THE

PREFACE.

THE great apoſtle of the Gentiles aſſures us, that all ſcripture is given by inſpiration of God[a]; which ſaying of his, as it ſtands in an Epiſtle, ſuppoſed to be the laſt he wrote, may be thought to reſpect the greater part of the New Teſtament, which muſt be then written, as well as is true of what was written after; and eſpecially it includes, and may chiefly refer to all the books of the Old Teſtament. And whereas what I now publiſh, and have propoſed to publiſh, will compleat my Expoſition of the whole Bible, it will not be improper to ſay ſomewhat of the inſpiration of the ſacred ſcriptures, and of the proof and evidence of it. That God could, if he would, make known his mind and will to men in ſuch a way, no one can doubt, who believes that God is the maker of the bodies and ſouls of men, of the organs of the body, and of the faculties of the ſoul, and therefore can, if he pleaſes, operate upon them in ſuch a manner as to raiſe right and proper ideas of things in the brain, and to convey to the mind what he thinks fit to make known unto it, and to continue it on it, and direct and aſſiſt in writing it, that it may remain. And indeed it is certain, that God in ſome inſtances did communicate his mind and will to men before the written word was, either in a viſion, or by a dream, or by an articulate voice, or by an impulſe of ſpirit making ſtrong impreſſions on the mind, as his appearances to, and diſcourſes with the patriarchs, ſhew, as with Adam, Noah, Abraham, and others; ſee Gen. xx. 3. Job iv. 16, 17, and xxxii. 8. and xxxiii. 14, 15, 16. Numb. xii. 6, 7. Moreover, divine inſpiration has never been thought unreaſonable nor incredible among the heathens; perſons of different profeſſions have laid claim to it in the performance of any great and uncommon undertakings of theirs, to give the greater credit and ſanction to them. The prieſts and prieſteſſes of the ſeveral Gentile oracles gave out, that they delivered their oracles, being divinely inſpired; the poets, when they began any large and arduous work, expected divine inſpiration, and invoked Apollo, and the Muſes, to aſſiſt them in it; Orpheus, Heſiod, Homer, and others affirmed what they learnt and publiſhed was by divine inſpiration[b]; and indeed Cicero ſays[c], no man was ever a great man without ſome divine afflatus. People of almoſt all nations, religions and intereſts have pretended to have books among them which came from God, or that the authors of them were inſpired by him, and which they have attended to as the rule of their civil, moral and religious conduct. Numa Pompilius declared to the Roman people, that he had a converſation with the goddeſs Egeria, from whom he received his body of laws[d]; and ſo Lycurgus, Zaleucus, and others, made the like pretences; and who has not heard of the books of the Sibyls? whoſe name in the ſignification of it carries in it the counſel, mind and will of God[e], which they were ſuppoſed to be made acquainted with, and to publiſh; and whoſe writings, reſponſes and ſayings were thought to be under divine inſpiration[f]. The Egyptians had, in great veneration, the books of Taaut, or Hermes Triſmegiſtus, as a rule to them in things civil and ſacred[g]; and the Chineſe have the writings of Confucius in the ſame eſteem as we have the ſacred ſcriptures[h]: ſo the Perſians had the books of Zoroaſtres, particularly that which they call Zend or Zendeveſta; and which the Magians have the ſame reſpect for as we have for our bible[i]. The Indian Brachmans report in their hiſtories, that the book of their law, which they call Caſter, was delivered by God on a mountain out of a cloud to Bremavius, and that he alſo gave to Brammon another book of laws in the firſt age of the world [k]; and at this day the Turks have their Al-koran, or the Scripture, as they call it, which they believe is from heaven, and is the foundation of their religion. Now, tho' theſe are ſatanical deceptions, yet they ſeem to be forged in imitation of the ſacred writings, and ſerve to confirm the notion and neceſſity of inſpiration, and to ſhew the common ſenſe of mankind about it. And indeed, conſidering the wiſdom and goodneſs of God, and the depraved ſtate and condition of men, it ſeems abſolutely neceſſary, that there ſhould be a revelation of his mind and will in ſome ſuch manner; otherwiſe they muſt have been left without the true knowledge of God, and in danger of going into Polytheiſm, as it is certain many without it have; and ſuch as had any knowledge of him, glorified him not as God [l]. Now it is not reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that God would leave all mankind in ſuch a ſtate and condition, whoſe chief end is to glorify him. Without a revelation, men muſt have been ignorant of the true worſhip of God, and the mode of it; and however juſt and reaſonable it might be judged by them, that God ſhould be worſhipped, yet they could never have formed of themſelves a plan of worſhip that could be acceptable to him; and eſpecially that part of worſhip muſt have for ever been unknown to them, which depends upon the arbitrary will of God, and conſiſts of poſitive precepts and inſtitutions: and hence it is that the heathens, deſtitute of divine revelation, have gone into the moſt abſurd and ridiculous modes of worſhip, as well as have groſsly betrayed their weakneſs and ignorance; wherefore, ſays the Apoſtle, whom ye ignorantly worſhip, him declare I unto you [m]. And indeed, they muſt have been not only ſtrangers to the external form of worſhip, and more ſo to truly ſpiritual and devotional ſervices; but even to the duties of morality, the contrary to which many of the heathen philoſophers have given into, as fornication, polygamy, community of wives, inceſt, unnatural luſts, the uſe of obſcene words, ſuicide, and private revenge. Some of them indeed are ſaid to be ſenſible of the depravity of human nature, and of the diſeaſe it labours under; but then they were altogether ignorant of the way of its cure, or whether it ever would be cured. They lamented the miſt and darkneſs that were about them, but were at a loſs for the manner, means and method of the removal of it. Socrates is made to ſay, "it was neceſſary to wait till ſome one teaches us how we ſhould "behave towards God and man:" [n] and yet this, the relater of it, who travelled into the eaſt, might have picked up and borrowed from the Jews, he met with there; and beſides, he does not appear to have any clear knowledge of the perſon that was to be the inſtructor, nor of the ways and means he ſhould make uſe of to bring men to true knowledge and happineſs. Men may, by the light of nature, be convinced, that they have ſinned, and by ſinning have angred God, and incenſed him againſt them, who muſt be appeaſed; but then of the way in which this is to be done, they are quite ignorant: hence men deſtitute of divine revelation have introduced the moſt abſurd, ſhocking, impious and deteſtable methods of reconciling God to them, and of recommending themſelves to him, that could be thought of. A man ſenſible that he is a ſinner from a general notion of the mercy of God, and from ſome particular inſtances of his goodneſs to him, may fancy and entertain ſome faint hope that God will pardon him; but without a divine revelation he cannot be certain of it, and even that God will pardon ſin at all, the ſin of any man: nor can he have any notion of the way and method in which God can do it conſiſtent with his holineſs and juſtice; ſo that without a revelation a ſinner is left under the load of guilt, and in black deſpair, having no well-grounded hope of a remedy. To which may be added, that it may be eaſily diſcerned, that if God had not favoured men with a divine revelation, they would have been in doubt, as the heathens were, about the immortality of the ſoul; and left without hope of the reſurrection of the dead, and with very confuſed and uncertain notions of a future ſtate, and altogether ignorant of the way of life and ſalvation, all which are clearly revealed in the ſacred ſcriptures: upon the whole, it ſeems abſolutely neceſſary in the preſent ſtate of things, we ſhould have an infallible rule of faith and practice to apply and appeal unto, and try doctrines and duties by, in caſes of doubt and difficulty, that we may not be at a loſs about theſe things; and ſuch a rule can only be given us of God: yea, the knowledge of divine things which Adam himſelf had in a ſtate of innocence, was by inſpiration; what knowledge he had of God, of his mind and will, of the worſhip of him, and of his own ſalvation, was by divine revelation; and even the moral law of God was inſpired into his heart, and written upon it, or he would not have had ſuch certain and diſtinct knowledge of it; and eſpecially he could not have known any thing of the poſitive law of God, to abſtain from the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, without a revelation; and if man, in ſuch a ſtate, ſtood in need of it, then much more man in his fallen ſtate. That the ſcripture is θεοπνευστος, inſpired of God, or is his breath, and comes from him, may be evinced by the following obſervations.

I. The

[k] Huet. Alnetan. Quæſt. l. 2. c. 12. §. 19.
[l] Rom. i. 21, 22, 23.
[m] Acts xvii. 23.
[n] Plato in Alcibiad. 2, c. 11.

I. The ſubject-matter of the ſcriptures, or the things contained in them, are ſuch as could never come from any other but God, and are ſuch as are entirely worthy of him; whereas all other writings before obſerved, pretended to come from him, are full of contradiction and falſhood, and contain in them things abſurd, indecent and unworthy of God, quite ſcandalous, as well as contrary to right reaſon. —— 1. Some paſt facts recorded in the ſacred writings could never have been known, had not God revealed them; as the creation of all things out of nothing, the original of mankind, who were the firſt parents of men, when and how made, and in what form and order all things were created; hence, without this guide, men have entertained ſtrange and extravagant notions about theſe things: nay, the ſcriptures inform us what was done in eternity, which God himſelf could only reveal and make known to men, as the council of peace between the divine perſons concerning the ſalvation of men; the ſcheme of it formed, and agreed upon among them; the choice of perſons in Chriſt unto it before the foundation of the world; the donation of the bleſſings of grace to them in him, before the world began; the covenant of grace made with Chriſt on their behalf from eternity; the ſetting up of Chriſt as the mediator of it from everlaſting, or ever the earth was; and his goings forth in it ſo early, becoming a ſurety for them, repreſenting their perſons, and taking care of them, and of all bleſſings and promiſes of grace made unto them; all which could not have been known without a revelation from God himſelf. —— 2. There are ſome things recorded in the ſcriptures as future, which God only could foreknow would be, and foretel ſhould be, and which have accordingly come to paſs, which ſhows the revelation of them to be of God. Some of them relate to particular perſons and contingent events; as the prophecy of the birth of Joſiah by name, and of what he ſhould do, and which was delivered out between three and four hundred years before he was born; and of Cyrus alſo by name, and what ſhould be done by him, and this predicted upwards of two hundred years before his birth. Others relate to kingdoms and nations, what ſhould befal them, and the utter deſtruction of them, as the Egyptians, Moabites, Edomites, Aſſyrians, Babylonians, and others, which now are no more, as was foretold; and eſpecially to the Jews, to their deſcent into Egypt, and coming from thence; their ſeveral captivities and return from them; their many afflictions and diſtreſſes, and their preſent ſtate and circumſtances; all which are juſt as they are deſcribed in the ſacred writings: but above all, the many prophecies concerning Chriſt deſerve regard; as of his birth of a virgin, the place of his birth, and the exact time of his coming into the world, the miracles done by him, his ſufferings and death, and the ſeveral minute circumſtances thereof; of his reſurrection from the dead, aſcenſion to heaven, and ſeſſion at the right-hand of God; together with other prophecies concerning the calling of the Gentiles, the abolition of paganiſm in the Roman empire, and the riſe and power of Antichriſt; which prove, beyond all contradiction, the divine inſpiration of the ſcriptures. —— 3. There are other things in them, which, though not contrary to reaſon, yet are above the capacity of men ever to have made a diſcovery of; as the Trinity of perſons in the God-head, the eternal generation of the Son of God, his myſterious incarnation, the union of the two natures, divine and human, in his perſon; the regeneration of men by the Spirit of God, and the manner of his operations on the ſouls of men, and the reſurrection of the ſame body at the laſt day. — 4. The things contained in them are holy, and becoming the purity and holineſs of God, from whom they come; and they are truly called γραφαι αγιαι, holy ſcriptures [b]: there are in them none of the impurities which are in the Pagan Theogony, which is full of the murders, thefts and adulteries of their deities, nor of the carnal and ſenſual gratifications, and unclean luſts promiſed and allowed in the Al-koran of Mahomet. The matter of them is holy; the truths they inculcate, and the precepts they enjoin, are holy; the doctrines of them are according to godlineſs, and teach men to deny ungodlineſs and worldly luſts, and to live ſoberly, righteouſly and godly; the commands in them require nothing but what is agreeable to the perfections of God, nor any thing but what is for the good of men; they forbid whatſoever is evil, diſcover and ſtrike at all ſorts of ſin in men, and condemn them: and hence it may be obſerved in favour of the ſcriptures being of God, that in natural men, whoſe carnal minds are enmity to God, there is ſuch a backwardneſs, and even an averſion to the reading of them. The manner in which they are written, or the ſtyle of them, is pure, holy, chaſte and clean, free from all levity and obſcenity, and from every thing that may be offenſive to the ear of the chaſte and pious: to prevent this, there are remarkable inſtances in the marginal readings of ſome paſſages in the Hebrew text; and care ſhould be taken in all tranſlations, to make uſe of language neat and pure.

II. The writers or penmen of the ſcriptures were ſuch as plainly make it appear, that what they wrote were not of themſelves, but that they ſpake and wrote as they were moved by the Holy Ghoſt. For, 1. though they were men that lived in different ages of the world, and in different parts of it, and were of different intereſts and capacities, and in different conditions and circumſtances, yet they are all of the ſame ſentiment; they ſpeak and write the ſame things, deliver out the ſame doctrines and truths, enjoin the ſame moral duties of religion, and the ſame poſitive precepts, according to the different diſpenſations under which they were, and relate the ſame hiſtorical facts: there are no contradictions to one another, no jar nor diſcord between them, but all uniform, and of a piece; what ſeeming contradictions may be obſerved, are eaſily reconciled with a little care, diligence and ſtudy; and ſome of theſe ariſe from the careleſſneſs of the tranſcribers, putting one word or letter for another; and even thoſe inſtances are but few, and not very material, and which never affect any article of faith or practice; ſuch care has divine Providence taken of theſe peculiar and important writings. — 2. Many of the writers of the ſcriptures were men of no education, and in a low ſtation of life, being taken from the flock or herd, or from their nets, or other mean employments; and what they wrote, both as to matter and manner, were above and beyond their ordinary capacities, and therefore muſt be of God. — 3. As they were holy men, and of good morals, ſo they appear to be plain, honeſt, faithful and diſintereſted men, that ſought not popular applauſe, nor worldly wealth, neither to aggrandize themſelves, nor their families; but on the contrary expoſed themſelves to poverty, vexation and trouble, yea, to perſecution and death itſelf, which they never would have done, had they not been fully ſatisfied they were ſent of God, and inſpired by him. Take Moſes for an inſtance and example; he was a holy good man, meek and modeſt beyond all others; as untainted in his life and converſation, as perhaps ever any man was; and what blemiſhes were in his conduct, he was not careful to conceal, as none of the inſpired writers were; not even the blemiſhes of his family, of his more remote anceſtor Levi in the affair of the Shechemites, and of the illegal marriage of his immediate parents, his father with his own aunt; and, on the contrary, ſays not a word of the learning and wiſdom he was brought up in; nor of his honour and grandeur in Pharaoh's court; nor of his warlike exploits, recorded by Joſephus and other writers: he ſought not to make himſelf and family great; for though he was at the head of the Jewiſh nation as their civil governor, yet he was not ſolicitous to have any of his poſterity to ſucceed him in his office; and though the prieſthood was conferred on Aaron his brother, and his ſons, yet no other proviſion was made for the tribe he was of, nor of his family in particular, than to attend the common and lower ſervices of the tabernacle; nay, when it was offered to him by the Lord to make his family a great nation, and cut off the reſt of the people, he refuſed it more than once, preferring the public good of Iſrael to his private advantage: and though ſuch was his great affection for and cloſe attachment to that people, yet he ſpares them not, nor conceals their ill carriage and behaviour, both to God and himſelf; and which may be obſerved in all the inſpired writers in after-ages, that though they were their own nation, they ſpared them not, but ſharply reproved them for their rebellion, obſtinacy and idolatry, and publiſhed the ſame; whereas it is uſual with hiſtorians to conceal the faults of their own people and favourite nations, the ſubject of their hiſtory. In ſhort, the writers of the ſcriptures ſeem to be men that neither could be impoſed upon themſelves, nor ſought to impoſe on others; nor would it have been eaſy, had they been bad men, for them to have ſucceeded, had they attempted it.

III. The many and wonderful effects the ſacred writings, attended with a divine power and influence, have had upon the hearts and lives of men, ſhew them to be of God; how many thouſands and millions by reading the ſcriptures, or hearing them explained, have been converted from a vicious life, and from error, ſuperſtition and idolatry, to embrace and profeſs the truth, and to live a holy life and converſation; and ſome of theſe, men of great natural parts and learning, as Juſtin Martyr, Origen, and others. This word of God, in the hand of the divine Spirit, is quick and powerful, ſharper than a two-edged ſword; it pierces and penetrates into the ſecret receſſes of the heart, and lays open the ſecrets of it; it is the means of enlightening the mind, quickening the ſoul, regenerating and ſanctifying the heart, and of producing faith, and every other grace there; of ſtrengthening, comforting and reviving the ſpirits of the people of God, when in diſtreſs by afflictions, or ſatan's temptations. It is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and for inſtruction in righteouſneſs, and is indeed the power of God unto ſalvation; all which it would not be, were it not of God: ſo that every good man has a teſtimony within himſelf of the divinity of the holy ſcriptures; the Spirit of God witneſſes to his ſpirit the truth of them.

IV. The teſtimony bore to the ſcriptures, and to the veracity of them, and to the miſſion of the writers of them, by miracles, abundantly confirms the genuineneſs of them, and that they are by inſpiration of God; ſuch as thoſe done by Moſes more eſpecially, and by other prophets of the Old Teſtament, and by the apoſtles of the New; even ſuch as exceed the laws of nature, and are above the power of a creature to perform, and which only Omnipotence itſelf could work; now theſe God would never do to eſtabliſh the character of impoſtors, or to confirm a lye.

V. To theſe might be added, in favour of the divine inſpiration of the ſcriptures, the authoritative manner in which they are expreſſed, not aſking, but requiring the acceptance of them, and aſſent unto them, coming with the power and authority of Jehovah himſelf, and in his name, with a Thus ſaith the Lord; the force and energy of which are felt by men, and which commands reverence of them, and attention to them; the figures uſed to excite hereunto are inimitable by creatures, and ſuch as it would be daring and preſumptuous for any to make uſe of, and which only become the moſt high God, with whom is terrible majeſty; as Hear, O heavens, and I will ſpeak, &c. Deut. xxxii. 1. Iſ. i. 2. with which agrees,

VI. The ſublimity of their ſtile, which is ſuch as exceeds all other writings. Longinus, an heathen writer, in his treatiſe on the Sublime, admired ſome paſſages in them, particularly Gen. i. 3. That early compoſition, the book of Job, is full of ſuch ſtrong figures and lofty expreſſions as are not to be found in any human writings, and eſpecially the ſpeeches Jehovah himſelf delivered out of the whirlwind, ch. xxxviii, xxxix, xl, and xli. The book of Pſalms is full of bright figures, and of inimitable language; take, for example, Pſ. xviii. 7—15. and xxix. 3—10. and cxiii. 3—8. cxxxix. 7—12. The prophecies of Iſaiah are fraught with a rich treaſure of divine elocution, which ſurpaſſes all that is to be obſerved in human writings; and which is remarkable, that in ſome of the inſpired writers, who have been bred in a ruſtic manner, are found ſome of the moſt grand images, the moſt lively pictureſques, and higheſt flights of language, as particularly in Amos the herdman, ch. iv. 13. and ix. 2—6. And yet,

VII. There is a moſt amazing perſpicuity in the ſacred writings, beyond any to be found in human compoſures; according to a common obſervation, though there are in them ſuch depths that an elephant may ſwim, yet ſuch ſhallows that a lamb may wade in them; that is, though there is enough to exerciſe the talents of men of the greateſt capacities to ſearch into, and find out the things contained therein, yet what are eſſential to ſalvation, or neceſſary to be known by men with reſpect to their faith and practice, are clear, and plain, and eaſy to be underſtood by an enlightened mind, though otherwiſe of the meaneſt capacity. This divine book contains in it intereſting things to perſons of every rank and claſs, of every different capacity, of every age and ſex: it is written for the uſe of all ſorts, men, women and children, and therefore the main and eſſential things in it are written in ſuch a manner as to be underſtood by them all: thus Timothy from a child knew the holy ſcriptures, 2 Tim. iii. 15. and herein the wiſdom of God is wonderfully diſplayed, and is a plain mark of the divinity of them: to which may be added,

VIII. The long continuance and wonderful preſervation of them, notwithſtanding the hatred of men to them, the attempts of the moſt fierce and powerful perſecutors to extirpate them, is very remarkable; and the malice of ſatan againſt them, ſhown not only in tempting men not to read them, but in ſtirring up others to corrupt and deſtroy them, is no inconſiderable evidence of their being divinely inſpired. For were they of men, there would not have been ſuch an hatred of them, and ſuch an oppoſition to them; and by this are to be known the ſpirit of truth, and the ſpirit of error; ſuch that ſpeak of the world, and in a mere worldly and human manner, the world hears them, receives and applauds them; but they that ſpeak of God, and under a divine influence, are not heard, but are diſapproved of, rejected and deſpiſed, even whatever they ſay or write, 1 John iv. 5, 6. and if theſe writings were of ſatan, or the work of forgery, impoſture and deceit, that wicked ſpirit would never have ſhewn ſuch deſpite unto them, nor have taken ſo much pains to prevail upon men not to read them, and to perſuade them to uſe their utmoſt efforts to extirpate them; wherefore it remains that they muſt be of God, who has in a moſt wonderful manner preſerved them, ſome of them, ſome thouſands of years, when other writings are loſt and periſhed.

IX. The awful judgments of God on ſuch who have deſpiſed them, and have endeavoured to root them out of the world, deſerve regard, and are an evident teſtimony of the divine authority of them. Inſtances of Antiochus Epiphanes king of Syria, and Diocleſian the Roman emperor, may ſuffice for many others; the firſt of theſe cut to pieces the copies of the book of the law wherever he found them, and burnt them, and put to death all with whom they were, and who obſerved them, 1 Maccab. i. 59, 60. the hand of God, and his diſpleaſure againſt him was very remarkable in his death; he died of a violent diſorder in his bowels, his body was covered with worms, his fleſh flaked off, and was attended with an intolerable ſtench, 1 Maccab. vi. 8. 2 Maccab. ix. 5, 9. The latter, Diocleſian, by an edict, ordered all the ſacred books to be burnt [p], that if poſſible he might root out chriſtianity from the world. This tyrant and perſecutor lived in continual fear of thunder, and his palace was burnt down with lightening [q]; and becauſe he could could not accompliſh his deſign to deſtroy the chriſtian religion by burning the ſacred books, through madneſs and deſpair, in the height of his imperial glory, he abdicated the empire, and retired to a private life [r], and at laſt poiſoned himſelf [s]; the one ſhewed deſpite to the books of the Old Teſtament, the other more eſpecially to the books of the New; and both were highly reſented by the Divine Being, who appears hereby to be the author of them.

X. The venerable antiquity of the ſacred writings is worthy of notice with reſpect to their authority; the books of Moſes particularly being more antient than any prophane writings, by many hundred years: the moſt early of that ſort extant, are the poems of Homer and Heſiod, who yet were no earlier than the times of Iſaiah the prophet: nor is the teſtimony of the Jewiſh ſynagogue to the books of the Old Teſtament, and of the chriſtians to thoſe of both New and Old, to be diſregarded; the catalogues of Melito [t], as to the Old Teſtament, and Origen [u], as to both Teſtaments, and that of Joſephus [w] with reſpect to the former, agree with the preſent canon.

XI. The inſpiration pleaded for extends to all the books of the ſacred ſcripture, and to all the writers of them, and principal ſpeakers introduced in them; and though all that is contained in them is not of God, or inſpired by him, as the quotations from heathen writers, the words of ſatan, the ſpeeches of bad men, and even of good men, in which ſome things not right are ſaid of God, as by Job and his three friends; yet the writers of the books, in which theſe ſayings are, were under a divine impulſe, inſpiration and direction to commit theſe ſeveral things to writing, partly for the truth of hiſtorical facts, and partly to ſhew the malice of devils and wicked men, as well as the weakneſſes and frailties of good men, and all are for our caution and inſtruction. And ſo in the hiſtorical books, though there are many things that ſome of the writers of them were eye and ear-witneſſes of, and could from their knowledge and memory record them, and others they might take from diaries, journals and annals of former times; yet in all theſe they were directed by the impulſe and inſpiration of the unerring Spirit of God, what to leave out, and what to take and inſert in their writings, and tranſmit to poſterity; ſo that in all they wrote, they may be truly ſaid to be divinely inſpired.

XII. Some think this inſpiration only furniſhed the ſacred writers with matter, and gave them general ideas of things, and left them to clothe them with their own words, and to uſe their own ſtile, and which they think accounts for the difference of ſtile to be obſerved in them: but if this was the caſe; as it ſometimes is, that men have clear and ſatisfactory ideas of things in their own minds, and yet are at a loſs for proper words to expreſs and convey the ſenſe of them to others, ſo it might be with the ſacred writers; and then we ſhould be left at an uncertainty about the real ſenſe of the Holy Spirit, if not led into a wrong one. It is beſt therefore to ſuppoſe that words, as well as matter, were given by inſpiration; and as for the difference of ſtile, as it was eaſy with God to direct to the uſe of proper words, ſo he could accommodate himſelf to the ſtile ſuch perſons were wont to uſe, and which was ſuitable to them, to their genius and circumſtances.

XIII. The authenticity of each book is obſerved in the argument thereof in the following work, ſo far as may be ſatisfactory to chriſtians, taken from quotations out of them in the New Teſtament, and from the general reception of them into the canon of ſcripture, by the church in all ages. The five books of Moſes are an hiſtory, reaching from the creation of the world to the coming of the Iſraelites to the borders of the land of Canaan, whoſe lineage, travels, and things appertaining to them, are chiefly treated of throughout the whole. The hiſtorical books, from thence to the end of the books of Chronicles, give an account of the ſame people under their judges and kings, to the time of the Babyloniſh captivity; and the reſt of the hiſtorical books, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Eſther, treat of their affairs at, and after their return from captivity, ſo far as the ſcripture-account goes, even unto the times of Ahaſuerus king of Perſia. The poetical books are a treaſure of truths, moral, ſpiritual and evangelical, which cannot fail of yielding pleaſure and profit to all good men.

As I have in the preface to the Expoſition of the books of the prophets, and eſpecially of thoſe of the New Teſtament, given an account of Jewiſh writers and their writings, made uſe of by me, I have no need to ſay any more concerning them, ſince what are uſed in this part of the Expoſition are chiefly the ſame. I have only the pleaſure to obſerve to the Encouragers of this work, that my copy of the whole is compleatly finiſhed; and therefore ſhould the wiſe and ſovereign Diſpoſer of all things think fit to remove me into another world, before the publication of the whole, they may expect to have a perfect work delivered out to them; which I humbly commit to the bleſſing of God, to make uſe of, for ſuch purpoſes as he ſhall in his wiſdom and goodneſs ſee meet and proper.

The First Book of Moses called GENESIS.

THIS book in the Hebrew copies of the Bible, and by the Jewish writers, is generally called Bereshith, which signifies in the beginning, being the first word of it; as the other four books of Moses are also called from their initial words. In the Syriac and Arabic versions, the title of this book is the book of the creation, because it begins with an account of the creation of all things; and is such an account, and so good an one, as is not to be met with any where else: the Greek version calls it Genesis, and so we and other versions from thence; and that because it treats of the generation of all things, of the heavens, and the earth, and all that are in them, and of the genealogy of men: it treats of the first men, of the patriarchs before the flood, and after it to the times of Joseph. It is called the first book of Moses, because there are four more that follow; the name the Jewish Rabbins give to the whole is חמשה חומשי תורה the five fifths of the law, to which the Greek word pentateuch answers; by which we commonly call these books, they being but one volume, consisting of five parts, of which this is the first. And that they were all wrote by Moses is generally believed by Jews and Christians. Some atheistical persons have suggested the contrary; our countryman Hobbes [a] would have it, that these books are called his, not from his being the author of them, but from his being the subject of them; not because they were written by him, but because they treat of him: but certain it is that Moses both wrote them, and was read, as he was in the Jewish synagogues, every sabbath-day, which can relate to no other writings but these, John i. 45. and v. 46, 47. Acts xv. 21. And Spinosa catching at some doubts raised by Aben Ezra on Deut. i. 1. concerning some passages which seemed to him to have been added by another hand, forms objections against Moses being the author of the book of Genesis; which are sufficiently answered by Carpzovius [b]. Nor can Ezra be the author of the pentateuch, as Spinosa suspects; since it is plain these writings were in being before his time, in the times of Josiah, Amaziah, yea of David, and also of Joshua, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 14. xxv. 4. 1 Kings ii. 3. Josh. viii. 34. nay, they are even referred to in the book of Ezra as the writings of Moses, Ezra iii. 2. and vi. 18. to which may be added in proof of the same, Deut. xxxi. 9, 24. Nor are there any other writings of his authentic; what are ascribed to him, as the Analepsis of Moses, his Apocalypse, and his Last Will and Testament, are apocryphal. That this book of Genesis particularly was written by him, is evident from the testimony of Philip, and even of our Lord Jesus Christ, who both testify that he wrote concerning the Messiah, John i. 45. and v. 46. as he did in this book, where he speaks of him as the seed of the woman that should break the serpent's head; as the seed of Abraham, in whom all the nations of the earth should be blessed; and as the Shiloh, to whom the gathering of the people should be, Gen. iii. 15. and xxii. 18. and xlix. 10. Nor is there any reason to believe that he wrote this book from the annals of the patriarchs, since it does not appear, nor is it very probable that they had any; nor from traditions delivered down from one to another, from father to son, which is more probable, considering the length of the lives of the patriarchs: but yet such a variety of particulars respecting times, places, persons, their genealogies and circumstances, so nicely and exactly given, can scarcely be thought to be the fruit of memory; and much less is it to be imagined that he was assisted in it by Gabriel, when he lived in solitude in Midian: but it is best of all to ascribe it to divine inspiration, as all scripture is by the apostle, 2 Tim. iii. 16. for who else but God could have informed him of the creation, and the manner and order in which every creature was brought into being, with a multitude of things recorded in this book? the design of which is to lead men into the knowledge and worship of the one true God, the creator of all things, and of the origin of mankind, the fall of our first parents, and their posterity in them; and to point at the means and method of the recovery of man by the Messiah, the promised seed; and to give an account of the state and case of the church of God, in the times of the patriarchs, both before and after the flood, from Adam in the line of Seth, to Noah; and from Noah to the times of Joseph, in whose death it ends: and, according to bishop Usher [c], it contains an history of two thousand, three hundred and sixty-nine years.

CHAP. I.

THIS chapter contains an account of the creation of the univerſe, and all things in it; aſſerts the creation of the heaven and earth in general, and deſcribes the ſtate and condition of the earth in its firſt production, ℣. 1, 2. and then proceeds to declare the work of each of the ſix days of creation, and to give an account of light, its ſeparation from darkneſs, and the names of both, the work of the firſt day, ℣. 3, 4, 5. of the firmament, its uſe and name, the work of the ſecond day, ℣. 6, 7, 8. of the appearance of the earth, and the production of graſs, herbs and trees in the earth, the work of the third day, ℣. 9, 10, 11, 12, 13. of the ſun, moon and ſtars, their ſituation and uſe, the work of the fourth day, ℣. 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19. of the fowls of the air, and the fiſhes of the ſea, the work of the fifth day, ℣. 19, 20, 21, 22, 23. of all kinds of cattle, and beaſts, and creeping things, ℣. 24, 25. and then of man, created male and female, after the image of God, having a grant of dominion over the reſt of the creatures, the fruit of divine conſultation, ℣. 26, 27, 28. and of a proviſion of food for man and beaſt, ℣. 29, 30. And the chapter is concluded with a ſurvey God took of all his works, and his approbation of them; all which were the work of the ſixth day, and cloſes the account of the creation in that ſpace of time, ℣. 31.

℣. 1. In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth.] By the heaven ſome underſtand the ſupreme heaven, the heaven of heavens, the habitation of God, and of the holy angels; and this being made perfect at once, no mention is after made of it, as of the earth; and it is ſuppoſed that the angels were at this time created, ſince they were preſent at the laying of the foundation of the earth, Job xxxviii. 6, 7. but rather the lower and viſible heavens are meant, at leaſt are not excluded, that is, the ſubſtance of them; as yet being imperfect and unadorned; the expanſe not yet made, or the æther and air not yet ſtretched out; nor any light placed in them, or adorned with the ſun, moon and ſtars: ſo the earth is to be underſtood, not of that properly ſo called, as ſeparated from the waters, that is, the dry land afterwards made to appear; but the whole maſs of earth and water before their ſeparation, and when in their unformed and unadorned ſtate, deſcribed in the next verſe: in ſhort, theſe words repreſent the viſible heavens, and the terraqueous globe in their chaotic ſtate, as they were firſt brought into being by almighty power. The ה prefixed to both words, is, as Aben Ezra obſerves, expreſſive of notification or demonſtration, as pointing at thoſe heavens, and this earth; and ſhews that things viſible are here ſpoken of, whatever is above us, or below us to be ſeen: for in the Arabic language, as he alſo obſerves, the word for heaven comes from one which ſignifies high or above [a]; as that for earth from one that ſignifies low and beneath, or under [b]. Now it was the matter or ſubſtance of theſe that was firſt created; for the word את ſet before them, ſignifies ſubſtance, as both Aben Ezra and [c] Kimchi affirm. Maimonides [d] obſerves, that this particle, according to their wiſe men, is the ſame as with; and then the ſenſe is, God created with the heavens whatſoever are in the heavens, and with the earth whatſoever are in the earth; that is, the ſubſtance of all things in them; or all things in them were ſeminally together: for ſo he illuſtrates it by an huſbandman ſowing ſeeds of divers kinds in the earth, at one and the ſame time; ſome of which come up after one day, and ſome after two days, and ſome after three days, though all ſown together. Theſe are ſaid to be created, that is, to be made out of nothing; for what pre-exiſtent matter to this chaos could there be out of which they could be formed? And the apoſtle ſays, thro' faith we underſtand that the worlds were framed by the word of God, ſo that things which are ſeen were not made of things which do appear, Heb. xi. 3. And though this word is ſometimes uſed, and even in this chapter, of the production of creatures out of pre-exiſtent matter, as in ℣. 21, 27. yet, as Nachmanides obſerves, there is not in the holy language any word but this here uſed, by which is ſignified the bringing any thing into being out of nothing; and many of the Jewiſh interpreters, as Aben Ezra, underſtand by creation here, a production of ſomething into being out of nothing; and Kimchi ſays [e], that creation, is a making ſome new thing, and a bringing ſomething out of nothing: and it deſerves notice, that this word is only uſed of God; and creation muſt be the work of God, for none but an almighty power could produce ſomething out of nothing. The word uſed is Elohim, which ſome derive from another, which ſignifies power, creation being an act of almighty power: but it is rather to be derived from the root in the Arabic language, which ſignifies to worſhip [f], God being the object of all religious worſhip and adoration; and very properly does Moſes make uſe of this appellation here, to teach us, that he who is the creator of the heavens and the earth, is the ſole object of worſhip; as he was of the worſhip of the Jewiſh nation, at the head of which Moſes was. It is in the plural number, and being joined to a verb of the ſingular, is thought by many to be deſigned to point unto us the myſtery of a plurality, or trinity of perſons in the unity of the divine eſſence: but whether or no this is ſufficient to ſupport that doctrine, which is to be eſtabliſhed without it; yet there is no doubt to be made, that all the three perſons in the Godhead were concerned in the creation of all things, ſee Pſ. xxxiii. 6. The heathen poet Orpheus has a notion ſomewhat ſimilar to this, who writes, that all things were made by one Godhead of three names, and that this God is all things [g]: and now all theſe things, the heaven and the earth, were made by God in the beginning; either in the beginning of time, or when time began, as it did with the creatures, it being nothing but the meaſure of a creature's duration, and therefore could not be until ſuch exiſted; or as Jarchi interprets it, in the beginning of the creation, when God firſt began to create; and is beſt explained by our Lord, the beginning of the creation which God created, Mark xiii. 19. and the ſenſe is, either that as ſoon as God created, or the firſt he did create were the heavens heavens and the earth; to which agrees the Arabic verſion; not any thing was created before them: or in connexion with the following words thus, when firſt, or in the beginning, when God created the heavens and the earth, then the earth was without form, &c [h]. The Jeruſalem Targum renders it, in wiſdom God created; ſee Prov. iii. 19. and ſome of the ancients have interpreted it of the wiſdom of God, the Logos and Son of God. From hence we learn, that the world was not eternal, either as to the matter or form of it, as Ariſtotle, and ſome other philoſophers have aſſerted, but had a beginning; and that its being is not owing to the fortuitous motion and conjunction of atoms, but to the power and wiſdom of God, the firſt cauſe and ſole author of all things; and that there was not any thing created before the heaven and the earth were: hence thoſe phraſes, before the foundation of the world, and before the world began, &c. are expreſſive of eternity: this utterly deſtroys the notion of the preexiſtence of the ſouls of men, or of the ſoul of the Meſſiah: falſe therefore is what the Jews ſay [i], that paradiſe, the righteous, Iſrael, Jeruſalem, &c. were created before the world; unleſs they mean, that theſe were fore ordained by God to be, which perhaps is their ſenſe.

℣. 2. And the earth was without form, and void, &c.] It was not in the form it now is, otherwiſe it muſt have a form, as all matter has; it was a fluid matter, the watry parts were not ſeparated from the earthy ones; it was not put into the form of a terraqueous globe it is now, the ſea apart, and the earth by itſelf, but were mixed and blended together; it was, as both the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem paraphraſe it, a waſte and deſart, empty and deſtitute both of men and beaſts; and it may be added, of fiſhes and fowls, and alſo of trees, herbs and plants. It was, as Ovid [k] calls it, a chaos and an indigeſted maſs of matter; and Heſiod [l] makes a chaos firſt to exiſt, and then the wide extended earth; and ſo Orpheus [m] and others; and this is agreeable to the notion of various nations. The Chineſe make a chaos to be the beginning of all things, out of which the immaterial being (God) made all things that conſiſt of matter, which they diſtinguiſh into parts they call Yn and Yang, the one ſignifying hidden or imperfect, the other open or perfect [n]: and ſo the Egyptians, according to Diodorus Siculus, [o] whoſe opinion he is ſuppoſed to give, thought the ſyſtem of the univerſe had but one form; the heaven and earth, and the nature of them, being mixed and blended together, until by degrees they ſeparated and obtained the form they now have: and the Phœnicians, as Sanchoniatho [p] relates, ſuppoſed the principle of the univerſe to be a dark and windy air, or the blaſt of a dark air, and a turbid chaos ſurrounded with darkneſs, as follows; and darkneſs was upon the face of the deep: the whole fluid maſs of earth and water mixed together. This abyſs is explained by waters in the next clauſe, which ſeem to be uppermoſt; and this was all a dark turbid chaos, as before expreſſed, without any light or motion, till an agitation was made by the Spirit, as is next obſerved: and the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters, which covered the earth, Pſ. civ. 6. the earthy particles being heavieſt ſunk lower, and the waters being lighter roſe up above the others: hence Thales [q] the philoſopher makes water to be the beginning of all things, as do the Indian Brahmans [r]: and Ariſtotle [s] himſelf owns that this was the moſt ancient opinion concerning the origin of the univerſe, and obſerves, that it was not only the opinion of Thales, but of thoſe that were the moſt remote from the then preſent generation in which he lived, and of thoſe that firſt wrote on divine things; and it is frequent in Heſiod and Homer to make Oceanus, or the ocean, with Tethys, to be the parents of generation: and ſo the ſcriptures repreſent the original earth as ſtanding out of the water, and conſiſting of it, 2 Pet. iii. 5. and upon the ſurface of theſe waters, before they were drained off the earth, the Spirit of God moved; which is to be underſtood not of a wind, as Onkelos, Aben Ezra, and many Jewiſh writers, as well as Chriſtians, interpret it; ſince the air, which the wind is a motion of, was not made until the ſecond day. The Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem call it the Spirit of mercies; and by it is meant the Spirit of the Meſſiah, as many Jewiſh writers [t] call him; that is, the third perſon in the bleſſed Trinity, who was concerned in the creation of all things, as in the garniſhing of the heavens, ſo in bringing the confuſed matter of the earth and water into form and order; ſee Job xxvi. 13. Pſ. civ. 30. and xxxiii. 6. This ſame Spirit moved or brooded [u] upon the face of the waters, to impregnate them, as an hen upon eggs to hatch them; ſo he to ſeparate the parts which were mixed together, and give them a quickening virtue to produce living creatures in them. This ſenſe and idea of the word are finely expreſſed by our poet [w]. Some traces of this appear in the νους or mind of Anaxagoras, which when all things were mixed together came and ſet them in order [x]; and the mens of Thales he calls God, which formed all things out of water [y]; and the ſpiritus intus alit, &c. of Virgil; and with this agrees what Hermes ſays, that there was an infinite darkneſs in the abyſs or deep, and water, and a ſmall intelligent ſpirit, endued with a divine power, were in the chaos [z]: and perhaps from hence is the mundane egg, or egg of Orpheus [a], or the firſt born or firſt laid egg, out of which all things were formed; and which he borrowed from the Egyptians and Phœnicians, and they perhaps from the Jews, and which was reckoned by them a reſemblance of the world. The Egyptians had a deity they called Cneph, out of whoſe mouth went forth an egg, which they interpreted of the world [b]: and the Zophaſemin of the Phœnicians, which were heavenly birds, were, according to Sanchoniatho [c], of the form of an egg; and in the rites of Bacchus they worſhipped an egg, as being an image of the world, as Macrobius [d] ſays; and and therefore he thought the queſtion, whether an hen or an egg was oldeſt, was of ſome moment, and deſerved conſideration: and the Chineſe ſay [d], that the firſt man was produced out of the chaos as from an egg, the ſhell of which formed the heavens, the white the air, and the yolk the earth; and to this incubation of the ſpirit, or wind, as ſome would have it, is owing the windy egg of Ariſtophanes [e].

℣. 3. And God ſaid, &c.] This phraſe is uſed nine times in this account of the creation; it is admired by Longinus the heathen in his treatiſe of the Sublime, as a noble inſtance of it; and it is moſt beautifully paraphraſed and explained in Pſ. xxxiii. 6. as expreſſive of the will, power, authority and efficacy of the divine being; whoſe word is clothed with power, and who can do, and does whatever he will, and as ſoon as he pleaſes; his orders are always obeyed. Perhaps the divine perſon ſpeaking here is the Logos or Word of God, which was in the beginning with God, and was God, and who himſelf is the light that lightens every creature. The words ſpoke were, let there be light, and there was light: it at once appeared; God commanded light to ſhine out of darkneſs, as the apoſtle ſays, 2 Cor. iv. 6. this was the firſt thing made out of the dark chaos; as in the new creation, or work of grace in the heart, light is the firſt thing produced there: what this light was is not eaſy to ſay. Some of the Jewiſh Rabbins, and alſo ſome Chriſtian writers, think the angels are deſigned by it, which is not at all probable, as the ends and uſe of this light ſhew: others of them are of opinion, that it is the ſame with the ſun, of which a repetition is made on the fourth day, becauſe of its uſe and efficacy to the earth, and its plants; but others more rightly take it to be different from the ſun, and a more glimmering light, which afterwards was gathered into and perfected in the body of the ſun [f]. It is the opinion of Zanchius [g], and which is approved of by our countryman Mr. Fuller [h], that it was a lucid body, or a ſmall lucid cloud, which by its circular motion from eaſt to weſt made day and night [i]; perhaps ſomewhat like the cloudy pillar of fire that guided the Iſraelites in the wilderneſs, and had no doubt heat as well as light; and which two indeed, more or leſs, go together; and of ſuch fiery particles this body may well be thought to conſiſt. The word Ur ſignifies both fire and light.

℣. 4. And God ſaw the light, that it was good, &c.] Very pleaſant and delightful, uſeful and beneficial; that is, he foreſaw it would be good, of great ſervice, as Picherellus [k] interprets it; for as yet there were no inhabitants of the earth to receive any advantage by it; ſee Eccl. xi. 7. beſides, it was doubtleſs good to anſwer ſome preſent purpoſes, to prepare for the work of the two following days, before the great luminary was formed; as to diſpel the darkneſs of heaven, and that which covered the deep; to rarify, exhale, and draw up the lighter parts of the chaos, in order to form the wide extended æther, the expanded air, and the ſurrounding atmoſphere, while the Spirit of God was agitating the waters, and ſeparating them from the earthy parts; and which alſo might ſerve to unite and harden thoſe which were to form the dry land, and alſo to warm that when it appeared, that it might bring forth graſs, herbs, and fruit-trees: and God divided the light from the darkneſs; by which it ſhould ſeem that they were mixed together, the particles of light and darkneſs; but by what way is the light parted, ſevered and divided from darkneſs, is a queſtion put to men by the Lord himſelf, who only can anſwer it, Job xxxviii. 24. he has ſo divided one from the other, that they are not together at the ſame place and time; when light is in one hemiſphere, darkneſs is in the other [l]; and the one by certain conſtant revolutions is made to ſucceed the other; and by the motion of the one, the other gives way; as well as alſo God has divided and diſtinguiſhed them by calling them by different names, as Aben Ezra, and is what next follows:

℣. 5. And God called the light, day, and the darkneſs he called night, &c.] Either by the circulating motion of the above body of light, or by the rotation of the chaos on its own axis towards it, in the ſpace of twenty-four hours there was a viciſſitude of light and darkneſs; juſt as there is now by the like motion either of the ſun, or of the earth; and which after this appellation God has given, we call the one, day, and the other, night: and the evening and the morning were the firſt day; the evening, the firſt part of the night, or darkneſs, put for the whole night, which might be about the ſpace of twelve hours; and the morning, which was the firſt part of the day, or light, put alſo for the whole, which made the ſame ſpace, and both together one natural day, conſiſting of twenty-four hours; what Daniel calls an evening-morning, Dan. viii. 14. and the apoſtle νυχθημερον, a night-day, 2 Cor. xi. 25. Thales being aſked which was firſt made, the night or the day, anſwered, the night was before one day [m]. The Jews begin their day from the preceding evening; ſo many other nations: the Athenians uſed to reckon their day from ſun-ſetting to ſun-ſetting [n]; the Romans from the middle of the night to the middle of the night following, as Gellius [o] relates; and Tacitus [p] reports of the ancient Germans, that they uſed to compute not the number of days, but of nights, reckoning that the night led the day. Cæſar [q] obſerves of the ancient Druids in Britain, that they counted time not by the number of days but nights; and obſerved birth-days, and the beginnings of months and years, ſo as that the day followed the night; and we have ſome traces of this ſtill among us, as when we ſay this day ſennight, or this day fortnight. This firſt day of the creation, according to James Capellus, was the 18th of April; but, according to biſhop Uſher, the 23d of October; the one beginning the creation in the ſpring, the other in autumn. It is a notion of Mr. Whiſton's, that the ſix days of the creation were equal to ſix years, a day and a year being one and the ſame thing before the fall of man, when the diurnal rotation of the earth about its axis, as he thinks, began; and in agreement with this, very remarkable is the doctrine Empedocles taught, that when mankind ſprung originally nally from the earth, the length of the day, by reaſon of the ſlowneſs of the ſun's motion, was equal to ten of our preſent months [r]. The Hebrew word ערב Ereb, rendered evening, is retained by ſome of the Greek poets, as by Heſiod [s], who ſays, out of the chaos came Erebus, and black night, and out of the night æther and the day: and Ariſtophanes [t], whoſe words are, "chaos, night, and black "Erebus were firſt, and wide Tartarus, but there "were neither earth, air nor heaven, but in the in-"finite boſom of Erebus, black winged night firſt "brought forth a windy egg, &c." And Orpheus [u] makes night to be the beginning of all things.

℣. 6. And God ſaid, let there be a firmament in the midſt of the waters, &c.] On which the Spirit of God was ſitting and moving, ℣. 2. part of which were formed into clouds, and drawn up into heaven by the force of the body of fire and light already produced; and the other part left on the earth, not yet gathered into one place, as afterwards; between theſe God ordered a firmament to be, or an expanſe [w]; ſomething ſtretched out and ſpread like a curtain, tent, or canopy: and to this all thoſe paſſages of ſcripture refer, which ſpeak of the ſtretching out of the heavens, as this firmament or expanſe is afterwards called; ſee Pſ. civ. 2. Iſ. xl. 22. and xlii. 5. and by it is meant the air, as it is rendered by the Targum on Pſ. xix. 1. we call it the firmament from the [w] word which the Greek interpreter uſes, becauſe it is firm, laſting and durable: and it has the name of an expanſe from its wide extent, it reaching from the earth to the third heaven; the lower and thicker parts of it form the atmoſphere in which we breathe; the higher and thinner parts of it, the air in which fowls fly, and the æther or ſky in which the ſun, moon and ſtars are placed; for all theſe are ſaid to be in the firmament or expanſe, ℣. 17, 20. Theſe are the ſtories in the heavens the ſcriptures ſpeak of, Amos ix. 6. and the air is divided by philoſophers into higher, middle and lower regions: and ſo the Targum of Jonathan places this firmament or expanſe between the extremities of the heaven, and the waters of the ocean. The word in the Syriac language has the ſenſe of binding and compreſſing [x]; and ſo it is uſed in the Syriac verſion of Luke vi. 38. and may denote the power of the air when formed in compreſſing the chaos, and dividing and ſeparating the parts of it; and which it now has in compreſſing the earth, and the ſeveral parts that are in it, and by its compreſſion preſerves them and retains them in their proper places [y]: and let it divide the waters from the waters; the waters under it from thoſe above it, as it is explained in the next verſe; of which more there.

℣. 7. And God made the firmament, &c.] By a word ſpeaking, commanding it into being, producing it out of the chaos, and ſpreading it in that vaſt ſpace between the heaven of heavens and our earth [z]: and divided the waters which were under the firmament, from the waters which were above the firmament, the lower part of it, the atmoſphere above, which are the clouds full of water, from whence rain deſcends upon the earth; and which divided between them and thoſe that were left on the earth, and ſo under it, not yet gathered into one place; as it now does between the clouds of heaven and the waters of the ſea. Tho' Mr. Gregory [a] is of opinion, that an abyſs of waters above the ſupremeſt orb is here meant; or a great deep between the heavens and the heaven of heavens, where, as in ſtore-houſes, the depth is laid up: and God has his treaſures of ſnow, hail and rain, and from whence he brought out the waters which drowned the world at the univerſal deluge. Others ſuppoſe the waters above to be the cryſtalline heaven, which for its clearneſs reſembles water; and which Milton [b] calls the cryſtalline ocean. And it was ſo; the firmament was accordingly made, and anſwered this purpoſe, to divide the waters below it from thoſe above it; or it was firm [c], ſtable and durable; and ſo it has continued.

℣. 8. And God called the firmament, heaven, &c.] Including the ſtarry and airy heavens: it has its name from its height in the Arabic language, it being above the earth, and reaching to the third heaven; though others take the word ſhamaim to be a compound of two words, ſham and maim, that is, there are waters, namely, in the clouds of heaven: and the evening and the morning were the ſecond day; theſe together made up the ſpace of twenty-four hours, which was another natural day; the body of light, created on the firſt day, having again moved round the chaos in that ſpace of time; or elſe the chaos had turned round on its own axis in that time, which revolution produced a ſecond day; and which, according to Capellus, was the nineteenth of April, and according to biſhop Uſher the 24th of October. It is an obſervation that every one may make, that the phraſe, and God ſaw that it was good, is not uſed at the cloſe of this day's work, as of the reſt: the reaſon ſome Jewiſh writers give is, becauſe the angels fell on this day; but it is a much better which Jarchi gives, and that is, becauſe the work of the waters was not finiſhed; it was begun on the ſecond day, and perfected on the third [d]; and therefore the phraſe is twice uſed in the account of the third day's work: the Septuagint verſion adds it here indeed, but without any foundation.

℣. 9. And God ſaid, let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, &c.] Which are before called the waters under the firmament; and which were either on the ſurface of the earth, or in the bowels of it, or mixed with it, which by the compreſſure of the expanſe or air were ſeparated from it; and theſe by apertures and channels made, were cauſed to flow as by a ſtrait line, as the word [e] uſed ſignifies, unto the decreed place that was broke up for them, the great hollow or channel which now contains the waters of the ocean: this was done by the word of the Lord, at his rebuke; and when it ſeems there was a clap of of thunder, and perhaps an earthquake, which made the vaſt cavity for the ſea, as well as threw up the hills and mountains, and made the vallies; ſee Job xxxviii. 10. Pſ. civ. 6, 7, 8. and let the dry land appear; clear of the waters, dried by the expanded air, and hardened by the fiery light, and as yet without any herb or tree upon it: and it was ſo; immediately done, the waters were drained off the earth, directed to their proper channels, and cauſed to run as by line to their appointed place; and the ſolid parts of the earth became dry, and appeared in ſight.

℣. 10. And God called the dry land, earth, &c.] The whole chaos, that was a turbid fluid, a mixture of earth and water, a rude unformed maſs of matter was called earth before; but now that part of the terraqueous globe, which was ſeparated from the waters, and they from it, is called earth; which has its name in the Arabic language from its being low and depreſſed; the lighter parts having been elevated, and moved upwards, and formed the atmoſphere; the groſſer parts ſubſiding and falling downwards, made the earth, which is low with reſpect to the firmament, which has its name in the ſame language from its height [f], as before obſerved. And the gathering together of the waters called he, ſeas; for though there was but one place into which they were collected, and which is the main ocean, with which all other waters have a communication, and ſo are one; yet there are divers ſeas, as the Red-ſea, the Mediterranean, Caſpian, Baltic, &c. or which are denominated from the ſhores they waſh, as the German, Britiſh, &c. and even lakes and pools of water are called ſeas, as the ſea of Galilee and Tiberias, which was no other than the lake of Geneſaret. And God ſaw that it was good; that theſe two ſhould be ſeparate, that the waters ſhould be in one place, and the dry land appear, and both have the names he gave them: and this is here mentioned, becauſe now the affair of the waters, the diviſion and ſeparation of them were brought to an end, and to perfection: but becauſe this phraſe is here uſed, and not at the mention of the ſecond day, hence Picherellus, and ſome others, have thought, that this work is to be aſcribed to the ſecond day, and not to the third, and render the beginning of the ninth verſe, and God had ſaid, or after God had ſaid, let the waters under the heaven, &c.

℣. 11. And God ſaid, let the earth bring forth graſs, &c.] Which had been impregnated by the Spirit of God that moved upon it when a fluid; and though now become dry land, it retained ſufficient moiſture in it, and was juicy and fit to produce vegetables; and eſpecially as it had the advantage of the expanded air about it, and the warmth of the primigenial light or fire; though all this would have been inſufficient to produce plants and trees at full growth, with their ſeed in them, and fruit on them, without the interpoſition of almighty power: this ſeems to intend the germination or budding out of the tender graſs, and the numerous ſpires of it which cover the earth, and by their verdure and greenneſs give it a delightful aſpect, as well as afford food for the creatures: the herb yielding ſeed; this is diſtinct from the former; that denotes herbage in general, which grows up of itſelf without being ſown or manured, and is the food of beaſts; this in particular, herbs and plants for the uſe of man, which yield a ſeed which either falling from it ſows itſelf again, or is taken from it and ſown on purpoſe to reproduce it, being uſeful or delightful: and the fruit-tree yielding fruit after his kind; as apples, pears, plumbs, apricots, nectars, peaches, oranges, lemons, &c. whoſe ſeed is in its ſelf upon the earth; each of which produce a ſeed according to the nature of them, which being ſown produce the like, and ſo there is a continuance of them upon the earth: and it was ſo; as God commanded it ſhould, as appears from the following verſe, ℣. 12. And the earth brought forth graſs, &c.] In great abundance at once; the hills and vales were clothed with it, and ſo a rich proviſion was made for the beaſts and cattle of the earth two or three days before they were created: and herb yielding ſeed after his kind, and the tree yielding fruit, whoſe ſeed was in itſelf after his kind; wholeſome and healthful herbs and plants, and delicious fruit to be meat and food for man, ready prepared for him when created; ſee ℣. 29, 30. on this day, though after related, were made the garden of Eden, and all the trees in it, pleaſant for ſight, and good for food; and particularly the tree of life, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil: and God ſaw that it was good; which he had now cauſed to ſpring forth, graſs, herbs and fruit-trees, which were good for men and beaſt, and this he foreſaw would be ſo; ſee the note on ℣. 4.

℣. 13. And the evening and the morning were the third day.] The ſpace of twenty-four hours ran out, and were meaſured, either by the rotation of the body of light and heat around the earth, or of the earth upon its axis: and this was according to Capellus the twentieth day of April, and according to biſhop Uſher the 25th of October; though thoſe who ſuppoſe the world was created in autumn make the firſt day to be the firſt of September, and ſo this muſt be the third of that month: the Jews are divided about the ſeaſon of the creation; ſome ſay Niſan or March, others Tiſri or September [g].

℣. 14. And God ſaid, let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven, &c.] In the upper part of it, commonly called the ſtarry heaven: ſome writers, both Jewiſh and chriſtian, and even modern aſtronomers, underſtand this only of the appearance of them, and not of the formation of them; they ſuppoſe they were made on the firſt day, but did not appear or ſhine out ſo clearly and viſibly as now on the fourth day: but it ſeems rather, that the body of fire and light produced on the firſt day was now diſtributed and formed into ſeveral luminous bodies of ſun, moon and ſtars, for theſe were מאורת from light; lights produced from that light, or made out of it; or were inſtruments of communicating and letting down that light upon the earth [h], which was collected and put together in them, eſpecially in the ſun: and the uſes of them were to divide the day from the night; which is the peculiar uſe of the ſun, which by its appearance and continuance makes the day, and by withdrawing itſelf, or not appearing for a certain time makes the night; as the light by its circular motion did for the firſt three days, or the diurnal motion of the earth on its axis, then and now: and let them be for ſigns, and for ſeaſons, and for days and years; for ſigns of good and bad weather; for the times of plowing, ſowing, reaping, &c. and for the ſeaſons of ſummer and winter, ſpring ſpring and autumn; for days by a circular motion for the ſpace of twenty-four hours; and for years by annual motion for the ſpace of three hundred ſixty-five days and odd hours. The Targum of Jonathan is, "and let them be for ſigns and the "times of the feaſts, and to reckon with them the "number of days, and ſanctify the beginnings of "the months, and the beginnings of the years, "and the intercalations of months and years, the "revolutions of the ſun, and the new moons, "and cycles." And ſo Jarchi interprets ſeaſons of the ſolemn feſtivals, that would hereafter be commanded the children of Iſrael; but thoſe uſes were not for a certain people, and for a certain time, but for all mankind, as long as the world ſhould ſtand.

℣. 15. And let them be for lights in the firmament of the heaven, &c.] To continue there as luminous bodies; as enlighteners, as the word ſignifies, cauſing light, or as being the inſtruments of conveying it, particularly to the earth, as follows: to give light upon the earth; and the inhabitants of it, when formed: and it was ſo; theſe lights were formed and placed in the firmament of the heaven for ſuch uſes, and ſerved ſuch purpoſes as God willed and ordered they ſhould.

℣. 16. And God made two great lights, &c.] This was his own work which he himſelf did, and not by another; and may be particularly obſerved to expreſs the folly of idolaters in worſhipping theſe luminaries which were the creatures of God, and were placed by him in the heaven to ſerve ſome purpoſes on earth beneficial to men, but not to be worſhipped. Theſe two great lights are the ſun and moon; and they may well be called great, eſpecially the former, for the diameter of the ſun is reckoned to be about eight hundred thouſand miles. According to Mr. Derham [i], its apparent diameter is computed at 822,148 Engliſh miles, its ambit at 2,582,873 miles, and its ſolid contents at 290,971,000,000,000,000: the loweſt account makes the ſun a hundred thouſand times bigger than the earth; and according to Sir Iſaac Newton it is 900,000 bigger. The moon's diameter is to that of the earth as 11 to 40.2, or 2175 miles, its ſurface contains fourteen hundred thouſand ſquare miles [k]: it is called great not on account of its corporal quantity, for it is the leaſt of all the planets excepting Mercury, but becauſe of its quality, as a light, it reflecting more light upon the earth than any beſides the ſun. The greater light to rule the day; not to rule men, though the heathens have worſhipped it under the names of Molech and Baal, which ſignify King and Lord, as if it was their Lord and King to whom they were to pay homage; but to rule the day, to preſide over it, to make it, give light in it, and continue it to its proper length; and in which it rules alone, the moon nor any of the other planets then appearing: this is called the greater light, in compariſon of the moon, not only with reſpect to its body or ſubſtance, but on account of its light, which is far greater and ſtronger than that of the moon; and which indeed receives its light from it, the moon being, as is generally ſaid, an opake body: and the leſſer light to rule the night; to give light then, though in a fainter, dimmer way, by reflecting it from the ſun; and it rules alone, the ſun being abſent from the earth, and is of great uſe to travellers and ſailors; it is called the leſſer light, in compariſon of the ſun. Aſtronomers are of opinion, as Calmet [l] obſerves, that it is about fifty-two times ſmaller than the earth, and four thouſand one hundred and fifty times ſmaller than the ſun; but theſe proportions are otherwiſe determined by the generality of modern aſtronomers: however, they all agree that the moon is abundantly leſs than the ſun; and that it is as a light, we all know. He made the ſtars alſo; to rule by night, Pſ. cxxxvi. 9. not only the planets, Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Mercury, Venus, but the vaſt numbers of ſtars with which the heavens are beſpangled, and which reflect ſome degree of light upon the earth; with the ſeveral conſtellations, ſome of which the ſcriptures ſpeak of, as Arcturus, Orion, Pleiades, and the chambers of the ſouth, Job ix. 9. and xxxviii. 31, 32. Amos v. 8. though ſome reſtrain this to the five planets only.

℣. 17. And God ſet them in the firmament of the heaven, &c.] He not only ordered that there they ſhould be, and made them that there they might be, but he placed them there with his own hands; and they are placed, particularly the ſun, at ſuch a particular diſtance as to be beneficial and not hurtful: had it been ſet nearer to the earth, its heat would have been intolerable; and had it been farther off it would have been of no uſe; in the one caſe we ſhould have been ſcorched with its heat, and in the other been frozen up for the want of it. The various expreſſions uſed ſeem to be deſigned on purpoſe to guard againſt and expoſe the vanity of the worſhip of the ſun and moon; which being viſible, and of ſuch great influence and uſefulneſs to the earth, were the firſt the heathens paid adoration to, and was as early as the times of Job, ch. xxxi. 26, 27, 28. and yet theſe were but creatures made by God, his ſervants and agents under him, and therefore to worſhip them was to ſerve the creature beſides the creator. To give light upon the earth; this is repeated from ℣. 15. to ſhew the end for which they were made, and ſet up, and the uſe they were to be of to the earth; being hung up like ſo many lamps or chandeliers, to contain and ſend forth light unto the earth to the inhabitants of it, that they may ſee to walk and work by, and do all the buſineſs of life, as well as be warmed and comforted thereby, and the earth made fertile to bring forth its pretious fruits for the uſe of creatures in it: and it is marvellous that ſuch light ſhould be emitted from the ſun, when it is at ſuch a vaſt diſtance from the earth, and ſhould reach it in ſo ſhort a ſpace. A modern aſtronomer [m] obſerves, that a bullet diſcharged from a cannon would be near twenty-five years, before it could finiſh its journey from the ſun to the earth; and yet the rays of light reach the earth in ſeven minutes and a half, and are ſaid to paſs ten millions of miles in a minute.

