of the children of men; there is no darkneſs where the workers of iniquity can hide themſelves; the fornicator and adulterer chuſe the night-ſeaſon for the commiſſion of their ſin, fancying no eye ſees them; but they cannot eſcape the eye of God, who is omniſcient; he obſerves the ways they walk in, the methods they take to compaſs their deſigns; he marks and counts every ſtep taken by them, as he does indeed take notice of, and reckons up every action of men, good and bad; and the conſideration of this was another argument with Job to avoid the ſin of uncleanneſs; for however privately he might commit it, ſo as not to be ſeen by men, it could not be hidden from the all-ſeeing eye of God. Some take theſe words to be an obteſtation, or appeal to God for the truth of what he had ſaid; that he made a covenant with his eyes, and took every precaution to prevent his falling into the ſin of uncleanneſs; and he whoſe eyes were upon his ways, knew how holily and unblameably he had walked; or elſe, as if the ſenſe was, that had he given into ſuch an impure courſe of life, he might expect the omniſcient God, that is above, and dwells on high, would bring upon him deſtruction, and a ſtrange puniſhment, ſince he is the avenger of all ſuch; others connect the words with the following, doth he not ſee my ways and ſteps, whether I have walked with vanity, &c. or no?

℣. 5. If I have walked with vanity, &c.] Or with vain men, as Bar Tzemach interprets it, keeping company, and having fellowſhip with them in their vain and ſinful practices; or in the vanity of his mind, indulging himſelf in impurity of heart and life; or rather uſing deceitful methods to overreach and defraud others; for this ſeems to be another vice Job clears himſelf of, acting unjuſtly in his dealings with men, or dealing falſly with them: if my foot hath haſted to deceit; to cheat men in buying and ſelling, being ready and ſwift to do it, and in haſte to become rich, which puts men oftentimes on evil ways and methods to attain it; ſee Prov. xxviii. 20.

℣. 6. Let me be weighed in an even balance, &c.] Or in balances of righteouſneſs[z], even in the balance of ſtrict juſtice, the juſtice of God; he was ſo conſcious to himſelf that he had done no injuſtice to any man in his dealings with them; that, if weight of righteouſneſs, which was to be, and was the rule of his conduct between man and man, was put into one ſcale, and his actions into another, the balance would be even, there would be nothing wanting, or however, that would require any ſevere cenſure: that God may know mine integrity; God did know his integrity, and bore a teſtimony to it, and to his retaining it, ch. ii. 3. but his meaning is, that ſhould God ſtrictly enquire into his life and conduct with reſpect to his dealings with men; as it would appear that he had lived in all good conſcience to that day, ſo he doubted not but he would find his integrity ſuch, that he would own and acknowledge it, approve of it, and commend it, and make it known to his friends and others, whereby whereby he would be cleared of all thoſe calumnies that were caſt upon him. Some connect theſe words with the following, reading them affirmatively, God knows mine integrity; he knows that my ſtep has not turned out of the way of truth and righteouſneſs; that my heart has not walked after mine eye, in luſtful thoughts and deſires; and that there is no ſpoil, nor rapine, nor violence in my hand, that I ſhould deſerve ſuch a puniſhment as to ſow, and another eat: thus Sephorno.

[y] ונכר & abalienatio, Munſter; & alienatio, V. L. Pagninus, Montanus, Mercerus, Druſius, Schmidt.
[z] במאזני צדק in bilancibus juſtitiæ, Montanus, Mercerus, Druſius; ſo Junius & Tremellius, Cocceius, Michaelis, Schultens.

℣. 7. If my ſtep hath turned out of the way, &c.] The way of God, the way of his commandments, the good and right way, the way of truth and righteouſneſs, ſo far as Job had knowledge of it; for, beſides the law and light of nature the Gentiles had in common, good men had ſome revelation, and notions of the mind and will of God unto them, both before and after the flood, previous to the Moſaic diſpenſation; which in ſome meaſure directed them what way to walk in, with reſpect to worſhip and duty; and from this way Job ſwerved not; not that he walked ſo perfectly in it as to be free from ſin, and never commit any; or, that he never took a ſtep out of the way, or ſtepped awry; but he did not knowingly, wittingly, and purpoſely turn out of the way; and when, through infirmity of the fleſh, the temptations of Satan, and ſnares of the world, he was drawn aſide, he did not obſtinately and finally perſiſt therein; though this may have reſpect not to ſin in general, but to the particular ſin he is clearing himſelf from, namely, dealing falſly and deceitfully with men, in whatſoever he had to do with them, in matters of meum and tuum; or with regard to the rules of juſtice and equity between man and man, he was not conſcious to himſelf he had departed from them; a like expreſſion to thoſe in Pſ. vii. 3, 4, 5. and xliv. 18. where ſome particular ſin is referred unto: and mine heart walked after mine eyes; meaning not in the luſt of uncleanneſs, of which he had ſpoken before, as ſuch do whoſe eyes are full of adultery; but in the ſin of covetouſneſs, ſo Achan's heart walked after his eyes; and this is one of the three things the world is full of, and the men of it indulge themſelves in, the luſt of the eyes, 1 John ii. 16. the ſenſe is, that when he ſaw the riches and wealth of others, he did not covet them, nor take any illicit methods to get them out of their hands; or, when he ſaw the goods they were poſſeſſed of, and had with them to diſpoſe of, he did not take the advantage of their ignorance, or uſe any evil ways and means to cheat and cozen them of them: it is pleaſing to the fleſh for the heart to walk after the eye, or to indulge to that which it is taken with; but it is very vain and fooliſh, as well as very dangerous ſo to do, Eccl. ii. 10. and xi. 9. a good man chuſes a better guide than his eyes; even to be a follower of God, to tread in the ſteps of his living Redeemer, to walk not after the fleſh, but after the ſpirit, and according to the law and will of God: and if any blot cleaved to my hands; any ſpot, ſtain, or blemiſh, as all ſin is of a defiling nature, particularly the hands may be blotted by ſhedding innocent blood, by taking bribes to pervert judgment; which the Septuagint verſion directs to here; and by getting, holding, and retaining mammon of unrighteouſneſs, or ill-gotten goods; which is what is chiefly if not ſolely intended here; for it may be rendered, if any thing hath cleaved, &c. ſo Aben Ezra and Ben Gerſom; for the word ſignifies both a blot and any thing; and the Targum takes in both ſenſes; the meaning ſeems to be, that there was not any thing of another man's in his hands, which he had taken from him by force and violence, or had obtained by any deceitful methods, and which he held faſt, and it ſtuck with him as pitch to the hands, and he did not care to part with it, or reſtore it, whereby his hands were defiled; otherwiſe Job had no ſuch opinion of the cleanneſs of his hands and actions, as if he thought there was no ſpot of ſin in them, or only ſuch as he could waſh out himſelf; he clearly ſpeaks the contrary, ch. ix. 30, 31. which is the ſenſe of every good man, who, conſcious of his ſpots and blemiſhes, waſhes his hands, his actions, his converſation-garments, and makes them white in the blood of the lamb; and ſuch and ſuch only have clean hands.

℣. 8. Then let me ſow, and another eat, &c.] If what he had before ſaid was not true; but he had turned out of the way of righteouſneſs, and walked after the ſight of his eyes, and the mammon of unrighteouſneſs cleaved to his hands; then he wiſhes he might ſow his fields and another enjoy the increaſe of them, which is one of God's judgments threatened unto the wicked and diſobedient, Lev. xxvi. 16 Deut. xxviii. 33. let my offſpring be rooted out; but Job had no offſpring or children at this time to be rooted out or deſtroyed; they were all deſtroyed already; ſome think therefore that this imprecation was made by him in the time of his proſperity, though here repeated as it was then, he made a covenant with his eyes; but then this might have been improved againſt him and retorted on him, that ſo it was according to his wiſh; and therefore he muſt have been guilty of the ſin he would have purged himſelf from; others ſuppoſe that he refers to futurity, and to the offſpring he hoped to have hereafter, and when he ſhould have them, wiſhes they may be rooted out, if he had done what he denies he had; but it does not appear that Job had any hope at all of being reſtored to his former ſtate of proſperity, and of being poſſeſſed of a family and ſubſtance again, but the reverſe. Guſſetius [a] will have it, that he means his grandchildren; thoſe indeed are ſometimes called a man's children, and may with propriety be ſaid to be his offſpring, they ſpringing from him; and it is poſſible, that, as his ſons were ſettled from him, they were married and had children; but this is not certain, or, if they had any, that theſe were not deſtroyed with them; wherefore it is beſt to take the word [b] in its firſt and literal ſenſe, for what ſprings out of the earth, herbs, plants, and trees, as in Iſ. xlii. 5. ſo Ben Gerſom and Bar Tzemach, and which beſt agrees with the phraſe of being rooted out, and with what goes before; that as he had wiſhed, that which was ſown in his fields might be eat up by another, ſo what was planted and grew up in his gardens, orchards, vineyards, and olive-yards, and the like, might be quite rooted out and deſtroyed; if he was not the man he declared himſelf to be, or had wronged any of their goods and property, then this would have been a juſt retaliation of him.

℣. 9. If mine heart have been deceived by a woman, &c.] By another man's wife, by wantonly looking at her beauty, and ſo luſting after her; and ſo, not through any blame or fault of her's, or by any artful methods made uſe of by her, to allure and inſnare; ſuch as were practiſed by the harlot, lot, Prov. vii. but by neither was the heart of Job deceived, and drawn into the ſin of uncleanneſs; for he had made a covenant with his eyes, as not to look at a virgin, ſo much leſs at another man's wife, to prevent his luſting after her; and whatever temptations and ſolicitations he might have been attended with, through the grace of God, as Joſeph was, he was enabled to withſtand them; though as wiſe a man, and the wiſeſt of men, had his heart deceived and drawn aſide thereby, Eccl. vii. 26. or, if I have laid wait at my neighbour's door; to meet with his wife there, and carry on an intrigue with her; or to take the opportunity of going in when opened, in order to ſolicit her to his embraces, knowing her huſband to be from home; ſee Prov. v. 8. and vii. 8. 19.

[a] Comment. Ebr. p. 338.

[b] צאצאי germina mea, Beza, Montanus, Mercerus, Druſius, Michaelis, Schultens.

℣. 10. Then let my wife grind unto another, &c.] Which ſome underſtand literally, of her being put to the worſt of drudgery and ſlavery, to work at a mill, and grind corn for the ſervice of a ſtranger, and be expoſed to the company of the meaneſt of perſons, and to their inſults and abuſes; as we find ſuch as were taken captives and made priſoners by an enemy were put unto, as Samſon, Judg. xvi. 22. and it may be obſerved, that to grind in a mill, was alſo the work of women, Exod. xi. 5. Matt. xxiv. 41. as it was in early times; Homer [c] ſpeaks of it as in times before him; but others take the words in a figurative ſenſe, as if he imprecated that ſhe lie with another man, and be defiled by him, as the Targum, Aben Ezra, and others [d]; ſee Iſ. xlvii. 1, 2. and in like manner the following clauſe: and let others bow down upon her; both which phraſes are euphemiſms, or clean and decent expreſſions, ſignifying what otherwiſe is not to be named; the ſcriptures hereby directing, as to avoid unchaſte thoughts, inclinations, and deſires, and impure actions, ſo obſcene words and filthy talking, as becometh ſaints: but there is ſome difficulty in Job's imprecating or wiſhing ſuch a thing might befal his wife; it could not be lawful, if he had ſinned, to wiſh his wife might ſin alſo; or, if he was an adulterer, that ſhe ſhould be an adultereſs; the ſenſe is not, that Job really wiſhed ſuch a thing; but he uſes ſuch a way of ſpeaking, to ſhow how remote he was from the ſin of uncleanneſs, there being nothing more diſagreeable to a man than for his wife to defile his bed; it is the laſt thing he would wiſh for: and moreover, Job ſuggeſts hereby, that had he been guilty of this ſin, he muſt own and acknowledge that he would be righteouſly ſerved, and it would be a juſt retaliation upon him, ſhould his wife uſe him, or ſhe be uſed in ſuch a manner; likewiſe, though a man may not wiſh for, nor commit a ſin for the puniſhment of another; yet God ſometimes puniſhes ſin with ſin, and even with the ſame kind of ſin, and with this; ſo David's ſin with Bathſheba was puniſhed with Abſalom lying with his wives and concubines before the ſun, 2 Sam. xii. 11. ſee Deut. xxviii. 30.

℣. 11. For this is an heinous crime, &c.] Adultery; it is contrary to the light of nature, and is condemned by it as a great ſin, Gen. xx. 9. and xxvi. 10. as well as contrary to the expreſs will and law of God, Exod. xx. 14. and, though all ſin is a tranſgreſſion of the law of God, and deſerving of death; yet there are ſome ſins greater and more heinous than others, being attended with aggravating circumſtances; and ſuch is this ſin, it is a breach of the marriage-contract and covenant between man and wife; it is doing injury to a man's property, and to that which is the neareſt and deareſt to him, and is what introduces confuſion into families, kingdoms, and ſtates; and therefore it follows: yea, it is an iniquity to be puniſhed by the judges; who might take cognizance of it, examine into it, and paſs ſentence for it, and execute it; and, if they neglect to do their duty, God, the judge of all the earth, will puniſh for it in the world to come, unleſs repented of: for whoremongers and adulterers God will judge, Heb. xiii. 4. the puniſhment of adultery was death by the law of God, and that by ſtoning, as appears from Lev. xx. 10. Deut. xxii. 21. John viii. 4, 5. and it is remarkable, that the heathens, who were ignorant of this law, enjoined the ſame puniſhment for it; ſo Homer [e] introduces Hector reproving Paris for this ſin, and ſuggeſts to him, that if he had his deſerved puniſhment, he would have been clothed with a ſtone coat, as he beautifully expreſſes it; which Suidas [f] explains, by being overwhelmed with ſtones, or ſtoned; as Euſtathius [g].

℣. 12. For it is a fire that conſumeth to deſtruction, &c.] Referring either to the nature of the ſin of uncleanneſs; it is inflammatory, a burning luſt, a fire burning in the breaſt; ſee 1 Cor. vii. 9. or to the effect of it, either the rage of jealouſy in the injured perſon, which is exceeding fierce, furious, and cruel, like devouring fire, not to be appeaſed or mitigated, Prov. vi. 34, 35. Cant. viii. 6. or elſe it may reſpect the puniſhment of this ſin in the times of Job, and which we find was practiſed among the Gentiles, as the Canaanites, Job's neighbours, burning ſuch delinquents with fire; ſee Gen. xxxviii. 24. Jer. xxix. 22, 23. or rather, the wrath of God for it, which is poured forth as fire, and burns to the loweſt hell, and into which lake of fire all ſuch impure perſons will be caſt, unleſs the grace of God prevents; and which will be a fire that will conſume and deſtroy both ſoul and body, and ſo be an utter and everlaſting deſtruction, Rev. xxi. 8. and would root out all my increaſe; even in this world; adultery is a ſin, that not only ruins a man's character, fixes an indelible blot upon him, a reproach that ſhall not be wiped off, and conſumes a man's body, and deſtroys the health of it, but his ſubſtance alſo, the increaſe of his fields, and of his fruits, and by means of it, a man is brought to a piece of bread, to beg it, and to be glad of it, Prov. vi. 26. 33. and v. 10.

℣. 13. If I did deſpiſe the cauſe of my man-ſervant, or of my maid-ſervant, &c.] Whether it was a cauſe that related to any controverſy or quarrel among themſelves when it was brought before him, he did not reject it, becauſe of the meanneſs of the contending parties, and the ſtate of ſervitude they were in; but he received it and ſearched into it, heard patiently what each had to ſay, examined them thoroughly, entered into the merits of the cauſe, and either reconciled them, or paſſed a righteous ſentence, puniſhed the delinquent, and protected the innocent; or, if it was a cauſe relating to himſelf, any complaint of their work, or wages, or food, or clothing, as it ſeems to be from what follows; when they contended with me; had any thing to complain of, or to object to him on the above account, or any other, where there was any ſhew or colour of foundation for it; otherwiſe it cannot be thought he would indulge a ſaucy, malapert, and contradicting behaviour in them towards

[c] Odyſſ. 7. v. 107. & Odyſſ. 20. v. 109. apud Stockium, p. 414.
[d] So T. Bab. Sotah, fol. 10. 1. & Luther, Schmidt
[e] Iliad. 3. v. 57.
[f] In voce λαινον.
[g] In Homer. ibid.

3

wards him: masters in those times and countries had an unlimited, and exercised a despotic power over their servants, and used them with great rigour, and refused to do them justice upon complaints; but Job behaved as if he had had the rules of the apostle before him to act by in his conduct towards his servants, Eph. vi. 9. Col. iv. 1. and even condescended to submit the cause between him and his servants to other judges or arbitrators; or rather took cognizance of it himself, heard patiently and carefully what they had to alledge, and did them justice.

℣. 14. What then shall I do when God riseth up? &c.] That is, if he had despised and rejected the cause of his servants, or had neglected or refused to do them justice; he signifies he should be at the utmost loss to know what to do, what excuse to make, or what to say in his own defence, when God should rise up to defend the cause of the injured; either in a way of providence in this life, or at the great day of judgment in the world to come, when every thing will be brought to account, and masters and servants must stand alike before the judgment-seat of God, to receive for the things they have done, whether good or evil: and when he visiteth, what shall I answer him? when he makes a visitation among men, either in this world, even in a fatherly way, visits transgressions, and reproves and corrects for them; had he been guilty of ill usage of his servants, he must have silently submitted to such visitations and chastisements, having nothing to say for himself, why he should not be thus dealt with; or in the world to come, in the great day of visitation, when God shall make inquisition for sin, and seek it out, and call to an account for it; and should this be produced against him, even contempt of the cause of his servants, he was sensible he could not answer him for it, nor for any one sin of a thousand, as no man will be able to do; but must be speechless, unless he has a better righteousness than his own to answer for him in that time to come. This is Job's first reason which deterred him from using his servants ill; another follows.

℣. 15. Did not he that made me in the womb make him? &c.] And her also, both his man-servant and maid-servant: these were made by the Lord as Job was, and in a like place and manner as he himself; though parents are the instruments of begetting children, and of bringing them into the world, God is the maker of men, as at the beginning, and all are alike made by him, in whatsoever rank, condition, and circumstance of life, whether masters or servants; and they are all fabricated in the same shop of nature, the womb of a woman: and did not one fashion us in the womb? that is, he who is the One God, according to Mal. ii. 10. God is one in nature and essence, though there are three persons in the unity of the Godhead; and this One God, Father, Son, and Spirit, is the Creator of all men and things; hence we read of creators, Eccl. xii. 1. and, though one God makes the bodies and creates the souls of men now as at the first, and all are formed and fashioned by him, high, low, rich and poor, bond and free; and they have all the same rational powers and faculties of soul, Ps. xxxiii. 15. as well as the same curious art and skill are employed in forming and fashioning their bodies and the members of them, in the lower parts of the earth, in their mother's womb; yea, they are fashioned [in one womb][h], as the words will better bear to be rendered according to the position of them in the original and the accents; not indeed in the same identical womb, but in a like one: there are two words in the original here, both translated womb; the one signifies the ovarium, in which the conception is made; the other designs the secundine, in which the fœtus is wrapped or covered; for so it may be rendered, did he not cover us? &c[k]. though Jarchi, Aben Ezra, Ben Gersom, and others, interpret it of the One God as we do: Job's reasoning is, that seeing he and his servants were equally the workmanship of God, and both made in the womb by him, and curiously fashioned alike, and possessed of the same rational powers, it would be unreasonable in him to use them ill, who were his fellow-creatures; and should he, he might expect the Maker of them both would highly resent it. Macrobius[i], an heathen writer, gives a remarkable instance of the care heaven, as he expresses it, has of servants, and how much the contempt of it is resented thereby; and reasons much in the same manner concerning them as Job does here, that they are men, though servants; are of the same original, breathe in the same air, live and die as other men.

℣. 16. If I have withheld the poor from their desire, &c.] Their reasonable desires, and which it was in his power to grant; as when they desired a piece of bread being hungry, or clothes to cover them being naked; but not unreasonable desires, seeking and asking great things for themselves, or unlimited and unbounded ones, such as the two sons of Zebedee desired of Christ, Mark x. 35. or have caused the eyes of the widow to fail; through long waiting for, and expecting help and succour from him, and at last disappointed. Job did not use the widow in such a manner as to give her reason to hope for relief or counsel from him she came for, and make her wait long, and then send her away empty, as he was charged, ch. xxii. 9. but he soon dispatched her, by granting her what she sued to him for.

℣. 17. Or have eaten my morsel myself alone, &c.] Though he had kept no doubt a plentiful table in the time of his prosperity suitable to his circumstances, yet had been no luxurious person, and therefore calls provisions a morsel; however, be it what it would, more or less, he did not eat it alone; what he had for himself the poor had a share of it with him; and the same he eat himself he gave to them: and the fatherless hath not eaten thereof; meaning the poor fatherless; for as to the rich fatherless, it was no charity to feed them: this verse contradicts the charge exhibited against him, ch. xxii. 7.

℣. 18. For from my youth he was brought up with me as with a father, &c.] That is, the poor or the fatherless, one or both; as soon as he was at years of discretion, and was capable of observing the distressed circumstances, of others he had a tender and compassionate regard to the poor and fatherless, and acted the part of a father to them; was as affectionately concerned for them as if he had been their father, and took such care of them as if they were his children; see ch. xxix. 16. and I have guided her from my mother's womb; the widow, by his counsel and advice; an hyperbolical expression, signifying how early he was a succourer of such persons, perſons, by giving his friendly advice, or needful aſſiſtance; the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, from my youth mercy grew up with me, &c. a merciful diſpoſition, a compaſſionate regard to the poor and fatherleſs; this was as it were connatural to him; for though there is no good diſpoſition really in man, without the grace of God, of which Job might early partake, yet there is a ſhew of it in ſome perſons, in compariſon of others; ſome have a natural tender diſpoſition to the poor, when others are naturally cruel and hard-hearted to them; and ſo Mr. Broughton renders the words to this ſenſe, "for from my youth this grew with me as a father, and from my mother did I tender it:" but the firſt ſenſe ſeems beſt.

[h] ברחם אחד ἐν τῃ αὐτῃ κοιλιᾳ Sept. in utero uno, Munster; so Beza, Drusius, Michaelis. [i] Saturnal. l. 1. c. 11. [k] Vid. Hackman. Præcidan. Sacr. p. 193.

℣. 19. If I have ſeen any periſh for want of clothing, &c.] A man may be in ſuch poor circumſtances as to want proper clothing to cover his naked body with, and preſerve it from the inclemencies of the weather, and for want of it be ready to periſh or die with cold. Job denies he had ſeen any ſuch; not that he had never ſeen perſons in ſuch periſhing circumſtances; but he had not ſeen them as to deſpiſe them, as the Vulgate Latin verſion, as to have them in contempt, or look at them with diſdain becauſe of their poverty and rags, or ſordid apparel; or ſo as to overlook them, as the Septuagint verſion, to neglect them, and to take no notice of them, and make no proviſion for their clothing, a warm and comfortable garment, as in the next verſe: or any poor without covering; without clothing ſufficient to cover himſelf with, and keep him warm; Job had ſeen ſuch objects, but he did not leave them in ſuch a condition; he ſaw them, and had compaſſion on them, and clothed them.

℣. 20. If his loins have not bleſſed me, &c.] Which were girded and covered with garments he gave him; which, as often as he put on and girded his loins with, put him in mind of his generous benefactor, and this put him upon ſending up an ejaculatory wiſh to heaven, that all happineſs and bleſſedneſs might attend him, who had ſo comfortably clothed him; ſee ch. xxix. 13. and if he were not warmed with the fleece of my ſheep; not with a fleece of wool as taken off the back of the ſheep, or with a ſheep's-ſkin having the wool on it, but with it, as made up into cloth; with a woollen garment, which was a kind of clothing that very early obtained, and is what is warm and comfortable, ſee Deut. xxii. 11. Job clothed the naked, not with gay apparel, which was not neceſſary, but with decent and uſeful raiment, and not with the fleece of other men's ſheep, but with the fleece of his own ſheep, or with cloth made of the wool of his own flock, giving what was his own and not others; which always ſhould be obſerved in acts of charity; ſee 2 Sam. xii. 4. Thus Chriſt, the anti-type of Job, feeds the poor and the fatherleſs whom he finds, though he does not leave them ſo; it is at his own table, and with his own bread, with proviſions of his own making; and clothes them with the robe of his righteouſneſs, and garments of ſalvation, which is a clothing and a covering to them, and ſecures them from periſhing, and cauſes joy and gladneſs in them, Iſ. lxi. 10.

℣. 21. If I have lift up my hand againſt the fatherleſs, &c.] Either in a menacing way, threatening what he would do to them; which, from a man of wealth and authority, a civil magiſtrate, a judge, is very terrible to the poor and fatherleſs; or in order to ſtrike him, which would be to ſmite with the fiſt of wickedneſs; or give a ſignal to others, by lifting up the hand to ſmite, as Ananias gave orders to ſmite the apoſtle Paul; or thereby to give his vote againſt the fatherleſs wrongly, ſuffrages being ſometimes made by lifting up the hands; or hereby Job ſignifies, that he was ſo far from doing the fatherleſs any real injury, that he had not ſo much as lift up his hand, and even a finger againſt him: when I ſaw my help in the gate; in the court of judicature held in the gate of the city, as was uſual; though he knew he had the bench of judges for him, or they would give ſentence in his behalf, and againſt the fatherleſs, if he did but hold up his hand, or lift up a finger to them, ſo ready would they be to take his part and be on his ſide; yet he never made uſe of his power and intereſt to their detriment, or took ſuch an advantage againſt them.

℣. 22. Then let mine arm fall from my ſhoulder-blade, &c.] With which the upper part of it is connected; let it be disjointed from it, or rot and drop off from it; a dreadful calamity this, to loſe an arm and the uſe of it, to have it fall off immediately, as a judgment from God, and in juſt retaliation for lifting up an hand or arm againſt the fatherleſs; as Jeroboam's arm withered when he put it forth from the altar, and ordered hands to be laid upon the prophet for crying againſt the altar, 1 Kings xiii. 4. and mine arm be broken from the bone; from the channel-bone, as the margin of our bibles, or rather from the elbow, the lower part of the arm; and ſo may be rendered, or mine arm, &c. Eliphaz had brought a charge againſt Job, that the arms of the fatherleſs had been broken, and ſuggeſts that they had been broken by him, or by his orders, ch. xxii. 9. and Job here wiſhes, that if that was the caſe, that his own arm was broken: ſuch imprecations are not to be made in common, or frequently, and only when a man's innocence cannot be vindicated but by an appeal to the omniſcient God; an inſtance ſomewhat like this, ſee in Pſ. cxxxvii. 5, 6.

℣. 23. For deſtruction from God was a terror to me, &c.] Though he feared not men, they being at his beck and command, ready to do any thing for him he ſhould order, yet he feared God; and the dread of his reſentment, and of deſtruction from him the lawgiver, who is able to ſave and to deſtroy, had ſuch an influence on him as to deter and keep him from all unkindneſs to the poor, and injuſtice to the fatherleſs; he dreaded the deſtruction of himſelf, his family, and ſubſtance in this world, and everlaſting deſtruction of ſoul and body in the world to come; which of all things is to be feared, Matt. x. 28. and Old Teſtament-ſaints were much under a ſpirit of bondage to fear, and were actuated thereby; and, though Job might not be under any dread of eternal damnation, knowing his intereſt in the living Redeemer; yet he might fear temporal deſtruction, as it is certain he did; which thing he feared came upon him, though not for any crime or crimes he was guilty of, ſee ch. xxx. 25. he might fear as a good man may, the chaſtiſements and corrections of his heavenly Father: and by reaſon of his highneſs I could not endure; God is higher than the higheſt angels, or men; he is above all gods, ſo called; he is God over all, bleſſed for ever; and ſuch is his height, his glory, and his majeſty, that it is terrible, and the dread of them makes men afraid; nor can any ſinner ſtand before him, nor withſtand him, nor hope to prevail againſt him, nor flee from his preſence, nor eſcape eſcape out of his hand, nor bear his wrath and indignation, and the lighting down of his arm; for what hands can be ſtrong, or heart endure, when the Almighty God deals with them? or Job's ſenſe may be, that ſuch an awe of the divine Being was always upon him, that he could not do any unkind thing to the poor, or unjuſt one to the fatherleſs.

℣. 24. If I have made gold my hope, &c.] Job here purges himſelf from idolatry in a figurative ſenſe, as he afterwards does from it, taken in a literal ſenſe; for covetouſneſs is idolatry, and a covetous man is an idolater; he worſhips his gold and ſilver, placing his affections on them, and putting his truſt and confidence in them, Eph. v. 5. Col. iii. 5. for to make gold the object or ground of hope, is to place it in the room of God, who is the hope of Iſrael, and in whom every good man ſhould truſt, and whom he ſhould make his hope. Jer. viii. 14. and xvii. 5. not gold on earth, but glory in heaven, is what the good man is hoping for; and not riches, but Chriſt and his righteouſneſs are the foundation of ſuch an hope; to make gold our hope, is to have hope in this life, and to make a thing preſent the object of it; whereas true hope is of things not ſeen and future, and if only in this life, good men have hope, they are of all moſt miſerable; but they have in heaven a better and a more enduring ſubſtance, and a better ground for hope of that ſubſtance, than worldly wealth and riches can give: or have ſaid to the fine gold, thou art my confidence; as bad men do, and good men are prone unto, and therefore to be cautioned againſt it, Pſ. xlix. 6. and lii. 7. 1 Tim. vi. 17. for this is not only to truſt in uncertain riches, and in unſatisfying ones, but to put them in the ſtead of God, who is or ought to be the confidence of the ends of the earth: not gold, but the living God, who gives all things richly to enjoy, is to be truſted in; when men covet riches, and truſt in them as their ſecurity from evil, and that they may live independent of the providence of God, it is virtually to deny it, and carries in it ſecret atheiſm; as well as ſuch a confidence is deſtruction of the worſhip of God, and ſuch a temper makes a man an unprofitable hearer, plunges him into errors and hurtful luſts, and endangers his everlaſting happineſs, Hab. ii. 9. Matt. xiii. 22. 1 Tim. vi. 9, 10. Mar. x. 24. in after-times the Romans worſhipped the goddeſs pecunia, or money, as Auſtin [z] relates.

℣. 25. If I rejoiced becauſe my wealth was great, &c.] As it was, ſee ch. i. 2, 3. yet he did not ſet his heart upon it, pleaſe himſelf with it, indulge to a carnal joy on account of it, nor ſuffer it to engroſs his affections, or alienate them from God his chief joy; not but that a man may lawfully rejoice in the goodneſs of God unto him, in increaſing his wealth, and praiſe him for it, who has placed him in ſuch eaſy circumſtances, and ſo comfortably provided for him and his family, and put him into a capacity to do good to others; and he may rejoice in what God has given him, and chearfully partake of it, 1 Chron. xxix. 13, 14. Deut. xii. 7. Eccl. v. 19, 20. and becauſe my hand had gotten much; though he had much wealth, he did not aſcribe it to his own induſtry, and applaud his own wiſdom and diligence, as men are apt to do, for all comes of God, and is owing to his bleſſing; he did not pleaſe himſelf when become rich, as if his own hand had found him much ſubſtance, as Ephraim did, Hoſ. xii. 8.

℣. 26. If I beheld the ſun when it ſhined, &c.] Some take this to be a reaſon why Job did not make gold his hope and confidence, becauſe all ſublunary and earthly enjoyments muſt be uncertain, fading, and periſh, ſince the ſun and moon are not without their deficiencies and changes, to which ſenſe the Septuagint verſion inclines; others, as Nachmanides, that they are a denial that Job aſcribed his wealth and ſubſtance to the influence of the heavenly bodies; and many interpreters are of opinion, that they are a continuation of the ſame ſubject as before; Job hereby declaring that neither his eye nor his heart were ſet upon his outward proſperity, comparable to the light of the ſun, and the brightneſs of the moon; that he did not ſecretly pleaſe himſelf with it, nor congratulate himſelf upon it, nor applaud his own wiſdom and induſtry; and of late Schultens and others interpret it of flattering great perſonages, complimenting them and courting their favour, which we call worſhipping the riſing ſun; but I rather think it is to be underſtood, as it more generally is, of worſhipping the ſun and moon in a literal ſenſe; which was the firſt kind of idolatry men went into; thoſe very ancient idolaters the Zabii worſhipped the ſun as their greater God, as Maimonides [a] obſerves, to whom he ſays they offered ſeven bats, ſeven mice, and ſeven other creeping things, with ſome other things alſo; in after times horſes were offered to it, ſee 2 Kings xxiii. 11. So the antient Egyptians worſhipped the ſun and moon, calling the one Oſiris, and the other Iſis [b]. The word for ſun is light, and it is ſo called becauſe it is a luminous body, and the fountain of light to others; it is called the greater light, Gen. i. 16. and from this Hebrew word Or, with the Egyptians, Apollo, who is the ſun, is called Horus, as Macrobius [c] relates; it is ſaid to ſhine, as it always does, even when below our horizon, or in an eclipſe, or under a cloud, though not ſeen by us. Job has here reſpect to its ſhining clearly and viſibly, and perhaps at noon-day, when it is in its full ſtrength; unleſs regard is had to its bright and ſhining appearance at its riſing, when the heathens uſed to pay their homage and adoration to it [d]: now when Job denies that he beheld it ſhining, it cannot be underſtood of the bare ſight of it, which he continually had; nor of beholding it with delight and pleaſure, which might be very lawfully done, Eccl. xi. 7. nor of conſidering it as the work of God, being a very glorious and uſeful creature, in which his glory is diſplayed, and for which he is to be praiſed, becauſe of its beneficial influence on the earth; ſee Pſ. viii. 3, 4. and xix. 1. and cxxxvi. 1, 7. Deut. xxxiii. 14. but of his beholding it with admiration, as if it was more than a creature, aſcribing deity to it, and worſhipping it as God; and the ſame muſt be underſtood of the moon in the next clauſe: or the moon walking in brightneſs; as at firſt riſing, or rather when in the full, in the middle of the month, as Aben Ezra; when it walks all night, in its brightneſs, illuminated by the ſun: theſe two luminaries, the one called the king, the other the queen of heaven, were very early worſhipped, if not the firſt inſtances of idolatry.

[z] De civitate Dei, l. 4. c. 21.

[a] Moreh Nevochim, par. 3. c. 29. p. 424.

[b] Diodor. Sic. l. 1. p. 10.

[c] Saturnal. l. 1. c. 21.

[d] Illi ad ſurgentem converſi lumina ſolem.
Virgil. Æneid. 12.

latry. Diodorus Siculus [e] says, that the firſt men of old, born in Egypt, beholding and admiring the beauty of the world, thought there were two gods in the nature of the univerſe, and that they were eternal; namely, the ſun and moon, the one they called Oſiris, and the other Iſis; hence the Iſraelites having dwelt long in Egypt were in danger of being drawn into this idolatry, againſt which they are cautioned, Deut. iv. 19. and where was a city called Heliopolis, or the city of the ſun, as in the Greek verſion of Iſ. xix. 18. where was a temple dedicated to the worſhip of it; and ſo the Arabians, the neighbours of Job, according to Herodotus [f], worſhipped the ſun and moon; for he ſays the Perſians were taught by them and the Aſſyrians to ſacrifice to the ſun and moon; and ſo did the old Canaanites and the Phœnicians; hence one of their cities is called Beth-ſhemeſh, the houſe or temple of the ſun, Joſh. xix. 22. yea we are told [g] that to this day there are ſome traces of this ancient idolatry in Arabia, the neighbourhood of Job; as in a large city in Arabia, upon the Euphrates, called Anna, where they worſhip the ſun only; this being common in thoſe parts in Job's time, he purges himſelf from it.

℣. 27. And mine heart hath been ſecretly enticed, &c.] Drawn away by beholding the magnitude of theſe bodies, the ſwiftneſs of their motion, their glorious appearance, and great uſefulneſs to mankind, to entertain a thought of their being deities; and privately to worſhip them, in ſecret acts of devotion, as by an honourable eſteem of them as ſuch, reverence, and affection for them, truſt and confidence in them; for as there is a ſecret worſhipping of the true God, ſo there is a ſecret idolatry, idolatry in the heart, and ſetting up of idols there, as well as worſhipping them in dark places, in chambers of imagery, as the Jews did, Ezek. viii. 12. or my mouth hath kiſſed my hand; idols uſed to be kiſſed by their votaries, in token of their veneration of them, and as expreſſive of their worſhip of them; ſo Baal and Jeroboam's calves were kiſſed by the worſhippers of them, 1 Kings xix. 18. Hoſ. xiii. 2. Kiſſing is uſed to ſignify the religious veneration, homage, and worſhip of a divine perſon, the Son of God, Pſ. ii. 12. and ſuch deities eſpecially that were out of the reach of their worſhippers, as the ſun, moon, and ſtars were, they uſed to put their hands to their mouths, and kiſs them, in token of their worſhip; juſt as perſons now at a diſtance from each other, pay their civil reſpects to one another: inſtances of religious adoration of idols performed in this manner, ſee in the note on Hoſ. xiii. 2. Job denies that he had been guilty of ſuch idolatry, either ſecretly or openly.

℣. 28. This alſo were an iniquity to be puniſhed by the judge, &c.] As well as adultery, ℣. 11. by the civil magiſtrates and judges of the earth, who are God's vicegerents, and therefore it behoves them to take cognizance of ſuch an iniquity, and to puniſh for it, which affects in ſo peculiar a manner the honour and worſhip of the true God; this by the law of Moſes was puniſhed by ſtoning to death, Deut. xiii. 9. however this will be taken notice of and puniſhed by God the judge of all, whoſe law is broken hereby, and who will viſit this iniquity more eſpecially on thoſe who commit it, and their poſterity after them. Idolaters of every ſort ſhall have their part and portion in the lake which burns with fire and brimſtone, Exod. xx. 3, 4, 5. Rev. xxi. 8. the conſideration of its being ſuch a heinous ſin, and ſo deſerving of puniſhment, deterred Job from it; the Targum paraphraſes it, a moſt amazing iniquity, it being, as follows, a denial of the true God: for I ſhould have denied the God that is above; that is, had he worſhipped the ſun and moon ſecretly or openly; for as the atheiſt denies him in words, the idolater denies him in facts, worſhipping the creature beſides the creator, and giving his glory to another, and his praiſe to idols; which is a virtual denial of him, even of him who is above the ſun and moon in place, being higher than the heavens; and in nature, excellency, and glory, being the creator of them, and they his creatures; and in power and authority, who commands the ſun, and it riſes not, and has appointed the moon for ſeaſons, Job ix. 7. Pſ. civ. 19.

℣. 29. If I rejoiced at the deſtruction of him that hated me, &c.] Job though a good man had his enemies, as all good men have, and that becauſe of their goodneſs, and who hated him with an implacable hatred, without a cauſe, there being a rooted bitter enmity in the ſeed of the ſerpent againſt the godly in all generations; on whom ſooner or later, at one time or another, deſtruction comes, one calamity or another on their families, diſeaſes on their bodies, loſs of ſubſtance, death of themſelves or relatives; now it is a common thing with wicked men to rejoice in the adverſity of their enemies, but good men ſhould not do ſo; yet it is a difficult thing, and requires a large meaſure of grace, and that in exerciſe, not to feel any pleaſing emotion, a ſecret joy, and inward pleaſure at the hearing of any thing of this ſort befalling an enemy; which is a new crime Job purges himſelf from: or lift up myſelf when evil found him; either the evil of ſin, which ſooner or later finds out the ſinner, charges him with guilt, and requires puniſhment, or the evil of puniſhment for ſin; which though it may ſeem to move ſlowly, purſues the ſinner, and will overtake him, and light upon him. Mr. Broughton renders the words, and beſtirred me when he found loſs; loſs in his family, in his cattle, and in his ſubſtance; now when this was the caſe, Job did not raiſe up himſelf in a haughty manner, and inſult and triumph over him, or ſtir up himſelf to joy and rejoicing, or to make joyful motions, as Aben Ezra and Ben Gerſom interpret it; and by his geſtures ſhew that he was elated with the evil that had befallen his enemy; indeed ſo far as the fall and deſtruction of the wicked make for the public good, for the intereſt of religion, for the glory of God, and the honour of his juſtice, it is lawful for good men to rejoice thereat; but not from a private affection, or from a private ſpirit of revenge, ſee Pſ. lviii. 10, 11. Prov. xi. 10. Rev. xviii. 20. and xix. 1, 2.

℣. 30. Neither have I ſuffered my mouth to ſin, &c.] Which, as it is the inſtrument of ſpeech, is often the means of much ſin, particularly of curſing men, and expreſſing much bitterneſs againſt enemies; but Job laid an embargo upon it, kept it as with a bridle, reſtrained it from uttering any evil, or wiſhing any to his worſt adverſaries; which is difficult to do, when provocations are given, as follows: by wiſhing a curſe to his ſoul; not to his ſoul as diſtinct from his body, being the ſuper-excellent and immortal part; that it be everlaſtingly damned, as wicked men wiſh to their own ſouls, and

[e] Bibliothec. l. i. p. 10.

[f] Clio, ſive, l. 1. c. 131.

[g] De la Valle Itinerar. par. 2. c. 9. apud Spanheim. Hiſt. Job. c. 6. §. 14. N°. 6. p. 108, 109.

and the ſouls of others, but to his perſon, wiſhing ſome calamity might befal him, ſome diſeaſe ſeize upon him, or that God would take him away by death: Job would never ſuffer himſelf to wiſh any thing of this kind unto his enemy.

℣. 31. If the men of my tabernacle, &c.] Either his friends, that came to viſit him, and take a meal with him, and would ſometimes tarry awhile with him in his houſe, being very free and familiar with him; and who were, as it were, at home in his tabernacle; or rather his domeſtic ſervants, that were under his roof, and dwelt in his houſe, ſee ch. xix. 15. if theſe ſaid not, oh that we had of his fleſh, we cannot be ſatisfied; of the fleſh of Job's enemy; and the ſenſe is, that his ſervants uſed to ſay, we cannot bear to ſee our maſter ſo ill uſed and inſulted by his enemy; we wiſh he would only allow us to avenge him on him, we would eat him up alive; we would devour him, and deſtroy him at once; nor can we be ſatisfied unleſs we have leave to do it: and ſo this is a further proof of Job's patience with his enemies, that though he had ſetters-on in his family, his ſervants ſolicited him to revenge, yet he abſtained from it; which may be exemplified in the caſes of David and of Chriſt, 1 Sam. xxvi. 8. 2 Sam. xvi. 9. Luke ix. 54. though ſome think theſe words expreſs Job's patience towards his ſervants, who were ſo angry with him for the ſtrict diſcipline he obſerved in his houſe, that they wiſhed they had his fleſh to eat, and could not be ſatisfied without it; and yet, ſo far was he from taking pleaſure in the calamities of his enemies, and wiſhing ill to them, that he did not reſent the ill-natured ſpeeches of his ſervants, and avenge himſelf on them for their wicked inſults upon him: but it can hardly be thought that Job would keep ſuch wicked ſervants in his houſe; but perhaps Job here enters upon a new crime, which he clears himſelf of, and is opened more fully in the next verſe, namely, inhoſpitality to ſtrangers; ſince the particle if commonly begins a new article in this chapter, and being taken in this ſenſe, various interpretations are given; ſome, as if Job's ſervants were diſpleaſed with him for his hoſpitality, that his houſe was always ſo full of gueſts, that they were continually employed in dreſſing food for them, that they had not time, or that there was not enough left for them to eat of his fleſh, his food, and be ſatisfied with it; or elſe, as pleaſed with the plentiful table he kept, and therefore deſired to continue always in his ſervice, and eat of his food; nor could they be ſatisfied with the food of others, or live elſewhere; though perhaps it is beſt of all to render the words, as by ſome, who will give, or ſhew the man that is not ſatisfied of his fleſh[h]? point out the man in all the neighbourhood that has not been liberally entertained at Job's table to his full ſatisfaction and content; and his liberality did not extend only to his neighbours, but to ſtrangers alſo; as follows.

℣. 32. The ſtranger did not lodge in the ſtreet, &c.] By a ſtranger, is not meant an unconverted man, that is a ſtranger to God and godlineſs, to Chriſt, and the way of ſalvation by him, to the Spirit of God and ſpiritual things; nor a good man, who is a ſtranger and pilgrim on earth; but one that is out of his nation and country, and at a diſtance from it, whether a good man or a bad man; theſe Job would not ſuffer to lie in the ſtreets in the night-ſeaſon, expoſed to the air and the inclemencies of it; ſee Judg. xix. 15—21. but I opened my doors to the traveller; even all the doors of his houſe, to denote his great liberality, that as many as would might enter it; and this was done by himſelf, or however, by his order; and ſome think that it ſignifies that he was at his door, waiting and watching for travellers to invite them in, as Abraham and Lot, Gen. xviii. 1, 2. and xix. 1, 2. or his doors were opened to the way[i], as it may be rendered, to the road-ſide; his houſe was built by the way-ſide; or however, the doors which lay towards that ſide were thrown open for travellers to come in at as they pleaſed, and when they would; ſo very hoſpitable and kind to ſtrangers and travellers was Job, and ſo welcome were they to his houſe and the entertainment of it, ſee Heb. xiii. 2.

℣. 33. If I covered my tranſgreſſions as Adam, &c.] Job could not be underſtood by this account he had given of the holineſs of his life, that he thought himſelf quite free from ſin; he had owned himſelf to be a ſinner in ſeveral places before, and diſclaimed perfection; and here he acknowledges he was guilty of tranſgreſſing the law of God, and that in many inſtances; for he ſpeaks of his tranſgreſſions in the plural number; but then he did not ſeek to cover them from the ſight of God or men, but frankly and ingenuouſly confeſſed them to both; he did not cover them, palliate, excuſe, and extenuate them as Adam did his, by laying the blame ro his wife; and as ſhe by charging it on the ſerpent; and thoſe excuſes they made are the inventions they found out, Eccl. vii. 29. or the meaning is, Job did not do as men[k] in common do; who, when they have ſinned, either through fear or ſhame, endeavour to conceal it, and keep it out of the ſight of others, unleſs they are very hardened and audacious ſinners, ſuch as rhe men of Sodom were, ſee Hoſ. vi. 7. by hiding mine iniquity in my boſom; meaning perhaps ſome particular iniquity which his nature was moſt inclined to; this he did not attempt to hide in ſecret, as what is put into the boſom is; or that he did not ſpare it and cheriſh it, and from an affection to it, keep it as perſons and things beloved are, laid in the boſom; and ſo Mr. Broughton reads the words, hiding my ſin of a ſelf-love; either having a ſelf-love to it, or hiding it of ſelf-love, that is, from a principle of ſelf-love, to preſerve his honour, credit, and reputation among men.

℣. 34. Did I fear a great multitude? &c.] No, they did not deter him from confeſſing his ſin in the moſt public manner, when ſenſible, or convicted of it, and when ſuch a public acknowledgment was neceſſary: or did the contempt of families terrify me? no, the contempt he might ſuppoſe he ſhould be had in by ſome families that knew him, and he was well acquainted with, did not terrify him from making a free and ingenuous confeſſion of his ſins: that I kept ſilence; or did I keep ſilence, and went not out of the door? ſo as not to open his mouth by confeſſion in public, but kept within doors through fear and ſhame; or elſe the ſenſe is, that he was not intimidated from doing his duty as a civil magiſtrate, adminiſtring juſtice to the poor and oppreſſed; neither the dread of a clamorous mob, nor the contempt of families of note, or great perſonages, could deter him from the execution of his office with uprightneſs, ſo as to cauſe him to be ſilent, and keep at home; but without any regard to the fear

[h] So Schultens, quis; and Ikenius, apud ib. Piſcator, Michaelis; לדרך Ben Gerſom. Bolducius, Mercerus, Druſius, Schmidt; more hominum, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator; ſo Aben Ezra.

[i] לארח ad ſemitam ſeu viam, Mercerus; verſus viam,

[k] כאדם ut homo, V. L. Pagninus, Montanus, Beza, fear of the one, or the contempt of the other, he went out from his houſe through the ſtreet to the court of judicature, took his place on the bench, and gave judgment in favour of thoſe that were oppreſſed, though the multitude was againſt them, and even perſons and families of note: or thus, though I could have put a great multitude to fear, yet the moſt contemptible perſons in any family, ſo Aben Ezra and Ben Gerſom interpret that phraſe, the meaneſt perſon, or but a beggar, if his cauſe was juſt, terrified him; or ſuch was the fear of God upon him, that he durſt do no other than to do him juſtice; ſo that he could not open his mouth againſt him, or ſtir out of doors to do him the leaſt injury; though perhaps it may be beſt of all, with Schultens, to conſider theſe words as an imprecation, that if what he had ſaid before from ver. 24. was not true; if he was not clear from idolatry figurative and literal, from a malicious and revengeful ſpirit, from inhoſpitality and unkindneſs to ſtrangers, from palliating, excuſing, and extenuating his ſins; then as if he ſhould ſay, may I be frighted with a tumult, or a multitude of people, and terrified with the public contempt of families; may I be as ſilent as a mope in my own houſe, and never dare to ſtir out of doors, or ſhew my face, or ſee the face of any man any more: and then, before he had quite finiſhed his account of himſelf, breaks out in the following manner.

℣. 35. Oh, that one would hear me! &c.] Or who will give me a hearer[l]? Oh, that I had one, not a hearer of him as a teacher and inſtructor of many, as he had been, ch. iv. 3. or only to hear what he had delivered in this chapter; but to hear his cauſe, and hear him plead his own cauſe in a judiciary way; he does not mean an ordinary hearer, one that comes out of curioſity into courts of judicature to hear cauſes tried, what is ſaid on both ſides, and how they will iſſue; but as Bar Tzemach paraphraſes it, "who ſhall give me a judge that ſhall hear me," that would hear his cauſe patiently, examine it thoroughly, and judge impartially, which is the buſineſs of judges to do, Deut. i. 16, 17. he did not care who it was, if he had but ſuch an one; though he ſeems to have reſpect to God himſelf, from what he ſays in the next clauſe, and wiſhes that he would but hear, try, and judge his cauſe: behold, my deſire is that the Almighty would anſwer me; anſwer to what he had ſaid, or had further to ſay in his own defence; this is a requeſt he had made before, and now repeats it, ſee ch. xiii. 22. and xxiii. 3, 4, 5. Some render it, behold my mark, or ſcope[m]; ſo Mr. Broughton, behold my ſcope in this; this is what I aim at, what I deſign and mean by wiſhing for an hearer, that the Almighty himſelf would take the cauſe in hand, and give me an anſwer: or behold my ſign[n]; the ſign of my innocence, appealing to God, leaving my cauſe to be heard, tried, and judged by him, who is my witneſs, and will anſwer for me; ſee ch. xvi. 19. as well as deſiring mine adverſary to put down in writing what he has againſt me; or behold my ſignature[o]; the plea I have given is ſigned by my own hand: now let the Almighty anſwer me; a bold expreſſion indeed, and a making too free with the Almighty, and was one of thoſe ſpeeches Job was to be blamed for, and for which he was after humbled and repented of: and that mine adverſary had written a book; or the man of my contention[p]: either that contended for him, as Aben Ezra, that pleaded for him, was his advocate in court, whom he would have take a brief of him, and ſo diſtinctly plead his cauſe; or rather that contended againſt him, a court-adverſary, by whom he means either his three friends, or ſome one of them whom he more eſpecially took for his enemy; ſee ch. xvi. 9, 10, 11. and who he wiſhes had brought a bill of indictment, and put down in a book, or a paper in writing, the charge he had againſt him; that ſo it might be clearly known what could be alledged againſt him; and that it might be particularly and diſtinctly examined; when he doubted not but he ſhould be able to give a full anſwer to every article in it; and that the very bill itſelf would carry in it a juſtification of him: or it may be, rather he means God himſelf, who carried it towards him as an adverſary, at leaſt in a providential way; he had before requeſted that he would ſhow him wherefore he contended with him, ch. x. 2. and now he deſires he would give in writing his charge againſt him, being fully confident, that if he had but the opportunity of anſwering to it before him, he ſhould be able ſufficiently to vindicate himſelf; and that he ſhould come off with honour, as follows.

℣. 36. Surely I would take it upon my ſhoulder, &c.] The bill of indictment, the charge in writing; this he would take up and carry on his ſhoulder as a very light thing, having nothing weighty in it, no charge of ſin and guilt to bear him down; nothing but what he could eaſily ſtand up under, only ſome trifling matter, which could not be interpreted ſin; for any thing of that kind would have been a burden too heavy for him to have borne: or elſe his ſenſe is, that ſhould he be convicted of any ſin, he would openly confeſs the charge, acknowledge the ſin in the moſt public manner, that being viſible which is borne upon the ſhoulder; and would alſo patiently bear the afflictions and chaſtiſements that were laid upon him for it: though rather the meaning is, that he ſhould take up and carry ſuch a bill, not as a burden, but as an honour, as one bears a ſword of ſtate, or carries a ſcepter as an enſign of royalty on his ſhoulder; to which the alluſion may be, in Iſ. ix. 6. not at all doubting but it would turn out to his glory; which is confirmed by what follows: and bind it as a crown to me, or crowns[q], having various circles of gold hung with jewels; ſignifying that he would not only take his bill or charge, and carry it on his ſhoulder, but put it on his head, and wear it there, as a king does his crown; which is an ornament and honour to him, as he ſhould reckon this bill, ſeeing it would give him an opportunity of clearing himſelf effectually.

℣. 37. I would declare to him the number of my ſteps, &c.] To his judge, or to him that contended with him, and drew up the bill againſt him; he would forward it, aſſiſt in it, furniſh materials for it, give an account of all the tranſactions of his life that he could remember; this he ſays not as though he thought that God ſtood in need of any ſuch declaration, ſince he better knows the actions of men than they themſelves, compaſſes their paths, and is acquainted with all their ways; but to ſhew how confident he was of his innocence, and how little he feared the ſtricteſt and cloſeſt examination of his ways and works, knowing that he had had lived with all good conſcience unto that day: and as a prince would I go near unto him; either he ſhould conſider ſuch an hearer, and judge of his cauſe he deſired, as a prince, and reverence and reſpect him as ſuch; he ſhould be as dear unto him, though his adverſary that contended with him, as a prince; and he ſhould be as ambitious of an acquaintance with him as with a prince: or rather he means that he himſelf as a prince, in a princely manner, and with a princely ſpirit, ſhould draw nigh to his judge, to anſwer to the bill in writing againſt him; that he ſhould not come up to the bar like a malefactor, that ſhews guilt in his countenance, and by his trembling limbs, and ſhrinking back, not caring to come nigh, but chuſing rather to ſtand at a diſtance, or get off and eſcape if he could; but on the other hand, Job would go up to his judge, and to the judgment-ſeat, with all the ſtatelineſs of a prince, with an heroic, intrepid, and undaunted ſpirit; like a bold prince, as Mr. Broughton renders the word; ſee ch. xxiii. 3.

[l] מי יתן לי שמע לי quis dabit mihi audientem me? Montanus; utinam ſit mihi auditor, Tigurine verſion.
[m] הן תוי en ſcopum meum, Junius & Tremellius. [n] Ecce ſignum meum, Pagninus, Montanus, Beza, Bolducius; ſo BenGerſom. [o] En ſignaturam meam, Schultens. [p] איש ריבי vir litis meæ, Montanus, Beza, Bolducius, Druſius, Michaelis; ſo Vatablus, Mercerus. [q] עטרות diademata, Montanus; corollas, Tigurine verſion; coronas, Vatablus, Piſcator, Cocceius, Michaelis.

℣. 38. If my land cry againſt me, &c.] Some think that this and the two following verſes ſtand out of their place, and ſhould rather follow after ℣. 34. and ſome place them after ℣. 25. and others after ℣. 8. but this is the order of them in all copies and verſions, as they ſtand in our bibles; and here, after Job had expreſſed his deſire to have a hearer and judge of his cauſe and his charge exhibited in writing, and his confidence of the iſſue of it, ſhould it be granted; returns to his former ſubject, to clear himſelf from any notorious vice, he was ſuſpected of, or charged with; and as he had gone through what might reſpect him in private life, here he gives another inſtance in public life, with which he concludes; namely, purging himſelf from tyranny and oppreſſion, with which his friends had charged him without any proof; and he denies that the land he lived on, was poſſeſſed of, and of which he was the proprietor, cried againſt him, as being unjuſtly gotten, either by fraud, or by force, from others; or as being ill uſed by him, either as being too much cultivated, having never any reſt, or lying fallow; and ſo much weakened and drained of its ſtrength, or neglected and over-run with weeds, thorns, and thiſtles; or on account of the dreſſers and tillers of it, being badly dealt with, either over-worked, or not having ſufficiency of food, or their wages detained from them; all which are crying ſins, and by reaſon of which the land by a figure may be ſaid to cry out as the ſtone out of the wall, and the beam out of the timber, becauſe of the ſins of ſpoil, violence, oppreſſion, and covetouſneſs, Hab. ii. 11. or that the furrows likewiſe thereof complain; or weep [a], on account of the like ill uſage. Jarchi, and ſo the Midraſh, interpret this of not allowing the forgotten ſheaf and corner of the field to the poor, and detaining the tithes; and of plowing and making furrows with an ox and an aſs together; but the laws reſpecting theſe things were not yet in being; and if they had been, were only binding on Iſraelites, and not on Job, and the men of his country.

℣. 39. If I have eaten the fruits thereof without money, &c.] Or, the ſtrength thereof without ſilver [b]; ſee Gen. iv. 12. ſilver being the money chiefly in uſe in thoſe times. Job's meaning is, that he ate not any thing of the fruits and increaſe of his own land, without having paid for the ſame, which he would have done, if he had got his land out of the hands of the right owners of it, by deceit or violence; or if he had not paid his workmen for plowing, ſowing, reaping, &c. or if he had demanded the fruits of the earth of his tenants, to whom he had let out his farms, without giving them a proper price for them: or have cauſed the owners thereof to loſe their life; as Jezebel cauſed Naboth to loſe his, who was the original proprietor, that Ahab might poſſeſs it; or it may ſignify tenants, to whom Job let out fields, but did not ſtarve them by letting them hard leaſes, or lands on hard terms, ſo that they could not live upon them; or it may deſign the tillers of the land, as Jarchi and Bar Tzemach; thoſe that wrought in it, the ſervants that were employed in plowing, &c. to whom wages were due, and who had not too hard labour impoſed upon them, to the endangering of their lives; or he did not afflict and grieve [c] them, as ſome verſions; or make their lives bitter, through hard bondage and ſervice, as the Iſraelites in Egypt.

℣. 40. Let thiſtles grow inſtead of wheat, and cockle inſtead of barley, &c.] This is an imprecation of Job's, in which he wiſhes that if what he had ſaid was not true, or if he was guilty of the crimes he denied, that when and where he ſowed wheat, thorns or thiſtles might come up inſtead of it, or tares, as ſome Jewiſh writers [d] interpret it; and that when and where he ſhould ſow barley, cockle, or darnel, or any ſtinking or hurtful weed [e], as the word ſignifies, might ſpring up in room of it; reſpect ſeems to be had to the original curſe upon the earth, and by the judgment of God is ſometimes the caſe, that a fruitful land is turned into barreneſs for the wickedneſs of them that dwell in it, Gen. iii. 18. Pſ. cvii. 34. the words of Job are ended; which is either ſaid by himſelf, at the cloſe of his ſpeech; thus far, ſays Job, and no farther, having ſaid enough in his own defence, and for the confutation of his antagoniſts, and ſo cloſes in a way of triumph: or elſe this was added by Moſes, ſuppoſed to have written this book; or by ſome other hand, as Ezra, upon the reviſe of it, and other books of the old teſtament, when put in order by him: and theſe were the laſt words of Job to his friends, and in vindication of himſelf; for though there is ſomewhat more ſaid afterwards by him, and but little, yet to God, and by way of humiliation, acknowledging his ſin, and repentance for it with ſhame and abhorrence; ſee ch. xl. 3, 4, 5. and xlii. 1—6. Jarchi, and ſo the Midraſh, underſtand this concluding clauſe as an imprecation of Job's; that if he had done otherwiſe than he had declared, he wiſhes that theſe might be his laſt words, and he become dumb, and never open his mouth more; but, as Bar Tzemach obſerves, the ſimple ſenſe is, that his words were now compleated and finiſhed, juſt as the prayers of David, the ſon of Jeſſe, are ſaid to be, Pſ. lxxii. 20.

[a] יבכיון defleant, Pagninus, Montanus; flent, Beza, Piſcator, Cocceius, &c. [b] כחה robur ejus, Montanus, Bolducius, Mercerus, Druſius; vim ejus, Junius & Tremellius, Cocceius, Michaelis, Schultens; בלי כסף ſine, vel abſque argento, Mercer. Druſius, Cocceius, Michaelis, Schultens. [c] הפחתי afflixi, V. L. dolore affeci, Pagninus; ſo Broughton. [d] Bar Tzemach & alii. [e] באישה herba fœtens, Montanus, Bolducius; ſpina fœtida, Druſius; vitium frugum, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator; labruſca, Cocceius, Schultens.

CHAP. XXXII.

JOB's three friends being ſilenced, and having no more to ſay in reply to him, Elihu of whoſe deſcent ſome account is given, a by-ſtander and hearer of the whole diſpute between them, riſes up as a moderator, and expreſſes ſome warmth both againſt them and Job, ℣. 1—5. he makes an apology for engaging in this controverſy, by reaſon of his youth, and they being advanced in years, ℣. 6, 7. but ſince there is a ſpirit in man, that gives underſtanding to men of every age, and old men are not always wiſe, he deſires they would hearken to him whilſt he delivered his ſentiments on the ſubject in debate, ℣. 8, 9, 10. and hopes to be heard patiently, ſince he had waited until they had ſaid all they had to ſay, and had cloſely attended to it, and which fell ſhort of convincing Job; and this he was obliged to ſay, leſt they ſhould be wiſe in their own conceit, and attribute that to men which belongs to God, ℣. 11, 12, 13. he propoſes to take a new method with Job, different from theirs; and now they hearing all this from a young man, they were filled with amazement, and ſtruck with ſilence; and after he had waited a while to obſerve whether they would ſay any thing or no, he determined to take his turn, and ſhew his opinion alſo, ℣. 14—17. and the rather becauſe he was full of arguments, he was deſirous to propoſe them, and was uneaſy until he had brought them out; and which he was reſolved to do with all impartiality and integrity, ℣. 18—22.

℣. 1. So theſe three men ceaſed to anſwer Job, &c.] His three friends, Eliphaz the Temanite, Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite, who came to viſit and comfort him under his afflictions; but unawares were led into a controverſy with him, occaſioned by ſome raſh and impatient expreſſions of his; which controverſy had been carried on between them a conſiderable time, but now dropped; they grew weary of it, and now reſted themſelves as men do on a ſabbath, as the word ſignifies; they ſet themſelves down, and made no reply to Job's vindication of himſelf, not caring to give themſelves any further trouble, or labour the point any more and longer, perceiving it was all to no purpoſe: or and theſe three men ceaſed, &c. the laſt words of the preceding chapter are, the words of Job are ended; and the copulative and connects theſe with them, and ſhews that theſe men alſo had done ſpeaking; ſo that the diſpute was cloſed between Job and them, and the way was clear for another diſputant that might think fit to enter, as Elihu did after-mentioned: becauſe he was righteous in his own eyes; ſome take this to expreſs the ſtate of the queſtion between them, rendering the words, that he was righteous, &c[f]. The notion his friends had of him was, that he was righteous in his own account, and as he profeſſed to be, and might ſo ſeem to others; but was a wicked man, and an hypocrite, as his afflictions ſhewed; this point they had been labouring to prove, but upon Job's long and clear vindication of his integrity, they ceaſed to defend it: others ſuppoſe the words to be an inference of Job's from their ſilence; therefore he was righteous, &c. they making no reply to him he concluded himſelf to be quit and clear of the charge they had brought againſt him; but they rather, according to our verſion, contain a reaſon why they ceaſed to anſwer him; becauſe they thought him ſelf-conceited, ſelf-willed, obſtinate, and incorrigible; not open to conviction, ſtiffly inſiſting on his own innocence, not allowing that he was guilty of any ſin or ſins, which were the cauſe of his afflictions; otherwiſe in the article of juſtification before God Job was no ſelf-righteous man, nor was he ſo charged by his friends; to ſay he was is to abuſe his character, and is contrary to that which God himſelf has given of him; nor would he have ſo highly commended him as to ſuggeſt there was none like him on earth, when of all men in the world there are none more abominable to God than a ſelf-righteous man; ſee Iſ. lxv. 4. Luke xvi. 15. and xviii. 14. It is contrary to Job's knowledge of and faith in Chriſt, as his living redeemer; Job xix. 25. and to many clear and ſtrong expreſſions, confeſſing his ſin, diſclaiming perfection, and declaring himſelf no ſelf-juſticiary, ch. vii. 20. and ix. 2, 20, 31, 32, 33.

℣. 2. Then was kindled the wrath of Elihu the ſon of Barachel the Buzite, &c.] Both againſt Job and his three friends, for reaſons after given; who this perſon was is not eaſy to ſay; they debaſe him too much, who make him to be Balaam the ſoothſayer, according to the tradition of the Jews[g]; for neither the time he lived in, nor his character will agree with him; this man living before the times of Balaam; and being alſo a holy, good man, which all his diſcourſes ſhew: and they too much exalt him who make him to be Chriſt; for though ſome phraſes being ſtrained, may ſeem to agree with him, and ſome things in the ſignification of his name, and the names of his anceſtors, may be thought to anſwer to him; Elihu ſignifying, my God is he; the ſon of Barachel, the ſon of the bleſſed God; of the kindred of Ram, of the high and holy line; the Buzite, one deſpiſed and reproached; yet there are other things that cannot be ſaid of him, as particularly in ver. 22. and beſides, the Meſſiah ſeems to be ſpoken of by him as another perſon, ch. xxxiii. 23, 24. it is very probable that he was one of Job's relations that was come to viſit him in his melancholy circumſtances, had been a by-ſtander, and an hearer of the whole diſpute between Job and his friends, with the management of which he was not a little diſpleaſed; he is deſcribed by his deſcent, when Job's other three friends are not, becauſe he was a young man, and not known as they were: and this ſerves to ſhew the truth of this hiſtory, that it is not a mere apologue, or fable, but a real fact; though who his father Barachel the Buzite was, cannot eaſily be determined; it is probable he was a deſcendant of Buz, the ſon of Nahor, Abraham's brother, Gen. xxii. 20, 21. of this opinion are Aben Ezra and Ben Gerſom; unleſs it can be thought he was ſo called from the city Buz, of which he might be an inhabitant, mentioned along with Dedan and Tema, places in Edom or Idumea, where or near to which Job lived: of the kindred of Ram; according to the Targum, of the kindred of Abraham, [f] כי הוא צדיק quod ille (tantum) juſtus in oculis ſuis, Schmidt.

[g] T. Hieroſ. Sotah, fol. 20. 4 Hieron. Quæſt. ſeu Traditiones in Gen. fol. 69. D. So Bolducius.

Abraham, in which it is followed by other Jewiſh writers[h]; and ſome even take him to be Iſaac, the ſon of Abraham[i]; Aben Ezra thinks he is the ſame with Ram the father of Amminadab, Ruth iv. 19. but he is abundantly too late for this man to be of his kindred; others take him to be the ſame with Aram, the ſon of Kemuel, a brother of Buz, Gen. xxii. 21. theſe names being uſed for one another, either by adding or removing a letter; ſee Matt. i. 3. compared with Ruth iv. 19. againſt Job was his wrath kindled, becauſe he juſtified himſelf rather than God; not that he made himſelf more juſt than God, he could never think or ſay ſo, ſee ch. iv. 17. nor that he was juſt before him or by him; for he was ſo in an evangelic, though not in a legal ſenſe; and Elihu would not have been diſpleaſed with him, for aſſerting that; he did not deny that Job was a righteous man in the ſight of God; nor that he was righteous, and in the right in the ſight of God, with reſpect to the controverſy between him and his friends; nor did he blame him for juſtifying himſelf from their charges; but that he juſtified himſelf more than God; ſo the Jewiſh writers generally[k] render it; he ſpent more time, and inſiſted longer on his own juſtification, than upon the juſtification of God in the dealings of his providence with him; he was more careful of his own character and reputation than he was of the honour of God, and the glory of his juſtice; he ſaid more for himſelf than he did for God; and this diſpleaſed Elihu; it gave this good man ſome concern, that, though Job did not directly charge God with unrighteouſneſs in his dealings with him, yet by conſequence; and he expreſſed himſelf in ſuch language that would bear ſuch a conſtruction, whether it was his real ſenſe or no; and to hear him complain ſo heavily of God, and at the ſame time enlarge ſo much on his own innocence, and to importune in ſo bold and daring a manner to have a hearing of his cauſe; theſe things being obſerved by Elihu, raiſed his choler and indignation.

℣. 3. Alſo againſt his three friends was his wrath kindled, &c.] He did not take part with either ſide, but blamed both, and took upon him to be a moderator between them, and deal impartially with them: what highly diſpleaſed him, and raiſed his ſpirit againſt the three friends of Job was, becauſe they had found no anſwer; they were at a loſs for one, for a ſufficient one; they had all of them been anſwering him in their turns again and again, but with nothing to the purpoſe, not with any thing concluſive and convincing; and particularly they could find, and give no anſwer to Job's laſt vindication of himſelf: and yet had condemned Job; as a very wicked man, and an hypocrite, for no other reaſon but becauſe he was afflicted; and they ſtill perſiſted in their ſentiment, though Job had ſo fully cleared himſelf, and put them to entire ſilence; this exaſperated Elihu, to obſerve theſe men to retain ſo unreaſonable a ſentiment, to pronounce ſuch a raſh ſentence, and yet could make no reply to Job's defence of himſelf. Jarchi ſays, this place is one of the corrections of the Scribes, it having been formerly written God inſtead of Job; as if the ſenſe was, that Elihu was provoked with them, becauſe by their ſilence they had condemned the Lord, not vindicating his honour and glory as became them; but Aben Ezra declares his ignorance of that correction, and obſerves, that they that ſay ſo, knew what was hid from him.

℣. 4. Now Elihu had waited till Job had ſpoken, &c.] Made an end of ſpeaking, until he had thus expreſſed himſelf, the words of Job are ended; and waited likewiſe until his three friends had ſaid all they had to ſay, and which is here ſuppoſed and implied, as appears by what follows: becauſe they were elder than he; it may be added from the original text, in, or as to days[l]; more days had gone over their heads than over his; they had lived longer in the world than he, and therefore did not take upon him to ſpeak till they had done; he, as became a young man, was ſwift to hear, and ſlow to ſpeak; that they were old men, appears from what Eliphaz ſays, ch. xv. 10.

℣. 5. When Elihu ſaw that there was no anſwer in the mouth of theſe three men, &c.] That could be called an anſwer; nay, when he perceived they were quite nonpluſſed and ſilenced, though men of years and experience, and reputed wiſe and knowing: then his wrath was kindled; his ſpirit was ſtirred up; his heart was hot within him; he burned with anger againſt thoſe men; he was all on fire, as it were, and wanted to vent his reſentment.

℣. 6. And Elihu the ſon of Barachel the Buzite anſwered and ſaid, &c.] Since there was no anſwer in them, he takes upon him to give one himſelf; but firſt makes an apology on account of his youth: I am young, and ye are very old; or few of days; a few days, comparatively ſpeaking, had he lived in the world; or ſmall, or little as to days[m]; he had been but a little time in it, and ſo could be thought to have but little knowledge and experience; whereas they were old, even very old; with them were the aged and the grey-headed, ch. xv. 10. in whom it might have been expected was much wiſdom and knowledge: wherefore I was afraid, and durſt not ſhew mine opinion; declare what knowledge he had of the things in diſpute, leſt it ſhould appear mean, ſmall, and contemptible; or give his ſentiments concerning them, leſt he ſhould ſpeak wrong, and not only give offence, but do more hurt than good: the firſt of theſe words in the Arabic language[n], as Aben Ezra obſerves, ſignifies to go back; it is uſed of worms, which, thro' fear, withdraw themſelves from men; ſo mean an opinion had he of himſelf, and ſuch a ſenſe of his own weakneſs, that it not only kept him back, but even cauſed him to draw back, and keep out of the diſpute, and at a diſtance from it, inſtead of being forward to engage in it: one Jewiſh commentator[o] paraphraſes it "I humbled myſelf as one that goes on his belly;" referring to worms that go low and creep upon their belly, or to the proſtrate poſture of men that humble themſelves to their ſuperiors.

℣. 7. I ſaid, days ſhould ſpeak, &c.] That is, men of days, of many days, who have lived many days and years in the world: man in common is but of few days, even the moſt that men arrive to, are but few; and ſome indeed are very few, in compariſon of whom others may be ſaid to be men of days, or to have lived many days; and to ſuch it belongs to ſpeak, it is their place, nor ſhould they be prevented or interrupted; it ſhould be allowed them to ſpeak, nor ſhould they be hindered; and it is their

[h] Jarchi, Bar Tzemach, &c. Ben Gerſom.
[i] T. Hieroſ. Sotah. fol. 20. 4.
[k] Jarchi, Aben Ezra,
[l] לימים diebus, Beza, Montanus, Mercerus; quod ad dies, Schultens.
[m] צעיר אני לימים minimus ego diebus, Montanus; parvus diebus ſum, Mercerus. receſſit ſuo loco, Caſtel. col. 1036.
[n] رحل
[o] Sephorno.

their duty to ſpeak and inſtruct juniors, and all that are under them; and it might be reaſonably expected, that when they ſpeak it will be to the purpoſe, and to profit and edification: and multitude of years ſhould teach wiſdom; that is, ſuch over whom many years have paſſed; theſe it may be thought, having had an opportunity of making their obſervation on things, and of increaſing experience, and of treaſuring up a ſtock of knowledge, they ſhould be very capable of, and indeed, the only fit perſons to teach others wiſdom; either natural wiſdom, or the knowledge of natural things; or divine wiſdom, the knowledge of God, of his perfections and providences; and inward, ſpiritual, and evangelical wiſdom, which lies in the knowledge of a man's ſelf; in the knowledge of God in Chriſt; in the knowledge of Chriſt and of the goſpel of Chriſt, and the truths of it: this was a ſentiment Elihu had entertained of ancient men, and this had reſtrained him from entering ſooner into this debate between Job and his friends; they all being his ſuperiors in age, and as from thence he judged, in wiſdom and knowledge alſo.

℣. 8. But there is a ſpirit in man, &c.] This ſeems to be a correction of his former ſentiment; the conſideration of which gave him encouragement, though young, to declare his opinion, ſince there is a ſpirit in men, both young and old; and wherever that be, there is an ability to ſpeak, and a capacity of teaching wiſdom; which is not tied to age, but may be found in young men as well as in old men: ſome by this underſtand the rational ſoul, or ſpirit, which is immaterial, immortal, is of God, and is in man; and the rather it is thought this is meant, becauſe it is in every man, whereby he has knowledge of many things, natural and divine, and particularly is capable of trying and judging things, of diſcerning the difference between one thing and another, and of reaſoning and diſcourſing upon them; and this being obſerved by Elihu, and he being conſcious to himſelf of having ſuch a ſpirit in him, was emboldened to engage in the debate, though a young man; but if ſuch a ſpirit is meant, the words may be rendered to ſuch a ſenſe, verily, truly, indeed there is ſuch a rational ſpirit in man, which makes him capable of knowing many things, but the inſpiration of the Almighty, &c [o]. it is not owing to the rational powers and faculties of the ſoul of man, and the uſe of them, that a man becomes capable of teaching others wiſdom; but to his ſoul or ſpirit being inſpired by the Almighty; and ſuch a one be he young or old, that God breathes into, and he is under his inſpiration, he is the man fit to engage in ſuch work: though I rather think, that in this firſt clauſe the Spirit of God is meant, and ſo Jarchi; who is an increated, infinite, and eternal Spirit; is of God, and is put into men; for he is not in men naturally, nor in every one; and where he is, he is given, and there he abides; and it is from him men have their wiſdom and knowledge; it is he that makes men know themſelves, that ſearches the deep things of God, and reveals them to men, and that is the ſpirit of wiſdom and revelation in the knowledge of Chriſt, and leads into all truth, as it is in him; though rather the ſpirit in his gifts, than in his ſpiritual ſaving grace is here meant; and ſo does not point to every good man in common, but to ſuch who are favoured with the gifts of the Spirit ſuperior to others; and ſo the Targum interprets it of the ſpirit of prophecy; and on whomſoever this reſts, whether on young or old, he is fit to teach men wiſdom: and the inſpiration of the Almighty giveth them underſtanding; not the ſoul of man, or breath of God inſpired by him, which is the candle of the Lord, ſearching the inward parts of men; for that leaves him without underſtanding of things of the greateſt importance: rather as the Targum, the Word of God, the eſſential Word, the Son of God, who gives an underſtanding of the beſt things, 1 John, v. 20. but better, the Spirit of God, by whom the ſcriptures were inſpired, and who is breathed into men, John, xx. 21. and is a ſpirit of underſtanding to them; for though a man has an underſtanding of natural things, yet not of things ſpiritual; to have an underſtanding of them is the ſpecial gift of God, and is in particular the work of the Spirit of God: Elihu now having ſome reaſon to believe that he had the Spirit of God, and was under his inſpiration, and was favoured with knowledge and underſtanding by him, is encouraged, though young, to interpoſe in this diſpute between Job and his friends, and declare his opinion on the matter in debate; and which leads him to make an obſervation ſomewhat different from his former ſentiment, as follows.

℣. 9. Great men are not always wiſe, &c.] Men of grandeur and dignity, as Job's friends might be, the rich, the honourable, and noble; the apoſtle is thought to refer to this, at leaſt to expreſs the ſentiment contained in it, 1 Cor. i. 26. or the great in quantity, the many, the multitude; and therefore are not to be followed in principle or practice; or that are great in years, well ſtricken in age, have lived long in the world, ſo ſome verſions [p]; or are doctors, teachers of others, maſters in Iſrael, as Nicodemus, and yet ignorant; all theſe may be wiſe in natural, civil, and worldly things, though this is not always the caſe; but not wiſe and knowing in divine and ſpiritual things, particularly in thoſe reſpecting the cauſes and reaſons of God's providential dealings with men, afflicting the righteous, and ſuffering the wicked to proſper, which is more fully explained in the next clauſe: neither do the aged underſtand judgment; what is right and wrong, the difference between truth and error, and particularly the judgments of God, which are unſearchable, and his ways paſt finding out; even ſo to underſtand them as to obſerve and acknowledge his ſovereignty, wiſdom, truth, and faithfulneſs in them.

℣. 10. Therefore I ſaid, hearken to me, &c.] Thou, O Job, and every one of you his friends, for the word is ſingular; though I am but a young man, yet if I have the Spirit of God, and am under the inſpiration of the Almighty, I may be able to ſay ſomething to you worth your hearing: I alſo will ſhew mine opinion; for though for a while he was timorous and fearful of doing it, leſt he ſhould miſtake and expoſe himſelf, yet having duly weighed and conſidered the above things, he was determined to do it.

℣. 11. Behold I waited for your words, &c.] With great deſire, with great eagerneſs and earneſtneſs, in hope of meeting with arguments fully ſatisfying and convincing; he waited for them, as for the rain, and the latter rain, to be revived, refreſhed freſhed, and edified therewith; and he patiently waited until they had done ſpeaking: I gave ear to your reaſons, or underſtandings[r]; endeavoured to get into the ſenſe and meaning of their words; not only attended to what they did ſay, but to what he thought they meant to ſay: ſome are not ſo happy in their expreſſions; and yet, by what they do ſay, with cloſe attention it may be underſtood what they aim at, what is their drift and deſign; this Elihu was careful to attain unto, not barely to hear their words, but penetrate, if poſſible, into their meaning: whilſt ye ſearched out what to ſay; for they did not make their replies to Job immediately, and ſay what came uppermoſt at once, but they took time to think of things, and to ſearch out for the moſt forcible arguments to refute Job, and ſtrengthen their cauſe; it is very probable they made a pauſe at the end of every ſpeech of Job's, and conſidered what was proper to be ſaid in reply, and perhaps conſulted each other.

[o] So Vatablus, Beza.

[p] רבים πολυχρονιοι, Sept. longævi, V. L. Mr. Broughton renders it "men of not great time may be wiſe, as the old underſtand the right."

℣. 12. Yea, I attended unto you, &c.] Very cloſely, with great application and diligence, endeavouring to get, as it were, within them, and thoroughly underſtand the meaning of what they ſaid: and behold there was none of you that convinced Job; which was not owing to his obſtinacy, but to want of proof in them, their words and arguments; they had charged Job highly, as particularly Eliphaz, ch. xxii. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9. but then they failed in their proof; they produced nothing to ſupport their allegations: or that anſwered his words; the arguments and reaſons he gave in proof of his own innocence and uprightneſs, or the inſtances he produced, ſhewing that God often afflicted good men, and ſuffered the wicked to proſper; and therefore no argument could be drawn from God's dealings with men, proving they were either of this or the other character, good or bad men.

℣. 13. Leſt ye ſhould ſay, we have found out wiſdom, &c.] They were left to themſelves, and not directed to take the proper methods of convincing Job, and anſwering his arguments; leſt they ſhould be wiſe in their own conceits, and attribute too much to themſelves; or Elihu told them this, that they had not convicted Job, though they had condemned him, nor anſwered his arguments, though they had left off ſpeaking; and this he was obliged to ſay, and that for the reaſon before obſerved: for all wiſdom is of God, and not to be found out, or acquired by men; not natural wiſdom, that is not of men, but of God, and eſpecially ſupernatural wiſdom, or the knowledge of divine and ſpiritual things, and the reaſon of God's dealings with the ſons of men in the different manner he does, ſee ch. xxviii. 12, 13. 20. 28. God thruſteth him down, not man: ſome think Elihu ſays this in reference to himſelf, whom God would make uſe of as an inſtrument to convince Job and anſwer his arguments; and that he would aſcribe this not to himſelf but to God; they took a natural way to convince Job, which failed, that they might not be proud of their own wiſdom; he ſhould take a more divine and ſpiritual method, and if he ſucceeded, he ſhould give all the glory to God, and aſcribe nothing to himſelf: as in the converſion of a ſinner, though miniſters are inſtruments, it is not by might or power of men, but by the Spirit of the Lord of hoſts; it is God that thruſts down man from a vain opinion he has of himſelf; that convinces him of ſin, that takes him off of his own righteouſneſs, and humbles him, and lays him low at his feet: but they rather ſeem to be the words of Job's friends, as related by Elihu; and the ſenſe is in connection with the former, either that they found it was the wiſeſt method they could take with Job to be ſilent, and leave him to himſelf, leſt they ſhould add to his affliction; to which Jarchi inclines, who paraphraſes it, "we found wiſdom by our ſilence, that we may'nt provoke him any more;" which, if their ſenſe, ſhews more tenderneſs and compaſſion than they had hitherto expreſſed, and anſwers pretty much to the advice given 2 Cor ii. 6, 7. or elſe their meaning is, that they found it the beſt and wiſeſt way to leave him with God, he being ſo obſtinate and incorrigible, that none but God could move him; it was not in the power of men, or of words uſed by men, to make him ſenſible of things; or rather the meaning is, Elihu was obliged to tell them, that none of them had convinced Job, or anſwered his arguments, leſt they ſhould ſay, we have found out a wiſe and ſtrong argument, proving the charge brought againſt him, that he muſt be a wicked man and an hypocrite, ſince God has ſo ſorely afflicted him, and thruſt him down from all his grandeur and dignity; which no man could ever have done, and God would not, if he had not been the man we ſuppoſe him to be; now Elihu's view is to obſerve to them, that there was nothing in this argument convincing, in which they imagined ſo much wiſdom lay. Job's afflictions indeed were of God, and not men; and which he often owns himſelf; but this was no proof or argument of his being a wicked man: Mr. Broughton renders the words, "The Omnipotent doth toſs him, not man."

℣. 14. Now he hath not directed his words againſt me, &c.] That is, Job had not directed his ſpeech to him, or levelled his arguments againſt him; he had not ſet himſelf and his words in battle array againſt him, as the word ſignifies; he had not laſhed and irritated him as he had them; and therefore he came into the diſpute calm and unprovoked, having nothing in view but truth, the glory of God, and the good of Job; and therefore hoped for better ſucceſs than they had had: neither will I anſwer him with your ſpeeches; he propoſed to take a new and different method from them, as he did; for he never charges Job with any ſin or ſins, or a courſe of living in a ſinful manner, before thoſe afflictions came upon him, and as the cauſe of them; he only takes notice of what was amiſs in him ſince his afflictions, and what dropped from him in the heat of this controverſy, raſh and unbecoming ſpeeches, which reflected upon the honour and juſtice of God; and if he made uſe of any words and arguments ſimilar to their's, yet to another purpoſe, and in a milder and gentler manner.

℣. 15. They were amazed, &c.] They were like perſons thunder-ſtruck, quite ſurprized and aſtoniſhed to hear a young man talk after this manner: they anſwered no more; as they had ceaſed to anſwer Job, they did not undertake to anſwer Elihu, who had plainly told them their arguments were not convincing; their anſwers were no anſwers, and that they had done a wrong thing in condemning Job without proof; and that which they thought their greateſt wiſdom and ſtrongeſt argument, had no wiſdom nor ſtrength in it; namely, which was taken from his ſore afflictions by the hand of God: they left off ſpeaking; or words departed from them, as Jarchi; their ſpeech left them, they ſeemed deprived of it: Mr. Broughton renders the whole, "they ſhrink away, do ſpeak no more, ſpeeches be departed from them."

℣. 16

[r] עד תבונותיכם uſque ad intelligentias veſtras, Pagninus, Montanus, Cocceius, Schultens; uſque ad ſenſa veſtra, Beza. Junius & Tremellius.

℣. 16. When I had waited, &c.] To obſerve whether they would make any reply to what he had ſaid, or any objection to his engaging in the controverſy: for they ſpake not; were as mute as fiſhes, but ſtood ſtill, like ſtatues, had no power to move, neither to ſit down nor to depart, but were as if all life, ſenſe, and motion were gone from them: and anſwered no more; or not at all; for it does not appear that they had given him any anſwer before, as well as not now.

℣. 17. I ſaid I will anſwer alſo my part, &c.] Or take his turn in giving an anſwer to Job; what they had given being quite inſufficient and unſuitable: I alſo will ſhew mine opinion; knowledge, or ſentiment; this for a while he was fearful of doing, but upon a thorough and ſerious conſideration of things, he determined upon it, and now repeats it, to aſſure he would do it; the reaſons of which follow.

℣. 18. For I am full of matter, &c.] Or full of words [y]; not of mere words, ſuch that have nothing ſolid and ſubſtantial in them; this is the character of a fool, Eccl. x. 14. nor was Elihu a loquacious, talkative man, as Job is charged to be, a man full of talk, ch. xi. 2. but he was full of words, which had fulneſs of matter in them, which were to the purpoſe, and contained ſtrong reaſonings and ſolid arguments; his mind was full of them, and he could eaſily fill his mouth with them, and was not eaſy until he had uttered them: ſo an able miniſter of the word may be ſaid to be full of words, of the wholſome words of our Lord Jeſus, of uſeful doctrines, when the word of Chriſt dwells richly in him, and he has a rich treaſure in an earthen veſſel, is full of the bleſſing of the goſpel of Chriſt; has a large knowledge of goſpel-truths, a real experience of them in the heart, great gifts to expreſs them to others, and is full of power and of the Spirit of God, to declare them as this good man was: the Spirit within me conſtraineth me, or the ſpirit of my belly [z]; alluding to wind pent up therein, which, unleſs expelled, gives great uneaſineſs and pain: he either means the Spirit of God within him, as in ver. 8. by whom the prophets were inſpired and ſpoke, by whom ordinary miniſters of the word are qualified for their work, and by whom they are led into all truth, and who preſſes and obliges them to ſpeak what they know; there is a neceſſity upon them to preach the goſpel wholly and faithfully, and a woe unto them if they do not: or elſe his own ſpirit, influenced and actuated by the Spirit of God; as the ſpirit of the apoſtle Paul was ſtirred up in him to ſpeak, when he ſaw the idolatry and ſuperſtition of the people of Athens, Acts xvii. 16. ſo love to God and Chriſt, and the ſouls of men, the honour of God, and intereſt of religion, conſtrain the miniſters of Chriſt to ſpeak in his name, notwithſtanding all the oppoſition made unto them, and reproach caſt upon them.

℣. 19. Behold my belly is as wine, which hath no vent, &c.] Or, is not opened [a], like a bottle of wine, as Ben Gerſom, which is ſtopt cloſe, and the wine in it new; which is moſt apt to ferment, and ſhould have vent given it; ſo the Targum, "as "new wine, which is not opened:" in the ſame manner Jarchi and Bar Tzemach interpret it; in theſe words, Elihu illuſtrates by a metaphor taken from new wine put into bottles and cloſe ſtopt, what he had before more literally and properly expreſſed, and ſo in the following clauſe: it is ready to burſt like new bottles; or perhaps it may be better rendered, like bottles of new wine [b]; for new bottles are not ſo apt to burſt as old ones, and eſpecially when they have new wine in them; the bottles of the ancients, and in the eaſtern countries, being made of ſkin, which better agrees with what our Lord ſays, Matt. ix. 17. by his belly he means his mind, which was full of matter, and that matter he compares to new wine in bottles, cloſely ſtopped, which need vent, and are in danger of burſting: the doctrine of the goſpel is like to wine, Cant. vii. 9. to wine neat and clean, being free from all human mixtures; to wine of a good flavour and pleaſant taſte, as the goſpel is to thoſe whoſe taſte is changed; to generous wine, which revives, and refreſhes, and comforts; all which effects the doctrines of the goſpel have, when attended with a divine influence: and it may be compared to new wine; not that it is a new and upſtart doctrine, it is the everlaſting goſpel, made known immediately on the fall of Adam, and was ordained before the world for our glory; but becauſe it is newly, or of late under the goſpel-diſpenſation, more clearly revealed: miniſters of the word are like veſſels, into which it is put; they are but veſſels, even earthly veſſels, and have nothing but what is put into them; and they are like veſſels ſtopped up, when they are ſtraitened in themſelves, or ſhut up by the Lord, that they cannot come forth freely in their miniſtry, and when any outward reſtraint is laid upon them by perſecuting magiſtrates, and when there is no open door for them in providence; which gives them great pain and uneaſineſs, and let the conſequence be what it will, they are weary of forbearing, and cannot ſtay, but muſt ſpeak the things they ſee and know; ſee Jer. xx. 9. Acts iv. 18, 20.

℣. 20. I will ſpeak that I may be refreſhed, &c.] That his mind might be made eaſy; the matter it was full of lay with much weight upon it, preſſed him hard, and gave him pain; and therefore he determines to ſpeak his mind, and diſburthen himſelf: ſo a miniſter of the word ſpeaks ſometimes to the refreſhment of others, the goſpel being a word in ſeaſon to weary ſouls, bread to the hungry, drink to the thirſty, even wine to them that are of an heavy heart; and eſpecially it is refreſhing when the love of God is ſhed abroad in the heart through it, and the preſence of God is enjoyed under it; and ſometimes he ſpeaks to the refreſhment of himſelf with others, Rom. xv. 32. and whether it be ſo, one or the other, yet a faithful miniſter eaſes his mind, diſcharges his conſcience, and is clear from the blood of all, when he truly and fully declares the whole counſel of God, ſo far as he is acquainted with it: I will open my lips and anſwer; ſpeak freely and boldly what was upon his mind, and he had to ſay, and which he judged would be a ſufficient anſwer to Job; the opening of his lips is a phraſe uſed by him in alluſion to the opening of a bottle, full of new wine, the metaphor before expreſſed by him.

℣. 21. Let me not I pray you accept any man's perſon, &c.] Neither the perſon of Job, becauſe of his poverty and affliction, indulging too much to pity and commiſeration, and affecting to get a good name from others for it; nor the perſon of his three three friends, on account of their wealth and grandeur; for neither the persons of the poor, nor of the rich, are to be regarded in judgment, or in the decision of any matter between them, but truth and justice are to be attended to; see Exod. xxiii. 3. Lev. xix. 15. Elihu was determined with himself not to respect the person of any, and he hopes that Job and his friends would bear with him, and excuse him on that account: neither let me give flattering titles unto men; he does not mean titles of civil honour and respect, which belong to men, and are in common use among men, according to the different stations of life men are in; for honour is to be given to whom it is due; and it is no piece of flattery to give men their proper and usual titles, as it was not in the evangelist Luke, and in the apostle Paul, Luke i. 3. Acts xxvi. 25. but he means such titles that don't belong to men, and are unsuitable unto them, and only given them by way of flattery; as to call a man wise and prudent when he is the reverse; or a holy, just, and good man, when he is a very wicked one. Elihu was resolved not to act such a part, and he hopes the persons he had to deal with would not take it amiss that he spake his mind plainly and freely, and called a spade a spade; nor must they or any other expect to be complimented by him with the characters of wise and prudent, just and good, if they did not appear to him to be so. According to Ben Gersom the sense is, that he would not hide a man's name under epithets, but call him by his proper name; he would not do as they had done by Job, who under covert names meant him; as when they described a wicked man, and an hypocrite, designed him, but did not say so in express words; now Elihu suggests, that should Job or they appear to him to have acted a wrong part, he should tell them plainly of it, and say thou art the man.

[y] מלתי מלים plenus ſum ſermonibus, V. L. Pagninus, Montanus, Tigurine verſion, Beza, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator. [z] רוח בטני ſpiritus ventris mei, Beza, Junius & Tremellius, Cocceius, Schultens.
[a] לא יפתח quod non eſt apertum, Pagninus, Michaelis, Schultens. [b] כאבות חדשים ſicut utres vino novo repleti, Piſcator.

℣. 22. For I know not to give flattering titles, &c.] He had not been brought up in such a manner, nor taught to use them; he had not been inured to them, nor did he know or approve of them; nor could he in conscience give them. In so doing, my maker would soon take me away; it being such a piece of wickedness, so abominable to him, and so highly resented by him, that I might justly expect he would, as he could, strike me dead at once; just as Ananias and Sapphira were struck dead for lying: or he knew that it would be but a short time at most, and he should be taken out of the world by death, when he must appear before his maker, his judge, to whom he must give an account of his words, as well as actions; the awe of this being continually on his mind, would not admit him to flatter any man. Some render it will burn me[c], as in 2 Sam. v. 21. so Aben Ezra and Ben Gersom, that is, in hell-fire; see Ps. xii. 2, 3.

CHAP. XXXIII.

IN this chapter Elihu addresses Job himself, and intreats his attention to what he had to say to him, and offers several things to induce him to it; and recommends himself as one that was according to his wish, in the stead of God, a man like himself, and of whom he had no reason to be afraid, ℣. 1—7. and then he brings a charge against him of things which he himself had heard, of words that had dropped from him in the course of his controversy with his friends; in which he too much and too strongly insisted on his own innocence and purity, and let fall very undue and unbecoming reflections on the dealings of God with him, ℣. 8—11. to which he gives an answer by observing the superior greatness of God to man, and his sovereignty over him, not being accountable to him for any thing done by him; and therefore man should be silent and submissive to him, ℣. 12, 13. and yet though he is so great and so absolute, and uncontroulable, and is not obliged to give an account of his affairs to man, and the reasons of them; yet he condescends by various ways and means to instruct him in his mind and will, and even by those very things complained of; and therefore should not be treated as if unkind and unfriendly to men; sometimes he does it by dreams and visions, when he opens the ears of men, and seals instruction to them, and with this view to restrain them from their evil purposes and doings, and to weaken their pride and humble them, and preserve them from ruin, ℣. 14—18. and sometimes by chastening and afflictive providences, which are described ℣. 19—22. and which become teaching ones; through the interposition of a divine messenger, and upon the afflicted man's prayer to God, and humiliation before him, God is gracious and favourable to him, and delivers him; which is frequently the design and the use that he makes of chastening dispensations, ℣. 23—30. and the chapter is concluded with beseeching Job to mark and consider well what had been said unto him, and to answer it if he could or thought fit; if not, silently to attend to what he had further to say to him for his instruction, ℣. 31, 32, 33.

℣. 1. Wherefore Job I pray thee hear my speeches, &c.] In the preceding chapter, Elihu directed his discourse to the three friends of Job chiefly, here to Job himself, and that by name; which none of his friends in all their discourses ever used; and in an humble suppliant manner intreats his attention to what he was about to deliver, and that for reasons which his address to his friends could furnish him with; and hence begins his speech with wherefore, seeing he took not the part of his three friends, but blamed them; and because he had the Spirit of God in him, and was full of matter, and uneasy until he had vented it; and which he proposed to deliver in a plain and faithful manner, with sincerity and without flattery; on all which accounts he beseeches him to give him a diligent and attentive hearing: and hearken to all my words; not to some of them only, but to all; he bespeaks his candid and constant attention, that he would hear him out, all that he had to say, with patience, and without interruption; and then judge of the truth, force, and pertinency of them; which he would not so well be able to do, unless he heard them all; for sometimes the proof, the evidence, and demonstration of a thing depends not on a single argument, but upon many put together; each of them alone being insufficient, at least may appear so, when all considered together give full satisfaction.

℣. 2.

[c] ישאנני comburet me, Pagninus.

℣. 2. Behold now I have opened my mouth, &c.] Begun to ſpeak in order to give vent to the fulneſs of matter within him, which made him, like bottles of new wine, ready to burſt; and ſince he had opened his lips, that he might ſpeak and be refreſhed, he deſires Job to liſten to him, and offers ſome things to his conſideration to induce him to it: my tongue hath ſpoken in my mouth; but does not every man's tongue ſpeak in his mouth when he ſpeaks? is there any thing ſingular and peculiar in this, that can excite attention? it may be rendered, in my palate[d]; which, as it is an inſtrument of ſpeech, ſo of taſting and trying food, ſee ch. vi. 30. and xii. 11. and Elihu's ſenſe is, that he had thoroughly conſidered what he ſhould ſay, he had well weighed what he ſhould ſpeak, and ſhould not deliver any thing raw, crude, and indigeſted; he had palated his words, in order to diſcern whether there was any thing in them perverſe or no.

℣. 3. My words ſhall be of the uprightneſs of my heart, &c.] Nor that the uprightneſs of his heart, or his own perſonal integrity, ſhould be the ſubject of his diſcourſe; but what he ſhould ſay would be in or out of the uprightneſs of his heart, with all ſincerity and faithfulneſs; what would be the real ſentiments of his mind, and not proceed from a double or inſincere heart: and my lips ſhall utter knowledge clearly; what knowledge he had of God, and of the perfections of his nature, and of his works in nature and grace, and of his dealings in a providential way with the ſons of men; and what knowledge he had of Chriſt, his perſon, office, and grace, ſomewhat of which he ſpeaks in this chapter; and ſuch ſort of knowledge is to be uttered, to be publiſhed, and made known to the good of others; and not to be concealed, and hid, or held as in a priſon in unrighteouſneſs; and to be uttered clearly, plainly, and diſtinctly, in words intelligible, and eaſy to be underſtood; and not in ambiguous terms, or in words of a double meaning; or which are abſtruſe and intricate, and ſerve rather to make the myſteries of providence and grace more dark and obſcure, than to explain them; integrity of heart, and perſpicuity of language, ſerve much to recommend a ſpeaker, and both are expreſſed in this verſe.

℣. 4. The Spirit of God hath made me, &c.] As a man; ſo every man is made by God, and not by himſelf; Father, Son, and Spirit, are his Makers or Creators, as we read of them in the plural number, Pſ. cxlix. 2. Eccl. xii. 1. and this is a proof of the deity of the Spirit, who was not only concerned in the creation of all things, garniſhing the heavens, and moving upon the face of the waters on the earth, but in the formation of man: and the breath of the Almighty hath given me life; the ſame with the Spirit of God, the alluſion is to the creation of man at firſt, when God breathed into him the breath of life, and he became a living ſoul: life natural is from God, he is the God of our life, he gives all the mercies of life, and by him is this life preſerved; and the whole is the effect of Almighty power: now this is obſerved by Elihu to Job, to encourage him to attend to him without fear, ſince he was a man, a creature of God, as he was: it may be underſtood of his ſpiritual formation, the Spirit of God re-makes men, or makes them new men, new creatures; this is done in regeneration, which is the work of the holy Spirit; hence regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghoſt, are put together; and being a work of almighty power, is a proof of the deity of the Spirit of God; it is he that quickens men when dead in treſpaſſes and ſins, and makes them alive to God; which appears by their ſpiritual breathings after divine things, and by the exerciſe of their ſpiritual ſenſes, and by their performance of ſpiritual actions; and now Elihu, being a man regenerated and quickened by the Spirit, might more juſtly claim the attention of Job, ſince what he ſhould ſay was what he had heard, felt, and ſeen, as a good man, one that had an experience of divine and ſpiritual things.

℣. 5. If thou can'ſt anſwer me, &c.] That is, when he had done ſpeaking, after he had heard him out; if he thought he could make a reply to him, he gave him full liberty ſo to do, and tacitly ſuggeſts that he ſhould give him an attentive and candid hearing, as he had requeſted of him: ſet thy words in order before me; put them into the beſt form and order thou canſt for thy ſelf-defence, and level them at me; ſet them, as it were, in battel-array againſt me; give them all the poignancy, ſtrength, and force thou art capable of: ſtand up; not out of veneration to him, but to denote freedom and boldneſs in himſelf; a preſentation of himſelf with boldneſs, and ſtanding and keeping his ground: the expreſſions are military; Mr. Broughton renders it, ſtand to it.

℣. 6. Behold I am according to thy wiſh in God's ſtead, &c.] So ſome perſons are, as civil magiſtrates, the miniſters of the Word, the prophets of the Old Teſtament, and the apoſtles of the New; ſee 2 Cor. v. 20. and ſo in ſome ſenſe was Elihu; he undertakes to be an advocate for God, to vindicate his juſtice in his dealings with the children of men, and clear him from the charge of ſeverity towards them, and hard uſage of them, and particularly Job; and whom he beſought, as in God's ſtead, to be reconciled to his providential dealings with him; to bear his afflictions patiently, and wait the iſſue of them: or I am as thou art; ſo the Targum and Ben Gerſom interpret it; one that belongs to God, a creature of God's, a ſinful frail mortal creature, as Job was, and accountable to God; one that belonged to him both as the God of nature and providence, and of grace; and ſuch an one Job ſeemed to have wiſhed for, to diſpute the point in queſtion with; ſee ch. ix. 32, 33. I alſo am formed out of the clay; or cut out[e] of it; alluding to the potter, who out of a maſs or lump of clay before him, cuts a piece out of it, to make a veſſel of. God is the potter, men are as clay in his hands, their bodies are bodies of clay, houſes of clay, which have their foundation in the duſt; reference may be had to the original formation of man, and may denote not ſo much the pollution of his nature, clay being defiling, but the frailty of man, a veſſel made of clay being brittle, and eaſily broken; ſee ch. iv. 19. and x. 9. and xiii. 12. Iſ. lxiv. 8.

℣. 7. Behold my terror ſhall not make thee afraid, &c.] To come near, join iſſue in a debate, and ſpeak freely; this Job had wiſhed for, and deſired of God that his fear might not terrify him, and his dread not make him afraid, and then he could talk and reaſon freely with him, ch. ix. 34, 35. and xiii. 21, 22. now Job had nothing to fear from Elihu, he was a man and not God, with whom there was no terrible majeſty, as with God; he was was but a clod of clay, and had nothing in him or about him to ſtrike terror into him; he was no great perſonage, as a king or prince, nor in any civil authority, nor had ſo much as age to command an awe, much leſs could inject dread and terror: neither ſhall my hand be heavy upon thee; which is not to be literally underſtood; Job could be in no fear of that, nor Elihu guilty of ſuch rudeneſs; but figuratively, that he ſhould not ſeek to afflict and diſtreſs him, or add to his affliction, and make it heavier, by hard words, ſevere reflections, and cruel reproaches; he ſeems to refer to ch. xiii. 21. the Targum is, "my burden upon thee ſhall not be heavy;" he promiſes not to aggravate things, but make them as eaſy as they would admit of.

[d] בחכי in palato meo, Pagninus, Montanus, Tigurine verſion, Beza, Schultens; ſo Mr. Broughton.

[e] קריצתי exciſus, Montanus, Munſter, Mercerus, Cocceius, Michaelis.

℣. 8. Surely thou haſt ſpoken in mine hearing, &c.] After the above preface, Elihu proceeds to the point in hand, and enters a charge againſt Job; which he took up, not upon ſuſpicion, and ſurmiſings, nor upon report, nor upon accuſations received from others, but what he had heard with his own ears, unleſs he was greatly miſtaken indeed, which he thought he was not: and I have heard the voice of thy words; the ſound of them, clearly and diſtinctly, and took in the ſenſe of them, as he really believed, ſaying as follows.

℣. 9. I am clean without tranſgreſſion, &c.] This with what follows is ſuppoſed to be gathered from ch. x. 6, 7. and xiii. 23. and xxvii. 5, 6. for this is no where ſaid by Job in expreſs words; though I rather think ſince Elihu ſo peremptorily affirms that they were ſpoken in his hearing, that theſe words and the following did drop from Job's lips, in the controverſy with his friends, though not recorded; for we are not to ſuppoſe that every thing that was ſaid on both ſides is preſerved, only ſo much as the Holy Ghoſt thought fit ſhould be: no man is naturally clean, or free from ſin; man came clean out of the hands of God, by ſin is become unclean. This impurity is propagated by natural generation, and is in all without exception. Job expreſſes himſelf clearly on this point, and agreeable to it, ch. xiv. 4. nor is any man clean by and of himſelf, or through any thing he is capable of doing in a moral, ceremonial, or evangelic ſenſe, to make himſelf clean; as by moral actions, by ceremonial ablutions and ſacrifices, or by ſubmiſſion to evangelic ordinances, or even by his own tears, repentance, and humiliation. Job ſeemed clearly and fully ſenſible of this, ch. ix. 30, 31. ſee Prov. xx. 9. Jer. ii. 22. yet there are ſome perſons that are clean through the blood of Chriſt, in which they are waſhed, and which cleanſes from all ſin; and through the righteouſneſs of Chriſt imputed to them, in which they appear without ſpot or wrinkle, or any ſuch thing; and through the ſentence of juſtification pronounced on them, by which word ſpoken they are all clean; and through the grace of God beſtowed on them, the clean water that is ſprinkled upon them, by which they are cleanſed from all filthineſs; and hence ſaid to have clean hearts, and clean hands; and if Job meant it in this ſenſe, as he had knowledge of his living Redeemer, he no doubt was ſuch a one: but not without tranſgreſſion; without tranſgreſſion imputed he was, and ſuch are all they whoſe perſons are juſtified, and their ſins pardoned; to thoſe God does not impute ſin, Pſ. xxxii. 1, 2. but they are not without the being nor commiſſion of ſin; for no man, even the beſt of men, are clear of it in this ſenſe. Job might be free from the groſſer ſins of life, but not from indwelling ſin, and the actings of it; we find him confeſſing ſin, and diſclaiming perfection, ch. vii. 20. and ix. 20. I am innocent; ſo he was, as to the charges brought againſt him by his friends, or the things it was inſinuated he was guilty of, as hypocriſy, &c. or as to doing any injury to the perſons and properties of men, or with reſpect to groſs enormities, from which he had ſufficiently cleared himſelf in ch. xxxi. but not ſo innocent as to be free from all ſin, as Adam was in his ſtate of innocence, which is contrary to his own declarations in the paſſages before referred to; ſome, as Aben Ezra obſerves, interpret the word covered[f], and as having the ſame ſenſe with Pſ. xxxii. 1. and in which ſenſe it was true of Job, that his iniquities were covered; and others of his being covered with righteouſneſs; with civil righteouſneſs, as in ch. xxix. 14. which was true of the exerciſe of it; and in an evangelic ſenſe he was covered with the juſtifying righteouſneſs of Chriſt; the Targum renders the word waſhed, as he was in a ſpiritual ſenſe. Jarchi interprets it wiped or rubbed, and others combed and bruſhed, and ſo neat and clean, which is the ſenſe of ſeveral verſions[g]: neither is there iniquity in me; in a goſpel-ſenſe there is none in believers in Chriſt; their iniquities being removed from them to him, and are done away, and made an end of by him; nor are they to be ſeen with the eye of vindictive juſtice; God has caſt them behind his back, and into the depths of the ſea, never to be ſeen more; but then there is iniquity in them, as conſidered in themſelves; for men to ſay they have none, ſhews pride and ignorance, and is inconſiſtent with the truth of grace. If Job is to be underſtood in theſe expreſſions in an evangelical ſenſe, or with reſpect to the groſſer ſins of life, or a vicious courſe of life; and indeed in no other ſenſe can he well be underſtood conſiſtent with himſelf; he is not to be blamed for what he ſaid, and I apprehend that Elihu does not blame him for ſaying theſe things in his own defence; but for inſiſting ſo much and ſo long upon his innocence and purity, and unſpotted life; and eſpecially for joining with it undue and unbecoming reflections on the Lord, for afflicting a perſon ſo holy and righteous, as follows.

℣. 10. Behold, he findeth occaſions againſt me, &c.] That is, ſought in order to find them; ſo Job in ſome places ſuggeſts, that God enquired after his ſins, and ſought diligently after them, that he might have ſomething to bring againſt him; and becauſe he could not find great ſins, groſs enormities, he ſought after leſſer ſins; ſo ſome render the word, ſtaggerings, totterings[h]; frailties, failings, and infirmities; and becauſe he could find none of late of a very heinous nature, he went back as far as the ſins of his youth; ſee ch. x. 6. and xiii. 26. and this in order to pick a quarrel with him; and ſo Mr. Broughton renders the words, lo, he picketh quarrels againſt me; or that he might have juſt reaſon to depart from him, or to break from him, or to break off friendſhip with him, or to break him to pieces in his eſtate, family, and health; all which ſenſes ſome obſerve the words will bear: but it it would be needleſs for God to ſeek in order to find occaſions againſt men; there is enough ready at hand, the ſins that are about them; and to repreſent the Lord as dealing thus with good men, is to repreſent him as acting contrary to the declarations and methods of his grace; yea, as doing what wicked men do to good men, as the enemies of David, Daniel, and Jeremiah, did to them; nay, even as Satan himſelf does, who goes about and ſeeks for, and picks up accuſations againſt the ſaints; this muſt be owned to be a very irreverent and unbecoming expreſſion of Job's, and for which he deſerved to be ſharply rebuked, as well as for ſome following ones, and for which he afterwards was thoroughly humbled: he counteth me for his enemy; this he had often ſaid, but very wrongly; ſee ch. xiii. 24. and xvi. 9. and xix. 11. and the notes there.

[f] חף tectus, Montanus, Bolducius. [g] Mundus, Beza; nitidus, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator; terſus, Codurcus, Cocceius. [h] תנועות vacillationes, Cocceius; aut mutationes, Michaelis.

℣. 11. He putteth my feet in the ſtocks, &c.] This alſo he had ſaid, ch. xiii. 27. by which he would ſuggeſt not only that his afflictions were painful and diſgraceful, and from which he could not extricate himſelf, being cloſe fettered by them; but that they were inflicted on him as puniſhments, and he was treated as a criminal, as a malefactor, who had been guilty of ſome notorious breach of the law: he marketh all my paths; looked narrowly at them, numbered and counted them; this alſo he had ſaid, ch. xiii. 27. and xiv. 16. and xxxi. 4. meaning not only his natural and civil paths and ſteps, but his moral ones, that he could not ſtep the leaſt awry, but preſently it was marked and obſerved, ch. x. 14. but though God does take notice of the ſins of his people, and chaſtiſes them for them, yet he does not mark them in ſtrict juſtice, for ſhould he, they could not ſtand before him, Pſ. cxxx. 3.

℣. 12. Behold, in this thou art not juſt, &c.] Here begins Elihu's anſwer, who does not deny that Job was a juſt man, both before God in an evangelic ſenſe, and before men in a moral ſenſe; he did not go about to detract from Job's general character, as a man that lived ſoberly, righteouſly, and godly in the world; but in this he was not juſt, nor is it to be juſtified, with reſpect to this thing, he could not acquit him of doing what was wrong; namely, inſiſting ſo much on his own innocence, and tacking therewith ſuch unbecoming and undue reflections on the dealings of God with him; he did not give to God his due, he did not do him juſtice in repreſenting him in this light; he did not ſay nor do the right thing, ſo Mr. Broughton tranſlates the words, "lo, here thou art not in the right;" ſee ch. xxxii. 2. I will anſwer thee; or I muſt tell thee; as the ſame writer renders the words, being able to make it clear and plain: that God is greater than man; than any man, than the greateſt of men, moſt famous for power, wiſdom, or juſtice; he is not only greater in his power, faithfulneſs, goodneſs, grace, and mercy, but in his holineſs and righteouſneſs, wiſdom and knowledge; and therefore can never do either an unjuſt thing, or an unwiſe one; and for man, who is both ſinful and ignorant, even the beſt in compariſon of him, to arraign him at his bar, is very arrogant and preſumptuous; ſince he knows beſt what to do, and what are his reaſons for ſo doing, and is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works.

℣. 13. Why doſt thou ſtrive againſt him? &c.] A creature againſt the Creator, a man againſt his Maker, the clay againſt the potter; how abſurd and ſtupid is this? and a piece of weakneſs and folly it was in him to deſire to litigate the point with God, and diſpute with him, as he often did, when men cannot anſwer him one of a thouſand, as he himſelf owned, ch. ix. 3, 4. and very ſinful and criminal it is to chide with God, or complain of him, on account of any of his dealings with the ſons of men, as well as it is vain and fruitleſs: for he giveth not account of any of his matters; he is a ſovereign being, and does what he pleaſes in nature, providence, and grace, and is not accountable to any for what he does; in things temporal, he does all after the counſel of his will; he beſtows riches and honours, wealth and health, gifts of natural wiſdom and knowledge on ſome, and withholds them from others; and each of theſe are his own, and he may do with them as he pleaſes: ſo likewiſe in things ſpiritual, he loves, chuſes, redeems, regenerates, calls by his grace, and brings to glory whom he thinks fit; the bleſſings of grace and glory are his own, and he diſpoſes of them as ſeems good in his ſight; and in all reſpects he acts according to his will in heaven and in earth; none can ſtay his hand, or hinder him from doing his pleaſure; and none ought to ſay to him, what doſt thou? or why doſt thou thus? or if they do, he is not obliged to give any reaſons for his ſo doing. Some take this to be the thing Job ſtrove and contended with God about, that he did not, and becauſe he did not give an account of all his matters, or anſwer all his words; and particularly he did not ſhew to him wherefore he contended with him; and others think the meaning is, that God does not reveal all his ſecrets to men, but only as much as he thinks fit to acquaint them with; ſecret things belong to him, and things revealed to men; the ſecrets of his own nature, and the modes of ſubſiſtence of the divine perſons in the godhead, the ſecret reaſons of divine predeſtination of men to life or death, and of his dealings with men in a providential way, afflicting the righteous, and ſuffering the wicked to proſper.

℣. 14. For God ſpeaketh once, yea twice, &c.] Or, but God ſpeaketh [1]; though he is not bound to give an account of his matters, and the reaſons of his proceedings in a way of providence or grace; yet ſuch is his condeſcenſion and goodneſs, that he makes uſe of various ways and means to make known his mind and will in his diſpenſations, if men were but attentive to them; he ſpeaks once, in dreams and viſions, as in the following verſe; and twice, or a ſecond time, by chaſtiſements, as in ℣. 18. or he ſpeaks frequently, again and again, ſee Pſ. lxii. 11. gives line upon line, and precept upon precept; if one way is without effect, he'll take another; and if one warning and admonition is not ſufficient, he'll give another; ſo that tho' he is a ſovereign being, and not accountable to any, yet he does not act the unkind and unfriendly part Job had ſuggeſted: yet man perceiveth it not; the voice of God ſpeaking in one way or another; hearkens not to the admonition given in a dream or viſion, nor hears the chaſtizing rod, and him that has appointed it; he is deaf to all inſtructions; he underſtands not the mind and meaning of God in his diſpenſations; which is not owing to want of means of knowledge, but to the blindneſs and ignorance of his mind, to dulneſs of hearing, to negligence and inattention, and to the prevalence of ſin and corruption: the words, yet man, are a ſupplement plement to the text, and not in it, and ſome verſions are without it, and underſtand the whole of God, rendering the words thus, God ſpeaketh once, and a ſecond time he does not repeat it; ſo the Vulgate Latin, Syriac, and Arabic verſions: or does not reviſe it, or will not ſee it [k]; to which agrees the Targum, "and a ſecond time he needs not to look upon it;" and which rendering as it ſuits with the context, ſo is more agreeable to the accents; but is differently applied, by ſome to the ſufficiency of the word of God, that God has at once made known all truth, and there is no need to do it a ſecond time; but certain it is, that God did at ſundry times, and in divers manners, ſpeak unto the fathers by the prophets; though indeed in theſe laſt days he hath ſpoken at once all his mind and will by his Son, ſo that no future revelation is to be expected; but though this is true now, it was not in the times of Elihu: by others it is referred to God's dealings with a proud man, that calls him to an account for his actions, to whom he ſpeaks once, and reproves him for his boldneſs; but a ſecond time he'll not look at him, nor bear his pride and inſolence: and by others to the unalterable decrees and purpoſes of God; what he has ſaid or determined in his eternal mind is done at once, and remains invariably fixed; he has no need to look over a ſecond time, or reviſe his firſt thoughts and deſigns, or conſider them, whether it is proper to make any alteration in them or no, they are at once ſo wiſely formed; and he has all things before him in one view in his all-comprehending mind, ſo that there cannot poſſibly any thing turn up unforeſeen by him, to hinder the execution of his purpoſes, or cauſe him to make any change in them; no new thoughts, reſolutions, or purpoſes can ariſe in his mind, with whom there is no variableneſs, nor ſhadow of turning. This agrees well with his ſovereignty expreſſed in the preceding verſe, and carries in it a ſtrong reaſon enforcing what is there ſaid. Though ſome take the meaning to be this, that God ſpeaks once to a man, and admoniſhes and reproves him as he uſed to do, in the way expreſſed in the following verſe; and if he regards it not, he don't ſpeak to him a ſecond time in that way, or no more by words, but now by blows or chaſtiſements.

[1] כי ſed, Beza, Piſcator.

℣. 15. In a dream, in a viſion of the night, &c.] That is, God ſpeaks to men in this way, and which in thoſe times was his moſt uſual way; ſee ch. iv. 12, 13. ſometimes he ſpake to a prophet, a perſon in public office, and made known his mind and will in this manner to him, that he might deliver it to others, Numb. xii. 6. and ſometimes directly and immediately to perſons themſelves, as he did to Abimelech and Laban, Gen. xx. 3. and xxxi. 24. when deep ſleep falleth upon men, in ſlumbrings upon the bed; the former denotes a faſt, heavy, and ſound ſleep, when the ſenſes are all locked up, and there is not the leaſt attention to any outward object; the latter a ſlight ſleep, when a man is between ſleeping and waking; and now at ſuch a time, when he was laid on his bed in the night-ſeaſon, it was uſual for God to come to him in a viſionary way, and impreſs things on his mind; when it was called off from worldly and earthly thoughts and cares, and was calm and ſerene, and ſo fit to receive what intimations and inſtructions might be given this way; ſee Pſ. iv. 4. Job had his dreams and night-viſions, though he ſeems not to have had any benefit by them, or to have underſtood them, but was ſcared and terrified with them, ch. vii. 14. to which Elihu may have ſome reſpect.

℣. 16. Then he openeth the ears of men, &c.] Not the ears of his body, which remaining ſhut whilſt things are preſented to his mind in a dream or viſion, but his internal ears; it is the ſame with opening the heart or underſtanding to attend to and receive the things delivered in this viſionary way: and ſealeth their inſtruction; ſets home the inſtruction given in this manner, and imprints it upon the mind, ſo that it is well remembered when awake, not only the dreams themſelves, but the leſſons taught and learnt there, as may be obſerved in the caſes of Abimelech and Laban; the word ſignifies chaſtiſement [l] as well as inſtruction, that being one way in which God teaches and inſtructs men, Pſ. xciv. 12. and ſo the ſenſe may be that God in a dream or viſion makes it known to men, that if they regard not what he ſays to them, and repent not of their evils, and turn from them, he will correct and chaſtiſe them, and this he aſſures them of; and they may look for the certain performance of it, that he will viſit their tranſgreſſions with a rod, and their iniquities with ſtripes; things that are ſealed being ſure and firm: Mr. Broughton renders the words, and imprinteth why they are chaſtiſed.

℣. 17. That he may withdraw man from his purpoſe, &c.] Or work [m], his wicked work, as the Targum; either which he has begun upon, or which he deſigned to do. Thus Abimelech and Laban were reſtrained from their intentions by a divine admonition in a dream, the one from taking Abraham's wife, as he intended, and the other from doing hurt to Jacob, which he deſigned: and hide pride from man; by pardoning his ſins, in which there is always pride, ſo ſome; pardon of ſin being expreſſed by covering it, Pſ. xxxii. 1. or rather by repreſſing, weakening, and preventing it; and that by not ſuffering vain and proud men to perform their enterprizes, but obliging them to ſubmit to the will of God, and humble themſelves under his mighty hand. Theſe are the ends propoſed, and which are effected through the Lord ſpeaking to men in dreams, opening their ears, and ſealing inſtructions to them; and others alſo for their good follow.

℣. 18. He keepeth back his ſoul from the pit, &c.] Or, that he may keep back [n]; for this is another end and uſe of God's ſpeaking unto men; it is to preſerve them for the preſent from going down to the grave, the pit of corruption and deſtruction; ſo called becauſe the bodies of men being there laid corrupt, and are entirely deſtroyed by worms, and turn to rottenneſs and duſt; and to preſerve them from the bottomleſs pit of everlaſting ruin and deſtruction; for the Lord's people are reproved by him, that they may not be condemned with the world, 1 Cor. xi. 32. and his life from periſhing by the ſword; by the ſword of men, which is one of God's ſore judgments; or by the ſword of the civil magiſtrate, the man ſpoken to being warned of God, of committing theſe ſins, which would bring him into the hands of ſuch; or by the ſword of divine vine juſtice; Jarchi interprets it of the ſword of the angel of death; the word ſignifies a miſſive weapon, as a dart; ſo Mr. Broughton renders the words, and his life from going on the dart; or, as another verſion has it, leſt it ſhould go on under the caſt of darts [o]; the darts of an enemy in war, or the fiery darts of Satan, Eph. vi. 16.

[k] ובישתים לא ישורנה ſecundo non revidet, Schmidt & Maius apud Michaelis; & ſecunda vice non videbit illud, Schultens. [l] במסרם diſciplinam eorum, Tigurine verſion; caſtigationem eorum, Beza, Vatablus. Druſius, Mercerus, Piſcator, Michaelis, Schultens. [m] מעשה opere, Pagninus, Montanus, Mercerus, &c. [n] יחשך ut prohibeat, Mercerus, Piſcator.

℣. 19. He is chaſtened alſo with pain upon his bed, &c.] This ſeems to be another way, in which God, according to his eternal purpoſes, ſpeaks unto men, as the word alſo intimates; namely, by afflictions, and ſometimes painful ones; which have a voice in them, and men of wiſdom will hearken to it, Mic. vi. 9. Pain here ſignifies not pain of the mind, or a wounded ſpirit, which is very afflicting, diſtreſſing, and intolerable; but pain of the body, as the next clauſe ſhews; and this endured on the bed, it being ſo great as to confine a man to his bed, or is what he felt there, where he might hope for eaſe and reſt; ſee ch. vii. 13. and the multitude of his bones with ſtrong pain; not with a ſlight one, but a very ſtrong one, ſuch as thoſe felt who gnawed their tongues for pain, Rev. xvi. 10. Jarchi interprets it, the multitude of his bones, which are ſtrong; though they are hardy and ſtrong, yet filled with exquiſite pain; and not one, or a few of them, but a multitude of them, as there are a multitude of them in a man's body; even all of them, as Hezekiah complains, which muſt be very excruciating indeed, Iſ. xxxviii. 13. and which was Job's caſe; not only his fleſh was in pain, through the ſores and ulcers upon him, but his bones were pierced in him, and his ſinews had no reſt, and he was full of toſſings to and fro, ch. vii. 3, 4. and xxx. 17. and in this way he was, as other good men are, reproved and chaſtened by the Lord; and in which way he had ſpoke to him, as he does to others, and which ſhould be attended to; and ſince ſuch painful afflictions are but fatherly chaſtiſements, they ſhould be patiently endured, and the voice of God in them liſtened to, and ere long there will be no more pain: the Cetib, or textual writing is, the contention of his bones is ſtrong; through pain, or with which God contends with men; we follow the marginal reading.

℣. 20. So that his life abhorreth bread, &c.] Through the force of pain he loſes his appetite for food, and even a nauſea of it takes place; he loathes it as the moſt abominable and filthy thing that can be thought of; even bread ſo neceſſary to the ſupport of human life, ſo ſtrengthening to the heart of man, and what he every day ſtands in need of, and ſhould pray for, and in health is never weary of; it may be put for all common and uſeful food: and his ſoul dainty meat; the moſt rich and delicious; ſuch as the tables of the great and rich are furniſhed with: food of deſire [p]; or deſireable food, as it may be rendered; ſee Dan. x. 3. ſuch as in the time of health the appetite craves and deſires, and is fed on with delight and pleaſure, but now had in the utmoſt averſion. Pains and diſeaſes of body often produce ſuch a nauſea in men, Pſ. cvii. 17, 18. and was Job's caſe, ch. iii. 24. and vi. 7.

℣. 21. His fleſh is conſumed away that it cannot be ſeen, &c.] All being gone, none left to be ſeen, nothing but ſkin and bones; and this partly thro' the vehemence of ſtrong pain, and partly through the nauſea of food; not being able to take any thing for nouriſhment and the ſupport of the fluids, and ſo quite emaciated: and his bones that were not ſeen ſtick out; which before were covered with fleſh and fat, ſo that they could not be ſeen; but now the fleſh and fat being waſted, they ſeem as if they roſe up in an eminence, and ſtood out to be beheld; this was alſo Job's caſe, being reduced to a mere ſkeleton, ch. xix. 20. and Elihu in this deſcription of an afflicted man, ſeems to have Job chiefly in view, and by this would intimate to him that God had been, and was ſpeaking to him by thoſe afflictions, which he would do well to advert unto.

℣. 22. His ſoul draweth near unto the grave, &c.] Not the ſoul ſtrictly and properly ſpeaking, for that does not, nor is it laid in the grave at death, but returns to God that gave it; rather the body, for which it is ſometimes put, and of which what is here ſaid is true, ſee Pſ. xvi. 10. or the perſon of the ſick man, whoſe diſeaſe being ſo threatening, all hope is gone, and he is given up by his phyſicians and friends, and ſeemingly is at the grave's mouth, and that is ready for him, and he on the brink of that; which were the apprehenſions Job had of himſelf, ch. xvii. 1. ſee Pſ. lxxxviii. 3. and cvii. 17. and his life to the deſtroyers; the deſtroying angels, as Aben Ezra, and ſo the Septuagint verſion: or deſtroying diſeaſes, and ſo Mr. Broughton renders it, to killing maladies; or it may be to worms, which deſtroy the body in the grave, and which Job was ſenſible of would quickly be his caſe, ch. xix. 26. though ſome interpret it of thoſe that kill, or of thoſe that are dead, with whom they are laid that die; or of deaths corporal and eternal, and the horrors and terrors of both, with which perſons in ſuch circumſtances are ſometimes diſtreſſed.

℣. 23. If there be a meſſenger with him, &c.] Or angel, either with God, as ſome think; or rather with the ſick man; by which meſſenger is meant not an angel by nature, a created angel, though ſometimes ſuch are God's meſſengers, ſent by him on errands to men, are interpreters of things to them, as Gabriel was to Daniel; of whom there are thouſands, and who may be of ſervice to ſick men for their comfort and inſtruction, ſince it is certain they attend ſaints in their dying moments; yet this proves not that they are to be invoked as mediators between God and men: but rather a miniſter of the word is deſigned, who is by office an angel, a meſſenger of Chriſt, and of the churches; an interpreter of the ſcriptures, and of the mind of God in them; and a ſpiritual, evangelical, faithful miniſter is ſcarce and rare, one among a thouſand; and his buſineſs is to viſit ſick perſons, and to obſerve the uprightneſs and faithfulneſs of God in afflicting them, that they may quietly ſubmit to and patiently bear the affliction; and to direct them for their peace and comfort to the uprightneſs or righteouſneſs of Chriſt, for their juſtification before God; and to ſhew them what is right for them to do in their preſent circumſtances; whether the ſick man be ſtupid and inſenſible of his caſe, and his need of righteouſneſs, or whether he be a truly gracious man, yet labouring under doubts and fears about the truth of grace in him, the uprightneſs of his heart, and his intereſt in the righteouſneſs of Chriſt: but it ſeems beſt to underſtand this of Chriſt himſelf, the angel of God's preſence, the meſſenger of the covenant, who is with the ſick man, and favours him with his ſpiritual preſence; or is for him [q], as it may be rendered, is on his ſide, an advocate and and interceſſor for him with God; an interpreter of his Father's mind, and with which he is long acquainted, he lying in his boſom; and of the ſacred ſcriptures, as he was to his diſciples concerning himſelf; or an orator [r], an eloquent one, never man ſpake like him, having the tongue of the learned given him as man; and who as a divine Perſon is the eternal and eſſential Word of God; who ſpake for his people in the council of peace and covenant of grace; and alſo as mediator is the antitypical Aaron, can ſpeak well for them on all occaſions: one among a thouſand; the chiefeſt among ten thouſand, angels or men; ſee Cant. v. 10. Eccl. vii. 28. to ſhew unto man his uprightneſs; which to do is his office as Mediator, and eſpecially as a Prophet, even to ſhew the uprightneſs of God, the rectitude of his nature, the righteouſneſs required in his holy law; and this Chriſt has ſhewn forth and declared in his being the propitiation for the ſins of his people, Rom. iii. 25, 26. And by his Spirit he ſhews to man, and ſo to a ſick man, his want of uprightneſs in himſelf, his need of righteouſneſs from another; and brings it near him, and ſhews it to be perfect, complete and ſuitable; as well as teaches to live ſoberly, righteouſly and godly.

[o] Tigurine verſion. Mercerus.

[p] מאכל תאוה cibum deſiderii, Vatablus, Druſius, Michaelis; cibum appetentiæ, על ן pro eo, V. L. Pagninus, Mercerus.

℣. 24. Then he is gracious to him, &c.] To the ſick man; either the meſſenger or the miniſter that is with him, who pities his caſe and prays for him; and by ſome, the following words are ſuppoſed to be a prayer of his, Deliver me, &c. ſince I find in the goſpel there is a ranſom for ſuch perſons. Rather Chriſt, who is gracious to man, as appears by his aſſumption of their nature and becoming a ranſom for them, and who upon the foot of redemption which he has found or obtained, ſee Heb. ix. 12. pleads for the preſent comfort and future happineſs of his people, in ſuch language as after expreſſed, Deliver him, &c. Or rather, God the Father is gracious to the ſick man for his Son's ſake, and ſaith, Deliver him from going down to the pit; addreſſing either the diſeaſe, ſo Mr. Broughton renders the word, Spare him (O killing malady) from deſcending into the pit, the grave, for the preſent his diſeaſe threatned him with. Or the miniſter of the word attending the ſick man, who is bid to declare to him, as Nathan to David, and Iſaiah to Hezekiah, that he ſhould live longer, and not die for the preſent: or rather, the addreſs is to law and juſtice, to let the redeemed of the Lord go free, and particularly the ſick man being one of them; and not thruſt him down into the bottomleſs pit of everlaſting ruin and deſtruction, for the reaſon following: I have found a ranſom; which is no other than Chriſt the Son of God; whom Jehovah in his infinite wiſdom found out and pitched upon to be the ranſomer of his people; to which he agreed, and in the fulneſs of time came to give his life a ranſom for many, and for whom he has given himſelf as a ranſom-price, which has been teſtified in due time: and this ranſom is for all the elect of God, and is of them from ſin, Satan, law, hell and death; and the finding of it is not of man, nor is the ſcheme of propitiation, peace and reconciliation by Chriſt, or of atonement and ſatisfaction [s] by the ſacrifice of Chriſt, as the word here uſed ſignifies an invention of men; but is the effect of infinite wiſdom, and a ſcheme drawn in the eternal mind, and formed in Chriſt from everlaſting; ſee 2 Cor. v. 19. Some take theſe words to be ſpoken by the Father to the Son, upon his appointment and agreement to be the ranſomer and redeemer, ſaying, Go, redeem him, &c. for ſo the words [t] may be rendered; and others think they are the words of the Son the meſſenger to his Father, the advocate with him for his people as before obſerved.

℣. 25. His fleſh ſhall be freſher than a child's, &c.] Being recovered from illneſs and reſtored to health, through the gracious dealings of God with him. This is to be underſtood not ſimply and abſolutely, but comparatively, or with reſpect to his former condition; that he who before was reduced to ſkin and bone, is now become fat and plump; and whoſe fleſh was dry and withered, now moiſt, ſucculent and juicy; and whoſe ſkin was wrinkled, now ſoft, and ſmooth, and ſleek; and whoſe face was pale, now bloomy and ruddy. The Targum is, "his fleſh is weakened more than a child;" and the Vulgate Latin, "is conſumed," referring to his former ſtate: he ſhall return to the days of his youth. His youth renewed, and he ſeem young again; become hale and robuſt as in his youthful days; ſee Pſal. ciii. 5.