℣. 18. And to rule over the day, and over the night, &c.] The one, namely the ſun, or greater light, to rule over the day, and the moon and ſtars, the leſſer lights, to rule over the night: this is repeated from ℣. 16. to ſhew the certainty of it, and that the proper uſes of theſe lights might be obſerved, and that a juſt value might be put upon them, but not carried beyond due bounds: and to divide the light from the darkneſs; as the day from the night, which is done by the ſun, ℣. 14. and to diſſipate and ſcatter the darkneſs of the night, and give ſome degree of light, though in a more feeble manner, which is done by the moon and ſtars: and God ſaw that it was good; or foreſaw

℣. 19. And the evening and the morning were the fourth day.] Made by the rotation of the earth on its own axis, in the ſpace of twenty-four hours: this according to Capellus was the twenty-firſt of April, and according to biſhop Uſher the 26th of October; or, as others, the fourth of September: and thus, as on the fourth day of the creation the ſun was made, or appeared, ſo in the fourth millennium the ſun of righteouſneſs aroſe on our earth.

℣. 20. And God ſaid, let the waters bring forth abundantly, &c.] The waters gathered together in one place, the waters of the ocean, and thoſe in rivers, pools and lakes, and which before their collection into thoſe places had been ſat on, moved and impregnated by the Spirit of God; ſo that they could, as they did, by the divine order accompanied with his power, bring forth abundance of creatures, next mentioned: the moving creature that hath life; an animal life, of which ſort of creatures as yet there had been none made; vegetables, or ſuch as have a vegetative life, were made on the third day; but thoſe that have a ſenſitive and animal life not till this day, the fifth; and the leſs perfect, or lower ſort of theſe were firſt produced, even ſuch as move or creep [n], as the word uſed ſignifies; which is applied to fiſhes as well as creeping things, becauſe in ſwimming their bellies touch the water, and are cloſe to it, as reptiles on the earth: and of theſe creeping things in the ſeas there are innumerable, as the Pſalmiſt ſays, Pſ. civ. 25. Pliny [o] reckons up an hundred and ſeventy-ſix kinds of fiſhes, which he puts in an alphabetical order: and fowl that may fly above the earth in the open firmament of heaven; which according to our verſion were to be produced out of the waters alſo; not out of mere water, but out of earth and water mixed togther, or out of the earth or clay [p] that lay at the bottom of the waters: and it may be obſerved of ſome fowls, that they live on the waters, and others partly on land and partly on water; and as the elements of fowl and fiſh, the air and water, bear a reſemblance to each other, ſo do theſe creatures, ſome fowls both fly and ſwim; and what wings are to the one, fins are to the other; and both ſteer their courſe by their tails, and are both oviparous: tho' it ſhould ſeem, according to ch. ii. 19. that the fowls were produced out of the earth, and the words may be rendered here, let the fowl fly above the earth, &c. as they are in the Samaritan and Syriac verſions, and in others [q].

℣. 21. And God created great whales, &c.] Which the Targum of Jonathan and Jarchi interpret of the Leviathan and its mate, concerning which the Jews have many fabulous things: large fiſhes are undoubtedly meant, and the whale being of the largeſt ſort, the word is ſo rendred. Ælianus, from various writers, relates many things of the extraordinary bigneſs of whales; of one in the Indian ſea five times bigger than the largeſt elephant, one of its ribs being twenty cubits [r]; from Theocles, of one that was larger than a galley with three oars [s]; and from Oneſicritus and Orthagoras, of one that was half a furlong in length [t]; and Pliny [u] ſpeaks of one ſort called the balæna, and of one of them in the Indian ſea, that took up four acres of land, and ſo Solinus [w]; and from Juba, he relates there were whales that were ſix hundred feet in length, and three hundred ſixty in breadth [x]: but whales in common are but about fifty, ſeventy, eighty, or at moſt one hundred feet. Some interpret theſe of crocodiles, ſee Ezek. xxix. 3. ſome of which are twenty, ſome thirty, and ſome have been ſaid to be an hundred feet long [y]. The word is ſometimes uſed of dragons, and if it has this ſenſe here muſt be meant of dragons in the ſea, or ſea ſerpents, leviathan the piercing ſerpent, and leviathan the crooked ſerpent, Iſ. xxvii. 1. ſo the Jews [z]; and ſuch as the biſhop of Bergen [a] ſpeaks of as in the northern ſeas of a hundred fathom long, or ſix hundred Engliſh feet; and who alſo gives an account of a ſea monſter of an enormous and incredible ſize, that ſometimes appears like an iſland at a great diſtance, called Kraken [b]: now becauſe creatures of ſuch a prodigious bigneſs were formed out of the waters, which ſeemed ſo very unfit to produce them; therefore the ſame word is here made uſe of, as is in the creation of the heaven and the earth out of nothing, ℣. 1. becauſe this production, though not out of nothing, yet was an extraordinary inſtance of almighty power. And every living creature that moveth, which the waters brought forth abundantly after their kind; that is, every living creature that ſwims in the waters of the great ſea, or in rivers, whoſe kinds are many, and their numbers not to be reckoned; ſee the note on ℣. 20. and every winged fowl after his kind; every fowl, and the various ſorts of them that fly in the air; theſe were all created by God, or produced out of the water and out of the earth by his wonderful power: and God ſaw that it was good; or foreſaw that thoſe creatures he made in the waters and in the air, would ſerve to diſplay the glory of his perfections, and be very uſeful and beneficial to man, he deſigned to create.

℣. 22. And God bleſſed them, &c.] With a power to procreate their kind, and continue their ſpecies, as it is interpreted in the next clauſe; ſaying, be fruitful, and multiply, and fill the waters in the ſeas: and theſe creatures do multiply exceedingly, and vaſt quantities there are of them in the mighty waters, though the conſumption of ſome ſorts of them is very great. Our Engliſh word fiſh is derived from the Hebrew word פוש fuſh, which ſignifies to multiply and increaſe: and let fowl multiply in the earth; as they did, and continue to do to this day.

℣. 24. And God ſaid, let the earth bring forth the living creature after his kind, &c.] All ſorts of living creatures that live and move upon the earth; not that the earth was endued with a power to produce theſe creatures of itſelf, without the interpoſition of God: for though it might be impregnated with a quickening virtue by the Spirit of God, which moved on it whilſt a fluid, and had been prepared and diſpoſed for ſuch a production by the heat of the body of light created on the firſt day, and of the ſun on the fourth; yet no doubt it was by the power of God accompanying his word, that theſe creatures were produced of the earth, and formed into their ſeveral ſhapes. The heathens had ſome traditionary notion of this affair: according to the Egyptians, whoſe ſentiments Diodorus Siculus [c] ſeems to give us, the proceſs was thus carried on; the earth being ſtiffened by the rays of the ſun, and the moiſt matter being made fruitful by the genial heat, at night received nouriſhment by the miſt which fell from the ambient air; and in the day was conſolidated by the heat of the ſun, till at length the incloſed fœtus having arrived to a perfect increaſe, and the membranes burnt and burſt, creatures of all kinds appeared; of whom thoſe that had got a greater degree of heat went upwards, and became flying fowl; thoſe that were endued with an earthly concretion were reckoned in the claſs or order of reptiles, and other terreſtrial animals; and thoſe that chiefly partook of a moiſt or watry nature, ran to the place of a like kind, and were called ſwimmers or fiſh. This is the account they give; and ſomewhat like is that which Archelaus, the maſter of Socrates, delivers as his notion, that animals were produced out of ſlime, through the heat of the earth liquifying the ſlime like milk for food [d]: and Zeno the Stoic ſays [e], the groſſer part of the watry matter of the world made the earth, the thinner part the air, and that ſtill more ſubtilized, the fire; and then out of the mixture of theſe proceeded plants and animals, and all the other kinds; but all this they ſeem to ſuppoſe to be done by the mere efforts of nature; whereas Moſes here moſt truly aſcribes their production to the all-powerful word of God: cattle and creeping things, and beaſt of the earth after his kind; the living creatures produced out of the earth are diſtinguiſhed into three ſorts; cattle, which ſeem to deſign tame cattle, and ſuch as are for the uſe of man, either for carriage, food or clothing, as horſes, aſſes, camels, oxen, ſheep, &c. and creeping things which are different from the creeping things in the ſea before mentioned, are ſuch as either have no feet, and go upon their bellies, or are very ſhort, and ſeem to do ſo, whether greater or leſſer, as ſerpents, worms, ants, &c. and the beaſt of the earth ſeems to deſign wild beaſts, ſuch as lions, bears, wolves, &c. and it was ſo; ſuch creatures were immediately produced.

℣. 25. And God made the beaſt of the earth after his kind, &c.] The wild beaſts, and the ſeveral ſorts of them; beginning the account with the laſt mentioned, as is frequent in the Hebrew language, and ſo he made all the reſt: and cattle after their kind, and every thing that creepeth upon the earth after his kind; tame creatures, and all the reptiles of the earth: this moſt clearly ſhews and proves that the above creatures were not produced by the mere force of nature, or the powers the earth were poſſeſſed of, however the matter of it might be diſpoſed and prepared, but by the omnipotent hand of God: and God ſaw that it was good; that every creature he had made would ſome way or other be for his glory, and for the benefit of man. Pichellus thinks that all this belongs to the work of the fifth day, not the ſixth; becauſe as the vegetables, herbs and trees were produced on the ſame day, the third day; ſo animals, whether in the waters, air or earth, were made on one and the ſame day; and that it was proper a ſeparate day ſhould be allotted for the formation of rational creatures, Adam and Eve, and that it might appear that the ſame bleſſing was not conferred on brutes as on reaſonable beings; and therefore the words with which ℣. 24. begins, ſhould be rendered, but after God had ſaid, let the earth, &c. that is, after God had ordered this, and it was done, then the evening and the morning were the fifth day; which is what rhetoricians call an hyſteron proteron.

℣. 26. And God ſaid, let us make man in our image, after our likeneſs, &c.] Theſe words are directed not to the earth, out of which man was made, as conſulting with it, and to be aſſiſting in the formation of man, as Moſes Gerundenſis, and other Jewiſh writers [f], which is wretchedly ſtupid; nor to the angels, as the Targum of Jonathan, Jarchi and others, who are not of God's privy-council, nor were concerned in any part of the creation, and much leſs in the more noble part of it: nor are the words ſpoken after the manner of kings, as Saadiah, uſing the plural number as expreſſive of honour and majeſty; ſince ſuch a way of ſpeaking did not obtain very early, not even till the cloſe of the Old Teſtament: but they are ſpoken by God the Father to the Son and Holy Ghoſt, who were each of them concerned in the creation of all things, and particularly of man: hence we read of divine creators and makers in the plural number, Job xxxv. 10. Pſ. cxlix. 2. Eccl. xii. 1. and Philo the Jew acknowledges that theſe words declare a plurality, and are expreſſive of others, being co-workers with God in creation [g]: and man being the principal part of the creation, and for the ſake of whom the world, and all things in it were made, and which being finiſhed, he is introduced into it as into an houſe ready prepared and furniſhed for him; a conſultation is held among the divine perſons about the formation of him; not becauſe of any difficulty attending it, but as expreſſive of his honour and dignity; it being propoſed he ſhould be made not in the likeneſs of any of the creatures already made, but as near as could be in the likeneſs and image of God. The Jews ſometimes ſay, that Adam and Eve were created in the likeneſs of the holy bleſſed God, and his Shekinah [h]; and they alſo ſpeak [i] of Adam Kadmon the ancient Adam, as the cauſe of cauſes, of whom it is ſaid, I was as one brought up with him (or an artificer with him) Prov. viii. 30. and to this ancient Adam he ſaid, let us make man in our image, after our likeneſs: and again, let us make man; to whom did he ſay this? the cauſe of cauſes ſaid to jod, he, vau, he; that is, to Jehovah, which is in the midſt of the ten numerations. What are the ten numerations? aleph, he, jod, he, that is, אהיה I am that I am, Exod. iii. 14. and he that ſays let us make, is Jehovah; I am the firſt, and I am the laſt, and beſide me there is no God: and three jods jods ''' teſtify concerning him, that there is none above him, nor any below him, but he is in the middle: and let them have dominion over the fiſh of the ſea, and over the fowl of the air; that is, to catch them, and eat them; though in the after grant of food to man, no mention as yet is made of any other meat than the herbs and fruits of the earth; yet what can this dominion over fiſh and fowl ſignify, unleſs it be a power to feed upon them? It may be obſerved, that the plural number is uſed, let them, which ſhows that the name man is general in the preceding clauſe, and includes male and female, as we find by the following verſe man was created: and over the cattle, and over all the earth; over the tame creatures, either for food, or clothing, or carriage, or for all of them, ſome of them for one thing, and ſome for another; and over all the wild beaſts of the earth, which ſeem to be meant by the phraſe, over all the earth; that is, over all the beaſts of the earth, as appears by comparing it with ℣. 24. ſo as to keep them in awe, and keep them off from doing them any damage: and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth; to make uſe of it as ſhould ſeem convenient for them.

℣. 27. So God created man in his own image, &c.] Which conſiſted both in the form of his body, and the erect ſtature of it, different from all other creatures; in agreement with the idea of that body, prepared in covenant for the Son of God, and which it was therein agreed he ſhould aſſume in the fulneſs of time; and in the immortality of his ſoul, and in his intellectual powers, and in that purity, holineſs and righteouſneſs in which he was created; as well as in his dominion, power and authority over the creatures, in which he was as God's vice-gerent, and reſembled him. The Jeruſalem Targum is, "the Word of the Lord created "man in his likeneſs;" even that Word that was in the beginning with God, and was God, and in time became incarnate, by whom all things were made, John i. 1, 2, 3, 14. in the image of God created he him; which is repeated for the certainty of it, and that it might be taken notice of, as ſhewing man's ſuperior glory and dignity to the reſt of the creatures, 1 Cor. xi. 7. male and female created he them; not that man was created an hermaphrodite, or with two bodies, back to back united together, and afterwards cleaved aſunder, as the Jews fabulouſly ſay; but firſt God made man, or the male, out of the duſt of the earth, and infuſed a rational ſoul into him; and then out of one of his ribs made a female, or woman, who was preſented to him as his wife, that ſo their ſpecies might be propagated; and only one male and one female were created, to ſhew that hereafter a man was to have at a time no more wives than one; ſee Mal. ii. 15. Matt. xix. 4. for all that is ſaid in the following chapter, concerning the formation of man out of the duſt of the earth, and the making of woman out of his rib, and preſenting her to him, and his taking her to be his wife, were all done on this ſixth day, and at this time. It is a tradition among the heathens, that man was made laſt of all the creatures; ſo ſays Plato [k]; and this notion the Chineſe alſo have [l]. The Jews give theſe reaſons why man was made on the evening of the ſabbath, to ſhew that he did not aſſiſt in the work of creation; and that if he was elated in his mind, it might be told him that a fly was created before him, and that he might immediately enter on the command, i. e. of the ſabbath [m].

℣. 28. And God bleſſed them, &c.] The man and the woman he had made, with all the bleſſings of nature and providence; with all the good things of life; with his preſence, and with communion with himſelf in a natural way, through the creatures; and particularly with a power of procreating their ſpecies, as follows; and God ſaid unto them, be fruitful, and multiply, and repleniſh the earth: if this is not an expreſs command, as the Jews underſtand it, for marriage and procreation of children; it ſeems to be more than a bare permiſſion; at leaſt it is a direction and an advice to what was proper and convenient for the increaſe of mankind, and for the filling of the earth with inhabitants, which was the end of its being made, Iſ. xlv. 18. This ſhews that marriage is an ordinance of God, inſtituted in paradiſe, and is honourable; and that procreation is a natural action, and might have been, and may be performed without ſin: and ſubdue it; the earth; not that it was in the hands of others, who had no right to it, and to be conquered and taken out of their hands; but is to be underſtood of their taking poſſeſſion, and making uſe of it; of their tilling the land, and making it ſubſervient to their uſe: and have dominion over the fiſh of the ſea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the face of the earth; which was giving them an univerſal and unlimited dominion over all the creatures; of which ſee an enumeration in Pſ. viii. 6, 7, 8.

℣. 29. And God ſaid, &c.] That is, to Adam and Eve, whom he had made in his image and likeneſs, and to whom he had given the dominion of the earth and ſea, and all things in them: behold, I have given you every herb bearing ſeed, which is upon the face of all the earth; every herb or plant which had a ſeed in it, by which it ſowed itſelf again; or being taken off, might be ſown by man, even every one that was wholeſome, healthful and nouriſhing, without any exception; whatever grew in any part of the earth, be it where it would: and every tree, in which is the fruit of a tree yielding ſeed; all but the tree of knowledge, of good and evil, afterwards excepted; and both theſe take in all kind of vegetables, all herbs, plants, roots, even corn, wheat, barley, peaſe, beans, &c. and the various fruits of all ſorts of trees, but that before mentioned: to you it ſhall be for meat; which is generally thought to be the food of the antediluvians [n], it not being proper, at leaſt very ſoon, to kill any of the animals, until they were multiplied and increaſed, leſt their ſpecies ſhould be deſtroyed; though here is no prohibition of eating fleſh; nor is it ſaid that this only ſhould be for meat, which is before mentioned; and by the early employment of ſome in keeping ſheep, and by the ſacrifice of creatures immediately after the fall, part of which uſed to be eat by the offerers; and by the diſtinction of clean and unclean creatures before the flood; it looks probable that fleſh might be eaten: and Bochart [o] refers this clauſe to what goes before in the preceding verſe, as well as to what is in this, and takes the ſenſe to be, that the fiſhes of the ſea, and fowls of the air, and every living creature man had dominion over, as well as herbs and fruits, were given him for his food: but the Jews [p] are of opinion, that the the firſt man might not eat fleſh, but it was granted to the ſons of Noah.

℣. 30. And to every beaſt of the earth, &c.] Wild or tame, the cattle on a thouſand hills; God took care and provided for theſe, being all his creatures, and deſigned to anſwer ſome end or other by their creation: and to every fowl of the air; that flies in it; and to every creeping thing upon the earth; even the meaneſt and loweſt inſect: wherein there is life; or a living ſoul; that has an animal life, which is to be ſupported by food: I have given every green herb for meat; the leaves for ſome, and ſeed for others; and here is no mention made of fleſh; and perhaps thoſe creatures which are now carnivorous, were not ſo at their firſt creation: and it was ſo; every creature, both man and beaſt, had food ſuitable to their nature and appetite, and a ſufficiency of it.

℣. 31. And God ſaw every thing that he had made, &c.] Either all that he had made on the ſeveral ſix days of the creation, he took a ſurvey of them, looked over them again, as workmen do when they have finiſhed their work, to ſee if any thing is amiſs or wanting; not that any thing of this nature can be ſuppoſed in the works of God, but ſuch a ſurvey is attributed to him after the manner of men, to ſhew the compleatneſs of his works, and the excellency of them. Picherellus [q] limits this to what had been done on this day, with reſpect to man, who alone, as he thinks, was the ſubject of this day's work; and ſo it reſpects the creation of man after the image and likeneſs of God; the forming of the woman out of his rib, and ſo providing a meet help for him; giving them dominion over all the creatures, and ſuitable food for the ſupport of the animal life; and God reflected on this, and foreſaw it would be good in the iſſue, as it was in itſelf. And behold, it was very good; it had been ſaid of every thing elſe, at the cloſe of each day's work, excepting the ſecond, that it was good; but here the expreſſion is ſtronger upon the creation of man, the chief and principal work of God, that it was very good; he being made upright and holy, bearing the image of his creator upon him, and in ſuch circumſtances as to be happy and comfortable himſelf, and to glorify God: the phraſe may be expreſſive not only of the goodneſs of every thing God had made, as it was in itſelf, and in its uſe; but of his complacency, and delight therein, every thing being made for himſelf and for his pleaſure, Rev. iv. 11. and the evening and the morning were the ſixth day; by that time all theſe works on this day were finiſhed; the ſun had gone round the earth, or the earth about that, for the ſpace of twenty-four hours, which compleated the ſixth day, within which term of time God had determined to finiſh all his works, as he did. This day, according to Capellus, was the twenty-third of April, and, according to archbiſhop Uſher, the 28th of October, or, as others, the ſixth of September. Mr. Whiſton, as has been before obſerved, is of opinion, that the ſix days of the creation were equal to ſix years: and the Perſians have a tradition, which they pretend to have received from Zoroaſtres, that God created the world, not in ſix natural days, but in ſix times or ſpaces of different length, called in their tongue Ghahan barha. The firſt of theſe ſpaces, in which the heavens were created, was a ſpace of 45 days; the ſecond, in which the waters were created, 60 days; the third, in which the earth was created, 75 days; the fourth, in which graſs and trees were created, 30 days; the fifth, in which all creatures were made, 80 days; the ſixth, in which man was created, 75 days, in all 365 days, or a full year [r]. The firſt of the ſix principal good works they are taught to do, is to obſerve the times of the creation [s]. And the ancient Tuſcans or Etruriaus allot ſix thouſand years to the creation; the order of which, with them, is much the ſame with the Moſaic account, only making a day a thouſand years: in the firſt thouſand, they ſay God made the heaven and the earth; in the next, the firmament, which appears to us, calling it heaven; in the third, the ſea, and all the waters that are in the earth; in the fourth the great lights, the ſun and moon, and alſo the ſtars; in the fifth, every volatile, reptile, and four-footed animal, in the air, earth and water (which agrees with Picherellus; ſee the note on ℣. 25.) and in the ſixth, man; and whereas they ſay God employed twelve thouſand years in all his creation, and the firſt ſix being paſſed at the creation of man, it ſeems, according to them, that mankind are to continue for the other ſix thouſand years [t]. And it is a notion that obtains among the Jews, that anſwerable to the ſix days of creation, the world will continue ſix thouſand years. It is a tradition of Elias [u], an ancient Jewiſh doctor, that "the world ſhall ſtand ſix thouſand years, "two thouſand void, two thouſand under the law, "and two thouſand, the days of the Meſſiah." And Baal Hatturim [w] obſerves, there are ſix Alephs in the firſt verſe of this chapter, anſwerable to the ſix thouſand years the world is to continue: and R. Gedaliah ſays [x], at the end of the ſixth millennium the world ſhall return without form and void, (to its former condition, tohu and bohu) and the whole ſhall be a ſabbath: and very particular is another writer [y] of theirs concerning theſe ſix days of the creation, who having ſpoken of the day of judgment, the reſurrection of the dead, and the world to come, obſerves, that the ſix days work is an intimation and ſign of theſe things: on the ſixth day man was created, and the work was perfected on the ſeventh; ſo the kings of the nations ſhall be in the world five thouſand years, anſwerable to the five days in which the fowls, and creeping things of the waters, and the reſt, were created; and the holding of their kingdoms will be a little within the ſixth millennium, anſwerable to the creation of cattle and beaſts, who were now created on the beginning of it, the ſixth day; and the kingdom of the houſe of David will be in the ſixth millennium, anſwerable to the creation of man, who knew his creator, and ruled over them all; and at the end of that millennium will be the day of judgment, anſwerable to man's being judged at the end of it, the ſixth day; and the ſeventh millennium will be the ſabbath. And a like notion obtains among the Perſian Magi; it is ſaid that Zerduſht, or Zoroaſtres, was born in the middle age of the world, ſo it was told him from the age of Keiomaras (the firſt man) unto thy age are 3000 years, and from this thy age unto the reſurrection are 3000 years [z].

CHAP. II.

IN this chapter are contained a ſummary of the works of creation on the ſix days, and God's reſting from his works on the ſeventh day, and the ſanctification of that, ℣. 1, 2, 3, 4. and an account of various things relating to ſeveral parts of the creation enlarged on and explained, and of various circumſtances omitted in the preceding chapter, which could not ſo well be taken notice of there; as of a miſt ariſing out of the earth, which watered the herbs and plants before there was any rain to fall upon them, or a man to cultivate them, ℣. 5, 6. and of the matter and manner of man's formation, ℣. 7. and of the planting of the garden of Eden, and the trees that were in it, and the rivers that watered it, and ſprung from it, and the courſe they ſteered, the countries they waſhed, and what thoſe countries abounded with, ℣. 8—14. of man's being put into it to dreſs it, and keep it, and of the grant he had to eat of the fruit of any of the trees in it, excepting one, which was forbidden under a penalty of death, ℣. 15, 16, 17. and of all the creatures, beaſts and fowls, being brought to him, to give them names, ℣. 18, 19, 20. and of God's providing an help-meet for him, and forming Eve out of one of his ribs, and of their marriage together, and the inſtitution of marriage, ℣. 21—24. and the chapter is concluded with obſerving the preſent ſtate and circumſtances of our firſt parents before they fell, ℣. 25.

℣. 1. Thus the heavens and the earth were finiſhed, &c.] Perfected and compleated in the ſpace of ſix days, gradually, ſucceſſively, in the manner before related; by the word and power of God they were on the firſt day created out of nothing, but they were not perfected, beautified, and adorned, and filled, until all the creatures in them were made: and all the hoſt of them; of the heavens and the earth; the hoſt of the heavens are the ſun, moon and ſtars, often ſo called in ſcripture, and alſo the angels; ſee Luke ii. 13. wherefore this may be conſidered as a proof of their creation within the above ſpace of time, probably on the firſt day, though the Jews commonly ſay on the ſecond; for if all the hoſt of heaven were made at this time, and angels are at leaſt a part of that hoſt, then they muſt be then made, or otherwiſe all the hoſt of heaven were not then and there made, as here affirmed: and the hoſt of the earth, or terraqueous globe, are the plants, herbs and trees, the fowls, fiſhes, animals and man; and theſe are like hoſts or armies, very numerous, and at the command of God, and are marſhalled and kept in order by him; even ſome of the ſmalleſt of creatures are his army, which are at his beck, and he can make uſe of to the annoyance of others, as particularly the locuſts are called, Joel ii. 11, 20.

℣. 2. And on the ſeventh day God ended his work, which he had made, &c.] Not that God wrought any thing on the ſeventh day, or finiſhed any part of his work on that day, becauſe he could not then be ſaid to reſt from all his work, as he is afterwards twice ſaid to do; and becauſe of this ſeeming difficulty the Septuagint, Samaritan and Syriac verſions read on the ſixth day. The two latter verſions following the former, which ſo tranſlated for the ſake of Ptolemy king of Egypt, as the Jews ſay [a], that he might not object that God did any work on the ſabbath-day: and Joſephus [b] obſerves, that Moſes ſays the world, and all things in it, were made in thoſe ſix days, as undoubtedly they were; and were all finiſhed on the ſixth day, as appears from the laſt verſe of the preceding chapter; and yet there is no occaſion to alter the text, or ſuppoſe a various reading. Some, as Aben Ezra obſerves, take the ſenſe of the word to be, before the ſeventh day God ended his work, as they think ב may be rendered, and as it is by Noldius [c]: or the words may tranſlated, in the ſeventh day, when God had ended, or finiſhed his work [d], which he had done on the ſixth day, then he reſted on the ſeventh day from all his works which he had made; not as though weary of working, for the creator of the ends of the earth fainteth not, nor is weary, Iſ. xl. 28. but as having done all his work, and brought it to ſuch perfection, that he had no more to do; not that he ceaſed from making individuals, as the ſouls of men, and even all creatures that are brought into the world by generation, may be ſaid to be made by him, but from making any new ſpecies of creatures; and much leſs did he ceaſe from ſupporting and maintaining the creatures he had made in their beings, and providing every thing agreeable for them, and governing them, and over-ruling all things in the world for ends of his own glory; in this ſenſe he worketh hitherto, as Chriſt ſays, John v. 17.

℣. 3. And God bleſſed the ſeventh day, and ſanctified it, &c.] A day in which he took delight and pleaſure, having finiſhed all his works, and reſting from them, and looking over them as very good; and ſo he pronounced this day a good and happy day, and ſanctified or appointed it in his mind to be a day ſeparated from others, for holy ſervice and worſhip; as it was with the Jews when they became a body of people, both civil and eccleſiaſtical: or this is all ſaid by way of prolepſis or anticipation, as many things in this chapter are, many names of countries and rivers, by which being called in the times of Moſes, are here given them, though they were not called by them ſo early, nor till many ages after: and according to Jarchi this paſſage reſpects future time, when God bleſſed this day with the manna, which deſcended on all the other days of the week, an omer for a man, and on the ſixth day double food; and he ſanctified it with the manna which did not deſcend at all on that day: beſides, theſe words may be read in a parentheſis, as containing an account of a fact that was done, not at the beginning of the world, and on the firſt ſeventh day of it; but of what had been done in the times of Moſes, who wrote this, after the giving of the law of the ſabbath; and this being given through his hands to the people of Iſrael, he takes this opportunity here to inſert it, and very pertinently, ſeeing the reaſon why God then, in the times of Moſes, bleſſed the ſabbath-day, and hallowed it, was, becauſe he had reſted on that day from all his works, Exod. xx. 11. and the ſame reaſon is given here, taken plainly out out of that law which he had delivered to them: becauſe that in it he had reſted from all his work, which God created and made; which ſhows, that this refers not to the ſame time when God bleſſed and hallowed the ſeventh day, which was done in the times of Moſes, but to what had been long before, and was then given as a reaſon enforcing it; for it is not here ſaid, as in the preceding verſe, he reſted, but had reſted, even from the foundation of the world, when his works were finiſhed, as in Heb. iv. 3. even what he created to make [c], as the words may be here rendered; which he created out of nothing, as he did the firſt matter, in order to make all things out of it, and put them in that order, and bring them to that perfection he did.

℣. 4. Theſe are the generations of the heavens and the earth, when they were created, &c.] That is, the above account delivered in the preceding chapter, is a hiſtory of the production of the heavens and earth, and of all things in them; the creation of them being a kind of generation, and the day of their creation a ſort of birth-day; ſee ch. v. 1. Matt. i. 1. in the day that the Lord God made the earth, and the heavens; meaning not any particular day, not the firſt day, in which the heavens and the earth were created; but referring to the whole time of the ſix days, in which every thing in them, and relating to them, were made. Here another name is added to God, his name Jehovah expreſſive of his being and perfections, particularly his eternity and immutability, being the everlaſting and unchangeable I am, which is, and was, and is to come: this name, according to the Jews, is not to be pronounced, and therefore they put the points of Adonai, directing it ſo to be read; and theſe two names, Jehovah Elohim, or Adonai and Elohim, with them make the full and perfect name of God, and which they obſerve is here very pertinently given him, upon the perfection and completion of his works.

℣. 5. And every plant of the field, before it was in the earth, &c.] That is, God made it, even he who made the heavens and the earth; for theſe words depend upon the preceding, and are in cloſe connection with them; ſignifying, that the plants of the field, which were made out of the earth on the third day, were made before any were planted in it, or any ſeed was ſown therein, from whence they could proceed, and therefore muſt be the immediate production of divine power: and every herb of the field before it grew; thoſe at once ſprung up in perfection out of the earth, before there were any that budded forth, and grew up by degrees to perfection, as herbs do now: for the Lord God had not cauſed it to rain upon the earth; ſo that the production of plants and herbs in their firſt formation could not be owing to that; ſince on the third day, when they were made, there was no ſun to exhale and draw up the waters into the clouds, in order to be let down again in ſhowers of rain: and there was not a man to till the ground; who was not created till the ſixth day, and therefore could have no concern in the cultivation of the earth, and of the plants and herbs in it; but theſe were the produce of almighty power, without the uſe of any means: ſome Jewiſh writers [f] by the plant and herb of the field, myſtically underſtand the firſt and ſecond Meſſiah, for they ſometimes feign two; ſee Iſ. iv. 2. Ezek. xxxiv. 29.

℣. 6. But there went up a miſt from the earth, &c.] After the waters had been drained off from it, and it was warmed by the body of light and heat created on the firſt day, which cauſed a reek which went up as a miſt, and deſcended: and watered the whole face of the ground; or earth, and ſo ſupplied the place of rain, until that was given: though rather the words may be rendered disjunctively, or there went up [g]; that is, before a miſt went up, when as yet there was none; not ſo much as a miſt to water the earth, and yet plants and herbs were made to grow; and ſo Saadiah reads them negatively, nor did a miſt go up; there were no vapours exhaled to form clouds, and produce rain, and yet the whole earth on the third day was covered with plants and herbs; and this is approved of by Kimchi and Ben Melech.

℣. 7. And the Lord God formed man of the duſt of the ground, &c.] Not of dry duſt, but as Joſephus [h] ſays, of red earth macerated, or mixed with water; the like notion Heſiod [i] has; or out of clay, as in Job xxxiii. 6. hence a word is made uſe of, tranſlated formed, which is uſed of the potter that forms his clay into what ſhape he pleaſes: the original matter of which man was made was clay; hence the clay of Prometheus [k] with the heathens; and God is the potter that formed him, and gave him the ſhape he has, ſee Iſ. lxiv. 8. there are two jods, it is obſerved, in the word, which is not uſual; reſpecting, as Jarchi thinks, the formation of man for this world, and for the reſurrection of the dead; but rather the twofold formation of body and ſoul, the one is expreſſed here, and the other in the following clauſe: and this, as it ſhews the mighty power of God in producing ſuch a creature out of the duſt of the earth, ſo it ſerves to humble the pride of man, when he conſiders he is of the earth, earthy, duſt and aſhes, is duſt, and to duſt he muſt return. And breathed into his noſtrils the breath of life; which in that way entered into his body, and quickened it, which before was a lifeleſs lump of clay, though beautifully ſhapen: it is in the plural number, the breath of lives [l], including the vegetative, ſenſitive and rational life of man. And this was produced not with his body, as the ſouls of brutes were, and was produced by the breath of God, as theirs were not; nor theirs out of the earth, as his body was: and theſe two different productions ſhew the different nature of the ſoul and body of man, the one is material and mortal, the other immaterial and immortal: and man became a living ſoul; or a living man, not only capable of performing the functions of the animal life, of eating, drinking, walking, &c. but of thinking, reaſoning and diſcourſing as a rational creature.

℣. 8. And the Lord God planted a garden eaſtward in Eden, &c.] Or had planted [m], for this was not now done, after the formation of man, but before; and ſo the word tranſlated eaſtward may be rendered, as it is by ſome, before [n]: for the plain meaning is, that God had planted a garden before he made man, even on the third day, when all herbs, and plants, and trees were produced out of the earth. The whole world was as a garden, in com-compariſon of what it is now ſince the fall: what then muſt this ſpot of ground, this garden be, which was ſeparated and diſtinguiſhed from the reſt, and the more immediate plantation of God, and therefore is called the garden of the Lord, Gen. xiii. 10. Ezek. xxviii. 13. and which Plato [o] calls Διος κηπος, Jove's garden. This garden was planted in the country of Eden, ſo called very probably from its being a very pleaſant and delightful country; and though it is not certain, and cannot be ſaid exactly where it was, yet it ſeems to be a part of Meſopotamia, ſince it is more than once mentioned with Haran, which was in that country, 2 Kings xix. 12. Iſ. xxxvii. 12. Ezek. xxvii. 23. and ſince it was by the rivers Tigris and Euphrates, when they were become one ſtream, which ran thro' this country, and parted again at this garden; and the country there, as Herodotus [p] ſays, is the moſt fruitful he every ſaw; and it ſeems to be much better to place it here than in Armenia, where the fountain of theſe rivers is ſaid to be: ſo Tournefort [q] thinks it lay in the country, or plain of the three churches (or Ejmiadzit) in Armenia, about twenty French leagues diſtant from the heads of Euphrates and Araxes, and near as many from the Phaſis, a country exceeding pleaſant and fruitful. A very learned man [r] is of opinion, that the garden of Eden was in the land of Judea to the eaſt, by the lake of Geneſaret or Tiberias, and the lake of Aſphaltites, called the Dead Sea, and takes in in its compaſs the famous valley, or the great plain, and the plains of Jericho, and great part of Galilee, and all that tract which Jordan flows by, from Geneſaret to the country of Sodom; and he takes the river Jordan to be יאר עדן the river of Eden, from whence it has its name of Jordan; and Geneſaret, he interprets as if it was גן שר Ganſar, the garden of the prince, that is of Adam, the prince of all mankind. He argues from the ſituation of the place, and the pleaſantneſs and fruitfulneſs of it, the balſam of Jericho, and other odoriferous plants that grew there, and what are called the apples of paradiſe: and it muſt be owned, that this country abounded with gardens and orchards: it is mentioned in the Jewiſh Miſnah, where the commentators [s] ſay, it was a country in the land of Iſrael, in which were many gardens and orchards, that produced excellent fruit; and the fruits of Geneſaret are ſpoken of in the Talmud [t], as exceeding ſweet: and with this agrees the account Joſephus [u] gives of it, that it is "wonderful in nature and goodneſs, and through its fertility refuſes no plant; every thing is ſet here; the temper of the air ſuits with different things; here grow nuts, and more winter-fruit; and there palms, which are nouriſhed with heat, and near them figs and olives, which require a ſofter air — not only it produces apples of different ſorts, beyond belief, but long preſerves them; and indeed the moſt excellent of fruit; grapes and figs it furniſhes with for ten months, without intermiſſion, and other fruit throughout the whole year, growing old with them." And it may be further obſerved, that it is aſked by the Jewiſh Rabbins, why it is called Geneſar? and the anſwer is, becauſe גנסרי מלכים the gardens of princes; theſe are the kings who have gardens in the midſt of it: another reaſon is given, becauſe it belonged to Naphtali, a portion in the midſt of it, as it it ſaid, and of Naphtali a thouſand princes, 1 Chron. xii. 34. [w] And it is worthy of remark, that Strabo calls Jericho, which was within this tract, the paradiſe of balſam [x]; and there, and hereabout, as Diodorus Siculus [y] and Juſtin [z] relate, grew this aromatic plant, and no where elſe; it was not to be found in any other part of the world. And it appears from ſcripture, that if the plain of Jordan was not the garden of Eden, it is ſaid to be as the garden of the Lord, Gen. xiii. 10. and if the caph or as is not a note of ſimilitude, but of reality, as it ſometimes is, it proves it to be the very place; and the above learned writer takes it to be not comparative, but illative, as giving a reaſon why it was ſo well watered, becauſe it was the garden of the Lord: and the Jews have ſome notion of this, for they ſay, if that the garden of Eden is in the land of Iſrael, Bethſhean is the door of it, or entrance into it; the gloſs gives this reaſon, becauſe the fruits were ſweeter than any other [a]; and this was near, at the entrance of the great plain, before mentioned; and before which was this place, as Joſephus ſays [b]: and if the garden of Eden was in thoſe parts, it may be obſerved, that where the firſt Adam firſt dwelt, and where he ſinned and fell, Chriſt the ſecond Adam frequently was; here he converſed much, taught his doctrines, wrought his miracles; and even here he appeared after his reſurrection from the dead. But the opinions of men about this place are very many, and there is ſcarce any country in the whole world, but one or another has placed the garden of Eden in it; nay, ſome have aſſigned a place for it out of the earth, in the eighth ſphere. Such a garden undoubtedly there was ſome where, and it is ſaid to be placed eaſtward, either in the eaſtern part of the country of Eden, ſee ch. iv. 16. or to the eaſt of the deſart where Moſes was when he wrote; or to the eaſt of Judea, as Meſopotamia was: and if this garden was in Judea, the place aſſigned for it, by the above learned perſon, it was in the eaſtern part of that country; ſee Numb. xxxii. 19. This garden was an emblem, either of the church of Chriſt on earth, which is a garden incloſed, ſurrounded with divine power, and diſtinguiſhed with divine grace; a ſmall ſpot in compariſon of the world; is of Jehovah's planting, and is his property; and is an Eden to his people, where they enjoy much ſpiritual pleaſure and delight: or however of the place and ſtate of the happineſs of the ſaints in the other world, often called a paradiſe, in alluſion to this, Luke xxiii. 43. 2 Cor. xii. 4. Rev. ii. 7. and which is of God's planting, and therefore called the paradiſe of God, and is an Eden, where are pleaſures for evermore: and this ſeems to be what the Jews mean, when they ſay [c], that the garden of Eden, or paradiſe, was created before the world was; which is no other than what Chriſt ſays of it in other words, Matt. xxv. 34. and there he put the man whom he had formed; not as ſoon as he had planted the garden, but as ſoon as he had made made man; and from hence it is generally concluded, that man was made without the garden, and brought from the place where he was formed, and put into it; and which ſome ſay was near Damaſcus: but be it where it will, it is moſt probable that it was not far from the garden; though there ſeems no neceſſity for ſuppoſing him to be made out of it; for the putting him into it may ſignify the appointing and ordering him to be there, and fixing and ſettling him in it, for the ends and uſes mentioned ℣. 15. ſee ch. iii. 23.

℣. 9. And out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every tree that is pleaſant to the ſight, and good for food, &c.] That is, out of the ground of the garden of Eden; and this was done on the third day, when the whole earth brought forth graſs, herbs and trees: but a peculiar ſpot of ground was fixed on for man, and ſtocked with trees of all ſorts for his uſe, not only to bear fruit, which would be ſuitable and agreeable food for him, but others alſo, which would yield him delight to look at; ſuch as the tall cedars for their loftineſs, ſpreading branches and green leaves, with many others; ſo that not only there were trees to gratify the ſenſes of taſting and ſmelling, but that of ſight; and ſuch a ſightly goodly tree to look at was the tree of knowledge, ch. iii. 6. Theſe trees may be an emblem of the ſaints, the trees of righteouſneſs, the planting of the Lord, and made to grow by him through the influence of his Spirit and Grace; and whom he plants in his gardens the churches, and tranſplants into the heavenly paradiſe, and are often compared to palm trees, cedars, olive trees, pomegranates, &c. the tree of life alſo in the midſt of the garden; ſet there as in the moſt excellent place, where it might be moſt conſpicuous, and to be come at; for before Adam ſinned, as there was no prohibition of his eating of it, ſo there was no obſtruction to it; and as he had a grant to eat of it, with the other trees, it was deſigned for his uſe, to ſupport and maintain his natural life, which would have been continued, had he perſiſted in his obedience and ſtate of innocence, and very probably by means of this chiefly: hence the ſon of Sirach calls it the tree of immortality, Eccleſiaſtic. ch. xix. ℣. 19. and it might be alſo a ſign, token and ſymbol to him of his dependence on God; that he received his life from him; and that this was preſerved by his bleſſing and providence, and not by his own power and ſkill; and that this would be continued, provided he tranſgreſſed not the divine law: and it ſeems to have a further reſpect, even to eternal life by Chriſt; for though it might not be a ſymbol of that life to Adam in his ſtate of innocence, yet it became ſo after his fall: hence Chriſt is ſometimes ſignified by the tree of life, Prov. iii. 18. Rev. ii. 7. who is not only the author of natural and ſpiritual life, but the giver of eternal life; the promiſe of it is in him, and the bleſſing itſelf; he has made way for it by his obedience, ſufferings and death, and is the way unto it; it is in his gift, and he beſtows it on all his people, and it will lie greatly in the enjoyment of him. The ſituation of this tree in the midſt of the garden, well agrees with him, who is in the midſt of his church and people, Rev. i. 13. and ii. 7. ſtands open, is in ſight, and is acceſſible to them all now, who may come to him, and partake of the fruits and bleſſings of his grace, which are many, conſtant and durable, Rev. xxii. 2. and who will be ſeen and enjoyed by all, to all eternity: and the tree of knowledge of good and evil; ſo called, either with reſpect to God, who by it tried man, when he had made him, whether he would be good or evil; but this he foreknew: rather therefore with reſpect to man, not that the eating the fruit of it could really give him ſuch knowledge, nor did he need it; for by the law of nature inſcribed on his heart, he knew the difference between good and evil, and that what God commanded was good, and what he forbid was evil: but either it had its name from the virtue ſatan aſcribed to it, ch. iii. 5. or from the ſad event following on man's eating the fruit of it, whereby he became experimentally ſenſible of the difference between good and evil, between obedience and diſobedience to the will of God; he found by ſad experience what good he had loſt, or might have enjoyed, and what evil he had brought on himſelf and his poſterity, he might have avoided. What this tree was is not certain; there are various conjectures about it, and nothing elſe can be come at concerning it. Some take it to be the fig-tree, as Jarchi, and ſome in Aben Ezra on ch. iii. 6. becauſe fig leaves were at hand, and immediately made uſe of on eating the fruit of it; ſome the vine, and particularly the black grape, as in the book of Zohar [d]; others, as Baal Hatturim on ch. i. 29. the pome-citron, or citron apple-tree [e]; others, the common apple, as the author of the old Nizzechon [f], and which is the vulgar notion; evil and an apple being called by the ſame Latin word malum: in the Talmud [g], ſome ſay it was the vine, ſome the fig-tree, and others wheat [h]: the Mahometans ſay it was a tree, called by the Africans by the name of Muſa [i].

℣. 10. And a river went out of Eden to water the garden, &c.] Before man was created, as Aben Ezra obſerves, this river went out of Eden and watered it on every ſide; but what river is here meant, is hard to ſay. It is more generally thought to be the river Euphrates, when that and the Tigris met, and became one ſtream or river, and as ſuch entered and paſſed thro' Eden; and as it was parted into four rivers afterwards, in two of which they retained their names: the learned Reland [k] thinks, this river is now loſt; but the learned writer before referred to thinks, as has been obſerved, that it is the river Jordan; ſee the note on ℣. 8. and which, as Pliny [l] ſays, was a very pleaſant river: and from thence it was parted, and became into four heads; after it had paſſed through Eden, and the garden in it, watering it, it divided into four parts or heads of water, or four chief principal rivers, hereafter mentioned; and which circumſtance the above writer thinks makes it the more probable to be the river Jordan, which and with the four rivers are ſpoken of together by the ſon of Sirach, Eccleſiaſtic. xxiv. 25, 26, 27. he filleth all things with his wiſdom, as Phiſon, and as Tigris in the time of the new fruits; he maketh the underſtanding to abound like Euphrates, and as Jordan in the time of harveſt; he maketh the doctrine of knowledge to appear as the light, and as Geon in the time of vintage: of which in the following verſes. This river may be an emblem of the everlaſting love of God, that pure river of water of life, which ſprings from the throne of God, and of the Lamb, from divine ſovereignty, and not from the faith, love and obedience of man; that river, the ſtreams whereof make glad the city of God, and which water the garden, the church, revive its plants, and make it fruitful and delightful; the four heads or branches of which are eternal election of God, particular redemption by Chriſt, regeneration and ſanctification by the Spirit, and eternal life and happineſs, as the free gift of God through Chriſt; ſee Pſ. xlvi. 4. Rev. xxii. 1.

℣. 11. The name of the firſt is Piſon, &c.] Not the river Nile in Egypt, as Jarchi, who thinks it is derived from Paſhah, which ſignifies to increaſe, expand and diffuſe, as that does at certain times, and ſpreads itſelf over the land of Egypt, or from Piſhten linen, which grows there, Iſ. xix. 9. nor the river Ganges in India, as Joſephus [m], and others; for the country where it is afterwards ſaid to run, agrees with neither Egypt nor India: rather it ſeems to be the ſame river, which is the Phaſis of Pliny [n], and Strabo [o], and the Phyſcus of Xenophon [p], and the Hyphaſis of Philoſtorgius [q], a river in Armenia, and about Colchis; and which is ſometimes called Paſitigris, being a branch of that river, and mixed with, or ariſing from channels, drawn from Tigris, Euphrates, and other waters [r]: that is it which compaſſeth the whole land of Havilah, where there is gold; this country had its name from Havilah, one of the ſons of Cuſh, Gen. x. 7. who very probably ſeated himſelf near his brother Seba, from whom came the Sabeans, who inhabited one part of Arabia; and Havilah, it is plain, was before Egypt, in the way to Aſſyria, and bordered upon the Iſhmaelites, who inhabited Arabia deſerta, Gen. xxv. 16, 17, 18. 1 Sam. xv. 7. So that it ſeems to be a country in Arabia, near unto, or a part of Cuſh or Arabia Cuſea, and near to Seba or Arabia felix: and ſo Strabo, among the nations of the Arabians, and along with the Nabatheans, places the Chaulotæans [s], who ſeem to be no other than the poſterity of Havilah: according to the learned Reland [t], it is the ſame with Colchis, a part of Scythia, and Phaſis is well known to be a river of Colchis; and which runs into Pontus, as appears from Pliny [u]; and includes Scythia, as Juſtin [w] ſays; and then it muſt have its name from Havilah, the ſon of Joktan, Gen. x. 29. and in either of theſe countries there was gold, and an abundance of it, and of the beſt, as follows:

℣. 12. And the gold of that land is good, &c.] Arabia was famous for gold: Diodorus Siculus [x] ſpeaks of gold in Arabia, called apyrus, which is not melted by fire out of ſmall filings, as other; but as ſoon as dug is ſaid to be pure gold, and that in the bigneſs of cheſnuts, and of ſuch a flaming colour, that the moſt precious ſtones are ſet in it by artificers for ornament: and in Colchis and Scythia, as Strabo [y] relates, there are rivers which produce gold; and from whence came the fable of the golden fleece, the Argonauts went to Colchis for: there is the bdellium, and the onyx ſtone; the firſt of this is either an aromatic gum; the tree, according to Pliny [z], is black, and is of the bigneſs of an olive tree, has the leaf of an oak, and its fruit is like capers; it is found in Arabia, India, Media and Babylon; but the beſt, according to him, is in Bactriana, and next to that the bdellium of Arabia: or elſe it is a precious ſtone, and which the Jewiſh writers [a] commonly take to be cryſtal; and, according to Solinus [b], the beſt cryſtal is in Scythia. Bochart [c] would have it that the pearl is meant, becauſe of its whiteneſs and roundneſs, for which the manna is compared to it, Numb. xi. 7. and the rather becauſe of the pearl fiſhery at Catipha, taking Havilah to be that part of Arabia which lies upon the Perſian gulph. The latter, the onyx, is a precious ſtone, which has its name from its being of the colour of a man's nail; and, according to Pliny [d], the onyx marble is found in the mountains of Arabia, and the ancients thought it was no where elſe; and he ſpeaks elſewhere of the Arabian onyx precious ſtone, and of the ſardonyx, as in the ſame country [e]; and ſome think that is here meant; though the word is ſometimes by the Septuagint rendered the emerald; and the beſt of theſe, according to Solinus [f] and Pliny [g], were in Scythia.

℣. 13. And the name of the ſecond river is Gihon, &c.] There was one of this name in the land of Iſrael, which, or a branch of it, flowed near Jeruſalem, 1 Kings i. 33. 2 Chron. xxxii. 30. this Aben Ezra ſuggeſts is here meant, and which favours the notion of the above learned man, that the garden of Eden was in the land of Iſrael. Joſephus [h] takes it to be the river Nile, as do many others; it ſeems to have been a branch of the river Euphrates or Tigris, on the eaſtern ſide, as Phiſon was on the weſt; and ſo Aben Ezra ſays it came from the ſouth-eaſt. The learned Reland [i] will have it to be the river Araxes: it has its name, according to Jarchi, from the force it goes with, and the noiſe it makes. And it ſeems to have its name from גרח, which ſignifies to come forth with great force, as this river is ſaid to do, when it pours itſelf into the Baltic ſea. The ſame is it that compaſſeth the whole land of Ethiopia; either Ethiopia above Egypt; and this favours the notion of thoſe, who take Gihon to be the Nile: for Pauſanias [k] ſays, that it was commonly reported that the Nile was Euphrates, which diſappearing in a marſh, roſe up above Ethiopia, and became the Nile, and ſo waſhed that country, and is thought to agree very well with the Moſaic account: or elſe that Cuſh or Ethiopia, which bordered on Midian, and was a part of Arabia, and may be called Arabia Chuſea, often meant by Cuſh in ſcripture. Reland [l] thinks the country of the Coſſæans or Cuſſæans, a people bordering on Media, the country of Kubeſtan, a province of Perſia, is intended.

℣. 14. The name of the third river is Hiddekel, &c.] A river which ran by Shuſhan in Perſia, and retained its name in the times of Daniel, ch. x. 4. where it is called the great river; and it ſeems it bears the ſame name now among the Perſians; at leaſt it did an hundred and fifty years ago, when Rauwolf [m] travelled in thoſe parts. The Targum of Jonathan here calls it Diglath, the ſame with the Diglito of Pliny [n]; and according to him it is called Tigris, from its ſwiftneſs, either from the Tyger, a ſwift creature, or from גרא to dart, in the Chaldee language; and ſo Curtius [o] ſays, that in the Perſian language they call a dart Tigris; and and with this agrees the word Hiddekel, which in the Hebrew language ſignifies ſharp and ſwift, as a poliſhed arrow is; and Jarchi ſays it is ſo called, becauſe its waters are ſharp and ſwift: though this is contradicted by ſome modern travellers [p], who ſay it is a ſlower ſtream than the Euphrates, and is not only very crooked, and full of meanders, but alſo choaked up with iſlands, and great banks of ſtone: that is it which goeth towards the eaſt of Aſſyria; a country which had its name from Aſhur, a ſon of Shem, Gen. x. 11, 22. it became a famous kingdom and monarchy, Niniveh was the metropolis of it, which was built on the river Tigris or Hiddekel; and, as before obſerved, it ran by Shuſhan in Perſia; and ſo as Diodorus Siculus [q] ſays, it paſſed through Media into Meſopotamia; and which very well agrees with its being, according to Moſes, one of the rivers of Eden. Twelve miles up this river, from Moſul, near which Niniveh once ſtood, lies an iſland, called the iſland of Eden, in the heart of the Tigris, about ten Engliſh miles in circuit, and is ſaid to be undoubtedly a part of paradiſe [r]. and the fourth river is Euphrates; or Phrat, as in the Hebrew tongue. Reland [s] ſeems rightly to judge, that the ſyllable Eu, prefixed to it, is the Perſian au or eu, which in that language ſignifies water; ſo that Euphrates is no other than the water of Phrat, ſo called from the fruitfulneſs of it; for its waters, as Jarchi ſays, fructify, increaſe and fatten the earth; and who rightly obſerves that theſe names, and ſo thoſe of other rivers, and of the countries here mentioned, are named by a prolepſis or anticipation, theſe being the names they bore when Moſes wrote; unleſs it may be thought to be the Hebrew הוא Hu, the, that Phrat; and which the Greeks have made an eu of.

℣. 15. And the Lord God took the man, and put him into the garden of Eden, &c.] This is obſerved before in ℣. 8. and is here repeated to introduce what follows; and is to be underſtood not of a corporal aſſumption, by a divine power lifting him up from the place where he was, and carrying him into another; rather of a manuduction, or taking him by the hand and leading him thither; ſo Onkelos renders it, he led him, that is, he ordered and directed him thither: hence Jarchi paraphraſes it, he took him with good words, and perſuaded him to go thither: the place from whence he is ſuppoſed by ſome to be taken was near Damaſcus, where he is by them ſaid to be created; or the place where the temple was afterwards built, as ſay the Jewiſh writers: the Targum of Jonathan is, "the Lord God took the man from the mount of "Service, the place in which he was created, and "cauſed him to dwell in the garden of Eden." And elſewhere [t] it is ſaid, "the holy bleſſed God "loved the firſt Adam with an exceeding great "love, for he created him out of a pure and holy "place; and from what place did he take him? "from the place of the houſe of the ſanctuary, "and brought him into his palace, as it is ſaid, "Gen. ii. 15. and the Lord God took," &c. though no more perhaps is intended by this expreſſion, than that God ſpoke to him, or impreſſed it on his mind, and inclined him to go, or ſtay there: to dreſs it, and to keep it; ſo that it ſeems man was not to live an idle life, in a ſtate of innocence; but this could not be attended with toil and labour, with fatigue and trouble, with ſorrow and ſweat, as after his fall; but was rather for his recreation and pleaſure; though what by nature was left, to be improved by art; and what there was for Adam to do, is not eaſy to ſay: at preſent there needed no plowing, nor ſowing, nor planting, nor watering, ſince God had made every tree pleaſant to the ſight, and good for food, to grow out of it; and a river ran through it to water it: hence in a Jewiſh tract [u], before referred to, it is ſaid, that his work in the garden was nothing elſe but to ſtudy in the words of the law, and to keep or obſerve the way of the tree of life: and to this agree the Targums of Jonathan and of Jeruſalem, "and he "placed him in the garden of Eden, to ſerve "in the law, and keep the commands of it." And in another tract [w] it is ſaid, "God brought Adam "the law, Job xxviii. 27. and he put him in the "garden of Eden; that is, the garden of the law, "to dreſs it, to do the affirmative precepts of the "law, and to keep it, the negative precepts:" though Aben Ezra interprets this ſervice of watering the garden, and keeping wild beaſts from entring into it. And indeed the word may be rendered to till, as well as to dreſs, as it is in ch. iii. 23. and by Ainſworth here; ſo Milton [x] expreſſes it; and ſome have thought Adam was to have planted and ſowed, had he continued in the garden.

℣. 16. And the Lord God commanded the man, &c.] Over whom he had power and authority; and he had a right to command him what he pleaſed, being his creator, benefactor and preſerver; and this is to be underſtood not of man only, but of the woman alſo, whoſe creation, though related afterwards, yet was before this grant to eat of all the trees of the garden but one, and the prohibition of the fruit of that; for that ſhe was in being, and preſent at this time, ſeems manifeſt from ch. iii. 2, 3. ſaying, of every tree of the garden thou mayeſt freely eat; a very generous, large and liberal allowance this: or in eating thou mayeſt eat [y]; which was giving full power, and leaving them without any doubt and uncertainty about their food; which they might freely take, and freely eat of, wherever they found it, or were inclined to, even of any, and every tree in the garden, excepting one, next forbidden.

℣. 17. But of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, &c.] Of the name of this tree, and the reaſons of it, ſee the note on ℣. 9. thou ſhalt not eat of it; not that this tree had any efficacy in it to increaſe knowledge, and improve in ſcience and underſtanding, as ſatan ſuggeſted God knew; and therefore forbid the eating of it out of envy to man, which the divine being is uncapable of; or that there was any thing hurtful in it to the bodies of men, if they had eat of it; or that it was unlawful and evil of itſelf, if it had not been expreſly prohibited: but it was, previous to this injunction, a quite indifferent thing whether man eat of it or no; and therefore was pitched upon as a trial of man's obedience to God, under whoſe government he was, and whom it was fit he ſhould obey in all things; and ſince he had a grant of all the trees of the garden, but this, it was the greater aggravation of his offence, that he ſhould not abſtain from it: for in the day thou eateſt thereof, thou ſhalt ſurely die; or in dying, die [z]; which denotes the cer-certainty of it, as our verſion expreſſes it; and may have regard to more deaths than one; not only a corporal one, which in ſome ſenſe immediately took place, man became at once a mortal creature, who otherwiſe continuing in a ſtate of innocence, and by eating of the tree of life, he was allowed to do, would have lived an immortal life; of the eating of which tree, by ſinning he was debarred, his natural life not now to be continued long, at leaſt not for ever; he was immediately arraigned, tried and condemned to death, was found guilty of it, and became obnoxious to it, and death at once began to work in him; ſin ſowed the ſeeds of it in his body, and a train of miſeries, afflictions and diſeaſes began to appear, which at length iſſued in death. Moreover, a ſpiritual or moral death immediately enſued; he loſt his original righteouſneſs, in which he was created; the image of God in him was deformed; the powers and faculties of his ſoul were corrupted, and he became dead in ſins and treſpaſſes; the conſequence of which, had it not been for the interpoſition of a ſurety and Saviour, who engaged to make ſatisfaction to law and juſtice, muſt have been eternal death, or an everlaſting ſeparation from God, to him and all his poſterity; for the wages of ſin is death, even death eternal, Rom. vi. 23. So the Jews [a] interpret this of death, both in this world, and in the world to come.

℣. 18. And the Lord God ſaid, &c.] Not at the ſame time he gave the above direction and inſtruction to man, how to behave according to his will, but before that, even at the time of the formation of Adam; and which he ſaid either to him, or with himſelf: it was a purpoſe or determination in his own mind, and may be rendered, as it is by many, he had ſaid [b], on the ſixth day, on which man was created, it is not good that man ſhould be alone; not pleaſant and comfortable to himſelf, nor agreeable to his nature, being a ſocial creature; nor uſeful to his ſpecies, not being able to propagate it; nor ſo much for the glory of his creator: I will make him an help meet for him; one to help him in all the affairs of life, not only for the propagation of his ſpecies, but to provide things uſeful and comfortable for him; to dreſs his food, and take care of the affairs of the family; one like himſelf [c], in nature, temper and diſpoſition, in form and ſhape; or one as before him [d], that would be pleaſing to his ſight, and with whom he might delightfully converſe, and be in all reſpects agreeable to him, and entirely anſwerable to his caſe and circumſtances, his wants and wiſhes.

℣. 19. And out of the ground the Lord God formed every beaſt of the field, and every fowl of the air, &c.] Or had formed them [e] on the fifth and ſixth days; and theſe were formed two and two, male and female, in order to continue their ſpecies; whereas man was made ſingle, and had no companion of the ſame nature with him: and whilſt in theſe circumſtances, God brought them unto Adam; or to the man [f]; either by the miniſtry of angels, or by a kind of inſtinct or impulſe, which brought them to him of their own accord, as to the lord and proprietor of them, who as ſoon as he was made, had the dominion of all the creatures given him; juſt as the creatures at the flood went in unto Noah in the ark; and as then, ſo now, all creatures, fowl and cattle, came, all but the fiſhes of the ſea: and this was done to ſee what he would call them; what names he would give to them; which as it was a trial of the wiſdom of man, ſo a token of his dominion over the creatures, it being an inſtance of great knowledge of them to give them apt and ſuitable names, ſo as to diſtinguiſh one from another, and point at ſomething in them that was natural to them, and made them different from each other; for this does not ſuppoſe any want of knowledge in God, as if he did this to know what man would do, he knew what names man would give them before he did; but that it might appear he had made one ſuperior to them all in wiſdom and power, and for his pleaſure, uſe and ſervice; and therefore brings them to him, to put them into his hands, and give him authority over them; and being his own, to call them by what names he pleaſed: and whatſoever Adam called every living creature, that was the name thereof; it was always afterwards called by it, by him and his poſterity, until the confuſion of languages, and then every nation called them as they thought proper, every one in their own language: and as there is a good deal of reaſon to believe, that the Hebrew language was the firſt and original language; or however that eaſtern language, of which the Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac and Arabic are ſo many dialects; it was this that he ſpoke, and in it gave names to the creatures ſuitable to their nature, or agreeable to ſome property or other obſerved in them: and Bochart [g] has given us many inſtances of creatures in the Hebrew tongue, whoſe names anſwer to ſome character or another in them: ſome think this was done by inſpiration; and Plato ſays, that it ſeemed to him that that nature was ſuperior to human, that gave names to things; and that this was not the work of vain and fooliſh man, but the firſt names were appointed by the gods [h]; and ſo Cicero [i] aſks, who was the firſt, which with Pythagoras was the higheſt wiſdom, who impoſed names on all things?