℣. 26. He ſhall pray unto God, &c.] As the former verſe expreſſes the condition of the body of the man recovered from ſickneſs, this the frame of his ſoul, and the ſpiritual bleſſings enjoyed by him: ſome underſtand this of his praying in the time of his affliction, and conſider it as one means of his recovery; and indeed a time of affliction is a time for prayer; and which brings a good man to it, who in health and proſperity has been negligent of it; ſuch a one will make his application to God for deliverance, and not to the creature; and it is his mercy and privilege he has a God to pray unto, who can and will help him. But according to the courſe and connexion of the words, it ſeems rather to reſpect what the good man would do, and the frame he would be in upon his recovery; who would intreat the Lord to make him thankful for the mercy received, and accept of his thankſgiving for the ſame; that his affliction might appear to be ſanctified unto him, and that he is much the better for it, more holy and more humble; and that he would manifeſt his pardoning grace to him for all the ſins and tranſgreſſions he had been guilty of, his murmurings and repinings, and every thing elſe during his affliction; and that he may make uſe of his health and ſtrength given him in the ſervice of God, and for the glory of his name. And he will be favourable to him; which, if underſtood of the time of affliction, it may be interpreted of his laying no more on him than he will enable him to bear, and ſupporting him under it; of granting his gracious preſence in it, and of his taking notice of him, viſiting him, knowing, owning and chooſing him in the furnace of affliction, and manifeſting his care unto him; and of the deliverance of him out of it. But if it reſpects the man as recovered out of affliction, it denotes further diſcoveries of the ſpecial care and favour of God to him, which are very enlivening and refreſhing, ſtrengthning and ſupporting; and of his gracious acceptance of his perſon, and of his ſacrifices of prayer, praiſe and thankſgiving, thro' Chriſt the mediator and meſſenger of the covenant. And he ſhall ſee his face with joy: that is, either God who is favourable to him, he looks with a ſmiling ſmiling countenance upon the man now recovered, who before ſeemed to look upon him with frowns in his countenance, there being a change in the outward diſpenſations of his providence towards him, though none in his heart: his countenance beholds the upright with pleaſure, whether they ſee it or no; he looks upon his people in Chriſt with the utmoſt complacency and delight, and particularly when they come to him in the exerciſe of grace, with their prayers, praiſes and thankſgivings. Or the man recovered from illneſs, God being favourable to him, he beholds the face of God with joy, who perhaps had hid it from him in his affliction, which cauſed trouble; but now ſhewing his face and favour, it cauſes joy and exultation, even a jubilee in his ſoul. He beholds him in Chriſt as the God of grace and peace; and through him can come to him and look him in the face with comfort and pleaſure, as nothing is more delightful to him than the light of his countenance. For he will render unto man his righteouſneſs: not the ſick man recovered, render to another man what is his right and due, or what he may have wronged him of; for which being reproved by the affliction, and convicted of, is deſirous of making reſtitution: but God who will render, return or reſtore to the man recovered his righteouſneſs, which is the foundation of his joy; not render to him according to his own righteouſneſs, as the Targum, which would be but a poor recompence if ſtrictly given; nor reſtore to him the righteouſneſs he loſt in Adam, which is but a creature-righteouſneſs; but the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, as Mr Broughton, which is the good man's or the believer's in Chriſt, becauſe wrought out for him, imputed to him, and beſtowed as a free gift on him. Now though this righteouſneſs can never be loſt, being an everlaſting one, yet a ſenſe of intereſt in it may, which is returned, reſtored and rendered to a man, when that righteouſneſs is afreſh revealed to him from faith to faith; the conſequence of which is peace and comfort, joy and triumph.

[r] מליץ Eloquens, Pagninus, Montanus; Orator, Tigurine Verſion, Bolducius. [s] כפר Propitiationem, Beza, Pagninus, Montanus, Munſter, Bolducius, Vatablus; Expiationem, Tigurine Verſion; Lytrum, Cocceius; Satisfactionem, Schmidt. [t] פדעהו Redime eum, Pagninus, Montanus, &c.

℣. 27. He looketh upon men, &c.] According to our verſion and other interpreters, the ſenſe is, God looks upon men as he does on all men in general, their ways and their works; and particularly he takes notice of men under affliction, and obſerves how they behave; if they are penitent and confeſs their ſins, he reſtores them to health, and does them good both in body and ſoul. But moſt carry the ſenſe another way, and interpret it of the ſick man recovered, who looks upon his friends and relations about him, and any others that come within his reach; or he goes about them, as Aben Ezra explains the word; or will accompany with men, as Mr Broughton; or ſets them in rows, as Gerſom, in order as at a levee, that he may the better addreſs them; or he ſhall direct himſelf to them, as the Targum; or ſhall ſing over them or before them, ſo Schultens [t]; in a joyful manner, in an exulting ſtrain expreſs himſelf, as follows; for the phraſe, and if any ſay [u], ſhould be rendred, and he ſhall ſay; make the following confeſſion of his acknowledgment of the goodneſs of God unto him. I have ſinned; againſt God and man, and that has been the cauſe of all my afflictions; I am now ſenſible of it, and ingenuouſly own it: and perverted that which was right; have not done that which is right in the ſight of God, nor what is juſt and right between man and man; have perverted the right ways of God, ſwerved from his commandments, and gone into crooked paths, with the workers of iniquity; and declined from, or perverted juſtice and judgment among men. And it profiteth me not; as ſin does not in the iſſue; though it promiſes profit and advantage, it does not yield it; but, on the contrary, much hurt and miſchief come by it.

℣. 28. He will deliver his ſoul from going into the pit, &c.] Into the pit of the grave; and then the ſoul is put for the man or for the body; or into the pit of hell or perdition: and his life ſhall ſee the light; or he ſhall live and enjoy outward proſperity here, and the light of eternal happineſs hereafter; and ſo the Targum interprets it of ſuperior light, or the light above, even the inheritance of the ſaints in light. Theſe words have a double reading; the Keri, or marginal reading, is what we follow; but the Cetib, or textual reading is, he hath delivered my ſoul from going into the pit, and my life ſees the light: and which ſeems to be the better reading; and ſo the words are a continuation of the addreſs of the man recovered from illneſs to his friends; ſetting forth and acknowledging, with joy and thankfulneſs, the great goodneſs of God unto him, that he had delivered him from the grave and ſpared his life, and given him to enjoy great proſperity, both temporal and ſpiritual.

℣. 29. Lo, all theſe things worketh God oftentimes with man.] This is a ſummary or recapitulation of what goes before, from ℣. 15. God is an operating being, he is always at work in a providential way: my father worketh hitherto, John v. 17. ſometimes on the minds of men in dreams and viſions; and ſometimes by affliction, and ſometimes by his prophets, meſſengers and miniſters of the word; he works with and by theſe, and all according to the internal workings and actings of his mind, his eternal purpoſes and decrees, which are hereby brought about: and theſe he works oftentimes, or, as in the original, twice [w]; therefore when once is not ſufficient, he repeats it in dreams and viſions; when men are not admoniſhed by one, he comes to them in another: and afflictions, when one does not bring men to repentance or anſwer a good purpoſe, he ſends another; and continues the miniſtry of the word in which he waits to be gracious, till all his people are brought to repentance, and all his ends anſwered by it: and all this he works with man, his darling object, the ſpecial care of his providence; and for whom his great concern is in redemption and ſalvation. He works with men diſtributively conſidered, with various men, in the ſeveral ways before expreſſed; and with men perſonally and individually; to one and the ſame man he has often appeared in dreams and viſions, and on the ſame perſon has laid his afflicting hand again and again; and to the ſame individual has given line upon line, and precept upon precept. And becauſe this is certain and to be depended upon as truth, and is worthy of notice and conſideration, as well as is very wonderful and aſtoniſhing, that God ſhould thus be mindful of man, and work with him and for him, Lo or behold is prefixed unto it: the ends for which all this is done follow.

℣. 30. To bring back his ſoul from the pit, &c.] From the pit of the grave; at the mouth or on the brink of which he ſeemed to be in the apprehenſion of his friends, and having the ſentence of death in himſelf; ſee Pſal. xc. 3. Or to turn away, away [x], or ſtay his ſoul from the pit, as Mr Broughton; prevent his going into it by removing his diſorder, and reſtoring him to health, as in the caſe of Hezekiah, Iſai. xxxviii. 17. Or figuratively, from the pit of an unregenerate ſtate, which may be compared to a pit or grave, becauſe in it lie ſuch who are dead in treſpaſſes and ſins; and which is a pit of corruption, or a corrupt ſtate: men in it are corrupt and corrupters, corrupt both in principles and practices; and is an impure one, like to mire and clay; and a very unconifortable one, a pit wherein is no water, no refreſhment, no ſolid peace and comfort. In converſion, which ſometimes is brought about by the above means, afflictive providences, as well as by the miniſtry of the word, ſouls are brought back from hence; are regenerated, quickned and raiſed from the graves of ſin and live ſpiritually, as they are alſo ſecured from going down into the pit of hell and everlaſting deſtruction: to be enlightned with the light of the living; in a natural ſenſe, to enjoy the light of living men, the light of the ſun, and to live in health and proſperity, which is called light in oppoſition to affliction and adverſity, expreſſed by darkneſs; ſee Eſth. viii. 15. Pſ. cxii. 4. Iſai. viii. 22. And in a ſpiritual ſenſe, to live a ſpiritual life, who before were dead in ſin, to live a life of faith on Chriſt as their righteouſneſs, and to live a life of holineſs from him, and in newneſs of life to his honour and glory; and to have ſpiritual light into their ſtate by nature, and their recovery and ſalvation by Chriſt; to ſee their need of him, his ſuitableneſs, worth and excellency, and to have a glimpſe of eternal glory; as alſo hereafter to partake both of eternal life and eternal light, called by our Lord the light of life, John viii. 12.

[t] ישר על cantabit ſuper vel coram, Schultens. [u] ויאמר et dicat, V.L. Beza, Montanus, Mercerus, Michaelis, Schultens. [w] פעמים שלש bis aut ter, Tigurine Verſion; bis & ter, Beza; bis, ter, Mercerus, Cocceius.

℣. 31. Mark well, O Job, &c.] Conſider and weigh well what has been ſaid; or rather attend to what is further to be ſaid: hearken unto me; to what he was about to ſay; for he was full of matter, and had not yet vented all he had to utter: hold thy peace, and I will ſpeak; be ſilent and don't interrupt, and I'll go on with my diſcourſe.

℣. 32. If thou haſt any thing to ſay, anſwer me, &c.] Any thing to object to what he had delivered, or any anſwer to return to what he had charged him with; ſpeak, for I deſire to juſtify thee. Elihu was a fair antagoniſt, and gave free liberty, time and ſpace, to make whatſoever reply he thought fit, and which he ſhould patiently and attentively hear: his view was not victory, but that truth might come out, and take place and prevail, having nothing more at heart than Job's good; and could wiſh it would appear, that he was in all reſpects a juſt man, and even in that in which he thought he was not juſt; but could he fairly acquit himſelf it would be a pleaſure to him.

℣. 33. If not, hearken to me, &c.] If he had no objection to make, nor anſwer to return, then he deſires he would attend and liſten to what he had further to lay before him; hold thy peace, and I ſhall teach thee wiſdom. For though Job was a wiſe and good man, he might become wiſer and more knowing; and indeed when inſtruction is given to a wiſe man, he will be yet wiſer, Prov. ix. 9. and this may be received ſometimes from perſons inferior in age and abilities. Elihu propoſed to teach him as he did, natural, moral and evangelical wiſdom, eſpecially the wiſdom of God in his providential dealings with men, and what is man's higheſt wiſdom under them; which is to be reconciled unto them, and patiently to ſubmit and to fear the Lord, and be careful not to offend him, which to do is wiſdom and underſtanding.

CHAP. XXXIV.

IN this chapter Elihu reaſſumes his diſcourſe, and proceeds in his anſwer to Job, in which are firſt a preface exciting attention, ℣. 1—4. then a charge is brought againſt Job, expreſſed in or extracted from ſome words that dropped from his lips, not ſo well guarded, ℣. 5—9. A refutation of theſe expreſſions of his in a variety of arguments, ℣. 10—30. and the chapter is cloſed with ſome good advice to Job, ℣. 31—33. and with an earneſt requeſt of Elihu to men of underſtanding, to join with him in trying him to the uttermoſt, ℣. 34—37.

℣. 1. Furthermore Elihu anſwered and ſaid,] It is reaſonable to ſuppoſe that Elihu made a conſiderable pauſe, to ſee whether Job would make any reply to what he had delivered; or object to what he had ſaid; which he gave him free liberty to do, if he had any thing upon his mind: but perceiving he was not inclined to return any anſwer to him, he went on with his diſcourſe; and which is called a further anſwer to him: for though Job had made no reply to which this could be called an anſwer; yet as there were ſeveral things remaining for Elihu to anſwer to, and which he propoſed to anſwer and did, it may with great propriety here be ſaid that he anſwered him.

℣. 2. Hear my words, O ye wiſe men, &c.] This is not an addreſs to Job's three friends, as ſome think; for Elihu had expreſſed his diſpleaſure at them, in condemning Job without convicting him, and returning ſolid anſwers to him; and therefore he ſhould not take their method of dealing with him, but take another; and plainly ſuggeſts that wiſdom was not with them, nor taught by them; and therefore as he could not give flattering titles to men, it could not well be thought that he ſhould addreſs them as wiſe and underſtanding men, unleſs indeed in an ironical way, as ſome chooſe to interpret it; ſee chap. xxxii. 3, 5, 7, 9, 12, 14, 21, 22. Rather therefore ſome byſtanders are here ſpoken to, whom Elihu knew to be men of wiſdom and knowledge, &c. as it follows, and give ear unto me, ye that have knowledge; and as they were endued not only with natural and political wiſdom and knowledge, but with that which is divine and ſpiritual, they were proper judges of the affair in controverſy, and could beſt diſcern whether what Elihu delivered was right or wrong, and to the purpoſe or not. And beſides, though they had a large ſhare of wiſdom and knowledge, yet it was but imperfect; and the moſt wiſe and knowing may become more ſo, and that ſometimes by means of their inferiors and juniors: and therefore Elihu craves their attention to what he had ſaid or ſhould ſay, though he was but a young man, and they aged, and men of great geniuſes and abilities; and the rather, he might be preſſing on them to be his hearers and judges, becauſe, generally ſpeaking, ſuch, as they are the moſt judicious, ſo the moſt candid hearers.

℣. 3.

[x] לרשיב ut avertat, Beza, Mercerus, Piſcator, Michaelis, Schultens.

℣. 3. For the ear trieth words, &c.] Not only the muſical ſound of them, the goodneſs of the language and diction, and the grammatical conſtruction of them, but the ſenſe of them, and whether the matter of them is good or not; that they are ſound ſpeech, which cannot be condemned, or unſound; whether they are right or wrong, agreeable to right reaſon, ſound doctrine and the word of God; for there are words and words, ſome the words of men, others the words of God. A ſanctified ear tries theſe; but then men muſt have ſuch ears to hear, and be attentive to what they hear and retain it, hear internally as was as externally; and which a man does when his ears are opened by the Lord, from whom are the hearing ear and ſeeing eye; and ſuch try what they hear, diſtinguiſh between good and bad, approve truth and receive it, and retain and hold it faſt: as the mouth taſteth meat; words and doctrines are like meat, ſome good and ſome bad; and ſuch that have a good taſte try them, either a rational or rather a ſpiritual diſcernment: ſome have no ſpiritual taſte, their taſte is not changed, and therefore cannot diſtinguiſh, nor make any good judgment of things; but others have, and theſe diſcern the difference, reliſh truth, ſavour the things that be of God, taſte the good word of God, and eſteem it more than their neceſſary food; and it is ſweeter to them than the hony or the hony-comb. Such Elihu judged theſe men to be he addreſſed, and therefore deſired their attention to what he had to ſay.

℣. 4. Let us chooſe to us judgment, &c.] Take the part of the queſtion or controverſy in which truth and juſtice lie, and he doubtleſs has reſpect to the preſent controverſy with Job. Let us know among ourſelves what is good; agree upon that which is beſt to be done in the preſent caſe, what judgment to be made of the dealings of God with Job, and his behaviour under them, and what the beſt advice to give to him.

℣. 5. For Job hath ſaid, I am righteous, &c.] Not in expreſs words, but what amounted to it: no doubt he was a righteous man in an evangelic ſenſe, being juſtified by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, as all the Old-Teſtament ſaints were, who looked to him and believed in him as the Lord their righteouſneſs, and ſaid, as the church in thoſe times did, Surely in the Lord have I righteouſneſs and ſtrength, Iſai. xlv. 24, 25. And moreover he was an upright man, to which the Lord himſelf bore teſtimony, chap. i. 8. and had the truth of grace in him, that new man which is created in righteouſneſs and true holineſs; and alſo lived an holy life and converſation; but then he did not ſay or think that he was righteous in or of himſelf, or ſo as to be free from ſin: Job could not judge or ſpeak thus of himſelf, which would be contrary to what he expreſly declares, chap. vii. 20. and ix. 20, 30, 31. though it muſt be owned, that he thought himſelf ſo righteous, holy and good, that he ought not to have been afflicted in the manner he was; in which ſenſe it is probable Elihu underſtood him: and beſides, theſe words are not to be taken ſeparately, but in connexion with what follows, which ſhews Job's ſenſe, and how Elihu underſtood him, that though he was a righteous perſon, he had not juſtice done him: and God hath taken away my judgment; which words he did ſay, chap. xxvii. 2. ſee the note there; or as Mr Broughton renders the words, the Omnipotent keeps back my right; does not vindicate my cauſe, nor ſo much as give it a hearing, nor lets me know why he contends with me; and though I call for juſtice to be done, cannot be heard, chap. xix. 7. a like complaint of the church in Iſai. xl. 27.

℣. 6. Should I lie againſt my right? &c.] No; I ought not: this though Job had not ſaid in ſo many words, yet this ſeems to be his ſenſe in chap. xxvii. 4, 5, 6. that ſhould he own and ſay that he was a wicked man, a hypocrite, and deſtitute of the grace of God, he ſhould not only ſpeak againſt himſelf, but, contrary to his conſcience, ſay an untruth, and not do juſtice to his character. Some read the words without an interrogation, as Mr Broughton, "for my right I muſt be a liar;" that is, for vindicating my right, ſeeking and endeavouring to do myſelf juſtice, and clear myſelf from falſe imputations, I am reckoned a liar. And to this purpoſe is the paraphraſe of Aben Ezra, "becauſe I ſeek judgment, they ſay that I lie." Others render them, there is a lie in judging me, ſo the Vulgate Latin Verſion; that is, "I am falſly accuſed, I am judged wrongfully:" things I know not are laid to my charge, which has often been the caſe of good men: or, I have lied in judgment; that is, failed, as the word is ſometimes uſed, Iſai. lviii. 11. Hab. iii. 17. failed in his expectation of judgment or of juſtice being done him; he looked for it but was diſappointed; but the firſt ſenſe ſeems beſt. My wound is incurable without tranſgreſſion; not that he thought himſelf without tranſgreſſion, but that his wound or ſtroke inflicted on him, or the afflictions he was exerciſed with, were without cauſe; were not for any injuſtice in his hands, or wickedneſs that he had committed; and that he utterly deſpaired of being rid of them, or reſtored to his former health and proſperity; and to this ſenſe he had expreſſed himſelf, chap. ix. 17. and xvi. 17, 18, 19, 20. In the Hebrew text it is, my arrow[y], that is, the arrow that was in him, the arrows of the Lord that ſtuck faſt in him; theſe were thrown at him and faſtened in him without cauſe; and there was no hope of their being drawn out, or of the wounds made by them being healed; ſee chap. vi. 4. Now what Elihu was offended at in theſe expreſſions, was that Job ſhould ſo rigidly inſiſt on his innocence, and not own himſelf faulty in any reſpect; nor allow there was any cauſe for his afflictions, nor entertain any hope of the removal of them: whereas it became him to acknowledge his ſins, which no man is free from, and that he was dealt with leſs than his iniquities deſerved; and that, inſtead of indulging deſpair, he ſhould rather ſay, I will return to the Lord; he hath torn and he will heal, he hath ſmitten and he will bind up, Hoſea vi. 1.

℣. 7. What man is like Job, &c.] This is ſaid as wondering at the part he acted, that a man ſo wiſe and good as Job was eſteemed to be, ſhould behave in ſuch a manner as he did, who drinketh up ſcorning like water? For a fooliſh and wicked man to do ſo is not ſtrange nor uncommon; but for a man of ſuch ſenſe and grace as Job was, to do this was aſtoniſhing; to have no more regard to his character, than to expoſe himſelf to the ſcorn and ridicule of men: for a man to become a laughing-ſtock to profane and wicked men for his religion and piety, it is no diſgrace, but an honour to him; but by unbecoming words and geſtures to make himſelf juſtly jeered and ſcoffed at, is great indiſcretion. Or it may be underſtood actively of his dealing very freely and frequently in ſcoffs and jeers, which he poured out very liberally and plentifully, and ſeemingly with as much delight as a man drinks water when thirſty; ſee chap. xi. 3.

℣. 8.

[y] חצי Sagitta mea, Montanus, Schultens, Michaelis.

℣. 8. Which goeth in company with the workers of iniquity, &c.] The worſt of men, who make it their conſtant buſineſs and employment to commit ſin; and walketh with wicked men, the moſt abandoned of mankind. Not that Job kept company with ſuch, and walked with them in all exceſs of riot; nor did Elihu think ſo; Job was a man that feared God and eſchewed evil, and evil men; he was a companion of them that feared the Lord; his delight was with the excellent of the earth: nor ſhould a good man keep company and walk with the wicked, nor can he with any pleaſure. But the ſenſe is, that by his words, the expreſſions that dropped from his lips, he ſeemed to agree with them, and to be of the ſame ſentiments with them; and what he delivered tended to encourage and harden them in their ſinful ways; and what thoſe words were follow.

℣. 9. For he hath ſaid, &c.] Not plainly and expreſly, but conſequentially; what it was thought might be inferred from what he had ſaid, particularly in chap. ix. 22. it profiteth a man nothing that he ſhould delight himſelf with God; in his houſe and ordinances, ways and worſhip; he may as well indulge himſelf in the pleaſures of ſin, and in the delights of the world, if God deſtroys the perfect and the wicked, as Job had ſaid in the place referred to; if this be the caſe, it is in vain to ſerve God and pray unto him, or keep his ordinances; which are the language and ſentiments of wicked men, and according to which they act, ſee chap. xxi. 14, 15. Mal. iii. 14. Mr Broughton renders it, "when he would walk with God;" and ſo the Targum, "in his walking with God;" and another Targum, "in his running with God:" though he walks and even runs in the way of his commandments, yet it is of no advantage to him; or he does the will of God, as Aben Ezra; or ſeeks to pleaſe him or be acceptable to him, and to find grace in his ſight. Whereas though love and hatred are not known by proſperity and adverſity, but both come to good and bad men, which ſeems to be Job's meaning in the above place, from whence this inference is deduced; yet it is certain that godlineſs is profitable to all, 1 Tim. iv. 8.

℣. 10. Therefore hearken unto me, ye men of underſtanding, &c.] The ſame perſons he addreſſes as wiſe men and men of knowledge, ℣. 2. and here as men of underſtanding, or heart [z]; the heart being the ſeat of wiſdom and knowledge; and ſuch Elihu deſired to be his hearers, to attend to what he was about to ſay; which was to refute the words of Job, or his ſenſe expreſſed in the preceding verſes. Far be it from God that he ſhould do wickedneſs; and from the Almighty, that he ſhould commit iniquity; do any injuſtice or injury to any perſon, there being no unrighteouſneſs in him, nor in any of his ways and works; which Job tacitly ſeemed to charge God with, at leaſt as Elihu underſtood him. But ſin is contrary to his pure and holy nature; he cannot look upon it with pleaſure, much leſs commit it; it is forbidden by his holy, righteous law, and therefore would never be done by him the lawgiver; nor can any one ſingle inſtance be given of wickedneſs and unrighteouſneſs committed by him in any of his works of nature, or providence, or grace. He is the author of the evil of afflictions, whether as puniſhments or fatherly corrections; and in neither caſe does he commit or do any injuſtice; not in puniſhing wicked men leſs than they deſerve, as he does in this life; nor in correcting his own people, which is always for their good: but not of the evil of ſin; this may be concluded from the titles here given, of almighty and all-ſufficient; for being ſo he can be under no temptation of doing an unjuſt thing; and which is expreſſed with the like abhorrence and indignation by Elihu, as the ſame ſentiment is by the apoſtle Paul, Rom. ix. 14.

℣. 11. For the work of a man will he render unto him, &c.] The reward of his work, as Ben Gerſom interprets it, whether the work of a wicked man or of a good man; and cauſe every man to find according to his ways. Which is a truth frequently inculcated in the ſcriptures; and will take place eſpecially at the reſurrection of the dead, which is for that purpoſe, and at the final judgment, by the righteous judge of all; for though wicked men may not be puniſhed now according to their deſerts, they will hereafter, which is ſufficient to vindicate the juſtice of God: and as for the works and ways of good men, though God does not proceed according to them in the methods of his grace; they are not juſtified by them, nor called and ſaved according to them; for though evil works deſerve damnation, good works do not merit ſalvation; yet they are not neglected by the Lord; he is not unrighteous to forget them, and verily there is a reward for righteous men, though it is not of debt but grace; and not for, but in keeping the commands of God is this reward; even communion with him and peace in their ſouls, which they enjoy in, though not as ariſing from their keeping them; and at the laſt day, when their juſtification will be pronounced before men and angels, it will be according to their works of righteouſneſs, not done by themſelves but done by Chriſt, in their room and ſtead, and reckoned to them; for the obedience of Chriſt, by which they are made righteous, though imputed to them without works, is nothing elſe but a ſeries of good works moſt perfectly done by Chriſt for them; and according to which the crown of righteouſneſs in a righteous way will be given them by the righteous Judge. All which therefore is a full proof that no iniquity is, will or can be committed by the Lord.

℣. 12. Yea, ſurely God will not do wickedly, &c.] This truth is repeated and affirmed in the ſtrongeſt manner; or will not condemn, as the Vulgate Latin Verſion, and ſo the Targum, that is, he will not condemn the righteous; for though he may afflict them, which is done that they may not be condemned with the world, he will not condemn them; for there is no condemnation to them that are in Chriſt; his righteouſneſs, by which they are juſtified, ſecures them from all condemnation. Neither will the Almighty pervert judgment: pronounce a wrong ſentence, decline the execution of juſtice, ſwerve from the rule of it, or do a wrong thing; for he puniſhes wherever he finds it, either in the ſinner or his ſurety; and his puniſhing it in his Son, as the ſurety of his people, is the ſtrongeſt proof of his punitive juſtice that can be given: nor does he neglect to chaſtize his people for ſin, though ſatisfied for; ſo far is he from conniving at ſin, and ſtill farther from committing it; ſee chap. viii. 2. and the note there.

℣. 13. Who hath given him a charge over the earth? &c.] Or who hath committed the earth unto him, and made it his care and charge? Is there any above him that has put him into this poſt and office? Under whoſe direction and command is he, and to to whom is he accountable? None at all; he is no deputy or ſub-governor: the kings of the earth are under him, and they have others ſubordinate to them; but he is above all, higher than the higheſt: he is ſole governor of the world in his own right, by right of creation, and which he has from himſelf and not another; he has no rival nor partner with him, none to whom he is accountable, or can controll him; and ſince he is the judge of all the earth, he will do right. Subordinate governors ſometimes do unjuſt things in obedience to their ſuperiors, or to pleaſe them, or through fear of them; but nothing of this kind is or can be the caſe with God; as he cannot do any injuſtice thro' inclination of nature, nor through ignorance, as men may; ſo neither through fear of any, there being none above him from whom he has received a charge, or that rules over him; and, as Jarchi expreſſes it, can ſay to him, what doſt thou? as, I did not command thee ſo and ſo. And though he is ſovereign and independent, and his power uncontrolable, it is contrary to his nature to make an ill uſe of it; and was juſtice perverted by him, the world would ſoon be in the utmoſt confuſion: but it is a plain caſe there is a God that judgeth in the earth, and cannot commit iniquity. Or this may be ſaid with reſpect to man; who has committed the earth to man, to be his charge, to be governed by him? if ſo, it would ſoon come to nothing; all creatures in it would be deſtroyed, as in the following verſes; but this is not the caſe. Or who has given it to man to poſſeſs it, and to enjoy all things in it, and has put all things into his hands and in ſubjection to him, to make uſe thereof, and for his good, delight and pleaſure, and viſits him in it in a providential way, in great kindneſs and goodneſs? It is the Lord; and can it be thought that he that is ſo good and beneficent to men, will do them any injuſtice? no ſurely! Yea, ſhould he take away all theſe good things he has given them, and even life itſelf, it could be no injuſtice, ſince he would only take away what he had given and had a right unto. Or who hath diſpoſed the whole world? or created it, as Aben Ezra; that ſtored it with all the good things in it for the uſe of men? or put it in the beautiful order it is, ſo ſuitable and convenient for the good of his creatures? or made it the habitable earth it is for man and beaſt? So Mr Broughton renders the whole, "who before him looked to "the earth, or who ſettled all the dwelt land?" Or who made it the fruitful earth it is, abounding with plenty of food for man and beaſt? or who diſpoſes of all things in it by his wiſe providence, ſo that every thing is beautiful in its ſeaſon? None but the Lord has done all this; how then can it be thought that he who has filled the earth with his goodneſs, ſhould do wickedly or pervert judgment?

[z] אנשי לבב Viri cordis, Pagninus, Montanus, Michaelis.

℣. 14. If he ſet his heart upon man, &c.] Not his love and affections; though there are ſome he does in this ſenſe ſet his heart on, and whoſe ſouls at death he gathers to himſelf, but with this ſenſe the next verſe will not agree; but to deſtroy him, as Jarchi adds by way of explanation; if he gives his mind to it, is ſet upon it and reſolved to do it, none can hinder him; or ſets himſelf againſt him in an hoſtile way, the iſſue muſt be entire ruin and deſtruction to the race of men; but it is plain this is not the caſe, or otherwiſe all muſt have periſhed long ago: or if he ſeverely marks the ways and works of men, and deals with them according to the ſtrictneſs of his juſtice, which yet he might do without any charge of injuſtice, none could ſtand before him; but this he does not, ſo far is he from any injuſtice or any appearance of it. If he gather unto himſelf his ſpirit and his breath; not his own ſpirit and breath, drawing in and retaining that within himſelf, and withholding the influence of it from his creatures, which the Septuagint Verſion ſeems to favour; but the ſpirit and breath of man, which are of God, and which as he gives, he can gather when he pleaſes. The ſpirit or rational ſoul of man is put in him by the Lord; this at death is ſeparated from the body, yet dies not with it, but is gathered to the Lord: and the breath which he breathes into man, and is in his noſtrils, and which as he gives, he can take away, and then man dies. But in doing this he does no injuſtice; indeed ſhould he in anger and reſentment riſe up and deal thus with men in general, the conſequence muſt be as follows.

℣. 15. All fleſh ſhall periſh together, &c.] Not one by one, or one after another, as they generally do, but all together; as when the flood ſwept away the world of the ungodly. All fleſh ſignifies all men, and their bodies of fleſh particularly, which are weak, frail and mortal; and if God gathers or takes out the ſpirit from them, they die immediately, which is meant by periſhing, as in Eccl. vii. 15. Iſai. lvii. 1. And man ſhall turn again unto duſt; from whence he came, as the body does at death; when thoſe earthly tabernacles of the bodies of men, which have their foundation in the duſt, are diſſolved and ſink into it. Now though this is the caſe of particular perſons, one after another, yet it is not a general caſe, as it would be, if God was to exert his power, as he might without any charge of injuſtice: and this ſhews the merciful kindneſs of God to man, ſo far is he from doing any thing injurious or unjuſt.

℣. 16. If now thou haſt underſtanding, hear this, &c.] Not as calling his underſtanding in queſtion, as if he had none: for Job was a very underſtanding man; he had not loſt his natural underſtanding by his afflictions, ſee chap. vi. 13. nor was he without an underſtanding of divine things, as his ſpeeches and anſwers ſhew; but rather it is taken for granted that he was a man of underſtanding: if or ſeeing thou haſt underſtanding, art a man of knowledge and intelligence, therefore hearken and attend to what has been ſaid or about to be ſaid; though, as ſome Jewiſh interpreters [a] obſerve, the word is not a noun but a verb, and is imperative, underſtand thou now, hear this; and then the ſenſe is, if things are ſo as before related, ℣. 13, 14, 15, then now underſtand this, take it into thy heart, and mind, and well weigh and conſider it; hearken to the voice of my words, either the preceding or following ones.

℣. 17. Shall even he that hateth right govern? &c.] That hates moral and civil juſtice; is ſuch an one fit to rule among men or over them? No ſurely; for to love righteouſneſs and do it, is a qualification of a civil governor; it is his buſineſs to adminiſter juſtice; and if an hater of it, he can never be a proper perſon to rule: and if God was an hater of that which is right, as he would ſeem to be if he did not do it, he would not be fit to govern the world as he does. To this abſurdity is Job reduced, by ſuggeſting that right was not done him, or that God had removed his judgment from him; ſee 2 Sam. xxiii. 3. Gen. xviii. 25. Rom. iii. 5, 6. Mr Broughton tranſlates the words, Can a foe to judgment rule well? And yet it cannot be denied, denied, but muſt be owned, that God does judge in the earth and judges righteouſly. Or ſhall ſuch an one bind [b]; the alluſion may be to a chirurgeon that binds up wounds. Sin makes wounds, and ſuch as cannot be healed by men; but God can bind them up and cure them, and does: but would he do this, if he hated that which is right, if he was not kind and merciful, juſt and good? ſee Hoſea vi. 1. Or as others render it, which comes pretty near to the ſame ſenſe, Shall a hater of judgment refrain wrath [c]? Such are tyrants, cruel and unmerciful, full of wrath and vengeance, and which they execute in a barbarous manner; but ſuch is not God; he ſtirs not up all his wrath, which he in juſtice might; he retains it not for ever, but delights in mercy. And wilt thou condemn him that is moſt juſt? It is not right to condemn any juſt man, to charge him wrongfully, and then paſs an unrighteous ſentence on him; and much leſs to charge the righteous God with injuſtice, and condemn him that is moſt juſt, ſuperlatively juſt; in whom there is not the leaſt ſhadow of unrighteouſneſs; who is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works; who is naturally, eſſentially and infinitely righteous.

[a] Jarchi, Bar Tzemach in loc. ſo Cocceius, Schmidt and Schulteus.

℣. 18. Is it fit to ſay to a king, Thou art wicked? &c.] Not even to a bad king; for though he may be reproved for his ſins, yet not by any or every one, but by a fit and proper perſon: and generally ſpeaking, if not always, the ſcriptural inſtances of reproving ſuch kings, are of men that were prophets, and ſent in the name of the Lord to do it; and when done by them, was done with decency: and much leſs ſhould this be ſaid to a good king; as to ſay to him, Belial, the word here uſed; or thou art Belial; or a ſon of Belial, as Shimei ſaid to David, 2 Sam. xvi. 7. a name given to the worſt of men, and is the devil himſelf; and ſignifies either one without a yoke, or lawleſs, which a king is not; or unprofitable, whereas a king is a miniſter of God for good; is for the puniſhment of evil-doers, and for a praiſe to them that do well. And to princes, Ye are ungodly? Who have their name from being generous, munificent and liberal, and therefore ſhould not be treated in ſuch a manner. Who are the ſons of kings, or ſubordinate magiſtrates to them, and execute their will and pleaſure, laws and precepts. And if now ſuch language is not to be uſed to earthly kings and princes, then ſurely not to the King of kings, and Lord of lords; ſo Jarchi interprets it of God the king of the world; and ſome Chriſtian interpreters, as Schmidt, underſtand by Princes the three perſons in the godhead; which can hardly be made to bear: though could the whole be underſtood of God in the three perſons of the deity, the connexion with the following verſe would run more ſmoothly without the ſupplement that is made; ſo Broughton, "to the King, the King of nobles, that "accepteth not," &c.

℣. 19. How much leſs to him that accepteth not the perſons of princes, &c.] And indeed God is not the reſpecter of the perſons of any, no not of the greateſt men on earth, kings and princes; theſe are alike dealt with by him as others in the diſpenſations of his providence; nor do they eſcape the marks of his diſpleaſure, wrath and vengeance, when they ſin againſt him: nor regardeth the rich more than the poor; by ſhewing favour to them, or conniving at them. For they are all the work of his hands; both the rich and the poor; not only as creatures made by him, but as rich men and poor men; it is God that makes men rich or poor, 1 Sam. ii. 7. Prov. xxii. 2. inſtances follow proving this, that God is no reſpecter of perſons on account of outward circumſtances.

℣. 20. In a moment ſhall they die, &c.] Princes as well as the common people, rich men as well as poor; all muſt and do die, great and ſmall, high and low, kings and peaſants, rich and poor men, and ſometimes ſuddenly; are ſtruck dead at once, and without any previous notice, that night, that hour, that moment their ſouls are required of them. The Targum interprets this of the men of Sodom. And Mr Broughton, in his margin, refers to the hiſtory of them in Gen. xix. and the people ſhall be troubled at midnight; either the common people when their kings and governors die; or the relations and friends of perſons deceaſed; and this circumſtance at midnight is added, which makes the ſcene more melancholy, awful and ſhocking, when it happens at ſuch a time. The above Targum underſtands it of the Egyptians, when their firſt-born were ſlain, which was in the middle of the night; and Mr Broughton refers in his margin to the ſame inſtance: but it is a queſtion whether this affair ever came to the knowledge of Job and his friends, at leaſt not ſo early as this controverſy. And paſs away; not into another country being taken and carried away captive; but paſs away by death into their graves, and into another world. Sepharno interprets it of the deſtroying angel's paſſing over the tents of the Iſraelites, and not entering into them to ſmite them when they ſmote the firſt-born of Egypt. But the former ſenſe is beſt, ſee Pſal. xxxvii. 36. And the mighty ſhall be taken away without hand; without the hand of men, but by the immediate hand of God; not falling in battle, or in a common natural way by diſeaſes, but by ſome judgment of God upon them: and the whole verſe ſeems to be underſtood not of a natural death, or in the common way, but of ſudden death in a way of judgment, from the immediate hand of God, and that upon the mighty and great men of the earth; which ſhews that he is no reſpecter of princes, ſee Dan. viii. 25. and xi. 20.

℣. 21. For his eyes are upon the ways of man, &c.] Which denotes the omniſcience of God, which reaches to every man, to every individual, and to all men in general; and to their ways, to every ſtep taken by them, to the whole of their lives and converſations, and every action of them; to all their internal and external ways and goings; perhaps the former may be meant in this, and the latter in the following clauſe. This may denote all their inward thoughts, the workings of their mind, the imaginations of their heart; all their ſecret purpoſes, deſigns and ſchemes; and all the deſires and affections of their ſoul; and all theſe whether good or bad: and he ſeeth all his goings; the whole of his walk and converſation, conduct and behaviour; all his external ways, works and actions; and theſe whether of good or bad men, ſee Pſalm cxxxix. 1—6.

℣. 22. There is no darkneſs, nor ſhadow of death, where the workers of iniquity may hide themſelves.] By whom may be meant chiefly profane ſinners that are abandoned to a vicious courſe of life, and make a trade of ſin, or that the common courſe of their lives; tho' ſecret ſinners, and even profeſſors of religion, hypocrites, who in a more private manner ner live in ſin, come under this name, *Mat.*vii.23. ſuch may endeavour to hide themſelves through ſhame and fear, but all in vain and to no purpoſe; there is no ſcreening themſelves and their actions from the all-ſeeing eye of God, and from his wrath and vengeance. No darkneſs of any ſort can hide them, not the thick clouds of the heavens, nor the darkneſs of the night; nor is there any darkneſs in God that can obſtruct his ſight of them; nor are they able to caſt any miſt before his eyes, or uſe any colourings, pretences, and excuſes he cannot ſee through. Nor ſhadow of death; the groſſeſt and thickeſt darkneſs; nor is even the grave itſelf an hiding place for ſinners, from whence they will be raiſed to receive the juſt deſerts of their ſins. See chap. x. 21, 22. and xiv. 13. Now from the omniſcience of God, and his clear uninterrupted ſight of all perſons and their actions, inward and outward, Elihu argues to the juſtice of God, who therefore cannot do any thing amiſs through ignorance, error, or miſtake.

[b] יחבש obligabit, Montanus; ſo Junius and Tremellius, Piſcator, Cocceius, Michaelis. [c] An naſum oſor judicii frænabit? Schultens.

℣. 23. For he will not lay upon man more than right, &c.] Neither in a way of duty, his law being holy, juſt, and good, not any of his commandments grievous, but all his precepts concerning all things right, his yoke eaſy and his burden light; nor in a way of puniſhment, always puniſhing men leſs than their iniquities deſerve; nor in a way of chaſtiſement, ſuffering nothing to befal his people but what is common to men; and he is faithful to bear them up under it and through it, and to make a way of eſcape out of it: or the phraſe, than right, being a ſupplement, may be left out, and the words be connected with what follows, that he ſhould enter into judgment with God; and the ſenſe is, either that God does not put it on man to go again into judgment with him; he does not ſuffer him to have a cauſe heard over again, to appeal from God or to him to have a ſecond hearing; nor is any thing to be got by it, he is in one mind and none can turn him, or reverſe or get reverſed any ſentence of his; and therefore it was a piece of weakneſs in Job to inſiſt ſo much as he did to have a hearing of his cauſe before him, ſince he could not expect there would be any alteration made in his favour: or, as Mr Broughton reads it, it is not for men to purpoſe to enter into judgment before the Omnipotent; ſuch a purpoſe is vain, he can never carry his cauſe againſt him; it is a piece of weakneſs to pretend to litigate a point with him: or the ſenſe is, he puts no more on man than to come to him in judgment, ſo Schultens; he has appointed a perſon and time to judge the world in righteouſneſs, and all muſt appear before his tribunal; and every thing, thought, word and action, will then and there be brought into an account, and righteous judgment will paſs; and therefore ſince he has fixed ſuch a method of proceeding, and requires no other, he can never be charged with injuſtice.

℣. 24. He ſhall break in pieces mighty men without number, &c.] Such as are mighty in bodily ſtrength, as the giants of the old world, and ſuch as were inhabitants of ſome parts of the land of Canaan; or mighty in power and authority, being kings, princes, rulers and governors, over nations and cities; or mighty in wealth and riches, which give men power and ſtrength; theſe God can and ſometimes does break in pieces like potters veſſels, and even mighty kingdoms and nations themſelves he will make like the chaff of the ſummer-threſhing floor: and even without number; or there have been and will be numberleſs inſtances of this kind; who can tell how many of theſe mighty men, men of gigantic ſtature, were drowned in the flood, or cut off by the ſword of the Iſraelites in the land of Canaan? or without ſearch[d], as it may be rendered; either on the part of God who needs not any, with whom are unneceſſary any formal inquiries into a cauſe, or examination of witneſſes, in order to a judicial proceſs againſt delinquents, all being naked and open before him at once; or on the part of man, with whom the ways and judgments of God are unſearchable, and who ought not cloſely and curiouſly to inquire into any of his proceedings, and the cauſes and reaſons of them, who does all things after the counſel of his own will. Mr Broughton renders it without end, for ever; with an everlaſting deſtruction, an utter and irretrievable one; he ſo breaks them as that they never can be made whole again, like an earthen veſſel that is broke to pieces and cannot be put together again. And ſet others in their ſtead; God always provides for a ſucceſſion in the world, that as when one generation goes off, another comes on; when he deſtroyed the world with a flood, he preſerved a family to repleniſh the earth; when the fathers of the Jewiſh nation, their carcaſſes fell in the wilderneſs, their children were raiſed up in their room to enter the good land and poſſeſs it; and particularly he provides for the civil government of the world, and when he pulls down or removes one king he ſets up another, and will not ſuffer kingdoms and ſtates to fall into anarchy and confuſion; and ſometimes, when he caſts down the mighty from their ſeats, he exalts men of low degree, as when he rejected Saul he took David from the ſheepfold; and makes ſuch kings and kingdoms to ſtand[e] ſtable and firm, as the kingdom of David, and as the word here uſed ſignifies.

℣. 25. Therefore he knoweth their works, &c.] Being God omniſcient, or rather takes notice of them, weighs and conſiders them, and gives to man according to them; or rather makes them known, for of his omniſcience Elihu had ſpoken before; he makes them known to themſelves, faſtens convictions of their evil ways and works on their conſciences, and obliges them to confeſs them, as the inſtances of Cain, Pharaoh, and others ſhew; and he makes them known to others by the judgments he executes, as on the old world, Sodom and Gomorrah; and the works of all will be made manifeſt at the day of judgment. And he overturneth them in the night; literally taken, as the firſt-born of the Egyptians were ſlain in the night; and Pharaoh and his hoſt were drowned in the Red-ſea in the night; and the Aſſyrian army were deſtroyed by an angel in one night; and Belſhazzar was killed in the night, and the Babylonian empire tranſlated to the Medes and Perſians at the ſame time: or figuratively, that is, ſuddenly, at unawares, and by ſurprize, and as quickly and eaſily as the night is turned into day; and ſuch a revolution is made, as when he turns the night into day, and diſcovers and makes known all their ſecret actions committed in the dark; or he turns the night of calamity upon them, and puts an end to their light of temporal happineſs and proſperity; or turns the night of death and everlaſting wrath and juſtice on them, the blackneſs of darkneſs upon them: ſo that they are deſtroyed; both in a temporal ſenſe on every ſide, with an utter deſtruction; tion; and in a ſpiritual ſenſe, with an everlaſting one.

[d] לא חקר abſque inquiſitione, Beza, Mercerus; ſine inveſtigatione, Michaelis; ſo Cocceius, Schultens.
[e] ויעמד & ſtare faciet, Pagninus, Montanus, V. L. ſo Mercerus, Druſius, Coeceius, Schultens.

℣. 26. He ſtriketh them as wicked men, &c.] Such is the ſtrict juſtice of God that he never ſtrikes men, or inflicts puniſhment on them, or brings down his judgments upon them, but as wicked men, and becauſe of their wickedneſs; the caſting of man out of Eden was for his ſin, as well as the caſting down the angels from heaven that ſinned; the drowning of the old world, the deſtruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, the ruin of Pharaoh and his hoſt, the driving the Canaanites out of their land, the various captivities of the Iſraelites, with other inſtances of God's diſpleaſure with men in this world, and the everlaſting puniſhment of them in another, are only of them as wicked men, and for ſin; and therefore he is not chargeable with any unrighteouſneſs. Sephorno interprets it inſtead of wicked men, and illuſtrates it by the ſhaking out of Pharaoh and his hoſt into the ſea in the room and ſtead of the wicked Iſraelites, that came up from thence, in the open ſight of others; which the ſame interpreter refers to the Iſraelites ſeeing the Egyptians dead on the ſea-ſhore; or in the place of them that ſee [f], that is, in a public manner, as generally malefactors are executed, to which the alluſion may be; it denotes the publickneſs of God's righteous judgments on wicked men, for the greater declaration of his power and juſtice, and for the greater ſhame and diſgrace of ſuch wicked men, and for the joy and comfort of the righteous delivered from them.

℣. 27. Becauſe they turned back from him, &c.] Became apoſtates from the ways and worſhip of God, as the poſterity of Cain before the flood, and the poſterity of Ham after it; who had been educated and trained up therein, and turned from the law of God, as the Septuagint verſion, from the light and law of nature: and would not conſider any of his ways; either of providence, whether in a way of mercy which might lead to repentance, or in a way of judgment which might be a caution and inſtruction to them; or of his precepts, the way of his commandments, not any of theſe would they conſider; ſo as to expreſs a value for them, ſhew any regard to them, and walk in them; and which was owing to the ſtubbornneſs of their wills; they would not advert to them.

℣. 28. So that they cauſe the cry of the poor to come to him, &c.] To God; through their oppreſſions of the poor they are made to cry by reaſon of them, and who come to God with their cries, and tears, and ſupplications, and which enter into the ears of the Lord of hoſts. And he heareth the cry of the afflicted; as he did the cry of the Iſraelites under Egyptian bondage; he is a God hearing and anſwering prayer, and he particularly attends to the cry of the humble, and of the afflicted, and ariſes for their help and deliverance.

℣. 29. When he giveth quietneſs, who then can make trouble? &c.] Quietneſs or peace is of God; external peace to bodies of men, to communities, civil and religious, and to particular perſons; quietneſs and contentment in outward enjoyments, peace and ſafety at home, and from enemies abroad; inward ſpiritual peace, this is of God, is in Chriſt, and from him; is the fruit of his righteouſneſs, ſpoke by his blood, comes through faith in Chriſt, and is enjoyed in his ordinances, and continues as long as it is the pleaſure of God to give it, and cannot be diſturbed by men or devils; a national peace, when God gives it, cannot be broke in upon; nor the peace of churches, though there are always ſome inclined to be troublers of the Iſrael of God; nor the peace of particular perſons, not their outward peace and quietneſs, when God ſets an hedge of providence about them; nor their inward peace, not by all the afflictions and perſecutions they meet with in the world; nor by all the temptations of Satan, and the corruptions of their own hearts. The Targum is, Who ſhall condemn? and ſo the Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, Syriac and Arabic verſions, when God acquits, abſolves, and juſtifies men, who can condemn them? See Rom. viii. 33. Iſaiah l. 8, 9. When God pronounces the ſentence of juſtification by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt in the conſcience of a ſinner, it produces peace ſolid and ſubſtantial, and this being done, who ſhall condemn? or of what avail will their condemnation be? whether of the law, or of Satan, or of the world, or of themſelves, of their own hearts. And when he hideth his face, who then can behold him? whether it be done againſt a nation, or againſt a man only? Whether God hides his face from a nation, as he ſometimes did from the nation of Iſrael, becauſe of their ſins; when he would not hear their prayers, nor aſſiſt them againſt their enemies, nor ariſe for their help and deliverance out of their hands: or from his church and people, his ſpiritual Jacob and Iſrael, as when they complain, their way is hid from the Lord, and the Lord has forgotten and forſaken them; or from particular perſons, as from David, Heman, and others; and who of the Lord's people, but at one time or another are under the hidings of his face? and then there is no finding him, no looking to him with comfort and confidence; no looking into and beholding the works and ways of God, and the cauſes of his dealings with them; theſe are out of ſight, his ways are in the deep, and his footſteps are not known. Some refer this to men, who will ſhew favour to him whom God frowns upon? who will look at him in a pleaſant manner, when God hides his face from him?

℣. 30. That the hypocrite reign not, &c.] Theſe words ſeem to be connected with ℣. 24. He breaketh in pieces mighty men, &c. to the end of ℣. 28. the whole twenty ninth verſe being read in a parentheſis; or with the phraſe he hideth his face; as God is ſaid to be in the deſtruction of mighty wicked men, who oppreſs the poor, and cauſe their cry to come to God, to prevent the reign of an hypocrite, or however to ſhorten it. By an hypocrite is not meant a common hypocrite in religion, but an hypocrite in politics; who pretends to great humanity and goodneſs, to a tender care of the people, and a preſervation of them in their rights and liberties, and promiſes to ſupport and eſtabliſh the conſtitution, and obſerve the laws of the nation, with a ſhew of zeal for the religion profeſſed in it. But when he has aſcended the throne, and got the power into his hands, he throws off the maſk and becomes a tyrant; and men of ſuch a temper, either God does not ſuffer to aſcend the throne, but if they do get on it through artifice and deceit, he ſuffers them not to continue, but depoſes them and cuts their reign ſhort: and this he does leſt the people be enſnared; be brought into bondage, and loſe their rights, privileges and liberties; or leſt they be drawn into ſin by their precepts or examples. Some take the ſenſe of the words to be, that God ſuffers not not such to reign, but when he does it is because of the offences or sins of the people; he gives them such kings in his wrath to punish them for their iniquities.

[f] במקום ראים in loco videntium, V. L. Pagninus, Montanus, Mercerus, Piſcator, Michaelis; in loco ſpectantium, Beza, Cocceius, Schultens.

ℵ. 31. Surely it is meet to be said unto God, &c.] By any afflicted person under his chastising hand, and particularly by Job, for whom the advice and instructions in this and the following verse are designed. I have born chastisement; the word chastisement is not in the text, but is very properly supplied, as it is by Jarchi and others; the affliction of God's people is a fatherly chastisement, and should be considered and born as such; and it becomes an afflicted good man to say, "I have born "and still do bear, and I am content yet to bear, "the chastisement of the Lord; I am desirous to "bear it willingly, chearfully, and patiently, until "he is pleased to remove it from me." See Mic. vii. 9. I will not offend any more; that is, sin any more; sin is an offence to God, being contrary to his nature, and a breach of his law; Job had sinned as every good man does, no man is without sin, in many things we all offend; and on account of sin God chastens his people, and the design of it is to bring them to a sense and acknowledgment of it; and it becomes them under chastening providences to confess it, and humble themselves under the mighty hand of God, and in the strength of divine grace determine to be careful not to offend more. Some render the words I will not corrupt [g]; that is, myself or others, my ways and works by sinning; and others, I will not break, or break through [h]; the commands of God; and so the sense of this and the former version is much the same with ours; or I will not endeavour to break thro' the afflictive providence in which I am shut up, or break off the fetters and cords of affliction, but bear all patiently, until it is the Lord's time and will to set me at liberty. Some, as Ben Gersom, interpret this and the preceding clause, I pardon, I will not destroy; or will not retain a pledge, as others [i]; and so take them to be the words of God himself; and thus Mr Broughton renders the whole verse, "Now unto the omnipotent which saith, I "pardon, I will not destroy, this should be said," namely, what follows in the next verse [k]: it is the prerogative of God, and it is his grace to pardon, and such whom he pardons he never destroys, but accepts, discharges and remits the surety's bond or pledge; and nothing more effectually engages to a careful abstinence from sin for the future, than a sense of pardoning grace; and it highly becomes such persons to say what they are next directed to.

ℵ. 32. That which I see not, teach thou me, &c.] Which may be understood either of the chastisements of God, and his dealings with his people in a providential way, and of the design and use of them, which are sometimes unsearchable, and at most but a part of them only seen and known; it is meet to say to God, it is but a small part and portion of thy ways that is known by me; I can see but little into them: teach me more of thy mind and will in them, or else of sins and transgressions the cause of chastisement; it is proper for an afflicted man to say unto God, I am conscious to myself of many sinful failings and infirmities, but there may be secret sins committed by me which have escaped my notice and observation, point them out to me, that I may be humbled for them, and make a free confession of them. If I have done iniquity, I will do no more; that is, if I have committed any capital crime, any foul offence or gross enormity, for otherwise no man lives without sin; I sincerely repent of it, and will take care for the future thro' divine grace, to do so no more.

ℵ. 33. Should it be according to thy mind? &c.] O Job, for the words seem to be directed to him; and may respect either the government of the world in general, and the disposal of all things in it, treated of in this chapter, though more remotely, ℵ. 13. Is it not proper that God should govern it who has made it, and do all things in it as he pleases? is it fit he should consult with men what to do, or be instructed and taught by them in the path of judgment? is it meet that every man should have his mind and will, and have every thing go in the form and course most eligible to him? Or else they may respect chastisement, with which the words are more nearly connected; and so the sense be, should man be consulted, as Job or any other, and his mind known first, whether he should be chastened or no? should a son or a servant be asked first by a parent or master, whether it is fitting to give correction or not? or is man to be advised with in what way and manner he should be chastened of God, whether in his person, or family, or estate? or how long the chastening should endure upon him, and when it should be removed? no surely; all should be left with God, the wise and sovereign disposer of all things. He will recompense it, whether thou refuse, or whether thou choose, and not I; that is, God will recompense chastisement; he will chastise whom he pleases, and in what manner he pleases, and as long as he pleases, whether man consents or submits to it or no; he will not ask his leave; he will do according to the counsel of his own will; and thou Job mayest choose or refuse to submit to him as thou likest best, for my part was it my case I would not refuse submission to his will; I would say, It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth good in his sight. Some make this last clause the words of God, put by way of question, Shouldst thou choose or refuse, and not I? shouldst thou have thine option and refusal, and not I? should man be his own chooser, or choose for himself what he likes best? should he not say, the Lord shall choose mine inheritance for me, though that inheritance is affliction? The words are rendered by others to different senses, all which to observe would be too tedious: some [l] to this sense, "what is of thyself God recompenses;" sin is of a man's self, it flows from his corrupt heart and will, he is not tempted to it of God; nor is it to be ascribed to the temptations of Satan, which, tho' they may have their influence, sin is a man's own act and deed; and God will recompense it in one way or another, whether man will or no; either in a way of punishment on the sinner himself, or on his surety for him; or in a way of fatherly correction and chastisement; and this is the Lord's doing and not mine, and he is just in so doing. Therefore speak what thou knowest; if thou knowest any thing better than this, or canst contradict what is said: or as others [m] to this purpose, "did ever such a speech "come from thee, as expressed in the preceding "verses? God will recompense it, if thou refusest "to speak in such a submissive manner; thou "mayest refuse to do it, I would not; I should "choose [g] לא אחבל non corrumpam, Montanus, Mercerus, Piscator. non pigneraba, Cocceius; non pigneratus eram, Schultens. Vid. Gusset. Ebr. Comment. p. 238.

[h] Non disrumpam, Beza.

[i] המעמך ישלתנה ecce de tuo rependit illud, Schultens. Junius and Tremellius.

[k] Figurine Version, Vatablus, Junius and Tremellius, Grotius.

[l] Non pig-

[m] Junius and Tremellius.

" chooſe to ſubmit and bear the affliction patient" ly; if thou thinkeſt otherwiſe, ſpeak out thy
" mind."

℣. 34. Let men of underſtanding tell me, &c.] Whether I am right or wrong; and let a wiſe man hearken unto me; to what I have ſaid or ſhall ſay. Elihu here addreſſes the company around him, the wiſe and intelligent part of them; the words may be rendered in the future tenſe, men of underſtanding will tell me [n], and a wiſe man will hearken to me and aſſent, not only to what I have ſaid, but to what I am about to ſay, namely what follows.

℣. 35. Job hath ſpoken without knowledge, &c.] Not that Job was an ignorant man, either in things natural or divine; but in this point, about the chaſtening hand of God upon him, he had ſaid ſome things which betrayed lack of knowledge, as in ℣. 5. And his words were without wiſdom; Job was not deſtitute of human wiſdom, nor of ſpiritual wiſdom, but no man is wiſe at all times; ſome things had dropped from him which ſavoured of folly and ignorance, and which he afterwards was convinced of, and confeſſed with ſhame, chap. xl. 4, 5. and xlii. 3. being charged by the Lord himſelf with what he is here by Elihu, chap. xxxviii. 2. and it may be obſerved, that Elihu does not charge Job with being a wicked man, as his three friends did, but as having ſpoken unadviſedly with his lips, under his chaſtening circumſtances, and which he labours to convince him of.

℣. 36. My deſire is that Job may be tried unto the end, &c.] This is my opinion, or what I bring in [o], adduce and lay before you, men of underſtanding and wiſdom, and leave it with you to conſider of. Some render it, O my Father, let Job be tried, &c. as if it was an apoſtrophe to God, and a requeſt to him; ſo Mr Broughton, who adds, " which art in heaven," and the ſame is added by ſome Jewiſh interpreters [p], as there are others [q] of them which go this way, and alſo ſeveral chriſtian commentators [r]; and of late [s] it has been urged from this and other paſſages, that Elihu was Chriſt, who here addreſſes God as his Father: but this is his New-Teſtament title; and though God is the father of all men by creation, and of ſaints by adoption, yet this relation and title are not ſo frequently claimed under the former diſpenſation, or however not ſo early as the times of Job, but are more peculiar to the goſpel-diſpenſation, under which ſaints receive not the ſpirit of bondage again to fear, but the ſpirit of adoption, whereby they cry, Abba, Father; wherefore admitting this verſion, rather ſome grave venerable perſon as Eliphaz [t], ſenior to Elihu, who was a young man, is addreſſed under this title; or the whole circle of Job's friends now about him, all elder than Elihu, may be intended; father for fathers, the ſingular for the plural, ſee Acts vii. 1. and what he propoſes is, that they ſhould make it their joint requeſt at the throne of grace, that Job's afflictions be ſtill continued; that he might be thoroughly tried by them, and be purged from all his droſs, he not appearing yet to be thoroughly ſenſible of his ſinful ſpeeches, and humbled for them; and therefore it was proper he ſhould be ſtill corrected and chaſtened to the end, or unto victory, as Mr Broughton, or untill victory was obtained, and he was obliged to yield and cry peccavi: but ſince afflictions are things not joyous but grievous, and it does not ſeem ſo agreeable to a good man, kind and humane, to deſire the continuance of the afflictions of another, though palliated with a plauſible pretence for his good; it ſeems better to underſtand this as a motion made to the underſtanding part of the company by Elihu, that the words of Job which he had ſpoken without knowledge and wiſdom, might be taken under ſtrict examination by them, and thoroughly ſcanned, that it might be better known what was proper to be ſaid more to him for his conviction. Becauſe of his anſwers for wicked men; or concerning or relative to ſuch anſwers which he had made, which were like to thoſe which wicked men make; who charge the ways of God with inequality and want of equity, and aſk where is the God of judgment? or which ſerve the cauſe of the wicked, and which furniſh them with arguments, prepare them for them, and put them into their mouths, to argue againſt God and his providential dealings with men, and againſt all religion. See ℣. 8.

℣. 37. For he addeth rebellion unto his ſin, &c.] Or he may or will add [u], if he is ſuffered to go on at this rate, and is not ſtopped; as yet he has only committed, it may be charitably hoped, ſome ſins through ignorance, error, and miſtake, but if he is let alone he will proceed from evil to evil, to more ungodlineſs; to be guilty of preſumptuous ſins, of open treaſon and rebellion againſt God. He clappeth his hands amongſt us, or he will clap; he will either clap his hands together as expreſſive of extreme grief and ſorrow, of the agonies of his mind; ſhewing extravagant impatience, and pouring out his complaints in the moſt bitter manner, ſee Ezek. xxi. 14. or rather by way of joy and triumph, as having got the victory over us, ſee Pſal. xlvii. 1. And multiplieth his words againſt God, or will multiply; he has ſaid too many things already againſt God, his juſtice in his dealings with him, ℣. 5. he will ſay more if he is not reſtrained. Theſe are the reaſons Elihu gives for a thorough trial and ſtrict examination of Job; and they are taken partly from a concern for the good of Job, and partly on their account, that they might not be triumphed over, and chiefly for the glory of God.

CHAP. XXXV.

IN this chapter Elihu goes on to charge Job with other unbecoming ſpeeches, which he undertakes to refute; as that he had repreſented his cauſe more juſt than God's, and religion and righteouſneſs as things unprofitable to men, only to God; to which Elihu takes upon him to make anſwer, ℣. 1—8. and that the cries of the oppreſſed were not heard by the Lord, ſo as to give occaſion to ſongs of praiſe and thankfulneſs, to which he replies, ℣. 9—13. and that Job had expreſſed diffidence

[n] יאמרו dicent; Junius and Tremellius, Piſcator, Vatablus, Mercerus, Druſius, Cocceius, Michaelis, Schultens: ſo Broughton.
[o] אבי pro אביא adducam, ſo ſome in Codurcus: hæc autem in medio affero, Tigurine Verſion; adduco, Schultens.
[p] P. Abraham Peritſol, Simeon Bar Tzemach, Sephorno.
[q] Jarchi, Aben Ezra, Ben Gerſom.
[r] Junius and Tremellius, Piſcator, Vatablus, Druſius, Cocceius; ſo V. L.
[s] Hodges's Elihu.
[t] So Hieron. Trad. Heb. fol. 75. I.
[u] יסף addet; Montanus, Mercerus, Druſius, Cocceius; ſo in the next clauſes.

dence and deſpair of ever ſeeing and enjoying the favour of God, which he endeavours to remove, ℣. 14, 15, 16.

℣. 1. Elihu ſpake moreover, and ſaid,] Elihu very probably pauſed a while, and waited to obſerve whether any of the company would riſe up, and either contradict and refute what he had ſaid, or declare their aſſent unto it and approbation of it; or rather to ſee whether Job would make any reply or no; but perceiving no inclination in him to it, he proceeded to take notice of ſome other undue expreſſions of Job, and refute them; one of which is obſerved in the following verſe, and the proof of it given in the next.

℣. 2. Thinkeſt thou this to be right, &c.] Elihu appeals to Job himſelf, to his conſcience and reaſon; who as a natural man, guided by the light of nature and reaſon only, and judging according to the dictates of a natural conſcience, and eſpecially as a good man, one that feared God, and had ſo much knowledge of him and his perfections, as his ſpeeches ſhewed, could never upon reflection think it right what he had ſaid concerning God and his juſtice, as follows; that thou ſaidſt, My righteouſneſs is more than God's? A ſtrange expreſſion this indeed! but what is to be underſtood, not of his perſonal righteouſneſs; Job in his ſenſes could never ſay that this was more or greater than God's, or to be above it and preferred to it in any ſenſe; nor even of righteouſneſs imputed. Old-Teſtament ſaints had the righteouſneſs of Chriſt imputed to them, and were juſtified by it; and ſo Job, who had knowledge of and faith in Chriſt as his living Redeemer, and the Lord his righteouſneſs: but then though this is the righteouſneſs of God, wrought out by one that is God as well as man, and approved and accepted of by God, and imputed by him to his people, which is revealed in the goſpel, and is unto all, and upon all them that believe, and they are made the righteouſneſs of God in Chriſt; yet this cannot be more than the righteouſneſs of God: beſides it is not the eſſential righteouſneſs of Chriſt as God, as Oſiander dreamed, by which men are juſtified, but his obedience, active and paſſive as Mediator, otherwiſe they would be deified who are juſtified by it; and if even ſo abſurd a notion as this could obtain, it would not be more than the righteouſneſs of God: much leſs can this be interpreted of Job's inherent righteouſneſs, or the new man which is created in righteouſneſs and true holineſs; ſince all the holineſs and righteouſneſs that is in man is from God, and at preſent imperfect, and therefore cannot be more or greater than his; and ſtill leſs can this be meant of Job's external righteouſneſs, which, how great ſoever, was not perfect and without ſin; whereas God is juſt and without iniquity. But there is not a juſt man that does good and ſins not. This therefore muſt be underſtood of the righteouſneſs of his cauſe; and to ſay that this was more than God's, was what he ought not to have ſaid, and was more than became him to ſay: for though a good man may defend himſelf againſt the calumnies of his enemies, by aſſerting his own righteouſneſs, innocence and integrity, and may deſire the Lord to plead his cauſe againſt them, and judge him according to his righteouſneſs and the integrity of his heart; but to attempt to make it out, that his cauſe is more righteous than the Lord's, is doing an ill thing. Now though Job had not expreſſed this in ſo many words, yet he had ſaid that from whence this might by conſequence be deduced; he had given great occaſion for ſuch an inference to be drawn from his ſpeeches; for ſince he had ſpoken ſo largely of his innocence and integrity, and holy life, and of the hard uſage nevertheleſs he had met with from God; and had repreſented his own caſe, as if he had behaved ſo well as to deſerve better treatment at the hand of God, than to be afflicted in the manner he was; that he had wrong done him, and complained of it, and could not be heard; his judgment was taken from him by the Lord; which was in effect to ſay, that his cauſe was better than the Lord's, and would bear a ſtricter examination than his; which to ſay was exceeding bad and unbecoming; ſee chap. xvi. 17. and xix. 7. and xxvii. 2.

℣. 3. For thou ſaidſt, What advantage will it be unto thee, &c.] Meaning that his righteouſneſs, his holy life and converſation, were of no avail to him: he received no more benefit by being righteous than if he was wicked, ſince God deſtroyed one as well as another; and ſince his righteouſneſs did not ſecure him from afflictions and calamities, it was of no advantage to him; he had not ſaid ſo in ſo many words, but it is inferred from what he had ſaid, chap. ix. 22. and x. 15. Man's own righteouſneſs is of no advantage to him as to juſtification before God, and acceptance with him, nor in the buſineſs of ſalvation, or with reſpect to heaven and happineſs, ſo as to give a right and title to it; but is of great advantage in other reſpects; is for ſelf-defence againſt the imputations and calumnies of wicked men; it makes a man honourable and reſpectable among men, when to live a vicious courſe of life is ſcandalous and reproachful; it gives pleaſure and ſatisfaction to the mind, the teſtimony of a good conſcience is matter of rejoicing; and ſuch a man is free from the racks and tortures of an evil conſcience others are diſtreſſed with; beſides, good works are an evidence of the truth and genuineneſs of faith to others, and ornament the doctrines of the goſpel and a profeſſion of them: and though a righteous man may be afflicted as others, yet in a different manner, in love and not in wrath, and always for his good. And, What profit ſhall I have, if I be cleanſed from my ſin? The words if I be cleanſed, are a ſupplement and ſeem neceſſary; ſo Mr Broughton ſupplies. Sin is of a defiling nature, yet man may be cleanſed from it, not by any thing he can do, but only by the grace of God and blood of Chriſt; and from ſuch a cleanſing profit ariſes. This fits a man for the ſervice and worſhip of God, and for communion with him; gives him peace of mind, and makes him meet for heaven. This Job had not expreſly ſaid, and not at all in this ſenſe, but it ſeems to be inferred from chap. ix. 29, 30, 31. where he is ſpeaking of outward purity of life, and yet was plunged into the ditch of afflictions. Some render the words to this ſenſe, as if there was no profit by expiation or atonement for ſin [u]; the ſame word ſignifying both ſin and atonement for it: there is none but by the blood and ſacrifice of Chriſt, and much profit ariſes from that; pardon of ſin proceeds upon it, and this furniſhes out much ſolid peace, joy and comfort, Rom. v. 10, 11. Others, what profit by puniſhment for ſin [w], unleſs to God? ſo ſin is ſometimes put for puniſhment; or through leaving ſin ſin and repenting of it [w]. Now though theſe are not the cauſes of the pardon of ſin, yet it is given and applied to ſuch who do repent of it, confeſs and forſake it, Prov. xxviii. 13. Iſai. lv. 7. Or by being without ſin [x]: no man is without ſin; but a man may be without any groſs and enormous crime he is chargeable with, or without living a vicious courſe of life; and this is profitable as has been before obſerved. Jarchi's paraphraſe is, "What ſhall I profit more by my righteouſneſs "than by my ſin?" which ſenſe is followed by others: I may as well be wicked as righteous; I am not the better for it, ſince I am afflicted in the manner I am: my righteouſneſs is of no profit to me, if to any, it is to God. To this Elihu returns an anſwer in the following verſes.

[u] מחטאתי de expiatione mea, Mercerus, &c. in expiando peccatum, Grotius; חטאה pro piaculo venit, Cocceius; ſo Simeon Bar Tzemach in loc.

[w] Supplicio meo, Junius & Tremellius; mucta pro illo aut pœna, Cocceius; ex pœna peccati mei, Druſius; ſo Ben Gerſom.

℣. 4. I will anſwer thee, and thy companions with thee.] Meaning not his three friends, as the Septuagint Verſion expreſſes it; for they were not on the ſide of Job, and of the ſame ſentiment with him, but rather on the ſide of Elihu; eſpecially Eliphaz, who expreſſes much the ſame ſentiment he does, chap. xxii. 2, 3. but all that were of the ſame mind with Job, whether preſent or abſent, or in whatſoever part of the world; the anſwer he ſhould return to him would ſerve for them all, and ſufficiently confute ſuch a bad notion of God, let it be embraced by whomſoever.

℣. 5. Look unto the heavens and ſee, &c.] The firmament of heaven, in which are the ſun and moon and ſtars: and behold the clouds which are higher than thou; the clouds of the air or ſky, which are lower than the ſtarry heavens, yet theſe were higher than Job, and much more the ſtarry heavens: but becauſe the word has the ſignification of thinneſs, which does not ſo well agree with the clouds, which are thick ſubſtances, condenſed air; ſome take it to be meant of the ſupreme region of the heavens, which is pure and thin; ſo Sephorno: and Job is directed to look to theſe, not as ſtar-gazers do, ſuch as are given to judicial aſtrology, to judge of the fates of men and kingdoms; but rather thereby to be led to the contemplation of God the author of them, and the glorious perfections of his being they diſplay; and chiefly to obſerve the height of them, that they were out of his reach, and he could neither help them nor hurt them; that he could neither increaſe nor diminiſh the light of the celeſtial bodies, which he could only behold; nor either forward or hinder their courſe, nor in the leaſt add to or abate their influence and efficacy; and if he could neither be beneficial nor hurtful to them, how was it poſſible that he could be of any advantage or detriment to God, by any actions of his good or bad, who is higher and out of ſight? This is the anſwer Elihu in general returned, he more particularly replies as follows.

℣. 6. If thou ſinneſt, what doſt thou againſt him? &c.] Sin is expreſly ſaid to be againſt God, Pſal. li. 4. It is contrary to his nature, as any contraries can be to each other: it is againſt his law, a breach and violation of it; and ſo againſt his ſupreme legiſlative power and authority, and a contempt of it; it is what he is angry with and is provoked by, being what he hates and abhors, and is abominable in his ſight. But then he cannot be ſuppoſed to be ſo affected with it as to be ruffled and diſcompoſed, or his peace be diſturbed, and his happineſs in the leaſt broke in upon; for affections are only attributed to him after the manner of men; much leſs is he ſo affected hereby, as to be hurt or in danger of being deſtroyed, nor even of being dethroned: men can no more reach him by any hoſtile action of theirs, ſuch as ſin is, than they can reach the ſun and ſtop its courſe, leſſen its light or pluck it from its orbit. Or, what canſt thou work for him? as Mr Broughton; by way of atonement or ſatisfaction for ſin? Nothing at all; ſee chap. vii. 20. but the other ſenſe is beſt. Or if thy tranſgreſſions be multiplied, what doſt thou unto him? As he is not hurt by a ſlight ſingle ſin, a failing or infirmity, an error or miſtake, common to men, as the preceding word may ſignify; ſo not by greater ſins, preſumptuous ones, groſs enormities, rebellions againſt God, overt-acts of treaſon againſt the Almighty, and theſe multiplied and heaped up even unto heaven; for though by theſe the name of God is profaned and blaſphemed, and he is diſhonoured and deſpiſed, and his manifeſtative glory is eclipſed, or he has not the honour given him that is due unto him; yet his eſſential glory is untarniſhed, unſullied and unhurt, no more than the ſun by an eclipſe; he is the ſame without any variableneſs or ſhadow of turning, as well as is over all bleſſed for ever. And indeed his manifeſtative glory in many inſtances receives a luſtre, through his power, wiſdom and goodneſs, overruling the ſins of men for the diſplay of it; as the fall of the firſt Adam made way for the ſending of Chriſt the Saviour, in which God has ſhewn forth the exceeding riches of his grace; and as his mercy and grace are diſplayed in the pardon of ſin, and his power and juſtice in the puniſhment of ſin and ſinners; and his patience and long-ſuffering in bearing with them.

℣. 7. If thou be righteous, what giveſt thou him? &c.] All righteouſneſs is of God that any creatures have. What the angels in heaven have, or Adam had in a ſtate of innocence; or what believers in Chriſt have in and from him; his righteouſneſs imputed to them, is of God; the grace of righteouſneſs or holineſs, imparted to them and implanted in them, is from him; and it is under the influence of his Spirit, and by his grace and ſtrength, they do works of righteouſneſs externally; and therefore can give nothing to him of their own, nor does he need any, being God all-ſufficient; even the goodneſs of his Son does not extend to him, but to the ſaints, Pſal. xvi. 2, 3. much leſs any goodneſs of theirs: their beſt works of righteouſneſs are due to him, and not gifts; and tho' they may contribute to his manifeſtative glory, both in them that do them and in others that ſee them, they can add nothing to the eſſential glory of God. Or what receiveth he of thine hand? He can receive nothing but what he has given, or what he has a prior right to and is his due, and ſo cannot be laid under any obligation to man by what he does; nor can man merit any thing at his hand, not even the leaſt temporal mercy, and much leſs ſpiritual ones and everlaſting life: and what notice God is pleaſed to take of the good works of men in a way of reward, is not of debt but of grace, and entirely owing to his goodneſs; and does not ariſe from any intrinſic worth in them, or from any advantage to him by them.

℣. 8. Thy wickedneſs may hurt a man as thou art, &c.] But not God: a man may hurt himſelf by [w] Subaudi relicto, ſo Mercerus, Druſius; remiſſo & per pœnitentiam diluto, Munſter. ita vivendo ut non peccem; ſo ſome in Michaelis.

[x] Abſque peccato, i. e.

by his wickedneſs; his body, by bringing various diſeaſes upon it, through debauchery and intemperance; his family and eſtate, by waſting it; his ſoul, for every ſin is a wrong and injury to a man's ſoul, and expoſes it to ruin and deſtruction: and ſin does even a good man hurt, ſince it breaks in upon his peace, and hinders his communion with God; and the wickedneſs of men may hurt others like themſelves, frail, mortal, ſinful creatures, and eaſily led aſide by ill examples; as well as there are many ſins which do injury to the perſons, families and eſtates of others, as murder, adultery, theft, &c. and ſince ſin is hurtful to others, God reſents it and puniſhes for it, though, ſtrictly ſpeaking, it cannot hurt him in the ſenſe before given. And thy righteouſneſs may profit the ſon of man; may profit a man himſelf, (ſee the note on ℣. 3.) and others, but neither for juſtification before God; but godlineſs is profitable to a man's ſelf, both for this life and that to come, and good works are profitable to other men; for what reaſons they are to be performed and maintained, ſee 1 Tim. iv. 8. Tit. iii. 8, 14. Some are of real and direct profit to men, as acts of beneficence to them, and all as being examples to them; but then no works of righteouſneſs can be profitable to God, they adding nothing to him; which is what Elihu undertook to anſwer to.

℣. 9. By reaſon of the multitude of oppreſſions, they make the oppreſſed to cry, &c.] Which is either an illuſtration by an inſtance of what is before ſaid, that wickedneſs hurts men, as particularly oppreſſion does, which makes men cry; or this refers to ſomething new, to another complaint of Job, or an undue expreſſion of his Elihu undertakes to anſwer; that men cry unto God, as he himſelf had, but are not heard and anſwered; the place or places referred to may be chap. xxiv. 12. and xix. 7. and xxx. 20. To which Elihu replies, by granting that men oppreſſed cry becauſe of their oppreſſion, and are not heard; for which reaſons may be given as in the following verſes. The poor are often oppreſſed by the rich, whoſe wealth gives them power, and that they abuſe; and the weak and feeble by the mighty; and their oppreſſions are many, there is a multitude of them: men in power and authority have various ways of oppreſſing others, who like the Iſraelites cry by reaſon of them, and are made to cry by their oppreſſors. And they cry out by reaſon of the arm of the mighty; which falls with weight, and lies heavy upon them, and cruſhes them; meaning the power they have, and which they abuſe to the injury of them; nor are they able to help themſelves or deliver themſelves out of their hands, they being mighty, if not in body, yet through wealth; and by means of that authority over them which gives it them: now on account of the preſſure upon them, they cry, not to God, but to men; and if they cry to God, it is in a murmuring and complaining way, thro' impatience under their burden, thro' envy at the riches and power of others, in a paſſionate manner, in a revengeful ſpirit, calling and ſeeking for vengeance on their oppreſſors; not in an humble, penitent manner, acknowledging their ſins, and owning their unworthineſs to be heard and regarded, and ſubmitting all to the will of God: for which reaſons they are not heard, their cries and prayers being reckoned no other than howlings, Hoſea vii. 14.

℣. 10. But none ſaith, Where is God my maker? &c.] Or makers[y], as in Pſal. cxlix. 2. Iſai. liv. 5. for there are more concerned in the formation of man, Gen. i. 26. even the Father, Son, and Spirit, who are the one God that has made all men, Mal. ii. 10. Now not one of the oppreſſed ones that cry by reaſon of their oppreſſion, or very few of them, inquire after God, ſeek unto him for help and deliverance from their oppreſſions, or deſire to enjoy him and his gracious preſence under their afflictions and diſtreſſes; and that is one reaſon why they are not heard: they do not ſo much as conſider him as the author of their beings, and be thankful to him for them; nor as the preſerver of them in their beings; nor as their kind benefactor, who gives them all that they enjoy, and who is the diſpoſer of all their affairs in providence: and if they are new creatures or are re-made, they are his workmanſhip; and therefore ſhould upon all accounts ſeek him and ſubmit to his will, and patiently bear all their afflictions, waiting his time to deliver them out of them: but there are few or none that regard him in this light, or make an inquiry after him, even though he has not only made them, but is he who giveth ſongs in the night; which reſpects not the praiſes of the angels in the night, as the Targum; nor the ſhining of the moon and ſtars in the night, which cauſe praiſe and thankfulneſs; nor the ſinging of birds in the night, as of the nightingale; ſenſes ſome give into: but matter and cauſe of rejoicing in the night, either taken literally, as the mercies of the day, which, when reflected upon when men come to lie down on their beds at night, and commune with their hearts there, afford them ſongs of praiſe, ſee Pſal. xlii. 8. Or the mercies of the night, as ſweet refreſhing ſleep, and preſervation in ſafety from all dangers by fire, thieves, &c. all which are of God; and, when duly conſidered, will direct to encompaſs him with ſongs of deliverance, ſee Pſal. cxxxvii. 2, 3. and iii. 5. and iv. 8. Or figuratively, the night ſometimes ſignifying a time of calamity, affliction and diſtreſs, either on temporal or ſpiritual accounts; and when men ſeek to him in ſuch a night with their whole hearts, and he is pleaſed to viſit them in a gracious manner, and favour them with his preſence and the diſcoveries of his love, this occaſions ſongs of praiſe to him, Iſai. xxvi. 9. Pſal. xvii. 3. But when men are unconcerned about, and not thankful for the mercies of the day and of the night, though theſe adminiſter ſongs unto them, it is no wonder that, when they cry through oppreſſion, they are not heard.

℣. 11. Who teacheth us more than the beaſts of the earth, &c.] Who are taught and know much, eſpecially ſome of them; but not ſo much as man, ſee Iſai. i. 3, 4. and maketh us wiſer than the fowls of heaven; who are wiſe to provide food and neſts for themſelves and their young; and ſuch as are birds of paſſage, as the turtle, the crane, the ſtork and the ſwallow, to know the time of their coming and returning, ſee Jer. viii. 7, 8, 9. But then neither the beaſts nor the fowls, though they are endowed with much knowledge and ſagacity, according to their natures, yet not with reaſon and underſtanding as men are; ſo as to make reflections on things they ſee and hear, and reaſon and diſcourſe about them; nor are they capable of being taught and attaining to knowledge and wiſdom as men are, by the works of God, of creation and providence; and by the word of God, the ſcriptures of truth, which are able to make men wiſe unto ſalvation; and by the Spirit of God, who teaches all things of a ſpiritual nature. God not only endows men with with reaſon, but with ſentiments of religion, which brutes are incapable of: he gives to men wiſdom in the hidden part; he puts in them his fear, which is the beginning of wiſdom; he makes them wiſe to know God in Chriſt, and to know his Son Jeſus Chriſt, whom to know is life eternal; and he gives them knowledge of a future ſtate, and hope of immortality and eternal life. Wherefore it becomes them to bear afflictions and oppreſſions with a fortitude of mind, and patiently ſubmit to the will of God, and wait his time for deliverance, having called upon him in faith, and left their caſe with him; but if they only cry, as the brutes do under their burdens, it need not ſeem ſtrange they are not heard and anſwered; ſince God has given them more wiſdom and knowledge than they, and therefore ſhould behave after another manner; though ſometimes they act a part inferior to them, Jude, ℣. 10.

[y] עשי factores mei; Druſius, Mercerus, Piſcator, Cocceius, Michaelis, Schultens; ſo Broughton.

℣. 12. There they cry, &c.] As brutes do, and as in ℣. 9. by reaſon of their oppreſſions, but not under a due ſenſe of the hand of God upon them, nor of his being their only helper, and ſaviour, and deliverer. But none giveth anſwer; to them, either God or men, and they lie groaning and howling under their oppreſſion. Becauſe of the pride of evil men; this is either to be connected with they cry, and then the ſenſe is, that they cry by reaſon of the oppreſſions of wicked men, who, through the pride of their hearts, and to ſhew their ſuperior power and authority, perſecute and diſtreſs them, Pſalm x. 2. And it is becauſe of this they cry out, being diſtreſſed by them, and not through any ſenſe of ſin they have committed, as the reaſon of God's ſuffering them to be thus oppreſſed: or with none give anſwer; God gives them no anſwer to their cry, becauſe pride is not withdrawn from them, which is one end he has in afflicting men; becauſe they are not humbled under the mighty hand of God, and are not brought to a ſenſe of ſin and humiliation for it, and acknowledgment of it. And another reaſon follows:

℣. 13. Surely God will not hear vanity, &c.] Or a lie[z], than which nothing is more an abomination to him; if men come to him with a lie in their mouths they cannot expect to be heard by him; he is only nigh to thoſe who call upon him in truth: or that which is raſh[a]; which is raſhly uttered, and in a paſſionate wrathful manner, ſavouring of a revengeful ſpirit, too often the caſe of thoſe that cry under oppreſſion; ſee Eccl. v. 2. 1 Tim. ii. 8. or vain and empty prayers, a ſpeech of vanity, as Aben Ezra; which as to the matter of them are about vain and empty things; only for outward mercies, worldly goods; and not for ſpiritual mercies, or ſuch things as are according to the will of God; but what are pleaſing to the fleſh, and ſought for to conſume on the luſts of it, and therefore ſuch prayers are not heard, Pſalm iv. 6. James iv. 3. and as to the manner of them, they are not put up in the name of Chriſt, nor under the influence of the ſpirit of Chriſt, nor in the exerciſe of any grace, nor with reverence of God, nor with ſincerity of ſoul, not in faith, nor with fervency: or vanity is put for vain men, as ſin for ſinners; ſuch as are proud men, and are vainly puffed up in their fleſhly mind. God hears humble penitent ſinners, who find mercy with him; and humble ſaints, to whom he gives more grace; but not proud phariſees, or men unhumbled by afflictions; ſee Luke xviii. 11—14. nor light and empty perſons, who are without God and Chriſt, deſtitute of the ſpirit, devoid of all grace, and full of all unrighteouſneſs; unſtable ones, who are vanity itſelf, and lighter than vanity, toſſed to and fro like a wave of the ſea, and double minded, James i. 6, 7, 8. nor men of vain converſations, that walk in the vanity of their minds, whoſe words are vain, and eſpecially ſuch as take the name of God in vain; and all whoſe actions are vain, or ſuch that live a vain and ſinful courſe of life; God hears not ſinners, John ix. 31. Neither will the Almighty regard it; vanity, vain prayers and vain perſons; he regards the prayer of the deſtitute, the lowly, and the humble, but not the prayer of ſuch as before deſcribed; he cannot look at it[b], nor at them: he looks to the poor and contrite, and deſires to ſee their countenance and hear their voice in prayer; but he is of purer eyes than to look on vain perſons, and their vain prayers; and a greater contempt cannot be ſhewn to petitioners and their petitions, than when thoſe to whom they apply will not ſo much as look at them, but turn both a deaf ear to them, and their eyes away from them.

℣. 14. Although thou ſayeſt, thou ſhalt not ſee him, &c.] Which is another expreſſion of Job's taken notice of by Elihu, and to which he makes anſwer; he ſeems to refer to chap. xxiii. 3, 8, 9. God is indeed inviſible in his nature and eſſence, but is to be ſeen in his works of creation and providence; which Job was acquainted with, and in which he had ſeen ſomewhat of the glory of God, and of his divine perfections in them. See chap. ix. 4—10. and xxvi. 14. And he is to be ſeen in Chriſt by an eye of faith, and Job had truſted in him as his ſalvation; and he will be ſeen with the beatific viſion in heaven as he is, in a more glorious and perfect manner, which Job had a full perſuaſion of, chap. xiii. 15, 16. and xix. 26, 27. and therefore is not to be underſtood in either of thoſe ſenſes, but of his not ſeeing him on a throne of judgment, hearing and trying his cauſe, judging and acquiring him; this he had often deſired, but deſpaired of ever ſeeing it; ſee chap. xxiii. 4, 5, 6, 7. and xxxi. 35, 36, 37. and ix. 32—35. to which Elihu replies. Yet judgment is before him; all things are naked and open to him, and ſtand clear before him; he has perfect knowledge of what is right and wrong; no cauſe is unknown to him, and needs not to be ſearched into by him; nor can he, nor will he ever paſs a wrong judgment: he is juſt and true, righteous in all his ways and works, the judge of the whole earth, who will do right, and will plead and judge the cauſe of every good man ſooner or later; if not now, there is a judgment to come with him, when all muſt appear before his judgment-ſeat, and he will render unto every man according to his works. Therefore truſt thou in him, or wait for him[c]; wait for his coming to judgment; wait till that time comes when every thing will be brought to light, and every good man ſhall have praiſe of God. Or as we render it, truſt in him; God alone is the object of truſt and confidence, and happy is the man that truſts in him; he is to be truſted in for all things, both temporal, ſpiritual and eternal; and particularly for this of doing juſtice to his people; if not now, yet hereafter, he will render tribulation to them that trouble them; he will right all their wrongs, and avenge their injuries, and remove the rebuke that is upon them, and confeſs them before before men and angels, and declare them righteous, and receive them into his kingdom and glory: and he is to be truſted in at all times, in times of adverſity as well as proſperity; and even when he is not to be ſeen, and the diſpenſations of his providence are dark and intricate, ſee Iſa. l. 10. The word uſed ſignifies ſuch a truſt, hope, and waiting, as of a woman in travail, who bears her pains patiently, hoping and truſting for a ſafe deliverance of a child, to the joy of her and her family.

[z] שוא falſitatem, Beza; mendacium, Pagninus, Montanus. [a] Quod temerarium eſt, Cocceius. [b] ישורנה non intuatur illud, Pagninus, Montanus; non videt illud, Cocceius; ſo Michaelis and Schultens. [c] תחולל לו & expectabis eum, Montanus; expecta eum, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Mercerus; ſo Michaelis, Schultens.

℣. 15. But now becauſe it is not ſo, &c.] Becauſe there was not ſuch truſt, hope, patience, and quiet expectation in Job that God would appear for him, and do him juſtice openly and publicly; for though he had hope and confidence of an intereſt in his living redeemer and ſaviour, and of eternal life and happineſs through him; yet not of his bringing his judgment to the light, and of his beholding his righteouſneſs, as he ought to have had, ſee Pſal. xxxvii. 5, 6, 7. Mic. vii. 9. He hath viſited in his anger; corrected and chaſtiſed in fatherly anger and diſpleaſure, though not in wrath and vengeance, and in a way of puniſhment in ſtrict juſtice; but conſiſtent with his invariable love and free favour in Chriſt; being diſpleaſed at his want of faith and patience, failing in the exerciſe of which is oftentimes reſented by the Lord, ſee Numb. xx. 12. Zeph. iii. 2. Yet he knoweth it not in great extremity: ſo ſtupid was Job, that though he was in the utmoſt extremity of affliction, in his body, family, and ſubſtance, yet was not ſenſible it was his duty to truſt in God, and patiently wait for him; he knew that the hand of God was upon him, and that he had viſited him in anger, and that his arrows ſtuck faſt in him, and his hand preſſed him ſore; but was inſenſible of the cauſe of the continuance of it, his unbelief, impatience, and non-ſubmiſſion to the will of God. The word for extremity ſignifies abundance[d], and may be applied to an abundance and plenty of good things; and therefore ſome underſtand it of Job's proſperity, and take the ſenſe to be, that God took no notice of this; it did not hinder him from viſiting him, but he deſtroyed it all: though Mr Broughton, on the other hand, interprets it of the great plenty of ſorrows and diſtreſſes Job was attended with, the true cauſe of which he did not advert to: ſome[e] think the whole refers to the merciful dealings of God with Job, and read the firſt clauſe "know "now his anger hath viſited but a little or nothing;" the affliction is but a light one comparatively ſpeaking, ſcarce any thing at all in compariſon of what ſin deſerves, being abundantly leſs than that: "neither hath he made great inquiſition, or inquired out "the multitude" of ſins; not ſtrictly and ſeverely marking them, and dealing with and for them according to their deſerts; ſee Ezra ix. 13. Pſalm ciii. 10. with which compare 2 Cor. iv. 17. and therefore Job had no reaſon to complain of God, or of any hard uſage from him.

℣. 16. Therefore doth Job open his mouth in vain, &c.] In uttering ſuch unbecoming expreſſions, obſerved and refuted, in his loud complaints of God, and of his dealings with him, and in defence of himſelf. He multiplieth words without knowledge; both againſt God and in anſwer to others; being in a great meaſure ignorant of the nature and number of his ſins, and of his afflictions; and of the end of God in them, and of the right he had to lay them upon him; as well as of his duty patiently to bear them, and truſt in God, and wait his own time for deliverance out of them; and of the truth of this he was afterwards convinced, and acknowledged it, chap. xlii. 3.

CHAP. XXXVI.

THIS chapter, with the following, contains Elihu's fourth and laſt diſcourſe, the principal view of which is to vindicate the righteouſneſs of God; which is done by obſerving the dealings of God with men in his providence, according to their different characters, and from the wonderful works wrought by him in a ſovereign manner, and for the benefit of his creatures. This chapter is introduced with a preface, the deſign of which is to gain attention, ℣. 1—4. the different dealings of God with men are obſerved, and the different iſſue of them, and the different ends anſwered thereby, ℣. 5—15. and it is ſuggeſted to Job, that had he attended to the deſign of the providence he was under, and had ſubmitted to it patiently, things would have been otherwiſe with him; and therefore Elihu proceeds to give him ſome advice, which if taken would be for his own good, and the glory of God, ℣. 16—25. and cloſes the chapter by obſerving the unſearchable greatneſs of God, as appears by the works of nature wrought by him, ℣. 26—33.

℣. 1. Elihu alſo proceeded, and ſaid,] or added[f], what follows to his former diſcourſes; pauſing a while to ſee whether Job would make any reply to what he had already ſaid; but perceiving he had no inclination to do it, and having more upon his mind to deliver, went on with his diſcourſe.

℣. 2. Suffer me a little, &c.] Bear with me a little longer, and allow me to ſay a few words more. I have but little more to ſay, and it will take but a little time to ſay it in; thus propoſing brevity he hoped to be heard with patience, ſince he ſhould not long treſpaſs upon it. The word uſed has the ſignification of a crown; but not to be underſtood in the ſenſe of ſurrounding, as a crown ſurrounds the head, as ſome, who interpret it, ſtand about me, ſurround me, in order to hear; for this cannot with propriety be ſaid to a ſingle perſon; but rather in the ſenſe of doing honour, as Aben Ezra; and ſo the meaning may be, do me the honour of giving me thy preſence a little longer, and hearing me out patiently. And I will ſhew thee; make things clear, manifeſt, and plain to thee: clearneſs of expreſſion, with brevity, recommends a diſcourſe. Something may be here ſupplied; for a greater ſtop is here to be made than in our verſion, as either my opinion, as in chap. xxxii. 10, 17. his ſentiment concerning God and his righteouſneſs in his dealings with the ſons of men; or truth, as Ben Gerſom; truth in general, plain naked truth, without any colouring, juſt as it is, cordially, ſincerely, in love, and by clear manifeſtations of it; and particularly the truth of the righteouſneſs of God in all his ways and works. He propoſed to make it clear to him that God did all things well and right, and to lay before him in the plaineſt manner what were the ends of God

[d] בפש in copia, Montanus; ad auctum valde, Cocceius; proſperitatem, De Dieu; ſo Patrick. [e] Tigurine Verſion, Mercerus, Piſcator; ſo Ben Gerſom. [f] ויסף & addidit, Pagninus, Montanus, Cocceius, Mercerus, Michaelis.

God had in view in dealing thus with Job, and what was his duty to do in his preſent circumſtances. That I have yet to ſpeak in God's behalf; or for I have yet to ſpeak, &c.[g] Elihu had ſaid much for God already, in vindication of his ſovereignty, purity, holineſs, and juſtice, and he had yet more to ſay; out of the abundance of his heart his mouth ſpake for God; he ſet out with this, that he was full of matter, and wanted to vent himſelf, that he might be eaſed, chap. xxxii. 18, 19, 20. and he had vented much, but he had yet more to deliver; and ſince it was not for himſelf, in his own behalf, nor of any other, but God, he hoped he ſhould be heard: it may be rendered, for yet God has words[h], to put into my mouth, and ſpeak by me; ſignifying, that he had ſpoken by him already, and had ſtill more to ſay by him; and ſince it was not ſo much he that ſpoke, as God that ſpoke in him and by him, it might be expected he would be heard.

℣. 3. I will fetch my knowledge from afar, &c.] Not from himſelf; for it is but a ſmall ſhare of knowledge that a man gets of himſelf, or attains to by the light of nature, and eſpecially concerning God, and divine things; but from others, either from perſons that lived in former ages, and in foreign countries; it being uſual for men deſirous of acquiring knowledge to travel into diſtant parts for it; and ſuch were generally much eſteemed of, and the knowledge they profeſſed to have got and publiſhed; as the Queen of Sheba came from the further parts of the earth to hear and learn the wiſdom of Solomon: or rather the ſenſe is, he would fetch the knowledge he ſhould now communicate concerning God, from God himſelf, from the nature and perfections of God, who, and his knowledge, are high as heaven; and from the works of God, which are far above men; or ſhould treat of things deep and ſublime, and not common; though perhaps it is beſt of all to read the words, I will bring forth knowledge concerning, or with reſpect to him that is afar off[i]; that is, God, who is in the higheſt heavens, and inhabits the high and holy place; a God both at hand and afar off; with which agrees what follows; though ſome interpret it of lifting it up, and cauſing it to be heard afar off, ſo ſome, as Aben Ezra. And will aſcribe righteouſneſs to my maker; God is the maker of all men; Elihu conſidered him as his maker with gratitude, whilſt many are regardleſs of him, chap. xxxv. 10. and therefore thought himſelf obliged to ſpeak for him, and on his behalf; and particularly in vindication of his righteouſneſs; aſſert this to be an eſſential attribute and perfection of his nature; own, acknowledge, publiſh, and declare it; give him the glory of it, and demonſtrate that he is righteous in all his ways and works; and clear him from all imputation of unrighteouſneſs.

℣. 4. For truly my words ſhall not be falſe, &c.] But ſtrictly true; he would take the utmoſt care to ſay nothing but the truth, with the greateſt impartiality and ſincerity, ſo that what was ſaid might be depended upon; truth ſpoken briefly, clearly, and on ſo important a ſubject as the righteouſneſs of God, deſerved attention. He that is perfect in knowledge is with thee; meaning either God, whoſe knowledge is perfect, who knows all perſons and things; knows himſelf, his nature, perſons, and perfections; his thoughts, counſels, and purpoſes; all his creatures, angels and men; the hearts of all men, their thoughts, words, and works; he, the omniſcient and omnipreſent God, was with Job, from whoſe preſence there is no fleeing; and therefore it became him to be careful of his thoughts, words, and actions; that he did not entertain any unbecoming thoughts of God, and ſay any thing unworthy of him, or do any thing that tended to his diſhonour; ſince he was preſent with him, and nothing could eſcape his notice: or elſe Elihu means himſelf; ſuggeſting, that he who undertook to ſpeak for God, and plead his cauſe, and clear him from the charge of unrighteouſneſs, was no novice, but one that thoroughly underſtood the point in hand; and though no man is perfect in knowledge in an abſolute ſenſe, yet may be in compariſon of others; or however may be upright and ſincere in his knowledge; which ſenſe the word uſed often has; and ſo it may ſignify, that as he was a ſincere ſearcher after knowledge, and had through divine goodneſs attained to a competent ſhare of it, even of ſound and not ſuperficial knowledge, he ſhould be honeſt and upright in the communication of it; and this he might chooſe to obſerve the more, to excite the attention of Job to what he had to ſay; though it may be, the trueſt reading of the words is, perfect knowledge, or perfection of knowledge is with thee[k], that is, in his own apprehenſion, ſo Jarchi; and may be underſtood either ironically, or rather really, inſinuating that Job was a man of ſuch conſummate wiſdom and knowledge, that he would eaſily ſee the force of his reaſonings, and the juſtneſs of them, and acquieſce in them; and having thus prefaced his diſcourſe, he next enters upon his ſubject.

℣. 5. Behold, God is mighty, &c.] This is a clear, plain truth, eaſy to be diſcerned, and worthy of notice, and therefore introduced with a behold; that God is mighty, the moſt mighty, the almighty, as appears from his works of nature and providence; making all things out of nothing, upholding them by the word of his power, and governing and over-ruling all things in the world, and doing in it whatever he pleaſes: and from the works of redemption and grace; ranſoming his people out of the hands of them that are ſtronger than they; converting them by the power of his grace; aſſiſting them to do all they do in a ſpiritual way; ſupporting them under all their troubles; protecting and defending them from all their enemies; ſupplying all their wants, and preſerving them ſafe to his kingdom and glory. And deſpiſeth not any; not the meaneſt of his creatures, clothing the graſs of the field, feeding the fowls of the air, and preſerving man and beaſt; and particularly he deſpiſes not any of the ſons of men: not the mighty thro' fear of them, nor envy at them, whoſe power and grandeur are from him, which he gives and can take away at his pleaſure; nor the mean and miſerable, the poor and the afflicted, to whom he has a merciful regard; much leſs the innocent and harmleſs, as the Septuagint; or the juſt and righteous man, as the Targum: he does not deſpiſe his own people, whom he has loved and choſen, redeemed and called; nor any, as Aben Ezra obſerves, without a cauſe; for though there are ſome whoſe image he will deſpiſe, it is becauſe of their own ſins and tranſgreſſions; and ſince therefore, though though he is mighty, yet deſpiſes not any of his creatures, he cannot do any unrighteous thing; he does not and cannot uſe or abuſe his power to the injury of any of his creatures. He is mighty in ſtrength and wiſdom; as there is a pleonſam, a redundancy in the expreſſion, mighty in ſtrength, it denotes the abundance of his ſtrength, that he is exceeding ſtrong, ſuperlatively and beyond all expreſſion ſo; and alſo ſtrong in wiſdom, his ſtrength is tempered with wiſdom, ſo that he cannot employ it to any bad purpoſe, or be guilty of any unrighteouſneſs. Some men have ſtrength, but not wiſdom to make a right uſe of it; but God abounds as much in wiſdom as in ſtrength; he is the only wiſe and the all-wiſe God, and therefore can do no injuſtice; and thus Elihu, as he promiſed, aſcribes righteouſneſs to his almighty maker.

[g] כי quia, Pagninus, Montanus; nam, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator. [h] עוד לאלוה מלים adhuc Deo ſermones, Montanus; habet enim Deus adhuc quod dicet, Caſtalio; ſo ſome in Michaelis. [i] למרחוק ei, vel de eo qui eſt longinquus; ſo Aben Ezra, Bar Tzemach. [k] תמים רעות עמך ſcientiæ perfectæ tecum; ſo ſome in Bar Tzemach.

℣. 6. He preſerveth not the life of the wicked, &c.] He makes a difference between wicked and righteous men, which ſhews him to be a holy and righteous God; though he preſerves the life of all men ſo long as they live, yet not in the ſame way; he preſerves the lives of wicked men in the common courſe of his providence, but not in a ſpecial way and manner, as he does the lives of the righteous, which are dear and precious to him; nor does he preſerve to any great length ſuch as are notorious ſinners, who are guilty of capital crimes, as murder, &c. their lives are ſhortned, and they do not live out half their days: or he does not quicken them, beſtow his ſpiritual favour upon them, in which only is life; and though they will be quickened and raiſed at the laſt day, as well as the righteous, yet not to the reſurrection of life, but to the reſurrection of damnation. But giveth right to the poor; pleads their cauſe and rights their wrongs, adminiſters juſtice to them, eſpecially to the poor in ſpirit, who hunger and thirſt after righteouſneſs; to theſe he gives freely the righteouſneſs of his Son, which only denominates perſons truly righteous: of whom in the next verſe.

℣. 7. He withdraweth not his eyes from the righteous, &c.] His eyes of providence are upon them to ſupply their temporal wants, and to protect and defend them from their enemies, and they are never off of them; his eyes of love, grace, and mercy, are upon them; he always viewed them as righteous in his Son, and through his righteouſneſs imputed; and looked upon them with delight and pleaſure, and always ſo views them; they are engraven on his heart and on his hands, and are ever before him, and in his ſight: and his eyes are upon them from the beginning of the year to the end of it, yea from one eternity to another; theſe were ſet upon them from everlaſting, and are upon them in time; at the time of their converſion to quicken them, and call them by his grace; and afterwards they continue upon them under all their afflictions, temptations, and deſertions, and ever will remain on them; they will never be withdrawn, nothing can ſeparate them from the love of God. But with kings are they on the throne; that is, either the eyes of the Lord are with them, even with righteous kings, as the Targum; to guide and direct them in the affairs of government, and to protect and preſerve them from the deſigns of evil men: or the righteous are with kings on the throne, or are the favourites of kings that are on thrones; are admitted into their preſence, and are highly eſteemed by them, and have honour conferred on them, even to be the next to them in the throne and kingdom, as Joſeph and Daniel: or rather, the righteous are equal to kings on the throne; they are ſo accounted of by the Lord as kings; they are made by him kings and prieſts, and are regarded by him as ſuch; they have the power, and riches, and honour of kings; they have a kingdom of grace beſtowed on them now, and a kingdom of glory they are entitled to hereafter; and ſhall reign with Chriſt on earth a thouſand years, and in the ultimate glory to all eternity. Yea, he doth eſtabliſh them for ever; as righteous perſons in their righteouſneſs, which is an everlaſting one; ſo that they ſhall never come into condemnation: they are eſtabliſhed in the love of God, in the covenant of grace, in the hands of Chriſt, and in a ſtate of grace now, and ſhall be in a ſtable permanent ſtate of happineſs to all eternity. And they are exalted; now, being raiſed as beggars from the dunghill to ſit among princes, even among the princes of God's people; and they will be exalted hereafter and ſit at Chriſt's right hand, and be introduced into his kingdom, where they will be ſet down with him in his throne, and reign with him for ever and ever.

℣. 8. And if they be bound in fetters, &c.] Not the wicked, as the Targum, but the righteous ſpoken of in the preceding verſe, with which this is cloſely connected; and this is not to be underſtood of righteous kings on the throne in particular, or their ſpecial favourites, but of the righteous in general; and not in a literal ſenſe, of their bonds and impriſonment for religion and righteouſneſs-ſake, which is ſometimes their lot; but in a figurative ſenſe, of afflictions, as chaſtenings and corrections for ſin, as appears by the next clauſe; and the deſign is to obviate an objection, and to ſhew that the eye of God is upon them, and his heart towards them; and they are not the leſs objects of his love and delight, of his value and eſteem, care and protection, tho' they are afflicted by him, and, as it may ſeem, uſed with ſome ſeverity; ſeeing he has gracious ends and deſigns in all this, which are ſuggeſted in the following verſes. And be holden in cords of affliction; righteous men are not exempt from afflictions; the afflictions of the righteous are many, according to divine appointment, the covenant of grace, the declaration of God, the conſtant experience of good men, it being the way in which they are all led, and muſt enter into the kingdom; and the metaphor here uſed ſhews that afflictions are ſometimes heavy upon them, like fetters and chains, and thoſe made heavy by the hand of God preſſing them ſore, Lam. iii. 7. no affliction is joyous, but grievous and heavy in itſelf; it is indeed comparatively light when viewed with the weight of glory; and God can make a heavy affliction light with his preſence, and the diſcoveries of his love; but they are heavy to the fleſh as Job felt his to be, chap. vi. 2, 3, 12. and xxiii. 2, 3. and, like fetters and cords, they cannot free themſelves from them, or looſe them, until it is the pleaſure of God to take them off; and moreover by theſe they are ſometimes held and reſtrained from going into more or greater ſins, which is one uſe of them: as they are with afflictions hedged about that they cannot come out, any more than a perſon bound faſt in a priſon; ſo they are hedged up with thorns that they cannot go out after their lovers, Lam. iii. 7. Hoſ. ii. 6. Some render the phraſe, cords of poverty; it is oftentimes the caſe of righteous perſons to be poor, and to be ſadly hampered with poverty, and out of which, by all that they can do cannot extricate themſelves; and ſometimes they fall into it, and and are held in it, after they have enjoyed much worldly prosperity, which was the case of Job. Mr Broughton renders it, cords of anguish; and indeed the word for cords is used of the pains of a woman in travail, who has then great anguish and trouble; and anguish on various accounts lays hold on the righteous, and they are holden thereby and cannot relieve themselves, Psal. cxix. 143. and yet this is all in mercy, and to answer some good ends and purposes, as follow.

בחבלי עני funibus paupertatis, Mercerus, Druſius; funibus inopiæ, Cocceius.

℣. 9. Then he sheweth them their work, &c.] Either what they ought to do, so the Tigurine version; and which they have not done, their sins of omission; when they have been negligent either of the duty of prayer in private and public, or of attendance on the ordinances of the house of God; then he sends an affliction, and by it, as in a glass, presents to their view the omissions they have been guilty of: or else the work which they have done, and should not have done, their sins of commission: sin is a work at which some toil and labour, and weary themselves to commit; it is a work of the flesh; and so it is in good men; it is a man's own work, and which he can work of himself; to have a will, and to do good works, is owing to God working in his people, and it is through him strengthning them they do them; but sinful works are their own act and deed, though tempted to them by others, and which they are able to do of their own free will and power. Now God, in the glass of affliction, holds forth to view the sinful actions of good men, and brings them to their remembrance which they had forgotten; as the cases of Joseph's brethren, David, and others prove: the Lord shews them that they have done such actions, and shews them the evil of them, how exceeding sinful they are; and humbles them under a sense of them, and brings them to repentance for them, and an acknowledgment of them; which sense is confirmed by the next clause, which explains what this their work is, and their transgressions that they have exceeded. Sin is a transgression of the law; every sin greater or lesser is, and even righteous persons are guilty of many; for there is not a just man that sinneth not; and these exceed the bounds set by the righteous law of God, and many of them are sadly aggravated by the light and knowledge, grace and mercy, such have been favoured with: and some of them, they are suffered to fall into, are exceeding great and exceeding sinful; such as those of David, Peter and others; all which they are made to see, bewail and weep over, when God by afflictions brings them to a sense of them. Or when or because they have prevailed [m]; or begin to prevail: as soon as ever indwelling sin begins to be prevalent, the Lord is pleased to take measures to nip it in the bud, by sending a sharp and severe affliction; or when it has prevailed greatly, as sometimes it does, so that good is hindered from being done, and much evil is committed, then the soul is so much under the power of it, as to be carried captive with it; see Rom. vii. 23, 24. Or because they are become proud, or behaved themselves proudly [n]; and therefore he afflicts them to humble them, and hide pride from them.

℣. 10. He openeth also their ear to discipline, &c.] Or to correction [o]; to the rod of correction; to bear the weight of it and him that has appointed it; its reproving voice for sin, its directing voice to duty, and its commanding voice to return from iniquity, as in the next clause. Or to instruction [p]; God's corrections of his people being instructions to them, whereby they learn more of their duty, and of the rich experiences of grace, their faith, hope, love and patience, are tried and increased hereby; and more of the love of God, of his care and faithfulness, of his covenant, of his gracious presence and communion with God, what it is; and even of the doctrines of the everlasting gospel: sometimes more is learned by an affliction than by a sermon. Now in order to hearken hereunto, to the voice of God in an affliction, the ear must be opened; which is first done in conversion by the mighty power of God: but sometimes good men fall asleep, and are inattentive to divine things; and this is one way God takes to awaken them, to arouze their attention; he speaks to them out of a whirlwind; he sends some terrible, startling affliction, which fetches them out of their slumber, and so their ears are opened to hear what he says in it: at the noise of his water-spouts, and his billows one after another rolling over them, they are awakened to a sense of their sin and duty, Psal. xlii. 7. And commandeth that they return from iniquity; repent of their sin, turn from it and forsake it: such a strong voice has an affliction in it, when sanctified and attended with the spirit and power of God; then it effectually teaches men to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, as the word of God, the gospel of the grace of God does, when accompanied with the same; as there is a commanding voice in the one, so there is in the other; and happy it is when such ends as these are answered by afflictions.

℣. 11. If they obey and serve him, &c.] That is God, to whom so many things are ascribed in the preceding verses; and who only is to be obeyed and served in a religious way, with the obedience of faith and love, in all his commands and ordinances. But here not so much obedience to his word, his law or gospel, as to his rod, is intended: if they hear, &c. [q] hear the rod and him that has appointed it; hearken to his reproving, instructing and commanding voice in affliction; to his calls, cautions and admonitions thereby given, and act according to them; humble themselves under the mighty hand of God, and return from iniquity: they shall spend their days in prosperity, and their years in pleasures: which intimates, that those to whom afflictions are sanctified, and they obedient under them, when recovered out of them shall enjoy long life; not only live many days, but years, and those in great prosperity and pleasure; be blessed with much temporal prosperity, which lies in riches and wealth, as this word is rendered in chap. xxi. 13. and in bodily health, which is a considerable part of outward prosperity; but more especially prosperity of soul may be intended, see 3 John 2. which is enjoyed when a man is favoured with the discoveries of the love of God to him; with applications of pardoning grace and mercy; when grace is in lively exercise in him, and he has a spiritual appetite for the good word of God, and is fruitful in every good work: and so pleasures do not so much design corporal pleasures, though ever so innocent and lawful; for though they may at proper times be indulged unto, yet a man's days and years are not to be spent in them; but rather spiritual pleasures, which are had in views of the wonderful love love of God in Chriſt; in the enjoyment of the gracious preſence of God, and communion with him; and which the people of God are favoured with, in his houſe and ordinances, ways and worſhip: and when thoſe years are gone, endleſs pleaſures at God's right hand, and in his preſence, will follow.

[m] כי יתנברו quum invalescunt, Mercerus; quum invaluerunt, Munster, Piscator; so Drusius, Pagninus, Bolducius. [n] Quia superbierunt, Tigurine version; so Cocceius, Michaelis, Schultens. [o] למוסר ad correptionem, Montanus; ad correctionem, Beza, Michaelis, Schultens. [p] Ad eruditionem, Cocceius. [q] ויעברו אם ישמעו si audierint & fecerint, Codurcus.

℣. 12. But if they obey not, &c.] Who ſeem to be righteous and are not; and when afflicted are not ſubmiſſive to the will of God; attend not to the voice of his providence; receive no inſtruction thereby; but kick againſt the pricks, and rebel againſt God; complain of him, and murmur at his dealings with them: they ſhall periſh by the ſword; or they ſhall paſs away out of the world by it, or by ſome miſſive weapon: they ſhall die a violent death, by the ſword of juſtice, of the civil magiſtrate, or by the ſword of men; or as a Jewiſh commentator [r] paraphraſes it, by the dart of death, by the ſword of Satan, they ſhall paſs out of this world. And they ſhall die without knowledge; without knowledge of their death being near, it coming upon them ſuddenly and at unawares; or without knowledge of themſelves, and of their miſerable and loſt eſtate; and without knowledge of Chriſt, and of God in Chriſt, and of the way of ſalvation by him. Or they ſhall periſh for lack of knowledge; becauſe they have none; through ignorance and that affected; they know not nor will they underſtand, but deſpiſe the means of knowledge, and hate inſtruction.

℣. 13. But the hypocrites in heart heap up wrath, &c.] Or and the hypocrites [s]; for theſe are the ſame with the diſobedient in the preceding verſe; who ſeem to be righteous, but are not; pretend to what they have not; have a double heart, or ſay one thing with their mouth, and mean another thing in their hearts; or with their mouths draw nigh to God, but their hearts are far from him; and ſo hypocrites, at leaſt, outwardly righteous before men, but inwardly full of wickedneſs, as the Phariſees were, whom our Lord often calls hypocrites: theſe put or add wrath, as Aben Ezra interprets it; they increaſe the wrath of God; or as we expreſs it, heap up wrath; or to uſe the apoſtle's phraſe, treaſure up wrath againſt the day of wrath: though ſome underſtand it of the wrath of the hypocrites againſt God for afflicting them; ſo Jarchi. When afflictions come upon them, they reproach and blaſpheme; they are angry with God and are wrathful, and quarrel at his dealings with them: they put the noſe [t]; ſo it may be literally rendered; they erect that againſt God, and point it at him in a proud, haughty, wrathful and contumacious manner. They cry not when he bindeth them; in fetters and cords of affliction, ℣. 8. or when he corrects them, as Mr Broughton rightly as to the ſenſe renders it: they pray not, as Ben Gerſom interprets it; whereas ſanctified afflictions bring good men to the throne of grace, who have been too long abſent from it: but theſe men cry not unto God for grace and mercy, help, aſſiſtance and deliverance; they cry out againſt God, but not unto him.

℣. 14. They die in youth, &c.] They, or their ſoul [u]; which, though that dies not, being immaterial and immortal; yet being the principal part of man, is put for the whole perſon, and which being taken away, the body dies. All men muſt die, but all do not die at an age; there is a common term of human life, Pſal. xc. 10. ſome few exceed it, multitudes arrive not to it; ſuch who die before it may be ſaid to die in youth; it ſeems to ſignify premature and untimely death: the word ſignifies an excuſſion, or violent ſhaking out; and the Vulgate Latin verſion is, in a tempeſt; in a tempeſt of divine wrath, and in a ſtorm in their conſciences, chap. xxvii. 20. Jarchi interprets it by ſuffocation or ſtrangling. And their life is among the unclean: all men are by nature unclean, and all that is in them; ſome are more notoriouſly and openly ſo than others, who give themſelves over to laſciviouſneſs, to work all uncleanneſs with greedineſs; ſuch as whoremongers and fornicators, of whom Mr Broughton underſtands thoſe unclean perſons; or Sodomites, of whom the word is ſometimes uſed, Deut. xxiii. 17. And this may be underſtood either of the preſent life of hypocrites before they die; who are unclean perſons themſelves, whatever ſhew of purity they make, and love to live and converſe, at leaſt privately, if not openly, with unclean perſons, and die whilſt they live with ſuch and in their ſins: or of their life after death; for wicked men live after death; their ſouls live in hell, and their bodies at the reſurrection will be raiſed to life and be reunited to their ſouls, and both together will live in endleſs puniſhment; and the life of hypocrites will be among ſuch; as is a man in life, ſo he is at and after death, if filthy, filthy ſtill; and ſuch will have no admittance into the heavenly ſtate, and with ſuch impure ones hypocrites will live for ever, Rev. xxi. 8, 27. and xxii. 15.

℣. 15. He delivereth the poor in his affliction, &c.] The righteous or godly poor; who are not only poor in worldly things, but poor in ſpirit; who are humbled, brought low, and made contrite, thro' the afflicting hand of God: theſe, though the Lord does ſooner or later deliver out of their afflictions, yet that is not intended here, but a deliverance in them; which is done by ſupporting them under them, by ſupplying them with his grace to bear them patiently, by granting them his gracious preſence for their comfort in them, by ſtilling the enemy and the avenger, keeping Satan from diſturbing them, and freeing them from doubts and fears and unbelief, and by drawing their hearts and affections off of the world and the things of it, to himſelf. And openeth their ears in oppreſſion; whilſt they are oppreſſed; not only to diſcipline, correction and inſtruction, ℣. 10. but to hear comfortable words ſpoken to them by the Lord; who, in the midſt of their affliction and oppreſſion, whiſpers in their ears, and tells them how he loves them, though they are rebuked and chaſtened by him; how he has choſen them to everlaſting life and happineſs, though now in the furnace of affliction; that he is their covenant-God and Father, and knows and owns their ſouls in adverſity; that he has pardoned all their ſins, though he takes vengeance on their inventions; and in a little time will free them from all their afflictions and oppreſſions.

℣. 16. Even ſo, &c.] Here Elihu accommodates what he had ſaid to the caſe of Job; that had he hearkened and been obedient to the voice of God in his rod, and had ſubmitted to his chaſtening hand, and patiently bore his afflictions; he, God, would have removed thee out of the ſtrait into a broad place, where there is no ſtraitneſs: that is, out of the ſtrait circumſtances in which he was, into liberty;

[r] R. Simeon, Bar Tzemach. [s] דחנפי & hypocritæ, Montanus; & loripedes, Schultens. [t] ושימו אף ponent naſum, Montanus; ponunt naſum, Schultens. [u] נפשם anima eorum, Pagninus, Montanus, Tigurine verſion, Vatablus, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, &c.

berty; would have brought him into a large place, where he might walk at liberty, as David experienced, Pſal. iv. 1. and xviii. 19. and cxix. 45. and may be underſtood both in a temporal and ſpiritual ſenſe. In a temporal ſenſe; he was now in great ſtraits, in poverty and affliction; theſe preſsed him hard on every ſide, ſo that his way, as he ſays, was fenced up that he could not paſs, chap. xix. 8. Now had he been rightly humbled under his affliction, God would have taken him out of the ſtraits of adverſity, and ſet his feet in a large room of proſperity; ſee Pſal. xxxi. 7, 8. In a ſpiritual ſenſe; perſons are as in a ſtrait place and pent up, when they cannot come forth in the free exerciſe of grace and duty; their ſouls are as it were in priſon, they are ſhut up, and have not freedom with God nor man; their faith is ready to fail, their hope is ſunk very low, they are ſtraitned in their own bowels or affections, in their love to God and his people: and then they are removed into a large place, when it is the reverſe with them; when they are favoured with the free ſpirit of the Lord, for where he is there is liberty; and when their hearts are enlarged with the love of God, and in the exerciſe of grace; and then they can run chearfully the ways of his commandments. And that which ſhould be ſet on thy table, ſhould be full of fatneſs; which in a temporal ſenſe denotes, that he ſhould have had a plentiful table, ſpread with the beſt of proviſions, the richeſt dainties, the fineſt of the wheat, and the fatteſt of the creatures; and theſe ſhould reſt and remain upon his table, or be conſtantly renewed there: and in a ſpiritual ſenſe, that his ſoul ſhould have been ſatisfied with the love of God, ſhed abroad in his heart; with the bleſsings of the everlaſting covenant of grace applied unto him; and with the goodneſs of the houſe of God, his word and ordinances, as with marrow and fatneſs; ſee Pſal. lxiii. 5. and xxxvi. 8.

℣. 17. But thou haſt fulfilled the judgment of the wicked, &c.] Some [w] take this to be a continuation of the happineſs Job would have enjoyed, had he behaved in his affliction as he ought to have done; then he would have been filled to ſatisfaction, by ſeeing the judgments of God exerciſed on wicked men, as on the Chaldeans and Sabeans, who had injured him: and judgment and juſtice would have upheld thee; when they ſhould be caſt down. But theſe words rather ſeem to be expreſſive of his preſent ſtate, and the reaſon of it, he not being ſufficiently humbled: and the ſenſe is, not that he had lived a vicious courſe of life, as the wicked do, and filled up the meaſure of his wickedneſs as they; and ſo deſerved to be filled with the like judgments as inflicted on them. Mr Broughton reads the words, "As thou haſt fulfilled the ſentence of the wicked, "ſentence and judgment have laid hold:" but rather the meaning is, that he had fulfilled the contention of the wicked [x]; pleaded as they did, argued with God after their manner; and therefore is ſaid to go in company and walk with them, and make anſwers for them, chap. xxxiv. 8, 36. Wherefore juſtice and judgment take hold on thee; afflictions in righteouſneſs; or the chaſtening hand of God, in righteous judgment, had taken hold upon him, and would hold him until he was ſufficiently humbled under them.

℣. 18. Becauſe there is wrath, &c.] Either wrath in Job, ſo ſome; indignation and impatience under the afflicting hand of God, expreſſed by curſing the day of his birth, and by his angry pleadings with God: and therefore Elihu adviſes him to beware of it, and check this impetuous ſpirit; ceaſe from his anger and forſake wrath, and fret not himſelf to do evil, and provoke the Lord to take him away at once, and then his caſe would be irretrievable. Or rather wrath in God, which is revealed from heaven againſt all ungodlineſs and unrighteouſneſs of men. His vindictive and punitive juſtice, to revenge and puniſh wickedneſs, the effects of which are ſometimes awful judgments on men in this life; and eternal vengeance hereafter, called wrath to come: this is laid up in ſtore with him, and ſealed up in his treaſures, prepared in his purpoſes and decrees, is revealed in his law, and breaks forth in various inſtances; ſee Num. xvi. 46. And there is an appearance of wrath, a little wrath, which is no other than love diſpleaſed, in the afflictions and chaſtiſements of God's people, and might be perceived by Job: and this being the caſe, Elihu adviſes him to beware; which, though not expreſſed in the original, is well ſupplied; and his meaning is, that he would be cautious of what he ſaid, and not go on to multiply words againſt God; ſpeak unbecomingly of him, arraign his juſtice, and find fault with his dealings with him; as well as beware of his actions, conduct and behaviour, that his tongue and his doings be not againſt the Lord, to provoke the eyes of his glory. Leſt he take thee away with his ſtroke; out of the world by death, which is the ſtroke of his hand; and is ſometimes given ſuddenly, and in an awful manner, in wrath and vengeance. Some render the laſt word, with clapping of hands [y]; either the hands of men, chap. xxvii 23. or of God; expreſſing his exultation and pleaſure at the death of ſuch a perſon, laughing at his calamity, and mocking when fear cometh; which is dreadful and tremendous. Then a great ranſom cannot deliver thee: there is no ranſom on earth equal to the life or ſoul of man; What ſhall a man give in exchange for his ſoul? Matt. xvi. 26. ſee Pſal. xlix. 6, 7, 8. The great ranſom of all is the ranſom of Chriſt, which Elihu had made mention of before, chap. xxxiii. 24 and what elſe could he have in his mind now? This is the ranſom found by infinite wiſdom, which Chriſt came to give, and has given; and by which he has ranſomed his people from him that is ſtronger than they; from the bondage of ſin, of Satan, of the world, of law, hell and death, and everlaſting deſtruction: and this is a great one, plenteous redemption, a great ſalvation; the ranſomer is the great God and our Saviour; the ranſom-price is not corruptible things, as ſilver and gold, but the precious blood of Chriſt, his life, yea he himſelf. How great muſt this ranſom be! and it is given for great ſinners, the chief of them; and is ſufficient for all the elect of God, both Jews and Gentiles: and yet, as great as it is, it is of no avail to one that God has taken away by a ſtroke out of this world, and ſent to everlaſting deſtruction; not through want of ſufficiency in this ranſom, but by reaſon of the final and unalterable ſtate of ſuch perſons; as even in the preſent life, it is of no avail to the deniers and deſpiſers of it, Heb. x. 26—29.

℣. 19. Will he eſteem thy riches? no, not gold, nor all the forces of ſtrength.] Riches can be of no account, nor bear any weight with God; for they are of him and come from him, and what he has a right a right to take away and diſpoſe of as he pleaſes. Theſe cannot ward off the ſtroke of death, or ſecure from it; nor can a man poſſeſſed of them, carry them with him into the other world; nor will they profit in the day of wrath. Mr Broughton renders it, Will he eſteem thy nobleneſs? ſo Junius and Tremellius. Thy noble birth, rank and ſtation, thou haſt had among men? Not at all. God is no reſpecter of perſons; he regards not the noble and the rich more than the poor: and as for gold, the ſame may be ſaid of that, which, though the moſt valuable among men, is of no eſteem with God; and beſides it is his: the gold is mine, ſays he, and the ſilver is mine, Hag. ii. 8. Nor is death to be bribed with it, or put off by it; nor is a munition[z], fortreſs or caſtle, as ſome render the word, any defence againſt it: nor all the forces of ſtrength. Had a man at his command ever ſuch numerous and powerful armies, they could not protect him from the ſtroke of death; or deliver him from eternal puniſhment, the demerit of ſin. Though as Job had no riches, no gold, nor troops of ſoldiers about him; nor was there any great likelihood that this would be his caſe at death; I ſhould think the words might be better rendered, Will he regard thy cry? no, not in diſtreſs; not even the moſt ſtrong and forcible cries or intreaties: when the ſtroke of death is given, the ſentence of wrath is paſſed, and eternal deſtruction takes place; weeping and wailing will ſignify nothing: the cries and howlings of the damned in hell are of no avail; their ſtrong cryings, and moſt intenſe and earneſt intreaties, will have no effect on the Lord; though he is a God of great pity and compaſſion, and has ſympathy with his people in diſtreſs, and in all their afflictions is afflicted; yet will have no regard to cries and tears, when the decree is gone forth and carried into execution: the verb from whence the firſt word is derived, is uſed for crying in this chapter, ℣. 13. and the Targum renders it here by ſupplication and petition; ſo ſome other Jewiſh writers [a] interpret it of crying: and the ſecond word is by ſeveral rendered, in ſtraits [b] and diſtreſs; and Cocceius has obſerved the notion of intenſe and fervent prayer in the third, and renders the whole pretty near to what has been obſerved [c].

[w] Schmidt, Michaelis. [x] ידין רשע מלאת & tu litem improbi impleviſti, Schultens. [y] בשפק complosione manuum, Tigurine verſion; ſo ſome in Munſter.

℣. 20. Deſire not the night, &c.] Either in a literal ſenſe, which Job might do; not for ſecrecy to commit ſin, as the thief, murderer, and adulterer do; Elihu had no ſuch ſuſpicion of Job; nor for eaſe and reſt, which he expected not; nor would his ſores admit thereof; his nights were weariſome, and when come he wiſhed they were gone, chap. vii. 2, 3, 4. but either for retirement, that he might muſe and conſider, and endeavour to ſearch and find out the reaſon of God's dealing with men, in cutting off ſometimes ſuch great numbers together. Elihu ſuggeſts, that ſuch a ſearch was altogether vain and to no purpoſe; he would never be able to find out the reaſon of theſe things: or rather for ſhelter from the eye and hand of God; as nothing before mentioned could ward off his ſtroke, ſo neither could the night or darkneſs preſerve from it; ſee Pſal. cxxxix. 11, 12. Or elſe the words may be taken in a figurative ſenſe; either of the night of calamity and diſtreſs, he might be tempted to deſire and wiſh for, to come upon his enemies; or rather of the night of death, he wiſhed for himſelf, as he often had done; in doing which Elihu ſuggeſts he was wrong; not conſidering that if God ſhould take him away with a ſtroke, and he not be humbled and brought to repentance, what would be the conſequence of it. When people are cut off in their place; as ſometimes they are in the night, literally taken; juſt in the place where they ſtood or lay down, without moving elſewhere, or ſtirring hand or foot as it were. So Amraphel, and the kings with him, as Jarchi obſerves, were cut off in the night, the firſt-born of Egypt, the Midianites and Sennacherib's army; and ſo in the night of death, figuratively, the common paſſage of all men, as Mr Broughton obſerves, who renders the words, for peoples paſſage to their place.

℣. 21. Take heed, regard not iniquity, &c.] Not any iniquity, as to ſhew any approbation of it, love for it, and deſire after it. All appearance of ſin, of every ſin, is to be abſtained from; but particularly by the iniquity here meant, may be the ſin of impatience under his affliction; murmuring at the dealings of God with him; arraigning his juſtice, and ſaying very indecent things of him, as in chap. xxxiv. 5. and xxxv. 2. Or it may mean the evil he had been guilty of in ſo earneſtly deſiring the night of death: for this thou haſt choſen rather than affliction; choſe rather to die than to be afflicted as he was; or choſe rather to complain of God, as if he dealt hardly with him, and did not do juſtly by him, than to ſubmit patiently to the will of God, as he ought to have done: or this he choſe through affliction [d]; through the force of it, becauſe of it, and by means thereof; and ſo is a ſort of excuſe that Elihu makes for him; though at the ſame time, he would have him by no means to regard ſuch iniquity, and indulge to it.

℣. 22. Behold, God exalteth by his power, &c.] He exalts himſelf, or cauſes himſelf to be exalted, and even above all the bleſſing and praiſe of his creatures; by his power in the works of creation and providence, he makes ſuch a diſplay of his glorious perfections, as to ſet him on high, and out of the reach of the higheſt praiſes of men. He exalts his Son as mediator, and has made him higher than the kings of the earth; he exalts him as a Prince and a Saviour, to give repentance and remiſſion of ſins to his people, and to be the judge of quick and dead. He has exalted the human nature of Chriſt to the grace of union to the Son of God; and exalted him in this nature at his right hand, far above all principality and power: he exalts men in a civil ſenſe, who are in a low eſtate, and raiſes them to a very high one; promotion is alone of him, he ſets up and puts down at pleaſure. In a ſpiritual ſenſe, he exalts men when he brings them out of a ſtate of nature, into an open ſtate of grace; brings them out of the horrible pit, and ſets their feet upon the rock Chriſt Jeſus; takes them as beggars from the dunghill, and places them among princes, even the princes of his people; admits them to communion with himſelf, puts and keeps them in his favour, as in a garriſon; and at laſt cauſes them to inherit the throne of glory. He exalts men, when he ſets the poor on high from affliction, and brings them out of adverſity into proſperity; and which is what may be chiefly intended here; let a man be brought as low as he may, God can by his power, if he will, raiſe him up again. And this may be ſaid for the comfort and and encouragement of Job, in his preſent circumſtances: and ſo Aben Ezra interprets it, "God "will exalt thee;" as he afterwards did. The Targum is, "Behold, God alone is ſtrong in his might;" ſee Pſal. xxi. 13. Who teacheth like him? He teaches by his providences, adverſe as well as proſperous; he teaches by his word and ordinances; he teaches by his Spirit and grace, and none teaches like him. Miniſters of the word teach men both doctrine and duty, but not like him; they have their gifts for teaching, their wiſdom and knowledge, their doctrine, and all the uſe they are of from him; none teach ſo pleaſantly, ſo profitably, ſo powerfully and effectually as he does: the Targum adds, "right things."

[z] לא בצר non munitionem, Tigurine verſion. [a] Vid. Aben Ezra, Bar Tzemach, Sephorno. [b] In anguſtia, Mercerus, Druſius, Piſcator; in arcto, Cocceius, Schultens. [c] Num æqualis eſſet imploratio tua non in arcto & omnes contentiones virium, Cocceius. [d] מענ׳ præ affliction, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator; præ miſeria ex adflictione, Michaelis.

℣. 23. Who hath enjoined him his way? &c.] He teaches men his own ways, the methods of his grace and mercy towards them; and he preſcribes to them the ways in which they ſhould walk; but none can lead or preſcribe to him; as the way of governing the world, in what manner he ſhould act in it; who has taught him in the path of judgment? or ſhewed to him the way of underſtanding? Iſa. xl. 14. and particularly whom he ſhould afflict, in what manner he ſhould do it, when and how long he ſhould continue it; all which he does according to his ſovereign will, and is not to be controlled: and in a ſpiritual ſenſe, no man can or ought to enjoin and preſcribe to him whom he ſhould ſave, and in what way; he ſaves whom he pleaſes, and in his own way, even by his Son Jeſus Chriſt, and no other: or who hath viſited, or ſhould viſit on him, or with him his way[e]: who can take upon him to examine into his ways, and ſcrutinize them and call him to an account for what he does? no man can overlook his ways and works, or cenſure him for any of his actions: or, who can ſay thou haſt wrought iniquity? this may be ſaid of every man, but it cannot be ſaid of God, by any without ſin; for as there is no iniquity in his nature, there can be none in his works; not any in his works of providence, no not in the afflictions of his people; juſt and true are all his ways.