℣. 20. And Adam gave names to all cattle, and to the fowls of the air, and to every beaſt of the field, &c.] As they came before him, and paſſed by him, paying as it were their homage to him, their Lord and owner: but for Adam there was not found an help meet for him; and perhaps this might be one reaſon of their being brought unto him, that he might become ſenſible that there was none among all the creatures of his nature, and that was fit to be a companion of his; and to him muſt this be referred, and not to God; not as if God looked out an help meet for him among the creatures, and could find none; but as Aben Ezra obſerves, man could not find one for himſelf; and this made it the more grateful and acceptable to him, when God had formed the woman of him, and preſented her before him.

℣. 21. And the Lord God cauſed a deep ſleep to fall upon Adam, and he ſlept, &c.] This was not a common and natural ſleep that Adam fell into, occaſioned by any wearineſs of the animal ſpirits, in viewing the creatures as they paſſed by him, and in examining them, and giving them ſuitable and proper names; but it was ſupernatural, and from the Lord, his power and providence, who cauſed it to fall upon him: it was not a drowſineſs, nor a ſlumber, but a ſound ſleep: his ſenſes were ſo locked up by it, that he perceived not any thing that that was done to him; and it ſeems to have been on purpoſe, that he might feel no pain, whilſt the operation was made upon him, as well as that it might appear that he had no hand in the formation of the woman; and that he might be the more ſurprized at the ſight of her, juſt awaking out of ſleep, to ſee ſo lovely an object, ſo much like himſelf, and made out of himſelf, and in ſo ſhort a time, as whilſt he was taking a comfortable nap: and he took one of his ribs; with the fleſh along with it: men have commonly, as anatomiſts [k] obſerve, twelve ribs on a ſide; it ſeems by this, that Adam had thirteen. The Targum of Jonathan is, "and he took one of his ribs; that is, "the thirteenth rib of his right ſide:" but our Engliſh poet [l] takes it to be one of the left ſide, and alſo a ſupernumerary one [m]. God made an opening in him, and took it out, without putting him to any pain, and without any ſenſation of it: in what manner this was done we need not enquire; the power of God was ſufficient to perform it; Adam was aſleep when it was done, and ſaw it not, and the manner of the operation is not declared: and cloſed up the fleſh inſtead thereof; ſo that there was no opening left, nor any wound made, or a ſcar appeared, or any loſs ſuſtained, but what was made up by an increaſe of fleſh, or by cloſing up the fleſh; and that being hardened like another rib, and ſo anſwered the ſame purpoſe.

℣. 22. And the rib which the Lord God had taken from man, made he woman, &c.] It is commonly obſerved, and pertinently enough, that the woman was not made from the ſuperior part of man, that ſhe might not be thought to be above him, and have power over him; nor from any inferior part, as being below him, and to be trampled on by him; but out of his ſide, and from one of his ribs, that ſhe might appear to be equal to him; and from a part near his heart, and under his arms, to ſhow that ſhe ſhould be affectionately loved by him, and be always under his care and protection: and ſhe was not created as things were, out of nothing, nor formed as Adam was, out of the duſt of the earth, being in the ſame form as man; but made out of refined and quickened duſt, or the fleſh and bones of man, and ſo in her make and conſtitution fine and lovely; or built [n], as the word ſignifies, which is uſed, becauſe ſhe is the foundation of the houſe or family, and the means of building it up: or rather to denote the ſingular care and art uſed, and fit proportion obſerved in the make of her: and brought her unto the man; from the place where the rib had been carried, and ſhe was made of it; or he brought her, as the parent of her, at whoſe diſpoſe ſhe was, and preſented her to Adam as his ſpouſe, to be taken into a conjugal relation with him, and to be loved and cheriſhed by him; which as it affords a rule and example to be followed by parents and children, the one to diſpoſe of their children in marriage, and the other to have the conſent of their parents in it; as well as it is a recommendation of marriage, as agreeable to the divine will, and to be eſteemed honourable, being of God: ſo it was a type of the marriage of Chriſt, the ſecond Adam, between him and his church, which ſprung from him, from his ſide; and is of the ſame nature with him, and was preſented by his divine father to him, who gave her to him; and he received her to himſelf as his ſpouſe and bride; ſee Eph. v. 29—32.

℣. 23. And Adam ſaid, this is now bone of my bones, and fleſh of my fleſh, &c.] Of his bones, becauſe made out of a pair of his ribs, as ſome think, one on each ſide, and therefore expreſſed in the plural number, and of his fleſh, a part of which was taken with the rib; this Adam knew, either being awake while ſhe was made, though aſleep when the rib was taken out; or by divine revelation, by an impreſs of it on his mind; or it might have been declared to him in a dream, whilſt aſleep, when being in an extacy or trance, this whole affair was repreſented unto him: and this was now done, juſt done, and would be done no more in like manner; this time [o], this once, as many render it; ſo it was, but hereafter the woman was to be produced in the way of generation, as man: ſhe ſhall be called woman, becauſe ſhe was taken out of man; her name was Iſhah, becauſe taken from Iſh, as vira in Latin from vir, and woman in our language from man.

℣. 24. Therefore ſhall a man leave his father, and his mother, &c.] Theſe are thought by ſome to be the words of Moſes, inferring from the above fact, what ought to be among men; and by others, the words of Adam under divine inſpiration, as the father of mankind inſtructing his ſons what to do, and foretelling what would be done in all ſucceeding ages: though they rather ſeem to be the words of God himſelf, by whom marriage was now inſtituted; and who here gives direction about it, and declares the caſe and circumſtance of man upon it, and how he would and ſhould behave: and thus our Lord Jeſus Chriſt quoting theſe words, makes them to be the words of him that made man, male and female, and ſupplies and prefaces them thus, and ſaid, for this cauſe, &c. Matt. xix. 5. ſo Jarchi paraphraſes them, "the Holy Ghoſt ſaid ſo:" not that a man upon his marriage is to drop his affections to his parents, or be remiſs in his obedience to them, honour of them, and eſteem for them, or to neglect the care of them, if they ſtand in need of his aſſiſtance; but that he ſhould depart from his father's houſe, and no more dwell with him, or bed and board in his houſe; but having taken a wife to himſelf, ſhould provide an habitation for him and her to dwell together: ſo all the three Targums interpret it, of quitting the houſe of his father, and his mother's bed, and ſhall cleave unto his wife; with a cordial affection, taking care of her, nouriſhing and cheriſhing her, providing all things comfortable for her, continuing to live with her, and not depart from her as long as they live: the phraſe is expreſſive of the near union by marriage between man and wife; they are, as it were, glued together, and make but one; which is more fully and ſtrongly expreſſed in the next clauſe: and they ſhall be one fleſh; that is, they two, the man and his wife, as it is ſupplied and interpreted by Chriſt, Matt. xix. 5. and ſo here in the Targum of Jonathan, and in the Septuagint and Samaritan verſions: the union between them is ſo cloſe, as if they were but one perſon, one ſoul, one body; and which is to be obſerved againſt polygamy, unlawful divorces, and all uncleanneſs, for-fornication and adultery: only one man and one woman, being joined in lawful wedlock, have a right of copulation with each other, in order to produce a legitimate offspring, partaking of the ſame one fleſh, as children do, of their parents, without being able to diſtinguiſh the fleſh of the one from the other, they partake of: and from hence it appears to be a fabulous notion, that Cecrops, the firſt king of Athens, was the firſt inſtitutor of matrimony and joiner of one man to one woman; whence he was ſaid to be biformis [p], and was called διφυης; unleſs, as ſome [q] have thought, that he and Moſes were one and the ſame who delivered out the firſt inſtitution of marriage, which is this.

℣. 25. And they were both naked, the man and his wife, &c.] Were as they were created, having no clothes on them, and ſtanding in need of none, to ſhelter them from the heat or cold, being in a temperate climate; or to conceal any parts of their bodies from the ſight of others, there being none of the creatures to guard againſt on that account: and were not aſhamed; having nothing in them, or on them, or about them, that cauſed ſhame; nothing ſinful, defective, ſcandalous or blameworthy; no ſin in their nature, no guilt on their conſciences, or wickedneſs in their hands or actions; and particularly they were not aſhamed of their being naked, no more than children are to ſee each other naked, or we are to behold them: beſides, they were not only alone, and none to behold them; but their being naked was no diſgrace to them, but was agreeable to their nature; and they were not ſenſible that there was any neceſſity or occaſion to cover themſelves, nor would they have had any, had they continued in their innocent ſtate: moreover, there was not the leaſt reaſon to be aſhamed to appear in ſuch a manner, ſince they were but one fleſh. The Jeruſalem Targum is, "they knew not what ſhame was," not being conſcious of any ſin, which ſooner or later produces ſhame. Thus Plato [r] deſcribes the firſt men, who, he ſays, were produced out of the earth; and for whom the fertile ground and trees brought forth fruit of all kind in abundance of themſelves, without any agriculture; that theſe were γυμνοι και αοπλοι, naked and without any covering; and ſo Diodorus Siculus [s] ſays, the firſt of men were naked and without clothing. The word here uſed ſometimes ſignifies wiſe and cunning; it is rendred ſubtle in the firſt verſe of the next chapter: and here the Targum of Jonathan is, "they were both wiſe, "Adam and his wife, but they continued not in "their glory;" the next thing we hear of, is their fall.

CHAP. III.

IN this chapter an account is given of the temptation of our firſt parents, of the inſtrument of it, and of their fall into it, and of the effect of it, ℣. 1—7. their ſummons upon it to appear before God, againſt whom they had ſinned, ℣. 8, 9, 10. their examination by him, and the excuſes they made, ℣. 11, 12, 13. the various ſentences paſſed on the ſerpent, the woman, and the man, ℣. 14—19. ſome incidental things recorded, expreſſive of faith and hope in man, and of favour to him, ℣. 20, 21. and his expulſion from the garden of Eden, ℣. 22, 23, 24.

℣. 1. Now the ſerpent was more ſubtle than any beaſt of the field, which the Lord God had made, &c.] Many inſtances are given of the ſubtlety of ſerpents, in hiding their heads when ſtruck at, rolling themſelves up, ſtopping their ear at the voice of the charmer, putting off their ſkin, lying in ſand of the ſame colour with them, and biting the feet of horſes, and other things of the like kind; but by theſe it does not appear to be now more ſubtle than any other creature, whatever it might be at its firſt creation; particularly the fox greatly exceeds it: the words therefore may be rendred, that ſerpent; that particular ſerpent, of which ſo much is ſpoken of afterwards; or the ſerpent was become [t], or made more ſubtle, that is, not naturally, but through ſatan being in it, and uſing it in a very ſubtle manner, to anſwer his purpoſes, and gain his point: for tho' a real ſerpent, and not the mere form or appearance of one is here meant, as is clear from this account, and the curſe afterwards pronounced on it; yet not that only, but as poſſeſſed and uſed by ſatan as an inſtrument of his to accompliſh his deſigns, as is evident from its having the faculty of ſpeech, and the uſe of reaſon, employed in a very artful and ſophiſtic manner: nor is it rational to ſuppoſe that human nature, in the height of its glory and excellency, ſhould be outwitted and ſeduced by a creature ſo inferior to it; beſides, the ſcriptures always aſcribe the ſeduction of man to the devil; who becauſe he acted his deceitful part in and by the ſerpent, is called the ſerpent, and the old ſerpent, and the devil and ſatan, 2 Cor. xi. 3. Rev. 12. 9. The Targum of Jonathan reſtrains this ſubtlety to wickedneſs, paraphraſing the words, "but the ſerpent "was wiſe to evil." Some Jewiſh writers [u] interpret the paſſage of the nakedneſs of the ſerpent, taking the word in the ſenſe it is uſed in ch. ii. 25. and render it more naked than any beaſt of the field, the reſt having a clothing, as hair, &c. but this none; and ſo might be more agreeable to Eve, being in this reſpect like herſelf; but it is generally interpreted of ſubtlety. The ſerpent early became the object of religious worſhip. Taautus, or the Egyptian Thoth, was the firſt that attributed deity to the nature of the dragon, and of ſerpents; and after him the Egyptians and Phœnicians: the Egyptian God Cneph was a ſerpent with an hawk's head; and a ſerpent with the Phœnicians was a good dæmon: what led them to have ſuch veneration for this animal, were its plenty of ſpirits, its fiery nature, its ſwiftneſs, its various forms it throws itſelf into, and its long life [w]; and ſo Pherecydes [x] ſpeaks of a deity of the Phœnicians called Ophioneus; and who alſo affirms [y], that this was the prince of dæmons caſt down from heaven by Jupiter; and Herodotus [z] makes mention of ſacred ſerpents about Thebes; and Ælianus [a], of ſacred dragons; and Juſtin Martyr ſays [b], the ſerpent with the heathens was a ſymbol of all that were reckoned gods by them, and they were painted as ſuch; and wherever ever ſerpents were painted, according to Perſius [c], it was a plain indication that it was a ſacred place. Serpents were ſacred to many of the heathen deities, and who were worſhipped either in the form of one, or in a real one [d]; all which ſeem to take their riſe from the uſe the devil made of the ſerpent in ſeducing our firſt parents. And he ſaid to the woman; being alone, which he took the advantage of; not the ſerpent, but ſatan in it; juſt as the angel ſpoke in Balaam's aſs; for we are not to imagine with Philo, Joſephus, Aben Ezra, and others, that beaſts in their original ſtate had the faculty of ſpeech, and whoſe language Eve underſtood: it is very probable that good angels appeared in paradiſe to our firſt parents, in one form or another, and converſed with them; it may be in an human form, and it may be in the form of a beautiful flying ſerpent, which looked very bright and ſhining, and that ſort called Seraph, Numb. xxi. 6. hence angels may bear the name of Seraphim, as ſome have thought; ſo that it might not be at all ſurpriſing to Eve to hear the ſerpent ſpeak, it being what ſhe might have been uſed to hear, and might take this to be a good angel in ſuch a ſhape, that was come to bring a meſſage to her from God, and to converſe with her for her good, and who thus accoſted her: yea, hath God ſaid ye ſhall not eat of every tree of the garden? or of any tree [e]; ſo ambiguouſly does he ſpeak, in order to reproach the divine goodneſs, and draw into a diſbelief of it. The ſpeech is abrupt; and, as Kimchi obſerves [f], ſuppoſes ſome diſcourſe, as to this purpoſe; ſurely God hates you, for though you are greater than the reſt of the creatures, he has not provided any ſuperior excellency for you, and eſpecially ſince he has ſaid, ye ſhall not eat, &c. or as others, taking occaſion from their being naked, ch. ii. 25. he obſerves, that that was unbecoming them, of which they might be aſhamed; yea alſo, that it was unjuſt to forbid them to eat of the tree of good and evil: he might, it is ſuggeſted, firſt endeavour to perſuade the woman, that it was indecent for her, and her huſband, to be naked; which they not being convinced of, he inſinuated that this was owing to a defect of knowledge, and that there was a tree in the garden, which if they eat of, would give them that knowledge, and therefore God had forbid it, to keep them in ignorance: but he ſeems to put this queſtion, to cauſe them to doubt of it, whether there was ſuch a prohibition or not, and as amazing that it ſhould be, and as not believing it to be true; it being, as he would have it, contrary to the perfections of God, to his goodneſs and liberality, and to his profeſſion of a peculiar reſpect to man: wherefore the Targum of Onkelos renders it, of a truth, and that of Jonathan, is it true? ſurely it cannot be true, that a God of ſuch goodneſs could ever deny you ſuch a benefit, or reſtrain you from ſuch happineſs; he can never be your friend that can lay ſuch an injunction on you.

℣. 2. And the woman ſaid unto the ſerpent, &c.] Or to him that ſpoke in the ſerpent, which ſhe might take to be a meſſenger from heaven, a holy angel: had ſhe known who it was, ſhe might be chargeable with imprudence in giving an anſwer, and carrying on a converſation with him; and yet even ſuppoſing this, ſhe might have a good deſign in her anſwer; partly to ſet the matter in a true light, and aſſert what was truth; and partly to ſet forth the goodneſs and liberality of God, in the large proviſion he had made, and the generous grant he had given them: from this diſcourſe of Eve and the ſerpent, no doubt Plato [g] had his notion of the firſt men diſcourſing with beaſts: we may eat of the fruit of the trees of the garden; of all and every one of them, which is to be underſtood, excepting the one after mentioned; ſo far are we from being debarred from eating of any, which the ſpeech of the ſerpent might imply, that they were allowed to eat of what they pleaſed but one.

℣. 3. But of the fruit of the tree, which is in the midſt of the garden, &c.] This tree ſtood near the tree of life, as is highly probable, ſince that is deſcribed in the ſame ſituation, ch. ii. 9. ſhe does not give it any name, which perhaps was not as yet given it; or ſhe was not acquainted with it, its name in the preceding chapter being given by anticipation; and moſt likely it is, it had its name from the event, and as yet was without one: God hath ſaid, ye ſhall not eat of it, neither ſhall ye touch it, leſt ye die; here the woman is charged by ſome both with adding to, and taking from the law of God; and if ſo, muſt have ſinned very heinouſly before ſhe eat of the fruit: but neither of them are ſufficiently proved; not the former by her ſaying, neither ſhall ye touch it, which though not expreſſed in the prohibition, is implied, namely, ſuch a touching the fruit as to pluck it off the tree, take it in the hand, and put it to the mouth, in order to eat it; nor the latter by theſe words, leſt ye die, or leſt perhaps ye die [h]; as if it was a matter of doubt, when it was moſt ſtrongly aſſured; for the word uſed is not always to be underſtood of doubting, but of the event of a thing, ſee Pſ. ii. 12. and may be rendred, that ye die not [i]; which would certainly be the caſe, ſhould they pluck the fruit, and eat of it.

℣. 4. And the ſerpent ſaid unto the woman, &c.] In reply to her anſwer: ye ſhall not ſurely die; in direct contradiction to the divine threatening, and which he would inſinuate was a mere threatening, and which God never intended to put in execution; ſo that they had nothing to fear from that, God would never be ſo rigid and ſevere, and bear ſo hard upon them as to put them to death for ſuch an offence, if it was one; he only gave out the menace to frighten them, and deter from it: however, at moſt it was not a certain thing they ſhould die, and they might ſafely conclude they would not.

℣. 5. For God doth know, &c.] Or but [k] God doth know, who knows all things, and has foreknowledge of all future events; he foreknows what will be the conſequence of this event, eating the fruit of this tree, that it would be ſo far from iſſuing in death, which he has threatened, that the effect of it would be a clearer underſtanding, and a greater degree of knowledge of things, which he is unwilling ſhould be enjoyed, and therefore has endeavoured to prevent it by this prohibition; ſuggeſting hereby even in God hatred of the creatures he had made, and unwilling they ſhould be as happy as they might: that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes ſhall be opened; not the eyes of their bodies, as if they were now blind, but the

the eyes of their underſtandings; meaning, that their knowledge ſhould be enlarged, and they ſhould ſee things more clearly than they now did, and judge of them in a better manner; yea even together with the light of their mind, the ſight of their bodily eyes would receive ſome advantage; and particularly, that though they ſaw the nakedneſs of their bodies, yet it was as if they ſaw it not, and were unconcerned about it, and heedleſs of it; did not ſee it as unſeemly and indecent, and ſo were not aſhamed; but now they ſhould ſee it as it was, and be filled with ſhame and confuſion: and ye ſhall be as gods, knowing good and evil; as Elohim, which word is ſometimes uſed of civil magiſtrates, ſometimes of angels, and ſometimes of God himſelf, and of the divine perſons in the Godhead: the Targum of Onkelos ſeems to reſpect the former, rendering it as great perſonages, princes, judges, civil magiſtrates, who ought to know the difference between good and evil, or otherwiſe would be unfit for their office; but this cannot be the ſenſe here, ſince there were no ſuch perſons in being, to whom the reference could be made; nor could it convey any proper idea to the mind of Eve, unleſs by them are meant principalities and powers, or the mighty angels, as the Targum of Jonathan paraphraſes the word; and ſo it intimates, that upon eating this fruit they ſhould be as wiſe and as knowing as thoſe intelligent creatures: though perhaps ſatan might mean, ſuch angels as himſelf and his were, and that they ſhould by ſad experience know the difference between good and evil, as they did: but rather it is to be underſtood of that Elohim that made the heavens and the earth, for as yet the word had never been uſed, but of the true God, and of the divine perſons in the Trinity: and this agrees with what is ironically ſaid, ℣. 22. behold the man is become as one of us, as the devil told him he ſhould, and as he believed he would: this was the bait laid for man, ſuited to his intellectual mind, and to the ambitious deſires of it, not being content with finite knowledge, but aiming at omniſcience, or ſomething like it: now the temptation began to take place and operate.

℣. 6. And when the women ſaw that the tree was good for food, &c.] She being near the tree, and perhaps juſt at it when the ſerpent firſt attacked her; wherefore looking more wiſhfully at it, ſhe could diſcern nothing in the fruit of the tree, which ſhewed it to be bad, and unfit to be eaten, or why it ſhould be forbidden for food; but on the contrary, had a moſt promiſing aſpect to be very delicious, nouriſhing and ſalutary, as any other fruit in the garden: and that it was pleaſant to the eyes; of a beautiful colour, and very inviting to the taſte: and a tree to be deſired to make one wiſe; which above all was the moſt engaging, and was the moſt prevailing motive to influence her to eat of it, an eager deſire of more wiſdom and knowledge; tho' there was nothing ſhe could ſee in the tree, and the fruit of it, which promiſed this; only ſhe perceived in her mind, by the diſcourſe ſhe had with the ſerpent, and by what he had told her, and ſhe believed, that this would be the conſequence of eating this fruit, which was very deſirable, and ſhe concluded within herſelf that ſo it would be: ſhe took of the fruit thereof, and did eat; ſhe took it off of the tree, and not only taſted of it, but eat of it; what quantity cannot be ſaid, enough to break the divine law, and to incur the divine diſpleaſure: ſo Sanchoniatho ſays [1], that Æon (the ſame with Eve) found the way of taking food from trees: and gave alſo to her huſband with her; that he might eat as well as ſhe, and partake of the ſame benefits and advantages ſhe hoped to reap from hence; for no doubt it was of good will, and not ill will, that ſhe gave it to him; and when ſhe offered it to him, it is highly probable ſhe made uſe of arguments with him, and preſſed him hard to it, telling him what delicious food it was, as well as how uſeful it would be to him and her. The Jews infer from hence, that Adam was with her all the while, and heard the diſcourſe between the ſerpent and her, yet did not interpoſe nor diſſuade his wife from eating the fruit, and being prevailed upon by the arguments uſed; or however thro' a ſtrong affection for his wife, that ſhe might not die alone, he did as ſhe had done: and he did eat; on which an emphaſis may be obſerved, for it was upon his eating the fate of his poſterity depended; for not the woman, but the man, was the federal head, and he ſinning all his poſterity ſinned in him, and died in him; through this offence judgment came upon all to condemnation; all became ſinners, and obnoxious to death, Rom. v. 12—19. If Eve only had eat of the forbidden fruit, it could only have perſonally affected herſelf, and ſhe only would have died; and had this been the caſe, God would have formed another woman for Adam, for the propagation of mankind, had he ſtood; though ſince he fell as well as ſhe, it is needleſs to enquire, and may ſeem too bold to ſay what otherwiſe would have been the caſe.

℣. 7. And the eyes of them both were opened, &c.] Not of their bodies, but of their minds; not ſo as to have an advanced knowledge of things pleaſant, profitable and uſeful, as was promiſed and expected, but of things very diſagreeable and diſtreſſing. Their eyes were opened to ſee that they had been deceived by the ſerpent, that they had broke the commandment of God, and incurred the diſpleaſure of their creator and kind benefactor, and had brought ruin and deſtruction upon themſelves; they ſaw what bleſſings and privileges they had loſt, communion with God, the dominion of the creatures, the purity and holineſs of their nature, and what miſeries they had involved themſelves, and their poſterity in; how expoſed they were to the wrath of God, the curſe of the law, and to eternal death: and they knew that they were naked; they muſt know before that they were naked in their bodies, but they did not perceive that their nakedneſs was at all uncomely, or any diſadvantage to them; but now they were ſenſible of both, that whereas they could look upon it before, and not bluſh or feel any ſinful emotions in them, now they could not behold it without ſhame, and without finding evil concupiſcence ariſing in them; and it being now the cool of the day, and their ſpirits alſo ſeized with fear of the divine diſpleaſure, they might feel a ſhivering all over them, and wanted ſomething to cover them: but more eſpecially this may reſpect the nakedneſs of their ſouls they were now conſcious of, being ſtripped of that honour and glory, privileges and power, they were veſted with; and having loſt the image of God that was upon them, and that robe of purity, innocence and righteouſneſs, the rectitude of their nature, with which they were arrayed, and finding themſelves naked and defenceleſs, and unable to ſcreen themſelves from the curſes of a righteous law, and the fury of vindictve juſtice: and they ſewed fig leaves together, and made themſelves aprons; not to cover their whole bodies, but only thoſe parts which which ever ſince mankind have been aſhamed to expoſe to public view, and which they ſtudiouſly conceal from ſight: the reaſon of which perhaps is, becauſe by thoſe members, the original corruption of human nature has been from the beginning, and ſtill is propagated from parents to children. The leaves of the fig tree were pitched upon becauſe of the largeneſs of them; the leaves of the common fig-tree are very large, as every one knows; and perhaps thoſe in the eaſtern countries, and eſpecially in paradiſe were much larger than ours. Pliny [m] ſays of the fig-tree, that its leaf is the largeſt, and the moſt ſhady. Some think the Indian fig-tree is meant; ſo John Temporarius, as Druſius relates; and ſo our Milton [n]; and according to Pliny [o], the breadth of the leaves of this tree has the ſhape of an Amazonian ſhield. And when they are ſaid to ſew theſe together, it is not to be ſuppoſed that they ſewed them as taylors ſew their garments together, ſince they cannot be thought to be furniſhed with proper inſtruments, or that they tacked them together with ſome ſort of thorns, or made uſe of them inſtead of needles; but they took the tender branches of the fig-tree with leaves on them, as the word ſignifies, ſee Neh. viii. 15. and twiſted them round their waiſts; which ſerved for girdles, as ſome render the word [p], and the broad leaves hanging down, ſerved for aprons; but theſe, whatever covering they may be thought to have been to their bodies, which yet ſeem to be but a ſlender one, they could be none to their ſouls, or be of any ſervice to hide their ſin and ſhame from the all-ſeeing eye of God; and of as little uſe are the poor and mean ſervices of men, or their beſt works of righteouſneſs to ſhelter them from the wrath of God, and the vengeance of divine juſtice.

℣. 8. And they heard the voice of the Lord God, &c.] Which they had heard before and knew, tho' perhaps now in another tone, and very terrible, which before was mild and gentle, pleaſant and delightful: ſome by it underſtand a clap of thunder, ſometimes called the voice of the Lord, Pſ. xxix. and the rather becauſe mention is made afterwards of a wind; but rather the voice of the Son of God, the eternal Word is here meant, who appeared in an human form, as a pledge of his future incarnation; and that not only as a judge to arraign, examine and condemn the parties concerned in this act of diſobedience to God, but as a Saviour of men, to whom as ſuch he made himſelf known, as the event ſhews, and therefore they had no reaſon to entertain ſuch terrible apprehenſions of him, as to flee from him; and ſo the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan paraphraſe it, the voice of the word of the Lord God, the eſſential Word of God then with him, and ſince made fleſh, and dwelt among men as the Saviour of them; and to him agrees what follows: walking in the garden in the cool of the day; or at the wind of the day [q]; of that day in which man was created and fell, as ſome conclude from hence; in the evening, at ſunſetting; for very often when the ſun ſets a wind riſes, at leaſt a gentle breeze; and this might bring the ſound of the voice, and of the ſteps of this glorious perſon the ſooner to the ears of Adam and his wife, which gave them notice of his near approach, and cauſed them to haſten their flight: ſome render it emphatically, at the wind of that day [r]; as if it was a violent wind which aroſe at that time, as a ſign and teſtimony of the indignation of God, as the ſound of a violent wind was a teſtimony of the coming of the Spirit of God, Acts ii. 2. and Adam and his wife hid themſelves from the preſence of the Lord God, amongſt the trees of the garden; conſcious of their guilt, and vainly imagining they could flee from his preſence which is every where, and hide themſelves from his ſight, before whom every creature is manifeſt, be it where it will; and very fooliſhly fanſying, that the thick trees and buſhes in the garden would be a ſcreen and ſhelter for them: and ſad ſhifts do wretched mortals make to ſecure themſelves from the wrath of God, who are ignorant of the juſtifying righteouſneſs and atoning ſacrifice of the Son of God: it is in the ſingular number in the original text, in the midſt of the tree of the garden [s]; which ſome underſtand of the fig-tree, whoſe leaves they covered themſelves with, and under the ſhade of which they hid themſelves; and particularly of the Indian fig-tree, which is ſo large, that it is ſaid that fifty horſemen may ſhade themſelves at noonday under it; nay, ſome ſay four hundred [t]; but tree may be put for trees, the ſingular for the plural.

℣. 9. And the Lord God called unto Adam, &c.] The Jeruſalem Targum is, the Word of the Lord God, the ſecond perſon in the Trinity; and this is the voice he is ſaid to have heard before: and ſaid unto him, where art thou? which is ſaid, not as ignorant of the place where he was, nor of what he had done, nor of the circumſtances he was in, or of the anſwers he would make; but rather it ſhews all the reverſe, that he knew where he was, what he had done, and in what condition he was, and therefore it was in vain to ſeek to hide himſelf: or as pitying his caſe, ſaying, alas for thee [u], as ſome render the words, into what a miſerable plight haſt thou brought thyſelf, by liſtening to the tempter, and diſobeying thy God? thou that waſt the favourite of heaven, the chief of the creatures, the inhabitant of Eden, poſſeſſed of all deſirable bliſs and happineſs, but now in the moſt wretched and forlorn condition imaginable: or as upbraiding him with his ſin and folly; that he who had been ſo highly favoured by him, as to be made after his image and likeneſs, to have all creatures at his command, and the moſt delightful ſpot in all the globe to dwell in, and a grant to eat of what fruit he would, ſave one, and who was indulged with intercourſe with his God, and with the holy angels, ſhould act ſuch an ungrateful part as to rebel againſt him, break his laws, and trample upon his legiſlative authority, and bid, as it were, defiance to him: or elſe as the Saviour, looking up his ſtraying ſheep, and loſt creature, man: or rather as a ſummons to appear before him, the judge of all, and anſwer for his conduct; it was in vain for him to ſecrete himſelf, he muſt and ſhould appear; the force of which words he felt, and therefore was obliged to ſurrender himſelf, as appears from what follows:

℣. 10. And he ſaid, I heard thy voice in the garden, &c.] The voice of thy Word, as the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan: this was not the true true cauſe of his hiding himſelf; he had heard his voice in the garden before, when it did not ſtrike him with terror, but gave him pleaſure; and I was afraid, becauſe I was naked. This alſo was not the true reaſon; he was naked from his creation as to his body, and it cauſed no ſhame in him, nor any dread to appear before God; he conceals the true cauſe, which was ſin, that made the nakedneſs of his body ſhameful, and had ſtripped his ſoul of its native cloathing, purity and holineſs; and therefore it was, he could not appear before a pure and holy being: and I hid myſelf; among the trees of the garden, and his wife alſo; or therefore [w] hid myſelf; thro' fear of God, his wrath and diſpleaſure, which he had juſtly incurred by his diſobedience, and becauſe of his ſin which had made his ſoul naked, tho' he was not as yet ingenuous enough to confeſs it.

℣. 11. And he ſaid, &c.] The Lord God, or the Word of the Lord; who told thee that thou waſt naked? or ſhewed it to thee; by what means haſt thou got knowledge of it? what haſt thou done that thou perceiveſt it, ſo as to cauſe ſhame and fear? man was made naked, and ſo he continued, and he muſt be ſenſible of it, but it gave him no uneaſineſs, becauſe he was without ſhame on account of it; ſo that it was as if it was not, and he was regardleſs of it, as if he was not naked; but now, having ſinned, he could not look upon his nakedneſs without bluſhing, and ſin, being what had produced this ſenſation, he was afraid to appear before God, againſt whom he had ſinned; tho' he did not chuſe to acknowledge it, only alledges his outward nakedneſs, without confeſſing the inward nakedneſs of his ſoul, and being humbled for that as he ought to have been; and in order to bring him to this, is this queſtion and the following put unto him; haſt thou eaten of the tree, whereof I commanded thee that thou ſhouldeſt not eat? The Lord knew he had; but he puts this queſtion to bring him to a confeſſion of it, as well as to aggravate his crime; that it was a violation of a precept of his, who had been ſo kind and bountiful to him, who had crowned him with glory and honour, and ſet him over the works of his hands, and had put all creatures under his feet, and had allowed him to eat of every tree in the garden but one; there was but one tree reſtrained from him, but one command he gave him, and this he broke; ſin is a tranſgreſſion of the law, 1 John, iii. 4. And in this light it is here put to bring Adam under a conviction, and to a confeſſion of it, tho' he made it in a very lame manner, having covered it as long as he could; being found he excuſes it, as loth to bear the blame and ſcandal of it. See Job, xxxi. 33.

℣. 12. And the man ſaid, &c.] Not being able any longer to conceal the truth tho' he ſhifts off the blame as much as poſſible from himſelf: the woman whom thou gaveſt to be with me; to be his wife and his companion, to be an help meet unto him, and ſhare with him in the bleſſings of paradiſe, to aſſiſt in civil and domeſtic affairs, and join with him in acts of religion and devotion: ſhe gave me of the tree, and I did eat; ſhe firſt eat of it herſelf, thro' the ſolicitations of the ſerpent, and then ſhe perſuaded me to eat of it; and accordingly I did, I own it. By this anſwer Adam endeavours to caſt the blame partly upon his wife, and partly upon God; tho' in what he ſaid he told the truth, and what was matter of fact, yet it carries this innuendo, that if it had not been for his wife he had never eat of it, which was a fooliſh excuſe; for he being her head and huſband, ſhould have taught her better, and been more careful to have prevented her eating of this fruit, and ſhould have diſſuaded her from it, and have reproved her for it, inſtead of following her example, and taking it from her hands: and more than this he tacitly reflects upon God, that he had given him a woman, who, inſtead of being an help meet to him, had helped to ruin him; and that if he had not given him this woman, he had never done what he had: but at this rate a man may find fault with God for the greateſt bleſſings and mercies of life beſtowed on him, which are abuſed by him, and ſo aggravate his condemnation.

℣. 13. And the Lord God ſaid unto the woman, &c.] Who was firſt in the tranſgreſſion, and drew her huſband into it, and upon whom he ſeemingly caſts the blame of his eating the forbidden fruit: what is this that thou haſt done? doſt thou know how great an offence thou haſt committed in breaking a command of mine, and how aggravated it is when thou hadſt leave to eat of every other tree? what could move thee to do this? by what means haſt thou been brought into it, and not only haſt done it thyſelf, but drawn thine huſband into it, to the ruin of you both, and of all your poſterity? ſo heinous is the ſin thou haſt been guilty of: and the woman ſaid, the ſerpent beguiled me, and I did eat; that is, a ſpirit in the ſerpent, which ſhe took for a good one, but proved a bad one, with lying words and deceitful language impoſed upon her, told her that the fruit forbidden was very good food, and very uſeful to improve knowledge; even to ſuch a degree as to make men like God; and this God knew, and therefore out of envy and ill-will to them forbid the eating of it; nor need they fear his menaces, for they might depend upon it they ſhould never die; and thus he cauſed her to err from the truth, and to believe a lie; and by giving heed to the ſeducing ſpirit ſhe was prevailed upon to eat of the fruit of the tree, which was forbidden, and which ſhe owns; and it is an ingenuous confeſſion that ſhe makes as to the matter of fact; but yet like her huſband, and as learning it from him, ſhe endeavours to ſhift off the blame from herſelf, and lay it on the ſerpent.

℣. 14. And the Lord God ſaid unto the ſerpent, &c.] And to the devil in it; for what follows may be applied to both; literally to the ſerpent, and myſtically to ſatan; both are puniſhed, and that very juſtly, the ſerpent in being the inſtrument ſatan made uſe of, and is curſed for his ſake, as the earth for man's; and the puniſhing the inſtrument as well as the principal, the more diſcovers God's deteſtation of the act for which they are puniſhed, as appears in other inſtances, Exod xxi. 28. Levit. xx. 15. Nor could it have been agreeable to the juſtice of God, to puniſh the inſtrument and let the principal go free; and therefore the following ſentence muſt be conſidered as reſpecting them both; and it muſt be obſerved, that no pains is taken to convince ſatan of his ſin, or any time ſpent in reaſoning and debating with him about it, he being an hardened apoſtate ſpirit, and doomed to everlaſting deſtruction, and without any hope of mercy and forgiveneſs; but to ſhew the divine reſentment of his crime, the following things are ſaid: becauſe thou haſt done this; beguiled the woman, and drawn her in to eat of the forbidden fruit, thou art curſed above all cattle, and above every beaſt of the field; the ſerpent is the moſt hateful of all creatures, and eſpecially the moſt deteſtable to men, and and ſatan is accurſed of God, baniſhed from the divine preſence, is laid up in chains of darkneſs, and reſerved for the judgment of the great day, and conſigned to everlaſting wrath, and ruin ſignified by everlaſting fire prepared for the devil and his angels; upon thy belly ſhalt thou go, or breaſt, as Aben Ezra, and others; Jarchi thinks it had feet before, but were cut off on this account, and ſo became a reptile, as ſome ſerpents now have feet like geeſe, as Pliny [x] relates; or it might go in a more erect poſture on its hinder feet, as the baſiliſk, which is one kind of ſerpent, now does; and if it was a flying one, bright and ſhining in the air, now it ſhould loſe all its glory, and grovel in the duſt, and with pain or at leaſt with difficulty creep along on its breaſt and belly; and this as it reſpects the puniſhment of the devil may ſignify, that he being caſt down from the realms of bliſs and glory, ſhall never be able to riſe more and regain his former place and dignity: And duſt ſhalt thou eat all the days of thy life; meaning not that particular ſerpent, and as long as that ſhould live, but all of the ſame kind, as long as there were any in the world, even to the end of it: it is probable, that when the ſerpent moved in a more erect poſture, it lived on herbs and plants as other creatures; but when it was obliged to go upon its belly or breaſt, it licked up the duſt of the earth, and which it could not well avoid in eating whatſoever food it did; and ſome ſerpents are ſaid to live upon it. This is applicable to ſatan, deſigns the mean and abject condition in which he is, and the ſordid food he lives upon; no more on angels food and joys of heaven, but on the baſe, mean, earthly and impure luſts of men; and this will be his caſe, condition, and circumſtances for ever.

℣. 15. And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, &c.] Between whom there had been ſo much familiarity, not only whilſt they had the preceding diſcourſe together, but before; for it is conjectured by ſome [y], that ſhe took a particular liking to that creature, and was delighted with it, and laid it perhaps in her boſom, adorned her neck with its windings, or made it a bracelet for her arms; and being a peculiar favourite, the devil made choice of it as his inſtrument to deceive her; but now being beguiled hereby, ſhe conceived an antipathy againſt it, and which is become natural between the ſerpent and man; man abhors the ſight of a ſerpent, and the ſerpent the ſight of man; and the ſpittle of a man and the gall of a ſerpent are poiſon to each other; and this antipathy is obſerved to be ſtronger in the female ſex: and this was not only true of the particular ſerpent that deceived Eve, and of the particular woman Eve deceived by him, but of every ſerpent and of every woman in ſucceſſive ages; and is alſo true of ſatan and the church of God in all ages, between whom there is an implacable and an irreconcileable hatred, and a perpetual war: and between thy ſeed and her ſeed; the poſterity of Eve mankind, and the production of ſerpents, between whom the antipathy ſtill continues, and myſtically the evil angels and alſo wicked men called ſerpents; and a generation of vipers on the one hand, and the people of God on the other, the ſeed of the church; the latter of which are hated and perſecuted by the former, and ſo it has been ever ſince this affair happened: and eſpecially by the ſeed of the woman may be meant the Meſſiah; the word ſeed ſometimes ſignifying a ſingle perſon, Gen. iv. 25. and xv. 2. and xxi. 13. and particularly Chriſt, Gal. iii. 16. and he may with great propriety be ſo called, becauſe he was made of a woman and not begotten by man; and who aſſumed not an human perſon, but an human nature, which is called the holy thing, and the ſeed of Abraham, as here the ſeed of the woman, as well as it expreſſes the truth of his incarnation and the reality of his being man; and who as he has been implacably hated by ſatan and his angels, and by wicked men, ſo he has oppoſed himſelf to all them that hate and perſecute his people: it ſhall bruiſe thy head; the head of a ſerpent creeping on the ground is eaſily cruſhed and bruiſed, of which it is ſenſible, and therefore it is careful to hide and cover it. In the myſtical ſenſe, it or he, Hu, which is one of the names of God, Pſal. cii. 27. Iſa. xlviii. 12. and here of the Meſſiah, the eminent ſeed of the woman, ſhould bruiſe the head of the old ſerpent the devil, that is, deſtroy him and all his principalities and powers, break and confound all his ſchemes, and ruin all his works, cruſh his whole empire, ſtrip him of his authority and ſovereignty, and particularly of his power over death, and his tyranny over the bodies and ſouls of men; all which was done by Chriſt, when he became incarnate and ſuffered and died, Heb. ii. 14, 15. Col. ii. 15. 1 John, iii. 8. And thou ſhalt bruiſe his heel; the heel of a man being what the ſerpent can moſt eaſily come at, as at the heels of horſes which it bites, Gen. xlix. 17. and which agrees with that inſidious creature, as Ariſtotle [z] deſcribes it: this, as it refers to the devil, may relate to the perſecutions of the members of Chriſt on earth, inſtigated by ſatan, or to ſome ſlight trouble he ſhould receive from him in the days of his fleſh, by his temptations in the wilderneſs, and agony with him in the garden; or rather by the heel of Chriſt is meant his human nature, which is his inferior and loweſt nature, and who was in it frequently expoſed to the inſults, temptations, and perſecutions of ſatan, and was at laſt brought to a painful and accurſed death; though by dying he got an entire victory over him and all his enemies, and obtained ſalvation for his people. The Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem paraphraſe this paſſage of the days of the Meſſiah, and of health and ſalvation in them: what is here delivered out in a way of threatning to the ſerpent the devil, carries in it a kind intimation of grace and good will to fallen man, and laid a foundation for hope of ſalvation and happineſs: reference ſeems to be had to this paſſage in Pſ. xl. 7. in the volume, in the firſt roll, εν κεφαλιδι, as in the Greek verſion, at the head, in the beginning of the book, it is written of me, to do thy will, O my God.

℣. 16. Unto the woman he ſaid, &c.] The woman receives her ſentence next to the ſerpent, and before the man, becauſe ſhe was firſt and more deeply in the tranſgreſſion, and was the means of drawing her huſband into it. I will greatly multiply thy ſorrow and thy conception, or thy ſorrow of thy conception [a], or rather of thy pregnancy [b]; ſince not pain but pleaſure is perceived in conception, and beſides is a bleſſing; but this takes in all griefs and ſorrows, diſorders and pains, from the time of conception or pregnancy, unto the birth; ſuch as a nauſea, a loathing of food, dizzineſs, pains in the head and teeth, faintings and ſwoonings, ings, danger of miſcarriage, and many diſtreſſes in ſuch a caſe; beſides the trouble of bearing ſuch a burden, eſpecially when it grows heavy: and when it is ſaid, I will greatly multiply, or multiplying I will multiply [c], it not only denotes the certainty of it, but the many and great ſorrows endured, and the frequent repetitions of them, by often conceiving, bearing, and bringing forth: in ſorrow ſhalt thou bring forth children, ſons and daughters, with many ſevere pangs and ſharp pains, which are ſo very acute, that great tribulations and afflictions are often in ſcripture ſet forth by them: and it is remarked by naturaliſts [d], that women bring forth their young with more pain than any other creature: and thy deſire ſhall be to thy huſband, which ſome underſtand of her deſire to the uſe of the marriage-bed, as Jarchi, and even notwithſtanding her ſorrows and pains in child-bearing; but rather this is to be underſtood of her being ſolely at the will and pleaſure of her huſband; that whatever ſhe deſired ſhould be referred to him, whether ſhe ſhould have her deſire or no, or the thing ſhe deſired; it ſhould be liable to be controuled by his will, which muſt determine it, and to which ſhe muſt be ſubject, as follows; and he ſhall rule over thee, with leſs kindneſs and gentleneſs, with more rigour and ſtrictneſs: it looks as if before the tranſgreſſion there was a greater equality between the man and the woman, or man did not exerciſe the authority over the woman he afterwards did, or the ſubjection of her to him was more pleaſant and agreeable than now it would be; and this was her chaſtiſement, becauſe ſhe did not aſk advice of her huſband about eating the fruit, but did it of herſelf, without his will and conſent, and tempted him to do the ſame.

℣. 17. And unto Adam he ſaid, &c.] Laſt of all, being the laſt that ſinned, but not to be excuſed: becauſe thou haſt hearkened unto the voice of thy wife; which was not only mean but ſinful, ſince it was oppoſite to the voice of God, which he ought to have hearkened to. God is to be hearkened to and obeyed rather than man, and much rather than a woman; to regard the perſuaſion of a woman, and neglect the command of God, is a great aggravation of ſuch neglect; ſee Acts iv. 19. and v. 29. and haſt eaten of the tree, of which I commanded thee, ſaying, thou ſhalt not eat of it; that is, had eat of the fruit of the tree which God had plainly pointed unto him, and concerning which he had given a clear and an expreſs command not to eat of it; and had delivered it to him in the ſtrongeſt manner, and had moſt peremptorily and ſtrictly enjoined it, adding the threatening of death unto it; ſo that he could by no means plead ignorance in himſelf, or any obſcurity in the law, or pretend he did not underſtand the ſenſe of the legiſlator. The righteous ſentence therefore follows, curſed is the ground for thy ſake; the whole earth, which was made for man, and all things in it, of which he had the poſſeſſion and dominion, and might have enjoyed the uſe of every thing in it, with comfort and pleaſure; that which was man's greateſt earthly bleſſing is now turned into a curſe by ſin, which is a proof of the exceeding ſinfulneſs of it, and its juſt demerit: ſo in later inſtances, a fruitful land is turned into barrenneſs, for the wickedneſs of them that dwell therein, Pſ. cvii. 34. hence, whenever there is ſterility in a country, a want of proviſions, a famine, it ſhould always be imputed to ſin; and this ſhould put us in mind of the ſin of the firſt man, and the conſequence of that: in ſorrow ſhalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life, meaning that with much toil and trouble in manuring and cultivating the earth, he ſhould get his living out of the produce of it, though with great difficulty; and this would be his caſe as long as he was in it.

℣. 18. Thorns alſo and thiſtles ſhall it bring forth to thee, &c.] Not for his advantage, but to give him more trouble, and cauſe him more fatigue and ſorrow to root them up: theſe include all ſorts of noxious herbs and plants, and troubleſome weeds, which added to man's labour to pluck up, that thoſe more uſeful might grow and flouriſh: and Rabbi Eliezer [e] was of opinion, that if there had not been a new bleſſing upon the earth, it would have brought forth nothing elſe, as that which is rejected and nigh unto curſing does, Heb. vi. 8. and this curſe continued, at leaſt it was not wholly removed, until the times of Noah, Gen. viii. 21. which made it hard and difficult to the Antediluvian patriarchs to get their bread. And thou ſhalt eat the herb of the field; not the fruits of the garden of Eden, but only the common herbs of the field, ſuch as even the beaſts of the earth fed upon: to ſuch a low condition was man, the Lord of the whole earth, reduced unto by ſin; and this was according to the law of retaliation, that man, who could not be content with all the fruits of Eden, ſave one, by eating the forbidden fruit ſhould be deprived of them all.

℣. 19. In the ſweat of thy face ſhalt thou eat bread, &c.] Or of thy noſe [f], ſweat appearing firſt and chiefly on the forehead, from whence it trickles down by the noſe in perſons employed in hard labour; and here it takes in all the labour uſed in cultivating the earth for the production of herbs, and particularly of corn, of which bread is made; with reſpect to which there are various operations in which men ſweat, ſuch as plowing, ſowing, reaping, threſhing, winnowing, grinding, ſifting, kneading, and baking; and it may have regard to all manufactories by which men get their bread, and not without ſweat; and even ſuch exerciſes as depend upon the brain, are not excuſed from ſuch an expence: ſo that every man, let him be in what ſtation of life he will, is not exempt, more or leſs, from this ſentence, and ſo continues till he dies, as is next expreſſed: till thou return unto the ground, his original, out of which he was made; that is, until he dies, and is interred in the earth, from whence he ſprung; ſignifying that the life of man would be a life of toil and labour to the very end of it; and nothing elſe can man expect in it: for duſt thou art, and unto duſt ſhalt thou return; his body was compoſed of the duſt, was of the earth earthly, and ſhould be reduced to that again by death, which is not an annihiliation of man, but a bringing him back to his original; which ſhews what a frail creature man is, what little reaſon he has to be proud of himſelf, when he reflects from whence he came and whither he muſt go; ſee Eccl. xii. 7.

℣. 20. And Adam called his wife's name Eve, &c.] Whom he had before named Iſhah, a woman, becauſe taken from him the man, ch. ii. 23. and now gives her a new name upon this ſcene of things, which had taken place; which is derived not from Chavah, to ſhew forth, to declare; as if ſhe was called ſo, becauſe of her diſcourſe with the ſerpent, ſerpent, being loquacious and talkative, and telling every thing ſhe knew, according to ſome Jewiſh writers [g]; but from Chayah, to live, as the reaſon given in the text ſhews. She is called Æon (Ævum) by Philo Byblius, the interpreter of Sanchoniatho [h]. The word Eve is retained in many Heathen writers, and uſed to be frequently repeated in the Bacchanalian rites, when the idolaters appeared with ſerpents platted on their heads [i]; which plainly refers to the affair between the ſerpent and Eve; hence Bacchus is ſometimes called Evius [k]: the reaſon of Adam's giving her this name follows, becauſe ſhe was the mother of all living; which reaſon is either given by Moſes, when from her had ſprung a numerous offſpring, and would be continued to the end of the world; or if given by Adam was prophetical of what ſhe would be; and ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, becauſe ſhe would be the mother of all living: and the ground of this faith and perſuaſion of his, that he and his wife ſhould not die immediately for the offence they had committed, but ſhould live and propagate their ſpecies, as well as be partakers of ſpiritual and eternal life, was the hint that had been juſt given, that there would be a ſeed ſpring from them; not only a numerous offſpring, but a particular eminent perſon that ſhould be the ruin of the devil and his kingdom, and the Saviour of them; and ſo Eve would be not only the mother of all men living in ſucceeding generations, but particularly, or however one deſcending from her would be the mother of him that ſhould bring life and immortality to light, or be the author of all life, natural, ſpiritual, and eternal; and who is called ζωη, the life, which is the ſame word by which the Greek verſion renders Eve in the preceding clauſe. It was with pleaſure, no doubt, that Adam gave her this name; and it appears that this affair of her being ſeduced by the ſerpent, and of drawing him into the tranſgreſſion, did not alienate his affection from her; and the rather he muſt needs cleave unto her, and not forſake her, ſince her ſeed was to break the ſerpent's head, and procure life and ſalvation for them; and by means of her, there would be a race of living men produced, which would propagate his ſpecies to the end of time: for all living can only reſpect them, and not other animals, though in ſome ſenſe they may be included, as our Engliſh poet [l] hints.

℣. 21. Unto Adam alſo and to his wife, &c.] Beſides the kind intimation of grace and favour to them, another token of God's good-will towards them was ſhewn, in that whereas they were naked and aſhamed, did the Lord God make coats of ſkins and clothed them; not that before this they were only bone and fleſh, and now God brought a ſkin over them, and covered them with it, or ordered a beaſt, which was very like a man, to have its ſkin ſtripped off, and put on him, as ſome in Aben Ezra fooliſhly imagined; but theſe were made of the ſkins of beaſts, not of the ſkin of the ſerpent, as the Targum of Jonathan; but of creatures ſlain, not merely for this purpoſe, nor for food, but for ſacrifice, as a type of the woman's ſeed, whoſe heel was to be bruiſed, or who was to ſuffer death for the ſins of men; and therefore to keep up and direct the faith of our firſt parents to the ſlain Lamb of God from the foundation of the world, and of all believers in all ages, until the Meſſiah ſhould come and die, and become a ſacrifice for ſin, the ſacrifices of ſlain beaſts were appointed: and of the ſkins of theſe the Lord God, either by his Almighty power, made coats for the man and his wife, or by the miniſtry of angels; or he inſtructed and directed them to make them, which was an inſtance of goodneſs to them; not only to provide food for them as before, but alſo raiment; and which tho' not rich, fine, and ſoft, yet was ſubſtantial, and ſufficient to protect them from all inclemencies of the weather; and they might ſerve as to put them in mind of their fall, ſo of their mortality by it, and of the condition ſin had brought them into; being in themſelves, and according to their deſerts, like the beaſts that periſh: as alſo they were emblems of the robe of Chriſt's righteouſneſs, and the garments of his ſalvation, to be wrought out by his obedience, ſufferings, and death; with which being arrayed, they ſhould not be found naked, nor be condemned, but be ſecured from wrath to come. The Heathens had a notion, that the firſt men made themſelves coats of the ſkins of beaſts: the Grecians aſcribe this to Pelaſgus, whom they ſuppoſe to be the firſt man [m] among them, and Sanchoniatho [n] to Uſous, who lived in the fifth generation.

℣. 22. And the Lord God ſaid, &c.] The Word of the Lord God, as the Jeruſalem Targum; not to the miniſtring angels, as the Targum of Jonathan; but within himſelf, or to the other two divine perſons: behold, the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil; which is generally underſtood as an irony or ſarcaſm at man's deception by ſatan, who promiſed man, and he expected to be as gods, knowing good and evil; behold the man, ſee how much like a god he looks, with his coat of ſkin upon his back, filled with ſhame and confuſion for his folly, and dejected under a ſenſe of what he had loſt, and in a view of what he was ſentenced to; yet muſt be underſtood not as rejoicing in man's miſery, and inſulting over him in it, but in order the more to convince him of his folly, and the more to humble him, and bring him to a more open repentance for affecting what he did, and giving credit to the devil in it: though I rather think they are ſeriouſly ſpoken, ſince this was after man was brought to a ſenſe of the evil he committed, and to repentance for it, and had had the promiſed ſeed revealed to him as a Saviour, and as an emblem of juſtification and ſalvation by him, was clothed with garments provided by God himſelf: wherefore the words are to be conſidered either as a declaration of his preſent ſtate and condition, in and by Chriſt, by whoſe righteouſneſs he was made righteous, even as he is righteous, though he had loſt his own; to whoſe image he was conformed, now bearing the image of the heavenly one, though he was deprived of that in which he was created, having ſinned, and come ſhort of the glory of God; and was now reſtored to friendſhip and amity with God, favoured with his gracious preſence, and having faith and hope of being with him for evermore; the eyes of his underſtanding were enlightened by the Spirit and Grace of God, to know the good things which God had provided for him in Chriſt, and in the covenant of grace, a better covenant than that under der which he was made, and which he had broke; and to know the evil nature of ſin, its juſt demerit, and the atonement of it, by the death and ſacrifice of the promiſed ſeed: or elſe the words are a declaration of man's paſt ſtate and condition, and may be rendered, behold, the man was as one of us [o]; as one of the perſons in the deity, as the Son of God, after whoſe image, and in whoſe likeneſs he was made; both as to his body, that being formed according to the idea of the body of Chriſt in the divine mind, and which was not begotten, but made out of the virgin earth; and as to his ſoul, which was created in righteouſneſs and holineſs, in wiſdom and knowledge, and was like him in the government he had over all the creatures: and beſides, he was in many things a type of Chriſt, a figure of him that was to come; eſpecially in his being a federal head to his poſterity, and in his offices of prophet, prieſt and king; and being created in knowledge, after the image of him that created him, and having the law of God inſcribed on his heart, he knew what was good and to be done, and what was evil and to be avoided: but now he was in a different condition, in other circumſtances, had loſt the image of God, and friendſhip with him, and his government over the creatures; and had ruined himſelf, and all his poſterity, and was become unholy and unwiſe; for being tempted by ſatan to eat of the forbidden fruit, under an expectation of increaſing his knowledge, loſt in a great meaſure what he had: and now, leſt he put forth his hand, and take alſo of the tree of life; as well as of the tree of knowledge of good and evil; which ſome take to be a continued ſarcaſm; and others, that it was in pity to him, that he might not live a long life of ſorrow; and others, as a puniſhment, that having ſinned he was juſtly deprived of the ſacrament and ſymbol of life; or elſe to prevent a freſh ſin; or rather to ſhew that there could be no life without ſatisfaction for the ſin committed, and this in no other way than by Chriſt, the antitype of the tree of life: and eat and live for ever; not that it was poſſible by eating of the fruit of the tree of life, his natural life could be continued for ever, contrary to the ſentence of death pronounced upon him; or ſo as to elude that ſentence, and by it eternal life be procured and obtained; but he was hindered from eating of it, leſt he ſhould flatter himſelf, that by ſo doing he ſhould live for ever, notwithſtanding he was doomed to die; and very probably the devil had ſuggeſted this to him, that ſhould he be threatened with death, which he made a queſtion of, yet by eating of the tree of life, which ſtood juſt by the other, he might ſave himſelf from dying: wherefore to prevent him, and to cut off all hopes of ſecuring life to himſelf in this way, it is ſuggeſted that ſomething muſt be done, which may be ſupplied from the following verſe, let us ſend him out of the garden.

℣. 23. Therefore the Lord God ſent him forth from the garden of Eden, &c.] Gave him orders to depart immediately; ſent or put him away as a man does his wife, when he divorces her; or as a prince baniſhes a rebellious ſubject: however, he did not ſend him to hell at once, as he did the apoſtate angels, but to till the ground, from whence he was taken; either the earth in general, out of which he was made, and to which he muſt return, and in the mean while muſt labour hard, in digging and plowing, in planting and ſowing, that ſo he might get a livelihood; or that particular ſpot, out of which he was formed, which is ſuppoſed from hence to have been without the garden of Eden, though very probably near unto it: ſome ſay it was a field near Damaſcus; the Targum of Jonathan is, "he went and dwelt in mount Moriah, "to till the ground out of which he was created;" and ſo other Jewiſh writers ſay [p], the gate of paradiſe was near mount Moriah, and there Adam dwelt after he was caſt out.

℣. 24. So he drove out the man, &c.] Being unwilling to go out upon the orders given, ſome degree of force was uſed, or power exerted, in ſome way or other, to oblige him to depart; the word it is expreſſed by, is uſed of divorces: there was a conjugal relation between God and man, the covenant between them had the nature of a matrimonial contract; which covenant man broke, tho' he was an huſband to him, by committing idolatry, that is, ſpiritual adultery, not giving credit to him, but believing the devil before him; wherefore he wrote him a bill of divorce, and ſent him away; drove him from his preſence and communion with him, from his houſe and habitation, from his ſeat of pleaſure, and garden of delight, and from all the comfortable enjoyments of life; an emblem of that ſeparation and diſtance which ſin makes between God and his creature, and of that loſs which is ſuſtained thereby: and he placed at the eaſt of the garden of Eden, cherubims; the Septuagint verſion is, "and he placed him, or "cauſed him (Adam) to dwell over-againſt the "paradiſe of pleaſure, and he ordered the cherubim." But the words are not to be underſtood either of placing man, or placing the cherubim, but of Jehovah's placing himſelf, or taking up his habitation and reſidence before the garden of Eden, or at the eaſt of it: whilſt man abode in a ſtate of innocence, the place of the divine preſence, or where God more glorioufly manifeſted himſelf to him, was in the garden; but now he having ſinned, and being driven out of it, he fixes his abode in a very awful manner at the entrance of the garden, to keep man out of it; for ſo the words may be rendered, and he inhabited the cherubim, or dwelt over, or between the cherubim, before or at the eaſt of the garden of Eden [q]; ſo the Jeruſalem Targum, "and he made the glory of his Shekinah, or glo-"rious majeſty, to dwell of old at the eaſt of the "garden of Eden, over or above the two cherubim;" or between them, as the Targum of Jonathan; and very frequently is Jehovah deſcribed as ſitting and dwelling between the cherubim, 1 Sam. iv. 4. 2 Sam. vi. 2. 1 Kings xix. 15. Pſ. lxxx. 1. and xcix. 1. Iſ. xxxvii. 16. by which are meant not flying animals or fowls, whoſe form no man ever ſaw, as Joſephus [r]; nor angels, which is the more generally received opinion; for theſe were not real living creatures of any ſort, but forms and repreſentations, ſuch as were made afterwards in the tabernacle of Moſes, and temple of Solomon; and which Ezekiel and John ſaw in a viſionary way, and from whom we learn what figures they were: and theſe were hieroglyphicks, not of a trinity of perſons, as ſome of late have ſtupidly imagined; for theſe were the ſeat of the divine majeſty, and between which he dwelt: and beſides, as theſe had four faces, they would rather repreſent a quaternity than a trinity, and would give a ſimilitude of the divine divine being, which cannot be done, and be contrary to the ſecond command; to which may be added, that the word is ſometimes ſingular as well as plural: but theſe were hieroglyphicks of the miniſters of the word, whoſe underſtanding, humility and tenderneſs are ſignified by the face of a man; their ſtrength, courage and boldneſs by that of a lion; their labour and diligence by that of an ox; and their quick ſight and penetration into divine things by that of an eagle, which are the forms and figures of the cherubim; ſee Ezek. i. 10. and the note there. Among theſe Jehovah is; with theſe he grants his preſence, and by them ſignifies his mind and will to men; and theſe he makes uſe of to ſhew them the vanity of all ſelf-confidence, and to beat them off of ſeeking for life and righteouſneſs by their own works, and to direct them alone to Chriſt, and point him out as the alone way of ſalvation; and of this uſe the hieroglyphick might be to fallen Adam, now driven out of Eden: and a flaming ſword, which turned every way; a drawn ſword, brandiſhed, and which being very quick in its motion, as it was turned to and fro, glittered and looked like a flame of fire: this is not to be underſtood as by itſelf, and as of itſelf, turning about every way without a hand to move it, nor as with the cherubim, or as in the hands of angels, as in 1 Chron. xxi. 16. or as being they themſelves, which are made as flames of fire; but as in the hand of the Lord God, that dwelt between the cherubim; for ſo it may be rendered, he inhabited the cherubim — and that with a flaming ſword[s]; that is, with one in his hand, an emblem of the fiery law of God now broken, and of the fire of divine wrath on the account of that, and of the flaming juſtice of God, which required ſatisfaction; and this turning on all ſides, to keep the way of the tree of life; ſhewing, that life and ſalvation were not to be had, unleſs the law and juſtice of God were ſatisfied; and that they were not to be expected on the foot of mens works, but only through Chriſt, the way, the truth, and the life; that no happineſs was to be looked for from the covenant of works, now broke, nothing but wrath and vengeance; and that there muſt be another way opened, or there could be no enjoyment of the heavenly paradiſe.

CHAP. IV.

IN this chapter an account is given of the two eldeſt children of Adam and Eve, their names and calling, ℣. 1, 2. and of their different offerings to the Lord, and the different reſpect had unto them by him, which in Cain iſſued in wrath and envy, which appeared in his countenance, and were taken notice of by the Lord, and about which he reaſoned with him, ℣. 3—7.—but it had no effect upon him, he murdered his brother, upon which he was examined about him, but denied he knew any thing of him where he was, ℣. 8, 9. he is arraigned, convicted and condemned, ſentence paſſed upon him, and that executed, which he complains of, and is mitigated, or however a protection is granted him, and a mark ſet on him for his ſecurity, ℣. 10—15. after which we have an account of his poſterity for ſeveral generations, their names, and the buſineſs of ſome of them, ℣. 16—24. and the chapter is cloſed with the birth of another ſon, and of a grandſon to Adam and Eve, in whoſe days was the beginning of ſocial religion.

℣. 1. And Adam knew Eve his wife, &c.] An euphemiſm or modeſt expreſſion of the act of coition. Jarchi interprets it, had known, even before he ſinned, and was drove out of the garden; and ſo other Jewiſh writers, who think he otherwiſe would not have obſerved the command, be fruitful and multiply: but if Adam had begotten children in a ſtate of innocence, they would have been free from ſin, and not tainted with the corruption of nature after contracted; but others more probably think it was ſome conſiderable time after; according to Mer Thudiuſi, or Theodoſius [t], it was thirty years after he was driven out of paradiſe: and ſhe conceived and bare Cain; in the ordinary way and manner, as women ever ſince have uſually done, going the ſame time with her burden. Whether this name was given to her firſt-born by her, or by her huſband, or both, is not ſaid: it ſeems to have been given by her, from the reaſon of it after aſſigned. His name, in Philo Byblius [u], is Genos, which no doubt was Cain, in Sanchoniatho, whom he tranſlated; and his wife, or the twin born with him, is ſaid to be Genea, that is, קינה, Cainah: the Arabs call her Climiah [v], and the Jewiſh writers Kalmenah [w]; who are generally of opinion, that with Cain and Abel were born twin-ſiſters, which became their wives. And ſaid, that is, Eve ſaid upon the birth of her firſt-born, I have gotten a man from the Lord; as a gift and bleſſing from him, as children are; or by him, by his favour and good will; and through his bleſſing upon her, cauſing her to conceive and bare and bring forth a ſon: ſome render it, I have gotten a man, the Lord [x]; that promiſed ſeed that ſhould break the ſerpent's head; by which it would appear, that ſhe took that ſeed to be a divine perſon, the true God, even Jehovah, that ſhould become man; though ſhe muſt have been ignorant of the myſtery of his incarnation, or of his taking fleſh of a virgin, ſince ſhe conceived and bare Cain through her huſband's knowledge of her: however, having imbibed this notion, it is no wonder ſhe ſhould call him Cain, a poſſeſſion or inheritance; ſince had this been the caſe, ſhe had got a goodly one indeed: but in this ſhe was ſadly miſtaken, he proved not only to be a mere man, but to be a very bad man: the Targum of Jonathan favours this ſenſe, rendering the words, "I have gotten a man, the angel of "the Lord."

℣. 2. And ſhe again bare his brother Abel, &c.] Or added to bare [y], not directly or immediately, but perhaps the following year; though ſome have thought, becauſe no mention is made of her conceiving ceiving again, that she brought forth Abel at the same time she did Cain, or that the birth of the one immediately followed upon that of the other: and it is the common opinion of the Jews [z], that with Abel, as with Cain, was born a twin-sister, whom the Arabic writers [a] call Lebuda: the name of Abel, or rather Hebel, signifies not mourning, as Josephus [b] observes, but vanity, Eve not making that account of him as she did of Cain; or perhaps because by this time she became sensible of her mistake in him, or had met with something which convinced her, that all earthly enjoyments were vanity; or by a spirit of prophecy foresaw what would befall this her second son, that he should be very early deprived of his life in a violent manner: and Abel was a keeper of sheep; a calling which he either chose himself, or his father put him to, and gave him; for tho' he and his brother were born to a large estate, being the heirs of Adam, the lord of the whole earth, yet they were not brought up in idleness, but in useful and laborious employments: but Cain was a tiller of the ground; of the same occupation his father was, and he being the first-born, was brought up in the same business, and might be a reason why he was put into it.

℣. 3. And in process of time it came to pass, &c.] Or at the end of days [c]; which some understand of the end of seven days, at the end of the week, or on the seventh day, which they suppose to be the sabbath-day, these sons of Adam brought their offerings to the Lord: but this proceeds upon an hypothesis not sufficiently established, that the seventh day-sabbath was now appointed to be observed in a religious way; rather according to Aben Ezra it was at the end of the year; so after days in Judg. xi. 4. is meant after a year, and which we there render, as here, in process of time. This might be after harvest, after the fruits of the earth were gathered in, and so a proper season to bring an offering to the Lord, in gratitude for the plenty of good things they had been favoured with; as in after-times with the Israelites, there was a feast for the ingathering of the fruits of the earth, Exod. xxiii. 16. The Targum of Jonathan fixes this time to the fourteenth of Nisan, as if it was the time of the passover, a feast instituted two thousand years after this time, or thereabout; and very stupidly one of the Jewish writers [d] observes, that "the night of the feast of the passover came, and "Adam said to his sons, on this night the Israelites "will bring the offerings of the passovers, offer ye "also before your creator." That Cain brought of the fruit of the ground, an offering unto the Lord; corn, herbs, seeds, &c. the Targum of Jonathan says it was flax-seed; so Jarchi makes mention of an agadah or exposition, which gives the same sense; and another of their writers [e] observes, that Cain brought what was left of his food, or light and trifling things, flax or hemp-seed. This he brought either to his father, as some think, being priest in his family; or rather he brought and offered it himself at the place appointed for religious worship, and for sacrifices; so Aben Ezra, he brought it to the place fixed for his oratory. It is highly probable it was at the east of the entrance of the garden of Eden, where the Shekinah, or the divine Majesty was, and appeared in some remarkable manner.

℣. 4. And Abel, he also brought of the firstlings of his flock, &c.] As he was a shepherd, his flock consisted of sheep; and of the firstlings of these, the lambs that were first brought forth, he presented as an offering to the Lord; and which were afterwards frequently used in sacrifice, and were a proper type of Christ, Jehovah's first-born, the Lamb of God that takes away the sin of the world, a Lamb without spot and blemish; fitly signified by one for his innocence, harmlessness and meekness: and of the fat thereof; which is to be understood, either of the fat properly, which in after-time was claimed by the Lord as his own, Lev. iii. 16. or of the fattest of his flock, the best lambs he had; the fattest and plumpest, and which were most free from defects and blemishes; not the torn, nor lame, nor sick, but that which was perfect and without spot; for God is to be served with the best we have. Josephus [f] says, it was milk, and the firstlings of his flock; and a word of the same letters, differently pointed, signifies milk; and some learned men, as Grotius and others, have given into this sense, observing it to be a custom with the Egyptians to sacrifice milk to their gods: but the word, as here pointed, is never used for milk; nor were such sacrifices ever used by the people of God; and Abel's sacrifice is called by the apostle θυσια, a slain sacrifice, as Heidegger [g] observes: and the Lord had respect to Abel, and to his offering; as being what he had designed and appointed to be used for sacrifice in future time, and as being a suitable type and emblem of the Messiah, and his sacrifice; and especially as being offered up by faith, in a view to the sacrifice of Christ, which is of a sweet smelling savour to God, and by which sin only is atoned and satisfied for, see Heb. xi. 4. God looked at his sacrifice with a smiling countenance, took, and expressed delight, well pleasedness and satisfaction in it; and he first accepted of his person, as considered in Christ his well beloved Son, and then his offering in virtue of his sacrifice: and this respect and acceptance might be signified by some visible sign or token, and particularly by the descent of fire from heaven upon it, as was the token of acceptance in after-times, Lev. ix. 24. and Theodotion here renders it, he fired it, or set it on fire; and Jarchi paraphrases it, "fire "descended and licked up his offering;" and Aben Ezra, "and fire descended and reduced the offer-"ing of Abel to ashes;" so Abraham Seba [h].

℣. 5. But unto Cain, and his offering he had not respect, &c.] Not because of the matter of it, as some have thought; but because it was not offered in faith and sincerity, but in a formal and hypocritical manner, without any regard to the Messiah and his sacrifice, and without any view to the glory of God: no notice was taken, no approbation was given of it by the above token, or any other; so that it was manifest to Cain himself, that God did not approve of it, or was well pleased with it, as with his brother's: and Cain was very wroth; with God to whom he offered it, because he did not accept of it, and with his brother, because he and his sacrifice were preferred to him and his: and his countenance fell; the briskness and cheerfulness of his countenance went off, and he looked dejected; and instead of lifting up his face towards heaven, he looked with a down look to the earth; he looked churlish, morose and sullen, ill natured, full of malice and revenge, and as if he was studying which which way to vent it; he knit his brows and gnaſhed his teeth, put on a ſurly countenance; and there might be ſeen in his face all the ſigns, not only of grief and diſappointment, but of rage and fury; though [i] ſome interpret it of ſhame and confuſion.

℣. 6. And the Lord ſaid unto Cain, why art thou wroth? and why is thy countenance fallen? &c.] Which was ſaid not as being ignorant of his wrath and reſentment, but to bring him to a conviction of his ſin or ſins, which were the cauſe of God's rejecting his ſacrifice, and to repentance and amendment; and to ſhew him that he had no cauſe to be diſpleaſed, either with him or his brother, for the different treatment of him and his offering; ſince the fault lay in himſelf, and he had none to blame but his own conduct, which for the future he ſhould take care to regulate according to the divine will, and things would take a different turn.

℣. 7. If thou doſt well, ſhalt thou not be accepted? &c.] That is, either if thou doſt thy works well in general, doſt good works in a right way and manner, according to the will of God, and directed to his glory, from right principles, and with right views: ſo all the Targums, "if thou "doſt thy works well;" for it is not merely doing a good work, but doing the good work well, which is acceptable to God; hence that ſaying, "that not nouns but adverbs make good works:" or particularly it may reſpect ſacrifice; if thou doſt thine offering well, or rightly offereth, as the Septuagint; or offers not only what is materially good and proper to be offered, but in a right way, in obedience to the divine will, from love to God, and with true devotion to him, in the faith of the promiſed ſeed, and with a view to his ſacrifice for atonement and acceptance; then thine offering would be well pleaſing and acceptable. Some render the latter part of the clauſe, which is but one word in the original text, there will be a lifting up [k]; either of the countenance of the offerer, and ſo if Cain had done well, his countenance would not have fallen, but have been lifted up, and chearful as before; or of ſin, which is the pardon of it, and is often expreſſed by taking and lifting it up, and bearing it away, and ſo of eaſing a man of it as of a burden; and in this ſenſe all the Targums take it; which paraphraſe it, "it or thy "ſin ſhall be forgiven thee:" and if thou doſt not well, ſin lieth at the door; if thou doſt not do good works, nor offer an offering as it ſhould be offered, ſin lies at the door of conſcience; and as ſoon as that is awakened and opened, it will enter in and make ſad work there, as it afterwards did, ℣. 13. or it is open and manifeſt, and will be taken cognizance of, and puniſhment be inflicted for it; or elſe the puniſhment of ſin itſelf is meant, which lies at the door, is at hand, and will ſoon be executed; and ſo all the Targums paraphraſe it, "thy ſin is reſerved to the day of "judgment," or lies at the door of the grave, reſerved to that day, as Jarchi. Some render the word a ſin-offering, as it ſometimes ſignifies; and then the ſenſe is, that though he had ſinned, and had done amiſs in the offering he had offered, nevertheleſs there was a propitiatory ſacrifice for ſin provided, which was at hand, and would ſoon be offered; ſo that he had no need to be dejected, or his countenance to fall; for if he looked to that ſacrifice by faith, he would find pardon and acceptance; but the former ſenſe is beſt: and unto thee ſhall be his deſire; or its deſire, as ſome underſtand it of ſin lying at the door, whoſe deſire was to get in and entice and perſuade him to that which was evil, and prevail and rule over him. The Targum of Jonathan, and that of Jeruſalem, paraphraſe it of ſin, but to another ſenſe, "ſin ſhall "lie at the door of thine heart, but into thine "hand I have delivered the power of the evil "concupiſcence; and to thee ſhall be its deſire, "and thou ſhalt rule over it, whether to be righ-"teous, or to ſin:" but rather it refers to Abel; and the meaning is, that notwithſtanding his offering was accepted of God, and not his brother Cain's, this would not alienate his affections from him, nor cauſe him to refuſe ſubjection to him; but he ſhould ſtill love him as his brother, and be ſubject to him as his elder brother, and not ſeek to get from him the birth-right, or think that that belonged to him, being forfeited by his brother's ſin; and therefore Cain had no reaſon to be angry with his brother, or envious at him, ſince this would make no manner of alteration in their civil affairs: and thou ſhalt rule over him, as thou haſt done, being the firſt-born.

℣. 8. And Cain talked with Abel, &c.] Or ſaid, or ſpoke unto him [l]; either what the Lord God ſaid to him in the foregoing verſes, as Aben Ezra, or he ſpoke to him in a kind and friendly manner; and thereby got him to take a walk in the field with him. The Vulgate Latin verſion adds, let us go abroad; and the Septuagint and Samaritan verſions, let us go into the field; not to fight a duel, which Abel doubtleſs would have declined, had that been declared, but to have ſome friendly converſation; and there being a large pauſe here in the Hebrew text, the Jeruſalem Targum gives us an account of what paſſed between them when in the field; "Cain ſaid to Abel his brother, there is no "judgment, nor judge, nor will a good reward "be given to the righteous; nor will vengeance "be taken of the wicked; neither is the world "created in mercy nor governed in mercy; other-"wiſe, why is thine offering received with good-"will, and mine not." Abel anſwered and ſaid to Cain, "there is a judgment," &c. and ſo goes on to aſſert every thing Cain denied, and to give a reaſon why the offering of the one was accepted, and the other rejected: and to the ſame purpoſe the Targum of Jonathan: and it came to paſs, when they were in the field; alone and at a diſtance from their parents, or from any town or city, if any were now built, as ſome think there were, and out of the ſight of any perſon that might come and interpoſe and reſcue: about a mile from Damaſcus, in a valley, yet on the ſide of a hill, are now ſhewn the place, or the houſe on it, where Cain ſlew Abel [m]; and ſo Mr. Maundrel [n] ſpeaks of a high hill near Damaſcus, reported to be the ſame they offered their ſacrifice on, and Cain ſlew his brother, and alſo of another hill at ſome diſtance from Damaſcus, and an ancient ſtructure on it, ſuppoſed to be the tomb of Abel: that Cain roſe up againſt Abel his brother, and ſlew him; in a furious manner aſſaulted him, without any juſt provocation, and took away his life, by ſome inſtrument or other, perhaps that was uſed in huſbandry, which might be in the field where they were. The Targum of Jonathan is, "he fixed a ſtone in his "forehead, " forehead, and ſlew him;" and ſo the Jews ſay [o] elſewhere: our poet [p] ſays, he ſmote him in the breaſt with a ſtone, into the midriff or diaphragm: it muſt be by ſome means or other, by which his blood was ſhed; but it is not material to enquire what the inſtrument was, as Aben Ezra obſerves; ſince though there might be no ſwords, yet there were ſtones and clubs enough, as he takes notice; and there muſt be even inſtruments for agriculture, one of which might be taken up, as being at hand, with which the execution might be made. The Jewiſh writers [q] ſay, Abel was an hundred years old when he was ſlain; and ſome of them [r] make Abel to be the firſt aggreſſor: they ſay, that Abel roſe up againſt him, and threw him to the ground, and afterwards Cain roſe up and ſlew him; not likely.

℣. 9. And the Lord ſaid unto Cain, where is Abel thy brother? &c.] Perhaps this was ſaid to him the next time he came to offer, he not being with him: this queſtion is put not as being ignorant where he was, but in order to bring Cain to a conviction and confeſſion of his ſin, to touch his conſcience with it, and fill it with remorſe for it; and for the aggravation of it, obſerves the relation of Abel to him, his brother: and he ſaid, I know not; which was a downright lye; for he muſt know where he had left him or laid him: this ſhows him to be under the influence of ſatan, who was a lyar, and the father of lies, as well as a murderer from the beginning; and that he was ſo blinded by him, as to forget whom he was ſpeaking to; that he was the omniſcient God, and knew the wickedneſs he had done, and the falſhood he now delivered, and was capable of confronting him with both, and of inflicting juſt puniſhment on him. Am I my brother's keeper? which was very ſaucily and impudently ſpoken: it is not only put by way of interrogation, but of admiration, as Jarchi obſerves, as wondring at it, that God ſhould put ſuch a queſtion to him, ſince he knew he had not the charge of his brother, and his brother was at age to take care of himſelf; and if not, it rather belonged to God and his Providence to take care of him, and not to him: ſo hardened was he in his iniquity, he had ſtretched out his hand againſt his brother, and now he ſtretched it out againſt God, and ran upon him, even on the thick boſſes of his buckler.

℣. 10. And he ſaid, &c.] Not Cain, the laſt ſpeaker, but the Lord God, what haſt thou done? what an heinous crime haſt thou committed? how aggravated is it? I know what thou haſt done; thou haſt ſlain thy brother, thine own, thine only brother, a holy, righteous, and good man, who never gave thee any offence, or any juſt occaſion of ſhedding his innocent blood: this he ſaid as knowing what he had done, and to impreſs his mind with a ſenſe of the evil, and to bring him to a confeſſion of it, before the ſentence was paſſed, that it might appear to all to be juſt, and of which there was full proof and evidence, as follows: the voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground; where it was ſpilt, and in which it was covered and hid, and where perhaps Cain had buried his body, that it might not be ſeen, and the murder not diſcovered; but God ſaw what was done, and the voice of innocent blood came into his ears, and cried for vengeance at his hands: it is in the original, the voice of thy brothers bloods [s], in the plural; which the Jews generally underſtood of the poſterity that would have deſcended from Abel, had he not been murdered: the Targum of Onkelos is, " the voice of the blood of the ſeeds or " generations that ſhould come from thy brother;" ſee 2 Kings ix. 26. or it may reſpect the blood of the ſeed of the woman, of all the righteous ones that ſhould be ſlain in like manner. The Jeruſalem Targum is, " the voice of the bloods of the multi- " tude of the righteous that ſhall ſpring from Abel " thy brother," or ſucceed him; ſee Matt. xxiii. 35. Jarchi thinks it has reference to the many wounds which Cain gave him, from whence blood ſprung; and every wound and every drop of blood, as it were, cried for vengeance on the murderer.

℣. 11. And now art thou curſed from the earth, &c.] From receiving benefit by it, and enjoying the fruits of it as before, and from having a ſettled dwelling in it, as is afterwards explained: which hath opened her mouth to receive thy brother's blood from thy hand; the blood of his brother which was ſhed by his own hand, was received and ſucked into the earth, where it was ſpilt, thro' the pores of it, and drank up and covered, ſo as not to be ſeen; in which it was as it were more humane to Abel, and as it were more aſhamed of the crime, and ſhuddered more, and expreſſed more horror at it, than Cain.

℣. 12. When thou tilleſt the ground, &c.] Which was the buſineſs he was brought up in and followed, ℣. 2. it ſhall not henceforth yield unto thee her ſtrength; the earth had been curſed for Adam's ſin, and was not ſo fruitful as in its primigenial ſtate; and now it was curſed again for Cain's ſin; not the whole earth, but that part which belonged to Cain, and was cultivated by him; and ſo it muſt be ſuppoſed to be curſed, not only in the ſpot where he had been ſettled, but in every other place where he ſhould come and occupy, and which thro' this additional curſe became ſo barren that it did not yield ſuch good fruits, and ſuch an increaſe of it as before; it loſt its native and vital juice, by which ſeed caſt into it became not ſo fruitful, and did not increaſe; but inſtead of this, tho' much pains were taken to manure it, and much was ſown, yet it brought forth little, at leaſt but little to Cain, whatever it did to others; and therefore it is ſaid, ſhall not yield unto thee; it would not turn much to his account, or yield much profit and increaſe to him, or bring forth much fruit; ſee Job xxxi. 38. a fugitive and a vagabond ſhalt thou be in the earth; being obliged to quit his former habitation, and remove to a place at ſome diſtance from the houſe of his father Adam, which was near the garden of Eden, as Aben Ezra obſerves; and to wander about from place to place, having no quiet ſettlement in any one place: the Septuagint render it groaning and trembling; the guilt of his ſin lay heavy on his conſcience, and filled him with ſuch horror and terror that he was continually ſighing and groaning, and was ſeized with ſuch a tremor that he ſhook in all his limbs; ſo the Arabic writers [t] ſay, that he was trembling and quivering, and had a ſhaking in his head all the days of his life; and Aben Ezra obſerves, that there are ſome that ſay that the firſt of theſe words ſignifies to moan and lament; but it may be, it was not ſo much his ſin, at leaſt the evil of of it, that he lamented, as the miſchief that came by it, or the calamities and misfortunes it brought upon him.

℣. 13. And Cain ſaid unto the Lord, &c.] In the anguiſh of his ſpirit and the diſtreſs of his mind: my puniſhment is greater than I can bear; thus complaining of the mercy of God, as if he acted a cruel part, inflicting on him more than he could endure; and arraigning his juſtice, as if it was more than he deſerved, or ought in equity to be laid on him; whereas it was abundantly leſs than the demerit of his ſin, for his puniſhment was but a temporal one; for excepting the horrors and terrors of his guilty conſcience, it was no other than a heavier curſe on the land he tilled, and baniſhment from his native place, and being a fugitive and wanderer in other countries; and if ſuch a puniſhment is intolerable, what muſt the torments of hell be? the worm that never dies? the fire that is never quenched? and the wrath of God which is a conſuming fire, and burns to the loweſt hell? ſome render the words, my ſin is greater than can be forgiven [u]; as deſpairing of the mercy of God, having no faith in the promiſed ſeed, and in the pardon of ſin through his atonement, blood and ſacrifice; or, is my ſin greater than can be forgiven [w]? is there no forgiveneſs of it? is it the unpardonable ſin? but Cain ſeems not to be ſo much concerned about ſin, and the pardon of it, as about his temporal puniſhment for it; wherefore the firſt ſenſe ſeems beſt, and beſt agrees with what follows.

℣. 14. Behold, thou haſt driven me out this day from the face of the earth, &c.] Not from being upon the earth, or had chaſed him out of the world as a wicked man is at death, but from a quiet ſettlement in it, and from ſociety and converſe with the inhabitants of it; and eſpecially he was driven from that part of it, where he was born and brought up, and which he had been employed in manuring; where his parents dwelt, and other relations, friends and acquaintance: and to be baniſhed into a ſtrange country, uninhabited, and at a diſtance from thoſe he had familiarly lived with, was a ſore puniſhment of him: and from thy face ſhall I be hid; not from his omniſcience and omnipreſence, for there is no ſuch thing as being hid from the all-ſeeing eye of God, or flying from his preſence which is every where; but from his favour and good-will and the outward tokens of it, as well as from the place where his ſhekinah or divine majeſty was; and which was the place of public worſhip, and where good men met and worſhipped God, and offered ſacrifice to him: and from the place of divine worſhip and the ordinances of it, and the church of God and communion with it, an hypocrite does not chuſe to be debarred: and I ſhall be a fugitive and a vagabond in the earth; as was threatned him, ℣. 12. ſee the note there: and it ſhall come to paſs, that every one that findeth me, ſhall ſlay me; that is, ſome one, the firſt that ſhould meet him, for he could be ſlain but by one; ſo odious he knew he ſhould be to every one, being under ſuch marks of the divine diſpleaſure, that his life would be in danger by whomſoever he ſhould be found: and this being near an hundred and thirty years after the creation of man, ſee ℣. 25. and chap. v. 3, there might in this time be a large number of men on earth; Adam and Eve procreating children immediately after the fall, and very probably many more beſides Cain and Abel, and thoſe very fruitful, bringing many at a birth and often, and few or none dying, the increaſe muſt be very great; and we read quickly after this of a city being built, ℣. 17. Cain ſeems to be more afraid of a corporal death, than to have any concern about his ſoul, and the eternal welfare of it, or to be in dread and fear of an eternal death, or wrath to come; tho' ſome think the words ſhould be rendered prayerwiſe [x], let it be that any one that findeth me, may kill me; being weary of life under the horrors of a guilty conſcience.

℣. 15. And the Lord ſaid unto him, &c.] In order to ſatisfy him, and make him eaſy in this reſpect, that he need not fear an immediate or bodily death, which was ſhewing him great clemency and lenity; or in anſwer to his begging for death, therefore, or as ſome render the word, taking them for two, not ſo [y]; it ſhall not be that whoever finds thee ſhall ſlay thee, thou needeſt not be afraid of that; nor ſhall thy requeſt be granted, that thou mighteſt be ſlain by the firſt man that meets thee: it was the will of God, that tho' Cain deſerved to die, yet that he ſhould not die immediately, but live a long miſerable life, that it might be a terror to others not to commit the like crime; tho' rather the particle ſhould be rendered verily, ſurely, of a truth [z]; ſo it will certainly be, it may be depended on: whoſoever ſlayeth Cain, vengeance ſhall be taken on him ſevenfold; ſeven times more than on Cain; that is, he ſhall be exceedingly puniſhed; vengeance ſhall be taken on him in a very viſible manner, to a very great degree: the Targum of Onkelos and Jonathan are "unto or thro' ſeven generations;" the meaning of which is, that the ſlayer of Cain ſhould not only be puniſhed in his own perſon, but in his poſterity, even unto ſeven generations; and not as Jarchi and Aben Ezra interpret it, that God deferred his vengeance on Cain unto ſeven generations, and at the end of them took vengeance on him by Lamech, one of his own poſterity, by whom he is ſuppoſed by that Jewiſh writer to be ſlain: and the Lord ſet a mark upon Cain, about which there is a variety of ſentiments [a]: ſome ſay it was a horn in his forehead; others, a leproſy in his face; others, a wild ghaſtly look; others, a ſhaking and trembling in all his limbs; and others, that there was an earthquake wherever he ſtepped; and others will have it, that the dog which guarded Abel's flock was given him to accompany him in his travels, by which ſign it might be known that he was not to be attacked, or to direct him from taking any dangerous road: ſome ſay it was a letter imprinted on his forehead, either taken out of the great and glorious name of God, as the Targum of Jonathan, or out of his own name as Jarchi; others the mark or ſign of the covenant of circumciſion [b]: but as the word is often uſed for a ſign or miracle, perhaps the better rendering and ſenſe of the words may be, and the Lord put, or gave a ſign [c]; that is, he wrought a miracle before him to aſſure him, that whoever found him ſhould not kill him; ſo that this was not a mark or ſign to others, to direct or point out to them that they ſhould not kill kill him, or to deter them from it; but was a ſign or miracle confirming him in this, that no one ſhould kill him; agreeable to which is the note of Aben Ezra, "it is right in my eyes that God made "a ſign (or wrought a miracle) for him, until he "believed;" by which he was aſſured, that his life would be ſecure, go where he would; even that no one ſhould ſtrike[d] him, as the word is, much leſs kill him.

ver. 16. And Cain went out from the preſence of the Lord, &c.] Either from the place where the Lord was talking with him; or from the place where his glorious majeſty uſually reſided, where was ſome viſible token of his preſence, ſome ſtream of light and glory which ſhewed him to be there, and which was at the eaſt of the garden of Eden; from whence Cain was obliged to go, not being ſuffered to appear any more before God, or among his worſhippers: there was a place near Tripoli in Syria, near where mount Lebanon ends, called προσωπου τȣ̃ Θεȣ̃, the face of God, made mention of by Polybius[e], and Strabo[f]; and was near thoſe parts where ſome place the garden of Eden; and it is poſſible might have its name from ſome tradition that this was the place where the face of God was ſeen, or his preſence enjoyed by our firſt parents after their ejection from Eden, and from whence Cain went forth: and dwelt in the land of Nod; ſo called, not before he went there, but from his wandering up and down in it; continuing in no one place in it, as well as his mind was reſtleſs and uneaſy; Jarchi mentions another reaſon of its name, that in every place where he went the earth ſhook under him, and men ſaid, depart from him, this is he that ſlew his brother: on the eaſt of Eden; farther eaſt from the place where his father Adam and his other children dwelt; not being allowed to continue any longer with them, or converſe with them, after he had been guilty of ſo horrid a crime.

ver. 17. And Cain knew his wife, &c.] Who this woman was is not certain, nor whether it was his firſt wife or no; whether his ſiſter, or one that deſcended from Adam by another of his ſons, ſince this was about the 130th year of the creation. At firſt indeed Cain could marry no other than his ſiſter; but whether he married Abel's twin ſiſter or his own twin ſiſter, is diſputed; the Jews ſay[g], that Cain's twin ſiſter was not a beautiful woman, and therefore he ſaid I will kill my brother and take his wife: on the other hand, the Arabic writers ſay[h], that Adam would have had Cain married Abel's twin ſiſter whom they call Awin; and Abel have married Cain's twin-ſiſter, whom they call Azron; but Cain would not, becauſe his own ſiſter was the handſomeſt; and this they take to be the occaſion of the quarrel, which iſſued in the murder of Abel: And ſhe conceived and bare Enoch; which ſignifies trained up, not in the true religion, and in the ways of God and godlineſs, as one of this name deſcending from Seth was, who is ſaid to walk with God; but in the practices of his father Cain, and in a wicked courſe of life: and he builded a city; for a ſettlement on earth, thinking of nothing but this world, and the things of it; or to ſecure himſelf from being ſlain by men; or it may be for his amuſement, to divert his thoughts from the melancholy ſcene always preſented to his mind, by being thus employed; and his poſterity growing numerous, he took this method to keep them together, and that they might be able to defend themſelves from the aſſaults of others. Some render the words, he was building a city[i]; as if he did not live to finiſh it; but it looks as if it was finiſhed by him, by what follows: and called the name of the city, after the name of his ſon Enoch; not after his own name which was odious and infamous, but after his ſon's name, to ſhew his affection to him, and that his name might be continued in ages to come; ſee Pſ. xlix. 11. This was the firſt city that was built, that we read of. Sir Walter Raleigh conjectures[k], that the Henochii or Heniochi of Pliny, Ptolemy, and other writers, took their name from this city of Henoch, or from the country where it ſtood, when it was re-peopled after the flood, ſince theſe people were due eaſt from the garden of Eden.

ver. 18. And unto Enoch was born Irad, &c.] But of neither of them is any other mention made, either in ſacred or prophane hiſtory; nor is it ſaid how old Enoch was when Irad was born, nor how long he lived after; as is recorded of Adam, Seth, and their poſterity: and Irad begat Mehujael, and Mehujael begat Methuſael; of whom alſo we have no other account; and Methuſael begat Lamech; and it ſeems for the ſake of Lamech that the genealogy of Cain's poſterity is deſcribed and carried down thus far, ſome things being to be taken notice of concerning him. The names of the immediate poſterity of Genos or Cain, according to Sanchoniatho, and, as Philo Byblius[l] has tranſlated them, were light, fire, and flame; who found out fire by rubbing pieces of wood together, and taught the uſe of it, from whence they ſeem to have their names. Theſe begat ſons that exceeded others in bulk and height, whoſe names were given to the mountains they firſt poſſeſſed, and from them were called Caſſius, Libanus, Antilibanus, and Brathy; and of them were begotten Memrumus and Hypſuranius, ſo called by their mothers, women, who, without ſhame, lay with every one they could meet with; of theſe came Agreus and Halieus, the inventors of fiſhing and hunting; and theſe ſeem to anſwer to the generations from Cain to Lamech; and it is no wonder Moſes ſhould take no more notice of ſuch a ſett of men; which, according to their own hiſtorian, deſerved but little regard.

ver. 19. And Lamech took unto him two wives, &c.] He was the firſt we read of that introduced polygamy, contrary to the firſt inſtitution of marriage, whereby only one man and one woman were to be joined together, and become one fleſh, ch. ii. 24. This evil practice, though it began in the race of wicked Cain, was in after-ages followed by ſome among the people of God, which was connived at becauſe of the hardneſs of their hearts; otherwiſe it was not ſo from the beginning. This was the firſt inſtance of it known; Jarchi ſays it was the way of the generation before the flood to have one wife for procreation of children, and the other for carnal pleaſure; the latter drank a cup of ſterility, that ſhe might be barren, and was adorned as a bride, and lived deliciouſly; and the other was uſed roughly, and mourned like a widow; but by this inſtance it does not appear, for theſe both bore children to Lamech. The name of the one was Adah, Adah, and the name of the other Zillah; whose daughters they were cannot be said, no doubt of the race of Cain: the name of the one signifies an ornament, or beauty, and might seem to answer to the account Jarchi gives of the wife for pleasure, if there were any foundation for it; and the other signifies a shadow, being continually under the shadow of her husband.

℣. 20. And Adah bare Jabal, &c.] According to Hillerus [m], this name, and Jubal and Tubal, after mentioned, all signify a river; why Lamech should call all his sons by names signifying the same thing, is not easy to say. He was the father of such as dwelt in tents, and of such as have cattle; not in a proper sense the father of them, though his posterity might succeed him in the same business; but he was the first author and inventor of tents or moveable habitations, which could be carried from place to place for the convenience of pasturage for cattle: he was not the first that had cattle in his possession, or that first fed and kept them, for Abel, the son of Adam, was a keeper of sheep; but he was the first that found out the use of tents, and the pitching of them to abide in at proper places, so long as the pasturage lasted, and then to remove elsewhere; as we find in after-times the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac and Jacob did, and as the Scenitæ and Nomades among the Arabs, and who retain the same method of keeping cattle to this day; and so the words may be rendered according to Bochart [n] and Noldius [o], "he was the father of such that dwell in tents with cattle." Heidegger [p] thinks this Jabal to be the same with Pales, the god of shepherds [q], to whom the Palilia were sacred with the heathens; and that from Jabal may be formed Bal, leaving out the jod, as is sometimes done, and by adding the termination, it will be Bales, and by changing the letters of the same organ, Pales.

℣. 21. And his brother's name was Jubal, &c.] This was another son of Lamech by Adah, and his name differs only in one letter from his brother's: he was the father of all such that handle the harp and organ; he was the inventor of instrumental music, both of stringed instruments, such as were touched by the fingers, or struck with a quill, as the harp; and of wind-instruments, such as were blown, as the organ, which seems not to be the same we call so, being a late invention; but however a pleasant instrument, as its name signifies. Jubal is thought by some to be the same with Apollo, to whom with the Greeks the invention of the harp is ascribed; and some have been of opinion, that the jubile-trumpet was so called from Jubal, Lev. xxv. 9. Sanchoniatho [r] makes Chrysor or Vulcan, the same with Tubal-Cain, the brother of Jubal, to exercise himself in eloquence, songs and divination, confounding or mistaking the employment of the two brothers. The Arabs have such a notion of the Cainites being the inventors of music, that they commonly call a singing girl Cainah [s]; and the Arabic writers [t] make Jubal to be the first inventor of music, and that the beasts and birds gathered together to hear him; the same that is said of Orpheus.

℣. 22. And Zillah, she also bare Tubal-Cain, &c.] Thought by many to be the same with Vulcan, his name and business agreeing; for the names are near in sound, Tubal-Cain may easily pass into Vulcan; and who, with the heathens, was the god of the smiths, and the maker of Jupiter's thunderbolts, as this was an artificer in iron and brass, as follows: his name is compounded of two words, the latter of which was no doubt put into his name in memory of Cain his great ancestor; the former Josephus [u] reads Thobel, and says of him, that he exceeded all in strength, and had great skill in military affairs: an instructor of every artificer in brass and iron; he taught men the way of melting metals, and of making armour and weapons of war, and other instruments for various uses, out of them; and he seems to be the same with the Chrysor of Sanchoniatho; for he says [w] of them (Agreus and Halieus) were begotten two brothers, the inventors of iron, and of working of it; one of these, called Chrysor, is said to be Hephæstus or Vulcan; and Chrysor, as Bochartus [x] seems rightly to conjecture, is חרש־אור Chores-Ur, a worker in fire; that by means of fire, melted metals, and cast them into different forms, and for different uses; and one of these words is used in the text of Tubal-Cain; and so, according to Diodorus Siculus [y], Vulcan signifies fire, and was not only the inventor of fire, but he says he was the inventor of all works in iron, brass, gold and silver, and of all other things wrought by fire, and of all other uses of fire, both by artificers and all other men, and therefore he was called by all πυρ, fire. Clemens of Alexandria [z] ascribes the invention of brass and iron to the Idæans or priests of Cybele in Cyprus; and so Sophocles in Strabo [a]: and the sister of Tubal-Cain was Naamah; whose name signifies pleasant, fair and beautiful; and is thought by some to be the Venus of the heathens; the Arabic writers [b] say she was a most beautiful woman, and found out colours and painting; and by others Minerva, and Josephus [c] says, she excelled in the knowledge of divine things; and Minerva is by the Greeks called Nemanoum [d]. The Jews say [e], she was the wife of Noah; and some of them say [f], she was the wife of one Shimron, and the mother of the evil spirit Asmodeus, mentioned in Tobit, and of whom other dæmons were begotten: the Targum of Jonathan adds, "she was the mistress of lamentation and songs;" but our bishop Cumberland [g] conjectures, that she was the wife of Ham, was with him in the ark, and after the flood was the means of leading him into idolatry: what led him to this conjecture was, that he observed in Plutarch, that the wife of Cronus, the same with Ham, is by some called Nemaus, which brought Naamah to his mind. Josephus [h] makes the number of children Lamech had by his two wives, to be seventy-seven.

℣. 23. And Lamech said unto his wives, Adah and Zillah, &c.] Confessing what he had done, or boasting what he would do should he be attacked; or in order to make his wives easy, who might fear from his fierceness and cruelty, and the murders he had committed, or on account of Abel's murder, ℣. 15. that either the judgments of God would fall upon him and them, or some man or other would dispatch him and his; wherefore calling them together, he thus bespeaks them, hear my voice, ye wives of Lamech, hearken unto my speech;

ſpeech; this he ſaid in an imperious manner to them, demanding their attention and regard, and as glorying in, inſtead of being aſhamed of his polygamy, and in a bluſtering way, as neither fearing God nor man; or rather ſpeaking comfortably to them, to remove their fears: for I have ſlain a man to my wounding, and a young man to my hurt; which, as ſome ſay, were his great grandfather Cain, and his ſon Tubal-Cain: according to a tradition of the Jews [l], it was after this manner; Cain being old, and blind, and weary, ſat in a thicket among the trees to reſt himſelf; when Lamech, who was blind alſo, and led by Tubal-Cain a hunting, who ſeeing Cain, and taking him for a wild beaſt, bid Lamech draw his bow, which he did, and killed him; but coming nearer, and finding it was Cain, was wroth and angry, and ſlew the young man: the Arabic writers [k] tell the ſtory with a little variation, and "Lamech being in a wood with "one of his ſons, and hearing a noiſe in it, ſuppoſing it to be a wild beaſt, caſt a ſtone, which "fell upon Cain, and killed him ignorantly; and "the lad that led him, ſaid, what haſt thou done? "thou haſt killed Cain; at which being very ſorrowful after the manner of penitents, he ſmote his "hands together, and the lad ſtanding before him, "he ſtruck his head with both his hands, and "killed him unawares; and coming to his wives, "Adah and Zillah, ſaid to them, hear my word, "he that ſlew Abel ſhall be avenged ſevenfold, "but Lamech ſeventy times ſeven, who killed a "man with the caſt of a ſtone, and a young man "by clapping of his hands." And our verſion, and others, imply, that he killed both a man, and a young man, or ſome one perſon or more, and that he was ſorry for it, made confeſſion of it; it was to the wounding and grief of his ſoul, which does not ſo well agree with one of the wicked race of Cain: wherefore the words may be rendered, though I have ſlain a man [l], that is nothing to you, you are not accountable for it, nor have any thing to fear coming upon you by reaſon of that; it is to my own wounding, damage and hurt, if to any, and not to you. Some verſions render it, I would ſlay a man, &c. [m] any man, young or old, that ſhould attack me; I fear no man: if any man wounds me, or offers to do me any hurt, I would ſlay him at once; I doubt not but I ſhould be an over-match for him, be who he will that ſhall ſet upon me, and kill him; though I might receive ſome ſlight wound, or ſome little hurt in the engagement, and therefore you need not be afraid of any man's hurting me. The Arabic verſion reads interrogatively, have I killed a man? &c. and ſo ſome others [n], I have not; with which agree the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan, "I have not killed a man;" for which he or his poſterity ſhould be puniſhed, as they interpreted it; and therefore his wives had no need to fear any ill ſhould befall him or them, or that the murder of Abel ſhould be avenged on them, this being the ſeventh generation in which it was to be avenged, ℣. 15. wherefore it follows, ℣. 24. If Cain ſhall be avenged ſevenfold, truly Lamech ſeventy and ſeven fold.] Which if underſtood of him as confeſſing and lamenting his ſin of murder, the ſenſe is, if Cain was ſo ſeverely puniſhed for killing one man, of how much ſorer puniſhment am I deſerving, and ſhall have, who have killed two perſons, and that after I had ſeen the puniſhment of Cain, and yet took no warning by it? or if he that killed Cain, who ſlew his brother, was to be avenged ſevenfold, or to ſeven generations, then how much more, or longer, ſhall he be avenged, that ſhall ſlay me, who have ſlain none, or however not deſignedly; and therefore you may be eaſy and quiet, your fears, either from God or man, are groundleſs.

℣. 25. And Adam knew his wife again, &c.] The Targum of Jonathan adds, at the end of a hundred and thirty years after Abel was killed, ſee ch. v. 3. but, according to biſhop Uſher, Seth was born the ſame year, which is moſt probable. And ſhe bare a ſon, and called his name Seth, that is, put, placed, ſet; not with any reſpect to Cain, who had no ſettled fixed abode, but wandred about; or to Seth as a foundation of the church and true religion, being a type of Chriſt the only foundation, tho' he may be conſidered in ſuch a light; but the reaſon of his name follows: for God, ſaid ſhe, hath appointed me another ſeed inſtead of Abel, whom Cain ſlew; that is, another ſon in his room; and by calling him a ſeed, ſhe may have reſpect unto the promiſed ſeed, whom ſhe once thought Cain was, or however expected him in his line, as being the firſt-born; but he proving a wicked man, and having ſlain his brother Abel, on whom her future hope was placed, has another ſon given her, and ſubſtituted in his room, in whom, and in whoſe family the true religion would be preſerved, and from whom the Meſſiah, the promiſed ſeed, would ſpring; ſee Gal. iii. 16.

℣. 26. And to Seth, to him alſo there was born a ſon, &c.] When he was an hundred and five years old, chap. v. 6. and this is mentioned as a further proof and inſtance of God's goodneſs to Adam's family in this line, that there was a ſucceſſion in it, where the true worſhip of God was kept, and from whence the Meſſiah was to ariſe, and as a pledge and confirmation of it: and he called his name Enos; which is generally interpreted a weak, feeble, frail, mortal, miſerable man; which Seth being ſenſible of, and obſerving the ſorrows of human life, and eſpecially an increaſe of them amongſt good men thro' the growing corruptions of the age, gave this name to his ſon; tho' it may be obſerved, that the derivation of this name may be from the Arabic word انس anas [o], to be ſociable and familiar; man being a ſociable creature, not only in civil but in religious things, and ſo a reaſon of the name may be taken from what follows; then began men to call upon the name of the Lord; not but that Adam and Abel, and all good men, had called upon the name of the Lord, and prayed to him, or worſhipped him before this time perſonally, and in their families; but now the families of good men being larger, and more numerous, they joined together in ſocial and public worſhip: or ſince it may be thought there were public aſſemblies for religious worſhip before this time, though it may be they had been neglected, and now were reviyed with more zeal and vigour; ſeeing the Cainites incorporating themſelves, and joining families together, and building cities, and carrying on their civil and religious affairs among themſelves, they alſo formed themſelves into diſtinct bodies; and not only only ſeparated from them, but called themſelves by a different name; for ſo the words may be rendered: then began men to call themſelves, or to be called by the name of the Lord [p]; the ſons of God, as diſtinct from the ſons of men; which diſtinction may be obſerved in ch. vi. 2. and has been retained more or leſs ever ſince: ſome chuſe to tranſlate the words, then began men to call in the name of the Lord [q]; that is, to call upon God in the name of the Meſſiah, the mediator between God and man; having now ſince the birth of Seth, and eſpecially of Enos, clearer notions of the promiſed ſeed, and of the uſe of him, and his name, in their addreſſes to God; ſee John xiv. 13, 14. and xvi. 23, 24. The Jews give a very different ſenſe of theſe words; the Targum of Onkelos is, "then "in his days the children of men ceaſed from "praying in the name of the Lord;" and the Targum of Jonathan is, "this was the age, in the "days of which they began to err, and they made "themſelves idols, and ſurnamed their idols by "the name of the word of the Lord;" with which agrees the note of Jarchi, "then they be-"gan to call the names of men, and the names "of herbs, by the name of the bleſſed God, to "make idols of them:" and ſome of them ſay, particularly Maimonides [r], that Enos himſelf erred, and fell into idolatry, and was the firſt inventor of images, by the mediation of which men prayed to God: but all this ſeems to be without foundation, and injurious to the character of this antediluvian patriarch; nor does it appear that idolatry obtained in the poſterity of Seth, or among the people of God ſo early; nor is ſuch an account agreeable to the hiſtory which Moſes is giving of the family of Seth, in oppoſition to that of Cain; wherefore one or other of the former ſenſes is beſt.

CHAP. V.

THIS chapter contains a liſt or catalogue of the poſterity of Adam in the line of Seth, down to Noah; it begins with a ſhort account of the creation of Adam, and of his life and death, ℣. 1—5. next of five of the antediluvian patriarchs, their age and death, namely Seth, Enos, Cainan, Mahaleel, Jared, ℣. 6—20. then a particular relation of Enoch, his character and tranſlation, ℣. 21—24. then follow an account of Methuſelah, the oldeſt man, and Lamech's oracle concerning his ſon Noah, ℣. 25—29. and the chapter is cloſed with the life and death of Lamech, and the birth of the three ſons of Noah, ℣. 30—32.

℣. 1. This is the book of the generations of Adam, &c.] An account of perſons born of him, or who deſcended from him by generation in the line of Seth, down to Noah, conſiſting of ten generations; for a genealogy of all his deſcendants is not here given, not of thoſe in the line of Cain, nor of the collateral branches in the line of Seth, only of thoſe that deſcended one from another in a direct line to Noah: in the day that God created man, in the likeneſs of God made he him; this is repeated from ch. i. 27. to put in mind that man is a creature of God; that God made him, and not he himſelf; that the firſt man was not begotten or produced in like manner as his ſons are, but was immediately created; that his creation was in time, when there were days, and it was not on the firſt of theſe, but on the ſixth; and that he was made in the likeneſs of God, which chiefly lay in knowledge, righteouſneſs and holineſs, and in dominion over the creatures.

℣. 2. Male and female created he them, &c.] Adam and Eve, the one a male, the other a female; and but one male and one female, to ſhew that one man and one woman only were to be joined together in marriage, and live as man and wife for the procreation of poſterity; and theſe were not made together, but firſt the male, and then the female out of him, though both in one day: and bleſſed them; with a power of propagating their ſpecies, and multiplying it; and with all other bleſſings of nature and providence; with an habitation in the garden of Eden; with leave to eat of the fruit of all the trees in it, but one; with ſubjection of all the creatures to them, and with communion with God in their enjoyments: and called their name Adam, in the day when they were created; which, as Philo [s] obſerves, ſignifies earth; and according to Joſephus [t] red earth, out of which Adam was made; and as ſoon as he was made, this name was impoſed upon him by God, to put him in mind of his original, that he was of the earth, earthly; and the ſame name was given to Eve, becauſe made out of him, and becauſe of her marriage with him, and union to him; on that account, as ever ſince man and wife bear the ſame name: wherefore I ſhould rather think the name was given them from their junction and union together in love; ſo the name may be derived from the Arabic word [u] ſignifying to join; tho' ſome think they had it from their beauty, and the elegance of their form [w], being the moſt fair and beautiful of the whole creation. The names of Adam and Eve in Sanchoniatho [x], as tranſlated into Greek by Philo Byblius, are Protogonos, the firſt-born, and Aeon, which has ſome likeneſs to Eve: the name of the firſt man with the Chineſe is Puoncuus [y].

℣. 3. And Adam lived an hundred and thirty years, &c.] The Septuagint verſion, through miſtake, gives the number, two hundred and thirty years: and begat a ſon; not that he had no other children during this time than Cain and Abel; this is only obſerved to ſhew how old he was when Seth was born, the ſon here meant; who was begotten in his own likeneſs, after his image; not in the likeneſs, and after the image of God, in which Adam was created; for having ſinned, he loſt that image, at leaſt it was greatly defaced, and he came ſhort of that glory of God, and could not convey it to his poſterity; who are, and ever have been conceived in ſin, and ſhapen in iniquity; are polluted and unclean, fooliſh and diſobedient; averſe to all that is good, and prone to all that is evil: the ſinfulneſs neſs of nature is conveyed by natural generation, but not holineſs and grace; that is not of blood, nor of the will of man, nor of the fleſh, but of God, and produced of his own will, by his mighty power impreſſing the image of his Son in regeneration on his people; which by beholding his glory they are more and more changed into by the Spirit of God. The Jewiſh writers underſtand this in a good ſenſe, of Seth being like to Adam in goodneſs, when Cain was not: ſo the Targum of Jonathan, "and he begat Seth, who was like to his "image and ſimilitude; for before Eve had brought "forth Cain, who was not like unto him—but afterwards ſhe brought forth him who was like unto "him, and called his name Seth." So they ſay [z], Cain was not of the ſeed, nor of the image of Adam, nor his works like Abel his brother; but Seth was of the ſeed and image of Adam, and his works were like the works of his brother Abel; according to that, he begat (a ſon) in his own likeneſs. And they aſſert [a], that Adam delivered all his wiſdom to Seth his ſon, who was born after his image and likeneſs; and particularly Maimonides [b] obſerves, that all the ſons of Adam before Seth were rather beaſts than men, and had not the true human form, not the form and image of men; but Seth, after Adam had taught and inſtructed him, was in human perfection, as it is ſaid of him, and he begat in his likeneſs: but the text ſpeaks not of the education of Seth, and of what he was through that, but of his birth, and what he was in conſequence of it; and we are told by good authority, that that which is born of the fleſh is fleſh, carnal and corrupt, and ſuch are all the ſons of Adam by natural generation; ſee Job xiv. 4.

℣. 4. And the days of Adam, after he had begotten Seth, were eight hundred years, &c.] The Septuagint verſion is ſeven hundred; for having added one hundred years more than ſhould be, to the years of his life before the birth of Seth, here they are taken away to make the number of his years compleat: and he begat ſons and daughters; not only after the birth of Seth, but before, though we have no account of any, unleſs of Cain's wife; but what their number was, is not certain, either before or after; ſome ſay he had thirty children, beſides Cain, Abel and Seth; and others a hundred [c].

℣. 5. And all the days that Adam lived, were nine hundred and thirty years, &c.] Not lunar years, as Varro [d], but ſolar years, which conſiſted of three hundred and ſixty five days and odd hours, and ſuch were in uſe among the Egyptians in the times of Moſes; and of theſe muſt be the age of Adam, and of his poſterity in this chapter, and of other patriarchs in this book; or otherwiſe, ſome muſt be ſaid to beget children at an age unfit for it, particularly Enoch, who muſt beget a ſon in the ſixth year of his age; and the lives of ſome of them muſt be very ſhort, even ſhorter than ours, as Abraham and others; and the time between the creation and the deluge, could not be 200 years: but this long life of the antediluvians, according to the ſcripture-account, is confirmed by the teſtimony of many heathen writers, who affirm that the ancients lived a thouſand years, as many of them did pretty near, though not quite, they uſing a round number to expreſs their longævity by; for the proof of this Joſephus [e] appeals to the teſtimonies of Manetho the Egyptian, and Beroſus the Chaldean, and Mochus and Heſtiæus; beſides Jerom the Egyptian, and the Phœnician writers; alſo Heſiod, Hecatæus, Hellanicus, Acuſilaus, Ephorus and Nicolaus. And though the length of time they lived may in ſome meaſure be accounted for by natural things as means, ſuch as their healthful conſtitution, ſimple diet, the goodneſs of the fruits of the earth, the temperate air and climate they lived in, their ſobriety, temperance, labour and exerciſe; yet no doubt it was ſo ordered in Providence for the multiplication of mankind, for the cultivation of arts and ſciences, and for the ſpread of true religion in the world, and the eaſier handing down to poſterity ſuch things as were uſeful, both for the good of the ſouls and bodies of men. Maimonides [f] is of opinion, that only thoſe individual perſons mentioned in ſcripture lived ſo long, not men in common; and which was owing to their diet and temperance, and exact manner of living, or to a miracle; but there is no reaſon to believe, that they were the only temperate perſons, or that any miracle ſhould be wrought, particularly on their account for prolonging their lives, and not others. But though they lived ſo long, it is ſaid of them all, as here of the firſt man, and he died, according to the ſentence of the law in Gen. ii. 17. and though he died not immediately upon his tranſgreſſion of the law, yet he was from thence forward under the ſentence of death, and liable to it; yea, death ſeized upon him, and was working in him, till it brought him to the duſt of it; his life, though ſo long protracted, was a dying life, and at laſt he ſubmitted to the ſtroke of death, as all his poſterity ever ſince have, one or two excepted, and all muſt; for it is appointed unto men once to die, Heb, ix. 27. The Arabic [g] writers relate, that Adam when he was near death called to him Seth, Enos, Kainan and Mahaleel, and ordered them by his will, when he was dead, to embalm his body with myrrh, frankincenſe and caſſia, and lay it in the hidden cave, the cave of Macphelah, where the Jews [h] ſay he was buried, and where Abraham, Sarah, &c. were buried; and that if they ſhould remove from the neighbourhood of paradiſe, and from the mountain where they dwelt, they ſhould take his body with them, and bury it in the middle of the earth. They are very particular as to the time of his death. They ſay [i] it was on a Friday, the 14th of Niſan, which anſwers to part of March and part of April, A. M. 930. in the ninth hour of that day. The Jews are divided about the funeral of him; ſome ſay Seth buried him; others, Enoch; and others, God himſelf [k]: the primitive chriſtian fathers will have it, that he was buried at Golgotha, on mount Calvary, where Chriſt ſuffered.

℣. 6. And Seth lived an hundred and five years, and begat Enos.] Not that this was his firſt-born, no doubt but he had other children before this time; but this is only mentioned, becauſe it carried the lineage and deſcent directly from Adam to Noah, the father of the new world, and from whom the Meſſiah was to ſpring; whoſe genealogy to give is a principal view of this book, or account of generations from Adam to Noah.

℣. 7. And Seth lived after he begat Enos, eight hundred and ſeven years, &c.] The Septuagint verſion makes the ſame miſtake in the numbers of Seth as of Adam, giving him two hundred and five years years before the birth of Enos, and but ſeven hundred and ſeven years after: and begat ſons and daughters; very probably both before and after Enos was born; but how many is not ſaid.

℣. 8. And all the days of Seth, were nine hundred and twelve years, and he died.] As his father Adam before him. Seth, according to Joſephus [l], was a very good man, and brought up his children well, who trod in his ſteps, and who ſtudied the nature of the heavenly bodies; and that the knowledge of theſe things, they had acquired, might not be loſt, remembring a prophecy of Adam, that the world ſhould be deſtroyed both by fire and by water, they erected two pillars, called Seth's pillars; the one was made of brick, and the other of ſtone, on which they inſcribed their obſervations, that ſo if that of brick was deſtroyed by a flood, that of ſtone might remain; and which the above writer ſays continued in his time in the land of Siriad. The Arabic writers [m] make Seth to be the inventor of the Hebrew letters, and ſay, that when he was about to die he called to him Enos, Cainan, Mahaleel, Jared, Enoch, their wives and children, and adjured them by the blood of Abel, not to deſcend from the mountain, where they dwelt, after the death of Adam, nor ſuffer any of their children to go to, or mix with any of the ſeed of Cain, which were in the valley; whom he bleſſed, and ordered by his will to ſerve the Lord, and then died in the year of his age 912, on the third day of the week of the month Ab (which anſwers to part of July and part of Auguſt) A. M. 1142. and his ſons buried him in the hidden cave in the holy mountain, and mourned for him forty days.

℣. 9. And Enos lived ninety years, and begat Cainan.] According to the Septuagint a hundred and ninety years; it can hardly be thought but that he had ſons or daughters before, but this is only taken notice of for a reaſon before given.

℣. 10. And Enos lived after he begat Cainan, eight hundred and fifteen years, &c.] The Septuagint verſion is ſeven hundred and fifteen; the hundred which is wanting is to be ſupplied from the preceding verſe, which in that verſion has an hundred too much: and begat ſons and daughters; others beſides Enos, as very likely he had before he was born.

℣. 11. And all the days of Enos, were nine hundred and five years, and he died.] According to the Arabic writers [n], this man was a very good man, governed his people well, and inſtructed them in the ways of righteouſneſs, and the fear of God; and when his end drew nigh, his offſpring gathered about him for his bleſſing; and calling them to him, he ordered them by his will to practiſe holineſs, and exhorted them not to mix with the offſpring of Cain the murderer; and having appointed Cainan his ſucceſſor, he died in the year of his age 905. A. M. 1340. and was buried in the holy mountain; but according to biſhop Uſher it was A. M. 1140.

℣. 12. And Cainan lived ſeventy years, and begat Mahaleel.] Here the Septuagint verſion adds an hundred years, as before.

℣. 13. And Cainan lived after he begat Mahaleel, eight hundred and forty years, &c.] The Septuagint has ſeven hundred and forty, which added to the years given him before, makes the ſame ſum: and begat ſons and daughters; as his progenitors did.

℣. 14. And all the days of Cainan, were nine hundred and ten years, and he died.] The Arabic writers [o] alſo commend him as a good ruler of his people; and at his death he charged them not to deſert the holy mountain, and join themſelves with Cain's poſterity; and having appointed Mahaleel, who they ſay was his eldeſt ſon, his ſucceſſor, he died on the fourth day of the week, and the thirteenth of the month Cheziran, A. M. 1535. and was buried in the double cave, and they mourned for him, according to cuſtom, forty days: according to biſhop Uſher it was in A. M. 1235.

℣. 15. And Mahaleel lived ſixty and five years, and begat Jared.] A hundred and ſixty according to the Septuagint verſion.

℣. 16. And Mahaleel lived after he begat Jared, eight hundred and thirty years, &c.] Seven hundred and thirty, as the above verſion, ſtill making the ſame miſtake: and he begat ſons and daughters; how many cannot be ſaid.

℣. 17. And all the days of Mahaleel, were eight hundred ninety and five years, and he died.] He alſo is ſpoken well of by the Arabic writers [p] as a good governor, a pious man that walked in the way of righteouſneſs; and when he died bleſſed his children, and adjured them by the blood of Abel, not to ſuffer any of theirs to deſcend from the mountain to the ſons of Cain: according to biſhop Uſher he died A. M. 1290.

18. And Jared lived an hundred and ſixty-two years, and he begat Enoch.] Here the Septuagint agrees with the Hebrew text, and the Samaritan verſion differs, reading only ſixty-two; but this can hardly be thought to be his firſt ſon at ſuch an age.

℣. 19. And Jared lived after he begat Enoch, eight hundred years, &c.] And ſo the Greek verſion, but the Samaritan is ſeven hundred and eighty-five: and begat ſons and daughters; in that time, as well as before; for it is not to be imagined in this, or either of the foregoing or following inſtances, that theſe ſons and daughters were begotten after living to ſuch an age, ſince it is plain at that age they died.

℣. 20. And all the days of Jared, were nine hundred ſixty and two years, and he died.] The name of this patriarch ſignifies deſcending; and according to the Arabic writers [q], he had his name from the poſterity of Seth, deſcending from the holy mountain in his time; for upon a noiſe being heard on the mountain, about an hundred men went down to the ſons of Cain, contrary to the prohibition and dehortation of Jared, and mixed themſelves with the daughters of Cain, which brought on the apoſtacy: when Jared was near his end, he called to him Enoch, Methuſelah, Lamech, Noah, and their children, and ſaid unto them, ye know what ſome have done, that they have gone down from the mountain, and have had converſation with the daughters of Cain, and have defiled themſelves; take you care of your purity, and don't deſcend from the holy mountain; after which he bleſſed them, and having appointed Enoch his ſucceſſor, he died the 12th of Adar, anſwering to February, A. M. 1922. according to the Samaritan verſion, he lived only eight hundred and forty-ſeven years: he died according to biſhop Uſher A. M. 1422.

℣. 21. And Enoch lived ſixty and five years, and begat Methuſelah.] Here the Septuagint verſion adds again an hundred years; and that Enoch had a ſon, whoſe name was Methuſelah, is affirmed by Eupolemus [r], an heathen writer; and Enoch being a pro-prophet gave him this name under a ſpirit of prophecy, foretelling by it when the flood ſhould be; for his name, according to Bochart [s], ſignifies, when he dies there ſhall be an emiſſion, or ſending forth of waters upon the earth, to deſtroy it.