℣. 24. Remember that thou magnify his work, &c.] Or his works; his works of creation and providence, which are great in themſelves, and declare the greatneſs of God; and which though they cannot be made greater than they are, men may be ſaid to magnify them when they aſcribe them to God, and magnify him on account of them; when they think and ſpeak well of them, and give glory to God: and particularly by his work, may be meant the chaſtiſement of his people, which is a rod in his hand, which he appoints, and with which he ſmites; it is his own doing, and he may do what he pleaſes this way; and it becomes his people to be ſtill and patient becauſe he does it; and then do they magnify this work of his, when they bear it patiently, quietly ſubmit to it, and humble themſelves under the mighty hand of God. Which men behold; for the works of God are viſible, particularly the works of creation, and the glory of God in them; which men of wiſdom and underſtanding behold with admiration and praiſe; and ſo the Targum is, "which righteous men praiſe;" and ſome derive the word here uſed from a root which ſignifies to ſing, and ſo may be underſtood of mens celebrating the works of God in ſongs of praiſe; though his work here may chiefly deſign the afflictions he lays on his people, and particularly which he had laid upon Job, which were ſo viſible, and the hand of God in them was ſo clearly to be ſeen, that men eaſily beheld it and took notice of it.

℣. 25. Every man may ſee it, &c.] Not only was to be ſeen by the wiſe and learned, the juſt and good, but by the common people; whether it is to be underſtood of the works of creation, or of the afflictive providences of God in general, or of Job's afflictions in particular. Man may behold it afar off; as to time, from the creation of the world to the preſent time, as Jarchi; or as to place, from the heaven, ſo diſtant, where are the ſun, moon, and ſtars; and which, though ſo far off, are eaſily beheld; or as to the manner of ſeeing them, not darkly, imperfectly, and in a confuſed manner, as things at a diſtance are ſeen, ſo ſome underſtand it; but rather clearly and plainly, as things eaſy to be ſeen, are clearly diſcerned at a diſtance; and it ſignifies that the work of God here meant is ſo viſible that he muſt be quite blind and ſtupid that cannot ſee; it it may be ſeen as it were with half an eye, and a great way off; he that runs may ſee and read.

℣. 26. Behold, God is great, &c.] In his power and might, in his wiſdom and knowledge, in his truth and faithfulneſs, in his love, grace, and mercy, and that to admiration; and it is worthy of notice and attention, which the word behold, prefixed hereunto, is expreſſive of: or is much or many[f]; as he is in his perſons: for though his eſſence is one, his perſons are more, they are three, Father, Son, and Spirit; in his perfections, of which there is a fulneſs; in his thoughts, counſels, purpoſes, and decrees, which reſpect other perſons and things; in his works of creation, providence, and grace, and in the bleſſings of his goodneſs, which are ſo many as not to be reckoned up. And we know him not; God is to be known by the works of creation, and even by the very heathen, though ſuch is their inattention to them that they are ſaid not to know God; yea even the wiſeſt among them by all their wiſdom knew not God; for though they might know there was a God, they knew not who and what he was. God is known by his word, among thoſe who are favoured with a divine revelation of him, and eſpecially by true believers in Chriſt, who know God in Chriſt, whom to know is life eternal; and yet theſe know but in part, there is no finding out the almighty to perfection; God is not known clearly, fully, and perfectly by any: or we know it not; the greatneſs of God; he is great, but we know not how great he is; his greatneſs is beyond all conception and expreſſion. Neither can the number of his years be ſearched out; years are aſcribed to God, after the manner of men, otherwiſe properly ſpeaking they are not applicable to him; by which time is meaſured, and which belongs not to the eternal God; however the number of his years in an eternity paſt, and of thoſe to come, cannot be ſearched out and reckoned up: it requires no great ſkill in arithmetic to reckon up the years of the oldeſt man that ever lived; yea, the months, the days, the hours, and minutes of his life may be counted; but the years of the moſt High cannot; this is a phraſe expreſſive of the eternity of him which is, and was, and is to come, and who from everlaſting to everlaſting is God. He was before the world was, as the creation of it out of nothing ſhews. Jehovah the Father had a Son, and he loved him before the foundation of the world, and all his people in him; he made an everlaſting choice of them in him, before the world began; he made an everlaſting covenant with them in in him, and gave them grace in him as early; he ſet him up as Mediator from everlaſting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was; and will be the everlaſting and unchangeable portion of his people to all eternity. Cocceius thinks that theſe words are expreſſive of the conſtant love of God to the church, and the continuance of his kingdom in it; and of his moſt fixed purpoſe of love to men, and indefatigable care of them.

[e] מי פקד עליו דרכו quis viſitavit ſuper illum viam ejus, Montanus, Michaelis; cum eo, Tigurine verſion.
[f] שגיא πολυς, Sept. multus, Mercerus, Druſius.

℣. 27. For he maketh ſmall the drops of rain, &c.] Elihu proceeds to give inſtances and proofs of the greatneſs of God, and begins with rain, as Eliphaz does, chap. v. 9, 10. a common phænomenon, what is very frequent, and well known in all ages and countries, and by all men more or leſs; and yet there are ſome things relative to it which are beyond the comprehenſion of men, and ſhew the greatneſs and incomprehenſibleneſs of God: and the deſign of this, and all other inſtances of this kind, is to convince Job of his folly in ſearching out the cauſes and reaſons of God's works of providence, when the common works of nature lie out of the reach of men; and to reconcile him to them, and bring him patiently to ſubmit to the will of God, whoſe ways are paſt finding out: and ſome render the words, he reſtrains the drops of rain[g]; he withholds it from the earth, which cauſes a drought, and ſo brings on a famine; others, he ſubtracts, or draws out, or draws up the drops of water[h], which he exhales by the heat of the ſun out of the earth and out of the ſea; ſee Pſal. cxxxv. 7. Amos v. 8. and which are drawn up in ſmall particles, but form large bodies of waters in the clouds; and which are let down again upon the earth in ſmall drops, in an eaſy and gentle manner, and ſo ſoak into the earth and make it fruitful; which is what is meant by our verſion here: this is a wonderful inſtance of God's power, wiſdom, and goodneſs, and is beyond our comprehenſion; for no mortal man can tell how the almighty parts and divides thoſe large quantities of water in the clouds, that ſometimes hang over our heads, into millions and ten thouſand times ten thouſand millions of drops, even innumerable; and cauſes theſe waters in ſuch a manner to deſcend on the earth; lets them not fall at once, or in water-ſpouts, which would waſh away the inhabitants of cities and towns, the cattle of the field, and the produce of the earth, as at the general deluge. They pour down rain according to the vapour thereof; the water drawn up and formed into large bodies in the heavens pours down rain in a gentle and plentiful manner, according to the quantity of vapours exhaled out of the earth and ſea; if a ſmall quantity is drawn up, a ſmall quantity is let down; and if a large quantity is attracted, a large quantity, or a plentiful ſhower is given: ſome think that a ſmall rain is meant in the preceding clauſe, and a great rain in this; for there is the ſmall rain and the great rain of his ſtrength, chap. xxxvii. 6. The word tranſlated pour has the ſignification of liquefying, melting, and diſſolving, and of purging and purifying; and which is applicable to clouds which melt and diſſolve gradually as they deſcend in drops upon the earth; and the water which they let down is of all the moſt clear and pure, as Galen and Hippocrates[i], thoſe eminent phyſicians, have obſerved; and a late celebrated one tells us[k], that rain water is ſo truly diſtilled by nature, that the chymiſt, with all his diſtilling art, cannot produce purer water; for though it is exhaled out of the dirty earth, out of miry places, bogs, and ditches, yet being bound up in the clouds, as in a garment, and paſſing through the atmoſphere, it comes down to us pure as if it had been percolated or ſtrained through a linen cloth; and though the water as drawn up out of the ſea is ſalt, yet carried up into the air, and there, as in an alembic, diſtilled, it deſcends to us ſweet and freſh, and has not the leaſt brackiſhneſs in it.

℣. 28. Which the clouds do drop and diſtil upon man abundantly.] Not upon the perſons of men, which they take care as much as poſſible to ſhun and avoid, but upon the fields of men, and ſo for the profit and advantage of men; and this denotes both the gentle manner in which the clouds let down rain, and the liberal profuſion of them; they let it down both in an eaſy and plentiful manner, and upon an abundance of men, or upon an abundance of fields and lands belonging to men; though ſometimes rain falls upon the wilderneſs where no man is, chap. xxxviii. 26. The Targum is "at "the prayer of a ſon of a great man," or at the prayer of a man that has great intereſt with God; that is famous for his faith and piety, as Elijah was, to whom perhaps the Targumiſt may have reſpect. The rain is an emblem of the word of God, the goſpel of Chriſt, which drops and diſtils on the ſouls of men like rain, and refreſhes them, and makes them fruitful; and is diſpenſed by the miniſters of it, who are compared to clouds, according to the meaſure of the gift of grace received by them, and that freely and fully as they have received it.

℣. 29. Alſo can any underſtand the ſpreadings of the clouds, &c.] Or of a cloud[l], a thick cloud, a ſingle one; which ſometimes at the beginning is very ſmall, about the bigneſs of a man's hand, 1 Kings xviii. 44. and which in a little time ſpreads all over the heavens, and covers them with black clouds and darkneſs; none can underſtand, deſcribe and tell by what means ſo ſmall a cloud at firſt appearance is ſpread to ſuch a prodigious extent; and which is done partly for the uſe of God himſelf, to be a pavilion or tent around him, Pſalm xviii 11. and xcvii. 2. and partly for the uſe of men, either to let down rain on the ſeveral parts of the world, or to be a ſort of an umbrella to men, to ſhelter them from ſcorching heat; nor can any underſtand how the clouds, ſtretched out to ſuch a compaſs, are poiſed and balanced in the air, ſo as to retain their poſition as long as it is the pleaſure of God; ſee chap. xxxvii. 16. Ben Gerſom, who is followed by others[m], interprets this of the differences of the clouds, which are unaccountable, as to the form and colour of them being curious, and the matter which they contain or what iſſues from them; out of ſome, rain, others hail, others ſnow and ſleet, others wind, others thunder and lightning; and yet all ariſe from the ſame, even from vapours exhaled from the earth and ſea; ſome become moiſt and cold, others hot and dry. As clouds are emblems of goſpel-miniſters, Iſa. v. 6. this may lead us to obſerve the different gifts of grace beſtowed on them, and the different uſes they are of; ſome are Boanergeſes, ſons of thunder; others Barnabaſes, ſons of conſolation; and the extent of the goſpel-miniſtry all over the world, which firſt began as a ſmall cloud over the land of Judea, and then was ſpread throughout the Gentile world. Or the noiſe of

[g] יגרע נטפי מים aufert ſtillas pluviæ & prohibebit, Pagninus; ſo Vatablus, Tigurine verſion, Targum & Ben Gerſom. [h] Attrahit, Codurcus; ſubtrahit, i. e. a mare, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Schultens. [i] Apud Pinedam in loc. [k] Boerhaav. Elem. Chem. p. 600. apud Schultens in loc. [l] עב nubis, Montanus, Tigurine verſion, Mercerus, Piſcator, Schultens. [m] מפרשי differentias, Pagninus; varietates, Vatablus.

of his tabernacle; the tabernacle of God, which are the clouds, which are laid as the flooring of his palace, and are drawn about him as a tent or pavilion, Pſal. civ. 3. and xviii. 11. where he ſits inviſible, and from whence, as a general of an army, he iſſues out his orders, and ſends forth his artillery, rain, hail, ſnow, thunder and lightning, and ſtormy wind fulfilling his word; the noiſe hereof is either the noiſe of the waters in the clouds, the ſound of an abundance of rain, 1 Kings xviii. 41. or of the bluſtring winds, by which the clouds are moved and portend rain; or of the thunder that burſts out of them with a vehement noiſe, and which is uſually followed with rain; and the thunder of his power who can underſtand? chap. xxvi. 14. This may be an emblem of the voice of God in his goſpel out of his tabernacle, the church, which the natural man underſtands not; or the voice of God in his providences, in which he ſpeaks to men once and twice and they perceive it not.

℣. 30. Behold, he ſpreadeth his light upon it, &c.] Upon his tabernacle; that is, upon the clouds, which are his tabernacle; either the light of the ſun, whereby the clouds are diſperſed and blotted out; an emblem of the blotting out of ſin, or the forgiveneſs of it, Iſa. xliv. 22. which is like a clear ſhining after rain, 2 Sam. xxiii. 4. or on a thin cloud whereby the rainbow is formed, an emblem of peace and reconciliation by Chriſt; or lightning, which burſting out of the dark cloud is ſpread over it, when it ſeems to be all in flames. Cocceius renders it, he ſpreads the light about himſelf; God ſpreads it about himſelf, clothing himſelf with light as with a garment, and dwelling in light inacceſſible to men: or he ſpreads it upon him, upon man; cauſing his ſun to ſhine on the juſt and unjuſt: or on it, the earth; ſo it was ſpread when firſt commanded to ſhine out of darkneſs, with which the earth in its primæval ſtate was covered; and ſo it is ſpread every morning upon the earth; as ſoon as day breaks, the morning is ſpread upon the mountains, and in a ſhort time it overſpreads the whole hemiſphere; an emblem this of the ſpread of the light of grace over the dark hearts of men, in converſion, which are like the earth in its chaotic ſtate, or as in the night-ſeaſon covered with darkneſs; out of which they are called and brought by the grace of God, having the true light ſprung and placed in their ſouls; which at firſt is but glimmering, and at beſt imperfect in the preſent ſtate, yet is ſpreading and increaſing, Prov. iv. 18. and of the ſpread of the great and glorious light of the goſpel in the world in the times of the apoſtles, and as it will be in the latter-day glory. And covereth the bottom of the ſea, or the roots of the ſea[n]; though one would think they ſhould be rather covered with water and with darkneſs, as they are; ſee chap. xxxviii. 8, 9, 10. Iſa. xi. 9. This is to be underſtood either of the light of the ſun, and the rays of it, which are ſo piercing and penetrating as to reach to the bottom of the ſea, and cover it and exhale waters out of it; or of lightning, which is equally as piercing and penetrating or more, and ſtrikes to the very roots of the ſea, and covers them, or rather diſcovers them, ſo that the channels of waters are ſeen, and the foundations of the world are diſcovered, Pſal. xviii. 14, 15. the Targum of this verſe is, "he ſpreads upon it rain, and covers the rocks "or foundations of the ſea;" and the rain is called light according to Ramban, becauſe by the deſcent of it the day is enlightened, and the darkneſs of the clouds removed; and by this means the bottom of the ſea is covered, ſo that it paſſes its bounds and covers the rocks, that is, the borders of it, as others explain it[o].

℣. 31. For by them judgeth he the people, &c.] That is, by the clouds; which the Lord uſes both in a way of judgment, as expreſſed in this clauſe, and in a way of mercy, as in the following; by theſe, and what iſſue out of them, as rain, hail, winds, thunder and lightning, he ſometimes puniſhes the inhabitants of the earth, as he did the old world by a deluge of water, which came partly from the foundations of the great deep, and partly from the windows of heaven, which deſtroyed man and beaſt, and the increaſe of the earth; he puniſhed the Egyptians by a violent ſtorm of hail; and ſlew many of the Canaanites with hail-ſtones; Pharaoh and his hoſt ſunk like lead when he blew with his wind; and Sodom and Gomorrah, with the cities of the plain, were deſtroyed with thunder and lightning, fire and brimſtone from heaven; as the army of the Philiſtines were diſcomfited by thunder in the times of Samuel; and the captains of fifties, with their men, were conſumed by lightning in the times of Elijah; and as the heavens and the earth will be burnt with fire at the end of all things. He giveth meat in abundance; very plentifully, or to a multitude of creatures, both men and cattle; who have a liberal ſupply of food by means of the clouds and rain, which falling upon the earth make it fruitful, ſo that it gives bread to the eater, and ſeed to the ſower; cauſes graſs to grow up for the beaſts of the field, and produces bread-corn, oil, and wine, for the benefit of men; an emblem of the variety and plenty of ſpiritual food diſpenſed to the churches of Chriſt, through the miniſtry of the word, and by the miniſters of it.

℣. 32. With clouds he covereth the light, &c.] Either the lightning which is hid and covered in the black dark cloud until it burſts out of it; or the light of the ſun, which is wonderful, that waters naturally clear and tranſparent, when formed into clouds, ſhould obſtruct the rays of the ſun and darken it; ſee Ezek. xxxii. 7. and thus it was in the ſtorm and tempeſt the apoſtle Paul was in many days, which was ſo thick and dark, that the ſun and ſtars did not appear of a long time, Acts xxvii. 20. And commandeth it not to ſhine, by the cloud that cometh betwixt; that is, commands the ſun that it ſhines not, or hinders it from ſhining, by reaſon of the intervening clouds; this is an emblem of ſin interpoſing between God and his people, which cauſes him to hide his face from them and not ſhine upon them: ſins are comparable to clouds for numbers, being more than can be told; and for their nature and quality, like clouds they riſe out of the earthly and carnal heart of man; and which is alſo like a troubled ſea which cannot reſt; and which reach up unto heaven and bring down wrath and vengeance from thence on wicked men; and in God's own people like the clouds they intercept the light of his countenance, the bright ſhining of the ſun of righteouſneſs, the comfort, peace, and joy of the holy Spirit: the words may be rendered, with hands he covers the light, and commands that it ſhine not by reaſon of what comes between; and they are underſtood by ſome, as by Schmidt particularly, of the eclipſes of the ſun and moon, when God as it were covers them with hands, and ſuffers them not to ſhine by intervening bodies; ſo the eclipſe of the ſun is occaſioned by the moon's coming between that that and the earth, and the eclipſe of the moon by the interpoſition of the earth between that and the ſun; the Targum is, "becauſe of rapine of hands "he reſtrains rain, and commands it to deſcend be- "cauſe of him that prays," who comes between and intercedes for a ſinful people as Elijah did; or as others, he commands the lightning that it hurts not becauſe of him that comes between and intercedes with his prayers.

[n] שרשי הים radices maris, Pagninus, Montanus, &c.

[o] In Bar Tzemach in loc.

℣. 33. The noiſe thereof ſheweth concerning it, &c.] The rain, that it is coming; it is a preſage and prognoſtic of it, namely, the noiſe of the clouds in the air, the ſound of abundance of rain there; or the noiſe of the winds, which is often a forerunner of it; or the noiſe of thunder when rain frequently follows, Jer. x. 13. The cattle alſo concerning the vapour; that is, the cattle likewiſe ſhew ſigns of rain, being ſenſible of the vapours which riſe up out of the earth, and are drawn up into the air and form clouds there; theſe, through their ſharp ſight, diſcern the vapours riſing out of the earth inſenſible by men; or by their quick ſmell [p] or taſte diſcern them, theſe leaving ſome tincture upon the graſs they are feeding on; and which occaſion ſome motions and geſtures in them by which huſbandmen, and thoſe that are accuſtomed to them, know that the rain is at hand: and there are various things obſervable in brutes, fowls, and cattle, and other creatures, which are ſigns of approaching rain; as the kawing of crows, the croking of frogs, the flying about of cranes and ſwallows, the motion of ants, the retire of cattle to places of ſhelter, and the like; Aben Ezra obſerves that ſheep lying on their right ſide portends rain; the above things with others are moſt beautifully expreſſed by Virgil [q], and which with many others are collected together by Pliny [r]; and though there are various interpretations given of this paſſage, this ſeems to be the moſt agreeable, and which ſuits with our verſion; unleſs the following, which I only propoſe, ſhould be more eligible, he, that is, God, by it, the rain, declares his good-will to men, likewiſe to the cattle, and alſo towards what riſes up out of the earth, the herbs and plants; all which receive much benefit by the clouds and rain.

CHAP. XXXVII.

ELIHU in this chapter proceeds to ſhew the greatneſs of God as it appears in other of his works of nature, which greatly affected him, and to an attention to which he exhorts others, ℣. 1, 2. particularly thunder and lightning, the direction, extent, and order of which he obſerves, ℣. 3, 4. and then ſuggeſts that beſides theſe there are other great things done by him, incomprehenſible and unknown in various reſpects; as the ſnow, and rain, leſſer and greater, which come on the earth at his command, and have ſuch effect on men as to ſeal up their hands, and on the beaſts of the field as to cauſe them to retire to their dens, and there remain, ℣. 5—8. and then he goes on to take notice of wind, and froſt, and the clouds, and the diſperſion of them; their uſe and ends, whether in judgment or mercy, ℣. 9—13. and then calls on Job to conſider theſe wondrous works of God, and remark how ignorant men are of the diſpoſition of clouds for the rainbow; of the balancing of them; of the heat and quietneſs that come by the ſouth wind, and of the firmneſs of the ſky, ℣. 14—21. And from all this he concludes, the terrible majeſty, unſearchable nature of God, the excellency of his power and juſtice; and that men therefore ſhould and do fear him, who is no reſpecter of perſons, ℣. 21, 22, 23.

℣. 1. At this alſo my heart trembleth, &c.] At the greatneſs and majeſty of God, not only as diſplayed in thoſe works of his before obſerved, but as diſplayed in thoſe he was about to ſpeak of: ſuch terrible majeſty is there with God, that all rational creatures tremble at it; the nations of the world, the kings and great men of the earth, and even the devils themſelves. Good men tremble in the worſhip of God, and at the word of God; and even at the judgments of God on wicked men, and at the things that are coming on the churches of Chriſt. But Elihu has a particular reſpect to thunder and lightning, which are very terrible to many perſons [s], both good and bad [t]. At the giving of the law, there were ſuch blazes of lightning and claps of thunder, that not only all the people of Iſrael in the camp trembled, but Moſes himſelf alſo exceedingly feared and quaked. It is very probable, that at this time Elihu ſaw a ſtorm gathering, and a tempeſt riſing; ſome flaſhes of lightning were ſeen, and ſome murmurs [u] of thunders heard, which began to affect him; ſince quickly after we read that God ſpoke out of the whirlwind or tempeſt, chap. xxxviii. 1. And is moved out of his place; was ready to leap out of his body. Such an effect had this phænomenon of nature on him; as is ſometimes the caſe with men at a ſudden fright or unuſual ſound, and particularly thunder [w].

℣ 2. Hear attentively the noiſe of his voice, &c.] Of the voice of God in the clouds; and of thunder, which is his voice, chap. xl. 9. Elihu being affected with it himſelf, exhorts the company about him to hearken and liſten to it, and learn ſomething from it. And the ſound that goeth out of his mouth: as the former clauſe may have reſpect to loud thunder, a more violent crack or clap of it; ſo this may intend ſome leſſer whiſpers and murmurs of it at a diſtance; or a rumbling noiſe in the clouds before they burſt; ſince the word is ſometimes uſed for private meditation. Now the voice of God, whether in his works of nature, or in the diſpenſations of his providence, or in his word; whether in the thunder of the law, or in the ſtill ſound of the goſpel, is to be attentively hearkened to; becauſe it is the voice of God, the voice of of the God of glory, majeſtic and powerful, and is attended with various effects; of which ſee Pſal. xxix. 3—9.

[p] Vid. Democrit. Fragment. & Rendtorf. Not. in Ib. apud Fabritii Bibliothec. Gr. l. 4. c. 29. p. 338, 362. [q] Aut illum ſurgentem vallibus imis, &c. Georgic. l. 1. v. 374, &c. See Bacon's Nat. Hiſt. cent. 9. p. 208. [r] Nat. Hiſt. l. 18. c. 35. Vid. Democrit. Fragm. ut ſupra, p. 335, 358, 362, 366. [s] —— κραδιη δε μοι εξω, &c. Homer. Il. 10. v. 94, 95. [t] As it was to Auguſtus Cæſar, who always carried about with him the ſkin of a ſea-calf, as a preſervative; and on ſuſpicion of a ſtorm riſing, would betake himſelf to ſome ſecret and covered place. And to Tiberius, who wore his laurel to ſecure him from it: and to Caligula, who, on hearing it, would get out of bed and hide himſelf under it. Sueton. Vit. Auguſt. c. 90. Tiber. c. 69. & Caligul. c. 51. Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 15. c. 30. Vid. Virgil. Georgic. l. 1. v. 330, 331. [u] Tonitruorum unum genus grave murmur —— aliud genus eſt acre quod crepitum magis dixerint. Senecæ Quæſt. Nat. l. 2. c. 27. [w] Attonitos, quorum mentes ſonus ille cœleſtis loco pepulit. Ibid.

℣. 3. He directeth it under the whole heaven, &c.] His voice of thunder, which rolls from one end of the heaven to the other: he charges the clouds with it, and directs both it and them where they ſhall go and diſcharge; what tree, houſe or man, it ſhall ſtrike; and where the rain ſhall fall when the clouds burſt: yet Pliny [w] atheiſtically calls thunder and lightning chance-matters. Thus the miniſters of the word, who are compared to clouds, Iſai. v. 6. are charged with it by the Lord: they are directed by him what they ſhall ſay, where they ſhall go and declare it, and he directs where it ſhall fall with power and weight; yea, he directs it into the very hearts of men, where it pierces and penetrates; and is a diſcerner and diſcoverer of their thoughts and intents. And his lightning unto the ends of the earth: it cometh out of the eaſt, and ſhineth to the weſt, Matt. xxiv. 27. and ſwiftly moves to the further parts of the earth: and ſuch a direction, motion and extent, has the goſpel had; the glorious light of it, comparable to lightning, it firſt broke forth in the eaſt, where Chriſt, his forerunner and his diſciples, firſt preached it, and Chriſtian churches were formed; and from thence it ſpread into the weſtern parts of the world, and before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem it was preached unto all nations; it had a free courſe, ran and was glorified; the ſound of the voice of it went into all the earth, and the words and doctrines of the apoſtles unto the ends of the world.

℣. 4. After it a voice roareth, &c.] After the lightning comes a violent crack or clap of thunder, which is like the roaring of a lion. Such is the order of thunder and lightning, according to our ſenſe and apprehenſion of them; otherwiſe in nature they are together: but the reaſons given why the lightning is ſeen before, and ſo the ſame in the flaſh and report of a gun, are, becauſe the ſenſe of ſeeing is quicker than the ſenſe of hearing [x]; and the motion of light is quicker than that of ſound; which latter is the trueſt reaſon [y]. The roaring voice of thunder may be an emblem of the thunder of the law; its dreadful vollies of curſes, vengeance, and wrath on the breakers of it, as delivered out by Boanergeſes, ſons of thunder: or, the loud proclamation of the goſpel, made by the miniſters of it; and the alarming, awakening ſound of the word, when attended with the Spirit and power of God, to ſinners aſleep and dead in treſpaſſes and ſins; upon which they awake, hear, and live. He thundreth with the voice of his excellency: that is, God thunders with ſuch a voice, an excellent and majeſtic one; for his voice of thunder is full of majeſty, Pſal. xxix. 4. So is the voice of Chriſt in the goſpel; he ſpake when on earth as one having authority, and he comes forth and appears in it now with majeſty and glory; and ſpeaks in it of the excellent things which he has done, of the excellent righteouſneſs he has wrought out, of the excellent ſacrifice he has offered up, and of the excellent ſalvation he is the author of. And he will not ſtay them when his voice is heard; either the thunder and the lightning, as ſome; which he does not long defer after he has given out the decree concerning them, the order and diſpoſition for them: or rather the rain and hail; theſe are not ſtayed, but quickly follow the flaſh of lightning and clap of thunder: for when he utters his voice of thunder, there is a multitude of waters in the heavens; and theſe quickly come down and are not ſtopped, Jer. x. 13. The word for ſtay, ſignifies to ſupplant, or act deceitfully; the name of Jacob is derived from this root, becauſe he ſupplanted his brother; and ſo it may be rendered here, he will not ſupplant, or deceive them [z], when his voice is heard: that is, either he does not ſubvert them, the heavens and earth, but preſerves them; though he makes them to tremble with his voice of thunder [a]: or he does not act the part of a ſecret, ſubtil and deceitful enemy, when he thunders; but ſhews himſelf openly as a King, executing his decrees with authority [b]: or rather, he deceives none with his voice; none can miſtake it; all know it to be the voice of thunder when it is heard: ſo Chriſt's ſheep know his voice in the goſpel, and cannot be deceived; the voice of a ſtranger they will not follow.

℣. 5. God thundreth marvellouſly with his voice, &c.] Or marvels [c], or marvellous things, which may reſpect the marvellous effects of thunder and lightning: ſuch as rending rocks and mountains; throwing down high and ſtrong towers; ſhattering to pieces high and mighty oaks and cedars, and other ſuch like effects, mentioned in Pſal. xxix. and there are ſome things reported which ſeem almoſt incredible, were they not well atteſted facts; as that an egg ſhould be conſumed thereby, and the ſhell unhurt; a caſk of liquor, the liquor in it ſpoiled, and the caſk not touched; money melted in the purſe, and the purſe whole; the fœtus in the womb killed, and the woman preſerved; with other things of the like kind mentioned by various writers [d]; and which are to be accounted for only by the ſwift motion, and piercing and penetrating nature of lightning. So the voice of God in the goſpel thunders out and declares many wonderful things; as the doctrines of the trinity of perſons in one God; of the everlaſting love of the three perſons; of the perſon of Chriſt, and the union of the two natures in him; of his incarnation, of redemption and ſalvation by him; of regeneration by the Spirit of God; of union to Chriſt, and communion with him; and of the reſurrection of the dead: and it produces marvellous effects, attended with a divine power; as quickning ſinners dead in treſpaſſes and ſins; enlightning thoſe who are darkneſs itſelf; bearing down all oppoſition before it; caſting down the ſtrong-holds of ſin and Satan, and reducing the moſt ſtubborn and obſtinate to the obedience of Chriſt. Great things doth he, which we cannot comprehend; or know [e]: great things in creation, the nature and cauſes of which lie greatly out of the reach of man; and which he rather gueſſes at than knows, and ſtill leſs comprehends. Great things in providence; in ſuſtaining all creatures and providing for them; and in the government of the world, and in his diſpenſations in it; his judgments being unſearchable, and his ways paſt finding out: and great things in grace; as the ſalvation of ſinners by Chriſt, and the converſion of their ſouls by his Spirit; and even what is known known of them, is known but in part and very imperfectly. This is a tranſition to other great things done by the Lord, beſides thoſe before mentioned, and particular inſtances follow.

[w] Nat. Hiſt. l. 2. c 43. [x] Senec. Nat. Quæſt. l. 2. c. 12. ſo Ariſtot. Meteorolog. l. 2. c. 9. [y] The noiſe is commonly about ſeven or eight ſeconds after the flaſh, that is, about half a quarter of a minute; but ſometimes much ſooner, in a ſecond or two, or leſs than ſo; and almoſt immediately upon the flaſh: this is when the exploſion is very near us. Philoſoph. Tranſact. abridged, vol. 2. p. 183. ſee vol. 4. p. 398. [z] ולא יעקבם non ſupplantabit ea, Munſter; ſo Schmidt; Michaelis, Guſſetius, p. 633. [a] So Schmidt. [b] So Guſſetius. [c] נפלאות mirabilia, Pagninus, Montanus. [d] Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 2. c. 51. Senec. Nat. Quæſt. l. 2. c. 31. [e] ולא נדע & neſciemus, Pagninus, Montanus; ſo Schultens.

℣. 6. For he ſaith to the ſnow, Be thou on the earth, &c.] In the original it is, be thou earth: hence one of the Rabbins formed a notion, that the earth was created from ſnow under the throne of glory, which is juſtly cenſured by Maimonides [f]; for there is a defect of the letter ב as in 2 Chron. xxxiv. 30. as Aben Ezra obſerves; and therefore rightly ſupplied by us, on the earth. This is one of the great and incomprehenſible things of God. What is the cauſe of it, how it is generated, what gives it its exceeding whiteneſs and its form, we rather gueſs at than certainly know; and there are ſome things relative to it not eaſy to be accounted for: as that it ſhould be generated in the lower region of the air, ſo near us, and yet be ſo cold; and be ſo cold in its own nature, yet be like a blanket warming to the earth; and that being ſo cold, it ſhould fall in hot countries, as in many parts of Africa, as Leo Africanus aſſerts [g]; and though ſo eaſily melted, yet lies continually upon the top of a burning mountain, mount Ætna, as obſerved by Pineda and others. God has his treaſures of it, and he brings it forth from thence; it is at his command, it goes at a word ſpeaking; it is one of the things that fulfil his word, Pſal. cxlviii. 8. And if what Pliny [h] ſays is true, that ſnow never falls upon the high ſeas or main ocean; the expreſſion here is with great exactneſs and propriety, be thou on the earth. However, this is certain, that to the earth only it is uſeful, warming, refreſhing and fructifying; it has a wonderful virtue in it to fatten the earth. Olaus Magnus [i] reports, that in the northern countries, where it falls in great plenty, the fields are more fruitful than any others, and ſooner put forth their fruits and increaſe, than other fields prepared and cultivated with the greateſt labour and diligence: and that they are often obliged to drive off the cattle from them, leſt they ſhould eat too much and burſt, the fields and meadows becoming ſo luxurious by it; and frequently they mow off the tops of herbs and graſs with their ſcythes, to prevent their growing too rank. The word of God, as for its purity, ſo for its warming, refreſhing and fructifying nature, is compared unto it, Iſai. lv. 10, 11. Likewiſe to the ſmall rain, and to the great rain of his ſtrength: that is, God ſays to theſe as to the ſnow, Be upon the earth; and they preſently are, whether leſſer or larger ſhowers: the leſſer or more gentle, according to Seneca [k], fall in the winter, and the larger in ſpring; the former when the north wind blows, the latter when the ſouth; but whenever they come, they fall by the direction of God, and at his command. He and he only gives rain, the vanities of the Gentiles cannot; and theſe are ſent to water and refreſh the earth, and make it fruitful; for which reaſon alſo the word of God is compared thereunto, Deut. xxxii. 2. Iſai. lv. 10, 11. The Targum is, "to the rain after rain in "ſummer, to ripen the fruits; and to the rain af"ter the rain, to cauſe the graſs to bud in winter "in his ſtrength." So a ſhower of rain in the ſingular number, ſignifies rain that falls in ſummer; and a ſhower of rain in the plural, what falls in winter.

℣. 7. He ſealeth up the hand of every man, &c.] That is, by deep ſnows and heavy rains being on the earth; where, as travellers are ſtopped in their journies, and cannot proceed, ſo various artificers are hindered from their work, and huſbandmen eſpecially from their employment in the fields; ſo that their hands are as it were ſhut up and ſealed, that they cannot work with them. Sephorno interprets this of the fruits and increaſe of the earth being produced and brought to perfection by means of the ſnow and rain, and ſo gathered by and into the hands of men; whereby they are led to obſerve the work of God and his goodneſs herein, and ſo to love and fear him; which he takes to be the ſenſe of the following clauſe, that all men may know his work: either their own work; what they have to do at home when they cannot work abroad; or that they may have leiſure to reflect upon their moral ways and works, and conſider how deficient they are: or rather the work of God; that they may know and own the ſnow and rain are his work, and depend upon his will; or that they may have time and opportunity of conſidering and meditating on the works of God, in nature, providence and grace. Some chooſe to read the words, that all men of his work may know [l]; may know him the author of their beings, and the God of their mercies. For all men are the work of his hands; he has made them, and not they themſelves; and the end of all God's dealings with them is, that they may know him, fear, ſerve, and glorify him.

℣. 8. Then the beaſts go into dens, &c.] When ſnow and rains are on the earth in great abundance, then the wild beaſts of the field, not being able to prowl about, betake themſelves to dens; where they lie in wait, lurking for any prey that may paſs by, from whence they ſpring and ſeize it. And remain in their places; until the ſnow and rains are gone off. As for other beaſts, Olaus Magnus [m] obſerves, that when ſuch large ſnows fall, that trees are covered with them, and the tender branches bend under the weight of them; they will come and abide under them, as in ſhady places, in great ſecurity, ſheltered from the cold wind. The former may put us in mind of great perſonages, comparable to beaſts of prey for their ſavageneſs and cruelty, who, when the day of God's wrath and vengeance is come, will flee to rocks and mountains, dens and caverns, there to hide themſelves from it; Rev. vi. 15, 16, 17.

℣. 9. Out of the ſouth cometh the whirlwind, &c.] Or from the chamber [n]; from the chamber of the cloud, as Ben Gerſom, from the inſide of it; or from the treaſury of God, who bringeth the wind out of his treaſures; alluding to chambers where treaſures are kept; or from the heavens, ſhut up and veiled around with clouds like a pavilion: but becauſe we read of the chambers of the ſouth, chap. ix. 9. and the ſouthern pole was like a ſecret chamber, ſhut up, unſeen, and unknown very much to the ancients; hence we render it, and others interpret it, of the ſouth; from whence in theſe countries came whirlwinds. Hence we read of the whirlwinds of the ſouth, Iſai. xxi. 1. Zech. ix. 14. And cold out of the north; cold freezing winds from thence; or from the ſcatterers [o]: Aben Ezra interprets them of ſtars, the ſame with the Mazzaroth, chap. xxxviii. 32. ſtars ſcattered about the Arctic or or northern pole, as ſome: or rather the northern winds are deſigned, which ſcatter the clouds, drive away rain, Prov. xxv. 33. and bring fair weather, ℣. 22. Wherefore Mr Broughton renders the word, "fair weather-winds;" and, in a marginal note, "the ſcatterers of clouds [p]."

[f] Moreh Nevochim, par. 2. c. 26. [g] Deſcriptio Africæ, l. 1. c. 27, 28. l. 2. c. 27, 46, 69. [h] Nat Hiſt. l. 2. c. 103. [i] De Ritu Gent. Septentr. l. 19. c. 15. [k] Nat. Quæſt. l. 4. c. 4.
[l] כל אנשי omnes homines operis ipſius, Schmidt, Michaelis; ſo Schultens. [m] Ut ſupra. [n] מן החדר de penetrali, Montanus; ſo Junius and Tremellius, Piſcator, Cocceius, Schultens. [o] ממזרים a diſpergentibus, Montanus, Vatablus, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator; a ſparſoribus, Schultens.

℣. 10. By the breath of God froſt is given, &c.] By the word of God, as the Targum; at his command it is, at his word it comes, and at his word it goes, Pſalm cxlvii. 15—18. or by his will, as Ben Gerſom interprets it, when it is his pleaſure it ſhould be, it appears; it may be underſtood of a freezing wind from the Lord, for a wind is ſometimes expreſſed by the breath of his noſtrils, Pſal. xviii. 15. and as the word God added to things, increaſes the ſignification of them, as mountains of God, are ſtrong mountains; ſo the breath of God may ſignify a ſtrong wind, as Sepborno notes, the north wind [q]. And the breadth of the waters is ſtraitned; by the froſt they are reduced and brought into a narrower compaſs; or made hard, as Mr Broughton renders it; ſo hard as to walk upon, to draw carriages on, and lay weights and burdens very great upon; or become compact or bound together, like metal melted, poured out, and conſolidated; though ſome think it refers to the thawing of ice by the ſouth winds [r], when the waters return to their former breadth; which is done by the breath or commandment of God, as appears from the place before quoted from the Pſalmiſt; for it may be rendered, and the breadth of the waters in pouring out, ſo the Targum, when thawed; or thro' the pouring down of rain, ſo the Syriac and Arabic verſions, he ſends forth plenty of water.

℣. 11. Alſo by watering he wearieth the thick cloud, &c.] By filling it with a multitude of water, it is as it were loaded and made weary with it; and eſpecially by ſending it about thus loaded from place to place before diſcharged, when it becomes as a weary traveller; and then by letting down the water in it, whereby it ſpends itſelf like one that is weary; an emblem of miniſters that ſpend and are ſpent for the good of men: ſome render it by ſerenity or fair weather, and ſo Mr Broughton, "by "clearneſs he wearieth the thick vapours;" by cauſing a clear ſky he diſpels them. He ſcattereth his bright cloud; thin light clouds that have nothing in them, and are ſoon diſperſed and come to nothing, and are ſeen no more; an emblem of ſuch as are clouds without water, Jude, ℣. 12. ſee Zech. xi. 17. or he ſcatters the cloud by his light [s]; by the ſun, which diſpels clouds and makes a clear ſky; an emblem of the blotting out and forgiveneſs of ſins, and of reſtoring the manifeſtations of divine love, and the joys of ſalvation; ſee Iſaiah xliv. 22.

℣. 12. And it is turned round about by his counſels, &c.] The cloud is, and that by the wind, which is turned about to all points of the compaſs, according to the will of God; by the counſels of him who ſits at the helm, as the word ſignifies, and orders all things according to the counſel of his own will; to which are owing every ſhifting of the wind, and the various motions of the clouds. That they may do whatſoever he commandeth them upon the face of the world in the earth; as all his creatures do; the ſeveral meteors in the air, clouds, ſtormy wind, fire, hail, ſnow, and vapour, all fulfilling his word; and which they do every where in the ſeveral parts of the world whither they are ſent, Pſal. cvii. 25, 29. and cxlviii. So miniſters of the word drop down or withhold the rain of goſpel-doctrine and carry it into the ſeveral places of the world, as the Lord directs them; ſee Iſa. v. 6. Acts xiii. 46. Matt. xxviii. 19, 20.

℣. 13. He cauſeth it to come, &c.] The cloud and rain by it. Whether for correction; for the reproof and chaſtiſement of men for their ſins, by ſuffering ſuch quantities to fall as waſh away, or corrupt and deſtroy the fruits of the earth: or for a tribe [t], as the word ſometimes ſignifies; the rain is ſent, and comes only to a particular part or ſpot of ground, to one city and not another, Amos iv. 7. or for his land; ſome particular land he has a favour for, as the land of Canaan he cared for from one end of the year to another, and therefore ſent on it rain in due ſeaſon, though as yet it did not appear to be the object of his peculiar regard; or for the whole earth, which is his, and wherever rain comes ſeaſonably and in proper quantity, it is for the benefit of it; though ſome think the land which no man has a property in but the Lord is meant, even the wilderneſs where no man is, chap. xxxviii. 26, 27. or for mercy; to ſome particular ſpot, and to ſome particular perſons; and indeed it is a kindneſs and benefit both to good and bad men; hereby the earth is watered and made fertile and fruitful, to bring forth ſeed to the ſower and bread to the eater, ſee Matt. v. 45. Acts xiv. 17. the word of God is for the correction of ſome, and for the comfort of others, 2 Tim. iii. 16. yea the ſavour of death unto death to ſome, and the ſavour of life unto life to others, 2 Cor. ii. 16. The Targum paraphraſes the words, "either a rain of vengeance on the ſeas and "deſerts, or an impetuous rain on the trees of the "mountains and hills, or a ſtill rain of mercy on "the fruitful fields and vineyards."

℣. 14. Hearken unto this, O Job, &c.] Either to the preſent clap of thunder then heard; or rather to what Elihu had laſt ſaid concerning clouds of rain coming for correction or mercy; and improve it and apply it to his own caſe, and conſider whether the afflictions he was under were for the reproof and correction of him for ſin, or in mercy and love to his ſoul and for his good, as both might be the caſe; or to what he had farther to ſay to him, which was but little more, and he ſhould conclude. Stand ſtill; ſtand up, in order to hear better, and in reverence of what might be ſaid; and with ſilence, that it might be the better received and underſtood: and conſider the wondrous works of God; not prodigies and extraordinary things, which are out of the common courſe of nature, ſuch as the wonders in Egypt, at the Red ſea, in the wilderneſs, and in the land of Canaan, but common things; ſuch as come more or leſs under daily obſervation, for of ſuch only he had been ſpeaking, and continued to ſpeak; ſuch as winds, clouds, thunder, lightning, hail, rain, and ſnow; theſe he would have him conſider and reflect upon, that though they were ſo common and obvious to view, yet there were ſome things in them marvelous and beyond the full comprehenſion of men; and therefore much more muſt be the works of providence, and the hidden cauſes and reaſons of them.

℣. 15. Doſt thou know when God diſpoſed them? &c.] The clouds, that part of the wondrous works of God he was ſpeaking of; when he decreed concerning them that they ſhould be, when he put into them and ſtored them with rain, hail, ſnow, &c.

[p] So David de Pomis, Lexic fol. 77. 3.

[q] Induroque nives, &c. Ovid. Biſtoniæ tepuere nives, &c. Statii Theb. l. 2.

[r] —— Cum vere reverſo

[s] יפיץ ענן אורו diſpellit nubem luce ſua, Munſter.

[t] לשבט in una tribu, V. L. uni tribui, Tigurine verſion.

&c. diſpoſed of them here and there in the heavens, and gave them orders to fall on this and the other ſpot of ground; waſt thou preſent at all this, and knew what God was doing ſecretly in the clouds, and before heard what would break out of them, or fall from them? and if thou art ignorant of theſe things, canſt thou imagine that thou ſhouldſt be made acquainted with the ſecret ſprings of God's providential dealings with the children of men? And cauſed the light of his cloud to ſhine; either the lightning to break through the cloud, or rather the light of the ſun to ſhine upon his cloud, prepared to receive the light reflected on it, and form the rainbow; which, as it is called his bow, the cloud in which it is may be called his cloud; which is one of the wondrous works of God, and is called by the heathens the daughter of wonder[t]; formed in a ſemicircle, with various colours, and as a token that God will drown the earth no more; an emblem of the covenant of peace, and of Jeſus Chriſt, ſaid to be clothed with a cloud, and with a rainbow about his head, Rev. x. 1.

v. 16. Doſt thou know the balancings of the clouds? &c.] How thoſe ponderous bodies, as ſome of them are very weighty, full of water, are poized, and hang in the air, without turning this way or the other, or falling on the earth. The wondrous works of him which is perfect in knowledge; of God who is a God of knowledge, of knowledges, 1 Sam. ii. 3. who knows himſelf and all his works, all creatures and things whatever, ſee chap. xxxvi. 4. and this is another of his wondrous works which none but he, whoſe knowledge is perfect, and is the author and giver of knowledge, can know, even the poizing and balancing of the clouds in the air; we ſee they are balanced, but we know not how it is done.

v. 17. How thy garments are warm, when he quieteth the earth by the ſouth wind?] One ſhould think there is no great difficulty in accounting for this, that a man's clothes ſhould be warm, and he ſo hot as not to be able to bear them, but obliged to put them off in the ſummer ſeaſon, when only the ſouth wind blows, which brings heat, a ſerene ſky, and fine weather, Luke xii. 55. and yet there is ſomething in the concourſe of divine providence attending theſe natural cauſes, and his bleſſing with them, without which the garment of a man will not be warm, or at leaſt not warming to him, Haggai i. 6. or "how thy garments are warm when the "land is ſtill from the ſouth," as Mr Broughton renders the words; that is, how it is when the earth is ſtill from the whirlwinds of the ſouth; or when that wind does not blow which brings heat, but northerly winds in the winter time; that then a man's garments ſhould be warm, and keep him warm.

v. 18. Haſt thou with him ſpread out the ſky? &c.] Waſt thou concerned with him at the firſt ſpreading out of the ſky? waſt thou an aſſiſtant to him in it? did he not ſpread it as a curtain or canopy about himſelf, without the help of another? verily he did; ſee chap. ix. 8. Iſa. xliv. 24. Which is ſtrong; for though it ſeems a fluid and thin, is very firm and ſtrong, as appears by what it bears, and are contained in it; and therefore is called the firmament of his power, Pſal. cl. 1. And as a molten looking-glaſs; clear and tranſparent, like the looking-glaſſes of the women, made of molten braſs, Exod. xxxviii. 8. and firm and permanent[u]; and a glaſs this is in which the glory of God, and his divine perfections, is to be ſeen; and is one of the wondrous works of God, made for the diſplay of his own glory, and the benefit of men, Pſal. xix. 1. Or this may reſpect the ſpreading out a clear ſerene ſky, and ſmoothing it after it has been covered and ruffled with ſtorms and tempeſts; which is ſuch a wonderful work of God, that man has no hand in.

v. 19. Teach us what we ſhall ſay unto him, &c.] To this wonder-working God, of whoſe common works of nature we know ſo little; how we ſhould reaſon with him about his works of providence, when we know ſo little of theſe: for we cannot order our ſpeech by reaſon of darkneſs; by reaſon of darkneſs in themſelves, which is in all men naturally, and even in the ſaints in this ſtate of imperfection; and by reaſon of the clouds and darkneſs which are about the Lord himſelf, who is incomprehenſible in his nature and perfections; and by reaſon of the darkneſs caſt about his providential dealings with men, ſo that they are unſearchable and paſt finding out; and the beſt of men are at a loſs how to order their ſpeech, or diſcourſe with God concerning theſe things.

v. 20. Shall it be told him that I ſpeak? &c.] And what I ſpeak? there is no need of it, ſince he is omniſcient and knows every word that is ſpoken by men; or is any thing I have ſaid concerning him, his ways, and his works, worthy relating, or worthy of his hearing, being ſo very imperfect? nor can the things I have ſpoken of, though common things, be fully explained to any; or ſhould it be told him, the Lord, that he, Elihu, had ſpoke as Job had done, and arraigned his juſtice, and complained of his dealings? God forbid; he would not have it ſaid they were ſpoken by him for all the world: or ſhall it be recorded unto him what I ſpeak? as Mr Broughton, or that I ſpeak; ſhall it be recorded in a book, and that ſent to God; that I will ſpeak in thy cauſe, and be an advocate for thee, and endeavour to juſtify thee, in all thou haſt ſaid? no, by no means. If a man ſpeak, ſurely he ſhall be ſwallowed up; if he ſpeaks of the being and perfections of God, he is ſoon loſt; his eſſence, and many of his attributes, are beyond his comprehenſion; if he ſpeaks of his works of nature and providence, he is preſently out of his depth; there is a bathos, a depth in them he cannot fathom: if he ſpeaks of his love, and grace, and mercy, in the ſalvation of man, he is ſwallowed up with admiration; he is obliged to ſay, what manner of love is this! it has heights he cannot reach, depths he cannot get to the bottom of, lengths and breadths immeaſurable: or ſhould he undertake to diſpute with God, to litigate a point with him concerning his works, he could not anſwer him in one thing of a thouſand; and particularly Elihu ſuggeſts, was he to undertake Job's cauſe, it would ſoon be loſt and all over with him; ſo Mr Broughton renders the words, would any plead, when he ſhould be undone? who would engage in a cauſe he is ſure would be loſt, and prove his utter undoing?

v. 21. And now men ſee not the bright light which is in the clouds, &c.] Here Elihu returns to his ſubject it, may be, occaſioned by black clouds gathering in the heavens, as a preparation for the whirlwind, ſtorm and tempeſt, out of which the Lord is ſaid to ſpeak in the next chapter. And this is to be underſtood, not of the lightning in the cloud, which is not to be ſeen until it breaks out of it; nor the rainbow in the cloud, formed by the rays of light from the ſun, which diſappears when the wind paſſes and clears the ſky of the cloud cloud in which it is; nor of the Galaxy, or milky way, as Sephorno, which is not to be ſeen in a cloudy night; but of the ſun, which is the great light and a bright one, and ſhines brightly; yet ſometimes not to be ſeen by men, becauſe of interpoſing clouds, until they are cleared away by winds. Though rather this reſpects the ſun ſhining in its brightneſs, and in its full ſtrength, in the ſkies or ethereal regions, in a clear day, when men are not able to look full at it: and how much leſs then are they able to behold him who is light itſelf? and in whom is no darkneſs at all, nor ſhadow of turning? who dwells in light, which no mortal can approach unto; into whoſe nature and perfections none can fully look, or behold the ſecret ſprings of his actions, and the reaſons of his diſpenſations towards men. But the wind paſſeth and cleanſeth them; the clouds, and clears the air of them, which obſtruct the light of the ſun: or when a wind paſſeth and cleareth it; the air, as Mr Broughton, then the ſun ſhines ſo brightly that it dazzles the eye to look at it.

[t] Apollodorus, l. 1. p. 5.

[u] χαλκειος αηρ. Pindar. Nem. Ode 6.

℣. 22. Fair weather cometh out of the north, &c.] Or gold [x], which ſome underſtand literally; this being found in northern climates as well as ſouthern, as Pliny relates [y]; particularly in Colchis and Scythia, which lay to the north of Paleſtine and Arabia; and is thought by a learned man [z], to be here intended: though to underſtand it figuratively of the ſerenity of the air, bright and pure as gold; or of fair weather, which is golden weather, as Mr Broughton renders it, "through the "north the golden cometh," ſeems beſt to agree with the ſubject Elihu is upon; and ſuch weather comes from the north, through the north winds, which drive away rain, Prov. xxv. 23. With God is terrible majeſty; majeſty belongs to him as he is King of kings, whoſe the kingdom of nature and providence is; and he is the governor among and over the nations of the world. His throne is prepared in the heavens; that is his throne, and his kingdom ruleth over all: and this majeſty of his is terrible, commanding awe and reverence among all men, who are his ſubjects; and eſpecially among his ſaints and peculiar people; and ſtrikes a terror to others, even to great perſonages, the kings and princes of the earth; to whom the Lord is ſometimes terrible now, and will be hereafter; ſee Pſal. lxxvi. 12. Rev vi. 15, 16, 17. and to all chriſtleſs ſinners, eſpecially when he comes to judgment; ſee Iſai. ii. 19. 2 Cor. v. 11. Or terrible praiſe [a]; for God is fearful in praiſes, Exod. xv. 11. which may reſpect the ſubject of praiſe, terrible things, and the manner of praiſing him with fear and reverence, Pſal. cvi. 22. and ii. 11.

℣. 23. Touching the Almighty, &c.] Or with reſpect to God, who is almighty; with whom nothing is impoſſible; who can do and does do all things he pleaſes, and more than we can aſk or think; and who is all-ſufficient, as this word is by ſome rendered; has enough of every thing in himſelf and of himſelf to make him happy; and needs not any of his creatures, nor any thing they can do or give him, but has a ſufficiency for himſelf and them. We cannot find him out; found he may be in his works, and eſpecially in his Son, the expreſs image of his perſon; in whom he makes himſelf known as the God of grace: but he is not to be found out to perfection; neither by the light of nature, which is very dim, and by which men grope after him, if haply they may find him; nor even by the light of grace in the preſent ſtate: and there are many things in God quite out of the reach of man, and ever will be, fully to comprehend; as the modes of the ſubſiſtence of the three perſons in the godhead; the eternity and immenſity of God; with all ſecret things, which belong not to us to inquire curiouſly into. He is excellent in power; or great and much in it; which is diſplayed in the works of creation and ſuſtentation of the world; in the redemption and converſion of his people; in the ſupport, protection, and preſervation of them; and in the deſtruction of his and their enemies. And in judgment; in the government of the world in ſo righteous a manner; in the judgments he executes on wicked men; and as he will appear to be in the general judgment of the world, at the great day, which will be a righteous one. And in plenty of juſtice; being moſt juſt, righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works; diſtributing juſtice to all, acting according to the rules of it, in all things and towards all perſons; ſo that though he is great in power, he does not abuſe that power, to do things that are not juſt. He will not afflict; without a juſt cauſe and reaſon for it; nor willingly, but with reluctance; nor never beyond deſerts, nor more than he gives ſtrength to bear; and only for the good of his people, and in love to them. Some render it, he will not anſwer [b]; or give an account of his matters, or the reaſon of his dealings with men.

℣. 24. Men do therefore fear him, &c.] Or ſhould, becauſe of his greatneſs in power, judgment and juſtice; and becauſe of his goodneſs, in not afflicting for his pleaſure's ſake, but for the profit of men; and therefore they ſhould reverence and adore him, ſubmit to his will, patiently bear afflictions, ſerve him internally and externally, with reverence and godly fear. He reſpecteth not any that are wiſe of heart; that are wiſe in a natural ſenſe: theſe are not always regarded by God, or are his favourites; neither temporal bleſſings, nor ſpecial grace, or the knowledge of ſpiritual things, are always given to the wiſe and prudent, Eccleſ. ix. 11. Matt. xi. 25. Or that are wiſe in their own conceit; there is a wo to ſuch; and there is more hope of a fool than of them, Iſai. v. 21. Prov. xxvi. 12. Or he is not afraid of them [c], as ſome chooſe to render the word; he fears not to reprove them, and correct them for their faults, or the ſchemes they form to counterwork him; for he can take them in their craftineſs, and carry their counſel headlong. Or every wiſe in heart ſhall not ſee him [d]: the world by wiſdom knows him not; nor can any look into his heart, his thoughts, purpoſes and deſigns, and into the cauſes and reaſons of his actions; nor have thoſe that are truly wiſe perfect viſion and knowledge of him now, 1 Cor. xiii. 9, 12.

[x] זהב aurum, Pagninus, Montanus, &c. [y] Nat. Hiſt. l. 6. c. 11. & l. 33. c. 3, 4. [z] Reland. de Paradiſo, ſ. 9, 10. p. 22, 23, 24. And in the countries furtheſt north, were mines of gold formerly, as Olaus Magnus relates, tho' now deſtroyed. De Ritu Gent. Septent. l. 6, 11. Vid. l. 3, 5. [a] נורא הוד φοβερος αινος, Symmachus, formidoloſa laudatio, V. L. terribilem laude, Vatablus. [b] לא יענה non reſpondebit, Tigurine verſion; ſo ſome in Mercerus and Druſius. [c] לא יראה non timebit, Oſiander. [d] Non videbit eum omnis ſapiens corde; ſo ſome in Druſius.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

IN this chapter the Lord takes up the controverſy with Job; calls upon him to prepare to engage with him in it, and demands an anſwer to poſing queſtions he puts to him, concerning the earth and the fabric of it, ℣. 1—7. Concerning the ſea, compared to an infant in embryo, at its birth, in its ſwadling bands and cradle, ℣. 8—11. Concerning the morning-light, its ſpread and influence, ℣. 12—15. Concerning the ſprings of the ſea, the dark parts of the earth, the place both of light and darkneſs, ℣. 16—21. Concerning the various meteors, ſnow, hail, rain, thunder, lightning, and the influences of the ſtars, ℣. 22—38. and concerning proviſion for lions and ravens, ℣. 39, 40, 41.

℣. 1. Then the Lord anſwered Job out of the whirlwind, &c.] As ſoon as Elihu had done ſpeaking, who ſaw the tempeſt riſing, and gave hints of it, chap. xxxvii. 2, 14. and haſtened to finiſh his diſcourſe. This was raiſed to give notice of the Lord being about to appear, and to diſplay his majeſty, and to command reverence and attention. The Targum calls it the whirlwind of diſtreſs, as it might be to Job; and a repreſentation of the diſtreſſed and diſturbed ſtate and condition in which he was. The perſon that ſpoke out of it is Jehovah the Son of God, the eternal Word, who very probably appeared in an human form; for there was an object ſeen, chap. xlii. 5. and ſpoke with an articulate voice to Job. And ſaid; in anſwer to his frequent wiſhes and deſires, that the Lord would appear and take his cauſe in hand.

℣. 2. Who is this, &c.] Meaning not Elihu the laſt ſpeaker, as ſome think; and there are ſome who ſuppoſe not only that theſe words are directed to him, but all that is ſaid in this and the following chapter: but it was Job the Lord ſpoke to and anſwered, as expreſſed in the preceding verſe; and theſe words are taken by Job to himſelf, chap. xlii. 3. Concerning whom the Lord inquires, not as ignorant of him, who he was; but wondring that ſuch a man as he ſhould talk as he did; and as angry with him, and rebuking him for it. That darkneth counſel by words without knowledge; either his own counſel, his ſenſe and ſentiments of things, which were delivered in ſuch an obſcure manner, as not to be intelligible by thoſe that heard them; whereby they were led, as Job's friends were, into ſome miſtaken notions of him: or rather the counſel of God, his works of providence, which are done according to the counſel of his will, and were miſrepreſented by Job, as not being wiſe and good, juſt and equitable; ſee chap. xxxiv. 35, 37.

℣. 3. Gird up now thy loins like a man, &c.] Like a man of valour that girds on his harneſs for battle: Job is bid to prepare for the controverſy the Lord was entring into with him; and bring forth his ſtrong reaſons, and moſt powerful arguments in his own defence. The alluſion is to the cuſtom in the eaſtern countries, where they wore long garments, to gird them about their loins, when they engaged in work or war. Job had bluſtered what he would do, and now he is dared to it; ſee chap. xxiii. 4, 5, 6. and xxxi. 37. For I will demand of thee, and anſwer thou me; put queſtions to him, to which he required a direct and poſitive anſwer. Jehovah takes the part of the opponent in this diſpute, and gives that of the reſpondent to Job; ſince Job himſelf had put it to his option which to take, chap. xiii. 22.

℣. 4. Where waſt thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? &c.] The earth has foundations, and ſuch firm ones that it cannot be moved; but what are they, ſince it is hung in the air on nothing! No other than the power and will of God, who laid theſe foundations, and the Son of God, who has created and upholds all things by the word of his power, Heb. i 3, 10. Where was Job then? In a ſtate of nothingneſs, a mere non-entity: he was not preſent when this amazing work of nature was done, and ſaw not how the Lord went about it; and yet takes upon him to dive into the ſecret works and ways of providence, for which he is rebuked by this queſtion and the following. Declare, if thou haſt underſtanding: Job had the underſtanding of a man in things natural and civil, and of a good man in things ſpiritual and divine; but he had no underſtanding of this, of what he is queſtioned about; could not declare in what place he was, and where he ſtood, when the earth was founded.

℣. 5. Who hath laid the meaſures thereof, if thou knoweſt? &c.] Did God or a creature? The Lord, no doubt. He laid them out in his divine mind, and laid them forth by his divine power; who does all things by weight and meaſure. He fixed the dimenſions of the earth, how long, how thick, and how broad it ſhould be; he ſettled the borders and boundaries of it. This Job might know that the Lord did; but how he laid them, and what they are that are laid, he knew not. Mathematicians pretend to give us the circumference and diameter of the earth; but in their accounts are not agreed, but widely differ; which ſhows they are at no certainty about them [e]; and Job and the men of his age might be ſtill leſs knowing: though the words may be rendered, for thou knoweſt [f]; ſurely ſuch a knowing man as thou art, muſt needs know this; and ſo are a ſevere ſarcaſm upon him. Or who hath ſtretched the line upon it? The meaſuring line being formed according to rule, with exact ſymmetry and proportion. This may be the ſame with the circle of the earth, and the compaſs ſet upon the face of the deep or terraqueous globe, Prov. viii. 27. Iſai. xl. 22. And with the ſame exactneſs and juſt proportion are the ways and works of providence, which Job ought to have acquieſced in, as being well and wiſely done.

℣. 6. Whereupon are the foundations thereof faſtened? &c.] Or the pillars of it, as Ben Gerſom interprets it; ſee Pſal. lxxv. 3. and which Aben Ezra underſtands of the mountains: but be they what they may; on what can they be faſtened or ſunk into, when the earth hangs on nothing, and there is nothing viſible to ſupport it, nothing but the mighty hand of God? Or who laid the corner-ſtone thereof? which unites, cements, and keeps the [e] The mathematicians in Ariſtotle's time, reckoned the breadth of the earth a little leſs than 40 myriads of furlongs, and the length of it 70 myriads. Ariſtot. de Mundo, c. 3. Vid. Plin. Nat. Hiſt l. 2. c. 108, 109.— According to the moderns, the circumference of the earth is 25031 ½ of our ſtatute miles, and its diameter 7967 ſuch miles. See Chambers's Dictionary on the word EARTH.

[f] כי quandoquidem, Junius & Tremellius, [illegible]cator; quia, Michaeli; nam, Schultens; ſo Broughton.

the fabric together, and is the ornament and beauty of it; but who can tell what that is? Aben Ezra interprets it of the point or centre of the earth.

℣. 7. When the morning-ſtars ſang together, &c.] Either all the ſtars in a literal ſenſe; for though, ſtrictly ſpeaking, there is but one morning-ſtar, yet all may be called ſo, becauſe early created in the morning of the world; and are all ſtars of light, ſhine till the morning; and it is obſerved by ſome, that the nearer the morning the brighter they ſhine: and theſe in their way ſing the praiſes of God, and ſet forth the glory of his perfections, and occaſion ſongs of praiſe in men; ſee Pſal. cxlviii. 3. and xix. 1. Or figuratively, either angels, as moſt interpret them, comparable to ſtars for their glory, purity and light, for their conſtancy, permanency and numbers: or good men, particularly miniſters of the word, and angels of the churches; who are ſtars in Chriſt's right hand, Rev. i. 20. and ii. 1. but the principal morning-ſtar is Chriſt himſelf, Rev. xxii. 16. And all the ſons of God ſhouted for joy; which are uſually underſtood of angels alſo, ſo the Targum; who are the ſons of God, not by birth, as Chriſt, nor by adoption, as ſaints; but by creation, as Adam, Luke iii. 38. And becauſe they bear ſome likeneſs to God, as holy ſpirits, and honour and obey him in doing his will; though the character of ſons of God, as diſtinct from the children of men, given to profeſſors of religion, obtained before the times of Job; ſee Gen. vi. 2. and who might be ſaid to ſing together, and ſhout for joy, when they met for ſocial worſhip; ſee chap. i. 6. and eſpecially when any freſh diſcoveries were made to them of the Meſſiah, and ſalvation by him. Thus Abraham, one of theſe ſons of God, ſaw Chriſt's day and was glad, and ſhouted for joy, John viii. 56. For theſe words are not neceſſarily to be reſtrained to the laying of the foundation and corner-ſtone of the earth, as our verſion directs; though indeed the angels then might be preſent, being created as ſoon as the heavens were, and with the ſtars, as Capellus on this place obſerves; and rejoiced when the foundations of the earth were laid, on beholding ſuch a diſplay of the power, wiſdom and goodneſs of God therein; and which may be ſaid of them, in alluſion to what is done at the laying of the foundation of any building of note; ſee Ezra iii. 10. for it may be repeated from ℣. 4. where waſt thou when the morning-ſtars, &c. and ſo may refer to any rejoicing, whether of angels or men, before the times of Job, at which he was not preſent.

℣. 8. Or who ſhut up the ſea with doors, &c.] From the earth the tranſition is to the ſea, according to the order of the creation; and this refers not to the ſtate and caſe of the ſea as at the flood, of which ſome interpret it, but as at its firſt creation; and it is throughout this account repreſented as an infant, and here firſt as in embryo, ſhut up in the bowels of the earth, where it was when firſt created with it, as an infant ſhut up in its mother's womb, and with the doors of it; ſee chap. iii. 10. the bowels of the earth being the ſtorehouſes where God firſt laid up the deep waters, Pſalm xxxiii. 7. and when the chaos, the mis-ſhapen earth, was like a woman big with child. When it brake forth out of the abyſs, as the Targum, with force and violence, as Pharez broke out of his mother's womb; for which reaſon he had his name given, which ſignifies a breach, Gen. xxxviii. 29. ſo it follows, as if it had iſſued out of the womb; as a child out of its mother's womb; ſo the ſea burſt forth and iſſued out of the bowels of the earth, and covered it all around, as in Pſal. civ. 6. and now it was that the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters, before they were drained off the earth; this was the firſt open viſible production of the ſea, and may be called the birth of it; ſee Gen. i. 2. Something like this the heathen philoſopher Archelaus had a notion of, who ſays[g], the ſea was ſhut up in hollow places, and was as it were ſtrained through the earth.

℣. 9. When I made the cloud the garment thereof, &c.] For this new-born babe, the ſea. And thick darkneſs a ſwaddling band for it; which was the caſe of the ſea when it burſt out of the bowels of the earth and covered it, for then darkneſs was upon the face of the deep, a dark, foggy, miſty air, Gen. i. 2. and this was before its ſeparation from the land, and in this order it ſtands in this account; though ſince, clouds, fogs, and miſts, which riſe out of the ſea, are as garments to it, and cover it at times, and the ſurrounding atmoſphere, as it preſſes the whole terraqueous globe, and keeps the parts of the earth together, ſo the waters of the ſea from ſpilling out; and theſe are the garments and the ſwaddling bands with which the hands and arms of this big and boiſterous creature are wreathed; it is ſaid of the infant in Ezek. xvi. 4. that it was neither ſalted nor ſwaddled at all; but both may be ſaid of the ſea; that it is ſalted is ſufficiently known, and that it is ſwaddled is here affirmed; but who except the Lord almighty could do this? and who has managed, and ſtill does and can manage this unruly creature as eaſily as a nurſe can turn about and ſwaddle a new born babe upon her lap.

℣. 10. And brake up for it my decreed place, &c.] Or as Mr Broughton tranſlates it, and brake the earth for it by my decree; made a vaſt chaſm in the earth to hold the waters of the ſea, which was provided as a ſort of cradle to put this ſwaddled infant in; God cleaved the earth, raiſed the hills and ſunk the valleys, which became as channels to convey the waters that ran off the earth to their appointed place, which is beautifully expreſſed in Pſalm civ. 7,8. and refers there, as here, to the work of creation on the ſecond day, Gen. i. 9, 10.[h] And ſet bars and doors; to keep it in its decreed, appointed place, that the waters might not go over the earth; theſe are the ſhores, as the Targum, the cliffs and rocks upon them, the boundaries of the ſea; to which may be added, and what is amazing, the ſand upon the ſea-ſhore is ſuch a boundary to it that it cannot paſs, Jer. v. 22. but theſe would be inſufficient was it not for the power and will of God next expreſſed.

℣. 11. And ſaid, Hitherto ſhalt thou come, but no further, &c.] The waters of the ſea ſhall ſpread themſelves to ſuch and ſuch ſhores, and waſh them, but go no further; its rolling tides ſhall go up ſo far in rivers that go out of it, and then return, keeping exactly to time and place; this is ſaid by Jehovah, the Word of God, and through his almighty power is attended to. And here ſhall thy proud waves be ſtayed; ſo high and no higher ſhall they lift up themſelves; ſo far and no further ſhall they roll on, than to the boundaries fixed for them; and though they may toſs up themſelves as proud men toſs up their heads, for which reaſon pride is aſcribed to them, yet they ſhall not prevail, Jer. v. 22. all this may be accommodated to the afflictions of God's people, which are ſometimes compared to the

[g] Laert. Vit. Philoſoph. l. 2. p. 99. ſo David de Pomis, Lexic. fol. 203. 1.

[h] Or determined, that is, appointed for it its convenient, proper and fixed place;

the waves and billows of the ſea, Pſal. xlii. 7. and lxxxviii. 7. and theſe iſſue out of the womb of God's purpoſes and decrees, and are not the effects of chance; they are many, and threaten to overwhelm, but God is with his people in them, and preſerves them from being overflowed by them; he has ſet the bounds and meaſures of them, beyond which they cannot go; ſee Iſa. xxvii. 8. and xliii. 2. and alſo to the world, and to the men of it, who are like a troubled ſea, Dan. vii. 2, 3. Iſa. lvii. 20. and who riſe, and ſwell, and daſh againſt the people of God, being ſeparated from them who were originally mixed with them; but the Lord reſtrains their wrath and fury, and ſuffers them not to do his people any hurt; whom he has placed in the munition of rocks out of their reach, that thoſe proud waters cannot go over them as they threaten to do; ſee Pſal. lxxvi. 10. and cxxiv. 2—6.

℣. 12. Haſt thou commanded the morning ſince thy days? &c.] Job had lived to ſee many a morning, but it never was in his power to command one; he had been in ſuch circumſtances as to wiſh for morning-light before it was, but was obliged to wait for it, could not haſten it, or cauſe it to ſpring before its time; ſee chap. vii. 3, 4. one of the Targums is, "waſt thou in the days of the firſt crea-"tion, and commandedſt the morning to be?" he was not, God was; he was before the firſt morning, and commanded it into being, Gen. i. 3, 4, 5. Iſa. xliii. 13. And cauſed the day-ſpring to know his place; the firſt ſpring of light or dawn of day; which though it has a different place every day in the year, as the ſun aſcends or deſcends in the ſigns of the zodiac, yet it knows and obſerves its exact place, being taught of God.

℣. 13. That it might take hold of the ends of the earth, &c.] As when the morning-light ſprings forth, it quickly does, reaching in a ſhort time the extreme part of the hemiſphere; which, and what goes before, may be applied to the light of the goſpel, and the direction of that under divine providence in the ſeveral parts of the world, and unto the ends of it; ſee Pſal. xix. 4, 5, 6. Rom. x. 18. That the wicked might be ſhaken out of it; the earth, by means of the light; which may be underſtood either of wicked men who have been all night upon works of darkneſs, and betake themſelves on the approach of light to private lurking places, like beaſts of prey, ſo that the earth ſeems to be, as it were, clear of them; or of their being taken up in the morning for deeds done in the night, and brought to juſtice, which uſed to be exerciſed in mornings, Jer. xxi. 12. Pſalm ci. 8. and ſo the earth rid of them: thus wicked men ſhun the light of the goſpel, and are condemned by it; and in the latter daylight and glory they will ceaſe from the earth; ſee John iii. 19, 20. Pſal. x. 16. and civ. 35.

℣. 14. It is turned as clay to the ſeal, &c.] As the clay receives a different form by the impreſs of the ſeal upon it, ſo the earth appears in a different manner by the ſpring of morning-light upon it; in the darkneſs of the night nothing of its form and beauty is to be ſeen; it is a mere tohu and bohu, like the chaos, Gen. i. 2. its riſing hills, and ſpreading dales, and beautiful landſkips, cannot be obſerved with pleaſure; but when the light breaks forth in the morning, it is ſeen in all its beauty and glory: of the change the light of the goſpel makes in men, ſee 2 Cor. iii. 18. And they ſtand as a garment; or things ſtand upon it as a garment, as Mr Broughton renders the words; herbs, plants and trees, unſeen in the night, ſtand up like a veſture to the earth in the morning light; and as they are clothed themſelves, they are a garment to that which now puts on another and beautiful habit; the paſtures are clothed with flocks, and the valleys covered with corn, and the whole earth with light itſelf, as with a garment: and as beautifully do men made light in the Lord appear; ſee Iſa. lxi. 10. Rev. iii. 4, 5. and xii. 1.

℣. 15. And from the wicked their light is withholden, &c.] Whoſe light is darkneſs, and whoſe day is the night, of which they are deprived when the morning-light breaks forth; ſee chap. xxiv. 17. it may be figuratively underſtood of the light of proſperity being removed from them, or the light of life, when they ſhall be ſent into utter darkneſs. And the high arm ſhall be broken; their power weakned and made uſeleſs; even the power of ſuch wicked men who have had a large ſhare of it, and have uſed it in a tyrannical manner; and eſpecially this will be their caſe at death; ſee Iſa. xiv. 10, 12.

℣. 16. Haſt thou entred into the ſprings of the ſea? &c.] The ſubterraneous paſſages through which the waters flow into the ſea and ſupply it; or the ſprings and fountains that riſe up at the bottom of it[i]; and ſome tell us of ſprings of ſweet water that riſe there, even though the water at the bottom of the ſea is ſalter than on the ſurface[k]: ſome render it the drops of the ſea[l]; haſt thou conſidered them and counted them? art thou able to do it? no: others the perplexities of it[m], ſo the Targum, the word being uſed in this ſenſe Exod. xiv. 3. the thickets of it; ſome ſpeak of woods and foreſts in it, ſee note on Exod. x. 19. others rocks and ſhelves[n], and others the borders of it[o]; and the ſenſe then is, haſt thou entred into and travelled through the main ocean, obſerved the foreſts in it, the ſhelving rocks and ſandy mountains in it, and gone to the utmoſt borders of it? Or haſt thou walked in the ſearch of the depth? to find out the deepeſt place of it, where no ſounding line can reach[p]; or walked in queſt of the curioſities of it, animals, plants and minerals, unknown to men; or of the riches that lie at the bottom of it, for which now the diving-bell is uſed, but not invented and known in the times of Job; and if Job had not done and could not do all this, how ſhould he be able to enter into the ſecret ſprings of providence, or trace the ways of God, whoſe way is in the ſea, and whoſe paths are in the great waters, and his footſteps not known, Pſal. lxxvii. 19. Rom. xi. 33.

℣. 17. Have the gates of death been opened unto thee? &c.] Meaning not by which death has entered into the world, and which have been the cauſes and occaſion of it; as the ſin of man, the appointment of God, and various providences, calamities lamities and diſeaſes; but by which men enter into the ſtate of the dead. Men know not experimentally what death is, nor in what way they ſhall go out of the world, nor at what time, nor in what place; they know not what the ſtate of the dead is, there is no correſpondence between them and the living; they do not know either what they enjoy or endure, or who preciſely and with certainty are in the ſeparate abodes of bliſs or miſery; the gates of theſe dark and inviſible regions to us have never been thrown open, for mortals to look into them. Or haſt thou ſeen the doors of the ſhadow of death? the ſame thing in other words; the Targum and Jarchi interpret this of hell.

[i] According to Dr Plot, the principal fountains have their origin, and are ſupplied with water through ſubterraneous paſſages from the ſea. De Origine Fontium, &c. apud Act. Erudit. Lipſ. A. M. 1685. p. 538. See Gen. vii. 11. [k] Vid. Scheuchzer. Phyſic. Sacr. vol. 4. p. 803. [l] נבכי ים guttas maris, Tigurine verſion, Grotius. [m] Perplexitates maris, Munſter. [n] Scopulos maris, Michaelis; ſalebroſa maris, Schultens. [o] So Jarchi. [p] For though the greateſt depth of the ſea is ſaid by Fabianus, (apud Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 2. c. 102.) to be fifteen furlongs, or near two miles; this muſt be underſtood of that part of it which is fathomable and nearer land. But ſuch as thoſe, called Bathea Ponti, the depths of the Pontus, and are almoſt 300 furlongs from the continent, they are ſaid, (Plin. ib.) to be of an immenſe depth, and the bottom not to be found. And if the Sardinian ſea, the deepeſt in the Mediterranean, (Ariſtot. Meteorolog. l. 2. c. 1.) is 1000 orgies or fathoms deep, (Poſidonius apud Strabo. Geograph. l. 1. p. 37.) that is, one mile and a fifth; what muſt the depth of the vaſt ocean be?

℣. 18. Haſt thou perceived the breadth of the earth? &c.] Which may be put for all the dimenſions of it, length, breadth, diameter and circumference, but eſpecially it regards the ſuperficies of it, and the meaſurement of that; haſt thou gone over the whole face of the earth and meaſured it, all its parts, its hills and dales, rocks and mountains, and took a ſurvey of all the cities, towns and villages, woods, foreſts, fountains, rivers, &c.? no; if a man lived as long as Methuſelah, and ſpent all his days in this way, he could never be able to do it; and ſome parts are inacceſſible, and not to be meaſured by the moſt ſkilful geometer. Declare, if thou knoweſt it all; the whole earth and every part of it, and all that is in it. Whether the other hemiſphere and the antipodes were known in Job's time is a queſtion; however not America, or the new world, which is a late diſcovery; and even now, in our moſt exact maps of the world, ſome parts are marked with terra incognita, the unknown land.

℣. 19. Where is the way where light dwelleth? &c.] Or the way to the place where it dwells, and what that is. And as for darkneſs, where is the place thereof? where theſe were placed when they were firſt ſeparated at the creation? where light goes and dwells, when it departs from us at ſun-ſetting? and where the darkneſs betakes itſelf, and makes its abode at ſun-riſing? What is the chamber of the ſun, and the tabernacle of it? from whence it ſets out, and whither it returns? And though theſe queſtions may be anſwered by geographers and aſtronomers in their way; yet they ſeem to reſpect chiefly the diſpoſal of light and darkneſs, in ſuch a manner as to cauſe the revolution of them, and the inequality of days and nights in different ſeaſons and climates; and which is not in the power of men to effect, but depends on the ſovereign will of God.

℣. 20. That thou ſhouldſt take it to the bound thereof? &c.] Either darkneſs, or rather the light; take it as it were by the hand, and guide and direct its courſe to its utmoſt bound. This only the Lord can do and does: he has ſet a tabernacle for the ſun, which goes forth at his command as a ſtrong man to run a race; whoſe going forth is from the end of the heavens, and his circuit unto the ends of it: in which his courſe is ſo ſteered and directed by the Lord, that he never miſſes his way or errs from it; but keeps his path exactly, as well as knows its riſing and ſetting, its utmoſt bounds. And that thou ſhouldſt know the paths to the houſe thereof? from whence it ſets out, and whither it returns; ſee Pſal. xix. 4, 5, 6. And ſo the light and darkneſs of proſperity and adverſity, as well as natural light and darkneſs, are of God, at his diſpoſal, and bounded by him, and therefore his will ſhould be ſubmitted to; which is the doctrine the Lord would teach Job by all this.

℣. 21. Knoweſt thou it, becauſe thou waſt then born? &c.] When light and darkneſs were firſt ſeparated, and had their ſeveral apartments aſſigned them; their laws and rules given them, and their bounds and limits ſet them? No; he was not: and had he been the firſt man, could not have been early enough to have been preſent at the doing of this, and ſo come at the knowledge thereof; ſince man was not made until the ſixth day of the creation. Or becauſe the number of thy days is great? reach to the beginning of time, and ſo as old as the creation. This was not the caſe. Some underſtand theſe words ironically; thou knoweſt the places and bounds of light and darkneſs, ſince thou art a very old man, born as ſoon as the world was. Whereas he was of yeſterday, and knew nothing; which to convince him of, is the deſign of this biting, cutting expreſſion. The Targum is, "Didſt thou know then that thou ſhouldſt be born, "and the number of thy days many?" No, Job did not know when he was born, nor of whom, and in what circumſtances, but by the relation of others; and much leſs could he know before he was born, that he ſhould be, or how long he ſhould live in the world: but God knows all this beforehand; when men ſhall come into the world, at what period and of what parents, and how long they ſhall continue in it.

℣. 22. Haſt thou entred into the treaſures of the ſnow? or haſt thou ſeen the treaſures of the hail?] The vapours raiſed, and clouds formed in the atmoſphere, which is the ſtorehouſe of thoſe meteors; and may be called treaſures, becauſe hidden in the clouds, and not ſeen by man until the fall of them; and becauſe they are in the keeping, and at the command and direction of the Lord the proprietor of them; and becauſe rich and inriching, eſpecially ſnow, which falling keeps the earth warm, and makes it fruitful; and becauſe of the abundance thereof which ſometimes falls. Now we are not to imagine, that the Lord has ſtores of theſe laid up in heaps, in times paſt for time to come; but that he can and does as eaſily and as ſoon produce them when he pleaſes, as one that has treaſures laid up can bring them forth at once.

℣. 23. Which I have reſerved againſt the time of trouble, &c.] For the puniſhment or affliction of men; and is explained as follows, againſt the day of battle and war? as his artillery and ammunition to fight his enemies with. Of hail we have inſtances in ſcripture, as employed againſt the Egyptians and Canaanites, Exod. ix. 25. Joſh. x. 11. and of a reſerve of it in the purpoſes of God, and in prophecy againſt the day of battle with antichriſt, Rev. xvi. 21. and ſo Jarchi interprets it here of the war of GOG and MAGOG. And though there are no inſtances of ſnow being uſed in this way in ſcripture, yet there is in hiſtory. Strabo[s] reports, that at Corzena and Cambyſena, which join to mount Caucaſus, ſuch ſnows have fallen, that whole companies of men have been ſwallowed up in them; and even armies have been overwhelmed with them, as the army of the Gauls[t]; and ſuch quantities have been thrown down from mountains, on which they have been lodged, that towns, towers, and villages have been laid proſtrate by them[u]; and in the year 443, a vaſt ſnow deſtroyed many[w]. Frequently do we hear in our parts of the diſaſters occaſioned by them. The Targum particularly cularly makes mention of ſnow; and renders it, which ſnow I have reſerved, &c. though abſurdly applies it to puniſhment in hell.

[s] Geograph. l. 11. p. 363. [t] Cicero de Divinatione, l. 1. c. 13. [u] Olaus Magn. de Ritu Gent. Septent. l. 2. [w] Whiſton's Chronolog. Tables, cent. 20.

ver. 24. By what way is the light parted, &c.] That is, doſt thou know by what way it is parted or divided? As at the firſt creation, when God divided the light from darkneſs, Gen. i. 4. or at ſun-riſing and ſun-ſetting; and ſo in the two hemiſpheres, when there is darkneſs on the one, and light on the other; or under the two poles, when there are interchangeably ſix months light and ſix months darkneſs. Or how it is parted in an unequal diſtribution of day and night, at different ſeaſons and in different climates; or how on one and the ſame day, and at the ſame time, the ſun ſhall ſhine in one part of the earth, and not another; and more eſpecially if this had been now a fact, and known, that there ſhould be darkneſs all over the land of Egypt, and light in Goſhen. Some underſtand this of lightning, but that is after mentioned. Which ſcattereth the eaſt wind upon the earth? that riſing ſometimes with the ſun, or firſt ſpring of light; ſee Jonah iv. 8. or which light ſpreads and diffuſes itſelf from the eaſt, as it may be rendered. The ſun riſes in the eaſt, and in a very quick and ſurpriſing manner ſpreads and diffuſes its light throughout the hemiſphere. Or this may reſpect the eaſt wind itſelf, which ſcatters the clouds; and either ſpreads them in the heavens over the earth, or diſperſes them and drives away rain [x], as the north wind does: or as Mr Broughton renders the words, and the eaſt wind ſcattereth itſelf over the earth; it blowing inviſibly and without our knowledge, goes and returns as other winds do, John iii. 8.

ver. 25. Who hath divided a water-courſe for the overflowing of waters? &c.] For a very large ſhower of rain, as the Vulgate Latin verſion: for this is not to be underſtood of an aquæduct, channel, or canal made on earth, either for the draining of waters off of land overflowed thereby, or for the conveyance of it to different parts to overflow it; ſuch as were cut out of the Nile in Egypt, for the overflowing of the land, to make it fruitful; ſuch may be and have been made by men: but of a water-courſe in the air or atmoſphere, as a canal or channel, for the rain to come down upon the earth; and this is the work of God, and him only, who directs and ſteers the courſe of rain, that it falls regularly and gently, not in ſpouts and floods, but in drops larger or leſſer; on what ſpot of ground, or part of the earth, he pleaſes: and if what Jarchi ſays is true, that every drop has its courſe, its canal, through which it paſſes, it is ſtill more wonderful. Or a way for the lightning of thunder; which generally go together, and are of God. His fire and voice, and for which he makes a way, by which they burſt and break forth out of the cloud, and their courſe is directed by him under the whole heavens; ſee chap. xxviii. 26. and xxxvii. 3. So the goſpel, compared to rain and lightning, has its direction and its courſe ſteered to what part of the world he pleaſes; ſee Pſal. xix. 4. Acts xiii. 46, 47. and xvi. 6, 7, 8, 9, 10.

ver. 26. To cauſe it to rain on the earth, where no man is; on the wilderneſs, wherein there is no man?] Which is uninhabited by men, being ſo dry and barren; where there is no man to cultivate and water it, as gardens are; and where is no man to receive any advantage by the rain that comes upon it; and yet the Lord ſends it for the uſe of animals that dwell there; which ſhews his care and providence with reſpect even to the wild beaſts of the earth. This may be an emblem of the rain of the goſpel upon the Gentile world, comparable to a wilderneſs; ſee Iſa. xxxv. 1.

ver. 27. To ſatisfy the deſolate and waſte ground, &c.] Which is exceeding deſolate, and therefore two ſuch words are uſed to expreſs it; which is ſo dry and thirſty that it is one of the four things that ſay not it is enough, Prov. xxx. 16. and yet God can and does give it rain to its full ſatisfaction, Pſal. civ. 13. ſo the Lord ſatisfies ſouls, comparable to dry and thirſty ground, by his word and ordinances, with the goodneſs and fatneſs of his houſe; ſee Pſalm lxiii. 1—5. and lxv. 4. And to cauſe the bud of the tender herb to ſpring forth; graſs for the cattle, and herb for the ſervice of men, Pſalm civ. 14. of like uſe is the word in a ſpiritual ſenſe for the budding and increaſe of the ſpiritual ſenſe for the budding and increaſe of the graces of the ſpirit in the Lord's people; ſee Deut. xxxii. 2. Iſa. lv. 10, 11.

ver. 28. Hath the rain a father? &c.] None but God; hence the heathen themſelves call God [y], and [z]; ſee Jer. xiv. 22. he that is our father in heaven is the father of rain, and him only; whatever ſecondary cauſes there be, God only is the efficient cauſe, parent, and producer of it: ſo the goſpel is not of men but of God, is a gift of his, comes down from heaven, tarries not for men, and is a great bleſſing, as rain is. Or who hath begotten the drops of the dew? which are innumerable; he that is the parent of the rain is of the dew alſo, and he only [a]; to which ſometimes not only the word of God, and his free favour and good-will, but the people of God themſelves are compared for their number, influence, and uſe; ſee Pſal. cx. 3. Mic. v. 7. and their new birth is ſimilar to the generation of dew, it being not of the will of man, but of God, according to his abundant mercy, free favour, and good-will, is from above, from heaven, and is effected ſilently, ſecretly, ſuddenly, at an unawares; John i. 13. and iii. 3, 5, 8.

ver. 29. Out of whoſe womb came the ice, &c.] The parent of the rain and dew is the parent of the ice alſo, and he only; it is therefore called his ice, his child, his offſpring, Pſalm cxlvii. 17. Here the Lord is repreſented as a mother, and ſo he is by Orpheus [b] called metropator, or mother-father. And the hoary froſt of heaven, who hath gendered it? this is of God, and by his breath; ſee chap. xxxvii. 10.

ver. 30. The waters are hid as with a ſtone, &c.] The ſuperficies of waters by froſt become as hard as a ſtone, and will bear great burdens, and admit of carriages to paſs over them [c], where ſhips went before; ſo that the waters under them are hid and quite out of ſight: an emblem of the hard heart of man, which can only be thawed by the power and grace of God, by the ſouthwind of the Spirit blowing, and the ſun of righteouſneſs riſing on it. And the face of the deep is frozen; or bound together by the froſt, as the Targum; it is taken, laid hold on, and kept together, as the word ſignifies, ſo that it cannot flow. Hiſtorians ſpeak of ſeas being frozen up, as ſome parts of the Scythian ſea, reported by [x] Agente nimbos ocyor euro. Horat. Carmin. l. 2. ode 16. tica, ſive l. 1. p. 60.

[a] Though a certain poet (Alcman Lyricus apud Macrob. Saturnal. l. 7. c. 16.) ſays, that dew is the offſpring of the air and of the moon; but theſe can only at moſt be reckoned but ſecondary cauſes. The Arabs ſpeak of an angel over dew. Abulpharag. Hiſt. Dynaſt p. 75.

[b] Apud Clement. Stromat. l. 5. p. 698.

[c] Nunc hoſpita plauſtris, &c. Virg. Georgic. l. 3. v. 362.

[y] Ariſtot. de Mundo, c. 7.

[z] Pauſan. Attica, ſive l. 1. p. 60.

by Mela [d], and the Cimmerian Bosphorus, by Herodotus [e], and the northern seas by Olaus Magnus [f]; as that men might travel over them on foot or on horseback, from one country to another; and Strabo relates [g], that where a sea-fight has been in the summer time, armies and hosts have met and fought in the winter. In Muscovy the ice is to six and ten feet deep [h]; in the year 401 the Euxine sea [i] was frozen over for the space of twenty days; and in the year 763 the seas at Constantinople were frozen one hundred miles from the shore, so thick as to bear the heaviest carriages [k].

℣. 31. Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades, &c.] Of which see the note on chap. ix. 9. and this constellation of the seven stars which is meant, rising in the spring, the pleasantnesses of the season, as the word may be rendered, may be intended here; which cannot be restrained or hindered from taking place in the proper course of the year; which is beautifully described in Cant. ii. 12, 13. and may in a spiritual sense relate to the effects of powerful and efficacious grace, the influences of which are irresistible and cause a spring-time in the souls of men, where it was before winter, a state of darkness, deadness, coldness, hardness and unfruitfulness, but now the reverse. Some versions read the bands of the Pleiades [l], as if the sense was, Canst thou gather and bind, or cluster together such a constellation as the seven stars be, as I have done? thou canst not; and so not stop their rising or hinder their influences, according to the other versions: Or loose the bands of Orion? of which see the note on chap. ix. 9. and Amos v. 8. This constellation appears in the winter, and brings with it stormy winds, rain, snow and frost, which latter binds up the earth, that seeds and roots in it cannot spring up; and binds the hands of men from working, by benumbing them, or rendering their materials or utensils useless; for which reasons bands are ascribed to Orion, and are such strong ones that it is not in the power of men to loose; the seasons are not to be altered by men; and Job might be taught by this that it was not in his power to make any change in the dispensations of providence; to turn the winter of adversity into the spring of prosperity; and therefore it was best silently to submit to the sovereignty of God, and wait his time for a change of circumstances.

℣. 32. Canst thou bring forth Mazzaroth in his season? &c.] Which are thought to be the same with the chambers of the south, chap. ix. 9. the southern pole [m] with its stars, signified by chambers, because hidden from our sight in this part of the globe; and here by Mazzaroth, from nazar, to separate, because separated and at a distance from us; some think [n] the twelve signs of the zodiac are meant, each of which are brought forth in their season, not by men, but by the Lord; see Isa. xl. 26. Or canst thou guide Arcturus with his sons? a constellation of many stars called its sons, of which see chap. ix. 9. Schmidt conjectures that Jupiter and his satellites are meant; but rather what we call the greater and lesser bear, in the tail of which is the north pole-star, the guide of mariners, said [o] to be found out by Thales, by which the Phœnicians sailed, but is not to be guided by men; this constellation is fancied to be in the form of a wain or waggon, and is called Charles's wain; could this be admitted, there might be thought to be an allusion to it [p], and the sense be, Canst thou guide and lead this constellation, as a waggon or team of horses can be guided and led; stars have their courses, Judg. v. 20. but are not steered, guided, and directed by men, but by the Lord himself.

℣. 33. Knowest thou the ordinances of heaven? &c.] Settled by the decree, purpose, and will of God, and are firm and stable; see Psal. cxlviii. 6. Jer. xxxi. 35, 36. the laws and statutes respecting their situation, motion, operation, influence, and use, which are constantly observed; these are so far from being made by men, and at their direction, that they are not known by them, at least not fully and perfectly. Canst thou set the dominion thereof in the earth? or over it? of the heavens over the earth; not such an one as judicial astrologers ascribe unto them, as to influence the bodies of men, especially the tempers and dispositions of their minds; to affect their wills and moral actions, the events and occurrences of their lives, and the fate of nations and kingdoms; their dominion is not moral and civil, but physical or natural, as to make the revolutions of night and day, and of the several seasons of the year; and to affect and influence the fruits of the earth, &c. see Gen. i. 16. Deut. xxxiii. 13, 14. Hos. ii. 21, 22, 23. but this dominion is solely under God, and at his direction, and is not of mens fixing.

℣. 34. Canst thou lift up thy voice to the clouds, that abundance of waters may cover thee?] Thy gardens, fields and farms; canst thou in a magisterial way call to, and demand of the clouds to let down rain in large quantities, sufficient to water them and make them fruitful? no, thou canst not: thou mayst cry and call as long as thou wilt, not a cloud will stir, nor a drop of water be let down; rain is to be had in a suppliant way, through the prayer of faith, as by Elijah; but not in a dictatorial, authoritative way: the clouds and rain are only at the disposal of the Lord; ask of him and he will give them; but they are not to be commanded, Zech. x. 1. see Amos v. 8.

℣. 35. Canst thou send lightnings, that they may go, and say unto thee, Here we are?] Thy humble servants? we have been where thou didst send us, and have executed what we were bid to do, and are returned, and here we are waiting further orders; see Matt. viii. 9. no: lightnings are only at the command of God, and there have been some awful instances of it, Lev. x. 1. Numb. xi. 1. and xvi. 35. but not in the power of men; indeed we have an extraordinary instance in Elijah, who at the motion, and under the impulse of the spirit of prophecy in him, called for fire, or lightning, to consume captains with their fifties, and it came down on them and consumed them, 2 Kings i. 10, 12. but he is not to be imitated herein: when the disciples of Christ desired the same upon a provocation, they were severely reproved by him, Luke ix. 54, 55. were these at the call and dispose of men, what dreadful things would be done in the world? for if good men, when provoked, would make use of such a power to destroy the lives of men, much more bad men; and our eyes would continually behold the flashes of lightning, and our ears ears hear the roarings of thunder, and the terrible effects thereof; but neither mercies nor judgments are at the command of men, but of God.

[d] De Situ Orbis, l. 3. c. 5. [e] Melpomene, sive l. 4. c. 20. Vid. Macrob. Saturnal. l. 7. c. 12. [f] De Ritu Gent. Septent. l. 1. c. 13. [g] Geograph. l. 7. p. 211. Vid. Alex. ab Alex. Dier. Genial. l. 1. c. 22. [h] Scheuchzer. Phys. Sacr. vol. 4. p. 810. [i] Universal History, vol. 16 p. 489. [k] Ibid. vol. 17. p. 45 [l] מעדנות כימה δεσμον πλειαδος, Sept. nexus stellarum, Schmidt; so Jarchi and Targum. — According to the Talmud, the word signifies 100 stars. Vid. T. Bab Beracot, fol. 58. 2. [m] David de Pomis, Lexic. fol. 77. 3. [n] Vatablus, Codurcus, Schultens; so Suidas in voce Μαζουρωθ. [o] Callimachus apud Laert. Vit. Thalet. p. 16. [p] Vid. Hinckelman. Præfat. ad Alkoran. p. 29, 30,

℣. 36. Who hath put wisdom in the inward parts? &c.] That is, of man, in his heart, as explained in the next clause; such wisdom as to guide the the stars, know the ordinances of heaven, set their dominion on earth, manage and direct the clouds and lightning; no such wisdom is put in man. Or who hath given understanding to the heart? to understand all the above things, and answer to the several questions put in this chapter? though as these clauses may respect much one and the same thing, they may be understood of wisdom and understanding in man, whether natural or spiritual; and seeing they are found there, the question is who put them there, or how came they there? who gave them to him? the answer must be, God himself, and no other; man has his rational soul, his intellectual powers, the light of nature and reason in him; all his understanding in arts and sciences, trades and manufactures, is of the Lord, and not of himself or another; see chap. xxxii. 8. Exod. xxxvi. 1, 2. Isa. xxviii. 23—29. all spiritual wisdom and understanding, which lies in a man's concern for his eternal welfare, in the knowledge of himself, and of his state and condition by nature, and of the way of life and salvation by Christ, and of the truths and doctrines of the gospel, is all of God and Christ, and by the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of him; no man therefore has any reason to glory in his wisdom and knowledge, of whatsoever kind, as though he had not received it; nor should he dare to arraign the wisdom of God in his providential dealings with men; since he that teaches man knowledge must needs know better than man how to govern the world he has made, and dispose of all things in it. The last clause is in the Vulgate Latin rendered, who hath given to the cock understanding? and so the Targums and other Jewish writers [p] interpret it; and they observe [q] that in Arabia a cock is called by the word that is here used; and in their morning prayers, and at hearing a cock crow, they say [r], "Blessed be the Lord who "giveth to the cock understanding to distinguish be- "tween the day and the day:" but however remarkable the understanding of this creature is, which God has given it, and which is even taken notice of by heathen writers [s]; that it should know the stars, distinguish the hours of the night by crowing, and express its joy at the rising of the sun and moon; yet such a sense of the text seems impertinent, as well as that of the Septuagint version, of giving to women the wisdom and knowledge of weaving and embroidery.

℣. 37. Who can number the clouds in wisdom? &c.] Or has such wisdom as to be able to count them when the heavens are full of them; hence they are used to denote a great multitude, Isa. lx. 8. Heb. xii. 1. or declare them [t], set forth and explain the nature of them, their matter, motion and use; none can do this perfectly or compleatly. Aben Ezra interprets it, who can make them as sapphire? in which he is followed by Mr Broughton and others [u]: the sapphire is a precious stone very clear and lucid, of a sky colour. And then the sense is, Who can make a clear and serene sky, when it is cloudy? None but the Lord; see chap. xxxvii. 11. Or who can stay the bottles of heaven? or barrels, as Mr Broughton; the clouds in which the rain is bottled or barrelled up; and when it is the pleasure of God to pour them out, who can stay, stop, or restrain them? Or who can cause them to lie down [w]? that is, on the earth; to descend or distil on it, as the same translator. Who can do this, when it is the will of God to withhold them? To stop or unstop those bottles, to restrain rain, or pour it forth, is entirely at his dispose and not man's; see ℣. 34. Gen. viii. 2. Amos iv. 7.

℣. 38. When the dust groweth into hardness, and the clods cleave fast together?] When the dust is attenuated, and ground as it were into powder; and the clods cleave together, as if glued, as in a drought for want of rain: or the bottles of heaven being unstopped and poured out; or "sprink- "ling the dust with this sprinkling," as Mr Broughton. Or rather, pouring on the dust with pouring; that is, pouring down rain, by unstopping the bottles of heaven. The dust as meal, by water poured into it, cements, unites, and is compacted and becomes earth, that may be cultivated; is clodded and cleaves together, and may be plowed and sown.

℣. 39. Wilt thou hunt the prey for the lion? &c.] From meteors the Lord passes to animals, beasts and birds, wherefore some here begin the 39th chapter, which only treats of such; and he begins with the lion, the strongest among beasts, and most fierce, cruel and voracious; and asks, who hunts his prey for him? Not man, who cannot; and if he could, durst not: but the Lord does; and according to some writers [x], he has provided a small creature, between a fox and a wolf, called a jackal; which goes before the lion, and hunts the prey for him. And could this be understood particularly of the old lion, as Cocceius and others, naturalists [y] observe, that young lions hunt for the old ones, when they are not able to go in search of prey; and when they have got it, either bring it to them, or call them to partake of it with them. Or fill the appetite of the young lions? whose appetite is sharp and keen, and requires a great deal to fill it, and especially to satisfy a great many of them; herds of them, as Mr Broughton renders the word, and which signifies a company; see Psal. lxviii. 30. Men cannot feed them, but God can and does; there being some ends in providence to be answered thereby, see Psal. civ. 21. see also Psal. xxxiv. 8, 9, 10.

℣. 40. When they couch in their dens, and abide in the covert to lie in wait?] Which some understand of old lions, who for want of strength lie couchant in their dens, or in some covert place, waiting for any prey that passes by, to seize upon it. But the same pasture and places are used by younger lions, as well as old ones; who are emblems of wicked men, cruel persecutors, and blood-thirsty tyrants, who fill their palaces and kingdoms with murder and rapine; see Psalm x. 8, 9, 10. Nahum ii. 11, 12.

℣. 41. Who provideth for the raven his food? &c.] Not man, but God; he feeds the ravens, creatures very voracious, mean and useless, Luke xii. 24. When his young ones cry unto God; cry for want of food; which is interpreted by the Lord as a cry unto him, and he relieves them, Psal. cxlvii. 9. when deserted by the old ones; either left in their nests neſts through forgetfulneſs, as ſome [z]; or becauſe they are not till fledged, black like them, as others [a]; when God feeds them, as ſome ſay [b], with a kind of dew from heaven, or with flies that fly about them, and fall into their mouths; or with worms bred out of their dung. But theſe things are not to be depended on; it may rather reſpect them when caſt out of the neſt by the old ones, when able to fly, which is teſtified by naturaliſts [c]; and with this agrees what follows: they wander for lack of meat; being obliged to ſhift for themſelves, when God takes care of them; which is an inſtance of his providential goodneſs; and how this is to be improved, ſee Matt. vi. 26. Luke xii. 24.

[p] Jarchi, Ramban, Simeon Bar Tzemach. [q] Vajikra Rabba, s. 25. fol. 166. 1. Vid. T. Roshhashanah, fol. 26. 1. [r] Seder Tephillot. fol 2. 2. Ed. Basil. & Bab. Beracot. fol. 60. 2. [s] Plin. Nat. Hist. l. 10. c. 21. Ælian. de Animal. l. 4. c. 29. [t] יספר enarrabit, V. L. vel explicabit, Mercerus, Schmidt. [u] Junius & Tremellius, Piscator. Vid. Ravii Orthograph. Ebr. p. 22. [w] ישכיב cubare faciet, Drusius, Schmidt; quiescere, Montanus; descendere, Pagninus, so Aben Ezra; effundit humi, Schultens. [x] Thevenot's Travels, part 2. c. 13. [y] Ælian. de Animal. l. 9. c. 1.

CHAP. XXXIX.

THIS chapter treats of various creatures, beaſts and birds, which Job had little knowledge of, had no concern in the make of them, and ſcarce any power over them; as of the goats and hinds, ℣. 1—4. Of the wild aſs, ℣. 5—8. Of the unicorn, ℣. 9—12. Of the peacock and oſtrich, ℣. 13—18. Of the horſe, ℣. 19—25. and of the hawk and eagle, ℣. 26—30.

℣. 1. Knoweſt thou the time when the wild goats of the rock bring forth? &c.] Which creatures are ſo called, becauſe they dwell among the rocks [d], and run upon them; and though their heads are loaded with a vaſt burden of horns upon them, yet can ſo poiſe themſelves, as, with the greateſt ſwiftneſs, to leap from mountain to mountain, as Pliny ſays [e]: and if they bring forth their young in the rocks, as Olympiodorus aſſerts, and which is not improbable; it is not to be wondered, that the time of their bringing forth ſhould not be known by men, to whom the rocks they run upon are inacceſſible. Canſt thou mark the time when the hinds do calve? that is, preciſely and exactly, and ſo as to direct, order and manage, and bring it about, as the Lord does: and it is wonderful that they ſhould calve, and not caſt their young before their time, when they are continually in flight and fright, through men or wild beaſts, and are almoſt always running and leaping about; and often ſcared with thunder, which haſtens birth, Pſalm xxix. 9. otherwiſe the time of their bringing forth in general is known by men, as will be obſerved in the following verſe.

℣. 2. Canſt thou number the months that they fulfil? &c.] Which ſome underſtand both of wild goats and hinds. Common goats fulfil five months, they conceive in November, and bring forth in March, as Pliny [f] obſerves; but how many the wild goats of the rock fulfil, is not ſaid by him or any other I know of: the ſame writer ſays [g], of hinds, that they go eight months. Or knoweſt thou the time when they bring forth? naturaliſts [h] tell us, that the hinds conceive after the riſe of the ſtar Arcturus, which riſes eleven days before the autumnal equinox; ſo that they conceive in September; and as they go eight months, they bring forth in April; but then the exact time to a day and hour is not known. Beſides, who has fixed the time for their bringing forth, and carries them in it through ſo many dangers and difficulties? None but the Lord himſelf. Now if ſuch common things in nature were not known perfectly by Job, how ſhould he be able to ſearch into, and find out the cauſes and reaſons of God's providential dealings with men, or what is in the womb of providence?

℣. 3. They bow themſelves, &c.] That they may bring forth their young with greater eaſe and more ſafety: for it ſeems the hinds bring forth their young with great difficulty; and there are proviſions in nature made to leſſen it; as thunder before obſerved, which cauſes them to bring forth the ſooner; and there is an herb called ſeſelis, which it is ſaid [i], they feed upon before birth, to make it the eaſier; as well as they uſe that and another called aros, after the birth, to eaſe them of their afterpains. They bring forth their young ones; renting and cleaving aſunder the membrane, as the word ſignifies, in which their young is wrapped. They caſt out their ſorrows; either their young, which they bring forth in pains and which then ceaſe; or the ſecundines, or after-birth, in which the young is wrapped, and which the philoſopher ſays [k] they eat, and is ſuppoſed to be medical to them. None but a woman ſeems to bring forth with more pain than this creature; and a wife is compared to it, Prov. v. 19.

℣. 4. Their young ones are in good liking, &c.] Plump, fat and ſleek, as fawns are: they grow up with corn; by which they grow, or without in the field, as the word alſo ſignifies; and their growth and increaſe is very quick, as Ariſtotle obſerves [l]. They go forth, and return not unto them; they go forth into the fields, and ſhift and provide for themſelves, and trouble their dams no more; and return not to them, nor are they known by them.

℣. 5. Who hath ſent out the wild aſs free? &c.] Into the wide waſte, where it is, ranges at pleaſure, and is not under the reſtraint of any; a creature which, as it is naturally wild, is naturally averſe to ſervitude, is deſirous of liberty and maintains it: not but that it may be tamed, as Pliny [m] ſpeaks of ſuch as are; but it chooſes to be free, and agreeable to its nature, it is ſent out into the wilderneſs as ſuch; not that it is ſet free from bondage, for in that it never was until it is tamed; but its nature and inclination, and courſe it purſues, is to be free. And now the queſtion is, who gave this creature ſuch a nature, and deſire after liberty? and ſuch power to maintain it? and directs it to take ſuch methods to ſecure it, and keep clear of bondage? It is of God. Or who hath looſed the bands of the wild aſs? not that it has any naturally upon it, and is looſed from them; but becauſe it is as clear of them as ſuch creatures are, which have been in bands and are freed from them: therefore this mode of expreſſion is uſed, and which ſignifies the ſame as before.

℣. 6. Whoſe houſe I have made the wilderneſs, &c.] Appointed that to be his place of reſidence, as [z] Plin. apud Servium in Virgil. Georgic. l. 1. p. 189. [a] Hieron. in Pſal. cxlvii. 9.

[b] Ariſtot. Hiſt. Animal. l. 9. c. 3. Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 10. c. 12. [c] Pirke Eliezer, c. 21.
[d] —— Amantis ſaxa capellæ. Ovid. Epiſt. 15. v. 55.
[e] Nat. Hiſt l. 8. c. 53. Ælian. de Animal. l. 14. c. 16. & l. 2. c 47. Ariſtot. Hiſt. Animal. l. 6. c. 29. Solinus, c. 31.
[f] Nat. Hiſt. l. 8. c 50. [g] Ib. c. 32. [h] Ib. c. 8. 32. Ariſtot. Hiſt. Animal. l. 9. c. 5. [k] Ariſtot. Ib.
[i] Cicero de Natura Deorum, l. 2. Plin. Nat. Hiſt.
[l] Ib. l. 6. c. 29. [m] Nat. Hiſt. l. 8. c. 44.

as being agreeable to his nature, at a diſtance from men, and in the leſs danger of being brought into ſubjection by them. Such were the deſarts of Arabia; where, as Xenophon [n] relates, were many of theſe creatures, and which he repreſents as very ſwift: and Leo Africanus [o] ſays, great numbers of them are found in deſarts, and on the borders of deſarts; hence ſaid to be uſed to the wilderneſs, Jer. ii. 24. And the barren land his dwellings; not entirely barren, for then it could not live there; but comparatively, with reſpect to land that is fruitful: or ſalt land [p]; for, as Pliny [q] ſays, every place where ſalt is, is barren.

℣. 7. He ſcorneth the multitude of the city, &c.] Chooſing rather to be alone in the wilderneſs and free, than to be among a multitude of men in a city, and be a ſlave as the tame aſs; or it deſpiſes and defies a multitude of men, that may come out of cities to take it. Leo Africanus ſays [r], it yields to none for ſwiftneſs but Barbary horſes: according to Xenophon [s], it exceeds the horſe in ſwiftneſs; and when purſued by horſemen, it will outrun them, and ſtand ſtill and reſt till they come near it, and then ſtart again; ſo that there is no taking it, unleſs many are employed. Ariſtotle [t] ſays, it excels in ſwiftneſs; and according to Bochart [u], it has its name in Hebrew from the Chaldee word פרא to run. Or it may be rendered, the noiſe of the city, ſo Cocceius; the ſtir and buſtle in it, through a multiplicity of men in buſineſs. Neither regardeth he the crying of the driver; or hears [w]: he neither feels his blows, nor hears his words; urging him to move faſter and make quicker diſpatch, as the tame aſs does; he being neither ridden nor driven, nor drawing in a cart or plough.

℣. 8. The range of the mountains is his paſture, &c.] It ranges about the mountains for food; it looks about for it, as the word ſignifies; and tries firſt one place and then another to get ſome, it having ſhort commons there. And he ſearcheth after every green thing; herb or plant, be it what it will that is green, it ſeeks after; and which being ſcarce in deſarts and mountains, it ſearches about for and feeds upon it, wherever it can find it; graſs being the peculiar food of theſe creatures, ſee chap. vi. 5. and which is obſerved by naturaliſts [x].

℣. 9. Will the unicorn be willing to ſerve thee? &c.] Whether there is or ever was ſuch a creature, as deſcribed under the name of an unicorn, is a queſtion: it is thought the accounts of it are for the moſt part fabulous; though Vartomannus [y] ſays, he ſaw two at Mecca, which came from Ethiopia, the largeſt of which had a horn in his forehead three cubits long. There are indeed ſeveral creatures which may be called monocerots, who have but one horn; as the rhinoceros, and the Indian horſes and aſſes [z]. The Arabic geographer [a] ſpeaks of a beaſt in the Indies, called carcaddan, which is leſſer than an elephant and bigger than a buffalo; having in the middle of the forehead an horn long and thick, as much as two hands can graſp: and not only on land, but in the ſea are ſuch, as the nahr whal, or Greenland whale [b]; but then they do not anſwer to the creature ſo called in ſcripture: and beſides, this muſt be a creature well known to Job, as it was to the Iſraelites; and muſt be a ſtrong creature, from the account that gives of it, and not to be taken as here. And Solinus [c] ſpeaks of ſuch monocerots or unicorns, which may be killed, but cannot be taken, and were never known to be in any man's poſſeſſion alive; and ſo Ælianus [d] ſays of the like creature, that it never was remembred that any one of them had been taken. Some think the rhinoceros is meant; but that, though a very ſtrong creature, and ſo may be thought fit for the uſes after mentioned, yet may be tamed; whereas the creature here is repreſented as untameable, and not to be ſubdued, and brought under a yoke and managed; and beſides, it is not very probable that it was known by Job. Bochart [e] takes it to be the oryx, a creature of the goat-kind; but to me it ſeems more likely to be of the ox-kind, to be ſimilar to them, and ſo might be thought to do the buſineſs of one; and the rather, becauſe of its great ſtrength, and yet could not be brought to do it, nor be truſted with it: for the queſtions concerning it relate to the work of oxen; and as the wild aſs is oppoſed to the tame one in the preceding paragraph, ſo here the wild ox to a tame one. And both Strabo [f] and Diodorus Siculus [g] relate, that among the Troglodytes, a people that dwelt near the Red ſea, and not far from Arabia, where Job lived, were abundance of wild oxen or bulls, and which far exceeded the common ones in largeneſs and ſwiftneſs; and the creature called the Reem in the original, has its name from height. Now the queſtion is, could Job take one of theſe wild bulls or oxen, and tame it, and make it willing to do any work or ſervice he ſhould chooſe to put it to? No, he could not. Or abide by thy crib? manger or ſtall, as the tame or common ox will; who, when it has done its labour, is glad to be led to its ſtall and feed, and then lie down and reſt, and there abide; ſee Iſai. i. 3. but not ſo the wild ox.

℣. 10. Canſt thou bind the unicorn with his band in the furrow? &c.] Put the yoke and harneſs upon him, and faſten it to the plough to draw it, that he may make furrows with it in the field, or plough up the ground as the tame ox does? thou canſt not. Or will he harrow the vallies after thee? draw the harrow which is uſed after ploughing to break the clods, and make the land ſmooth and even? he will not: vallies are particularly mentioned, becauſe arable land is uſually in them; ſee Pſal. lxv. 13.

℣. 11. Wilt thou truſt him, becauſe his ſtrength is great? &c.] No; tame oxen are employed becauſe they are ſtrong to labour, Pſalm cxliv. 14. and they are to be truſted, in plowing or treading out the corn, under direction, becauſe they are manageable, and will attend to buſineſs with conſtancy; but the wild ox, though ſtronger, and ſo fitter for labour, is yet not to be truſted, becauſe unruly and unmanageable: if that ſort of wild oxen called Uri could be thought to be meant, for which Bootius [h] contends, Cæſar's account of them would agree with this character of the Reem, as to his great ſtrength: he ſays of them [i], they are in bigneſs a little leſſer than elephants, of the kind, colour and ſhape of a bull; they are of great ſtrength and of great

[n] De Expedition. Cyri, l. 1.
[o] Deſcriptio Africæ, l. 9. p. 752.
[p] מלחה ſalſuginem, Montanus; ſalſuginoſam terram, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator.
[q] Nat. Hiſt. l. 31. c. 7.
[r] Ut ſupra.
[s] Ut ſupra.
[t] Hiſt. Animal. l. 6. c. 36.
[u] Hierozoic. par. 1. l. 1. c. 9. col. 63.
[w] לא ישמע non audiet, Pagninus, Montanus.
[x] Oppiani Cyneget. l. 3.
[y] Navigat. l. 1. c. 19.
[z] Vid. Bochart. Hierozoic. par. 1. l. 3. c. 26. Of this Narhual, or ſea-unicorn, ſee the Philoſoph. Transact. abridged, vol. 9 p. 71, 72.
[a] Nub. Clim. 1. par. 8.
[b] Ludolf. Ethiop. Hiſt. l. 1. c. 10.
[c] Hierozoic. par. 1. l. 3. c. 27. col. 969, &c.
[d] De Animal. l. 16. c. 20.
[e] Polyhiſtor. c. 65.
[f] Geograph l. 16. p. 533.
[g] Bibliothec. l. 3. p. 175.
[h] Animadverſ. Sacr. l. 3. c. 1. ſ. 14.
[i] Comment. de Bello Gall, l. 6. c. 27.

great ſwiftneſs, and not to be tamed. Or wilt thou leave thy labour to him? to plow thy fields, to harrow thy lands, and to bring home the ripe corn? as in the next verſe; thou wilt not.

℣. 12. Wilt thou believe him, that he will bring home thy ſeed? &c.] Draw in the cart, and bring home the ripe ſheaves of corn, as the tame ox does? no; thou knoweſt him too well to believe he will bring it home in ſafety. And gather it into thy barn; to be trodden out, which uſed to be done by oxen in thoſe times: if therefore Job could not manage ſuch unruly creatures as the wild aſs and the wild ox, and make them ſerviceable to him, how unfit muſt he be to govern the world, or to direct in the affairs of providence?

℣. 13. Gaveſt thou the goodly wings unto the peacocks? &c.] Rather oſtriches, as the Vulgate Latin and Tigurine verſions render it; ſome render it the wing of thoſe that exult is joyful, ſo Montanus; that is, of the oſtriches; who, in confidence of their wings, exult and glory over the horſe and his rider, ℣. 18. for peacocks are not remarkable for their wings, but for their tails; whereas the wings of the oſtrich are as ſails unto them, as ſeveral writers obſerve [k]; and with which they rather run or row, than fly: hence it is called by Plautus [l] paſſer marinus, the ſea-ſparrow: and the feathers of it are more goodly than thoſe of the wings of the peacock; and beſides, it is a queſtion whether the peacock was where Job lived, and in his times; ſince it is originally from the Indies, and from thence it was brought to Judea in the times of Solomon; and was not known in Greece and Rome [m] until later ages. Alexander the great, when he firſt ſaw them in India, was ſurprized at them; and yet Solon [n] ſpeaks of them in his time as ſeen by him, which was at leaſt two hundred years before Alexander; tho' at Rome not common in the times of Horace [o], who calls a peacock rara avis; and ſpeaks of them as ſold for a great price; but oſtriches were well known in Arabia where Job lived; as is teſtified by Xenophon [p], Strabo [q], and Diodorus Siculus [r]. Moreover, what is ſaid in the following verſes is only true of the oſtrich, and that only is ſpoken of here and there, as it follows. Or wings and feathers unto the oſtrich; or whoſe wings and feathers are like the ſtork's; and ſo Bochart renders the words, truly they have the wing and feather of the ſtork; the colours of which are black and white, from whence it has its name πελαργος [s] in Greek; and ſo Leo Africanus [t] ſays of the oſtriches, that they have in their wings large feathers of a black and white colour; and this was a creature well known in Arabia [u], in which Job lived.

℣. 14. Which leaveth her eggs in the earth, &c.] Lays them and leaves them there. Ælianus, agreeable to this, ſays [w], that it builds a low neſt in the ground, making a hollow in the ſand with its feet; though he ſeems to be miſtaken as to the number of its eggs, which he makes to be more than eighty; more truly Leo Africanus [x], who reckons them ten or twelve; which, he ſays, it lays in the ſand, and each of them are of the bigneſs of a cannon-ball, and weigh fifteen pounds, more or leſs. Hence, with the Arabs, it is called "the mother of eggs," becauſe of the large eggs it lays; and with them it is a proverb, "meaner, or of a leſſer account, than the eggs of an "oſtrich," becauſe its eggs are neglected by it [y]. And warmeth them in the duſt; not that ſhe leaves them to be warmed by the hot ſand, or by the heat of the ſun upon them, by which they are hatched, as has been commonly ſaid, for thereby they would rather be corrupted and become rotten; but ſhe herſelf warms them and hatches them, by ſitting upon them in the duſt and ſand: and for this the above hiſtorian is expreſs, who ſays [z], the female lighting on theſe eggs, whether her own or anothers, ſits on them and heats them. Concerning the oſtrich hatching its eggs, Vanſleb [a], from an Arabic manuſcript, relates what is incredible, that they are hatched by the male and female with their eye only; that one or other of them keep continually looking at them until they are all hatched; and this I obſerve is aſſerted alſo by another writer [b].

℣. 15. And forgetteth that the foot may cruſh them, &c.] The foot of the traveller, they being laid in the ground where he may walk, or on the ſand of the ſea-ſhore where he may tread and trample upon them unawares, and cruſh them to pieces; to prevent which this creature has no foreſight. Or that the wild beaſt may break them; ſuppoſing they may be, though not where men walk, yet where wild beaſts frequent, they may be as eaſily broken by the one as the other; againſt which it guards not, having no inſtinct in nature, as ſome creatures have, to direct to the preſervation of them.

℣. 16. She is hardned againſt her young ones, as though they were not hers, &c.] Hence ſaid to be cruel, Lam. iv. 3. not againſt the young ones ſhe hatches, for Ælianus [c] reports her as very tender of her young, and expoſing herſelf to danger for the preſervation of them; but being a very forgetful creature, having laid its eggs in the ſand, where it leaves them, forgets where it has laid them; and finding other eggs ſits on them and hatches them, and regards the young as its own, and is hardned againſt its true and real young, as not belonging to her. Her labour is in vain without fear; in laying her eggs and leaving them in the duſt, without fear of their being cruſhed and broken, which yet they are, and ſo her labour is in vain; or her labour in hatching the eggs of others, without any fear or care of their belonging to others, which yet they do, and ſo ſhe labours in vain.

℣. 17. Becauſe God hath deprived her of wiſdom, &c.] Or made her to forget [d] what ſhe had; an inſtance of her forgetfulneſs is mentioned ℣. 15. and ſo Leo Africanus [e] ſays of it, that it is of a very ſhort memory, and preſently forgets the place where its eggs are laid. Neither hath he imparted to her underſtanding; many inſtances are given of its ſtupidity by hiſtorians, as that it will take any thing that is offered to it to eat, ſtones, iron, &c. [f] that it will thruſt its head and neck into a thicket, fancying it is hid and covered, and that none can ſee it; which Pliny [g] remarks as an inſtance of its fooliſhneſs; though Diodorus Siculus [h] takes this to be a point of prudence, for the preſervation of thoſe parts of

[k] Xenophon. de Expedit. Cyri, l. 1. Ælian. de Animal. l. 2. c. 77. [l] Perſa, act. 2. ſc. 2. v. 19. [m] Ælian. Ib. l. 5. c. 21. [n] Laert. Vit. Solon. l. 1. c. 2. [o] Sermon. l. 2. ſat. 2. v. 25, 26. Vid. Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 10. c. 20. Macrob. Saturnal. l. 3. c. 13. [p] Ut ſupra. [q] Geograph. l. 16. p. 531. [r] Bibliothec l. 2. p. 133. [s] Suidas in voce πελαργος. [t] Deſcriptio Africæ, l. 9. p. 766. [u] Diodor. Sicul. ut ſupra. [w] De Animal. l. 14. c. 17. [x] Ut ſupra. [y] Hottinger. Smegm. Orient. l. 1. c. 7. p. 128. [z] Deſcrip. Africæ, ut ſupra. Vid. Ælian. l. 4. c. 37. [a] Relation of a Voyage to Egypt, p. 64. [b] Cœlius, l. 10. c. 5. apud Sanctium in loc. [c] Ut ſupra. [d] השיה obliviſci fecit eum, Montanus, Mercerus, Druſius, Cocceius, Michaelis, Schultens. [e] Ut ſupra. [f] Ælian. ut ſupra. Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 10. c. 1. [g] Ibid. [h] Ut ſupra.

of it which are weakeſt. Strabo gives [i] another inſtance of its ſtupidity, its being ſo eaſily deceived by ſportſmen, who, by putting the ſkin of an oſtrich on their hands, and reaching out fruits or ſeeds to it, it will receive them of them, and be taken. Others obſerve the ſmallneſs of their heads, and ſo of their brains, as an argument of their want of underſtanding; and it has been remarked as a proof, of their having but few brains, that Heliogabalus, the Roman emperor, had ſix hundred heads of oſtriches dreſſed at once for his ſupper, for the ſake of their brains [k].

℣. 18. What time ſhe lifteth up herſelf on high, &c.] It is ſometimes eight foot high [l]; when alarmed with approaching danger ſhe raiſes up herſelf, being ſitting on the ground, and erects her wings for flight, or rather running. She ſcorneth the horſe and his rider; being then, as Pliny [m] ſays, higher than a man on horſeback, and ſuperior to a horſe in ſwiftneſs; and though horſemen have been able to take wild aſſes and goats, very ſwift creatures, yet never oſtriches, as Xenophon relates [n] of thoſe in Arabia; and this creature has another method, when purſued, by which it defies and deſpiſes, as well as hurts and incommodes its purſuers, which is by caſting ſtones backward at them with its feet as out of a ſling [o].

℣. 19. Haſt thou given the horſe ſtrength? &c.] Not only to bear burdens and draw carriages, but for war; for it is the war-horſe that is here ſpoken of, as what follows ſhews, and his ſtrength denotes; not ſtrength of body only, but fortitude and courage; for which, as well as the other, the horſe is eminent, and both are the gift of God, and not of men. Haſt thou clothed his neck with thunder? or with ſtrength, as the Targum; the horſe having particularly great ſtrength in its neck, as well as in other parts; or with ſtrength of voice, as Ben Gerſom explains it; and it has been generally underſtood of the neighing of horſes, which comes thro' and out of their neck, and makes a vehement ſound: ſome render it with a mane [p]; and could it be made to appear that the word is ſo uſed in any other place, or in any other writings, or in any of the dialects, it would afford a very good ſenſe, ſince a fine large mane to a horſe is a great ornament and recommendation: the Septuagint render it by fear, and Jarchi interprets it of terror; and refers to the ſenſe of the word in Ezek. xxvii. 35. and it may ſignify ſuch a tremor as thunder makes, from whence that has its name; and it may be obſerved that between the neck and ſhoulder-bone of an horſe there is a tremulous and quavering motion; and which is more vehement in battle, not from any fearfulneſs of it, but rather through eagerneſs to engage in it; and therefore Schultens tranſlates the words, haſt thou clothed his neck with a chearful tremor?

℣. 20. Canſt thou make him afraid as a graſshopper? &c.] Which is affrighted at every noiſe, and at any approach of men; but not ſo the horſe; or canſt thou move him, or cauſe him to ſkip and jump, or rather leap like a graſshopper? that is, haſt thou given, or canſt thou give him the faculty of leaping over hedges and ditches, for which the horſe is famous? ſo Neptune's war-horſes are ſaid [q] to be ευσκαρθμοι, good leapers. The glory of his noſtrils is terrible; which may be underſtood of his ſneezing, ſnorting, pawing and neighing, when his noſtrils are broad, ſpread, and enlarged; and eſpecially when enraged and in battle, when he foams and fumes, and his breath comes out of his noſtrils like ſmoke [r], and is very terrible.

℣. 21. He paweth in the valley, &c.] Where armies are uſually pitched and ſet in battle-array, and eſpecially the cavalry, for which the valley is moſt convenient; and here the horſe is impatient of engaging, cannot ſtand ſtill, but riſes up with his fore-feet, and paws and prances, and as the word ſignifies, digs the earth and makes it hollow, by a continual ſtriking upon it; ſo generous horſes are commonly deſcribed in this manner [s]. And rejoiceth in his ſtrength; of which he is ſenſible, and glories in it; marches to the battle with pride and ſtatelineſs, defying as it were the enemy, and as if ſure of victory, of which he has knowledge when obtained; for Lactantius ſays [t] of horſes, when conquerors they exult, when conquered they grieve; it has its name in the Hebrew language from rejoicing [u]. He goeth on to meet the armed men; without any fear or dread of them, as follows.

℣. 22. He mocketh at fear, and is not affrighted, &c.] At thoſe things which cauſe fear and fright to men; as arms, though ever ſo terrible, and armies, though never ſo numerous. Neither turneth he back from the ſword; the naked ſword, when it is drawn againſt him, and ready to be thruſt into him; the horſe being ſo bold and courageous was with the Egyptians a ſymbol of courage and boldneſs [v].

℣. 23. The quiver rattleth againſt him, &c.] The quiver is what arrows are put into and carried in, and ſeems here to be put for arrows, which being ſhot by the enemy come whizzing about him, but do not intimidate him; unleſs this is to be underſtood of arrows rattling in the quiver when carried by the rider upon him, ſo ſome render the laſt word; and thus Homer [w] and Virgil [x] ſpeak of the rattling quiver and ſounding arrows in it, as carried on the back or ſhoulder; but the firſt ſenſe ſeems beſt, in which another poet uſes it [y]. The glittering ſpear and the ſhield; the lance or javelin, as Mr Broughton renders it, and others; that is, he does not turn back from theſe, nor is he frighted at them when they are pointed to him or flung at him; ſo Ælianus [z] ſpeaks of the Perſians training up their horſes and uſing them to noiſes, that in battle they might not be frighted at the claſhing of arms, of ſwords and ſhields againſt each other; in like manner as our war-horſes are trained up, not to ſtart at the firing of a gun, or the exploſion of a cannon.

℣. 24. He ſwalloweth the ground with fierceneſs and rage, &c.] Being ſo eager for the battle, and ſo full of fierceneſs and rage, he bounds the plain with ſuch ſwiftneſs that he ſeems rather to ſwallow up the ground than to run upon it. Neither believeth he that it is the ſound of the trumpet; for joy at hearing it; or he will not truſt to his ears, but will ſee with his eyes whether the battle is ready, and therefore puſhes forward. Mr Broughton and others read it, he will not ſtand ſtill at the noiſe of the trumpet; and the word ſignifies firm and ſtable, as well as to believe; when he hears the trumpet ſound, the alarm of war, as a preparation for the battle, battle, he knows not how to [x] ſtand; there is ſcarce any holding him in, but he ruſhes into the battle at once, Jer. viii. 6.

[i] Geograph. l. 16. p. 531. [k] Lamprid. Vit. Heliogab. c. 20, 30. [l] Philoſoph. Tranſact. abridged, vol. 2. p. 360. [m] Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 10. c. 1. [n] De Expedit. Cyri, l. 1. [o] Plin ut ſupra. Ælian. de Animal. l. 4. c. 37. [p] Bochart, Bootius, &c. [q] Homeri Iliad. 13. v. 31. [r] Igneſcunt patulæ nares. Claudian. in 4 Conſul. Honor. [s] Cavatque tellurem. Virgil. Georgic. l. 3. v. 87. [t] Inſtitut. l. 3. c. 8. [u] שוש gaviſus eſt. Vid. Buxtorf. in voce כום [v] Clement Alex. Stromat. l. 5. p. 567. [w] Iliad. 1. v. 4. [x] Pharetramque ſonantem. Æneid. 9. v. 666. [y] —— audito ſonitu per inane pharetræ. Ovid. Metamorph. l. 6. v. 230. [z] De Animal. l. 16. c. 25.

℣. 25. He ſaith among the trumpets, Ha, ha, &c.] As pleaſed with the ſound of them, rejoicing thereat, and which he ſignifies by neighing. And he ſmelleth the battle afar off; which reſpects not ſo much the diſtance of place as of time; he perceives beforehand that it is near, by the preparations making for it, and particularly by what follows; ſo Pliny [y] ſays of horſes, they preſage a fight. The thunder of the captains, and the ſhouting; they underſtand an engagement is juſt going into by the loud and thundring voice of the captains, exhorting and ſpiriting up their men, and giving them the word of command; and by the clamorous ſhout of the ſoldiers echoing to the ſpeech of their captains; and which are given forth upon an onſet, both to animate one another, and intimidate the enemy. Bootius [z] obſerves, that Virgil [a] and Oppianus [b] ſay moſt of the ſame things in praiſe of the horſe which are here ſaid, and ſeem to have taken them from hence; and ſome [c] give the horſe the preference to the lion, which when it departs from a fight never returns, whereas the horſe will. This is an emblem both of good men, Zech. x. 3. and of bad men, Jer. viii. 6.

℣. 26. Doth the hawk fly by thy wiſdom? &c.] With ſo much ſwiftneſs, ſteddineſs and conſtancy, until ſhe has ſeized her prey. The Vulgate Latin verſion and ſome others read, does ſhe become feathered, or begin to have feathers; and ſo Bochart: either when firſt fledged; or when, as it is ſaid [d], ſhe caſts her old feathers and gets new ones, and this every year. Now neither her flight nor her feathers, whether at one time or the other, are owing to men, but to the Lord, who gives both. And ſtretch her wings towards the ſouth? Being a bird of paſſage, ſhe moves from colder climates towards the winter, and ſteers her courſe to the ſouth towards warmer ones [e]; which ſhe does from an inſtinct in nature, put into her by the Lord, and not through the inſtruction of man. Or, as ſome ſay, caſting off her old feathers, ſhe flies towards the ſouth for warmth; and that her feathers may be cheriſhed with the heat, and grow the ſooner and better. Hence it is perhaps, as Ælianus reports [f], that this bird was by the Egyptians conſecrated to Apollo or the ſun; it being able to look upon the rays of it wiſtly, conſtantly and eaſily, without being hurt thereby. Porphyry [g] ſays, that this bird is not only acceptable to the ſun; but has divinity in it, according to the Egyptians; and is no other than Oſiris, or the ſun repreſented by the image of it [h]. Strabo [i] ſpeaks of a city of the hawks, where this creature is worſhipped. It has its name in Greek from the ſacredneſs of it; and according to Heſiod [k], is very ſwift, and has large wings. It is called ωκυπλεξος, ſwift in flying, by Manetho [l]; and by Homer, ωκιστος πετεηνων, the ſwifteſt of fowls [m]. It has its name from נצה to fly, as Kimchi obſerves [n]. Cyril of Jeruſalem, on the authority of the Greek verſion, affirms [o], that by a divine inſtinct or order, the hawk ſtretching out its wings, ſtands in the midſt of the air unmoved, looking towards the ſouth. All accounts ſhew it to be a bird that loves warmth, which is the reaſon of the expreſſion in the text.

℣. 27. Doth the eagle mount up at thy command? &c.] No; but by an inſtinct which God has placed in it, and a capacity he has given it above all other birds. They take a circuit in their flight, and bend about before they ſoar aloft: but the eagle ſteers its courſe directly upwards towards heaven, till out of ſight; and, as Apuleius ſays [p], up to the clouds, where it rains and ſnows, and beyond which there is no place for thunder and lightning. And maketh her neſt on high? ſo the philoſopher ſays [q]; eagles make their neſts not in plains, but in high places, eſpecially in cragged rocks, as in the next verſe.