℣. 22. And Enoch walked with God, after he begat Methuſelah, three hundred years, &c.] The Greek verſion is two hundred. He had walked with God undoubtedly before, but perhaps after this time more cloſely and conſtantly: and this is obſerved to denote, that he continued ſo to do all the days of his life, notwithſtanding the apoſtacy which began in the days of his father, and increaſed in his. He walked in the name and fear of God, according to his will, in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord then made known: he walked by faith in the promiſes of God, and in the view of the Meſſiah, the promiſed ſeed; he walked uprightly and ſincerely, as in the ſight of God; he had familiar converſe, and near and intimate communion with him: and even the above heathen writer, Eupolemus, ſeems to ſuggeſt ſomething like this, when he ſays, that he knew all things by the angels of God, which ſeems to denote an intimacy with them; and that he received meſſages from God by them: and begat ſons and daughters; the marriage-ſtate and procreation of children being not inconſiſtent with the moſt religious, ſpiritual and godly converſation.

℣. 23. And all the days of Enoch, were three hundred and ſixty-five years.] A year of years, living as many years as there are days in a year; not half the age of the reſt of the patriarchs: our poet [t] calls him one of middle age; though his being taken away in the midſt of his days, was not a token of divine diſpleaſure, but of favour, as follows; ſee Pſ. lv. 23.

℣. 24. And Enoch walked with God, &c.] Which is repeated both for the confirmation of it, and for the ſingularity of it in that corrupt age; and to cauſe attention to it, and ſtir up others to imitate him in it, as well as to expreſs the well-pleaſedneſs of God therein; for ſo it is interpreted, he had this teſtimony, that he pleaſed God, Heb. xi. 5. and he was not; not that he was dead, or in the ſtate of the dead, as Aben Ezra and Jarchi interpret the phraſe following, for God took him, out of the world by death, according to 1 Kings xix. 4. Ezek. xxiv. 16, 18. for he was tranſlated, that he ſhould not ſee death, Heb. xi. 5. nor was he annihilated, or reduced to nothing, for God took him, and therefore he muſt exiſt ſomewhere: but the ſenſe is, he was not in the land of the living, he was no longer in this world; or with the inhabitants of the earth, as the Targum of Jonathan paraphraſes it; but the Lord took him to himſelf out of the world, in love to him, and removed him from earth to heaven, ſoul and body, as Elijah was taken; ſee the note on Heb. xi. 5. The Arabic writers [u] call him Edris, and ſay he was ſkilled in aſtronomy and other ſciences, whom the Grecians ſay is the ſame with Hermes Triſmegiſtus; and the Jews call him Metatron, the great ſcribe, as in the Targum of Jonathan: they ſay [w], that Adam delivered to him the ſecret of the intercalation of the year, and he delivered it to Noah, and that he was the firſt that compoſed books of aſtronomy [x]; and ſo Eupolemus [y] ſays he was the firſt inventor of aſtrology, and not the Egyptians; and is the ſame the Greeks call Atlas, to whom they aſcribe the invention of it. The apoſtle Jude ſpeaks of him as a prophet, ℣. 14. and the Jews ſay [z], that he was in a higher degree of prophecy than Moſes and Elias; but the fragments that go under his name are ſpurious: there was a book aſcribed to him, which is often referred to in the book of Zohar, but cannot be thought to be genuine.

℣. 25. And Methuſelah lived an hundred and eighty and ſeven years, and begat Lamech.] The Septuagint verſion is an hundred and ſixty-ſeven; the Samaritan only ſixty-ſeven; the ſame names were given to ſome of the poſterity of Seth, as were to thoſe of Cain, as Lamech here, and Enoch before.

℣. 26. And Methuſelah lived after he begat Lamech, ſeven hundred eighty and two years, &c.] The Greek verſion is eight hundred and two years, and ſo makes the ſum total of his life the ſame; but the Samaritan verſion only ſix hundred and fifty-three, and ſo makes his whole life but ſeven hundred and twenty; and thus inſtead of being the oldeſt, he is made the youngeſt of the antediluvian patriarchs, excepting his father Enoch: and begat ſons and daughters; ſome, it is highly probable, before he begat Lamech, ſince then he was near two hundred years of age, as well as others after.

℣. 27. And all the days of Methuſelah, were nine hundred and ſixty nine years, and he died, &c.] This was the oldeſt man that ever lived, no man ever lived to a thouſand years: the Jews give this as a reaſon for it, becauſe a thouſand years is God's day, according to Pſ. xc. 4. and no man is ſuffered to arrive to that. His name carried in it a prediction of the time of the flood, which was to be quickly after his death, as has been obſerved on ℣. 21. Some ſay he died in the year of the flood; others, fourteen years after, and was in the garden of Eden with his father, in the days of the flood, and then returned to the world [a]; but the eaſtern writers are unanimous that he died before the flood: the Arabic writers [b] are very particular as to the time in which he died; they ſay he died in the ſix hundredth year of Noah, on a Friday, about noon, on the twenty-firſt day of Elul, which is Thout; and Noah and Shem buried him, embalmed in ſpices, in the double cave, and mourned for him forty days: and ſome of the Jewiſh writers ſay he died but ſeven days before the flood came, which they gather from Gen. vii. 10. after ſeven days; that is as they interpret it, after ſeven days of mourning for Methuſelah [c]: he died A. M. 1656. the ſame year the flood came, according to biſhop Uſher.

℣. 28. And Lamech lived an hundred eighty and two years, and begat a ſon.] According to the Septuagint verſion he was an hundred and eighty-eight years old; but according to the Samaritan verſion only fifty-three; the name of his ſon, begotten by him, is given in the next verſe, with the reaſon of it.

℣. 29. And he called his name Noah, &c.] Which ſignifies reſt and comfort; for reſt gives comfort, and comfort flows from reſt, ſee 2 Sam. xiv. 17. where a word from the ſame root is rendred comfortable, and agrees with the reaſon of the name, as follows: ſaying, this ſame ſhall comfort us, concerning cerning our work and toil of our hands, because of the ground, which the Lord hath cursed; this he spake by a spirit of prophecy, foreseeing what his son would be, and of what advantage to him and his family, and to the world, both in things temporal and spiritual. In things temporal: the earth was cursed for the sin of man immediately after the fall, and continued under it to this time, bringing forth thorns and thistles in great abundance of itself, which occasioned much trouble to root and pluck them up, and nothing else, without digging, and planting, and sowing; and being barren through the curse, it was with great difficulty men got a livelihood: now Noah eased them in a good measure of their toil and trouble, by inventing instruments of plowing, as Jarchi suggests, which they had not before, but threw up the ground with their hands, and by the use of spades, or such like things, which was very laborious; but now by the use of the plough, and beasts to draw it, their lives were made much more easy and comfortable; hence he is said to begin to be an husbandman, or a man of the earth, that brought agriculture to a greater perfection, having found out an easier and quicker manner of tilling the earth: and as he was the first that is said to plant a vineyard, if he was the inventor of wine, this was another way in which he was an instrument of giving refreshment and comfort to men, that being what cheers the heart of God and men, see Gen. ix. 20. and if the antediluvians were restrained from eating of flesh, and their diet was confined to the fruits of the earth; Noah, as Dr. Lightfoot [d] observes, would be a comfort in reference to this, because to him, and in him to all the world, God would give liberty to eat flesh; so that they were not obliged to get their whole livelihood with their hands out of the ground: and moreover, as Lamech might be apprized of the flood by the name of his father, and the prediction of his grandfather, he might foresee that he and his family would be saved, and be the restorer of the world, and repeople it, after the destruction of it by the flood. And he may have respect to comfort in spiritual things, either at first taking him to be the promised seed, the Messiah, in whom all comfort is; or however a type of him, and from whom he should spring, who would deliver them from the curse of the law, and from the bondage of it, and from toiling and seeking for a righteousness by the works of it; or he might foresee that he would be a good man, and a preacher of righteousness, and be a public good in his day and generation.

℣. 30. And Lamech lived after he begat Noah, five hundred ninety and five years, &c.] The Septuagint version is five hundred and sixty-five; and the Samaritan version six hundred: and begat sons and daughters; of which we have no account.

℣. 31. And all the days of Lamech, were seven hundred seventy and seven years, and he died.] According to the Greek version, he lived but seven hundred and fifty-three; and according to the Samaritan version, only six hundred and fifty-three: but it is best and safest in these, and all the above numbers, to follow the original Hebrew, and the numbers in that, with which the Targum of Onkelos exactly agrees, written about the time of Christ; and these numbers were just the same when the two Talmuds were composed. Some of the Jewish writers, and so some christians, confound this Lamech with the other Lamech, who was of the race of Cain, spoken of in the preceding chapter, and say he was a bigamist and a murderer; and that in his days sins were committed openly, and witchcraft was throughout the whole world [e]: he died according to bishop Usher A. M. 1651. Eight times in this chapter the phrase is used, and he died, to put us in mind of death; to observe that it is the way of all flesh; that those that live longest die at last, and it must be expected by every one.

℣. 32. And Noah was five hundred years old, &c.] Or the son of five hundred years [f]; he was in his five hundredth year: it can hardly be thought that he should live to this time a single life, and have no children born to him, which he might have had, but were dead; though some think it was so ordered by Providence, that he should not begin to procreate children until of this age, because it being the will of God to save him and his family from the flood, had he began at the usual age, he might have had more than could conveniently be provided for in the ark; or some of them might have proved wicked, and so would deserve to perish with others: and Noah begat Shem, Ham and Japheth; not together, but one after another; and since Ham was the younger son, see Gen. ix. 24. and Shem was an hundred years old two years after the flood, Gen. xi. 10. he must be born in the five hundred and second year of his father's age; so that it seems most probable, that Japheth was the eldest son, and born in the 501st year of his age; though Shem is usually mentioned first, because of his superior dignity and excellency, God being in an eminent manner the God of Shem, Gen. ix 26. and from whom the Messiah was to spring, and in whose line the church of God was to be continued in future ages. The name of Japheth is retained in Greek and Latin authors, as Hesiod [g], Horace [h], and others [i], by whom he is called Japetos and Japetus.

CHAP. VI.

THIS chapter gives an account of the wickedness of the old world, both among the prophane and the professors of religion, which was taken notice of and resented by God, upon which he determined the destruction of it, ℣. 1—7. only one man, Noah, is excepted, who found favour with God, and whose character is given, ℣. 8, 9, 10. and to whom was observed by God the general corruption of the earth, ℣. 11, 12, 13. and to whom he gave orders and directions for the building an ark for himself, and his family, being determined to destroy the earth with a flood, and all creatures in it, ℣. 14—17. only he would preserve him and his wife, his three sons and their wives, and two of every living creature, for which, and for himself and his family, he was to take food into the ark when built, ℣. 18—21. and the chapter is concluded with observing, that Noah did as he was commanded, ℣. 22.

℣. 1. And it came to paſs when men began to multiply upon the face of the earth, &c.] Either mankind in general, or rather the poſterity of Cain, who were mere natural men, ſuch as they were when born into the world, and as brought up in it, deſtitute of the grace of God, and of the knowledge and fear of him; and who in proportion much more multiplied than the poſterity of Seth, becauſe of the practice of polygamy, which by the example of Lamech, one of that race, might prevail among them: and daughters were born unto them; not daughters only, but ſons alſo, though it may be more daughters than ſons, or it may denote remarkable ones, for their beauty or immodeſty or both; and chiefly this is obſerved for the ſake of what follows.

℣. 2. That the ſons of God ſaw the daughters of men, that they were fair, &c.] Or good [k], not in a moral but natural ſenſe; goodly to look upon, of a beautiful aſpect; and they looked upon, and only regarded their external beauty, and luſted after them: thoſe ſons of God were not angels either good or bad, as many have thought, ſince they are incorporeal beings, and cannot be affected with fleſhly luſts, or marry and be given in marriage, or generate and be generated; nor the ſons of judges, magiſtrates, and great perſonages, nor they themſelves, as the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan, and ſo Jarchi and Aben Ezra; but this could be no crime in them, to look upon and take in marriage ſuch perſons, though they were the daughters of the meaner ſort; and ſuppoſing they acted a criminal part in looking at them, and luſting after them, and committing fornication with them, and even in marrying irreligious perſons; yet this could only be a partial not an univerſal corruption, as is after affirmed, though ſuch examples muſt indeed have great influence upon the populace; but rather this is to be underſtood of the poſterity of Seth, who from the times of Enos, when men began to be called by the name of the Lord, ch. iv. 25. had the title of the ſons of God in diſtinction from the children of men; theſe claimed the priviledge of divine adoption, and profeſſed to be born of God, and partakers of his grace, and pretended to worſhip him according to his will, ſo far as revealed to them, and to fear and ſerve and glorify him. According to the Arabic writers [l], immediately after the death of Adam the family of Seth was ſeparated from the family of Cain; Seth took his ſons and their wives to a high mountain (Hermon) on the top of which Adam was buried, and Cain and all his ſons lived in the valley beneath, where Abel was ſlain; and they on the mountain obtained a name for holineſs and purity, and were ſo near the angels that they could hear their voices and join their hymns with them; and they, their wives and their children went by the common name of the ſons of God: and now theſe were adjured by Seth and by ſucceeding patriarchs, by no means to go down from the mountain and join the Cainites; but notwithſtanding in the times of Jared ſome did go down it ſeems; ſee the note on ch. v. 20. and after that others, and at this time it became general; and being taken with the beauty of the daughters of Cain and his poſterity, they did as follows: and they took them wives of all that they choſe; not by force, as Aben Ezra and Ben Gerſom interpret, for the Cainites being more numerous and powerful than they, it can hardly be thought that the one would attempt it, or the other ſuffer it; but they intermarried with them, which the Cainites might not be averſe unto; they took to them wives as they fancied, which were pleaſing to the fleſh, without regard to their moral and civil character, and without the advice and conſent of their parents, and without conſulting God and his will in the matter; or they took women as they pleaſed, and were to their liking, and committed fornication, to which the Cainites were addicted; for they ſpent their time in ſinging and dancing, and in uncleanneſs, whereby the poſterity of Seth or ſons of God were allured to come down and join them, and commit fornication with them, as the Arabic writers [m] relate.

℣. 3. And the Lord ſaid, &c.] Not to Noah, as in ℣. 13. for, as yet he is not taken notice of, or any diſcourſe addreſſed to him; but rather to or within himſelf, he ſaid what follows, or thus concluded, and reſolved on in his own mind: my ſpirit ſhall not always ſtrive with man; meaning either the ſoul of man, called the ſpirit of God, Job xxvii 3. becauſe of his creation, and is what he breathes and puts into men, and therefore is ſtiled the father of ſpirits; and which is in man, as ſome in Aben Ezra obſerve, to be the ſenſe of the word uſed, as a ſword in the ſcabbard; and ſo the meaning is, it ſhall not always abide there, but be unſheathed and drawn out; man ſhall not live always, ſince he is corrupt, and given to carnal luſts: or elſe, as Jarchi thinks, God himſelf is meant, and that the ſenſe is, my ſpirit ſhall not always contend within myſelf; or there ſhall not always be contention within me concerning man, whether I ſhall deſtroy him, or have mercy on him; I am at a point to puniſh him, ſince he is wholly carnal: or rather, this is to be underſtood of the holy Spirit of God, as the Targum of Jonathan, which agrees with 1 Pet. iii. 18, 19, 20. and to be thus interpreted; that the Spirit of God, which had been litigating and reaſoning the point, as men do in a court of judicature, as the word ſignifies, with theſe men in the court, and at the bar of their own conſciences, by one providence or by one miniſter or another, particularly by Noah, a preacher of righteouſneſs in vain, and to no purpoſe; therefore, he determines to proceed no longer in this way, but paſs and execute the ſentence of condemnation on them: for that he alſo is fleſh; not only carnal and corrupt, but ſadly corrupted, and wholly given up to and immerſed in ſenſual luſts and carnal pleaſures, ſo as not to be reſtrained nor reformed; even the poſterity of Seth, profeſſors of religion alſo, as well as the prophane world and poſterity of Cain: yet his days ſhall be an hundred and twenty years; meaning not the term of man's life, reduced to this from the length of time he lived before the flood; but this deſigns the ſpace that God would give for repentance, before he proceeded to execute his vengeance on him; this is that long ſuffering of God, the apoſtle ſpeaks of in the forementioned place, that waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was preparing; and ſo both the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan interpret it, of a ſpace of an hundred and twenty years, given them to repent: now whereas it was but an hundred years from the birth of Japheth to the flood; ſome think the ſpace was ſhortened twenty years, becauſe of their impenitence; but it is more probable what Jarchi obſerves, that this decree was made and given out twenty years before his birth, though here related, by a figure called hyſteron proteron, frequent in the ſcriptures.

[k] טובת καλαι, Sept. bonæ Cocceius. [l] Elmacinus, Patricides apud Hottinger. Smegma, l. 1. c. viii. p. 226, 227. 228. [m] Ib. p. 232. 235, 236. 242. 247.

℣. 4. There were giants in the earth in thoſe days, &c.] That is, in the days before the ſons of God took the daughters of men for wives, in ſuch a general manner as before declared, or before the declenſion and apoſtacy became ſo univerſal; even in the times of Jared, as the Arabic writers [n] underſtand it, who ſay that theſe giants were begotten on the daughters of Cain, by the children of Seth, who went down from the mountain to them in the days of Jared, ſee ch. v. 20. the word Nephilim comes from a word which ſignifies to fall; and theſe might be ſo called, either becauſe they made their fear to fall upon men, or men, thro' fear to fall before them, becauſe of their heighth and ſtrength; or rather, becauſe they fell and ruſhed on men with great violence, and oppreſſed them in a cruel and tyrannical manner; or as ſome think, becauſe they fell off and were apoſtates from the true religion, which is much better than to underſtand them of apoſtate angels, whom the Targum of Jonathan mentions by name, and calls them Schanchazai and Uziel, who fell from heaven, and were in the earth in thoſe days: and alſo after that, which ſhews that the preceding clauſe reſpects giants in former times, when the ſons of God came in unto the daughters of men; came into their houſes and chambers, and lay with them: and they bare children unto them, or giants unto them, as may be ſupplied from the former clauſe; for the ſenſe is, as there were giants before this general defection, ſo there were at this time, when there was a mixture of the Cainites and Sethites; which were the offspring of the ſons of God or poſterity of Seth, mixing with the daughters of men, or the poſterity of Cain; for this is not to be underſtood after the flood, as Aben Ezra, Ben Melech; and ſo they are deſcribed in the following words, the ſame became mighty men; for tallneſs and ſtrength, for power and dominion, for tyranny and oppreſſion: which were of old; like thoſe that were of old before; or who in after times were ſpoken of, as in the days of old: men of renown, or of name [o]; whoſe names were often made mention of, both for their bigneſs and for their wickedneſs; they were much talked of, and extolled for their exploits, and even wicked ones: they were famous men, or rather infamous; for ſome men get a name in the world, not for their goodneſs, but for their greatneſs, and ſometimes for their great wickedneſs; which ſenſe is countenanced by what follows: that there were giants in theſe early times is confirmed by the teſtimony of many heathen writers; ſuch were the Titans that made war againſt Saturn, begotten by Ouranus, who were not only of bulky bodies, but of invincible ſtrength, as Apollodorus [p] relates, and Beroſus [q] ſpeaks of a city about Lebanon, called Enos, which was a city of giants, who were men of vaſt bodies, and of great ſtrength, inventors of arms and muſick, were canibals and exceedingly debauched.

℣. 5. And God ſaw the wickedneſs of man was great in the earth, &c.] That it ſpread throughout the earth, wherever it was inhabited by men, both among the poſterity of Cain and Seth, and who indeed now were mixed together, and become one people: this reſpects actual tranſgreſſions, the wicked actions of men, and thoſe of the groſſer ſort, which were multiplied [r], as the word alſo ſignifies; they were both great in quality and great in quantity; they were frequently committed, and that every where; the degeneracy was become univerſal; there was a flood of impiety that ſpread and covered the whole earth, before the deluge of waters came, and which was the cauſe of it: this God ſaw, not only by his omniſcience, by which he ſees every thing, but he took notice of it in his providence, and was diſpleaſed with it, and determined in his mind to ſhew his reſentment of it, and let men ſee that he obſerved it, and diſapproved of it, and would puniſh for it: and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually; the heart of man is evil and wicked, deſperately wicked, yea wickedneſs itſelf, a fountain of iniquity, out of which abundance of evil flows, by which it may be known in ſome meaſure, what is in it, and how wicked it is; but God that ſees it, only knows perfectly all the wickedneſs of it, and the evil that is in it: the thoughts of his heart are evil; evil thoughts are formed in the heart, and proceed from it; they are vain, fooliſh, and ſinful, and abominable in the ſight of God, by whom they are ſeen, known, and underſtood a-far off: the imagination of his thoughts is evil, the formation of them; they were evil while forming, the ſubſtratum of thought, the very beginning of it, the firſt motion to it, yea every ſuch one was evil, and only ſo; not one good among them, not one good thing in their hearts, no one good thought there, nor one good imagination of the thought; and ſo it was continually from their birth, from their youth upwards, throughout the whole of their lives, and all the days of their lives, night and day, and day after day, without intermiſſion: this reſpects the original corruption of human nature, and ſhews it to be univerſal; for this was not only true of the men of the old world, but of all mankind; the ſame is ſaid of men after the flood as before, and of all men in general without any exception, Gen. viii. 21. Pſ. xiv. 1, 2, 3. Rom. iii. 9, 10, 11. Hence appears the neceſſity of regeneration, and proves that the new creature is not an improvement of the old principles of corrupt nature, ſince there is no good thing in man but what is put into him; alſo the diſability of man to do that which is good, even to think a good thought, or do a good action; therefore the works of unregenerate men are not properly good works, ſince they cannot flow from a right principle, or be directed to a right end.

℣. 6. And it repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth, &c.] Becauſe of the wickedneſs of man, the wickedneſs of his heart, and the wickedneſs of his life and converſation, which was ſo general, and increaſed to ſuch a degree that it was intolerable; wherefore God could have wiſhed, as it were, that he had never made him, ſince he proved ſo bad; not that repentance, properly ſpeaking, can fall upon God, for he never changes his mind or alters his purpoſes, though he ſometimes changes the courſe and diſpenſations of his providence. This is ſpeaking by an anthropopathy, after the manner of men, becauſe God determined to do, and did ſomething ſimilar to men, when they repent of any thing: as a potter when he has formed a veſſel that does not pleaſe him, and he repents that he has made it, he takes it and breaks it in pieces; and ſo God becauſe of man's wickedneſs, and to ſhew his averſion to it, and diſplicency at it, repented of his making him; that is, he reſolved within himſelf to to deſtroy him, as in the next verſe, which explains this: and it grieved him at his heart; this is to be underſtood by the ſame figure as before, for there can no more be any uneaſineſs in his mind than a change in it; for God is a ſimple being, uncompounded, and not ſubject to any paſſions and affections. This is ſaid to obſerve his great hatred to ſin, and abhorrence of it.

ver. 7. And the Lord ſaid, &c.] Not to the angels, nor to Noah, but within himſelf, on obſerving to what a height the ſin of man had got, and what a ſpread it made on the earth: I will deſtroy man, whom I have created, from the face of the earth; though he is my creature, the work of my hands, I have made him out of the earth, and made him Lord of it; I am now determined to ſhow my deteſtation of his wickedneſs, and for the honour of my juſtice to deſtroy him from off it; juſt as a potter takes a veſſel he diſlikes, when he has made it, and daſhes it to pieces: or I will wipe men off of the earth[s]; like ſo much duſt; man was made of the duſt of the earth, he is duſt, yea ſinful duſt and aſhes; and God reſolved to ſend a flood of waters on the earth, which ſhould waſh off man from it, like ſo much duſt upon it, juſt as duſt is carried off by a flood of water, ſee 2 Kings xxi 13. or I will blot out man[t], as moſt render the words; that is, out of the book of the living, he ſhall no longer live upon the earth; out of the book of creation, or of the creatures, he ſhall have no more a being, or be ſeen among them, any more than what is blotted out of a book: both man and beaſt; or from man to beaſt[u]; even every living creature upon the earth, from man to beaſt, one as well as another, and one for the ſake of the other, the beaſts for the ſake of man; theſe were made for his uſe and benefit, but he ſinning againſt God, and abuſing his mercies, they are to be taken away, and deſtroyed for his ſake, and as a puniſhment for his ſins: and the creeping things, and the fowls of the air; not the creeping things in the great and wide ſea, for the fiſhes died not in the deluge, but the creeping things on the earth, ver. 20. for it repenteth me that I have made them; man, male and female, whom he created; Adam and Eve, and their poſterity, and particularly the preſent inhabitants of the earth: but though it may reſpect men principally, yet is not to be reſtrained to them, but takes in all the creatures before mentioned, made for the uſe of man; and the ends not being anſwered by them, God repented that he had made them, as well as man. Some think the repentance, attributed to God in this and the preceding verſe, is not to be underſtood of him in himſelf, but of his Spirit in good men, particularly Noah, producing grief, ſorrow and repentance in him, who wiſhed that man had never been, than to be ſo wicked as he was; but for ſuch a ſenſe there ſeems to be no manner of foundation in the text.

ver. 8. But Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord.] This man and his family were the only exception to the general apoſtacy; God always reſerves ſome, in the worſt of times, for himſelf; there is a remnant, according to the election of grace; it was but a ſmall one, and that now appeared; and this was owing to the grace of God, and his choice upon that, and not to the merits of the creature. This grace, which Noah found and ſhared in, was the favour and good will of God; Noah was grateful and acceptable to him; he was well pleaſed with him in Chriſt; his perſon, ſervices and ſacrifices were acceptable to him through the beloved; though he might not be acceptable in the eyes of men, who derided him for his piety and devotion, and eſpecially for his prediction of the flood, and making an ark to ſave him and his family from it; yet he was very acceptable in the eyes of the Lord, and grateful in his ſight, and was favoured with grace from him, who is the God of all grace, and with all the ſupplies of it: the Jeruſalem Targum is, he "found grace and "mercy;" the grace he found was not on account of his own merit, but on account of the mercy of God: and this ſhews that he was not without ſin, or he would have ſtood in no need of the mercy and grace of God to ſave him; and as he found grace and favour in things ſpiritual, ſo in things temporal; he found favour with God, and therefore he and his family were ſpared, when the whole world of the ungodly were deſtroyed; he found favour with God, and therefore was directed by him to build an ark, for the ſaving of himſelf and his; he found favour with him, and therefore he had the honour of being the preſerver of mankind, and the father of a new world.

ver. 9. Theſe are the generations of Noah, &c.] Or this is the account of his poſterity, of the perſons that were generated by him, that ſprung from him, and peopled the earth after the flood, who are mentioned in the next verſe, what follows being to be put in a parenthenſis; as the genealogy of Adam is carried on from Adam to Noah, ch. v. 1—32. ſo the old world ending at the flood, the genealogy of the new world begins with Noah: though Aben Ezra and Ben Gerſom interpret the word events, things which days bring forth, Prov. xxvii. 1. theſe are the events or the things which befel Noah, of which an account is given in this, and ſome following chapters, whoſe character is next obſerved: Noah was a juſt man; not only before men, but in the ſight of God; and not by his own works of righteouſneſs, for no man is juſt by them before God, but by the righteouſneſs of the promiſed ſeed, the Meſſiah; for he became heir of the righteouſneſs which is by faith, Heb. xi. 7. the righteouſneſs which was to be brought in by the Son of God, and which was revealed to him from faith to faith; and which by faith he received and lived upon, as every juſt man does, and believed in as his juſtifying righteouſneſs before God; though he alſo lived a holy and righteous converſation before men, which may rather be intended in the next part of his character: and perfect in his generations; not that he was perfecty holy, or free from ſin, but was a partaker of the true grace of God; was ſincere and upright in heart and life; lived an unblemiſhed life and converſation, untainted with the groſs corruptions of that age he lived in, which he eſcaped through the knowledge, grace and fear of God; and therefore it is added, that he was holy, upright and blameleſs in his generations; among the men of the ſeveral generations he lived in, as in the generations before the flood, which was very corrupt indeed; and which corruption was the cauſe of that, and in the generation after the flood: or in his ages[w], in the ſeveral ſtages of his life, in youth and in old age; he was throughout the whole courſe of his life a holy good man. And Noah walked with God; walked according to his will, in the ways ways of truth and righteouſneſs; walked in a manner well-pleaſing to him, and enjoyed much communion with him, as Enoch had done before him, ch. v. 22, 24.

℣. 10, And Noah begat three ſons, Shem, Ham and Japheth.] When he was five hundred years of age, and before the flood came upon the earth; and when it was ſo wicked as is next deſcribed: of theſe ſons of his, and of the order in which they are placed, ſee the note on ch. v. 32.

℣. 11. The earth alſo was corrupt before God, &c.] That is, the inhabitants of the earth were corrupt in their lives and converſations; they were corrupt both in principle and practice, and did abominable things; and thoſe corruptions were, according to Jarchi, uncleanneſs and idolatry; they were corrupt in the worſhip of God, worſhipping the creature more, or beſides the creator; and they were corrupt in their manners and behaviour to one another, being guilty of fornication and adultery, and other enormous crimes; of ſome againſt God, and of others againſt their neighbours; and theſe they committed openly and impudently, without any fear of God, or dread of his wrath and diſpleaſure, and in contempt of him, his will and laws: and the earth was filled with violence; with doing injury to the perſons and properties of men; with oppreſſion and cruelty, by tyrannical decrees and unrighteous judgments; or with rapines and robberies, as the Targums and Jarchi; and with rapes, as Aben Ezra adds: the account that Lucian [x] gives from tradition, agrees with this; that the preſent race of men is not the firſt, they totally periſhed by a flood; and thoſe men were very inſolent and addicted to unjuſt actions; for they neither kept their oaths, nor were hoſpitable to ſtrangers, nor gave ear to ſuppliants, for which reaſon they were deſtroyed.

℣. 12. And God looked upon the earth, and behold it was corrupt, &c.] This is ſpoken as if he had never looked upon it before; whereas his eyes are always upon the earth, and the inhabitants of it, and upon all their ways and works: but this denotes the ſpecial notice he took, and the particular obſervation he made upon the condition and circumſtances the earth, and its inhabitants, were in. And this is remarked, as well as the particle behold is uſed, to denote the certainty of this corruption; it muſt needs be true, that the earth was corrupted, ſince the omniſcient God had declared it to be ſo, who ſees and knows all things: for all fleſh had corrupted his way upon the earth; that is, all men, excepting Noah; who were fleſh, carnal and unregenerate perſons; theſe had corrupted the way of God, the true religion, with their idolatries; and they had corrupted their own way, their manners, their life and converſation with their uncleanneſs and wickedneſs of various ſorts: the Arabic writers [y] ſay, that after Enoch was taken away, the children of Seth and of Cain worſhipped idols, every one as he pleaſed, and were immerſed in wickedneſs, and gave their right hands to each other, and joined in fellowſhip in committing ſin and vice; and that in the times of Noah, none were left in the holy mount but he and his wife, and his three ſons and their wives; all went down below and mixed with the daughters of Cain, and were immerſed in ſins, and worſhipped ſtrange gods, and ſo the earth was corrupted and filled with laſciviouſneſs. The Jewiſh writers alſo obſerve [z], that the generations of Cain were guilty of uncleanneſs, men and women, like beaſts, and defiled themſelves with all kind of fornication and inceſt, every one with his mother, and with his own ſiſter, and with his brother's wife, and that openly, and in the ſtreets: and Sanchoniatho [a] the heathen hiſtorian, the writer of the hiſtory of Cain's line, ſays of the fifth generation before the flood, that the women of thoſe times without ſhame lay with any man they could meet with.

℣. 13. And God ſaid unto Noah, &c.] This is a proof that he found favour in his eyes, ſince he ſpake to him, and told him what he had obſerved, and what he was determined to do, and gave him directions to make an ark for the ſecurity of himſelf and family, when he ſhould deſtroy the world: the end of all fleſh is come before me; that is, it was determined to put an end to the lives of all men, and of all cattle, and fowl and creeping things on the earth; all which are included in the phraſe, all fleſh, even every living ſubſtance on the earth: for the earth is filled with violence through them; that is, through men, for they are principally intended in the preceding clauſe, though not only; and it was through them, and not through other creatures, that the earth was filled with violence, in the ſenſe in which it is explained in ℣. 11. ſee the note there: and behold, I will deſtroy them with the earth; meaning, that he would deſtroy all men, together with the cattle and creeping things of the earth, the trees, and herbs, and plants in it, yea that itſelf, for that is ſaid to periſh by the flood, 2 Pet. iii. 6. Some render it, out of the earth [b]; that is, would deſtroy them from it, that they ſhould be no more on it.

℣. 14. Make thee an ark of Gopher-wood, &c.] It is not called a ſhip, for it was not made for ſailing to any diſtant parts, but an ark or cheſt, being like one, flat-bottomed, and ridged and ſloping upwards, and was made for floating on the waters for a little way. So Lucian [c], and other heathen writers call it λαρναξ, an ark or cheſt: this was made of Gopher-wood, which all the Targums, and the more ancient Rabbins, underſtand of Cedar-wood; ſome the box-tree, as the Arabic verſion; others, the pine; others, fir; the Mahometans ſay it was the Indian plane-tree; and others, the turpentine-tree: but the cypreſs-tree bids faireſt to be the wood of which the ark was made, as Fuller [d], Bochart [e], and others [f] have ſhown; that being neareſt to Gopher in ſound, and being a wood very durable and incorruptible, and fit for ſhipping. Alexander made a navy of cypreſs-trees in the groves and gardens about Babylon, as Strabo [g] relates: where this ark was made, is not eaſy to ſay: ſome think in Paleſtine; others, near mount Caucaſus, on the borders of India; others, in China: but it is moſt likely it was near the garden of Eden, where Noah lived, and not far from Ararat, where the ark reſted. Bochart [h] conjectures, that Gopher is the name of the place where it was made, as well as of the wood of which it was made; and that it might be Cupreſſetum or Cypariſſon, which Strabo [i] places in Aſſyria. How long Noah was building the the ark is variouſly conjectured: a Jewiſh [k] writer ſays fifty-two years; and an Arabic writer [l] an hundred years; others think Noah was building it the whole hundred and twenty years [m], the time of God's long-ſuffering and forbearance, which ſome conclude from 1 Pet. iii. 20. but though it would require not a few years to build ſuch a veſſel, and prepare every thing neceſſary for the uſe of it, yet one would think it ſhould not take ſo many years as the leaſt account gives unto it: it may be obſerved, the order is, make thou, or for thyſelf [n]; for thy uſe and benefit, for the ſaving of thyſelf and family, as well as for the preſervation of the ſeveral creatures which were for the ſervice of him and his poſterity: rooms ſhalt thou make in the ark; or neſts [o]; little apartments, and many of them for the ſeveral creatures, and for their proviſions, as well as for Noah and his family. The Targum of Jonathan gives us the number of them, paraphraſing the words thus, "a hundred and fifty cells "ſhalt thou make for the ark on the left-hand, and "ten apartments in the middle to put food in, and "five cabins on the right, and five on the left:" and ſhalt pitch it within and without with pitch; it was pitched without to keep out the waters, and that they might more eaſily ſlide off, and to preſerve the ark from being eat with worms, or hurt with the wind and ſun; and it was pitched within, to take off the ill ſmell that might ariſe from the ſeveral creatures, as well as for the better ſecurity of the ark. Some take it to be bitumen, a ſort of clay or ſlime like pitch, ſuch as was uſed at the building of Babel, and of the walls of Babylon. De Dieu conjectures it was that kind of bitumen which the Arabs calls Kaphura, which agrees in ſound with the word here uſed; but why not the pitch of the pine-tree, or the roſin of the cypreſs-tree, and eſpecially the latter, if the ark was made of the wood of it [p]?

℣. 15. And this is the faſhion which thou ſhalt make it of, &c.] The form and bigneſs of it, its length, breadth and height, as follows: the length of the ark ſhall be three hundred cubits, the breadth of it fifty cubits, and the height of it thirty cubits; which ſome interpret of geometrical cubits, each of which contained ſix ordinary cubits; others of ſacred cubits, which were larger by an hand's breadth than the common cubit; but the general opinion of learned men now is, that they were common cubits of eighteen inches long; and by the geometrical calculations made by them it is found, that the ark of ſuch dimenſions was abundantly ſufficient to contain Noah, and his family, and the ſeveral creatures, and all neceſſary proviſions for them [q]. But if the Jewiſh and Egyptian cubit, the cubit of the ſcriptures, as Dr. Cumberland [r] has ſhown it to be, conſiſted of twenty-one inches and upwards, the ark according to them muſt be very near twice as great, and ſo more convenient for all the ends to which it was deſigned; for as he obſerves, the cube of ſuch a cubit is very near double to the cube of eighteen inches, and therefore ſo muſt the capacity be.

℣. 16. A window ſhalt thou make to the ark, &c.] Or a light, ſuch as is that at noon, for which the word in the dual number is uſed; and therefore Junius and Tremellius tranſlate it a clear light. The Jewiſh writers [s] will have it to be a precious ſtone, a pearl which Noah fetched from the river Piſon, and hung up in the ark, and it gave light to all the creatures, like a large chandelier; but a window no doubt it was to let light into the ſeveral apartments, and to look out at on occaſion, ſince Noah is afterwards ſaid to open it; but what it was made of is difficult to ſay, ſince it does not appear that as yet glaſs was invented. Some think it was made of cryſtal, which would let in light, and keep off the water. A very learned [t] man is of opinion, that Noah underſtanding chemiſtry, prepared a fine ſubtle fragrant ſpirit, of an oily nature and luminous, which he put into veſſels made of cryſtal or glaſs, and hung them up in every room in the ark, and which was both illuminating and refreſhing; and this he thinks is what is meant by the Zohar or light, which we tranſlate a window; but this is afterward ſaid to be opened by Noah, to ſend forth the raven and the dove, which will not agree with ſuch a veſſel of ſpirituous liquor: and in a cubit ſhalt thou finiſh it above; not the window, as ſome think, which they place at top of the ark, and ſuppoſe to be a cubit in length, but the ark itſelf, which was finiſhed with a roof raiſed up a cubit high in the middle: and the door of the ark ſhalt thou ſet in the ſide thereof; on which it is not ſaid; an Arabic writer [u] places it on the eaſt-ſide of it, on which ſide he ſuppoſes Noah and his ſons dwelt, and on the weſt-ſide his wife and his ſons wives. How large this door was is not ſaid; it is reaſonably ſuppoſed [w] to be ten cubits high and eight broad, that there might be room enough for an elephant to enter in by it; and it ſeems it was ſo large, that Noah, and thoſe with him, could not ſhut it, but it was done by the Lord, ch. vii. 16. with lower, ſecond and third ſtories ſhalt thou make it: the above Arabic writer [x] makes the lower ſtory to be for the beaſts, the ſecond for the birds, and the third for Noah and his children; and with him agrees a Jewiſh writer [y]: but as by this diſtribution no place is left for proviſions, they ſeem righteſt, who place the beaſts in the lower ſtory, and the birds with Noah and his family in the uppermoſt, and the proviſions for all in the middle. This ark was a type of the church of God. As to the form and pattern of it, it was of God, ſo the ſeparation of men from the world in a church-ſtate, is of God; it is by his appointment, and it is his will, that when any numbers of men are converted in a place, that they ſhould be incorporated together in a church-ſtate, the form of which is given by him, its officers appointed, and the laws and ordinances of it fixed by him: and as to the matter of it, Gopher-wood, a laſting and incorruptible wood, denoting the duration of the church; God ever had, and ever will have a church in the world: as to the parts of it, and rooms in it, the rooms may point at particular churches, of which there have been many; or may ſignify, that there is always room enough in the church of God to receive ſaints. The ark had three ſtories in it, as the tabernacle and temple had three diviſions, which were types of the ſame alſo; and may have reſpect to the viſible church, conſiſting of believers and unbelievers, the inviſible church, or general aſſembly of the firſt-born, whoſe names are written in heaven, and the church triumphant. The door into the ark may ſignify Chriſt, who, and faith in him him may be ſaid to be the door into the church, and to all the ordinances of it: the windows may either typify the glorious light of the Goſpel, held forth in the church, or the ordinances of it, to which ſenſible ſouls betake themſelves, as doves to their windows, Iſ. lx. 8. Into this ark not only Noah and his family, but creatures of all ſorts were admitted, as ſinners of all ſorts called by grace, and become peaceable, are received into the church of God; yea even good and bad have a place here, though the latter under the notion and character of the former, but are hypocrites in Zion: here alſo were plenty of proviſions for all in it, as there are in the church of God fulneſs of ſpiritual proviſions for all the people of God. The ark was of the uſe of a ſhip, and was the means of ſaving a few men, even Noah and his family; ſo the church of God has the nature and uſe of a ſhip, of which Chriſt is the pilot, and conducts it through the ſea of this world, in which it is often toſſed with tempeſts, and diſtreſſed; but at laſt brought to its haven, in which a few are ſaved, not as the cauſe, which alone is Chriſt, but as the means. The apoſtle Peter makes baptiſm its antitype, 1 Pet. iii. 21. which is God's ordinance, and not man's, of his appointing; as to the form and manner of it, is the object of the world's ſcorn, when rightly adminiſtred, as Noah's ark was; repreſents a burial, as that did, when Noah entered into it; and was an emblem of Chriſt's reſurrection and ours, when he came out of it: it was a type of baptiſm in its ſalutary effect, it ſaves by water, as that does by leading to the reſurrection of Chriſt; it ſaves not as a cauſe, but as a means of directing to Chriſt, the author of ſalvation; and ſaves not all in the water, only thoſe that are in the ark, that is, truly and rightly in the church, and real members of it, or that are in Chriſt; and ſo many make the ark alſo a type of Chriſt.

℣. 17. And behold, I, even I do bring a flood of waters upon the earth, &c.] That there was ſuch a flood of waters brought upon the earth, is confirmed by the teſtimonies of heathen writers of all nations; only inſtead of Noah they put ſome perſon of great antiquity in their nation, as the Chaldeans, Siſithrus or Xiſuthrus; the Grecians and Romans, Prometheus or Deucalion, or Ogyges. Joſephus [z] ſays, all the writers of the Barbarian or heathen hiſtory, make mention of the flood, and of the ark; and he produces the authorities of Beroſus the Chaldean, and Hieronymus the Egyptian, who wrote the Phœnician antiquities, and Mnaſeas, and many others, and Nicolaus of Damaſcus: and there are others that Euſebius [a] makes mention of, as Melo, who wrote againſt the Jews, yet ſpeaks of the deluge, at which a man with his ſons eſcaped; and Abydenus the Aſſyrian, whoſe account agrees with this of Moſes that follows, in many things; as do alſo what Lucian [b] and Ovid [c] have wrote concerning it, excepting in the name of the perſon in whoſe time it was: and not only the Egyptians had knowledge of the univerſal deluge, as appears from the teſtimony of Plato, who ſays [d], that an Egyptian prieſt related to Solon, out of their ſacred books, the hiſtory of it; and from various circumſtances in the ſtory of Oſiris and Typhon, which name they give to the ſea, and in the Chaldee language ſignifies a deluge; and here the Targum of Onkelos renders the word by Tuphana; and the Arabs to this day call the flood al-tufan; but the Chineſe alſo frequently ſpeak of the deluge [e]; and even it is ſaid the Americans of Mexico and Peru had a tradition of it [f]; and the Bramines alſo [g], who ſay that 21000 years ago, the ſea over-whelmed and drowned the whole earth, excepting one great hill, far to the northward, called Biudd; and that there fled thither one woman and ſeven men (whoſe names they give, ſee ch. vii. 13.) thoſe underſtanding out of their books that ſuch a flood would come, and was then actually coming, prepared againſt the ſame, and repaired thither; to which place alſo went two of all ſorts of creatures (ſee ℣. 19.) herbs, trees and graſs, and of every thing that had life, to the number in all of 1800000 living ſouls: this flood, they ſay, laſted 120 years (ſee v. 30.) five months and five days; after which time all theſe creatures, that were thus preſerved, deſcended down again, and repleniſhed the earth; but as for the ſeven men and woman, only one of them came down with her, and dwelt at the foot of the mountain. And this flood was not topical or national only, but general and univerſal: it was brought upon the earth, upon the whole earth, as the following account ſhews; and by the Lord himſelf, it was not through ſecond cauſes, or the common courſe of things: and to ſhew it poſſible and certain, this form of expreſſion is uſed, behold, I, even I do bring; it was wonderful, beyond the power of nature, and therefore a behold is prefixed; it was poſſible, becauſe the almighty God declares he would bring it; and it was certain, which the redoubling of the word points at; and would be quickly, ſince he ſaid, I am bringing, or do bring; juſt about to do it; wherefore the ark was not ſo long preparing, as ſome have thought, and the command to build it was not long before the flood came. The word for the flood comes from one which ſignifys to fall [h], either becauſe of the fall of the waters at it, or becauſe it made all things to fall, wither and decay, as herbs, plants, men, beaſts, and all creatures; or from one that ſignifies to conſume, or to mix and confound, and bring all things to confuſion, as Jarchi ſuggeſts [i]: and the end and intention of it, as here expreſſed, was to deſtroy all fleſh, wherein is the breath of life from under heaven; every living creature, men and women, the beaſts and cattle of the earth, and every creeping thing on it, and the fowls of the heaven, man principally, and theſe for his ſake. And every thing that is in the earth ſhall die; but not what was in the waters, the fiſhes of the ſea, which could live in the flood.

℣. 18. But with thee will I eſtabliſh my covenant, &c.] Made with Noah at this time, though not expreſſed, that on his making an ark, as God directed him, and going into it at his command, he would preſerve him whilſt building it from the rage of wicked men, and ſave him in it and his family, when the flood ſhould come; and that they ſhould come ſafe out of it, and repeople the world, which ſhould be no more deſtroyed by one; for this covenant reſpects that after mentioned, ch. ix. ſo Aben Ezra; or the promiſe of the Meſſiah, which ſhould ſpring from him, for the fulfilment of which Noah and his family were ſpared; and this in every article God would confirm, of which he might be aſſured from his power, veracity city and faithfulneſs, and other perfections of his: and thou ſhalt come into the ark; when the covenant would begin more clearly to be eſtabliſhed, and more plainly to be fulfilling; Noah on the one hand being obedient to the divine will, having built an ark, and entring into it; and on the other, God giving him leave, and an order to enter into it, and ſhutting him up in it to preſerve him: thou and thy ſons, and thy wife, and thy ſons wives with thee; that is, Noah and his wife, and his ſons and their wives, in all eight perſons; and eight only, as the apoſtle Peter obſerves, 1 Pet. iii. 20. by this it appears that Noah's three ſons were married before the flood, but as yet had no children. Jarchi concludes from the mode of expreſſion uſed, that the men and women were to be ſeparate; that they entred the ark in this manner, and continued ſo, the uſe of the marriage-bed being forbidden them whilſt in the ark.

℣. 19. And of every living thing of all fleſh, two of every ſort ſhalt thou bring into the ark, &c.] That is, of fowls, cattle and creeping things, as after explained; and two of each ſort at leaſt were to be brought, as Jarchi obſerves, and not fewer; though of the clean ſort there were to be more, even ſeven, as after directed; and theſe were to be brought, that they might preſerve their ſpecies, as it follows: to keep them alive with thee; to be fed and nouriſhed by him in the ark, whilſt others periſhed by the flood, that ſo they might propagate their own ſpecies, and be continued, for which reaſon it is further ordered: they ſhall be male and female; not any two, but one male and one female, for the end before mentioned.

℣. 20. Of fowls after their kind, and of cattle after their kind, of every creeping thing of the earth after his kind, &c.] What before is generally expreſſed by every living thing, is here particularly explained of every ſort of them; and from the order of them, ſome have thought, that in the ſame manner they were diſpoſed of in the ark, the fowls in the firſt ſtory, the cattle in the next, and the creeping things in the lowermoſt: but others place them in a different manner, ſee the note on ℣. 16. the roots and grain in the lower ſtory, the living creatures of all ſorts in the ſecond, and their hay and litter in the third: the ſecond ſtory being three hundred cubits long, and fifty broad, contained in the whole fifteen thouſand cubits, which is ſuppoſed to be divided into an hundred and fifty equal rooms; ſo the Targum of Jonathan on ℣. 14. of theſe, four are allowed for Noah and his family, two with earth for thoſe animals that live under ground, one for thoſe which live on herbs and roots, and the other for thoſe which live on fleſh; and the other 144 rooms are divided into three parts, that is, twenty-four for birds, twenty-five for beaſts, and the other ninety-five for ſuch animals as are deſigned to be food for the reſt; and according to the calculations of learned men, there appear to have been in this ſtory rooms ſufficient for all ſorts of birds, beaſts and creeping things[k]: two of every ſort ſhall come unto thee, to keep them alive; that is, they ſhall come of themſelves, as Jarchi and Aben Ezra obſerve, the providence of God ſo directing and impelling them, juſt as the creatures came to Adam; ſo that there was no need for Noah to take any pains by hunting or hawking to get ſuch a number together: the Targum of Jonathan is, "they ſhall come unto thee by the hand of an "angel, who ſhall take and cauſe them to come." So ſays another Jewiſh[l] writer, that they were collected by the angels that preſided over each ſpecies; in which, except the notion of angels preſiding over every kind of creature, there is no incongruity, as biſhop Patrick obſerves; and two of every ſort were to come to the ark, to be preſerved alive there, that they might propagate their ſpecies. So Lucian ſays[m], that ſwine, and horſes, and lions, and ſerpents, and all other creatures which were on the earth, entered into the ark by pairs.

℣. 21. And take thou unto thee of all food that is eaten, &c.] By man and beaſt; of which ſee ch. i. 29, 30. and thou ſhalt gather it to thee; to lay up in the ark: and it ſhall be for food for thee, and for them, during the flood, a quantity ſufficient for them: and according to the calculation of learned men[n], well verſed in mathematics, there was room enough in the ark, and to ſpare, to put food for them all during the time the flood was on the earth.

℣. 22. Thus did Noah, &c.] Or and or therefore Noah made[o] the ark; and all things, as the Septuagint and Vulgate Latin verſions: according to all that God commanded him, ſo did he; he made the ark according to the pattern God gave him, he gathered together food for himſelf and family, and for all the creatures, and laid it up in the ark, as God directed him; and when the time was come, he and they not only entered into it, but he took with him all the creatures he was ordered, as after related; in this we have an inſtance of his fear of God, of his faith in his word, and of his obedience to his will, ſee Heb. xi. 7. in all which he was a type of Chriſt, the builder of his church the ark was a figure of, and the pilot of it through the tempeſtuous ſea of this world, and the provider of all good things for it, for the ſuſtenance of it, and of thoſe who are in it.

CHAP. VII.

THIS chapter begins with an order to Noah to come with his family, and all the creatures, into the ark, that they might be ſafe from the flood, which would quickly be upon the earth, ℣. 1—4. and then gives an account of Noah's obedience to the divine command in every particular, ℣. 5—9. and of the time of the beginning of the flood, and its prevalence, ℣. 10, 11, 12. then follows a repetition of Noah, his family, and the creatures entring into the ark, ℣. 13, 14, 15, 16. and next a relation is given of the increaſe of the waters, and of the heighth they arrived unto, ℣. 17—20, and of the conſequences of the flood, the death and deſtruction of every living creature, except thoſe in the ark, fowl, cattle, beaſt, creeping things and men, ℣. 21, 22, 23. and the chapter is cloſed with an account how long the waters continued before they began to ebb, even one hundred and fifty days, ℣. 24.

℣. 1. And the Lord ſaid unto Noah, &c.] After Noah had built the ark, and got all things ready as were commanded him; and when it was but ſeven days ere the flood would begin: Come thou and all thy houſe into the ark; that is, he and his wife, his three ſons and their wives; for thee have I ſeen righteous before me in this generation: this was a great character of Noah; that he was a righteous perſon, not by his own righteouſneſs, but by the righteouſneſs of faith he was both heir and preacher of; and this he was before God, in his ſight, ſeen, known, and acknowledged by him as righteous; and therefore muſt be really ſo: and this ſhews that he was not ſo by the works of the law, but by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt; becauſe by them no fleſh living is juſtified in the ſight of God: and Noah was a rare inſtance of this character; there was none beſides him in that wicked generation, ſo that he was very conſpicuous and remarkable; and it was wonderful grace to him, that he ſhould have this bleſſing to be righteous in an age ſo ſadly corrupt, which was the cauſe of his being ſaved; for whoever are juſtified ſhall be ſaved eternally, Rom. viii. 30. as well as they are often ſaved from temporal calamities, ſee Iſ. iii. 10

℣. 2. Of every clean beaſt thou ſhalt take to thee by ſevens, &c.] From hence it appears, that the diſtinction of clean and unclean beaſts, at leaſt for ſacrifice, if not for food, was known before the flood, and ſo before the law of Moſes; tho' ſome think this is ſaid by anticipation, and as providing a large ſtock of ſuch creatures for the propagation of their ſpecies; becauſe they would be moſt ſerviceable to men both for food and ſacrifice: but as it is certain that ſacrifices were offered ever ſince the fall of man; by the ſame way, namely, by divine revelation, that men were taught to ſacrifice creatures as typical of the ſacrifice of Chriſt, they were directed what ſort of creatures to offer, as were moſt ſuitable figures of him; thoſe beaſts that were clean, and uſed under the law, and ſo no doubt, at this time, were oxen, ſheep, and goats: and theſe were to be taken into the ark by ſevens, or ſeven ſeven [p]; either only three pairs, male and female, for procreation, and the ſeventh a male for ſacrifice, when the flood was over; or rather fourteen, ſeven couple, an equal number of male and female, as Aben Ezra and Ben Gerſom, that there might be enough for propagation; ſince a large number of them would be conſumed, both for food and ſacrifice: the male and his female, or the man and his wife [q]; which confirms the ſenſe given, that there were ſeven pairs, or otherwiſe, if there had been an odd ſeventh, there would not have been a male and his female: and of beaſts that are not clean, by two, or only two: the male and his female, or the man and his wife; which was a number ſufficient for the propagation of creatures, neither uſed for food nor ſacrifice; and many of which are hurtful to mankind, as lions, wolves, tygers, bears, &c.

℣. 3. Of fowls alſo of the air by ſevens, the male and his female, &c.] That, is of ſuch as were clean; ſeven couple of theſe were to be brought into the ark, for the like uſe as of the clean beaſts, and thoſe under the law; and ſo at this time, and here meant were turtle doves, and young pigeons that were for ſacrifice; and the reſt were for food: and the deſign of bringing both into the ark was, to keep ſeed alive upon the face of all the earth; that the ſpecies of creatures might be continued, both of beaſts and birds, clean and unclean.

℣. 4. For yet ſeven days, &c.] Or one week more, after the above orders were given, which the Jews ſay, were for the mourning at Methuſelah's death; others, that they were an additional ſpace to the 120 given to the old world for repentance; in which time ſome might truly repent, finding that the deſtruction of the world was very near, and who might be ſaved from everlaſting damnation, though not from periſhing in the flood: but it rather was a ſpace of time proper for Noah to have, to ſettle himſelf and family, and all the creatures in the ark, and diſpoſe of every thing there, in the beſt manner for their ſuſtenance and ſafety: and I will cauſe it to rain upon the earth forty days and forty nights: this was not an ordinary but an extraordinary rain, in which the power and providence of God were eminently concerned, both with reſpect to the continuance of it, and the quantity of water that fell: and every living ſubſtance that I have made, will I deſtroy from off the face of the earth: not every ſubſtance that has a vegetative life, as plants, herbs, and trees, which were not deſtroyed, See ch. viii. 11. but every ſubſtance that has animal life, as fowls, cattle, creeping things, and men.

℣. 5. And Noah did according to all that the Lord commanded him, &c.] He prepared for his entrance into the ark, and all the creatures with him; got every thing ready for them, the rooms for their habitation, and food for their ſuſtenance.

℣. 6. And Noah was ſix hundred years old, when the flood of waters was upon the earth, &c.] When it began, for he was in his ſix hundred and firſt year when it ended, ch. viii. 13. his eldeſt ſon was now an hundred years old, ſince when Noah was five hundred years old he begat children, ch. v. 32.

℣. 7. And Noah went in, and his ſons, and his wife and his ſons wives with him into the ark, &c.] Within the ſpace of the ſeven days, between the command of God to go into it, and the coming of the flood; or rather on the ſeventh day, on which it began to rain; when he ſaw it was coming on, ſee v. 11. 13. becauſe of the waters of the flood; for fear of them, leſt before he entered into the ark with his family, he and they ſhould be carried away with them; or from the face of the waters [r], which now began to appear and ſpread; or rather, before the waters [s], before they came to any height.

℣. 8. Of clean beaſts, and of beaſts that are not clean, &c.] Seven couple of the one, and a couple of the other: and of fowls, clean and unclean, alſo a like number: and of every thing that creepeth upon the earth; and upon that only, not in the water, for theſe had no need of the ark, they could live in the waters.

℣. 9. There went in two and two unto Noah into the ark, &c.] Of themſelves, as Jarchi and Aben Ezra, being impreſſed with an inſtinct from God ſo to do; or by the miniſtry of angels, as obſerved on ch. vi. 20. there were two of a ſort, and ſome think four: the male and the female; and of ſome ſeven, or ſeven pairs, as before obſerved: as God commanded Noah; which reſpects his own and his family's entrance and the creatures; both were commanded by God, and attended to by Noah, who was obedient in all things.

℣. 10. And it came to pass after seven days, &c.] Were ended, or on the seventh day, after God had given the orders to Noah, to prepare for his going into the ark, with his family, and all the creatures: that the waters of the flood were upon the earth; that is, they began to be upon the earth; for it continued to rain from hence forty days and forty nights; and still the waters continued to increase, and it was an hundred and fifty days before they began to ebb.

℣. 11. In the 600th year of Noah's life, &c.] Not compleat but current, for otherwise Noah would have lived after the flood 351 years, whereas he lived but 350; ch. ix. 28. in the 2d month, the 17th day of the month: as the Jews had two ways of beginning their year, one at the spring, and the other at autumn; the one on ecclesiastical accounts, which began at Nisan, and which answers to March and April; and then the second month must be Ijar, which answers to part of April and part of May: and the other on civil accounts, which began at Tisri, and answers to part of September and part of October; and then the second month must be Marchesvan, which answers to part of October and part of November; so they are divided about this month in which the flood was: one says it was Marchesvan; another that it was Ijar[t]; a third in particular says[u], it was on the 10th of Marchesvan, that all the creatures came together into the ark, and on the 17th the waters of the flood descended on the earth; and this is most likely, since this was the most antient way of beginning the year; for it was not until after the Jews came out of Egypt that they began their year in Nisan on sacred accounts; and besides the Autumn was a proper time for Noah's gathering in the fruits of the earth, to lay up in the ark, as well as for the falling of the rains; though others think it was in the spring, in the most pleasant time of the year, and when the flood was least expected: the Arabic writers[w], contrary to both, and to the scripture, say, that Noah, with his sons, and their wives, and whomsoever the Lord bid him take into the ark, entered on a Friday, the 27th day of the month Adar or Agar: according to the Chaldean account by Berosus[x], it was predicted that mankind would be destroyed by a flood on the 15th of the month Dæsius, the second month from the vernal equinox: it is very remarkable what Plutarch[y] relates, that Osiris went into the ark the 17th of Athyr, which month is the 2d after the autumnal equinox, and entirely agrees with the account of Moses concerning Noah: according to bishop Usher, it was the 7th of December, on the first day of the week; others the 6th of November; with Mr. Whiston the 28th: the same day were all the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened; and by both these the flood of waters was brought upon the earth, which drowned it, and all the creatures in it: by the former are meant the vast quantities of subterraneous waters, which are more or greater than we know; and might be greater still at the time of the deluge: "there are large lakes, as Seneca observes[z], "which we see not, much of the sea that lies "hidden, and many rivers that slide in secret:" so that those vast quantities of water in the bowels of the earth being pressed upwards, by the falling down of the earth, or by some other cause unknown to us, as bishop Patrick observes, gushed out violently in several parts of the earth, where holes and gaps were made, and where they either found or made a vent, which with the 40 days rain, might well make such a flood as here described: it is observed[a], there are seas which have so many rivers running into them, which must be emptied in an unknown manner, by some subterraneous passages, as the Euxine sea; and particularly it is remarked of the Caspian sea, reckoned in length to be above 120 German leagues, and in breadth from east to west about 90, that it has no visible way for the water to run out, and yet it receives into its bosom near an 100 rivers, and particularly the great river Wolga, which is of itself like a sea for largeness, and is supposed to empty so much water into it in a year's time, as might suffice to cover the whole earth, and yet it is never increased nor diminished, nor is it observed to ebb or flow: so that if, says my author, the fountains of the great deep, or these subterraneous passages, were continued to be let loose, without any reflux into them, as Moses supposes, during the time of the rain of forty days and forty nights; and the waters ascended but a quarter of a mile in an hour; yet in forty days it would drain all the waters for 240 miles deep; which would, no doubt, be sufficient to cover the earth above 4 miles high: and by the former, the windows or floodgates of heaven, or the cataracts, as the Septuagint version, may be meant the clouds, as Sir Walter Raleigh[b] interprets them; Moses using the word, he says, to express the violence of the rains, and pouring down of waters; for whosoever, adds he, hath seen those fallings of water which sometimes happen in the Indies, which are called the spouts, where clouds do not break into drops, but fall with a resistless violence in one body, may properly use that manner of speech which Moses did, that the windows or floodgates of heaven were opened, or that the waters fell contrary to custom, and that order which we call natural; God then loosened the power retentive in the uppermost air, and the waters fell in abundance: and another writer upon this observes[c], that thick air is easily turned into water; and that round the earth there is a thicker air, which we call the atmosphere; which, the farther it is distant from the earth, the thinner it is, and so it grows thinner in proportion, until it loseth all its watry quality: how far this may extend cannot be determined; it may reach as far as the orb of the moon, for aught we know to the contrary: now when this retentive quality of waters was withdrawn; Moses tell us, that the rain was upon the earth 40 days and 40 nights; and therefore some of it might come so far as to be forty days in falling; and if we allow the rain a little more than 10 miles in an hour, or 250 miles in a day, then all the watry particles, which were 10,000 miles high, might descend upon the earth; and this alone might be more than sufficient to cover the highest mountains.

℣. 12. And the rain was upon the earth 40 days and 40 nights, &c.] So long it was falling upon it, after the windows of heaven were opened. Aben Ezra would have it, that all things were in such confusion, during the flood, that there was no difference between day and night, since, it is said, day and night shall not cease any more; and that after the waters ceased, then Noah knew that forty days and nights had passed, for God had revealed this secret ſecret to him; but the text ſeems more to make againſt him than for him.

℣. 13. In the ſelf ſame day entered Noah, and Shem, and Ham, and Japheth, the ſons of Noah, &c.] That is, on the 17th day of the 2d month; ſee the notes on ℣. 11. the names of Noah, and his three ſons are expreſſed, but not the names of his wife, and of the wives of his ſons; they are only deſcribed by their relation as follows: and Noah's wife, and the three wives of his ſons, into the ark: but other writers pretend to give us their names; Beroſus[c] calls the wife of Noah Tytea the great, and Aretia, plainly, from Tit clay, and Ærets the earth; and his ſons wives Pandora, Noela, and Noegla: according to Sanchoniatho[d], the name of Noah was Epigeus, a man of the earth, ſee Gen. ix. 20. and afterwards Ouranus, heaven; and he had a ſiſter whom he married, called Ge, earth; and with this agrees the account that the Atlantes give of their deities; the firſt of which was Uranus, and his wife's name was Titea; who, after her death, was deified and called Ge[e]: ſo the Jewiſh writers ſay[f], the wife of Noah was called Titzia, and others ſay Aritzia, from the word Eretz, earth[g]; though others will have it, that ſhe was Naamah, the daughter of Lamech: the Arabic writers[h] tell us, that the name of Noah's wife was Hancel, the daughter of Namuſa, the ſon of Enoch; that the name of Shem's wife was Zalbeth, or as other copies, Zalith or Salit; that the name of Ham's, Nahalath; and of Japheth's, Areſiſia; who were all three the daughters of Methuſelah; and they alſo relate[i], that when Noah entered the ark, he took the body of Adam with him, and placed it in the middle of the ark.

℣. 14. They, and every beaſt after his kind, and all the cattle after their kind, &c.] They, Noah and his family, went into the ark; as did all ſorts of beaſts and cattle, reckoned 130 ſorts, by ſome 150, including ſerpents: and every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth after his kind; ſuppoſed to be ſcarce 30 ſorts; not one ſort of creature was left out, though ever ſo ſmall and deſpicable: every fowl after his kind: Biſhip Wilkins has divided them into nine ſorts, and reckons them up to be 95 in the whole; every bird of every ſort, or bird of every wing[k], let their wings be what they will; ſome, as Ainſworth obſerves, are winged with feathers, others with ſkin, as batts.

℣. 15 And they went in unto Noah into the ark, &c.] Noah went in firſt, and the creatures of themſelves came to him, or were conducted by the miniſtry of angels; and they were delivered into his hands, and he placed them in the ark as was moſt convenient for them: it is very likely he went in and out as occaſion required, for the better management and diſpoſition of things; for he ſeems to be the laſt of all that went in, See ℣. 16: two and two of all fleſh, wherein is the breath of life: they that went by ſevens, yet being ſeven couple, as has been obſerved, as thoſe which were only two or four, went by pairs: this is true of them all.

℣. 16. And they that went in, went in male and female of all fleſh, &c.] Theſe pairs were not two males or two females, but one male and one female; ſo they were coupled for the propagation of their ſpecies, which was the end of their entering into the ark, and being preſerved: as God had commanded him: Noah, who took care as they entered, that there were ſo many of a ſort, as was injoined, and theſe were male and female: and the Lord ſhut him in; or ſhut the door after him[l], he being the laſt that entered; and which he could not ſo well ſhut himſelf, at leaſt ſo cloſe, as was done by the Lord, or by the angels; and this was done to keep out the waters, and all within in ſafety; and to ſhut out others, and preſerve Noah from the rage of wicked men, as well as the violence of the waters: ſome[m] have thought that not ſo much the door of the ark is meant, as the way to it, the penſile bridge which was neceſſary for the creatures to enter the ark; which being carried away by the force of the waters near the ark, that not being joined to it, precluded all acceſs of the ſcoffers, whoſe ſcoffs were ſoon turned to lamentation and howling.

℣. 17. And the flood was forty days upon the earth, &c.] This is ſaid with reſpect to what follows, and the meaning is, that when and after the flood had been upon the earth ſo long, then the waters increaſed, and bare up the ark, and it was lift up above the earth: after this they were ſo many and ſo ſtrong that they lifted up the ark from the place where it ſtood, and bore it up, that it touched not the earth; and Aben Ezra from hence infers, that the ark did not remove from its place after the flood began, until forty days.

℣. 18. And the waters prevailed, and were increaſed greatly upon the earth, &c.] Still they became greater and more powerful, as to bear up the ark, ſo to caſt down houſes, trees, &c. by the continual rains that fell, though perhaps they were not ſo violent as before, and by the conſtant eruptions of water out of the earth: and the ark went upon the face of the waters; it floated about upon them, in an eaſy gentle manner; for there were no ſtorms of wind or tempeſts raiſed, which might endanger it.

℣. 19. And the waters prevailed exceedingly on the earth, &c.] Yet more and more, ſo that the people without the ark were obliged to remove, not only from the lower to the higher rooms in their houſes, and to the tops of them, but to the higheſt trees; and when theſe were bore down, to the higheſt hills and mountains; and to thoſe it was in vain to fly, by what follows: and all the high hills that were under the whole heaven were covered: whence it appears there were hills before the flood, and that theſe were not cauſed by it, and that the deluge was univerſal, ſince there was not a hill under the whole heaven but what was covered with it. In Deucalion's flood all men are ſaid to periſh, except a few who fled to the high mountains[n]; which ſtory ſeems to be hammered out of this account.

℣. 20. Fifteen cubits upwards did the waters prevail, &c.] Either to ſuch an height above the earth, upwards from that, or from the high hills; for though the words do not neceſſarily imply that, yet it may be allowed, ſince there was water enough to cover the higheſt of them; and fifteen cubits of water were enough to drown the talleſt man, or largeſt beaſt that ſhould be upon the top of any of them: and the mountains were covered, with water, even it may be allowed fifteen cubits high; nor will this furniſh out ſo conſiderable an objection tion to the hiſtory of the flood, as may be thought at firſt ſight, ſince the higheſt mountains are not near ſo high, as they are by ſome calculated. Sir Walter Raleigh allows thirty miles for the height of the mountains, yet the higheſt in the world will not be found to be above five direct miles in height. Olympus, whoſe height is ſo extolled by the poets, does not exceed a mile and a half perpendicular, and about 70 paces. Mount Athos, ſaid to caſt its ſhade into the iſle of Lemnos (according to Pliny 87 miles) is not above 2 miles in height, nor Caucaſus much more; nay, the pike of Teneriff, reputed the higheſt mountain in the world, may be aſcended in 3 days (according to the proportion of 8 furlongs to a day's journey) which makes about the height of a German mile perpendicular; and the Spaniards affirm, that the Andes, thoſe lofty mountains of Peru, in compariſon of which they ſay the Alps are but cottages, may be aſcended in 4 days compaſs [o].

℣. 21. And all fleſh died that moved upon the earth, &c.] That had animal life in them, of which motion was a ſign: both of fowl, and of cattle, and of beaſt, and of every creeping thing that creepeth on the earth; excepting thoſe that were in the ark. This general deſtruction of the creatures, as it was for the ſins of men, whoſe they were, and by whom they were abuſed, and is expreſſive of God's hatred of ſin, and of his holineſs and juſtice in the puniſhment of it; ſo, on the other hand, it is a diſplay both of the wiſdom of God, in cauſing a decreaſe of the creatures, in proportion to the decreaſe of men, who now would not need ſo many; and of the goodneſs of God to thoſe that were ſpared, that ſo the beaſts of the field, eſpecially the wilder ſort, might not multiply againſt them, and prevail over them, ſee Exod. xxiii. 29. and every man; except thoſe in the ark; and the number of them is ſuppoſed to be as great, if not greater, than of the preſent inhabitants of the earth, by thoſe who are ſkilful in the calculation of the increaſe of men. It is thought it may be eaſily allowed, that their number amounted to eleven thouſand millions; and ſome have made their number to be eighty thouſand millions [p]. The apoſtle Peter calls them, the world of the ungodly, 2 Pet. ii. 5.

℣. 22. All in whoſe noſtrils was the breath of life, &c.] Whether of fowls, beaſt, cattle, or creeping things: of all that was in the dry land, died; by which deſcription fiſhes were excepted, ſince they breathe not, having no lungs, and are not on the dry land, where they cannot live, but in the waters. Some pretend it to be the opinion of ſome Jewiſh writers, that the fiſhes did die, the waters being made hot, and ſcalded them; but this fable I have not met with.

℣. 23. And every living ſubſtance was deſtroyed which was upon the face of the ground, &c.] Not every thing, particularly trees; for after the flood was abated there was an olive-tree, a leaf of which was brought to Noah by the dove, ch. viii. 11. but all animals, both men and cattle, and the creeping things, and the fowl of the heaven, and they were deſtroyed from the earth; this is repeated, partly for explanation of the preceding clauſe, and partly for confirmation of this general deſtruction, which might ſeem almoſt incredible; there never was ſuch a deſtruction of creatures before, or ſince, nor never will be till the general conflagration; and is a proof of the ſovereignty of God, his almighty power, the purity and holineſs of his nature, and the ſtrictneſs and ſeverity of his juſtice, and ſhows what a fearful thing it is to fall into his hands: and Noah only remained alive, and they that were with him in the ark; beſides thoſe, of the millions of mankind that were upon the earth, not one was left, the flood came and deſtroyed them all, Luke xvii. 27. the fable, ſome Jewiſh writers relate of Og, being found alive, and which they gather from Deut. iii. 11. by ſitting upon a piece of wood of one of the ladders of the ark, to whom Noah reached out food every day, and ſo he remained alive [q], deſerves no regard; though perhaps from hence aroſe the Grecian fable of the flood of Ogyges, which ſeems to be the ſame with this of Noah.

℣. 24. And the waters prevailed upon the earth 150 days.] Which is to be reckoned not from the end of the 40 days rain, but from the beginning of the flood; for from the 17th day of the 2d month, when the fountains of the deep were broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened, unto the 17th day of the 7th month, when the ark reſted on the mountains of Ararat, and the waters decreaſed, were juſt 5 months, or 150 days; until which time the waters increaſed yet more and more, even after the 40 days rain; ſo that it ſeems there was a continual rain afterwards, as Aben Ezra obſerves, though not ſo vehement; or otherwiſe it is not ſo eaſy to account for the increaſe of the waters.

CHAP. VIII.

THIS chapter gives an account of the going off of the waters from the earth, and of the entire deliverance of Noah, and thoſe with him in the ark, from the flood, when all the reſt were deſtroyed: after an 150 days a wind is ſent over the earth, the fountains of the deep and the windows of heaven are ſtopped, the waters go off gradually, and the ark reſts on mount Ararat, ℣. 1—4. two months and 13 days after that the tops of the mountains were ſeen, ℣. 5. and 40 days after the appearance of them, Noah ſent forth firſt a raven, and then a dove, and that a ſecond time, to know more of the abatement of the waters, ℣. 6—12. When Noah had been in the ark 10 months and 13 days he uncovered it, and the earth was dry, yet not ſo dry as to be fit for him to go out upon, until near 2 months after, ℣. 13, 14. when he had an order from God to go out of the ark, with all that were with him, which was accordingly obeyed, ℣. 15—19. upon which he offered ſacrifice by way of thankfulneſs for his great deliverance, which was accepted by the Lord; who promiſed him not to curſe the earth any more, nor to drown it, but that it ſhould remain, and as long as it did, there would be the conſtant revolutions of the ſeaſons of the year, and of day and night, ℣. 20—22.

℣. 1. And God remembred Noah, and every living thing, and all the cattle that was with him in the ark, &c.] Not that God had forgotten Noah, for he

he does not, and cannot forget his creatures, properly ſpeaking; but this is ſaid after the manner of men, and as it might have ſeemed to Noah, who having heard nothing of him for five months, and having been perhaps longer in the ark than he expected, might begin to think that he was forgotten of God; but God remembred him, and his covenant with him, and the promiſe that he had made to him, that he and his family, and all the living creatures in the ark, ſhould be preſerved alive during the flood, ch. vi. 17, 18, 19. and God may be ſaid particularly to remember him, and them, when he began to take meaſures for removing the waters from the earth, as he did by ſending a wind, next mentioned: and thus God's helping his people when in difficulties and in diſtreſs, and delivering out of them, is called his remembrance of them; and he not only remembred Noah and his family, who are included in him, but every living creature alſo, which is expreſſed; for as the creatures ſuffered in the flood for the ſins of men, ſo thoſe in the ark were remembred and preſerved for the ſake of Noah and his family, and the world of men that ſhould ſpring from them: and God made a wind to paſs over the earth, and the waters aſſwaged; not a ſtormy bluſtering one, that would have endangered the ark, but a gentle, hot, drying one; which ſtopped the increaſe of the waters, and made them leſs, and both drove away the rain, as the north-wind does, as this perhaps was [r], and cauſed the waters to move towards their proper channels and receptacles: this was the work of God, who has the command of the winds and waters, brings the former out of his ſtorehouſes, and reſtrains the latter at his pleaſure; and this wind had this effect to aſſwage the waters, not from its own nature, but was attended with the mighty power of God to make it effectual, in an extraordinary manner: and it was, as the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem call it, a wind of mercies, or a merciful wind; or a wind of comforts, as Jarchi; for ſo it was to Noah and his family, and to all the creatures, ſince it ſerved to dry up the waters of the flood, and cauſed them to ſubſide.

℣. 2. The fountains alſo of the deep, and the windows of heaven were ſtopped, &c.] The paſſages which let out the ſubterraneous waters in great quantity upon the earth, and the clouds of heaven, which poured down water upon it like ſpouts, were ſtopped from ſending forth any more, as they had from the firſt of the flood unto 150 days from thence: Jarchi obſerves, that it is not ſaid that all the fountains of the deep, as when they were broken up, ch. vii. 11. becauſe ſome of them were left open for the uſe and benefit of the world; beſides, ſome muſt be left for the return of the waters: and the rain from heaven was reſtrained; which ſeems to confirm what has been before obſerved, that after the rain of forty days and nights it ceaſed not to rain, more or leſs, tho' not ſo vehemently, until the end of an hundred and fifty days, and then it entirely ceaſed.

℣. 3. And the waters returned from off the earth continually, &c.] Or going and returning [s]; they went off from the earth, and returned to their proper places appointed for them; ſome were dried up by the wind, and exhaled by the ſun into the air; and others returned to their channels and cavities in the earth, or ſoaked into it: and after the end of the hundred and fifty days, the waters were abated; or began to abate, as Jarchi and the Vulgate Latin verſion; which days are to be reckoned from the beginning of the flood, including the 40 days rain; though Jarchi reckons them from the time of the ceaſing of it; ſo that there were from the beginning of the flood 190 days; and 6 months, and 10 days of the year of the flood were now paſt; and in this he is followed by Dr. Lightfoot [t]: but the former reckoning ſeems beſt, and agrees better with what follows.

℣. 4. And the ark reſted in the 7th month, on the 17th day of the month, &c.] That is, five months after the flood began, and when the waters began to decreaſe; for this is not the 7th month of the flood, but of the year, which being reckoned from Tiſri, or the autumnal equinox, muſt be the month Niſan, which anſwers to part of our March, and part of April; and ſo the Targum of Jonathan explains it, "this is the month Niſan;" but Jarchi makes it to be the month Sivan, which anſwers to part of May, and part of June, taking it to be the 7th month from Ciſleu, when the 40 days rain ceaſed; in which he is followed by Dr. Lightfoot [u]; and according to biſhop Uſher [w], the 17th day of the 7th month, on which the ark reſted, was Wedneſday the 6th of May: and then it reſted upon the mountains of Ararat; that is, on one of them, for Ararat is ſaid to be a long ridge of mountains like the Alps, or the Pyrenean mountains; which, as Sir Walter Raleigh [x] thinks, are the ſame which run through Armenia, Meſopotamia, Aſſyria, &c. and are by Pliny [y] called Taurus. But what is now called Ararat, and by the Armenians Meſſis or Macis, and by the Turks Augri-daugh or Agrida, is a ſingle mountain, and is ſo high that it overtops all the mountains thereabout; and that which makes it ſeem ſo very high is, that it ſtands by itſelf in the form of a ſugar-loaf, in the middle of one of the greateſt plains one can ſee; it has two tops, one greater, and the ſmaller is moſt ſharp pointed of the two [z]. The Vulgate Latin verſion renders it the mountains of Armenia; and ſo Ararat in the Septuagint of Iſ. xxxvii. 38. is rendered Armenia, and in our verſion alſo; and it is the more commonly received opinion, that Ararat was a mountain there; and this agrees with the teſtimonies of various heathen writers, which are produced by Joſephus and Euſebius. Beroſus the Chaldæan [a] ſays, "it is reported that in Armenia, on a mountain of "the Cordyæans, there is part of a ſhip, the pitch "of which ſome take off, and carry about with "them, and uſe it as an amulet to avert evils." And Nicholas of Damaſcus [b] relates, that in Minyas in Armenia is an huge mountain called Baris, to which, as the report is, many fled at the flood, and were ſaved; and that a certain perſon, carried in an ark or cheſt, ſtruck upon the top of it, and that the remains of the timber were preſerved a long time after; and, adds he, perhaps he may be the ſame that Moſes, the lawgiver of the Jews, writes of. Now this mountain ſeems plainly to have its name from the ark of Noah, for a boat, or or ſhip is, with the Egyptians, called Baris. Herodotus [c] gives a large account of ſhips they call by this name; and the boat in which Charon is ſaid to carry the dead bodies over the lake Acheruſia, near Memphis, is ſaid by Diodorus Siculus [d] to have the ſame name. Abydenus the Aſſyrian [e] tells us, that "Saturn having foretold to Siſithrus, that "there would be a vaſt quantity of rain on the "15th of the month Dæſius, he immediately ſailed "to the Armenians; and that the ſhip being driven "to Armenia, the inhabitants made amulets of the "wood of it, which they carried about their necks, "as antidotes againſt diſeaſes." And hence Melo [f], who wrote againſt the Jews, ſuggeſts, as if the deluge did not reach Armenia; for he ſays, "at the "deluge, a man that had eſcaped with his ſons "went from Armenia, being driven out of his poſ-"ſeſſion by thoſe of the country, and paſſing over "the intermediate region, came into the moun-"tainous part of Syria which was deſolate." And with what Beroſus ſays of a mountain of the Cordyæans in Armenia, agree the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan, and the Syriac and Arabic verſions, who all render the words here the mountains of Cardu or Carda: from the reſting of the ark on this day on the mountains of Ararat, Jarchi concludes, and Dr. Lightfoot [g] after him, that the ark drew 11 cubits water, which, according to them, thus appears; on the firſt day of the month Ab, the mountain-tops were firſt ſeen, and then the waters had fallen 15 cubits, which they had been 60 days in doing, namely, from the firſt day of Sivan, and ſo they had abated the proportion of 1 cubit in 4 days: by this account we find, that on the 16th day of Sivan they had abated but 4 cubits, and yet on the next day, the 17th, the ark reſteth on a hill, where the waters yet lay 11 cubits above it.

℣. 5. And the waters decreaſed continually until the tenth month, &c.] That is, from the 17th of the 7th month, to the 1ſt of the 10th month, a ſpace of 2 months and 13 days, and being ſummer-time, through the heat of the ſun, they decreaſed apace: in the tenth month, on the firſt day of the month, were the tops of the mountains ſeen; not the tenth month of the flood, but of the year; the month Tammuz, as the Targum of Jonathan, and anſwers to part of June, and part of July; and the 1ſt day of this month, according to biſhop Uſher [h], was Sunday the 19th of July: but according to Jarchi, whom Dr. Lightfoot [i] follows, this was the month Ab, which anſwers to July and Auguſt, the tenth from Marcheſvan, when the rain began.

℣. 6. And it came to paſs at the end of 40 days, &c.] From the appearance of the mountains, that is, from the 1ſt day of the 10th month, to 40 days after; and being ended, this muſt be the 11th day of the 11th month, the month Ab, which anſwers to July and Auguſt; and according to biſhop Uſher [k] it was Friday the 28th of Auguſt: that Noah opened the window of the ark which he had made; of which ſee the note on ch. vi. 16.

℣. 7. And he ſent forth a raven, &c.] That by it he might make his obſervation, how high or low the waters were upon the earth; and the rather he ſent out the raven, a bird of prey, which feeds on carrion, that if the earth had been dry, the ſmell of the dead carcaſes would have invited it to go far off from the ark, and not return; but if not, he would ſee it again: which went forth to and fro, until the waters were dried up from the earth; or, and it went forth, going forth and returning [l]; it went forth out of the ark, and returned, but might not go into it, but went forth again, and then returned; and thus it continued going backwards and forwards, until the waters were dried up, when it returned no more: the Septuagint verſion is, and it returned not; and ſo ſome Jewiſh writers [m] ſay, it found the carcaſe of a man on the top of the mountains, and ſat upon it for food, and returned not: hence came the fable of Apollo's ſending a raven to fetch water, whilſt he was ſacrificing, which lighting on a large cornfield, yet green, and being willing to enjoy ſome grains of it, waited till it was ripe, and neglected its orders [n]; and hence is the proverb, corvus nuntius. Some make this creature to be an emblem of the law, firſt ſent forth, but brought no good tidings of the waters of God's wrath being aſſwaged, but worketh wrath, and is the miniſtration of condemnation and death: rather it is an emblem of unregenerate men, who are, like it, black through original ſin and actual tranſgreſſions; are unclean and polluted in all the powers and faculties of their ſouls; are hateful, hating one another, and live in carnal and ſenſual luſts and pleaſures.

℣. 8. Alſo he ſent forth a dove from him, &c.] Seven days after he had ſent out the raven, as in ℣. 10. to ſee if the waters were abated from off the face of the ground; for the dove is a creature that delights in cleanneſs, flies low, and goes far off, ſo that if it returned not again, he might conclude that the waters were gone off the earth; but being a ſociable creature, and familiar to men, and eſpecially loving to its mate, if they were not gone off, it would certainly return again. This ſome take to be an emblem of the goſpel, bringing the good tidings of peace, pardon, righteouſneſs and ſalvation by Jeſus Chriſt: rather it is an emblem of a ſenſible ſinner, and true believer in Chriſt, being mournful, timorous, ſwift, modeſt and affectionate; ſuch perſons, like doves of the valley, mourn for their iniquities; tremble at the ſight of their ſins, and the curſes of the law, at the apprehenſion of divine wrath, at the awful judgment of God; and are fearful leſt Chriſt ſhould not receive them, to whom they ſwiftly fly for refuge, as doves to their windows; and who are modeſt, meek and lowly, and affectionate to Chriſt, and one another. The Targum of Jonathan calls this an houſe-dove, or tame one: hence perhaps came the practice of making uſe of doves as meſſengers to carry letters from place to place [o].

℣. 9. But the dove found no reſt for the ſole of her foot, and ſhe returned unto him into the ark, &c.] It being a creature that feeds upon ſeeds it picks off from the ground, and loving cleanneſs, it could find no place where it could alight, and have food to live upon, and retain its cleanneſs; for though the tops of the mountains were clear of the waters, yet they might be muddy and filthy with what the waters had raiſed up in them, or left upon them; and therefore it returned to Noah again, and not only like the raven unto the ark, but into it: for the waters were on the face of the whole earth; there was no place dry, and ſo neither food nor footing for this creature; and which was an emblem of a ſenſible ſinner, who finds no reſt in any thing ſhort of Chriſt; not in worldly enjoyments; nor in external duties, not in hearing, reading, praying, faſting, nor in external humiliation and tears; nor in the law, and in the works of it; nor in natural deſcent, nor in education-principles, nor in a profeſſion of religion, and ſubjection to ordinances; only in Chriſt, where it finds reſt from the burden and guilt of ſin, and the tyrannical power of it; from the bondage, curſe, and condemnation of the law, and from a ſenſe of divine wrath and fear of it; and though not from afflictions, yet it finds reſt in Chriſt amidſt them: then he put forth his hand and took her, and pulled her in unto him into the ark: ſhe hovered about it, and got near the window, which Noah opened and took her in; which may repreſent the gracious reception ſenſible ſouls meet with from Chriſt, who apply to him; he kindly embraces them, and they find room in his heart and affections, fulneſs of every thing they want, and ſecurity from all danger.

℣. 10. And he ſtayed yet other 7 days, &c.] As he had ſtayed 7 days between the ſending out of the raven and the dove, ſo he ſtayed 7 days more after he had ſent out the dove, and it returned to him, waiting patiently for his deliverance, and the ſigns of it; though he could have been glad to have known its near approach, for which he made the experiments he did: and again he ſent forth the dove out of the ark; very probably the ſelf ſame dove he had ſent out before.

℣. 11. And the dove came in to him in the evening, &c.] It having been out all day delighting itſelf in a free air, and perching upon the trees, but yet not finding ſufficient food, or a proper lodging, it returned to Noah at the evening for food and dwelling in the ark; and lo, in her mouth was an olive-leaf pluckt off: which might eaſily be done, and even an olive-branch, as the word ſometimes ſignifies, and is by ſome [p] rendred; for it being now the ſummer-ſeaſon, young branches ſprouted out, which being tender, were eaſily cropt: the Targum of Jonathan adds, "which it had took from the "mount of olives;" but there is no neceſſity to ſuppoſe it went ſo far from the ark, ſince Aſſyria, a country nearer, was a land of oil-olive, like that of Judea; 2 Kings xviii. 32. and beſides, olives grew in Armenia itſelf, where the ark reſted. Gogarene in Armenia, is ſaid by Strabo [q] to produce olive trees; though a modern author ſays [r], "I don't ſee "where the dove which was ſent out of the ark, "could find an olive branch, if the ark be ſup-"poſed to have reſted on mount Ararat, or any "of the mountains in Armenia; for this ſort of "trees is not found hereabout, where the ſpecies "muſt be loſt, and yet olives are known to be a "kind of trees which never die:" but the above accounts ſhew it to be otherwiſe in antient times: ſo Noah knew the waters were abated from off the earth; by this he perceived not only that they were gone off the mountains, but the lower grounds, at leaſt, the hills on which olive trees delight to grow; and yet that they were only abated, and not entirely gone off, ſince the dove returned to him: this dove ſent out the ſecond time, and returning, may be conſidered as an emblem of a goſpel-miniſter, comparable to a dove, for the dovelike gifts of the Spirit of God, by which he is qualified for his work, and for his ſimplicity, harmleſſneſs, meekneſs, and humility; and the olive-leaf in its mouth, may be an emblem of the goſpel, which is from Chriſt, the good olive; is the goſpel of peace, which an olive branch is a ſymbol of, proclaiming and publiſhing peace and reconciliation by Chriſt; and as that is ever green, the goſpel always continues, and is the everlaſting goſpel, and which was brought, and more fully and clearly diſpenſed in the evening of the world; and by it, it is known that the waters of divine wrath are aſſwaged, and the people of God may be aſſured, they will never return to come upon them.

℣. 12. And he ſtayed yet other 7 days, &c.] After the dove had returned: and ſent forth the dove; the ſame dove again; which returned not again unto him any more: the earth being dry, it found reſt for the ſole of its feet, ſufficient food to eat, and a proper place for its habitation; and liking to be at liberty, and in the open air, choſe not to return to the ark, even though its mate was there: of thoſe birds ſent out, the heathen writers make mention: Abydenus ſays [s], that Siſithrus, the ſame with Noah, ſent out birds, making an experiment to ſee whether the earth was emerſed out of the water, which returned again to him; and after them he ſent out others; and having done ſo three times, obtained what he wiſhed for, ſince the birds returned with their wings full of clay or mud; and ſo Joſephus [t] ſays, the dove which brought the olive-leaf was all over clayey or muddy: and Plutarch [u] makes particular mention of the dove, and ſays, that according to the mythologiſts, a dove was let out of the ark; and that her going out was to Deucalion, (the ſame with Noah) a ſign of fair weather, and her return of foul: and the ſtory that Lucian [w] tells of a golden dove upon the head, of a ſtatue in the temple of Hierapolis, ſuppoſed to be Deucalion's, ſeems plainly to refer to this dove of Noah; for the report, he ſays, was, that this golden dove flew away twice in a year, at the commemoration there made of the flood, by pouring out abundance of water into a chaſm or cleft of the earth, then not very large; and which, it was told him, was formerly a very great one, and ſwallowed up all the flood that drowned the world.

℣. 13. And it came to paſs in the 601ſt year, &c.] Of Noah's life, and ſo the Septuagint adds, in the 1ſt month, the 1ſt day of the month; ſo that it was the 1ſt day of the year, new year's-day, and a joyful one it was to Noah and his family, when they ſaw dry ground; which they had not ſeen for above 10 months: according to R. Joſhua, this was the month Niſan, which was the firſt month with the Jews on ſacred accounts; but according to R. Eliezer it was the month of Tiſri, as Jarchi obſerves, which was their firſt month on civil accounts, and was their moſt antient way of reckoning; and ſo the Targum of Jonathan explains it, adding, and Tiſri; which anſwers to part of September, and part of October; and according to Biſhop Uſher [x], this day was Friday, October 23, A. M. 1657. the waters were dried up from off the earth; by the wind that continued to paſs over it, and by the ſun, which exhaled great quantities of it throughout the whole ſummer ſeaſon; as it was from the end of the 150 days, when the wind was firſt made, and the waters began to aſſwage to this time; as well as alſo by their ſoaking into the earth, and by returning to the cavities and receptacles in it: and Noah removed the covering of the ark, and looked; not the roof of it, at leaſt not the whole, only only a board or two; though perhaps this was a covering made of ſkins, that was thrown over the ark, like that which was put over the tabernacle of Moſes, and was made of ſkins, Exod. xxvi. 14. where the ſame word is uſed as here: the uſe of this might be to hang over the window and defend it from the rain; ſo that the uncovering of the ark was only putting by, or turning up this covering, that he might be able, more clearly to ſee out of the window, how things were: and behold the face of the ground was dry; the ſuperficies or ſurface of the earth looked dry; but was not ſo dry and hard as to bear heavy bodies, or the foot to tread on it, being ſoft and tender, through the water ſo long upon it, and had left mud and ſlime, not yet ſufficiently hardened by the wind and ſun to walk upon.

℣ 14. And in the 2d month, on the 27th day of the month, &c.] This was the month Marcheſvan, as the Targum of Jonathan, which anſwers to part of our October, and part of November; though according to Biſhop Uſher [y], this day was Friday the 18th of December, A. M. 1657. it was on the 17th of this month that Noah went into the ark, ch. vii. 11. ſo that he was in it twelve months and ten days, according to a ſolar year; but if the reckoning is made according to Jewiſh months, 6 of which conſiſted of 30 days, and 6 of 29 only, then the 12 months made but 354 days, add to which 11 days to the 27th, fully ended, it makes 365 days; ſo that he was in the ark juſt a full year, according to the courſe of the ſun; but it ſeems very plain, that the months here reckoned conſiſted of 30 days, ſince the 150 days when the waters abated are reckoned, from the 17th day of the 2d month, to the 17th day of the 7th month; which make exactly 5 months, and allow 30 days to a month: and at this time, when Noah had waited almoſt 2 months, after he had removed the covering of the ark, was the earth dried; ſo that it was fit to walk upon, and was become commodious both for man and beaſt: a different word from that in the preceding verſe is here uſed for dry, this being a different kind, or however, a greater degree of dryneſs than the other.

℣. 15. And God ſpake unto Noah, ſaying, &c.] Whether in a dream or viſion, or by an articulate voice, appearing in an human form, or by an impulſe on his mind, is not certain; however, the Lord ſpoke ſo to him, that he heard him and underſtood him: it was, no doubt, very rejoicing to him, ſince he had not heard his voice for a year or more, at leaſt that we read of; and what he ſaid to him was as follows.

℣. 16. Go forth of the ark, &c.] Though the earth was dry and fit to be inhabited, yet he would not go out without orders as he had to go in; which he waited for before he would, and now he has them: thou and thy wife, and thy ſons, and thy ſons wives with thee: the Jewiſh writers [z] obſerve, that the manner of Noah and his family coming out of the ark, is different from that of their going into it: when they went into it they went the men by themſelves, and the women by themſelves, and ſo continued apart in the ark, the uſe of the marriage-bed being forbidden them, being a time of diſtreſs; but now when they came out they are coupled together, ſignifying that they were now free to cohabit together.

℣. 17. Bring forth with thee every living thing that is with thee, &c.] There is a various reading of the word, for bring forth; according to the margin, as Jarchi obſerves, the ſenſe is, order them to come forth; and according to the ſcripture, if they will not, oblige them to come: of all fleſh, both of fowl, and of cattle, and of every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth; for of each of theſe there were ſome that went with him into the ark, and continued there: that they may breed abundantly in the earth, and be fruitful, and multiply upon the earth; for which end they were preſerved in the ark. Jarchi obſerves, it is ſaid on the earth, not in the ark, which ſhews, he thinks that birds and beaſts were not allowed to couple, and that they did not breed there. It is a queſtion with ſome, how the creatures which were only in Aſia at their coming out of the ark, could ſpread themſelves all over the earth; particularly how they could get into iſlands, and eſpecially into America: to which it may be anſwered, that this might be done by many of them, by ſwimming over narrow ſeas, for ſome wild creatures will ſwim whole days and nights together, when they are forced to it; and by mens carrying others in veſſels to diſtant and different parts, on one account or another, either for profit or pleaſure; and eſpecially, what is it the power and providence of God cannot do, who could not be at a loſs for ways and means to repleniſh a world in all the parts of it he had made deſolate, when it was his pleaſure?

℣. 18. And Noah went forth, &c.] Being obedient to the divine command, and no doubt, with great pleaſure in his countenance, and with a heart full of thankfulneſs for ſo great a deliverance; and his ſons. and his wife, and his ſons wives with him; in all eight perſons, and no more were ſaved in the ark, as Peter obſerves, 1 Pet. iii. 20. and the Arabic writers ſay [a], Noah and his ſons built a city near the place where they came out of the ark, and called it Themanin, giving this as a reaſon of the name, we are eight, that is, who have eſcaped; ſo Beroſus ſays [b], that the earth being dried of the waters, there were then only eight men in Armenia, from whence all mankind ſprung.

℣. 19. Every beaſt, every creeping thing, and every fowl, and whatſoever creepeth upon the earth, &c.] All went out, not one was left, and they went out after their kind; not in a confuſed diſorderly manner, mixing with one another; but as they went in by pairs, male and female of every ſort, ſo they came forth in like manner, or, according to their families [c]; by which it ſeems as if the creatures did breed in the ark, and had their families of young ones; and which is the ſenſe of ſome in Aben Ezra, and he himſelf thinks it not foreign, though he interprets it as we do, and as the Greek verſion does, after their kind: thus they went forth out of the ark; every one with his mate, in order to procreate and multiply upon the earth.

℣. 20. And Noah builded an altar unto the Lord, &c.] Not an houſe for himſelf and his family, but an altar for God; his firſt and greateſt concern being for the glory of God, and not for the temporal good of himſelf and his: this altar was erected, and devoted to the ſervice of God; it was built according to his will, and by his direction: Noah's view was to renew the worſhip of God, preſerve and propagate it by his example; and this was done by way of thankſgiving to God for his wonderful preſervation of him, and was alſo propitiatory and typical of Chriſt: the Jewiſh writers [d] ſay, this was the altar on which Adam ſacrificed ficed, when expelled the garden of Eden, and on which Cain and Abel offered; and being demoliſhed by the flood, was rebuilt by Noah, which is not at all probable; it is much more likely what Aben Ezra ſays, that it was built on one of the mountains of Ararat, and that as Noah took the firſt opportunity, ſo he built it in the firſt place he came to, or at leaſt not far from the place where he came out of the ark: and took of every clean beaſt, and of every clean fowl, and offered burnt-offerings on the altar; the clean beaſts were the bullock, the ſheep and goat, and the clean fowl, the turtle and young pigeon, one of each ſort at leaſt was taken. The Targum of Jonathan ſays, he offered four upon the altar: theſe were typical of Chriſt; the bullock or heifer might denote his ſtrength, the ſheep or lamb his patience and harmleſſneſs, the turtle or dove his meekneſs; and being burnt-offerings, may ſignify the painful and dolorous ſufferings of Chriſt, when the wrath of God was poured on him like fire.

℣. 21. And the Lord ſmelled a ſweet ſavour, &c.] Or a ſavour of reſt[e]; he was delighted and well-pleaſed with his ſacrifice which was offered up in the faith of the ſacrifice of Chriſt, the apoſtle ſays, is for a ſweet-ſwelling ſavour, Eph. v. 2. referring to this paſſage; that being a ſatisfaction to the juſtice of God, an appeaſing of his wrath, and a propitiation for the ſins of men: and the Lord ſaid in his heart; within himſelf; it was a while a ſecret there, but Noah being a prophet, as Aben Ezra obſerves, he revealed it to him, or to his heart[f], that is, to the heart of Noah, as ſome interpret it, he ſpoke comfortably to him, as follows, when the Jewiſh writers[g] ſay he ſtretched out his right-hand and ſwore, agreeable to Iſ. liv. 9. I will not again curſe the ground for man's ſake, or drown it for the ſin of man, as he had curſed it for the ſin of Adam, and which continued till this time; but now was taken off, and it became more fruitful, and very probably by means of the waters which had been ſo long upon it, and had left a fructifying virtue in it, as the waters of the Nile do in Egypt. Some interpret the phraſe, for man's ſake, for the man Chriſt's ſake, for the ſake of his ſacrifice, of which Noah's was a type, and the ſenſe be, that God would no more curſe the earth; for by his ſacrifice the curſe of the law is removed, with reſpect to his people; they are redeemed from it, and ſhall inherit that new earth, of which this earth, renewed after the flood, was a type, in which there will be no more curſe, Rev. xxi. 1. and xxii. 3. which ſenſe, though evangelical, cannot be admitted, becauſe of the reaſon following, unleſs the firſt word be rendered though, as it may: for the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth; his nature is depraved, his heart is corrupt, the thoughts of it evil, yea the imagination of it, and of them is ſinful, and that originally, even from his birth; from the time he is ſhook out of his mother's womb, as Jarchi interprets the phraſe: man is conceived in ſin, and ſhapen in iniquity, and is a tranſgreſſor from the womb, and ſo a child of wrath, and deſerving of the curſe of the law upon himſelf, and all that belong to him; and yet this is given as a reaſon why God will not any more curſe the ground for his ſake: that which was a reaſon for deſtroying the earth, is now one againſt it, ſee ch. vi. 5. which may be reconciled thus, God for this reaſon deſtroyed the earth once, for an example, and to diſplay his juſtice; but ſuch is his clemency and mercy, that he'll do it no more to the end of the world; conſidering that man has brought himſelf into ſuch a condition, that he cannot but ſin, it is natural to him from his birth; his nature is tainted with it, his heart is full of it, and all his thoughts and imaginations are wicked and ſinful, from whence continually flow a train of actual ſins and tranſgreſſions; ſo that if God was to curſe and drown the world as often as man ſins, he muſt be continually doing it; for the words may be rendered, though the imagination of man's heart is evil, &c.[h] yet I will not do it; and ſo they are expreſſive of the ſuper-abounding grace of God over abounding ſin: neither will I again ſmite any more every thing living, as I have done; this hinders not but that there might be, as has been ſince, partial calamities, or particular judgments on individual perſons, towns and cities, as thoſe of Sodom and Gomorrah, or partial inundations, but not a general deluge, or an univerſal deſtruction of the world and creatures in it, at leaſt not by water as has been, but by fire as will be; for that the earth will have an end, at leaſt as to its preſent nature, form and uſe, may be concluded from the following words.

℣. 22. While the earth remaineth, &c.] Which as to its ſubſtance may remain for ever, Eccl. i. 4. yet as to its form and quality will be changed; that and all in it will be burnt up; there will be an end of all things in it, for ſo the words are in the original, as yet all the days of the earth, or while all the days of the earth are[i]; which ſhows that there is a time fixed for its continuance, and that this time is but ſhort, being meaſured by days: but however as long as it does continue, ſeed-time and harveſt, and cold and heat, and ſummer and winter, and day and night ſhall not ceaſe; as they had done, or ſeemed to do during the flood; for the year paſt there had been no ſeed-time nor harveſt, and it muſt have been for the moſt part damp and cold through the rains, and the abundance of water on the earth, that the difference of ſeaſons was not very diſcernible; as neither of days and nights at ſome times, eſpecially when the clouds were ſo black and thick all over the heavens, that neither ſun, moon or ſtars could be ſeen; and ſuch floods of water continually pouring down, that it muſt be difficult to know when it was day and when night; but for the future it is promiſed, that theſe ſhould not ceaſe as long as the world ſtands: ſeed-time and harveſt; the time of ſowing ſeed in the earth, and the time of gathering in the fruits of it when ripe, ſo neceſſary for the ſuſtenance of man and beaſt: once in ſeven years, and once in fifty years indeed theſe ceaſed in the land of Judea, whilſt the people of Iſrael reſided there; but then this was not general all the world over, in other places there were ſeed-time and harveſt: and cold and heat, and ſummer and winter; in ſome places indeed there is but little cold, in others but little heat, and the difference of ſummer and winter is not ſo diſcernible in ſome places as in others, yet there is of all theſe in the world in general. According to Jarchi, cold ſignifies a more ſevere ſeaſon than winter, or the ſeverer part of the winter; and heat a hotter ter ſeaſon than the ſummer, or the hotter part of it. The Jews obſerve, that the ſeaſons of the year are divided into 6 parts, and 2 months are to be allowed to each part; which Lyra from them, and chiefly from Jarchi, thus gives, "to ſeed-time "the laſt half of September, all October, and half "November; to cold, the other half of November, "all December, and half January; to winter, half "January, all February, and half March; to har-"veſt, half March, all April, and half May; to "ſummer, half May, all June, and half July; to "heat, half July, all Auguſt, and the firſt half "of September." But theſe accounts refer to the land of Judea only: it is enough for the fulfilment of the promiſe, that they are more or leſs, at one time of the year or another, in all parts of the world, and ſo will be until the world ſhall be no more; and may, in a myſtic ſenſe, denote the continuance of the church of God in the world, as long as it endures, and its various viciſſitudes and revolutions; ſometimes it is a time of ſowing the precious ſeed of the word; and ſometimes it is an harveſt, is an ingathering of ſouls into it; ſometimes it is a winter ſeaſon with it, and all things ſeem withered and dead; and at other times it is ſummer, and all things look ſmiling and chearful; ſometimes it is in a ſtate of coldneſs and indifference, and at other times expoſed to the heat of perſecution, and more warm and zealous uſually then; ſometimes it is night with it, and ſometimes day, and ſo it is like to be, until that ſtate takes place deſcribed in Rev. vii. 16. and xxi. 25.

CHAP. IX.

IN this chapter we have an account of God's bleſſing Noah and his ſons, being juſt come out of the ark, with a renewal of the bleſſing of propagating their ſpecies, and repleniſhing the earth, the dominion over the creatures, and a freedom from the fear of them; with liberty to eat fleſh, only it muſt not be eaten with blood; with a providential care and preſervation of their lives from men and beaſts, by making a law that that man or beaſt ſhould die that ſhed man's blood, ℣. 1—6. and after repeating the bleſſing of procreation, ℣ 7. mention is made of a covenant God made with Noah, his ſons, and all the creatures, that he would drown the world no more, the token of which ſhould be the rain-bow in the cloud, ℣. 8—17. the names of the ſons of Noah are obſerved, by whom the earth was repeopled, ℣. 18, 19. and ſeem to be obſerved for the ſake of an event after recorded; Noah having planted a vineyard, and drank too freely of the wine of it, lay down uncovered in his tent, which Ham ſeeing, told his two brothers of it, who in a very modeſt manner covered him, 20—23. of all which Noah being ſenſible when he awoke, curſed Canaan the ſon of Ham, and bleſſed Shem and Japheth, ℣. 24—27. and the chapter is concluded with the age and death of Noah, ℣. 28, 29.

℣. 1. And God bleſſed Noah and his ſons, &c.] With temporal bleſſings, not ſpiritual ones; for though ſome of them were bleſſed with ſuch, yet not all, particularly Ham: and ſaid unto them, be fruitful and multiply, and repleniſh the earth; depopulated by the flood: this is a renewal of the bleſſing on Adam, a power and faculty of propagating his ſpecies, which was as neceſſary now as then, ſince there were ſo few of the human race left in the world; and the renewal of this grant was the rather neceſſary, if, as has been obſerved, Noah and his ſons were reſtrained from cohabiting with their wives whilſt in the ark: but though theſe words are not an expreſs command, for the propagation of their ſpecies, yet more than a bare permiſſion, at leaſt they are a direction and inſtruction to it, and even carry in them a promiſe of fruitfulneſs, that they ſhould multiply and increaſe, which was very needful at this time.

℣. 2. And the fear of you, and the dread of you, ſhall be upon every beaſt of the earth, &c.] This is a renewal, at leaſt in part, of the grant of dominion to Adam over all the creatures; theſe obeyed him chearfully, and from love, but ſinning, he in a good meaſure loſt his power over them, they rebelled againſt him; but now though the charter of power over them is renewed, they don't ſerve man freely, but are in dread of him, and flee from him; ſome are more eaſily brought into ſubjection to him, and even the fierceſt and wildeſt of them may be tamed by him; and this power over them was the more eaſily retrieved in all probability by Noah and his ſons, from the inhabitation of the creatures with them for ſo long a time in the ark: and upon every fowl of the air, and upon all that moveth upon the earth, and upon all the fiſhes of the ſea; as appears by fowls flying away, by beaſts and creeping things getting off as faſt as they can, and by fiſhes ſwimming away at the ſight of men: into your hand are they delivered; as the lords and proprietors of them, for their uſe and ſervice, and particularly for what follows, ſee Pſ. viii. 6, 7, 8. where there is an enumeration of the creatures ſubject to men.

℣. 3. Every moving thing that liveth, ſhall be meat for you, &c.] That is, every beaſt, fowl, and fiſh, without exception; for though there was a difference at this time of clean and unclean creatures with reſpect to ſacrifice, yet not with reſpect to food; every creature of God was good then, as it is now, and it was left to man's reaſon and judgment what to make uſe of, as would be moſt conducive to his health, and agreeable to his taſte: and though there was a diſtinction afterwards made under the Levitical diſpenſation among the Jews, who were forbid the uſe of ſome creatures; yet they themſelves ſay [k], that all unclean beaſts will be clean in the world to come, in the times of the Meſſiah, as they were to the ſons of Noah, and refer to this text in proof of it: the only exception in the text is, that they muſt be living creatures which are taken, and uſed for food; not ſuch as die of themſelves, or are torn to pieces by wild beaſts, but ſuch as are taken alive, and killed in a proper manner: even as the green herb have I given you all things; as every green herb was given for meat to Adam originally, without any exception, Gen. i. 29, 30. ſo every living creature, without exception, was given to Noah and his ſons for food. Some think, and it is a general opinion, that this was a new grant, that man had no right before to eat fleſh, nor did he; and it is certain it is not before expreſſed, but it may be included in the general grant of power and dominion over the creatures tures made to Adam; and ſince what is before obſerved is only a renewal of former grants, this may be conſidered in the ſame light; or otherwiſe the dominion over the creatures firſt granted to Adam will be reduced to a ſmall matter, if he had no right nor power to kill and eat them; beſides in ſo large a ſpace of time, as 1600 years and upwards, the world muſt have been overſtocked with creatures, if they were not uſed for ſuch a purpoſe; nor will Abel's offering the firſtling and fatteſt of his flock appear ſo praiſe-worthy, when it made no difference with him, if he eat not of them, whether they were fat or lean; and who will deny that there were peace-offerings before the flood, which the offerer always eat of? to which may be added the luxury of men before the flood, who thereby were given to impure and carnal luſts; and our Lord expreſly ſays of the men of that age, that they were eating and drinking, living in a voluptuous manner, which can hardly be accounted for, if they lived only on herbs, ſee Luke xvii. 22. though it muſt be owned, that it was a common notion of poets and philoſophers [l], that men in the golden age, as they call it, did not eat fleſh, but lived on herbs and fruit.

℣. 4. But fleſh with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof, ſhall you not eat.] This is the only exception to the eating of fleſh; it was not to be eaten with the blood in it, which is ſaid to be its life; not that the blood is of itſelf the life, but becauſe it is a means of life, and that being exhauſted, the creature muſt die, and beauſe the animal and vital ſpirits appear to us moſt vigorous in it; yea, it is the aliment and ſupport of them, and which furniſhes out the greateſt quantity of them: or rather it may be rendred, the fleſh with its life in its blood [m]; whilſt there is life in the blood, or whilſt the creature is living; the meaning is, that a creature deſigned for food ſhould be properly killed, and its blood let out; that it ſhould not be devoured alive, as by a beaſt of prey; that raw fleſh ſhould not be eaten, as ſince by Cannibals, and might be by riotous fleſh-eaters, before the flood; for notwithſtanding this law, as fleſh without the blood might be eaten, ſo blood properly let out, and dreſſed, or mixed with other things, might be eaten, for aught this ſays to the contrary; but was not to be eaten with the fleſh, though it might ſeparately, which was afterwards forbid by another law. The deſign of this was to reſtrain cruelty in men, and particularly to prevent the ſhedding of human blood, which men might be led into, were they ſuffered to tear living creatures in pieces, and feed upon their raw fleſh, and the blood in it. The Targum of Jonathan is, "but "the fleſh which is torn from a living beaſt at "the time that its life is in it, or which is torn "from a beaſt whilſt it is ſlain, before all its breath "is gone out, ye ſhall not eat." And the Jewiſh writers generally interpret this of the fleſh of a creature taken from it alive, which they ſay is the 7th precept given to the ſons of Noah, over and above the 6 which the ſons of Adam were bound to obſerve, and they are theſe; the 1ſt forbids idolatry, the 2d blaſphemy, the 3d ſhedding of blood, or murder, the 4th uncleanneſs, or unjuſt carnal copulations, the 5th rapine or robbery, the 6th required the adminiſtration of juſtice to malefactors, and this 7th forbids the eating of any member or fleſh of a creature whilſt alive [n]; and ſuch of the heathens who conformed to thoſe precepts, were admitted to dwell among the Iſraelites, and were called proſelytes of the gate.

℣. 5. And ſurely your blood of your lives will I require, &c.] Or for ſurely your blood, &c. ° and ſo is a reaſon of the preceding law, to teach men not to ſhed human blood; or though, ſurely your blood, as Jarchi and Aben Ezra; though God had given them liberty to ſlay the creatures, and ſhed their blood, and eat them, yet he did not allow them to ſhed their own blood, or the blood of their fellow-creatures; ſhould they do this, he would ſurely make inquiſition, and puniſh them for it: at the hand of every beaſt will I require it; ſhould a beaſt kill a man, or be the inſtrument of ſhedding his blood, it ſhould be ſlain for it; not by means of another beaſt, God ſo ordering it, as Aben Ezra ſuggeſts, but by the hands or order of the civil magiſtrate; which was to be done partly to ſhew the great regard God has to the life of man, and partly to puniſh men for not taking more care of their beaſts, as well as to be an example to others to be more careful, and to leſſen the number of miſchievous creatures: and at the hand of man, at the hand of every man's brother will I require the life of man; which may be reaſonably ſuppoſed; for if it is required of a beaſt, and that is puniſhed for the ſlaughter of a man, then much more a man himſelf, that is wilfully guilty of murder; and the rather, ſince he is by general relation a brother to the perſon he has murdered, which is an aggravation of his crime: or it may ſignify, that though he is a brother in the neareſt relation, as his crime is the greater, he ſhall not go unpuniſhed.

℣. 6. Whoſo ſheddeth man's blood, by man ſhall his blood be ſhed, &c.] That is, he that is guilty of wilful murder ſhall ſurely be put to death by the order of the civil magiſtrate; ſo the Targum of Jonathan, "by witneſſes the judges ſhall condemn "him to death," that is, the fact being clearly proved by witneſſes, the judges ſhall paſs the ſentence of death upon him, and execute it; for this is but the law of retaliation, a juſt and equitable one, blood for blood, or life for life; though it ſeems to be the firſt law of this kind that empowered the civil magiſtrate to take away life; God, as it is thought, reſerving the right and power to himſelf before, and which, for ſome reaſons, he thought fit not to make uſe of in the caſe of Cain, whom he only baniſhed, and ſuffered not others to take away his life, but now enacts a law, requiring judges to puniſh murder with death; and which, according to this law, ought never to go unpuniſhed, or have a leſſer puniſhment inflicted for it: the reaſon follows, for in the image of God made he man; which, though ſadly defaced and obliterated by ſin, yet there are ſuch remains of it, as render him more eſpecially the object of the care and providence of God, and give him a ſuperiority to other creatures; and particularly this image, among others, conſiſts in immortality, which the taking away of his life may ſeem to contradict; however, it is what no man has a right to do.

℣. 7. And you, be ye fruitful and multiply, &c.] Inſtead of taking away the lives of men, the great concern ſhould be to multiply them; and this indeed is one reaſon of the above law, to prevent the decreaſe and ruin of mankind; and which was peculiarly needful, when there were ſo few men in the world as only 4, and therefore it is repeated in ſtronger terms: bring forth abundantly in the earth, and multiply therein; that the whole earth might be overſpread with men, and and repeopled ſufficiently, as it was by the ſons of Noah, ſee ℣. 19. and x. 32.

℣. 8. And God ſpake unto Noah, and to his ſons with him, &c.] Not only what is contained in the preceding verſes, but in the ſubſequent ones: ſaying; as follows,

℣. 9. And I, behold, I eſtabliſh my covenant with you, &c.] Not the covenant of grace in Chriſt, but of the preſervation of the creatures in common, a promiſe that they ſhould not be deſtroyed any more by a flood; to which promiſe it ſeems an oath was annexed, as appears from Iſ. liv. 9. which paſſage refers to this covenant, as Aben Ezra on the place obſerves; and both to raiſe attention to what is here affirmed, and to ſhew the certainty of it, the word behold is prefixed to it; nor is it amiſs what Jarchi obſerves, that this follows upon the direction and exhortation to procreation of children, and is an encouragement to it; ſince it is aſſured that poſterity ſhould be no more cut off in the manner it had been; for this covenant was made and eſtabliſhed not only with Noah, and his ſons, but with all their ſucceeding offspring, as follows: and with your ſeed after you; with all their poſterity to the end of the world; ſo that this covenant was made with all the world, and all the individuals in it, from Noah's time to the end of it; for from him and his ſons ſprung the whole race of men that peopled the world, and ſtill continue to inhabit it; hence here is nothing in it peculiar to the ſeed of believers.

℣. 10. And with every living creature that is with you, &c.] This is a further proof, that this was not the covenant of grace, but of conſervation, ſince it is made with irrational as well as rational creatures: of the fowl, of the cattle, and of every beaſt of the earth with you; the birds of the air, the tame cattle, and the wild beaſts: from all that go out of the ark, to every beaſt of the earth; which take in the creeping things not mentioned, for theſe were in the ark, and came out of the ark with Noah; and this covenant not only included all the ſeveral kinds of creatures that came out of the ark with Noah, but it reached to all that ſhould ſpring from them in future ages, to the end of the world.

℣. 11. And I will eſtabliſh my covenant with you, &c.] This is repeated to denote the certainty of it, as well as to lead on to the particulars of it: neither ſhall all fleſh be cut off any more, by the waters of a flood; neither man nor beaſt, at leaſt not all of them, and eſpecially by water: neither ſhall there be any more a flood to deſtroy the earth; not a general deluge, otherwiſe notwithſtanding this promiſe there might be, as there have been, particular inundations, which have overflowed particular countries and places, but not the whole earth; and this hinders not but that the whole earth may be deſtroyed by fire, as it will be at the laſt day, only not by water any more: and this is the ſum and ſubſtance of the covenant with Noah, his ſons, and all the creatures that have been, or ſhall be.

℣. 12. And God ſaid, this is the token of the covenant which I make between me and you, &c.] Meaning the bow in the cloud, and which might be formed in the cloud at this time, that Noah might ſee it, and know it when he ſaw it again, and ſeems to be pointed unto: this is the token; or ſign of the covenant made between God and Noah, and his ſons: and every living creature that is with you, for perpetual generations; which more clearly ſhews and proves, that this covenant reaches to all creatures that then were, or ſhould be in all ages, to the end of the world.

℣. 13. I do ſet my bow in the cloud, &c.] Or I have given, or have ſet it [p], which ſeems as if it was at that inſtant ſet; this is the ſame we call the rainbow; and ſo Horace [q] calls it arcus pluvius: it is called a bow, becauſe of its form, being a ſemicircle, and a rainbow, becauſe it is ſeen in a day of rain, and is a ſign of it, or of its being quickly over, Ezek. i. 28. and this appears in a moiſt dewy cloud, neither very thick nor very thin, and is occaſioned by the rays of the ſun oppoſite to it, refracted on it: and this God calls his bow, not only becauſe made by him, for notwithſtanding the natural cauſes of it, the cloud and ſun, the diſpoſition of theſe to produce it, ſuch a phænomenon is of God; but alſo becauſe he appointed it to be a ſign and token of his covenant with his creatures; ſo the heathen poets [r] call the rainbow the meſſenger of Juno. It is a queſtion, whether there was a rainbow before the flood, and it is not eaſily anſwered; both Jews and chriſtians are divided about it; Saadiah thought there was one; but Aben Ezra diſapproves of his opinion, and thinks it was firſt now made. The greater part of chriſtian interpreters are of the mind of Saadiah, that it was from the beginning, the natural cauſes of it, the ſun and cloud, being before the flood; and that it was now after it only appointed to be a ſign and token of the covenant: but tho' the natural cauſes of it did exiſt before, it does not follow, nor is it to be proved, that there was ſuch a diſpoſition of them to produce ſuch an effect; and it might be ſo ordered in Providence, that there ſhould not be any, that this might be entirely a new thing, and ſo a wonderful one, as the word for token [s] ſignifies; and the Greeks call the rainbow the daughter of Thaumas or Wonder [t], and be the more fit to be a ſign and token of the covenant, that God would no more deſtroy the earth with water; for otherwiſe, if this had been what Noah and his ſons had been uſed to ſee, it can hardly be thought ſufficient to take off their fears of a future inundation, which was the end and uſe it was to ſerve, as follows: it ſhall be for a token of a covenant between me and the earth; that is, between God and the creatures of the earth; or of a promiſe that God would no more deſtroy the earth, and cut off the creatures in it by a flood; for though it is a bow, yet without arrows, and is not turned downwards towards the earth, but upwards towards heaven, and ſo is a token of mercy and kindneſs, and not of wrath and anger.

℣. 14. And it ſhall come to paſs, when I bring a cloud over the earth, &c.] Or cloud a cloud [u], cauſe the clouds to gather thick in the heavens, and to hang over the earth ready to pour down great quantities of water; by reaſon of which the inhabitants might dread another flood coming upon them: wherefore, in order to diſſipate ſuch fears, it ſhall be ſo ordered, that the bow ſhall be ſeen in the cloud; after it has pretty much diſcharged itſelf; for the rainbow is always in a thin, not a thick cloud, after the

the heavy ſhowers are fallen from the thick clouds, and a ſmall thin one remains, then the rainbow is ſeen in it; not always, but very frequently, and when the ſun and clouds are in a proper poſition: and this is often ſo ordered, to put men in mind of this covenant, and to diveſt them of, or prevent their fears of the world being drowned by a flood; for when they ſee this, it is a ſure ſign the rain is going off, ſince the cloud is thinned, or otherwiſe the rainbow could not appear: and a moſt glorious and beautiful ſight it is, having ſuch a variety of colours in it, and in ſuch a poſition and form. Some think that it ſerves both to put in mind of the deſtruction of the old world by water, through its watry colours, and of the preſent world by fire, through its fiery ones. Others make the three predominant colours, to denote the three diſpenſations, before the law, under the law, and under the goſpel: rather they may ſignify the various providences of God, which all work together for the good of his people; however, whenever this bow is ſeen, it puts in mind of the covenant of preſervation made with all the creatures, and the firmneſs, ſtability and duration of it; and is by ſome conſidered as an emblem of the covenant of grace, from Iſ. liv. 9, 10. which is of God's making, as this bow is; is a reverberation of Chriſt the ſun of righteouſneſs, the ſum and ſubſtance of the covenant; conſiſts of various bleſſings and promiſes of grace; is expreſſive of mercy and peace, and is a ſecurity from everlaſting deſtruction: or rather, it may be thought to be an emblem of Chriſt himſelf, who was ſeen by John cloathed with a cloud, and a rainbow on his head, Rev. x. 1. this being a wonderful thing, as Chriſt is wonderful in his perſon, office, and grace; and as it has in it a variety of beautiful colours, it may repreſent Chriſt, who is full of grace, and truth, and fairer than the children of men; and may be conſidered as a ſymbol of peace and reconciliation by him, whom God looks unto, and remembers the covenant of his grace, he has made with him and his choſen ones in him; and who, is the rainbow round about the throne of God, and the way of acceſs unto it; Rev. iv. 3. the Jews have a ſaying, "Till ye ſee the bow in its luminous co-"lours, don't look for the feet of the Meſſiah, or "his coming [w]."

℣. 15. And I will remember my covenant which is between me and you, and every living creature of all fleſh, &c.] See ℣. 11, 12. and the waters ſhall no more become a flood to deſtroy all fleſh; this is repeated to remove thoſe fears which would naturally ariſe, upon the gathering of the clouds in the heavens; but as God would remember his covenant, which he can never forget, and is always mindful of, ſo men, when they ſee the bow in the cloud, may be aſſured, that whatever waters are in the heavens, they ſhall never be ſuffered to fall in ſuch quantity as to deſtroy all creatures as they have done.

℣. 16. And the bow ſhall be in the cloud, &c.] Not whenever there is a cloud, but at ſome certain times, when that and the ſun are in a proper poſition to form one, and when divine wiſdom ſees right there ſhould be one; then it appears and continues for a time, and as the cloud becomes thinner and thinner it diſappears: and I will look upon it, that I may remember the everlaſting covenant between God and every living creature of all fleſh that is upon the earth; not that forgetfulneſs, or remembrance, properly ſpeaking, belong to God, but this is ſaid after the manner of men; who by this token may be aſſured, whenever they ſee the bow in the cloud, that God is not unmindful of the covenant he has made with all creatures, and which is to continue to the end of the world.

℣. 17. And God ſaid to Noah, this is the token of the covenant, &c.] Which is repeated for the greater confirmation and certainty of it, ſince the fears of men would be apt to run very high, eſpecially whilſt the flood was freſh in memory; which I have eſtabliſhed between me and all fleſh that is upon the earth: See ℣. 9, 10, 11. it is highly probable, that from the rainbow being the token of the covenant between God and Noah, and the creatures, ſprung the fable of the Chineſe concerning their firſt emperor Fohi, who ſeems to be the ſame with Noah, and whom they call the ſon of heaven, and ſay he had no father; which is this, that his mother walking on the bank of a lake near Lanthien, in the province of Xenſi, trod upon a large footſtep of a man impreſſed upon the ſand, and from thence, being ſurrounded with the rainbow, conceived and brought forth Fohi [x].