℣. 28. She dwelleth and abideth on the rock, upon the crag of the rock, and the ſtrong place.] Where ſhe and her young are ſafe: ſo Pliny [r] ſays, eagles make their neſts in rocks, even in the precipices of them, as the philoſopher quoted in the preceding verſe; and here on the tooth, edge, or precipice of the rock, which is inacceſſible, and ſo like a ſtrong fortified place.

℣. 29. From thence ſhe ſeeketh the prey, &c.] From the high rock; from whence ſhe can look down into vallies, and even into the ſea; and ſpy what is for her purpoſe, and deſcend and ſeize upon them; as lambs, fawns, geeſe, ſhell-fiſh, &c. though they may lie in the moſt hidden and ſecret places. Wherefore in the original text it is, ſhe diggeth the prey or food [s]; as treaſure hid in ſecret, is dug or diligently ſearched for; and for which ſhe is qualified by the ſharpneſs of her ſight, as follows: and her eyes behold afar off; from the high rocks and higher clouds, even from the high ſky, as Ælianus [t] expreſſes it; and who obſerves that ſhe is the moſt ſharp-ſighted of all birds; and ſo, Homer [u] ſays, ſome affirm.

℣. 30. Her young ones alſo ſuck up blood, &c.] As well as herſelf, being brought up to it by her. The eagle cares not for water, but drinks the blood of her prey; and ſo her young ones after her, as naturaliſts report [w]. And Ælianus ſays [x] the ſame of the hawk, that it eats no ſeeds, but devours fleſh and drinks blood, and nouriſhes her young ones with the ſame. And where the ſlain are, there is ſhe; where there has been a battle, and carcaſſes left on the field, the eagles will gather to them. This is particularly true of that kind of eagles called Vulture-eagles, as Ariſtotle [y] and Pliny [z] obſerve; ſee Matt. xxiv. 28. Now ſince Job was ſo ignorant of the nature of theſe creatures, and incapable of governing and directing them; and what they had of any excellency were of God, and not of him, nor of any man; how unfit muſt he be to diſpute with God, and contend with him about his works of providence? which to convince him of, was the deſign of this diſcourſe about the creatures; and which had its intended effect, as appears in the next chapter.

[x] Stare loco neſcit. Virgil. Georgic. l. 3. v. 84. Ut fremit acer equus, &c. Ovid. Metamorph. l. 3. fab. 10. v. 704. [y] Nat. Hiſt. l. 8. c. 42. [z] Animadverſ. Sacr. l. 3. c. 6. ſ. 1. [a] Georgic. l. 3. [b] Cyneget. l. 1. [c] Horus Ægypt. apud Steeb. Cœlum Sephirot. Heb. c. 6. ſ. 1. p. 106. [d] Ælian. de Animal. l. 12. c. 4. [e] Ibid. l. 2. c. 43. Plin. l. 10. c. 8. [f] De Animal. l. 7. c. 9. & l. 10. c. 14. [g] De Abſtinentia, l. 4, ſ. 9. [h] Kircher. Prodrom. Copt. p. 232. [i] Geograph. l. 17. p. 562. [k] Opera & Dies, l. 1. v. 208. [l] Apoteleſm. l. 5. v. 176. [m] Iliad. 15. v. 238. Odyſſ. 13. v. 87. [n] Sepher ſhoreſh. rad. נצה [o] Catecheſ. 9. ſ. 6. [p] Florida 1. [q] Ariſtot. Hiſt. Animal. l. 9. c. 32. [r] Nat. Hiſt. l. 10. 3. [s] חפר אכל fodit eſcam; Montanus, Mercerus. [t] De Animal. l. 2. c. 26. & l. 1. c. 42. Ariſtot. & Plin. ut ſupra. [u] Iliad. 17. v. 674, 675. ſo Diodor. Sic. l. 3. p. 145. [w] Ariſtot. de Animal. l. 8. c. 3. 18. Ælianus, l. 2. c. 26. [x] Ib. l. 10. c. 14. [y] Hiſt. Animal. l. 9. c. 32. [z] Nat. Hiſt. l. 10. c. 3.

CHAP.

CHAP. XL.

IN this chapter Job is called upon to give in his anſwer, ℣. 1, 2. which he does in the moſt humble manner, acknowledging his vileneſs and folly, ℣. 3, 4, 5. And then the Lord proceeds to give him further conviction of his ſuperior juſtice and power, ℣. 6—9. and one thing he propoſes to him, to humble the proud, if he could, and then he would own his own right hand could ſave him, ℣. 10—14. and obſerves to him another inſtance of his power in a creature called behemoth, which he had made, and gives a deſcription of, ℣. 15—24.

℣. 1. Moreover the Lord anſwered Job, &c.] The Lord having diſcourſed largely of the works of nature, in order to reconcile the mind of Job to his works of providence, ſtopped and made a pauſe for a little ſpace, that Job might anſwer if he thought fit; but he being entirely ſilent, the Lord began again, and ſaid, as follows:

℣. 2. Shall he that contendeth with the Almighty, inſtruct him? &c.] Is he capable of it? He ought to be that takes upon him to diſpute with God, to object or reply to him; that brings a charge againſt him, enters the liſts, and litigates a point with him; which Job wanted to be at. But could he or any other inſtruct him, who is the God of knowledge, the all-wiſe and only-wiſe God; who gives man wiſdom, and teaches him knowledge? What folly is it to pretend to inſtruct him? Or can ſuch an one be inſtructed? as the Targum: he is not in the way of inſtruction; he that ſubmits to the chaſtizing hand of God, may be inſtructed thereby, but not he that contends with him; ſee Pſal. xciv. 12. Or ſhould he be one that is inſtructed? no, he ought to be an inſtructor, and not one inſtructed; a teacher, and not one that is taught; he ſhould be above all inſtruction from God or man, that will diſpute with the Almighty. The word for inſtruct has the ſignification of chaſtiſement, becauſe inſtruction ſometimes comes that way; and then the ſenſe either is, Shall a man contend with the Almighty that chaſtizes him? Does it become a ſon or a ſervant, to ſtrive againſt a parent or a maſter that corrects him? Or does not he deſerve to be chaſtized that acts ſuch a part? Some derive the word from one that ſignifies to remove or depart, and give the ſenſe; Shall the abundance, the all-ſufficiency of God, go from him to another, to a man; and ſo he, inſtead of God, be the all-ſufficient one? Or rather, the meaning of the clauſe is, Has there not been much, enough, and more than enough ſaid, Job, to chaſtize thee, and convince thee of thy miſtakes? muſt more be ſaid? is there any need of it? He that reproveth God, let him anſwer it; he that reproves God, for his words, or works, or ways, finding fault with either of them, ought to anſwer to the queſtion now put; or to any or all of thoſe in the preceding chapters, and not be ſilent as Job now was.

℣. 3. Then Job anſwered the Lord, &c.] Finding that he was obliged to anſwer, he did, but with ſome reluctance; and ſaid, as follows:

℣. 4. Behold, I am vile, &c.] Or light[a]; which may have reſpect either to his words and arguments, which he thought had force in them, but now he ſaw they had none; or to his works and actions, the integrity of his life, and the uprightneſs of his ways, which he imagined were weighty and of great importance, but now being weighed in the balances of juſtice were found wanting; or it may refer to his original meanneſs and diſtance from God, being duſt and aſhes, and nothing in compariſon of him; and ſo the Septuagint verſion is, I am nothing; ſee Iſa. xl. 17. or rather, to the original vileneſs and ſinfulneſs of his nature he had now a ſight of, and ſaw how he had been breaking forth in unbecoming expreſſions concerning God and his providence: the nature of man is exceeding vile and ſinful; his heart deſperately wicked; his thoughts, and the imaginations of them, evil, and that continually; his mind and conſcience are defiled; his affections inordinate, and his underſtanding and will ſadly depraved; he is vile in ſoul and body; of all which an enlightned man is convinced, and will acknowledge. What ſhall I anſwer thee? I am not able to anſwer thee, who am but duſt and aſhes; what more can I ſay than to acknowledge my levity, vanity, and vileneſs? he that talked ſo big, and in ſuch a bluſtring manner of anſwering God, as in chap. xiii. 22. and xxxi. 35, 36, 37. now has nothing to ſay for himſelf. I will lay mine hand upon my mouth; impoſe ſilence upon himſelf, and as it were lay a reſtraint upon himſelf from ſpeaking: it looks as if there were ſome workings in Job's heart; he thought he could ſay ſomething and make ſome reply but durſt not, for fear of offending yet more and more, and therefore curbed it in; ſee Pſal. xxxix. 1.

℣. 5. Once have I ſpoken; but I will not anſwer, &c.] Some think this refers to what he had juſt now ſaid of his vileneſs, he had owned that, and that was all he had to ſay, or would ſay, he would give no other anſwer; Jarchi ſays, ſome ſuppoſe he has reſpect to his words in chap. ix. 22. Yea, twice; but I will proceed no further; the meaning ſeems to be, that he who had once and again, or very often, at leaſt in ſome inſtances, ſpoken very imprudently and indecently, for the future would take care not to ſpeak in ſuch a manner: for this confeſſion was not quite free and full; and therefore the Lord takes him in hand again, to bring him to make a more full and ingenuous one, as he does in chap. xlii.

℣. 6. Then anſwered the Lord unto Job out of the whirlwind, &c.] Some think that the whirlwind ceaſed while the Lord ſpake the words in ℣. 2. which encouraged Job to make the anſwer he did; but others are of opinion that it continued, and now increaſed, and was more boiſterous than before. The Targum calls it the whirlwind of tribulation: comfort does not always follow immediately on firſt convictions; Job, though humbled, was not yet humbled enough: God will have a fuller confeſſion of ſin from him: it was not ſufficient to ſay he was vile, he muſt declare his ſorrow for his ſin, his abhorrence of it, and of himſelf for it, and his repentance of it; and that he had ſaid things of God he ought not to have ſaid, and which he underſtood not; and though he had ſaid he would anſwer no more, God will make him ſay more, and therefore continued the whirlwind, and to ſpeak out of it; for he had more to ſay to him, and give him further proof of his power to his full conviction. And ſaid, as follows.

℣. 7.

[a] קלתי levis ſum, Coccius, Michaelis; leviter locutus ſum, V. L.

℣. 7. Gird up thy loins now like a man, &c.] And prepare to give an anſwer to what ſhould be demanded of him. The ſame way of ſpeaking is uſed in chap. xxxviii. 3. ſee the note there.

℣. 8. Wilt thou alſo diſannul my judgment? &c.] The decrees and purpoſes of God concerning his dealings with men, particularly the afflictions of them, which are framed with the higheſt wiſdom and reaſon, and according to the ſtricteſt juſtice, and can never be fruſtrated or made void; or the ſentence of God concerning them, that is gone out of his mouth and cannot be altered; or the execution of it which cannot be hindered: it reſpects the wiſdom of God in the government of the world, as Aben Ezra obſerves, and the particular dealings of his providence with men, which ought to be ſubmitted to; to do otherwiſe is for a man to ſet up his own judgment againſt the Lord's, which is as much as in him lies to diſannul it; whereas God is a God of judgment, and his judgment is according to truth, and in righteouſneſs, and will take place, let men do or ſay what they pleaſe. Wilt thou condemn me, that thou mayeſt be righteous? Is there no other way of vindicating thine own innocence and integrity, without charging me with unrighteouſneſs; at leaſt ſaying ſuch things as are judged by others to be an arraignment of my juſtice, wiſdom, and goodneſs, in the government of the world? Now though Job did not expreſsly and directly condemn the Lord, and arraign his juſtice, yet when he talked of his own righteouſneſs and integrity, he was not upon his guard as he ſhould have been with reſpect to the juſtice of God in his afflictions; for though a man may juſtify his own character when abuſed, he ſhould take care to ſpeak well of God; and be it as it will between man and man, God is not to be brought into the queſtion; and though ſome of his providences are not ſo eaſily reconciled to his promiſes, yet let God be true and every man a liar.

℣. 9. Haſt thou an arm like God? &c.] Such power as he has, which is infinite, almighty, and uncontroulable, and therefore there is no contending with him; as he has an arm on which good men may lean on and truſt in, and by which they are ſupported, protected and ſaved, ſo he has an arm to cruſh like a moth all that ſtrive with him or againſt him. Or canſt thou thunder with a voice like him? thunder is his voice; ſee chap. xxxvii. 4, 5. and Pſal. xxix. 3, &c. and is expreſſive of his power, chap. xxvi. 14. and his powerful voice may be obſerved in calling all things out of nothing into being in creation; in commanding and ordering all things in providence according to his pleaſure; and in quickening ſinners through his goſpel, by his ſpirit and grace in converſion, and will be in calling men out of their graves and ſummoning them to judgment at the laſt day. God can both overpower and out-voice men, and therefore it is in vain to oppoſe him and contend with him.

℣. 10. Deck thyſelf now with majeſty and excellency, &c.] With excellent majeſty, as I am decked and clothed, Pſal. xciii. 1. And array thyſelf with glory and beauty; appear in the moſt glorious and ſplendid manner thou canſt, make the beſt figure thou art able, put on royal robes, and take thy ſeat and throne, and ſit as a king or judge in ſtate and pomp, and exert thyſelf to do the following things; or take my ſeat and throne as the judge of the whole earth, and try if thou canſt govern the world better than I do; for theſe and the expreſſions following are ironical.

℣. 11. Caſt abroad the rage of thy wrath, &c.] Work thyſelf up into a paſſion, at leaſt ſeemingly; put on all the airs of a wrathful and enraged king on a throne of ſtate, whoſe wrath is like the roaring of a lion, and as meſſengers of death; pour out menaces plentifully, threatning what thou wilt do; and try if by ſuch means thou canſt humble the ſpirit of a proud man, as follows. And behold every one that is proud, and abaſe him; look ſternly at him, put on a fierce, furious, and menacing countenance, and ſee if thou canſt daſh a proud man out of countenance, and humble him before thee, as I am able; among the many inſtances of divine power the Lord pitches upon this one, and propoſes it to Job to try his ſkill and power upon, the humbling of a proud man.

℣. 12. Look on every one that is proud, and bring him low, &c.] As the Lord often does; ſee Iſa. ii. 11, 12. this is the ſame as before. And tread down the wicked in their place; the ſame with the proud, for pride makes men wicked; it is a ſin, and very odious in the ſight of God, and is highly reſented by him; he reſiſts the proud: now Job is bid, when he has brought proud men low, and laid their honour in the duſt, to keep them there, to trample upon them, and tread them as mire in the ſtreet; and that in their own place, or wherever he ſhould find them; the Septuagint render it immediately; ſee Iſa. xxviii. 3.

℣. 13. Hide them in the duſt together, &c.] Either in the duſt of death, that they may be ſeen no more in this world, in the ſame place and circumſtances where they ſhewed their pride and haughtineſs; or in the duſt of the grave, and let them have an inglorious burial, like that of malefactors thrown into ſome common pit together; as when multitudes are ſlain in battle, a large pit is dug, and the bodies are caſt in together without any order or decency; or it may be rendered alike [b], let them be treated equally alike, no preference given to one above another. And bind their faces in ſecret; alluding, as it is thought, to malefactors when condemned and about to be executed, whoſe faces are then covered, as Haman's was, Eſther vii. 8. or to the dead when buried, whoſe faces are bound with napkins, as Lazarus's was, John xi. 44. the meaning of all theſe expreſſions is, that Job would abaſe and deſtroy, if he could, every proud man he met with, as God does, in the courſe of his providence, ſooner or later. There had been inſtances of divine power in this way before, or in the times of Job, which might come to his knowledge; as the caſting down of the proud angels out of heaven, and of caſting proud Adam out of paradiſe, the drowning the proud giants of the old world, and of diſperſing the proud builders of Babel, and of deſtroying Sodom and Gomorrah by fire, one of whoſe reigning ſins was pride; and of drowning proud Pharaoh and his hoſt in the Red ſea: which laſt ſeems to have been done much about the time Job lived.

℣. 14. Then will I alſo confeſs unto thee, that thine own right hand can ſave thee.] From all his enemies temporal and ſpiritual, and out of all evils and calamities whatſoever; and that he ſtood in no need of his help and aſſiſtance, yea that he was a match for him, and might be allowed to contend with him; but whereas he was not able to do the above things propoſed to him, it could not be admitted mitted that his own right hand could ſave him; and therefore ought quietly to ſubmit to the ſovereignty of God over him, and to all the diſpenſations of his providence, and be humbled under his mighty hand, ſince no hand but his could ſave him; as no man's right hand can ſave him from temporal evils and enemies, and much leſs from ſpiritual ones, or with an everlaſting ſalvation; nor any works of righteouſneſs done by him, only the arm of the Lord has wrought ſalvation, and his right hand only ſupports and ſaves. Two inſtances are given in this and the following chapter, the one of a land-animal, the other of a ſea-animal, as is generally ſuppoſed; or it may be of amphibious ones, that live both on land and water.

[b] חד׳ pariter, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Cocceius, Schultens.

℣. 15. Behold, now behemoth, &c.] The word is plural, and ſignifies beaſts, and may be uſed to denote the chiefeſt and largeſt of beaſts, and therefore is commonly underſtood of the elephant; and certain it is, that a ſingle beaſt is deſcribed in the following account, and ſo the word is rendered, Pſal. lxxiii. 22. The word is here rendered by the Septuagint θηρια, beaſts; which is the word uſed by the Greeks [c] for elephants, as belluæ, a word of the ſame ſignification, is by the Latins [d]: and ſo the Sabines called an elephant barrus, and the Indians barro [e] בער a beaſt; and it may be obſerved, that ivory is called ſhenhabbim, 1 Kings x. 22. i. e. ſhenhabebim, behem or behemoth [f], the tooth of the beaſt: and it may be alſo obſerved, that Seneca [g] ſays, that the Nile produces beaſts like the ſea; meaning particularly the crocodile and hippopotamus. Bochart diſſents from the commonly received opinion of the elephant being meant; and thinks the hippopotamus, or river-horſe, is intended, ſo called from its having a head like a horſe; and is ſaid to have a mane, and to neigh like one, and to bear ſome reſemblance to it in its ſnout, eyes, ears and back [h]. And the reaſons that celebrated author has given for this his opinion, have prevailed on many learned men to follow him; and there are ſome things in the deſcription of behemoth, as will be obſerved, which ſeem better to agree with the river-horſe than with the elephant. It is an amphibious creature, and ſometimes lives upon the land, and ſometimes in the water; and by various [i] writers, is often called a beaſt and four-footed one: which I made with thee; or as well as thee; it being equally the work of my hands, a creature as thou art: or made on the continent, as thou art, ſo Aben Ezra; and made on the ſame day man was made; which thoſe obſerve, who underſtand it of the elephant; or, which cometh neareſt to thee, the elephant being, as Pliny [k] ſays, the neareſt to man in ſenſe; and no beaſt more prudent, as Cicero [l] affirms. But the above learned writer, who interprets it of the river-horſe, takes the meaning of this phraſe to be; that it was a creature in Job's neighbourhood, an inhabitant of the river Nile in Egypt, to which Arabia joined, where Job lived; which is teſtified by many writers [m]: and therefore it is thought more probable, that a creature near at hand and known, ſhould be inſtanced in, and not one that it may be was never ſeen nor known by Job. But both Diodorus Siculus [n] and Strabo [o] ſpeak of herds of elephants in Arabia, and of that as abounding with them; and of various places called from them, and the hunting of them, and even of men from eating them. He eateth graſs as an ox; which is true both of the elephant and of the river-horſe: that a land-animal ſhould eat graſs is not ſo wonderful; but that a creature who lives in the water, ſhould come out of it and eat graſs, is very ſtrange and worthy of admiration, it is obſerved: and that the river-horſe feeds in corn-fields and on graſs, many writers [p] aſſure us; yea, in the river it feeds not on fiſhes, but on the roots of the water-lily, which fiſhermen therefore uſe to bait their hooks with to take it. Nor is it unlike an ox in its ſhape, and in ſome parts of its body: hence the Italians call it bomaris, the ſea-ox; but it is double the bigneſs of an ox [q]. Olaus Magnus [r] ſpeaks of a ſea-horſe, found between Britain and Norway; which has the head of a horſe, and neighs like one, has cloven feet with hoofs like a cow; and ſeeks its food both in the ſea and on the land, and grows to the bigneſs of an ox, and has a forked tail like a fiſh.

℣. 16. Lo now, his ſtrength is in his loins, &c.] The ſtrength of the elephant is well known, being able to carry a caſtle on its back, with a number of men therein; but what follows does not ſeem ſo well to agree with it. And his force is in the navel of his belly; ſince the belly of the elephant is very tender; by means of which the rhinoceros, its enemy, in its fight with it, has the advantage of it, by getting under its belly, and ripping it up with its horn [s]. In like manner Eleazar the Jew killed one of the elephants of Antiochus, by getting between its legs, and thruſting his ſword into its navel [t]; which fell and killed him with the weight of it. On the other hand, the river-horſe is covered with a ſkin all over, the hardeſt and ſtrongeſt of all creatures [u], as not to be pierced with ſpears or arrows [w]; and of it dried were made helmets, ſhields, ſpears and poliſhed darts [x]. That which monſieur Thevenot [y] ſaw, had ſeveral ſhot fired at it before it fell, for the bullets hardly pierced thro' its ſkin. We made ſeveral ſhot at him, ſays another traveller [z], but to no purpoſe; for they would glance from him as from a wall. And indeed the elephant is ſaid to have ſuch a hard ſcaly ſkin as to reſiſt the ſpear [a]: and Pliny [b], though he ſpeaks of the hide of the river-horſe being ſo thick that ſpears are made of it; yet of the hide of the elephant, as having targets made of that, which are impenetrable.

℣. 17. He moveth his tail like a cedar, &c.] To which it is compared, not for the length and largeneſs of it; for the tail both of the elephant and of the river-horſe is ſhort; though Vartomannus [c] ſays, the tail of the elephant is like a buffalo's, and is four four hands long, and thin of hair: but becauſe of the ſmoothneſs, roundneſs, thickneſs and firmneſs of it; ſuch is the tail of the river-horſe, being like that of a hog or boar [d]; which is crooked, twiſted, and which it is ſaid to turn back and about at pleaſure, as the word uſed is thought to ſignify. Aben Ezra interprets it, maketh to ſtand; that is ſtiff and ſtrong, and firm like a cedar. One writer [e] ſpeaks of the horſe of the Nile, as having a ſcaly tail; but he ſeems to confound it with the ſea-horſe. Junius interprets it of its penis, its genital part; to which the Targum in the King's Bible is inclined: and Cicero [f] ſays, the ancients uſed to call that the tail; but that of the elephant, according to Ariſtotle [g], is but ſmall, and not in proportion to the bigneſs of its body; and not in ſight, and therefore can hardly be thought to be deſcribed; though the next clauſe ſeems to favour this ſenſe. The ſinews of his ſtones are wrapped together: if by theſe are meant the teſticles, as ſome think, ſo the Targums; the ſinews of which were wreathed, implicated and ramified, like branches of trees, as Montanus renders it. Bochart interprets this of the ſinews or nerves of the river-horſe, which having ſuch plenty of them, are exceeding ſtrong; ſo that as ſome report this creature will with one foot ſink a boat [h]; I have known him open his mouth, ſays a traveller [i], and ſet one tooth on the gunnel of a boat, and another on the ſecond ſtrake from the keel, more than four feet diſtant, and there bite a hole through the plank, and ſunk the boat.

[c] Suidas in voce θηρια. Plutarch in Eumene. [d] Terent. Eunuch. act. 3. ſc. 1. Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 8. c. 3. [e] Iſidor. Origin. l. 12. c. 2. Vid. Horat. Epod. 12. v. 1. [f] Hiller. Onomaſtic. Sacr. p. 434. [g] Nat. Quæſt. l. 4. c. 2. [h] Vid. Iſidor. Origin. l. 12. c. 6. Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 8. c. 25. Ariſtot. Hiſt. Animal. l. 2. c. 7. [i] Herodot. Euterpe, ſive l. 2. c. 71. Plin. ib. Ammian. Marcellin. l. 22. Leo African. Deſcript. Africæ, l. 9. p. 758. [k] Nat. Hiſt. l. 8. c. 1. [l] De Natur. Deor. l. 1. [m] Solin. Polyhiſt. c. 45. Ælian. de Animal. l. 5. c. 53. Philo de Præmiis, p. 924. Plin. Aſric. ut ſupra. [n] Bibliothec. l. 2. p. 136. & l. 3. p. 173, 174, 175. [o] Geograph. l. 16. p. 531, 533. [p] Diodor. Sic. l. 1. p. 31. Ælian. Plin. Solin. Ammian. ut ſupra. [q] Ludolf. Ethiop. Hiſt. l. 1. c. 11. [r] De Ritu Septent. Gent. l. 21. c 26. [s] Ælian. de Animal. l. 17. c. 44. Plin. l. 8. c. 10, 20. Vid. Solin. c. 38. Diodor. Sic. l 3. p. 167. & Strabo. Geograph. l. 16. p. 533. [t] Joſeph. Ben Gorion. Hiſt. Heb. l. 3. c. 20. [u] Diodor. Sic. ut ſupra. Plin. l. 8. c. 25. [w] Ptolem. Geograph. l. 7. c. 2. Fragment. Cteſiæ ad Calcem Herodot. p. 701. Ed Gronov. Boius apud Kircher. China cum Monument p. 193. [x] Herodot. ut ſupra. Ariſtot. Hiſt. Animal. l. 2. c. 7. [y] Travels, part 1. c. 72. [z] Dampier's Voyages, vol. 2. part 2. p. 105. [a] Heliodor. Ethiop. Hiſt. l. 9. c. 18. [b] Nat. Hiſt. l. 11. c. 39. Vid. Voſſium in Melam. de Situ Orbis, l. 1. c. 5. p. 28. [c] Navigat l 4. c. 9.

℣. 18. His bones are as ſtrong pieces of braſs; his bones are as bars of iron.] Than which nothing is ſtronger. The repetition is made for greater illuſtration and confirmation; but what is ſaid is not applicable to the elephant, whoſe bones are porous and rimous, light and ſpongy for the moſt part, as appears from the oſteology [k] of it; excepting its teeth, which are the ivory; though the teeth of the river-horſe are ſaid to exceed them in hardneſs [l]; and artificers ſay [m], they are wrought with greater difficulty than ivory. The ancients, according to Pauſanias [n], uſed them inſtead of it; who relates, that the face of the image of the goddeſs Cybele was made of them: and Kircher [o] ſays, in India they make beads, crucifixes, and ſtatues of ſaints of them; and that they are as hard or harder than a flint, and fire may be ſtruck out of them. So the teeth of the morſs, a creature of the like kind in the northern countries, are valued by the inhabitants as ivory [p], for hardneſs, whiteneſs and weight, beyond it, and are dearer and much traded in; ſee the note on ℣. 20. but no doubt, not the teeth only but the other bones of the creature in the text are meant.

℣. 19. He is the chief of the ways of God, &c.] Or the beginning of them, that is, of the works of God in creation; which muſt be reſtrained to animals, otherwiſe there were works wrought before any of them were created. There were none made before the fifth day of the creation, and on that day was the river-horſe made; in which reſpect it has the preference to the elephant, not made till the ſixth day. But if this phraſe is expreſſive of the ſuperexcellency of behemoth over other works of God, as it ſeems to be, it muſt be limited to the kind of which it is; otherwiſe man is the chief of all God's ways or works, made either on the fifth or ſixth day: and ſo as the elephant may be obſerved to be the chief of the beaſts of the earth, or of land-animals, for its largeneſs and ſtrength, its ſagacity, docility, gentleneſs, and the like; ſo the river-horſe may be ſaid to be the chief of its kind of the aquatic animals, or of the amphibious ones, for the bulk of its body, which is not unlike that of the elephant, as ſays Diodorus Siculus [q]; and it has been by ſome called the Egyptian elephant [r]; and alſo from its great ſagacity, of which inſtances are given by ſome writers [s]. However, it is one of the chief works of God, or a famous, excellent and remarkable one, which may be the ſenſe of the expreſſion; ſee Numb. xxiv. 20. It might be remarked in favour of the elephant, that it ſeems to have its name from אלף the firſt and chief; as the firſt letter in the Hebrew alphabet is called aleph; unleſs it ſhould have its name from this root, on account of its docility. He that made him, can make his ſword to approach unto him; not the ſword of God, as if this creature could not be killed by any but by him that made it; for whether the elephant or river-horſe be underſtood, they are both to be taken and ſlain: but the ſword of behemoth is that which he himſelf is furniſhed with; which ſome underſtand of the trunk of the elephant, with which he defends himſelf and annoys others; but that has no likeneſs of a ſword. Bochart [t] renders the word by harpe, which ſignifies a crooked inſtrument, ſickle or ſcythe; and interprets it of the teeth of the river-horſe, which are ſharp and long, and bended like a ſcythe. That which Thevenot [u] ſaw, had four great teeth in the lower jaw, half a foot long, two whereof were crooked; and one on each ſide of the jaw; the other two were ſtraight, and of the ſame length as the crooked, but ſtanding out in the length: ſee the figure of it in Scheuchzer [w]; by which it alſo appears to have ſix teeth. Another traveller ſays [x], of the teeth of the ſea-horſe, that they are round like a bow, and about ſixteen inches long, and in the biggeſt part more than ſix inches about: but another relation [y] agrees more nearly with Thevenot and Scheuchzer; that four of its teeth are longer than the reſt, two in the upper jaw, one on each ſide, and two more in the under; theſe laſt are four or five inches long, the other two ſhorter; with which it mows down the corn and graſs in great quantities: ſo that Diodorus Siculus [z] obſerves, that if this animal was very fruitful, and brought forth many young and frequently, the fields in Egypt would be utterly deſtroyed. This interpretation agrees with what follows, ℣. 20. Surely the mountains bring him forth food, &c.] Graſs which grows on mountains, and is the food of the river-horſe as well as of the elephant; and therefore is furniſhed with teeth like a ſcythe to mow it down; and it is not a ſmall quantity that will ſuffice it, mountains only can ſupply it; and marvellous it is, that a creature bred in a river ſhould come out of it to ſeek its food on mountains. There is a creature in the northern parts, as in Ruſſia, Greenland, &c. which is called morſs and ſea-morſs, and by the deſcription of it is much like the river-horſe, of the bigneſs of an ox, and having an an head like one, with two large long teeth ſtanding out of its upper jaw, and an hairy ſkin [a], ſaid to be an inch thick, and ſo tough that no lance will enter it [b]; it comes out of the ſea, and by its teeth gets up to the tops of mountains, and having fed on graſs rolls itſelf down again into the ſea; and this it does by putting its hinder feet to its teeth, and ſo falls from the mountain with great celerity, as on a ſledge [c]. Where all the beaſts of the field play; ſkip and dance, and delight in each other, being in no fear of behemoth; whether underſtood of the elephant or river-horſe; ſince neither of them are carnivorous creatures that feed on other animals, but on graſs only; and therefore the beaſts of the field may feed with them quietly and ſecurely. Pliny [d] ſays of the elephant, that meeting with cattle in the fields, it will make ſigns to them not to be afraid of it, and ſo they will go in company together.

[d] Ariſtot. Plin. Solin. & Iſidore ut ſupra. [e] Nicet. Choniat. apud Fabrit. Gr. Bibliothec. vol. 6. p. 410. [f] Epiſt. l. 9, ep. 22. [g] Hiſt. Animal. l. 2. c. 1. [h] Apud Hierozoic. par. 2. l. 5. c. 14. col. 758. [i] Dampier's Voyages, vol. 2. part 2. p. 105. [k] In Philoſoph. Tranſact. vol. 5. p. 155, 156. [l] Odoardus Barboſa apud Bochart. ut ſupra. [m] Diepenſes apud Ib. [n] Arcadica, ſive l. 8. p. 530. [o] China cum Monument. p. 193. [p] Olaus Magnus, ut ſupra, l. 2. c. 19. Voyage to Spitzbergen, p. 115. [q] Ut ſupra. [r] Achilles Tatius, l. 4. [s] Ammian. Marcellin. Plin. Solin. ut ſupra. Vid. Plin. l. 28. c. 8. [t] Ut ſupra, col. 760. [u] Travels, part 1. c. 72. [w] Phyſic. Sacr. tab. 532. [x] Dampier's Voyages, vol. 2. part 2. p. 105. [y] Capt. Rogers apud Dampier, Ib. p. 106. [z] Ut ſupra.

℣. 21. He lieth under the ſhady trees, in the covert of the reed, and fens.] This may be thought to agree very well with the river-horſe, the inhabitant of the Nile, where reeds in great plenty grew, and adjoining to which were fenny and marſhy places, and ſhady trees; and as hiſtorians relate [e], this creature takes its lodging among high reeds, and in ſhady places; yea the reeds and ſugar canes, and the leaves of the papyrus, are part of the food on which it lives; and hence the hunters of them ſometimes cover their bait with a reed to take them; tho' it muſt be allowed that the elephant delights to be about rivers, and in clayey and fenny places [f], and therefore Ælianus [g] ſays, it may be called the fenny animal.

℣. 22. The ſhady trees cover him with their ſhadow, &c.] Under which it lies, as in the preceding verſe; which is thought not ſo well to agree with the elephant, ſince according to Ælianus [h] and other writers, it lies not down, at leaſt but rarely, but ſleeps ſtanding; it being very troubleſome to it to lie down and riſe up again; and beſides it is repreſented by ſome authors [i] as higher than the trees, and therefore this is ſuppoſed to agree better with the river-horſe; eſpecially ſince it follows, the willows of the brook compaſs him about; or the willows of the Nile, as ſome chooſe to render it; which would put it out of all doubt that the river-horſe is intended, if it could be eſtabliſhed, it being an inhabitant of that river; and yet the above writer [k] ſpeaks of elephants, when grown old, ſeeking large thick and ſhady woods to take up their abode in.

℣. 23. Behold, he drinketh up a river, and haſteth not, &c.] The elephant is indeed a very thirſty animal, and drinks largely; the philoſopher [l] ſays, it drinks nine Macedonian buſhels at a feeding, and that it will drink fourteen Macedonian meaſures of water at once, and eight more at noon; but to drink up a river ſeems to be too great an hyperbole; wherefore the words may be rendered, Behold, let a river oppreſs him, or bear ever ſo hard upon him, and come with the greateſt force and preſſure on him [m], he haſteth not to get out of it; or he is not frighted or troubled, as the Targum; which agrees with the river-horſe, who walks into the river and proceeds on in it, with the greateſt eaſe and unconcernedneſs imaginable; now and then lifting up his head above water to take breath, which he can hold a long time; whereas the elephant cannot wade in the water any longer than his trunk is above it, as the philoſopher obſerves [n]; and Livy [o] ſpeaks of fear and trembling ſeizing an elephant, when about to be carried over a river in boats. He truſteth that he can draw up Jordan into his mouth; ſo bold and confident he is, and not at all diſturbed with its rapidity; or though Jordan, or rather any deſcending flowing ſtream, guſhes into his mouth, ſo Mr Broughton: for perhaps Jordan might not be known by Job; nor does it ſeem to have any connection with the Nile, the ſeat of the river-horſe; which has ſuch large holes in its noſtrils, and out of which, water being ſwallowed down, he can throw it with great force. Diodorus Siculus [p] repreſents it as lying all day in the water, and employing itſelf at the bottom of it, eaſy, careleſs and unconcerned.

℣. 24. He taketh it with his eyes, &c.] Or can men take him before his eyes? ſo Mr Broughton; and others tranſlate it to the ſame purpoſe; no, he is not to be taken openly but privately, by ſome inſidious crafty methods; whether it be underſtood of the elephant, or river-horſe; elephants, according to Strabo [q] and Pliny [r] were taken in pits dug for them, into which they were decoyed; in like manner, according to ſome [s], the river-horſe is taken, a pit being dug and covered with reeds and ſand, it falls into it unawares. His noſe pierceth through ſnares; he diſcerns them oftentimes and eſcapes them, ſo that he is not eaſily taken in them. It is reported of the ſea morſs [t], before mentioned, that they aſcend mountains in great herds, where, before they give themſelves to ſleep, to which they are naturally inclined, they appoint one of their number as it were a watchman; who, if he chances to ſleep or to be ſlain by the hunter, the reſt may be eaſily taken; but if the watchman gives warning by roaring as the manner is, the whole herd immediately awake and fall down from the mountains with great ſwiftneſs into the ſea, as before deſcribed; or as Mr Broughton, Can men take him? to pierce his noſe with many ſnares? they cannot; the elephant has no noſe to be pierced, unleſs his trunk can be called ſo, and no hook nor ſnare can be put into the noſe of the river-horſe. Diodorus Siculus [u] ſays, it cannot be taken but by many veſſels joining together and ſurrounding it, and ſtriking it with iron hooks, to one of which ropes are faſtened, and ſo the creature is let go till it expires. The uſual way of taking it now is, by baiting the hook with the roots of water lilies, at which it will catch, and ſwallow the hook with it; and by giving it line enough it will roll and tumble about until, thro' loſs of blood, it faints and dies. The way invented by Aſdrubal for killing elephants, was by ſtriking a carpenter's chopping ax into his ear [w]; the Jews [x] ſay a fly is a terror to an elephant, it enters into his noſe and torments him grievouſly.

[a] Olaus Magn. ut ſupra, l. 21. c. 19. Vid. Bochart. ut ſupra, col. 763. Eden's Travels, p. 318. [b] See the North-weſt Fox, p. 232. Voyage to Spitzbergen, p. 115, 120. Supplement, p. 194. [c] Olaus Magnus and Eden's Travels, ut ſupra. [d] Nat. Hiſt. l. 8. c. 7. [e] Ammian. Marcellin. l. 22. Bellonius & Achilles Tatius apud Bochart. ut ſupra. [f] Ariſtot. Hiſt. Animal. l. 9. c. 46. Plin. l. 8. c. 10. Ælian. de Animal. l. 9. c. 56. [g] Ibid. l. 9. c. 24. [h] Ibid. c. 31. [i] Ibid. l. 7. c. 6. [k] Ibid. c. 2. [l] Ariſtot. ut ſupra. [m] Vid. Bochart. ut ſupra, col. 766. [n] Ariſtot ut ſupra. Vid. Ælian. l. 7. c. 15. [o] Hiſt. l. 21. c. 28. [p] Bibliothec. l. 1. p. 31. Iſidor. Origin. l. 12. c. 6. [q] Geograph l. 15. p. 484. [r] Nat. Hiſt. l. 8. c. 8. See Ovington's Voyage to Surat, p. 192, 193. [s] Apud Bochart. ut ſupra, col. 768. [t] Eden's Travels, p. 318. Supplement to the North-eaſt Voyages, p. 94. [u] Bibliothec. l. 1. p. 32. [w] Oroſii Hiſt. l. 4. c. 18. p. 62. Liv. Hiſt. l. 27. c. 49. [x] T. Bab. Sabbat. fol. 77. 2. & Gloſſ. in Ib.

CHAP.

CHAP. XLI.

A Large deſcription is here given of the Leviathan, from the difficulty and danger of taking it, from whence it is inferred that none can ſtand before God, ℣. 1—10. from the ſeveral parts of him, his face, teeth, ſcales, eyes, mouth and neck, fleſh and heart, ℣. 11—24. and from various wonderful terrible things ſaid of him, and aſcribed to him, ℣. 25—34.

℣. 1. Canſt thou draw out leviathan with an hook? &c.] That is, draw it out of the ſea or river as anglers draw out ſmaller fiſhes with a line or hook? the queſtion ſuggeſts it cannot be done; whether by the leviathan is meant the whale, which was the moſt generally received notion; or the crocodile as Bochart, who has been followed by many; or the orca, a large fiſh of the whale kind with many teeth as Haſæus, it is not eaſy to ſay. Leviathan is a compound word of than, the firſt ſyllable of thannin, rendered either a whale, or a dragon, or a ſerpent, and of levi, which ſignifies conjunction, from the cloſe joining of its ſcales, ℣. 15, 16, 17. the patriarch Levi had his name from the ſame word; ſee Gen. xxix. 34. and the name bids faireſt for the crocodile, and which is called thannin, Ezek. xxix. 3, 4. and xxxii. 2. Could the crocodile be eſtabliſhed as the leviathan, and the behemoth as the river-horſe, the tranſition from the one to the other would appear very eaſy; ſince, as Pliny ſays [a], there is a ſort of a kindred between them, being of the ſame river, the river Nile, and ſo may be thought to be better known to Job than the whale: tho' it is not to be concealed what Pliny ſays [b], that whales have been ſeen in the Arabian ſeas; he ſpeaks of one that came into the river of Arabia, ſix hundred feet long, and three hundred and ſixty broad. There are ſome things in the deſcription of this creature that ſeem to agree beſt with the crocodile, and others that ſuit better with the whale, and ſome with neither. Or his tongue with a cord which thou letteſt down? into the river or ſea, as anglers do, with lead to it to make it ſink below the ſurface of the water, and a quill or cork that it may not ſink too deep; but this creature is not to be taken in this manner; and which may be objected to the crocodile being meant, ſince that has no tongue [c], or at leaſt ſo ſmall that it is not ſeen, and cleaves cloſe to its lower jaw, which never moves; and is taken with hooks and cords, as Herodotus [d], Diodorus Siculus [e], and Leo Africanus [f] teſtify; but not ſo the whale.

℣. 2. Canſt thou put an hook into his noſe? &c.] Or a ruſh, that is, a rope made of ruſhes; for of ſuch ropes were made, as Pliny [g] affirms. Or bore his jaw through with a thorn? as men do herrings, or ſuch like ſmall fiſh, for the conveniency of carrying them, or hanging them up to dry; the whale is not to be uſed in ſuch a manner: but the Tentyritæ, a people in Egypt, great enemies to crocodiles, had methods of taking them in nets, and of binding and bridling them, and carrying them as they pleaſed [h].

℣. 3. Will he make many ſupplications unto thee? &c.] To ceaſe purſuing him, or to let him go when taken, or to uſe him well and not take away his life, no, he is too ſpirited and ſtout-hearted to aſk any favour, it is below him. Will he ſpeak ſoft words unto thee? ſmooth and flattering ones, for the above purpoſes? he will not; this is a figurative way of ſpeaking.

℣. 4. Will he make a covenant with thee? &c.] To live in friendſhip or ſervitude, as follows. Wilt thou take him for a ſervant for ever? oblige him to ſerve thee for life, or reduce him to perpetual bondage; ſignifying, that he is not to be tamed or brought into ſubjection: which is true of the whale, but not of the crocodile; for ſeveral authors [i] ſpeak of them as making a ſort of a truce with the prieſts of Egypt for a certain time, and of their being tamed ſo as to be handled, and fed, and brought up in the houſe.

℣. 5. Wilt thou play with him as with a bird? &c.] In the hand or cage; leviathan plays in the ſea, but there is no playing with him by land, Pſ. civ. 26. Wilt thou bind him for thy maidens? or young girls, as Mr Broughton renders it; tie him in a ſtring, as birds are for children to play with? Now though crocodiles are very pernicious to children, and often make a prey of them when they approach too near the banks of the Nile, or whenever they have an opportunity of ſeizing them [k]; yet there is an inſtance of the child of an Egyptian woman that was brought up with one, and uſed to play with it [l], though, when grown up, was killed by it; but no ſuch inſtance can be given of the whale of any ſort.

℣. 6. Shall the companions make a banquet of him? &c.] The fiſhermen that join together in catching fiſh, ſhall they make a feaſt for joy at taking the leviathan? which ſuggeſts that he is not to be taken by them, and ſo they have no opportunity or occaſion for a feaſt: or will they feed on him? the fleſh of crocodiles is by ſome eaten, and ſaid [m] to be very ſavoury, but not the fleſh of the whale. Shall they part him among the merchants? this ſeems to favour the crocodile, which is no part of merchandize, and to be againſt the whale, which, at leaſt in our age, occaſions a conſiderable trade for the ſake of the bone and oil: but perhaps in thoſe times and countries in which Job lived, the uſe of them might not be known.

℣. 7. Canſt thou fill his ſkin with barbed irons? or his head with fiſh-ſpears?] This ſeems not ſo well to agree with the whale; whoſe ſkin, and the ſeveral parts of his body, are to be pierced with harpoons and lances, ſuch as fiſhermen uſe in taking whales; and their fleſh to be cut in pieces with their knives: but better with the crocodile, whoſe ſkin is ſo hard, and ſo cloſely ſet with ſcales, that it is impenetrable; ſee the note on Ezek. xxix. 4. Or if the words are rendered, as by ſome, Wilt thou fill ſhips with his ſkin? and the fiſhermens boat with his head [n]? It makes alſo againſt the whale; for this is done continually, ſhips of different nations tions are loaded every year with its ſkin, fleſh, and the bones of its head.

[a] Nat. Hiſt. l 28. c. 8. [b] Ib. l. 32. c. 1. [c] Diodor. Sicul. l. 1. p. 31. Herodot. Euterpe, ſive l. 2. c. 68, Solin. c. 45. Plutarch. de Iſ. & Oſir. Vid. Ariſtot. de Animal. l. 2. c. 17. & l. 4. c. 11. Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 11. c. 37. Thevenot, ut ſupra. Sandy's Travels, l. 2. p. 78. [d] Ut ſupra, c. 70. [e] Ut ſupra. [f] Deſcriptio Africæ, l. 9. p. 762. See Sandy's Travels, ut ſupra, p. 79. [g] Nat. Hiſt. l. 19. c. 2. [h] Strabo. Geograph. l. 17. p. 560. Ælian. de Animal. l. 10. c. 21. Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 8. c 25. [i] Herodot. ut ſupra, c. 69. Ælian. l. 8. c. 2. & l. 10. c. 21. Solin. c. 45. Plin. l. 8. c. 46. [k] Ælian. l. 10. c. 21. [l] Maxim. Tyr. Sermon. 38. [m] Leo Africanus & Ælian. ut ſupra. [n] Vid. Schultens in loc.

℣. 8. Lay thine hand upon him, &c.] If thou canſt or dareſt. It is dangerous ſo to do, either to the whale or crocodile. Remember the battle; or look for war, as Mr Broughton renders it; expect a fight will enſue, in which thou wilt have no ſhare with this creature: do no more; if thou canſt by any means eſcape, take care never to do the like again; or thou wilt never do ſo any more, thou wilt certainly die for it.

℣. 9. Behold, the hope of him is in vain, &c.] Of getting the maſtery over him, or of taking him; and yet both crocodiles and whales have been taken; nor is the taking of them to be deſpaired of: but it ſeems the orca, or the whale with many teeth, has never been taken and killed [n]. Shall not one be caſt down even at the ſight of him? the ſight of a whale is terrible to mariners, leſt their ſhips ſhould be overturned by it; and ſome have been ſo frighted at the ſight of a crocodile, as to loſe their ſenſes: and we read of one that was greatly terrified at ſeeing the ſhadow of one; and the creature before mentioned is ſuppoſed to be much more terrible [o].

℣. 10. None is ſo fierce that dare ſtir him up, &c.] This ſeems beſt to agree with the crocodile; who frequently lies down and ſleeps on the ground [p], and in the water by night [q]; ſee Ezek. xxix. 3. when it is very dangerous to arouſe him; and few, if any ſo daring, have courage enough to do it: though whales have been ſeen lying near ſhore aſleep, and looked like rocks, even forty of them together [r]. Who then is able to ſtand before me? This is the inference the Lord draws from hence, or the uſe he makes of it; that if this creature is ſo formidable and terrible, that it is dangerous to arouſe and provoke him, and there is no ſtanding before him or againſt him; then how ſhould any one be able to ſtand before the Lord who made this creature, whenever he is angry? ſee Pſalm lxxvi. 7.

℣. 11. Who hath prevented me, that I ſhould repay him? &c.] Firſt given me ſomething that was not my own, and ſo laid me under an obligation to him to make a return. The apoſtle ſeems to have reſpect to this paſſage, Rom. xi. 35. Whatſoever is under the whole heaven is mine; the fowls of the air, the cattle on a thouſand hills, the fulneſs of the earth; gold, ſilver, precious ſtones, &c. All things are made by him, are his property and at his diſpoſe; and therefore no man on earth can give him what he has not a prior right unto; ſee Pſalm xxiv. 1. and l. 10, 11, 12.

℣. 12. I will not conceal his parts, &c.] The parts of the leviathan; or his bars, the members of his body, which are like bars of iron: nor his power; which is very great, whether of the crocodile or the whale: nor his comely proportion; the ſymmetry of his body, and the members of it; which, though large, every part is in juſt proportion to each other.

℣. 13. Who can diſcover the face of his garment? &c.] Or rather uncover it? Not the ſea, which Mr Broughton repreſents as the garment of the whale; Who can ſtrip him of it, or take him out of that, and bring him to land? which, tho' not impoſſible, is difficult: but either the garment of his face, the large bulk or prominence that hangs over his eyes; or rather his ſkin. Who dare venture to take off his ſkin, or flay him alive? or take off the ſcaly coat of the crocodile, which is like a coat of mail to him, and which he never of himſelf caſts off, as ſerpents do? Or who can come to him with his double bridle? either go within his jaws, which, when opened, are like a double bridle; or go near and open his jaws, and put a curb-bridle into them, and lead, direct and rule him at pleaſure. This is not to be done either to the whale or crocodile; yet the Tentyritæ had a way of getting upon the back of the crocodile; and by putting a ſtick acroſs its mouth, as it opened it to bite them, and ſo holding both the ends of it with the right and left hands, as with a bridle, brought them to land, as Pliny [s] relates; and ſo the Nereides are repreſented as ſitting on the backs of whales, by Theocritus [t].

℣. 14. Who can open the doors of his face? &c.] Of his mouth, the jaws thereof; which are like a pair of folding-doors: the jaws of a crocodile have a prodigious opening. Peter Martyr [u] ſpeaks of one, whoſe jaws opened ſeven feet broad; and Leo Africanus [w] affirms, he ſaw ſome whoſe jaws when opened would hold a whole cow. To the wideneſs of the jaws of this creature, Martial [x] alludes: and that the doors or jaws of the mouth of the whale are of a vaſt extent, will be eaſily believed by thoſe, who ſuppoſe that was the fiſh which ſwallowed Jonah. His teeth are terrible round about; this may ſeem to make againſt the whale, the common whale having none; though the ceti dentati are a ſort of whales that have many teeth in the lower jaw, white, large, ſolid and terrible [y]. Olaus Magnus [z] ſpeaks of ſome that have jaws twelve or fourteen feet long; and teeth of ſix, eight and twelve feet: and there is a ſort called trumpo, having teeth reſembling thoſe of a mill [a]. In the ſperma-ceti whale are rows of fine ivory teeth in each jaw, about five or ſix inches long [b]. But of the crocodile there is no doubt; which has two rows of teeth, very ſharp and terrible, and to the number of ſixty [c].

℣. 15. His ſcales are his pride, ſhut up together as with a cloſe ſeal, &c.] This is notoriouſly true of the crocodile, whoſe back and tail are covered with ſcales, which are in a meaſure impenetrable and invincible; which all writers concerning it, and travellers that have ſeen it, agree in; ſee the note on Ezek. xxix. 4. but the ſkin of the whale is ſmooth; the outward ſkin is thin, like parchment, and is eaſily pulled off with the hand; and its under ſkin, tho' an inch thick, is never ſtiff nor tough, but ſoft [d]: though if Nearchus [e] is to be credited, he reports, that one was ſeen fifty cubits long, with a ſcaly ſkin all over it a cubit thick; and ſuch, it is ſaid, were by a ſtorm brought into our river Trent ſome years ago, and caſt aſhore, which had ſcales upon their backs very hard, as large and thick as one of our ſhillings [f]. But Aben Ezra interprets this of the teeth of the leviathan, and in which he is followed by Haſæus; which are ſtrong like a ſhield, as the words uſed ſignify; ſo Mr Broughton, "the ſtrong ſhields have "pride:" but then this is as applicable, or more ſo, ſo, to the ſcales of the crocodile; which are ſo cloſe as if they were ſealed together, and are like a ſhield, its defence, and in which it prides itſelf.

[n] Vid. Scheuchzer. Phyſic. Sacr. vol. 4. p. 846 [o] Scheuchzer. Ib. [p] Plin. l. 8. c. 25. Solin. c 45. [q] Ammian. Marcellin. l. 22. [r] See the North weſt Fox, p. 205. [s] Ut ſupra. [t] Idyll. 19. [u] Decad. 5. c. 9. [w] Deſcrip. Africæ, l. 9. p. 763. So Sandy's Travels, l. 2. p. 78. edit. 5. [x] Epigram. l. 3. ep. 64. [y] Vid. Plin. l. 9. c. 5, 6. and Philoſoph. Tranſact. vol. 3. p. 544. Scheuchzer. Phyſic. Sacr. vol. 4. p. 848. [z] De Ritu Gent. Septent. l. 21. c. 8. [a] Philoſoph. Tranſact. abridged, vol. 2. p. 847, 848. [b] Ibid. vol. 7. part 3. p. 425. [c] Ælian. l. 10. c. 21. [d] Voyage to Spitzbergen, p. 146, 147, 152. [e] Apud Arrian. in Indicis. [f] Vid. Weſley's Diſſertations on Job, diſſert. 38. p. 290.

℣. 16. One is ſo near to another, that no air can come between them.] This ſhews, that it cannot be underſtood of the ſkin of the whale, and the hardneſs and ſtrength of that, which is alike and of a piece; whereas thoſe ſcales, or be they what they may, tho' cloſely joined, yet are diſtinct: thoſe who interpret this of whales that have teeth, and theſe of the teeth, obſerve, that as they have teeth to the number of forty or fifty in the lower jaw, in the upper one are holes or ſockets into which they go; and they are ſo very cloſe that no wind or air can come between them [g].

℣. 17. They are joined one to another, &c.] One ſcale to another, or a man in his brother [h]: which may ſeem to favour the notion of the whale's teeth in the ſockets, which exactly anſwer to one another; but the next clauſe will by no means agree with them. They ſtick together, that they cannot be ſundred; whereas they eaſily be, at leaſt by the creature itſelf; but the ſcales of a crocodile are ſo cloſely joined and ſealed together, that there is no parting them.

℣. 18. By his neeſings a light doth ſhine, &c.] The philoſopher [i] obſerves, that thoſe who look to the ſun are apter to neeſe: and it is taken notice of by various writers [k], that the crocodile delights to be ſunning itſelf, and lying yawning in the ſun and looking at it, as quoted by Bochart; and ſo frequently neeſe: which neeſings, thro' the rays of the ſun, may ſeem to ſhine and give light. Though as in neeſing, water is thrown out thro' the noſtrils; it may be obſerved of the whale, that it has mouths or holes in its front, thro' which, as thro' pipes, it throws out ſhowers and floods of water, as Pliny [l] relates; which, by means of the rays of the ſun, as in a rainbow, appear bright and glittering. And his eyes are like the eye-lids of the morning: the break and dawn of day; a very beautiful expreſſion, the ſame we call peep of day: Pindar [m] has the eye of the evening; break of day, as Ben Gerſom ſays, is about an hour and the fifth part of an hour before the ſun-riſing. The eyes of the crocodile were with the Egyptians an hieroglyphic of the morning [n]: wherefore this ſeems better to agree with the crocodile than the whale, whoſe eyes are not much bigger than thoſe of a bullock; and has eye-lids and hair like mens eyes; the cryſtal of the eye is not much bigger than a pea [o]; its eyes are placed very low, almoſt at the end of the upper lip, and when without its guide, daſhes itſelf againſt rocks and ſhoals [p]. Tho' that ſort of whales called orcæ, are ſaid to have eyes a foot long, and of a red roſy colour, ſuch as the morning is deſcribed by [q]: and a northern writer [r] tells us, that ſome whales have eyes, whoſe circumference will admit fifteen or twenty men to ſit therein; and in others it exceeds eight or ten cubits; and that the pupil is a cubit, and of a red and flaming colour; which at a diſtance, in dark ſeaſons, among the waves, appears to fiſhermen as fire kindled. And Thevenot [s] ſays of crocodiles, that their eyes are indifferently big, and very darkiſh.

℣. 19. Out of his mouth go burning lamps, and ſparks of fire leap out.] Which, tho' hyperbolical expreſſions, have ſome foundation for them in the latter; in the vaſt quantities of water thrown out by the whale, thro' its mouth or hole in its frontiſpiece, which in the ſun may look like lamps and ſparks of fire, as before obſerved; and eſpecially in the orcæ, or whales with teeth, which eject in the ſame way an oily mucus, or the fat liquor of the brain, commonly called ſperma-ceti, which may appear more bright and glittering. Ovid [t] ſays much the ſame of the boar, as is here ſaid of the leviathan.

℣. 20. Out of his noſtrils goeth forth ſmoke, as out of a ſeething pot or caldron.] In which fleſh or any thing elſe is boiling. It is obſerved, that there is a likeneſs between the crocodile and the river-horſe, and particularly in their breathing [u]: and of the former it is remarked [w], that its noſtrils are very large and open, and that they breathe out a fiery ſmoke, as out of a furnace.

℣. 21. His breath kindles coals, and a flame goeth out of his mouth.] Hyperbolical expreſſions, which the above obſervations may ſeem to juſtify.

℣. 22. In his neck remaineth ſtrength, &c.] This is thought to be an argument againſt the whale, which is ſaid to have no neck: but whatever joins the head and body, may be called the neck, tho' ever ſo ſmall; and the ſhorter the neck is, the ſtronger it is. It is alſo ſaid by ſome, that the crocodile has no neck alſo; but the philoſopher [x] is expreſs for it, that it has one and moves it: and Pliny [y] ſpeaks of it, as turning its head upwards, which it could not do without a neck. And ſorrow is turned into joy before him; or leaps and dances before him; it departs from him: he is not afraid of any thing, though ever ſo threatning. Or ſorrow and diſtreſs at the ſight of him, in men and fiſhes, make them leap, and haſten to get out of the way of him and eſcape him.

℣. 23. The flakes of his fleſh are joined together, &c.] The muſcles of his body are not flaccid and flabby, but ſolid and firmly compacted. They are firm in themſelves; they cannot be moved; that is, not very eaſily, not without a large ſharp cutting knife, and that uſed with much ſtrength.

℣. 24. His heart is as firm as a ſtone; yea, as hard as a piece of the nether milſtone.] Which muſt be underſtood not of the ſubſtance but of the qualities of it, being bold, courageous, undaunted and unmerciful; which is true both of the whale and crocodile, and particularly of the crocodile: Ælianus [z] relates of one ſort of them that they are unmerciful, though elſewhere [a] he repreſents them as fearful.

℣. 25. When he raiſeth up himſelf, &c.] Not out of the waters, but above the ſurface of them, ſo as that his large bulk, his terrible jaws and teeth, are ſeen. The mighty are afraid; not only fiſhes and other animals, but men, and theſe the moſt ſtout-hearted and courageous, as mariners and maſters of veſſels. By reaſon of breakings they purify themſelves;

[g] Vid. Scheuchzer. ut ſupra. [h] אישׁ באחיהוּ vir in fratre ſuo; Montanus. [i] Problem. ſ. 33. qu. 4. [k] Ælian. l. 3. c. 11. Leo African. Deſcript.o Africæ, l. 9. p. 761. Petr. Martyr. Decad. 3. l. 4. [l] Nat. Hiſt. l. 9. c. 4, 6. [m] Olymp. ode 3. v. 36. [n] Hor. Hieroglyph. apud Scheuchzer. vol. 4. p. 849. [o] Voyage to Spitzbergen, p. 145. [p] Ælian. l. 2. c. 13. Plin. l 9. c. 62. [q] Haſæus apud Schultens in loc. [r] Olaus Magnus de Ritu Gent. Septent. l, 21. c. 5, 8. ſo Albertus Magnus de Animal. l. 24. c. 1. [s] Travels, ut ſupra, p. 245. [t] Fulmen ab ore venit; frondeſque adflatibus ardent. Metamorph. l. 8. fab. 4. [u] Plin. l. 48. c. 8. Ariſtot. Hiſt. Animal. l. 8. c. 2. [w] Achilles Statius & Euſtathius, apud Scheuchzer. ut ſupra. [x] Ariſtot. Hiſt. Animal. l. 9. c. 6. & Part. Animal. l. 4. c. 11. [y] Nat. Hiſt. l. 8. c. 25. [z] De Animal. l. 12. c. 41. [a] Ibid. l. 10. c. 24.

ſelves; either becauſe of the breaches of the ſea made through the lifting up of this creature, threatning the overturning of veſſels; or of the breaches of mens hearts through fear, they are thrown into a vomiting, and purging both by ſtool and urine, which are often the effects of fear, ſo Ben Gerſom; or they acknowledge themſelves ſinners, or expiate themſelves, endeavouring to do it by making confeſſion of ſin, declaring repentance for it, praying for forgiveneſs of it, and promiſing amendment; which is frequently the caſe of ſea-faring men in diſtreſs; ſee Jonah, chap. i.

℣. 26. The ſword of him that layeth at him cannot hold, &c.] It is either broken by ſtriking at him, or however cannot pierce him and ſtick in him; but ſince a ſword is not uſed in fiſhery, rather the harpagon or harpoon may be meant, which cannot enter into the crocodile, being ſo fenced with ſcales; but the whale being ſtruck with it, it enters deep into his fleſh, and is wounded by it; wherefore this and what follows in the next verſes, ſeems beſt to agree with the crocodile, or ſome other fiſh. The ſpear, the dart, nor the habergeon; that is, neither of theſe can faſten upon him or enter into him: and yet it is certain that the whale, after he has been ſtruck and wounded by the harping iron, men approach nearer to him and thruſt a long ſteeled lance or ſpear under his gills into his breaſt, and through the inteſtines, which diſpatches him: darts are not made uſe of in the whale-fiſhery; and as for crocodiles, as Peter Martyr ſays [c], they are not to be pierced with darts: the habergeon, or coat of mail, being a defenſive piece of armour, ſeems not to be deſigned, as being never uſed in taking ſuch creatures; rather therefore a javelin or hand-dart may be intended; ſince, as Bochart obſerves, in the Arabic language, ſuch an one is expreſſed by this word.

℣. 27. He eſteemeth iron as ſtraw, &c.] You may as well caſt a ſtraw at him as a bar of iron; it will make no impreſſion on his ſteeled back, which is as a coat of mail to him; ſo Euſtathius affirms [d], that the ſharpeſt iron is rebounded and blunted by him. And braſs as rotten wood; or ſteel, any inſtrument made of it, though ever ſo ſtrong or piercing.

℣. 28. The arrow cannot make him flee, &c.] The ſkin of the crocodile is ſo hard, as Peter Martyr ſays, that it cannot be pierced with arrows, as before obſerved; therefore it is not afraid of them, nor will flee from them. Sling-ſtones are turned with him into ſtubble; are no more regarded by him than if ſtubble was caſt at him; not only ſtones out of a ſling, but out of an engine; and ſuch is the hardneſs of the ſkin of the crocodile, that as Iſidore ſays [e], the ſtrokes of the ſtrongeſt ſtones are rebounded by it, yea even it is ſaid to be proof againſt muſket-ſhot [f].

℣. 29. Darts are counted as ſtubble, &c.] Darts being mentioned before, perhaps ſomething elſe is meant here; and according to Ben Gerſom the word ſignifies an engine out of which ſtones are caſt to batter down walls; but theſe are of no avail againſt the leviathan. He laugheth at the ſhaking of a ſpear; at him, knowing it cannot hurt him; the crocodile, as Thevenot ſays [g], is proof againſt the halberd. The Septuagint verſion is, the ſhaking of the pyrophorus, or torch-bearer; one that carried a torch before the army, who when ſhook it was a token to begin the battle; which the leviathan being fearleſs of laughs at it; ſee the note on Obadiah, ℣. 18.

℣. 30. Sharp ſtones are under him, &c.] And yet give him no pain nor uneaſineſs. He ſpreadeth ſharp-pointed things upon the mire; and makes his bed of them and lies upon them; as ſharp ſtones, as before, ſhells of fiſhes, broken pieces of darts, arrows, and javelins thrown at him, which fall around him: this does not ſo well agree with the crocodile, the ſkin of whoſe belly is ſoft and thin; wherefore dolphins plunge under it and cut it with a thorn, as Pliny [h] relates, or with ſpiny fins [i]; but with the whale, which lies among hard rocks and ſharp ſtones, and large cutting pieces of ice, as in the northern ſeas.

℣. 31. He maketh the deep to boil [k] like a pot, &c.] Which is all in a froth through the violent agitation and motion of the waves, cauſed by its toſſing and tumbling about; which better ſuits with the whale than the crocodile, whoſe motion in the water is not ſo vehement. He maketh the ſea like a pot of ointment; this alſo ſeems to make againſt the crocodile, which is a river-fiſh, and is chiefly in the Nile. Lakes indeed are ſometimes called ſeas, in which crocodiles are found; yea they are alſo ſaid to be in the ſeas, Ezek. xxxii. 2. and Pliny [l] ſpeaks of them as common to the land, river and ſea; and the Nile is in the Alkoran [m] called the ſea, and its ancient name was oceames with the Egyptians, i. e. in Greek, ocean, as Diodorus Siculus [n] affirms; and ſo it is thought to be the Egyptian ſea in Iſa. xi. 15. It is obſerved that they leave a ſweet ſcent behind them, thus Peter Martyr [o] in his account of the voyages of Columbus in the Weſt Indies, ſays, they ſometimes met with crocodiles, which when they fled or took water, they left a very ſweet ſavour behind them, ſweeter than muſk or caſtoreum. But this does not come up to the expreſſion here of making the ſea like a pot of ointment; but the ſperm of the whale comes much nearer to it, which is of a fat oily nature, and like ointment, and which the whale ſometimes throws out in great abundance, ſo that the ſea is covered with it; whole pails full may be taken out of the water; it ſwims upon the ſea like fat; abundance of it is ſeen in calm weather, ſo that it makes the ſea all foul and ſlimy [p]: and there are a ſort of birds, called mallemuck, which fly in great numbers and feed upon it [q]. I cannot but remark what the biſhop of Bergen obſerves [r] of the ſea-ſerpent, that its excrements float on the water in ſummer time like fat ſlime.

℣. 32. He maketh a path to ſhine after him, &c.] Upon the ſea, by raiſing a white froth upon it, through its vehement motion as it paſſes along, or by the ſperma ceti it caſts out and leaves behind it. It is ſaid [s] that whales will cut and plow the ſea in ſuch a manner, as to leave a ſhining glittering path behind them, the length of a German mile, which is three of ours. One would think the deep to be hoary; to be old and grey-headed, or white like the hair of the head of an old man, a figure often uſed of the ſea by poets; poets [t]; and hence nereus [u], which is the ſea, is ſaid to be an old man, becauſe the froth in the waves of it looks like white hair.

[c] Apud Bochart. Hierozoic. par. 2. l. 5. c. 17. col. 785. [d] Apud Ibid. [e] Origin. l. 12. c. 6. [f] Mandelſloe in Harriſs's Voyages, &c. Vol. 1. p. 759. [g] Travels, part 1. b. 2. c. 72. p. 245. [h] Nat. Hiſt. l. 8. c. 25. [i] Sandy's Travels, l. 2. p. 78. [k] Fervetque — æquor, Virgil. Georgic. l. 1. v. 327. [l] Nat. Hiſt. l. 32. c. 11. [m] Schultens in Job. xiv. 11. [n] Bibliothec. l. 1. p. 17. [o] Decad. 3. l. 4. [p] Voyage to Spitzbergen, p. 148, 149. [q] Vid. Scheuchzer. ut ſupra, p. 852. & Voyage to Spitzbergen, p. 167. [r] Pontoppidan's Hiſtory of Norway, part 2. p. 204. [s] Vid. Scheuchzer. Ibid. p. 853.

℣. 33. Upon earth there is not his like, &c.] As to form and figure; in moſt creatures there is ſome likeneſs between thoſe in the ſea and on the land, as ſea-horſes, calves, &c. but there is no likeneſs between a whale and any creature on earth; there is between the crocodile and the lizard; nor is any like the whale for the largeneſs of its bulk; the Targum is, "his dominion is not on the earth," but on the ſea, as Aben Ezra notes; but rather the ſenſe is, there is no power on earth that he obeys and ſubmits to, as the Tigurine verſion; tho' the meaning ſeems to be, that there is none like him, for what follows: Who is made without fear; yet this agrees not neither with the crocodile, which Ælianus [w] ſays is fearful; nor with the whale, which will make off and depart at the ſhoutings of men, blowing of trumpets, and making uſe of any tinkling inſtruments, at which it is affrighted, as Strabo [x], Philoſtratus [y], and Olaus Magnus [z] relate. It is obſerved [a] of their valour, that if they ſee a man or a long-boat, they go under water and run away; and are never known to endeavour to hurt any man, but when in danger; though a voyager [b] of our own ſays, 'We ſaw whales in 'Whale-ſound, and lying aloft on the water, not 'fearing our ſhips, or aught elſe.' The Targum is, "He is made that he might not be broken;" or bruiſed, as Bochart; as reptiles uſually may, among whom the crocodile may be reckoned, becauſe of its ſhort legs; and yet is made with ſuch a hard ſcaly ſkin, that it cannot be cruſhed, bruiſed and broken. Aben Ezra obſerves that ſome ſay, the word hu, that is, he, is wanting, and ſhould be ſupplied, he, i. e. God, made him without fear; or that he might not be bruiſed: wherefore Cocceius interprets the following words entirely of God.

℣. 34. He beholdeth all high things, &c.] Or who beholdeth all high things; even he that made leviathan, that is, God, as the above interpreter: he does that which Job was bid to do, and could not; beholds every one that is proud, and abaſes him, chap. xl. 11, 12. and therefore he ought to acknowledge his ſovereignty and ſuperiority over him, and ſubmit to him, He is a king over all the children of pride: the proud angels that fell, and all the proud ſons of men; proud monarchs and potentates of the earth, ſuch as Nebuchadnezzar and others. But interpreters generally underſtand all this either of the crocodile, or of a fiſh of the whale-kind. Bochart obſerves, that the crocodile, tho' it has ſhort legs, will behold and meet unterrified, beaſts abundantly taller than itſelf, and with one ſtroke of its tail, break their legs and bring them low; and will deſtroy not only men, but all ſorts of beaſts, as elephants, camels, horſes, oxen, boars, and every animal whatſoever. But others apply this to the whale, which beholds the toſſing waves of the ſea, which mount up to heaven; the clouds of heaven on high over it; the lofty cliffs or ſhores, and ſhips of the greateſt bulk and height; and which, when it lifts up itſelf above the water, equals the high maſts of ſhips, and is abundantly ſuperior to all the tribes of watry animals, or the beaſts of the ſea. But this ſeems not wholly to come up to the expreſſions here uſed. Upon the whole; as there are ſome things that agree with the crocodile, and not the whale; and others that agree with the whale, of one ſort or another, and not with the crocodile; it is uncertain which is meant, and it ſeems as if neither of them were intended: and to me very probable is the opinion of Johannes Camerenſis [c], and to which the learned Schultens moſt inclines; that the leviathan is the dragon of the land-ſort, called leviathan, the piercing ſerpent, as diſtinct from the dragon in the ſea, Iſai. xxvii. 1. which agrees with the deſcription of the leviathan in the whole: as its prodigious bigneſs; its terrible countenance; its wide jaws; its three-forked tongue; its three rows of ſharp teeth; its being covered all over, back and belly, with thick ſcales, not to be penetrated by arrows and darts; its flaming eyes, its fiery breath, and being moſt terrible to all, and fearleſs of every creature; it will engage with any, and conquer and kill an elephant [d]; hence in Ethiopia dragons have no other names than elephant-killers: and ſo it may be ſaid to be king over all the children of pride; of all which proof may be given from various writers, as Pliny [e], Ælianus [f], Philoſtratus [g], and others; and particularly the dragon, Attilius Regulus, the Roman general, killed near Bagrade in Africa, is a proof itſelf of almoſt all the above articles, as Oſorius [h] has deſcribed it; nor is it any objection that the leviathan is repreſented as being in the ſea, ſince the dragon, even the land-dragon, will plunge into rivers, and is often found in lakes called ſeas, and in maritime places, and will go into the ſea itſelf, as Pliny [i] and Philoſtratus [k] relate. To which may be added, that this creature was found among the Troglodytes [l], who lived near the Red ſea, and not far from Arabia, where Job dwelt, and ſo might be well known by him: and beſides, of all creatures, it is the moſt lively emblem of the devil, which all the ancient Chriſtian writers make leviathan to be; and Satan is expreſly called the dragon in Rev. xii. 3, 9. So Suidas [m] ſays, the devil is called a dragon in Job. But be the leviathan what it may, it certainly is an illuſtrious inſtance of the power of God in making it; and therefore Job and every other man ought to ſubmit to him that made it, in all things, and be humble under his mighty hand; owning freely, that it is his right hand, and his only, and not man's, that can ſave, either in a temporal or ſpiritual ſenſe; for which end this and the behemoth are inſtanced in.

[t] πολιης αλος, Homer. Iliad. 1. v. 350. πολιης θαλασσης, Iliad. 4. v. 248. incanuit unda, Catullus. [u] Phurnutus de Natura Deorum, p. 63. [w] De Animal. l. 10. c. 24. [x] Geograph. l. 15. p. 499. [y] Vit. Apollon. l. 3. c. 16. [z] De Ritu Gent. Septent. l. 21. c. 3, 6. [a] Voyage to Spitzbergen, p. 153. [b] Baffin in the North-weſt Fox, p. 150. [c] Apud Pinedam, in v. 1. [d] Iſidor. Origin. l. 12. c. 4. [e] Nat. Hiſt. l. 8. c. 14. [f] De Animal. l. 2. c. 21. & l. 10. c. 48. & l. 15. c. 21. & l. 16. c. 39. [g] Vit. Apollon. l. 3. c. 2. Vid. Ovid. Metamorph. l. 3. fab. 1. [h] Hiſt. l. 4. c. 8. [i] Nat. Hiſt. l. 8. c. 13. [k] Ut ſupra. [l] Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 8. c. 11, 12. & l. 31. c. 2. [m] In voce δρακων, & in voce ψελιω.

CHAP. XLII.

THIS chapter contains Job's anſwer to the laſt ſpeech of the Lord's, in which he acknowledges his omnipotence, and his certain performance of his purpoſes and pleaſure; owns his own folly and ignorance, and confeſſes his ſins; for which he abhorred himſelf, and of which he repented, ℣. 1—6. it alſo gives an account of the Lord's deciſion of the controverſy between Job and his friends, blaming them and commending him above them; and ordered them to take ſacrifices and go to Job and offer them, who ſhould pray for them and be accepted, which was done, ℣. 7, 8, 9. and it cloſes with a relation of the great proſperity Job was reſtored unto, in which he lived and died, ℣. 10—17.

℣. 1. Then Job anſwered the Lord, and ſaid,] For though he had ſaid he would anſwer no more, chap. xl. 5. yet he might mean not in the manner he had, complaining of God and juſtifying himſelf; beſides he might change his mind without any imputation of falſhood or a lie; ſee Jer. xx. 9. to which may be added, that he had then ſaid all he had to ſay, and did not know he ſhould have more: he then confeſſed as much as he was convinced of, but it was not enough; and now through what the Lord had ſince ſaid to him he was more convinced of his ignorance, miſtakes and ſins, and had ſuch a ſight of God and of himſelf, that he could not forbear ſpeaking; moreover an injunction was laid upon him from the Lord to ſpeak again, and therefore he was obliged to give in his anſwer; ſee chap. xl. 7.

℣. 2. I know that thou canſt do every thing, &c.] As the works of creation, and the ſuſtentation of them ſhew; ſo the Targum, "thou ſuſtaineſt all "things," and can manage every creature made by him, even ſuch as were not tractable by men, ſuch as behemoth and leviathan, the creatures laſt inſtanced in; and was able to abaſe and bring low the proud, which Job could not do; and could alſo ſave him by his right hand, and bring him out of his low eſtate in which he was, and raiſe him to great proſperity again, which Job always deſpaired of till now; and though he had a theoretical knowledge of the omnipotence of God before, ſee chap. ix. 4—10. yet not a practical experimental knowledge of it; at leaſt not to ſuch a degree as he now had, working upon his heart, bowing his will, and bringing him to a reſignation to the will of God; he not only knew he could do all things, but that he had a right to do what he pleaſed; and that whatever he did he did well and wiſely, and in a righteous manner, of which before he ſeemed to have ſome doubt. And that no thought can be withholden from thee; either no thought of men, good or bad, of God or of themſelves, and ſo is an acknowledgment of the omniſcience of God, and may be an appeal to that; that God who knows the ſecrets of mens hearts, knew what thoughts Job now had of God; of the wiſdom, righteouſneſs, and goodneſs of God in the diſpenſations of his providence, different from what he had before; ſee John xxi. 17. or rather it may be underſtood of every thought of God's heart, of every ſecret purpoſe and wiſe counſel of his; which, as they are all well known to him, and cannot be withheld from having effect, or the performance of them hindered; Job now ſaw and was fully aſſured that all that had befallen him was according to the ſovereign and unſcrutable purpoſes of God, and according to the wiſe counſels of his will; he knew that not only God could do every thing, but that he alſo did whatever he pleaſed.

℣. 3. Who is he that hideth counſel without knowledge? &c.] It may be underſtood and ſupplied as it is by Cocceius, Thou didſt ſay; as the Lord had ſaid, or to this purpoſe, chap. xxxviii. 2. ſee the note there, to which Job here replies, I am the fooliſh man that has done it, I own it with ſorrow, ſhame and confuſion: or it may be interpreted as condemning every other man that ſhould act the like part. Schultens underſtands this as ſpoken by Job of God, and renders the words, "who is this that ſeals "up counſel, which cannot be known?" the counſels, purpoſes, and decrees of God are ſealed up by him, among his treaſures, in the cabinet of his own breaſt, and are not to be unſealed and unlocked by creatures, but are impenetrable to them, paſt finding out by them, and not to be ſearched and pried into; and ſo the ſecret ſprings of providence are not to be known, which Job had attempted, and for which he condemns himſelf. Therefore have I uttered that I underſtood not; concerning the providential dealings of God with men, afflicting the righteous and ſuffering the wicked to proſper, particularly relating to his own afflictions; in which he arraigned the wiſdom, juſtice, and goodneſs of God, as if things might have been better done than they were; but now he owns his ignorance and folly, as Aſaph did in a like caſe, Pſal. lxxiii. 22. Things too wonderful for me, which I knew not; things out of his reach to ſearch into, and beyond his capacity to comprehend; what he ſhould have gazed upon with admiration, and there have ſtopped. The judgments of God are a great deep, not to be fathomed with the line of human underſtanding, of which it ſhould be ſaid with the apoſtle, O, the depth, &c. Job ought to have done as David did, Pſal. cxxxi. 1. of which he was now convinced, and laments and confeſſes his folly.

℣. 4. Hear, I beſeech thee, and I will ſpeak, &c.] Not in the manner he had before, complaining of God and juſtifying himſelf, but in a way of humble intreaty of favours of him, of confeſſion of ſin before him, and of acknowledgment of his wiſdom, goodneſs, and juſtice in all his dealings with him, which before he arraigned. I will demand of thee; or rather I will make petition to thee, as Mr Broughton renders it; humbly aſk a favour, and intreat a gracious anſwer; for to demand is not ſo agreeable to the frame and temper of ſoul Job was now in. And declare thou unto me; or make him know what he knew not; he now in ignorance applies to God, as a God of knowledge, to inform him in things he was in the dark about, and increaſe what knowledge he had. He was now willing to take the advice of Elihu, and purſue it, chap. xxxiv. 31, 32.

℣. 5. I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, &c.] From his anceſtors, who in a traditionary way had handed down from one to another what they knew of God, his will and worſhip, his works and ways; and from thoſe who had the care of his education, parents and tutors, who had inſtilled the principles of religion, and the knowledge of of divine things, into him very early; and from ſuch as might inſtruct in matters of religion in a public manner; and both by ordinary and extraordinary revelation made unto him, as was ſometimes granted to men in that age in which Job lived; ſee chap. iv. 16, 17. and xxxiii. 14, 15, 16. Though he had heard more of God through his ſpeaking to him out of the whirlwind than ever he did before, to which he had attentively liſtened; and the phraſe hearing by or with the hearing of the ear, denotes cloſe attention; ſee Ezek. xliv. 5. But now mine eye ſeeth thee; thy ſhekinah, as Jarchi; thy divine glory and majeſty; the logos, the Word or Son of God, who now appeared in an human form and ſpake to Job out of the whirlwind; and whom he ſaw with the eyes of his body, as ſeveral of the patriarchs had ſeen him, and which is the ſenſe of an ancient writer [n]; though no doubt he ſaw him alſo with the eyes of his underſtanding, and had a clearer ſight of his living Redeemer, the Meſſiah, than ever he had before; and ſaw more of God in Chriſt, of his nature, perfections, and glory, than ever he had as yet ſeen; and what he had heard of him came greatly ſhort of what he now ſaw; particularly he had a more clear and diſtinct view of the ſovereignty, wiſdom, goodneſs, and juſtice of God in the dealings of his providence with the children of men, and with himſelf, to which now he humbly ſubmitted.

℣. 6. Wherefore I abhor myſelf, &c.] Or all my words, as Aben Ezra; all the indecent expreſſions he had uttered concerning God; he could not bear to think of them; he lothed them, and himſelf on account of them: ſin is abominable in its own nature, and makes men ſo; it is lothſome to God, and ſo it is to all good men when they ſee it in its proper light; and eſpecially when they have a view of the purity and holineſs of God, to which that is ſo very contrary, and alſo of his grace and goodneſs in the forgiveneſs of it; ſee Iſa. vi. 3, 5. Ezek. xvi. 63. and xx. 44. And repent in duſt and aſhes; which was an external ceremony uſed by mournful and penitent perſons; ſee chap. ii. 8. Jonah iii. 6. and is expreſſive of the truth and ſincerity of repentance; and never do any more truly mourn for ſin and repent of it, are more aſhamed of it, or have a more godly ſorrow for it, or more ingenuouſly confeſs it, and heartily forſake it, than thoſe who with an eye of faith, behold God in Chriſt as a ſin-forgiving God; or behold their ſins through the glaſs of pardoning grace and mercy; ſee Zech. xii, 10. Luke vii. 37, 47. 1 Tim. i. 13.

℣. 7. And it was ſo, &c.] What follows came to paſs. That after the Lord had ſpoken theſe words unto Job; which he ſpake to him out of the whirlwind, and after he had heard Job's confeſſion, and the declaration he made of his humiliation and repentance: the Lord ſaid to Eliphaz the Temanite; who with his two friends were ſtill preſent and heard the ſpeeches of the Lord to Job, and the acknowledgment he had made of ſin; though ſome [o] think that when the diſpute ended between Job and them, they returned to their own country; where Eliphaz is now ſuppoſed to be, and was bid with his two friends to go to Job again, which they did, as is concluded from the following verſes: but no doubt they ſtaid and heard what Elihu had to ſay; and the voice of the Lord out of the whirlwind would command their attention and ſtay; and very deſirous they muſt be to know how the cauſe would go for or againſt Job; the latter of which they might expect from the appearance of things. Now the Lord directs his ſpeech to Eliphaz, he being perhaps the principal man on account of his age, wiſdom and wealth, and being the man that led the diſpute, began it, and formed the plan to go upon, and was the moſt ſevere on Job of any of them; wherefore the Lord ſaid to him, My wrath is kindled againſt thee, and againſt thy two friends; who were Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite; who gave into the ſame ſentiments with Eliphaz, and went upon the ſame plan, ſpeaking wrong things of God, charging Job falſly, and condemning him; which provoked the Lord, and cauſed his wrath to be kindled like fire againſt them, of which there were ſome appearances and breakings forth in his words and conduct towards them. For ye have not ſpoken of me the thing that is right, as my ſervant Job hath; they had ſaid many right things of God, and Job had ſaid many wrong ones of him, and yet upon the whole Job had ſaid righter things of God than they; their notion, and which they had expreſſed, was, that God deals with men in this life according to their outward behaviour; that God did not afflict good men, at leaſt not ſorely, nor long; and that wicked men were always puniſhed now: from whence they drew this inference, that Job, being ſo long and ſo greatly afflicted, muſt be a bad man, or God would never have dealt with him after this manner. Job, on the other hand, affirmed, that wicked men enjoyed great proſperity, which good men did not; and therefore the love and hatred of God were not known by theſe things; and mens characters were not to be judged of by theſe outward things; in which he was doubtleſs right: ſome render the words have not ſpoken unto me [p], before him, in his preſence; for they were all before God, and to him they all appealed, and he heard and obſerved all that was ſaid, and now paſſed judgment. No notice is taken of Elihu, nor blame laid on him; he acting as a moderator, taking neither the part of Job, nor of his friends, but blaming both: nor did he pretend to charge Job with any ſins of his former life as the cauſe of his calamities; only takes up ſome indecent, unguarded, and extravagant expreſſions of his in the heat of this controverſy, and rebukes him for them; and throughout the whole vindicates the juſtice of God in his dealings with him.

℣. 8. Therefore take unto you now ſeven bullocks, and ſeven rams, &c.] Creatures uſed in ſacrifice before the giving of the levitical law, Gen. iv. 4. and viii. 20. and xv, 9. and the ſame number of the ſame creatures were offered by Balaam in the country of Moab, not far from where Job lived, nor at any great diſtance of time from his age, Numb. xxiii. 1, 2, and among the Gentiles in after-times [q]. And theſe were typical of Chriſt, being ſtrong creatures, eſpecially the bullocks, and which were uſed for labour; and the number ſeven, may point at the perfection of Chriſt's ſacrifice; to which theſe men were directed in their ſacrifices to look for the complete atonement of their ſins. Now tho' they were not at their own dwellings, and could not take theſe out of their own herds and flocks, and Job had none, yet they could purchaſe them of others; and which having done, they are bid to do as follows: And go to my ſervant Job, and offer up for yourſelves a burnt-offering;

[n] Euſeb. Demonſtr. Evangel. l. 1. c. 5. p. 11.
[o] Vid. Spanhem. Hiſt. Jobi, c. 8. ſ. 1, 2.
[p] לפני ad me, Mercerus, Druſius, Cocceius; coram me, V. L. apud me, Tigurine verſion.
[q] —— Septem mactare juvencos, &c. Virgil. Æneid. 6. v. 38, 39.

ing; that is, by Job, who was to offer it for them in their name, and at whoſe hands the Lord would accept it, and for his ſake. Job, as the head and maſter of his family, was wont to ſacrifice, as every ſuch man did before the Aaronical prieſthood took place, chap. i. 5. Now this was doing Job a great deal of honour, both by calling him his ſervant, as before in the preceding verſe, and twice more in this; which was plainly giving the cauſe on his ſide; confirming the character he always bore, and ſtill retained; and declaring he had other thoughts of him than his friends had; as well by ſending them to him with their ſacrifices to offer for them; which was ſaying, that they had ſinned, and muſt offer ſacrifice, and that Job was in the right; and therefore muſt offer the ſacrifice for them. This was putting them on a great piece of ſelf-denial; that men, who were older than Job, great perſonages, heads of families, and who had been wont to offer ſacrifices in them, yet are now ſent to Job to offer them for them; a man now in mean circumſtances, and whom they had treated with great contempt; and he in his turn had uſed them as roughly. And it was alſo a trial of Job's grace and of his forgiving ſpirit, to do this for them, and pray to God on their behalf: and the Lord's deſign in it was, to exerciſe the graces of them both, and to reconcile them to one another, and to himſelf. And my ſervant Job ſhall pray for you; that their ſacrifice might be accepted, and their ſin pardoned. In this Job was a type of Chriſt, as he was in many other things; ſee the notes on chap. xvi. 9—13. and xxx. 8, 9, 10. There is an agreement in his name, Job, whether it ſignifies love or hatred, deſired or hated, in both ways the etymology of it is given; it agrees with Chriſt, who is beloved of God and man, and the deſire of all nations; who hates iniquity, and was hated for his inveighing againſt it. Job was a type of him in his threefold ſtate; before his low eſtate, in it, and after it; ſee Phil. ii. 6—10. In his temptations by Satan, and ſufferings from men; and particularly in his office as a prieſt, who both offered himſelf a ſacrifice for his people, and offers their ſervices and ſacrifices of prayer and praiſe to God; and who prayed for his diſciples, and for all the Father has given him, for tranſgreſſors and ſinners, and even for his enemies that uſed him ill. For him will I accept; or his face, that is, hear his prayer, and grant what is aſked by him; as well as accept his ſacrifice. Leſt I deal with you after your folly; as all ſin is, being committed againſt God; a breach of his law, and injurious to men themſelves; ſee Deut. xxxii. 6. and iv. 6. Prov. viii. 36. Tho' here it ſeems to be reſtrained to their particular ſin and folly in their diſpute with Job; want of wiſdom in them was diſcerned by Elihu, chap. xxxii. 7, 9. So it follows: In that ye have not ſpoken of me the thing which is right, like my ſervant Job; and if by neglect of his advice, which would have been another inſtance of their folly, they had provoked the Lord to deal with them as their ſin deſerved, it muſt have gone hard with them. The Targum is, "leſt I ſhould "do with you, what would be a reproach" (or diſgrace;) would put them to ſhame, and make them appear ignominious to men; as by ſtripping them of their ſubſtance and honour, and reducing them to the condition Job was in.

℣. 9. So Eliphaz the Temanite, and Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite went, &c.] Having taken the above creatures for ſacrifice, as directed, they went to Job with them. And did according as the Lord commanded them; offered them by Job for a burnt-offering, and deſired him to pray for them. This they did both as to matter and manner, as the Lord ordered them; and they did it immediately, without conſulting fleſh and blood, the pride and other paſſions of their hearts; and they all united in it, and ſerved the Lord with one conſent, which ſhewed them to be good men. The Lord alſo accepted Job; the ſacrifice he offered; perhaps by ſending fire from heaven, which conſumed the burnt-offering: or the face of Job; he heard his prayer for his friends, and granted his requeſt for them: or the perſon of Job, as Mr Broughton renders it; Job in this was a type of Chriſt alſo, who is always heard in his interceſſion and mediation for his people. God has reſpect to his perſon, which is always acceptable to him, and in whom he is well pleaſed; and he has reſpect to his offering and ſacrifice, which is of a ſweet-ſmelling ſavour to him. And the perſons of his people are accepted in him the beloved, and all their ſervices and ſacrifices of prayer and praiſe, Matt. iii. 17. Epheſ. i. 6. 1 Peter ii. 5. The Targum is, "they did as the Word of "the Lord ſpake unto them, and the Word of the "Lord accepted the face of Job."

℣. 10. And the Lord turned the captivity of Job, &c.] Not literally, in ſuch ſenſe as Lot's captivity was turned; for Job's perſon was not ſeized on and carried away, though his cattle were: nor ſpiritually, being delivered from the captivity of ſin; that had been his caſe many years ago, when firſt converted: but it is to be underſtood of his reſtoration from afflictions and calamities, to a happy ſtate; as of the return of his ſubſtance, his health and friends, and eſpecially of his deliverance from Satan, in whoſe hands he had been ſome time, and by him diſtreſſed both in body and mind. But now his captivity was turned, and he was freed from all his diſtreſſes; and even from thoſe which aroſe from the dealings of God with him, which he was now fully ſatisfied about; and this was done, when he prayed for his friends; as he was directed to do. A good man will not only pray for himſelf, as Job doubtleſs did, but for others alſo; for his natural and ſpiritual friends, yea for unkind friends, and even for enemies likewiſe: and the prayer of an upright man is very acceptable to the Lord; and many mercies and bleſſings come by it; and even prayer for others, is profitable to a man's ſelf; and ſometimes he ſoon reaps the benefit of it, as Job now did. For when and while he was praying, or quickly upon it, there was a turn in his affairs: he preſently found himſelf in better health; his friends came about him, and his ſubſtance began to increaſe; Satan had no more power over him, and the preſence of God was with him. All which was of the Lord; and he enjoyed it in the way of prayer, and as the fruit of that. Alſo the Lord gave Job twice as much as he had before; or added to him double. Which chiefly reſpects his ſubſtance; his cattle, as appears from ℣. 12. and might be true both with reſpect to things temporal and ſpiritual. Double may denote an abundance, a large meaſure of good things; ſee Zech. ix. 12.

℣. 11. Then came there unto him all his brethren, and all his ſiſters, &c.] Which may be taken not in a ſtrict ſenſe, but in a larger ſenſe for all that were related to him; the ſame with his kinsfolks, chap. xix. 14. And all they that had been of his acquaintance before; that knew him, viſited him, converſed with him, and kept up a friendly correſpondence ſpondence with him; the circle of his acquaintance muſt have been large, for wealth makes many friends: now theſe had been ſhy of him, and kept at a diſtance from him, during the time of his affliction and diſtreſs; ſee chap. xix. 13, 14, 19. but hearing he was in the favour of God, and the cauſe was given on his ſide, and againſt his friends, and his affairs began to take a more favourable turn, they came to him again, and paid him a friendly viſit, even all of them. And did eat bread with him in his houſe; expreſſing their joy for his recovery, and renewing their friendſhip with him: this was done either at their own expence or at Job's, for he might not be ſo poor at the worſt as he is by moſt repreſented; for he had ſtill an houſe of his own, and furniture in it, and ſervants to wait upon him, as appears from chap. xix. 15, 16. nor do we read of any thing being taken out of his houſe from him; he might ſtill have gold and ſilver, and ſo could entertain his friends: and being a man of an excellent ſpirit received them kindly, without upbraiding them with their unkindneſs in deſerting him when afflicted. And they bemoaned him; ſhook their heads at him, pitying his caſe, that is, which he had been in; for this they might do, though things were now better with him, and might expreſs themſelves in ſuch manner as this, "Poor man, what haſt thou endured? what haſt thou gone through by diſeaſes of body, loſs of ſubſtance, and vexation from friends?" and beſides, though things began to mend with him, he was not come at once to the pitch of happineſs he arrived unto; ſo that there might be ſtill room for bemoaning, he being comparatively in poor circumſtances to what he was before. And comforted him over all the evil that the Lord had brought upon him; the evil of afflictions, of body and eſtate; which, though by means of Satan and wicked men, was according to the will of God, and might be ſaid to be brought on him and done to him by the Lord, Amos iii. 6. and they congratulated him upon his deliverance from them. Every man alſo gave him a piece of money, or a lamb; which ſome underſtand in a proper ſenſe, as being what might ſerve towards making up his loſs of ſheep, and increaſing his ſtock of them; but others with us take it for a piece of money, in which ſenſe it is uſed in Gen. xxxiii. 19. Joſh. xxiv. 32. compared with Acts vii. 16. which might have the figure of a lamb impreſſed upon it; as we formerly had a piece of money called an angel, having the image of one ſtamped on it; and it was uſual with the ancients both to barter with cattle inſtead of money before the coining of it, and when it was coined to impreſs upon it the figure of cattle; hence the Latin word pecunia for money, is from pecus cattle[r]; this piece of money in Africa is the ſame with the Jewiſh meah[s], which weighed ſixteen barley corns, the value of a penny. And every one an ear-ring of gold; or a jewel ſet in gold; ſuch men uſed to wear in Arabia, as appears from Judges viii. 24. however Job could turn them into money, and increaſe his ſtock of cattle thereby. Though perhaps theſe preſents were made him, not ſo much to enrich him, but as tokens of renewing their friendſhip with him; it being then uſual in the eaſtern countries, as it is to this day, that whenever they pay viſits, even to the greateſt perſonages, they always carry preſents with them; ſee 1 Sam. ix. 7.

℣. 12. So the Lord bleſſed the latter end of Job more than his beginning, &c.] Which verified the words of Bildad, chap. viii. 6, 7. though they were ſpoken by him only by way of ſuppoſition. All bleſſings are of the Lord, temporal and ſpiritual; and ſometimes the laſt days of a good man are his beſt, as to temporal things, as were David's, and here Job's; though this is not always the caſe: however if their laſt days are but the beſt in ſpiritual things, that is enough; if they have more faith, hope, love, patience, humility, and ſelf-denial, and reſignation of will to the will of God; are more holy, humble, ſpiritually and heavenly minded; have more light and knowledge in divine things; have more peace and joy, and are more fruitful in every good work, and more uſeful; and often they are in their very laſt moments moſt chearful and comfortable: the beſt wine is reſerved till laſt. For he had fourteen thouſand ſheep, and ſix thouſand camels, and a thouſand yoke of oxen, and a thouſand ſhe-aſſes; juſt double the number of each of what he had before, chap. i. 3.

℣. 13. He had alſo ſeven ſons, and three daughters.] The ſame number of children, and of the ſame ſort he had before, chap. i. 2. and according to Nachman the very ſame he had before, which the additional letter in the word ſeven is with him the notification of; ſo that the doubling of what he had before, ℣. 10. reſpects only his ſubſtance, and particularly his cattle; though the Targum ſays he had fourteen ſons, and ſo Jarchi[t]; others think theſe may be ſaid to be double to Job in their good qualities, external and internal, in their diſpoſitions, virtues, and graces; and others, inaſmuch as his former children were not loſt, but lived with God, and would live for ever, they might now be ſaid to be double; and ſo they conſider this as a proof of the immortality of the ſoul, and of the reſurrection of the body; but theſe ſenſes are not to be truſted to: whether theſe children were by a former wife or another, is uncertain.

℣. 14. And he called the name of the firſt, Jemima, &c.] That is, the name of the firſt and eldeſt daughter was called by Job, Jemima; which either ſignifies day, ſo the Targum interprets it, and moſt do, and ſo is the ſame with Diana; or as Spanheim[u] obſerves, it may be the ſame with the Arabic word Jemama, which ſignifies a turtle or dove[w]; and who alſo obſerves that a country in Arabia is ſo called, and perhaps from her; and which ſeems to be confirmed by the Arabic geographer[x], who ſpeaks of a queen called Jamama, who dwelt in a city of the country he deſcribes, as being on the north of Arabia Felix, and alſo ſpeaks of a way from thence to Bozrah in Edom. And the name of the ſecond, Kezia; or Caſſia; an aromatic herb of a very fragrant ſmell, as we render the word, Pſal. xlv. 8, and from this perſon the above learned writer conjectures mount Caſius in Arabia might have its name. And the name of the third, Keren-happuch; which ſignifies an horn or veſſel of paint, ſuch as the eaſtern women uſed to paint their faces, particularly their eyes with, Jer. iv. 30. and as Jezebel did, 2 Kings ix. 30. or the ray of a precious ſtone; ſome ſay the carbuncle[y] or ruby; according the Targum, the emerald; in 1 Chron. xxix. 2. the word is rendered glittering ſtones. Now theſe names may have reſpect to Job's daughters themſelves, to their external beauty, afterwards obſerved; ſo the Targum, "he called the one Jemima, be"cauſe her beauty was as the day; the other he "called Kezia, becauſe ſhe was precious like caſ-
"ſia; and another he called Keren-happuch, be-
"cauſe

[r] Plin. Nat Hiſt. l. 18. c. 3. & l. 33. c. 3. Alex. ab Alex. Genial. Dier. l. 4. c. 15. [s] T. Bab. Roſhhaſhanah, fol. 26. 1. [t] Vid. Balmeſ. Gram. Strat. 26. [u] Hiſt. Jobi, c. 12. ſ. 7. [w] Golii Lexic. Arab. col. 2767, 2768. [x] Geograph. Nub. Climat. 2. par. 6. [y] Hiller. Onomaſtic. Sacr. p. 356.

"cauſe great was the brighneſs of the glory of her "countenance, as the emerald." The complexion of the firſt might be clear as a bright day, though like that but of a ſhort continuance; ſee Cant. vi. 10. the next might have her name from the fragrancy and ſweetneſs of her temper; and the third, as being ſo beautiful that ſhe needed no paint to ſet her off, but was beauty and paint herſelf; or her beauty was as bright and dazzling as a precious ſtone; ſee Lam. iv. 7. Or theſe may reſpect their internal qualities, virtues, and graces; being children of the day and not of the night; having a good name, which is better than all ſpices; and poſſeſſed of ſuch graces as were comparable to jewels and precious ſtones. Though it might be, that Job, in giving them theſe names, may have reſpect to the change of his ſtate and condition; his firſt daughter he called Jemima or day, becauſe it was now day with him: he had been in the night and darkneſs of adverſity, temporal and ſpiritual, but now he enjoyed a day of proſperity, and of ſpiritual light and joy; the juſtneſs of his cauſe appeared, his righteouſneſs was brought forth as the light, and his judgment as noon-day; and the diſpenſations of divine providence appeared to him in a different light than he had ſeen them in: his ſecond daughter he called Kezia, or Caſſia, an herb of a ſweet ſmell, in oppoſition to the ſtench of his ulcers and of his breath, which had been ſo very offenſive, and from which he was now free; and may denote alſo the recovery of his good name, better than precious ointment, in which caſſia was an ingredient: his youngeſt daughter he called Keren-happuch, the horn of paint, in oppoſition to his horn being defiled in the duſt, and his face foul with weeping, chap. xvi. 15, 16. or if Keren-happuch ſignifies the horn turned, as Peritſol interprets it, it may have reſpect to the ſtrange and ſudden turn of Job's affairs: and it is eaſy to obſerve, that men have given names to their children on account of their preſent ſtate and condition, or on account of the change of a former one; ſee Gen. xli. 51, 52. Exod. xviii. 3, 4.

℣. 15. And in all the land were no women found ſo fair as the daughters of Job, &c.] Either in the whole world, which is not improbable: or it may be rather in the land or country in which they dwelt; and which may be gathered from their names, as before obſerved. The people of God, and children of Chriſt, the antitype of Job, are all fair, and there is no ſpot in them; a perfection of beauty, perfectly comely, thro' the comelineſs of Chriſt put upon them, and are without ſpot or wrinkle, or any ſuch thing. And their father gave them inheritance among their brethren; which was done not on account of their beauty or virtue; nor is this obſerved ſo much to ſhew the great riches of Job, that he could give his daughters as much as his ſons; as his impartiality to his children, and his ſtrict juſtice and equity in diſtributing his ſubſtance to them all alike, making no difference between male and female. And ſo in Chriſt, the antitype of Job, there is neither male nor female, no difference between them; but being all children, they are heirs, heirs of God and joint-heirs with Chriſt, and equally partake of the ſame inheritance with the ſaints in light.

℣. 16. After this lived Job an hundred and forty years, &c.] Not after he had arrived to the height of his proſperity; not after the birth of his children, and they were grown up, and had their portions given them, which muſt take in a conſiderable number of years; but after his afflictions were over, and his proſperity began: and if his years were doubled, as ſome think, tho' that is not certain, then he muſt be ſeventy years of age when he was ſo ſorely afflicted, and muſt live to the age of two hundred and ten; which is the common notion of the Jewiſh writers [z]: however, he muſt be fifty or ſixty years of age at that time, ſince his former children were grown up and were for themſelves; and it is ſaid [a], his afflictions continued ſeven years. So that it is not at all improbable, that he lived to be about two hundred years of age; and which was a ſingular bleſſing of God to him, if you compare his age with that of Jacob, Joſeph, Moſes and Joſhua, between the two former and the two latter he may be ſuppoſed to live. And ſaw his ſons, and his ſons ſons, even four generations; Joſeph ſaw but the third, Job the fourth, he was a great-great-grandfather. This was no doubt a pleaſant ſight to him, to ſee ſuch a numerous offſpring deſcending from him; and eſpecially if they were walking in the ways of God, as probably they were, ſince no doubt he would take all the care of their education that in him lay. This is the great bleſſing promiſed to the Meſſiah, the antitype of Job, Iſa liii. 10. ſee alſo Iſa. lix. 21.

℣. 17. So Job died, &c.] As every man does, though he lived ſo long, and as Methuſelah the oldeſt man did; and though a good man, the beſt of men die as well as others: ſo Job died, as a good man, in the Lord, in faith and hope of eternal life and happineſs; and ſo he died in all his outward proſperity and happineſs, having great ſubſtance and a numerous offſpring. Being old; as he might be truly called, being two hundred years of age or thereabout: and full of days; lived out all his days, the full term of life in common, and longer than it was uſual for men to live. He had a long life to ſatisfaction, as is promiſed, Pſal. xci. 16. He lived as long as he deſired to live, was quite ſatisfied with living; not that he lothed life, as he once did, and in that ſenſe he did, and from ſuch principles and with ſuch views as he then had, chap. vii. 15, 16. But he had enough of life, and was willing to die; and came to his grave, as Eliphaz ſaid, like a ſhock of corn in his ſeaſon, chap. v. 26. Adrichomius [b], from certain travellers, ſpeaks of the ſepulchre of Job, in the form of a pyramid, in the plains of the land of Uz, to the eaſt of the city Sueta, ſhewn to this day, and had in great honour by Greeks and others; and which is more probable than what ſome ſay [c], that his grave is in Conſtantinople, where there is a gate called Job's gate, from thence: but the Job there buried, was a general of the Saracens, who died beſieging that city with a numerous army, and was there buried, A. D. 675 [d]. There is a fragment at the end of the Septuagint and Arabic verſions of this book, ſaid to be tranſlated from a Syriac copy, which gives a very particular account of Job's deſcent; as, that "he dwelt in the land of Auſitis, on the borders of "Idumæa and Arabia; that his name was firſt Jo-"bab; that he married an Arabian woman, and "begot a ſon, whoſe name was Ennon; that his fa-"ther was Zare, a ſon of the ſons of Eſau; that "his mother was Boſorra (or Boſra) and that he "was the fifth from Abraham. And theſe are the "kings that reigned in Edom, which country he "reigned over; the firſt was Balac, the ſon of Beor, "the name of whoſe city was Dennaba; after Balac, "Jobab called Job; after him Aſom, who was go-"vernor in the country of Theman; after him Adad, "the ſon of Barad, who cut off Midian in the field "of Moab, the name of whoſe city was Gethaim. "The friends that came to him (Job) were Eliphaz, "of the ſons of Eſau, the king of the Themanites; "Baldad, king of the Sauchæans; and Sophar, king of "the Minæans." The ſubſtance of this is confirmed by Ariſtæus, Philo and Polyhiſtor [e], ancient hiſtorians.

[z] T. Bava Bathra, fol. 15. 1. Seder Olam Rabba, c. 3.
[a] Suidas in voce Ιωβ. [b] Theatrum Terræ S. p 93.
[c] Juchaſin, fol. 9. 2. [d] Schindler. Lexic. Pentaglott. col. 64.
[e] Apud Euſeb. Præpar. Evangel. l. 9. c. 25.

The end of the book of Job

The Book of PSALMS.

THE title of this book may be rendered the book of praiſes or hymns; the pſalm which our Lord ſung at the paſſover, is called an hymn, Matt. xxvi. 30. and the 145th pſalm is intitled תהלה an hymn of David; and the pſalms in general are called hymns by Philo the Jew [a], and ſongs and hymns by Joſephus [b]; and to theſe ſeveral names of this book, the apoſtle manifeſtly refers in Epheſ. v. 19. Col. iii. 16. The Jews divided the writings of the Old Teſtament into three parts: the firſt diviſion is the Law, or five books of Moſes; the ſecond is the Prophets, former and latter; and the third, the hagiographa, or holy writings; to which diviſion Chriſt has a regard in Luke xxiv. 44. and becauſe the book of Pſalms ſtands firſt in the laſt diviſion, the whole goes by its name. This book by the apoſtle Peter is intitled as here, Acts i. 20. the title in the Syriac verſion is, "the Book of the Pſalms of David, "king and prophet," with which agrees the Arabic verſion. As to the divine authority of it, that it was written by inſpiration of God, we have not only the teſtimony of David, who ſays, the Spirit of God ſpake by me, 2 Sam. xxiii. 2. but the teſtimonies of Chriſt and his apoſtles, Matt. xxii. 43. Acts i. 16. and iv. 24, 25. and, as Aben Ezra [c] obſerves, the whole of it was ſpoken ברוח הקודש by the holy Ghoſt. Concerning the penman or amanuenſis, employed by the Spirit of God in writing it, there are different opinions. The Jews make mention of ten, which are differently reckoned by them. According to Jarchi [d], they were Adam, Melchizedek, Abraham, Moſes, David, Solomon, Aſaph, and the three ſons of Korah. According to Kimchi [e], they were Adam, the firſt, Melchizedek, Abraham, Aſaph, Heman, Jeduthun, Moſes, and the three ſons of Korah; Aſir, Elkanah and Abiaſaph. Some aſcribe all the pſalms to David [f], and think that thoſe which are ſaid to be a pſalm of Aſaph, or of Heman, &c. ſhould be rendered, a pſalm to Aſaph, &c. and only ſignify that they were pſalms delivered to them, to be ſung in a public manner. But the trueſt opinion ſeems to be, that the greater part of them were written by David, and for the moſt part thoſe that have no title; and the reſt by thoſe whoſe names they bear. Some were written at and after the Babyloniſh captivity, as Pſalm cxxvi. and cxxxvii. The manner or form in which they were written was metre [g], though ſome deny it, that the Jews had metre; as appears by the different accentuation of them from other writings, and from their being ſung vocally and on muſical inſtruments. Joſephus [h], the Jewiſh hiſtorian, ſays, that "David "being free from war, and enjoying a profound "peace, compoſed ſongs and hymns to God, of "various metre; ſome trimetre, and ſome penta-"metre;" i. e. ſome of three feet, and others of five feet: for the Pſalms of David are thought to be of the lyric kind; and Gomarus in his Lyra has given many inſtances out of them, which are of the iambic, trochaic kind, &c. tho' the Jews for many years have loſt the knowledge of the ſacred poetry. R. Benjamin [i] indeed ſays, that in his time there were at Bagdad, R. Eleazar and his brethren, who knew how to ſing the ſongs, as the ſingers did when the temple was ſtanding. The ſubject-matter of this book is exceeding great and excellent: many of the pſalms reſpect the perſon, offices and grace of Chriſt; his ſufferings and death, reſurrection, aſcenſion and ſeſſion at the right hand of God; and ſo are exceeding ſuitable to the Goſpel-diſpenſation. The whole book is a rich mine of grace and evangelical truths, and a large fund of ſpiritual experience; and is abundantly ſuited to every caſe, ſtate and condition, that the church of Chriſt, or particular believers, are in at any time.

PSALM I.

THIS pſalm, though without a title, may reaſonably be thought to be a pſalm of David; ſince the next pſalm, which is alſo without a title, is aſcribed to him, Acts iv. 25. and ſince both are joined together as one pſalm by the Jews [k]; ſee the note on Acts xiii. 33. and ſince this is the general

[a] De Mutat. Nom. p. 1062. [b] Antiquitat. l. 7. c. 12. ſ. 3. [c] Præfat. in Pſalm. [d] Præfat. in Ibid. [e] Præfat. in Ibid. [f] R. Hona in Midraſh Tillim, fol. 2. 1. [g] Vid. Lowth. de Sacr. Poeſ. Heb. Prælect. 3. ſ. 32, &c. [h] Ut ſupra. [i] Itinerar. p. 70, 71. [k] T. Bab. Beracot, fol. 9. 2.

neral preface to the whole book, which is chiefly of David's penning: it is intitled, in the metaphraſe of Apollinarius, "a ſong of David, the prophet "and king."

℣. 1. Bleſſed is the man, &c.] This pſalm begins in like manner as Chriſt's ſermon on the mount, Matt. v. 2. ſetting forth the praiſes, and expreſſing the happineſs of the man who is deſcribed in this and the following verſe. The words may be rendered, O, the bleſſedneſſes of the man, or of this man [l]; he is doubly bleſſed, a thrice happy and bleſſed man; bleſſed in things temporal and ſpiritual; happy in this world, and in that to come. He is to be praiſed and commended as a good man, ſo the Targum; "the goodneſs, or O, the goodneſs "of the man;" or as others, "O, the right goings "or happy progreſs, or proſperous ſucceſs of the "man [m]," who anſwers to the following characters; which right walking of his is next obſerved, and his proſperity in ℣. 3. Some have interpreted this pſalm of Chriſt, and think it is properly ſpoken of him [n]. That walketh not in the counſel of the ungodly: all men are by nature and practice ungodly, without God, without the true knowledge, fear, and worſhip of God, and are at enmity againſt him. It is a character that belongs to God's elect as well others, whilſt in a ſtate of nature; and is ſometimes uſed to illuſtrate the love of Chriſt in dying for them, and the grace of God in the juſtification of them, Rom. iv. 5. and v. 6. But here it deſcribes not ſuch who are wicked in heart and life in common only, but the reprobate part of mankind, profligate and abandoned ſinners, ſuch as Jude ſpeaks of, ℣. 4. and for whom the law is made, and againſt whom it lies, 1 Tim. i. 9. The word [o] here uſed ſignifies ſuch who are reſtleſs and continually in miſchief; who are like the troubled ſea, which cannot reſt, ever caſting up mire and dirt: they are always diſquieted themſelves, and are ever diſquieting others; nor do they ceaſe from being ſo till they are laid in their graves. And to theſe counſel is aſcribed, which ſuppoſes capacity and wiſdom; as, generally ſpeaking, ſuch are wiſe and prudent in natural and civil things, and are wiſe to do evil, though to do good they have no knowledge: and counſel implies conſultation and deliberation; they act deliberately in ſinning, they caſt about in their minds, form ſchemes, and contrive ways and means how to accompliſh their vicious purpoſes; and ſometimes they enter into a confederacy, and conſult together with one conſent, and their counſel is generally againſt the Lord, though it does not proſper and prevail; and againſt his Chriſt, his people, truths and ordinances: it takes in both their principles and practices; and the ſum of their counſel is to indulge themſelves in ſin, to throw off all religion, and to caſt off the fear and worſhip of God, Job xxi. 14, 15. Now not to walk herein, is not to hearken to their counſel, to give into it, agree with it, purſue it, and act according to it; and happy is the man, who, tho' he may fall in the way of it, and may have bad counſel given him by ungodly men, yet does not conſent to it, take it and act upon it. This may be applied to the times of the Meſſiah, and the men of the age in which he lived; and the rather, ſince the next pſalm, in which mention is made of the counſel of the ungodly, manifeſtly belongs unto them. The men of that generation were a ſet of ungodly men, who conſulted againſt Chriſt to take away his life; and bleſſed is the man, as Joſeph of Arimathea, who, though he was in that aſſembly which conſpired againſt the life of Chriſt, did not walk in, nor conſent unto their counſel and their deeds, Luke xxiii. 51. Nor ſtandeth in the way of ſinners; all men are ſinners thro' Adam's diſobedience, and their own actual tranſgreſſions, and ſuch were the elect of God when Chriſt died for them; and indeed are ſo after converſion, for no man lives without ſin. But here it intends notorious ſinners, who are open, bold and daring in iniquity: the word [p] ſignifies ſuch, who in ſhooting miſs the mark, and go aſide from it, as ſuch ſinners do from the law of God; proceed from evil to evil, chooſe their own ways, and delight in their abominations. Now their way is not only their opinion, as the Syriac verſion renders it, their corrupt ſentiments, but their ſinful courſe of life; which is a way of darkneſs, a crooked path, and a road that leads to deſtruction and death: and happy is the man that does not ſtand in this way, which denotes openneſs, impudence, and continuance; who, tho' he may fall into this way, does not abide in it; ſee Rom. vi. 1, 2. The phariſees in the time of Chriſt, tho' they were not openly and outwardly ſinners, yet they were ſecretly and inwardly ſuch; and the way they ſtood in, was that of juſtification by the works of the law: but happy is the man, as the apoſtle Paul and others, who ſtands not in that way, but in the way Chriſt Jeſus, and in the way of life and righteouſneſs by him. Nor ſitteth in the ſeat of the ſcornful: by whom may be meant proud and haughty perſons, in oppoſition to the humble and lowly, as in Prov. iii. 34. ſuch who are proud of their natural abilities, knowledge and wiſdom, of their honours and riches, or of their own righteouſneſs, and deſpiſe others; or ſuch who are deſperate in wickedneſs, of whom there is no hope; ſee Prov. ix. 7, 8. and deiſts and atheiſts, who ſcoff at divine revelation, and mock at a future ſtate, at death, hell and judgment, as in Iſa. xxviii. 14, 15. 2 Peter iii. 3. Now happy is the man that does not ſit or keep company with ſuch perſons; who comes not into their ſecret and into their aſſembly; does not aſſociate himſelf with them, nor approve of their diſpoſitions, words, principles and actions; ſee Pſalm xxvi. 4, 5. Such were the ſcribes and phariſees in Chriſt's time; they derided him and his doctrines, ſcoffed at him when he hung upon the croſs, and deſpiſed him and his apoſtles, and his goſpel; but there were ſome that did not join with them, to whom he, his miniſters and truths, were precious and in high eſteem, and to whom he was the power and wiſdom of God.

℣. 2. But his delight is in the law of the Lord, &c.] Not the law of nature, which was inſcribed on Adam's heart in innocence, but now greatly impaired by ſin, and become very imperfect and very inſufficient to make men happy, or to lead them to true felicity: nor the law of Moſes, which is a fiery law, and works wrath, accuſes of ſin, pronounces guilty, curſes and condemns to death; and therefore cannot be delighted in by a ſenſible ſinner, unleſs as it is in the hands of Chriſt, and as fulfilled by him, who is the end of it; and as it is written on the heart of a regenerate man, who, ſo far far as it is, delights in it after the inward man, and ſerves it with his ſpirit: but rather the ſcriptures, as much and as many parts of them as were written in David's time; particularly the five books of Moſes, which are called the Law, and the teſtimony of the Lord; which being inſpired by God, were profitable and delightful to read, and to hear explained; and as they were David's delight, and the men of his council, Pſal. cxix. 24. ſo they were the delight of every good man, there being many things in them concerning the Meſſiah, his grace and kingdom; ſee Luke xxiv. 44. Acts xxvi. 22, 23. Moreover the word תורה here uſed, ſignifies doctrine, and may intend the evangelic doctrine, as it does in Pſal. xix. 7. which is a pſalm concerning the doctrine of the apoſtles that went into all the world; and in like ſenſe is the word uſed in Iſa. ii. 3. and xlii. 4. of the doctrine of the Meſſiah, that is, the Goſpel; and is the ſame with the Law, or doctrine of faith, in Rom. iii. 27. And this may be called the doctrine of the Lord, becauſe he is the author of it; it came by him, he revealed it; and becauſe he is the ſubject of it; it is concerning him, his perſon, office, grace and righteouſneſs; and ſo far as it was publiſhed in the times of David, it was a joyful ſound, good news and glad tidings, and the delight of good men. And in his law doth he meditate day and night; as Joſhua was directed to do, and David did, Joſh. i. 8. Pſal. cxix. 97. This is to be underſtood of a diligent reading, and ſerious conſideration of it; and of the employment of the thoughts, and of deep ſtudy upon it, in order to find out the ſenſe and meaning of it; and which is to be done conſtantly, every day, as often as there is leiſure and opportunity for it; or, as Kimchi on the place obſerves, whenever a man is free from the buſineſs of life; unleſs this ſhould be taken figuratively, of the day of proſperity and night of adverſity, whether in things temporal or ſpiritual, which are each of them proper ſeaſons to meditate in, upon the word of God and goſpel of Chriſt.

[l] אשרי האיש beatitudines illius viri, Montanus, Vatablus, Gejerus. [m] Recti inceſſus, felices progreſſus, ac proſperi ſucceſſus, Michaelis; ſo Piſcator. [n] Juſtinian. in Octapl. Pſalt. in loc. Romualdus apud Mabillon. Itinerar. Ital. p. 181. [o] רשעים ſignificat eos qui ſine quiete & indeſinenter impie degunt; Vatablus. [p] חטאים qui longiſſime aberrant a ſcopo legis; Gejerus.

℣. 3. And he ſhall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, &c.] Or, for then ſhall he be, &c. as Alſhech renders the words; and the Hebrew particle vau is often uſed for then[q]. As the preceding verſes deſcribe the man who is bleſſed, this points at his bleſſedneſs, and ſhews and proves him to be an happy man; for he is comparable to a tree; not to a dry tree, or a tree without fruit, or whoſe fruit is withered; but to a fruitful tree, a green and flouriſhing one; to a green olive-tree, or a palm-tree, or a cedar in Lebanon; to which David compares himſelf and the righteous, Pſal. lii. 8. and xcii. 12. and here ſuch an one is compared to a tree planted; not to one that grows of itſelf, a wild tree, a tree of the wood; but to one that is removed from its native place and ſoil, and planted elſewhere; and ſo deſigns ſuch who are broken off of the wild olive-tree, and are grafted into the good olive-tree; who are planted in Chriſt Jeſus, and in the church, the houſe of the Lord; of which tranſplantation, the removal of Iſrael into Canaan's land was an emblem, Pſal. lxxx. 8. and ſuch a ſpiritual plantation is of God the huſbandman; whoſe planting the ſaints are efficiently, Iſai. lx. 21. and lxi. 3. Matt. xv. 13. And it is owing to the word, the engrafted word, which is the means of this engrafture, and to the miniſters of it inſtrumentally; ſome of whom plant, and others water, 1 Cor. iii. 6, 7. Moreover, the happy man before deſcribed is like a tree that is ſituated by the rivers of water, or diviſions[r] and rivulets of water; which running about the plants, make them very fruitful and flouriſhing; ſee Ezek. xxxi. 4. and which may intend the river of the love of God, and the ſtreams of it, the diſcoveries and applications of it to regenerate perſons; and alſo the fulneſs of grace in Chriſt, who is the fountain of gardens, the well of living waters and ſtreams from Lebanon, to revive, refreſh, ſupply and comfort his people; as well as the graces of the Spirit of God, which are near the ſaints, and like rivers of water flow out of them that believe in Chriſt; to which may be added the word and ordinances of the goſpel, which are the ſtill waters, to which they are invited and led, and by which, and with which they are greatly refreſhed, and made fruitful. Arama interprets it of the waters of the law; it is beſt to underſtand it of the goſpel; ſee Iſai. lv. 1. it follows, that bringeth forth his fruit in his ſeaſon; and ſo appears to be a tree of righteouſneſs, filled with the fruits of righteouſneſs, the graces of the Spirit, and good works; which are brought forth by him under the influence of grace, as he has opportunity, and according to the meaſure of grace beſtowed. His leaf alſo ſhall not wither; neither tree, nor fruit, nor leaf ſhall wither, but ſhall be always green; which is expreſſive of the ſaints perſeverance: the reaſons of which are, they are engrafted in Chriſt the true vine, and abide in him, from whom they have their ſap, nouriſhment and fruit; they are rooted and built up in him, and eſtabliſhed in the faith of him; and ſo they hold faſt the profeſſion of it without wavering. And whatſoever he doth ſhall proſper; meaning not ſo much in things temporal, of which Arama interprets it, for in theſe the good man does not always ſucceed, but in things ſpiritual: whatever he does in faith, from love, to the glory of God, and in the name of Chriſt, proſpers; yea, thoſe things in which he is concerned, that are adverſe, and ſeem for the preſent to be againſt him, in the iſſue work for good to him: in ſhort, ſuch a man is bleſſed with grace here, and glory hereafter; and therefore muſt needs be an happy man.

℣. 4. The ungodly are not ſo, &c.] They are not as the good man is; their manner and courſe of life are different; they walk in the counſel of ungodly men, like themſelves, and take counſel againſt the Lord, his anointed, and his people: they ſtand in the way of ſinners, and ſteer their converſation according to the courſe of the world, and ſit in the ſeat of the ſcornful; laugh at divine revelation, lampoon the ſcriptures, deride good men, make a jeſt of religion and a future ſtate: they have no delight in the law of the Lord, they caſt it away from them, and deſpiſe it; and are ſo far from a conſtant meditation on it, that they never read it, nor ſo much as look into it, nor is it ever in their thoughts. They are not like to a tree, as deſcribed in the preceding verſe: if they are like to trees, it is to dry trees, and not green ones, to trees without any ſap, moiſture and verdure, and which are only fit fuel for the fire; to the trees of the wood, to wild olive-trees; to trees on an heath, in a deſert, in parched land, and not to trees by rivers of water, but to trees that have no root, and are without fruit, Jude ℣. 12. And though they may be in a ſeeming proſperous condition for a time, may be in great power, riches and honour, and ſpread themſelves like a green bay-bay-tree; yet ſuddenly they are cut down as the graſs, and wither as the green herb; and even their outward proſperity deſtroys them; ſo that not any thing they have or do in the iſſue proſpers: and therefore they are not bleſſed or happy as the good man is; yea, they are wretched and miſerable, nay curſed; they are curſed now, and will be hereafter: they are curſed in their baſket and ſtore, their bleſſings are curſes to them; the law pronounces them curſed; and they will hear, Go, ye curſed, at the day of judgment. The Vulgate Latin, Septuagint and Arabic verſions, repeat the words not ſo, and read not ſo the ungodly, not ſo; which ſeems to be done for the confirmation of the truth of it; but are like the chaff which the wind driveth away: they are like chaff, which has no root, moiſture, greenneſs, nor fruitfulneſs; they have nothing in them ſolid and ſubſtantial; they are deſtitute of all that is good; are vain and empty; without the knowledge of God and Chriſt; without faith in Chriſt and love to him; and are ſenſual, not having the Spirit, his graces and fruits: they are like chaff for lightneſs, vain in their imaginations, light in their principles, frothy in their words, and unſtable in all their ways: they are never long in any poſition, unſettled, diſquieted, and toſſed to and fro; and there is no peace unto them: they are like chaff, uſeleſs and unprofitable, nothing worth, fit only for everlaſting burnings, which will be their caſe. For when Chriſt will gather his wheat, the righteous, which are of value, into his garner, the heavenly glory, he will burn the chaff, the wicked, with unquenchable fire. They are now like chaff, driven and carried about with every wind of doctrine, with divers and ſtrange doctrines, and entertain every light and airy notion; and are eaſily drawn aſide and carried away by the force of their own luſts, and with every temptation of Satan, who works effectually in them: and particularly, they are like chaff before the wind of terrible judgments and calamities in this life, and of the awful judgment hereafter; when they will be driven away from the preſence of the Lord into everlaſting deſtruction. The metaphor is often uſed in this ſenſe; ſee Job xxi. 17. Iſai. xvii. 13, 14. and xxix. 3. Hoſ. xiii. 3. and denotes the ſecret, ſudden, ſure and eaſy ruin of the ungodly, which comes upon them like a whirlwind, in an inſtant, which they cannot avoid; and they can no more ſtand before God and againſt him, than chaff before the wind. It follows,

[q] Vid. Noldii Concord. Part. Ebr. p. 308.

[r] על פלגי juxta diviſiones: Muſculus, Hammond; ſo Ben Melech.

℣. 5. Therefore the ungodly ſhall not ſtand in the judgment, &c.] Neither in temporal judgment, when God comes forth in a way of wrath and ſore diſpleaſure; for who can ſtand before him when he is angry? what are chaff and ſtubble, thorns and briers, to conſuming fire? nor in the laſt and great day of judgment, ſo the Targum, and Kimchi interpret the words; for that day will burn like an oven the wicked, who will be as ſtubble, and leave neither root nor branch: when the great day of the Lamb's wrath is come, who will be able to ſtand? there will be no ſtanding for the wicked when he appears; they will all ſtand before the judgment-ſeat of Chriſt, to take their trial and hear their ſentence; but they ſhall not ſtand in the ſame place with the righteous, not at Chriſt's right hand, but at his left; they ſhall not ſtand with an holy confidence, with intrepidity, and without ſhame, as the bleſſed man will; they will not ſtand, but fall in judgment; they will not be acquitted and diſcharged, but be condemned to everlaſting puniſhment; and this ſenſe the Targum on the place expreſſes, The ungodly ſhall not be juſtified in the great day; the Vulgate Latin and Septuagint verſions render the words, The ungodly ſhall not riſe again in judgment; from whence ſome have concluded there will be no reſurrection of the wicked: which ſeems to be the ſenſe of Kimchi and other Jewiſh writers; who aſſert that the ſouls of the wicked periſh with their bodies at death, and that the latter riſe not, contrary to Eccleſ. xii. 7. Dan. xii. 2. but that the wicked will riſe may be concluded from the juſtice of God, which requires that the bodies which have ſinned ſhould be puniſhed; and from the general judgment of good and bad, and from the account of the puniſhment of hell, which will be inflicted on the body as well as on the ſoul: beſides, the contrary doctrine is a licentious one, and is calculated to harden wicked men in their ſins, and is directly repugnant to the aſſertions of Chriſt, and the apoſtle Paul, John v. 28, 29. Acts xxiv. 16. nor has it any foundation in this text, even admitting ſuch a verſion; which does not abſolutely affirm that the wicked ſhall not riſe again, but that they ſhall not riſe again in judgment, in the firſt reſurrection, the reſurrection of the juſt, and ſo as to be acquitted and diſcharged, but they ſhall riſe to the reſurrection of damnation. Nor ſinners in the congregation of the righteous; who are made righteous by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt imputed to them, and have a work of grace and holineſs wrought in them; and who under the influence of grace live ſoberly, righteouſly, and godly; theſe are the ſame with the bleſſed man, ℣. 1. and who at the day of judgment will be perfectly holy, and free from all ſin; and they will be all gathered together by the holy angels; the dead ſaints will be raiſed, the living ones will be changed, and both will be caught up together to meet the Lord in the air, and will make up one general aſſembly and church of the firſt-born; and among theſe, and in this aſſembly, there will not be a ſingle ſinner; there are now ſinners in Zion, fooliſh virgins with the wiſe, chaff and tares among Chriſt's wheat, and wolves and goats among his ſheep; but then there will be an eternal ſeparation, and no mixing together any more.

℣. 6. For the Lord knoweth the way of the righteous, &c.] The way in which he walks by faith, which is in Jeſus Chriſt; the way in which he goes to the Father, and carries to him his ſacrifices of prayer and praiſe, which meet with acceptance through him; the way in which he ſeeks for and expects juſtification, pardon, and ſalvation, namely, through the blood, righteouſneſs, and ſacrifice of Chriſt: and alſo it may denote his courſe, his walk and converſation; for the righteous man is a follower of God, he takes up the croſs and copies after Chriſt; he walks not after the fleſh but after the Spirit, according to the rule of the word, and as becomes the goſpel of Chriſt: and this way of his in every ſenſe the Lord knows; not merely as he is omniſcient, for by his omniſcience his eyes are upon the ways of all men; he knows the way of the wicked as well as the way of the righteous; but the ſenſe is, that the Lord approves of and is well pleaſed with his way of faith and holineſs; he knows his perſon, ſo as to love him and take delight and pleaſure in him; his countenance beholds him with a ſmile; he is well pleaſed with him in Chriſt and for his ſake, on whoſe account he has reſpect to him and to his offerings, to his ſervice and duty, to his ways and works; and hence he is a bleſſed man, is in a happy ſituation, and all he does proſpers, for he and his ways pleaſe the Lord:

and

and hence alſo it is, that neither he nor his way ſhall periſh; the way he is in leads to everlaſting life, and he being a follower of the Lord in a way pleaſing to him, he ſhall never periſh, but have eternal life. But the way of the ungodly ſhall periſh; for his way is a wicked way, the way of ſinners, ℣. 1. it leads to deſtruction and death, and all that walk in it ſhall periſh; for it is a way the Lord knows not, does not approve of, he abhors it; wherefore the man that continues in it will be unhappy, wretched and miſerable to all eternity. Theſe laſt words therefore ſhew the reaſon of the happineſs of one ſort of men, and the unhappineſs of the other; and prove and confirm the ſame: the Lord knows, approves of, loves and delights in the one; he does not approve of and delight in the other.

PSALM II.

THIS pſalm is the ſecond in order, and ſo it is called in Acts xiii. 33. which ſhews that the book of pſalms was in the ſame form in the apoſtles days as now, and as it ever had been; and tho' it is without a title, yet certain it is, that it is a pſalm of David, ſince the twelve apoſtles of Chriſt with one voice aſcribe it to him, in which no doubt they ſpoke the generally received ſenſe of the Jewiſh nation, Acts iv. 24, 25. and the Meſſiah is the ſubject of it; and that it is a prophecy concerning him, his perſon, office and kingdom, appears from the expreſs mention of the Lord's anointed, or Meſſiah, in it; from his being ſet as king over Zion, notwithſtanding the oppoſition made againſt him; from the perſon ſpoken of being called the Son of God, and that in ſuch ſenſe as angels and men are not, and therefore cannot belong to any creature; and from his having ſo large an inheritance, and ſuch power over the heathen; and from the reverence, ſervice, and obedience due to him from the kings and judges of the earth; and from the truſt and confidence which is to be put in him, which ought not to be placed but in a divine perſon; and more eſpecially this appears from ſeveral paſſages cited out of it in the New Teſtament and applied to the Meſſiah, Acts iv. 25, 26, 27. and xiii. 33. Heb. i. 5. and v. 5. to which may be added, that the ancient Jewiſh doctors interpreted this pſalm of the Meſſiah [s]; and ſome of the modern ones own that it may be underſtood either of David or of the Meſſiah, and that ſome things are clearer of the Meſſiah than of David [t]; and ſome particular paſſages in it are applied to him both by ancient and later writers among the Jews, as ℣. 1, 2. Why do the heathen rage, &c. [u] ℣. 6. I have ſet, &c. [w] ℣. 7. I will declare the decree, &c. [x]. and ℣. 8. Aſk of me, &c. [y] and we may very ſafely interpret the whole of him.