℣. 18. And the ſons of Noah that went forth of the ark, were Shem, and Ham, and Japheth, &c.] Theſe were born before the flood, and went into the ark with Noah, and came out with him; ſee ch. v. 32. and vi. 10. and Ham is the father of Canaan: this is obſerved for the ſake of the following hiſtory, concerning the behaviour of the one to Noah, and of the curſe of the other by him, which would not have been ſo well underſtood if this remark had not been made: the father and the ſon, as they were related in nature, they were much alike in manners and behaviour. Cuſh, the firſt-born of Ham is not mentioned, but Canaan his youngeſt ſon, becauſe he was curſed, as Aben Ezra obſerves; and who remarks that the paragraph is written to ſhew that the Canaanites were accurſed, the father of whom this Canaan was; and who is the ſame Sanchoniatho [y] calls Cna, and ſays, he was the firſt that was called a Phœnician.

℣. 19. Theſe are the three ſons of Noah, &c.] And his only ones; and if he had any more, they left no poſterity behind them, ſince it follows, and of them was the whole earth overſpread; with inhabitants by them and their poſterity only: Beroſus [z] indeed ſays, that Noah, after the flood, begat more ſons, and giants; and his commentator Annius, talks of 17 of them, among whom was Tuiſcon, the father of the Germans; and the author of Juchaſin [a] aſcribes a fourth ſon to Noah, whoſe name he calls Joniko, who taught aſtronomy in the world, and learnt Nimrod the art of war; but theſe are fabulous ſtories, and contrary to the ſacred ſcriptures, which ſpeak of three ſons of Noah and no more, and ſay that by theſe the earth was repleniſhed after the flood: hence, among the heathen writers, we read of Saturn and his three children, who by many circumſtances appears to be the ſame with Noah, as Bochart [b] hath proved at large.

℣. 20. And Noah began to be an husbandman, &c.] Or a man of the earth [c], not lord of it, as Jarchi, though he was, but a tiller of the earth, as he

he had been before the flood, and now began to be again; he returned to his old employment, and which perhaps he improved, having invented, as the Jews [d] say, inſtruments of huſbandry, it may be, the uſe of the plough which made the tillage of the ground more eaſy; he was expert in huſbandry, as Aben Ezra obſerves, and which, as he remarks, is great wiſdom; and though he was ſo great a man, yet he employed himſelf in this way: and he planted a vineyard; not vines, but a vineyard; there were vines before ſcattered up and down, here one and there another, but he planted a number of them together, and ſet them in order, as the Jewiſh writers ſay [e]; and ſome of them [f] will have it, that he found a vine which the flood brought out of the garden of Eden, and planted it; but this is mere fable: where this plantation was cannot be ſaid with certainty; the Armenians have a tradition that Noah, after quitting the ark, went and ſettled at Erivan, about 12 leagues from Ararat, a city full of vineyards; and that it was there he planted the vineyard, in a place where they ſtill make excellent wine, and that their vines are of the ſame ſort he planted there [g]; which contradicts what Strabo [h] ſays of the country of Armenia, its hills and plains, that a vine will not eaſily grow there.

℣. 21. And he drank of the wine, and was drunken, &c.] Either not being acquainted with the ſtrength of it, as it is thought by many; or having been uſed to weaker liquor, as water; or through the infirmity of his age; however he was overtaken with it, and which is recorded, not to diſgrace him, but to caution men againſt the evil of intemperance, as well as to encourage repenting ſinners to expect pardon: and this ſhews that the beſt of men are not exempted from ſin, nor ſecure from falling; and that though Noah was a perfect man, yet not as to be without ſin; and that whereas he was a righteous man, he was not ſo by the righteouſneſs of works, but by the righteouſneſs of faith: and he was uncovered within his tent; being in liquor when he laid down, he was either negligent of his long and looſe garments, ſuch as the eaſtern people wore without breeches, and did not take care to wrap them about him; or in his ſleep, through the heat of the weather, or of the wine, or both, threw them off.

℣. 22. And Ham the father of Canaan ſaw the nakedneſs of his father, &c.] Which had it been through ſurprize, and at an unawares, would not have been thought criminal; but he went into his father's tent, where he ought not to have entred; he looked with pleaſure and delight on his father's nakedneſs: Ham is repreſented by many writers, as a very wicked, immodeſt, and profligate creature: Beroſus [i] makes him a magician, and to be the ſame with Zoroaſt or Zoroaſtres, and ſpeaks of him as the public corrupter of mankind; and ſays, that he taught men to live as before the flood, to lie with mothers, ſiſters, daughters, males and brutes, and creatures of all ſorts; and that he actually did ſo himſelf, and therefore was caſt out by his father Janus, or Noah, and got the name of Chem the infamous and immodeſt: and told his two brethren without; he went out of the tent after he had pleaſed himſelf with the ſight; ſee Hab. ii. 15. and in a wanton, ludicrous, and ſcoffing manner, related what he had ſeen: ſome of the Jewiſh Rabbins [k], as Jarchi relates, ſay that Canaan firſt ſaw it, and told his father of it; and ſome ſay [l], that he or Ham committed an unnatural crime with him; and others [m], that he caſtrated him; and hence, it is ſuppoſed, came the ſtories of Jupiter caſtrating his father Saturn, and Chronus his father Uranus: and Beroſus [n] ſays, that Ham taking hold of his father's genitals, and muttering ſome words, by a magic charm rendered him impotent: and ſome [o] will have it, that he committed inceſt with his father's wife; but theſe things are ſaid without foundation: what Noah's younger ſon did unto him, beſides looking on him, we are not told, yet it was ſuch as brought a curſe on Canaan; and one would think it would be more than bare ſight, nay, it is expreſsly ſaid there was ſomething done, but what is not ſaid, ℣. 24.

℣. 23. And Shem and Japheth took a garment, &c.] Who were the two brothers Ham told what he had ſeen, and who, no doubt, reproved him for his ill behaviour, and then took a garment, a coat of their own, very probably, ſome large garment fit for the purpoſe; and laid it upon both their ſhoulders; one part of it on the right ſhoulder of the one, and the other on the left ſhoulder of the other: and went backward, and covered the nakedneſs of their father; going backward when they came into the tent, and to the place where their father lay, they threw the garment off from their ſhoulders over him, and ſo covered him: and their faces were backward, and they ſaw not their father's nakedneſs: which they purpoſely ſhunned, for which reaſon they went backwards, and their faces were backwards to their father; which ſhewed their modeſty, and their filial piety and duty, and thus by their actions reproved Ham, as well as doubtleſs they did by words.

℣. 24. And Noah awoke from his wine, &c.] From his ſleep which his wine brought on him; when the force and ſtrength of that was gone, and when not only he awaked, but came to himſelf, and was ſober; and knew what his younger ſon had done to him; either by revelation, as ſome, or prophecy, as Ben Gerſom, or by the relation of his two ſons, whom, when finding himſelf covered with another's garment, he might queſtion how it came about, and they told him the whole affair: ſome, as Aben Ezra, Ben Gerſom, and Abendana, think that this was not Ham, the younger ſon of Noah, and whom ſome alſo will have, not to be the youngeſt, being always placed middlemoſt, but Canaan, the fourth and youngeſt ſon of Ham; and whom Noah indeed might call his younger, or, his ſon, the little one [p]; as it was uſual for grandchildren to be called the ſons of their grandfather; ſee Gen. xxix. 5. and Noah might be informed how his little ſon, or rather grandſon Canaan, had been in his tent, and ſeeing him in the poſture he was, went very merrily, and told his father Ham of it, who made a jeſt of it alſo; and this ſeems the more reaſonable, ſince Canaan was immediately curſed by Noah, as in the following verſe; ſee the note on ℣. 22. this affair muſt happen many years after Noah's coming out of the ark, ſince then his ſons had no children; whereas Ham had at this time time four ſons, and Canaan was the youngeſt of them; and he was grown up to an age ſufficient to be concerned in this matter, of treating his grandfather in an ill way, ſo as to bring his curſe upon him: Jarchi interprets little by abominable and contemptible, ſuppoſing it refers not to age but character, and which was bad both in Ham and Canaan: ſee the note on ℣. 22.

℣ 25. And he ſaid, &c.] Not in a drunken fit, as ſome profane perſons would ſuggeſt, for he was awaked from his wine; nor in the heat of paſſion, but by inſpiration, under a ſpirit of prophecy: curſed be Canaan; or, O curſed Canaan, or rather, Canaan is, or ſhall be curſed[q]; for the words are either a declaration of what was his caſe, or a prediction of what it ſhould be. It may ſeem ſtrange that Canaan ſhould be curſed, and not Ham, who ſeems to be the only aggreſſor, by what is ſaid in the context: hence one copy of the Septuagint, as Ainſworth obſerves, reads Ham, and the Arabic writers the father of Canaan; and ſo Saadiah Gaon ſupplies it, as Aben Ezra relates; and the ſame ſupplement is made by others[r]: but as both were guilty, as appears from what has been obſerved on the former verſes, and Canaan particularly was firſt in the tranſgreſſion; it ſeems moſt wiſe and juſt that he ſhould be expreſsly named, ſince hereby Ham is not excluded a ſhare in the puniſhment of the crime he had a concern in, being puniſhed in his ſon, his youngeſt ſon, who perhaps was his darling and favourite, and which muſt be very afflicting to him to hear of; and ſince Canaan only, and not any of the other ſons of Ham were guilty, he, and not Ham by name, is curſed, leſt it ſhould be thought that the curſe would fall upon Ham and all his poſterity; whereas the curſe deſcends on him, and very juſtly proceeds in the line of Canaan; and who is the rather mentioned, becauſe he was the father of the accurſed race of the Canaanites, whom God abhorred, and for their wickedneſs, was about to drive out of their land, and give it to his people for an inheritance; and in order to which the Iſraelites were now upon the expedition, when Moſes wrote this account, and which muſt animate them to it; for by this prediction they would ſee that they were an accurſed people, and that they were to be their ſervants: a ſervant of ſervants ſhall he be unto his brethren; the poſterities of Shem and Japheth, who ſtood in the relation of brethren to Canaan and his poſterity; and to thoſe he and his offspring were to become the moſt mean abject ſervants, as the phraſe implies: this character agrees with the name of Canaan, which may be derived from כנע to depreſs, humble, and make mean and abject.

℣. 26. And he ſaid, bleſſed be the Lord God of Shem, &c.] Shem was bleſſed before Japheth, becauſe he was the firſt and principal in adviſing and conducting the affair before aſcribed to them, as Jarchi on ℣. 23. ſuggeſts; and though the words are in the form of an aſcription of bleſſedneſs to God, the fountain of all good, and by whoſe grace Shem was influenced and enabled to do the good he did, for which the Lord's name was to be praiſed and bleſſed; yet it includes the bleſſing of Shem, and indeed the greateſt bleſſing he could poſſibly enjoy; for what greater bleſſing is there, than for a man to have God to be his God? this includes every thing, all bleſſings temporal and ſpiritual; ſee Pſ. cxliv. 15. ſome interpret the God of Shem of Chriſt, who, according to the human nature, was a deſcendant of Shem; and according to the divine nature the God of Shem, God over all bleſſed for ever, Rom. ix. 4, 5. And Canaan ſhall be his ſervant; the poſterity of Canaan be ſervants to the poſterity of Shem: this was fulfilled in the times of Joſhua, when the Iſraelites, who ſprung from Shem, conquered the land of Canaan, ſlew thirty of their kings, and took their cities and poſſeſſed them, and made the Gibeonites, one of the ſtates of Canaan, hewers of wood and drawers of water to them, or the moſt mean and abject ſervants.

℣. 27. God ſhall enlarge Japheth, &c.] Or give him a large part of the earth, and large dominions in it, as his poſterity have had; for, as Bochart[s] obſerves, to them belonged all Europe, and leſſer Aſia, Media, Iberia, Albania, part of Armenia, and all thoſe vaſt countries to the north, which formerly the Scythians, and now the Tartars inhabit; not to ſay any thing of the new world (America) into which the Scythians might paſs through the ſtreights of Anian; and he ſhall dwell in the tents of Shem; inhabit the countries belonging to the poſterity of Shem: this was verified by the Medes, who were the deſcendants of Japheth, together with the Babylonians ſeizing upon the Aſſyrian empire and overthrowing that, for Aſhur was of Shem; and in the Greeks and Romans, who ſprung from Japheth, when they made conqueſts in Aſia, in which were the tents of Shem's poſterity; and who, according to the prophecy in Numb. xxiv. 24. that ſhips from the coaſt of Chittim, Greece, or Italy, or both, ſhould afflict Aſhur and Eber, the Aſſyrians and the Hebrews, or thoſe beyond the river Euphrates, who all belonged to Shem; and particularly this was fulfilled when the Romans, who are of Japheth, ſeized Judea, which had long been the ſeat of the children of Shem, the Jews; and at this day the Turks, who are alſo Japheth's ſons, literally dwell in the tents of Shem, or inhabit Judea: the Targums underſtand this in a myſtical ſenſe. Onkelos thus: "God ſhall cauſe his Shekinah or "glorious majeſty to dwell in the tents of Shem;" which was remarkably true, when Chriſt the brightneſs of his father's glory, the word, was made fleſh, and tabernacled in Judea: Jonathan Ben Uzziel thus; "and his children ſhall be proſelytes, and dwell "in the ſchool of Shem;" and many chriſtian writers interpret them, of the converſion of the Gentiles, and of their union and communion with the believing Jews in one goſpel-church-ſtate, which was very evidently fulfilled in the firſt times of the goſpel: and they read theſe words in connexion with the former clauſe thus, God ſhall perſuade Japheth[t], and he ſhall dwell in the tents of Shem; that is, God ſhall perſuade the Gentiles, the poſterity of Japheth, by the ſweet alluring voice of his goſpel, and through the power of his grace accompanying it, to embrace and profeſs Chriſt and his goſpel, and join with his churches, and walk with them in all the commandments and ordinances of Chriſt; and at this day all the poſterity of Japheth, excepting Magog, or the Turks, bear the name of chriſtians: the Talmudiſts[u] interpret the paſſage of the language of Japheth being ſpoken in the tents of Shem; which had its accompliſhment when the apoſtles of Chriſt ſpoke and wrote in Greek,

Greek, one of the languages of Japheth's ſons. Some underſtand this of God himſelf, he ſhall dwell in the tents of Shem, or in Iſrael, as Jarchi, and was verified remarkably in the incarnation of the Son of God: and Canaan ſhall be his ſervant; the poſterity of Canaan ſervants to the poſterity of Japheth; as they were when Tyre, which was built by the Sidonians, and Sidon, which had its name from the eldeſt ſon of Canaan, fell into the hands of Alexander the Grecian, who ſprung from Japheth; and when Carthage, a colony of the Phœnicians of Canaan's race, was taken and demoliſhed by the Romans of the line of Japheth, which made Hannibal a child of Canaan, ſay, agnoſcere ſe fortunam Carthaginis [u], that he owned the fate of Carthage; and in which ſome have thought that he refers to this prophecy.

℣. 28. And Noah lived after the flood 350 years.] So that he not only ſaw the old world, and the wickedneſs of that, and the deſtruction of it for it, but an increaſe of wickedneſs again, the building of the tower of Babel, the confuſion of languages, the diſperſion of his offspring, and the wars among them in the times of Nimrod, and others: however, it was a bleſſing to mankind that he lived ſo long after the flood in the new world, to tranſmit to poſterity, by tradition, the affairs of the old world; and to give a particular account of the deſtruction of it, and to inſtruct them in the doctrines and duties of religion. By this it appears, that he lived within 32 years of the birth of Abraham. The Jews conclude from hence, that he lived to the 58th year of Abraham's life: it may be remarked, that it is not added here as uſual to the account of the years of the patriarchs, and he begat ſons and daughters; from whence it may be concluded, that he had no more children than the three before mentioned, as well as from the ſilence of the ſcriptures elſewhere, and from the old age of himſelf and his wife, and eſpecially from what is ſaid, ℣. 19. ſee the note there.

℣. 29. And all the days of Noah were 950 years, &c.] He lived 20 years more than Adam did, and within 19 of Methuſelah, and his age muſt be called a good old age; but what is ſaid of all the patriarchs, is alſo ſaid of him, and he died: the Arabic writers ſay [w], when the time of his death drew nigh, he ordered his ſon Shem by his will to take the body of Adam, and lay it in the middle of the earth, and appoint Melchizedek, the ſon of Peleg, miniſter at his grave; and one of them is very particular as to the time of his death; they ſay [x] he died on the 2d day of the month Ijar, on the 4th day (of the week) at two o'clock in the morning.

CHAP. X.

THIS chapter gives an account of the poſterity of the three ſons of Noah, by whom the world was peopled after the flood, ℣. 1. of the poſterity of Japheth, ℣. 2—5. of the poſterity of Ham, ℣. 6—20. and of the poſterity of Shem, ℣. 21—32.

℣. 1. Now theſe are the generations of the ſons of Noah, &c.] The genealogy of them, and which is of great uſe to ſhew the original of the ſeveral nations of the world, from whence they ſprung, and by whom they were founded; and to confute the pretended antiquity of ſome nations, as the Egyptians, Chaldeans, Chineſe, and others; and to point out the particular people, which were to be the ſeat of the church of God for many ages, and from whom the Meſſiah was to ſpring; which ſeems to be the principal view of the hiſtory of Moſes, and of this genealogy, with which ſhould be compared 1 Chron. i. 1—25. Shem, Ham and Japheth; ſee ch. v. 32. and vi. 10. and vii. 13. and ix. 18. and unto them were ſons born after the flood; for they had none born to them either before the flood or in it; they were married before the flood, for their wives went into the ark with them; but it does not appear they had any children before, though they then were near an hundred years old; and if they had, they were not in the ark, and therefore muſt periſh with the reſt, which is not likely: Shem's ſon Arphaxad was born two years after the flood, ch. x. 10. when the reſt were born, either his or his brethrens, is not ſaid, however they were all born after the flood; though ſome pretend that Canaan was born in the ark [y], during the flood, for which there is no authority; yea, it is confuted in this chapter, where Canaan ſtands among the ſons of Ham, born to him after the flood.

℣. 2. The ſons of Japheth, &c.] Who though mentioned laſt, the genealogy begins with him, by a figure which Rhetoricians call a chiaſm. The poſterity of Japheth are thoſe whom Heſiod [z] often calls Ιαπετιονιδης, Iapetionides, and him Ιαπετος, Iapetus. According to Joſephus [a], the ſons of Japheth inhabited the earth, beginning from the mountains Taurus and Amanus, and then went on in Aſia unto the river Tanais, and in Europe unto Gadira. Seven of his ſons are mentioned, and the firſt is Gomer; from whom, according to the ſame writer [b], came the Gomareans or Gomerites, in his time called by the Greeks Galatians, that is, the Gauls of Aſia minor, who inhabited Phrygia; both Gomer and Phrygia ſignifying the ſame, as Bochart [c] obſerves, and the country looking as if it was torrified or burnt; and Pliny [d] makes mention of a town in Phrygia, called Cimmeris; and the Cimmerians and Cimbri are derived by ſome from this Gomer, whom Herodotus [e] makes mention of as in Aſia and Scythia, and ſpeaks of a country called Cimmerius, and of the Cimmerian Boſphorus; and theſe ſeem to be the Gauls before mentioned, under a different name; and it is to be obſerved, that the Welſh, who ſprung from the Gauls, call themſelves to this day Cumero, or Cymro and Cumeri. It is plain from Ezekiel, xxxviii. 6. that Gomer and his people lay to the north of Judea, and the poſterity of Japheth went firſt into the northern parts of Aſia, and then ſpread themſelves into Europe: ſix more of his ſons follow, and Magog, and Madai, and Javan, and Tubal, and Meſhech, and Tiras; the firſt of theſe, Magog, was the father of a northern people which bore his name, ſee Ezek. xxxviii. 2, 15. and according to Joſephus, ſephus [f], who is generally followed, are the ſame that were called Scythians; from Madai came the Medes, often ſpoken of in ſcripture, along with the Perſians; ſo Joſephus [g] ſays, from him came the nation of Madæans, whom the Greeks call Medes; and very frequently in ſcripture the Medes go by the name of Madai, their original anceſtor; ſee Dan. v. 28. and vi. 8, 12, 15. but Mr. Mede [h] is of opinion, that Macedonia was the ſeat of this Madai, which was formerly called Æmathia; that is, as he gives the etymology of it, αια Madai, the country of Madai; but the former ſenſe is generally received. Javan is by all agreed to be the father of the Grecians; hence Alexander, king of Grecia, is, in Dan. viii. 21. called king of Javan; and one part of Greece bore the name of Ionia; and the ſea that waſhed it is called the Ionian ſea. And his poſterity are Ιαονες, Iaonians, in Homer [i], and Ariſtophanes [k]; and the Scholiaſt of the latter ſays, that the Barbarians call all Greeks Iaonians. The next ſon of Japheth is Tubal or Thobel, as Joſephus calls him, who ſays [l] the Thobelians in his time were called Iberians, a people in Aſia, that dwelt near the Euxine ſea; and in Albania was a place called Thabilaca, as may be ſeen in Ptolemy [m], and another called Thilbis, from whom might ſpring the Iberians in Europe, now called Spaniards; but Bochart [n] thinks, that the Tibarenes are the deſcendants of Tubal, a people that dwelt between the Trapezuntii and Armenia the leſs; and he wonders that this never was thought of by any; but in that he is miſtaken, for our countryman Mr. Broughton [o] makes the Tibarenes to ſpring from Tubal; and Epiphanius [p] many hundreds of years before him. Meſhech, his next ſon, is mentioned along with Tubal in Ezek. xxvii. 13. and xxxviii. 2. and xxxix. 1. from him came the Moſocheni, as Joſephus [q], who in his time were called Cappadocians, with whom there was a city then named Mazaca, ſince Cæſarea [r]; and theſe ſeem to be the ſame that Pliny [s] calls Moſcheni, who inhabited the mountains Moſchici, which were at the north-eaſt of Cappadocia. Some derive the Muſcovites from them, which is not improbable: the laſt of Japheth's ſons is Tiras or Thiras, which Jarchi interprets very wrongly by Paras, or Perſia; much better, the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem, and ſo a Jewiſh chronologer [t], by Thracia; for the deſcendants of Thiras, as Joſephus [u] obſerves, the Greeks call Thracians; and in Thrace was a river called Atyras [w], which has in it a trace of this man's name; and Odryſus, whom the Thracians worſhipped, is the ſame with Tiras, which God ſometimes goes by the name of Thuras; and is one of the names of Mars, the god of the Thracians.

℣. 3. And the ſons of Gomer, &c.] Who was the firſt of the ſons of Japheth, three of whoſe ſons are mentioned, and they are as follow: Aſhkenaz, and Riphath, and Togarmah; the firſt of theſe ſeated himſelf in the leſſer Aſia, in Pontus and Bithynia, where were ſome traces of his name in the river Aſcanius, and in the Aſcanian lake or bay; and alſo in the leſſer Phrygia or Troas, where was a city called Aſcania, and where were the Aſcanian iſles [x], and the Euxine Pontus, or Axeine [y], as it was firſt called, which is the ſea that ſeparates Aſia and Europe, and is no other than a corruption of the ſea of Aſhkenaz. It ſeems to have been near Armenia by its being mentioned along with Minni or Armenia, in Jer. li. 27. Germany is by the Jews commonly called Aſhkenaz; perhaps ſome of the poſterity of Aſhkenaz in Aſia might paſs into Europe, and Germany might be a colony of them; ſo Mr. Broughton [z] obſerves of the ſons of Gomer, that they firſt took their ſeat in Aſia, and then came north and weſt into Muſcovy and Germany. The next ſon of Gomer was Riphath. Joſephus [a] ſays, that the Riphathæans, which came from him, are the Paphlagonians, a people of Aſia minor near Pontus, ſo that he ſettled near his brother Aſhkenaz; perhaps his poſterity are the Arimphæi of Pliny [b], and the Riphæans of Mela [c], who inhabited near the Riphæan mountains, which might have their name from this ſon of Gomer, who in 1 Chron. i. 6. is called Diphath, the letters ר and ד being very ſimilar. His third ſon is called Togarmah, who had his ſeat to the north of Judea, ſee Ezek. xxxviii. 6. his poſterity are the Phrygians, according to Joſephus [d]; but ſome place them in Galatia and Cappadocia; and Strabo [e] makes mention of a people called Trocmi, on the borders of Pontus and Cappadocia; and Cicero [f] of the Trogmi or Trogini, who may have their name from hence; for the Greek interpreters always call him Torgama or Thorgana. The Jews make the Turks to be the poſterity of Togarmah. Elias Levita ſays [g], there are ſome that ſay that Togarmah is the land of Turky; and Benjamin of Tudela [h] calls a Turkiſh Sultan king of the Togarmans, that is, the Turks; and among the ten families of Togarmah, which Joſephus ben Gorion [i] ſpeaks of, the Turks are one; and perhaps this notion may not be amiſs, ſince the company of Togarmah is mentioned with Gog, or the Turk, in Ezek. xxxviii. 6. ſee the note there. The Armenians pretend to be the deſcendants of Togarmah, who, with them is the ſon of Tiras, the ſon of Gomer, by his ſon Haik, from whom they and their country, from all antiquity, have bore the name of Haik [k].

℣. 4. And the ſons of Javan, &c.] Another ſon of Japheth; four ſons of Javan are mentioned, which gave names to countries, and are as follow: Eliſhah, and Tarſhiſh, Kittim, and Dodanim; the firſt of theſe, Eliſhah, gave name to the Elyſæans, now called Æoles, as Joſephus [l] ſays; hence the country Æolia, and the Æolic dialect, all from this name; and there are many traces of it in the ſeveral parts of Greece. Hellas, a large country in it, has its name from him; ſo the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem interpret Eliſhah by Allas. Elis in Peloponneſus, Eleuſis in Attica, the river Eliſſus, or Iliſſus, and the Elyſian fields, are ſo called from him. Tarſhiſh, ſecond ſon of Javan, gave name to Tarſus, by which Cilicia was formerly called, as Joſephus ſays [m], of which the city named Tarſus was the metropolis, the birth-place of the apoſtle Paul, Acts xxii. 3. Hence the Mediterranean ſea is called Tarſhiſh, becauſe the Cilicians were maſters of it; and Tarteſſus in Spain might be a colony from them, as Broughton obſerves; and ſo Euſe- bius says, from the Tarsians are the Iberians or Spaniards; and which Bochart [n] approves of, and confirms by various evidences; and Hillerus [o] makes Tarshish to be the author of the Celtæ, that is, of the Spanish, French and German nations. The third son of Javan is Kittim, whom Josephus [p] places in the island of Cyprus, a city there being called Citium, from whence was Zeno the Citian: but rather the people that sprung from him are those whom Homer [q] calls Cetii; and are placed by Strabo [r] to the west of Cilicia, in the western parts of which are two provinces, mentioned by Ptolemy [s], the one called Cetis, the other Citis: likewise this Kittim seems to be the father both of the Macedonians and the Latines; for Alexander the great is said to come from Cittim, and Perseus king of Macedon is called king of Cittim, 1 Maccab. i. 1. and viii. 5. and Macedonia is sometimes called Macetia, as it is in Gellius [t], which has something of the name of Cittim or Cetim in it; and also the Latines or Romans seem to spring from hence, who may be thought to be meant by Cittim in Numb. xxiv. 24. Dan. xi. 30. and Eusebius says the Citians are a people, from whom came the Sabines, who also are Romans; and in Latium was a city called Cetia, as says Halicarnassensis [u]; and Bochart [w] has shewn, that Latium and Cethem signify the same, and both have their names from words that signify to hide; latium à latendo, and cethem from כתם to hide, see Jer. ii. 22. in which sense the word is frequently used in the Arabic language; and Cittim in the Jerusalem Targum is here called Italy. The last son of Javan mentioned is Dodanim; he is omitted by Josephus: his country is by the Targum of Jonathan called Dordania; and by the Jerusalem Targum Dodonia; and he and his posterity are placed by Mr. Mede in part of Peloponessus and Epirus, in which was the city of Dodona, where were the famous temple and oracle of Jupiter Dodonæus, under which name this man was worshipped. In 1 Chron. i. 7. he is called Rodanim, and in the Samaritan version here; and the word is by the Septuagint translated, Rodians; which have led some to think of the island of Rhodes as the seat, and the inhabitants of it as the posterity of this man; but Bochart [x] is of opinion, that they settled in the country now called France, gave the name to the river Rhodanus, and called the adjacent country Rhodanusia, and where formerly was a city of that name, much about the same tract where now stands Marseilles; but this seems too remote for a son of Javan.

ver. 5. By these were the isles of the Gentiles divided in their lands, &c.] That is, by those sons of Japheth before mentioned; and by isles are meant, not countries surrounded with water, for the isles in this sense would not have been sufficient for the posterity of Japheth; nor can it be thought they would leave the continent, where there was room enough for them, and go into islands; and besides must have found it difficult to get there, when shipping and navigation were little known: but it is usual with the Hebrews, of whom Moses, the writer of this history, was, to call all places beyond the Mediterranean sea, or whatsoever they went to by sea, or that were upon the sea-coasts, islands, as Greece, Italy, &c. Moreover, the word sometimes signifies countries, as it does in Job xxii. 30. Isa. xx. 6. and so should be rendered here, as it is by some [y], the countries of the Gentiles; so called, because in the times of Moses, and at the writing of this history, those countries were inhabited by heathens and idolaters, strangers to the true religion: and this division was not made at random, and at the pleasure of a rude company of men, but in an orderly, regular manner, with the consent and by the advice and direction of the principal men of those times; and especially it was directed by the wise providence of the most High, who divided to the nations their inheritance, and set the bounds of the people, Deut. xxxii. 8. every one after his tongue, after their families in their nations; this shews, that what is said concerning the division of countries to the sons of Japheth is by way of anticipation; and that though thus related, was not done till after the confusion of languages, since the partition was made according to the different languages of men; those that were of the same language went and dwelt together, the several nations of them, and the several families in those nations; by which it appears that this was done by consultation, with great care and wisdom, ranging the people according to their tongues; of which nations were formed, and with them were taken the several families they consisted of.

ver. 6. And the sons of Ham, &c.] Next to the sons of Japheth, the sons of Ham are reckoned; these Josephus [z] says possessed the land from Syria, and the mountains of Amanus and Lebanon; laying hold on whatever was towards the sea, claiming to themselves the countries unto the ocean, whose names, some of them, are entirely lost, and others so greatly changed and deflected into other tongues, that they can scarcely be known, and few whose names are preserved entire; and the same observation will hold good of others. Four of the sons of Ham are mentioned, Cush, and Mizraim, and Phut, and Canaan; the first of these, Cush, Josephus [a] says has suffered no loss by time; for the Ethiopians, whose prince he was, are to this day by themselves, and all in Asia, called Chusæans: but though this word Cush, as used in scripture, is generally rendered by us Ethiopia, this must not be understood of Ethiopia in Africa, but in Arabia; and indeed is always to be understood of one part of Arabia, and which was near to the land of Judea; so Moses's wife is called an Ethiopian, when she was an Arabian, or of Midian, Numb. xii. 1. Exod. ii. 16, 21. and Chusan and Midian are mentioned together, Hab. iii. 7. see 2 Kings xix. 9. 2 Chron. xiv. 9. and Bochart [b] has shewn by various arguments, that the land of Cush was Arabia; and so the Targum of Jonathan interprets it here Arabia. There was a city called Cutha in Erac, a province in the country of Babylon [c], where Nimrod the son of Cush settled, which probably was called so from his father's name. Here the eastern writers say [d] Abraham was born, and is the same place mentioned in 2 Kings xvii. 24. 30. The second son of Ham was Mizraim, the same with the Misor of Sanchoniatho [e], and the Menes of Herodotus [f], the first king of Egypt, and the builder of the city of Memphis in Egypt, called by the Turks to this day Mitzir [g]. Mitzraim is a name by which Egypt is frequently called in scripture, and this man was the father of the Egyptians; and because Egypt was inhabited by a son of of Ham, it is ſometimes called the land of Ham, Pſ. cv. 23, 27. The word is of the dual number, and ſerves to expreſs Egypt by, which was divided into two parts, lower and upper Egypt. Joſephus ſays [h], we call Egypt Meſtres, and all the Egyptians that inhabit it, Meſtræans; ſo the country is called by Cedrenus [i], Meſtre; and Kairo, a principal city in it, is to this day by the Arabians called Al-meſſer, as Dr. Shaw [k] relates. The third ſon of Ham is Phut; of whom Joſephus [l] ſays, that he founded Libya, calling the inhabitants of it after his name, Phuteans; and obſerves, that there is a river in the country of the Moors of his name; and that many of the Greek hiſtorians, who make mention of this river, alſo make mention of a country adjacent to it, called Phute: mention is made of this river as in Mauritania, both by Pliny [m] and Ptolemy [n], and by the latter of a city called Putea: this Phut is the Apollo Pythius of the heathens, as ſome think. The laſt ſon of Ham is Canaan, the father of the Canaanites, a people well known in ſcripture. Concerning theſe ſons of Ham, there is a famous fragment of Eupolemus preſerved in Euſebius [o]; and is this "the Babylonians ſay, that the firſt was Belus, "called Cronus or Saturn (that is, Noah) and of "him was begotten another Belus and Chanaan (it "ſhould be read Cham) and he (i. e. Ham) begat "Chanaan, the father of the Phœnicians; and of him "another ſon Chus was begotten, whom the Greeks "call Aſſolos, the father of the Ethiopians, and the "brother of Meſtraim, the father of the Egyptians."

℣. 7. The ſons of Cuſh, &c.] The firſt-born of Ham, who had five ſons, next mentioned, beſides Nimrod, ſpoken of afterwards by himſelf: Seba, and Havilah, and Sabtah, and Raamah, and Sabtecha; the firſt of theſe is Seba, the founder of the Sabæans, according to Joſephus [p], a people ſeated in Arabia deſerta, which ſeem to be the Sabæans brought from the wilderneſs, Ezek. xxiii. 42. and very probably the ſame that plundered Job of his cattle, ch. i. 14, 15. The ſecond ſon is Havilah, who, as Joſephus [q] ſays, was the father of the Evilæans, now called Getuli; but the poſterity of Havilah ſeem to be the ſame, whom Strabo [r] calls Chaulotæans, and whom he ſpeaks of along with the Nabatæans and Agræans, a people near Arabia felix; and by Pliny [s] they are called Chavelæans, and whom he ſpeaks of as Arabians, and places them to the eaſt of the Arabian Scenites. The third ſon is Sabtah; from him, Joſephus [t] ſays came the Sabathenes, who by the Greeks are called Aſtabari: the poſterity of this man ſeemed to have ſettled in ſome part of Arabia felix, ſince Ptolemy [u] makes mention of Sabbatha as the metropolis of that country, called by Pliny [w] Sabotale, or rather Sabota, as it ſhould be read; Ptolemy places another city in this country he calls Saphtha, which ſeems to have its name from this man. The fourth ſon is Raamah or Ragmas, as Joſephus calls [x] him, from whom ſprung the Ragmæans he ſays; and moſt of the ancients call him Rhegmah, the letter y being pronounced as a G, as in Gaza and Gomorrah: his poſterity were alſo ſeated in Arabia felix, near the Perſian gulph, where Ptolemy [y] places the city Rhegama, or as it is in the Greek text, Regma. The fifth ſon is Sabtecha, whom ſome make to be the father of a people in the ſame country Arabia felix, near the Perſian gulph, called Sachalitæ; but Dr. Wells [z] thinks, that the deſcendants of this man might be from him regularly enough ſtiled at firſt by the Greeks, Sabtaceni, which name might be afterwards ſoftened into Saraceni; by which name it is well known, the people of the northern parts of Arabia, where he places the deſcendants of this man, were formerly denominated; tho' Bochart [a] carries them into Carmania in Perſia, there being a ſhort cut over the ſtraits of the Perſian gulph, out of Arabia thither, where he finds a city called Samydace, and a river Samydachus, which he thinks may come from Sabtecha, the letters B and M being frequently changed, as Berodach is called Merodach, and Abana, Amana, and ſo in other names. And the ſons of Raamah, Sheba, and Dedan: no account is given of any of the poſterity of the other ſons of Cuſh, only of this his 4th ſon Raamah, who is ſaid to have two ſons; the firſt is called Sheba, from whom came the Sabæans, according to Joſephus [b]; not the Sabæans before mentioned in Arabia deſerta, but thoſe in Arabia felix, where Pomponius Mela [c] and Strabo [d] ſeat a people called Sabæans, and whoſe country abounded with frankincenſe, myrrh and cinnamon; the latter makes mention of a city of theirs called Mariaba, and ſeems to be the ſame that is now called Mareb, and formerly Saba [e], very likely from this man. The other ſon Dedan, is called by Joſephus [f] Judadas, whom he makes to be founder of the Judadæans, a nation of the weſtern Ethiopians; but the poſterity of this man moſt probably ſettled in Arabia, and yet are to be diſtinguiſhed from the Dedanim in Iſ. xxi. 13. who were Arabians alſo, but deſcended from Dedan the ſon of Jokſhan, a ſon of Abraham by Keturah, Gen. xxv. 3. as well as from the inhabitants of Dedan in Edom, Jer. xxv. 3. and xlix. 8. it is obſerved, that near the city Regma before mentioned, on the ſame coaſt eaſtward, was another city called Dedan; and to this day Daden, from which the neighbouring country alſo takes its name, as Bochart [g] has obſerved, from Barboza, an Italian writer in his deſcription of the kingdom of Ormuz; ſo that we need not doubt, ſays Dr. Wells [h], but that here was the ſettlement of Dedan the ſon of Raamah or Rhegma, and brother of Sheba.

℣. 8. And Cuſh begat Nimrod, &c.] Beſides the other five ſons before mentioned; and probably this was his youngeſt ſon, being mentioned laſt; or however he is reſerved to this place, becauſe more was to be ſpoken of him than of any of the reſt. Sir Walter Raleigh [i] thinks that Nimrod was begotten by Cuſh after his other children were become fathers, and of a later time than ſome of his grandchildren and nephews; and indeed the ſons of Raamah, the fourth ſon of Cuſh, are taken notice of before him: however, the Arabic writers [k] muſt be wrong, who make him to be the ſon of Canaan, whereas it is ſo clear and expreſs from hence, that he was the ſon of Cuſh. In the Greek verſion he is called Nebrod, and by Joſephus, Nebrodes, which is a name of Bacchus; and indeed Nimrod is the ſame with the Bacchus of the heathens, for Bacchus is no other than Bar-chus, the ſon of Cuſh; and Jacchus, which is another of his names, names in Jah of Cush, or the God the ſon of Cush; and it is with reſpect to his original name Nebrod, or Nebrodes, that Bacchus is repreſented as cloathed with the ſkin of νεβρις, nebris, or a young hind, as were alſo his prieſts; and ſo in his name Nimrod, there may be an alluſion to נמרא, Nimra, which, in the Chaldee language, ſignifies a tyger, and which kind of creatures, with others, he might hunt; tygers drew in the chariot of Bacchus, and he was ſometimes cloathed with the ſkin of one; though the name of Nimrod is uſually derived from מרד, to rebel, becauſe he was a rebel againſt God, as is generally ſaid; and becauſe, as Jarchi obſerves, he cauſed all the world to rebel againſt God, by the advice he gave to the generation of the diviſion, or confuſion of languages, the builders of Babel: he ſeems to be the ſame with Belus, the founder of Babel and of the Babylonian empire, whom Diodorus Siculus [l] confounds with Ninus his ſon: he began to be a mighty man in the earth; that is, he was the firſt that formed a plan of government, and brought men into ſubjection to it: and ſo the Jews [m] make him to be the firſt king after God; for of the ten kings they ſpeak of in the world, God is the firſt, and Nimrod the ſecond; and ſo the Arabic writers [n] ſay, he was the firſt of the kings that were in the land of Babylon; and that, ſeeing the figure of a crown in the heaven, he got a golden one made like it, and put it on his head; hence it was commonly reported, that the crown deſcended to him from heaven; for this refers not to his gigantic ſtature, as if he was a giant, as the Septuagint render it; or a ſtrong robuſt man, as Onkelos; nor to his moral character, as the Targum of Jonathan, which is, "he began to be mighty in ſin, "and to rebel before the Lord in the earth;" but to his civil character, as a ruler and governor: he was the firſt that reduced bodies of people and various cities into one form of government, and became the head of them; either by force and uſurpation, or it may be with the conſent of the people, through his perſuaſion of them, and on account of the mighty and heroic actions done by him.

ver. 9. He was a mighty hunter before the Lord, &c.] Which might be literally true; for, from the time of the flood to his days, wild beaſts might increaſe very much, and greatly annoy men who dwelt very likely for the moſt part in tents ſcattered up and down in divers places: ſo that he did a good office in hunting and deſtroying them. An Arabic writer [o], of ſome authority in the eaſtern parts, ſays, that by hunting he got food ſufficient for the builders of Babel, whilſt they were employed therein; and Aben Ezra interprets it in his favour, that he built altars, and the creatures he took in hunting he offered them on them a burnt-offering to God. But neither of theſe is probable; however, it may be obſerved, that in this way by hunting he arrived to the power and dominion over men he afterwards had; for not only he ingratiated himſelf into their favour by hunting down and deſtroying the wild beaſts which moleſted them, but by theſe means he might gather together a large number of young men, ſtrong and robuſt, to join him in hunting; whereby they were inured to hardſhips, and trained up to military exerciſes, and were taught the way of deſtroying men as well as beaſts; and by whoſe help and aſſiſtance he might arrive to the government he had over men; and hunting, according to Ariſtotle [p], is a part of the military art, which is to be uſed both on beaſts and on ſuch men who are made to be ruled, but are not willing; and it appears, from Xenophon [q], that the Kings of Perſia were fitted for war and government by hunting, and which is ſtill reckoned in many countries a part of royal education. And it may be remarked, that, as Nimrod and Bacchus are the ſame, as before obſerved, one of the titles of Bacchus is Ζαϛρευς, an hunter. Cedrenus [r] ſays, that the Aſſyrians deified Nebrod, or Nimrod, and placed him among the conſtellations of heaven, and called him Orion; the ſame firſt diſcovered the art of hunting, therefore they joined to Orion the ſtar called the dog-ſtar. However, beſides his being in a literal ſenſe an hunter, he was in a figurative ſenſe one, a tyrannical ruler and governor of men. The Targum of Jonathan is, "he was a powerful rebel before the Lord;" and that of Jeruſalem, "he was powerful in hunting in ſin before the Lord:" and another Jewiſh writer [s] ſays, he was called a mighty hunter, becauſe he was all his days taking provinces by force, and ſpoiling others of their ſubſtance; and that he was before the Lord, truly ſo, and he ſeeing and taking notice of it, openly and publickly, and without fear of him, and in a bold and impudent manner, in deſpite of him, ſee Gen. vi. 11. and xiii. 13. The Septuagint render it, againſt the Lord; he intended, as Jarchi's note is, to provoke him to his face: wherefore it is ſaid, in a proverbial way, when any man is grown mighty and powerful, or is notoriouſly wicked, or is become a tyrant and an oppreſſor of the people, that he is even as Nimrod the mighty hunter before the Lord. This was a proverb uſed in the times of Moſes, as it is common now with us to call a hunter Nimrod.

ver. 10. And the beginning of his kingdom was Babel, &c.] The city of Babel, or Babylon, which was built by his direction; for though Babylon is by ſome writers ſaid to be built by Semiramis, the wife of Ninus, and others by Ninus himſelf, yet the trueſt account is, that it was built by Belus, the ſame with Nimrod. Curtius [t] ſays, Semiramis built it; or, as moſt believe, adds he, Belus, whoſe royal palace is ſhewn: and Beroſus [u], the Chaldean, blames the Greek writers for aſcribing it to Semiramis; and Abydenus [w], out of Megaſthenes, affirms, that Belus ſurrounded Babylon with a wall: however, this was the head of the kingdom of Nimrod, as Onkelos renders it, or his chief city, or where he firſt began to reign. Here he ſet up his kingdom, which he enlarged and extended afterwards to other places; and from hence it appears, that what is related in this context concerning Nimrod, is by way of anticipation; for it was not a fact that he was a mighty man, or a powerful prince poſſeſſed of a kingdom, until after the building of Babel, and the confuſion of languages there; when thoſe that continued on the ſpot either choſe him for their ruler, or he, by power or policy, got the dominion over them. Artapanus [x], an heathen writer, relates, that the giants which inhabited Babylon being taken away by the gods for their impiety, one of them, Belus, eſcaped death and dwelt in Babylon, and took up his abode in the tower which he had raiſed up, and which, from him the founder of it, was called called Belus; ſo that this, as Moſes ſays, was the beginning of his kingdom, together with Erech, and Accad, and Calneh, in the land of Shinar, where the city and tower of Babel were built: for of theſe four cities, which were all in the ſame country, did the kingdom of Nimrod conſiſt; they all, either by force or by conſent, were brought into ſubjection to him, and were under one form of government, and is the firſt kingdom known to be ſet up in the world. Erech, according to the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem, is Hades, or Edeſſa, a city in Meſopotamia; but it is rather thought to be the ſame with the Aracca of Ptolemy [y], and the Arecha of Marcellinus [z], placed by them both in Suſiana; though one would think it ſhould be that city in Chaldea which took its preſent Arabic name of Erak from Erech: the Arabic writers ſay [a], when Irac or Erac is abſolutely put, it denotes Babylonia, or Chaldea, in the land of Shinar; and they ſay that Shinar is in Al-Erac. The next city, Accad, according to the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem, is Netzibin, or Niſibis, a city in Meſopotamia; in the Septuagint verſion it is called Archad; and Cteſias [b] relates, that at the Perſian Sittace was a river called Argad, which Bochart [c] thinks carries in it a manifeſt trace of this name; and obſerves, from Strabo [d], that that part of Babylon neareſt to Suſa was called Sitacena. And the other city, Calneh, according to the above Targums, is Cteſiphon, and is generally thought to be the place intended, and was a town upon the Tigris, near to Seleucia in Babylon; it was firſt called Chalone, and its name was changed to Cteſiphon by Pacorus, king of the Perſians. It is in Iſaiah x. 9. called Calno, and by the Septuagint verſion there Chalane, which adds, "where the tower was built;" and from whence the country called the Chalonitis by Pliny [e] had its name, the chief city of which was Cteſiphon; and who ſays [f], Chalonitis is joined with Cteſiphon. Thus far goes the account of Nimrod; and, though no mention is made of his death, yet ſome writers are not ſilent about it. Abulpharagius [g], an Arabic writer, ſays, he died in the tower of Babel, it being blown down by ſtormy winds; the Jewiſh writers ſay [h], he was killed by Eſau for the ſake of his coat, which was Adam's, and came to Noah, and from him to Ham, and ſo to Nimrod. When he began his reign, and how long he reigned, is not certain; we have only ſome fabulous accounts: according to Beroſus [i], he began to reign 131 years after the flood, and reigned 56 years, and then diſappeared, being tranſlated by the gods: and, indeed, the authors of the Univerſal Hiſtory place the beginning of his reign in the year of the flood 131, and 30 years after the diſperſion at Babylon [k]; and who relate, that the Eaſtern writers ſpeak of his reign as very long: a Perſian writer gives his name a Perſian derivation, as if it was Nemurd, that is, immortal, on account of his long reign of above 150 years: and ſome of the Mahommedan hiſtorians ſay, he reigned in Al-Sowad, that is, the black country, 400 years [l].

℣. 11. Out of that land went forth Aſhur, &c.] It is a queſtion whether Aſhur is the name of a man or of a country; ſome take it in the latter ſenſe, and render the words, and out of that land he went forth into Aſſyria; ſo Onkelos; and in this way go Junius and Tremellius, Piſcator, Bochart, Cocceius, and others, and the margin of our bible, and interpret it of Nimrod; and the Targum of Jonathan is expreſs for him, which is this: "out of that land "went forth Nimrod, and reigned in Aſſyria, be- "cauſe he would not be in the counſel of the ge- "neration of the diviſion, and he left four cities; "and the Lord gave him therefore a place (or Aſ- "ſyria) and he built four other cities, Nineveh, "&c." ſo Theophilus of Antioch ſays [m] that Nebroth (Nimrod) built the ſame; but then the generality of interpreters which take this way give another and better reaſon for Nimrod's going out of Shinar or Babylon into Aſſyria than the Targumiſt gives; which is, that, not content with his own dominions, and willing to enlarge them, he went out and made war upon Aſſyria, and ſeized upon it, and built cities in it, and added them to his former ones; in favour of this ſenſe it is urged, that Moſes is ſpeaking of what Nimrod the ſon of Cuſh did, of the line of Ham, and not of the ſons of Shem, among whom Aſhur was; and that it is not probable he ſhould introduce a paſſage relating to a branch of Shem, when he is profeſſedly writing about that of Ham; nor is it agreeable to the hiſtory to ſpeak of what Aſhur did, before any mention of his birth, which is in ℣. 22. nor was it peculiar to him to go out of the land of Shinar, ſince almoſt all were diſperſed from thence; add to which, that Aſſyria is called the land of Nimrod, Mic. v. 6. to which it may be replied, that parentheſes of this ſort are frequent in ſcripture, ſee 2 Sam. iv. 4. 1 Kings x. 11, 12. beſides, it ſeems appoſite enough, when treating of Nimrod's dominion and power, in order to ſhew his intolerable tyranny, to remark, that it was ſuch, that Aſhur, a ſon of Shem, could not bear it, and therefore went out from a country he had a right unto; and as for the text in Mic. v. 6. the land of Nimrod and the land of Aſſyria are manifeſtly diſtinguiſhed from one another: add to this, that, if Nimrod ſo early made a conqueſt of Aſſyria, it would rather have been called by his own name than his uncle's; and it is allowed by all that the country of Aſſyria had its name from Aſhur, the ſon of Shem; and who ſo likely to have founded Nineveh and other cities as himſelf? Beſides theſe, interpreters are obliged to force the text, and inſert the particle into, which is not in it; and the order and conſtruction of the words are more natural and agreeable to the original, as in our verſion and others, which make Aſhur the name of a man, than this, which makes it a country: but then it is not agreed on who this Aſhur was; ſome will have him to be of the poſterity of Ham, and a ſon of Nimrod, as Epiphanius [n] and Chryſoſtom [o]; but this is not probable, nor can any proof be given of it; Joſephus [p] is expreſs for it, that Aſhur, the ſon of Shem, built Nineveh, and gave the name of Aſſyrians to thoſe that were ſubject to him. The reaſon of his going out from Shinar, as given by Jarchi, is, when he ſaw his ſons hearkening to Nimrod, and rebelling againſt the Lord, by building a tower, he went out from them; or it may be, he was drove out by Nimrod by force, or he could not bear his tyrannical government, or live where ſuch a wicked man ruled: and as Nimrod built cities and ſet up an empire, Aſhur did the ſame, in his own defence and and that of his poſterity: and builded Nineveh, and the city Rehoboth, and Calah. The firſt of theſe cities, Nineveh, the Greeks commonly call Ninus, is placed by Strabo [q] in Atyria, the Chaldee name of Aſſyria, who generally ſuppoſe it had its name from Ninus, whom Diodorus Siculus [r] makes the firſt king of the Aſſyrians, and to whom he aſcribes the building of this city; and who one would think ſhould be Aſhur, and that Ninus was another name of him, or however by which he went among the Greeks; and ſo this city was called after him; or rather it had its name from the beauty of it, the word ſignifying a beautiful habitation, as Cocceius [s] and Hillerus [t] give the etymology of it; or perhaps, when it was firſt built by him, it had another name, but afterwards was called Nineveh, from Ninus, who lived many years after him, who might repair, adorn, and beautify it. It was deſtroyed by the Medes and Babylonians, as foretold by Nahum, and it is difficult now to ſay where it ſtood; the place where it is ſuppoſed to have been, is now called Moſul; of which place Rauwolff [u] ſays, who was there in 1574, that "there are ſome very good buildings and "ſtreets in it, and it is pretty large, but very ill "provided with walls and ditches;—beſides this, I "alſo ſaw, ſays he, juſt without the town, a little "hill, that was almoſt quite dug through, and in"habited by poor people, where I ſaw them ſeve"ral times creep in and out as piſmires in ant"hills: in this place, or thereabouts, ſtood for"merly the potent town of Nineveh, built by "Aſhur, which was the metropolis of Aſſyria;— "at this time there is nothing of antiquities to be "ſeen in it, ſave only the fort that lieth upon "the hill, and ſome few villages, which the in"habitants ſay did alſo belong to it in former days. "This town lieth on the confines of Armenia, in a "large plain:" ſee the notes on Jonah i. 2. and iii. 1—3. and on Nahum i. 8. The next city, Rehoboth, ſignifies ſtreets, and ſo it is rendered in the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem; and, becauſe in the Chaldee language ſtreets are called Beritha, Bochart [w] thinks that this Rehoboth is the city which Ptolemy [x] calls Birtha, on the weſt of Tigris, at the mouth of the river Lycus, though he places it by Euphrates; wherefore it ſhould rather be Oroba, he places at the river Tigris [y], near to Nineveh alſo. The laſt city, Calah, or Calach, was a principal city in the country, by Ptolemy [z] called Calacine, and by Strabo [a] Calachene, and mentioned by both along with Adiabene, a country in Aſſyria.

℣. 12. And Reſen, between Nineveh and Calah, &c.] This was another city built by Aſhur, ſituated between thoſe two cities mentioned: the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem call it Talſar, or Thalaſſar, ſee Iſ. xxxvii. 12. The conjecture of Bochart [b] is more probable, that it is the Lariſſa of Xenophon, ſituated on the Tigris; though Junius thinks it is either Baſſora, or Belcina, which Ptolemy [c] places on the Tigris, near Nineveh: the ſame is a great city; which Jarchi interprets of Nineveh, called a great city, and was indeed one, being 60 miles in circumference, Jon. i. 2. and iii. 3. but the conſtruction of the words carries it to Reſen, which might be the greateſt city when firſt built; and if underſtood of Lariſſa, was a great city, the walls of it being 100 feet high, and the breadth 25, and the compaſs of it 8 miles. Benjamin of Tudela [d] ſays, that in his time Reſen was called Gebidagan, and was a great city, in which were 5000 Iſraelites; but, according to Schmidt, this refers to all the cities in a coalition, Nineveh, Rehoboth, Calah, and Reſen, which all made that great city Nineveh; or were a Tetrapolis, as Tripoli was anciently three cities, built by the joint intereſt of the Aradians, Sidonians, and Tyrians, as Diodorus Siculus [e] relates.

℣. 13. And Mizraim begat Ludim, &c.] Mizraim was the ſecond ſon of Ham, of whom ſee the note on ℣. 6. Ludim he is ſaid to beget, the word being plural, is not the name of a man, but of his poſterity; and the ſenſe is, that Mizraim begat the father of the Ludim, whoſe name very probably was Lud, which name is preſerved in Iſ. lxvi. 19. Theſe Ludim are the ſame with the Lydians, Jer. xlvi. 9. and whoſe country is called Lydia, Ezek. xxx. 5. but to be diſtinguiſhed from Lydia in Aſia Minor, and the Lydians there, who ſprung from Lud, a ſon of Shem, ℣. 22. for, as theſe ſprung from Mizraim, the founder of Egypt, they muſt be ſomewhere thereabout; and Bochart [f] has proved, by various arguments, that they are the Ethiopians in Africa, now called Abyſſines, whoſe country lies to the ſouth of Egypt, a people formerly famous for archery, as Lud and the Lydians are ſaid to be, Iſ. lxvi. 19. and Jer. xlvi. 9. and whoever reads the accounts Diodorus Siculus [g] gives of the Egyptians and Ethiopians, will eaſily diſcern a likeneſs between them, and that the one ſprung from the other; both deifying their kings; ſhewing a like carefulneſs about their funerals; both uſing hieroglyphicks; having the like order of prieſts, who uſed ſhaving; and circumciſion was common to them both, as Herodotus obſerves [h]: and Anamim, and Lehabim, and Naphtuhim: the name of the father of the Anamim very probably was Anam, though we have no account of him elſewhere: according to Hillerus [i], the Anamim were called ſo from the paſtoral life they led; and, by a tranſpoſition of letters, were the ſame with the Mæonians, who inhabited that tract of land in Aſia which was waſhed by the river Mæonia, or Mæander, and bordered on Lydia; but, as theſe were the deſcendants of Mizraim, they muſt be ſought for ſomewhere about Egypt: much better therefore does Mr. Broughton [k] take them to be the Nubians and Numidians, which were near both Egypt and Ethiopia; though Bochart [m] ſeems to be righteſt, in making them to be the Ammonians, who Herodotus ſays were a colony of the Egyptians and Ethiopians; theſe lived about Ammon and Naſamonitis, and in that part of Lybia in which the temple of Jupiter Ammon ſtood, and are the Nomades, that lived a paſtoral life; and Bochart thinks they are called Anamim, from Anam, which, in the Arabic language, ſignifies a ſheep, becauſe they fed ſheep, and lived upon them, and cloathed themſelves with their ſkins. The word Lehabim, the name of another people from Mizraim, ſignifies flames; and were ſo called, as Jarchi obſerves, becauſe their faces were like flames, ſee Iſ. xiii. 8. burnt with the heat of the ſun, living near the torrid zone; and therefore could not be the Lycians, as Hillerus [n] thinks, the inhabitants of a country in Aſia, between Caria and Pamphylia, formerly called Lycia, now Aidimelli, which he obſerves abounds with places that have their names from fire and flames, as mount Chimæra, the cities Hephæſtium, phæſtium, Myra, Lemyra, Habeſſus, Telmeſſus, Balbura, and Sirbis; but theſe were too far from Egypt, near which it is more probable the Lehabim were, and ſeem to be the ſame with the Lubim, which came with Shiſhak out of Egypt to invade Judea, 2 Chron. xii. 3. and who were called Lybians, Jer. xlvi. 9. and their country Lybia, Ezek. xxx. 5. of which Leo Africanus [n] ſays, that it is a deſart, dry and ſandy, having neither fountains nor ſprings; which was near Egypt as well as Ethiopia, with which it is joined in the above place, ſee Acts ii. 10. The word Naphtuhim, the name of another people that ſprung from Mizraim, according to Hillerus [o], ſignifies open; and he thinks they are the Pamphylians, who uſed to admit promiſcuouſly all into their ports and towns, which were open to all ſtrangers, and even robbers, for the ſake of commerce; but, as theſe were a people in leſſer Aſia, they cannot be the people here meant. Bochart [p] obſerves, from Plutarch, that the Egyptians uſed to call the extreme parts of a country, and abrupt places and mountains adjoining to the ſea, Nepthys, the ſame with Nephthuah; and therefore he is of opinion, that theſe Naphtuhim dwelt on the ſhores of the Mediterranean ſea, near Egypt, in Marmorica; not far from whence was the temple of Aptuchus, mentioned by Ptolemy [q], and placed by him in Cyrene, which carries in it ſome trace of the name of Naphtuhim; and he ſuſpects that Neptune had his name from hence, he being a Lybian god, as Herodotus [r] ſays; for none ever uſed his name before the Lybians, who always honoured him as a god: and it may be obſerved, from Strabo [s], that many of the temples of Neptune were on the ſea-ſhore. Some place theſe people about Memphis, the name of which was Noph, Iſ. xix. 13. but perhaps it may be much better to place them in the country of Nepate, between Syene and Meroe, where Candace, queen of Ethiopia, had her royal palace in the times of Strabo [t].

℣. 14. And Pathruſim, &c.] Theſe are other deſcendants of Mizraim, the name of whoſe father very probably was Pathros, from whom the country of Pathros was called, and which is not only ſpoken of in ſcripture along with Egypt, but as a part of it, Iſ. xi. 11. Jer. xliv. 1. Ezek. xxix. 14. and theſe Pathruſim were doubtleſs the inhabitants of it; which, as Bochart [u] has ſhewn, is no other than Thebais, or the upper Egypt. Hillerus [w] takes the word to be compounded of פאת and רוסים, and renders it the corner of the Roſians, and makes it to be the ſame with the bay of Iſſus, where was a colony of Egypt, called Cilicians; but the former is more probable. And Caſluhim; theſe alſo were the poſterity of Mizraim, by another ſon of his, from whence they had their name: according to Hillerus [x], they are the Solymi, a people near the Lycians and Piſidians, that came out of Egypt and ſettled in thoſe parts; but it is much more likely that they were, as Junius [y] obſerves, the inhabitants of Caſiotis, a country mentioned by Ptolemy [z] in lower Egypt, at the entrance of it, where ſtood mount Caſius: but Bochart [a] is of opinion, that they are the Colchi, the inhabitants of the country now called Mingrelia, and which, though at a diſtance from Egypt, the antient inhabitants came from thence, as appears from ſeveral antient authors of good credit, as the above learned writer ſhews. Out of whom came Philiſtim, or the Philiſtines, a people often ſpoken of in ſcripture; theſe ſprung from the Caſluhim, or were a branch of that people; according to Ben Melech they ſprung both from them and from the Pathruſim; for Jarchi ſays they changed wives with one another, and ſo the Philiſtines ſprung from them both; or theſe were a colony that departed from them, and ſettled elſewhere, as the Philiſtines did in the land of Canaan, from whence that part of it which they inhabited was called Paleſtine: and, if the Caſluhim dwelt in Caſiotis, at the entrance of Egypt, as before obſerved, they lay near the land of Canaan, and could eaſily paſs into it. Some think this clauſe refers not to what goes before, but to what follows after, and Caphtorim, and read the whole verſe thus: and Pathruſim, and Caſluhim, and Capthtorim, out of whom came Philiſtim; that is, they came out of the Caphtorim. What has led to ſuch a tranſpoſition of the words in the text is Amos ix. 7. and the Philiſtines from Caphtor: but though they are ſaid to be brought from a place called Caphtor, yet did not ſpring from the Caphtorim: to me it rather ſeems, that the two latter were brothers, and both ſprung from the Caſluhim; ſince the words may be rendered without a parentheſis: and Caſluhim, out of whom came Philiſtim and Caphtorim; though perhaps it may be beſt of all to conſider the two laſt as the ſame, and the words may be read, out of whom came Philiſtim, even, or that is, the Caphtorim; for the Philiſtines, in the times of Jeremiah, are ſaid to be the remnant of the country of Caphtor, Jer. xlvii. 4. and as in Amos the Philiſtines are ſaid to come out of Caphtor, in Deut. ii. 23. they are called Caphtorim, that came out of Caphtor, who deſtroyed the Avim, which dwelt in Hazerim, even unto Azzah, or Gaza, afterwards a principal city of the Philiſtines; for then, and not before their ſettlement in the land of Canaan, were they ſo called; for the word Philiſtim ſignifies ſtrangers, people of another country; and the Septuagint verſion always ſo renders the word: their true original name ſeems to be Caphtorim. Bochart [b] indeed will have the Caphtorim to be the Cappadocians, that dwelt near Colchis, about Trapezunt, where he finds a place called Side, which in Greek ſignifies a pomegranate, as Caphtor does in Hebrew; and ſo Hillerus [c] takes it for a name of the Cappadocians, who inhabited כפת הור, Cappath Hor, or the ſide of mount Hor, or כף התור, the ſide of mount Taurus; and in this they both follow the Jewiſh Targumiſts, who every where render Caphtorim by Cappadocians, as the three Targums do here, and Caphtor by Cappadocia, and as Jonathan on Deut. ii. 23. Jer. xlvii. 4. and Amos ix. 7. but then thereby they underſtood a people and place in Egypt, even Damietta, the ſame they ſuppoſe with Peluſium; for other Jewiſh writers ſay [d], Caphutkia, or Cappadocia, is Caphtor, and in the Arabic language Damietta: ſo Benjamin of Tudela ſays [e], in two days I came to Damietta, this is Caphtor; and it ſeems pretty plain, that Caphtor muſt be ſome place in Egypt, as Coptus, or ſome other, and that the Caphtorim, or Philiſtines, were originally Egyptians, ſince they deſcended from Mizraim.