℣. 1. Why do the heathen rage, &c.] Or the nations; which ſome underſtand of the Jews, who are ſo called, Gen. xvii. 5. Ezek. ii. 2. becauſe of their ſeveral tribes; and of their rage againſt the Meſſiah, there have been many inſtances; as when they gnaſhed upon him with their teeth, and at ſeveral times took up ſtones to ſtone him, and cried out in a moſt furious and wrathful manner, Crucify him, crucify him, Luke iv. 28, 29. John viii. 59. and x. 31. and xix. 6, 15. though it is beſt to interpret it of the Gentiles, as the apoſtles ſeem to do in Acts iv. 27. The Hebrew word tranſlated rage is by one Jewiſh writer [z] explained by חברו aſſociate or meet together; and which is often the ſenſe of the word in the Syriac and Chaldee languages, in which it is more uſed; and another [a] ſays, that it is expreſſive of gathering together, and of a multitude; it intends a tumultuous gathering together, as is that of a mob, with great confuſion and noiſe [b]; and ſo the Gentiles, the Roman ſoldiers, gathered together, even multitudes of them, and came out with Judas at the head of them, with ſwords and ſtaves to apprehend Chriſt and bring him to the chief prieſts and elders; theſe aſſembled together in Pilate's hall, when Chriſt was condemned to be crucified, and inſulted him in a moſt rude and ſhocking manner; and many are the inſtances of the Gentiles riſing in mobs, and appearing in riotous aſſemblies, making tumults and uproars againſt the apoſtles to oppoſe them, and the ſpread of the goſpel by them; to which they were ſometimes inſtigated by the unbelieving Jews, and ſometimes by their own worldly intereſt; ſee Acts xiii. 50. and xiv. 5, 19. and xvii. 5, 6. and xix. 23—32. to which may be added, as inſtances of this tumult and rage, the violent perſecutions both of the Pagan emperors and of the Papiſts, which laſt are called Gentiles as well as the other; for this reſpects the kingdom of Chriſt, or the goſpel-diſpenſation, from the beginning to the end. And the people imagine a vain thing? by the people are meant the people of Iſrael, who were once God's peculiar people, and who were diſtinguiſhed by him with peculiar favours above all others, and in whom this prophecy has been remarkably fulfilled; they imagined and meditated a vain thing when they thought the Meſſiah would be a temporal king, and ſet up a kingdom on earth in great worldly ſplendor and glory, and rejected Jeſus, the true Meſſiah, becauſe he did not anſwer to theſe their carnal imaginations; they meditated a vain thing, when they ſought to take away the good name and reputation of Chriſt, by fixing opprobrious names and injurious charges upon him, for wiſdom has been juſtified of her children; and ſo they did when they meditated his death, with thoſe vain hopes that he ſhould die and his name periſh, and ſhould lie down in the grave and never riſe more, Pſalm xli. 5, 6, 8. for he not only roſe from the dead, but his name was more famous after his death than before; they imagined a vain thing when they took ſo much precaution to prevent the diſciples ſtealing his body out of the ſepulchre, and giving out that he was riſen from the dead, and more eſpecially when he was riſen, to hire the ſoldiers to tell a lie in order to ſtifle and diſcredit the report of it; they meditated vain things when they attempted to oppoſe the apoſtles and hinder the preaching of the goſpel by them, which they often did, as the Acts of the Apoſtles teſtify; and it was after one of theſe attempts that the apoſtles, in their addreſs to God, made made uſe of this very paſſage of ſcripture, Acts iv. 2, 3, 17, 18, 24, 25. and they ſtill meditate a vain thing in that they imagine Jeſus of Nazareth is not the Meſſiah, and that the Meſſiah is not yet come; and in that they are expecting and looking for him. Now the pſalmiſt, or the holy Ghoſt by him, aſks why all this? what ſhould move the Gentiles and the Jews to ſo much rage, tumult, and oppoſition againſt an holy and innocent perſon, and who went about doing good as he did? what end they could have in it, or ſerve by it? and how they could expect to ſucceed? what would all their rage and riot, and vain imagination ſignify? it is ſtrongly ſuggeſted hereby that it would all be in vain and to no purpoſe, as well as what follows.

[s] Jarchi in loc. [t] Kimchi in v. 12. & Aben Ezra in v. 6. 12. [u] T. Bab. Avodah Zarah, fol. 3. 2. Pirke Eliezar, c. 19. [w] R. Saadiah Gaon in Dan. vii. 13. [x] Yalkut Simeoni, par. 2. fol. 90. 2. Zohar in Num. fol. 82. 2. Maimon. in Miſn. Sanhedrim, c. 11. 1. & Abarbinel. Maſhmiah Jeſhuah, fol. 37. 4. & 38. 1. [y] T. Bab. Succah, fol. 52. 1. & Bereſhit Rabba, ſ. 44. fol. 38. 4. [z] Aben Ezra in loc. [a] R. Sol. Ben Melech in loc. [b] רגשו congregrant ſe turmatim, Vatablus; cum tumultu, Munſter, Tigurine verſion.

℣. 2. The kings of the earth ſet themſelves, &c.] Roſe and ſtood up in great wrath and fury, and preſented themſelves in an hoſtile manner, and oppoſed the Meſſiah: as Herod the great, king of Judea, who very early beſtirred himſelf, and ſought to take away the life of Jeſus in his infancy; and Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee, who is called a king, Mark vi. 14. who with his men of war mocked him, and ſet him at nought; and Pontius Pilate, the governor of Judea, who repreſented the Roman emperor, and condemned him to death; and all the kings of the earth ever ſince, who ever perſecuted Chriſt in his members, and have ſet themſelves with all their might to hinder the ſpread of his goſpel and the enlargement of his intereſt. And the rulers take counſel together; as did the Jewiſh Sanhedrim, the great court of judicature among the Jews, the members of which were the rulers of the people, who frequently met together and conſulted to take away the life of Chriſt: tho' it may alſo include all other governors and magiſtrates who have entred into ſchemes againſt the Lord, and againſt his Anointed, or Meſſiah, Chriſt: by the Lord, or Jehovah, which is the great, the glorious, and incommunicable name of God, and is expreſſive of his eternal being and ſelf-exiſtence, and of his being the fountain of eſſence to all creatures, is meant God the Father; ſince he is diſtinguiſhed from his Son, the Meſſiah, his anointed One, as Meſſiah and Chriſt ſignify; and who is ſo called, becauſe he is anointed by God with the holy Ghoſt, without meaſure, to the office of the Mediator, Prophet, Prieſt, and King; from whom the ſaints receive the anointing, which teacheth all things, and every grace of the Spirit in meaſure; and who, after his name, are called Chriſtians. This name of the promiſed Redeemer was well known among the Jews, John i. 41. and iv. 25. and which they took from this paſſage, and from ſome others.

℣. 3. Let us break their bands aſunder, &c.] Theſe are not the words of the apoſtles, nor of the ſaints in goſpel-times, encouraging one another, notwithſtanding the rage and oppoſition of Jews and Gentiles againſt their Maſter and his intereſt, to break aſunder the bands of wickedneſs, the idolatrous cuſtoms and practices of the heathens, and to throw off the inſupportable yoke of bondage, of Jewiſh traditions and ceremonies; but of the heathen, the people, and kings of the earth, and rulers, who with one voice ſay this and what follows, and caſt away their cords from us; with relation to the Lord and his Anointed, whoſe laws, ordinances and truths, they call bands and cords; ſo Arama interprets them of the law, and the commandments; or a yoke, as the Vulgate Latin, Septuagint, Syriac, Arabic and Ethiopic verſions render the laſt word; and the phraſes in general expreſs their irreverence of God and the Meſſiah, their rejection of Chriſt and his religion; their non-ſubjection to him, and their refuſal to have him to rule over them; and their diſeſteem and contempt of his goſpel, and of the ordinances of it, and of the laws and rules of his government in his churches: and alſo they ſhew the wrong notion that carnal men have of theſe things; that whereas Chriſt's yoke is eaſy, and his burden light; his goſpel and the truths of it make men free from the ſlavery of ſin and Satan, and from a ſpirit of bondage; and true goſpel-liberty conſiſts in an obſervance of his commands and ordinances; yet they look upon theſe things as bands and cords, as fetters and ſhackles, as ſo many reſtraints upon their liberty, which are not to be bore: when, on the other hand, they promiſe themſelves liberty in a diſengagement from them, and in the enjoyment of their own luſts and ſinful pleaſures; whereas thereby they are brought into bondage, and become the ſervants of corruption. Some render it caſt away— from him [c]; either from Chriſt, or every one from himſelf.

℣. 4. He that ſitteth in the heavens ſhall laugh, &c.] At the rage and tumult of the heathen; at the vain imaginations of the people; at the oppoſition of the kings of the earth; at the mad counſel of the rulers, againſt him and his Meſſiah; and at their propoſal to one another to throw off the yoke and government of them both. This is a periphraſis of God, who dwells in the heavens, and ſits there enthroned; though he is not included and comprehended in them, but is every where; and his being there is mentioned in oppoſition to the kings of the earth, and the people in it; and to ſhew the vaſt diſtance there is between them, and how they are as nothing to him, Iſai. xl. 15, 17, 22. Job iv. 18. and how vain and fruitleſs their attempts muſt be againſt him and his Meſſiah: and his ſitting there ſtill and quiet, ſerene and undiſturbed, is oppoſed to the running to and fro, and the tumultuous and riotous aſſembling of the heathen. Laughing is aſcribed unto him, according to the language of men, as the Jewiſh writers ſpeak [d], by an anthropopathy; in the ſame ſenſe as he is ſaid to repent and grieve, Gen. vi. 6. and expreſſes his ſecurity from all their attempts, Job v. 22. and xli. 29. and the contempt he has them in, and the certain puniſhment of them, and the aggravation of it; who will not only then laugh at them himſelf, but expoſe them to the laughter and ſcorn of others, Prov. i. 26. The Lord ſhall have them in deriſion; which is a repetition of the ſame thing in other words; and is made partly to ſhew the certainty of their diſappointment and ruin, and partly to explain who is meant by him that ſits in the heavens. The Targum calls him, The Word of the Lord; and Alſhech interprets it of the Shekinah.

℣. 5. Then ſhall he ſpeak unto them in his wrath, &c.] Or, and he ſhall ſpeak to them; ſo Noldius: that is, the Lord that ſits in the heavens, and laughs, and has the heathen, the people, the kings and rulers in deriſion, ſhall not only ſilently deſpiſe their furious and concerted oppoſition to him and his Meſſiah, but ſhall at laſt ſpeak out unto them, not in his word, but in his providences; and not in love, as to his own people, when he chaſtiſes them, but in great wrath, inflicting ſevere and juſt puniſhment. It ſeems to refer to the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, after the crucifixion, ſufferings, death, reſurrection, and aſcenſion of Chriſt; and after the pouring out of the Spirit, and and when the goſpel, to their great mortification, had got ground, and made large advances in the Gentile world. And vex them in his ſore diſpleaſure; or in the heat of his anger [e]: ſee Deut. xxix. 24. where the holy Ghoſt ſpeaks of the ſame people, and of the ſame ruin and deſtruction of them at the ſame time, as here: and as the carrying of the Jews captive into Babylon, is called their vexation, Iſai. ix. 1. much more may their deſtruction by the Romans; then it was they howled for vexation of ſpirit, Iſai. lxv. 14. the wrath of God came upon them to the uttermoſt; they were filled with trouble and confuſion, with terror and conſternation, as the word [f] uſed ſignifies; they were vexed to ſee themſelves ſtraitned and pent in on every ſide by the Roman armies, oppreſſed with famine and inteſtine diviſions, rapine and murder; to ſee their temple profaned and burnt, their city plundered and deſtroyed, and themſelves taken and carried captive: and what moſt of all vexed them was, that their attempts againſt Jeſus of Nazareth, the true Meſſiah, were fruitleſs; and that notwithſtanding all their oppoſition to him, his name was famous, his intereſt increaſed, his kingdom was enlarged, through the ſpread of his goſpel among the Gentiles; and what Jehovah in the next verſe ſays, though it is to the comfort of his people, was to their terror and vexation.

[c] ממנו a nobis, ſive ab illo, Nebienſis.

[d] Kimchi, Aben Ezra, & R. Sol. Ben Melech in loc.

℣. 6. Yet have I ſet my King upon my holy hill of Zion.] Or, behold, I have ſet, &c. ſo Noldius. By Zion is meant the church of God, eſpecially under the goſpel-diſpenſation; ſee Heb. xii. 22. Rev. xiv. 1. ſo called, becauſe, as Zion was, it is the object of God's love and choice, the place of his habitation and reſidence; where divine worſhip is obſerved, and the word and ordinances of God adminiſtred; and where the Lord diſtributes his bleſſings of grace; and which is the perfection of beauty, through Chriſt's comelineſs put upon her; and will be the joy of the whole earth: it is ſtrongly fortified by the power and grace of God, and is immoveable and impregnable, being built on Chriſt the rock of ages; and, like Zion, it is an high hill, eminent and viſible; and more eſpecially will be ſo, when the mountain of the Lord's houſe is eſtabliſhed upon the tops of the mountains: and it is an holy one, through the preſence and worſhip of God in it, and the ſanctification of his Spirit. And over this hill, the church, Chriſt is king; he is king of ſaints, and is acknowledged by them; and it is for their great ſafety and ſecurity, their joy, comfort and happineſs, that he is ſet over them: he is called by his Father, my King, becauſe he who is king of Zion is his Anointed, as in ℣. 2. and his Son, his begotten Son, as in ℣. 7. his firſt-born, his fellow and equal; and becauſe he is his as king; not that he is king over him, for his Father is greater than he, as man and mediator, or with reſpect to his office-capacity, in which he is to be conſidered as king; and therefore he is rather king under him: but he is a king of his ſetting up, and therefore called his; he has appointed him his kingdom, given him the throne of his father David; put a crown of pure gold on his head, and crowned him with glory and honour, and the ſcepter of righteouſneſs in his hand, and has given him a name above every name. He did not make himſelf a king, nor was he made ſo by men; but he was ſet up, or anointed by God the father, as the word [g] here uſed ſignifies; and may refer either to the inauguration of Chriſt into his kingly office, and his inveſtiture with it from all eternity, as in Prov. viii. 23. where the ſame word is uſed as here; and anointing with oil being a ceremony performed at the inſtallment of kings into their office, the phraſe is uſed for the thing itſelf: or rather, ſince Chriſt was anointed with the holy Ghoſt in the human nature, at his incarnation and baptiſm, and eſpecially at the time of his aſcenſion, when he was made or declared to be LORD and CHRIST; this may refer to the time when he, as the aſcended Lord and King, gave gifts to men, to his apoſtles, and qualified them in an extraordinary manner to carry his goſpel into the Gentile world, and ſpread it there, as they did with ſucceſs; whereby his kingdom became more viſible and glorious, to the great vexation of the Jews; for, maugre all their oppoſition, Chriſt being ſet by his father king over his church and people, continued ſo, and his kingdom was every day more and more enlarged, to their great mortification.

℣. 7. I will declare the decree, &c.] Theſe are the words of Jehovah's anointed and king, exerciſing his kingly office, according to the decree and commandment of the Father: for theſe words refer not to the following, concerning the generation of the Son, which does not depend on the decree and arbitrary will of God, but is from his nature; but theſe words relate to what go before. The Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, and Oriental verſions place this clauſe at the end of the preceding verſe; ſome render it, declaring his commandment, or the commandment of the Lord; the laws that he would have obſerved, both by him and by the ſubjects of his kingdom. The Syriac and Arabic verſions, that he might declare the commandment of the Lord; as if this was the end of his being appointed King. The word חק is differently rendered; by many, the decree, the purpoſe of God concerning Chriſt as mediator, and the ſalvation of his people by him; and who ſo fit to declare this, as he who lay in the boſom of the Father, and was privy to all his ſecret thoughts and deſigns, and in whom the eternal purpoſe was purpoſed? John i. 18. Epheſ. iii. 11. The Chaldee paraphraſe renders it by קימא the covenant, the everlaſting covenant of grace; and who ſo proper to declare this, as he with whom the covenant was made? and who is the covenant itſelf, in whom all the bleſſings and promiſes of it are, and the meſſenger of it? Mal. iii. 1. It may not be unfitly applied to the goſpel, which is the ſum and ſubſtance of both the decree and covenant of God; it is what was ordained before the world for our glory. This Chriſt was appointed to preach, and did declare it in the great congregation; the ſame with the counſel of God, Acts xx. 27. The words will bear to be rendered, I will declare אל חק to the command [h]; or according to the order and rule preſcribed by Jehovah, without adding to it or taking from it; agreeable to which he executed his office as King, and Prophet alſo. The doctrine was not his own, but his Father's he preached; he ſpake not of himſelf, but as he taught and enjoined him; the Father gave him commandment what he ſhould ſay and ſpeak, ſpeak, John xii. 49. and he kept cloſe to it, as he here ſays he would: and he ruled in his name, and by his authority, according to the law of his office; and which might be depended upon from the dignity of his perſon, which qualified him both for his kingly and prophetic offices, expreſſed in the following words: The Lord hath ſaid unto me, Thou art my Son; not by creation, as angels and men; nor by adoption, as ſaints; nor by office, as civil magiſtrates; nor on account of his incarnation or reſurrection; nor becauſe of the great love of God unto him; but in ſuch a way of filiation, as cannot be ſaid of any creature nor of any other, Heb. i. 5. He is the true, proper, natural and eternal Son of God, and as ſuch declared, owned, and acknowledged by Jehovah the Father, as in theſe words; the foundation of which relation lies in what follows: This day have I begotten thee; which act of begetting refers not to the nature, nor to the office, but the perſon of Chriſt; not to his nature, not to his divine nature, which is common with the Father and Spirit; wherefore if his was begotten, theirs muſt be alſo: much leſs to his human nature, in which he is never ſaid to be begotten, but always to be made, and with reſpect to which he is without father: nor to his office as mediator, in which he is not a ſon but a ſervant; beſides, he was a Son previous to his being Prophet, Prieſt and King; and his office is not the foundation of his ſonſhip, but his ſonſhip is the foundation of his office; or by which that is ſupported, and which fits him for the performance of it: but it has reſpect to his perſon; for, as in human generation, perſon begets perſon, and like begets like, ſo in divine generation; but care muſt be taken to remove all imperfection from it, ſuch as diviſibility and multiplication of eſſence, priority and poſteriority, dependence, and the like: nor can the modus or manner of it be conceived or explained by us. The date of it, to day, deſigns eternity, as in Iſai. xliii. 13. which is one continued day, an everlaſting now. And this may be applied to any time and caſe in which Chriſt is declared to be the Son of God; as at his incarnation, his baptiſm, and transfiguration upon the mount, and his reſurrection from the dead, as it is in Acts xiii. 33. becauſe then he was declared to be the Son of God with power, Rom. i. 4. and to his aſcenſion into heaven, where he was made Lord and Chriſt, and his divine Sonſhip more manifeſtly appeared; which ſeems to be the time and caſe more eſpecially referred to here, if it be compared with Heb. i. 3, 4, 5.

[e] בחרונו in æſtu iræ ſuæ, Junius & Tremellius. [f] יבהלמו conturbabit, V. L. Vatablus, Gejerus; ſo Muſculus, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator; terrebit, Pagninus, Montanus; ſo Cocceius, Michaelis; ſee Ainſworth. [g] נסכתי χρισα, Symmachus; unxi, Muſculus, Vatablus, Ainſworth, Piſcator, Muis, Cocceius; ego inungens, Junius & Tremellius; inunxi, Michaelis. [h] אל חוק Heb. ad decretum, Michaelis, Piſcator; juxta vel ſecundum ſtatutum, Muſculus, Gejerus; præſcriptum & modum certum, Cocceius.

℣. 8. Aſk of me, &c.] Jehovah is either here again introduced ſpeaking, or theſe words are a continuation of the Son's account of what his Father ſaid unto him; which do not ſuppoſe any ſuperiority in the one, or inferiority in the other; but are only expreſſive of the Father's great reſpect and affection for his Son, as ſuch a way of ſpeaking among men ſhews, Eſther v. 3. Matt. xiv. 7. and of the great intereſt the Son had in his Father, who could aſk nothing but he had it; and ſhews the perfect harmony, agreement, and unity between them; ſee 1 Kings iii. 5. Chriſt, in the council and covenant of grace and peace, aſked many things of his Father, which were granted; he aſked for the perſons of all the elect to be his bride and ſpouſe, and his heart's deſire was given him, and the requeſt of his lips was not withheld from him: he aſked for all the bleſſings of grace for them; for ſpiritual life here, and eternal life hereafter; and all were given him, and put into his hands for them, Pſal. xx. 2, 3, 4. and here it is promiſed him, And I ſhall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermoſt parts of the earth for thy poſſeſſion; by the heathen, and the uttermoſt parts of the earth, are meant God's elect among the Gentiles, and who live in the diſtant parts of the world; which are Chriſt's other ſheep, the Father has given to him as his portion, and whom he has made his care and charge: as if it was not enough that he ſhould be King of Zion, or have the government over his choſen ones among the Jews, he commits into his hands the Gentiles alſo; ſee Iſai. xlix. 6. and theſe are given him as his inheritance and poſſeſſion, as his portion, to be enjoyed by him; and who eſteems them as ſuch, and reckons them a goodly heritage, and a peculiar treaſure, his jewels, and the apple of his eye. Theſe words reſpect the calling of the Gentiles under the goſpel-diſpenſation; and the amplitude of Chriſt's kingdom in all the earth, which ſhall be from ſea to ſea, and from the rivers to the ends of the earth.

℣. 9. Thou ſhalt break them with a rod of iron, &c.] Not his inheritance and poſſeſſion among the Gentiles, the choſen ones given him by the Father; theſe he delights in, takes care of, protects and preſerves: but the ſtubborn and rebellious ones among the heathen, and in the ſeveral parts of the world, who will not have him to reign over them; who treat his perſon with contempt, reject his government, diſobey his goſpel, and deſpiſe his commands; towards theſe Chriſt will uſe ſeverity, and will exert his power and break them in pieces. The Vulgate Latin, Septuagint, Syriac, Arabic and Ethiopic verſions render it, ſhall feed or rule them; and ſo it is cited in Rev. ii. 27. and xii. 5. and xix. 15. and applied to Chriſt, the Word of God, and King of kings; and muſt be underſtood as it is in thoſe places, of the ſeverity of his government over them, of the ſtrictneſs of his juſtice, without the leaſt diſplay of mercy; and then the ſenſe is the ſame with thoſe verſions which render it, ſhalt break them; as the word uſed is interpreted by the Targum, and the Jewiſh commentators on the place; and which is confirmed by what follows: Thou ſhalt daſh them in pieces like a potter's veſſel; which is very eaſily done with a bar of iron; and when it is done, the pieces can never be put together again: ſo that by the metaphor is ſignified, the eaſy and irreparable ruin of the wicked; ſee Iſa. xxx. 14. Jer. xix. 11. The word ſignifies that they ſhould be ſo crumbled into duſt, that they ſhould be ſcattered about as with the wind; which, ſo far as it relates to the Jews, was fulfilled in their deſtruction by the Romans, and will have its accompliſhment in the antichriſtian nations at the latter day; ſee Rev. ii. 26, 27.

℣. 10. Be wiſe now therefore, O ye kings, &c.] This addreſs is made not ſo much to the kings of the earth in David's time, as to thoſe who would be under the goſpel-diſpenſation, and times of the Meſſiah; and particularly who would riſe up, and ſet themſelves againſt the Lord and his anointed, ℣. 2. and with theſe are to be underſtood their ſubjects: for if they are to ſerve the Lord, and be ſubject to Chriſt, then much more thoſe that are under them; and they are rather ſpoken to particularly, becauſe their examples have great influence on thoſe over whom they rule, whether for good or evil. Theſe are exhorted to be wiſe, or to act the wiſe part; for great men are not always wiſe; wiſdom, riches and honour, do not always go together; men may be in high places, and yet be of low underſtandings; however they do not always always act wiſely, and particularly thoſe kings did not, when they roſe up and ſet themſelves againſt the Lord and his Meſſiah; ſince ſuch oppoſition muſt be fruitleſs, nor is there any counſel againſt the Lord. And we learn from the connexion of theſe words with the following, that the trueſt wiſdom in kings and people, is to fear God; be ſubject to Chriſt, and truſt in him. The words are an inference from what goes before; therefore, ſince Chriſt is ſet as King over Zion, and he is no other than the Son of God, and who has a power over all fleſh; one part of the world is his inheritance and poſſeſſion, and the other part he will in a little time break and daſh to pieces; wherefore now, under the goſpel-diſpenſation, while it is to day, and now is the accepted time and day of ſalvation, before the blow is given; act the wiſe part and leave off oppoſing, and become ſubject to ſo great and powerful a King. Be inſtructed, ye judges of the earth; who are under kings, being appointed by them to hear cauſes and miniſter juſtice; they anſwer to the Sanhedrim of the Jews; to the rulers in ℣. 2. Theſe are exhorted to receive inſtructions, not in things political and civil, they may be well acquainted with; but in things religious and evangelical, in the worſhip of God, in the goſpel of Chriſt, and in his ordinances; for perſons in ſuch poſts ſhould not be above inſtruction in theſe things. The word may be rendered, be ye chaſtiſed or corrected [i]; that is, ſuffer reproof, correction and chaſtiſement at the hand of God, whether by words or deeds; ſubmit to it patiently, and receive inſtruction from it: for God ſometimes reproves kings and princes of the earth, on account of their ſins, and for the ſake of his people, when they ſhould learn righteouſneſs; ſee Pſal. cv. 14, 15. Iſa. xxvi. 9.

℣. 11. Serve the Lord with fear, &c.] Not the creature, neither more, nor beſides, nor with the creator; God and mammon cannot both be ſerved; nor any fictitious and nominal deities, the idols of the Gentiles, who are not gods by nature; but the true Jehovah, the one and only Lord God, he only is to be worſhipped and ſerved, even Father, Son, and Spirit. Here it may be underſtood either of the Lord Chriſt, the Son of God, who is to be ſerved by the kings and judges of the earth, he being King of kings, and Lord of lords; or rather of Jehovah the Father, ſince the Son ſeems to be diſtinguiſhed from him in the next verſe: and the ſervice theſe perſons are called unto lies not in the diſcharge of any office in the church, as in preaching the word, which is ſerving God in the goſpel of his Son; and hence the miniſters of the word are eminently called the ſervants of the moſt high God; for kings and judges are not required hereby to lay aſide their crowns and ſceptres, and leave their ſeats of juſtice, and become preachers of the goſpel; but in acting according to the will of God revealed in his word, and in the whole worſhip of him both internal and external: and this is to be done with fear, not with fear of man, nor with ſervile fear of God, but with a godly and filial fear, with a reverential affection for him, and in a way agreeable to his mind and will; with reverence and awe of him, without levity, careleſſneſs, and negligence. And rejoice with trembling; ſome reference may be had to the joy in public worſhip, as at ſacrifices and feſtivals, and the muſic in divine ſervice under the law; and the ſinging of pſalms and hymns and ſpiritual ſongs under the goſpel; and eſpecially to the goſpel-diſpenſation itſelf, which is a time of joy and rejoicing; the goſpel is good tidings of great joy; the kingdom of God is not in things external, but in joy in the holy Ghoſt; and above all, reſpect is had to a rejoicing in Chriſt Jeſus, in his perſon, righteouſneſs, and ſalvation: and which is conſiſtent with trembling; not with a fearful looking for of judgment, but with modeſty and humility; in which ſenſe this word, when joined with fear as here, is uſed, Phil. ii. 12. and ſtands oppoſed to pride, haughtineſs and arrogance; men ſhould ſo rejoice in Chriſt as to have no confidence in the fleſh, or aſſume any degree of glory to themſelves, or have any rejoicing in themſelves, but wholly in Chriſt, giving all the glory of what they have to him.

℣. 12. Kiſs the ſon, &c.] The Son of God ſpoken of in ℣. 7. the word uſed is ſo rendered in Prov. xxxi. 2. and comes from another which ſignifies to chooſe, and to puriſy, or to be pure; hence ſome render it the elect or choſen one, or the pure one [k]; and both agree with Chriſt, who is God's elect, choſen to be the Redeemer and Saviour of his people, and who is pure and free from ſin, original and actual. And whereas a kiſs is a token of love among friends and relations, at meeting and parting, Gen. xxxiii. 11. Ruth i. 14. it may here deſign the love and affection that is to be expreſſed to Chriſt, who is a moſt lovely object, and to be loved above all creatures and things; or as it ſometimes ſignifies, homage and ſubjection, 1 Sam. x. 1. and it is the cuſtom of the Indians to this day for ſubjects to kiſs their kings: it may here alſo denote the ſubjection of the kings and judges and others to Chriſt, who is Lord of all; or elſe, as it has been uſed in token of adoration and worſhip, Job xxxi. 26, 27. Hoſ. xiii. 2. it may deſign the worſhip which is due to him from all ranks of creatures, angels and men, Heb. i. 6. and the honour which is to be given to him, as to the Father, John v. 22. which ſhows the greatneſs and dignity of his perſon, and that he is the true God and eternal life: in the Talmud [l] this is interpreted of the law, where it is ſaid, "there is "no בר but the law, according to Pſal. ii. 12." which agrees with the Septuagint verſion. Leſt he be angry; for though he is a Lamb, he has wrath in him, and when the great day of his wrath comes in any form on earth, there is no ſtanding before him; and how much leſs when he ſhall appear as the lion of the tribe of Judah, and ſhall be revealed from heaven in flaming fire; then kings and freemen will call to the rocks to fall upon them, and hide them from him. And ye periſh from the way; the Syriac verſion renders it from his way, the Son's way; and the Septuagint and Vulgate Latin verſions from the righteous way; and the Arabic verſion from the way of righteouſneſs; or as to the way, as others [m], the good way; all to one ſenſe; meaning that way of righteouſneſs, ſalvation and eternal life by Jeſus Chriſt, which being miſſed by perſons, they are eternally loſt and undone: ſome render it becauſe of the way [n]; that is, becauſe of their ſinful courſe of life; for the way of the ungodly ſhall periſh itſelf, and therefore they that purſue it ſhall periſh alſo: others render it in the way [o]; and then the ſenſe is, leſt they periſh in the midſt of their courſe of ſin, in their own evil way, they have choſen and delighted ed in, or to uſe the words of Chriſt, die in their ſins, and everlaſtingly periſh; for this periſhing is to be underſtood not of corporal death, in which ſenſe righteous men periſh, but of everlaſting deſtruction: or the word which is rendered from the way, may be tranſlated ſuddenly [p], immediately, or ſtraightway, and our Engliſh word directly is almoſt the ſame; and ſo may deſign the ſwift and ſudden deſtruction of ſuch perſons who provoke the Son to wrath and anger; which ſenſe is confirmed by what follows. When his wrath is kindled but a little; either to a ſmall degree, or but for a little while; for the leaſt degree and duration of it are intolerable, and who then can dwell in everlaſting burnings, or abide the devouring flames? or when it is kindled פתאום ſuddenly [q], in a moment, as Jarchi interprets it; and ſo ſudden wrath brings ſudden deſtruction. Bleſſed are all they that put their truſt in him; not in horſes and chariots, in riches and honours, in their own wiſdom, ſtrength and righteouſneſs; but in the Son of God, the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and who is truly and properly God; or otherwiſe faith and truſt would not be required to be put in him: and happy are thoſe who betake themſelves to him as to their ſtrong-hold and place of defence; who look to him and believe in him for pardon, peace, righteouſneſs, every ſupply of grace, and eternal life; theſe are ſafe and ſecure in him, nor ſhall they want any good thing needful for them; and they have much peace, joy and comfort here, and ſhall have more grace as they want it, and hereafter eternal glory and happineſs.

[i] הוסרו caſtigamini, Piſcator; ſo Ainſworth; corrigimini, Caſtalio, Gejerus, Michaelis. [k] בר εκλεκτον, Aquila; purum, Coccius; ſo Kimchi & Ben Melech. [l] T. Bab. Sanhedrin, fol. 92. 1. [m] דרך quoad viam, Cocceius, Guſſetius. [n] Propter viam, Vatablus, Muis. [o] In via, Pagninus, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Ainſworth, Gejerus.

PSALM III.

A pſalm of David, when he fled from Abſalom his ſon.

THIS is the firſt of the pſalms that has a title, and is called a Pſalm; the word for which, mizmor, comes from one which ſignifies to cut or prune [r], as trees are lopped of their ſuperfluous branches; ſhewing this to be a compoſition of even feet, in proper metre, formed for the modulation of the voice, to ſome tune or muſical inſtrument; and it is ſaid to be a pſalm of David, which may be rendered a pſalm for or to David [s], as if it was wrote by another for his uſe, and inſcribed to him; or rather, that it was given to him by the holy Spirit, who was the author of it, though he was the penman. It is obſerved by ſome that wherever the dative caſe is uſed in the title of the pſalm, as it moſt frequently is, as ſuch a pſalm to David, or to Aſaph, it may ſignify that it came from the Lord to him, or was divinely inſpired; juſt as it is ſaid, the word of the Lord came to the prophets; though ſome render it a pſalm concerning David [t], his troubles, his faith and ſecurity in God, his victory over his enemies, and ſalvation from the Lord. However, David was the compoſer of this pſalm, under the inſpiration of the holy Ghoſt, occaſioned by his flight from Abſalom; who, having ſtolen away the hearts of the people of Iſrael, entered into a conſpiracy with them, to dethrone his father and place himſelf in his ſtead; and the people ſo increaſed continually with him, that David thought it adviſable to flee from Jeruſalem, 2 Sam. xv. 12, 13, 14. and at the time of his flight or after it, he penned this pſalm on account of it, and as ſuitable to it. And now was fulfilled what God had ſaid, by Nathan the prophet, ſhould befal him, becauſe of the affair of Bathſheba and Uriah; ſee 2 Sam. xii. 11. & xvi. 21, 22. David was an eminent type of Chriſt, and ſo he was in his troubles, and in theſe; as one of his ſons conſpired againſt him to dethrone him, and take away his life; ſo Judas, one of Chriſt's diſciples or children, for diſciples were called children, his familiar friend, that did eat of his bread, lift up his heel againſt him, and ſought to betray him, and did; and who, tho' he knew the deſigns of Judas againſt him, and did not flee from him, but rather went to meet him, yet it is eaſy to obſerve, that he took the ſame rout from Jeruſalem as David did. At this time he went over the brook Kidron, and to the mount of Olives; ſee John xviii. 1. Matt. xxvii. 30. compared with 2 Sam. xv. 23, 30. And indeed the whole pſalm may be applied to Chriſt; and ſo as the ſecond pſalm ſets forth the dignity of Chriſt's perſon, as the Son of God, and the ſtability and enlargement of his kingdom, notwithſtanding the oppoſition made to him; this expreſſes his troubles from his enemies, his death and reſurrection from the dead, his victory over his enemies, and the ſalvation he wrought out for his people. In ſhort, it may be underſtood of David as the type, of Chriſt as the antitype, and of the people of God, being ſuited to their experiences, more or leſs, in all ages; and in this large and extenſive way I ſhall chooſe to interpret it.

℣. 1. Lord, how are they increaſed that trouble me? &c.] David's enemies increaſed in the conſpiracy againſt him, 2 Sam. xv. 12. the hearts of the men of Iſrael were after Abſalom, and againſt him. Chriſt's enemies increaſed, when Judas with a multitude came to take him; when the body of the common people cried out, crucify him; when the aſſembly of the wicked incloſed him, and pierced his hands and his feet. And the enemies of God's people are many; the men of this world are againſt them; legions of devils oppoſe them; and they have ſwarms of ſins in their own hearts; and all theſe give trouble. David's enemies troubled him; he wept as he went up the hill, to think that his own ſon ſhould ſeek to deſtroy him; that his ſubjects, whom he had ruled ſo long with clemency, and had hazarded his perſon in war for their defence, and to protect them in their civil and religious rights, ſhould rebel againſt him. Chriſt's enemies troubled him, when they bound and led him away as a malefactor; when they ſpit upon him, ſmote and buffeted him; when they ſcourged and crucified him, and mocked at him. The enemies of the ſaints are troublers of them; in the world and from the men of it, they have tribulation; Satan's temptations give them much uneaſineſs and diſtreſs; and their indwelling ſins cauſe them to cry out, O! wretched men that we are. This addreſs is made to the Lord, as the Lord God omniſcient, who knew the caſe to be as it was, and who had a concern in it; it not being without his will,

[p] Sub'to, Noldius, p. 230. N° 1052.
[q] εν ταχει, Sept. ſubito, Noldius, p. 433. N° 1371.
[r] מזמור a radice זמר præſcidit. Gejerus.
[s] לדויד pſalmus Davidi, ſub. datus, Genebrardus.
[t] De Davide, vel in Davidem.; ſo ſome in Mariana.

will, but according to it, he having foretold it, and as he who only could help out of it: and the pſalmiſt delivers it in a complaining way, and in an expoſtulatory manner; reaſoning the caſe why it ſhould be ſo, what ſhould be the reaſon of it, for what end and purpoſe it was; and as wondering at it, ſuggeſting his own innocence, and how undeſerving he was to be treated in ſuch a way. Many are they that riſe up againſt me; many in quantity, and great in quality; great in the law, in wiſdom, in riches, and in ſtature, as Jarchi interprets it; ſuch as Ahithophel and others, who roſe up againſt David in an hoſtile manner, to diſpoſſeſs him of his kingdom, and to deſtroy his life. And many were they that roſe up againſt Chriſt; the multitude came againſt him as a thief, with clubs and ſtaves: the men of this world riſe up againſt the ſaints with their tongues, and ſometimes with open force and violence; Satan, like a roaring lion, ſeeks to devour them, and their own fleſhly luſts war againſt them.

℣. 2. Many there be which ſay of my ſoul, &c.] Or to my ſoul [u], the following cutting words, which touched to the quick, reached his very heart, and like a ſword pierced through it: There is no help for him in God; or no ſalvation [w]; neither in this world, nor in that which is to come, as Kimchi explains it. David's enemies looked upon his caſe to be deſperate; that it was impoſſible he ſhould ever extricate himſelf from it; yea, that God himſelf either could not or would not ſave him. And in like manner did the enemies of Chriſt ſay, when they had got him upon the croſs; ſee Matt. xxvii. 43. and how frequent is it for the men of the world to repreſent the ſaints as in a damnable ſtate! and to call them a damned ſet and generation of men, as if there was no ſalvation for them? and how often does Satan ſuggeſt unto them, that there is no hope for them, and they may as well indulge themſelves in all ſinful luſts and pleaſures? and how often do their own unbelieving hearts ſay to them, that there is no ſalvation in Chriſt for them, tho' there is for others; and that they have no intereſt in the favour of God, and ſhall be eternally loſt and periſh? And this account is concluded with the word ſelah, which ſome take to be a muſical note; and ſo the Septuagint render it διαψαλμα, which Suidas [x] interprets the change of the ſong, of the note or tune of it; and the rather it may be thought to be ſo, ſince it is only uſed in this book of Pſalms, and in the prayer of Habbakuk, which was ſet to a tune, and directed to the chief ſinger. Kimchi derives it from a root, which ſignifies to lift up, and ſuppoſes that it denotes and directs to an elevation, or ſtraining of the voice, at the place where this word ſtands. Others underſtand it as a pauſe, a full ſtop for a while; and as a note of attention, either to ſomething that is remarkably bad and diſtreſſing, as here; or remarkably good and matter of rejoicing, as in ℣. 4, 8. Others conſider it as an affirmation of the truth of any thing, good or bad; and render it verily, truly, as anſwering to Amen; ſo be it, ſo it is, or ſhall be; it is the truth of the thing: to this ſenſe agrees Aben Ezra. But others render it for ever, as the Chaldee paraphraſe; and it is a tradition of the Jews [y], that wherever it is ſaid, netzach, ſelah and ed, there is no ceaſing, it is for ever and ever; and ſo then, according to this rule, the ſenſe of David's enemies is, that there was no help for him in God for ever. A very learned man [z] has wrote a diſſertation upon this word; in which he endeavours to prove, that it is a name of God, differently uſed, either in the vocative, genitive and dative caſes; as, O Selah, O God; or of God, or to God, &c. as the ſenſe requires.

℣. 3. But thou, O Lord, art a ſhield for me, &c.] Or about me [a], protecting and defending me. David was a military man, and often alludes to military affairs; and borrows words from thence, expreſſive of his great ſecurity from the Lord; ſee Pſalm xviii. 2. So Jehovah the Father was a ſhield to Chriſt in his infancy, from Herod's rage and fury; and afterwards from the inſults of the Phariſees, and their attempts to take away his life before the time; and in his ſufferings and death, ſo as that his faith and confidence in him were kept up, and he got the victory over ſin, Satan, and the world; ſee Pſalm xxii. 9, 10. Iſa. l. 7, 8, 9. And the Lord is a ſhield unto all his people, Gen. xv. 1. Pſalm lxxxiv. 11. They are kept by his power, and encompaſſed about with his favour, as with a ſhield; his veracity and his faithfulneſs in his promiſes, and his truth, are their ſhield and buckler: and eſpecially his Son, the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, is the ſhield which faith makes uſe of, particularly his blood and righteouſneſs, and ſalvation by him; which it holds up, and defends itſelf with, againſt the charges of the law, the accuſations of conſcience, and the temptations of Satan; and which are a ſecurity from the juſtice of God, and wrath to come. My glory; who took David from the ſheep-fold, and made him king over Iſrael, and raiſed him to all the glory he had enjoyed; and in whom he gloried as his covenant-God, and of whom he made his boaſt; and not of his ſtrength, valour, wiſdom, riches and honour. So God the Father is the glory of Chriſt, the glorifier of him, by ſupporting him under his ſufferings, raiſing him from the dead, and ſetting him at his own right hand, where he is crowned with glory and honour; and he is the glory of his people, in whom they glory, and by whom they are called to eternal glory; and who will give it to them, and reveal it in them, even an eternal weight of it, which the ſufferings of this life are not worthy to be compared unto. And the lifter up of mine head; ſuch as the helmet is: the Lord was the lifter up of David's head, when he brought him to the throne, and afterwards gave him victory over his enemies; for ſo the phraſe of lifting up the head ſignifies; ſee 2 Kings xxv. 27. Pſalm xxvii. 6. And he was the lifter up of Chriſt's head, when he raiſed him from the dead; and exalted him, both with and at his right hand, to be a Prince and a Saviour, and gave him a name above every name. And he is the lifter up of the heads of his people in converſion, when he raiſes them from a low eſtate, and ſets them among princes, to inherit the throne of glory; and when he gives them comfort, peace and joy, which cauſes them to lift up their heads; whereas in ſorrow, and mourning, and diſtreſs, the head is bowed down like a bulruſh, Iſa. lviii. 5, and when he gives them boldneſs and confidence, as at the throne of grace now, thro' the ſprinkling of of the blood of Chriſt upon them; ſo at the bar of judgment hereafter, thro' the righteouſneſs of Chriſt put upon them, as that they ſhall not be aſhamed nor confounded; ſee Luke xxi. 28. 1 John ii. 28. and he will be the lifter up of their heads in the reſurrection-morn, and when they ſhall appear with Chriſt in glory.

[u] לנפשי τῃ ψυχῃ μου, Sept. animæ meæ, V. L. Pagninus, Montanus, Muſculus, Gejerus, Michaelis; ſo the Targum. [w] אין ישועתה non eſt ſalus, V. L. Pagninus, Montanus; non ulla ſalus, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Ainſworth, in Theſaur. Theolog. Philolog. par. 1. [x] In voce διαψ. [y] T. Bab. Erubin, fol. 54. 1. Vid. Ben Melech in loc. [z] Paſchii Diſſertatio de Selah, p. 670. [a] בערי circa me, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Muis, Ainſworth, Cocceius, Michaelis.

℣. 4. I cried unto the Lord with my voice, &c.] The experience which the pſalmiſt had of being heard in prayer, was what gave great encouragement to his faith, as to his intereſt in God and ſalvation by him, when his enemies were ſo increaſed about him; for crying here is to be underſtood of prayer, as it is often uſed in this book of Pſalms: and ſo the Targum renders it, I prayed; and this deſigns vocal prayer. Sometimes there is a crying in prayer and no voice heard, as it is ſaid of Moſes, Exod. xiv. 15. and was the caſe of Hannah, 1 Sam. i. 13. but this was with a voice, and a loud one, as in Pſal. lv. 17. denoting ardor, fervency and importunity; and ſuch prayer avails much with God. The object addreſſed in prayer is the Lord, the God of his life, and who was able to ſave him, and ſupply all his wants. And he heard me out of his holy hill. Selah. Either out of the church, the holy hill of Zion, Pſalm ii. 6. where David prayed and God granted his preſence, and gave an anſwer to his prayers; or out from the mercy-ſeat and ark, which was a type of the propitiatory, Chriſt, and which David had brought to his own city, the hill of Zion; or from heaven, the habitation of God's holineſs: David was a man of prayer, and he was often heard and anſwered by God. And this alſo is true of Chriſt, he offered up prayers and ſupplications with ſtrong crying and tears to God, that was able to ſave him; and he was heard by him, yea the Father always heard him: and God is a God hearing and anſwering the prayers of his people, ſooner or later; ſometimes before, ſometimes at, and ſometimes after their crying to him.

℣. 5. I laid me down and ſlept, &c.] After the battle was over between Abſalom's men and his, ſays Aben Ezra; but rather this was in the midſt of his trouble and diſtreſs, ſince he afterwards prays for ſalvation: and this ſleep was either, as Jarchi obſerves, through his heart being overwhelmed with grief; for there have been inſtances of perſons ſleeping through ſorrow, as Elijah, Jonah, and the diſciples of Chriſt, 1 Kings xix. 4, 5. Jonah i. 5. Luke xxii. 45. or rather this is expreſſive of the calmneſs and ſerenity of his mind amidſt his troubles; he laid himſelf down in peace, and ſlept quietly and comfortably; he did not loſe a night's reſt, his ſleep was ſweet unto him; which was a bleſſing of life from the Lord, that every one does not enjoy; ſee Pſal. cxxvii. 2. I awaked; in the morning, alive and chearful. Some lay themſelves down and never awake more, as Siſera the captain of Jabin's army, and Iſhboſheth the ſon of Saul; and this might have been David's caſe, conſidering the circumſtances he was in: and others, thro' perplexing thoughts and cares, or pains of body, or uneaſy dreams, riſe fatigued and diſtreſſed; but David aroſe in good health of body, and tranquillity of mind, and comfortably refreſhed. For the Lord ſuſtained me; the pſalmiſt committed himſelf to the care and protection of God; he laid himſelf down in his arms, and there ſlept in ſafety; the Lord preſerved him, who is Iſrael's keeper that neither ſlumbers nor ſleeps: and he roſe in health and chearfulneſs in the morning, being ſupported by his right hand. This ſhews, that his lying down to ſleep, when in ſuch circumſtances, and awaking with chearfulneſs, were not owing to raſhneſs, ſtupidity and inſenſibility, but to divine ſupports. Theſe words may be interpreted, as they are by ſome of the ancients, of the death of Chriſt, and of his reſurrection from the dead by the power of God; death is often expreſſed by ſleep, and the reſurrection of the dead by an awaking out of ſleep, Dan. xii. 2. Iſa. xxvi. 19. and Chriſt's death being ſignified by lying down and ſleeping, may denote both the voluntarineſs of it, that he laid down his life freely and willingly; and his ſhort continuance under the power of death, it was but like a night's ſleep; and his reſurrection from the dead, being expreſſed by an awaking through the Lord's ſuſtaining him, ſhews that it was by the power of God, even the exceeding greatneſs of his power: and the whole of this may be applied to the caſe and ſtate of the ſaints and people of God, who at times have reſt and peace amidſt their enemies; though they have tribulation in the world, they have peace in Chriſt; and notwithſtanding the temptations of Satan, and the corruptions of their own hearts, they have joy and comfort through believing in Chriſt; the Lord ſtays them with precious promiſes, and ſupports them with the diſcoveries of his love, and upholds them with the right hand of his righteouſneſs.

℣. 6. I will not be afraid of ten thouſands of the people, &c.] David was a man of courage from his youth; the inſtances of his attacking the lion and the bear, when he kept his father's ſheep, his engaging with Goliath, and his military exploits, ſhew it; and though there were now many thouſands up in arms againſt him, and his own ſon at the head of them; all the tribes of Iſrael were revolting from him, and he was only attended with a few of his friends, yet he was not diſmayed; for that he refers to this inſurrection appears by what follows, that have ſet themſelves againſt me round about; and this was owing not to himſelf but to the Lord's ſuſtaining of him; ſee Pſalm xxvii. 1, 2, 3. and ſuch courage and greatneſs of ſoul did his antitype the Meſſiah expreſs, and to a greater degree, when Judas, with his band of ſoldiers, and the multitude with clubs and ſtaves, entered the garden to apprehend him; and when the prince of this world was marching towards him, and when he was engaged with all the powers of darkneſs, and when the ſorrows of death compaſſed him about, yet he failed not, nor was he diſcouraged: and ſomething of this ſpirit appears in true believers, when they are in the exerciſe of faith, have the preſence of God, and the diſcoveries of his love; they are then not afraid what man can do unto them; nor are they afraid of devils themſelves, but wreſtle againſt them; nor of any nor all their enemies, they having victory over them, given by God through Chriſt.

℣. 7. Ariſe, O Lord; ſave me, O my God, &c.] God ſometimes, in the apprehenſion of his people, ſeems to be as if he was aſleep: when he does not appear to them and for them, and does not exert his power on their behalf, then they call to him to awake and ariſe; ſee Pſal. xliv. 23. and it may be, ſome reſpect is had to the words of Moſes when the ark ſet forward, Numb. x. 35. and it may be obſerved, that though David enjoyed ſo much peace and tranquillity of mind, and was in ſuch high ſpirits as not to be afraid of ten thouſands of men, yet he did not neglect the right means of deliverance and ſafety, prayer to God, who he knew was his God; and he addreſſes him as ſuch, and uſes his covenant-intereſt in him, as an argument with him to ariſe and ſave him from his enemies, who was able able to do it, and to whom ſalvation belongs: ſo Chriſt, his antitype, prayed to God as his God to ſave him, and was heard by him in like manner; ſo the ſaints call upon God in a day of trouble, cry to him in their diſtreſſes, to be delivered out of them. For thou haſt ſmitten all mine enemies upon the cheek-bone; to ſmite any one upon the cheek is reckoned reproachful, and is caſting contempt upon them; ſee Job xvi. 10. and the ſenſe is, that God had poured contempt upon his enemies in time paſt, and had brought them to ſhame and confuſion: hence he puts up the above prayer as a prayer of faith for ſalvation, founded on paſt experience of God's goodneſs; he prayed that his God would ariſe and ſave him, and he believed he would, becauſe he had hitherto appeared for him, and againſt his enemies. Thou haſt broken the teeth of the ungodly; who were like to beaſts of prey whoſe ſtrength lies in their teeth, whereby they do the miſchief they do; and the breaking of their teeth ſignifies the taking away from them the power of hurting, and refers to the victories which God had given David over the Philiſtines, Edomites, Syrians, and others; and may be applied to Chriſt, and be expreſſive of ſin, Satan, the world and death being overcome and aboliſhed by him, and of the victory which the ſaints have through him over the ſame enemies.

℣. 8. Salvation belongeth unto the Lord, &c.] As the author of it; temporal ſalvation is of him; all the deliverances of the ſaints out of their troubles are from him; and to him is owing their ſpiritual and eternal ſalvation; this belongs to Jehovah, Father, Son, and Spirit: Jehovah the Father reſolved upon it, choſe men to it from everlaſting, contrived the ſcheme of it in his infinite wiſdom, made a covenant with his Son, in which he ſecured it, and appointed him to be the author of it, and ſent him in the fulneſs of time to effect it; and Chriſt the Son of God, being qualified for it, being mighty to ſave, came into this world for that purpoſe, and is become the author of eternal ſalvation; his own arm has brought it to him, though there were many difficulties in the way; ſuch as fulfilling the law, ſatisfying juſtice, making an end of ſin, grappling with all the powers of darkneſs, and undergoing an accurſed death: and the Spirit of God, he makes men ſenſible of their need of this ſalvation; he brings it near to them, and works faith in them to lay hold upon it, and ſhews them their intereſt in it; and in conſequence of all this the glory of ſalvation belongs to the Lord, Father, Son, and Spirit, and ſhould be given to the Father as the contriver of it, to the Son as the author of it, and to the Spirit as the applier of it; ſee Rev. vii. 10. Thy bleſſing is upon thy people. Selah. or it may be conſidered prayer-wiſe, let thy bleſſing be upon thy people[b]; either upon thoſe that were on the ſide of David, or on thoſe, as others interpret it, who had imprudently joined themſelves to Abſalom; which latter ſenſe, if right, ſhews in what a divine frame and diſpoſition of mind the pſalmiſt was, to pray for his enemies: or the words are an aſſertion, that the bleſſing of the Lord was come upon his covenant-people, and does deſcend upon them as they are called by grace; even all ſpiritual bleſſings, the bleſſings of a juſtifying righteouſneſs, of pardon of ſin, of reconciliation and peace by the blood of Chriſt, of adoption, and of eternal life; the bleſſing of grace, and the bleſſing of glory.

PSALM IV.

To the chief muſician on Neginoth, a pſalm of David.

THIS pſalm is inſcribed to the chief muſician, or conqueror[c]; who excelled others in the art of muſic, and carried the glory from them; who was very ſkilful, and inſtructed others in it, and was the maſter of the ſong, as Chenaniah, 1 Chron. xv. 22, 27. who ſet the tune, led on the pſalm, and had the whole direction and management of it; and ſo the Jewiſh doctors[d] generally underſtand it of one that preſided over the reſt of the muſicians and ſingers; and to ſuch an one was this pſalm ſent, to be ſung in public worſhip: for the pſalms of David were not compoſed for private uſe only, but for public ſervice; and were committed into the hands and care of the chief of the ſingers, as Aſaph and others; ſee 1 Chron. xvi. 7. by whom they were preſerved and tranſmitted to future ages for the uſe of the church, not only in the former but in the preſent diſpenſation. The Septuagint interpreters, and after them the Vulgate Latin and Ethiopic verſions, render it unto the end, or for ever; to this agrees the ſenſe of R. Saadiah Gaon[e], who ſays, "this is a pſalm of David, who gave it to "one of the ſingers to ſing it continually," as if was לנצח for ever; but the former ſenſe is beſt, to underſtand it of the chief muſician, or precentor, who is ſaid to be on neginoth; the ſingular, neginah, is uſed in the title of Pſal. lxi. and it is ſometimes rendered a ſong, as in Job xxx. 8. Pſalm lxxvii. 6. hence the Vulgate Latin verſion here renders it in ſongs; and the Septuagint renders it in pſalms; and then the meaning is, that this perſon was the chief man that preſided over the ſongs and pſalms: though the Jewiſh writers[f], for the moſt part, interpret it of a muſical inſtrument ſo called; not ſuch an one as was blown, as the pipe and trumpet, but what was played upon with the hand; ſee 1 Sam. xvi. 16, 23. and xix. 9. a ſtringed inſtrument, which was touched with the fingers as an harp, or ſtruck with a quill or bow as a violin. And as there were various inſtruments of muſic uſed in the temple-ſervice, ſo there were perſons ſet over them, ſome over one ſort, and ſome over another; and this man preſided over the inſtruments that were played with the hand: and it looks as if this pſalm was to be ſung to ſuch an inſtrument, by its being inſcribed and ſent to him. Aben Ezra takes the word to be, the beginning of a ſong; and the Targum renders the whole, to ſing upon the chorus or dances. It is called a pſalm of David, being written by him, under the inſpiration of the Spirit of God; the occaſion of it was Abſalom's rebellion; and it was written when he fled from him, as the preceding, as Kimchi thinks; but according to Lightfoot and others, it was the rebellion of Sheba, 2 Sam. xx. though others refer it to the time of his diſtreſſes and perſecutions by Saul: according to the Jewiſh rabbins[g] where there are the words נ֝יצ֗ח ונ֝ינ֗ן as they are both in this title, the pſalm belongs belongs to future time, to the world to come, to the times of the Meſſiah.

[b] ברכתך ſit benedictio tua, Junius & Tremellius, Tarnovius, Gejerus, Michaelis. [c] למנצח victori, Pagninus, Montanus, Vatablus; vincenti, Munſter. [d] Jarchi, Aben Ezra, Kimchi, & Ben Melech in loc. [e] Apud Aben Ezra in loc. [f] Kimchi & Ben Melech in loc. and others in Aben Ezra in loc. [g] Kimchi Præfat. in Pſalm.

℣. 1. Hear me when I call, O God of my righteouſneſs, &c.] Or, my righteous God [h], who is righteous in his nature, ways and works, the juſt judge of the whole earth, who will do right; or the vindicator of my righteouſneſs, as the Syriac verſion renders it; that is, of his innocence and uprightneſs, which the Lord knew and was a witneſs of: and ſince he was his covenant-God, he doubted not but he would bring it forth as the light, and favour his righteous cauſe, and do him juſtice upon his enemies: or the pſalmiſt addreſſes God in this manner, becauſe he was the author of his righteouſneſs, and was the juſtifier of him, by imputing the righteouſneſs of his Son unto him. So Chriſt addreſſes his Father, John xvii. 26. who he knew would juſtify him, and by whom he was juſtified as the ſurety of his people, when he roſe from the dead: and ſo the ſaints can draw nigh to God the judge of all, through the righteouſneſs of Chriſt; knowing that he is juſt, and the juſtifier of him that believes in Jeſus; and that he is juſt and faithful to forgive their ſins, and cleanſe them from all unrighteouſneſs, on account of his blood. The petition put up by the pſalmiſt is, to be heard when he called, that is, to hear his prayer, as it is explained in the latter part of the verſe: and God is a God hearing prayer; and ſo David, Chriſt, and all the ſaints have found him to be: and the encouragement to pray to the Lord, in hope of being heard, aroſe from paſt experience of divine goodneſs. Thou haſt enlarged me when I was in diſtreſs: when he had like to have been killed by Saul, caſting a javelin at him; and when his houſe was watched by men that Saul ſet there, and he was let down through a window and eſcaped; and when he was ſhut in at Keilah, where Saul thought he had him ſafe; and at other times, to which he may here refer, as in Pſal. xviii. 19. and xxxi. 8. and this may be applied to the Meſſiah, when in the garden, beſet with ſorrows, and an angel ſtrengthned him; and when on the croſs, ſurrounded by various enemies, whom he conquered; and when in death and the grave, from the pains and cords of which he was looſed, and ſet in a large place. And this agrees alſo with the experience of the ſaints; who, when in diſtreſs through ſin, Satan, and the law, have been ſet free, through the goſpel proclaiming liberty to the captives to ſuch enemies; and the opening of the priſon to them that have been bound by them: and when they have been ſo ſhut up and ſtraitned in themſelves, that they could not come forth in the diſcharge of duty, and in the exerciſe of grace; through the Spirit of the Lord, who is a Spirit of liberty, they have been enlarged in the duty of prayer and of praiſe, and in the exerciſe of faith and love; and their hearts have been enlarged through the diſcoveries of the love of God towards them, ſo that they have run chearfully in the ways of his commandments; who alſo gives them largeneſs of heart, an increaſe of the knowledge of Chriſt, and of the love of God, and fills them with joy and peace in believing, and draws out the deſires of their ſouls to his name, and the remembrance of him. Have mercy upon me: the pſalmiſt pleads no merit nor worthineſs of his own, but applies to the grace and mercy of God; and ſenſible of his ſin, both original and actual, he intreats a diſcovery of pardoning grace and mercy. The words may be rendred, be gracious unto me [i], or ſhew me favour; beſtow the bleſſings of grace, grant larger meaſures of grace, and freſh ſupplies of it: and ſo all ſenſible ſinners apply to God for mercy; and all the ſaints have recourſe to him as the father of mercies, and the God of all comfort, for every mercy, both temporal and ſpiritual. Nor is this unſuitable to the Meſſiah, as man and mediator; with whom God keeps his mercy for evermore, as the head and ſurety of his people, and upon whom, as man, the grace of God was; and who increaſed, as in ſtature, ſo in favour with God and man; and which, no doubt, was deſirable by him. And hear my prayer: the ſame petition with that in the beginning of the verſe; invocation and prayer being the ſame thing.

℣. 2. O ye ſons of men, &c.] Meaning great men, the nobles of Iſrael; and ſo the Jewiſh interpreters [k] generally explain it; ſuch as Achitophel, and others, who were in the conſpiracy with Abſalom: and ſo they were the kings and princes of the earth, and the rulers of the Jewiſh Sanhedrim, the chief prieſts and elders, who were the enemies of Chriſt; and ſuch, generally ſpeaking, have been the perſecutors of the ſaints: theſe men of power and authority, of dignity and honour; and who were in high places, and boaſted of their titles and grandeur; the pſalmiſt addreſſes by way of expoſtulation, in the following words. How long will ye turn my glory into ſhame? Meaning either God, who was his glory, Pſal. iii. 3. whom they reproached, when they ſaid, there was no help for him in him; or his tongue, the inſtrument of praiſe, and the ſongs of praiſe he expreſſed by it, Pſal. lvii. 8. which they jeered and ſcoffed at: or rather, his royal glory and majeſty, which they attempted to vail, by caſting him down from his excellency, by dethroning him, and ſetting up Abſalom in his room. So the Jews endeavoured to turn the glory of Chriſt into ſhame, which lay in his being the only-begotten of the Father; by denying his ſonſhip, by condemning him to death, becauſe he ſaid he was the Son of God; and by mocking at him under that character on the croſs; and alſo by their ſpitting upon, buffeting and crucifying the Lord of glory; by reproaching his goſpel, miniſters and people; and by not acknowledging him as the Meſſiah, and ſubmitting to his righteouſneſs. And wicked men do as much as in them lies, to turn the glory of the ſaints into ſhame, by aſperſing their character, taking away their good name and reputation among men; by reproaching and reviling them, and ſpeaking all manner of evil of them; and by perſecuting them in the moſt violent manner. How long will ye love vanity? or a vain thing [l]? Such as the placing of Abſalom upon the throne, on which their hearts were ſet; and ſuch was the vain imagination of the Jews, with which they pleaſed themſelves, that Jeſus ſhould die, and his name periſh; and ſuch are all the attempts of wicked men to ruin and deſtroy the people and intereſt of Chriſt; for no weapon formed againſt them ſhall proſper. And ſeek after leaſing? Selah. Or a lie [m]; or that which fails and deceives, as a lie does: and ſuch were all the counſels and deſigns of the great men of Iſrael againſt David: and ſo the Jews may be ſaid ſaid to ſeek after a lie, when they ſeek after another Meſſiah, beſides Jeſus of Nazareth: for every other proves a Bar Cozbi, that is, the ſon of a lie; as the falſe Meſſiah in Adrian's time was called by themſelves. And ſo do all ſuch as ſeek after and embrace falſe doctrines, errors and hereſies, and are given up to believe them. Now the pſalmiſt ſuggeſts that theſe great men were obſtinate, and continued in theſe ſinful practices; and that in the iſſue all their efforts would be vain and fruitleſs; and which he further ſtrengthens, by obſerving to them what follows.

[h] אלהי צדקי [i] חנני gratioſus eſto mihi, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Cocceius. [k] Jarchi, Aben Ezra, Kimchi, & Ben Melech in loc. [l] ריק inane, Pagninus, Montanus, Vatablus, Cocceius; inanem rem, Piſcator. [m] כזב mendacium, Pagninus, Montanus, Tigurine verſion, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, &c.

℣. 3. But know, &c.] Take notice of it, conſider it, be aſſured of the truth of it; it may be depended upon as fact, that the Lord hath ſet apart him that is godly for himſelf: which may be underſtood of David himſelf, an holy, good man; a man after God's own heart; whom the Lord choſe, and in a marvelous manner ſeparated from the reſt of his brethren; took him from the ſheepfold, and ſet him upon the throne of Iſrael, for the glory of his great name; and therefore the attempts of his enemies againſt him would be without ſucceſs: and alſo of the Meſſiah, God's holy One, whom he has choſen out from among the people, to be their Saviour and Redeemer, to the glory of his grace; wherefore the work of the Lord has proſpered in his hands: and likewiſe of all the ſaints, and of their election; which act is expreſſed by their being ſet apart, or ſeparated from others, who are called the reſt; and which is a marvelous act of grace: for the word may be rendered, he hath wonderfully ſet apart [n]. It is an amazing inſtance of grace, that God ſhould make one to differ from another, and ſeparate them from their mothers womb, and call them by his grace. The object of this act is, him that is godly, or holy [o]: not that any are ſet apart or choſen by God for their godlineſs, or holineſs; for they are choſen through ſanctification of the Spirit, and not becauſe they were, or it was foreſeen they would be holy. Holineſs, faith, godlineſs and good works, are the fruits of election, and not the cauſes of it: but the word חסיד rendered godly, ſignifies good and merciful [p]; and deſigns one that God is good, and gracious, and merciful unto; who is an object of his free grace and favour; and therefore he chooſes, and ſets him apart of his own grace and mercy, and according to his ſovereign will and pleaſure: and that for himſelf; for his own uſe and ſervice, for his praiſe and honour, and to the glory of his grace; which is his grand end in predeſtination, election, and in all ſpiritual bleſſings. And now all attempts againſt ſuch perſons are in vain; all charges againſt them are of no avail; all methods, whether by open force of perſecutors, or by the cunning of falſe teachers, that lie in wait to deceive, to prevail againſt them, prove ſucceſsleſs: and God will avenge his elect, that cry unto him day and night; as follows. The Lord will hear when I call unto him, and deliver out of the hands of enemies, and cut them off: wherefore it is a vain thing for men to ſet themſelves againſt Chriſt and his people.

℣. 4. Stand in awe, and ſin not, &c.] That is, ſtand in awe of God, and his righteous judgments; be afraid of him, and tremble before him; make him your fear and your dread, and go on no longer, and proceed no further in ſinning againſt him. The Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, Syriac, Arabic and Ethiopic verſions, render it, Be ye angry, and ſin not: which are the words of the apoſtle, Eph. iv. 26. referring to this place; and which doubtleſs is the reaſon of theſe verſions. There is an anger that is ſinful, when it is without a cauſe, or exceeds due bounds, and is not directed to a good end, and is productive of bad effects, by words or deeds; and when it is ſoon raiſed, or long continued: and there is an anger that is not ſinful; when it ariſes from a true zeal for God and religion; when it is kindled, not againſt the perſons, but ſins of men; and when it is continued to anſwer good purpoſes; as the good of thoſe with whom we are angry, and the glory of God, and the promoting of the kingdom and intereſt of Chriſt. Commune with your own heart upon your bed: when retired from men and buſineſs, and you are at leiſure to think and meditate; then reflect upon your actions, ſeriouſly conſider them; aſk your heart ſome proper and cloſe queſtions; examine narrowly and thoroughly the principles on which, and the views with which you act. And be ſtill. Selah. Ceaſe from all your rage and fury againſt me, againſt the Lord, and againſt his people; or ſay in your own hearts [q], as follows.

℣. 5. Offer the ſacrifices of righteouſneſs, &c.] Offer for ſacrifice things righteouſly gotten, for the Lord hates robbery for burnt-offering, Iſai. lxi 8. Some reſpect may be had to the unrighteous acquiſitions of Abſalom and his men, and who were now in poſſeſſion of Jeruſalem, and of the altars of the Lord, and were ſacrificing on them; in which they gloried; and to which this may be oppoſed. Likewiſe, ſacrifices of righteouſneſs, are ſuch as were according to the law, and were offered in a right manner; which were not maimed, nor had any blemiſh in them; ſee Mal. i. 13, 14. and particularly, ſuch as were offered up in the faith of the great ſacrifice, Chriſt; for without faith it is impoſſible to pleaſe God by any ſacrifice. And this ſenſe is confirmed by the following clauſe, which requires truſt in the Lord. Moreover, righteouſneſs, with the Jews, ſignifies alms, beneficence, ſhewing mercy to the indigent; and acts of liberality are ſacrifices, with which God is well pleaſed; and which are preferred by him to the ſacrifices of the ceremonial law, Heb. xiii. 16. Hoſ. vi. 6. The ſacrifices alſo of a broken heart, and of a contrite ſpirit, are ſuch as God eſteems of; he looks to thoſe that have them, and dwells with them. And to this ſenſe the Chaldee paraphraſe inclines, in which the words are thus paraphraſed; "Subdue your corruptions, and it ſhall be reckoned to you as a ſacrifice of righteouſneſs:" and why may not the ſacrifice of praiſe for mercies received, eſpecially for the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, be at leaſt included, if not principally deſigned; ſince theſe are ſacrifices which, under the ceremonial law, were more pleaſing to God than others; and are always acceptable to him through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord? Agreeably to this, Aben Ezra thinks the peace-offerings are intended, which were in a way of thanksgiving; and are oppoſed to ſin-offerings, and treſpaſs-offerings, and burnt-offerings; from the laſt of which ſacrifices of righteouſneſs are diſtinguiſhed in Pſalm li. 19. And put your truſt in the Lord: not in your ſtrength, in horſes and chariots, and numbers of men; nor in wiſe wiſe counſels, nor in riches, nor in fleſhly privileges, nor in works of righteouſneſs, or ſacrifices of righteouſneſs: for though they are to be performed, they are not to be truſted in; nor in your own hearts. And whilſt the pſalmiſt is ſtriking at the falſe confidence of the ſons of men, he is addreſſing, he may at the ſame time be thought to be encouraging thoſe that were with him to truſt in the Lord, Jehovah, the Son of God, before ſpoken of by him as the object of truſt, Pſalm ii. 12. to truſt in his perſon for the acceptance of their perſons and ſacrifices of righteouſneſs; and in his righteouſneſs for juſtification; in his blood for pardon; in his ſacrifice for expiation of ſin; in his fulneſs for daily ſupplies; and in his power for protection and ſafety. And it is right to truſt in him at all times; in times of affliction, temptation and deſertion: he is always the ſame; in him is everlaſting ſtrength; he has an heart as well as an ability to help and ſuccour, and none ever truſted in him and were confounded. Such have peace and ſafety, and can want no good thing.

[n] So Ainſworth. הפלה mirificavit, V. L. mirabilem effecit, Gejerus. [o] חסיד ſanctum, V. L. Muis, De Dieu. [p] Eum quem benigne acceperit, Junius & Tremellius; beneficiarium, Gejerus, Michaelis; gratia vel favore a Deo affectum, Hammond. [q] אמרו בלבבכם dicite in corde veſtro, Montanus, Cocceius, Guſſetius; loquimini, Pagninus, Piſcator.

℣. 6. There be many that ſay, Who will ſhew us any good? &c.] Theſe may be thought to be the men of the world; carnal, worldly-minded men, ſeeking after temporal good, and taking up their reſt and contentment in it; to whom the pſalmiſt oppoſes his wiſh and requeſt, in the following words. Or theſe are the words of the men that were along with David, wiſhing themſelves at home and in their families, enjoying the good things of life they before had; or rather theſe are the words of the ſame many, the enemies of David, ſpoken of in Pſal. iii. 1, 2. who were wiſhing, as Kimchi obſerves, that Abſalom's rebellion might proſper; that David might die and his ſon reign in his ſtead, ſo the evil they wiſhed to him was good to them: or they may be the words of the ſame men, expreſſing the deſperate condition that David and his friends were in, which the pſalmiſt repreſents in this manner, who will ſhew us any good? none, ſay they, will ſhew them any good, neither God nor man; there is no help for him in God; he and his friends muſt unavoidably periſh: and this produces the following petition, Lord, liſt thou up the light of thy countenance upon us; meaning his gracious preſence, the manifeſtations of himſelf, the diſcoveries of his love, communion with him, the comforts of his Spirit, and the joys of his ſalvation; ſuggeſting that in the enjoyment of theſe things lay their good and happineſs, and their ſafety alſo; his face and favour, love and grace, being as a ſhield to encompaſs them, and as a banner over them, Pſal. v. 12. Cant. ii. 4. and ſo Jarchi obſerves, that the word here uſed ſignifies to lift up for a banner [r]; ſome reſpect ſeems to be had to the form of the prieſt's bleſſing, Numb. vi. 24—26. and the words are oppoſed to the good deſired by carnal men, and expreſs the true happineſs of the ſaints, Pſal. lxxxix. 15. this is a bleſſing wiſhed for not only by David but by his antitype the Meſſiah, Matt. xxvii. 46. and by all believers.

℣. 7. Thou haſt put gladneſs in my heart, &c.] The Ethiopic verſion reads it into our heart; in granting the above requeſt; for nothing ſo rejoices the hearts of God's people as the light of his countenance, or the enjoyment of his gracious preſence: this was matter of exceeding joy to Chriſt himſelf, Pſal. xxi. 6. Acts ii. 28. and ſo it is to all his members; this cauſes inward gladneſs, gladneſs of heart, and is oppoſed to the external rejoicings of wicked men and of hypocrites: and this is of God's putting into the heart; and indeed none can put gladneſs either into a wounded conſcience, into the heart of a ſenſible ſinner, or into the ſoul of one that is panting after the preſence of God, and communion with him, but God himſelf. More than in the time that their corn and their wine increaſed; meaning the time of harveſt and of vintage; when there is a good harveſt, and a good vintage, there is joy among men, and the contrary when it is otherwiſe, Iſa. ix. 3. Joel i. 12. theſe things being of general uſe, ſpread an univerſal joy among people; there is ſcarce any earthly thing that occaſions more joy than theſe do; and yet the joy on ſuch occaſions is not to be compared with ſpiritual joy, that is a joy unſpeakable and full of glory. Some take the ן to be not comparative but cauſal, and render the words [s], thou haſt put gladneſs in my heart from the time that their corn, &c. as do the Chaldee paraphraſe and Syriac verſions; and the Arabic verſion renders it, becauſe of the multitude of fruits, &c. and then the ſenſe is, as if David ſhould ſay concerning his enemies, "I never envied their proſperity, I always rejoiced when they had a good harveſt, or vintage, and ſtill do; and yet they have roſe up and rebelled againſt me, and requited me evil for good." And this ſenſe is given into by the Jewiſh commentators [t], and ſhews of what an admirable ſpirit, and in what a ſweet diſpoſition of mind the pſalmiſt was; that whilſt his enemies were ſeeking his life, he was rejoicing in their proſperity; and is a ſad aggravation of their wickedneſs: and this may alſo be underſtood of the rejoicing of David, and even of the Meſſiah; and likewiſe of all good men, at the ſpiritual proſperity of the ſaints, at any increaſe of grace, ſpiritual knowledge and joy, ſignified by theſe outward things, as in Jer. xxxi. 12. the Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, Syriac, Arabic and Ethiopic verſions, add oil to corn and wine.

℣. 8. I will both lay me down in peace, and ſleep, &c.] Signifying, that he had ſuch a calmneſs and ſerenity of mind, amidſt all his troubles, that he could not only lay himſelf down in great peace, and much compoſure of mind, but ſleep alſo, and that as ſoon as laid down almoſt; ſome lay themſelves down but cannot ſleep, through the anxiety of their minds, but the pſalmiſt could do both: or the word rendered both, may be tranſlated together [u]; and the ſenſe be either that he would lie down and ſleep together with his friends, committing himſelf and them to the care and protection of God; or that he ſhould lie down and ſleep together with his enemies; meaning that he was aſſured that there would quickly be a reconciliation and peace between them; ſee Prov. xvi. 7. For thou, Lord, only makeſt me dwell in ſafety; ſuggeſting that his protection and ſafety were owing to the power and preſence of God only; and that was the reaſon of the tranquillity of his mind, and why he ſlept ſo quietly in the night watches, though in ſuch danger from his enemies; or thou, Lord, makeſt me only or alone [w], being ſolitary and deſtitute of friends, to dwell in ſafety; under the ſhadow of thy wings, encompaſſed by thy favour, and ſurrounded by thy power; ſee Deut. xxxiii. 28.

[r] So Guſſetius, Ebr. Comment. p. 515, 518. Pagninus, Montanus, Muſculus, Cocceius.

[s] מעת דגנם a vel ex tempore quo frumentum eorum, &c.

[t] Jarchi, Aben Ezra, & Kimchi in loc.

[u] יחדו ſimul, Muſculus, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Gejerus, Cocceius.

[w] לבדד me ſolum, Cocceius; me ſeorſim, Gejerus.

PSALM

PSALM V.

To the chief muſician upon Nehiloth, a pſalm of David.

THIS pſalm being written by David under the inſpiration of the holy Spirit, is inſcribed and ſent to him who had the direction and management of the muſical inſtruments uſed in religious worſhip in David's time, and afterwards in the temple-ſervice, called nehiloth; as the preceding pſalm is inſcribed to him who preſided over thoſe called neginoth; and as they ſeem to be ſuch inſtruments as were played upon with the hand, ſtringed inſtruments, ſo theſe ſeem to be wind-inſtruments, ſuch as were blown with the mouth; as the flute, cornet, pipe, trumpet, and hautboy; the word being derived from the ſame root as chalil, the pipe, is, and ſignifies hollow, and ſo deſigns ſuch hollow inſtruments as above: Rabbenu Hai [x] thinks the inſtrument intended was ſo called from the humming of bees, which its ſound reſembled; nechil ſhel deborim, with the rabbins [y] ſignifying a ſwarm of bees; and a word from the ſame root in the Arabic language is uſed for a bee [z]; though others have thought it might be ſo called from the murmuring noiſe of a brook or river, to which the ſound of it might be like; becauſe a word from the ſame root this is thought to come, in the Hebrew language ſignifies a brook or river. The Septuagint verſion, which is followed by the Vulgate Latin and Ethiopic verſions, renders it, for that which obtained the inheritance; and the Arabic verſion, concerning the inheritance; and to this agrees the old Midraſh [a] of the Jews; but what is the meaning is left to every one to conjecture; the reaſon of theſe verſions is becauſe the root from whence this word is ſuppoſed to be derived, ſignifies to inherit: the Targum renders the whole inſcription thus, to ſing upon the dances a ſong of David, as it does the title of the preceding pſalm; Aben Ezra takes the word, as he does neginoth, to be the firſt word of ſome ſong, to the tune of which this pſalm was to be ſung; and Jarchi interprets it troops or armies, and ſays it is a prayer on account of the troops of enemies that came againſt Iſrael; and that the ſinger ſaid this pſalm on the behalf of all Iſrael. The Syriac interpreter calls it a prayer in the perſon of the church, when it went in the morning to the houſe of the Lord. The occaſion of it ſeems to be the ſame with that of the two former: and certain it is, that the pſalmiſt was in diſtreſs by reaſon of wicked men when he wrote it, as appears from ſeveral paſſages in it; the ancient Jewiſh doctors [b] underſtood by them Doeg and Ahitophel; ſome think it was penned, as the preceding pſalm, on account of the rebellion of Sheba, 2 Sam. xx.

℣. 1. Give ear to my words, O Lord, &c.] Meaning not his words in common converſation, but in prayer; the words which came out of his mouth, and were audibly expreſſed by him at the throne of grace, and deſign vocal prayer; and ſo ſtand diſtinguiſhed from the meditation of his heart, ſacred ejaculations, or mental prayer; ſee Pſal. liv. 2. and xix. 14. and words in prayer to God ought to be few, at leaſt not repeated, Eccl. v. 2. Matt. vi. 7. and theſe ſhould be a man's own words, as were the pſalmiſt's; not what were ſuggeſted by another, or written in a book before him, but what were of his own compoſing and putting together, under the direction of the Spirit of God; who put words into his mouth, and furniſhed him both with words and matter, and which he freely uttered before the Lord: and this is the parrheſia, boldneſs, freedom of ſpeech, which the ſcriptures ſpeak of, Heb. iv. 16. and x. 19. and the ſaints are allowed to uſe in prayer before God; when they may pour out their ſouls unto him, and freely tell him all their mind, as the pſalmiſt now did; to which he intreats the Lord to give ear; not that God has a corporeal ear as man has, but he that made the ear has the power of hearing: this is an anthropopathy, and is ſpoken after the manner of men; ſuch as are of kind and benevolent diſpoſitions do not turn away, but ſtop and hear what a poor miſerable object has to ſay to them, to whom they liſten and return an anſwer; and ſo this phraſe is expreſſive of the kind regard God has to the prayers of the deſtitute, which he does not deſpiſe but delight in; and of his bowing and inclining his ear, or of the ſtrict and cloſe attention he gives to them; and of the full and ſuitable anſwer he returns, in his own time and way; and is what the pſalmiſt moſt earneſtly intreats. He adds, conſider my meditation; the prayer he had meditated: for meditation is requiſite to prayer, and ſhould go before it; which is neceſſary in order to pray with the underſtanding; nor ſhould men utter any thing raſhly and haſtily before the Lord: it may deſign mental prayer, in diſtinction from vocal prayer, ſignified by his words before, ſuch as that of Moſes at the Red ſea, and of Hannah before Eli, Exod. xiv. 15. 1 Sam. i. 13. The word alſo ſignifies inward mourning, ſighs and groans; the root from whence this is derived ſignifies to mourn, and is ſo rendered in Iſa. xxxviii. 14. where Hezekiah compares his prayers to the chattering of a crane and ſwallow, and the mourning of a dove; and are the ſame with the unutterable groanings with which the Spirit of God ſometimes makes interceſſion for the ſaints, Rom. viii. 26. and which are not hid from God, Pſal. xxxviii. 9. but are well known to him: he underſtands the language of a ſigh or groan; and ſo the words may be rendered underſtand my moan [c].

℣. 2. Hearken unto the voice of my cry, &c.] Which ſeems to intend more than groans or words, even a loud outcry, as of a perſon in great diſtreſs; ſuch as the ſtrong crying of Chriſt, in the days of his fleſh, when on the croſs, forſaken by God, deſerted by his friends, and ſurrounded by his enemies, Heb. v. 7. and ſuch, in ſome meaſure, was the caſe of David his type. The arguments uſed by him, that the Lord would hearken to him, are as follow: and the firſt is taken from his intereſt in the Lord, and his relation to him, My King, and my God; the Lord was David's King in a civil ſenſe; tho' David was a king over others, yet the Lord, who is the King of kings, was King over him, and he owned him to be ſo; he was ſet upon the the throne by him, had his kingdom from him, and was accountable to him: and he was his King in a natural ſenſe, the kingdom of nature and providence belonging to him, as he was his creator, preſerver, protector and defender; and in a ſpiritual ſenſe, he being delivered from the dominion of other lords, ſin, Satan, and the world, and brought to a ſubjection to him by his Spirit and grace; and ſo to own him as his King and Lawgiver, as well as his Saviour. And he was his God; not in a general way, as he is the God of the ſpirits of all fleſh living; nor merely in the peculiar way in which he was the God of the people of Iſrael; but in a moſt ſpecial manner, as being his covenant-God and Father in Chriſt. He was his God, not only as the God of nature and providence, but as the God of all grace; who had diſtinguiſhed him by ſpecial and ſpiritual bleſſings and favours; and whom David loved, believed in, and worſhipped as his God. And this his intereſt in him, and relation to him, he uſes with great pertinence and propriety, as an argument that he might be heard by him; ſince the Lord was his King, and he is ſubject; the Lord was his God, and he one of his people; the Lord was his father, and he a child of his; and therefore intreats and hopes to be heard; ſee Iſa. lxiii. 15, 16. His next argument is taken from his reſolution to pray to him, and to continue to do ſo: For unto thee will I pray; and only to thee: not to the gods of the heathen, to idols, the works of mens hands, who can neither hear nor ſave: and to thee always; ſuggeſting, that he would never leave off praying till he was heard; he would give him no reſt day nor night, until he received an anſwer.

[x] Apud Kimchi & Ben Melech in loc. So David de Pomis, Lexic. fol. 93. 1. [y] Maimon. in Miſn. Bava Kama, c. 10. ſ. 2. [z] Alnachal, apes. Arab. verſ. Deut. i. 44. [a] Midraſh Tillim apud Viccarſ. in loc. [b] Apud Kimchi & Arama in loc. [c] הגיגי murmur meum, Vatablus, Gejerus; gemitum meum, Coccius, Hammond; gemitus & ſuſpiria mea, Michaelis.

℣. 3. My voice ſhalt thou hear in the morning, O Lord, &c.] Theſe words may be conſidered, either as expreſſing the confidence of the pſalmiſt, that the Lord would hear and anſwer him, and that in the morning, every morning, as ſoon and as often as he prayed; or that he would hear him early, quickly, ſpeedily, ſeaſonably, and at the beſt time; or elſe, as declaring what he would do in conſequence of his reſolution to pray to the Lord in the preceding verſe; he would pray to him every morning: the morning is a proper time for prayer, both to return thanks to God for refreſhing ſleep and reſt, for preſervation from dangers by fire, by thieves and murderers, and for renewed mercies in the morning; as alſo to pray to God, to keep from evil and dangers the day following; to give daily food, and to ſucceed in buſineſs and the employments of life; and for a continuation of every mercy, temporal and ſpiritual. God ſhould be ſerved and ſought in the firſt place; and ſo to do, looks as if God was with his people, and they with him, when they awake in the morning. The Targum and Arabic verſion conſider the words as a petition, and render them, Hear[d] in the morning, O Lord, my voice, or my petition; and ſo bear the ſame ſenſe as the other petitions. In the morning will I direct my prayer unto thee; or ſet it in order[e]: not ſo much reſpecting the order of words, the method of prayer, which is ſometimes very broken and confuſed, and yet regarded by God; but in alluſion either to the ſhew-bread, placed in order on the table, which was typical of Chriſt's continual interceſſion for his people, Exod. xl. 4. or to the offering of incenſe and other ſacrifices, which when offered, were put in order upon the altar; and to which prayer is compared, Pſal. cxli. 2. Or the words may be rendered, I will ſtand before thee in the morning, as the Arabic verſion; or, I will preſent unto thee, as the Septuagint; that is, myſelf; ſee Job i. 6. Rom. xii. 1. tho' the ſupplement, my prayer, ſeems to be a good one; and ſo the words are ſupplied by the Jewiſh commentators[f]. And will look up; or out[g], as out of a watch-tower, Hab. ii. 1. to ſee if help is coming, and for an anſwer of prayer: the phraſe is expreſſive of hope, expectation, faith and confidence, that an anſwer would be returned; and therefore the pſalmiſt determines to look upwards to heaven, whither he directed his prayer, and from whence the anſwer muſt come; and to look out from his watch-tower, where he was waiting for it, and to continue patiently expecting it, till he had it: and the ground of his confidence were the nature and perfections of God, particularly his purity and holineſs, as appears from the following verſe.

℣. 4. For thou art not a God that hath pleaſure in wickedneſs, &c.] Sin, ungodlineſs; it is contrary to his nature, who is holy, juſt and good; and to his will revealed in his law, which is the ſame with his nature; and ſin is a tranſgreſſion of it. God is ſo far from taking pleaſure in ſin, that it is the abominable thing which his righteous ſoul hates; tho' this hinders not his voluntary permiſſion of ſin, or his decree of it; which he has willed, tho' he does not delight in it, in order to magnify the riches of his grace and mercy in the ſalvation of his people: nor is this contrary to the delight and pleaſure which he takes in the perſons of his elect in Chriſt, tho' they are ſinners in themſelves, and were ſo when he ſo loved them as to give his Son for them, and who died for them while they were yet ſinners; and when he ſends his Spirit to regenerate and ſanctify them, and are after converſion guilty of many ſins: for tho' he delights in their perſons, he has no pleaſure in their ſins; nor is it conſiſtent with the holineſs of his nature to take pleaſure in wickedneſs, let it be committed by whomſoever. Neither ſhall evil dwell with thee; that is, the evil man, who continues in a courſe of wickedneſs, and lives and dies in his ſins. He has no communion with God here, nor ſhall he dwell with him hereafter; but ſhall be bid to depart from him, whether he be a profane ſinner openly, or ſecretly a wicked profeſſor of religion. The ſenſe of the pſalmiſt is, that ſince they were evil and wicked men, that were riſen up againſt him, and gave him trouble, he entertained a ſtrong confidence that God would hear him, for himſelf and his friends, whoſe cauſe was righteous; and appear againſt his enemies, who were wicked and ungodly men; and this he grounded upon the purity and holineſs of God.

℣. 5. The fooliſh ſhall not ſtand in thy ſight, &c.] By the fooliſh, are meant not ſuch who are ſo in a natural, but in a moral ſenſe, wicked and ungodly men. The Septuagint render the word, tranſgreſſors of the law; and the Vulgate Latin verſion, the unrighteous; and the Arabic verſion, they that contradict thy precepts. The word[h] uſed comes from a root, which ſignifies to praiſe; and may deſign ſuch as are praiſers of themſelves, proud boaſters; who are elated with their own excellencies, with their wiſdom, ſtrength, honours, riches and righteouſneſs, and and treat all others with contempt; for tho' they are unrighteous, yet they truſt in themſelves that they are righteous, and deſpiſe others, which betrays their folly; hence the Syriac verſion renders it, the proud; and the Chaldee paraphraſe, mockers. And their not ſtanding in the ſight of God, denotes his abhorrence and deteſtation of them; as when one man abhors another, he cannot endure to look upon him, or bear to have him in his preſence: and it ſhews that ſuch ſhall receive no favour from him; for tho', like proud Haman, they may think themſelves his favourites, and they are the perſons the King will delight to honour; yet to their great mortification they will find, that a poor Mordecai, a mean deſpicable believer, will be preferred unto them. Nor ſhall they ſtand in acceptance and confidence before him, at the day of judgment: they will not be able to ſtand themſelves, but will call to the rocks and mountains to cover them; and they will not be ſuffered to ſtand, but will be driven from the preſence of the Lord into everlaſting burnings. Thou hateſt all workers of iniquity; not all that have ſin in them or do ſin, for there are none without it; but ſuch who give themſelves up to work wickedneſs, who make it the buſineſs of their lives, and are ſlaves unto it, living in a continued ſeries and courſe of impiety; and this character does not only belong to openly profane ſinners, but to ſome profeſſors of religion; ſee Matt. vii. 22, 23. and theſe are the objects of God's hatred. Which does not ſo much intend any paſt act of his, the preterition or paſſing them by, when he choſe others in his eternal purpoſes; in which ſenſe the word is uſed in Rom. ix. 13. as his continued averſion to them, denying them his grace and favour, and rejecting them from all nearneſs to him and communion with him; and may include the everlaſting puniſhment of them, by which his diſplicency and hatred will be made manifeſt: and he is impartial in it, without any reſpect to perſons, high or low, rich or poor; indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguiſh, will come upon every ſoul of man that does evil. God's love to his own people was antecedent to ſin, and was placed upon them in Chriſt, in whom their perſons are always well pleaſing to him; and though they ſinned in Adam, and became actual tranſgreſſors of his law, yet ſuch was his love to their perſons, that he ſaves them from their ſins by the blood and righteouſneſs of his Son.

[d] תשמע audi, Vatablus, Gejerus. [e] ערך diſponam, Montanus, Michaelis; præparabo, Pagninus, Muſculus; ordinabo, Piſcator, Gejerus. [f] Jarchi, Aben Ezra, Kimchi, & Ben Melech in loc. [g] אצפה ſpeculabor, Pagninus, Montanus, Piſcator, Michaelis; ſpeculaturus, Junius & Tremellius. [h] הוללים jactitantes, Gejerus; inſane glorioſi, Michaelis; ſo Ainſworth.

℣. 6. Thou ſhalt deſtroy them that ſpeak leaſing, &c.] Or a lie [i]; whether in matters of religion; as falſe doctrines, errors and hereſies, are lies; and ſo all that deny the deity, ſonſhip and meſſiahſhip of Chriſt, are liars; and the followers of the man of ſin ſpeak lies in hypocriſy: or in common converſation; ſuch are like to Satan, and are abominable in the ſight of God; and he will deſtroy them, either with a temporal deſtruction, with bodily diſeaſes, as Gehazi was ſmitten with a leproſy; and with corporal death, as Ananias and Sapphira; or with eternal deſtruction, the deſtruction of body and ſoul in hell; for all liars have their part in the lake which burns with fire and brimſtone. The Lord will abhor the bloody and deceitful man; or the man of blood and deceit [k]; that thirſts after blood; who ſheds innocent blood, as the Targum paraphraſes it. He ſhewed his reſentment againſt Cain, the firſt of this ſort, in a way that was intolerable to him. He very early eſtabliſhed a law, requiring that he who ſhed man's blood, by man ſhould his blood be ſhed; and he will give the whore of Rome, who has been drunk with the blood of his ſaints, blood to drink, becauſe ſhe is worthy. And all ſuch who flatter with their tongue, and ſpeak with a double heart, and lie in wait to deceive their neighbour, whether in things temporal or ſpiritual, are the objects of his abhorrence and indignation; ſee Pſalm lv. 23. Now David's enemies being ſuch ſort of perſons; fooliſh, wicked men, proud and haughty, workers of iniquity, liars, bloody and deceitful men, men that God had an abhorrence of: he therefore hoped and was confident, that God would hear his prayers againſt them, and for himſelf.

℣. 7. But as for me, I will come into thy houſe, &c.] The tabernacle of Moſes, ſometimes called the houſe of God, 1 Chron. ix. 23. for as yet the temple was not built. Here David had been uſed to go in times paſt; and tho' he was now in a kind of exile from it, he was confident he ſhould again enter into it, and determined ſo to do whenever he had an opportunity, and that in the following manner: In the multitude of thy mercy; grace or goodneſs. God is rich in mercy, abundant in goodneſs and truth; there is a multitude of mercy, love, and grace in his heart, and which is ſtored up in his covenant, and diſplayed in his Son, and in the proviſion of him as a Saviour of loſt ſinners; abundant mercy is ſhewn in regeneration, in adoption, and in the forgiveneſs of ſins, and in every ſpiritual bleſſing, and in the gift of eternal life. And now, not relying on his own merits, ſtrength and righteouſneſs, or leaning to his own underſtanding, but truſting in the mercy, grace and goodneſs of God in Chriſt, and in hope of finding more grace and mercy to help in time of need; with thankfulneſs for what he had received, he determines, by divine leave and aſſiſtance, to enter into the houſe of the Lord: and whatever other perſons did, whom he had before deſcribed, it was his reſolution to ſerve the Lord, under a ſenſe of his mercy and goodneſs to him; which laid him under an obligation ſo to do, and is the true principle from which all ſervice ſhould proceed. And in thy fear will I worſhip toward thy holy temple; either heaven, the habitation of God's holineſs, towards which and to God there, the pſalmiſt would lift up his eyes, his hands and heart; or the tabernacle, at the door of which the worſhip of God was performed, the ſacrifices were brought, and God met his people; and therefore he ſays, he would worſhip towards the temple or tabernacle, Levit. i. 3. Exod. xxix. 42, 43. And it may be that David has reference to the Meſſiah, the medium of divine worſhip; whoſe human nature was typified by the tabernacle and temple, in which the fulneſs of the Godhead dwells: the pſalmiſt therefore purpoſes to worſhip God in Chriſt, and to perform all acts of worſhip, as prayer, praiſe, hearing the word, offering ſacrifice, &c. in the name and faith of Chriſt; looking towards him for the preſentation of his ſervices by him, and for the acceptance of them with God through him: and this he deſired to do in the fear of God; not with a ſlaviſh fear, but with reverence and godly fear; with a fear influenced by the multitude of God's mercy, grace and goodneſs, in a humble, modeſt manner, not truſting to or depending upon any ſervice done by him.

℣. 8.

[i] כזב mendacium. V. L. Gejerus; ſo Ainſworth.

[k] איש דמים ומרמה vir ſanguinum & doli, vel fraudis, Montanus, Cocceius,

℣. 8. Lead me, O Lord, in thy righteouſneſs, &c.] Not in mine but thine; in the righteouſneſs of God, which is revealed in the goſpel, from faith to faith, and is imputed by God, and received by faith; in this righteouſneſs the pſalmiſt deſired to be led into the houſe of God, and appear before him; nor is there any other righteouſneſs, in which man can ſtand before God and worſhip. Or elſe the ſenſe is, that God would lead him in the way of righteouſneſs, in his righteous ſtatutes, judgments and ordinances; in which way the Lord does lead his people, Pſal. xxiii. 3. Prov. viii. 20. Or that he would lead him for his righteouſneſs-ſake; becauſe of his faithfulneſs to his promiſes, that he would direct, uphold, and never leave nor forſake him. David was very ſenſible that the way of man is not in himſelf, and that he could not direct his own ſteps; and therefore deſired to be guided by the Lord, and to be led by the right hand of his righteouſneſs, and to be upheld by it in his ways: Becauſe of mine enemies; or, thoſe that obſerve me [l]: that lie in wait and watch for my halting, as Jeremiah's enemies did; and would rejoice at my fall, and inſult me, and blaſpheme thy name; therefore lead, guide and uphold me. Make thy way ſtraight before my face; thy way of providence, thy way of grace, thy way of worſhip and duty; let it appear plain and manifeſt, that I may know in which way I ſhould walk; and let all obſtructions be removed out of the way, that I may walk ſtraight on, without any difficulty or hindrance. He ſeems to have reſpect to his enemies, who lay in his way, that God would remove them; ſee ℣. 9, 10.

℣. 9. For there is no faithfulneſs in their mouth, &c.] In the mouth of the ungodly, as the Chaldee paraphraſe; in the mouth of every one of them, as Aben Ezra interprets it: that is, in the mouth of every wicked, bloody and deceitful man; of every one of David's enemies, as Saul, or the conſpirators with Abſalom his ſon. There was no ſtedfaſtneſs in them; nothing right, ſure, or firm ſaid by them; nothing that could be depended upon; there was no truth in them, as the Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, Arabic, and Ethiopic verſions render it. And as this was true of David's, ſo of Chriſt's enemies; of Herod, and of the Herodians, and of the Scribes and Phariſees; ſee Matt. ii. 8. and xxii. 16. and of the enemies of Chriſt's goſpel; of all falſe teachers, who ſpeak not the word faithfully; tell dreams, uſe the hidden things of diſhoneſty, walk in craftineſs, handle the word of God deceitfully, and ſpeak lies in hypocriſy: there is no certainty in them, nor is any thing they ſay to be truſted to. And this is the character of wicked men in common: they are an aſſembly of treacherous men; there is none upright among them; nor is any confidence to be placed in them: the people of God are in danger of being impoſed upon, and miſled by them to their hurt; and therefore the pſalmiſt prays, that the Lord would lead him in his righteouſneſs. Their inward part is very wickedneſs; their heart, which is deſperately wicked, exceeding ſinful; not only wicked, and very wicked, but wickedneſs itſelf. This is the root and fountain of all wickedneſs; and the reaſon why there is no faithfulneſs in their mouth: the word [m] is ſometimes rendered, their inward thought, Pſal. xlix. 11. and lxiv. 6. which is the inmoſt of man, the neareſt to him; and which and even the imagination of it is evil, and that continually: the word [n] tranſlated wickedneſs, ſignifies woes, calamities, and miſchiefs; and ſuch the wicked hearts of men are full of, and are continually deviſing againſt the people of God, and his righteous cauſe. And this is the juſt character of ungodly men, even though they may profeſs to know God, have a form of godlineſs, and be outwardly righteous before men; as theſe were David was concerned with. Their throat is an open ſepulchre; or as one, as the Targum paraphraſes it; to which the throat of wicked men may be compared for its voracity and inſatableneſs; the grave being one of thoſe three or four things, which never has enough or is ſatisfied. And this is true of the throat, whether it be conſidered as an inſtrument of ſpeech, and throws out devouring words to the prejudice of the characters and reputations of others; or as an inſtrument of ſwallowing meat and drink, and where the pleaſure of appetite is; and ſo may be expreſſive of the eager deſire of the wicked after ſin, who drink up iniquity like water; and of their delight in it, and their fulneſs of it, and yet ſtill greedy, inſatiable, and not to be ſatisfied: and their throat may be compared to an open grave, for the nauſeous ſtench it emits; corrupt communication, filthineſs, and fooliſh talking proceeding out of it; and horrible oaths, curſes, imprecations, and blaſphemies being belched out through it; and for the danger which is by it, ſince into it men may fall unawares; and ſo the evil communications of wicked men corrupt good manners, and do great miſchief to thoſe who fall into company with them. They flatter with their tongue; or, make it ſmooth [o]; uſe oily expreſſions, ſoft language: or, part or divide [p] their tongue; are double-tongued and double-hearted; and ſo deceive perſons, as the apoſtle interprets it in Rom. iii. 13. They flatter God himſelf, drawing nigh to him in an hypocritical way; they flatter men, their neighbours, and impoſe upon them; they flatter princes, and ſuch ſycophants were about David. And ſuch are falſe teachers, who propheſy ſmooth things, and with good words and fair ſpeeches deceive the hearts of the ſimple; on which account there is great reaſon to pray to be led and directed by the Lord.

℣. 10. Deſtroy thou them, O God, &c.] Or make them guilty [q]; that is, make them appear to be guilty, either to themſelves, that they may acknowledge their offences, confeſs their guilt, and aſk for pardon; or to others, pronounce them guilty, paſs the ſentence of condemnation on them: and the Chaldee paraphraſe and the Syriac verſion render it by חיב condemn them, or hold them guilty; and the Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, Arabic and Ethiopic verſions, judge them; treat them as guilty perſons, puniſh them, deſtroy them ſoul and body, with an everlaſting deſtruction. Let them fall by their own counſels; into the pit they have dug for others; as Haman fell by his counſels, and was hanged on the gallows he prepared for Mordecai. And ſo ſometimes a man's own counſel caſts him down, and is the cauſe of his ruin, Job xviii. 7. Or, becauſe of their own counſels; ſels [s]; which they have taken againſt the Lord and his anointed, againſt his cauſe and intereſt, and againſt his righteous ones, particularly David; meaning their wicked counſels, in which they walked; ſee Hoſ. xi. 6. Or from their counſels [s]; as the Targum and moſt verſions render it: that is, let their counſels be turned into fooliſhneſs, become brutiſh, be carried headlong, and come to nought. Which had its accompliſhment in Ahithophel. Caſt them out; either out of their own country, and carry them into captivity; or from the preſence of the Lord, from his tabernacle and worſhip; which David's enemies now enjoyed, and gloried in: or into outer darkneſs, into a furnace of fire, where there is weeping and wailing and gnaſhing of teeth. In the multitude of their tranſgreſſions: when God deals with men in a way of grace, he turns away ungodlineſs from them, or them from their ungodlineſs; but when in a way of judgment he ſuffers them to die in their ſins, and ſo periſh: or for the multitude of their tranſgreſſions [t]. The ſins of tranſgreſſors are many; and becauſe of them they are caſt out of the ſight of God, and will be bid to depart from him hereafter. For they have rebelled againſt thee: all ſin is a rebellion againſt God; hence ſinners are called rebellious ones. The rebellion of David's ſubjects againſt him, was a rebellion againſt God; becauſe it was an attempt to dethrone him, whom God had made king of Iſrael. The word [u] ſignifies, to imbitter, exaſperate and provoke: and ſuch is the nature of ſin, it is a bitter thing in itſelf, and it provokes the eyes of God's glory. Now theſe ſeveral expreſſions are to be conſidered, not ſo much petitions, as prophecies; and not as imprecations, but as predictions of what would be the portion of wicked men.

[l] שורדי obſervatores meos, Junius & Tremellius, Cocceius, Michaelis; ſo Aben Ezra, Kimchi, Ben Melech, & Ainſworth. [m] קרבם η καρδια, Sept. cor, V.L. i. e. cogitatio, Muis. [n] הוות ærumnæ, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Gejerus; calamitates, Cocceius; ſo Ainſworth. [o] חליקון levigant, ſeu emolliunt, Piſcator, Gejerus. [p] Divident vel diſpertient, Mariana. [q] האשימם reos fac iſtos, Junius & Tremellius; ſo Piſcator, Cocceius, Schmidt, Michaelis, Kimchi, and Ainſworth.

℣. 11. But let all thoſe that put their truſt in thee rejoice, &c.] Who truſt not in themſelves, in their own hearts, in their righteouſneſs, or riches, or ſtrength; but in the name, righteouſneſs and ſtrength of the Lord: who betake themſelves to him, and put all their confidence in him: let them rejoice in the ſalvation of the Lord, and in hope of eternal glory and happineſs. Let them even ſhout for joy: not only rejoice inwardly, but expreſs their joy externally, with their voices, and in the loudeſt manner; and that always, the matter and foundation of a believer's joy always continues; and ſo does the grace itſelf: though it is not always in exerciſe, yet it is an everlaſting joy; and with it the redeemed of the Lord will come to Zion, and no man will be able to take away their joy. Which diſtinguiſhes it from the triumphing of the wicked, and the joy of the hypocrite, which is but for a moment. Becauſe thou defendeſt them, or covereſt them [w]; with the feathers of divine protection, under the ſhadow of his wings, and with the hollow of his hand: ſo God preſerves his people, keeps them by his power, as the apple of his eye, and is a wall of fire round about them. Which is a good reaſon why they ſhould rejoice, and ſhout for joy. Let them alſo that love thy name; as all that put their truſt in the Lord do; they love the Lord himſelf, becauſe of the perfections of his nature, and the works of his hands, and for what he has done for them: they love all they know of him; they love him in all his perſons, Father, Son, and Spirit; and every name of his, by which he has made himſelf known. They love, admire, and adore all his attributes and perfections, as they are diſplayed in the works of creation and providence; and eſpecially in redemption by Jeſus Chriſt, where they all glorioufly meet together; and in whom God has proclaimed his name gracious and merciful. They love his word, his goſpel, by which he is made known; and they love his people, on whom his name is called, and who call upon his name. And let ſuch, ſays the pſalmiſt, be joyful in thee: not rejoice in their boaſting of their wiſdom, ſtrength, riches and righteouſneſs; all ſuch rejoicing is evil: but in the Lord, in his grace, righteouſneſs and ſalvation. He is the only true proper object of ſpiritual joy; and there is good reaſon for it, from what follows.

℣. 12. For thou, Lord, wilt bleſs the righteous.] As he has bleſſed him with a righteouſneſs, even the righteouſneſs of God imputed to him, by which he is denominated righteous, and with the forgiveneſs of his ſins; ſo he will bleſs him with peace and proſperity, with all ſpiritual bleſſings, with the bleſſings of grace here, and glory hereafter. Hence he has juſt reaſon to rejoice and be glad. With favour wilt thou compaſs him, as with a ſhield: by which is meant the free favour, love, and grace of God in Chriſt, which ſprings from his ſovereign will and pleaſure; is his good will to men, and the exceeding riches of his grace, ſhewn in his kindneſs towards them in Chriſt Jeſus: and the compaſſing or crowning of the righteous with it, as the word [x] ſignifies, is expreſſive of the abundance of it, in the application of it to them in converſion, and in every inſtance and bleſſing of grace; for ſuch are crowned with loving-kindneſs and tender mercies; the grace of the Lord is exceeding abundant towards them, it flows and overflows; it ſurrounds them on all ſides, and covers them all over: it is as a ſhield unto them from all their enemies, Pſalm xl. 11. and which being held in the hand of faith, quenches the fiery darts of Satan; and is the ſaint's ſecurity from every enemy, and from all hurt and danger, here or hereafter; ſee Zeph. iii. 17. Rom. viii. 38, 39. and is a crown of glory upon them, which makes them glorious, lovely and amiable. Some interpret this of Chriſt the righteous One; ſo Nebienſis.

PSALM VI.

To the chief muſician on Neginoth upon Sheminith, a pſalm of David.

WHAT is deſigned by the chief muſician, and what is meant by neginoth, have been obſerved in the title of Pſalm iv. As for ſheminith, it ſeems to be one particular ſort of the neginoth, or ſtringed inſtrument, which this man had the care of; ſee the title of Pſalm xii. which moſt of the Hebrew

[s] ממועצותיהם propter conſilia ſua, Piſcator; ſo Tigurine verſion, and Michaelis. [t] ברב propter multitudinem, Muſculus, Pagninus, Piſcator, Gejerus, Michaelis; ſo Ainſworth. [u] מרו irritaverunt, V. L. ſee Ainſworth. [w] ותסך עלימו & operies ſuper eos, Vatablus; operies & proteges eos, Michaelis. [x] תעטרנו ἐστεφανωσας ἡμας, Sept. coronaſti nos, V. L. Arab. Ethiop. coronabis eum, Pagninus, Montanus, Cocceius.

Hebrew writers [y] underſtand of the harp of eight ſtrings, to which this pſalm was ſet; and which, from the number of its ſtrings, was called ſheminith, which ſignifies the eighth: and this receives confirmation from 1 Chron. xv. 21. The eighth ſtring was added to the harp by Simonides, according to Pliny [z]: but if ſuch an harp is here meant, this refutes it, for David lived long before Simonides. Though ſome [a] have thought it refers to a poem or ſong of eight notes, to the tune of which this pſalm was ſung; or to the eighth note, which was grave, and which we call the baſe. As for the eighth day of circumciſion, of which ſome Jewiſh writers myſtically interpret it; or the eighth, that is, the firſt day, or Lord's day, to which ſome of the ancient Chriſtian writers refer it, or the eighth age, or millennium, as Theodoret; theſe can by no means be admitted of. The occaſion of it was either ſome bodily diſeaſe the pſalmiſt laboured under, or ſome diſtreſs of ſoul, on account of ſin; and the rather this ſeems to be the caſe, ſeeing the pſalm begins with the ſame words as pſalm xxxviii. in which the pſalmiſt ſo much bewails his iniquity. Some have thought it was drawn up for the uſe of any and every ſick perſon; and others ſay it was written on the account of Iſrael in captivity, who were then as ſick perſons [b]: but rather, the occaſion of it was bodily ſickneſs, inward guilt of conſcience for ſin, and diſtreſs by enemies; as appears from ℣. 3, 4, 7, 8.

℣. 1. O Lord, rebuke me not in thine anger, &c.] The Lord ſometimes rebukes, or reproves, men by his Spirit, and ſometimes by his word and miniſters, and ſometimes by his providences, and that on account of ſin; to bring to a ſenſe and acknowledgment of it; and particularly for remiſſneſs in duty, or neglect of it; and for truſting in the creature, or in any outward enjoyment, boaſting of it, and loving it too much; and theſe rebukes of his own people are always in love, and never in wrath, though they ſometimes fear they are; ſee Pſalm lxxxviii. 7, 16. Lam. iii. 1. and therefore deprecate them, as the pſalmiſt here does; not the thing itſelf, but the manner in which it is apprehended it is done, or doing. Neither chaſten me in thy hot diſpleaſure; when God chaſtens his own people it is not in a way of vindictive wrath, or as a proper puniſhment for ſin; for this would be contrary to Chriſt's ſuretyſhip-engagements and performances, and to the doctrine of his ſatisfaction for ſin; it would draw a vail over it, and render it of none effect; it would be contrary to the juſtice of God to puniſh both ſurety and principal; and to the everlaſting love of God to them, in which he always reſts, and from which there can be no ſeparation; nor would they be dealt with as children; and beſides would be condemned with the world, and killed with the ſecond death; whereas they will not, though chaſtened of God, it is the chaſtning of a father, is very inſtructive to them, and is always for their good, ſpiritual and eternal; is in meaſure, in judgment, and in love; and never in fury and hot diſpleaſure; but this being feared, is deprecated.

℣. 2. Have mercy upon me, O Lord, &c.] He knew he was a ſinner, both by original ſin and actual tranſgreſſion, which he was always ready to own; he knew that what he had done deſerved the wrath of God, even his hot diſpleaſure; and that for ſuch things it came upon the children of diſobedience: he knew that there was mercy with God through Chriſt, and therefore he flees unto it, pleads for it, and intreats the manifeſtation of forgiving love: he pleads no merits of his own, nor makes any mention of former works of righteouſneſs done by him, but throws himſelf upon the mercy of God in Chriſt; giving this as a reaſon, for I am weak; either in body, through ſome diſeaſe upon him; or in ſoul, being enfeebled by ſin, and ſo without ſpiritual ſtrength to do that which was good of himſelf; to exerciſe grace, and perform duty, and much leſs to keep the law of God, or make atonement for ſin, or to bear the puniſhment of it. O Lord, heal me; meaning either his body, for God is the phyſician of the body, he wounds and he heals; ſo he healed Hezekiah and others; and he ſhould be ſought to in the firſt place by perſons under bodily diſorders: or elſe his ſoul, as in Pſal. xli. 4. ſin is the diſeaſe of the ſoul, and a very lothſome one it is, and is incurable but by the balm of Gilead, and the phyſician there; by the blood of Chriſt, and forgiveneſs through it; and the forgiveneſs of ſin is the healing of the diſeaſes of the ſoul, Pſal. ciii. 3. For my bones are vexed; with ſtrong pain; meaning his body, as Kimchi and Aben Ezra obſerve; becauſe theſe are the foundation of the body, and the more principal parts of it: and this may be underſtood of his grief and trouble of heart for his ſins and tranſgreſſions, which is ſometimes expreſſed by the bones being broke, and by there being no reſt in them, Pſal. li. 8. and xxxviii. 3.

℣. 3. My ſoul is alſo ſore vexed, &c.] Or exceedingly troubled [c], and even frightned and thrown into a conſternation with indwelling ſin, and on account of actual tranſgreſſions, and by reaſon of the hidings of God's face, and through the temptations of Satan, and becauſe of the fear of death; to which Old-Teſtament-ſaints were very incident. But thou, O Lord, how long? it is an abrupt expreſſion, the whole he deſigned is not ſpoken, being hindered through the grief and ſorrow with which his heart was overwhelmed; and is to be ſupplied after this manner, "ſhall I have refreſhment?" as the Chaldee paraphraſe; or "wilt thou look and not heal me?" as Jarchi; or "my ſoul be troubled?" as Aben Ezra; or "ſhall I be afflicted, and thou wilt not heal me?" as Kimchi; or "wilt thou afflict me, and not ariſe to my help?" ſee Pſal. xiii. 1, 2.

℣. 4. Return, O Lord, &c.] By this it ſeems that the Lord had withdrawn himſelf, and was departed from the pſalmiſt, wherefore he intreats him to return unto him, and grant him his gracious preſence. God is immenſe and omnipreſent, he is every where: going away and returning cannot be properly aſcribed to him; but he may be ſaid to depart from his people, as to ſenſible communion with him, and enjoyment of him; when he hides his face, withdraws his gracious preſence, and the comfortable diſcoveries and influences of his love; and he may be ſaid to return when he viſits them again, and manifeſts his love and favour to them: the Jewiſh writers [d] interpret it, "return from the fierceneſs of thine anger," as in Pſalm lxxxv. 3. and though there is no ſuch change in God, as from love to wrath, and from wrath to love; but inaſmuch as there is a change in his diſpenſations towards his people, it is as if it was ſo; and thus it is

[y] Targum, Jarchi, Kimchi, & Ben Melech in loc.
[b] Vid. Kimchi & Aben Ezra in loc.
[c] נבהלה מאד turbata eſt valde, V. L. conturbata, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator; territa valde, Pagninus, Montanus; conſternata valde, Cocceius.
[z] Nat. Hiſt. l. 7. c. 56.
[a] In Aben Ezra in loc.
[d] Jarchi, Aben Ezra, Kimchi, & Ben Melech in loc.

is apprehended by them. Deliver my ſoul; from the anxiety, diſtreſs, and ſore vexation it was now in, for of all troubles ſoul-troubles are the worſt; and from all enemies and workers of iniquity which were now about him, and gave him much grief and uneaſineſs; and from death itſelf, he was in fear of. O, ſave me for thy mercy's ſake; out of all troubles of ſoul and body, and out of the hands of all enemies, inward and outward; and with temporal, ſpiritual, and eternal ſalvation; not for his righteouſneſs-ſake, as Kimchi well obſerves; for ſalvation is according to the abundant mercy of God, and not through works of righteouſneſs done by men, otherwiſe it would not be of grace.

℣. 5. For in death there is no remembrance of thee, &c.] Of the goodneſs, truth, power, and faithfulneſs of God; no notice can be taken, nor mention made either of the perfections or works of God, whether of nature or of grace, by a dead man to others; he is wholly uſeleſs to men on earth with reſpect to theſe things. In the grave who ſhall give thee thanks? for mercies temporal or ſpiritual; the dead cannot praiſe the Lord among men, only the living; ſee Pſal. xxx. 9. and cxv. 17. Iſa. xxxviii. 18, 19. wherefore the pſalmiſt deſires that he might live and praiſe the Lord; this argument is taken from the glory of God, which end cannot be anſwered among men by death, as by life. It does not follow from hence that the ſoul either dies or ſleeps with the body, and is unactive until the reſurrection-morn, neither of which are true; or that the ſouls of departed ſaints are unemployed in heaven; they are always before the throne, and ſerve the Lord day and night; they remember, with the utmoſt gratitude and thankfulneſs, all the goodneſs and grace of God unto them, and praiſe him for all his wondrous works: but the ſenſe is, that when a ſaint is dead, he can no more ſerve and glorify God on earth among men.

℣. 6. I am weary with my groaning, &c.] By reaſon of bodily illneſs, or indwelling ſin, or the guilt of actual tranſgreſſions, or the hidings of God's face, or a ſenſe of divine wrath, or the temptations of Satan, or afflictions and croſſes of various kinds, or fears of death, or even earneſt deſires after heaven and eternal happineſs, or the low eſtate of Zion; each of which at times occaſion groaning in the ſaints, as in the pſalmiſt, and is the common experience of all good men. The pſalmiſt being weary of his diſeaſe, or of ſin, groaned till he was weary with his groaning; inward groaning affects the body, waſtes the animal ſpirits, conſumes the fleſh, and induces wearineſs and faintneſs; ſee Pſal. cii. 5. Jer. xlv. 3. All the night make I my bed to ſwim: I water my couch with my tears; theſe are hyperbolical phraſes [c], expreſſing more than is intended, and are not to be literally underſtood; for ſuch a quantity of tears a man could never ſhed, as to water his couch and make his bed to ſwim with them, but they are uſed to denote the multitude of them, and the exceſſiveneſs of his ſorrow; ſee Pſal. cxix. 136. Lam. iii. 48, 49. and theſe tears were ſhed, not to atone and ſatisfy for ſin, for nothing but the blood and ſacrifice of Chriſt can do that; but to expreſs the truth and reality, as well as the abundance of his grief; and this was done all the night long; ſee Job vii. 3, 4. when he had leiſure to think and reflect upon his ſins and tranſgreſſions, and when he was clear of all company, and no one could hear or ſee him, nor interrupt him in the vent of his ſorrow, and when his diſeaſe might be heavier upon him, as ſome diſeaſes increaſe in the night-ſeaſon: this may alſo be myſtically underſtood, of a night of ſpiritual darkneſs and deſertion, when a ſoul is without the diſcoveries of the love of God, and the influences of his grace; and has loſt ſight of God and Chriſt, and intereſt in them, and does not enjoy communion with them; and throughout this night-ſeaſon, weeping endures tho' joy comes in the morning. And it may be applicable to David's antitype, to the doleful night in which he was betrayed, when it was the hour and power of darkneſs, and when he had no other couch or bed but the ground itſelf; which was watered, not only with his tears, but with his ſweat and blood, his ſweat being as it were great drops of blood falling to the ground; ſo he is often ſaid to ſigh and groan in ſpirit, Mark vii. 34. and viii. 12. John xi. 33, 38.

℣. 7. Mine eye is conſumed becauſe of grief, &c.] Either by reaſon of the affliction he laboured under, which could not be joyous but grievous; or becauſe of the ſin that was in him, and thoſe that he had committed, which were grieving to him; or through the ſins of other profeſſors of religion, or profane ſinners, whom he beheld with grief of heart and weeping eyes: the word [f] uſed ſignifies anger and indignation, and ſorrow ariſing from thence, and may denote either indignation in himſelf at his enemies, who were rejoicing at his calamities; or the ſenſe he had of the anger of God, and his hot diſpleaſure, which he feared he was rebuking and chaſtening him with; and now his heart being filled with grief on one or other of theſe accounts, or all of them, vented itſelf in floods of tears, which hurt the viſive faculty; for through much weeping the eye is weakned and becomes dim, and through a multitude of tears, and a long continuance of them, it fails; ſee Job xvii. 7. Pſal. xxxi. 9. Lam. ii. 11. It waxeth old becauſe of all mine enemies; ſaints have many enemies, ſin, Satan, and the world; and theſe are very oppreſſive ones, as the word [g] here ſignifies; ſuch as beſet them about, ſtraiten them on all hands, and preſs them ſore; and they muſt be preſſed down by them, were it not that he that is in them is greater than he that is in the world; and David's enemies gave him ſo much trouble, and cauſed him to ſhed ſuch plenty of tears, that his eye waxed old, was ſhrunk up, and beſet with wrinkles, the ſigns of old age; or it was removed out of its place, as the word is rendered in Job xviii. 4. or the ſight was removed from that, it was gone from him, Pſal. xxxviii. 10.

℣. 8. Depart from me, all ye workers of iniquity, &c.] The pſalmiſt being fully aſſured that God had heard his prayer, that he ſhould recover from his diſorder, or be delivered out of his calamities, whether corporal or ſpiritual, has on a ſudden a ſpring of joy, faith, and comfort; as ſometimes there is a quick tranſition from comfortable to uncomfortable frames; ſee Pſalm xxx. 7. ſo on the contrary, there is as quick a paſſage from uncomfortable to comfortable ones; ſee Lam. iii. 18, 24. who may be called workers of iniquity may be ſeen in the note on Pſal. v. 5. and theſe were either his open enemies, as Saul and his men, or Abſalom and the conſpirators with him, whom he bids to ceaſe from following and purſuing after him; or his ſecret ones, hypocritical courtiers, that were about him, who were wiſhing and hoping for his death. It

[c] See the latter in Homer. Odyſſ. 17. v. 110. Odyſſ. 19. prope finem.

[f] מכעס præ ira, Pagninus; præ indignatione, Montanus, Muſculus; ex indignatione, Piſcator. [g] צוררי angueſtiatores, Montanus; anguſtiis afficientes me, Vatablus; oppreſſores meos, Junius & Tremellius, Gejerus.

It is the lot of God's people to be among the workers of iniquity; Lot was among the Sodomites, David was in Meſhech and in the tents of Kedar, Iſaiah was among men of unclean lips; Chriſt's lily is among thorns, and his ſheep among goats; and though in ſome reſpects a civil converſation with wicked men cannot be avoided, for then good men muſt needs go out of the world; yet as little company ſhould be kept with them as can be, and no fellowſhip ſhould be had with them in ſinful practices, nor in ſuperſtitious worſhip; and though there will not be a full and final ſeparation from them in the preſent ſtate of things, there will be hereafter, when theſe very words will be uſed by David's antitype, the Lord Jeſus Chriſt; not only to profane ſinners, but to carnal profeſſors of religion, who have herded themſelves with the people of God, Matt. xxv. 41. and vii. 23. Luke xiii. 25—28. The reaſon why the pſalmiſt took heart and courage, and ordered his wicked perſecutors, or ſycophants, to be gone from him, was his aſſurance of being heard by the Lord. For the Lord hath heard the voice of my weeping; referring to what is ſaid ℣. 6, 7. he had not only lift up his voice in prayer, but he had wept and made ſupplication, as Jacob did, Hoſ. xii. 4. ſometimes God brings his people to the throne of grace weeping, and with ſupplications leads them, Jer. xxxi. 9. and then hears their cry and anſwers them.

℣. 9. The Lord hath heard my ſupplication, &c.] Which he had preſented to him, ℣. 1, 2, 4. in which he deprecates his anger and hot diſpleaſure; intreats his free favour, grace, and mercy; deſires healing for ſoul or body, or both; prays a return of his gracious preſence; and deliverance and ſalvation out of all his troubles, from all his enemies, and from death itſelf. The word [h] uſed properly ſignifies petitions for grace and mercy, which the pſalmiſt put up under the influence of the Spirit of grace and ſupplication, and which were heard. The Lord will receive my prayer; inſtead of a burnt-offering, as Aben Ezra gloſſes it; as ſweet incenſe, as what is grateful and delightful, coming up out of the hands of Chriſt the mediator, perfumed with the ſweet incenſe of his mediation: the word [i] ſignifies prayer made to God as the righteous judge, as the God of his righteouſneſs, who would vindicate his cauſe and right his wrongs; and a believer, through the blood and righteouſneſs of Chriſt, can go to God as a righteous God, and plead with him even for pardon and cleanſing, who is juſt and faithful to grant both unto him. The pſalmiſt three times expreſſes his confidence of his prayers being heard and received, which may be either in reference to his having prayed ſo many times for help, as the apoſtle Paul did, 2 Cor. xii. 8. and as Chriſt his antitype did, Matt. xxvi. 39, 42, 44. or to expreſs the certainty of it, the ſtrength of his faith in it, and the exuberance of his joy on account of it.

℣. 10. Let all mine enemies be aſhamed, &c.] Or they ſhall be aſhamed [k]; and ſo the following clauſes may be rendered, and be conſidered as prophecies of what would be; though if this be conſidered as an imprecation, it is wiſhing no ill; wicked men are not aſhamed of their abominations committed by them, neither can they bluſh; it would be well if they were aſhamed of them, and brought to true repentance for them; and if they are not aſhamed now, they will be hereafter, when the judge of quick and dead appears. And ſore vexed; or troubled [l]; as his bones had been vexed, and his ſoul had been ſore vexed by them; as he knew they would be through diſappointment at his recovery, and at his deliverance from the diſtreſſes and calamities he was now in, when he ſhould ſing for joy of heart, and they ſhould howl for vexation of ſpirit. Let them return; meaning either from him, from purſuing after him; or to him, to ſeek his favour, and be reconciled to him, and be at peace with him, as Aben Ezra and Kimchi explain it; unleſs this word ſhould only ſignify again, as it ſometimes does, and be read in connection with what follows; let them be again aſhamed ſuddenly [m]; intimating that his deliverance would be ſudden, in a moment, in a very little time, and ſo would be their diſappointment, ſhame, and confuſion. Jarchi from R. Jonathan and R. Samuel bar Nachmani, refers this to the ſhame of the wicked in the world to come.

PSALM VII.

Shiggaion of David, which he ſang unto the Lord, concerning the words of Cuſh the Benjamite.

THE name of this pſalm ſhiggaion, either reſpects the muſic or the matter of the pſalm. Some take it to be the name of the muſical inſtrument, to which the pſalm was ſet [n]: ſo Habakkuk's prayer is ſaid to be upon ſhigionoth; which is the ſame word with this, only of the plural number, Hab. iii. 1. Others ſay it was the firſt word of a ſong, to the tune of which this was ſung [o]. And others underſtand it of a certain kind of a ſong [p]: and the Targum renders it, the interpretation of the ode of David; which Ainſworth renders, David's interpretation of the law; reading אוריתא inſtead of אוריתא as does alſo the king of Spain's Bible. And certain it is, that it is the name of a ſong; ſince it follows, which he ſang unto the Lord; in his preſence, before him, and to the glory of his name. But the queſtion is, of what ſort it is? and why it ſhould be ſo called? ſince its root שגה ſignifies to err or wander: it is more generally rendered, an erratic or wandering ode; a ſong or pſalm, which conſiſted of various kind of metre: it was ſung with various notes, and all kind of muſic, which made it very pleaſant. Hence ſome render it, David's delight, as R. Obadiah Gaon; and the verb from whence it is derived, is tranſlated raviſhed in Prov. v. 19, 20. and Ben Melech ſays, the word ſignifies שמחה וערבות joy and pleaſure; and Aben Ezra obſerves that ſome interpret it, תענוג delight. But others are of opinion, that this word regards the ſubject-matter of the pſalm, and may be rendered, David's ignorance or error; his ſin of ignorance; and reſpects his miſtaken conduct with regard to his enemies, particularly Saul, in making imprecations upon them, Pſalm vi. 10. in curſing curſing them, and eſpecially king Saul; when a king is not to be curſed, Eccleſ. x. 20. and in cutting off the ſkirt of his garment, for which his heart ſmote him, 1 Sam. xxiv. 4, 5. Some render it, the care of David, as Cocceius; which he wrote in deep meditation, when he had forgot himſelf, and was as it were in an extaſy; ſetting forth the ſum of his cares, as Ainſworth expreſſes it, when he was haraſſed and greatly afflicted by his enemies. The occaſion of it is, the words of Cuſh the Benjamite; which ſome underſtand of Shimei the Benjamite, who came out and curſed David as he went along, when he fled from Abſalom, 1 Sam. xvi. 5—11. Theodoret thinks Huſhai is meant, who perſuaded Abſalom not to follow the counſel of Ahithophel; on which account David penned this pſalm. Others interpret it of one of Saul's courtiers, who was of the tribe of Benjamin, and whoſe name was Cuſh [q]; and which is very likely, ſince it is evident that ſome of Saul's courtiers accuſed David to him, and charged him with ſeeking his hurt, not only to take away his crown and kingdom, but his life, 1 Sam. xxiv. 9. and xxvi. 19. Though the generality of the Jewiſh writers [r] interpret it of Saul himſelf, who is called Cuſh, in alluſion to his father's name Kiſh, who was a man of Benjamin, 1 Sam. ix. 1. or elſe becauſe Cuſh ſignifies an Ethiopian, to which he may be compared, as the children of Iſrael in Amos ix. 7. For as the Ethiopian is various in his ſkin, ſo was Saul in his actions, as Jarchi obſerves: or rather becauſe, as Kimchi and Ben Melech expreſs it, as the Ethiopian does not change his ſkin, Jer. xiii. 23. ſo Saul did not change his hatred to David. Though the ſame writers obſerve, that he may be called ſo by the rule of contraries, becauſe he was a very goodly and beautiful man; the words referred to, are ſuppoſed to be thoſe in 1 Sam. xxii. 7, 8.

[h] תחנתי ſupplices pro gratia preces meas, Michaelis: ſo Ainſworth. [i] תפלה eſt propria oratio habita ad juris & æqui arbitrum; Cocceius in Pſal. iv. 2. [k] יבשו pudore afficientur, Pagninus, Montanus; pudefient, Cocceius, Schmidt; ſo Ainſworth. [l] יבהלו conturbantur, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator. [m] ישבו יבושו iterum confundantur, Gejerus. [n] Menachem in Jarchi in loc. So David de Pomis, Lexic. fol. 204. 1. [o] Aben Ezra in loc. [p] Kimchi in loc.

℣. 1. O Lord my God, in thee do I put my truſt, &c.] The pſalmiſt expreſſes his intereſt in God as his covenant-God, and his truſt and confidence in him; and with theſe he ſets out as the ſtay of his ſoul, and his bulwark againſt the fears of his enemies: and he does not ſay that he had truſted in God, or would for the future truſt in him; but that he did truſt in him, and continued to do ſo. And God is to be truſted in at all times; in times of affliction, temptation, and deſertion; and theſe the pſalmiſt premiſes to his petition which follows, as an encouragement to him to hope for ſucceſs, ſince God was his God, and none that ever truſted in him were confounded. Save me from all them that perſecute me, and deliver me: perſecution is no new thing to the people of God; David had his perſecutors, and many of them; the church in Jeremiah's time had hers; the ſaints, in the times of the apoſtles, and in all ages ſince, have had theirs. Every one that will live godly in Chriſt Jeſus, muſt expect perſecution in one ſhape or another; and there is none can ſave and deliver from it but God, and he can and will in his own time, 2 Cor. i. 10. David was ſenſible of this, and therefore applies to him, and him only; and not to an arm of fleſh, to his friends, or to neighbouring princes and powers.

℣. 2. Leſt he tear my ſoul like a lion, &c.] That is, one of his perſecutors, the chief of them; it may be Saul, whom the pſalmiſt compares to a lion, for his majeſty and greatneſs, the lion being the king among beaſts; and for his authority, power and might, and for his wrath and cruelty, which he feared; and which, ſhould it be exerted on him, would tear his ſoul, or himſelf, in pieces; would rend his ſoul from his body, and diſpatch his life; ſee Prov. xix. 12. So the apoſtle Paul calls the Roman governor, before whom he was, and from whoſe hands he was delivered, a lion, for his power and fierceneſs, 2 Tim. iv. 17. And ſo our adverſary the devil, the chief of all perſecutors, and who inſtigates others againſt the ſaints, is by Peter ſaid to go about like a roaring lion, 1 Pet. v. 8. Rending it in pieces, as the lion does his prey when hungry. So Homer [s] compares Polyphemus to a mountain-lion, which devours and leaves nothing, neither the inteſtines, nor fleſh nor bones; and repreſents [t] it firſt taking hold of the creature with its ſtrong teeth, and breaking its neck, and drawing out its blood and all its inwards; ſee Iſa. xxxviii. 13. While there is none to deliver; no ſaviour, no deliverer: for if God does not ſave and deliver his people out of the hands of their perſecutors, none can; eſpecially out of the hands of ſuch an one as is here deſcribed tearing and rending in pieces. As there is no God beſides the Lord, there is no Saviour beſides him; there is no temporal nor ſpiritual Saviour but he: ſalvation is not to be expected from any other; and were it not for him, ſaints muſt fall a prey to their enemies.

℣. 3. O Lord my God, if I have done this, &c.] The crime which Saul and his courtiers charged him with, and which was made ſo public that every body knew it; and therefore it was needleſs particularly to mention it; namely, that he lay in wait for Saul, and ſought his life to take it away, 1 Sam. xxiv. 9. The Targum interprets it of this pſalm, paraphraſing it, If I have made this ſong with an evil intention; to give an ill character of any, and load them with falſe charges. If there be iniquity in my hands; not that he was without ſin, he had it in his heart; nor that he lived without the actual commiſſion of ſin: but his ſenſe is, that there was no iniquity, as not in his heart, purpoſe and deſign, ſo not in his hand, nor attempted by him, of the kind he was accuſed of, 1 Sam. xxiv. 11. Otherwiſe, we often hear him complaining of the depravity of his nature, and acknowledging his ſins and tranſgreſſions, Pſal. xxxii. 5. and xxxviii. 3, 4. and li. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5.

℣. 4. If I have rewarded evil unto him that was at peace with me, &c.] That is, when Saul was at peace with him; when he lived at his court, and eat at his table. His meaning is, that he did not conſpire againſt him, nor form ſchemes to deprive him of his crown nor of his life: or, as it may be rendered, If I have rewarded to him that rewarded me evil [u]; that is, as Jarchi explains it, If I rewarded him as he rewarded me, evil for evil. This David did not; and it is eminently true of Chriſt his antitype, 1 Pet. ii. 23. and in it he ought to be imitated by every believer, Rom. xii. 17. Yea, I have delivered him that without cauſe is mine enemy; meaning Saul, who perſecuted David without any juſt reaſon, and whom David delivered without any obligation to do it; not for any benefit and kindneſs he had received from him; for the phraſe without cauſe, may be read in connexion either with the word delivered [w]; for the deliverance was wrought without any cauſe or merit on Saul's part, or profit to David; or with the word enemy, for Saul was David's enemy without any juſt cauſe on David's part:

[q] Aben Ezra & Obadiah Gaon in loc. [r] Targum, Jarchi, Kimchi, Arama, & Ben Melech in loc. [s] Odyſſ. 9. v. 292, 293. [t] Iliad. 11. v. 175, 176. & Iliad. 17. v. 63. [u] Si malum malo rependi, Caſtalio. [w] חינם abſque emolumento ullo ad me inde redeunte, Guſſetius.

part: and the deliverance referred to, was when he cut off Saul's ſkirt, in the cave at Engedi, and ſpared his life; and when he took away his ſpear from him, as he was ſleeping in the trench, and did not deſtroy him, nor ſuffer thoſe that would to do it, 1 Sam. xxiv. 4, 5, 7, 10, 17. and xxvi. 8, 11. The words may be rendered, only I ſtripped him [x]. The ſenſe is, that he cut off the ſkirt of his coat, and took away his ſpear, and ſo in part ſtripped him both of his clothes and armour, at two different times; not to do him any hurt, but to let him know, as Jarchi obſerves, that he was delivered into his hands, and he could have ſlain him, but did not. The ſame Jewiſh writer interprets the word uſed, of ſtripping of garments; and Aben Ezra obſerves from R. Moſes that the vau, rendered yea, ſignifies only, as in Gen. xlii. 10.

℣. 5. Let the enemy perſecute my ſoul, and take it, &c.] That is, if the above things he was charged with could be proved againſt him; then he was content that Saul his enemy ſhould purſue after him, and apprehend him and bring him to juſtice, by taking away his life from him. Yea, let him tread down my life upon the earth; with the utmoſt indignation and contempt, without ſhewing any mercy; as the lion treads down his prey, and tears it to pieces, Micah v. 8. or as the potter treads his clay under foot, Iſa. xli. 25. And lay mine honour in the duſt. Selah: meaning either his life and ſoul as before; denominating himſelf from his better part, and which he elſewhere calls his glory, Pſal. xvi. 9. and xxx. 12. and lvii. 8. ſee Gen. xlix. 6. or elſe his body, as R. Judah Ben Balaam, who is blamed for it by Jarchi: or rather his fame, credit, and reputation that he had gained, both by his courage and valour in the field, and by his wiſe and prudent behaviour at court, 1 Sam. xviii. 7, 16. Should he appear to be guilty of the crimes he was accuſed of, he is willing to have his glorious name buried in the duſt of oblivion, and his memory periſh for ever. The words are to be conſidered as a ſtrong aſſertion of his innocence, in an appeal to God, the ſearcher of hearts and the trier of the reins of men; and as imprecating on himſelf the worſt of evils, ſhould it not appear; ſee Job xxxi. 21, 22. Aben Ezra renders ſelah, in truth, let it be ſo; and the Targum renders it as uſual, for ever; ſee the note on Pſalm iii. 2.

℣. 6. Ariſe, O Lord, in thine anger, &c.] This and the following phraſe do not ſuppoſe local motion in God, to whom it cannot belong, being infinite and immenſe; but are ſpoken of him after the manner of men, who ſeems ſometimes as though he had laid himſelf down, and was unconcerned about, and took no notice of human affairs, of the inſults of the wicked, and the oppreſſions of the righteous; wherefore the pſalmiſt beſeeches him to ariſe, which he may be ſaid to do when he comes forth in his power in the defence of his people, and againſt their enemies; ſee Pſal. xii. 5. Iſa. xxvi. 21. and he alſo prays him to ariſe in anger, to ſhew himſelf diſpleaſed, and give ſome tokens of his reſentment, by letting his enemies feel the lighting down of his arm with the indignation of his anger. Lift up thyſelf, becauſe of the rage of mine enemies; aſcend the throne of judgment, and there ſit judging right; ſhew thyſelf to be the judge of the earth, high and lifted up; let it appear that thou art above all mine enemies, higher and more powerful than they; ſtop their rage, break the force of their fury, lift up a ſtandard againſt them, who like a mighty flood threaten to bear all before them; or lift up thyſelf in rage, or fierce wrath, becauſe of, or againſt mine enemies [y]; and ſo the ſenſe is the ſame as before; and this way go many of the Jewiſh interpreters [z]. And awake for me to the judgment that thou haſt commanded; not that ſleep falls upon God, for the keeper of Iſrael neither ſlumbers nor ſleeps; nor does it fall on any but corporeal beings, not upon angels, nor the ſouls of men, much leſs on God; but he ſometimes in his providence ſeems to lie dormant and inactive, as if he diſregarded what is done in this world; and therefore his people addreſs him as if he was aſleep, and call upon him to ariſe to their help and aſſiſtance; ſee Pſal. xliv. 23, 26. and ſo David here, awake for me, that is, haſten to come to me and help me; ſuggeſting, that he was in great diſtreſs and danger by reaſon of his enemies, ſhould he delay coming to him. By judgment is either meant the vengeance which God had ordered him to execute upon his enemies, as Jarchi interprets it, and therefore he intreats him to ariſe and put him in a capacity of doing it; or elſe his innocence, and the vindication of it, which God had promiſed him, and then the petition is much the ſame with ℣. 8. But the generality of Jewiſh [a] writers underſtand it of the kingdom which God had appointed for him, and for which he was anointed by Samuel; and who had told Saul that God had found a man after his own heart, whom he had commanded to be captain over his people, 1 Sam. xiii. 14. wherefore the pſalmiſt prays that God would haſten the fulfilment of his purpoſe and promiſe, and ſet him on the throne, that ſo he might adminiſter juſtice and judgment to the people.

℣. 7. So ſhall the congregation of the people compaſs thee about, &c.] By the congregation of the people are meant the nation of the Jews, the twelve tribes of Iſrael, called an aſſembly of people, and a company of nations, Gen. xxviii. 3. and xxxv. 11. and this is to be underſtood not of their gathering together in an hoſtile manner about David to take him, which might be interpreted compaſſing God himſelf about, David being as dear to him as the apple of his eye, which is the ſenſe of ſeveral Jewiſh commentators [b]; but rather of their encompaſſing and ſurrounding the altar of God with ſongs of deliverance, upon David's being rid of his enemies, and advanced to the throne of the kingdom; ſee Pſal. xxvi. 6, 7. unleſs it ſhould have regard to the pure worſhip of God by David, which was greatly neglected in Saul's time; and then the ſenſe is, that the pſalmiſt prays that he might be eſtabliſhed in his kingdom, as God had appointed and commanded, when he would fetch up the ark of God, and encourage the worſhip of God, and rectify all diſorders in it; that ſo the ſeveral tribes might come up to Jeruſalem and encompaſs the ark, the ſymbol of the divine preſence, and worſhip in his holy mountain. For their ſakes therefore return thou on high; take the throne of juſtice, high and lifted up, vindicate the cauſe of the oppreſſed, deliver me from all my troubles, put me into the peaceable poſſeſſion of my kingdom; if not for my ſake, yet for the ſake of thy church and people, and for the ſake ſake of thy worſhip and thy glory; the Targum paraphraſes it, return thou to the houſe of thy ſhekinah.

[x] Verbum חלץ proprie extrahere, &c. ſignificat, & de veſtibus quæ alicui exuuntur & eripiuntur proprie dicitur, De Dieu. [y] בעברות צורי in furore contra hoſtes meos, Mariana; graviſſimo furore percitus in eos qui me opprimunt, Junius & Tremellius. [z] Targum, Jarchi, & Kimchi in loc. [a] R. Moſes in Aben Ezra in loc. R. Obadiah Gaon, Kimchi, & Ben Melech in loc. [b] Kimchi & Aben Ezra in loc.

℣. 8. The Lord ſhall judge the people, &c.] The inhabitants of the world in general; for God is the judge of all the earth, and he judges the world in righteouſneſs daily, and miniſters judgment in uprightneſs, though it is not always manifeſt; or his own people in particular, whoſe cauſe he pleads, whoſe injuries and wrongs he avenges, whoſe perſons he protects and defends; this the pſalmiſt expreſſes with confidence, and therefore, ſuitable to his character as a judge, he intreats him as follows; Judge me, O Lord, according to my righteouſneſs; he ſpeaks not of his juſtification before God, in whoſe ſight he well knew no fleſh living could be juſtified by their own righteouſneſs, Pſal. cxliii. 2. nor of the righteouſneſs of his perſon, either imputed or inherent, but of the righteouſneſs of his cauſe, Pſal. xxxv. 27. not of his righteouſneſs Godward, for he knew that he was a ſinner with reſpect to him; but of his righteouſneſs towards Saul, againſt whom he had not ſinned, but had acted towards him in the moſt righteous and faithful manner, 1 Sam. xxiv. 11. and therefore deſired to be judged, and was content to ſtand or fall according to his conduct and behaviour towards him. And according to mine integrity that is in me; who had always acted the ſincere and upright part towards Saul, though he had purſued him with ſo much fury and violence; the pſalmiſt's prayer was heard and anſwered, Pſal. xviii. 20, 24.

℣. 9. Oh, let the wickedneſs of the wicked come to an end, &c.] Which will not be till the meaſure of it is fully up, and that will not be till the wicked are no more; for as long as they are in the world they will be committing wickedneſs, and like the troubled ſea continually caſt up the mire and dirt of ſin; and they will remain to the end of the world, till the new Jeruſalem-church-ſtate ſhall take place, when all the Lord's people will be righteous, and there will not be a Canaanite in the houſe of the Lord of hoſts, nor a pricking brier or grieving thorn in all the land; for in the new earth will no ſinner be, but righteous perſons only; and for this ſtate the pſalmiſt may be thought to pray; however by this petition and the following he expreſſes his hatred of ſin and love of righteouſneſs: ſome chooſe to render the words [c], let wickedneſs now conſume the wicked; as in the iſſue it will, unleſs the grace of God takes place; ſome ſins conſume the bodies, others the eſtates of wicked men, and ſome both; and all are the means of deſtroying both body and ſoul in hell, if grace prevent not; this may be conſidered as a declaration of what will be, being a prophetic petition [d]. But eſtabliſh the juſt; or righteous one; meaning himſelf, and every other who is made righteous, not by his own righteouſneſs, but by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt imputed to him; and who needs not to have his righteouſneſs eſtabliſhed, which is in itſelf ſtable, firm, and ſure, and cannot be more ſo; it is an everlaſting one, and cannot be aboliſhed, but abides for ever, and will anſwer for him in a time to come; but his faith to be eſtabliſhed more and more in its exerciſe on this righteouſneſs: nor do the perſons of the juſt need eſtabliſhing, or can they be more ſtable than they are, as conſidered in Chriſt, as they are the objects of God's everlaſting love, ſecured in the covenant of grace, and built on Chriſt the foundation; but the graces of faith, hope, and love, need daily eſtabliſhing on their proper object, they being weak, fickle, and inconſtant in their acts; and the ſaints need more and more eſtabliſhing in the doctrines of the goſpel, and in their adherence to the cauſe of God and Chriſt and true religion; and it is God's work to eſtabliſh them, to whom the pſalmiſt applies; ſee 1 Pet. v. 10. For the righteous God trieth the hearts and reins; he is righteous himſelf in his nature, and in all his works, and he knows who are righteous and who are wicked; he knows the hearts, thoughts, affections, and inward principles of all men, and the ſprings of all their actions; he looks not at outward appearances, but at the heart; and as he can diſtinguiſh between the one and the other, he is capable of puniſhing the wicked and of confirming the righteous, conſiſtent with the truth of his perfections.

℣. 10. My defence is of God, &c.] Or my ſhield is in or of God [e]; God was his ſhield, his protector and defender; ſee Pſal. iii. 3. or my ſhield is with God; that is, Chriſt, who was the ſhield his faith made uſe of againſt every ſpiritual enemy, was with God; he was with him as the Word and Son of God from all eternity, and as the living Redeemer of his people before his incarnation; and he is now with him as their interceſſor and advocate, who pleads in defence of them, and oppoſes himſelf, his blood and righteouſneſs to all the charges and accuſations of Satan. Which ſaveth the upright in heart; who have the truth of grace in them, wiſdom in the hidden part; who are ſincere in their affections, purpoſes and deſigns, in their faith, hope, and love; and act from real principles of truth and love, in the integrity of their ſouls; for theſe light and gladneſs are ſown, to them grace and glory are given, and no good thing is withheld from them; they are ſaved by God from ſin, Satan, the world, death and hell, and every enemy, with a ſpiritual and everlaſting ſalvation.

℣. 11. God judgeth the righteous, &c.] Not all that are thought to be righteous, or think themſelves to be ſo, are ſuch; nor is any man naturally righteous, or of himſelf, nor by virtue of his obedience to the law of works; but ſuch only are righteous who are made ſo by the obedience of Chriſt; theſe God governs and protects, avenges their injuries and defends their perſons: ſome render the words, God is a righteous judge [f]; he is ſo now in the adminiſtrations of his government of the univerſe, and he will be ſo hereafter in the general judgment of the world. And God is angry with the wicked every day; wicked men are daily ſinning, and God is always the ſame in his nature, and has the ſame averſion to ſin continually; and though he is not always making men examples of his wrath, yet his wrath is revealed from heaven againſt all unrighteouſneſs of men; and there are frequent inſtances of it; and when he is ſilent he is ſtill angry, and in his own time will ſtir up all his wrath, and rebuke in his hot diſpleaſure.

℣. 12. If he turn not, &c.] Not God, but the enemy, or the wicked man, ſpoken of ℣. 5, 9, 11. if he turn not from his wicked courſe of life, to the Lord to live to him, and according to his will; unleſs unleſs he is converted and repents of his ſin, and there is a change wrought in him, in his heart and life; the Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, Arabic and Ethiopic verſions read, if ye turn not, or are not converted, an apoſtrophe to the wicked. He will whet his ſword; God is a man of war, and he is ſometimes repreſented as accoutred with military weapons; ſee Iſa. lix. 17, 18. and among the reſt with the ſword of judgment, which he may be ſaid to whet, when he prepares ſharp and ſore judgments for his enemies, Iſa. xxvii. 1. Deut. xxxii. 41. He hath bent his bow, and made it ready; drawn his bow of vengeance, and put it on the full ſtretch, and made it ready with the arrows of his wrath, levelled againſt the wicked, with whom he is angry; which is expreſſive of their ſpeedy and inevitable ruin, in caſe of impenitence; ſee Lam. ii. 4. and iii. 12, 13. or trod his bow, as is the uſual phraſe elſewhere; ſee Pſal. xi. 2. Lam. ii. 4. and iii. 12. which was done by the feet, and was neceſſary when the bow was a ſtrong one, as Jarchi on Pſal. xi. 2. obſerves; and ſo the Arabs, as Suidas [g] relates, uſing arrows the length of a man, put their feet on the ſtring of the bow inſtead of their hands.

[c] יגמור נא רע רשעים conſumat nunc vel quæſo malum impios, Muſculus, Vatablus, ſo Jarchi, Kimchi, & Ben Melech. [d] Conſumat nunc malum impios, Pagninus, Montanus, Hammond; ſo Obadiah Gaon. [e] על אלהים in Deo, Muſculus, Tigurine verſion, Junius & Tremellius, Muis, Ainſworth; apud Deum, Lutherus, Piſcator. Gejerus, Cocceius, Michaelis. [f] Vid. Aben Ezra & Abendana not. in Miclol Yophi in loc. אלהים שופט צדיק Deus judex juſtus. V. L. Munſter, Muſculus, Montanus, Piſcator, Gejerus, Michaelis; ſo Ainſworth.

℣. 13. He hath alſo prepared for him the inſtruments of death, &c.] The weapons of his indignation, Iſa. xiii. 5. which will iſſue both in the firſt and ſecond death, corporal and eternal; the inſtruments of the former are diſeaſes of various kinds, and judgments, as famine, peſtilence, &c. and of the latter not only the law is an inſtrument of it, that being the letter which kills, and is the miniſtration of condemnation and death, but even the goſpel itſelf to wicked men is the ſavour of death unto death; and devils will be the executioners of it. He ordaineth his arrows againſt the perſecutors; the word for perſecutors ſignifies hot or burning [h], and deſigns ſuch perſons who burn in malice and wrath, in rage and fury againſt the ſaints, and hotly purſue after them, as Laban did after Jacob, Gen. xxxi. 36. for theſe more eſpecially God has determined in his eternal purpoſes and decrees, and for for theſe he has provided in his quiver, arrows of wrath and vengeance, fiery ones; and againſt theſe will he bring them forth, direct them, and ſhoot them at them, Pſal. lxiv. 7. Some [i] underſtand all this not of God, but of the wicked man, and read if he turn not, but on the contrary inſtead of that, will whet his ſword, bend his bow, &c. againſt the righteous; yet he ſhall be diſappointed, he ſhall not accompliſh his deſigns, as appears by the following verſes; theſe phraſes are uſed of wicked men, Pſal. xi. 2. and xxxvii. 14, 15. and lxiv. 2, 3, 4. but the former ſenſe ſeems beſt.

℣. 14. Behold, he travaileth with iniquity, &c.] Is full of it, and big with it, as a woman with child, and eagerly deſires to bring it forth, and is in pain till he commits it. And hath conceived miſchief; that which is injurious to God and the perfections of his nature, a tranſgreſſion of his law, and an affront to his juſtice and holineſs; is doing wrong to fellow creatures, and hurt to themſelves, either to their name and credit, or to their ſubſtance and eſtates, or to their bodies and ſouls, and it may be to them all; and yet this they conceive, they deviſe it in their hearts, and form ſchemes how to bring it to paſs, and which they do with great freedom, deliberation, and pleaſure. And brought forth falſhood; or vanity [k], or a vain thing, as the ſame word is rendered in Job xv. 35. no fruit at all, but wind, or ſtubble, Iſa. xxvi. 17. and xxxiii. 11. that which deceives does not anſwer the expectation, but the contrary to it; the ſenſe is, that wicked men having deviſed miſchievous things againſt the ſaints, they are big with expectations of ſucceſs, and ſtrive to bring their purpoſes to bear, but are miſerably diſappointed, for it all ends in vanity and vexation of ſpirit to themſelves.

℣. 15. He made a pit and digged it, &c.] That is, he digged a pit, and made it very large and capacious to anſwer his purpoſes. And is fallen into the ditch which he made; ſo it is ſaid of the heathen, Pſal. ix. 15. and is exemplified in the caſe of Haman, who was hanged upon the gallows he had built for Mordecai. Kimchi explains this of Saul's falling upon his own ſword, and dying by it, which he drew againſt David; the phraſe is proverbial, Prov. xxvi. 27. Eccl. x. 8. and the ſenſe of this and the above figurative expreſſions is literally and properly given in the next verſe, ℣. 16. His miſchief ſhall return upon his own head, &c.] That which he conceived and deviſed in his mind, and attempted to bring upon others, ſhall fall upon himſelf, as a juſt judgment from heaven upon him. And his violent dealing ſhall come down upon his own pate; referring to the violence with which Saul purſued David, which would be requited to him, and of which he propheſied, 1 Samuel xxvi. 10.

℣. 17. I will praiſe the Lord according to his righteouſneſs, &c.] Or on account of it, as it was diſplayed in vindicating the innocent, and puniſhing the wicked; ſo Pharaoh having ordered the male infants of the Hebrews to be drowned, and he himſelf and his hoſt in righteous judgment being drowned in the Red ſea; Moſes and the children of Iſrael ſung a ſong as the pſalmiſt here. And will ſing praiſe to the name of the Lord moſt high; whoſe name is Jehovah, and is the moſt high over all the earth; and who had now, according to the pſalmiſt's requeſt, ℣. 6, 7. aroſe and lift up himſelf, and returned on high, and had ſhewn himſelf to be above all David's enemies, and had ſat on the throne judging right.

PSALM VIII.

To the chief muſician upon Gittith, a pſalm of David.

SOME think this pſalm was compoſed when the ark was brought to the houſe of Obed Edom the Gittite; and that it was delivered to him and his ſons, as others were to Aſaph, to Jeduthun, to the ſons of Korah, &c. [l] But againſt this lies a ſtrong objection, that Obed-Edom and his ſons were porters, and not ſingers, 1 Chron. xxvi. 4, 15. and for the ſame reaſon, Gittith cannot be the name of a muſical inſtrument which was kept in his family, and preſided over by them [m]. Some are of opinion, this word had its name from Gath; and that this pſalm was wrote by David when when he was there [y]; or that it is the name of a muſical inſtrument invented and made there, and which was brought from thence [z]. And ſo the Targum paraphraſes it; "upon the harp which "was brought from Gath." A word like this ſignifies wine-preſſes: and hence the Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, and Ethiopic verſions, render it for the wine-preſſes; which Theodoret interprets of churches, where Chriſt the true vine is gathered by believers, and they prepare the myſtic wine. Some think [a] the pſalms which bear this name were compoſed for the feaſt of tabernacles; when, having got in their vintage, they filled their preſſes, and ſqueezed their grapes, and therefore gave thanks; it was uſual, even with the heathens [b], to make uſe of the harp, and other inſtruments of muſic, at the gathering of the grapes to be ſqueezed and preſſed. Some of the Jewiſh writers [c] apply it to the times of Edom's deſtruction, who was to be trodden down as in a wine-preſs, foretold in Iſa. lxiii. 1, 2, 3. and others interpret it of the times of Gog and Magog, when the prophecy in Joel iii. 13. ſhall be fulfilled [d]; and ſome have thought this pſalm to be a ſong of praiſe, like one of thoſe ſung by them that tread in the wine-preſs; the time of vintage being a time of joy. The ancient Chriſtian writers explain it of the ſufferings of Chriſt, when he trod the wine-preſs of his father's wrath. But the word Gittith, is either the firſt word of ſome ſong, as Aben Ezra thinks; or the name of the tune, as Kimchi; or rather of the muſical inſtrument to which this pſalm was ſet and ſung. Though the author of the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, chap. ii. 6. citing ſome paſſages from this pſalm, only ſays, one in a certain place teſtified; without mentioning either the number of the pſalm, or the name of the writer; yet it is certain that David was the penman of it: and both from the teſtimony of the writer, and from a citation of Chriſt himſelf, it is evident that the ſubject of this pſalm is the Meſſiah, and that it belongs to his times; ſee Heb. ii. 6, 7, 8, 9. Matt. xxi. 15, 16. So the Syriac Scholiaſt; "the eighth pſalm is concerning Chriſt our redeemer."

[g] In voce Αραβες. [h] לרוֹלְקִים ardentibus, V. L. in ardentes, Montanus; hot perſecutors, Ainſworth. [i] So Brentius & Glaſſius in Gejerus. [k] שׁקר rem inanem, ſo ſome in Vatablus; vanitatem, Gejerus. [l] Aben Ezra in loc. [m] R. Moſes apud ibid.

℣. 1. O Lord our God, &c.] Jehovah, the one God, who is Lord of all angels and men, and in an eſpecial manner Lord and King of ſaints. How excellent is thy name in all the earth! by the name of God, is not meant any particular name of his, by which he is called; but either himſelf, his nature and perfections; or rather, that by which he is made known, and particularly his goſpel; ſee John xvii. 6. Acts ix. 15. this is excellent in its nature, it being good news, and glad tidings of good things, which diſplay the love, grace, mercy and kindneſs of God to men, as well as his wiſdom, power, truth and faithfulneſs; and in the ſubject-matter of it, Chriſt and his righteouſneſs, and life and ſalvation by him, the ſpiritual bleſſings of grace it publiſhes, and the exceeding great and precious promiſes it contains; and in its uſefulneſs for the enlightning, quickning, and converting ſinners, and for the comforting and reviving of drooping ſaints. It is the glorious goſpel of the bleſſed God, and excels the law in glory. It cannot well be ſaid how glorious it is; it is marvelouſly excellent; and that in all the earth, being carried by the apoſtles, who were ſent by Chriſt with it, into all the world; where it has ſhone out, and appeared glorioufly to Gentiles as well as Jews. This clauſe ſhews that this is ſaid by David propheticallly of goſpel-times; for not in his time, nor in any period under the Old Teſtament, was the name of the Lord glorious and excellent in all the earth. His name was great in Iſrael, but not in all the world. He ſhewed his word, and gave his ſtatutes and ordinances to Jacob; but as for the Gentiles, they were without them, and were ſtrangers to the covenants of promiſe, Pſal. lxxvi. 1, 2. and cxlvii. 19, 20. Eph. ii. 12. but this was true of the firſt times of the goſpel; and will be ſtill more fully accompliſhed, when the prophecies in Mal. i. 11. and Zech. xiv. 9. ſhall be fulfilled. Who haſt ſet thy glory above the heavens: meaning his Son, the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, the brightneſs of his glory; in whom is all the fulneſs of the Godhead, the glory of all the divine perfections; ſo called Pſalm lxiii. 2. and lxxxv. 9. and the ſetting of him above the heavens, deſigns the exaltation of him at the right hand of God; where angels, principalities and powers became ſubject to him, and he was made higher than the heavens, Heb. vii. 26. And it was in conſequence, and by virtue of this, that the goſpel was ſpread throughout the earth; for upon Chriſt's exaltation, the Spirit was poured down upon the apoſtles, and they were endowed with gifts qualifying them to carry the goſpel into the ſeveral parts of the world.

℣. 2. Out of the mouths of babes and ſucklings, &c.] Not literally ſuch, though the Jewiſh writers [e] generally ſo underſtand it; as do ſome Chriſtian interpreters, who explain it of the wonderful formation, nouriſhment, and growth of infants; and of the marvelous care of God in providing the breaſt for them; in filling it with milk, and and teaching them to ſuck; which, being obſerved by men, occaſion praiſe to God, to the confuſion of atheiſts and infidels. But this is no other than what is common to brute creatures: rather, the words are to be underſtood in a figurative ſenſe. So Jarchi applies them to the prieſts and Levites in the temple: but it is beſt to interpret them of the apoſtles and firſt preachers of the goſpel; and of ſuch who received it and profeſſed it; who were in their own eyes, and in the eyes of the world, as babes and ſucklings, Matt. xi. 25. Haſt thou ordained ſtrength: by which is meant the goſpel, the rod of Chriſt's ſtrength, and the power of God unto ſalvation; and which being made uſeful for the converſion of ſouls, is the cauſe of much praiſe and thanksgiving to God: this, by the mouths and means of the apoſtles and firſt miniſters of the word, God ordained, or founded [f], ſettled and eſtabliſhed in the world, notwithſtanding all the oppoſition made unto it; ſo that the gates of hell cannot prevail againſt it, to root it out of the world; but it will continue the everlaſting goſpel. Becauſe of thine enemies: either for the ſake of ſubduing them, and bringing them to the obedience of Chriſt, that is, the elect of God, who are before converſion enemies to God and Chriſt; or rather for the ſake of confounding the implacable enemies of God and Chriſt, and of the cauſe and intereſt of religion. In order to which, God has made choice of inſtruments the moſt mean and deſpicable, 1 Cor. i. 26, 27, 28. and God's end in this more particularly is expreſſed in the following clauſe. That thou mighteſt ſtill the enemy and the avenger; Satan, the enemy of mankind, the the adverſary of Chriſt perſonal and myſtical, who is filled with envy, wrath and malice againſt Chriſt and his people; him, by the means of the goſpel and the miniſtry of it, God has cauſed to ceaſe [g], as the word may be rendered; not as to his being, but as to his power and authority, in the Gentile world; out of which, to his great mortification, he was caſt, by the mouth and miniſtry of babes and ſucklings. Theſe words are applied by Chriſt to the children in the temple, crying Hoſanna to the Son of David, out of whoſe mouths God perfected the praiſe of the Meſſiah; and by which, and Chriſt's defence of them, the Scribes and Phariſees, the mortal enemies of Chriſt, and who wanted to revenge themſelves on him, were ſilenced and ſtilled, Matt. xxi. 15, 16.

[y] Ben Melech in loc. vide Kimchi ibid. [z] Jarchi in loc. [a] Vide Godwin. Synopſ. Antiq. Heb. l. 2. f. 1. c. 9. [b] Phurnutus de Natura Deorum. p. 84. [c] Rabbini apud Jarchium in loc. [d] Midraſh Tillim apud Viccarſ. in loc. [e] Aben Ezra & R. Moſes in ibid. Kimchi, Obadiah Gaon & Ben Melech in loc. [f] יסרת fundaſti, Pagninus, Montanus, Piſcator, Cocceius, ſo the Targum; fundatam diſpoſuiſti, Junius & Tremellius, Rivetus.

℣. 3. When I conſider thy heavens, &c.] Where God dwells, and which he has made; the airy and ſtarry heavens, which are to be ſeen with the bodily eye; and the heaven of heavens, which is to be beheld and conſidered by faith: the work of thy fingers; being curiouſly wrought by his power, and garniſhed by his Spirit: for the finger of God is the Spirit of God; ſee Matt. xii. 28. compared with Luke xi. 20. The moon and the ſtars, which thou haſt ordained, or prepared [h], for various uſes to the earth, and the inhabitants of it. The ſun is not mentioned, becauſe it cannot be looked upon, as the moon and the ſtars may, nor be ſeen when they are. And it is generally thought, that David compoſed this pſalm in the night, when theſe celeſtial bodies were in view; and, it may be, whilſt he was keeping his father's ſheep, ſince in the enumeration of the creatures ſubject to man, ſheep are mentioned firſt, as being in ſight, ℣. 7. The heavenly bodies are very glorious creatures, and are worthy of the conſideration and contemplation of man, and even of a ſaint; whereby he may be led to obſerve the wiſdom, power, goodneſs, and greatneſs of God.

℣. 4. What is man, that thou art mindful of him? &c.] That is, the pſalmiſt, while he was conſidering the greatneſs and glory of the celeſtial bodies, thought this within himſelf, and ſo expreſſed it; which is to be underſtood, not of man in general, nor of Adam in a ſtate of innocence; he could not be called Enoſh, the word here uſed, which ſignifies a frail, weak, ſickly mortal man; nor could he with any propriety be ſaid to be the ſon of man, as in the following clauſe: nor of fallen man, or of Adam's poſterity, deſcending from him by ordinary generation; for all things are not put in ſubjection to them, as is hereafter ſaid of man: but this is to be underſtood of the man Chriſt Jeſus, as it is interpreted in Heb. ii. 6, 7, 8, 9. or of that individual of human nature which Chriſt aſſumed. The name of Enoſh well agrees with him, who was a man of no note and eſteem among men, a worm and no man, a man of ſorrows and acquainted with griefs, encompaſſed with infirmities, and was ſubject to death, and did die. Now it was a marvelous thing that God ſhould be mindful of that individual of human nature; that he ſhould prepare it in his council and covenant; that among the vaſt numbers of individuals which it came up in his infinite mind to create, he ſhould chooſe this, to exalt it, and appoint it to union with his own Son, and take that delight in it he did; that when it was formed by his Spirit, he ſhould anoint it with the oil of gladneſs above his fellows; that he ſhould take ſuch providential care of it, and ſo often and ſo ſtrongly expreſs his affection for it; that he ſhould regard it, and ſupport it under ſufferings; and when in the grave, did not leave it, nor ſuffer it to ſee corruption; but raiſed it from the dead, and gave it glory, and exalted it at his own right hand. And the ſon of man, that thou viſiteſt him? The name of the ſon of man, is the name of the Meſſiah, in Pſalm lxxx. 17. Dan. vii. 13. and is often given to Chriſt, and uſed by him of himſelf in the New Teſtament. And this viſiting of him is not to be underſtood in a way of wrath, though he was ſo viſited by God, when he bore the chaſtiſements of his people; but in a way of favour, by beſtowing upon him without meaſure the gifts and graces of his Spirit; by affording him his gracious preſence, and filling him with ſpiritual peace and joy.

℣. 5. For thou haſt made him a little lower than the angels, &c.] Than Elohim, than God, as this word uſually ſignifies: and could it be interpreted of man, as made by God, it might be thought to refer to the creation of him in the image and likeneſs of God; but as it muſt be underſtood of the human nature of Chriſt, it may regard the wonderful union of it to the Son of God, on account of which it is called by the ſame name, Luke i. 35. and ſo made but a little lower than God, being next unto him, and in ſo near an union with a divine perſon; and which union is hypoſtatical or perſonal, the human nature being taken into a perſonal union with the Son of God: and ſo theſe words give an inſtance of God's marvelous regard to it; and contain a reaſon, proving that he has been mindful of it, and viſited it. Though rather, this clauſe refers to the humiliation of Chriſt in his human nature, as it is interpreted in Heb. ii. 9. and ſo it removes an objection, as it is connected with the following clauſe, which might be made againſt what had been obſerved in the foregoing verſe, on account of the low eſtate of Chriſt's human nature, when here on the earth; and the ſenſe is, that God has been mindful of it, and viſited it, notwithſtanding its ſtate of humiliation for a little while, ſeeing he has crowned it with glory and honour, &c. Chriſt was made low as to nature, place, eſtate, reputation and life; he who was the moſt high God, in the form of God, and equal to him in the divine nature, was made frail mortal fleſh, and was in the form of a ſervant in the human nature. He who dwelt on high, and lay in the boſom of his father, deſcended into the lower parts of the earth, was formed in the womb of a virgin, and when born was laid in a manger, and dwelt and converſed with ſinful mortal men upon earth: he who was Lord of all, whoſe is the earth, and the fulneſs of it, had not where to lay his head: he whoſe glory was the glory of the only begotten of the Father, became a worm and no man in the eſteem of men, was deſpiſed and rejected of men, and was of no reputation: and he who was the Lord of life and glory, was crucified and killed; becoming obedient to death, even the death of the croſs. Such is the nature of Chriſt's humiliation, expreſſed by being made low; the degree of it is, lower than Elohim, than God: he was equal to him in the divine nature, but inferior to him in the human nature, John xiv. 28. As mediator he was the ſervant of God, and the ſervant is not greater than his maſter; nor as ſuch ſo great: and he was in his low eſtate in ſuch a condition as to need the help and aſſiſtance of God, which which he had in the day of ſalvation: and eſpecially he was lower when he was deſerted by him, Matt. xxvii. 46. Agreeable to which, ſome render the words, as they will bear to be rendered, thou didſt make him want God, or didſt deprive or bereave him of God [i]; that is, of the gracious preſence of God: and ſo Chriſt was made lower than God in nature, office and condition. Sometimes the word Elohim is uſed for civil magiſtrates, as in Pſalm lxxxii. 6. becauſe they are in God's ſtead, and repreſent him; and on account of their majeſty, authority and power, bear ſome reſemblance to him. Now Chriſt was made lower than they, inaſmuch as he not only taught obedience to them, but obeyed them himſelf, was a ſervant of rulers, paid tribute to them, and ſuffered himſelf to be examined, tried, judged, and condemned by them: but ſince the word is rendered angels by the Chaldee paraphraſe, the Septuagint interpreters, the Jewiſh commentators, Aben Ezra, Jarchi, Kimchi and Ben Melech, and in the Arabic, Syriac, and Ethiopic verſions, and above all by the author of the Epiſtle to the Hebrews; it is beſt to interpret it of them: and Chriſt was made lower than they by aſſuming human nature, which is inferior to theirs, eſpecially in the corporeal part of it; and more ſo, inaſmuch as it was attended with infirmities, and ſubject to ſorrows and griefs; and as it was ſometimes reduced to great indigencies, and to want the comforts of life; and ſometimes was in ſuch diſtreſs as to need the aſſiſtance and miniſtration of angels, which it had, Matt. iv. 11. Luke xxii. 43. and particularly, it was lower than they when deſerted by God, whoſe face they always behold. To which may be added, that Chriſt was made under a law given by the diſpoſition of angels, ordained by them, and is called the Word ſpoken by them; ſome parts of which they are not ſubject to; but the particular inſtance the apoſtle obſerves, is ſuffering of death, Heb. ii. 9. which angels are not liable to, they die not. The duration of this low eſtate was a little while; for ſo the Hebrew word מעט may be rendered, as it is in Pſal. xxxvii. 10. and the Greek βραχυ τι, uſed by the Septuagint, and the author of the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, as it is in Acts v. 34. which refers either to the time of ſuffering death, and lying under the power of that and the grave, which was but a little time; or at moſt to the days of his fleſh, reaching from his incarnation to his reſurrection; which was a courſe but of a few years, and may very well be expreſſed in this manner. And to this low eſtate was Chriſt brought by Jehovah the father, who is the perſon ſpoken of throughout the pſalm; he preordained him to it, prepared a body for him, ſent him in the fulneſs of time, made of a woman, made under the law, and had a very great hand in his ſufferings and death: though all was with Chriſt's full conſent, and with his free good will. And haſt crowned him with glory and honour; by raiſing him from the dead, and ſetting him at his own right hand, committing all judgment to him; and requiring all creatures, angels and men, to give worſhip and adoration to him. And this being in conſequence of his ſufferings, after he had run the race, and endured a fight of afflictions; and becauſe of the greatneſs of his glory and honour, with which he was as it were on all ſides ſurrounded, he is ſaid to be crowned with it; who a little before was crowned with thorns, and encompaſſed with the terrors of death and hell. This reſpects his mediatorial glory.

[g] להשבית ad ceſſare faciendum, Montanus, Vatablus, Piſcator; ut facias ceſſare, Gejerus; ſo Ainſworth.
[h] כוננת præparaſti, Pagninus, Montanus; paraſti, Muſculus, Piſcator, Gejerus, Michaelis.

℣. 6. Thou madeſt him to have dominion over the works of thy hands, &c.] All power in heaven and in earth being given to him: when he was raiſed from the dead, and when he aſcended on high, and was ſet down at the right hand of God, he was made or declared LORD and CHRIST; Lord of the hoſts of heaven, of all the angels there, King of ſaints, King of kings, and Lord of lords. All things in heaven and earth, which God has made, are put into his hands, to ſubſerve his cauſe and glory, and for the good of his people; for he is head over all things to the church. The Ethiopic verſion reads, all the works of thy hands; among whom are angels. This is a greater dominion than was given to the firſt man, Adam, Gen. i. 28. Thou haſt put all things under his feet; or put them in ſubjection to him, as the phraſe ſignifies, and as it is interpreted, Heb. ii. 8. Good angels are ſubject to him, as appears by their miniſtration to him, their dependence on him, and adoration of him, 1 Pet. iii. 22. devils are ſubject to him, whether they will or no; and ſo are wicked men, whoſe power and wrath he is able to reſtrain, and does; and the church is ſubject to Chriſt, as her head; and ſo all good men, willingly and heartily, and from a principle of love, obey his commands: yea, all creatures in the earth, air and ſea, are in ſubjection to him; an enumeration of which is given in the following verſes.

℣. 7. All ſheep and oxen, &c.] The tame creatures, which are uſeful for food and cloathing: yea, and the beaſts of the field; the wild beaſts, which he can make uſe of to deſtroy and devour his enemies, and whom he can reſtrain from hurting his own people, Jer. xv. 3. Dan. vi. 22. Acts xxviii. 3, 4, 5.

℣. 8. The fowl of the air, &c.] Theſe he rained about the tents of the Iſraelites for their relief, Pſal. lxxviii. 27. and can command them to feed his people, as the ravens did Elijah, 1 Kings xvii. 4, 6. or to deſtroy his enemies, Jer. xv. 3. ſee Pſal. l. 10, 11. And the fiſh of the ſea: inſtances of Chriſt's power over them, and of their being at his command, and for his ſervice, may be ſeen in Matt. xvii. 27. Luke v. 5, 6. John xxi. 3, 6. And whatſoever paſſeth through the paths of the ſeas: ſome [k] underſtand this of ſhips, made by the wiſdom and art of men, in which they paſs through the paths of the ſea, and fiſh in the midſt of it. The Targum paraphraſes it, and Leviathan, which paſſes through the paths of the ſea. Compare with this Iſa. xxvii. 1. Some interpret all theſe things in a figurative and allegorical way; and ſome of the ancients by ſheep, underſtood believers among the Gentiles; by oxen, the Jews; by the beaſts of the field, idolaters and profane perſons; by the fowls of the air, angels; and by the fiſh of the ſea, devils: but theſe are much better explained by Cocceius, who by ſheep underſtands common members of the churches; by oxen, thoſe that labour in the word and doctrine; by the beaſts of the field, aliens from the city and kingdom of God; men fierce and cruel, Iſa. xi. 6, 7, 8. and lxv. 25. by the fowl of the air, ſuch as are lifted up with pride and vanity; and by the fiſh of the ſea, ſuch as are immerſed in worldly pleaſures. But it is beſt to interpret the whole literally; from whence may be obſerved, that what was loſt by the firſt Adam is reſtored

[i] תחסרהו — מאלהים & deficere facies (vel feciſti, Pagninus) eum paululum a Deo, Montanus; deſtitui quidem eum voluiſti paululum a Deo, Michaelis; carere eum feciſti Deo parumper, Gejerus.

[k] Aben Ezra & Kimchi in loc.

reſtored by the ſecond; and that believers have a free uſe of all the creatures through Chriſt: and not only the things here mentioned are ſubject to him, but every thing elſe; there is nothing left that is not put under him, only he is excepted that put all things under him, Heb. ii. 8. 1 Cor. xv. 27.

℣. 9. O Lord our God, how excellent, &c.] The pſalm ends with the ſame words with which it begins; which ſhews that the ſenſe of this, with which the pſalmiſt was affected, continued with him, and doubtleſs increaſed after ſuch a confirmation of it, by the inſtances he was led to take notice of.

PSALM IX.

To the chief muſician upon Muth-labben, a pſalm of David.

SOME take muth-labben to be the name of the tune to which this pſalm was ſung, and to deſign the ſame note which we call the counter-tenor: others think, that upon muth, or almuth, are but one word, and the ſame as alamoth, Pſalm xlv. title; and that it is the name of a muſical inſtrument; and that Ben in labben, is the name of the chief muſician, who was over that ſort of inſtrument, to whom the pſalm is inſcribed [l]; and indeed, R. Sol Jarchi ſays, that he had ſeen in the great Maſorah theſe words as one; and ſo it ſeems the Septuagint interpreters read them, who render them, for the hidden things of the Son; and the Arabic verſion, concerning the myſteries of the Son: and Ben is a name, it is ſaid, of one of the ſingers, whoſe kindred and companions were appointed with pſalteries on alamoth, 1 Chron. xv. 18, 20. And ſo then the title runs thus; To the chief muſician on alamoth, even to Ben. But others are of opinion, that the ſubject-matter or occaſion of the pſalm, is deſigned by this phraſe; and that as muth ſignifies death, the death of ſome perſon is intended, on account of which this pſalm was compoſed; ſome ſay Nabal, ſeeing the word לבן Laban inverted, or read backwards, is Nabal [m], whoſe death affected David; as appears from 1 Sam. xxv. 38, 39. Others, that it was one of the kings of the Gentiles, whoſe name was Labben, and is mentioned no where elſe, who fought with David, and whom he ſlew, and upon his death penned this pſalm [n]. Others, Goliath the Philiſtine [o], who is called 1 Sam. xvii. 4, 23. איש הבנים which we render champion and dueller, one of two that fight together. But rather, the reaſon of the name is as given by the Jewiſh commentators [p], becauſe he went and ſtood between the two camps of the Philiſtines and the Iſraelites; and ſo the Chaldee paraphraſe renders the title of this pſalm, "to "praiſe, concerning the death of the man who "went out between the camps, a ſong of David." And ſo the pſalm itſelf, in the Targum, and by other Jewiſh writers, is interpreted of Goliath and the Philiſtines, and of the victory over them; and which does not ſeem amiſs. Arama interprets it of the death of Saul. Others interpret Al-muth Labben, of the death of the ſon; and underſtand it of the death of Abſalom, the ſon of David [q]: but David's paſſion moved in another way, not in joy, but in grief, 2 Sam. xviii. 33. nor is there any thing in the pſalm that can be referred unto it. Others, of the death of the Son of God; but of that there is not the leaſt hint in the pſalm. Theodoret interprets it of Chriſt's victory over death by dying, which was a myſtery or hidden thing. Rather, I ſhould think it might be interpreted of the death of the ſon of perdition, the man of ſin and his followers; who may be typified by Goliath, and the Philiſtines: and ſo, as Ainſworth obſerves, as the former pſalm was concerning the propagation of Chriſt's kingdom, this is of the deſtruction of Antichriſt. And Jerom long ago ſaid, this whole pſalm is ſung by the prophet in the perſon of the church, concerning Antichriſt: and to this agrees the Syriac verſion; which makes the ſubject of the pſalm to be, "concern-"ing Chriſt, taking the throne and kingdom, "and routing the enemy." And alſo the Arabic verſion, according to which the argument of the pſalm is, "concerning the myſteries of the Son, "with reſpect to the glory of Chriſt, and his re-"ſurrection and kingdom, and the deſtruction of "all the children of diſobedience." To which may be added, that this pſalm, according to R. Sol. Jarchi, belongs to the time to come, to the days of the Meſſiah, and the future redemption by him.

℣. 1. I will praiſe thee, O Lord, with my whole heart, &c.] This is what is called in the New Teſtament making melody in the heart, or ſinging with grace in the heart, Eph. v. 19. Col. iii. 16. and yet does not ſignify mere mental ſinging, but vocal ſinging, the heart joining therein; for the word here uſed for praiſe ſignifies to confeſs, to ſpeak out, to declare openly the praiſes of God in the public congregation, as David elſewhere determines to do, Pſal. cxi. 1. and cxxxviii. 1, 2. the heart ought to be engaged in every part of divine ſervice and worſhip, whether in preaching or in hearing, or in prayer, or in ſinging of praiſe; and the whole heart alſo: ſometimes God has nothing of the heart in worſhip, it is removed far from him, and gone after other objects; and ſometimes it is divided between God and the creature; hence the pſalmiſt prays that God would unite his heart to fear him, and then he ſhould praiſe him with all his heart, with all that was within him, with all the powers and faculties of his ſoul; ſee Pſal. lxxxvi. 11, 12 and ciii. 1. This phraſe is not expreſſive of the perfection of this duty, or of performing it in ſuch manner as that there would be no imperfection in it, or ſin attending it; for good men fail in all their performances, and do nothing good without ſin; hence proviſion is made for the iniquities of holy things; but of the heartineſs and ſincerity of it; and in ſuch an undiſſembled and upright manner the pſalmiſt determines, in the ſtrength of divine grace, to praiſe the Lord. I will ſhew forth all thy marvelous works; ſuch as the creation of all things out of nothing, and the bringing them into the form and order in which they are by the word of God; and in which there is ſuch a diſplay of the power and wiſdom of God; and particularly the formation of man out of the duſt of the earth, in the image, and after the likeneſs of God; the ſuſ-

tentation

[l] Kimchi & Abendana in Miclol Yophi in loc. Levi in ibid. in 1 Sam. xvii. 4. [m] So ſome in Jarchi & Aben Ezra in loc. [n] Doneſh Hal- [o] Kimchi & Ben Melech in loc. [p] Jarchi, Kimchi, Levi Ben Gerſom, R. Iſaiah & Ben Melech [q] So ſome in Jarchi in loc.

tentation of the whole world of creatures in their being, the providential care of them all, the preſervation of man and beaſt; and eſpecially the work of redemption: it is marvelous that God ſhould think of redeeming ſinful men; that he ſhould fix the ſcheme of it in the way he has; that he ſhould pitch upon his own Son to be the Redeemer; that ungodly men, ſinners, the chief of ſinners, and enemies, ſhould be the perſons redeemed; and that not all the individuals of human nature, but ſome out of every kindred, tongue, people, and nation: as alſo the work of grace, which is a new creation, and more marvelous than the old; a regeneration, or a being born again, which is aſtoniſhing to a natural man, who cannot conceive how this can be; a reſurrection from the dead, or a cauſing dry bones to live; a call of men out of darkneſs into marvelous light; and it is as wondrous how this work is preſerved amidſt ſo many corruptions of the heart, temptations of Satan, and ſnares of the world, as that it is; to which may be added, the wonderful works yet to be done, as the ſetting up of the kingdom of Chriſt, the deſtruction of Antichriſt, the reſurrection of the dead, the laſt judgment, and the eternal glory and happineſs of the ſaints: and doubtleſs the pſalmiſt may have reſpect to the many victories which he, through the divine power, obtained over his enemies; and particularly the marvelous one which was given him over Goliath with a ſtone and ſling; theſe the pſalmiſt determined to make the ſubject of his ſong, to dwell and enlarge upon, to ſhew forth unto others, and to point out the glories, beauties, and excellency of them: and when he ſays all of them, it muſt be underſtood of as many of them as were within the compaſs of his knowledge, and of as much of them as he was acquainted with; for otherwiſe the marvelous works of God are infinite and without number, Job v. 9. and ix. 10.

℣. 2. I will be glad and rejoice in thee, &c.] Not in himſelf, in any attainments or works of his; not in his wiſdom, riches and ſtrength, nor in his warlike exploits, but in the Lord; not in ſecond cauſes, in horſes and chariots, in armies, and in the courage and valour of men, but in God, as the author of deliverance, victory and ſalvation; not in God only as the God of nature and providence, but as the God of all grace, and as his covenant-God and father; and becauſe of the bleſſings of this covenant, as forgiveneſs of ſin, a juſtifying righteouſneſs, &c. for he rejoiced not in his own righteouſneſs, but in the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, as well as in his perſon, grace, and ſacrifice; ſo the Chaldee paraphraſe renders it, I will be glad and rejoice במימרך in thy Word, the logos, the eſſential Word of God, of whom there were many types, promiſes, and prophecies in the former diſpenſation; two words being here uſed expreſs the greatneſs of this joy, and eſpecially the latter word denotes a very vehement joy, a joy unſpeakable and full of glory; ſuch as ariſes from a ſight of Chriſt the object, and which the pſalmiſt had now in view; and this was not a carnal and worldly joy, but joy in the holy Ghoſt. I will ſing praiſe to thy name, O thou moſt High; that is, to the glory of his name, his being, and perfections, as diſplayed in his marvellous works, and in the revelation of his word, and eſpecially in his Son; and under the character of the moſt high God, the ſupreme being over all creatures, angels and men; ſee Pſal. vii. 17.

℣. 3. When mine enemies are turned back, &c.] As the Philiſtines were, when Goliath their champion was dead; and as the men that came to apprehend Chriſt, David's antitype, went backwards and fell to the ground, thro' the ſuperior power of Chriſt; and as ſin, Satan, and the world, and at laſt antichriſt, are made to retreat from the Lord's people, who are more than conquerors over them through Chriſt that has loved them. They ſhall fall and periſh at thy preſence; they ſhall ſtumble at one thing or another which divine providence will throw in their way to hinder them from executing their deſigns, and ſo fall before them they meant to deſtroy, and periſh at the preſence of God as wax melteth before the fire; ſee Pſalm xxvii. 2. and lxviii. 1, 2. ſo antichriſt ſhall be conſumed with the breath of Chriſt's mouth, and the brightneſs of his coming, 2 Theſſ. ii. 8. and this is the ground and foundation of the pſalmiſt's joy, and rejoicing, and ſinging praiſe to God, as it will be the reaſon of the joy of ſaints in the latter day, Rev. xviii. 20. and xix. 1, 2.

℣. 4. For thou haſt maintained my right and my cauſe, &c.] Or vindicated and eſtabliſhed his righteous cauſe; God had pleaded and defended it, and by the flight, fall, and ruin of his enemies had clearly made it appear that his cauſe was juſt and good. Thou ſatteſt in the throne judging right; God has not only a throne of grace on which he ſits, and from whence he diſtributes grace and mercy to his people, but he has a throne of judgment, and which is prepared for it, as in ℣. 7. where he ſits as the judge of all the earth, and will do right; nor can he do otherwiſe, though his judgments are not always manifeſt in the preſent ſtate of things; and the vindication of the pſalmiſt's innocence and uprightneſs, is another reaſon of his joy and gladneſs.

℣. 5. Thou haſt rebuked the heathen, &c.] The people of the Philiſtines, as the Targum and Kimchi explain it, though ſome Jewiſh writers [a] underſtand it of Amalek the chief of the heathen nations; but it rather refers to goſpel-times, and to the rebukes of the heathen by the preaching of the goſpel, for their idolatry and ſuperſtition; and eſpecially to the latter day, and to the rebukes of the antichriſtian ſtates, the papiſts, who are called Gentiles; which will be with flames of fire, and will iſſue in their utter extirpation, upon which a profound peace and proſperity will ſucceed in the chriſtian churches, according to Iſa. ii. 4. which is a prophecy of thoſe times. Thou haſt deſtroyed the wicked; the wicked man; for it is in the ſingular number; labben, as Aben Ezra obſerves, or who is meant by him; Goliath, according to the Targum and Kimchi; or Eſau, as other Jewiſh writers [b], that is, his poſterity the Edomites; and each of theſe were figures of antichriſt, the man of ſin, the wicked one, whom Chriſt will ſlay with the breath of his lips, Iſa. xi. 4. Thou haſt put out their name for ever and ever; that is, the glory and reputation of their name, a good and honourable one, which they ſought to tranſmit to the lateſt poſterity; for though the names of wicked men may continue, as Pharaoh, Judas, and others; yet they continue with a ſcandal and reproach upon them that ſhall never be wiped off, their names rot and ſtink; ſee Prov. x. 7. the whole of this denotes the utter ruin and ſhameful end of the enemies of Chriſt and his church, and which is matter of joy to the ſaints.

℣. 6. O thou enemy, &c.] Which ſome underſtand of Goliath, though we do not read of any deſolations made by him, nor of any cities deſtroyed by him; nor by the Iſraelites upon his death and the flight of the Philiſtines on that account; Jarchi interprets interprets it of Eſau and his poſterity, who ſhall be deſtroyed in future time, to which he applies Ezek. xxxv. 9. other Jewiſh writers [c] think Amalek is intended, whoſe deſtruction they ſuppoſe will be in the days of the Meſſiah, and then will this ſcripture be fulfilled: and as theſe all prefigured antichriſt, as before obſerved, he ſeems to be deſigned, and not Satan, as ſome Chriſtian interpreters have thought, that enemy of Chriſt, perſonal and myſtical, of the church, and every true believer; and ſo is antichriſt, he oppoſes himſelf to God, and all that is called God; he is one that is contrary to Chriſt, as his name ſignifies, to his perſon, offices, grace, and kingdom; who blaſphemes the name of God, his tabernacle, and his ſaints. Deſtructions are come to a perpetual end; which may be underſtood either of the deſtructions and deſolations made by antichriſt, the havock he has made in the world, treading under foot the holy city, the church, deſtroying the earth and the inhabitants of it, the bodies, ſouls, and eſtates of men; but now the pſalmiſt prophetically declares the end of them to be come, his forty two months, or one thouſand two hundred and ſixty days or years will be up, and he will go on no more deſolating and deſtroying; ſee Rev. xi. 2, 3, 18. and xiii. 5, 7. or of the deſtructions and deſolations made upon him by the pouring out of the ſeven vials upon the antichriſtian ſtates, upon the ſeat of the beaſt, and upon both Pope and Turk, the eaſtern and weſtern antichriſt; when in the iſſue the beaſt, and the falſe prophet with him, will be taken and caſt alive into a lake of fire; ſee Rev. xvi. and xix, xx. and ſo this phraſe denotes that the deſtruction of antichriſt will be conſummate, his ruin will be complete, and there will be an utter end of him. Some inſtead of deſolations, by the change of a point read חרבות ſwords, and Ben Labrat or R. Doneſh ſays [d], that he found it ſo written in an ancient book; and ſo reads Jarchi, though he takes notice of the other reading alſo; and ſo read the Septuagint, Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic verſions; and then the ſenſe is, ſwords ſhall fail, they ſhall be no more made uſe of to deſtroy men with, they ſhall be beaten into plowſhares; for upon the deſtruction of the man of ſin there will be a profound peace in the world; ſee Iſa. ii. 4. Some [e] read theſe words interrogatively, are deſtructions come to a perpetual end? that is, which the enemy antichriſt deſigned to bring upon the people of God? no they are not; he may imagine they are, when the two witneſſes are ſlain; and may think he has then made an entire ſlaughter, and a complete deſtruction of the ſaints; but he will be miſtaken, theſe witneſſes will riſe again, and aſcend up to heaven in the ſight of their enemies, and to the great terror of them, Rev. xi. 10, 11, 12. And thou haſt deſtroyed cities, or haſt thou deſtroyed cities? that is, as antichriſt threatned and intended, namely, to deſtroy all the cities and churches of Chriſt; but, alas! he will never be able to do it, they are built on a rock againſt which the gates of hell can never prevail: but it is better to read the words affirmatively, and interpret them not of the enemy but of God, and of him deſtroying the cities of the enemy; for at the pouring out the ſeventh and laſt vial, the great city, the whole antichriſtian juriſdiction will be divided into three parts, and utterly periſh; and the cities of the Pagan and Mahometan nations will fall, and particularly Babylon the great city will come in remembrance before God, and be utterly deſtroyed, Rev. xvi. 19. Their memorial is periſhed with them; they ſhall not be returned or built any more, but ſhall be like a milſtone caſt into the ſea, and be found no more at all, Ezek. xxxv. 9. Rev. xviii. 21. Some [f] read this clauſe by way of interrogation as the others, is their memorial periſhed with them? no, the righteous are in everlaſting remembrance, even thoſe churches which the Romiſh antichriſt has made havock of, as the Albigenſes and Waldenſes; the memory of them is ſtill precious.

[a] Jarchi in loc. & Peſikta in ibid. in v. 1.

[b] Ibidem.

℣. 7. But the Lord ſhall endure for ever, &c.] When antichriſt is entirely ruined, his cities deſtroyed, and the memorial of them periſhed, then ſhall the Lord ſit for ever [g], as the words may be rendered; that is, as a Jewiſh writer [h] paraphraſes them, in reſt and quiet. The words may be expreſſive of the unchangeableneſs and eternity and power of God; the Chaldee paraphraſe of them is, מימרא דיי the word of the Lord is for ever; his habitation is in the higheſt heavens. And they may very well be interpreted of Chriſt, the eſſential Word of God, who is the unchangeable, everlaſting, and almighty God; and who ſits King for ever, and muſt ſit at God's right hand, in the higheſt heavens, until all his enemies are made his footſtool; and to him moſt properly do the following things in this and the next verſe belong: He hath prepared his throne for judgment; for the adminiſtration of judgment in this world, for the particular judgment after death, and for the general judgment after the reſurrection of the dead; which ſeems by what follows to be chiefly meant, and which will come on after the deſtruction of antichriſt; and all things are preparing for it; the day is appointed, in which God will judge the world; Chriſt is ordained to be the judge of quick and dead; devils and ungodly men are reſerved to the judgment of the great day; the throne is ready, which will be a white one, Rev. xx. 11. denoting the purity, juſtice and uprightneſs of the judge, who himſelf is at the door.

℣. 8. And he ſhall judge the world in righteouſneſs, &c.] The word תבל rendered world, is, as Ben Melech well obſerves, a general name for all the countries of the habitable world; and ſo ſhews that it is the univerſal judgment that is here ſpoken of; and which will be carried on and finiſhed with the utmoſt righteouſneſs, and according to the ſtricteſt rules of juſtice and equity; and is therefore called the righteous judgment of God, Rom. ii. 5. ſee Pſal. xcvi. 13. and xcviii. 9. Acts xvii. 31. He ſhall miniſter judgment to the people in uprightneſs; which ſignifies the ſame with the former clauſe, unleſs by the world there, ſhould be meant the wicked of the world; and by the people here, the people of God; to whom the righteous Judge will give the crown of righteouſneſs.

℣. 9. The Lord alſo will be a refuge for the oppreſſed, &c.] The poor and weak, ſuch as have no might nor power, and are thrown down and trampled upon, as the word [i] ſignifies; and ſuch are the people of God. They are oppreſſed with the burden of ſin; they are bowed down with Satan and his temptations; and are ſometimes preſſed out of meaſure, and above their ſtrength, with the perſecutions of men; they are trodden under foot by antichriſt, or otherwiſe are bore down with a variety of ſorrows and afflictions; but the Lord is a refuge

[c] Midraſh Tillim in loc. Tzeror Hammor, fol. 150. 2. [d] Apud Aben Ezra in loc. [e] So Piſcator, Cocceius, Ainſworth. [f] Sic Genevenſes, Diodatus, Bucerus, Cocceius. [g] ישב ſedebit, Montanus, Junius & Tremellius, Cocceius, Michaelis; ſo Ainſworth; ſedet, Vatablus, Muſculus. [h] R. Abraham Seba in Tzeror Hammor, fol. 150. 2.
[i] דך attrito, Cocceius, Gejerus; contrito, Michaelis, refuge for them. The Chaldee paraphraſe renders it as before, the Word of the Lord, the eternal Logos, the Son of God: he is a refuge for poor, ſenſible ſinners, fleeing from wrath to come; being typified by the cities of refuge, whither the manſlayer fled from the avenger of blood: he is the ſtronghold for the priſoners of hope to turn into; his name is a ſtrong tower and place of defence for oppreſſed ſaints; he is a refuge when all others fail, and at all times, in the day of affliction, and in the hour of death, and at judgment. A refuge in times of trouble; of which the ſaints have many, as when God hides his face, when corruptions prevail, when grace is low in exerciſe, and temptations are ſtrong, yet even then Chriſt is the refuge from the ſtorm; the ſalvation of his people is of him, and he is their ſtrength in every time of trouble; ſee Iſa. xxv. 4. Pſal. xxxvii. 39.

℣. 10. And they that know thy name, &c.] As proclaimed in the goſpel, a God gracious and merciful and forgiving ſin; and as in Chriſt, in whom his name is, and in whom he is the God of love, grace, and mercy, though out of him a conſuming fire; or the name of Chriſt himſelf, the Word of the Lord, who is the refuge of ſaints and ſinners; his name Jeſus, a Saviour: ſuch who know him to be the able, willing, complete, all-ſufficient, and everlaſting Saviour; who know his power and faithfulneſs to keep what is committed to him; and who know him not merely notionally and ſpeculatively, and in a profeſſional way only, but affectionately, ſpiritually and experimentally; ſuch will put their truſt in thee; as they have great reaſon to do; and the more they know of the grace and mercy of God in Chriſt, and of the ability and ſuitableneſs of Chriſt as a Saviour, the more ſtrongly will they place their truſt and confidence in him. For thou, Lord, haſt not forſaken them that ſeek thee; who are firſt ſought out by God in effectual vocation, and then under the influence and direction of his grace and Spirit ſeek him in Chriſt, where he is only to be found; and ſeek Chriſt and his righteouſneſs above all things elſe, and with their whole hearts, and diligently; and ſeek to Chriſt alone for life and ſalvation, and continue ſeeking the Lord by prayer and ſupplication, for whatever they ſtand in need of; theſe God does not forſake: he may ſometimes hide his face from them, as he does from his own children, and did from his own Son, yet he never forſakes them totally and finally; nor will he forſake the work of his own hands, which he has wrought in them, but will perfect it; he will never leave them ſo as that they ſhall periſh by ſin, Satan, or any enemy; he will not forſake them in life, nor at death, but will be the ſtrength of their hearts, and their portion for ever.

℣. 11. Sing praiſes to the Lord, which dwelleth in Zion, &c.] The pſalmiſt having determined in the ſtrength of grace to praiſe the Lord himſelf, and ſhew forth all his marvelous works, and given his reaſons for it, both with reſpect to himſelf in particular, and with reſpect to the people of God in general, here calls upon others to engage in the ſame work; the Lord is not only to be praiſed, which may be done by celebrating the perfections of his nature, and the works of his hands; by giving him thanks for mercies temporal and ſpiritual, and by living to his glory; but his praiſes are to be ſung by a modulation of the voice in tuneful notes, as the word uſed ſignifies; ſee Cant. ii. 12. where the ſame word is uſed of the ſinging of birds; and this is to be done by the ſaints jointly, in concert together, as Paul and Silas in priſon ſang the praiſes of God; and there is great reaſon why they ſhould join together in this work, ſince they ſhare the bleſſings of divine grace in common together; and it is their duty to ſtir up one another to this ſervice, as well as to other parts of worſhip: and this perfectly agrees with the exhortation to the ſaints, and the work they ſhall be employed in at the fall of Babylon, or deſtruction of Antichriſt, Rev. xiv. 1, 2, 3. and xviii. 20. and xix. 1, 2. Jehovah, to whom praiſes are to be ſung, is deſcribed as the inhabitant of Zion, the ark and tabernacle being there before the temple was built, which were ſymbols of the divine preſence. The Targum paraphraſes it, who cauſeth his ſhekinah to dwell in Zion; as many of the Jewiſh writers interpret this pſalm of Goliath, a doubt ariſes here about it, ſince in the days of Saul and at the time of Goliath's death, Zion was in the hands of the Jebuſites, and the ark of God was not there till many years afterwards; to this it is replied, that David might compoſe this pſalm upon that occaſion not immediately at that time, but after he was king of Iſrael, and when the ark was brought to Zion; or that he ſaid this by a prophetic ſpirit, foreſeeing that God would dwell there; and Kimchi obſerves, that it was every where a received tradition among the people of Iſrael that the ſanctuary would be built there; but however this be, certain it is that the church of God goes by the name of Zion frequently; ſee Pſal. ii. 6. and l. 2. Heb. xii. 22. Rev. xiv. 1. God by his eſſence and power is every where, he fills heaven and earth, and cannot be contained in either; his glorious preſence is in heaven; his gracious preſence is in his church and among his people; where they dwell he dwells, and where he dwells they dwell: hence the church is called by the ſame name as the Lord is here, the inhabitant of Zion, Iſa. xii. 6. and this deſcription of him points out the place where his praiſes are to be ſung, in Zion; who are to ſing them, the members of the church; and the reaſon why, becauſe the Lord dwells in Zion; and is there a refuge for his people, and protects them. Declare among the people his doings; what God does for the ſouls of men is not only to be declared among the people of God, Pſal. lxvi. 16. but alſo among the people of the world, when a ſuitable opportunity offers; and eſpecially in the public miniſtry of the word; partly that the name of God may be exalted, his grace, goodneſs and mercy be diſplayed; and partly that it might be the means of the converſion of God's choſen ones among them, Pſal. xcvi. 2, 3. Iſa. xii. 2, 3, 4. though it may be here his doings in providence are meant, his ſpecial providential care of his church and people, and his vengeance on their enemies, on Babylon; for upon the ruin of Antichriſt, the judgments of God, his providential diſpenſations towards his church and people will be made manifeſt, and all nations will be called upon to fear and worſhip him; ſee Jer. l. 28. Rev. xv. 3, 4. the word [k] which is here uſed ſignifies ſuch deeds and actions as are the effects of thought and counſel, and which are purpoſely and induſtriouſly done; and whatſoever is done by the Lord, whether in a way of grace or providence, is done after the counſel of his own will; as he thought ſo it is, as he purpoſes ſo it comes to paſs, and all things are done well and wiſely, and anſwer the ends and deſigns of them.

℣. 12.

[k] עלילה ſignificat tam machinationes, ſive conſilia, 1 Sam. ii. 3. quam conſiliorum eventus, ſeu opera ipſa, quomodo, Jerem. xxxii. 19. Gejerus.

℣. 12. When he maketh inquiſition for blood, &c.] The Arabic verſion renders it, he remembers him that ſeeks their blood; that is, the wicked man, that lies in wait for innocent blood, and whoſe feet are ſwift to ſhed it; the man of ſin, who is blood-thirſty; who drinks up the blood of the ſaints like water, and has been made drunk with the blood of the martyrs of Jeſus, him will God remember, and take vengeance on, in his own time: but rather, this is to be underſtood of God himſelf, ſeeking for the blood of his ſaints: he knows where it is, though ever ſo privily ſhed, as he did Abel's; yet, to ſhew his ſtrict care and accurate notice of it, he is repreſented as ſearching for it, and finding it out by ſecret ſearch, Jer. ii. 34. And it is the ſame phraſe with requiring blood, and expreſſes a demand of ſatisfaction for it; and declares the vengeance that God will take on account of it: he requires the blood of every man at the hand of him by whom it is ſhed, Gen. ix. 5, 6. eſpecially the blood of the righteous, Matt. xxiii. 35. particularly the blood of the martyrs of Jeſus, ſhed by the Romiſh Antichriſt; he will make inquiſition for that, and will find in Babylon the blood of the prophets and ſaints, and of all that are ſlain on earth; and will avenge the blood of his ſervants at her hand, and give her blood to drink, Rev. xviii. 24. and xix. 2. and xvi. 6. He remembereth them; either the righteous, as the Targum paraphraſes it, whoſe blood has been ſhed; or elſe the wicked, who ſhed their blood: God will remember them and their ſins; which, for ſome time, may ſeem not to have been taken notice of by him, and will pour out his wrath, and inflict juſt puniſhment on them; ſee Rev. xvi. 19. and xviii. 5, 6. He forgetteth not the cry of the humble: the cetib, or writing of the text, is עניים afflicted; the keri, or reading, is ענוים humble; ſo the Maſorah and Targum read: both may be taken into the ſenſe: afflicted perſons are generally humble, afflictions make them humble; God's people are an afflicted people; afflicted with ſin, with Satan, with the world, with Antichriſt and his followers: and they are a humble people; grace makes them humble, and a ſenſe of their ſin and unworthineſs keeps them ſo: and this is a proper character of the followers of Jeſus. Theſe in their diſtreſs cry to the Lord, as the Iſraelites did in Egypt under their bondage and preſſures: yea, their blood cries after death, as Abel's did, and as the blood of the martyrs of Chriſt does, whoſe ſouls under the altar cry for vengeance, Rev. vi. 9. and God is not unmindful of their cry; however he may ſeem to be, he takes notice of it, and will in his own time avenge his elect, which cry unto him day and night.

℣. 13. Have mercy upon me, O Lord, &c.] The pſalmiſt proceeds to petitions on his own account in this verſe: the ends he propoſes by the fulfilling of them, are mentioned in the next. A good man, a man called by the grace of God, though he has obtained mercy of the Lord, yet ſtill ſtands in need of more, of freſh diſcoveries of pardoning grace and mercy, of merciful ſupplies, of merciful ſupport, and merciful deliverances from enemies, inward and outward: and ſuch an one flees to God, and not to the creature; and pleads, not his own dignity, righteouſneſs or merit, but the mercy of God. Conſider my trouble which I ſuffer of them that hate me; or ſee my affliction becauſe of mine enemies [l]; look upon me under it with an eye of pity and compaſſion, and help and deliver me; and look upon mine enemies that give me this trouble, and take vengeance on them. Thou that liſteſt me up from the gates of death; the houſe appointed for all living; that is, from the power of it, when juſt upon the brink of it; when near it, as a perſon is to an houſe, when he is at the gates of it; either through ſickneſs, or ſome violent diſtemper of body, as Hezekiah was; or thro' ſome imminent danger in battle, as David was when engaged with Goliath; when every one thought, as Kimchi obſerves, that he ſhould fall by his hand: or it may be, this may have reſpect to his being raiſed up from the death of ſin, and delivered from the power of darkneſs; to his being brought out of the horrible pit and miry clay of an unregenerate ſtate, and ſet upon the rock of ſalvation; which is a lifting up indeed, an exaltation from a very low to a very high eſtate: and this the pſalmiſt takes notice of to encourage his faith; and makes uſe of it as an argument with God, that as he had dealt ſo graciouſly and bountifully with him, he would ſtill ſhew mercy to him, and look upon him under his affliction.

℣. 14. That I may ſhew forth all thy praiſe, &c.] That is, all thy bounties and acts of goodneſs, deſerving of praiſe; even as many of them as he had an experience of, and which came within his knowledge; and as much of them as he was capable of obſerving: for otherwiſe, the inſtances of divine grace and goodneſs are ſo many, that they cannot be reckoned up in order, nor God be praiſed for them, in the preſent ſtate of things, as he ſhould; ſee the note on ℣. 1. In the gates of the daughter of Zion: it was uſual with the Hebrews, to repreſent a chief city as a mother-city, and the towns and villages, and places adjacent, as daughters; and ſo, as Zion or Jeruſalem ſignifies the church of God in general, or the mother-church, Gal. iv. 26. ſo the daughter of Zion may mean a particular church: the Targum renders it the congregration of Zion; and the gates of it, are the public ordinances of divine worſhip in it; and the ſenſe is, that the pſalmiſt deſired to ſhew forth the praiſes of God in the moſt public manner in the congregation and aſſembly of the ſaints. I will rejoice in thy ſalvation, or that I may rejoice in thy ſalvation [m]: meaning either temporal ſalvation and deliverance from enemies, wrought by God for him, which would be matter of joy to him; or ſpiritual ſalvation, which may be called God's ſalvation, becauſe contrived by him in the council of peace, and ſecured by him in the covenant of grace, and wrought out by his Son in the fulneſs of time, and applied by his Spirit at converſion. And a gracious man rejoices in this ſalvation more becauſe it is the Lord's, than becauſe it is his own; or he rejoices more becauſe of the glory of God, which is diſplayed in it, than becauſe of his own advantage and happineſs by it.

℣. 15. The heathen are ſunk into the pit that they made, &c.] The pſalmiſt having determined to praiſe the Lord, and called upon others to join with him in it, here enters upon it: for, as Jarchi and Aben Ezra obſerve, this is תהלה the praiſe he was deſirous to ſhew forth, which is occaſioned by the deſtruction of God's enemies, and the deliverance of his people: by the heathen are meant not the Philiſtines, as Kimchi interprets it, who thought to cauſe Iſrael to fall, and fell themſelves; but this is ſpoken prophetically of the nations of the earth, who have joined in the idolatry of antichriſt, the Gentiles, by whom the holy city has been trodden under foot; even the ſeveral antichriſtian chriſtian ſtates, that will be deſtroyed by the pouring out of the ſeven vials, and eſpecially the laſt, at the battle of Armageddon; and which will be brought on by themſelves, with a deſign to deſtroy the whole kingdom and intereſt of Chriſt, but will iſſue in their utter ruin, which this phraſe is expreſſive of; ſee Rev. xviii. 3. and xi. 2. and xvi. 13, 14, 16. and xix. 19—21. The metaphor is taken from hunters, who dig pits for the wild beaſts to fall into, that they may the more eaſily take them, into which they fall themſelves; ſee Pſalm vii. 15. Wicked men are miſchievous and crafty, but ſometimes they are taken in their own craftineſs: In the net which they laid, is their own foot taken; which may ſignify the ſame thing as before, that the miſchief they deſign for others falls upon themſelves; only as the former phraſe denotes their utter deſtruction, like the ſinking of a milſtone in the ſea, by which the irrecoverable ruin of Babylon is expreſſed, Rev. xviii. 21. this may deſign the reſtraint and hindrance of them from doing the evil they would; their feet are intangled, that they cannot run to ſhed blood; and their hands are held, that they cannot perform their enterprize; and their wrath is reſtrained and made to praiſe the Lord. The metaphor is taken from fowlers, who lay nets and ſnares for birds, and cover them that they may not be ſeen, but fall into them unawares; ſee Pſal. cxxiv. 7.

[l] ראה עניי משונאי intuere afflictionem meum propter oſores meos, Gejerus.

[m] אגילה exultem, Junius & Tremellius, Muſculus; ut exultem, Piſcator, Gejerus, Michaelis; gaudeam, Cocceius; ſo Ainſworth.

℣. 16. The Lord is known by the judgment which he executeth, &c.] The judgment which God will execute upon antichriſt, and the antichriſtian powers, will be a means of making known his name, his glory, his perfections, in all the earth; as his wiſdom, power, juſtice and goodneſs; ſee Exod. ix. 16. Pſal. lxxix. 10. Rev. xv. 3, 4. The deſtruction of antichriſt will be the Lord's doing, and it will be a righteous one; it will be a juſt retaliation; as he has killed with the ſword, multitudes of his followers ſhall be killed with the ſword; as he has led captive, he ſhall be taken captive at the battle of Armageddon; as he has burnt many of the martyrs of Jeſus, he ſhall be caſt into the lake of fire burning with brimſtone. Some read theſe words as two ſentences, The Lord is known; he hath executed judgment[n]: the latter of theſe refers not to the miniſtration of juſtice in the providential government of the world, or at the laſt day in the general judgment; but to the judgment of the great whore, or Antichriſt, at which time the Lord will be known in his goſpel in all the world; the earth will be filled with the knowledge of him, and he, and he alone will be exalted; his name will be great and glorious throughout the earth; all ſhall know him from the leaſt to the greateſt; and their knowledge of him will be very clear and comprehenſive. The wicked is ſnared in the work of his own hands; not Goliath, as Kimchi thinks, who was ſlain by David with his own ſword, though this was true of him in the letter and type; but the wicked One, the man of ſin and ſon of perdition, Antichriſt, whoſe coming is after the working of Satan, with all craftineſs and wily ſtratagems, called the depths of Satan, Rev. ii. 24. but his own ſins ſhall take him, and he ſhall be holden with the cords of his iniquities, and be rewarded double for all his ſins; what is before figuratively expreſſed, is here litterally declared; or he hath ſnared the wicked in or by the work of his hands[o], that is, God. Higgaion, Selah. of the latter of theſe words ſee the note on Pſal. iii. 2. the former ſignifies meditation; Jarchi paraphraſes it נהגה let us meditate on this, ſelah; Aben Ezra interprets it, I will ſhew forth this in truth; the Chaldee paraphraſe is, the righteous ſhall rejoice for ever; the note of Kimchi and Ben Melech is, this ſalvation is to us meditation and praiſe; upon the whole the ſenſe ſeems to be this, that God's judgments upon Antichriſt, and the antichriſtian ſtates, and the deliverance of his people from their yoke and tyranny, are things worthy of the meditation of the ſaints, and afford juſt matter of joy, praiſe and thankſgiving.

℣. 17. The wicked ſhall be turned into hell, &c.] Some render it, ſhall return to the grave[p], to the earth, the original duſt from whence they came; but this is common to all men, to the righteous as well as the wicked; rather שאולה here ſignifies the place of torment, commonly called hell, where devils and damned ſpirits are; hither the ſouls of the wicked go immediately upon their departure from their bodies, Luke xvi. 23. and after the judgment is over, they will be remanded thither in ſoul and body; and their damnation is called the deſtruction of ſoul and body in hell; which will conſiſt in an everlaſting ſeparation from God, and in a ſenſe of his wrath and fiery indignation; and though this is true of all the wicked, yet here that wicked one, Antichriſt, and his wicked followers, are chiefly deſigned; even the beaſt and falſe prophet, who ſhall be caſt alive into the lake of fire burning with brimſtone, Rev. xix. 20. and xx. 10. And all the nations that forget God; which is not to be underſtood of the pagan nations, though they may be ſaid to forget God, ſince he is to be known by the light of nature, and yet they worſhip idols, the works of their hands; but the papal nations, who adore the Pope of Rome as God on earth, worſhip angels and ſaints departed, and images of gold and ſilver, and wood and ſtone. It may be applied to every wicked man who forgets there is a God who ſees and knows all things, and to whom men are accountable; ſee Pſal. l. 22.

℣. 18. For the needy ſhall not always be forgotten, &c.] The people of God are poor and needy for the moſt part; they are ſo in things temporal, and they are poor in ſpirit, or in things ſpiritual, of which they are ſenſible; their needs are many, and frequently return; but God has provided a throne of grace for them to come to for help in time of need, and he will ſupply all their wants out of the fulneſs of grace in Chriſt; nor is he unmindful of them, and of his covenant with them; ſtrictly ſpeaking, they are never forgotten by him, being engraven on his hands, and ſet as a ſeal on his heart; but they ſometimes ſeem to be ſo both to themſelves and others, Pſal. xlii. 3, 10. and xliv. 24. and lxxvii. 9. Iſa. xlix. 14. and they may continue ſo long; God may ſeem for a long time to take no notice of them, but ſuffer them to lie under affliction and perſecution; the holy city is trodden under foot forty two months, or one thouſand two hundred and ſixty days, that is, ſo many years; ſo long the witneſſes propheſy in ſackcloth, ſo long the church is in the wilderneſs, and ſo long will be the reign of Antichriſt, Rev. xi. 2, 3. and xii. 6. and xiii. 5. but as great Babylon will come up in remembrance before God, and he will remember her ſins, and render her double; the ſet time to favour favour his poor and needy will come, and he will ariſe and have mercy on them, and bring them into a glorious and comfortable ſtate and condition. The expectation of the poor ſhall not periſh for ever; the negative particle, though not in the original text, is rightly ſupplied from the preceding clauſe, as it is by the Targum, Jarchi, Aben Ezra, and Kimchi, and as the ſenſe requires; and the expectation of Chriſt's poor ones is not only a ſupply of grace here and eternal happineſs hereafter; but they expect a glorious ſtate of the church on earth, and that Chriſt will deſcend in perſon from heaven, and his tabernacle will be among men; and that they ſhall be kings and prieſts, and poſſeſs the kingdom, and reign with Chriſt a thouſand years; and tho' theſe things may ſeem to be deferred, and their expectation put off to a length of time, yet it ſhall not periſh for ever; there will be a performance of the things promiſed and expected.

[n] נודע יהוה משפט עשה notus eſt Dominus; judicium fecit, Pagninus, Montanus, Guſſetius; ſo Vatablus, Muſculus, Cocceius, Gejerus, Michaelis, and Ainſworth. [o] בפעל כפיו נוקש רשע illaqueavit iniquum per opus (vel in opere) manuum ipſius, Guſſetius. [p] ישובו לשאולה revertentur ad vel in ſepulchrum, Pagninus, Montanus, Vatablus, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator.

℣. 19. Ariſe, O Lord, &c.] To the deſtruction of thine enemies, and the ſalvation of thy people; ſee the note on Pſ. vii. 6. Let not man prevail; the man of ſin, Antichriſt, that is, let him not always prevail; he is the little horn that was to prevail againſt the ſaints, and has prevailed, Dan. vii. 21. Rev. xiii. 7. but he ſhall not always prevail; this petition will be heard and anſwered; for though he ſhall caſt down many thouſands, he ſhall not be ſtrengthened by it, Dan. xi. 12. where the ſame word is uſed as here; the Lamb at laſt ſhall overcome him and his ten kings, his ſupporters, and all that ſhall aid and aſſiſt him, Rev. xvii. 14. and xix. 19—21. Let the heathen be judged in thy ſight; that is, the antichriſtian nations that adhere to the man of ſin, let them be judged and puniſhed in the ſight of God, the judge of all the earth, whoſe eyes are as a flame of fire; compare with this Joel iii. 12.

℣. 20. Put them in fear, O Lord, &c.] Who are a bold, impudent, fearleſs generation of men; who, like the unjuſt judge, neither fear God nor regard men, therefore the pſalmiſt prays that God would inject fear into them, who only can do it; and this will be done at Babylon's deſtruction, when the antichriſtian kings, merchants, and ſeafaring men will ſtand afar off for fear of her torment, Rev. xviii. 10, 15, 17. That the nations may know themſelves to be but men. Selah. and not God, and have no power againſt him; ſee Iſa. xxxi. 3. the ſenſe is, that the antichriſtian nations who oppoſe themſelves to Chriſt and his people, may know that they are but frail, mortal, miſerable men, as the word [q] ſignifies; and that he who is at the head of them, the man of ſin, is no other, though he exalts himſelf above all that is called God, 2 Theſſ. ii. 4. or theſe words are a prayer for the converſion of many among the nations, and be rendered, put, O Lord, fear in them [r]; that is, the true grace of fear, that the nations may know themſelves, their ſin and guilt and danger, and know God in Chriſt, and Chriſt, and the way of ſalvation by him; for at the word know ſhould be a ſtop, concluding a propoſition, ſince the accent athnach is there; and then follows another, they are men. Selah. deſtitute of the fear and grace of God, are capable of it, but cannot give it to themſelves.

PSALM X.

THIS pſalm in the Septuagint verſion, and thoſe that follow it, is a part and continuation of the preceding pſalm, and makes but one with it; hence in theſe verſions the number of the following pſalms differ from others, and what is the xi[th] with others is the xth with them, and ſo on to the cxiv[th] and cxv[th], which alſo are put into one; but in order to make up the whole number of one hundred and fifty, the cxvi[th] and cxlvii[th] are both divided into two; and indeed the ſubject of this pſalm is much the ſame with the former. Antichriſt and antichriſtian times are very manifeſtly deſcribed; the impiety, blaſphemy, and atheiſm of the man of ſin; his pride, haughtineſs, boaſting of himſelf, and preſumption of ſecurity; his perſecution of the poor, and murder of innocents, are plainly pointed at; nor does the character of the man of the earth agree ſo well to any as to him: his times are times of trouble; but at the end of them the kingdom of Chriſt will appear in great glory, when the Gentiles, the antichriſtian nations, will periſh out of his land, ℣. 1—11, 16, 18.

℣. 1. Why ſtandeſt thou afar off, O Lord, &c.] This pſalm begins with a complaint which proceeds on two general heads; the one is with reſpect to God, his diſtance from his people, and deſertion of them in times of trouble, in this verſe; and the other is with reſpect to the wicked in ſome following ones. God by his infinite eſſence and power is every where, and is never far off from any of his creatures; and though his glorious preſence is in heaven, which, with reſpect to us on earth, is a land afar off, yet this hinders not but that there is often great nearneſs between God and his people; and when he ſtands afar off from them in their apprehenſions, it is when he withdraws his gracious preſence from them, and defers help and aſſiſtance to them, and does not immediately and directly come and viſit them: this they cannot bear, they complain; they wonder that ſeeing they are the objects of his love, this ſhould be his manner of conduct towards them; they expoſtulate with him, and inquire for what end and upon what account he ſhould ſo uſe them, and moſt earneſtly deſire that he would haſte and come unto them and help them; ſee Pſ. xxii. 1, 11, 18. Why hideſt thou thyſelf in times of trouble? when God ſeems to take no notice of his people, does not look upon them, but turns a deaf ear to them, he is ſaid to hide his face, his eyes and ears, from them: and this is ſometimes the caſe of the beſt of ſaints, as it has been of Job, David, Heman, and others; and though this is done in a ſovereign way by God, who comes and and goes when he pleaſes; for ſenſible communion with him as much depends upon his ſovereign pleaſure, as the gift of his grace itſelf does; yet generally ſpeaking, the denial or withdrawing of his gracious preſence is by way of reſentment for ſome diſagreeable conduct and behaviour of his people; and is conſiſtent with his everlaſting and unchangeable love to them, but is what fills them with grief and ſorrow; nor can they forbear making mournful complaints upon it; and this is aggravated when it it is a time of trouble with them, either of ſoul-trouble, by reaſon of the prevalence of unbelief, and the force of Satan's temptations; or of bodily affliction; though times of trouble here ſeem to deſign times of perſecution, as may be concluded from the connexion of theſe words with the following; and antichriſtian times are times of perſecution: during the reign of Antichriſt, in which he is ſuffered to make war with the ſaints and overcome them; and during the church's being in the wilderneſs the ſpace of one thouſand two hundred and ſixty days or years, God may ſeem to ſtand at a diſtance, and to hide himſelf from her.

[q] אנוש המה mortales eſſe, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Gejerus; homines miſeri, Cocceius, Michaelis; ſorry men, Ainſworth. [r] שיתה מורה להם pone timorem eis, ſo Junius and Tremellius, Piſcator, Pagninus, Montanus, Cocceius, Ainſworth.

℣. 2. The wicked in his pride doth perſecute the poor, &c.] The poor is the good and gracious man, who is commonly poor in this world's things, and is ſenſibly poor in ſpirit, or ſenſible of his ſpiritual poverty; or he is ſo called becauſe afflicted, as the word ſignifies; and he is afflicted becauſe he is poor: theſe two characters generally go together. The wicked man, is the wicked one, the lawleſs one, the man of ſin, and ſon of perdition, Antichriſt, the great perſecutor of Chriſt's poor ſaints and faithful witneſſes, more or leſs, ever ſince he has been in power; and which ariſes from the pride of his heart, not bearing that any ſhould refuſe to pay homage to him, contradict his will, or diſſent from him. The word [s] ſignifies to follow after, to purſue, as Jarchi, Aben Ezra, Kimchi, and Ben Melech interpret it; and to purſue hotly, as it is rendered in Gen. xxxi. 36. and denotes the vehemence and heat of his wrath and fury, with which Antichriſt perſecutes the followers of the Lamb; hence perſecution is compared to the heat of the ſun, Matt. xiii. 6, 21. Some render the words, through the pride of the wicked the poor is burned, or the poor burns [t]; which may be underſtood either literally, of the burning of the martyrs of Jeſus by Antichriſt, as here in Queen Mary's days; and which was foretold, that ſome of the ſaints ſhould fall by flame, as well as by ſword, captivity and ſpoil; and to which that part of the deſcription of Chriſt anſwers, whoſe feet are ſaid to be like fine braſs, as if it burned in a furnace; and which is prefaced to the Epiſtle to the church at Thyatira, which is an emblem of the apoſtate church: ſee Dan. xi. 33. Rev. i. 15. and ii. 18. or figuratively, of the poor ſaints burning with grief at the pride and wickedneſs of the man of ſin, and with zeal for the honour and glory of God; ſee 2 Cor. xi. 29. Cant. viii. 6. Pſal. lxix. 9. Let them be taken in the devices that they have imagined: we read the words as a petition; and ſo the ſenſe is, let the wicked perſecutors be taken in the wicked and crafty ſchemes which they have deviſed for the hurt of others, as they are, or will be; ſee Pſal. ix. 15, 16. But the pſalmiſt is not yet come to petitions, nor does he until ℣. 12. but is all along deſcribing the wickedneſs of the wicked one. It ſeems better therefore to render the words as do the Septuagint and Vulgate Latin verſions, They are taken in the devices that they have imagined: and the meaning is, that the poor, who are perſecuted by the wicked, are taken by their crafty ſchemes they lay for them, as Jarchi interprets it, and are put to death by them. So theſe words ſhew the iſſue and event of perſecution: and this ſenſe beſt agrees with the boaſted ſucceſs of the wicked man in the next verſe.

℣. 3. For the wicked boaſteth of his heart's deſire, &c.] As Antichriſt does of his univerſal power over all biſhops and princes, which his heart was long deſiring after; of his being Chriſt's vicar, Peter's ſucceſſor, and head of the church; and of having power in heaven, earth and hell: he boaſts of his wealth and riches, of the righteouſneſs and merits of ſaints, of works of ſupererogation, a ſtock of which he pretends to have in his hands to diſpenſe to others: he boaſts of his own holineſs and infallibility, and of miracles, ſigns and lying wonders done by his creatures, and of his great ſucceſs in deſtroying thoſe that oppoſe him; ſee Rev. xviii. 7. 2 Theſſ. ii. 4. The words may be rendered, The wicked praiſeth himſelf for the deſire of his heart [u], ſo the Chaldee paraphraſe; to which agrees Jarchi's gloſs, "wicked Eſau praiſeth himſelf, becauſe he hath obtained the deſire of his ſoul:" and thus it is uſual for proud, haughty, wicked men, as the Aſſyrian monarch, Nebuchadnezzar, and ſo the man of ſin, to aſcribe whatſoever they have or do, to their own power and prudence; ſee Iſa. x. 12, 13. Dan. iv. 30. Or, they may be rendered, He praiſeth the wicked for his heart's deſire [w]; or for his luſts, for his indulging them: for a wicked man not only delights in committing ſin himſelf, but he alſo takes pleaſure in thoſe that do it; and ſome of the antichriſtian party have even wrote in commendation of the moſt unnatural luſts. And bleſſeth the covetous whom the Lord abhorreth: the covetous man is one that makes no uſe of what he has, but for himſelf; and oftentimes withholds that which is meet from himſelf, as well as from others; and who makes uſe of unlawful ways to get, retain, and increaſe wealth, and is never ſatisfied: ſuch an one God abhors, becauſe he is an idolater, he has other gods before him; he worſhips his gold, he ſets his affection on it, places his confidence in it, and expects protection and ſecurity from it, to a neglect of divine providence; and yet the wicked man bleſſes him, calls his covetouſneſs frugality and good huſbandry; aſcribes what he has to his diligence, care and induſtry, and beſtows gifts upon him. The words may be rendered, the covetous man bleſſes himſelf [x]; with the good things he has laid up for many years; he pronounces himſelf bleſſed, and promiſes himſelf a great deal of happineſs, in futurity; and aſcribes all he has to his own hands. Or, the covetous man curſes, he abhors the Lord [y]; for the ſame word in the Hebrew language ſignifies to bleſs and curſe, Job i. 5. and ii. 9. which Aben Ezra on the place obſerves; and it is applicable enough to Antichriſt, who opens his mouth in blaſphemy againſt God, to blaſpheme his name, his tabernacle, and them that dwell in heaven; ſee Rev. xiii. 6.

℣. 4. The wicked, through the pride of his countenance, will not ſeek, &c.] We ſupply it, after God; as do the Targum and Kimchi, on the place: the ſenſe is, he will not ſeek to God for counſel or aſſiſtance, he will not pray unto him; which is the character of every unregenerate man, Rom. iii. 11. or, he will not inquire into the will of God, to know what is right or what is wrong, but will do do what ſeems beſt in his own eyes: and this ariſes from the pride of his heart, which ſhews itſelf in his countenance, in his proud and haughty look. It is ſaid of the little horn, who is Antichriſt, that he has a look more ſtout than his fellows, Dan. vii. 20. The words may be rendered, the wicked inquireth not into the height of his anger; ſo Ainſworth obſerves; that is, of God's anger; he is not concerned about it; he neither fears God nor regards men. Jarchi's ſenſe of the words is, "all "his thoughts ſay unto him, God will not inquire "into every thing that I ſhall do, for there is no "judgment." God is not in all his thoughts; nor in any of them, for they are evil continually; and if he does at any time think of him, his thoughts of him are wrong; he thinks he is altogether ſuch an one as himſelf: or, all his thoughts are, there is no God [z]: though he does not chooſe to ſay ſo, he thinks ſo; at leaſt, he wiſhes it may be ſo; and he works himſelf into ſuch impiety and atheiſm as to deny the providence of God, and thinks that he does not govern the world, nor concern himſelf with what is done below; that he takes no notice of mens actions, nor will call them to an account for them; and that there will be no future ſtate or judgment, in which ſecret as well as open things will be made manifeſt: or, as the Chaldee paraphraſe gloſſes it, that all his thoughts are not manifeſt before the Lord.

[s] ירלק fervide perſequitur, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator; ferventer, Gejerus; ſo Ainſworth. [t] Incenditur, V. L. ardet, Tigurine verſion, Muis, Cocceius. [u] כי הלל רשע על תאות נפשו nam laudat improbus animam ſuam in deſiderio ipſius, Junius & Tremellius; ſo Michaelis. [w] Quoniam laudat ipſium pro deſiderio animi ſui, Tigurine verſion. [x] ובוצע ברך & avarus benedicit ſibi, Piſcator; ſo Ainſworth. [y] Avarus maledicit ſive blaſphemat Jehovam, Tarnovius, Hammond; ſo ſome in Michaelis.

℣. 5. His ways are always grievous, &c.] To God and to his people; or, his ways cauſe terror [a], ſo Aben Ezra; make men fear; as Antichriſt has made the whole world tremble at him, Rev. xiii. 4. or, his ways are defiled, as the Septuagint and Vulgate Latin render it; for to him is nothing pure, his mind and conſcience being defiled, Tit. i. 15. or, his ways always remain [b]; they are always the ſame, there is no change in them for the better: or they proſper [c], as Jarchi interprets it; and this is ſometimes ſtumbling to the ſaints, Jer. xii. 1. Pſal. lxxiii. 2, 3. Thy judgments are far above, out of his ſight: meaning either the laws, ſtatutes, and commandments of God, which are not taken notice of by him; but his own decrees or orders are ſet in the room of them; or the examples of puniſhment inflicted on wicked men, as on the old world, on Sodom and Gomorrah, the Egyptians, and other nations; theſe are not regarded, when they ſhould be a terror to him. As for all his enemies, he puffeth at them; who are the poor ſaints, and are looked upon by Antichriſt as feeble creatures, and all their efforts againſt him and his kingdom are treated with contempt: he blows upon them, and ſuggeſts that he can cauſe them to fall with the breath of his mouth, or ſtrike them down with a ſtraw or a feather; ſee Pſal. xii. 6.

℣. 6. He hath ſaid in his heart, &c.] To and within himſelf, he thought in his own mind; for the thought is the word or ſpeech of the mind, λογος ενδιαθετος. I ſhall not be moved; from his proſperous and happy condition, abounding with riches and honours; from his ſeat of empire, over kings, princes, and the nations of the world; flattering himſelf that it would never be otherwiſe with him than it is: Even to generation and generation, I ſhall not be moved; ſo the words may be rendered. For I ſhall never be in adverſity, or in evil [d]: meaning either the evil of ſin; ſo aſſerting his innocence, wiping himſelf clean of all iniquity, claiming to himſelf the title of holineſs itſelf, and the character of infallibility; giving out that he is impeccable, and cannot err; when he is not only almoſt, but altogether in all evil; and is ο ανομος, the lawleſs and wicked one, the man of ſin, who is nothing but ſin itſelf. The Targum paraphraſes the whole thus; I ſhall not be moved from generation to generation from doing evil; and ſo it is a boaſt of impiety, and that none can reſtrain him from it, no one having a ſuperior power over him; ſee Pſal. xii. 4. Or the evil of affliction, or calamity; wherefore we render it adverſity, ſo Jarchi and Aben Ezra underſtand it: the note of the former is, "evil ſhall not come upon "me in my generation," or for ever; and the latter compares it with Numb. xi. 15. Kimchi and Ben Melech interpret it of long life. It is a vaunt of Antichriſt, promiſing himſelf a continuance of his grandeur, eaſe, peace and proſperity; in which he will be wretchedly diſappointed. The language and ſenſe are much the ſame with that of the antichriſtian Babylon, Rev. xviii. 7, 8.

℣. 7. His mouth is full of curſing, &c.] Or, he has filled his mouth with curſing [e] God and good men, his ſuperiors, himſelf and others. The word ſignifies an oath; and may deſign either a profane oath, taking the name of God in vain; or an oath on a civil account, a falſe oath, taken with a deſign to defraud and deceive others, as follows, and intends perjury; and this, as applicable to Antichriſt, regards his mouth ſpeaking great things and blaſphemies againſt God, and uttering curſes and anathema's againſt the ſaints, Rev. xiii. 5, 6. And deceit and fraud; ſuch as flattery and lying, which are both uſed by him with an intention to impoſe upon and deceive. The apoſtle, in Rom. iii. 14. renders both theſe words by one, bitterneſs; which may be ſaid of ſin in general, which is a very bitter thing; tho' it is rolled as a ſweet morſel in the mouth of a wicked man, yet in the iſſue it is bitterneſs to him: and it is applicable to ſinful words, which are bitter in their effects to thoſe againſt whom they are ſpoken, or who are deceived and impoſed upon by them: and as they refer to Antichriſt, may have reſpect to the lies in hypocriſy ſpoken by him, and to the deceitfulneſs of unrighteouſneſs, by which he works upon thoſe that periſh, 1 Tim. iv. 2. 2 Theſſ. ii. 10. Under his tongue is miſchief and vanity: alluding to ſerpents, who have little bags of poiſon under their teeth; ſee Pſalm cxl. 3. Kimchi and Ben Melech obſerve, that the heart is under the tongue, being lower than it, and ſo denotes the wickedneſs which that is full of, and deviſes continually, and is latent in it until diſcovered; and is miſchievous iniquity, injurious to God, and the honour of his law, and to fellow-creatures; and eſpecially to the ſaints, whoſe perſons, characters and eſtates are aimed at; but in the iſſue it is all vanity, and a fruitleſs attempt, being blaſted by God, and overruled for good to him; ſee Iſa. liv. 17.

℣. 8. He ſitteth in the lurking places of the villages, &c.] Which were by the way-ſide, where thieves and robbers harboured, and out of which they came, and robbed paſſengers as they came by. The word [f] ſignifies palaces or courts; and ſo it is rendered by the Chaldee paraphraſe and Syriac riac verſion; and ſo the alluſion is not to mean thieves and robbers, but to perſons of note and figure. Hence the Septuagint and Vulgate Latin, Arabic and Ethiopic verſions render it, he ſitteth in lurking places with the rich; and may be fitly applied to the Pope and his Cardinals. Antichriſt ſits in the temple of God, and by his emiſſaries gets into the villages, the particular churches and congregations of ſaints, where they lie in ambuſh to do miſchief, to corrupt their faith, worſhip and manners; and like thieves and robbers enter in to ſteal, kill and deſtroy. In ſecret places doth he murder the innocent; the harmleſs lambs and ſheep of Chriſt; who, though they are not without ſin in themſelves, yet are innocent with reſpect to the cauſe and the things for which they ſuffer: theſe are the ſaints and prophets and martyrs of Jeſus, whoſe blood is ſhed by Antichriſt; and the taking away of their lives is reckoned murder with God; and is ſo ſtiled in the ſcriptures, Rev. ix. 21. though the antichriſtian party call it doing God good ſervice, and impute it to zeal for the good of holy church: and yet this they chooſe to do in ſecret, by private maſſacres, or by the inquiſition; which having condemned men to death, delivers them over to the ſecular power to execute the ſentence on them: juſt as the Jews delivered Chriſt to the Roman governor, to ſhift off the ſin and blame from themſelves; murder being what no one cares to be known in, or chargeable with. His eyes are privily ſet againſt the poor: the word חלכה rendered poor, is uſed no where but in this pſalm, in which it is uſed three times, here, and in ℣. 1—4. and in the plural number in ℣. 10. It is tranſlated poor both in the Chaldee paraphraſe and Septuagint verſion, and in thoſe that follow them. In the Arabic language it ſignifies black[g], and may deſign ſuch who are black by reaſon of perſecution and affliction, who go mourning all the day long on account of ſin, their own and others; and becauſe of the diſtreſſes and calamities of the church and people of God. Theſe the eyes of the wicked watch and obſerve, and are ſet againſt them to do them all the miſchief they can; their eyes are full of envy and indignation at them, though it is all in a private and ſecret way. The alluſion is to thieves and robbers, who hide themſelves in ſome ſecret place, and from thence look out for them that paſs by, and narrowly obſerve whether they are for their purpoſe, and when it will be proper to come out and ſeize upon them.

[z] אין אלהים כל מזמותיו non Deus, omnes cogitationes ejus, Montanus, Vatablus, Muis; nullum eſſe Deum hæ ſunt omnes cogitationes ejus, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Ainſworth. [a] יחילון terrent, Cocceius. [b] Permanent ſive perdurant, Lutherus, Gejerus. [c] Proſperantur, Muſculus, Calvin, Ainſworth, Piſcator. [d] ברע in malo, Montanus, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Cocceius, Gejerus; ſo Ainſworth. [e] אלה פיהו מלא [f] חצרים αυλας, Symmachus in Druſius; atriorum, Munſter; ſo Hammond, Ainſworth, & Michaelis.

℣. 9. He lieth in wait ſecretly as a lion, &c.] The firſt beaſt in Rev. xiii. 2. is ſaid to have a mouth like a lion, and the ſecond beaſt in ℣. 11. ſpake like a dragon; and both deſign one and the ſame Antichriſt in his twofold capacity, civil and eccleſiaſtical; this metaphor of the lion lying in wait ſecretly for his prey, denotes the inſidious methods uſed by Antichriſt to deſtroy the faithful witneſſes of Chriſt; who lies like a lion in his den, in the temple of God, now become a den of thieves. He lieth in wait to catch the poor; to ſnatch and carry them away captive as his prey; ſee Rev. xiii. 10. He doth catch the poor when he draweth him into his net; this metaphor is taken from fowlers who ſpread nets, into which they allure and draw the birds and catch them. The allurements, ſnares and nets which Antichriſt lays to catch the poor ſaints and people of God in, are the riches and honours of this world, great pretenſions to holineſs, devotion and religion, and many lying ſigns and wonders.

℣. 10. He croucheth and humbleth himſelf, &c.] As the lion before he leaps and ſeizes on his prey, and as the fowler creepeth upon the ground to draw the bird into his net and catch it; ſo the antichriſtian beaſt has two horns like a lamb; though he has the mouth of a lion, and ſpeaks like a dragon, he would be thought to be like the Lamb of God, meek and lowly and humble, and therefore calls himſelf ſervus ſervorum, the ſervant of ſervants; but his end is, that the poor may fall by his ſtrong ones; the word for poor is here uſed, as before obſerved on ℣. 8. in the plural number, and is read by the Maſorites as two words, though it is written as one, and is by them and other Jewiſh writers[h] interpreted a multitude, company or army of poor ones, whoſe ſtrength is worn out; theſe weak and feeble ones Antichriſt cauſes to fall by his ſtrong ones; either by his ſtrong decrees, cruel edicts, and ſevere puniſhments, as by ſword, by flame, by captivity and by ſpoils, Dan. xi. 33. or by the kings of the earth and their armies, their mighty men of war, their ſoldiers, whom he inſtigates and influences to perſecute their ſubjects, who will not receive his mark in their right hands or foreheads, Rev. xiii. 15, 16, 17. and xvii. 12, 13. It is very obſervable, that thoſe perſecuted by Antichriſt are ſo often in this prophetic pſalm called poor; and it is alſo remarkable, that there were a ſet of men in the darkeſt times of Popery, and who were perſecuted by the papiſts, called the poor men of Lyons: the whole verſe may be rendered and paraphraſed thus, he tears in pieces, that is, the poor whom he catches in his net; he boweth himſelf, as the lion does, as before obſerved; that he may fall, or ruſh upon; with his ſtrong ones, his mighty armies, upon the multitude of the poor.

℣. 11. He hath ſaid in his heart, God hath forgotten, &c.] Meaning either his own ſins, becauſe they are not immediately puniſhed; wherefore he hopes to go on for ever with impunity, but will be miſtaken, for God will remember the iniquities of Babylon, and render to her double, Rev. xviii. 5, 6. ſee Amos viii. 17. or elſe the poor ones he oppreſſes; for though they ſeem for a while to be forgotten by God, they are not, a book of remembrance is written for them. He hideth his face; that is, from his poor ſaints, which is true oftentimes; but then the uſe the wicked one makes of it is bad, namely, to inſult them on that account, and to imagine that it is grateful to God, and doing him good ſervice, to afflict and perſecute them; and that God will never regard them, nor return to them more, as follows. He will never ſee it; or them; he will never more look upon the poor, he will no more regard them, and take notice of them and their afflictions; than which nothing is more falſe; for though he hides his face for a moment, yet with everlaſting kindneſs will he gather them to himſelf; and he beholds all their oppreſſions and afflictions, and not as a bare ſpectator; he ſympathizes with them, and delivers them out of them. Or he will never ſee the wickedneſs committed by the wicked; which is a very fooliſh thought, ſince what is done in the dark, and in the moſt ſecret manner, is ſeen by God, the darkneſs and the light are alike to him; he is all-ſeeing and ever-ſeeing, and every where ſeeing; and he it is that has made the eye, and ſhall not he ſee? Pſal. xciv. 5—9. the ſenſe of the whole in general is, that God takes no notice of good men or bad men, nor of what is done by either of them; he does not concern himſelf with the affairs of this world, which is an impious denial denial of divine providence; ſee Ezek. ix. 9. Zeph. i. 12.

[g] Chalac, valde niger fuit, Golius, col. 646.

[h] Jarchi, Kimchi, & Ben Melech in loc.

℣. 12. Ariſe, O Lord, &c.] See Pſal. iii. 7. and vii. 6. and ix. 19. O God, lift up thine hand; either on the behalf of his people, to help and deliver them; his hand may be ſaid to be let down when their enemies prevail, and to be lifted up or exalted, when it does valiantly, and works ſalvation for them; ſo when Moſes's hands were let down Amalek prevailed, and when his hands were lifted up Iſrael prevailed, Exod. xvii. 11. or againſt their enemies, to ſtrike them, to inflict puniſhment upon them, as God's hand is ſaid to be ſtretched out againſt the Egyptians, and to lie upon them, when he ſent his plagues among them, Exod. vii. 4, 5. and a dreadful thing it is to fall both into and under the hand of the living God, and to feel the weight of the lighting down of his arm with indignation. The Targum underſtands it as a geſture of ſwearing; ſee Gen. xiv. 22. and paraphraſes it, confirm the oath of thine hand; either ſworn in wrath againſt his enemies, or in love to his people; either of which is ſure and certain, and according to the immutable counſel of his will. Forget not the humble; the followers of the meek and lowly Jeſus, the Lamb of God, by which character the ſaints are diſtinguiſhed from the antichriſtian party, Rev. xiv. 4. theſe are ſuch who are made ſo by the Spirit of God, who in converſion brings down the pride and haughtineſs of man, that Chriſt and his grace may be alone exalted; theſe have the meaneſt thoughts of themſelves, and the beſt of others; their motto is, "leſs than the leaſt of all ſaints, "and the chief of ſinners;" they envy not the gifts and graces of others, and aſcribe all they have and are to the free grace of God; they are not eaſily provoked, they patiently bear injuries, and quietly ſubmit to the adverſe diſpenſations of providence: the word in the original text is read humble, but written afflicted: both characters generally meet together in the people of God; ſee the note on Pſal. ix. 12. this prayer for the humble is a prayer of faith; for though the humble may ſeem to be forgotten by God, they are not, they are precious in his ſight; he dwells among them, he gives more grace unto them, he comforts them when diſconſolate, he feeds them when they are hungry, he teaches and guides them when they want direction, he lifts them up when they are caſt down, and beautifies them with ſalvation.

℣. 13. Wherefore doth the wicked contemn God? &c.] God may be ſaid to be contemned or deſpiſed, when his being, perfections and providence are denied, or called in queſtion, or abuſed, ℣. 9, 11. when his word is derided, the great things of his law are counted as a ſtrange thing, and the truths of his goſpel are reckoned fooliſhneſs; and inſtead of theſe, the decrees, doctrines and traditions of men are ſet up, as by Antichriſt; and when his miniſters, and eſpecially his Son, are treated with diſdain, Luke x. 16. He hath ſaid in his heart, thou wilt not require it, or ſeek it[i]; or inquire after it, his iniquity; the ſenſe is, that God will make no inquiry after ſin, and bring it into judgment, unto account, and under examination; or will not make inquiſition, that is, for blood, for the blood of the ſaints and martyrs of Jeſus, ſhed by Antichriſt; or will not require it at his hands, or recompence vengeance for it: all which is falſe and vain; the contrary to it will be found true.

℣. 14. Thou haſt ſeen it, &c.] Though the wicked ſay God will never ſee, ℣. 11. he ſees all things in general, all men and all their actions; all are manifeſt and open to him, and every thing in particular, eſpecially the wickedneſs of men; even that which is ſaid or thought in the heart. For thou beholdeſt miſchief and ſpite; that miſchief which ariſes from ſpite or malice in the heart; God beholds the inward principle from whence it proceeds, as well as that itſelf; the miſchief deviſed in the heart, on the bed, and which lies under the tongue, deſigned againſt the people of God, either to the injury of their characters and eſtates, or to their bodies, and even to their ſouls, as much as in them lies, proceeding from implacable malice and enmity to them. To requite it with thy hand; of power, to retaliate it upon their own heads, to render tribulation to them that trouble the ſaints, which is but a righteous thing with God: or to put it in thy hand[k]; and the ſenſe is, that God looks upon all the injuries the wicked out of ſpite deviſe to do to his people, and puts them in his hand, that they may be ever before him, and always in his ſight, and he will take a proper opportunity of avenging them. The Targum interprets it of God's rewarding good men, as well as puniſhing the wicked, paraphraſing the whole thus, "it is manifeſt before thee that thou wilt ſend "ſorrow and wrath upon the wicked; thou lookeſt "to render a good reward to the righteous with thy "hand." The poor committeth himſelf unto thee: his body, and the outward concerns of life, as to a faithful Creator; his ſoul, and the ſpiritual and eternal welfare of it, as to the only Saviour and Redeemer; he commits all his ways to him, as the God of providence and grace; and at laſt he commits his ſpirit to him at death, as to his covenant-God and Father: the words may be rendered, the poor leaveth upon thee[l]; that is, he leaves himſelf and his upon the Lord; he leaves his burden on him, he caſts all his care upon him, as he is adviſed and encouraged to do; he leaves his cauſe with him to plead it for him, who will plead it thoroughly and maintain it: the phraſe is expreſſive of the poor's faith and hope in God; hence the Chaldee paraphraſe renders it, on thee will thy poor ones hope; for the ſupply of their wants, and for help and aſſiſtance againſt their enemies. Thou art the helper of the fatherleſs; God is the Father of them, provides for them, ſupplies, ſupports, and defends them; nor will he in a ſpiritual ſenſe leave his people orphans or comfortleſs, but will viſit and help them; ſee Pſal. lxviii. 5. John xiv. 18.

℣. 15. Break thou the arm of the wicked and the evil man, &c.] His power and ſtrength, ſo that he ſhall not be able to hold the ſword, to ſtrike a blow, or do any hurt to the people of God; ſee Ezek. xxx. 21—25. This prayer is in ſome meaſure already fulfilled in Antichriſt, the man of ſin, or Pope of Rome; though his kingdom is not broke to pieces, as it will be when Chriſt's kingdom ſhall be more viſibly ſet up, to which reference is had in the next verſe; ſee Dan. ii. 44. yet his ſtrength is weakened, his arm is broken, he has not the power he had, nor can he tyranniſe and do the miſchief he once did: but as for the evil man[m], for ſo the words ſhould be read, there being an athnach under the word wicked, which ends the propoſition there; Seek out his wickedneſs till thou find none; which deſigns a thorough ſearch after ſin, full full puniſhment of it, and the entire ruin and deſtruction of the wicked; and the ſenſe is, that God would make a ſtrict inquiry into the wickedneſs of the man of ſin, which he promiſed himſelf he would not, ℣. 13. and that he would puniſh him and his followers to the uttermoſt for it, until there ſhould not be one of the antichriſtian party found upon earth; with which ſenſe agrees the following verſe; ſee Pſal. civ. 35.

[i] לא תדרוש te non inquiſiturum, Piſcator, Michaelis; ſo Ainſworth. [k] לתת בידך ut ponas in manibus tuis, Vatablus, Cocceius. [l] עליך יזוב חלכה ſuper te relinquit pauper, Montanus, Gejerus, Michaelis; ſo Cocceius. [m] ורע et improbum quod attinet, requiras, &c. Gejerus; ſo Michaelis.

℣. 16. The Lord is King for ever and ever, &c.] Chriſt was king from everlaſting, and during the Old Teſtament-diſpenſation he was promiſed and propheſied of as King; and he had a kingdom when he was here on earth, though not of this world; nor was it with obſervation. At his aſcenſion to heaven, and ſeſſion at the right hand of God, he ſat down upon the ſame throne with his Father, and was made or declared Lord and Chriſt, and appeared more viſibly in his kingly office; and in the latter day it will be yet more manifeſt that he is King of ſaints, and when indeed he will be King over all the earth, and his kingdom will be an everlaſting one: he will have no ſucceſſor in it, nor will any uſurper obtain any more; the devil, beaſt and falſe prophet, will be caſt into the lake of fire; all antichriſtian ſtates will be deſtroyed, and all authority, rule and power put down; nor can his kingdom ever be ſubverted, he muſt reign till all enemies are put under his feet; he will reign to the end of the preſent world, and with the ſaints a thouſand years in the new heaven and earth, and in the ultimate glory to all eternity; nor will his government ceaſe when he ſhall have delivered up the kingdom to the Father, only the mode of the adminiſtration of it. Here begins the ſong of praiſe; the reign of Chriſt is matter of joy; ſee Pſalm xcvii. 1. Iſa. lii. 7. The heathen are periſhed out of his land: not the ſeven nations which were driven out of the land of Canaan, to make way for the people of Iſrael, that was long ago; nor the wicked and degenerate Jews, called the heathen, Pſalm ii. 1. compared with Acts iv. 27. on whom, and on whoſe temple, city and nation, Chriſt's native land, wrath is come to the uttermoſt; and they are periſhed out of it: nor hypocrites out of churches, which are Chriſt's property; but the antichriſtian party out of the world, which is Chriſt's land by creation, as God, and by the gift of his Father to him, as Mediator. The followers of Antichriſt are called Gentiles, and the nations of the earth, Rev. xi. 2, 18. and xviii. 2. and theſe will be no more; they will be utterly deſtroyed, when the man of ſin ſhall be conſumed with the breath of Chriſt's mouth and the brightneſs of his coming. The ſeventh vial will clear the world of all the remains of Chriſt's enemies: this alſo is cauſe of rejoicing, Pſalm cxxxii. 16—18. Rev. xviii. 20.

℣. 17. Lord, thou haſt heard the deſire of the humble, &c.] See ℣. 12. and Pſal. ix. 12. for the coming of Chriſt's kingdom, and that the kingdoms of this world may become his; for the deſtruction of Antichriſt, and for the avenging the blood of the ſaints. The prayers of God's people ſometimes lie in inward and ſecret deſires of the ſoul, and are not expreſſed in words; and theſe deſires are all before the Lord, and are well known unto him; yea ſuch prayers of the heart and which come from it, are principally regarded by him; they being his own preparation, as is ſuggeſted in the next clauſe, and the breathings of his Spirit; and eſpecially the deſires of humble ſouls are regarded, whoſe prayers he never deſpiſes, nor ſends them away empty, but fills with his good things. Thou wilt prepare their heart; for prayer, by pouring a ſpirit of grace and ſupplication on them, impreſſing their minds with a ſenſe of things to be prayed for, and drawing out the deſires of their ſouls unto them, and making interceſſion for them with groanings according to the will of God, and ſo helping their infirmities; and it is God's work to prepare the heart for prayer, as well as to put words into the mouth, Prov. xvi. 1. or thou wilt direct their heart [n]; to the object of prayer, himſelf, and to the things to be prayed for, for they know not what to pray for, nor how as they ſhould; and to what may encourage to it, as the love of God, the covenant of grace, the perſon, blood and righteouſneſs of Chriſt: or confirm or eſtabliſh their heart [o]; ſtrengthen and fix them, that they be not wavering and doubtful, but certain and aſſured of ſucceſs, believing that their deſires will be fulfilled in God's own time. Thou wilt cauſe thine ear to hear; God has an ear to hear the prayers of his people, nor is his ear heavy that it cannot hear; his ears are open to the cries of righteous ones; nor will he ever turn a deaf ear to them, but will give an anſwer in his own time and way; which is an inſtance of his ſovereign grace and goodneſs. Theſe words expreſs the faith of the pſalmiſt in God being a God hearing and anſwering prayer, particularly in things relating to the ruin of Antichriſt and his followers, and to the kingdom and glory of his Son Jeſus Chriſt.

℣. 18. To judge the fatherleſs and the oppreſſed, &c.] That is, God will cauſe his ear to hear the cries of his people, ſo as to avenge the wrongs done to the fatherleſs, and them that are oppreſſed by the man of ſin; ſee Rev. xi. 18. and xviii. 20. and xix. 2. That the man of the earth may no more oppreſs; or terrify [p], the dear children of God, and faithful witneſſes of Chriſt, as he has done; for by the man of the earth is not meant carnal worldly men in general, the wicked of the earth, as the Targum renders it; who are ſo called becauſe their original is from the earth, and they dwell in earthly tabernacles, and ſhall return to the earth again, and are earthly minded men, and have much of this world's things; and are therefore ſometimes called the men and children of this world, and who, generally ſpeaking, are oppreſſors of the ſaints; and who ſhall ceaſe to be ſo in the latter day, when the kingdom ſhall be given to the ſaints of the moſt High; but particularly the man of ſin, the Romiſh Antichriſt ſeems intended, who is the beaſt that is riſen up out of the earth, Rev. xiii. 11. and ſo the words may be rendered here, the man out of the earth [q]; whoſe kingdom and government is an earthly one, and is ſupported by the kings of the earth, and with earthly power and grandeur, and with earthly views and worldly ends: he has been the great oppreſſor and terrifier of the poor people of God; but when Chriſt comes to avenge them on him, he will no more oppreſs, he will be taken and caſt alive into the lake of fire; ſee Rev. xiii. 10. and xix. 20. The words may be rendered according to the accents thus, to judge the fatherleſs and the oppreſſed; he ſhall not add any more; for there is an athnach which makes a propoſition under עוד any more; and the ſenſe is, God ſhall ſo thoroughly avenge avenge the injuries of the fatherleſs and the oppreſſed, that there will be no need to add thereunto or repeat the vengeance, it will be an utter deſtruction; and then follows another diſtinct end of cauſing his ear to hear, namely, to ſhake terribly the man of the earth, or to ſhake terribly man from off the earth[r], the man of ſin, as before; ſee Iſa. ii. 19, 21. or as Jarchi interprets the words, to beat and break in pieces; that is, Antichriſt and his kingdom; ſo Montanus.

[n] תכין לבם dirigis, Vatablus; diriges, Tigurine verſion. [o] Confirmas, Piſcator, Gejerus, Michaelis; confirmes, Cocceius; confirma, Junius & Tremellius. [p] לערוץ perterrefacere, Piſcator; terrere, Muſculus, Vatablus; ſo Ainſworth. [q] אנוש מן הארץ homines de terra, Pagninus, Montanus.

PSALM XI.

To the chief muſician, a pſalm of David.

THIS pſalm has no name; it is neither called a pſalm, nor hymn, nor ſong, nor prayer, only ſaid to be David's; and is inſcribed and directed as others to the chief muſician, or maſter of the ſong, to be uſed in public ſervice; and ſeems to be written much upon the ſame ſubject with the two preceding pſalms. According to Theodoret it was written when David was perſecuted by Saul, and was adviſed by ſome to flee for his ſafety.

℣. 1. In the Lord put I my truſt, &c.] Not in himſelf, in his own heart, nor in his own righteouſneſs, and ſtrength; nor in men, the greateſt of men, the princes of the earth; nor in his armies, or any outward force; but in the Lord, as the God of providence and of grace; and in the Meſſiah, in his perſon and righteouſneſs; ſo the Chaldee paraphraſe renders it, in the Word of the Lord do I hope: and the phraſe denotes a continued exerciſe of faith in the Lord; that he was always looking to him, ſtaying himſelf on him, and committing himſelf and all his concerns to him; for he does not ſay, I have or I will, but I do put my truſt in the Lord; at all times, even in the worſt of times, and in the preſent one; wherefore he is diſpleaſed with his friends for endeavouring to intimidate him, perſuading him to flee and provide for his ſafety, when he had betaken himſelf to the Lord, and was ſafe enough. How ſay ye to my ſoul, Flee as a bird to your mountain? they compare him to a little, fearful, trembling bird, wandering from its neſt, moving through fear from place to place, whereas his heart was fixed truſting in the Lord; and this gave him a diſguſt: they adviſe him to flee either from his mountain, ſo Kimchi and Ben Melech interpret it; that is, either from Judea, which was a mountainous country, eſpecially ſome parts of it; or from mount Zion, or rather from the mountain in the wilderneſs of Ziph, or the hill of Hachilah, where David ſometimes was, 1 Sam. xxiii. 14. and xxvi. 1. or it may be rendered to your mountain as we, ſo the Targum; that is, to the ſaid place or places where he had ſometimes hid himſelf; and this they ſaid to his ſoul, which was very cutting and grieving to him; the word rendered flee in the cetib or writing of the text, is נדדו in the plural, flee ye; but is pointed for, and in the keri, or marginal reading, is נודי flee thou; the latter agrees with this being ſaid to David's ſoul, the former with the phraſe your mountain, and both are to be taken into the ſenſe of the words; not as if the one reſpected David's ſoul only, and the other both ſoul and body, as Kimchi and Ben Melech obſerve; but the one regards David's perſon, and the other his companions, or the people with him; and contains an advice both to him and them, to flee for their ſafety; the reaſons follow.

℣. 2. For lo, the wicked bend their bow, &c.] Are deviſing miſchief, and making preparations to accompliſh it. They make ready their arrow upon the ſtring; of the bow, and are juſt about to execute their wicked deſigns. That they may privily ſhoot at the upright in heart; ſuch as David, and thoſe that were with him were; they were men whoſe hearts were upright before God, and were of upright converſations before men, and ſo became the butt of the malice and reſentment of wicked men; againſt theſe they formed evil purpoſes, delivered out bitter words, which were like ſharp arrows of the mighty; threatened them with ruin and deſtruction, and took methods to bring about their deſigns and make good their words, in the moſt private and ſecret manner. Hence ſome of David's friends thought it moſt adviſeable for him to make his eſcape; adding,

℣. 3. If the foundations be deſtroyed, &c.] Or for the foundations are deſtroyed[s]; all things are out of order and courſe both in church and ſtate; the laws, which are the foundations of government, are deſpiſed and diſregarded; judgment is perverted, and juſtice ſtands afar off; the doctrines and principles of religion are derided and ſubverted; ſo that there is no ſtanding, either in a political or religious ſenſe. Jarchi interprets this of the prieſts of the Lord, the righteous, who are the foundations of the world, particularly the prieſts of Nob, ſlain by Doeg. Other Jewiſh writers, as Aben Ezra, Kimchi and Ben Melech, underſtand it of the purpoſes and counſels, nets and ſnares laid by the wicked for the righteous, which are broken and deſtroyed; not by them, for what can they do? but by the Lord, who is in his holy temple. So it follows, What can the righteous do? or what does the righteous one do[t]? that is, the righteous Lord, he ſits in the heavens, he beholds all the actions of the wicked, he diſtinguiſhes the righteous from them, and rains a violent ſtorm of wrath upon them, as in the following verſes; or what has the righteous man done[u]? what has David done, that the prieſts of Nob ſhould be ſlain? nothing that was criminal; nor ſhall he bear the ſin, but they, according to Jarchi's ſenſe; or rather, what has he done that the wicked ſhould bend their bow, prepare their arrow, and attempt to ſhoot privily at him, and to overturn the foundations of juſtice and equity? nothing that deſerves ſuch treatment: or if the fundamental doctrines of true religion and everlaſting ſalvation be ſubverted, what can the righteous do? he can do nothing to obtain ſalvation, nor do any good works of himſelf; the Chaldee paraphraſe is, wherefore does he do good? he can have no principle, motive or end to do good, if fundamental truths are deſtroyed: or what ſhould he do[w]? ſomething the righteous ones may do and ſhould do when men are attempting

[r] So Jarchi from Aben Ezra.
[s] כי השתות יהרסון nam fundamenta deſtruuntur, Piſcator, Michaelis; quoniam, Pagninus, Montanus; ſo Ainſworth.
[t] צדיק מה פעל juſtus quid operatus eſt? Pagninus, Montanus, Vatablus, Gejerus; quid facit? Syr. Arab.
[u] Juſtus quid fecit? V. L. Munſter, Tigurine verſion, Piſcator; ſo Ainſworth.
[w] Quid fuerit operatus juſtus? Junius & Tremellius; quid fecerit? Schmidt.

ing to undermine and ſap the foundation-articles of religion; they ſhould go to the throne of grace, to God in his holy temple, who knows what is doing, and plead with him to put a ſtop to the deſigns and attempts of ſuch ſubverters of foundations; and they ſhould endeavour to build one another up on their moſt holy faith, and conſtantly affirm it whilſt others deny it; and ſhould contend earneſtly for it, and ſtand faſt in it.

℣. 4. The Lord is in his holy temple, &c.] Not in the temple at Jeruſalem, which as yet was not built; nor in the temple of Chriſt's human nature; but rather in the church, where he dwells, which is an holy temple to the Lord; and which is an argument for truſt in him, and a reaſon againſt the fears of men in the worſt of times; ſee Pſalm xlvi. 1—5. Though it may be beſt to underſtand it of heaven, the habitation of God's holineſs, and which is the true ſanctuary; and which the holy places made with hands were only a figure of; ſince it follows, The Lord's throne is in heaven; yea, the heaven is his throne; here he ſits on a throne of grace, and here he has prepared his throne for judgment: and both this and the preceding clauſe are expreſſive of his glory and majeſty; and are ſaid to command awe and reverence of the divine being, and to inject terror into the wicked; and to ſhow that God is above the enemies of his people, and to encourage the ſaints truſt and confidence in him; and are mentioned as a reaſon why David put his truſt in him; and are, with what follows in the next verſe, oppoſed to the advice and reaſonings of ſome of his friends in the preceding ones. His eyes behold; all men, and all their actions; he ſees what the wicked are doing in the dark, what preparations for miſchief they are making, and beholds them when they ſhoot privily at the upright in heart; he can turn the arrow another way, and cauſe it to miſs the mark: his eyes run to and fro throughout the earth, in favour of thoſe whoſe hearts are perfect and ſincere. God's omniſcience, which is denied by wicked men, who are therefore hardened in ſin, and promiſe themſelves impunity, is uſed by the ſaints as an argument to encourage their faith and truſt in God, with reſpect to their preſervation and deliverance. The Septuagint and Vulgate Latin, Arabic and Ethiopic verſions read, his eyes look unto the poor; but this is an addition to the text not ſuitable to the context. His eyelids try the children of men; he tries their reins, he ſearches into their very hearts, and into the inmoſt receſſes of them, and takes cogniſance of their thoughts, intentions and deſigns; and confounds and diſappoints them, ſo that they cannot perform their enterpriſes.

℣. 5. The Lord trieth the righteous, &c.] As gold is tried in the fire, by afflictive providences; hereby he tries their graces, their faith and patience, their hope, and love, and fear; and by ſo doing expreſſes his love to them, ſince this is all for their good: and therefore when he ſuffers the wicked to go great lengths in perſecuting and diſtreſſing them, this ſhould not weaken their confidence in him; he ſtill loves them, and loves when he rebukes and chaſtiſes them. But the wicked, and him that loveth violence, his ſoul hateth; that is, ſuch who live in a courſe of ſin and wickedneſs, and who not only do injury to the perſons, characters and properties of men, but love it, and delight therein, and alſo take pleaſure in them that do the ſame: theſe God has a continued and inward averſion to; ſin and wickedneſs being the abominable thing his righteous ſoul hates: and he ſhews his hatred to them, by not chaſtiſing them now, as he does his own people, but reſerving everlaſting puniſhment for them hereafter; ſee Prov. xiii. 24.

℣. 6. Upon the wicked, &c.] The wicked One, the man of ſin, Antichriſt, and upon all that worſhip the beaſt and his image, on all perſecutors, and upon all wicked men in general: He ſhall rain ſnares, fire and brimſtone, and an horrible tempeſt; this will be in hell, as Jarchi obſerves. The alluſion is to the Lord's raining fire and brimſtone from heaven upon Sodom and Gomorrah, which was an example and emblem of eternal fire; ſee Gen. xix. 24. Jude 7. For the beaſt and the falſe prophet, and all the antichriſtian party, and all wicked men, will have their part in the lake which burns with fire and brimſtone. The phraſes uſed expreſs the dreadfulneſs and horribleneſs of their puniſhment; the ſuddenneſs, violence and force with which it will come; and the riſe of it, it will be from heaven; God himſelf will rain this ſhower of wrath upon them, Job xx. 23. nor will there be any eſcaping it, it will be inevitable: therefore ſnares are ſaid to be rained; the wicked will be ſnared in the works of their own hands; they will be taken and held in the cords of their own ſins; and full and deſerved puniſhment will be inflicted on them, which will be very ſevere and terrible. All that is dreadful in a ſtorm is here expreſſed, even in a ſtorm of fire. The word rendered ſnares, is by ſome thought to be the ſame with פחמים burning coals; and may ſignify burning ſtones, hot thunderbolts; ſee Pſal. xviii. 13, 14. fire may ſignify lightning, with its dreadful flaſhes, and which burn and conſume in an inſtant; and brimſtone, the nauſeous ſcent and ſmell, which always attends lightning and thunder, as naturaliſts obſerve[y]; and the words for an horrible tempeſt, ſignify a burning wind: ſo that they all ſerve to convey horrible ideas of the puniſhment of the wicked in hell. The Targum calls them ſhowers of vengeance. This ſhall be the portion of their cup; which will be meaſured out to them in proportion to their ſins, and which God in righteous judgment has appointed for them; and which they ſhall all drink of, and wring out the very dregs of it.

℣. 7. For the righteous Lord loveth righteouſneſs, &c.] The Lord is righteous in himſelf, and in all his ways and works; and therefore righteouſneſs, as it lies both in puniſhing the wicked, and in maintaining the righteous cauſe of his people, muſt be loved by him, it being agreeable to his nature: he loves to exerciſe righteouſneſs in the earth, to adminiſter it to and among men; this he delights in. He is well pleaſed with the righteouſneſs of his Son, it being ſatisfactory to his juſtice, and that by which his law is magnified and made honourable; and he is well pleaſed with his people, as they are clothed with it; and he approves of their righteous actions, as they are done in obedience to his righteous law, in faith, from a principle of love, and with a view to his glory; theſe are acceptable to him in Chriſt. His countenance doth behold the upright; whom wicked men privily ſhoot at, ℣. 2. God looks with pleaſure upon them, and takes delight in them, and takes care of them, protects and defends them, and at laſt ſaves them; and which, with all that goes before, was an encouragement to David to truſt in the Lord; ſee Pſal. vii. 10. and moreover, the Lord lifts up the light of his countenance on ſuch, and indulges them with his gracious preſence, than which nothing is more comfortable and deſirable. Some chooſe to render the word, their countenance, countenance [x], meaning the Trinity of perſons, Father, Son, and Spirit, who all have a gracious regard to ſuch: others render the clauſe thus, the upright ſhall ſee his face, the face of God; ſo the Chaldee paraphraſe and the Arabic verſion; ſee Pſ. xvii. 15.

[y] Senecæ Nat. Quæſt. l. 2. c. 21, 53. Plin. Nat. Hiſt. l. 35. c. 15.

PSALM XII.

To the chief muſician upon Sheminith, a pſalm of David.

THE word ſheminith is uſed in the title of pſalm vi, and ſignifies eighth; and intends either the eighth note, to which the pſalm was ſung, or rather, the harp of eight cords, to which it was ſet, as the Targum and Jarchi interpret it. Some Jewiſh writers [y] underſtand it of the times of the Meſſiah; and the Syriac verſion intitles the pſalm, "an accuſation of the wicked, and a prophecy "concerning the coming of the Meſſiah:" and the Arabic verſion ſays, it is concerning the end of the world, which ſhall be in the eighth day; and concerning the coming of the Meſſiah: but Arnobius interprets it of the Lord's day.

℣. 1. Help, Lord, for the godly man ceaſeth, &c.] A godly man, according to the notation of the word [z], is one that has received grace and mercy of the Lord; as pardoning mercy, juſtifying and adopting grace; and who has principles of grace, goodneſs and holineſs wrought in him; who fears the Lord, and ſerves him acceptably, with reverence and godly fear, and ſorrows for him after a godly ſort; who loves the Lord, and hopes and believes in him; who is regenerated and ſanctified by the Spirit of God, and is a true worſhipper of God, and lives in all holy converſation and godlineſs; and particularly, is beneficent, kind, and merciful [a] unto men: ſuch may be ſaid to ceaſe, when there are but few of them; when their number is greatly reduced [b], either by death, or when ſuch who have ſeemed, and have been thought to be ſo, prove otherwiſe: in a view of which, the pſalmiſt prays for help and ſalvation; help, or ſave [c], Lord; meaning himſelf, being deſtitute of the company, counſel and aſſiſtance of good and gracious men; or the cauſe and intereſt of religion, which he feared would ſink by the ceaſing of godly men. When all friends and refuge fail, ſaints betake themſelves to God, and their ſalvation is of him; and he is their preſent help in a time of trouble; and he ſaves and reſerves for himſelf a number in the worſt of times; as he did in Elijah's time, who thought there was no godly man left but himſelf; ſee Rom. xi. 1—5. For the faithful fail from among the children of men; ſo that there are none left among them but carnal, unregenerate, ungodly, and unfaithful men. The faithful are ſuch who are upright in heart and converſation; who truſt in the Lord, and believe in the Meſſiah; who abide by the truths and ordinances of God; and are faithful in what is committed to their truſt, whether they be gifts of nature, providence, or grace; and to their fellow-chriſtians, in adviſing, reproving, &c. when needful: theſe may fail in the exerciſe of grace, and in the diſcharge of duty, but not ſo as to periſh eternally. The words deſign the paucity of them, and the ſad degeneracy of the times to which they refer: and they may belong either to the times of David, when Saul's courtiers flattered him, and ſpoke evil of David; when the men of Keilah intended to have delivered him up; when the Ziphites diſcovered him to Saul, and invited him to come and take him; or when Abſalom roſe up in rebellion againſt him, and ſo many of the people fell off from him: or elſe to the times of Chriſt; the people of the Jews in his age were a wicked and faithleſs generation; and even among his own diſciples there was great want of fidelity; one betrayed him, another denied him, and all forſook him and fled; after his death, ſome doubted his being the Redeemer, and one of them could not believe he was riſen from the dead, when he was. And theſe words may be applied to the antichriſtian times, the times of the grand apoſtaſy, and falling away from the faith, upon the revealing of the man of ſin; ſince which the holy city is trodden under foot; the witneſſes propheſy in ſackcloth; and the church is in the wilderneſs, and is hid there. Yea, to the ſecond coming of Chriſt, when there will be great carnality and ſecurity, and little faith found in the earth. A like complaint with this, ſee in Iſa. lvii. 1. Mic. vii. 2.

℣. 2. They ſpeak vanity every one with his neighbour, &c.] That which is falſe and a lie, either doctrinal or practical; what was not according to the word of God, and was vain and empty, frothy, filthy and corrupt; and which no godly and faithful man would do. And this being done in common, by the generality of men, one with another, ſhews the degeneracy of the age, and ſupports the complaint before made. They ſpeak even with flattering lips; as Cain did to Abel, Joab to Amaſa, the Herodians to Chriſt, Judas to his maſter, falſe teachers to thoſe that are ſimple, hypocrites to God himſelf, when they draw nigh to him only with their lips, and all formal profeſſors to the churches of Chriſt, when they profeſs themſelves to be what they are not. And this is a farther proof of the juſtneſs of the above complaint. And with a double heart do they ſpeak; or with an heart and an heart [d]; ſuch are double-minded men, who ſay one thing, and mean another; their words are not to be depended upon; there is no faithfulneſs in them. The Chineſe [e] reckon a man of two hearts, as they call him, a very wicked man, and none more remote from honeſty.

℣. 3. The Lord ſhall cut off all flattering lips, &c.] This is either a prophecy or a prayer, as Aben Ezra and Kimchi obſerve; that God either would or ſhould cut off ſuch who uſed flattery with their lips, by inflicting ſome judgment in this life, or everlaſting puniſhment hereafter; by taking them them away by death out of the world, as the Targum paraphraſes it; or by caſting them into hell, where all liars and deceitful perſons will have their portion; ſee Job xxxii. 21, 22. And the tongue that ſpeaketh proud things, or great things [f], as the little horn, Dan. vii. 20, 25. and the beaſt, or Romiſh Antichriſt, who is deſigned by both, Rev. xiii. 5, 6. and which will be accompliſhed when Chriſt ſhall deſtroy him with the breath of his mouth, and the brightneſs of his coming; and indeed, every tongue that riſeth up againſt God, Chriſt, and his people, will be condemned; when ungodly ſinners will be convinced of all their hard ſpeeches, Iſa. liv. 17. Jude 15. Perhaps ſome regard may be had to the tongue of Doeg the Edomite; ſee Pſal. lii. 3, 4, 5.

[x] פניהם facies eorum, Genebrardus, Vatablus, Guſſetius; ſo R. Japhet in Aben Ezra who compares it with Geneſis xx. 13. [y] Sepher Lekach Shechachah apud Caphtor, fol. 64. 1. & Ceſeph Miſnah in Maimon. Hilch. Teſhuvah, c. 9. [z] חסיד paſſive pro beneficiario, ſive alterius beneficiis gratioſis cumulato, Gejerus. [a] Miſericors, Pagninus, Mariana; beneficus, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator. [b] Rari quippe boni, &c. Juvenal. Satyr. 13. v. 36. [c] הושיעה ſerva, Pagninus, Cocceius; da ſalutem, Junius & Tremellius. [d] בלב ולב in corde & corde, V. L. Pagninus, Montanus, Gejerus. [e] Martin. Sinic. Hiſt. p. 144. a heart having διχομυθον νοημα, a double meaning, as Pittacus ſays, Laert. in Vit. Pittac. l. 1. p. 53.

℣. 4. Who have ſaid, With our tongue will we prevail, &c.] Either through the eloquence of them, or the outward force and power with which they are backed. The ſenſe is, as we ſay, ſo ſhall it be; our words are laws, and ſhall be obeyed, there is no ſtanding againſt them; our edicts and decrees ſhall every where be regarded: or we will make one to prevail, or have the dominion [g]; meaning Antichriſt, the man of ſin; for all this is true of the tongues of the antichriſtian party, and of their laws, edicts and decrees; and which have obtained every where, and by which the wicked One has been eſtabliſhed in his tyrannical power and authority. Our lips are our own, or with us [h]: we will ſay what we pleaſe, and make what laws and decrees we think fit, and impoſe them upon men; and ſo change times and laws without controll, Dan. vii. 25. Who is Lord over us? which is the very language and conduct of Antichriſt, who oppoſes and exalts himſelf above all that is called God, 2 Theſſ. ii. 4. and is indeed the language of the hearts and lives of all wicked and ungodly men, ſons of Belial, men without any yoke or reſtraint; who walk, and are reſolved to walk after the imagination of their own evil hearts; not knowing the Lord, and being unwilling to obey him, or to be reſtrained by him; ſee Exod. v. 2.

℣. 5. For the oppreſſion of the poor, &c.] The ſervants and people of God, who, for the moſt part, are poor in a temporal ſenſe, and are all of them, and always ſo in a ſpiritual ſenſe, ſtanding continually in need of freſh ſupplies of grace; and being often afflicted, as the word ſignifies, are mean and deſpicable in the eyes of the men of this world, and ſo oppreſſed by them, as the poor generally are by the rich; and as the people of Iſrael were oppreſſed by the Egyptians, ſo are the people of God by Antichriſt, and by his tyrannical laws and edicts, and by ſuch haughty and inſolent perſons as before deſcribed. For the ſighing of the needy; who groan under their oppreſſions; being ſtripped of all good things, their friends and worldly ſubſtance, they ſigh inwardly, and cry unto the Lord, who ſees their oppreſſions, hears their groans; and though he cannot be moved, as men are, by any thing without himſelf, yet, according to his abundant mercy and ſovereign will, he appears and exerts himſelf on the behalf of his people, and for their relief and aſſiſtance. Now will I ariſe, ſaith the Lord; to have mercy on the poor and needy, and to avenge them on their oppreſſors, and free them from them. And this the Lord promiſes to do now, ſpeedily, immediately; God ariſes in the moſt ſeaſonable time, when his people are in the greateſt ſtraits, and in the utmoſt diſtreſs; and herein diſplays his wiſdom, power and goodneſs. This is an anſwer to the petition of the pſalmiſt in ℣. 1. I will ſet him in ſafety from him that puffeth at him; or in ſalvation [i]; in Chriſt the Saviour. All God's people are put into the hands of Chriſt, and are preſerved in him; there they are in ſafety, for out of his hands none can pluck them; and being built on him, the Rock, they are ſafe, notwithſtanding the waves and winds of temptation, perſecution, &c. come with ever ſo much force upon them. Here it ſeems to ſignify, that God would deliver his poor and needy from their oppreſſions, and put them into a comfortable, proſperous, ſafe and happy ſituation, in which they will be out of the reach of their enemies; as will be the witneſſes, when they ſhall aſcend to heaven, Rev. xi. 11, 12. even out of the reach of him that puffeth at them, deſpiſes them, and treats them with the utmoſt ſcorn and contempt; ſee Pſalm x. 5. Or that breathes, or let him breathe [k] threatnings and ſlaughters; as Saul did againſt the diſciples of Chriſt, Acts ix. 1. or that lays ſnares for him [l], as the wicked do for the righteous; or that ſpeaks unto him in ſuch haughty and inſolent language as before expreſſed. Some make this clauſe a propoſition of itſelf, he puffeth at him; meaning either that he that is ſet in ſafety puffs at his enemy, deſpiſes him, as he has been deſpiſed by him; or God, who breathes upon him, and whoſe breath is as a ſtream of brimſtone, which kindles in him a fire of divine wrath, which is unquenchable; or elſe the ſenſe is, God will ſpeak to himſelf, or to him [m]; in which ſenſe the word is uſed Hab. ii. 4. that is, good and comfortable words to the poor; or he will give him refreſhment, or reſt; which he will determine in himſelf to ſpeak to him: or he ſhall have breathing, or let him breathe [n]: he ſhall have times of refreſhing from the Lord, and reſt from adverſity, from the oppoſitions and perſecutions of his enemies.

℣. 6. The words of the Lord are pure words, &c.] This obſervation the pſalmiſt makes in reference to what is juſt now ſaid in the preceding verſe, and in oppoſition to the words of wicked men in ℣. 2, 4, which are deceitful, ſinful and impure. The ſcriptures are the words of God; and they are pure and holy, free from all human mixtures, and from all fraud and deceit; they are the ſcriptures of truth. The promiſes are the words of God, and they are firm and ſtable, and always to be depended on, and are ever fulfilled, being yea and amen in Chriſt Jeſus. The goſpel, and the doctrines of it, are the words of God; that is the ſincere milk of the word, pure and uncorrupt, as it is in itſelf, and as it is diſpenſed by the faithful miniſters of it; and they are all according to godlineſs, and tend to encourage and promote purity and holineſs of heart and life; ſee Prov. xxx. 5. As ſilver tried in a furnace of earth: they are as ſilver for worth and value; yea, they are more valuable than ſilver or gold, Pſalm xix. 10. and cxix. 72, Prov. viii. 10, 11. The Bible is a mine of rich treaſure, and to be ſearched into as for it; the promiſes in it are are exceeding precious; they are like apples of gold in pictures of ſilver, and yield more joy than the finding a great ſpoil. The doctrines of the goſpel are comparable to gold and ſilver and precious ſtones, and to be bought at any rate, but to be ſold at none: and they are as ſilver tried, which is pure, and free from droſs. The words of men, of falſe teachers, are as droſs and reprobate ſilver; but the words of the Lord are tried, and are pure, and free from all the droſs of error and falſhood, Pſalm xviii. 30. And they are as ſilver tried in a furnace of earth, which ſome [o] render by the Lord of the earth; but the word rather ſignifies a furnace, or an operatory, in which metal is melted and purified; and may be applied to the Lord Jeſus Chriſt in human nature, in whom are all the treaſures of wiſdom and knowledge, and who came full fraught with the doctrines of the goſpel; and in whom they have been tried, by his ſufferings and death, and are found to be pure, ſolid and ſubſtantial: or to the miniſters of the goſpel, who have this treaſure in earthen veſſels, whoſe works and words and miniſtry are tried by many fiery trials, and abide: or to all the people of God in general, who dwell in earthly tabernacles; and who, in the midſt of various afflictions, have a comfortable and confirming evidence of the purity and truth of the words of God, of the promiſes of his covenant, and the doctrines of the goſpel. Purified ſeven times; that is, many times, Prov. xxiv. 16. and ſo compleatly and perfectly pure, and clear of all droſs whatſoever, as ſilver ſo many times tried muſt needs be: and ſo the words of God are not only pure, but very pure, exceeding pure, Pſalm cxix. 140.

[f] גדלות magna, Pagninus, Montanus, Vatablus, Piſcator, Gejerus, Michaelis; grandia, Cocceius. [g] גבור prevalere ac dominare, faciemus, ſcil. aliquem regem, dominum, Cocceius. [h] אתנו nobiſcum, Muſculus, Pagninus, Montanus, Vatablus, Cocceius, Gejerus, Michaelis; ſo Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Ainſworth. [i] בישע in ſalute, Pagninus, Montanus, Mariana, Vatablus, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator; ſo Ainſworth. [k] יפיח לו ſpiret vel ſpirabit ſibi, De Dieu. [l] Qui ponit ei laqueum, Munſter; qui laqueum injicit illis, Heb. illi, Muis; ſo Kimchi. [m] Loquetur ſibi vel ei, Vatablus. [n] Reſpirationem dabit illi, Cloppenburgius; ſo Ainſworth, and ſome in Michaelis.

℣. 7. Thou ſhalt keep them, O Lord, &c.] Not the words before mentioned, as Aben Ezra explains it, for the affix is maſculine and not feminine; not but God has wonderfully kept and preſerved the ſacred writings; and he keeps every word of promiſe which he has made; and the doctrines of the goſpel will always continue from one generation to another; but the ſenſe is, that God will keep the poor and needy, and ſuch as he ſets in ſafety, as Kimchi rightly obſerves: they are not their own keepers, but God is the keeper of them; he keeps them by his power, and in his Son, in whoſe hands they are, and who is able to keep them from falling; they are kept by him from a total and final falling away; from the dominion and damning power of ſin, and from being devoured by Satan, and from the evil of the world: and this the pſalmiſt had good reaſon to believe, becauſe of the love of God to them, his covenant with them, and the promiſes of ſafety and ſalvation he has made unto them. Thou ſhalt preſerve them from this generation for ever; or thou ſhalt preſerve him [p]; that is, every one of the poor and needy, from the wicked generation of men in which they live, from being corrupted or intimidated by them; and who are deſcribed in the beginning of the pſalm. Some take theſe words to be a prayer, keep thou them, O Lord, and preſerve them, &c. [q] and ſo the following words may be thought to be a reaſon or argument enforcing the requeſt.

℣. 8. The wicked walk on every ſide, &c.] Of the poor and needy, or the righteous ones, to watch them, lay ſnares for them and hurt them; therefore Lord keep and preſerve them: the wicked are every where in great numbers, the whole world lies in wickedneſs; and the men of it are like their father the devil, they go about to do all the miſchief they can to the ſaints; wherefore they ſtand in need continually of divine preſervation. When the vileſt men are exalted; either to great dignities and high offices, to be magiſtrates and rulers; ſee Prov. xxix. 2. or are highly eſteemed and careſſed; which ſhews the ſad degeneracy and badneſs of the times, and the unſafe and dangerous condition the people of God are in, unleſs kept by him; ſee Mal. iii. 15, 16. or elſe theſe words may be conſidered as expreſſive of the judgment of God upon wicked men, and ſo confirm what the pſalmiſt had ſaid of God's regard to and preſervation of his own people; and the ſenſe be, that the wicked ſhall walk up and down here and there, as outcaſts and vagabonds, in a moſt deſolate, deſtitute and miſerable condition; and as the latter clauſe may be rendered, according to their exaltation ſhall be the vileneſs, depreſſion, or humiliation of the children of men [r]; they ſhall be brought as low as they have been made high; by how much the more highly they have been exalted, by ſo much the more deeply they ſhall be humbled: or elſe the meaning is, they ſhall walk about here and there fretting and vexing, when they ſhall ſee ſuch who in their opinion are the meaneſt and baſeſt of men, of low degree, and of a mean extract, exalted to the higheſt poſts of honour and dignity; as David, who was taken from the ſheepfold, and placed on the throne of Iſrael; ſo Jarchi, who obſerves that the Haggadah explains it of the Iſraelites who will be exalted in time to come.

PSALM XIII.

To the chief muſician, a pſalm of David.

ACcording to Theodoret this pſalm was written by David, not when he fled from Saul but from Abſalom; and gives this reaſon for it, what happened to him from Saul was before his ſin, and therefore he could ſpeak with great boldneſs; but what befel him from Abſalom was after it, and therefore mourning and groans were mixed with his words.

℣. 1. How long wilt thou forget me, O Lord, for ever? &c.] When God does not immediately deliver his people from their enemies, or help them out of an affliction; when he does not diſcover his love, communicate his grace, apply the bleſſings and promiſes of his covenant as uſual; and when he does not viſit them in his wonted manner, and ſo frequently as he has formerly done, they are ready to conclude he has forgotten them; and ſometimes this contiues long, and then they fear they are forgotten for ever; and this they cannot bear, and therefore expoſtulate with God in a querelous manner, as the pſalmiſt does here; but this is to be underſtood not in reality but in their own apprehenſion, ſion, and in the opinion of their enemies; for God never does nor can forget his people; oblivion does not fall upon him with reſpect to common perſons and things; and much leſs with reſpect to his own dear children, for whom a ſpecial book of remembrance is written; ſee the note on Pſalm ix. 18. How long wilt thou hide thy face from me? his love, and the manifeſtation of it, from his perſon; his gracious preſence, the light of his ſmiling countenance, which ſometimes God hides or withdraws from his people by way of reſentment of their unbecoming carriage to him; and which is very diſtreſſing to them, for they are apt to imagine it is in wrath and hot diſpleaſure, when he ſtill loves them, and will with everlaſting kindneſs have mercy on them; ſee Iſa. viii. 17. and lix. 2. and liv. 7—10. The Targum renders it, the glory of thy face.

[o] Vid. Jarchi, Kimchi, & Ben Melech in loc. ſo ſome in David de Pomis, Lexic. fol. 11. 1. taking ב in בעליל to be radical, and ל doubled as if it was בעל. [p] תצרנו cuſtodies eum, Pagninus, Montanus, Gejerus, Michaelis; ſo Ainſworth. [q] Cuſtodi eum, Tigurine verſion, Vatablus; cuſtodito eorum quemque, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator. [r] ברם זלות ſecundum ſuperelevationem, vilitas (erit vel eſt) Cocceius.

℣. 2. How long ſhall I take counſel in my ſoul, &c.] Or put it [s]; to take counſel of good men and faithful friends, in matters of moment and difficulty, is ſafe and right; and it is beſt of all to take counſel of God who is wonderful in it, and guides his people with it; but nothing is worſe than for a man to take counſel of his own heart, or only to conſult himſelf; for ſuch counſel often caſts a man down, and he is aſhamed of it ſooner or later: but this ſeems not to be the ſenſe here; the phraſe denotes the diſtreſſing circumſtances and anxiety of mind the pſalmiſt was in; he was at his wits end, and caſt about in his mind, and had various deviſes and counſels formed there; and yet knew not what way to take, what courſe to ſteer. Having ſorrow in my heart daily; by reaſon of God's hiding his face from him; on account of ſin that dwelt in him, or was committed by him; becauſe of his diſtance from the houſe of God, and the worſhip and ordinances of it; and by reaſon of his many enemies that ſurrounded him on every ſide: this ſorrow was an heart-ſorrow, and what continually attended him day by day; or was in the day-time, when men are generally amuſed with buſineſs or diverſions, as well as in the night, as Kimchi obſerves. How long ſhall mine enemy be exalted over me? even the vileſt of men, Pſal. xii. 8. this may be underſtood either of temporal enemies, and was true of David when he was obliged not only to quit his own houſe and family, but the land of Judea, and flee to the Philiſtines; and when he fled from Abſalom his ſon, leſt he ſhould be taken and ſlain by him: or of ſpiritual enemies, and is true of ſaints when ſin prevails and leads captive, and when the temptations of Satan ſucceed; as when he prevailed upon David to number the people, Peter to deny his maſter, &c. The Jewiſh writers [t] obſerve that here are four how longs, anſwerable to the four monarchies, Babylonian, Perſian, Grecian, and Roman, and their captivities under them.

℣. 3. Conſider and hear me, O Lord my God, &c.] The pſalmiſt amidſt all his diſtreſſes rightly applies to God by prayer, claims his intereſt in him as his covenant-God, which ſtill continued notwithſtanding all his darkneſs, deſertions and afflictions; and intreats him to conſider his affliction and trouble, and deliver him out of it; to conſider his enemies, how many and mighty they were; and his own weakneſs, his frame, that he was but duſt, and unable to ſtand againſt them: or to look [u] upon his affliction, and upen him under it, with an eye of pity and compaſſion; to have reſpect to him and to his prayers, and to turn unto him, and lift up the light of his countenance upon him: and ſo this petition is oppoſed to the complaint in ℣. 1. and he farther requeſts that he would hear him; that is, ſo as to anſwer him, and that immediately, and thereby ſhew that he had not forgotten him, but was mindful of him, of his love to him, and covenant with him. Lighten mine eyes; meaning either the eyes of his body, which might be dim and dull through a failure of the animal ſpirits, by reaſon of inward grief, outward afflictions, or for want of bodily food; which when obtained refreſhes nature, chears the animal ſpirits, enlightens, or gives a briſkneſs to the eyes; ſee 1 Sam. xiv. 27, 29. or elſe the eyes of his underſtanding, Eph. i. 18. that he might behold wondrous things in the law of God, know the things which were freely given to him of God, ſee more clearly his intereſt in him, and in the covenant of his grace, and have his ſoul refreſhed and comforted with the light of God's countenance; and he be better able to diſcern his enemies, and guard againſt them; and be directed to take the beſt method to be delivered and ſecured from them. The people of God are ſometimes in the dark, and ſee no light; eſpecially when benighted, and in ſleepy frames; and it is God's work to enlighten and quicken them. Leſt I ſleep the ſleep of death; a natural death [w], which is comparable to ſleep, and often expreſſed by it; and which ſenſe agrees with lightening the eyes of his body, as before explained; or rather, the ſenſe is, lift up the light of thy countenance, revive thy work in the midſt of the years; let me ſee thy goodneſs in the land of the living, that I may not faint and ſink and die away. Or it may be an eternal death is deſigned; for though true believers ſhall never die this death, yet they may be in ſuch circumſtances, as through unbelief to fear they ſhall. The Targum paraphraſes the word thus; "enlighten mine eyes in thy law, leſt I ſin, and ſleep with "thoſe who are guilty of death."

℣. 4. Leſt mine enemy ſay, I have prevailed againſt him, &c.] Which is an argument God takes notice of; and for which reaſon he does not give up his people into the hands of their enemies; ſee Deut. xxxii. 27. The Chaldee paraphraſe interprets this of the evil imagination or corruption of nature, and repreſents it as a perſon, as the apoſtle Paul does in Rom. vii. and which may be ſaid to prevail, when it puſhes on to ſin, and hinders doing good, and carries captive; and it may be applied to Satan, the great enemy of God's people, who triumphs over them, when he ſucceeds in his temptations. And thoſe that trouble me rejoice when I am moved; meaning from his houſe and family, from his country and kingdom, from a proſperous ſtate and condition to a diſtreſſed one; at which the troublers of David's peace would rejoice. They that trouble the ſaints are ſin, Satan, and the world; and the two laſt rejoice when they are in an uncomfortable and afflicted condition; and eſpecially Satan rejoices when he gains his point, if it is but to move them from any degree of ſtedfaſtneſs, of faith and hope, or from the ways of God in any reſpect: the Targum adds, from thy ways; for to be moved ſo as to periſh eternally they cannot, being built upon the rock of ages, and ſurrounded by the power and grace of God.

℣. 5. But I have truſted in thy mercy, &c.] The faith, hope, and comfort of the pſalmiſt grew and increaſed by prayer; from complaining he goes to praying, praying, from praying to believing; he truſted not in himſelf, not in his own heart, nor in his own righteouſneſs and merits, but in the mercy of God; and not in the bare abſolute mercy of God, but in the grace and goodneſs of God, as the word * here uſed ſignifies, as it is diſplayed in the plenteous redemption which is by Chriſt; which is a ſufficient ground of faith and hope; ſee Pſal. cxxx. 7. My heart ſhall rejoice in thy ſalvation; which God is the contriver, author, and giver of, and in which the glory of his perfections is ſo greatly diſplayed: and a true believer rejoices more on account that God is glorified by it, than becauſe of his own intereſt in it; and this joy is an inward one, it is joy in the heart, and is real and unfeigned, and is what continues, and will be felt and expreſſed both here and hereafter.

[s] אשית ponam, Pagninus, Montanus, Munſter, Vatablus. [t] Jarchi, Midraſh in Kimchi & Abendana in Miclol Yophi in loc. [u] הביטה intuere, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator; aſpice, Pagninus, Montanus, Cocceius. [w] Χαλκεον υπνον, Homer. Iliad. 11. v. 241. ferreus ſomnus, Virgil. Æneid. 10. v. 745, & 12. v. 309.

℣. 6. I will ſing unto the Lord, &c.] In prayer faith is encouraged, through believing the heart is filled with joy; and this joy is expreſſed by the lips, in ſongs of praiſe to the Lord, aſcribing the glory of ſalvation to him, and giving him thanks for every mercy and bleſſing of life. Becauſe he hath dealt bountifully with me; both in a way of providence and grace, granting life and preſerving it, and ſupporting with the comforts of it; bleſſing with ſpiritual bleſſings, and crowning with loving kindneſs and tender mercies; all which is generous and bountiful dealing, and affords a juſt occaſion of praiſe and thankſgiving; ſee Pſal. cxvi. 7. and ciii. 1—5.

PSALM XIV.

To the chief muſician, a pſalm of David.

THE argument of this pſalm, according to Theodoret, is Sennacherib's invaſion of Judea, when he ſent Rabſhakeh to Hezekiah with menaces and curſes; upon which Hezekiah implored divine help and obtained it, and the Aſſyrian army was deſtroyed by an angel; of all which he thinks this pſalm was prophetic.

℣. 1. The fool hath ſaid in his heart, &c.] This is to be underſtood not of a ſingle individual perſon, as Nabal, which is the word here uſed; nor of ſome Gentile king, as Sennacherib, or Rabſhakeh his general, as Theodoret; nor of Nebuchadnezzar, nor of Titus, as ſome Jewiſh writers [y] interpret it, making one to be here intended, and the other in Pſal. liii. the ſame with this; but of a body, a ſet of men, who juſtly bear this character; and deſign not ſuch who are ideots, perſons void of common ſenſe and underſtanding; but ſuch who are fools in their morals, without underſtanding in ſpiritual things; wicked profligate wretches, apoſtates from God, alienated from the life of God; and whoſe hearts are full of blindneſs and ignorance, and whoſe converſations are vile and impure, and they enemies of righteouſneſs, though full of all wicked ſubtlety and miſchief: theſe ſay in their hearts, which are deſperately wicked, and out of which evil thoughts proceed, pregnant with atheiſm and impiety; theſe endeavour to work themſelves into ſuch a belief, and inwardly to conclude, at leaſt to wiſh, there is no God; though they do not expreſs it with their mouths, yet they would fain perſuade their hearts to deny the being of God; that ſo having no ſuperior to whom they are accountable, they may go on in ſin with impunity; however, to conſider him as altogether ſuch an one as themſelves, and to remove ſuch perfections from him, as may render him unworthy to be regarded by them; ſuch as omniſcience, omnipreſence, &c. and to conceive of him as entirely negligent of, and unconcerned about affairs of this lower world, having nothing to do with the government of it: and thus to deny his perfections and providence, is all one as to deny his exiſtence, or that there is a God: accordingly the Targum paraphraſes it, "there is no שולטנא "government of God in the earth;" ſo Kimchi interprets it, "there is no governor, nor judge in "the world, to render to man according to his "works." They are corrupt; that is, every one of theſe fools; and it is owing to the corruption of their hearts they ſay ſuch things: they are corrupt in themſelves; they have corrupt natures, they are born in ſin, and of the fleſh, and muſt be carnal and corrupt: or they do corrupt, or have corrupted [z]: they corrupt themſelves by their atheiſtical thoughts and wicked practices, Jude 10. or their works, as the Chaldee paraphraſe adds; or their ways, their manner and courſe of life, Gen. vi. 12. and they corrupt others with their evil communications, their bad principles and practices, their ill examples and wicked lives. They have done abominable works: every ſinful action is abominable in the ſight of God; but there are ſome ſins more abominable than others; there are abominable idolatries, and abominable luſts, ſuch as were committed in Sodom; and it may be theſe are pointed at here, and which are uſually committed by ſuch who like not to retain God in their Knowledge; ſee Rom. i. 24, 28. There is none that doth good; any one good work in a ſpiritual manner; not in faith, from love, in the name and ſtrength of Chriſt, and with a view to the glory of God: nor can any man do a good work without the grace of God, and ſtrength from Chriſt, and the aſſiſtance of the Spirit of God: hence, whatſoever a wicked man does, whether in a civil or in a religious way, is ſin; ſee Prov. xxi. 4, 27. Arama takes theſe to be the words of the fool, or atheiſt, ſaying, there is no God that does good, like thoſe in Zeph. i. 12.

℣. 2. The Lord looked down from heaven upon the children of men, &c.] As he did when all fleſh had corrupted its way, and before he brought a flood upon the world of the ungodly, Gen. vi. 12. This is ſaid in direct oppoſition to the atheiſtical thoughts and reaſonings of wicked men, in the preceding verſe. There is a God, and he takes notice of the children of men, and of what is done by them; though his throne is in the heavens, and his dwelling there, yet he looks down from thence, and takes cogniſance of all human affairs. This muſt be underſtood conſiſtent with the omniſcience and omnipreſence of God; it is an anthropopathy, or a ſpeaking after the manner of men; and denotes the exact notice which God takes, and diſtinct obſervation he makes, and the perfect and accurate accurate knowledge he has of men and their actions; ſee Gen. xi. 5. and xviii. 20,21. Pſal. xxxiii. 13—15. To ſee if there were any that did underſtand: not things natural, civil and moral, but things ſpiritual, as the Apoſtle Paul interprets the words, Rom. iii. 11. For though man has not loſt the natural faculty of his underſtanding, and may have an underſtanding of the things of nature, yet not of the things of God, until a ſupernatural light is put into him; not any ſpiritual, experimental knowledge of God in Chriſt, nor of the way of ſalvation by Chriſt, nor of the work of the Spirit of God upon the heart, nor of the doctrines of the goſpel, nor any true ſight and ſenſe of his own ſtate and condition. And ſeek God; that is, after God; as the apoſtle in the ſame place explains it; after the knowledge of him and his ways, and communion with him; after the things of God, his intereſt and his glory: they do not ſeek after him in prayer, or by an attendance on his worſhip and ordinances; at leaſt with their whole hearts, earneſtly, diligently, conſtantly, and in the firſt place; nor do they ſeek after him in Chriſt, where he is only to be found; nor under the influence, and with the aſſiſtance of the bleſſed Spirit.

* בחסדך in bonitate tua, Vatablus; in benignitate tua, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator; in benigniſſima voluntate tua, Gejerus. [y] Vid. Jarchi, Kimchi & Ben Melech in loc. [z] השחיתו corruperunt, Pagninus, Montanus, Vatablus, Gejerus; corrumpunt, Junius & Tremellius; corrumpunt ſe, Piſcator.

℣. 3. They are all gone aſide, &c.] As bankrupts, having run out their whole ſtock, and into debt, and have nothing to pay, nor make compoſition with, and are obliged to abſcond, as Adam, Gen. iii. 8, 24. The words in Pſalm liii. 3. are, every one of them is gone back; from God; have revolted from him, and turned their backs upon him, and have gone back from his commandment, deſpiſed his law, and caſt away his word. The Apoſtle Paul interprets it, they are all gone out of the way; out of God's way, into their own way; out of the path of truth, righteouſneſs and holineſs, into the way of ſin, error, darkneſs and death; and with this agrees the interpretation of Aben Ezra, who adds, out of the right way; and of Kimchi and Ben Melech, whoſe gloſs is, out of the good way; which is God's way, or the way of his commandments. They are all together become filthy, or ſtinking [a], like putrid and corrupt fleſh; ſee Pſ. xxxviii. 5. Iſa. i. 6. and ſo unprofitable, uſeleſs, and good for nothing, as the Apoſtle renders it, Rom. iii. 12. Mankind are univerſally filthy and unclean; they are all of them defiled with ſin, both in ſoul and body, in all the faculties of their ſouls and members of their bodies; and they are originally and naturally ſo; nor can any thing cleanſe them from their pollution but the blood of Chriſt. There is none that doth good, no not one: this is repeated partly to aſſeverate more ſtrongly the depravity of mankind, and partly to expreſs the univerſality of it; that there is no exception to it in any that deſcend from Adam by ordinary generation. Here follow in the Septuagint verſion, according to the Vatican copy, all thoſe paſſages quoted by the Apoſtle, Rom. iii. 13—18. which have been generally ſuppoſed to have been taken from different parts of ſcripture; ſo the Syriac ſcholiaſt ſays, in ſome ancient Greek copies are found eight more verſes, and theſe are they, Their throat, &c.

℣. 4. Have all the workers of iniquity no knowledge? &c.] Of the being of God, of the nature of ſin, and of the puniſhment due unto it? This queſtion is put either by way of admiration, as Kimchi and Aben Ezra obſerve; the pſalmiſt, or rather God ſpeaking after the manner of men, wondering that there ſhould be ſuch ignorance and ſtupidity among men, as before expreſſed; or rather, as denying this to be the caſe, and affirming that they have knowledge, notwithſtanding they think and ſay and do as before related, as in Rom. ix. 21. Do not they know that there is a God? that ſin is the tranſgreſſion of the law of God? and that they are accountable to him for their actions? Verily they do: for this is ſaid, not of ſinners of the Gentiles; though even they, by the light of nature, know there is a God, and ſhew the work of the law written in their hearts; and have a conſciouſneſs in them of good and evil; but of ſinners in Zion, of the profligate part of mankind among the Jews, who had a divine revelation, by which they knew the one God of Iſrael; and a law, by which was the knowledge of ſin, and whoſe ſanctions were rewards and puniſhments. And it ſeems to deſign the chief among them, who had power over others, to eat them up and devour them; even their political and eccleſiaſtical governors; ſee Mic. iii. 1,2,3. Ezek. xxxiv. 2. who, tho' they had no ſpiritual underſtanding, nor experimental knowledge of things, yet had a theoretical and ſpeculative one; ſo that their ſins were attended with this aggravation, that they were againſt light and knowledge, particularly what follows: Who eat up my people as they eat bread: not David's people, but the Lord's people; ſee ℣. 2. whom he choſe for his people, who were his covenant-people, and who profeſſed his name, and were called by it; theſe the workers of iniquity eat up, devoured and conſumed; ſee Jer. x. 25. by reproaching and perſecuting them, doing injury to their perſons, property and character: they devoured their perſons, by uſing them cruelly and putting them to death; they devoured their ſubſtance, by ſpoiling them of it, and converting it to their own uſe, as the Phariſees are ſaid to devour widows houſes; and they deſtroyed their good names and characters with their devouring words: and this they did with as much eaſe, delight and pleaſure, and without any remorſe of conſcience, and as conſtantly as a man eats his bread. Or the words may be rendered, they eat up my people, they eat bread; that is, though they act ſuch a wicked and cruel part, yet they have bread to eat, and fulneſs of it; they are not in ſtraits, nor afflicted and puniſhed; and becauſe they are not, they are hardened in their impiety and iniquity: or they eat bread, after they have perſecuted and devoured the Lord's people, with peace of mind, without remorſe of conſcience, as if they had done no iniquity, like the adulterous woman in Prov. xxx. 20. And call not upon the Lord; or pray to him, or ſerve and worſhip him; for invocation includes the whole worſhip of God; and this they do not, though they know him, and are daily ſupplied by him, and eat his bread. Some read this clauſe with the former, they eat bread, and call not on the Lord; as if their ſin was, that when they eat bread, they did not aſk a bleſſing upon it, nor return thanks to God for it, which ought to be done; but the accent athnach under לחם bread, will not admit of this ſenſe, though it ſeems to be countenanced by the Targum.

℣. 5. There were they in great fear, &c.] This ſhews that they had ſome knowledge of God, and conſciouſneſs of guilt, which they endeavoured to baniſh out of their minds by their fears of puniſhment; and theſe fears men of the moſt atheiſtical principles cannot get rid of. In Pſalm liii. 5. it is is added, where no fear was; that is, any cauſe or reaſon for it: ſuch men are often frighted at their own ſhadows, afraid to be in the dark alone, as Hobbes the atheiſt was. The wicked flee when no man purſues, and are chaſed by the ſound of a ſhaken leaf; ſee Prov. xxviii. 1. Lev. xxvi. 36. or where there was no fear of God before their eyes, nor on their hearts, as well as no regard to men; or where before there were perfect peace and ſecurity, and no apprehenſion or dread of any calamity, ruin and deſtruction. For God is in the generation of the righteous, or of the righteous one [b]; which ſome underſtand of Jeſus Chriſt the righteous: and though the age or generation in which he lived was a very wicked one, yet God was with him; as was ſeen by the doctrines he taught, and the miracles he wrought; and which filled the Jews with panic fears, leſt the Romans ſhould come and take away their place and nation: but rather, this is to be underſtood of the generation of the ſaints, who are righteous through the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and have the new man in them, which is created in righteouſneſs and true holineſs, and live ſoberly and righteouſly; theſe are ſometimes called the generation of the upright, and of the children of God, and of them that ſeek him, Pſal. cxii. 2. and lxxiii. 15. and xxiv. 6. in the midſt of theſe God is, among them he affords his gracious preſence, and is with them, for their help and aſſiſtance againſt their enemies: and as this makes them fearleſs of them, it fills their enemies with dread and terror; ſee Joſhua ii. 9—11. The Targum renders it, "the Word of the Lord is in the gene-"ration of the righteous."

[a] נאלחו fætuerunt, putruerunt, Pagninus; aut putruerunt, Vatablus; putidi vel fœtidi, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Gejerus, Michaelis.

℣. 6. You have ſhamed the counſel of the poor, &c.] The poor ſaints, the Lord's people, the generation of the righteous, who are generally the poor of this world; poor in ſpirit, and an afflicted people: and the counſel of them, intends not the counſel which they give to others, but the counſel which they receive from the Lord, from the Spirit of counſel, which reſts upon them, and with which they are guided; and this is to truſt in the Lord, and to make him their refuge; and which is good advice, the beſt of counſel. Happy and ſafe are they that take it! But this is derided by wicked and ungodly men; they mock at the poor ſaints for it, and endeavour to ſhame them out of it; but hope makes not aſhamed; ſee Pſal. xxii. 7, 8. Becauſe the Lord is his refuge: he betakes himſelf to him when all others fail; and finds him to be a refuge from the ſtorm of impending calamities, and from all enemies.

℣. 7. O that the ſalvation of Iſrael were come out of Zion, &c.] By whom is meant the Meſſiah, the Saviour of Iſrael, of all the elect of God, whether Jews or Gentiles; and who is ſo called, becauſe the ſalvation of them was put into his hands, and he undertook it; and becauſe he is the Captain and Author of it, and it is in him, and in no other. He was to come out of Zion, out of Judea, from among the Jews; Zion being, as Kimchi obſerves, the head of the kingdom of Iſrael; ſee Rom. xi. 26. Accordingly Chriſt did come of the Jews, and ſalvation was of them, Rom. ix. 4, 5. John iv. 22. and for his coming from hence, or for his incarnation, the pſalmiſt moſt earneſtly wiſhes: he was one of thoſe kings, prophets, and righteous men, that deſired to ſee the days of the Meſſiah, Matt. xiii. 17. Luke x. 24. And what might move him ſo vehemently to wiſh for it, at this time, might be the ſad corruption and depravity of mankind, he had been deſcribing, and the afflicted and diſtreſſed ſtate of the ſaints. When the Lord bringeth back the captivity of his people. The people of God are in their unregeneracy, in a ſtate of captivity to ſin, Satan and the law; the work of the Meſſiah, when he came, was to proclaim liberty to the captives, to ſet them free, to deliver them from their ſpiritual bondage: and this Chriſt has done; he has redeemed his people from all their ſins, and from the curſe of the law, and from the power of Satan, and has led captivity captive; and which has juſtly occaſioned great joy in the redeemed ones, according to this prophecy: Jacob ſhall rejoice, and Iſrael ſhall be glad; that is, the poſterity of Jacob and Iſrael; not his natural but ſpiritual ſeed, ſuch who are the true ſons of Jacob, Iſraelites indeed; theſe having faith and hope in the plenteous redemption of Chriſt, rejoice in the view of their intereſt in it; they ſing the ſong of redeeming love now, and theſe ranſomed ones will hereafter come to Zion with joy, and everlaſting joy upon their heads. The Jews refer this to the times of the Meſſiah [c].

PSALM XV.

A pſalm of David.

AS in the preceding pſalm, according to Theodoret, the ſalvation of the inhabitants of Jeruſalem is foretold, and the liberty of the captives; ſo in this advice is given to them, and the life they ought to live propoſed, who ſhould ſhare in ſuch benefits.

℣. 1. Lord, who ſhall abide in thy tabernacle? &c.] This queſtion, with the following, is put by the pſalmiſt in a view of the ſad corruption and degeneracy of mankind deſcribed in the preceding pſalm, which renders the ſons of men unfit for the preſence of God, and communion with him; and it is put to the Lord himſelf, the founder of Zion, who has ſet his King over this holy hill of his; who has enacted laws for the good of it, and brings his people thither, making them meet for it, and ſo is moſt proper to give the qualifications of ſuch as are admitted here; for by the tabernacle is meant not the human nature of Chriſt, as in Heb. viii. 2. and ix. 11. as ſome interpret it, and apply all the characters in the following verſes to Chriſt; nor heaven itſelf, of which the holy place made with hands in the tabernacle and temple were a figure, Heb. ix. 24. for to ſojourn [d] or lodge as in an inn, as the word rendered abide ſignifies, will not ſuit with that ſtate and place which is fixed and immoveable; but the church of God on earth, called a tabernacle, in alluſion to the tabernacle of Moſes, where God granted his preſence, ſacrifices were offered up with acceptance, and the holy veſſels were put; and which was mean without, but rich and glorious glorious within: ſo God affords his gracious preſence in his church, accepts the ſpiritual ſacrifices of prayer and praiſe offered to him there; and here are the veſſels of mercy placed, which are ſanctified and meet for the maſter's uſe; and though it is mean and deſpicable in its outward appearance, in the eyes of men, it is all glorious within; ſee Cant. i. 6. and this is the tabernacle of God, being of his building, and preſerving, and the place of his reſidence. Who ſhall dwell in thy holy hill? the ſame is here intended as in the preceding clauſe; the alluſion is to mount Zion, whither the ark of the Lord was brought in David's time, and on one part of which the temple was afterwards built: and the church may be compared to this hill, for its eminence and viſibility in the world; for the holineſs which God has put upon it, and for the immoveableneſs of it; for though like a tabernacle it may be carried from place to place, yet it is like an hill that can never be removed out of the world; it is built on a ſure foundation, the rock of ages. Now the purport of theſe queſtions is, who is a proper perſon to be an inhabitant of Zion? or to be a member of the church of God? the anſwer is in the following verſes.

[b] צדיק juſti, Montanus, Gejerus. [c] Baal Hatturim in Num. 25. 12. & Midraſh Tillim in loc. [d] יגור Peregrinabitur, Pagninus, Montanus; diverſabitur, Muis; ſo Ainſworth; vel hoſpitabitur, Cocceius.

℣. 2. He that walketh uprightly, &c.] Or perfectly [c]; ſee Gen. xvii. 1. not ſo as to be without ſin entirely, but as not to be chargeable with any notorious crime, and living in it; moreover perfection and uprightneſs often ſignify ſincerity, and the phraſe here may deſign an Iſraelite indeed, in whom is no guile; whoſe faith is unfeigned, whoſe love is without diſſimulation, whoſe hope is without hypocriſy, and his whole conduct without fraud and deceit; likewiſe ſuch an one may be ſaid to walk uprightly who walks according to the truth of the goſpel, and by faith on Chriſt and in Chriſt, as he has received him; and ſuch an one is fit to be a member of a goſpel-church. And worketh righteouſneſs; not in order to his juſtification before God; for not ſuch an one, but he that truſts in the Lord for righteouſneſs, ſhall inherit his holy mountain, Iſa. lvii. 12, 13. but he that works the work of faith, and believes in the righteouſneſs of Chriſt; who looks to it and receives it; that lays hold on it and pleads it as his juſtifying righteouſneſs; he that does righteouſneſs in this ſenſe, is righteous as Chriſt is righteous, 1 John iii. 7. and ſuch an one is a proper perſon to dwell in his houſe; and who alſo by faith does works of righteouſneſs, and whoſe life is a ſeries and courſe of righteouſneſs, as a fruit of his faith, and in conſequence of his having laid hold on the righteouſneſs of Chriſt. And ſpeaketh the truth in his heart; receives Chriſt who is the truth, and the goſpel the word of truth into his heart, and makes an hearty profeſſion of the ſame before men; and both ſpeaks according to his light in the ſcriptures of truth, whenever he ſpeaks of divine things; and in common converſation ſpeaks truth from his heart to his neighbour, and does not ſpeak with a double heart, or ſay one thing with his mouth, and intend another in his heart; ſee Pſal. xii. 2. or endeavour to deceive perſons, and impoſe a falſhood on them, or tell them lies; for as ſuch a perſon is not fit to dwell in a private houſe, or to be in a civil ſociety, much leſs is he a proper perſon to be in the houſe of God.

℣. 3. He that backbiteth not with his tongue, &c.] Is not a ſlanderer, a defamer, a tale-bearer; a backbiter is one who privately, ſecretly, behind a man's back ſpeaks evil of him, devours and deſtroys his credit and reputation: the word here uſed comes from רגל which ſignifies the foot, and denotes ſuch a perſon who goes about from houſe to houſe, ſpeaking things he ſhould not, 1 Tim. v. 13. and a word from this root ſignifies ſpies; and the phraſe here may point at ſuch perſons who creep into houſes, pry into the ſecrets of families, and divulge them, and oftentimes repreſent them in a falſe light. Such are ranked among the worſt of men, and are very unfit to be in the ſociety of the ſaints, or in a church of Chriſt; ſee Rom. i. 30. 2 Cor. xii. 20. Nor doeth evil to his neighbour; to any man whatever, good or bad, friend or foe, whether in a natural, civil, or ſpiritual relation, either by words or deeds, to his perſon, property, or good name. Nor taketh up a reproach againſt his neighbour; does not raiſe any ſcandalous report on him himſelf, nor will he bear to hear one from another, much leſs will he ſpread one; nor will he ſuffer one to lie upon his neighbour, but will do all he can to vindicate him, and clear his character.

℣. 4. In whoſe eyes a vile perſon is contemned, &c.] A vile man is a very wicked, profligate, and abandoned creature, one that is to every good work reprobate; and ſuch ſometimes are in high places, Pſal. xii. 8. Dan. xi. 21. and are greatly careſſed and eſteemed by the men of the world; but then, as they are an abomination to God, they ſhould be deſpiſed by his people, let them be what they will as to their riches, honours, and wiſdom among men; as Haman was by Mordecai, Eſth. iii. 2. and Ahab by Eliſha, 2 Kings iii. 14. and ſuch who keep company with, and expreſs a delight and pleaſure in ſuch ſort of perſons, ought by no means to have a place in the houſe of God. Some underſtand this of a good man being deſpiſed in his own eyes, as it may be rendered [f]; on account of his vileneſs, and the imperfection of his obedience, and as expreſſive of his great humility, eſteeming others better than himſelf; and who renounces himſelf, and is rejected by himſelf, having a very mean opinion of himſelf; which is the ſenſe of the Targum, Aben Ezra and Kimchi; and which is no bad ſenſe, tho' the former is countenanced by what follows. But he honoureth them that fear the Lord; who have the covenant-grace of fear wrought in their hearts, and ſerve the Lord with reverence and godly fear; that is, who are truly religious and godly perſons; theſe, ſuch who are fit members of the church of Chriſt love heartily, eſteem of highly, and honour them by thinking and ſpeaking well of them, and behaving with great reſpect and decency to them; ſee Rom. xii. 10. He that ſweareth to his own hurt, and changeth not; having taken a ſolemn oath, ſo ſacred is it with him, and ſuch a regard has he to the name of God, by whom he ſwears, that tho' it is to his civil loſs and detriment, yet he will not break it and depart from it, but punctually obſerve it: ſome render it, he that ſwears to his neighbour, and changeth not [g]; he that is juſt to his word, faithful to his promiſes, that exactly fulfils all the obligations he lays himſelf under unto others; he that is honeſt and upright in all his dealings. The Jewiſh writers interpret this clauſe of a man's vowing and ſwearing to afflict himſelf by faſting, which, though it is to the emaciating of his body, yet he ſtrictly obſerves his vow or oath; but this is foreign from the ſcope of the place: it might be rendered, he that ſwears to do evil, and does not recompenſe or perform, perform [h], it being better to break through ſuch an oath than to keep it; ſee Lev. v. 4.

[c] תמים perfectus, Montanus, Gejerus. Sic. Syr. Ar. Æthiop.

[f] נבזה בעיניו qui deſpicit ſe in oculis ſuis, ſo ſome in Vatablus; illo eſt deſpectus in propriis oculis, reprobatus, Guſſetius, p. 453.

[g] להרע τω πλησιον αυτου, Sept. proximo ſuo, V. L.

℣. 5. He that putteth not out his money to uſury, &c.] To the poor, in an extravagant and exorbitant way, by which he bites, devours, and deſtroys his little ſubſtance, and ſadly afflicts and diſtreſſes him; ſee Exod. xxii. 25. otherwiſe, to lend money on moderate intereſt, and according to the laws, cuſtoms, and uſages of nations, and to take intereſt for it, is no more unlawful than to take intereſt for houſes and land; yea it is according to the law of common juſtice and equity, that if one man lends money to another to trade with, and gain by, that he ſhould have a proportionate ſhare in the gain of ſuch a trade; but the deſign of this paſſage, and the law on which it is founded, is, to forbid all exactions and oppreſſions of the poor, and all avaritious practices, and to encourage liberality and beneficence; and ſuch who are covetous, and bite and oppreſs the poor, are not fit for church-communion; ſee 1 Cor. v. 11. Eph. v. 5. Nor taketh reward againſt the innocent; either to ſwear falſly againſt him, or to paſs a wrong ſentence on him; ſee 1 Sam. xii. 3. He that doeth theſe things ſhall never be moved; from the tabernacle of God, and his holy hill; he is fit to be a member of the church of God, and an inhabitant of Zion; and he ſhall dwell and abide there, he ſhall be a pillar which ſhall never go out, Rev. iii. 12. he ſhall finally perſevere, through the grace of God; he ſhall hold on and out unto the end: and though he may fall through infirmity and temptation into ſin, and that many times, yet he ſhall not finally and totally fall, 2 Pet. i. 10. but ſhall be as mount Zion which can never be removed, Pſal. cxxv. 1, 2. The words ſhould be rendered, ſince the accent athnach is on אלה theſe things, thus; he that doth theſe things, not only what is mentioned in this verſe, but in the foregoing, he, I ſay, ſhall never be moved.

PSALM XVI.

Michtam of David.

THIS is a new title, not met with before, tho' it afterwards is prefixed to five pſalms running, Pſal. lvi, lvii, lviii, lix, lx. Some take the word mictam to be the name of a muſical inſtrument; as Kimchi on Pſal. iv. 1. others the name of one of the tunes, as Jarchi; and others the tune of a ſong which began with this word, as Aben Ezra obſerves, to which this pſalm was ſung; the Septuagint tranſlate it ſtelography, or an inſcription upon a pillar; ſuch an one as is erected by conquerors as Theodoret obſerves, having writing on it declaring the victory obtained; ſuggeſting that the pſalm, or the ſubject of it, the death and reſurrection of Chriſt, was worthy to be inſcribed on a pillar of marble; and the Targum renders it, a right engraving, that deſerves to be engraven in a monument of braſs: but what ſeems to be the beſt ſenſe of the word is, that it ſignifies a work of gold, and may be rendered, a golden pſalm of David; ſo called, either becauſe it was a dear and favourite ſong of his; or from the ſubject-matter, which is more valuable and precious than the moſt fine gold: the title of it in the Syriac and Arabic verſions is, "concerning the election of the church, and the reſurrection of Chriſt;" and certain it is from ℣. 10. the reſurrection of Chriſt is ſpoken of in it, as is clear from the teſtimonies of two apoſtles, Peter and Paul, who cite it in proof of it, Acts ii. 25—31. and xiii. 35, 36, 37. and ſince there is but one perſon ſpeaking throughout the pſalm, and Chriſt is he that ſpeaks in ℣. 10. and which cannot be underſtood of David, nor of any other perſon, but Chriſt, the whole of the pſalm muſt be interpreted of him.

℣. 1. Preſerve me, O God, &c.] Prayer is proper to Chriſt as man; he offered up many prayers and ſupplications to God, even his Father, and his God, and as the ſtrong and mighty God, as the word [i] here uſed is commonly rendered by interpreters; with whom all things are poſſible, and who is able to ſave; ſee Heb. v. 7. Luke vi. 12. Matt. xxvi. 39, 42, 44. John xvii. 1. and this petition for preſervation was ſuitable to him and his caſe, and was heard and anſwered by God; he was very remarkably preſerved in his infancy from the rage and fury of Herod; and very wonderfully was his body preſerved and ſupported in the wilderneſs under a faſt of forty days and forty nights together, and from being torn to pieces by the wild beaſts among which he was, and from the temptations of Satan, with which he was there aſſaulted; and throughout the whole of his miniſtry he was preſerved from being hindered in the execution of his office, either by the flatteries, or menaces, or falſe charges of his enemies; and though his life was often attempted they could not take it away before his time: and whereas Chriſt is in this pſalm repreſented as in the view of death and the grave, this petition may be of the ſame kind with thoſe in John xii. 27. Matt. xxvi. 39, 42. and put up with the ſame ſubmiſſion to the will of God; and at leaſt may intend divine help and ſupport in his ſufferings and death, preſervation from corruption in the grave, and the reſurrection of him from the dead; and it may alſo include his concern for the preſervation of his church, his other ſelf, and the members of it, his apoſtles, diſciples, and all that did or ſhould believe in his name, for whom he prayed after this manner a little before his death; ſee Luke xxii. 31, 32. John xvii. 11, 15, 20, 24. For in thee do I put my truſt; or have hoped [k]; the graces of faith and hope were implanted in the heart of Chriſt, as man, who had the gifts and graces of the Spirit without meaſure beſtowed on him, and theſe very early appeared in him, and ſhewed themſelves in a very lively exerciſe, Pſal. xxii. 7. Luke ii. 49. and were in a very eminent manner exerciſed by him a little before his death, in the view of it, and when he was under his ſufferings, and hung upon the croſs, Iſa. l. 6—9. Matt. xxvii. 46. Pſal. xvi. 9, 10. and xxii. 8. and this his truſt and confidence in God alone, and not in any other, is uſed as a reaſon or argument for his preſervation and ſafety.

℣. 2. O my ſoul, thou haſt ſaid unto the Lord, &c.] Some take theſe to be the words of David ſpeaking to the church, who had owned the Lord to be her Lord, and had declared what follows; others others think they are the words of God the Father to his Son, ſuggeſting to him what he had ſaid; but they are rather an apoſtrophe, or an addreſs of Chriſt to his own ſoul; and the phraſe, O my ſoul, though not in the original text, is rightly ſupplied by our tranſlators, and which is confirmed by the Targum, and by the Jewiſh commentators, Jarchi, Aben Ezra and Kimchi. Thou art my Lord; Chriſt, as man, is a creature made by God; his human nature is the true tabernacle which God pitched and not man, and on this conſideration he is his Lord, being his Creator; and as mediator Chriſt is his ſervant, and was made under the law to him, obeyed him, and ſubmitted to his will in all things; ſo that he not only in words ſaid he was his Lord, but by deeds declared him to be ſo. My goodneſs extendeth not to thee; ſuch who ſuppoſe that David here ſpeaks in his own perſon, or in the perſon of other believers, or that the church here ſpeaks, differently interpret theſe words: ſome render them, my goodneſs is not above thee[l]; it is far inferior to thine, it is not to be mentioned with it, it is nothing in compariſon of it; all my goodneſs, happineſs and felicity lies in thee, Pſal. lxxiii. 25. others, I have no goodneſs without thee; the ſenſe is the ſame as if it was I have ſaid, as read the Greek, Vulgate Latin, and oriental verſions, and ſo Apollinarius; I have none but what comes from thee; what I have is given me by thee, which is the ſenſe of the Targum; ſee James i. 17. others, my goodneſs is not upon thee[m]; does not lie upon thee, or thou art not obliged to beſtow the bleſſings of goodneſs on me; they are not due to me, they ſpring from thy free grace and favour; to this ſenſe incline Jarchi, Aben Ezra and Kimchi; ſee Luke xvii. 10. Rom. xi. 35. others, thou haſt no need of my goodneſs; nor will it profit thee, ſo R. Joſeph Kimchi; ſee Job xxii. 2, 3. and xxxv. 7, 8. or the words may be rendered, O my goodneſs, or thou art my good, nothing is above thee[n]; no goodneſs in any ſuperior to God. But they are the words of Chriſt, and to be underſtood of his goodneſs; not of his eſſential goodneſs as God, nor of his providential goodneſs, the ſame with his Father's; but of his ſpecial goodneſs, and the effect of it to his church and people; and denotes his love, grace, and goodwill towards them, ſhewn in his incarnation, ſufferings and death; and the bleſſings of goodneſs which come thereby; ſuch as a juſtifying righteouſneſs, forgiveneſs of ſin, peace and reconciliation, redemption, ſalvation, and eternal life. Now tho' God is glorified by Chriſt in his incarnation, ſufferings and death, and in the work of man's redemption, yet he ſtood in no need of the obedience and ſufferings of his Son; he could have glorified his juſtice another way, as he did in not ſparing the angels that ſinned, in drowning the old world, and in burning Sodom and Gomorrah, and in other inſtances of his vengeance; though there is glory to God in the higheſt in the affair of ſalvation by Chriſt, yet the good will is to men; though the debt of obedience and ſufferings was paid to the juſtice of God, whereby that is ſatisfied and glorified, yet the kindneſs in paying the debt was not to God but to men, deſcribed in the next verſe.

[h] So Ainſworth. [i] אל Deus fortis ſeu potens, Muis; Deus omnipotens, Cocceius, Michaelis. [k] חסיתי בך ſperavi in te, V. L. Pagninus, Montanus.

℣. 3. But to the ſaints that are in the earth, &c.] Who are ſanctified or ſet apart by God the Father in election; whoſe ſins are expiated by the blood of Chriſt in redemption, and who are ſanctified or made holy by the Spirit of God in effectual vocation; and who live a holy life and converſation: theſe are ſaid to be in the earth, not to diſtinguiſh them from the ſaints in heaven, to whom the goodneſs of Chriſt extends as to them; unleſs it be to diſtinguiſh them from the angels in heaven, who are called ſaints, Deut. xxxiii. 2. as Aben Ezra obſerves; but to point out the place of their abode, ſcattered up and down in the earth; and to ſhew that love, grace, goodneſs and kindneſs of Chriſt reaches to them in the preſent ſtate of things, notwithſtanding all their meanneſs and imperfection in themſelves, and their deſpicableneſs in the eyes of others; ſee John xiii. 1. And to the excellent; the ſame with the ſaints, who though reckoned by men the filth of the world, and the offſcouring of all things, are in high eſteem with Chriſt; they are nobles[o] in his account, as the word is rendered in Jer. xxx. 21. they are princes in all the earth, and theſe princes are kings; they are made kings and prieſts unto God by Chriſt; they wear and live like kings, and have the attendance, power, riches and glory of kings; they are guarded by angels, they have power with God, they are rich in faith, and heirs of a kingdom. In whom is all my delight; Chriſt's delights were with theſe ſons of men before the world was, and have always continued with them; they are his hephzi-bah and beulah, as in Iſa. lxii. 4. hence he became incarnate, and ſuffered and died for them, and makes application of all the bleſſings of his grace and goodneſs to them.

℣. 4. Their ſorrows ſhall be multiplied, &c.] Not the ſorrows of the ſaints and excellent ones, by ſeeing the idolatry of men, as Aben Ezra interprets it; but the ſorrows of ſuch that haſten after another God; a falſe god, an idol, to ſerve and worſhip it; for generally ſpeaking, idolaters are more forward, eager and haſty to attend a falſe worſhip, than the worſhippers of the true God are to attend his ſervice: now their ſorrows are many, even in their worſhip, by cutting their bodies with knives and lancets, as the worſhippers of Baal did; and by ſacrificing their own children, which, notwithſtanding their raſh and precipitate zeal, could not fail of giving them pain and uneaſineſs; and beſides temporal puniſhments inflicted on them for their idolatry by God, and ſtings of conſcience which muſt ſometimes attend them, the wrath of God lies upon them, and they will have their portion in the lake of fire, and the ſmoke of their torment will aſcend for ever and ever. Some render the words, their idols are multipled; and ſo the Chaldee paraphraſe, "they multiply their idols, and after that haſten to "offer their ſacrifices;" when men leave the true God, they know not where to ſtop; the heathens had not leſs than thirty thouſand gods, and the Jews when they fell into idolatry ran in the ſame way, Jer. ii. 28. and xi. 13. Hoſ. viii. 11. The word God is not in the original text, though the ſupplement is countenanced by the Jewiſh writers[p], who interpret it in this way; but I rather think the text is to be underſtood not of heathen idolaters, but of unbelieving Jews, who, rejecting the true Meſſiah, haſten after another Meſſiah, King and Saviour; when Jeſus the true Meſſiah came, they received him not; but when another came in his own name they were eager to embrace him, John v. 43. and to this day they are haſtening after another; and in their daily prayers pray that the coming

[l] טובתי בל עליך bonum meum non eſt ſupra te, Gejerus. [m] Bonum meum non eſt ſuper te, Montanus, Cocceius, [n] So Guſſetius, p. 299. [o] אדירי magnificis, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Rivetus; nobilibus delectationis meæ, Gejerus; ducibus eorum, Cocceius; ſo Michaelis. [p] Jarchi, Aben Ezra, Kimchi, Ben Melech & Abendana in loc.

ing of the Meſſiah might be בְּמַהֵרָה in haſte, in their days [q]; and the ſenſe of the paſſage is, that the ſorrows of the Jews, rejecting the Meſſiah and haſtening after another, would come thick and faſt upon them, until wrath came upon them to the uttermoſt, Matt. xxiv. 6—8. 1 Theſſ. ii. 16. and it holds good of all, whether Jews or Gentiles, that haſten after another Saviour; that ſay to the works of their hands, that they are their gods, or go about to eſtabliſh a righteouſneſs of their own, or ſeek for life and ſalvation by their own doings; theſe, ſooner or later, will lie down in ſorrow, Iſa. l. 11. Their drink-offerings of blood will I not offer; meaning not the libations of the Gentiles, which were not wine, according to the law, Numb. xv. 10. but blood, even ſometimes human blood; but the ſacrifices of the Jews, which were either got by blood, murders and robberies, and on that account were hateful to God, Iſa. lxi. 8. or rather the ſacrifices of blood-thirſty perſons, whoſe hands were full of blood, Iſa. i. 11—15. and ſuch were the offerings of the prieſts, ſcribes and phariſees, in Chriſt's time, who were the children of them that killed the prophets, and ſought after the blood of Chriſt. Or it may be rendered, I will not offer their drink-offerings becauſe of blood [r]; meaning his own blood ſhed for the remiſſion of ſins, which being obtained, there remains no more offering for ſin; and ſo the words may expreſs the abolition of all legal ſacrifices, and the cauſing of them to ceaſe through the blood and ſacrifice of Chriſt. This ſhews the perſon ſpeaking to be a prieſt, and therefore could not be David, but muſt be the Meſſiah, who is a prieſt after the order of Melchizedek; and who had a better ſacrifice to offer up, than any of the offerings of the Jews, even his own ſelf, by which he has put away ſin for ever. He adds, nor take up their names into my lips; not the names of idol-deities, nor of their worſhippers, but of the Jews that rejected him as the Meſſiah, for whom he would not pray, John xvii. 9. and ſo as he refuſed to offer their ſacrifices, he would not perform the other part of his prieſtly office for them in interceſſion; though this may alſo have reſpect to the rejection of the Jewiſh nation as the people of God; writing a lo-ammi upon them, declaring them to be no longer the children of the living God; leaving their names for a curſe, a taunt, and a proverb in every place; expreſſing the utmoſt abhorrence of them, and ſhewing the utmoſt indignation at them, as perſons whoſe names were not worthy or fit to be mentioned, Eph. v. 3.

℣. 5. The Lord is the portion of mine inheritance, and of my cup, &c.] This is ſaid by Chriſt as a prieſt, and in alluſion to the Levitical prieſts, who had no inheritance in the land of Canaan with their brethren, but the Lord was their part and portion, and their inheritance, Numb. xviii. 20. Deut. xviii. 1, 2. and it expreſſes the ſtrong love and affection Chriſt had for the Lord as his God, the delight and pleaſure he had in him, and the ſatisfaction he had in the enjoyment of him and communion with him, and that it was his meat and drink to ſerve him, and to do his will; and tho' his goodneſs did not extend to him, yet his goodneſs and happineſs as man lay in him: unleſs the ſenſe ſhould be, "the Lord is he who gives me the portion of mine inheritance;" meaning his church and people, all the elect of God, who are Chriſt's portion and inheritance, given him by the Father; ſee Deut. xxxii. 9. Pſal. ii. 8. And aſſigns to me my cup, as of bleſſings, ſo of ſorrows and ſufferings, which being meaſured out, filled up, and put into his hand by his Father, he freely took it, John xviii. 11. Thou maintaineſt my lot; that is, either his intereſt in God himſelf, as his covenant-God, which always continued; or the lot of goods, of grace and glory, put into his hands for his people, which always remains; or rather, the ſaints themſelves, who, as they are Chriſt's portion and inheritance, ſo they are his lot; in alluſion to the land of Canaan, which was divided by lot: theſe Jehovah took hold of, kept, preſerved and upheld, as the word [s] ſignifies; ſo that they ſhall never totally and finally fall and periſh; and this ſenſe is countenanced by what follows.

℣. 6. The lines are fallen unto me in pleaſant places, &c.] The alluſion is to the meaſuring of land by lines, and appropriating each part to the proper owners; and lines deſign the land that is meaſured out by them, and here the church and people of God, the choſen ones who are given to Chriſt, as his portion and inheritance; and the ſenſe is, that Chriſt's portion lies among or in pleaſant perſons; ſuch as were ſo to him, as he ſaw them in his father's purpoſes and decrees; and as they are clothed in his righteouſneſs, and waſhed in his blood; and as they are adorned with the graces of his Spirit; and as they will be as a bride adorned for him in the new Jeruſalem-ſtate; for rather perſons than places are here meant: though as the bounds of the ſaints habitations are ſet, and they are known to Chriſt, ſo they were pleaſant to him, and he took delight and rejoiced in the very ſpots of ground where he knew they would dwell, Prov. viii. 31. and the word places is ſupplied by Aben Ezra and Kimchi: but the former ſenſe ſeems beſt, and agrees with what follows. Yea, I have a goodly heritage: ſo the Lord's people are called, 1 Pet. v. 3. theſe are Chriſt's heritage, his peculiar treaſure, his jewels, with whom he is greatly delighted and well pleaſed; more than men are with their gold and ſilver, houſes and land, and their greateſt wealth and ſubſtance: theſe perſons are the inheritance with which he is contented and fully ſatisfied.

℣. 7. I will bleſs the Lord, &c.] As prayer, ſo thanksgiving belongs to Chriſt, as man and mediator; ſee Matt. xi. 25, 26. John xi. 42. and here he determines to praiſe the Lord, and give thanks to him for counſel and inſtruction: Who hath given me counſel; for though he himſelf is the Counſellor, with reſpect to his people, yet as man he received counſel from God, and the Spirit of counſel reſted on him, Iſa. xi. 2. and fitted him for, and directed him in the execution of his prophetic office; for the doctrine he taught was not his own, but his Father's; and he ſaid nothing of himſelf but what his Father taught him, and inſtructed him to ſpeak, John vii. 16. and viii. 28. and xii. 49, 50. And he alſo gave him counſel about the execution of his prieſtly office, or about his ſufferings and death, and drinking of the cup, which he, with ſubmiſſion to the divine will, deſired might paſs from him; but having advice in this matter, moſt chearfully and courageouſly yielded to take it; ſee Matt. xxvi. 39, 42, 44, 46, 50, 53, 54. My reins alſo inſtruct me in the night-ſeaſons; when engaged in prayer to God, in which he ſometimes continued a whole night together, Luke vi. 12. and xxi.

[q] Seder Tephillot, fol. 128. 2. [r] מדם propter ſanguinem, Cocceius, Gejerus, Michaelis. [s] תומיך ſuſtentas, Muſculus, Pagninus, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator; ſo Ainſworth; ſuſtentans, Montanus, Michaelis; tenuiſti, Cocceius; tenendo quaſi ſuſtentans, Gejerus.

xxi. 37. and eſpecially in that dark and diſmal night in which he was betrayed, when it was the hour and power of darkneſs with his enemies; then, his inward parts being influenced by the Spirit of wiſdom and counſel, directed him how to behave and conduct himſelf. Or the reins being the ſeat of the affections, and being put for them, may ſignify, that his ſtrong affection for God, and love to his people, put him upon, and moved him to take the ſteps he did, to deliver up himſelf into the hands of ſinful men, in order to ſuffer and die for his friends, and obtain eternal ſalvation for them.

℣. 8. I have ſet the Lord always before me, &c.] Not his fear only, or the book of the law, as Jarchi interprets it, but the Lord himſelf; or, I foreſaw the Lord always before my face, Acts ii. 26. as Chriſt is ſet before men in the goſpel, to look unto as the object of faith and hope, to truſt in and depend upon for life and ſalvation; ſo Jehovah the father is the object, which Chriſt ſet before him, and looked unto in the whole courſe of his life here on earth; he had always an eye to his glory, as the ultimate end of all his actions; and to his will, his orders and commands, as the rule of them; and to his purpoſes, and counſel, and covenant, to accompliſh them; and to his power, truth and faithfulneſs, to aſſiſt, ſupport, and encourage him in all his difficulties and moſt diſtreſſed circumſtances. Becauſe he is at my right hand; to counſel and inſtruct, to help, protect and defend: the phraſe is expreſſive of the nearneſs of God to Chriſt, his preſence with him, and readineſs to aſſiſt and ſtand by him againſt all his enemies; ſee Pſal. cix. 31. and cx. 5. and cxxi. 5. ſo the Targum paraphraſes it, becauſe his ſhekinah reſts upon me. I ſhall not be moved: as he was not from his place and nation, from the duty of his office, and the execution of it, by all the threats and menaces of men; nor from the fear, worſhip and ſervice of God, by all the temptations of Satan; nor from the cauſe of his people he had eſpouſed, by all the terrors of death, the flaming ſword of juſtice, and the wrath of God; but in the midſt and view of all, ſtood unſhaken and unmoved; ſee Iſa. xlii. 4. and l. 5—9.

℣. 9. Therefore my heart is glad, &c.] Becauſe he had the Lord always in view; he was at his right hand, for his ſupport and aſſiſtance, as well as becauſe of what is expreſſed in the next verſes: this is the ſame with rejoicing in ſpirit, Luke x. 21. it denotes an inward joy, and fulneſs of it, becauſe of the Lord's preſence with him; ſee Acts ii. 28. And my glory rejoiceth; meaning either his ſoul, which is the moſt glorious and noble part of man, as Aben Ezra, Kimchi and Ben Melech interpret it; or rather his tongue, as in Acts ii. 26. the faculty of ſpeaking in man being what gives him a ſuperior glory and excellency to other creatures, and is that whereby he glorifies God; and ſo the word is often uſed in this book; ſee Pſal. xxx. 12. and lvii. 8. and cviii. 1. and here the phraſe deſigns Chriſt's glorifying God, and ſinging his praiſe with joyful lips, among his diſciples, a little before his ſufferings and death. My fleſh alſo ſhall reſt in hope; in the grave; which, as it is a reſting-place to the members of Chriſt, from all their ſorrow, toil, and labour here; ſo it was to Chriſt their head, who reſted in it on the Jewiſh ſabbath, that day of reſt, and that both in ſafety [t], as the word uſed may ſignify, and in hope of his reſurrection from the dead, as follows.

℣. 10. For thou wilt not leave my ſoul in hell, &c.] Meaning, not in the place of the damned, where Chriſt never went, nor was; for at his death his ſoul was committed to his Father, and was the ſame day in paradiſe: but rather, ſheol here, as hades in the New Teſtament, ſignifies the ſtate of the dead, the ſeparate ſtate of ſouls after death, the inviſible world of ſouls, where Chriſt's ſoul was; though it was not left there, nor did it continue, but on the third day returned to its body again: though it ſeems beſt of all to interpret it of the grave, as the word is rendered in Gen. xlii. 38. Iſa. xxxviii. 18. and then by his ſoul muſt be meant, not the more noble part of his human nature, the ſoul, in diſtinction from the body; for as it died not, but went to God, it was not laid in the grave; but either he himſelf, in which ſenſe the word ſoul is ſometimes uſed, even for a man's ſelf, Pſal. iii. 2. and xi. 1. For it might be truly ſaid of him, God's holy One, that he was laid in the grave, though not left there; or rather, his dead body, for ſo the word nepheſh is rendered in Numb. ix. 6, 10. and xix. 11, 13. ſo anima is uſed in Latin authors [u]: this was laid in the grave; for Joſeph having begged it of Pilate, took it down from the croſs, and laid it in his own new tomb; though it was the will of God it ſhould not be left there, but be raiſed from the dead, as it was on the third day, before it was corrupted, as follows: Neither wilt thou ſuffer thine holy One to ſee corruption; that is, to lie ſo long in the grave as to putrify and be corrupted; wherefore he was raiſed from the dead on the third day, according to the ſcriptures, before the time bodies begin to be corrupted; ſee John xi. 39. and this was owing not to the care of Joſeph or Nicodemus, in providing ſpices to preſerve it, but of God who raiſed him from the dead, and gave him glory; and who would not ſuffer his body to be corrupted, becauſe he was holy, and becauſe he was his holy One; that ſo as there was no moral corruption in him, there ſhould be no natural corruption in him; ſo the Jewiſh Midraſh [w] interprets it, that "no worm "or maggot ſhould have power over him;" which is not true of David, nor of any but the Meſſiah. This character of holy One eminently belongs to Chriſt above angels and men, yea it is often uſed of the divine being, and it agrees with Chriſt in his divine nature, and is true of him as man; he is the holy thing, the holy child Jeſus; his nature is pure and ſpotleſs, free from the taint of original ſin; his life and converſation were holy and harmleſs, he did no ſin, nor knew any, nor could any be found in him by men or devils; his doctrines were holy, and tended to promote holineſs of life; all his works are holy, and ſuch is the work of redemption, which is wrought out in conſiſtence with and to the glory of the holineſs and righteouſneſs of God; Chriſt is holy in all his offices, and is the fountain of holineſs to his people; and he is God's holy One, he has property in him as his Son, and as mediator, and even as an holy One; for he was ſanctified and ſent into the world by him, being anointed with the holy oil of his Spirit without meaſure. The word may be rendered, a merciful [x] or liberal and beneficent one: for Chriſt is all this; he is a merciful as well as a faithful high-prieſt, and he he generouſly diſtributes grace and glory to his people.

[t] לבטח in tuto, Tigurine verſion; ſecure, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Cocceius; in confidence, Ainſworth. [u] — animamque ſepulchro condimus — Virgil. Æneid. 3. v. 67. [w] Apud Kimchi in v. 9. [x] חסידך miſericordem tuum, Pagninus, Montanus; beneficus tuus, Piſcator.

℣. 11. Thou wilt ſhew me the path of life, &c.] Not the way of life and ſalvation for loſt ſinners, which is Chriſt himſelf; but the reſurrection of the dead, which is a paſſing from death to life; and was ſhewn to Chriſt, not doctrinally, or by illuminating his mind, and leading him into the doctrine of it, for ſo he himſelf has brought it to light by the goſpel; but practically and experimentally, by raiſing him from the dead, or by cauſing him to paſs from death to life; and he was the firſt to whom the path of life was ſhewn in this ſenſe, or the firſt who ever trod in it, and ſo has led the way for others: hence he is called the firſt fruits of them that ſlept, the firſt-born and firſt-begotten from the dead; for though others were raiſed before, yet not to an immortal life, never to die more, as he was; now the view, the faith, and hope of this, of not being left in the grave ſo long as to ſee corruption, and of being raiſed from the dead to an immortal life, cauſed joy and gladneſs in Chriſt, at the time of his ſufferings and death, as well as what follows. In thy preſence is fulneſs of joy; Chriſt being raiſed from the dead aſcended to heaven and was received up into glory, into his Father's preſence, and is glorified with his own ſelf, with his glorious preſence, for which he prayed, John xvii. 5. and which fills his human nature with fulneſs of joy, with a joy unſpeakable and full of glory; ſee Acts ii. 28. and as it is with the head, it will be with the members in ſome meaſure; now the preſence of God puts more joy and gladneſs into them than any thing elſe can do; but as yet their joy is not full, but it will be when they ſhall enter into the joy of their Lord, into the preſence of God in the other world, then everlaſting joy will be upon their heads. At thy right hand there are pleaſures for evermore; Chriſt being entered into heaven is ſet down at the right hand of God in human nature, an honour which is not conferred on any of the angels, Heb. i. 13. where the man Chriſt Jeſus is infinitely delighted with the preſence of God, the never-fading joys of heaven, the company of angels and glorified ſaints; here he ſits and ſees of the travail of his ſoul; he prolongs his days and ſees his ſeed, ſouls called by grace, and brought to glory one after another, until they are all brought in, in whom is all his delight; and which was the joy ſet before him at the time of his ſufferings and death: or the words may be rendered, in thy right hand are pleaſant things for ever[y], and may deſign thoſe gifts and graces, which Chriſt, being exalted at the right hand of God, received from thence and gives to men, for the uſe and ſervice of his church and people, in the ſeveral ſucceſſive ages of time; and ſo Aben Ezra takes the words to be an alluſion to a man's giving pleaſant gifts to his friend with his right hand.

PSALM XVII.

A prayer of David.

THIS prayer was put up by David either in his own perſon, on his own account, praying to God for the vindication of his cauſe, and for ſalvation and deliverance from his enemies; or in the perſon of the Meſſiah, whoſe type he was, and of the whole church, ſo Jerom of old interpreted it; and the title of it in the Arabic verſion is, "a "prayer in the perſon of a perfect man, and of "Chriſt himſelf, and of every one that is redeem-"ed by him;" in which preſervation and protection are prayed for, and hope of eternal life is expreſſed. It was written, according to Theodoret, when David ſuffered perſecution from Saul.

℣. 1. Hear the right, O Lord, &c.] The pſalmiſt appeals to the Lord as a judge, ſitting on the throne judging right, that he would hear his cauſe litigated between him and his adverſaries, determine and give the deciſive ſentence about it; ſo Chriſt committed himſelf to him that judgeth righteouſly, 1 Pet. ii. 23. for by right may be meant his right and cauſe, or his righteous cauſe, as in Pſal. ix. 4. unleſs rather his righteous prayer ſhould be intended, ſo the Targum paraphraſes it, my prayer in righteouſneſs; not preſented for the ſake of his own righteouſneſs, but on account of the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and for the vindication of his righteous cauſe before men: the Vulgate Latin, Ethiopic and Arabic verſions render it my righteouſneſs, meaning his righteous cauſe; but rather the word may be rendered righteouſneſs[z], or the righteous one, and may deſign the pſalmiſt himſelf, who was a righteous perſon, and ſuch the Lord hears; or Chriſt, whoſe name is the Lord our righteouſneſs, Jer. xxiii. 6. and who, as an advocate or interceſſor for himſelf and for his people, is Jeſus Chriſt the righteous, 1 John ii. 1. The Septuagint verſion takes it to be an epithet of the Lord himſelf, tranſlating it, O Lord of my righteouſneſs, as in Pſal. iv. 1. and ſo the Syriac verſion, hear, O holy Lord; and in this manner does Chriſt addreſs his Father in prayer, John xvii. 11, 25. and the conſideration of the holineſs and righteouſneſs of God is of uſe in prayer to glorify God, and to command a proper awe and reverence of him. Attend unto my cry; the word for cry ſignifies both a noiſe made in a way of joy and grief; wherefore the Chaldee paraphraſe renders it, attend to my praiſe, or hymn of praiſe, and which ariſes from ſorrow and diſtreſs; and intends not mental prayer attended with groanings which cannot be uttered, but vocal prayer expreſſed in a loud and mournful manner, ſignifying the diſtreſs the perſon is in, and his earneſtneſs and importunacy for help; and of this ſort were ſome of Chriſt's prayers; ſee Heb. v. 7. Give ear unto my prayer that goeth not out of feigned lips; hypocritical and deceitful ones; but this went forth from his heart, which was lifted up with his hands to God, to whom he drew nigh with a true heart, and called upon him in the ſincerity and uprightneſs of his ſoul; and of this ſort were all Chriſt's prayers, in whoſe mouth there is no guile: the various expreſſions, hear, attend, give ear, which ſignify the ſame thing, ſhew the diſtreſs the ſupplicant was in, the fervency of his prayer, and his vehement and earneſt deſire to be heard and anſwered immediately, immediately, and ſince the accent athnach is upon the word תְּפִלָּתִי my prayer, this laſt clauſe is not to be joined only to that, but refers to all that is ſaid before; as that his right and his cry, as well as his prayer, were unfeigned.

[y] נעימות בימינך נצח amœnorum quæ ſunt in dextera tua perpetuo, Cocceius; delectationes in dextera tua uſque in ſeculum, Muſculus. [z] צדק juſtitiam, Vatablus, Cocceius, Gejerus; το δικαιον, Aquila in Druſius; juſtitiam, i. e. me qui ſum juſtus, Piſcator.

℣. 2. Let my ſentence come forth from thy preſence, &c.] Not of condemnation, ſuch as came forth from God and paſſed on Adam and all his poſterity, Rom. v. 12, 18. though ſuch an one was executed on Chriſt, as he was the ſurety and repreſentative of his people; but of juſtification, which came forth from God and paſſed on Chriſt, when he roſe from the dead, and upon his people in him, 1 Tim. iii. 16. Rom. iv. 25. Here it chiefly deſigns the vindication of the innocence of the pſalmiſt before men; and his requeſt is, that as he was fully perſuaded that he was clear of the things he was charged with in the ſight of God, that he would openly and publicly make him appear ſo before men; that he would bring forth his righteouſneſs as the light, and his judgment as the noon-day, Pſal. xxxvii. 6. and of which he made no doubt but he would; ſo Chriſt, though he was traduced by men, knew he ſhould be juſtified by his Father, and by his children, Iſa. l. 8. Matt. xi. 19. Let thine eyes behold the things that are equal; which is not to be underſtood barely of the eyes of his omniſcience; for theſe behold things both equal and unequal, good and evil, things which agree and diſagree with the law of God, the rule of righteouſneſs and equity; but of his approbation of them, and that he would ſome way or other teſtify that approbation; for the petition intends the favouring of his juſt and equal cauſe, and making it to appear to be ſo.

℣. 3. Thou haſt proved mine heart, &c.] This properly belongs to God, who is the ſearcher of the heart and reins, and is deſired by all good men; and though God has no need to make uſe of any means to know the heart, and what is in it; yet in order to know, or rather to make known what is in the hearts of his people, he proves them ſometimes by adverſity, as he did Abraham and Job, and ſometimes by proſperity, by mercies given forth in a wonderful way, as to the Iſraelites in the wilderneſs, Deut. viii. 2, 16. ſometimes by ſuffering falſe prophets and falſe teachers to be among them, Deut. xiii. 3. and ſometimes by leaving corruptions in them, and them to their corruptions, as he left the Canaanites in the land, and as he left Hezekiah to his own heart, Judg. ii. 22. and iii. 1. 2 Chr. xxxii. 31. In one or other or more of theſe ways God proved the heart of David, and found him to be a man after his own heart; and in the firſt of theſe ways he proved Chriſt, who was found faithful to him that appointed him, and was a man approved of God. Thou haſt viſited me in the night; God viſited and redeemed his people in the night of Jewiſh darkneſs; he viſits and calls them by his grace in the night of unregeneracy; and ſo he viſits with his gracious preſence in the night of deſertion; and he often viſits by granting counſel, comfort, and ſupport, in the night of affliction, which ſeems to be intended here; thus he viſited the human nature of Chriſt in the midſt of his ſorrows and ſufferings, when it was the Jews hour and power of darkneſs. Elſewhere God is ſaid to viſit every morning, Job vii. 18. Thou haſt tried me; as ſilver and gold are tried in the furnace; thus the people of God, and their graces in them, are tried by afflictions; ſo David was tried, and in this manner Chriſt himſelf was tried; wherefore he is called the tried ſtone, Iſa. xxviii. 16. And ſhalt find nothing; or ſhalt not find; which is variouſly ſupplied; ſome thy deſire, or what is well-pleaſing to thee, ſo Jarchi; or thou haſt not found me innocent, as Kimchi; others ſupply it quite the reverſe, and iniquity is not found in me, as the Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, and Ethiopic verſions; or thou haſt not found iniquity in me, as the Syriac and Arabic verſions; to which agrees the Chaldee paraphraſe, and thou haſt not found corruption; which muſt be underſtood, not as if there was no ſin and corruption in David; for he often makes loud complaints and large confeſſions of his ſins, and earneſtly prays for the forgiveneſs of them; but either that there was no ſin in his heart which he regarded, Pſalm lxvi. 18. which he nouriſhed and cheriſhed, which he indulged and lived in; or rather there was no ſuch crime found in him, which his enemies charged him with; ſee Pſal. vii. 3, 4. This is true of Chriſt in the fulleſt ſenſe; no iniquity was ever found in him by God, by men or devils, John xiv. 30. 1 Pet. ii. 22. and alſo of his people, as conſidered in him, being juſtified by his righteouſneſs, and waſhed in his blood, Jer. l. 20. though otherwiſe, as conſidered in themſelves, they themſelves find ſin and corruption abounding in them, Rom. vii. 18, 21. I am purpoſed that my mouth ſhall not tranſgreſs; by murmuring againſt God, on account of his viſitation, and fiery trials, or by railing at men for their falſe charges and accuſations; this reſolution was taken up by the pſalmiſt in the ſtrength of divine grace, and was kept by him, Pſal. xxxix. 9. ſo Chriſt ſubmitted himſelf patiently to the will of God without repining, and when reviled by men reviled not again, Luke xxii. 42. 1 Pet. ii. 23. and from hence may be learned, that the laws of God may be tranſgreſſed by words as well as by works, and that the one as well as the other ſhould be guarded againſt; ſee Pſal. xxxix. 1.

℣. 4. Concerning the works of men, &c.] Of wicked men, as to what reſpects and concerns them, or in the midſt of them; in the midſt of a wicked generation of men, and their filthy converſation; who appear to be ſo, by the word of thy lips; the law of God, the ſcriptures of truth, the rule and ſtandard of faith and practice, which ſhew what works are good and what are not; by the uſe, help, and benefit of this; I have kept me from the paths of the deſtroyer; ſuch is the devil, who was a murderer from the beginning; Antichriſt, whoſe name is Abaddon and Apollyon, both which ſignify a deſtroyer; falſe teachers, and all wicked men: the paths of ſuch are their wicked principles and practices, their damnable errors and hereſies, their ſins and luſts, which make up the broad road that leads to deſtruction; theſe the pſalmiſt kept or obſerved [a], for the words me and from are not in the original text; and the ſenſe is, that he took notice of them, and avoided them, and as a faithful prince and magiſtrate forbad his ſubjects walking in them, and reſtrained them from them, making the word of God the rule of his conduct.

℣. 5. Hold up my goings in thy paths, &c.] Which being ſpoken by David in his own perſon, and for himſelf, ſhews that he was conſcious of his own weakneſs to keep himſelf in the ways of God, and to direct his ſteps therein; and that he was ſenſible of the need he ſtood in of divine power to uphold and ſupport him in them. That my footſteps ſlip not; out of the paths of truth and duty, of faith and holineſs; of which there is danger, ſhould a man be left to himſelf, and deſtitute of divine direction rection and aid; ſee Pſalm lxxiii. 2. Jer. x. 23. and though Chriſt had no moral weakneſs in him, and was in no danger of falling into ſin, or ſlipping out of the ways of God; yet theſe words may be applied to him in a good ſenſe, as conſidered in human nature, and attended with the ſinleſs infirmities of it, he being God's ſervant whom he upheld, and of whom he gave his angels charge, to keep him in all his ways, Iſa. xlii. 1. Pſal. xci. 11.

[a] שמרתי cuſtodivi, Pagninus, Montanus; obſervavi, Muſculus, Piſcator, Cocceius, Gejerus; ſo Ainſworth; vel prohibui, Muis.

℣. 6. I have called upon thee, &c.] In prayer. This had been the conſtant practice of the pſalmiſt, and he ſtill continued in it. For thou wilt hear me, O God; God is a God hearing prayer; he is uſed to hear his people, and they have frequent experience of it, and they may be aſſured that whatſoever they aſk according to his will, and in the name of Chriſt, he will hear; and ſuch an aſſurance is a reaſon engaging the ſaints to a conſtant calling upon God, Pſal. cxvi. 2. and ſuch confidence of being always heard Chriſt had, John xi. 41, 42. Incline thine ear unto me, and hear my ſpeech; meaning his prayer, which he now directed to him in full aſſurance of being heard, and is as follows.

℣. 7. Shew thy marvelous loving-kindneſs, &c.] Such is the loving-kindneſs of God to his people in Chriſt; which is ſovereign, free, ſpecial, diſtinguiſhing, everlaſting and unchangeable; it is better than life, and paſſes knowledge; and which is ſet upon men and not angels, ſome and not all, and theſe many of them the worſt and vileſt of men, and all of them by nature children of wrath as others; and which has appeared in chooſing them in Chriſt, putting them into his hand, and making a covenant with him for them; in ſending him into the world to ſuffer and die for them; in regenerating, adopting, juſtifying, pardoning, and ſaving them with an everlaſting ſalvation; all which is marvelous in their eyes, and will be the wonder of men and angels to all eternity: this ſometimes is hidden from the objects of it, as it might be from the pſalmiſt, and therefore he deſires a manifeſtation of it to him; or elſe his ſenſe is, that God would ſhew to others in what a marvellous manner he loved him, by the help, deliverance, and ſalvation he would give him. Such a petition will agree with Chriſt; ſee Pſal. xl. 10, 11. Some render the words [b], ſeparate thy loving-kindneſs, or cauſe it to paſs from them that riſe up on or againſt thy right hand; but theſe were never the objects of it; and there is no ſeparation of them from it, nor of that from them who are intereſted in it, Rom. viii. 38, 39. much better may it be rendered, ſeparate or diſtinguiſh thy loving-kindneſs [c]; that is, let it appear that I have ſpecial intereſt in thy loving-kindneſs, diſtinct from others; diſtinguiſh me by thy loving-kindneſs, remember me with that which thou beareſt to a peculiar people, Pſal. cvi. 4. O thou that ſaveſt by thy right hand; either by his power, or by the man of his right hand, his own Son. Them which put their truſt in thee; not in men, not in an arm of fleſh, not in themſelves, in their own power, wiſdom, riches and righteouſneſs; but in the Lord their God, who is the Saviour of all men, but eſpecially of them that believe, 1 Tim. iv. 10. for theſe he ſaves both in a temporal and in a ſpiritual manner. From thoſe that riſe up againſt them; from all their ſpiritual enemies, ſin and Satan; and from all outward ones, from the men of the world, oppreſſors and violent perſecutors, who are afterwards deſcribed: the phraſe by thy right hand, is by ſome, as Aben Ezra, connected with the word truſt, and rendered, them which truſt in thy right hand [d]; either in the grace, mercy, and favour of God, diſpenſed by his right hand; or in his ſtrength, and the mighty power of his arm; and by others it is joined to the laſt clauſe, and ſo it ſtands in the original text, and rendered, from thoſe that riſe up againſt thy right hand [e]; and ſo the words deſcribe ſuch perſons who in a bold and preſumptuous manner ſet themſelves againſt God, and ſtrengthen themſelves againſt the almighty; who reſiſt his counſel and will, oppoſe themſelves to the Lord and his Anointed, the man of his right hand, made ſtrong for himſelf; and to his ſaints, who are as dear to him as his right hand, and who are preſerved by him in the hollow of his hand.

℣. 8. Keep me as the apple of the eye, &c.] Which is weak and tender, and is hurt and put to pain, and made uneaſy by every little thing that annoys it, and than which nothing is more dear to a man, or he is more careful of preſerving from being hurt; and fitly repreſents the weak eſtate and condition of God's people, his affection for them, and tender care of them; who as he has provided tunics for the eye, and guarded it with eye-brows, ſo he has taken care for the ſafety of his dear children, Deut. xxxii. 10. Zech. ii. 8. Hide me under the ſhadow of thy wings; alluding either to the wings of the cherubim over the mercy-ſeat, where God granted his preſence; ſo the Targum paraphraſes it, "under the ſhadow of thy ſhekinah hide me;" or to birds, who cover their young ones with their wings to ſave them from birds of prey; ſee Pſal. xci. 1, 4. Iſa. xxx. 5. Matt. xxiii. 37. From ſuch paſſages perhaps the heathens had their notion of repreſenting their gods with wings [f].

℣. 9. From the wicked that oppreſs me, &c.] Or waſte or deſtroy [g]; as wild beaſts do a field or vineyard when they get into it; and ſuch havock do perſecutors and falſe teachers make of the church and people of God, when they are ſuffered to get in among them, Pſal. lxxx. 13. Acts xx. 29. wherefore from ſuch wicked and unreaſonable men protection is deſired, 2 Theſſ. iii. 2. From my deadly enemies; enemies againſt his ſoul or life, who ſought to take it away, nothing would ſatisfy them but this. Who compaſs me about; on all ſides, in order to obtain their deſire; ſuch were the enemies of Chriſt, and ſo they are deſcribed, Pſalm xxii. 12, 13, 16.

℣. 10. They are incloſed in their own fat, &c.] Or their fat has incloſed them; either their eyes that they can hardly ſee out of them, or their hearts, ſo that they are ſtupid and ſenſeleſs and devoid of the fear of God; the phraſe is expreſſive of the multitude of their wealth and increaſe of power, by which they were ſwelled with pride and vanity, and neither feared God nor regarded man; ſo the Targum paraphraſes it, "their riches are multiplied, their "fat covers them;" ſee Deut. xxxii. 15. Pſalm lxxiii. 8, 9. ſome read it, their fat ſhuts their mouths, ſo Aben Ezra and Kimchi; or with their fat they ſhut them [h]; but the accent athnach will not admit of this reading; the laſt word belongs to the next clauſe.

[b] Kimchi & Ben Melech. [c] הפלה ſepara, Junius & Tremellius; ſegrega, Montanus; ſo ſome in Vatablus; ſee Ainſworth. [d] חוסים בימינך — eos qui fidunt in dextera tua, ſo ſome in Vatablus, Caſtalio, Ainſworth; recipentes ſe ad dexteram ſuam, Junius & Tremellius. [e] ממתקוממים בימינך ob inſurgentes in dexteram tuam, Pagninus, Montanus, Cocceius; ſo Michaelis, Gejerus, Muſculus. [f] Vid. Cuperi Apotheoſ. Homer. p. 169, &c. [g] ושדוני quid vaſtant, Vatablus, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator; qui vaſtaverunt, Pagninus, Montanus, Cocceius, Michaelis. [h] So De Dieu.

clauſe. With their mouth they ſpeak proudly; againſt God and his people, belching out blaſphemies againſt the one, and ſevere menaces and threatnings againſt the other.

℣. 11. They have now compaſſed us in our ſteps, &c.] The ſenſe is, they could not ſtir a ſtep but they were at their heels, ſurrounding them on every ſide. This was true of David, when he was purſued by Saul, and followed by him to Keilah and the wilderneſs of Maon, 1 Sam. xxiii. 8, 26. according to the cetib, or textual writing, it ſhould be rendered, they have compaſſed me; but according to the keri, or marginal reading, and the points, it is as we have tranſlated it, and which is followed by the Targum; and both are right, and deſign David as a principal perſon, and thoſe that were with him, who were encompaſſed by Saul and his men. This alſo was verified in Chriſt, when Judas followed him into the garden with a band of men to betray him, and when he was incloſed by wicked men as he went to the croſs, and hung upon it, John xviii. 2, 3. Pſal. xxii. 12, 16. and may likewiſe be accommodated to the caſe of all the ſaints, who are troubled on every ſide, are beſet with the corruptions of their hearts, the temptations of Satan, and the reproaches and perſecutions of the men of the world, 2 Cor. iv. 8. and vii. 5. They have ſet their eyes bowing down to the earth; which poſture either denotes fraudulence and hypocriſy, ſhewing by looking only upon the ground, as if they were harmleſs and inoffenſive, and had no ill deſigns, and took no notice of any thing; which as it was true of David's enemies, ſo of the Jews and of Judas with reſpect to Chriſt, and of falſe teachers with reſpect to the church, Luke xx. 20. Matt. vii. 15. and xxvi. 48, 49. or elſe inhumanity and contempt, not caring to turn their eyes to look upon them in diſtreſs, but kept their eyes fixed upon the earth, ſo Chriſt was treated by the Jews, Iſa. liii. 3. or rather their being intent upon miſchief, their diligence and watchfulneſs to obſerve all motions, and take every opportunity to ſtrike, or caſt me down to the earth, as the Arabic and Syriac verſions render it; or the ſenſe is, as Kimchi gives it, their eyes are upon our ways, to ſpread nets for us in the earth to take us.

℣. 12. Like as a lion that is greedy of his prey, &c.] Or the likeneſs of him is as a lion [i]; meaning Saul, as Kimchi interprets it; or every one of them that compaſſed them about, as Aben Ezra obſerves; ſometimes wicked and perſecuting princes are compared to lions, for their ſtrength and cruelty; ſee Prov. xxviii. 15. 2 Tim. iv. 17. ſo the devil is called a roaring lion, 1 Pet. v. 8. and the antichriſtian beaſt is ſaid to have the mouth of a lion, Rev. xiii. 2. And as it were a young lion lurking in ſecret places; to leap upon its prey and ſeize it at once, as it has opportunity; this denotes the ſecret and inſidious method which the enemies of Chriſt take to do miſchief; ſee Pſal. x. 9, 10.

℣. 13. Ariſe, O Lord, &c.] See Pſalm iii. 7. and vii. 6. and ix. 19. and x. 12. diſappoint him, or prevent his face [k]; be beforehand with him, and ſo diſappoint him, when he is about to ſeize his prey; who is comparable to the lion, or to the young lion; meaning the chief of his enemies, it may be Saul. Caſt him down; every one of them that ſet their eyes to caſt down others to the earth. Jarchi's note is, "cut off his feet," that he may bow down and fall. Deliver my ſoul from the wicked, which is thy ſword; ſo Jarchi, Aben Ezra, Kimchi and Ben Melech render the words; that is, from wicked men, whom God makes uſe of as inſtruments to afflict and chaſtiſe his people: ſo the Aſſyrian monarch is called the rod of his anger, with whom he ſcourged his people Iſrael, Iſa. x. 5. Compare with this Pſal. xxii. 20. The words are rendered by ſome, deliver my ſoul from the wicked by thy ſword [l]; meaning not the ſword of the Spirit, the word of God, by which Chriſt was delivered from the wicked one, when tempted by him in the wilderneſs; but the avenging juſtice of God, the ſword of the Lord, which being whetted and taken hold on, and uſed by him, brings vengeance on his enemies, and ſalvation to his people; ſee Deut. xxxii. 41. Iſa. xxvii. 1. Jer. xlvii. 6, 7. The Targum paraphraſes the clauſe thus, "deliver my ſoul from the wicked, who deſerves to "be ſlain by thy ſword."

℣. 14. From men which are thy hand, O Lord, &c.] Some underſtand theſe words, with what follows, as independent of the former, and of another ſett of men, even of good men; ſo the Targum, "and the righteous who deliver their ſouls "for thy ſake, O Lord, unto death in the earth, "their portion is in eternal life;" ſo Jarchi gives the like ſenſe of them: but the words are to be connected with the preceding, as they are by Aben Ezra, Kimchi, and Ben Melech; and the ſenſe is, deliver my ſoul from men, which are inſtruments in thine hand to chaſtiſe thy people: ſo even Satan himſelf, and the Sabeans and Chaldeans, whom he inſtigated to afflict Job, are called the hand of the Lord that touched him, becauſe he ſuffered them to do what they did for the trial of him, Job xix. 21. The words may be rendered, the men of thy hand [m]; who are raiſed up by thine hand to the power and dignity they have; and who can eaſily be pulled down by it; and who are in thine hand, and at thy beck and controll, and whoſe wrath and fury thou canſt reſtrain. Or they may be rendered, from men by thy hand [n]; that is, deliver me from them by thy ſtrong hand and mighty power; as Iſrael of old was delivered from the Egyptians by the ſtrong and mighty hand of God. From men of the world; who are as they were when they came into the world, in ſin, in darkneſs, and in a carnal and unregenerate ſtate; who are not only in the world, but of it, and belong to it, and to it only; and are under the influence of the god of the world, and are taken with the luſts and pleaſures of it, and live in them and ſerve them; and are of worldly ſpirits, inordinately love the things of the world, mind earth and earthly things, and are unconcerned about the things of another world; ſee Luke xvi. 8. Which have their portion in this life; and in this only; have a large ſhare of the good things of this life; and which is all their portion, Luke xvi. 25. And whoſe belly thou fillest with thy hid treaſure: earthly treaſure, as gold and ſilver, which is called hid treaſure, becauſe it is firſt hid in the bowels of the earth, out of which it is dug, and afterwards hid in the coffers of worldly men; and oftentimes kept to the hurt of the owners of it. Or the phraſe may denote the value and preciouſneſs of it. And to have the belly belly filled with this, is to have a very great affluence and plenty of it; though it is very rare, let it be ever ſo large, that men are fully ſatisfied with it. They are full of children; which among the eaſtern nations was reckoned a conſiderable part of outward proſperity and happineſs; ſee Job xxi. 7, 8, 11. Pſal. cxxvii. 3, 4, 5. or their children are full, or filled [o] with hidden treaſure alſo. And leave the reſt of their ſubſtance to their babes; their chil-drens children; their grandchildren, as Kimchi explains it; and which is ſaid, not by way of complaint, as an evil in them, ſince it is lawful and right for parents to lay up for their children, and leave it to them: unleſs the ſenſe is, that they engroſs all to themſelves, and to their poſterity, in life and death; whilſt they live, they indulge their ſenſual appetites and luſts, and fill themſelves and theirs, but give nothing to the poor and hungry; nor part with any thing for the intereſt of God and true religion; and when they die, leave nothing for ſuch uſe and ſervice, but all to their poſterity: but rather, the phraſe is expreſſive of their great plenty; that having lived in and enjoyed great fulneſs themſelves, and given large portions to their children, yet have much left; which at death they bequeath to the young generation. Now from ſuch men in power, and dignity, and from being hurt by them, as well as from communion and converſation with them, the pſalmiſt deſires to be delivered; and expreſſes his ſatisfaction in other and better things than they enjoy, in the following words.

[i] דמיונו כאריה ſimilitudo ejus, vel cujuſque eſt tanquam leonis, Pagninus, Montanus, Junius & Tremellius; ſo Muſculus, Gejerus, Michaelis. [k] קדמה פניו præveni faciem ejus, Pagninus, Montanus, Vatablus, Muſculus, Gejerus; anticipa faciem ejus, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator. [l] מרשע חרבך gladio tuo ab improbis, Junius & Tremellius; Gejerus; ſo Ainſworth. [m] ממתים ידך ab inimicis manus tuæ, V. L. ſo Sept. a viris manus tuæ, Lutherus, Muſculus. [n] Manu tua, Montanus, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Cocceius, Gejerus.

℣. 15. As for me, &c.] I do not deſire to be in their place and ſtead, with all their plenty and proſperity; I am content with my preſent condition and ſituation; for I will, or ſhall behold thy face in righteouſneſs; that is, appear before God in public worſhip, where was the ark, the ſymbol of the face of God; enjoy his gracious preſence, have the diſcoveries of his love, and ſee his face and favour; than which nothing was more deſirable by him and delightful to him. Or God himſelf may be meant by his face; and eſpecially God as he is to be beheld in the face of Chriſt, the Angel of his preſence; and who is to be beheld by faith in the preſent ſtate of things, though as thro' a glaſs, darkly; and in the future ſtate perfectly, and as he is, both with the eyes of the underſtanding, and after the reſurrection with the eyes of the body; ſee Job xix. 26, 27. and to this ſtate the pſalmiſt ſeems more eſpecially to have reſpect, as Jarchi interprets it: and the beatific viſion of God in Chriſt will be very glorious and exceeding delightful; it will be aſſimilating and appropriating; it will be free from all darkneſs and interruption, and will continue for ever. And this ſhall be ſeen in righteouſneſs; the pſalmiſt believing that he ſhould then appear as an innocent perſon, clear of all the falſe charges brought againſt him; and ſo this may be underſtood of the righteouſneſs of his cauſe, in which he ſhould ſtand before God, and enjoy communion with him: or this may deſign that perfect holineſs and purity of heart, without which no man ſhall ſee the Lord; and which, though now imperfect, ſhall in the other ſtate be without ſpot or blemiſh: or rather, the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, which fits believers for, and in which they are brought into and ſtand in the King's preſence. I ſhall be ſatisfied, when I awake with thy likeneſs; which will be in the reſurrection-morn, or as Jarchi expreſſes it, when the dead ſhall awake from their ſleep: for this is not to be underſtood of awaking from natural ſleep in the morning; when it is a ſatisfaction to a believer to be with God, and to have God with him, Pſalm cxxxix. 18. nor of awaking from a ſleepy drowſy frame of ſpirit, which ſometimes attends the ſaints; but of riſing from the dead: for as death is oftentimes expreſſed by ſleep in ſcripture, ſo the reſurrection by an awaking out of it, Iſa. xxvi. 19. Dan. xii. 2. at which time the ſaints will ariſe with the image of the heavenly One upon them; they will be like to Chriſt both in ſoul and body; in ſoul, in perfect knowledge and compleat holineſs; in body, in incorruption and immortality, in power, glory and ſpirituality; in this will lie their happineſs and ſatisfaction. Or the meaning is, that he ſhould be ſatisfied with the likeneſs of God, with Chriſt the image of God, when he ſhould ariſe from the dead; ſeeing he ſhould then appear with him in glory, ſee him as he is, and be like him, and be for ever in his preſence; which will yield endleſs pleaſure and unſpeakable ſatisfaction. For the words may be interpreted, not of David's awaking, but of the glory of God awaking or appearing; which would afford an infinitely greater ſatisfaction than worldly men have in worldly things [p], to which this is oppoſed, ℣. 10. ſo the Septuagint and Vulgate Latin verſions read, I ſhall be ſatisfied when thy glory appears, or is ſeen; and ſo the Ethiopic and Arabic verſions.

PSALM XVIII.

To the chief muſician, a pſalm of David.

THIS is the ſame with that in 2 Sam. xxii. with ſome variations, omiſſions and alterations: the ſervant of the Lord; not only by creation, nor merely by regeneration, but by office, as king of Iſrael, being put into it by the Lord, and acting in it in ſubmiſſion and obedience to him; juſt as the apoſtles under the New Teſtament, on account of their office, ſo ſtile themſelves in their Epiſtles: Who ſpake unto the Lord the words of this ſong; that is, who delivered and ſung this ſong in ſo many expreſs words, in public, before all the congregation of Iſrael, to the honour and glory of God: in the day that the Lord delivered him from the hand of all his enemies, and from the hand of Saul. Not that this pſalm was compoſed and ſung the ſelf-ſame day that David was delivered from Saul, and ſet upon the throne; for it ſeems to have been written in his old age, at the cloſe of his days; for immediately after it, in the ſecond book of Samuel, it follows, now theſe be the laſt words of David, 2 Sam. xxiii. 1. but the ſenſe is, that whereas David had many enemies, and particularly Saul, who was his greateſt enemy, the Lord delivered him from them all, and eſpecially from him; from him firſt, and then from all the reſt; which when he reflected upon in his laſt days, he ſat down and wrote wrote this pſalm, and then ſung it in public, having delivered it into the hands of the chief muſician for that purpoſe. There are two paſſages cited out of it in the New Teſtament, and applied to Chriſt; ℣. 2. in Heb. ii. 13. and ℣. 49. in Rom. xv. 9. and there are many things in it that very well agree with him; he is eminently the ſervant of the Lord as mediator; he was encompaſſed with the ſnares and ſorrows of death and hell, and with the floods of ungodly men, when in the garden and on the croſs. God was his helper and deliverer, as man; and he was victorious over all enemies, ſin, Satan, the world, death and hell; as the ſubject of this pſalm is all along repreſented: and to Chriſt it does moſt properly belong to be the head of the heathen, whoſe voluntary ſubjects the Gentiles are ſaid to be, ℣. 43, 44. and which is expreſſed in much the ſame language, as the like things are in Iſa. lv. 4, 5. which is a clear and undoubted prophecy of the Meſſiah; to which may be added, that the Lord's anointed, the king Meſſiah, and who is alſo called David, is expreſsly mentioned in ℣. 50. and which is applied to the Meſſiah by the Jews[q], as the thirty ſecond verſe is paraphraſed of him by the Targum on it. And he ſaid; the followings words;

[o] ישבעו בניהם ſaturantur vel ſatiantur filii, Munſter, Muis, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Gejerus; ſo Targ. Ar. Ainſworth.

[p] Vid. Caſtel. Lexic. Heptaglott. col. 2014.

℣. 1. I will love thee, O Lord, my ſtrength.] Theſe words are not in 2 Sam. xxii. the pſalm there begins with the following verſe. The pſalmiſt here expreſſes his love to the Lord, and his continuance in it; that Jehovah the Father was, is, and ever will be the object of Chriſt's love is certain; and which has appeared by his readineſs in the council and covenant of grace to do his will; by his coming down from heaven to earth for that purpoſe; by his delight in it, it being his meat and drink to do it; and by his ſufferings and death, which were in compliance with, and obedience to it, John xiv. 31. and as in David, ſo in all regenerate ones, there is love to God; Jehovah is loved by them in all his perſons; Jehovah the Father is loved, and to be loved, for the perfections of his nature, becauſe of the works of his hands, of creation and providence; and particularly becauſe of his works of ſpecial grace and goodneſs, and eſpecially becauſe of his love wherewith he has loved his people, 1 John iv. 19. Jehovah the Son is loved, and to be loved, above all creatures and things whatever, ſincerely and heartily, fervently and conſtantly; becauſe of the lovelineſs of his perſon, the love of his heart, and his works of grace and redemption; all of him is lovely; and he is to be loved, and is loved in his perſon, offices, relations, people, word and ordinances: Jehovah the Spirit is loved, and to be loved, becauſe of his perſon and perfections, and operations of grace; as a ſanctifier, comforter, the Spirit of adoption, the earneſt and pledge of eternal glory. The word here uſed ſignifies the moſt intimate, tender and affectionate love; it often deſigns mercy and bowels of mercy; ſo Aben Ezra interprets it of ſeeking mercy of God: the reaſons are as follow in this and the next verſe: becauſe the Lord is my ſtrength; ſo he was to Chriſt as man, who as ſuch was the man of his right hand, the ſon of man, whom he made ſtrong for himſelf, to do his work, and for his glory, Pſal. lxxx. 17. he promiſed to ſtrengthen him, and he did, Pſal. lxxxix. 21. Iſa. xlii. 1. and xlix. 8. and ſo he is the ſtrength of all his ſaints, even Jehovah, Father, Son, and Spirit; he is the ſtrength of their hearts both in life and at death; he is the ſtrength of their graces, who ſtrengthens that which he has wrought for them, and in them; he ſtrengthens them to do their duty, to bear the croſs, and every affliction, and againſt every enemy of their ſouls; and this renders him very lovely and amiable to them.

℣. 2. The Lord is my rock, &c.] To whom the ſaints have recourſe for ſhelter and ſafety, for ſupply, ſupport, and divine refreſhment; and in whom they are ſecure, and on whom they build their hopes of eternal life and happineſs, and ſo are ſafe from all enemies, and from all danger. Chriſt is called a rock on all theſe accounts, Pſal. lxi. 2, 3. Iſa. xxxii. 2. and xxxiii. 16. Matt. xvi. 18. 1 Cor. x. 4. And my fortreſs; or garriſon; ſo the ſaints are kept in and by the power of God as in a garriſon, 1 Pet. i. 5. And my deliverer; out of all afflictions, and from all temptations, and out of the hands of all enemies; from a body of ſin and death at laſt, and from wrath to come. My God; the ſtrong and mighty One, who is able to ſave, and who is the covenant-God and father of his people. My ſtrength, in whom I will truſt; as Chriſt did, and to whom theſe words are applied in Heb. ii. 13. and as his people are enabled to do even under very diſtreſſing and diſcouraging circumſtances, Job xiii. 15. Iſa. xxvi. 4. My buckler; or ſhield; who protects and defends them from their enemies, and preſerves them from the fiery darts of Satan. And the horn of my ſalvation; who puſhes, ſcatters and deſtroys their enemies, and ſaves them; a metaphor taken from horned beaſts; ſo Chriſt, the mighty and able Saviour, is called, Luke i. 69. And my high tower; ſuch is the name of the Lord, whither the righteous run and are ſafe, Prov. xviii. 10. and where they are above and out of the reach of every enemy; ſee Iſa. xxxiii. 16. in 2 Sam. xxii. 3. it is added, and my refuge, my Saviour, thou ſaveſt me from violence. Theſe various epithets ſhew the fulneſs of ſafety in Jehovah, the various ways he has to deliver his people from their enemies, and ſecure them from danger; and the pſalmiſt beholding and claiming his intereſt in him under all theſe characters, rendered him exceeding lovely and delightful to him; and each of them contain a reaſon why he loved him, and why, in the ſtrength of grace, he determined to love him. God may be regarded in all theſe characters by Chriſt as man.

℣. 3. I will call upon the Lord, &c.] In prayer, for freſh mercies, and farther appearances of himſelf, and diſcoveries of his grace and favour. Who is worthy to be praiſed; for the perfections of his nature, the works of his hands, his providential goodneſs, and more eſpecially for his covenant-grace and bleſſings in Chriſt. The Targum is, "in praiſe, or with an hymn, I pray before the "Lord;" agreeable to the rule the apoſtle gives, Phil. iv. 6. and this prayer was a prayer of faith, as follows. So ſhall I be ſaved from mine enemies; which was founded upon paſt experience of God's goodneſs to him in diſtreſs, when he called upon him, as the next words ſhew.

℣. 4. The ſorrows of death compaſſed me, &c.] Theſe words and the following in this and the next verſe, as they reſpect David, ſhew the ſnares that were laid for his life, the danger of death he was in, and the anxiety of mind he was poſſeſſed of on account of it; and as they refer to Chriſt, include all the ſorrows of his life to the time of his death, who was a man of ſorrows and acquainted with griefs perſonally, and bore and carried the ſorrows and griefs of all his people; and may chiefly intend his ſorrows in the garden, ariſing from a view of

[q] Echa Rabbati fol. 50. 2. & Midraſh Tillim in Tzeror Hammor, fol. 47. 3.

of the ſins of his people, which he was about to bear upon the croſs; and from an apprehenſion of the wrath of God, and curſe of the law, which he was going to ſuſtain for them, when his ſoul was περιλυπος, encompaſſed about with ſorrow, even unto death, Matt. xxvi. 38. when his ſorrow was ſo great, and lay ſo heavy upon him, that it almoſt preſſed him down to death, he could ſcarce live under it; and may alſo take in the very pains and agonies of death; he dying the death of the croſs, which was a very painful and excruciating one; ſee Pſal. xxii. 14—17. The Hebrew word for ſorrows ſignifies the pains and birth-throws of a woman in travail; and is here fitly uſed of the ſufferings and death of Chriſt; through which he brought forth much fruit, or many ſons to glory. The Targum is, "Diſtreſs "has encompaſſed me, as a woman that ſits upon "the ſtool, and has no ſtrength to bring forth, "and is in danger of dying." In 2 Sam. xxii. 5. it is, the waves or breakers of death compaſſed me; and the word there uſed is rendered in Hoſ. xiii. 13. the breaking forth of children: moreover the ſame word ſignifies cords [r], as well as pains and ſorrows; and the alluſion may be to malefactors, being bound with cords, when led to execution, and put to death; and may here ſignify the power of death, under which the Meſſiah was held for a while, but was looſed from it at his reſurrection; to which ſenſe of the word, and to the words here, the apoſtle Peter manifeſtly refers, Acts ii. 24. And the floods of ungodly men made me afraid; meaning either the multitude of them, as Herod, Pontius Pilate, the Roman ſoldiers, and people of the Jews, who all gathered together againſt him; ſo the Targum renders it, a company of wicked men; or the variety of ſufferings he endured by them; as ſpitting upon, buffeting, ſcourging, &c. The word rendered ungodly men, is Belial; and ſignifies, vain, worthleſs, and unprofitable men; men of no figure or account; or lawleſs ones, ſuch as have caſt off the yoke of the law, are not ſubject to it; perſons very wicked and profligate. The word in the New Teſtament ſeems to be uſed for Satan, 2 Cor. vi. 15. where it is ſo rendered in the Syriac verſion, and he may be deſigned here; and by the floods of Belial may be meant, not ſo much the temptations of Satan in the wilderneſs, as his violent and impetuous attacks upon Chriſt in the garden, when being in an agony or conflict with him, his ſweat was, as it were, great drops of blood, Luke xxii. 44. The Septuagint render the word, The torrents of iniquity troubled me; which was true of Chriſt, when all the ſins of his people came flowing in upon him, like mighty torrents, from all quarters; when God laid on him the iniquity of them all, and he was made ſin for them; and in a view of all this, he began to be ſore amazed, Mark xiv. 33. compare with this Pſal. lxix. 1, 2. Arama interprets Belial, of the evil imagination in David, who had a war in himſelf.

℣. 5. The ſorrows of hell compaſſed me about, &c.] Or the cords of the grave [s], under the power of which he was detained a while; the alluſion may be to the manner of burying among the Jews, who wound up their dead bodies in linen cloths; ſo that they were as perſons bound hand and foot; and thus were they laid in the grave; ſee John xi. 44. and ſo was Chriſt, till he was raiſed from the dead, when he ſhowed himſelf to have the keys of hell and death, and to be no more under their power, or be held by them. The ſnares of death prevented me; or met or got before me [t]; the ſenſe is, he was taken in them: this phraſe deſigns the inſidious ways and methods which the enemies of Chriſt took to enſnare him, and take away his life, and in which they ſucceeded; ſee Matt. xxvi. 4.

℣. 6. In my diſtreſs I called upon the Lord, &c.] The great Jehovah, the everlaſting I AM, who is the moſt High in all the earth, and who is able to ſave, Heb. v. 7. And cried unto my God; as Jeſus did, Matt. xxvii. 46. ſo the members of Chriſt, when in diſtreſs, as they often are, through ſin and Satan, through the hidings of God's face, a variety of afflictions, and the perſecutions of men, betake themſelves to the Lord, and call upon their God: a time of diſtreſs is a time for prayer; and ſometimes the end God has in ſuffering them to be in diſtreſs, is to bring them to the throne of his grace; and a great privilege it is they have, that they have ſuch a throne to come to for grace and mercy to help them in time of need, and ſuch a God to ſympathize with them, and help them; and their encouragement to call upon him, and cry unto him, is, that he is Jehovah, omniſcient, omnipotent, and omnipreſent; who knows their wants, is able to help them, and is a God at hand to do it. He heard my voice out of his temple; that is, out of heaven his dwelling-place; for the temple at Jeruſalem was not built in David's time; and it may be obſerved, that the prayer of the Pſalmiſt, or whom he repreſents, was a vocal one, and not merely mental; and hearing it, intends a gracious regard unto it, an acceptance of it, and an agreeable anſwer: for it follows, And my cry came before him, even into his ears; God did not cover himſelf with a cloud, that his prayer could not paſs through; but it was admitted and received; it came up before him with acceptance; it reached his ears, and even entered into them, and was delightful muſic to them; ſee John xi. 41, 42. Heb. v. 7.

℣. 7. Then the earth ſhook and trembled, &c.] As it did quickly after Chriſt called upon the Lord, and cried to his God upon the croſs, Matt. xxvii. 50, 51. and ſo ſome time after, when his people were praying together, the place where they were aſſembled was ſhaken, Acts iv. 31. as a token of God's preſence being with them: and the ſhaking and trembling of the earth is often uſed as a ſymbol of the preſence of God, and of the greatneſs of his majeſty; as when he brought the children of Iſrael through the Red ſea, went before them in the wilderneſs, and deſcended on mount Sinai, which mountain then moved and quaked exceedingly; ſee Pſal. civ. 32. and lxxvii. 16—18. and lxviii. 7, 8. Exod. xix. 18. and it is eaſy to obſerve, that in this, and other parts of this majeſtic account of the appearance of God on the behalf of the perſon the ſubject of this pſalm, and againſt his enemies, there are manifeſt alluſions to the giving of the law on mount Sinai; though it may be this ſhaking of the earth, and what follows, are to be underſtood in a figurative ſenſe. The foundations alſo of the hills moved and were ſhaken; and deſign the ſhaking of the earth and heavens, propheſied of in Hag. ii. 6, 7. and which is explained in Heb. xii. 26, 27. of the removing the ordinances of the ceremonial law, that goſpel-ordinances might remain unſhaken; for in 2 Sam. xxii. 8. the words words are, the foundations of heaven moved and ſhook; and the ſhaking and moving of the earth and mountains may denote the abolition and deſtruction of kingdoms and nations; and firſt of the civil polity of the Jews, and of their eccleſiaſtical ſtate, which quickly enſued upon the death of Chriſt; and next of the ruin of Rome pagan, and then of Rome papal; which are both ſignified by an earthquake, and by the removal of mountains, Rev. vi. 12, 14. and xi. 13. and xvi. 18—20. Becauſe he was wroth; with the people of the Jews, for diſbelieving and rejecting the Meſſiah; for ſetting themſelves, and taking counſel together againſt him, and putting him to death; for theſe things God was angry with them, and wrath came upon them to the uttermoſt, and their nation, city, and temple were deſtroyed, Pſal. ii. 1—5. 1 Theſſ. ii. 16. and with the pagan empire and antichriſtian powers, Rev. vi. 16, 17. and xi. 18.

[r] חבלי מות funes mortis, Muſculus, Montanus, Vatablus, Gejerus, Michaelis; ſo Ainſworth, Hammond. חבלי funes ſepulchri, Muſculus, Gejerus. [s] שאול [t] קדמוני præoccupaverunt me, V. L. anteverterunt me, Vatablus; occurrerunt, Cocceius.

℣. 8. There went up a ſmoke out of his noſtrils, &c.] This, with what follows, deſcribes a ſtorm of thunder; the ſmoke deſigns thick black clouds, gathered together; fire intends lightning; and coals of fire hot thunderbolts; and the whole is borrowed from, and is an alluſion to what was at the giving of the law on mount Sinai, Exod. xix. 16, 18. The majeſty of God is here ſet forth in much ſuch language as is the leviathan in Job xli. 19—21. the ſmoke of his noſtrils ſeems to intend the indignation of God againſt the enemies of David, of Chriſt, and of his people, and the puniſhment he will inflict upon them, Iſa. lxv. 5. Rev. xiv. 11. The Targum interprets it of the pride and inſolence of Pharaoh. And fire out of his mouth devoured; God is a wall of fire round about his people, and a conſuming one to his and their enemies. This expreſſes the wrath of God upon the Jewiſh nation, and his ſending the Roman armies to burn their city, Matt. xxii. 7. Coals were kindled by it; the Jews being as dry trees, were fit fuel for the fire of divine wrath, and ſo preſently became as coals of fire; ſo the antichriſtian party, upon the pouring out of the fourth vial, will be ſcorched with heat, and blaſpheme the name of God, Rev. xvi. 8, 9.

℣. 9. He bowed the heavens alſo, and came down, &c.] To execute wrath and vengeance on wicked men; which is always the ſenſe of theſe phraſes when they go together; ſee Pſal. cxliv. 6—8. Iſa. lxiv. 1, 2. The Targum is, He bowed the heavens, and his glory appeared; that is, the glory of his power, and of his mighty hand of vengeance; for not his grace and mercy, but his indignation and wrath ſhewed themſelves; for it follows, And darkneſs was under his feet; the Targum is, a dark cloud, expreſſive of the awfulneſs of the diſpenſation to wicked men; who are not allowed to ſee the face of God, are debarred his preſence, and denied communion with him, and to whom every thing appears awful and terrible, Pſal. xcvii. 2—5.

℣. 10. And he rode upon a cherub, and did fly, &c.] The Targum renders it in the plural number, cherubim; and ſo the Septuagint, Syriac, and Arabic verſions; and by whom may be meant, either the angels, who are as horſes and chariots, on whom Jehovah rides, and whom he makes uſe of as executioners of his wrath and vengeance, Zech. vi. 5. Pſal. lxviii. 17. and to whom wings are aſſigned as a token of ſwiftneſs, Iſa. vi. 2. or rather the miniſters of the goſpel, who are the living creatures in Rev. iv. 7, 8. and anſwer to the cherubim in Ezekiel's viſions; and whom God made uſe of, eſpecially after the death of Chriſt, and when the goſpel was rejected by the Jews, to carry it into the Gentile world, which was done by them with great ſpeed and ſwiftneſs; and Maimonides [u] gives a caution, not to underſtand the phraſe, he did fly, as of God, but of the cherub. Yea, he did fly upon the wings of the wind; which may deſign the ſpeedy help and aſſiſtance God gave to his Son, and gives to his people; and the ſwift deſtruction of their enemies; ſee Pſal. civ. 3, 4. the words in 2 Sam. xxii. 11. with only the variation of a letter in one word, are, and he was ſeen upon the wings of the wind; which were both true; nor need a various reading be ſuppoſed, the pſalmiſt uſing both words at different times, ſuitable to his purpoſe, and which both expreſs his ſenſe. Wings are aſcribed to the winds by the heathen poets, and they are repreſented as winged on ancient monuments [w].

℣. 11. He made darkneſs his ſecret place, &c.] Which, and the dark waters in the next clauſe, are the ſame with the thick clouds in the laſt, in which Jehovah is repreſented as wrapping himſelf, and in which he lies hid as in a ſecret place; not ſo as that he cannot ſee others, as wicked men imagine, Job xxii. 13, 14. but as that he cannot be beheld by others; the Targum interprets it, "he cauſed "his ſhekinah to dwell in darkneſs." His pavilion round about him were dark waters, and thick clouds of the ſkies; theſe were as a tent or tabernacle, in which he dwelt unſeen by men; ſee Job xxxvi. 29. all this may deſign the dark diſpenſation of the Jews, after their rejection and crucifixion of Chriſt; when God departed from them, left their houſe deſolate, and them, without his preſence and protection; when the light of the goſpel was taken away from them, and blindneſs happened unto them, and they had eyes that they ſhould not ſee, and were given up to a judicial darkneſs of mind and hardneſs of heart; which were ſome of the dark, deep, and myſterious methods of divine providence, with reſpect to which God may be ſaid to be ſurrounded with darkneſs, dark waters, and thick clouds; ſee Rom. xi. 7, 8, 25, 32, 33.

℣. 12. At the brightneſs that was before him, &c.] The lightning that came out of the thick clouds; which may denote, either the coming of Chriſt to take vengeance on the Jewiſh nation, which was ſwift and ſudden, clear and manifeſt; or the ſpreading of the goſpel in the Gentile world, in which Chriſt, the brightneſs of his Father's glory, appeared to the illumination of many; ſee Matt. xxiv. 27. and both may be intended, as the effects following ſhow. His thick clouds paſſed; that is, paſſed away; the groſs darkneſs, which had for ſo many years covered the Gentile world, was removed, when God ſent forth his light and truth; and multitudes, who were darkneſs itſelf, were made light in the Lord. Hail-ſtones and coals of fire; the ſame goſpel that was enlightening to the Gentiles, and the ſavour of life unto life unto them, was grievous, like hail-ſtones, and tormenting, ſcorching, irritating and provoking, like coals of fire, and the ſavour of death unto death to the Jews; when God provoked them, by ſending the goſpel among the Gentiles, and calling them: or theſe may deſign the heavy, awful, and conſuming judgments of God upon them, which are [u] Moreh Nevochim, par. 1. c. 49.

[w] Vide Cuperi Apotheoſ. Homeri, p. 178. Wings are given to the ſouth-wind, by Ovid, Metamorph. l. 1. fab. 7. and by Juvenal, Satyr. 5. v. 10. and by Virgil, Æneid. 8. v. 430. and who alſo ſpeaks of wings of lightning, Æneid. 5. v. 319.

are ſometimes ſignified by hail-ſtorms; ſee Rev. viii. 7. and xvi. 11. In 2 Sam. xxii. 13. it is only, Through the brightneſs before him were coals of fire kindled.

℣. 13. The Lord alſo thundered in the heavens, &c.] By his apoſtles and miniſters, ſome of which were Boanergeses, ſons of thunder, whoſe miniſtry was uſeful to ſhake the conſciences of men, and bring them to a ſenſe of themſelves, Mark iii. 17. And the Higheſt gave his voice; the ſame with thunder; for thunder is often called the voice of the Lord, Job xxxvii. 5. and xl. 9. Pſal. xxix. 3—9. compare with this Pſal. lxviii. 11. the Targum interprets it, He lift up his word; the ſame effects as before follow, hail-ſtones and coals of fire.

℣. 14. Yea, he ſent out his arrows, &c.] By which thunderbolts, cracks of thunder, and flaſhes of lightning, ſeem to be meant; ſee Pſal. lxxvii. 17, 18. and cxliv. 6. comparable to arrows ſhot, and ſent out of a bow; and may denote, either the doctrines of the goſpel, which were ſharp in the hearts of Chriſt's enemies, and are either the means of ſubduing them to him, or of deſtroying them, being the ſavour of death unto death; or however, like arrows, give great pain and uneaſineſs, where they ſtick, and grievouſly diſtreſs and torment; as does the fire which comes out of the mouth of the two witneſſes, Rev. xi. 5, 10. The Targum is, "He ſent his word as arrows;" or elſe the judgments of God are meant, as famine, peſtilence, and the ſword, which God ſent unto, and ſpent upon the Jewiſh nation, Deut. xxxii. 23. And ſcattered them; among the nations of the world, where they have been diſperſed ever ſince. And he ſhot out lightnings; or many lightnings, ſo the Targum: and diſcomfited them; troubled, terrified and diſtreſſed them.

℣. 15. Then the channels of water were ſeen, &c.] Or, of the ſea; as in 2 Sam. xxii. 16. There ſeems to be an alluſion to the drying up of the ſea when the Iſraelites paſſed through it. Aben Ezra interprets this of the diſcovery of the ſecrets of enemies, and of their deep ſchemes and counſels which they ſeek to hide, but are made known by him who ſees all things in the dark; and ſo the following clauſe. And the foundations of the world were diſcovered; but it rather ſeems to intend the utter extirpation and ruin of the Jewiſh nation, both in their civil and eccleſiaſtic ſtate, the foundation of which was rooted up and laid bare; unleſs with Jerom, we underſtand this of the miniſters of the word, in whom the doctrines of Grace were channelled, and who were as fountains of water; and of the foundation of the apoſtles and prophets made known in the goſpel: but the former ſenſe is beſt; ſince it follows, At thy rebuke, O Lord; at the blaſt of the breath of thy noſtrils; for the deſtruction of the Jews was the effect of divine wrath and vengeance: ſo ends the account of the wonderful appearance of God in favour of the perſon the ſubject of this pſalm, and againſt his enemies; the deliverance wrought for him is next deſcribed.

℣. 16. He ſent from above, &c.] Either his hand, as in Pſal. cxliv. 7. he exerted and diſplayed his mighty power in raiſing Chriſt from the dead; or he ſent help from his ſanctuary; as in Pſal. xx. 2. and helped and ſtrengthened him in a day of ſalvation; or when he wrought out the ſalvation of his people; or he ſent his word, as in Pſal. cvii. 20. his word of command, to take up his life again, as he had given it to lay it down, John x. 18. The Targum is, He ſent his prophets; but it may be much better ſupplied, he ſent his angels, or an angel; as he did at his reſurrection, who rolled away the ſtone from the ſepulchre, as a token of his juſtification and diſcharge: ſo Jarchi interprets it, he ſent his angels; and Aben Ezra ſupplies it thus, "he ſent his word or his angel:" unleſs the ſenſe ſhould be, as Cocceius ſuggeſts; he ſent a cloud from above, which was done at Chriſt's aſcenſion, and which received him out of the ſight of the apoſtles, Acts i. 9. Since it follows, He took me; that is, up to heaven; thither Chriſt was carried in a cloud, one of God's chariots, he ſent for him; and where he is received, and will be retained until his ſecond coming; though rather the ſenſe is, he took me by the hand: he drew me out of many waters. This is ſaid either in alluſion to Moſes, who had his name from his being drawn out of the water, Exod. ii. 10. and who was an eminent type of Chriſt; and this is the only place where the Hebrew word is made uſe of from whence he had his name; or elſe to a man plunged in water ready to be drowned; ſee Pſal. lxix. 1, 2. By theſe many waters, may be meant the many afflictions, ſorrows, and ſufferings from which Chriſt was freed, when raiſed from the dead, and highly exalted and crowned with glory and honour; and the torrent of ſins which flowed in upon him at the time he was made ſin for his people, from which he was juſtified when riſen; and ſo will appear a ſecond time without ſin unto ſalvation; and the wrath of God, the waves and billows of which went over him, and compaſſed him about as water, at the time of his ſufferings; from which he was delivered when he was ſhewn the path of life, and entered into the preſence of God, and ſat at his right hand, where are joys and pleaſures for evermore; and alſo his grand enemy Satan, with his principalities and powers, who came in like a flood upon him; but he deſtroyed him and ſpoiled them; and particularly the floods of ungodly men, ſpoken of in ℣. 4. ſeem to be here deſigned, compare with this Pſal. cxliv. 7. So, many waters, ſignify many people and nations, Rev. xvii. 15. and accordingly the Targum is, "he delivered me from "many people." This was true of Chriſt when riſen and aſcended; he was then ſeparate from ſinners, and made higher than the heavens; and this ſenſe is confirmed by the following words, where what is expreſſed figuratively here, is there literally explained.

℣. 17. He delivered me from my ſtrong enemy, &c.] Which, as it may reſpect David, may be underſtood of Goliath the Philiſtine champion, who was a man of war from his youth; or Saul, king of Iſrael; and as it may reſpect David's antitype, may deſign either the chief prieſts, ſcribes and Phariſees, who were men of power and influence; or more eſpecially Satan, the ſtrong man armed, with all his principalities and powers; or, likewiſe death, the laſt enemy, from whoſe pains and cords he was looſed when raiſed from the dead, and when he was delivered from every other ſtrong enemy. And from them which hated me; from the old ſerpent the devil, between whom and him there has been a laſting enmity; and from the world, the people of the Jews, particularly the Phariſees, who bore an implacable hatred to Chriſt. For they were too ſtrong for me; as Goliath and Saul were too ſtrong for David of himſelf, ſo Chriſt's enemies were too ſtrong for him; not as God, for he is the mighty God, the almighty, and ſtronger than the ſtrong man armed, but as man; for in his human nature he had a ſinleſs weakneſs, which ſhewed itſelf in his agonies in the garden; or a natural weakneſs, through which he was crucified; and this weak nature of Chriſt Satan attacked, and got got an advantage over, and brought it to the duſt of death, which is meant by his bruiſing his heel, though by it he got a broken head. But though Chriſt's enemies were too ſtrong for him, conſidered merely as man, they not being, at leaſt many of them, fleſh and blood, but principalities and powers; yet being helped by his father, and ſupported by his divine nature, he overcame them, and was delivered from them.

℣. 18. They prevented me in the day of my calamity, &c.] Referring to the times of his diſtreſs in the garden and upon the croſs; the time of his ſufferings and death, which was a dark and cloudy day, as the word [x] uſed ſuggeſts, both in a literal and in a ſpiritual ſenſe; and when the day and hour was come, fixed and determined by the will of God, then his enemies, though not before, met him, laid hold on him, were too mighty for him, condemned, crucified and inſulted him. But the Lord was my ſtay; or ſtaff, on whom he leaned, relied and depended, believing he would help him; and by whom he was ſupported and upheld, Iſaiah xlii. 1. and l. 7, 8, 9. and xlix. 7, 8. The Targum is, "The word of the Lord was my ſtay."

℣. 19. He brought me forth alſo into a large place, &c.] Into heaven, a place of the glorious liberty of Chriſt, after his captivity to death and the grave, whither he aſcended leading captivity captive, and of the children of God; and a ſpacious place, where there is room enough for Chriſt and all his people; here he now is, and will remain till his ſecond coming, and from hence we expect him; ſee John xiv. 2, 3. Compare with this Pſal. xxxi. 8. and cxviii. 5. He delivered me, becauſe he delighted in me; God delivered David from all his enemies, becauſe he was a man after his own heart, in whom he delighted; not for any merit and worthineſs in him, but of his good will and pleaſure: he delivered Chriſt becauſe he was his elect, in whom his ſoul delighted; and who was daily his delight, rejoicing in his preſence before the world was: and he delivers his church and people, becauſe they are his Hephzibah, in whom is his delight; the Father delighted in them, and therefore choſe them to ſalvation; the Son delighted in them, and gave himſelf for them, and ranſomed them out of the hands of him that is ſtronger than they; the holy Spirit delighted in them, and therefore regenerates, renews, and ſanctifies them, and ſeals them up unto the day of redemption.

℣. 20. The Lord rewarded me according to my righteouſneſs, &c.] Which, if applied to David, cannot be underſtood of his own perſonal righteouſneſs, or of works of righteouſneſs done by him, for theſe merit nothing at the hand of God; no reward, in ſtrict juſtice, is due to them, or given to them: a man's own righteouſneſs is imperfect, and by the law of God is not accounted a righteouſneſs; and it is unprofitable to God, is no gain to him, and ſo not rewardable by him; and were it perfect, it is but man's duty, and what God has a prior right to, and ſo is not recompenſed by him; though it is ſo far from being pure and perfect, that it is attended with much ſin, and is no other than rags and filthy ones, which can never recommend a perſon to God; it is what will not bear the ſight of God, and can never be called cleanneſs in his eye-ſight: by it no man is juſtified before him; and though God does, indeed, reward the works of his people, which are fruits of his grace, yet the reward is not of debt, but of grace. This, therefore, muſt be underſtood of the righteouſneſs of David's cauſe, and of his innocence with reſpect to the things he was charged with by his enemies; of his righteouſneſs towards Saul; and of the cleanneſs of his hands, in not defiling them with his blood, when it was in his power to take away his life; therefore God rewarded him by delivering him out of his hands, and ſetting him upon the throne, and cauſing his kingdom to flouriſh and proſper; for this reſpects temporal bleſſings, and not eternal glory and happineſs; and is ſomething that had been and was then enjoyed, and not any thing future, or in another world: though it is beſt of all to apply it to Chriſt, and underſtand it of his righteouſneſs, which he, as mediator, has wrought out for his people; this is perfect, pure and ſpotleſs, and entirely agreeable to the law of God; what will bear the ſight of God, is ſatisfying to his juſtice, is well pleaſing to him, and is what he accepts of, and imputes to them that believe in Chriſt, and by which they are juſtified from all things. Now according to this righteouſneſs, Chriſt in ſtrict juſtice has been rewarded in his own perſon; as he had the work of man's redemption aſſigned him, and he agreed to do it, he had a reward promiſed him, and which he claimed, when he had glorified his father and finiſhed his work; and which he received when he was ſet down at the right hand of God, crowned with glory and honour, in conſequence of his obedience, ſufferings and death; ſee Phil. ii. 7—10. and he is rewarded in his members according to his righteouſneſs, they being juſtified by it, and made heirs of eternal life on account of it, and are or will be glorified with him for evermore. According to the cleanneſs of my hands hath he recompenſed me; which ſignifies the ſame thing.

℣. 21. For I have kept the ways of the Lord, &c.] Not thoſe which the Lord himſelf walks in, his ways of providence, or of grace; though theſe are and ſhould be taken notice of and obſerved by good men, as the word [y] uſed will bear to be rendered; but the ways which he has preſcribed and directed men to walk in, the ways of his commandments, in which they ſhould go; theſe were, in ſome meaſure, kept by David, who often, in Pſal. cxix. ſpeaks of his keeping the teſtimonies and ſtatutes, and commandments of the Lord; as they are by good men, with ſome degree of pleaſure, they take delight to walk in them; and with ſome degree of conſtancy, they keep walking in them, without turning to the right hand or the left, though ſolicited to it; but yet not perfectly, for they have many a ſlip and fall in them; wherefore this cannot be a reaſon of their being rewarded according to their righteouſneſs: in ſtrict juſtice, the words better agree with Chriſt, who kept the law of God perfectly, did his will compleatly; he came from heaven to do it; it was his meat and drink to accompliſh it; and he always did the things which pleaſed his father, wherefore he rewarded him. And have not wickedly departed from my God; which was, in ſome ſenſe, true of David; not as by diſbelieving the power and providence, the promiſes, truth and faithfulneſs of God, and his covenant-intereſt in him; which to do do would have been a wicked departure from God; ſee Heb. iii. 12. nor by forſaking the houſe and worſhip of God; though he was driven from thence by wicked men, yet ſore againſt his will, and which during his exile he frequently laments and complains of; nor by ſinning wilfully and preſumptuouſly, only through error, inadvertency, infirmity and temptation: but when it is obſerved, how much unbelief, which is a partial departing from the living God, and how many there are that neglect private and public worſhip, and what a proneneſs there is to ſin and wickedneſs, and how much there is of the will in ſinful actions, in the beſt of men; it is right and beſt to underſtand this of Chriſt, who never was guilty of ſin, nor committed any wickedneſs in departing from God in the leaſt: as man, God was his God, and he always believed his intereſt in him, and claimed it even when he forſook him on the croſs; nor did he quit his ſervice, deſert his cauſe, nor depart from the work and buſineſs he enjoined him, till it was finiſhed.

[x] בְּיוֹם אֵידִי in the day of my cloudy calamity, Ainſworth; nomen אֵיד proprie ſignificat vaporem vel nubem, ut Gen. vii. 6. hinc per metaphoram transfertur ad obſcuras ac terrificas calamitatum nebulas, Prov. i. 26. Gejerus. [y] שָׁמַרְתִּי obſervaveram, Tigurine verſion, Vatablus; obſervo, Junius & Tremellius; obſervavi, Gejerus, Michaelis; ſo Ainſworth.

℣. 22. For all his judgments were before me, &c.] That is, the precepts of the law of God, which David had a reſpect unto, loved, took delight and pleaſure in, and ſo had them all in his ſight, and made them the rule of his actions; and the law of God is delighted in by regenerate perſons, after the inward man; and though it is aboliſhed as a covenant of works, it is a rule of walk and converſation to the ſaints; and as ſuch they keep it in view, and regard it impartially, not only ſome of its precepts, but all. This in the higheſt and fulleſt ſenſe was done by Chriſt, who was made under the law, in whoſe heart it was, and who came to fulfil it, and has compleatly fulfilled it. And I did not put away his ſtatutes from me; in 2 Sam. xxii. 23. it is read; And as for his ſtatutes, I did not depart from them; the ſenſe is the ſame; this may have reſpect to the ceremonial law, and the ordinances of it, which David abode by, very ſtrictly obſerved, renewed and put in order; and which Chriſt, his antitype, never departed from, but conformed unto throughout the whole of his life; witneſs his circumciſion, keeping of the paſſover, attendance on the ſynagogue and temple-worſhip; nor did he put them away until they had their full accompliſhment in him; when there was a diſanuling of them becauſe of their weakneſs and unprofitableneſs.

℣. 23. I was alſo upright before him, &c.] In heart and converſation, being ſincere and faithful; ſo David was in the ſight of God; but this is much more true of Chriſt, in whom there was no unrighteouſneſs nor guile, neither in his heart, nor in his lips; he was of perfect integrity, and faithful in all things to him that appointed him. And I kept myſelf from mine iniquity; which ſome interpret of original ſin, in which David was born, which dwelt in him, and prompted him to ſin; but rather, it refers to the taking away of Saul's life, which he might be tempted to do, as being his enemy that ſought his life; and which he was put upon and urged to by ſome about him, and yet did it not. But it is beſt here alſo to apply theſe words to Chriſt; for though he had no iniquity of his own, yet he had the iniquities of his people on him, as their ſurety, and which he calls mine, Pſal. xl. 12. But though he bore them, he did not commit any of them; though he was made ſin, he knew none; and though he was tempted by Satan to the moſt enormous iniquities, as deſtroying himſelf and worſhipping the devil, he kept himſelf from the evil One that he could not touch him: the ſenſe is, that he kept himſelf from committing any ſin, which cannot be ſaid of any mere man; and ſo far as good men are kept from ſin, they are kept by the power of God, and not by themſelves. All theſe things ſhew, that the righteouſneſs of Chriſt was a perfect, ſinleſs one, entirely agreeable to the laws, ſtatutes, and judgments of God; was pure in the ſight of God, and rewardable in ſtrict juſtice. Hence it is repeated as follows:

℣. 24. Therefore hath the Lord recompenſed me according to my righteouſneſs, &c.] Having proved and ſupported this propoſition by the above reaſons, it is repeated, for confirmation-ſake: According to the cleanneſs of my hands in his eye-ſight; this phraſe, in his eye-ſight, is here added, to ſhew that the righteouſneſs of Chriſt was clean, pure, and ſpotleſs in the ſight of God; in the eye of divine juſtice: hence thoſe that are clothed with it, are holy and unblameable, and irreproveable in his ſight, Col. i. 22.

℣. 25. With the merciful thou wilt ſhew thyſelf merciful, &c.] The merciful man is the good, gracious, holy and godly man, as the word [z] here uſed ſignifies, and is ſometimes rendered; one that has received grace and mercy from the Lord, and has principles of grace and goodneſs wrought in him, and is kind and merciful to others, both to their ſouls and bodies; and to ſuch men God ſhews himſelf merciful: not that they are firſt merciful to others and then he is ſo to them, for it is juſt the reverſe; nor is their mercifulneſs the cauſe or condition of his, for he has mercy on whom he will have mercy; but to ſuch he ſhews freſh mercy, and beſtows more grace upon them; they find grace and mercy with him now, and will do hereafter; ſee Matt. v. 7. This may be applied to Chriſt, all whoſe ways are mercy and truth; he ſaw the eſtate his people would come into; he pitied their caſe, and became their ſurety in eternity; he betrothed them to himſelf in loving kindneſs and tender mercies; and undertook to feed the flock of ſlaughter, even the poor of the flock; having, through his merciful loving kindneſs, aſſumed human nature, he went about doing good to the ſouls and bodies of men; he healed the diſeaſed and fed the hungry, and had compaſſion on the ignorant, and them that were out of the way; and, as a merciful high prieſt, he bore the ſins and ſorrows of his people; and in his love and pity redeemed them, and continues to ſympathize with them in all their afflictions and temptations; and though no mercy was ſhewn him whilſt he was ſuffering for them, for God ſpared him not, but awoke the ſword of juſtice againſt him, and uſed him with the utmoſt rigour and ſeverity; yet ſatisfaction being made, he did not leave him in the grave, nor ſuffer his holy, good, and merciful One to ſee corruption; but raiſed him from the dead, prevented him with the bleſſings of his goodneſs, and ſet upon his head a crown of honour and glory. With an upright man thou wilt ſhew thyſelf upright; an upright man, as the word [a] uſed ſignifies, is a perfect man, not abſolutely, but comparatively; not in himſelf, but in Chriſt; perfect with a perfection of parts, but not of degrees; he is one that is upright in heart, ſincere cere and without hypocriſy; an Iſraelite indeed, whoſe faith, hope and love are undiſguiſed; he is a man of integrity, a faithful man, faithful to God, his cauſe and intereſt, his word and ordinances, and is faithful with the ſaints; he walks uprightly according to the rule of God's word, and by faith in Chriſt; and to ſuch upright men God ſhews himſelf upright, or faithful, by keeping his covenant with them, fulfilling his promiſes to them, and not ſuffering one good thing to fail, he has given them reaſon to expect from him. This may alſo be interpreted of Chriſt, who is in the higheſt and fulleſt ſenſe perfect, upright, and ſincere, and faithful to him that appointed him; and as he has been faithful in all his covenant-engagements with his father, ſo his father has been faithful to him in making good all he promiſed him; both with reſpect to his own glory, and the happineſs of his people; ſee Iſa. liii. 10—12. John xvii. 4, 5. Phil. ii. 9, 10.

[z] חסיד benigno, Vatablus, Junius & Tremellius; bono, Gejerus, ſo ſome in Vatablus; qui bonitati ſtudet, Tigurine verſion; pio, Munſter, Cocceius, Michaelis; gracious ſaint, Ainſworth. [a] תמים perfecto, Pagninus, Montanus; ſo Ainſworth.

℣. 26. With the pure thou wilt ſhew thyſelf pure, &c.] None of Adam's poſterity are pure by nature; they are all defiled with ſin; and tho' ſome are pure in their own eyes, they are far from being cleanſed from their filthineſs; ſuch only are pure who are ſanctified by the Spirit of God, have clean hearts created in them, and whoſe hearts are purified by faith in the blood of Chriſt; who are juſtified by Chriſt's righteouſneſs, and are waſhed from their ſins in his blood; and who, in conſequence of ſuch grace, love pureneſs of heart, ſpeak a pure language, hold the myſtery of faith in a pure conſcience, and with a pure converſation, and live ſoberly, righteouſly and godly: and whereas God is a pure and holy being, his perfections, works, and word are pure; he ſhews himſelf to be ſo to ſuch perſons, by providing for the honour of his purity and holineſs in their redemption, ſanctification and ſalvation; by making all things to be pure to them; by granting them his preſence, and bleſſing them with the viſion of himſelf here and hereafter; ſee Matt. v. 8. this may likewiſe be underſtood of Chriſt, who, in his human nature, is pure from all ſin, both original and actual: he indeed took upon him the ſins of his people, and bore them, and made ſatisfaction for them, and brought in everlaſting righteouſneſs; which being done, God has ſhewed himſelf pure to him, by juſtifying, acquitting, and diſcharging him from all ſuch ſins; by accepting his righteouſneſs, and imputing it to thoſe for whom he wrought it. And with the froward thou wilt ſhew thyſelf froward; or thou wreſtleſt [b], or wilt contend with them until they are deſtroyed: the ſame word is here uſed which Naphthali has his name from, Gen. xxx. 6. The froward are ſuch as are of perverſe diſpoſitions, and of ſtubborn and obſtinate tempers, and whoſe ways are crooked and diſtorted; and ſuch were the people of the Jews in the times of Moſes, and of Chriſt, Deut. xxxii. 5, 20. Matth. xvii. 17. and who ſeem here to be deſigned; even the Jews in Chriſt's time, who were juſt the reverſe of the above characters, were cruel and unmerciful, faithleſs and hypocritical, filthy and impure, diſbelieved the Meſſiah, rejected and crucified him, were contrary to God, and to all men; and therefore God walked contrary to them, as he threatened, Lev. xxvi. 27, 28. the ſame as ſhewing himſelf froward to them; for God is not froward and perverſe in himſelf, nor in his ways, which are all equal, juſt, and pure: and though there is one and the ſame word uſed in our verſion, yet there are two different words in the Hebrew text; the ſame word that is uſed of the froward, is not uſed of God; that which is uſed of God, as before obſerved, ſignifies wreſtling, and deſigns God's contending with the people of the Jews, in a way of wrath and fury, which came upon them to the uttermoſt, and iſſued in their entire ruin as a people and nation; the words here had their fulfilment in the deſtruction of Jeruſalem.

℣. 27. For thou wilt ſave the afflicted people, &c.] As the people of God commonly are; they are afflicted with ſin, and the corruption of their own hearts, and with Satan and his temptations, and with the world, its reproaches and perſecutions; but God in his own time ſaves them out of them, if not here, yet hereafter. This is particularly and eminently true of the chriſtians, who lived between the crucifixion of Chriſt and the deſtruction of Jeruſalem; who were greatly afflicted and perſecuted by the Jews, but were in a remarkable manner ſaved a little before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, by being directed to go out of it to a place called Pella [c]; ſo that not one chriſtian ſuffered in it. But wilt bring down high looks; or proud men, whom God humbles; theſe he abhors, reſiſts, ſets himſelf againſt, ſcatters and deſtroys. The Jews were a very proud people, and behaved in an inſolent and inſulting manner towards Chriſt and his followers; but the high looks of the chief prieſts, ſcribes and Phariſees, were brought down to a purpoſe, when their city, temple and nation, were deſtroyed; ſee Iſa. ii. 11.

℣. 28. For thou wilt light my candle, &c.] or lamp [d]: in 2 Sam. xxii. 29. it is, Thou art my lamp, O Lord; which may either deſign outward proſperity, and the flouriſhing condition of David's kingdom; or internal, ſpiritual light, and an increaſe of it, by giving freſh ſupplies of the oil of grace, to cauſe the lamp to burn more clearly; or rather, the proſperous eſtate of Chriſt's kingdom; and may be the ſame with the lamp ordained for the Meſſiah, Pſal. cxxxii. 17. The Lord my God will enlighten my darkneſs; or cauſe light to ſhine in my darkneſs [e]; that is, bring me out of darkneſs into light; either out of adverſity to proſperity, or from walking in darkneſs, to the enjoyment of the light of his countenance; and is true of Chriſt, not only of the proſperity of his kingdom and intereſt, but of him perſonally; who though, when on the croſs, was in darkneſs of ſoul, being forſaken by his God; yet when raiſed from the dead, he was received up to heaven, and ſet down at the right hand of God, and was made full of joy with his countenance, Acts ii. 28.

℣. 29. For by thee I have run through a troop, &c.] Or, I have run to a troop; to meet one, [f] with courage and intrepidity, as ſome interpret it [g]; or as others [h], I have run after a troop; that is, purſued after one, as David purſued after the troops of the Amalekites who burnt Ziklag, 1 Sam. xxx. 8. to which Jarchi refers this paſſage; or rather, I have broke a troop, or through one [i]; for the word, as ſome Jewiſh writers [k] obſerve, comes from a root, which ſignifies to break in pieces, and is fitly uſed for the deſtroying, or cutting in pieces a troop of the enemy;

[b] תתפתל eluctaris, Junius & Tremellius; colluctaris, Aben Ezra; reluctaris, Gejerus; certas, Schmidt. [c] Euſeb. Eccl. Hiſt. l. 3. c. 5. [d] נרי lucernam meam, Pagninus, Montanus, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, &c. [e] So Guſſetius, Comment. Ebr. p. 495. [f] ארוץ גדוד occurram turmæ, ſo ſome in Vatablus. [g] Apud Kimchi in loc. [h] Apud Aben Ezra in loc. Tigurine verſion, Caſtalio; ſo Ainſworth. [i] Conteram, Pagninus; perfregi, Vatablus; perrupi, Muſculus; perrumpo, Kimchi & Ben Melech.

my; and is true of Chriſt, when he engaged with the troops of hell, and broke the ſquadrons of the infernal fiends, and ſpoiled or diſarmed principalities and powers, and triumphed over them on the croſs, and made a ſhew of them openly, when he dragged them at his chariot-wheels, and led captivity captive. And by my God have I leaped over a wall; which refers to the ſcaling of walls, and taking of fortified places; and ſo the Targum, By the word of my God I will ſubdue fortified towns; ſo Apollinarius has it, paſſed over a tower, or took it; which was literally true of David, in many inſtances. Jarchi applies this to his taking the fortreſs of Zion from the Jebuſites: a learned writer [l] thinks this refers to his leaping over the city-wall, and ſlipping through the city-watch, when Michal let him down thorough a window: it may be applied to Chriſt, who broke down the middle wall of partition, the ceremonial law, which ſtood between Jew and Gentile; or rather, it may deſign the many difficulties which were in the way of the ſalvation of his people, which he ſurmounted and got over with great ſtrength and ſwiftneſs; ſuch as fulfilling the law, ſatisfying juſtice, bearing ſin, and making atonement for it, undergoing a ſhameful and an accurſed death, and grappling with numerous enemies, whom he conquered; and he is ſaid to do all this by his God; becauſe, as man and mediator, he was ſtrengthened and aſſiſted by him.

ỿ. 30. As for God, his way is perfect, &c.] Or without ſpot [m], as the Septuagint render the word; without any juſt charge of inequality, or unrighteouſneſs; ſuch is God's way of providence, though ſometimes his methods of providence are cavilled at by wicked men, and murmured at by his own people: they are at a loſs, at times, to reconcile promiſes and providences together, and to account for the juſtice and equity of them; theſe ways of his are unſearchable, and not to be traced out by them; but when his judgments will be made manifeſt, the wiſdom, goodneſs, and righteouſneſs of them will be clearly diſcerned, and they will be admired; for they are all of a piece, and perfectly conſiſtent with the attributes of God: and ſuch alſo is his way of grace, and method of ſalvation; it is agreeable to all his perfections, and according to his purpoſes, counſel and covenant; this being reſolved on in his breaſt, contrived by his wiſdom, and concluded on in the covenant, has been effected and finiſhed by his Son; and his inward way of working upon the heart, though at preſent imperfect, will be compleated; he is a rock, and his work is perfect, and all his ways are judgment: whatever way or method he contrives and enters upon, whether in providence or grace, he purſues and brings to an iſſue; for he is an omnipotent, omniſcient, and unchangeable being, and neither fruſtrates, nor is he fruſtrated; nor is there any inſincerity, unrighteouſneſs, and unfaithfulneſs in him; nor can he act contrary to himſelf, and the perfections of his nature: the way alſo which he preſcribes to others is perfect and plain; whether the path of doctrine or of duty; the path of truth is plain to the enlightened underſtanding, and the way of holineſs is ſuch, in which men, though fools, ſhall not err; ſee Prov. viii. 8, 9. Iſa. xxxv. 8. The word of the Lord is tried; as ſilver in a furnace, and is clear of all droſs, of error and falſhood; is free from human mixtures, and without any impurity and unholineſs; nor is God's word of promiſe chargeable with unfaithfulneſs; all his promiſes being yea and amen in Chriſt, and have been tried and proved by the ſaints in all ages; and have been found true, faithful, conſtant, and invariable. He is a buckler to all thoſe that truſt in him; not in man, nor in themſelves; in their own righteouſneſs, or in any creature or creature-enjoyment or performance; but in the providence and power of God, in his grace and mercy, in his word, and eſpecially in his Son; in his perſon, blood, and righteouſneſs; to ſuch he is a buckler or ſhield: his power is all around them, his favour encompaſſes them, and his truth, or faithfulneſs in his word, is their ſhield and buckler: and ſo is his Son, who is both a ſun and ſhield to them; and ſuch are his precious blood, his ſpotleſs righteouſneſs, and atoning ſacrifice; which being held up by faith, repel the fiery darts of Satan.

ỿ. 31. For who is God, ſave the Lord? &c.] Or Jehovah? there is but one God, and Jehovah is he; there is none beſides him, nor any like him: there are many that are called gods, nominal deities, who are not by nature gods; fictitious ones, the idols of the Gentiles, made of gold, ſilver, braſs, wood and ſtone; but there is but one true God: there are gods, in an improper ſenſe, as civil magiſtrates; but there is none really and truly ſo but the Lord; which is to be underſtood, not of Jehovah the Father, to the excluſion of the Son and Spirit; for the Son is Jehovah, and the Spirit is Jehovah; both are ſo called, as well as the Father, and all three one God. Or who is a rock, ſave our God? to have recourſe to for ſhelter and protection; or to truſt to, and build upon, for eternal life and ſalvation. Falſe gods are rocks; but not like ours, our enemies themſelves being judges, Deut. xxxii. 31. ſo Apollo at Delphos is called the Delphian rock [n]: the words ſeem to be taken from, or at leaſt there is in them a reference to 1 Sam. ii. 2.

ỿ. 32. It is God that girdeth me with ſtrength, &c.] For battle, as in ỿ. 39. with ſtrength of body and fortitude of mind; both which are from the Lord, and were in David; and were acknowledged by him as beſtowed on him by the Lord; and which confirms what he had before ſaid of him: or with ſpiritual ſtrength, with ſtrength in his ſoul, againſt ſin, Satan, and the world; and to do the will and work of God: ſaints are girt by the Lord with the whole armour of God, and among the reſt with the girdle of truth; and are prepared and ready to every good work; ſee 1 Sam. ii. 4. Hannah's ſong is again referred to: in 2 Sam. xxii. 33. the words are, God is my ſtrength and power; they are true of Chriſt, the man of God's right hand, whom he promiſed to ſtrengthen, and whom he has made ſtrong for himſelf. Pſal. lxxx. 17. and lxxxix. 21. And maketh my way perfect; or ſafe, or proſperous. God removed every impediment and obſtacle out of his way, and made it plain and eaſy, as Jarchi obſerves; and ſucceeded him, and gave him victory over his enemies; this has been verified in Chriſt, who has conquered, ſin, Satan, the world, death, and the grave: for this is not to be underſtood of the way and courſe of David's life and converſation, which was not perfect and unſpotted, but had many blemiſhes and imperfections in it, which he often owns, confeſſes, and bewails.

ỿ. 33. He maketh my feet like hinds feet, &c.] As light and ſwift as theirs, as the Targum; that is, is, either to flee, when there was a neceſſity for it, as Kimchi obſerves; or rather to purſue after the enemy, to run through a troop, and leap over a wall, as before; ſee 1 Chron. xii. 8. 2 Sam. ii. 18, 19. the ſame phraſe is uſed in Hab. iii. 19. and may be underſtood in a ſpiritual ſenſe, of that readineſs and chearfulneſs with which the ſaints run the ways of God's commandments, when their hearts are enlarged with his love and grace; and may very well be applied to Chriſt, who is often compared to a roe, or a young hart, for ſwiftneſs; who readily and at once engaged to come and do the will of God, and whoſe coming in the fleſh, at the appointed time, was ſwift; and who made haſte to do the work of God, in which he took the utmoſt pleaſure; and who is a ſpeedy and preſent help to his people in time of trouble; ſee Cant. ii. 8, 9, 17. and viii. 14. And ſetteth me upon my high places; the towers and fortreſſes, and ſtrong and fortified places, where he was ſafe from his enemies; and, in a ſpiritual ſenſe, may deſign the everlaſting love of God, the covenant of grace, its bleſſings and promiſes; and Chriſt himſelf, with the fulneſs of grace in him, on which believers may be ſaid to be ſet, when their faith is directed to them, and they live and dwell upon them; ſee Hab. iii. 19. Iſa. xxxiii. 16. and the words were fulfilled in Chriſt, when God highly exalted him at his right hand, and ſet him above all principalities and powers, and made him higher than the heavens.

[l] Delaney's Life of King David, vol. 1. p. 63.

[m] תמים αμωμος, Sept. impolluta, V. L. ſo Syriac. Æthiop.

[n] Δελφις πετρα, Sophoclis Oedipus, v. 472.

℣. 34. He teacheth my hands to war, &c.] From whence it appears, that war, in ſome caſes, is lawful; and that all the ſkilfulneſs and art in training men for war, in the uſe of armour, in marſhalling of armies, in forming ſieges, &c. is all from God; ſee Pſal. cxliv. 1. and ſo is all that ſpiritual ſkill, in making uſe of the whole armour of God againſt every enemy, ſin, Satan, and the world; and even the wiſdom and ſkill, counſel and inſtruction, which Chriſt as man and Mediator had, when it was the hour and power of darkneſs; when he was engaged with principalities and powers, and got the victory over them, were from the Lord; ſee Pſal. xvi. 7. So that a bow of ſteel is broken by mine arms; that is, the bow of an enemy falling into his hands, which might be literally true of David. It is in the Hebrew text, a bow of braſs; and ſo Appollinarius renders it; which Kimchi and Ben Melech interpret, ſtrong iron, that is, ſteel; and ſo the Targum; ſee Job xx. 24. Satan is an archer; his temptations are darts, and fiery ones; and his ſtrong bow may be ſaid to be broken by the arms of faith, when his temptations, under the influence of divine grace, are repelled and rendered ineffectual; and eſpecially his bow was broken by Chriſt, not only in the wilderneſs, when he was vanquiſhed by him; but in the garden, and on the croſs, when Satan could find nothing in him, and get no other advantage over him, but to bruiſe his heel; when he himſelf had his head broke, his works ruined, and he himſelf deſtroyed. Some render the words, Mine arms have bent a bow of ſteel; that is, ſuch ſkill and ſtrength were given him, that he was able to bend, draw, and ſhoot a bow of ſteel: the Targum is, and hath ſtrengthned mine arm as a bow of braſs, or ſteel; and ſo the Syriac and Arabic verſions; and to the ſame purpoſe the Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, and Ethiopic verſions; or it may be rendered, my arms have bent, or made to deſcend[o], a bow of braſs; for when a bow is bent, the horns, or corners of it, are made to deſcend towards a man.

℣. 35. Thou haſt given me the ſhield of thy ſalvation, &c.] Meaning either temporal ſalvation, which was a ſhield to him when he had no outward one, as when he fought with Goliath; and was what preſerved him in all his battles at other times: or ſpiritual ſalvation, which is of the Lord, of his contriving, effecting, and applying, and in which his glory is concerned; intereſt in which is a free gift of his, as are the knowledge, application, and poſſeſſion of it; and this is as a ſhield, which ſaves from ſin, from all ſin, and the damning power of it; keeps off the curſes of the law, ſecures from wrath to come, and repels Satan's temptations; the words may be applied to Chriſt, who, though he was not ſaved from dying, yet was preſerved in the day of ſalvation, and was not ſuffered to ſee corruption in the grave, and was quickly delivered from the power and dominion of it. And thy right hand hath holden me up; Chriſt may be ſaid to be the right hand of God, being as dear to him as his right hand; and being exalted at it; and becauſe by him he communicates all good things to his people, and with him upholds and ſuſtains them; or elſe it deſigns the mighty power of God, which is often ſignified by it, Pſal. xx. 6. and xliv. 3. and cxviii. 15, 16. and may be underſtood of the ſuſtentation of David, both in a providential way, with reſpect to his being, the preſervation of it, the ſupplies of life, and ſupport in times of trouble and diſtreſs; and in a ſpiritual ſenſe, maintaining the principle of grace in him, furniſhing him with freſh ſupplies of grace, and bearing him up under and through every temptation and exerciſe; ſo upholding him that he ſtood firm in the true grace of God, in the exerciſe of it implanted, and in the doctrine of grace, ſo as to go forward in the ways of God, and follow hard after him, and ſo as not to fall and utterly periſh; and which is true of all the ſaints; ſee Pſalm lxiii. 8. and xxxvii. 24. The words may be interpreted of Chriſt, who, as man and mediator, as God's righteous ſervant, was upheld by him, ſo that he failed not, nor was he diſcouraged; the hand of the Lord was eſtabliſhed with him, and his arm alſo ſtrengthened him, Iſa. xlii. 1, 4. Pſal. lxxxix. 21. this clauſe is not in 2 Sam. xxii. 36. And thy gentleneſs hath made me great; David was very mean and low by his birth and occupation, and whilſt perſecuted by Saul; but God of his grace and goodneſs, of his ſovereign good will and pleaſure, raiſed him to an high eſtate, ſet him on the throne of Iſrael, and gave him honour among and above the kings of the earth; ſo Kimchi interprets the word for gentleneſs by goodneſs or merciful kindneſs; R. Jonah by providence; and R. Iſaac explains it thy help and good will; and all ſhews that his greatneſs was not owing to his merits, but to the providential goodneſs of God; and his ſpecial grace and mercy in Chriſt Jeſus made him ſtill greater, even a child of God, an heir of God, a joint-heir with Chriſt, a king and a prieſt unto God; gave him a right unto, and a meetneſs for a crown of glory, an everlaſting kingdom, an eternal inheritance, as it does all the ſaints. The words may be rendered, thy humility hath made me great[p]; which may be underſtood either of God's humbling himſelf to look upon him in his low eſtate, and to raiſe him to ſuch honour and dignity as he did, both in a temporal and ſpiritual ſenſe; ſee Pſal.

[o] תנחתני ut curvent, Cocceius; ſo Michaelis; ut deſcendat vel deprimatur, Gejerus; vid. Guſſetii Comment. Ebr. p. 507. ſo Jarchi. [p] ענותך manſuetudo tua, Pagninus, Montanus, Muſculus, Gejerus; thy meekneſs, Ainſworth; ענוה ſumitur pro humilitate ſeu manſuetudine, Zeph. ii. 3. Gejerus.

Pſal. cxiii. 6—8. or of the humility which he had in himſelf from God, as Aben Ezra interprets it; of which grace God is the author; it is a fruit of the Spirit; which he takes great notice of, gives more grace to them that have it, and exalts them, as he did David, who was mean and low in his own eyes. The Septuagint, and thoſe verſions which follow that, render it thy diſcipline or correction; and ſo may deſign the gentleneſs and lenity of God in chaſtiſing his people, which is always in meaſure and in judgment, and for their good; whereby he increaſes grace in them, and trains them up for, and brings them to his kingdom and glory. The Chaldee paraphraſe is, by thy word thou haſt increaſed me; it may not be improperly interpreted of Chriſt, who was very low in his eſtate of humiliation on earth, but is now highly exalted, and crowned with glory and honour; who firſt endured great ſufferings, and then entered into his glory.

℣. 36. Thou haſt enlarged my ſteps under me, &c.] Which is oppoſed to thoſe ſtraitned circumſtances in which the pſalmiſt was, ℣. 4, 5. and is expreſſive of deliverance from his enemies, by whom he was ſurrounded, beſieged, and ſhut up; ſee Pſal. xxxi. 8. and of freedom of walking at large, without being ſtraitned for room, or interrupted by others, Prov. iv. 12. and of ſafety in ſtanding; all which is true in a ſpiritual ſenſe of believers in Chriſt, who being delivered by him out of the hands of their enemies, ſerve the Lord without fear in righteouſneſs and holineſs; walk at liberty by faith in Chriſt, and up and down in the name of the Lord their God; and have their feet eſtabliſhed upon the Rock of ages, that ſure and large foundation, Chriſt, from which there is no danger of ſlipping and falling; as follows. That my feet did not ſlip; ſo as to fall and periſh; for ſometimes the ſteps of the ſaints are well nigh ſlipt; yea in ſome ſenſe they ſtumble, ſlip, and fall, but not ſo as to be utterly caſt down and periſh eternally; the bottom on which they are is ſo broad, and the foundation ſo ſure, that it is not poſſible they ſhould. The words will bear to be applied to Chriſt, who was in very preſſed and ſtraitned circumſtances, when beſet with the bulls of Baſhan, encompaſſed with dogs, and incloſed with the aſſembly of the wicked; and was in ſlippery places, when he ſunk in deep mire where there is no ſtanding, Pſal. xxii. 12, 16. and lxix. 2. but now being delivered from all this, he is brought, as in ℣. 19. into a large place, into heaven, and made higher than the heavens, and is ſet down at the right hand of God, from whence he can never be moved.

℣. 37. I have purſued mine enemies, and overtaken them, &c.] Which may refer to David's purſuing the Amalekites, who overtook them and recovered all they had carried away, 1 Sam. xxx. 8, 10, 18, 19. ſo Kimchi explains it. Neither did I turn again till they were conſumed; for not a man eſcaped, ſave four hundred young men that rode on camels and fled, ℣. 17.

℣. 38. I have wounded them that they were not able to riſe, &c.] Which was not only true of the Amalekites, but of all with whom David engaged in war. They are fallen under my feet; either dead, or become ſubject and tributaries to him; as the Philiſtines, Moabites, Syrians, and Edomites; ſee 2 Sam. viii. This, with the preceding verſe, may very well be accommodated to David's antitype, and be expreſſive of the entire victory he has obtained over all his and his peoples enemies; he wounded the heads over many countries, Pſal. cx. 6. Satan and his principalities and powers, whoſe head is broke, whoſe works are deſtroyed; yea he himſelf, which had the power of death, ſo as not to be able to riſe more againſt Chriſt, who has led captivity captive: he has alſo finiſhed and made an end of ſin, and overcome the world; nor did he turn back from this work he engaged in, until he had made a compleat conqueſt; and moreover he has likewiſe made his people more than conquerors, through him, over theſe ſame enemies; ſo that the words are alſo applicable to them.

℣. 39. For thou haſt girded me with ſtrength unto battle, &c.] See ℣. 32. that natural ſtrength, courage and valour, which David had, were from the Lord; and ſo is the ſpirit of power, love and of a ſound mind, which believers have; and likewiſe that ſtrength which Chriſt, as man, had and uſed in his combat with the powers of darkneſs; ſee Pſal. lxxx. 17. Thou haſt ſubdued under me thoſe that roſe up againſt me; as the pſalmiſt aſcribes his ſtrength, ſo he attributes his ſucceſs to the Lord; who likewiſe ſubdues the ſins of his people, and all other enemies of theirs, and who alſo makes the enemies of his Son his footſtool, Pſal. cx. 1.

℣. 40. Thou haſt alſo given me the necks of mine enemies, &c.] Either to ſlay them, or to trample, or put a yoke upon them; or rather the ſenſe is, thou haſt made them to fly before me, to turn their necks or backs unto me, as the word is uſed in Joſh. vii. 8. and it is expreſſive of an utter rout and vanquiſhing of them. That I might deſtroy them that hate me; they not being able to face him and ſtand againſt him.

℣. 41. They cried, but there was none to ſave them, &c.] It is in 2 Sam. xxii. 42. they looked; that is, they looked round about, here and there, to ſee if there were any near at hand to help and deliver them; they cried in their diſtreſs, and becauſe of the anguiſh of their ſpirits, and for help and aſſiſtance, but in vain; they cried, as Jarchi thinks, to their idols, as Jonah's mariners cried every one to their god; and, if ſo, it is no wonder there was none to ſave; for ſuch are gods that cannot ſave: but it follows, Even unto the Lord, but he anſwered them not; as Saul, for inſtance, 1 Sam. xxviii. 6. ſo God deals with wicked men, often by way of righteous retaliation; ſee Prov. i. 28. Zech. vii. 13.

℣. 42. Then did I beat them ſmall, as the duſt before the wind, &c.] They being given up by God, and he not anſwering to their cries; the phraſe denotes the utter ruin and deſtruction of them, and repreſents their caſe as deſperate and irrecoverable; being, as it were, pounded to duſt, and that driven away with the wind; juſt as the deſtruction of the four monarchies is ſignified by the iron, clay, braſs, ſilver and gold, being broken to pieces, and made like the chaff of the ſummer-threſhing floor, and carried away with the wind, ſo that no place is found for them any more, Dan. ii. 35. I did caſt them out as the dirt of the ſtreets; expreſſing indignation and contempt: in 2 Sam. xxii. 43. it is, I did ſtamp them as the mire of the ſtreet, and did ſpread them abroad; which alſo denotes the low and miſerable condition to which they were reduced, and the entire conqueſt made of them, and triumph over them; ſee Iſa. x. 6. Mic. vii. 10. compare with this 2 Sam. xii. 31.

℣. 43. Thou haſt delivered me from the ſtrivings of the people, &c.] In 2 Sam. xxii. 44. it is read my people, meaning the people of Iſrael; either Saul and his men who contended with David, and ſought his life; or rather the tribes of Iſrael, who, after Saul's death, refuſed to acknowledge David as their king, but afterwards came and anointed him in Hebron. The words may very well be interpreted of the contentions of the ſcribes and Phariſees with Chriſt, and of the contradiction of ſinners ners which he for a while endured, but is now delivered from them all. And thou haſt made me the head of the heathen; which, if underſtood of David, refers to the Philiſtines, Syrians, Moabites, and Edomites, being ſubdued by him, and becoming tributaries to him, 2 Sam. viii. But it beſt agrees with Chriſt, who is the head of his choſen ones among the Gentiles; the political head, king and governor of them, the heathen being given him for his inheritance and poſſeſſion; and which appeared in the firſt ages of chriſtianity, when the goſpel was firſt preached to the Gentiles by the apoſtles; and ſtill continues, and will be more clearly ſeen in the latter day, when the Lord ſhall be king over all the earth. Chriſt was made the head of the heathen by the appointment and deſignation of his father; and in fact was ſo when multitudes from among the Gentiles were converted and brought to the obedience of him. In 2 Sam. xxii. 44. it is, thou haſt kept me to be head of the heathen; which does not ſeem ſo much to intend the deſignation and conſtitution of him as ſuch, but the continuation of him; and denotes the ſtability of his government in the gentile world, of which there will be no end. A people whom I have not known, ſhall ſerve me; by whom are meant the Gentiles, who were not the people of God, were without Chriſt, and without God, and without hope in the world: not that there are any people than can be unknown to Chriſt, as he is the omniſcient God; nor were theſe unknown to him, in ſuch ſenſe as reprobates, nominal profeſſors, and fooliſh virgins, are ſaid not to be known by him, Matt. vii. 23. and xxv. 12. For theſe people among the heathen, who are or ſhall be brought to ſerve the Lord, are ſuch who were the objects of his love and delight from everlaſting; were in his father's choice and in his own, and in the gift of his father to him, and in the covenant of his grace; and therefore muſt be known by him: moreover, they are the purchaſe of his blood; and the ſheep he knows, for whom he has laid down his life, and of whom he has ſuch an exact and particular knowledge, that he can and does call them by name. But the ſenſe is, theſe ſeemed not to be taken notice of and cared for by Chriſt; they were not owned and acknowledged by him as his people; the Jews were diſtinguiſhed from all others; they only had the law, the word of God, and his ordinances; the Gentiles were ſuffered to walk in their own ways; they were neglected, and the times of their ignorance were overlooked and diſregarded; ſo that they were treated as a people that were not known for many hundreds of years: but here it is predicted, that when the goſpel ſhould come among them, and they be called by it, they ſhould ſerve the Lord in righteouſneſs and true holineſs, with reverence and godly fear, from a principle of love, in his name and ſtrength, and to his glory; ſee Iſa. lv. 4, 5.

℣. 44. As ſoon as they hear of me they ſhall obey me, &c.] That is, as ſoon as they ſhould hear of Chriſt, through the preaching of the word, by which faith would come, they ſhould readily and at once receive, embrace, and profeſs the goſpel, and yield a chearful ſubmiſſion to the ordinances of it; and which has had its accompliſhment among the Gentiles, Acts xxviii. 28. and xiii. 42, 44, 48. The ſtrangers ſhall ſubmit themſelves unto me; meaning either the ſame perſons as before, the Gentiles, who were aliens from the commonwealth of Iſrael, and ſtrangers to the covenant of promiſe, who ſhould ſubmit to Chriſt, to his goſpel, to his righteouſneſs, and to the ſceptre of his kingdom; though ſome interpret it of the degenerate Jews, the ſons of the ſtranger, as the words may be rendered; who, though called the children of God, and the children of the kingdom; yet were, as our Lord ſays, of their father the devil; and theſe, ſome of them, in a flattering and diſſembling way, feigned themſelves to be the followers and diſciples of Chriſt: and indeed it looks as if hypocrites were intended, whether among Jews or Gentiles, or both, ſince the word here uſed and rendered ſubmit, ſignifies to lye; and ſo it is in the metaphraſe of Apollinarius; or as in the margin of ſome Bibles, to yield a feigned obedience; ſee Pſal. lxvi. 3. There ſeems to be an alluſion to the conqueſt of nations, ſome of the inhabitants of which readily and heartily ſubmit, but others only feignedly, and through fear, and the force of ſuperior power they cannot withſtand.

℣. 45. The ſtrangers ſhall fade away, &c.] Like the leaves of trees in autumn, when they fall and periſh; to which hypocrites and nominal profeſſors are compared, Jude 12. And be afraid out of their cloſe places; their towers and fortified places, or the rocks and mountains to which they betake themſelves for ſhelter; but, as not thinking themſelves ſafe enough, through fear and dread, come out of them; ſee Micah vii. 17. Some Jewiſh writers [q] interpret the words, They ſhall halt or be lame; that is, becauſe of the chains put upon their feet: and ſo they are expreſſive of the conqueſt made of them. The word in the Arabic language ſignifies to come out; and may be ſo rendered here, and come out: in 2 Sam. xxii. 46. it is, they ſhall gird themſelves, or come out girt.

℣. 46. The Lord liveth, and bleſſed be my rock, &c.] This, with what follows, is the concluding part of the pſalm, which ends with a celebration of the divine Being, and with thankfulneſs for mercies received from him. The pſalmiſt praiſes him on account of what he is in himſelf, what he was to him, and had done for him: in himſelf he is the living God, the Lord liveth; he has life in himſelf, eſſentially, originally, and independently; and is the fountain and author of life to all others, even to all creatures that have life, whether rational or irrational: he is the giver of natural life to all men, and the ſupporter of it; and of ſpiritual and eternal life to his choſen people; and he continues to live, and ever will; wherefore the ſaints may conclude, that their life in every ſenſe is ſafe and ſecure. Some render the phraſe, by way of wiſh, may the Lord live; [r] but then it muſt be underſtood only, that he would ſhew himſelf more abundantly to be the living God, and that he might be acknowledged ſo by others. The next clauſes are by way of petition; And bleſſed be my Rock; on which he was built and eſtabliſhed, to which he betook himſelf in times of diſtreſs, which was his place of defence, and from whence he had a ſupply; wherefore he deſires he might be bleſſed, not by invoking or conferring a bleſſing on him, neither of which can be; there being none greater than he to call upon, and he being El-ſhaddai, God all-ſufficient, and in no need of any; but by declaring his bleſſedneſs, by celebrating his greatneſs and goodneſs, and by aſcribing bleſſing and honour and glory to him. And let the God of my ſalvation be exalted; God was the God of his ſalvation vation in a temporal ſenſe, ſaving him daily from his many enemies; and in a ſpiritual ſenſe, being the contriver, author, and applier of it to him; on which account he would have him be exalted both by himſelf, and in the high praiſes of his people; aſcribing the whole of ſalvation to him, and giving him all the glory of it. Some render the words, The God of my ſalvation is high [s]; he is the moſt high God, the high and lofty One that inhabits eternity, and is above all others. In 2 Sam. xxii. 47. the words are read, And exalted be the God of the rock of my ſalvation.

[q] R. Doneſh apud Jarchi & Abendana not. in Miclol Yophi in loc. ſo Apollinar. Metaphraſ.

[r] חי יהוה vivat Jehova, Muſculus, Tigurine verſion, Piſcator, Muis; ſo ſome in Vatablus, Ainſworth.

℣. 47. It is God that avengeth me, &c.] Or gives vengeance unto me, or for me [t]: vengeance only belongs to God, and he repays it for and in behalf of his people. Private revenge is not to be exerciſed by any; public vengeance on delinquents may be exerciſed by the civil magiſtrate, to whom God gives power and authority to exerciſe it, Rom. xiii. 4. as he did to David, as king of Iſrael; tho' the phraſe rather ſeems to deſign the victories which he obtained over his enemies, which were puniſhments to them, vengeances inflicted on them, and owing to God; ſo the acceptable year of the Meſſiah's coming, and the time of his people redeemed by him, is called the day of vengeance of our God, both on his and their enemies, Iſa. lxi. 2. and lxiii. 4. And ſubdueth the people under me; the Edomites, Moabites, and others, as in 2 Sam. viii. or the Gentiles under Chriſt; ſee the note on ℣. 39.

℣. 48. He delivereth me from mine enemies, &c.] From Saul and his men, from Iſhboſheth and Abner, from Abſalom and the conſpirators with him; ſo all believers are delivered out of the hands of their enemies by Chriſt, as that they can ſerve the Lord without fear; and ſo Chriſt himſelf is delivered from all his enemies, being raiſed from the dead, and ſet at the right hand of God, where he muſt reign till all enemies are put under his feet. Yea, thou lifteſt me up above thoſe that riſe up againſt me; David was lifted up from a low and mean eſtate, and placed on the throne of Iſrael, above all thoſe that roſe up againſt him, and ſought to deſtroy him; and the ſaints are ſet upon their high places in Chriſt, where they are out of the reach of their enemies to do them any hurt; and Chriſt, he is highly exalted at the right hand of God, above all principality and power, might and dominion, and every name that is named in this world. Thou haſt delivered me from the violent man; either from Saul, from whom David was delivered; or from Satan the enemy, the ſon of wickedneſs, who ſhall no more exact upon and afflict the Meſſiah, Pſal. lxxxix. 21, 22. The Chaldee paraphraſe ſays, from Gog; as the ſaints will be delivered from Antichriſt, the man of ſin, and ſon of perdition, who will be deſtroyed with the breath of Chriſt's mouth.

℣. 49. Therefore will I give thanks unto thee, O Lord, among the heathen, &c.] Theſe words are cited by the apoſtle, in Rom. xv. 9. and applied to the converſion of the Gentiles, which is manifeſtly prophecied of in ſome preceding verſes of this pſalm: there it is rendered, I will confeſs to thee among the Gentiles; and deſigns not confeſſion of ſin, nor profeſſion of the truth, but an acknowledgment of unworthineſs, joined with thankfulneſs for mercies received; done in the moſt public manner, not only in the congregation of the righteous, but before the heathen conquered by him; owning before them all, that the victories he had obtained over them, were not to be aſcribed to his arm and ſword, but to the power of the Lord. And ſing praiſes unto thy name; which is comely for the ſaints to do, and which Jeſus Chriſt himſelf did, in the great congregation of his diſciples, and among the Gentiles, by his apoſtles, and others, on the account of the converſion of them.

℣. 50. Great deliverance giveth he to his king, &c.] Not that is king over him; for he is King of kings and Lord of lords; but that is made king by him, as David was; who did not uſurp the throne, but was anointed king by the appointment of God, and was placed by him upon the throne; to whom he gave great deliverance from his enemies, or magnified ſalvations to him; which were great in kind, and many in number; and as Chriſt is, whom God has ſet as his king on his holy hill of Sion, againſt whom the heathen raged, and kings and princes ſet themſelves; but he is delivered from them all, and ſaved from the power of death and the grave, and ever lives to reign over, protect, and defend his people; in 2 Sam. xxii. 51. it is, he is the tower of ſalvation for his king, with which compare Prov. xviii. 10. And ſheweth mercy to his anointed, to David and to his ſeed for evermore; which may be underſtood either of David literally, who was the Lord's anointed, and to whom God ſhewed mercy in various inſtances; and then by his ſeed is meant the Meſſiah, who was of his ſeed according to the fleſh: or of the Meſſiah, whoſe name ſignifies Anointed; and who is often called David, Ezek. xxxiv. 23, 24. and xxxvii. 24, 25. Hoſ. iii. 5. and ſo ſome of the Jewiſh doctors [u] from this verſe prove that the name of the Meſſiah is David: and by his ſeed are meant his ſpiritual ſeed; all the elect of God, who are given him as his children, to whom he ſtands in the relation of the everlaſting Father: and as mercy is kept with him for evermore, Pſal. lxxxix. 28. ſo it is ſhewn to them in regeneration, in the forgiveneſs of their ſins, and in their everlaſting ſalvation.

PSALM XIX.

To the chief muſician, a pſalm of David.

THIS pſalm was penned by David, and inſcribed to the chief muſician, as others, to be uſed in public ſervice; and was deſigned for goſpel-times, as the ſubject of it ſhews; which is firſt, not an account of the light of nature, and then of the law of Moſes, but of the goſpel of Chriſt; and eſpecially as miniſtred in the times of the apoſtles, as a citation out of it in Rom. x. 18. makes appear.

℣. 1. The heavens declare the glory of God, &c.] By which we are to underſtand not the heavens literally taken, though theſe with the firmament are the handy-works of God, and do declare the glory of

[s] רום excelſus eſt, Gejerus. [t] הנותן נקמות לי qui dat ultiones mihi, Pagninus, Gejerus; ſo Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Muſculus, Cocceius, Michaelis. [u] Echa Rabbati fol. 50. 2.

of his perfections, eſpecially his wiſdom and power; theſe ſhew that there is a God, and that he is a glorious one: but either goſpel-churches, often ſignified by the kingdom of heaven, in the New Teſtament; the members of them being heaven-born ſouls, and the doctrines and ordinances miniſtred among them being from heaven; and there being a very great reſemblance between them and heaven, in the company and communion enjoyed in them; and who declare the glory of the divine perfections, which is very great in the handy-work of their redemption; and who aſcribe the glory of their whole ſalvation to God: or rather, the apoſtles and firſt preachers of the word, as appears from Rom. x. 18. who were ſet in the higheſt place in the church; had their commiſſion, doctrine, and ſucceſs from heaven; and who may be called by this name, becauſe of the purity and ſolidity of their miniſtry, and their conſtancy and ſtedfaſtneſs in it, and becauſe of their heavenly lives and converſations: theſe declared the glory of the divine perfections; ſuch as thoſe particularly of grace, goodneſs, and mercy, which are not diſcoverable by the light of nature or law of Moſes, as they are diſplayed in the ſalvation of men by Chriſt, in the forgiveneſs of their ſins, the juſtification of their perſons, and the gift of eternal life unto them: they taught men to aſcribe the glory of ſalvation to God alone, Father, Son and Spirit; they ſet forth in their miniſtry the glory of Chriſt, of his perſon, and of his offices and grace; and they ſhewed that redemption was his handy-work, as follows: The firmament ſheweth his handy-work: for the ſame perſons may be called the firmament, ſince they that are wiſe are ſaid to ſhine as the brightneſs of it, Dan. xii. 3. Theſe were like to ſtars in it, and were the light of the world, and declared that redemption is the work which Chriſt undertook, and came into this world to perform, and which he has finiſhed; his hands have wrought it, and his own arm has brought ſalvation to him. The Targum interprets the heavens and the firmament, of ſuch perſons as contemplate the heavens, and look upon the firmament or air; and ſo do ſome other Jewiſh writers [w].

℣. 2. Day unto day uttereth ſpeech, &c.] This, with the following clauſe, and night unto night ſheweth knowledge, ſome underſtand, of the conſtant and continued ſucceſſion of day and night; which declares the glory of God, and ſhews him to be poſſeſſed of infinite knowledge and wiſdom; and which brings a new acceſſion of knowledge to men; others, of the continual declaration of the glory of God, and of the knowledge of him made by the heavens and the firmament, the ordinances of which always continue; the ſun for a light by day, and the moon and ſtars for a light by night; and ſo night and day conſtantly and ſucceſſively proclaim the glory and wiſdom of God: but rather, this is to be underſtood of the conſtancy of the goſpel-miniſtry, and the continuance of the evangelic revelation. The apoſtles of Chriſt perſevered in their work, and laboured in the word and doctrine night and day: they were in it at all ſeaſons; yea, were inſtant in ſeaſon and out of ſeaſon; and though they are dead, the goſpel continues, and will do as long as day and night remain: and theſe, like overflowing fountains, ſent forth in great abundance, as the word [x] rendered uttereth, ſignifies, the ſtreams of divine light and knowledge; they were full of matter, and their tongues were as the pen of a ready writer; they diffuſed the ſavour of the knowledge of Chriſt, in great plenty, in every place where they came. Theſe words expreſs the continuance of the goſpel-revelation, as the next do the extent of it.

℣. 3. There is no ſpeech nor language where their voice is not heard, &c.] Not the voice of the day and night; as if the ſenſe was, that there is no people, of any ſpeech or language under the ſun, but there is ſomething ſaid every day and night of the weather, what it is, or will be, as the face of the heavens appears morning and evening: but of the heavens and firmament; the meaning of which ſome take to be this; either that though they have no proper ſpeech nor language, yet there is a voice in them which is heard, declaring the glory of God and his handy-works; and the words may very well be rendered, they have no ſpeech nor words, without theſe their voice is heard; or that there is no people, nation, or language under the heavens; ſee Dan. iii. 4, 29. and vi. 24. though they are ever ſo different one from another, ſo as not to be able to underſtand each other; yet the voice of the heavens, uttering and proclaiming the glory of their maker, is heard and underſtood by them all: but rather, this is to be interpreted of the extent of the goſpel-miniſtry by the apoſtles; who, according to their commiſſion, went every where preaching the word, to men of all nations, of every ſpeech and language; for which they were qualified, by having the gift of divers tongues beſtowed upon them; ſo that there were no nations, of ever ſo barbarous a ſpeech and language, but they were capable of ſpeaking to and of being underſtood by them; and though they could not underſtand one another, they all heard the apoſtles ſpeak in their own tongues the wonderful works of God, Acts ii. 4—11. Their voice, in the miniſtration of the goſpel was heard in every nation externally, and by many internally: faith came by hearing; and they received the word with gladneſs and readineſs. This gives the goſpel-revelation a ſuperiority to the legal one; that was only made to one nation, to the nation of the Jews; the voice of that was not heard elſewhere; but the voice of the goſpel is heard in all nations; this revelation is publiſhed throughout the world: and this ſhews that theſe words belong to the times of the apoſtles, after they had received a commiſſion from Chriſt, to go into all the world, and preach the goſpel to every creature; which was done before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, Matt. xxiv. 14. Col. i. 6, 23. and which is further confirmed by what follows.

℣. 4. Their line is gone out through all the earth, &c.] Not the line or writings in the book of the creatures, the heavens, and the earth, which lie open, and are legible, and to be ſeen and read of all men; nor the line and writings in the book of the ſcriptures, called line upon line, and precept upon precept, Iſa. xxviii. 13. which, though firſt given to the Jews, were written for the inſtruction of others, and have been communicated to them; but the line of the apoſtles: every one had his line or meaſure; or the courſe he was to ſteer, was meaſured out and directed to him; the line of one, where he was to go and preach the goſpel, reached ſo far one way, and the line of another reached ſo far another way; and what with one and another, their line reached throughout all the earth; ſee 2 Cor. xvi. 13—16. the apoſtle citing theſe words in Rom. x. 18.

[w] Jarchi & Kimchi in loc. [x] יביע eructat, Muſculus, Munſter, Vatablus, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator; ſo Ainſworth; ſcaturit, Muis; ſcaturiendo effundit, Cocceius; copioſe ac conſtanter inſtar fœcundæ cujuſdam ſcaturiginis protrudit, emittit, Gejerus; ſo Michaelis.

x. 18. renders them, their ſound went, &c. the ſound of the goſpel, as publiſhed by them; which agrees with the next clauſe; and their words to the end of the world; to the iſles afar off, even to theſe northern and diſtant ones of England, Scotland, and Ireland, which were reached and viſited with the goſpel, either by the apoſtles, or at leaſt by ſome of the firſt miniſters of the word. In them hath he ſet a tabernacle for the ſun; that is, in the heavens and firmament, where the natural ſun is placed; and its habitation is fitly called a tabernacle, becauſe it is always in motion and never ſtops: or this may have ſome reſpect to its ſetting, when, according to the vulgar appearance, and to common underſtandings, it ſeems to be hid as in a tent or tabernacle; to be as it were gone to bed, and at reſt; when in the morning it riſes gay and chearful, and comes forth like a bridegroom out of his chamber, as is ſaid in the next verſe: but this is all to be underſtood ſpiritually and myſtically, of Chriſt the ſun of righteouſneſs, who has his tabernacle among his people, his churches; and particularly has a place, and the chief place in the miniſtry of the goſpel, being the ſum and ſubſtance of it; and this is of God's putting there, who committed to his apoſtles the word of reconciliation, the ſum of which is Chriſt; and this is what makes the goſpel ſo glorious a light, ſo clear a revelation as it is: the nature, continuance, and extent of this revelation, are deſcribed in the foregoing verſes; the perſpicuity and clearneſs of it is ſet forth in this clauſe, and in what follows.

℣. 5. Which is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, &c.] His nuptial chamber [y]; who looks lovely and beautiful in his nuptial robes, chearful and pleaſant in his countenance, creating pleaſure and delight in all his friends that ſee him and hear his voice: and this ſimile is expreſſive of the brightneſs and glory of the ſun, when it riſes; and of the joy and pleaſure which it produces in the minds of men when they behold it: all which ſets forth the lovelineſs and beauty of Chriſt, as he is held forth in the miniſtration of the goſpel, and the joy unſpeakable and full of glory which his preſence yields, after a ſhort departure from his people; ſee Iſa. lxi. 10. John iii. 29. And rejoiceth as a ſtrong man to run a race; in which he ſhews his readineſs, velocity, and ſtrength; and this denotes the ſwiftneſs of the ſun in running its courſe, and its indefatigableneſs in its conſtant motion; though it has been employed therein for ſo many thouſands of years, yet every morning riſes with the ſame chearfulneſs, purſues it courſe, and is never weary: all which may point at the readineſs of goſpel-miniſters, their ſwiftneſs to run to and fro, and their ſtrength to fulfil the courſe of their miniſtry, in which Chriſt, the ſun of righteouſneſs, is held forth in ſo glorious a manner.

℣. 6. His going forth is from the end of the heaven, &c.] From the eaſt, where it riſes; And his circuit to the ends of it; to the weſt, where it ſets; which is expreſſive of the large compaſs the goſpel-miniſtration took in the times of the apoſtles; whereby the grace of God appeared to all men, ſhone out in a very illuſtrious manner, and Chriſt became, what the ſun is to the earth, the light of the world. And there is nothing hid from the heat thereof; though things may be hid from the light of it, yet not from its heat, ſo forcible and penetrating it is. Chriſt in the miniſtration of the goſpel to all to whom it comes with power, not only enlightens their minds, but quickens their ſouls, warms their hearts, cauſes them to burn within them, ariſes with healing in his wings upon them, and makes his goſpel the ſavour of life unto life unto them. The pſalmiſt goes on to ſay more and excellent things of the goſpel, its nature and uſefulneſs.

℣. 7. The law of the Lord is perfect, &c.] By which is meant, not the law of Moſes, or the ten commandments, but the doctrine of the Lord; as the word תורה, Torah, ſignifies, even the whole word of God, as in Iſa. viii. 20. All the ſcriptures of truth, which are profitable for doctrine; for ſetting doctrine in a clear light, and for the vindication and eſtabliſhment of it, and are the rule of doctrine both to preachers and hearers; and which are perfect, contain the whole mind and will of God, both with reſpect to faith and practice; whereby the man of God is made perfect, and thoroughly furniſhed to all good works, 2 Tim. iii. 16, 17. and eſpecially the goſpel-part of the word of God may be deſigned, which both in the Old and New Teſtament is called a law or doctrine, being eminently ſo; the doctrine of the Meſſiah, and of juſtification by faith in his righteouſneſs, Iſa. ii. 3. and xlii. 1. Rom. iii. 27. The goſpel is a perfect plan and ſcheme of ſpiritual and ſaving truths: it gives an account of perfect things; as of the perfect righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and compleat juſtification by it; of the full as well as free pardon of ſins by the blood of Chriſt; and of redemption and ſalvation from all ſin and evils by him: and it alſo ſhews where true perfection is; namely, in Chriſt, in whom the ſaints are compleat, he being made to them wiſdom, righteouſneſs, ſanctification, and redemption; ſee James ii. 25. This character, therefore, ſuits better with the goſpel than with the moral law; though that, as it is to be gathered out of the whole word of God, contains the good and perfect will of God, with reſpect to what is to be done or avoided; nor is any thing to be added to it; nor did our Lord come to add unto it, or to make it more perfect, but to fulfil it, which men could not do; nor could the law make any man or any thing perfect, either perfectly ſanctify, or juſtify, or ſave; whereas the bringing in of the better hope in the goſpel does, Heb. ix. 7, 19. The effect, under a divine influence and bleſſing aſcribed to it, is, converting the ſoul; which is a further proof that the law of Moſes is not intended: for though by it is the knowledge of ſin, or conviction of ſin, which often falls ſhort of converſion; yet the Spirit of God as a Spirit of regeneration, converſion, and ſanctification, is not received thro' the doctrine or preaching of the law, but through the miniſtration of the goſpel; which is deſigned to turn men from darkneſs to light, and from the power of Satan to God; and which uſe it has when it is attended with the demonſtration of the Spirit and of power; ſee Rom. iii. 20. Gal. iii. 2. Acts xxvi. 18. though the words may be rendered relieving, i. e. refreſhing and comforting the ſoul [z], as in Lam. i. 11—16. Through want of bodily food, which is the caſe in the paſſage referred to, the ſpirits faint and ſink, the ſoul is almoſt gone, when, by the miniſtration of proper food, it is as it were brought back again, as the word [a] here uſed

[y] Elias in his Tiſhbi, p. 119, ſays, "we call the garment (or canopy) ſpread over the head of the bridegroom and bride, ſupported by four pillars, in the time of their eſpouſals, חפה." The ſame word is uſed Iſa. iv. 5. and tranſlated a defence.

[z] משיבת נפש recreans animam, Vatablus, Schmidt; refocillat, Piſcator.

[a] Reſtituens animam, Junius & Tremellius, Cocceius; reducens, Gejerus, Montanus; ſo Ainſworth.

uſed ſignifies, and the animal ſpirits are cheared and revived: and of like uſe is the goſpel; it is the food of the ſoul, by which it is refreſhed and exhilarated, when ready to ſink and faint away; hereby it is reſtored and revived, comforted and nouriſhed. The teſtimony of the Lord is ſure; this is another name for the word of God, or the holy ſcriptures; ſo called becauſe they teſtify of Chriſt, of his perſon, office, and grace; of what he is, was to do, and ſuffer, and perform for his people, and of his glory that ſhould follow thereon, John v. 39. and particularly the doctrine of the goſpel, is the teſtimony of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, both which he himſelf teſtified, and which is a teſtimony concerning him, 2 Tim. i. 8. John iii. 11. And this is ſure, or to be believed [b]; the whole of ſcripture is true, coming from the God of truth; having for its principal ſubject Chriſt, who is truth itſelf, and being dictated by the ſpirit of truth; and particularly the goſpel-part of it, and all the truths therein contained, eſpecially the doctrine of ſalvation by Chriſt, which is a faithful ſaying, and worthy of all acceptation: the goſpel is a teſtimony or record whichGod himſelf has bore concerning his Son, and eternal life by him, and therefore ſure and to be depended upon; for if the witneſs of men is received, the witneſs of God is greater, 1 John v. 9, 10, 11. The effect aſcribed to the word of God, or to the goſpel under this character is, making wiſe the ſimple. The Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic verſions, render it babes or children; and ſo Apollinarius; and the word פתי here uſed in the Arabic language, is ſaid to [c] ſignify ſuch; and here it intends babes and children not in years, but in underſtanding, to whom God is pleaſed to reveal the truths of his goſpel, when he hides them from the wiſe and prudent: theſe ſimple ones are ſuch who are ſenſible of their ſimplicity and folly, and of their want of underſtanding; who, with Agur, think themſelves more fooliſh than any man, and have not the underſtanding of a man; and theſe, by the word of God, are made wiſe to know themſelves, their folly, ſinfulneſs, imperfection, and impotence; and are made wiſe unto ſalvation, to know the right way of ſalvation by Chriſt; ſee 2 Tim. iii. 15. where the ſame phraſe is uſed as here, and ſeems to be borrowed from hence, and is uſed of the ſcriptures; which alſo make men wiſe in the knowledge of goſpel-doctrines, the wiſdom of God in a myſtery, which to know is the greateſt wiſdom and underſtanding, and much more ſo than to be acquainted with the law only, Deut. iv. 6.

℣. 8. The ſtatutes of the Lord are right, &c.] The word of God may be called ſtatutes, or viſitations [d], becauſe that God will viſit, in a way of reſentment, ſuch perſons as deſpiſe its authority, do not act according to it, or add unto it, or detract from it; or the word may be rendered commiſſions [e], things committed to truſt, as the ſcriptures were to the Jews, Rom. iii. 1, 2. and as the goſpel is committed to the truſt of the miniſters of it, who faithfully diſpenſe it, 2 Cor. v. 19. 1 Tim. i. 11. Now theſe may be ſaid to be right, as the word of the Lord is, Pſal. xxxiii. 4. ſince they ſet men right in their principles, and direct them to right practices; they are the means of making them upright in heart, and in converſation: the doctrines of the word of God have nothing crooked, froward and perverſe in them; are without ſophiſm, and the hidden things of diſhoneſty; they are all in righteouſneſs, and plain and eaſy in every thing reſpecting ſalvation, to thoſe who have a ſpiritual knowledge and underſtanding of them, Prov. viii. 8, 9. they lead into right and ſtraight paths, of truth and holineſs, in which way-faring men, tho' fools, ſhall not err; and particularly the goſpel directs to the right way of ſalvation and eternal life by Jeſus Chriſt; the effect of which is rejoicing the heart. This cannot be underſtood of the law, which is a voice of terror, pronounces guilty, curſes and condemns, is the killing letter, and works wrath; but of the goſpel-part of the word, which is a joyful ſound; publiſhes good tidings of good things; and when applied by the Spirit of God, is found to have this effect, ſee Jer. xv. 16. The commandment of the Lord is pure; not only the ſcriptures in general may bear this name, becauſe they deliver out the commands of God to men, as thoſe of a moral and ceremonial kind, to the Jews under the former diſpenſation; ſo the ordinances of Chriſt, which are his commands under the goſpel-diſpenſation; yea, the goſpel itſelf may be ſo called, though, ſtrictly ſpeaking, it has no command in it; becauſe, according to the commandment of the everlaſting God, it is made known to all nations for the obedience of faith, Rom. xvi. 25, 26. beſides, the commandment is no other than the word or doctrine, ſee 1 John ii. 7. and as every commandment of the Lord, of what kind ſoever it is, is pure and holy, ſo is every word of God, Prov. xxx. 5. being without any mixture of mens inventions, or the droſs of corrupt doctrine, ſincere, unadulterated, clear of all chaff and impurity, conſiſtent, uniform, and all of a piece, and which tends to promote purity of heart, life, and converſation. Enlightening the eyes; that is of the underſtanding, ſo as for a man to ſee his loſt ſtate and condition by nature; to ſee the glory, fullneſs, and grace of Chriſt; to behold wondrous things in the doctrine of the goſpel, and to obſerve the way of duty in which he ſhould walk: this is the eye-ſalve in Rev. iii. 18. and ſo the Jewiſh doctors [f] explaining this text call the law, uſing the ſame word as there.

℣. 9. The fear of the Lord is clean, &c.] Still the word of God is intended, which teaches men to fear the Lord; gives a full account of the worſhip of God, which is often meant by the fear of God; it inſtructs in the matter and manner of worſhip; and nothing more powerfully engages to ſerve the Lord with reverence and godly fear than the goſpel does: and this is clean; and the doctrines of it direct to the blood of Chriſt, which cleanſes from all ſin, and to the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, the fine linen, clean and white; the promiſes of it put the ſaints on cleanſing themſelves from all filthineſs of fleſh and ſpirit; and the whole of it is the word of truth, by which God and Chriſt ſanctify the church and the members of it, John xv. 2. and xvii. 17. Eph. v. 25, 26. And this word is enduring for ever; the law is done away; the ceremonial law entirely, and the moral law, as a covenant of works, and as to the miniſtration of it by Moſes; but the goſpel continues; it is an everlaſting one; it endures for ever, notwithſtanding all the oppoſition made to it by open perſecution, or falſe teachers. The judgments of the Lord are true, and righteous altogether; the judgments of the Lord are the ſame with the word of God, as appears from Pſal. cxix. 25, 149. and theſe ſeem to deſign that part of

[b] נאמנה fidele, V. L. Muſculus, Pagninus; fide dignum, Piſcator, Michaelis. [c] Shemot Rabba, ſ. 3. fol. 93. 2.
[d] פקודי viſitationes, Ainſworth. [e] Commiſſiones, Munſter; depoſita, ſo ſome in Rivetus; depoſitum, Gejerus, Michaelis. [f] Vajikra Rabba, ſ. 12. fol. 155. 3. & Debarim Rabba, ſ. 8, fol. 243. 3.

of the word, which contains rules of God's judging and governing his people; or the laws, orders, and ordinances of Chriſt in his houſe, which his people ſhould obſerve, and yield a chearful obedience to, he being their King, Judge, and Lawgiver: and theſe are true, or truth[g] itſelf; being wiſely made, according to the truth of things, and agreeable to the holineſs and righteouſneſs of God, and ſo righteous; not at all grievous, but eaſy, pleaſant, and delightful, one and all of them.

℣. 10. More to be deſired are they than gold, &c.] This refers to all the truths in the word of God; to all the doctrines of the goſpel; which, by good men, are more deſireable, and by them more prized and valued, than all worldly riches and treaſure. Yea, than much fine gold; more than gold, and the beſt of gold, and a great deal of it, than thouſands of gold and ſilver; ſee Pſal. cxix. 72, 127. Prov. viii. 10, 11. Sweeter alſo than honey, and the honeycomb; or the dropping of the honey-combs[h], which is the pureſt and ſweeteſt of the honey; and what honey is to the natural taſte of men, that is the goſpel, and the truths of it, to the ſpiritual taſte of believers, Pſal. cxix. 103. and when the preſence of Chriſt is enjoyed, his love is ſhed abroad, and the bleſſings of his grace are partook of, the ordinances of the goſpel are very delightful, Cant. ii. 3. eloquence, and eloquent orators, are ſometimes deſcribed by mellifluous words; or by their expreſſions being like honey, and ſweeter than that[i].

℣. 11. Moreover, by them is thy ſervant warned, &c.] By whom the pſalmiſt means himſelf, who was the ſervant of the Lord, not only in common with other ſaints, but as he was a king and prophet, and as ſuch he received advantage from the word of God; all his inſtructions as a prophet, and all his rules of government as a king; and the whole of that wiſdom, prudence, and knowledge, with which he conducted in both offices, were from the Lord by his word: and it may be applied to any ſervant of the Lord; and eſpecially in an eccleſiaſtical office, as an apoſtle of Chriſt, and miniſter of the word; who ſerve God in the goſpel of his Son, and, by means of the ſcriptures, are furniſhed for every good work; and alſo to believers in Chriſt in common; who, of whatſoever rank and quality, in whatſoever ſtate and condition of life, whether high or low, rich or poor, bond or free, are Chriſt's ſervants; and whatſoever is written is for their inſtruction, and by the word of God they are warned; the ſcriptures are a way-mark to them, to direct them in the right way, and to caution them againſt turning to the right or left; either to immoral practices, or the errors and hereſies of wicked men: it is a lamp to their feet, and a light to their path, and teaches them to walk circumſpectly, and warns them of rocks, gins, and ſnares in the way; or, as the words may be rendered, by them is thy ſervant made clear, or bright[k]; ſo the word is uſed in Dan. xii. 3. that is, in his underſtanding: the pſalmiſt confirms, by his own experience, what he had ſaid before of the word, ℣. 8. that it enlightned the eyes: the light of the glorious goſpel of Chriſt ſhining into the heart, gives the light of the glory of God in the perſon of Chriſt; it illuminates and irradiates the mind, and gives clear ideas of the glory and perfections of God, of his counſels and covenant, of his works of nature and of grace; and makes a bright diſcovery of the perſon, offices, and grace of Chriſt; and of the bleſſed Spirit, and his operations; and of the bleſſings of grace, and of eternal glory and happineſs. And in keeping of them there is great reward; which is to be underſtood, not of keeping the law of Moſes, and the precepts of that, which, if a man did keep perfectly and conſtantly, he ſhould live in them; but of obſerving the word of God, and by diligent ſearching into it, reading and learning it, and meditating on it, to get and obtain knowledge of divine things; which carries its own reward with it, and is better than thouſands of gold and ſilver; and of laying up the word of God, and the truths of the goſpel, and keeping them in mind and memory, which is very profitable and ſerviceable, to promote ſpiritual peace and comfort, and to preſerve from ſin, doctrinal and practical; and alſo of yielding a chearful obedience to the goſpel, by cordially embracing and profeſſing the doctrines, and ſubmitting to the ordinances of it; from all which ariſe great profit, and much reward: ſuch come at the knowledge of Jeſus Chriſt, which is preferable to every thing elſe, and is more precious than rubies, and all deſireable things; ſuch enjoy the preſence of Chriſt, have much peace and comfort in their ſouls; they are made wiſe unto ſalvation, and are fitted for every good word and work.

℣. 12. Who can underſtand his errors? &c.] Sin is an error, a wandering out of the way of God, ſwerving from the rule of his word; and many miſtakes are made by the people of God themſelves; even ſo many, that they cannot number them; they are more than the hairs of their head; they cannot underſtand, find out and expreſs, neither their number, nor their evil nature, nor the many aggravating circumſtances which attend them: this the pſalmiſt ſaid, upon a view of the large extent, glory, and excellency of the word of God; and upon comparing himſelf with it, in which, as in a glaſs, he ſaw how far ſhort he came of it, and what a diſagreement and want of conformity there was in him unto it; ſee Pſal. cxix. 97. Rom. vii. 14. and he ſuggeſts, that though the word he had been deſcribing was perfect, pure, and clean, he was not; nor could he expect any reward of debt, but merely of grace, for his obſervance of it; and that it was beſt, under a ſenſe of ſin, to have recourſe, not to works of righteouſneſs done by men; but to the grace and mercy of God in Chriſt, as follows: Cleanſe thou me from ſecret faults; by which are meant: not ſuch ſins as are done in ſecret, and are unknown to men; ſuch as David's ſin with Bathſheba, 2 Sam. xii. 12. nor the inward motions of ſin in the heart, to which none are privy but God, and a man's own ſoul; not but that each of theſe may be properly enough included in ſuch a petition; but ſins, which are unknown to a man himſelf, are meant: there are ſome actions, which, though known when committed, are not known to be ſinful ones; and there are ſome ſins which are committed unadviſedly, and through careleſsneſs, and paſs unobſerved; not only many vain and ſinful thoughts paſs to and fro uncontrolled, without being taken notice of; but many fooliſh and idle words are ſpoken, and many evil actions, through infirmity and inadvertency, are done, which, when a good man, at the cloſe of a day, comes to reflect upon the things that have paſſed in it, are quite hidden from him, are unknown to him, being unobſerved by him; wherefore ſuch a petition is highly proper to be inſerted in his addreſs at the throne of grace: and which

[g] אמת veritas, Pagninus, Montanus, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Cocceius, Gejerus, Rivetus. [h] נופת צופים ſtillatione favorum, Vatablus, Rivetus, Cocceius; ſo Ainſworth. [i] τῃ καὶ ἀπὸ γλώσσης. Homer. Iliad. 1. v. 249.
[k] נזהר illuſtratur, Pagninus, Montanus, Rivetus.

which alſo ſuppoſes the perſon ſenſible of the defiling nature of ſin, and of his own impotency to cleanſe himſelf from it; and that God only can do it, who does it by the application of the blood of his Son, which cleanſes from all ſin; for this reſpects not regenerating and ſanctifying grace, but pardoning grace; a manifeſtation of it, a view of acquittance from ſin by Chriſt, and of freedom from obligation to puniſhment for it.

℣. 13. Keep back thy ſervant alſo from preſumptuous ſins, &c.] Some underſtand theſe words of perſons: the Septuagint, and the verſions that follow that, render it from ſtrangers; ſuch who are ſtrangers to God and godlineſs; that is, keep from all converſation with them in things ſinful, or from others ſins; from having a fellowſhip with them, being a partaker of them, leſt their plagues and puniſhments ſhould be ſhared in: others, as the Targum, from proud men, who are haughty, inſolent, and conceited of themſelves; leſt he ſhould be ſo corrupted and drawn aſide by them: but rather, the words are to be underſtood of ſins wilfully, contumaciouſly, and preſumptuouſly committed; and the petition ſuppoſes, that theſe may be commited by good men, if left to themſelves; and that there is a proneneſs in them to them; and that they would ruſh into them, were they not kept back and reſtrained by the powerful and efficacious grace of God: and it alſo ſuppoſes, that the ſaints cannot keep themſelves; that God only can keep them from evil; and therefore they pray to him that he would, who does keep them by his power, at leaſt from a final and total falling away. Let them not have dominion over me; neither preſumptuous ſins, nor any other, Pſal. cxix. 133. as they ſhall not, Rom. vi. 14. as ſin has over wicked men; and they yield a ready obedience to the laws and luſts of it; it reigns over them as a king and tyrant, even unto death: it is ſomething very powerful in good men; it prevails over them, and carries them captive; wherefore they pray it may not have a continued dominion, as it ſhall not; becauſe they are in another kingdom, and under grace as a governing principle, which reigns through righteouſneſs unto eternal life. Then ſhall I be upright; in heart, and walk uprightly in converſation; being cleanſed from ſecret faults, and kept from notorious crimes, and groſs enormities; and ſhall exerciſe a conſcience void of offence, both to God and man; and be perfect, as the word is ſometimes rendered, at leaſt comparatively; and abſolutely ſo, as waſhed in Chriſt's blood, and juſtified by his righteouſneſs. And I ſhall be innocent from the great tranſgreſſion; which ſome underſtand of pride, others of apoſtaſy; perhaps the ſin againſt the Holy Ghoſt may be intended; though the words may be rendered, from much tranſgreſſion[k]; and the ſenſe is, that he ſhould be cleared and acquitted of a multitude of tranſgreſſions he had been guilty of; or be preſerved from much ſin, which otherwiſe he ſhould have fallen into.

℣. 14. Let the words of my mouth, &c.] Meaning either his ſpeech in common converſation, which ſhould not be filthy and fooliſh, rotten and corrupt; but ſuch as miniſters grace to the hearer; or elſe his addreſs to God, both in prayer and thankſgiving. And the meditation of my heart; his inward thoughts continually revolving in his mind; or his meditation on the word of God and divine things; or mental prayer, which is not expreſſed, only conceived in the mind. Be acceptable in thy ſight; as words and thoughts are, when they are according to the word of God; and as the ſacrifices of prayer, whether vocal or mental, and of praiſe, are through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord. The pſalmiſt, in order to ſtrengthen his faith in God, that he ſhould be heard and anſwered in the petitions he put up, makes uſe of the following epithets: O Lord, my ſtrength, or rock[l], and my Redeemer; who had been the ſtrength of his life, and of his ſalvation, the rock on which he was built and eſtabliſhed, and the Redeemer who had redeemed his life from deſtruction, and out of the hands of all his enemies, and from all his iniquities.

PSALM XX.

To the chief muſician, a pſalm of David.

THIS pſalm is thought, by ſome, to be written by David, on account of himſelf, and as a form to be uſed by the people for him, when he was about to go to war; particularly with the Ammonites and Syrians, 2 Sam. x. 6, 18. mention being made of chariots in it, ℣. 7. of which there was a great number in that war: Arama thinks it was made by him when he got the victory over the Philiſtines; others think it was written by one of the ſingers on David's account, and ſhould be rendered, a pſalm for David, as Pſal. lxxii. and xcii. but rather it is a pſalm concerning David; concerning the Meſſiah, whoſe name is David; or a pſalm of David concerning the Meſſiah, ſince he is expreſsly mentioned, ℣. 6. and Aben Ezra ſays, there are ſome that interpret it of the Meſſiah; and ſome paſſages in it are, by Jewiſh writers[m], applied unto him, as ℣. 6, 9. and our countryman, Mr Ainſworth, ſays, the whole pſalm is a prophecy of Chriſt's ſufferings, and his deliverance out of them, for which the church with him triumpheth. Theodoret takes it to be a prophecy of Sennacherib's invaſion of Judea, and of Rabſhakeh's blaſphemy, and of Hezekiah's diſtreſs and prayer on that account.

℣. 1. The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble, &c.] All the days of Chriſt were days of trouble; he was a brother born for adverſity; a man of ſorrows, and acquainted with griefs; he had his own ſorrows, and he bore the griefs of others; he was perſecuted by Herod in his infancy; he was tempted by Satan in the wilderneſs; he was haraſſed by the ſcribes and Phariſees continually; he was grieved at the hardneſs, impenitence and unbelief, of that perverſe and faithleſs generation of men, and was ſometimes made uneaſy by his own diſciples: at ſome particular ſeaſons his ſoul or ſpirit is ſaid to be troubled, as at the grave of Lazarus, and when in a view of his own death, and when he was about to acquaint his diſciples that one of them ſhould betray him, John xi. 33. and xii. 27. and xiii. 21. but more particularly particularly it was a day of trouble with him, when he was in the garden, heavy, and ſore amazed, and his ſweat was, as it were, drops of blood falling on the ground, and his ſoul was exceeding ſorrowful, even unto death; but more eſpecially this was his caſe, when he hung upon the croſs, and is what ſeems to be principally reſpected here; when he was in great torture of body through the rack of the croſs; when he endured the cruel mockings of men, of the common people, of the chief prieſts, and even of the thieves that ſuffered with him; when he had Satan, and all his principalities and powers, let looſe upon him, and he was grappling with them; when he bore all the ſins of his people, endured the wrath of his Father, and was forſaken by him: now in this day of trouble, both when in the garden and on the croſs, he prayed unto his Father, as he had been uſed to do in other caſes, and at other times; and the church here prays, that God would hear and anſwer him, as he did: he always heard him; he heard him at the grave of Lazarus; he heard him in the garden, and filled his human ſoul with courage and intrepidity, of which there were immediate inſtances; he heard him on the croſs, and helped him as man and Mediator, Iſa. xlix. 8. The name of the God of Jacob defend thee; that is, God himſelf, who is named the God of Jacob, whom Jacob called upon, and truſted in as his God, and who anſwered him in the day of his diſtreſs: Jacob was exerciſed with many troubles, but the Lord delivered him out of them all; and which may be the reaſon why the Lord is addreſſed under this character here; beſides, Iſrael is one of the names of the Meſſiah, Iſa. xlix. 3. on whoſe account the petition is put up; to which may be added, that Jacob may deſign the people of God, the ſpiritual ſons of Jacob, the church of the living God, whoſe God the Lord is; and the phraſe may be here uſed by the church, to encourage her faith in prayer: the petition, on account of the Meſſiah, is, that God would defend him, or ſet him on an high place[n]; or exalt him: he was brought very low in his ſtate of humiliation; he was in the form of a ſervant; he was in a very low and mean condition throughout the whole of his life; through the ſuffering of death he was made lower than the angels, and he was laid in the lower parts of the earth: the church, in this petition, prays for his reſurrection from the dead; for his aſcenſion into the higheſt heavens; for his exaltation at the right hand of God; for the more viſible ſetting him on his throne in his kingdom; in all which ſhe has been anſwered.

[k] רב multa, Montanus, Rivetus, Gejerus, Cocceius; ſo Ainſworth. [l] צורי rupes mea, Muſculus, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Cocceius; mea petra, Pagninus, Montanus, Rivetus; ſo Ainſworth. [m] Shirhaſhirim Rabba, fol. 18. 1, Tzeror Hammor, fol. 44. 2.

℣. 2. Send thee help from the ſanctuary, &c.] Meaning either from the tabernacle, the holy place, where was the ark, the ſymbol of the divine preſence; or rather heaven, the habitation of God's holineſs; unleſs the ſame is meant by it as by Zion, in the next clauſe, the church of God, from whence he ſends the rod of his ſtrength. And ſtrengthen thee out of Zion; and the help and ſtrength prayed for are not to be underſtood of that aſſiſtance and ſupport, which Chriſt, as man, had from his Father, at the time of his ſufferings, which were promiſed him, and he believed he ſhould have, and had, Pſal. lxxxix. 21. Iſa. l. 7, 9. and xlix. 8. ſince theſe petitions follow that which relates to his exaltation; but of the help and ſtrength afforded to the apoſtles and miniſters of Chriſt, after they had received the commiſſion from him to preach the goſpel to every creature; when, as a full anſwer to theſe petitions, God worked with them, greatly aſſiſted them, ſtrengthened them with ſtrength in their ſouls; confirmed the word with ſigns and wonders following; made it the power of God to ſalvation to multitudes; and ſo ſtrengthened the cauſe, intereſt, and kingdom of the Redeemer.

℣. 3. Remember all thy offerings, &c.] The ſpiritual ſacrifices of prayer and praiſe which Chriſt, as the great high-prieſt, offers up for his people; or which they offer by him, and are acceptable to God through him, by virtue of the incenſe of his mediation; or the offering up of himſelf, which anſwers to, and is the body, the ſum and ſubſtance of all the offerings of the law; they were types of this, and what they could not do, this did; and therefore it is expreſſed in the ſingular number in the next clauſe. And accept thy burnt-ſacrifice. Selah. The word rendered accept ſignifies to reduce to aſhes[o]; and the way in which it was known that ſacrifices were acceptable to God, was by fire coming down from heaven upon them and conſuming them, Lev. ix. 24. 1 Chron. xxi. 26. 2 Chron. vii. 1. 1 Kings xviii. 38. and therefore the word is rightly rendered accept; and Chriſt's ſacrifice of himſelf, putting away ſin, and perfecting for ever them that are ſanctified, is of a ſweet ſmelling ſavour to God; for hereby his juſtice is ſatisfied, his law is magnified and made honourable, the ſins of his people are atoned for, their perſons are accepted, and their ſacrifices of prayer and praiſe come up alſo with acceptance to him through the virtue of this ſacrifice; and ſo theſe petitions have their accompliſhment.

℣. 4. Grant thee according to thine own heart, &c.] Which is to ſee his ſeed, the travail of his ſoul, and to have the pleaſure of the Lord proſper in his hand; to have all his people called, preſerved, and glorified. And fulfil all thy counſel; whatever was agreed upon in the council and covenant of peace between him and his Father, relating to his own glory, and the ſalvation of his people.

℣. 5. We will rejoice in thy ſalvation, &c.] That is, ſo will we, &c. or that we may[p], &c. or let us; theſe words, with what follow, point at the end of the church's requeſts, and what ſhe reſolved to do upon the accompliſhment of the above things; for inſtance, ſhe would rejoice in the ſalvation of the Meſſiah; meaning either the ſalvation and deliverance from death and the grave, and all other enemies, which he himſelf is poſſeſſed of, and which enters into, and is the occaſion of the joy of his people; for not his ſufferings and death only, but chiefly his reſurrection from the dead, ſeſſion at God's right hand, and interceſſion for them, cauſe the triumph of faith in him, and further the joy of it, Rom. viii. 33, 34. or elſe the ſalvation he is the author of, which being ſo great, ſo ſuitable, ſo compleat and perfect, and an everlaſting one, is matter of joy to all ſenſible of their need of it, and who have a comfortable hope of intereſt in it. And in the name of our God we will ſet up our banners; either as a preparation for war; ſee Jer. li. 27. ſo when Cæſar[q] ſet up his banner, it was a token to his ſoldiers to run to their arms and prepare to fight; and then the ſenſe is, putting our truſt in the Lord, relying on his ſtrength, and not on our own, own, we will chearfully and courageouſly engage with all his and our enemies, ſin, Satan, and the world; as good ſoldiers of Chriſt, we will endure hardneſs, fight his battles under the banners of the Lord of hoſts, in whoſe ſervice we are enliſted; or as a token of victory, when ſtandards were ſet up, and flags hung out[r]; ſee Jer. l. 2. Exod. xvii. 15. and then the meaning is, Chriſt, the great captain of our ſalvation, having obtained a compleat victory over all enemies, and made us more than conquerors thereby, we will ſet up our banners, hang out the flag, and in his name triumph over ſin, Satan, the world, death and hell. The Lord fulfil all thy petitions; the ſame as in ℣. 4. this is put here to ſhew that the church will be in ſuch a frame as before deſcribed, when the Lord ſhall have fulfilled all the petitions of his Anointed; of which ſhe had a full aſſurance, as appears from the following words.

[n] ישגבך elevet te, Pagninus, Montanus; exaltet te, Vatablus, Muſculus, Michaelis; in edito collocet te, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator; ſo Ainſworth. [o] ידשנה incineret, Pagninus, Montanus, Cocceius; in cinerem vertat, Vatablus; ſo Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Gejerus, Ainſworth. [p] So Ainſworth; נרננה ovemus, Vatablus, Piſcator, Michaelis; cantemus, Gejerus. [q] De Bello Gallico, l. 2. c. 20.

℣. 6. Now know I that the Lord ſaveth his Anointed, &c.] Not David, though he was the anointed of the God of Jacob, and was anointed with material oil to be king of Iſrael by Samuel, at the expreſs order of God himſelf; but David is not here ſpeaking of himſelf, nor the church of him, but of the Meſſiah; anointed by Jehovah king over his holy hill of Zion, with the oil of gladneſs, or the holy Spirit. The church in prayer riſes in her faith, and is ſtrongly aſſured of the ſalvation of the Meſſiah; that though his troubles would be many and great, he ſhould be delivered out of them all; ſhould be heard and helped in the day of ſalvation, and be freed from the ſorrows of death and hell, he ſhould be encompaſſed with; that he ſhould be raiſed from the dead; have all power in heaven and earth given him; aſcend on high and triumph over all his enemies; and all his people, all the members of his body ſhould be ſaved through him, which is in a ſenſe the ſalvation of himſelf. He will hear him from his holy heaven; where his throne and temple are, which is the habitation of his holineſs, whither the prayers of the Meſſiah when on earth aſcended, where they were received, heard, and anſwered. Before the church prays that he might be heard, now ſhe believes he would; and that, With the ſaving ſtrength of his right hand; that is, by the exertion of his mighty power, in ſtrengthening him as man to bear up under his ſorrows, go through his work, and finiſh it; by upholding him with his right hand whilſt engaged in it, and by raiſing him up from the dead with it, and ſetting him down at it in the higheſt heavens.

℣. 7. Some truſt in chariots, and ſome in horſes, &c.] That is, in chariots and horſes prepared for war; which, beſides their uſe for carriage, did great annoyance to the enemy in battle, and were very terrible to them, and were greatly truſted in by thoſe that poſſeſſed them, Deut. xx. 1. Iſa. xxxi. 1. ſuch chariots as were called currus falcati, that had ſcythes at the ſides of them, which being drove with fury among the infantry, cut them down as graſs is mown with ſcythes; ſuch the old Canaanites uſed, which were very terrible, Joſh. xvii. 16. Judg. iv. 3. and horſes trained up for war do much execution in a battle by pawing and trampling; ſee Job xxxix. 21—25. though theſe are vain things for ſafety, and not to be depended on, for ſalvation and victory are of the Lord, Pſal. xxxiii. 17. Prov. xxi. 31. and ſuch are the chariots and horſes of the ſun, and the idols in which the Gentiles truſted, 2 Kings xxiii. 11. Pſalm cxv. 8. and all external things in which men depend for ſalvation, as fleſhly privileges, outward works of righteouſneſs, morality, a profeſſion of religion, a round of duties, &c. all which are diſclaimed by thoſe who know the way of life and ſalvation by Chriſt, Hoſea xiv. 3. But we will remember the name of the Lord our God; not any of the names by which the Lord God is called, as Elohim, El-ſhaddai, Jehovah, and the like; though each of theſe are worthy of remembrance, and greatly ſerve to encourage faith in him; but rather the perfections of God, ſuch as the goodneſs, wiſdom, and power of God, which are to be remembered and confided in; and not the friendſhip of princes, the ſchemes of human policy, and the outward forces of ſtrength; or elſe God himſelf is intended, whoſe name is himſelf, and is a ſtrong tower to the righteous: and to remember him is to bear him in mind, and not forget him; to have the deſires of the ſoul towards him, and to the remembrance of him; and to make mention of him, of his names, attributes, word and works; which is both for his glory and for the encouragement of faith in him, both in ourſelves and others; it is to call upon his name in times of trouble, and at all times, and alſo to truſt in him and not in an arm of fleſh; for it ſtands oppoſed to truſting in chariots and horſes; and it is to call to mind paſt inſtances of his goodneſs, wiſdom and power, and be thankful for them, and make uſe of them to engage confidence in him; and which ſhould be done from the conſideration of his being God and not man, and of his being our God, our covenant-God and Father.

℣. 8. They are brought down and fallen, &c.] Theſe are they that rode in chariots and on horſes, and truſted in them; who are brought down from their places of honour and ſafety; and fall, not into the hands of their enemies, and into a low and mean eſtate, but to the ground by death; as alſo ſuch who, being like Capernaum, lifted up to heaven with their own outward attainments, and think to get thither by them, are brought down to hell, and fall into the pit of corruption. But we are riſen, and ſtand upright; who remember the name of the Lord, and truſt in him; the church is ſometimes in a very low and depreſſed condition; it conſiſts of a poor and an afflicted people, and who are perſecuted by men; ſo the church has been under the heathen Roman emperors, and under the papacy, and will be as long as ſhe is in the wilderneſs, and the witneſſes propheſy in ſackcloth; and eſpecially when they will be ſlain, and their bodies lie on the earth unburied; but theſe ſhall riſe and ſtand upright, and aſcend to heaven; there will be a glorious ſtate of the church; there will be a reviving of the intereſt of Chriſt, through the bringing in the fulneſs and forces of the Gentiles, and the converſion of the Jews; the dry bones will live again, and ſtand upon their feet, an exceeding great army; in thoſe days the righteous will flouriſh and have abundance of peace and proſperity. This may alſo include the firſt reſurrection, which the ſaints will have a part in; the dead in Chriſt will riſe firſt, and will ſtand before the Lord with confidence, and not be aſhamed; when the ungodly ſhall not ſtand in judgment, nor ſinners in the congregation of the righteous; for though theſe words are expreſſed in the preſent tenſe, becauſe of the certainty of them, they belong to future times; hence the following petitions.

℣. 9. Save, Lord, &c.] Not the king, as the Septuagint, Ethiopic, and Arabic verſions read the words, joining the word king to them, which is in the the next clauſe; but this, as Aben Ezra obſerves, is not right, becauſe of the accent athnach, which divides theſe words from the following; rather the word us may be ſupplied; and ſo the Syriac verſion renders it, the Lord will deliver us; and the Targum is, O Lord, פרק לן, redeem us, or ſave us; that is, with a temporal, ſpiritual, and eternal ſalvation: this petition is directed to Jehovah the Father, as the following is to the King Meſſiah. Let the king hear us when we call; for not God the Father is here meant, though he is an everlaſting King, the King of kings; and who hears his people, when they call upon him, and while they are calling; yet he is rarely, if ever, called the King, without any other additional epithet; whereas the Meſſiah often is, as in the next pſalm, ℣. 1, 7. and xlv. 1. and prayer is made to him, and he hears and receives the prayers of his people; and, as Mediator, preſents them to his Father perfumed with his much incenſe; for he is a Prieſt as well as a King.

[r] Schindler. Pentaglott. col. 1126.

PSALM XXI.

To the chief muſician, a pſalm of David.

THIS pſalm was either written by David; and therefore called a pſalm of David; or it was written, as it may be rendered, for David, by ſome other perſon, on account of his victories and triumphs; or rather, concerning David [s]; that is, concerning the Meſſiah, the Son of David, as Kimchi ſays, ſome expound it; or concerning the Meſſiah, who is called David, Ezek. xxxvii. 24, 25. and Jarchi obſerves, that their Rabbins interpret it of the Meſſiah; but, ſays he, it is right to explain it, moreover, of David himſelf, for an anſwer to the heretics (chriſtians) who err in it; and various paſſages in this pſalm are by the Jewiſh writers underſtood of the Meſſiah; as the King, in ℣. 1, 7. is in the Targum called the King Meſſiah; ℣. 4. is in the Talmud applied [t] to him, ℣. 3, 5. are in Zohar [u], and in the Midraſhes [w], interpreted of him; and many chriſtian writers underſtand the whole of him; which is right: though Theodoret thinks it was penned on the account of the health of king Hezekiah, and his reſtoration from his diſeaſe; which is not likely.

℣. 1. The king ſhall joy in thy ſtrength, O Lord, &c.] Either in that ſtrength which is in Jehovah himſelf, in whom is everlaſting ſtrength; and which is ſeen in the works of creation and providence, and is the ſame in Chriſt himſelf, as he is the mighty God; or elſe in the ſtrength which Jehovah communicated to Chriſt as man, whereby he was ſtrengthned in his human nature, to go thro', and complete the work of man's redemption; or in the ſtrength which the Lord puts forth, and the power which he exerts towards, and upon his people, in converſion; which is the produce of the exceeding greatneſs of his power; and in ſtrengthning them, from time to time, to exerciſe grace, diſcharge duty, and withſtand temptations and ſin; and in keeping them ſafe to the end; in ſupporting them under all their trials, and in carrying on and finiſhing the work of faith upon their ſouls; all which is matter of joy to Chriſt. And in thy ſalvation how greatly ſhall he rejoice? meaning either his own ſalvation by the Lord, from all his ſorrows and troubles, and out of the hands of all enemies, being in the preſence of God, where is fulneſs of joy, Pſal. xvi. 9—11. or elſe the ſalvation of his people by him, which Jehovah appointed them to, ſecured for them in the covenant of grace, ſent Chriſt to work out for them, applies by his Spirit, and at laſt puts into the full poſſeſſion of; Chriſt rejoices at the effectual vocation and converſion of his people, when ſalvation is brought near unto them; and eſpecially at their glorification, when they ſhall be in the full enjoyment of it; then will they be his joy, and crown of rejoicing: this is the joy that was ſet before him, which made him go ſo chearfully through his ſufferings and death for them, Heb. xii. 2. the reaſons of this joy are, becauſe of the great love he bears to them; the intereſt and property he has in them; his undertakings for them, as their ſurety, to bring them ſafe to glory; his purchaſe of them by his blood; his interceſſion for them, that they might be with him to behold his glory; and laſt of all, becauſe of his Father's glory, his own glory, and the glory of the bleſſed Spirit, which are concerned in the ſalvation of theſe perſons.

℣. 2. Thou haſt given him his heart's deſire, &c.] Which the church had prayed for in Pſal. xx. 4. whatever Chriſt's heart deſired, or his lips requeſted, has been given him. And haſt not withholden the requeſt of his lips. Selah. whatever he aſked in the council and covenant of peace was granted; he aſked for all the elect, as his ſpouſe and bride; theſe were the deſire of his heart and eyes, and they were given him; he aſked for all the bleſſings of grace for them, and all grace was given to them in him; he aſked for glory, for eternal life, and it was promiſed him; and not only the promiſe of it was put into his hand, but the thing itſelf; ſee Pſalm ii. 8. 2 Tim. i. 1, 9. 1 John v. 11. and Pſal. xx. 4. whatever he requeſted of his Father, when here on earth, was granted; he always heard him; that memorable prayer of his in John xvii. is heard and anſwered, both in what reſpects himſelf, his own glorification, and the converſion, ſanctification, union, preſervation, and glorification of his people; whatever he now deſires and requeſts in heaven, as the advocate and interceſſor for his ſaints, is ever fulfilled; which is an inſtance of the great regard Jehovah has unto him, and may be conſidered as a reaſon of his joy in him.

℣. 3. For thou preventeſt him with the bleſſings of goodneſs, &c.] Not temporal, but ſpiritual bleſſings, which ſpring from the grace and goodneſs of God, and conſiſt of it; and relate to the ſpiritual and eternal welfare of thoſe for whoſe ſake he receives them, and who are bleſſed with them in him: his being prevented with them, denotes the freeneſs of the donation of them; that before he could well aſk for them, or before he had done requeſting them, they were given him; and alſo the earlineſs of the gift of them, they were put into his hands before before his incarnation, before he was manifeſt in the fleſh, even from the foundation of the world, and before the world began, Eph. i. 3, 4. 2 Tim. i. 9. and likewiſe the order in which they were given; firſt to Chriſt, and then to his people in him, as the paſſages referred to ſhew. Thou ſetteſt a crown of pure gold on his head; which is expreſſive of his victory over all enemies, ſin, Satan, and the world, death and hell; and of his being poſſeſſed of his throne and kingdom; and has reſpect to his exaltation at the right hand of God, where he is crowned with glory and honour: and this crown being of pure gold, denotes the purity, glory, ſolidity, and perpetuity of his kingdom; this is a crown, not which believers put upon him by believing in him, and aſcribing the glory of their ſalvation to him, or what the church, called his mother, has crowned him with, Cant. iii. 11. but which his Father put upon him, who has ſet him King over his holy hill of Zion, Pſal. ii. 6. and viii. 5. compare with this Rev. xiv. 14. The Septuagint and Vulgate Latin verſions read a crown of a precious ſtone; and ſo Apollinarius; and ſeem to refer to the crown ſet on David's head, which had precious ſtones in it, 2 Sam. xii. 30. Joſephus [x] ſays it had a ſardonyx. Fortunatus Scacchus [y] fancies the topaz is meant, and that the Hebrew text ſhould be read a crown of topaz; miſtaking the ſenſe of the word phaz, which never ſignifies a topaz, but the beſt gold, pure, ſolid gold.

[s] לדוד pro Davide, vel de Davide, Vatablus. [t] T. Bab. Succah, fol. 52. 1. vid. Nachman. diſput. cum fratre Paulo, p 36. Ed. Wagenſeil. [u] In Num. fol. 68. 3. 4. [w] Midraſh Tillim apud Viccarſ. in loc. & in Galatin. l. 3. c. 9. Bemidbar Rabba, fol. 212. 4 & 218. 1.

℣. 4. He aſked life of thee, and thou gaveſt it him, &c.] Both for himſelf, as man, when he was about to die, that he might be raiſed to life again, which was granted him; and for his people, that they might live ſpiritually and eternally, and accordingly life is given to him for them; and he has power to give it to as many as the Father has given him, John xvii. 2. Even length of days for ever and ever; the life he has for himſelf as man is what will ever continue; he will die no more, death will have no more dominion over him; he will live for evermore, and that to make interceſſion for his members, Rom. vi. 9, 16. Rev. i. 18. Heb. vii. 25. and the life which is granted them at his requeſt is an everlaſting one, both as to body and ſoul; for though they die as other men, they ſhall live again in the reſurrection of the juſt, and never die more, but ſhall be like the angels in heaven; and as for the ſecond death, that ſhall not hurt them, nor have any power over them; they will live and reign with Chriſt for ever.

℣. 5. His glory is great in thy ſalvation, &c.] That is, the glory of the king Meſſiah is great in the Lord's ſalvation of him; delivering him from all his troubles and ſorrows, and out of the hands of all his enemies, when he was raiſed from the dead, and was ſet at the right hand of God, and crowned with glory and honour: or the ſenſe is, that his glory is great in the ſalvation of his people by him; it was his glory as mediator to be appointed to be the Lord's ſalvation to them; and it being effected by him declares the glory and greatneſs of his perſon; and the nature of it is ſuch as cannot fail of bringing glory to him; and ſuch is the ſenſe his people have of it, that it obliges them to aſcribe the glory of it alone to him. Honour and majeſty haſt thou laid upon him; which is to be underſtood not of the honour and majeſty of his divine nature, which are eſſential to him, and not laid upon him by any; nor of the glory which the ſaints attribute to him on account of their ſalvation by him; but of that which his Father has put upon him, and lies in the introduction of him into his glory after his ſufferings, and death, and reſurrection from the dead; in exalting him at his right hand above all creatures and things; in giving him all power in heaven and in earth; in putting all the gifts of the Spirit into his hands, which he receiving gave to men, and in ordaining him judge of quick and dead.

℣. 6. For thou haſt made him moſt bleſſed for ever, &c.] Not as God, for as ſuch he is over all bleſſed for ever, and not made ſo; but as man and mediator: the words may be rendered, thou haſt ſet him to be bleſſings for ever [z]; which deſign the bleſſings which are laid up in Chriſt for his people, and which he imparts unto them, and they are bleſſed with in him; ſo that he is made a bleſſing, or rather bleſſings to them; ſuch as redemption to free them from bondage, righteouſneſs to juſtify them, ſanctification to make them holy, wiſdom to direct and guide them, and ſtrength to aſſiſt and ſupport them; through whom they have the forgiveneſs of ſins, by whom they have peace with God, and from whom they receive all their joy and comfort, and at laſt eternal life and happineſs; and all theſe are for ever, they are irreverſible bleſſings, are never repented of, nor taken away: or this bleſſedneſs may be underſtood of that which Chriſt himſelf enjoys as man; which lies in his human nature being exalted to union with the Son of God; in being heard and helped in the day of ſalvation; in being raiſed from the dead and glory given him; in being ſet at God's right hand, angels, authorities and powers being ſubject to him, and in ſeeing the travail of his ſoul with ſatisfaction: the particular inſtance of his bleſſedneſs follows. Thou haſt made him exceeding glad with thy countenance; the glorious preſence of God in heaven; Chriſt having done his work on earth aſcended to heaven, where he was received by his Father with a chearful countenance, was made to ſit down on the ſame throne with him, being well-pleaſed with his obedience, righteouſneſs, and ſacrifice; and being now in the preſence of God, in which is fulneſs of joy, and at his right hand, where are pleaſures for evermore, the human nature of Chriſt is filled with an exceſs of joy; the words may be rendered, thou haſt made or wilt make him glad with joy [a], with thy countenance; ſee Pſal. xvi. 11. Acts ii. 28.

℣. 7. For the king truſteth in the Lord, &c.] That is, the king Meſſiah, as the Targum paraphraſes it; he truſted in the Lord for his ſupport and ſuſtenance as man, for aſſiſtance and help in his time of trouble, and for deliverance out of it; he truſted in the Lord that he would hear him for himſelf and for his people; and that he would glorify him with all glory, honour, majeſty, and bleſſedneſs before ſpoken of; ſee Pſal. xxii. 8, 9, 10. Iſa. l. 7, 9. John xiii. 31, 32. And through the mercy of the moſt High, he ſhall not be moved; God the Father is the moſt High; Chriſt is called the Son of the Higheſt, and the Spirit the power of the Higheſt, Luke i. 32, 35. there is mercy with him, which is a ground of hope and truſt, in his people, and alſo in the Meſſiah; ſee Pſal. lxxxix. 28. and ſome verſions make the mercy of the moſt High to be what the king Meſſiah truſts in, reading the words [b], for the [x] Antiq. l. 7. c. 7. ſ. 5. [y] Eleochriſm. Sacr. l. 3. c. 40. p. 1003. [z] תשיתהו ברכות poſuiſti vel pones eum benedictiones, Pagninus, Montanus, Vatablus; ſo Ainſworth, Cocceius, Gejerus. [a] תחדהו בשמחה lætificabis eum in lætitia, Pagninus, Montanus, Michaelis; ſo Junius & Tremellius, Gejerus. [b] So Genebrard, Muis.

the king truſteth in the Lord, and in the mercy of the moſt High; but the accent athnach, which diſtinguiſhes the propoſitions, will not admit of it; but the ſenſe is, that becauſe of the mercy, grace, goodneſs, and faithfulneſs of God in making and keeping his promiſes, Chriſt would not be and was not moved from his truſt and confidence in the Lord; nor ſhall he ever be removed from his throne of glory on which he ſits; nor from the glorious and happy ſtate in which he is: nor will it ever be in the power of his enemies to diſplace him; for theſe in time will be deſtroyed by him, as the following words ſhew.

℣. 8. Thine hand ſhall find out all thine enemies, &c.] The Jews, that would not have him to reign over them, who crucified him and perſecuted his apoſtles; the Gentiles, who were alſo concerned in his death; the Roman emperors, who perſecuted the chriſtians, and are ſignified by the red dragon that waited to devour the man-child when brought forth by the woman, the church, Rev. xii. 3, 4. and alſo the papiſts, the followers of the man of ſin, who oppoſe Chriſt in his offices and grace, and are the enemies of his witneſſes, and of his intereſt; and beſides theſe there are many profeſſors of religion who are enemies to Chriſt, either doctrinally or practically; to whom may be added, the devil and his angels, and all thoſe who are the children of him and are influenced by him: theſe the hand of Chriſt will find out ſooner or later; for the words are an addreſs to the king Meſſiah, who being omniſcient knows where all his enemies are, and where to find them; and being omnipotent he will lay hold upon them, and hold them, and none ſhall eſcape from him; his hand of vengeance ſhall fall upon them, and he ſhall inflict righteous and deſerved puniſhment on them; and this ſhall be the caſe of all of them, none will be able to hide themſelves in ſecret places from him. This has been in part verified in the Jewiſh nation at the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, when wrath came upon that people to the uttermoſt for their treatment of the Meſſiah; and in the pagan empire, when it was demoliſhed, and kings and great men in vain called to the rocks and mountains to hide them from the wrath of the Lamb, Rev. vi. 15, 16, 17. and will have a farther accompliſhment in the antichriſtian ſtates and kingdoms, when the vials of God's wrath ſhall be poured out upon them; and eſpecially at the battle of Armageddon, when Chriſt will avenge himſelf, and get rid of all his enemies at once; and will have its final accompliſhment in all wicked men and devils at the day of judgment, when all Chriſt's enemies will be found out by him, whether open or ſecret, and receive their juſt puniſhment. Thy right hand ſhall find out thoſe that hate thee; this is the ſame with the former clauſe, and is repeated for the farther certainty and greater confirmation of the thing; and the right hand is mentioned as expreſſive of the mighty power of the Lord. The Chaldee paraphraſe renders it, the vengeance of thy right hand.

℣. 9. Thou ſhalt make them as a fiery oven, &c.] Some think the alluſion is to David's cauſing the Ammonites to paſs through the brick-kiln, 2 Sam. xii. 31. others to the burning of Sodom and Gomorrah: it repreſents what a ſevere puniſhment ſhall be inflicted on the enemies of Chriſt; they ſhall be caſt into a fiery oven, or furnace of fire, as Shadrach, Meſhach, and Abednego, were by the order of Nebuchadnezzar; ſo ſome render the words, thou ſhalt put them into a fiery oven, ב as being put for ב into [c]: wicked men are as dry trees, as ſtubble, as thorns or briers, and are fit fuel for a fiery oven or furnace; by which is meant the wrath and fury of God, which is poured forth as fire; and this has had its fulfilment in part in the Jews at Jeruſalem's deſtruction; when that day of the Lord burned like an oven, and the proud and haughty Jews, and who dealt wickedly by Chriſt, were burned up in it, Mal. iv. 1. and will have an additional accompliſhment, when the whore of Babylon ſhall be burnt with fire; and when the beaſt and falſe prophet ſhall be caſt alive into a lake of fire burning with brimſtone; and ſtill more fully at the general conflagration, when will be the perdition of ungodly men, and the earth and all that is therein ſhall be burnt up; and eſpecially when all wicked men and devils ſhall be caſt into the lake and furnace of fire, where will be weeping, wailing, and gnaſhing of teeth; ſee Rev. xvii. 16. and xix. 20. and xx. 10—15. Matt. xiii. 41, 42. and xxv. 41. 2 Pet. iii. 7, 10, 12. This will be in the time of thine anger, or of thy countenance [d]; not his gracious, but his angry countenance; when he ſhall put on a fierce look, and appear as the lion of the tribe of Judah, and ſtir up all his wrath. The Lord ſhall ſwallow them up in his wrath: not that they ſhall be annihilated; their ſouls remain after death, and their bodies after the reſurrection, and will be tormented with the fire of God's wrath for ever and ever; the phraſe is expreſſive of utter ruin, of the deſtruction of ſoul and body in hell; ſee Pſal. xxxv. 25. Jarchi takes it to be a prayer, may the Lord ſwallow them up, &c. and the fire ſhall devour them; that is, as the Targum paraphraſes it, the fire of hell; or, however, it deſigns the wrath of God, who is a conſuming fire; or that fiery indignation of his, which ſhall devour the adverſaries; which comes down upon them either in temporal judgments here, or in their everlaſting deſtruction hereafter.

℣. 10. Their fruit ſhalt thou deſtroy from the earth, &c.] Meaning the offſpring of wicked men; the fruit of the womb, Pſal. cxxvii. 3. the ſame with their ſeed in the next clauſe; and their ſeed from among the children of men; ſee Pſal. xxxvii. 28. which muſt be underſtood of ſuch of their ſeed and offſpring as are as they were when born; are never renewed and ſanctified, but are like their parents; as the Jews were, their parents were vipers, and they were ſerpents, the generation of them; and were the children of the devil, and did his works: now theſe paſſages had their accompliſhment in the Jews, when the day of God's wrath burnt them up, and left them neither root nor branch, Mal. iv. 1. and in the Pagan empire, when every mountain and iſland were moved out of their places, and the heathen periſhed out of the land, Rev. vi. 14. Pſal. x. 16. and will be further accompliſhed, when the Lord ſhall puniſh the wicked woman Jezebel, the antichriſtian harlot, and kill her children with death, Rev. ii. 23. See Pſal. civ. 35.

℣. 11. For they intended evil againſt thee, &c.] All evil, whether in thought or deed, if not immediately and directly, yet is ultimately againſt the Lord, whoſe law is tranſgreſſed, and who is deſpiſed and reflected upon as a lawgiver; all ſin is an hoſtility committed againſt God, or againſt Chriſt, againſt the Lord and his anointed, or againſt his people, who are all one as himſelf: the intention

[c] Vide Aben Ezram in loc. Junius & Tremellius; ſo Michaelis.

[d] פנ׳ך vultus tui, V. L. ſo Sept. Æthiop, Gejerus, Muis, Ainſworth; faciei iratæ tuæ, intention of evil is evil, and is cognizable by the Lord, and puniſhable by him; They imagined a miſchievous device, which they are not able to perform: not the death of Chriſt; that was indeed in itſelf a miſchievous device of theirs, but that they performed, though they had not their end in it; they expected his name would then periſh, and they ſhould hear no more of him: but rather, it reſpects his reſurrection from the dead, they could not prevent, though they took all imaginable care that there might be no ſhew of it; and when they found he was really raiſed from the dead, they contrived a wicked ſcheme to ſtop the credit of it, but in vain, Matt. xxvii. 63—66. xxviii. 12, 13, 14. and Jews and Gentiles and Papiſts, have formed ſchemes and done all they can to root the goſpel, cauſe, and intereſt of Chriſt out of the world, but have not been able to perform it

℣. 12. Therefore ſhalt thou make them turn their back, &c.] Or flee and run away to private places, to hide themſelves from the wrath of God and of the Lamb, though to no purpoſe; or make them turn behind thy back: God will turn his back upon them, and be negligent and careleſs of them, and not regard them when they cry in their miſery and deſtruction. Some Jewiſh interpreters [e] underſtand it of their being put together on one ſide, in one corner, and be ſeparate from the people of God; to which ſenſe the Targum inclines, rendering the word for back the ſhoulder, which ſometimes ſignifies unanimity and conjunction, Zeph. iii. 9. and thus being all together by themſelves, the wrath of God ſhall be poured forth upon them, and they ſhall be deſtroyed at once: ſo the chriſtians were, by the providence of God, brought out of Jeruſalem before its deſtruction; and the ſaints will be called out of Babylon before its fall; and the goats, the wicked, will be ſeparated from the righteous, and ſet together at Chriſt's left hand; for they ſhall not ſtand in the congregation of the righteous: but the beſt ſenſe of the words is, thou ſhalt ſet them for a butt or [f] heap; or, as it is in the Hebrew text, a ſhoulder; a butt to ſhoot at being ſo called, becauſe it is earth heaped up like a ſhoulder; ſee Job xvi. 12, 13. and to this agrees what follows: when thou ſhalt make ready thine arrows upon thy ſtrings againſt the face of them; that is, direct the arrows of his wrath and vengeance right againſt them; ſee Pſal. vii. 11—13.

℣. 13. Be thou exalted, Lord, in thine own ſtrength, &c.] Exert thy ſtrength, diſplay thy power in ſuch manner, that thou mayſt be exalted and magnified on account of it. This was fulfilled at the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, when the kingdom of God came with power, Mark ix. 1. and will be again when Babylon ſhall be utterly deſtroyed, becauſe the Lord is ſtrong who judgeth her, Rev. xviii. 8. and finally at the day of judgment, when the wicked will be puniſhed with everlaſting deſtruction from the preſence of the Lord, and the glory of his power, 2 Theſſ. i. 9. So will we ſing and praiſe thy power; forms of ſuch ſongs of praiſe may be ſeen, as Cocceius obſerves, in Rev. xi. 15—18. and xv. 3, 4. and xix. 1, 2—7. at the ſounding of the ſeventh trumpet, at the victory over the beaſt, and his image, and at the deſtruction of Babylon.

PSALM XXII.

To the chief muſician upon Aijeleth Shahar, a pſalm of David.

THE only thing obſervable in the title of this pſalm, is the ſenſe of the words Aijeleth Shahar, left untranſlated; which, according to ſome of the Jewiſh [g] interpreters, is the name of a muſical inſtrument; to which our verſion inclines; and a learned Jew [h] ſays, it is the inſtrument which the mourning women uſed on account of diſtreſs, which was ſudden, not known till it came, as a man does not think of the morning till he ſees it. Aijeleth with him has the ſignification of mourning, as Eli in Joel i. 8. and Shahar, as in Iſai. xlvii. 11. and Hoſ. x. 15. ſo אלית and אלייה are uſed in the Miſnah [i] for a mourning woman; and with others, it is the beginning of a ſong to the tune of which the pſalm was ſet [k]: but I rather think the words expreſs the ſubject-matter of the pſalm, and that they may be beſt rendered, concerning Aijeleth Shahar; which ſignify either according to the Chaldee paraphraſe, the daily morning-ſacrifice; or, as ſome Jewiſh writers [l] obſerve, the morning-ſtar; or, according to the Septuagint, the morning-help [m]; or rather, the morning-hind, or bind of the morning: but who ſhould be deſigned hereby is the queſtion. The Jews would have any rather than the Meſſiah; ſome ſay Eſther [n], who ſo ſeaſonably and readily appeared for the Jews in diſtreſs, and was the means of their deliverance; but there is not one word in the pſalm that agrees with her; and there are ſome things which were manifeſtly ſpoken of a man, and not a woman, ℣. 8, 24. others ſay David, [o] when he fled from Saul, or, as others, from Abſalom: but the diſjointing the bones of this perſon, the piercing his hands and feet, parting his garments, and caſting lots on his veſture, mentioned in ℣. 14, 16, 18. were never fulfilled in him. Others [p] would have the congregation of Iſrael in captivity intended; but it is plain that a ſingle perſon is ſpoken of throughout; and he is manifeſtly diſtinguiſhed from others, from his brethren, from the congregation, from the ſeed of Jacob and Iſrael, ℣. 22, 23. and, indeed, no other than the Meſſiah can be meant: and of this there ought to be no doubt with chriſtians, when ℣. 1. is compared with Matt. xxvii. 46. ℣. 8. with Matt. xxvii. 43. ℣. 18. with Matt. xxvii. 35. ℣. 22. with Heb. ii. 12. and the Jews themſelves ſometimes ſay, that by Aijeleth Shahar, is meant the Shekinah [q], or the divine Majeſty; and in what way ſoever theſe words are rendered, they agree with Chriſt: he is the antitype of the daily morning-ſacrifice, the Lamb of God, who continually takes away the ſin of the world; and very fitly is he ſo called in the title of a pſalm, which ſpeaks ſo much of his ſufferings and death, which which are a propitiatory ſacrifice for the ſins of his people; he is the bright and morning ſtar, Rev. xxii. 16. the day-ſpring from on high, the ſun of righteouſneſs, and light of the world; he had morning-help in his very infancy, when his life was ſought for by Herod; and had early and ſeaſonable help and aſſiſtance in the acceptable time, and in the day of ſalvation, and early in the morning was he raiſed from the dead, and had glory given him: but as the words are better rendered the morning-hind, this ſuits with Chriſt, who is frequently compared to a roe or a young hart, Cant. ii. 9, 17. and viii. 14. and he may be compared to a hind for its lovingneſs to its mate and young, Prov. v. 19. the love of Chriſt to his church and people being very ſtrong and affectionate, and paſſing knowledge; and alſo for its lovelineſs and goodlineſs, Gen. xlix. 21. Chriſt being exceeding amiable and lovely, and fairer than the children of men; likewiſe for its gentleneſs and harmleſsneſs, Chriſt being meek and lowly, holy and harmleſs; and for its antipathy to ſerpents, there being an enmity between Chriſt, the ſeed of the woman, and the ſerpent and his ſeed; for its being hunted by dogs, as Chriſt was by Herod, by the ſcribes and Phariſees, by Judas, and the band of ſoldiers; ſee ℣. 16. of this pſalm; for its being fit for food, Deut. xiv. 5. and as it is ſaid to be the fitter for being hunted, Chriſt's fleſh being meat indeed, and the more ſuitable to faith, as being ſacrificed for us; and for its long life it is ſaid to have, Chriſt, though once dead, being alive again, and living for evermore; to which may be added its great ſwiftneſs, expreſſive of the readineſs of Chriſt to comply with his Father's propoſals and do his will; to come into this world in the fullneſs of time, and ſet about the work he came to do; to deliver up himſelf into the hands of his enemies, and lay down his life for his people; and of his haſte to help them in diſtreſs, and viſit them with his gracious preſence, and to appear a ſecond time to them unto ſalvation. He may be called the hind of the morning, looking lovely and beautiful as the morning, and ſwift and chearful as the hind when it riſes from its reſt, and runs its courſe; or, becauſe of his being hunted in the morning of his infancy by Herod; or becauſe it was early in the morning, the chief prieſts conſulted to take away his life; and as early alſo he roſe from the dead, when God made his feet like hinds feet, and ſet him on his high places, Pſal. xviii. 33. The ancient chriſtian writers generally underſtood it of Chriſt wholly. Juſtin Martyr [r] ſays, the whole pſalm is ſpoken of Chriſt; and Tertullian obſerves [s], that it contains the whole paſſion, or all the ſufferings of Chriſt. The late Monſieur Fourmont [t] the elder, profeſſor of the oriental languages in the univerſity of Paris, has a very ſingular notion, that this pſalm was written by Jeremiah, when he was drawn up from the dungeon, and is a hiſtory of his life and ſufferings, in which he was a type of Chriſt.

[e] Kimchi & Ben Melech in loc. [f] חשיתמו שכם ponis eos metam, Cocceius; humerum, Pagninus, Montanus, Gejerus; velut tumulum, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator. [g] Jarchi, Kimchi & Abendana in loc. [h] Leo Mutinenſ. Shilte Hagibborim, fol. 5 1. [i] Miſn. Celim, c. 15.6. & 16.7. & Maimon. & Bartenora in ib. [k] Aben Ezra in loc. [l] Vide Kimchium & Abendanam in loc. [m] So Menachem in Jarchi, and others in Kimchi & Abendana in loc. [n] R. R. in Jarchi in loc. [o] In Kimchi in loc. [p] Kimchi & Ben Melech in loc. [q] Zohar in Lev. fol. 5.4. & Imre Binah in ib.

℣. 1. My God, my God, &c.] God is the God of Chriſt as he is man; he prepared a body for him, an human nature; anointed it with the oil of gladneſs; ſupported it under all its ſorrows and ſufferings, and at laſt exalted it at his own right hand: and Chriſt behaved towards him as his covenant-God; prayed to him, believed in him, loved him, and was obedient to him as ſuch; and here expreſſes his faith of intereſt in him, when he hid his face from him, on account of which he expoſtulates with him thus, why haſt thou forſaken me? which is to be underſtood, not as if the hypoſtatical or perſonal union of the divine and human natures were diſſolved, or that the one was now ſeparated from the other; for the fullneſs of the Godhead ſtill dwelt bodily in him; nor that he ceaſed to be the object of the Father's love; for ſo he was in the midſt of all his ſufferings, yea, his Father loved him becauſe he laid down his life for the ſheep; nor, that the principle of joy and comfort was loſt in him, only the act and ſenſe of it; he was now deprived of the gracious preſence of God, of the manifeſtations of his love to his human ſoul, and had a ſenſe of divine wrath, not for his own ſins, but for the ſins of his people, and was for a while deſtitute of help and comfort; all which were neceſſary in order to make ſatisfaction for ſin: for as he had the ſins of his people imputed to him, he muſt bear the whole puniſhment of them, which is twofold, the puniſhment of loſs and the puniſhment of ſenſe; the former lies in a deprivation of the divine preſence, and the latter in a ſenſe of divine wrath, and both Chriſt ſuſtained as the ſurety of his people. This expoſtulation is made not as ignorant of the reaſon of it; he knew that as he was wounded and bruiſed for the ſins of his people, he was deſerted on the ſame account; nor as impatient, for he was a mirror of patience in all his ſufferings; and much leſs as in deſpair; for in theſe very words, he ſtrongly expreſſes and repeats his faith of intereſt in God; ſee ℣. 8. and alſo Iſai. l. 6, 7, 9. But this is done to ſet forth the greatneſs and bitterneſs of his ſufferings; that not only men hid their faces from him, and the ſun in the firmament withdrew its light and heat from him, but, what was moſt grievous of all, his God departed from him. From hence it appears that he was truly man, had an human ſoul, and endured ſorrows and ſufferings in it; and this may be of uſe to his members, to expect the hidings of God's face, though on another account; and to teach them to wait patiently for him, and to truſt in the Lord, and ſtay themſelves upon their God, even while they walk in darkneſs and ſee no light. Why art thou ſo far from helping me? or from my ſalvation; from ſaving and delivering him out of his ſorrows and ſufferings? not that he deſpaired of help; he firmly believed he ſhould have it, and accordingly had it: but he expoſtulates about the deferring of it. He adds, and from the words of my roaring? which expreſſes the vehemency of his ſpirit in crying to God, the exceeding greatneſs of his ſorrows, and his excruciating pains and ſufferings: this is what the apoſtle means by his ſtrong crying and tears, Heb. v. 7. or the words of my roaring are far from my ſalvation; there is a great ſpace or interval between the one and the other, as Guſſetius [u] obſerves.

℣. 2. O my God, I cry in the day-time, &c.] In the time of his ſuffering on the croſs, which was in the day-time: But thou hearеſt me not; and yet he was always heard, John xi. 41, 42. though he was not ſaved from dying, yet he was quickly delivered from the power of death, and ſo was heard in that he feared, Heb. v. 7. And in the night-ſeaſon; in the night in which he was in the garden, ſorrowing and praying, the night in which he was betrayed

[r] Dialog. cum Tryphone, p. 325.
[s] Adv. Judæos, c. 10.
[t] In hunc Pſalm. M. S. penes me, fol. 8, 9.
[u] Comment. Ebr. p. 788.

trayed and was apprehended; and though the natural deſires of his human ſoul were not heard and anſwered, that the cup might paſs from him, yet his prayer in ſubmiſſion to the will of God was: moreover, the day-time and night ſeaſon, may deſign the inceſſant and continual prayer of Chriſt; he prayed always, night and day: and am not ſilent; but continue to pray, though as yet ſeemingly not heard and anſwered; or there is no ſilence to me [w]; that is, no reſt from ſorrow and pain; or no likeneſs to me [x], there are none like me, no ſorrow like my ſorrow, as in Lam. i. 12.

℣. 3. But thou art holy, &c.] Which may be conſidered either as an argument with his God, why he ſhould hear and anſwer him, ſince he is holy, juſt and faithful; he has promiſed, when any call upon him in a day of trouble, he will hear and anſwer them, and will be glorified by them; this Chriſt did, and therefore pleads his faithfulneſs to his promiſe: or rather, a reaſon quieting him under divine deſertion, and a ſenſe of divine wrath; that God was righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works; and that whereas he was the ſurety of his people, and had all their ſins on him, it was perfectly agreeable to the holineſs and juſtice of God to treat him in the manner he did; yea it was done to declare his righteouſneſs, that he might appear to be juſt, whilſt he is the juſtifier of him that believes in him. O thou that inhabiteſt the praiſes of Iſrael; either the place where Iſrael offered the ſacrifices of praiſe to God, the tabernacle or temple, the houſe of prayer and praiſe in which Jehovah dwelt: or the true Iſrael of God praiſing him, who are formed for himſelf, and called by his grace to ſhew forth his praiſes; among whom he takes up his reſidence: or elſe the praiſes themſelves; and ſo the phraſe denotes God's gracious acceptance of them, and well-pleaſedneſs in them, ſignified by his inhabiting of them, and the frequent and conſtant aſcription of them to him: and perhaps reſpect may be had chiefly to the praiſes of his people for providing ſuch a Saviour for them, ſending him in the fullneſs of time, and not ſparing him, but delivering him up into the hands of juſtice and death for them; and for giving all things freely with him.

℣. 4. Our fathers truſted in thee, &c.] By whom are meant Abraham, Iſaac and Jacob, from whom our Lord deſcended; and the people of Iſrael when in Egypt, in the times of the Judges, and in all ages before the coming of Chriſt, of whom, as concerning the fleſh, or as to his human nature, Chriſt came, Rom. ix. 5. theſe, as they were ſojourners, and went from place to place, eſpecially the patriarchs, and were often in trouble and diſtreſs, when they called upon the Lord, looked to him, and put their truſt and confidence in him; not in themſelves, their own wiſdom, riches and ſtrength, nor in others, in any mere creature, nor in any outward thing, or arm of fleſh, but in the Lord Jehovah, in whom is everlaſting ſtrength; they believed in the power of God, that he was able to help and deliver them, and they had faith in him that he would; they depended upon his word and promiſe, and were perſuaded he would never ſuffer his faithfulneſs to fail; they committed themſelves to the Lord, and ſtayed themſelves upon him. They truſted; this is repeated not only for the ſake of emphaſis, pointing out ſomething remarkable and commendable, and for the greater certainty of it, more ſtrongly confirming it; or to obſerve the many that put their truſt in the Lord, the numerous inſtances of confidence in him; but alſo to denote the conſtancy and continuance of their faith, they truſted in the Lord at all times. And thou didſt deliver them; out of the hands of all their enemies, and out of all their ſorrows and afflictions; inſtances of which we have in the patriarchs, and in the people of Iſrael when brought out of Egypt, and through the Red ſea and wilderneſs, and in the times of the Judges, when they were diſtreſſed by their neighbours, and God ſent them a deliverer time after time.

℣. 5. They cried unto thee, and were delivered, &c.] As the Iſraelites did in Egyptian bondage, and as they in after times did when in diſtreſs; ſee Exod. ii. 23. Pſal. cvii. 6, 13, &c. The crying is to be underſtood of prayer to God, and ſometimes deſigns mental prayer, ſighing and groaning, which cannot be uttered, when no voice is heard, as in Moſes, Exod. xiv. 15. but oftener vocal prayer, put up in times of diſtreſs, and denotes the vehemency of trouble, and eagerneſs of deſire to be heard and relieved; and this cry was from faith, it followed upon and was accompanied with truſting in the Lord; it was the prayer of faith, which is effectual and availeth much, and iſſued in deliverance. They truſted in thee, and were not confounded; or aſhamed; neither of the object of their truſt, the living God, as thoſe who truſt in graven images; ſo Moab was aſhamed of Chemoſh, Jer. xlviii. 13. nor of their hope and truſt in him, it being ſuch as makes not aſhamed, Pſal. cxix. 116. Rom. v. 5. nor of the conſequences of it; when men truſt in any thing and it fails them, and they have not what they expect by it, they are filled with ſhame and confuſion, Iſa. xxx. 2. but they that truſt in the Lord are never confounded, or made aſhamed; their expectations do not periſh: now Chriſt mentions this caſe of his anceſtors as a reaſon of the praiſes of Iſrael, which they offered up to God for deliverances, and which he inhabited, ℣. 3. as alſo by way of encouragement to himſelf in his preſent circumſtances, that though the Lord was at a diſtance from him, and ſeemed not to regard him and his cries, yet that he would deliver him; and likewiſe as an argument with God that he would do ſo, ſince it had been his wonted way and method with his fathers before; moreover he may take notice of it in order to repreſent his own forlorn, uncomfortable and deplorable condition, which was abundantly worſe than theirs, and the reverſe of it, as it ſeemed at preſent.