℣. 15. And Canaan begat Sidon his firſt-born, &c.] Canaan is the fourth ſon of Ham; the poſterity of Phut, his third ſon, are omitted: the firſt-born of Canaan Canaan was Sidon, from whom the city of Sidon had its name, being either built by himself, who called it after his own name, or by some of his posterity, who called it so in memory of their ancestor: it was a very ancient city, more antient than Tyre, for that was built by the Sidonians; Homer makes mention of it, but not of Tyre: it is now called Said, as it was in the times of Benjamin of Tudela [c]. Justin [f] says it had its name from the plenty of fish on its coasts; but, since Canaan had a son of this name, it was no doubt so called from him. And Heth; the father of the Hittites, who dwelt about Hebron, on the south of the land of Canaan; for when Sarah died, the sons of Heth were in possession of it, Gen. xxiii. 2, 3. of this race were the Anakim, or giants, drove out from hence by Caleb, Numb. xiii. 22. Josh. xv. 14. and these Hittites became terrible to men in after-times, as appears from 2 Kings vii. 6. hence חתת signifies to terrify, affright, and throw into a consternation.

℣. 16. And the Jebusite, &c.] Who had their name from Jebus, a third son of Canaan, and from whom Jerusalem was called Jebus, Judg. xix. 10. and where his posterity continued to dwell when the land of Canaan was possessed by the Israelites; for they were so strong and powerful, that the men of Judah could not drive them out from thence, and here they remained until the times of David, who dispossessed them of it, Josh. xv. 63. 2 Sam. v. 6, 7, 8. There is an island near Spain formerly called Ebusus, now Ibissa, where was one of the colonies of the Phœnicians, in which Bochart [g] observes the name of the Jebusites is thought to remain. And the Emorite; so called from Emor, the fourth son of Canaan, commonly called the Amorite, a people so strong and mighty, that they are compared to cedars for height, and to oaks for strength, Amos ii. 9. they dwelt both on this and the other side Jordan: Sihon, one of their kings, made war on the king of Moab, and took all his country from him unto Arnon, Numb. xxi. 26. and in the times of Joshua there were several kings of the Amorites, which dwelt on the side of Jordan westward, Josh. v. 1. hence it may be Amor in the Arabic tongue signifying to command, and Emir a commander. And the Girgasite; the same with the Gergesene in Matt. viii. 28. who, in the times of Christ, lived about Gerasa, or Gadara: a Jewish writer [h] says, that when they left their country to Israel, being forced to it by Joshua, they went into a country which to this day is called Gurgestan.

℣. 17. And the Hivite, &c.] These dwelt in Hermon, a part of mount Lebanon from mount Baal-Hermon unto the entering in of Hamath, Josh. xi. 3. Judg. iii. 3. to the east of the land of Canaan; hence they were sometimes called Kadmonites, or Easterlings, Gen. xv. 19. and are thought to have their name from dwelling in holes and caves like serpents; hence Cadmus the Phœnician, and his wife Hermonia, who seem to have their names from hence, are reported to be turned into serpents, they being Hivites, which this word signifies, as Bochart [i] observes. And the Arkite; the same with the Aruæans, or Arcæans, Josephus [k] speaks of in Phœnicia about Sidon, and from whom the city Arce had its name, which he places in Lebanon; and is mentioned by Menander [l] as revolting to the king of Assyria, with Sidon and old Tyre; and which is reckoned by Ptolemy [m] a city of Phœnicia, and placed by him near old Byblus; and hence Bochart [n] thinks Venus had the name of Venus Architis, said by Macrobius [o] to be worshipped by the Assyrians and Phœnicians. And the Sinite; either the inhabitants of the wilderness of Sin, who dwelt in the northern part of the desert of Arabia, or the Pelusiotæ, as Bochart [p] thinks, the inhabitants of Pelusium, which was called Sin, Ezek. xxx. 15. the former being its Greek name, the latter its Chaldee or Syriac name, and both signify clay, it being a clayey place; but Canaan or Phœnicia seems not to have reached so far: Jerom speaks of a city not far from Arca called Sin, where rather these people may be thought to dwell.

℣. 18. And the Arvadite, &c.] The inhabitants of Arvad, or Aradus, an island in the Phœnician sea; it is mentioned with Sidon, Ezek. xxvii. 8. so Josephus says [q], the Arudæans possessed the island Aradus: it is about a league distant from the shore; Strabo [r] says it is 20 furlongs from land, and about 7 in circumference, and is said to be built by the Sidonians: it is now, as Mr. Maundrel [s] says, by the Turks called Ru-ad, or, as Dr. Shaw says [t], Rou-wadde; see the note on Ezek. xxvii. 8. And the Zemarite; who perhaps built and inhabited Simyra, a place mentioned by Pliny [u], not far from Lebanon, and along with Marathos and Antarados, which lay on the continent, right against the island Aradus, or Arvad, and near the country of the Aradians. Strabo [w] makes mention of a place called Taxymira, which Casaubon observes should be Ximyra, or Simyra; and Mela [x] speaks of the castle of Simyra as in Phœnicia. There was a city called Zemaraim in the tribe of Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 22. which bishop Patrick suggests, and Ainsworth before him, that Zemarus, the son of Canaan, might be the founder of; and there is also a mountain of the same name in mount Ephraim, 2 Chron. xiii. 4. And the Hamathite; who dwelt in Amathine, as Josephus [y], and was in his time called by the inhabitants Amathe; but the Macedonians called it, from one of their race, Epiphania, which seems to have been the country called Amathite, 1 Maccab. xii. 25. there was another Hamath, called Antiochia, but cannot be meant, since Hamath was the northern border of the land of Israel, then called the entrance of Hamath, which border was pretty near to Epiphania, but not so far as Antioch; this is the Amathus of Syria, twice mentioned by Herodotus, as Hillerus [z] observes: but both Reland [a] and Vitringa [b] are of opinion, that the Hamath so often mentioned in scripture, which doubtless had its name from the Hamathite, is neither Antiochia nor Epiphania, but the city Emesa, or Emissa, which lay below Epiphania, upon the Orontes, nearer Damascus and the land of Canaan; and Hamath is mentioned with Damascus and Arpad, or Arvad, Is. x. 9. Jer. xlix. 23. and, according to Ezek. xlvii. 16, 17. and xlviii. 1. Hamath must lie between Damascus and the Mediterranean sea. And afterwards were the families of the Canaanites spread abroad; not only these eleven, but two more which are not mentioned, the Canaanites properly so called, and the Perizzites; these families at first dwelt in one place, or within narrow limits; but, as they increased, they spread themselves farther every way, and in process of time possessed all the country from Idumea and Palestine

Paleſtine to the mouth of the Orontes, and which they held about 700 years, when five of theſe families, with the two other above-mentioned, were caſt out of the land for their ſins, and to make way for the people of Iſrael.

℣. 19. And the border of the Canaanites was from Sidon, &c.] This is to be underſtood, not of the Canaanites, properly ſo called, but of them in general; and is a deſcription of the bounds of the land of Canaan, as poſſeſſed by the people of Iſrael: the northern or north weſt border of it was Sidon, ſee ℣. 15. and is to be underſtood of the country which reached from that city towards the eaſt almoſt as far as Jordan: as thou comeſt from Gerar unto Gaza; two cities of the Philiſtines, well known in ſcripture, the former for being the place where Abraham and Iſaac ſometimes ſojourned, and the latter for Sampſon's exploits in it; theſe were the ſouthern or ſouth weſt border of the land of Canaan: as thou goeſt unto Sodom and Gomorrah, and Admah and Zeboim; four cities deſtroyed by fire from heaven, as is after related in this book; theſe lay to the ſouth or ſouth eaſt part of the land: even unto Laſhah; which, according to the Targum of Jonathan is Callirrhoe, a place famous for hot waters, which run into the dead ſea, and who in this is followed by Jerom; but ſince it was not in the ſouthern part of Judea as Laſhah was, Bochart propoſes [a] Luſa, as being more likely to be the place, a city of the Arabs, which Ptolemy [b] puts in the mid-way between the Mediterranean and the Red ſea; but this is objected to by Reland [c], ſince the ſouthern borders of the land of Canaan were from the extremity of the dead ſea unto the Mediterranean ſea, from which Luſa was at a great diſtance: the Samaritan verſion of this verſe is very different from the Hebrew, and is this, "and the bor-"der of the Canaanites was from the river of "Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates, "and unto the hinder ſea:" i. e. the weſtern or Mediterranean.

℣. 20. Theſe are the ſons of Ham, &c.] His ſons and grandſons, which ſome reckon to be 30, others 31, if the Philiſtines are taken in: after their families, after their tongues, in their countries, and in their nations: families of the ſame language joined together and dwelt in the ſame country, ſee the note on ℣. 5. all Africa and a conſiderable part of Aſia were poſſeſſed by the four ſons of Ham and their poſterity; Mizraim had Egypt, and Phut all the reſt of Africa; and Cuſh and Canaan had a large portion in Aſia.

℣. 21. Unto Shem alſo the father of all the children of Eber, &c.] And for the ſake of thoſe Shem is particularly ſaid to be the father of, is this genealogy given, and indeed the whole book of Geneſis wrote: Eber was the great grandſon of Shem, and is here ſpoken of by anticipation, and Shem is called not the father of either of his immediate ſons, but of the poſterity of this man; becauſe the Hebrews ſprung from him in his line, among whom the church of God and the true religion were preſerved, and from whom the Meſſiah was to come, as he did: the word Eber, Jarchi interprets, beyond the river, Euphrates or Tigris, or both, as deſcribing the ſeat of the poſterity of Shem; but as this too much ſtraitens them, ſince they inhabited on both ſides; Dr. Hyde [d] has ſhewn that the word uſed may refer to both, to thoſe beyond theſe rivers, and to thoſe on this ſide; ſee Numb. xxiv. 24. the brother of Japheth the elder; he was the brother of Ham too, but he is not mentioned becauſe of the behaviour towards his father, and becauſe of the curſe that was upon him and his; but Shem's relation to Japheth is expreſſed to ſhew, that they were alike in their diſpoſition; and it may be to ſignify, that in times to come, their poſterity would unite in ſpiritual things, which has been fulfilled already in part, and will be more fully by the coalition of the Jews the poſterity of Shem, and of the Gentiles, the poſterity of Japheth, in the chriſtian church-ſtate: and from hence we learn that Japheth was the eldeſt of Noah's ſons, though ſome render the words, the elder brother of Japheth [e]; and ſo make Shem to be the eldeſt; but as this is contrary to the accents, ſo to the hiſtory: for Noah was 500 years old when he began to beget ſons, ch. v. 32. he was 600 when he went into the ark, ch. vii. 11. 2 years after the flood Shem begat Arphaxad, when he was 100 years old, and Noah 602, ch. xi. 10. ſo that Shem muſt be born when Noah was 502 years old; and ſince he begot children, there muſt be one two years older than Shem, which can be no other than Japheth, ſince Ham is called his younger ſon, ch. ix. 24. even to him were children born, who are reckoned as follow.

℣. 22. The children of Shem, &c.] Whoſe names are Elam and Aſhur, and Arphaxad, and Lud, and Aram; and who, as Joſephus [f] ſays, inhabited Aſia, from Euphrates to the Indian ocean: his firſt-born Elam, was the father of the Elymæans, from whom ſprung the Perſians, as the ſame writer obſerves, and his poſterity are called Elamites, Act. ii. 10. their country Elam, and is ſometimes mentioned with Media, when the Perſians and Medes are intended, Iſ. xxi. 2. Jer. xxv. 25. ſee alſo, Iſ. xxii. 6. Jer. xlix. 34, &c. in Daniel's time, Shuſhan in the province of Elam, was the ſeat of the kings of Perſia: the country of Elymais, ſo called from this man, is ſaid by Pliny [g], to be divided from Suſiane by the river Eulæus, and to join with Perſia; and the famous city of Elymais, the metropolis of the country is placed by Joſephus [h] in Perſia. Aſhur, the ſecond ſon of Shem, gives name to Aſſyria, a country frequently mentioned in ſcripture; and which, according to Ptolemy [i], was bounded on the north by part of Armenia the great, and the mountain Niphates, on the weſt by Meſopotamia and the river Tigris, on the ſouth by Suſiane, and on the eaſt by part of Media. Strabo ſays [k], they call Babylonia, and great part of the country about it, Aſſyria, in which was Ninus or Niniveh, the chief city of the Aſſyrian empire; and which was built by Aſhur, as Joſephus [l] affirms, and ſays, he gave the name of Aſſyrians to his ſubjects: Arphaxad, the third ſon of Shem, from him that part of Aſſyria, which lay northward next to Armenia, was called Arphaxitis, as it is probable that was its original name, tho' corruptly called by Ptolemy [m] Arrapachitis: Joſephus ſays [n], he gave name to the Arphaxadæans, whom he ruled over, now called Chaldeans; and indeed the name of the Chaldeans may as well be derived from the latter part of Arphaxad's name, כשד

כשד Chaſhad, as from Cheſed, the ſon of Nahor, and brother of Abraham, as it more commonly is; ſince the Chaldæans were called Chaſdim before Cheſed was born, and were a nation when Abraham came out of Ur, before Cheſed could be old or conſiderable enough to build towns and found a nation; ſee Gen. xi. 31. and xv. 7. and xxii. 22. though Bochart treats this as a mere dream, yet he is obliged to have recourſe to the uſual refuge, that Ur was called Ur of the Chaldees, by anticipation. The fourth ſon of Shem was Lud, from whom ſprung the Lydians, a people of Aſia minor, and whoſe country is called Lydia, including Myſia and Caria, which all lay by the river Mæander; and Lud, in the Phœnician language, ſignifies bending and crooked, as that river was, being full of windings and turnings: ſome think that the poſterity of Lud are carried too far off from thoſe of his brethren, but know not where elſe to fix them. From Aram the laſt ſon of Shem, ſprung the Aramæans, called by the Greeks, Syrians, as Joſephus[o] obſerves; and by Homer[p] and Heſiod[q] Αριμοι, and ſo ſays Strabo[r], ſome by the Arimi, underſtand the Syrians, now called Arami; and elſewhere[s] he obſerves, that they who are by us called Syrians, are by the Syrians themſelves called Aramæans, and this is the name they give to themſelves to this day: the country inhabited by them included Meſopotamia and Syria, and particularly all thoſe places that have the name of Aram added to them, as Padan Aram, and Aram Naharaim (which is Meſopotamia) Aram of Damaſcus, Aram Zobah, Aram Maacha, and Aram Beth Rehob, Gen. xxviii. 2. and xxiv. 10. 1 Sam. viii. 6. and x. 6. 1 Chron. xix. 6. Pſ. lx. title: the Septuagint verſion here adds, and Cainan, but without any authority.

℣. 23. And the children of Aram, &c.] The four following perſons are called the ſons of Shem, 1 Chron. i. 17. being his grandſons, which is not unuſual in ſcripture, Uz, and Hul, and Gether, and Maſh: the firſt of theſe ſons of Aram, Uz, is generally thought to be the founder of Damaſcus; ſo Joſephus[t] ſays. Uſus founded Trachonitis and Damaſcus, which lies between Paleſtine and Cœleſyria: there was a place called Uz in Idumea, Lam. iv. 21. and another in Arabia where Job dwelt, ch. i. 1. but neither of them ſeems to be the ſeat of this man and his poſterity, who, in all probability, ſettled in Syria: his ſecond ſon Hul, whom Joſephus[u] calls Ulus, according to him, founded Armenia; which notion may be ſtrengthened by obſerving that Cholobotene is reckoned a part of Armenia, by Stephanus[w]; which is no other than Cholbeth, that is, the houſe or ſeat of Chol, the ſame with Hul; and there are ſeveral places in Armenia, as appears from Ptolemy[x], which begin with Chol or Col, as Cholus, Cholua, Choluata, Cholima, Colſa, Colana, Colchis: but perhaps it may be better to place him in Syria, in the deſerts of Palmyrene, as Junius and Grotius; ſince among the cities of Palmyrene, there is one called Cholle, according to Ptolemy[y]. Gether, the third ſon, is made by Joſephus[z], to be the father of the Bactrians; but theſe were too far off to come from this man, and were not in the lot of Shem: Bochart[a] finds the river Getri, which the Greeks call Centrites, between Armenia and the Carduchi, whereabout, he conjectures, might be the ſeat of this man; but perhaps it may be more probable, with Grotius and Junius, to place him in Cœleſyria, where are the city Gindarus of Ptolemy[b], and a people called Gindareni, by Pliny[c]; though biſhop Patrick thinks it probable that Gadara, the chief city of Peræa, placed by Ptolemy[d] in the Decapolis of Cœleſyria, had its name from this man: Mr. Broughton derives Atergate and Derceto, names of a Syrian goddeſs, from him, which was worſhipped at Hierapolis in Cœleſyria, as Pliny ſays[e]. The laſt of the ſons of Aram, Maſh, is called Meſhech, in 1 Chron. i. 17. and here the Septuagint verſion calls him Maſoch; his poſterity are ſuppoſed to ſettle in Armenia, about the mountain Maſius, thought to be the ſame with Ararat, and which the Armenians call Maſis; perhaps the people named Moſcheni, mentioned by Pliny[f], as dwelling near Armenia and Adiabene, might ſpring from this man.

℣. 24. And Arphaxad begat Salah, &c.] Or Shelach, which ſignifies a ſending forth; that is, of waters: it is part of the name of Methuſelah, given him by his father, as prophetic of the flood, ſee ch. v. 21. and Arphaxad, who was born two years after the flood, gives this name to his firſt-born, as commemorative of it: according to ſome, from him are the Suſians[g]; and in Suſiana is found a city called Sele, by Ptolemy[h]; but this ſeems not to be a ſufficient proof: and Salah begat Eber; from whom, Joſephus[i] ſays, the Jews were called Hebrews from the beginning; and which, perhaps, is as good a derivation of their name as can be given, and ſeems to be confirmed by Numb. xxiv. 24. though ſome derive it from Abraham's paſſing over the rivers in his way from Chaldea into Syria; but be it ſo, why might not this name be given to Eber, as prophetical of that paſſage, or of the paſſage of his poſterity over the Euphrates into Canaan, as well as Eber gave to his ſon Peleg, his name, as a prediction of the diviſion of the earth in his time? the Septuagint verſion of this text, inſerts a Cainan between Arphaxad and Salah, but is not to be found in any Hebrew copy, nor in the Samaritan, Syriac, and Arabic verſions, nor in Joſephus, ſee Luke iii. 36.

℣. 25. And unto Eber were born two ſons, the name of one was Peleg, &c.] Bochart[k] thinks, that either Peleg, or one of his poſterity, in memory of him, gave the name of Phalga to a town ſituated on the Euphrates; though the reaſon of the name as given by Arrianus, as he himſelf obſerves, was becauſe it divided between the two Seleucias, as the reaſon of Peleg's name was; for in his days was the earth divided; among the three ſons of Noah, and their reſpective poſterities; their language was divided, and that obliged them to divide and ſeparate in bodies which underſtood one another; hence that age, in which was this event, was uſually called by the Jews, the age of diviſion; whether this was done about the time of his birth, and ſo this name was given him to perpetuate the memory of it, or in ſome after part of his life, and ſo was given by a ſpirit of prophecy, is a queſtion: Joſephus, Jarchi, and the Jewiſh writers, generally go the latter way; if it was at the time of his birth, which is the ſenſe of many, then this affair happened in the 101ſt year after after the flood, for in that year Peleg was born, as appears from ch. xi. 11—16. and his brother's name was Joktan, whom the Arabs call Cahtan, and claim him as their parent, at leaſt, of their principal tribes; and ſay, he was the firſt that reigned in Yaman, and put a diadem on his head [l]; and there is a city in the territory of Mecca, about 7 furlongs to the ſouth of it, and one ſtation from the Red Sea, called Baiſath Jektan, the ſeat of Jektan [m], which manifeſtly retains his name; and there are a people called Catanitæ, placed by Ptolemy [n] in Arabia felix.

℣. 26. And Joktan begat Almodad, &c.] And 12 more after mentioned: the Arabic writers [o] ſay, he had 31 ſons by one woman, but all, excepting two, left Arabia, and ſettled in India; the Targum of Jonathan adds, "who meaſured the earth "with ropes," as if he was the firſt inventor and practiſer of Geometry: from him are thought to ſpring the Allumæotæ, a people whom Ptolemy [p] places in Arabia felix, called ſo by the Greeks, inſtead of Almodæi: Mr. Broughton [q] ſets Eldimæi over againſt this man's name, as if they were a people that ſprung from him; whereas this word is wrongly put in Ptolemy [r], for Elymæans, as it is in the Greek text, a people joining to the Perſians: and Sheleph and Hazarmaveth, and Jerah: to the firſt of theſe, Sheleph, the Targum of Jonathan adds, "who "drew out the water of the rivers;" his people are ſuppoſed by Bochart [s], to be the Alapeni of Ptolemy [t], which ſhould be read Salapeni, who were, he ſays, more remote from the reſt, almoſt as far as the neck of Arabia, and not far from the ſpring of the river Betius. The next ſon, Hazarmaveth, or Haſermoth, as in the Vulgate Latin, is thought to give name to a people in Arabia, called by Pliny [u] Chatramotitæ, and by Ptolemy Cathramonitæ, whoſe country, Strabo ſays [w], produces myrrh; according to Ptolemy [x] they reached from the mountain Climax to the Sabæans, among whom were a people, called by Pliny [y], Atramitæ, who inhabited a place of the ſame name, and which Theophraſtus calls Adramyta, which comes nearer the name of this man, and ſignifies the court or country of death; and in thoſe parts might be places ſo called, partly from the unwholeſomneſs of the air, being thick and foggy, and partly from the frankincenſe which grew there, which was fatal to thoſe that gathered it, and therefore only the king's ſlaves, and ſuch as were condemned to die, were employed in it, as Bochart [z] has obſerved from Arrianus; as alſo becauſe of the multitude of ſerpents, with which thoſe odoriferous countries abounded, as the ſame writer relates from Agatharcides and Pliny. The next ſon of Joktan is Jerah, which ſignifies the moon, as Hilal does in Arabic; and Alilat with the Arabians, according to Herodotus [a], is Urania, or the moon; hence Bochart [b] thinks, that the Jeracheans, the poſterity of Jerah, are the Alilæans of Diodorus Siculus [c], and others, a people of the Arabs; and the Arabic geographer, as he obſerves, makes mention of a people near Mecca called Bene Hilal, or the children of Jerah; and he is of opinion that the iſland Hieracon, which the Greeks call the iſland of the Hawks, placed by Ptolemy [d], in Arabia felix, adjoining to the country which lies upon the Arabian gulph, is no other than the iſland of the Jeracheans, the poſterity of this man: the Arabs [e] ſpeak of a ſon of Joktan or Cahtan, they call Jareb, who ſucceeded his father, which perhaps may be a corruption of Jerah; and another, called by them, Jorham.

℣. 27. And Hadoram, and Uzal, and Diklah.] The poſterity of Hadoram, from the likeneſs of the name and ſound, might ſeem to be the Adramitæ of Ptolemy [f], but Bochart [g] thinks, they are the Drimati of Pliny [h], who dwelt in the extreme corner of Arabia, to the eaſt near the Macæ, who were at the ſtraits of the Perſian gulph; and he obſerves, that the extreme promontory of that country was called Corodamum, by tranſpoſition of the letters D and R: Uzal gave name to a city which is ſtill ſo called; for R. Zacuth [i] ſays, the Jews which dwelt in Yaman, the kingdom of Sheba, call Samea, which is the capital of the kingdom of Yaman, Uzal; and who alſo relates, that there is a place called Hazarmaveth unto this day, of which ſee ℣. 26. the kingdom in which Uzal is ſaid by him to be, was the ſouth part of Arabia felix, as Yaman ſignifies, from whence came the queen of the ſouth, Matt. xii. 42. and Uzal or Auzal, as the Arabs pronounce it, is the ſame the Greeks call Auſar, changing l into r; hence mention is made by Pliny [k] of myrrh of Auſar, in the kingdom of the Gebanites, a people of the Arabs, where was a port by him called Ocila [l], by Ptolemy, Ocelis [m], and by Artemidorus in Strabo Acila [n], and perhaps was the port of the city Uzal, to the name of which it bears ſome reſemblance: Diklah ſignifies a palm-tree, in the Chaldee or Syriac language, with which kind of trees Arabia abounded, eſpecially the country of the Minæi, as Pliny [o] relates; wherefore Bochart [p] thinks, the poſterity of Diklah had their ſeat among them, rather than at Phænicon or Diklah, ſo called from the abundance of palm-trees that grew there, which was at the entrance into Arabia felix at the Red ſea, of which Diodorus Siculus [q] makes mention; and ſo Artemidorus in Strabo [r] ſpeaks of a place called Poſidium, oppoſite to the Troglodytes, and where the Arabian gulph ends, where palm-trees grew in a wonderful manner, on the fruit of which people lived, where was a Phænicon or continued grove of palm-trees; and here is placed by Ptolemy [s], a village called Phænicon, the ſame with Diklah.

℣. 28. And Obal, and Abimael, and Sheba.] The firſt of theſe, Obal or Aubal, as the Arabs pronounce, Bochart [t] is obliged to make his poſterity paſs over the ſtraits of the Arabian gulph out of Arabia felix into Arabia Troglodytice; where he finds a bay, called by Pliny [u] the Abalite bay, which carries in it ſome trace of this man's name, and by Ptolemy [w] the Avalite bay; and where was not only an Emporium of this name, but a people called Avalites and alſo Adulites, which Biſhop Patrick believes ſhould be read Abulites, more agreeable to the name of this man, but Pliny [x] ſpeaks of a town of the Adulites alſo: Abimael is ſuppoſed by Bochart [y], to be the father of Mali or the Malitæ, as his name may be thought to ſignify, Theophraſtus phraſtus [y] making mention of a place called Malì along with Saba, Adramyta, and Citibæna, in ſpicy Arabia, which is the only foundation there is for this conjecture: Sheba gave name to the Sabæans, a numerous people in Arabia; their country was famous for frankincenſe; the nations of them, according to Pliny [z], reached both ſeas, that is, extended from the Arabian to the Perſian gulf; one part of them, as he ſays [a], was called Atramitæ, and the capital of their kingdom Sabota, on a high mountain, eight manſions from which was their frankincenſe-country called Saba; elſewhere he ſays [b], their capital was called Sobotale, including 60 temples within its walls; but the royal ſeat was Mariabe; and ſo Eratoſthenes in Strabo [c] ſays, the metropolis of the Sabæans was Mariaba, or as others call it, Merab, and which, it ſeems, is the ſame with Saba; for Diodorus Siculus [d] and Philoſtorgius [e] ſay, the metropolis of the Sabæans is Saba; and which the former repreſents as built on a mountain, as the Sabota of Pliny is ſaid to be.

℣. 29. And Ophir, and Havilah, and Jobab, &c.] If ſeveral of the ſons of Joktan went into India, as the Arabs ſay, one would be tempted to think that Ophir in India, whither Solomon ſent his ſhips once in three years had its name from the firſt of theſe; ſee the note on ℣. 26. but as this would be carrying him too far from the reſt of his brethren, who appear to have ſettled in Arabia, ſome place muſt be found for him there; and yet there is none in which there is any likeneſs of the name, unleſs Coper can be thought to be, a village in the country of the Cinædocolpites on the Arabian gulph, as in Ptolemy [f], or Ogyris, an iſland in the ſame ſea; Pliny makes mention of the ſame with the Organa of Ptolemy [h], placed by him on the Sachalite bay; wherefore Bochart [i] looks out elſewhere for a ſeat for this Ophir, or Oupheir, as in the Septuagint verſion, and finding in a fragment of Eupolemus preſerved by Euſebius [k], mention made of the iſland of Ourphe, which he thinks ſhould be Ouphre or Uphre, ſituated in the Red ſea, ſeems willing to have it to be the ſeat of this man and his poſterity, and that it had its name from him; or that their ſeat was among the Caſſanites or Gaſſandæ, the ſame perhaps with the tribe of Ghaſſan, Aupher and Chaſan ſignifying much the ſame, even great abundance and treaſure: Havilah next mentioned, is different from Havilah the ſon of Cuſh, ℣. 7. and ſo his country; but it is difficult where to fix him; one would rather think that the Avalite bay, emporium, and people ſhould take their name from him than from Obal, ℣. 28. but Bochart [l] chuſes to place him and his poſterity in Chaulan, a country in Arabia felix, in the extreme part of Caſſanitis near the Sabæans: and Jobab, the laſt of Joktan's ſons, was the father of the Jobabites, called by Ptolemy [m] Jobarites, corruptly for Jobabites, as Salmaſius and Bochart think; and who are placed by the above geographer near the Sachalites in Arabia felix, whoſe country was full of deſarts, as Jobab in Arabic ſignifies, ſo Bochart [n] obſerves, as the countries above the Sachalite bay were, by which theſe Jobabites are placed: all theſe were the ſons of Joktan; the 13 before-mentioned, all which had their dwelling in Arabia or near it, and which is further deſcribed in the following verſe.

℣. 30. And their dwelling was from Meſha, as thou goeſt unto Zephar, a mount of the eaſt.] Meſha, which is thought to be the Muza of Ptolemy and Pliny, was a famous port in the Red ſea, frequented by the merchants of Egypt and Ethiopia, from which the Sappharites lay directly eaſtward; to whoſe country they uſed to go for myrrh and frankincenſe and the like, of which Saphar was the metropolis, and which was at the foot of Climax, a range of mountains, which perhaps might be formerly called Saphar, from the city at the bottom of it, the ſame with Zephar here: by inſpecting Ptolemy's tables [o], the way from one to the other is eaſily diſcerned, where you firſt meet with Muza a port in the Red ſea, then Ocelis, then the mart Arabia, then Cane, and ſo on to Sapphar or Sapphara; and ſo Pliny ſays [p], there is a third port which is called Muza, which the navigation to India does not put into, only the merchants of frankincenſe and Arabian odours: the towns in the inland are the royal ſeat Saphar, and another called Sabe; now the ſons of Joktan had their habitations all from this part in the weſt unto Zephar or Saphar eaſtward, and thoſe were reckoned the genuine Arabs: Hillerus [q] gives a different account of the ſituation of the children of Joktan, as he thinks, agreeable to theſe words of Moſes; underſtanding by Kedem, rendered the eaſt, the mountains of Kedem, or the Kedemites, which ſprung from Kedem or Kedomah, the youngeſt ſon of Iſhmael, Gen. xxv. 15. and Zephar the ſeat of the Sepharites, as between Meſha and Kedem; for, ſays he, Meſha is not Muza, a mart of the Red ſea, but Moſcha a famous port of the Indian ſea, of which Arrian and Ptolemy make mention; and from hence the dwelling of the Joktanites was extended, in the way you go through the Sepharites to the mountainous places of Kedem or Cadmus: perhaps nearer the the truth may be, the Arabic paraphraſe of Saadiah [r], which is "from Mecca till you come to the city "of the eaſtern mountain, or (as in a manuſcript) "to the eaſtern city," meaning perhaps Medina, ſituate to the eaſt; ſo that the ſenſe is according to this paraphraſe, that the ſons of Joktan had their dwelling from Mecca to Medina; and ſo R. Zacuth [s] ſays, Meſha in the Arabic tongue is called Mecca; and it is a point agreed upon by the Arabs that Meſha was one of the moſt antient names of Mecca; they believe that all the mountainous part of the region producing frankincenſe went in the earlieſt times by the name of Sephar; from whence Golius concludes this tract to be the mount Zephar of Moſes, a ſtrong preſumption of the truth of which is that Dhafar, the ſame with the modern Arabs, as the antient Saphar, is the name of a town in Shibr, the only province in Arabia bearing frankincenſe on the coaſt of the Indian ocean [t].

℣. 31. Theſe are the ſons of Shem, &c.] His ſons, and grandſons, and great grandſons, in all 26, no doubt but there were many more, but theſe are only mentioned; for none of the ſons of Elam, Aſhur and Lud are named, and but one of Arphaxad's, and one of Salah's, and two of Eber's, and none of Peleg's; when it is not to be queſtioned but they had many, as is certain of Arphaxad, Salah, Eber and Peleg, ch. xi. 13—15. 17. 19. after their families, after their tongues, in their lands, after after their nations: from hence ſprung various families at firſt, and theſe of different languages upon the confuſion of Babel, which thenceforward, formed different nations, dwelt in different lands; which have been pointed at as near as we can at this diſtance, and with the little helps and advantages we have: it ſeems from hence that Shem's poſterity were of different languages as well as thoſe of Ham and Japheth.

℣. 32. Theſe are the families of the ſons of Noah, after their generations, in their nations, &c.] This is the account of their families, from whom the ſeveral nations of the earth ſprung: and by theſe were the nations divided in the earth after the flood; not immediately, not till they were ſo increaſed as to form diſtinct nations; not till Peleg's time when the diviſion was made; not until the building of the city and tower of Babel, for unto that time theſe families were together, and then and not before were they diſperſed abroad upon the face of the earth; and by degrees peopled all the known parts of the world, Aſia, Africa and Europe, and no doubt America, though the way of their paſſage thither is unknown to us; and to this partition of the earth by the three ſons of Noah, Pindar [u] ſeems to have reſpect, when he ſays, "according to the "antients, Jupiter and the immortal ones parted "the earth;" and he ſpeaks of one man having three ſons who dwelt ſeparate, the earth being divided into three parts.

CHAP. XI.

THIS chapter gives an account of the inhabitants of the earth before the confuſion of tongues at Babel, of their ſpeech and language, which was one and the ſame, and of the place where they dwelt, ℣. 1, 2. and of their deſign to build a city and tower to make them a name and keep them together, which they put in execution, ℣. 3, 4. of the notice the Lord took of this affair, and of the method he took to put a ſtop to their deſigns, by confounding their ſpeech, and diſperſing them abroad upon the face of the earth, ℣. 5—9. then follows a genealogy of Shem's poſterity down to Abraham, ℣. 10—26. and a particular relation is given of Terah, the father of Abraham and his family, and of his going forth with them from Ur of the Chaldees, in order to go into the land of Canaan, and of his death at Haran by the way, ℣. 27—32.

℣. 1. And the whole earth was of one language, and of one ſpeech, &c.] Or had been [w] before the flood, and from that time to this, and ſtill was, until the confuſion took place; the account of which, and the occaſion of it, are given in this chapter: by the whole earth is meant the inhabitants of it, ſee Iſ. xxxvii. 18. 1 King. x. 24. and ſo the Jeruſalem Targum paraphraſes the words, "and all the generations of the earth were of one "language, and of one ſpeech, and of one coun-"ſel, for they ſpoke in the holy tongue in which "the world was created at the beginning;" and to the ſame purpoſe the Targum of Jonathan: all the poſterity of Shem, Ham and Japheth, uſed the ſame language, though it does not appear that they were all in one counſel or conſultation, or of one mind about building a city or tower, which the Targum ſeems to ſuggeſt; for it is not likely that Shem and his ſons were in it: nor by one lip and the ſame words or things [x], as theſe phraſes may be rendred, are we to underſtand the ſame ſimplicity of ſpeech and buſineſs, and likeneſs of manners; for it appears there was a difference with reſpect to theſe in the immediate ſons of Noah, and it may be ſuppoſed to be much more in their remote offſpring; nor as if they were all of the ſame religion, embraced the ſame doctrines, and ſpoke the ſame things; for as idolatry and ſuperſtition, obtained in the race of Cain before the flood, ſo Ham and his poſterity ſoon fell into the ſame, or the like afterwards: and it may be obſerved that the ſame diſtinction was made of the children of God, and of the children of men, before the confuſion and diſperſion, as was before the flood, ℣. 5. from whence it appears they were not in the ſame ſentiments and practice of religion: but this is to be underſtood of one and the ſame language, without any diverſity of dialects, or without any hard and ſtrange words, not eaſily underſtood; and perhaps it was pronounced by the lip and other inſtruments of ſpeech in the ſame way; ſo that there was no difficulty in underſtanding one another, men, women and children, all the people in common, princes and peaſants, wiſe and unwiſe, all ſpoke the ſame language and uſed the ſame words; and this the Targumiſts take to be the holy or Hebrew language; and ſo Jarchi and Aben Ezra, and the Jewiſh writers in general, and moſt chriſtians; though ſome make a queſtion of it, whether it might not be rather the Syriac, or Chaldee, or Arabic; but there is no need of ſuch a queſtion, ſince theſe with the Hebrew are all one and the ſame language; and no doubt it was the eaſtern language, without giving it any other name, which now ſubſiſts in the above dialects, though not in any one alone, which was firſt ſpoken; though more purely and without the difference of dialects it now conſiſts of, or without the various different inflexions now made in it; for nothing is more reaſonable to ſuppoſe, than that the language Adam ſpoke was uſed by Noah, ſince Adam lived, within 100 years and a little more of the birth of Noah; and it is not to be queſtioned but Noah's ſons ſpoke the ſame language as he did, and their poſterity now, which was but little more than 100 years after the flood: there are various teſtimonies of heathens confirming this truth, that originally men ſpoke but one language; thus Sibylla in Joſephus [y], who ſays, "when "all men were ομοφωσσων, of the ſame language, "ſome began to build a moſt high tower, &c." ſo Abydenus [z] an heathen hiſtorian, ſpeaking of the building of the tower of Babel ſays, "at that time "men were ομογλωσσους, of the ſame tongue;" in like manner Hyginus [a] ſpeaking of Phoroneus, the firſt of mortals that reigned, ſays, "many ages before, men "lived without towns and laws, una lingua loquentes, ſpeaking one language, under the empire of "Jove."

℣. 2. And it came to paſs, as they journeyed from the eaſt, &c.] That is, the inhabitants of the whole earth; not Ham and his poſterity only, or Nimrod and his company; but as all the ſons of Noah and his poſterity for a while dwelt together, or at leaſt very near each other, and finding the place where they were too ſcanty for them, as their ſeveral families increaſed, they ſet out in a body from the place where they were, to ſeek for a more convenient one: it ſeems a little difficult how to interpret this phraſe, from the eaſt, ſince if they came from Ararat in Armenia, where the ark reſted, as that lay north of Shinar or Babylon, they might rather be ſaid to come from the north than from the eaſt, and rather came to it than from it: ſo ſome think the phraſe ſhould be rendered, to the eaſt [b], or eaſtward, as in Gen. xiii. 11. Jarchi thinks this refers to ch. x. and their dwelling was, &c. at the mountain of the eaſt; from whence he ſuppoſes they journeyed, to find out a place that would hold them all, but could find none but Shinar; but then this reſtrains it to Joktan's ſons, and beſides their dwelling there, was not until after the confuſion and diſperſion. But it is very probable the caſe was this, that when Noah and his ſons came out of the ark, in a little time they betook themſelves to their former habitation, from whence they had entered into the ark, namely to the eaſt of the garden of Eden, where was the appearance of the divine preſence, or Shekinah; and from hence it was that theſe now journeyed: and ſo it was as they were paſſing on, that they found a plain in the land of Shinar; which the Targum of Jonathan paraphraſes the land of Babylon; and Heſtiæus [c], a Phœnician hiſtorian, calls it Sennaar of Babylon; there are plain traces of this name in the Singara of Ptolemy [d] and Pliny [e], the Hebrew letter ע being ſometimes pronounced as G, as in Gaza and Gomorrah; the firſt of theſe place a city of this name in Meſopotamia, near the Tigris, and that of the other is reckoned a capital of the Rhetavi, a tribe of the Arabs, near Meſopotamia. This plain was very large, fruitful and delightful, and therefore judged a fit place for a ſettlement, where they might have room enough, and which promiſed them a ſufficient ſuſtenance: and they dwelt there; and provided for their continuance, quickly beginning to build a city and tower, afterwards called Babylon: and that Babylon was built in a large plain, is not only here aſſerted, but is confirmed by Herodotus [f], who ſays of it, that it lay εν πεδιω μεγαλω, in a vaſt plain, and ſo Strabo [g]; which was no other than the plain of Shinar.

℣. 3. And they ſaid one to another, go to, &c.] Adviſing, exhorting, ſtirring up and encouraging one another to the work propoſed, of building a city and tower for their habitation and protection; ſaying, let us make brick, and burn them thoroughly; they knew the nature of bricks, and how to make them before: according to Sanchoniatho [h], the brothers of Vulcan, or Tubal-Cain, before the flood, were the firſt inventors of them; for he relates, that "there are ſome that ſay that his brothers invented the way of making walls of bricks: he "adds, that from the generation of Vulcan came "two brothers, who invented the way of mixing "ſtraw or ſtubble with brick-clay, and to dry "them by the ſun, and ſo found out tiling of "houſes." Now in the plain of Shinar, tho' it afforded no ſtones, yet they could dig clay enough to make bricks, and which they propoſed to burn thoroughly, that they might be fit for their purpoſe. According to an eaſtern tradition [i], they were 3 years employed in making and burning thoſe bricks, each of which was 13 cubits long, 10 broad, and 5 thick, and were 40 years in building: and they had brick for ſtone, and ſlime had they for mortar; they could not get ſtone, which they would have choſen, as more durable; they got the beſt bricks they could make, and inſtead of mortar they uſed ſlime; or what the Septuagint verſion calls aſphaltos, a bitumen, or kind of pitch, of which there was great plenty in that neighbourhood. Herodotus [k], ſpeaking of the building of Babylon, uſes language very much like the ſcripture, "digging a foſs or ditch, ſays he, the earth "which was caſt up they formed into bricks, and "drawing large ones, they burnt them in furnaces, uſing for lime or mortar hot aſphaltos "or bitumen." And he obſerves, that "8 days "journey from Babylon was another city, called "Is, where was a ſmall river of the ſame name, "which ran into the river Euphrates, and with its "water were carried many lumps of bitumen, "and from hence it was conveyed to the walls of "Babylon." This city is now called Ait, of which a traveller [l] of the laſt century gives the following account; "from the ruins of old Babylon we came "to a town called Ait, inhabited only with Arabians, but very ruinous; near unto which town "is a valley of pitch, very marvellous to behold, "and a thing almoſt incredible, wherein are many "ſprings throwing out abundantly a kind of black "ſubſtance, like unto tar and pitch, which ſerveth "all the countries thereabout to make ſtaunch "their barks and boats; every one of which "ſprings makes a noiſe like a ſmith's forge, which "never ceaſeth night nor day, and the noiſe is "heard a mile off, ſwallowing up all weighty "things that come upon it; the Moors call it the "mouth of hell." Curtius relates [m], that Alexander in his march to Babylon, came to a city called Mennis, where was a cavern, from whence a fountain threw out a vaſt quantity of bitumen or pitch; ſo that, ſays he, it is plain, that the huge walls of Babylon were daubed with the bitumen of this fountain; and he afterwards ſpeaks of the walls, towers and houſes being built of brick, and cemented with it; and ſo Diodorus Siculus ſays [n] from Cteſias, that the walls of Babylon were built of bricks, cemented with bitumen; and not only theſe, but all heathen authors that write of Babylon, confirm this; and not only hiſtorians, but poets, of which Bochart [o] has made a large collection; as well as Joſephus [p] ſpeaks of it, and this ſort of pitch ſtill remains. Rauwolf ſays [q], near the bridge over the Euphrates, where Babylon ſtood, are ſeveral heaps of Babylonian pitch, which is in ſome places grown ſo hard, that you may walk over it; but in others, that which hath been lately brought over thither is ſo ſoft, that you may ſee every ſtep you make in it.

℣. 4. And they ſaid, go to, let us build us a city and a tower, &c.] Some Jewiſh writers [r] ſay, theſe are the words of Nimrod to his people; but it is a queſtion whether he was now born, or if he was, muſt be too young to be at the head of ſuch a body body of people; but they are ſpoken to one another, or by the principal men among them, to the common people, adviſing and encouraging to ſuch an undertaking. It is generally thought what led them to it, was to ſecure them from another flood, they might be in fear of; but this ſeems not likely, ſince they had the covenant and oath of God, that the earth ſhould never be deſtroyed by water any more; and beſides, had this been the thing in view, they would not have choſen a plain to build on, a plain that lay between two of the greateſt rivers, Tigris and Euphrates, but rather one of the higheſt mountains and hills they could have found: nor could a building of brick be a ſufficient defence againſt ſuch a force of water, as the waters of the flood were; and beſides, but few at moſt could be preſerved at the top of the tower, to which, in ſuch a caſe, they would have betook themſelves. The reaſon of this building is given in a following clauſe, as will be obſerved. Some think by a city and tower is meant, by the figure Hendyadis, one and the ſame thing, a city with towers; and according to Cteſias [s], there were 250 towers in Babylon: but no doubt the city and tower were two diſtinct things; or there was one particular tower propoſed to be built beſides the city, though it might ſtand in it, or near it, as an acropolis or citadel to it; as it is not unuſual in cities to have ſuch, to betake unto in caſe of danger: whoſe top may reach unto heaven; not that they imagined ſuch a thing could be literally and ſtrictly done, but that it ſhould be raiſed exceeding high, like the cities in Canaan, ſaid to be walled up to heaven, Deut. i. 28. and ix. 1. hyperbolically ſpeaking; and ſuch was the tower of Babel, by all accounts, even of heathens: the Sibyl in Joſephus [t] calls it a moſt high tower; and ſo Abydenus [u] reports, "there are, ſays he, that ſay, "that the firſt men that roſe out of the earth, "proud of their ſtrength and largeneſs (of their "bodies) and thinking themſelves greater than the "gods, erected a tower of a vaſt height, near to "heaven, where Babylon now is." And the temple of Belus, which ſome take to be the ſame with this tower, at leaſt was that perfected, and put to ſuch a uſe, was, according to Cteſias [w], of an immenſe height, where the Chaldeans made their obſervations of the ſtars: however the tower that was in the middle of it, and which ſeems plainly to be the ſame with this, was exceeding high: the account Herodotus [x] gives of it is, "in the midſt of "the temple a ſolid tower is built, of a furlong "in length, and of as much in breadth; and upon "this tower another tower is placed, and another "upon that, and ſo on, to 8 towers." Μηκος, the word uſed by Herodotus, tranſlated length, ſignifies alſo height, and ſo it is taken here by ſome; and if ſo, it looks as if every tower was a furlong high, which makes the whole a mile, which is too extravagant to ſuppoſe, though it may denote the height of them all, a furlong, which makes it a very high building. This agrees with Strabo's account of it, who calls it a pyramid, and ſays it was a furlong high [y]: according to Rauwolf [z], the tower of Babel is ſtill in being; this, ſays he, we ſaw ſtill (in 1574) and it is half a league in diameter; but it is ſo mightily ruined, and low, and ſo full of vermin, that hath bored holes through it, that one may not come near it for half a mile, but only in two months in the winter, when they come not out of their holes. Another traveller [a], that was in thoſe parts at the beginning of the laſt century, ſays, "now at this day, that which re-"maineth is called the remnant of the tower of "Babel; there ſtanding as much as is a quarter of "a mile in compaſs, and as high as the ſtone-work "of Paul's ſteeple in London—the bricks are three "quarters of a yard in length, and a quarter in "thickneſs, and between every courſe of bricks "there lieth a courſe of matts, made of canes and "palm-tree leaves, ſo freſh as if they had been "laid within one year." Not to take notice of the extravagant account of the eaſtern writers, who ſay the tower was 5533 fathoms high [b]; and others, beyond all belief, make it 10000 fathoms, or twelve miles high [c]; and they ſay the builders were forty years in building it: their deſign in it follows, and let us make us a name; which ſome render a ſign [d], and ſuppoſe it to be a ſignal ſet upon the top of the tower, which ſerved as a beacon, by the ſight of which they might be preſerved from ſtraying in the open plains with their flocks, or return again when they had ſtrayed. Others take it to be an idol propoſed to be ſet upon the top of the tower; and the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem intimate, as if the tower was built for religious worſhip, paraphraſing the words, "let us build in the midſt of it a temple "of worſhip on the top of it, and let us put a "ſword into his (the idol's) hand." And it is the conjecture of Dr. Tenniſon, in his book of idolatry, that this tower was conſecrated by the builders of it to the ſun, as the cauſe of drying up the waters of the deluge: but the ſenſe is, that they propoſed by erecting ſuch an edifice to ſpread their fame, and perpetuate their name to the lateſt poſterity, that hereby it might be known, that at ſuch a time, and in ſuch a place, were ſuch a body of people, even all the inhabitants of the world; and all of them the ſons of one man, as Ben Gerſom obſerves; ſo that as long as this tower ſtood, they would be had in remembrance, it being called after their names; juſt as the Egyptian kings afterwards built their pyramids, perhaps for a like reaſon; and in which, the end of neither have been anſwered, it not being known who were by name concerned therein, ſee Pſ. xlix. 11. though a late learned writer [e] thinks, that by making a name is meant chuſing a chief or captain, which was propoſed by them; and that the perſon they pitched upon was Nimrod, in which ſenſe the word he ſuppoſes is uſed, 2 Sam. xxiii. 17, 18, 19. but what has been obſerved at the beginning of this note, may be objected to it; though Beroſus [f] ſays, that Nimrod came with his people into the plain of Sennaar, where he marked out a city, and founded the largeſt tower, in the year of deliverance from the waters of the flood, 131, and reigned 56 years; and carried the tower to the height and bigneſs of mountains, for a ſign and monument, that the people of Babylon were the firſt in the world, and ought to be called the kingdom of kingdoms; which laſt clauſe agrees with the ſenſe given: leſt we be ſcattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth; which they ſeemed to have ſome notion of, and feared would be their caſe, liking better to be together than than to ſeparate, and therefore were careful to avoid a diſperſion; it being ſome way or other ſignified to them, that it was the will of God they ſhould divide into colonies, and ſettle in different parts, that ſo the whole earth might be inhabited; or Noah, or ſome others had propoſed a diviſion of the earth among them, each to take his part, which they did not care to hearken to; and therefore to prevent ſuch a ſeparation, propoſed the above ſcheme, and purſued it.

℣. 5. And the Lord came down to ſee the city and the tower, &c.] Not locally or viſibly, being immenſe, omnipreſent and inviſible; nor in order to ſee and take notice of what he otherwiſe could not ſee from heaven, for he is omniſcient; but this is ſpoken after the manner of men, and is to be underſtood of ſome effects and diſplays of his power, which were manifeſt, and ſhewed him to be preſent: the Targum is, "and the Lord was revealed "to take vengeance on them on account of the "buſineſs of the city and tower the children of "men built." This ſhows the patience and long-ſuffering of God, that he did not immediately proceed againſt them, and his wiſdom and juſtice in taking cognizance of the affair, and enquiring into it; examining the truth and reality of things before he paſſed judgment and took meaſures to hinder them in the execution of their deſign; all which muſt be underſtood agreeable to the divine majeſty, and as accommodated to the capacities of men, and as an inſtruction to them in judging matters they have a concern in: which the children of men builded; or were building, for they had not finiſhed their building, at leaſt not the city, as appears from ℣. 8. Theſe were either the whole body of the people, under the general appellation of the children of men; or elſe a part of them, diſtinguiſhed by this character from the ſons of God, who were truly religious; by which it ſeems that Noah, Shem, Arphaxad, Salah, and others were not concerned in this affair, who though they might come with the reſt unto Shinar, yet when they underſtood their deſign, refuſed to join with them in it; ſo that it was only the carnal and irreligious part of them, who very probably were by far the majority, and therefore there was no over-ruling their debates, and ſtopping them in their works, that were the builders; and theſe might be the poſterity of Ham in general, with others of Shem and Japheth mixed with them. Joſephus [g] makes Nimrod to be the head of them, which is not likely, as before obſerved.

℣. 6. And the Lord ſaid, &c.] Not to the angels, as Aben Ezra, but rather to the Son and Spirit, or within himſelf: behold, the people is one, and they have all one language; which ſome think is ſpoken ironically; but I ſee no reaſon why it may not be underſtood ſeriouſly, that the people who were concerned in this building were unanimous, not only in their religious principles, ſuch as they were, as Aben Ezra, but in their counſel, purpoſe and deſign in building; they went on with great concord, harmony and vigour, and being of one language, they underſtood one another, and ſo could carry on their work with the greater expedition: and this they begin to do; to build the city and the tower, and had made conſiderable progreſs in it: and now nothing will be reſtrained from them, which they have imagined to do; they had prepared bricks, and ſlime or bitumen, a ſufficient quantity for their uſe, or could eaſily come at more if they wanted; and they were not to be prevailed upon to deſiſt from their work, by any advice that the ſons of God could give them; they were obſtinate and ſelf-willed, and not to be argued with and perſuaded to leave off; and there was no power on earth ſuperior to them, to oblige them to it; they could only be reſtrained from their enterprize, and hindered from executing it, by divine power; and which was judged neceſſary to exert, as appears by what follows: and the words may be rendered, ſhall they not be reſtrained? &c. they ſhall.

℣. 7. Go to, let us go down, and there confound their language, &c.] Theſe words are not ſpoken to the angels, as the Targum and Aben Ezra; for as Philo the Jew obſerves [h], they are ſaid to ſome as co-workers with God, which angels could not be in this work of confounding the language of men; it being above the power of creatures ſo to work upon the mind, and on the faculty of ſpeech, as to make ſuch an alteration, as was at the confuſion of tongues, when men were made to forget their former language, and had another put into their minds, and a faculty of ſpeaking it given; or however the firſt language was ſo differently inflected and pronounced, that it ſeemed another, and various; all which could not be done but by him who is almighty, even that Jehovah, Father, Son and Spirit, ſaid ℣. 8. to confound man's language; and the firſt of theſe ſpeaks to the other two, with whom he conſulted about doing it, and with whom he did it. Not that every man had a new and diſtinct language given him, for then there could have been no ſociety and converſe in the world, but one was given to each family; or rather to as many families as conſtituted a nation or colony, deſigned for the ſame place of habitation; how many there were, cannot be ſaid with any certainty. Euphorus, and many other hiſtorians [i] ſay, they were 75, according to the number of Jacob's poſterity that went down into Egypt; others ſay 72: the Jewiſh writers generally agree with the Targum of Jonathan in making them 70, according to the number of the poſterity of Noah's ſons, recorded in the preceding chapter; but ſeveral of them ſpoke the ſame language, as Aſhur, Arphaxad and Aram ſpoke the Chaldee or Syriac language; the ſons of Canaan one and the ſame language; and the 13 ſons of Joktan the Arabic language; Javan and Eliſha the Greek language; ſo that, as Bochart [k] obſerves, ſcarce 30 of the 70 will remain diſtinct: and it is an obſervation of Dr. Lightfoot [l] not to be deſpiſed, that "the 15 "named in Acts ii. were enough to confound the "work (at Babel) and they may very well be ſup-"poſed to have been the whole number." The end to be anſwered by it was, that they may not underſtand one another's ſpeech; or hear [m], that is, ſo as to underſtand; the words were ſo changed, and ſo differently pronounced from what they had uſed to hear, that though they heard the ſound, they could not tell the meaning of them: hence as Jarchi obſerves, when one aſked for a brick, another brought him clay or ſlime, on which he roſe up againſt him, and daſhed his brains out.

℣. 8. So the Lord ſcattered them abroad from thence, upon the face of all the earth, &c.] Hence that which they feared came upon them, and what they were ſo careful to guard againſt, befel them, occaſioned by thoſe meaſures they took to ſecure themthemſelves from it; for not being able to underſtand one another, they left off their deſign, and as many as ſpoke the ſame language joined together, and ſo parted in bodies; ſome went one way, and ſome another, and ſettled in different places, until at length, by degrees, the whole world was peopled by them, which was the will of God ſhould be done, and was brought about in this way. The heathen writers themſelves aſcribe this diſperſion to a divine being, as well as ſpeaking different tongues. Eupolemus [n] ſays, that firſt the city of Babylon was built by thoſe that were ſaved from the flood, who were giants; and then they built the tower, ſo much ſpoken of in hiſtory, which falling by the power of God, the giants were ſcattered throughout the whole earth. One would think this writer, by his language, muſt have read this account of Moſes: ſome of them ſay the fall of the tower was by ſtorms and tempeſts raiſed by the gods. So the Sibyl in Joſephus [o] ſays, "the gods "ſending winds overthrew the tower, and gave to "every one his own ſpeech, and hence the city came "to be called Babylon." Agreeable to which Abydenus [p], an Aſſyrian writer, relates, that "the winds "being raiſed by the gods overthrew the mechaniſm "(the tower) upon them (the builders of it) and "out of the ruins of it was the city called Baby-"lon, when thoſe who were of the ſame language, "from the gods ſpoke a different one, and of va-"rious ſounds." And ſo Heſtiæus [q] a Phœnician writer, ſpeaking of thoſe who came to Sennaar or Shinar of Babylon, ſays, from thence they were ſcattered; and becauſe of the diverſity of language, formed colonies every where, and every one ſeized on that land which offered to him. Theſe writers indeed ſeem to be miſtaken as to the deſtruction of the tower, and that by tempeſtuous winds; otherwiſe they agree with Moſes in the confuſion of languages, and ſcattering of the people at the tower of Babel: in what year this was done is not certain; it was in the days of Peleg, who was born in the year 101 after the flood; and if it was at the time of his birth, as many are of opinion, both Jews [r] and chriſtians, it muſt be in the above year; but the phraſe uſed does not determine that: the eaſtern writers [s] ſay, that it was in the 40th year of the life of Peleg, and then it muſt be in the year after the flood 141; but others, and which is the common opinion of the Jewiſh chronologers [t], ſay, it was at the end of Peleg's days; and whereas he lived 239 years, this muſt happen in the year 340 after the flood; and ſo it was 10 years, as they obſerve, before the death of Noah, and when Abraham was 48 years of age. But of this ſee more in Buxtorf's diſſertation concerning the confuſion of the Hebrew language. It follows here, and they left off to build the city; it ſeems they had finiſhed the tower, but not the city, and therefore are only ſaid to leave off building that; though the Samaritan and Septuagint verſions add, and the tower; for not underſtanding one another, they were not able to go on with their work, for when they aſked for one thing, as before obſerved out of Jarchi, they had another brought them; which ſo enraged them, that the Targum of Jonathan ſays they killed one another; and ſay ſome Jewiſh writers [u], they fought one with another upon this occaſion, until half the world fell by the ſword.

℣. 9. Therefore is the name of it called Babel, &c.] The name of the city mentioned, and the tower alſo, which ſignifies confuſion, as the Septuagint verſion renders it; and ſo Joſephus [w] ſays the Hebrews call confuſion Babel: perhaps this name was given it by the ſons of Eber, or it might be a common name preſerved in all languages, as ſome are; and tho' the firſt builders deſiſted from going on with building it, yet it ſeems that afterwards Nimrod went on with it, and compleated it, and made it the beginning of his kingdom, or his capital city; and perhaps he and his family might continue after the confuſion and diſperſion ſomewhere near unto it, ſee Gen. x. 10. The reaſon of its name is given, becauſe the Lord did there confound the language of all the earth; and therefore it is falſe what is ſaid by ſome, that the above city had its name from Babylon, the ſon of Belus: and from thence did the Lord ſcatter them abroad upon the face of all the earth; which is repeated for the confirmation of it, and that it might be taken notice of and obſerved as a very wonderful and important event. Theſe Babel-builders were an emblem of ſelf-righteous perſons, who, as thoſe were, are the greater part of the world, and under different forms of religion are all upon the ſame foot of a covenant of works; they all ſpeak the ſame language; and indeed all men naturally do, declaring and ſeeking for juſtification by their own works; and journey from the eaſt, depart from Chriſt, one of whoſe names is the eaſt, or riſing ſun; they turn their backs on him and his righteouſneſs; build on a plain, not on a rock or mountain, but on the ſandy bottom of their own works, in a land of Shinar, or ſhaking, on a tottering foundation; their view is to get themſelves a name, to be ſeen of men, and be applauded for their work-ſake, and that they might reach heaven, and get to it this way; but the iſſue of all is confuſion and ſcattering abroad; for upon the foot of their own righteouſneſs they can never enter into the kingdom of heaven.

℣. 10. Theſe are the generations of Shem, &c.] Or a genealogy of the poſterity of Shem; not of all of them, only of thoſe of the line which led to Abraham, by which might appear the true line in which the Meſſiah from Adam through Abraham ſprung: Shem was 100 years old, and begat Arphaxad 2 years after the flood; by which it is pretty plain that he was younger than Japheth; ſee the note on ch. x. 21. of Arphaxad his ſon, ſee the note on ch. x. 22.

℣. 11. And Shem lived, after he begat Arphaxad, 500 years, &c.] So that his whole age was 600 years, and therefore muſt live to the times of Abraham, and even throughout the life of that patriarch, or near the end of it; and if he was the ſame with Melchizedek, as is the general opinion of the Jews, and is embraced by many chriſtians, they had an interview with each other: and begat ſons and daughters; of whom we have no account, becauſe the Meſſiah did not ſpring from them; the deſign of this genealogy being to carry down his direct line from Shem to Abraham: it is to be obſerved, that in the account of the patriarchs, and their children after the flood, it is not added as before the flood, and he died, their lives being long, that remark is made; but the lives of theſe being ſhorter, ℣. 12. And Arphaxad lived 35 years, and begat Salah.] Arphaxad is the firſt on record that had a ſon born to him ſo early; of Salah, ſee the note in ch. x. 24.

℣. 13. And Arphaxad lived after he begat Salah, 403 years, &c.] In all 438; the Vulgate Latin wrongly reads, 303: and begat ſons and daughters; not mentioned by name: he died, as the above Arabic writer [z] ſays, in the month Niſan, A. M. 2696. and a Jewiſh writer [a] ſays, he died in the 48th year of Iſaac, and who alſo ſays [b], that in his days they began to build the city of Babel.

℣. 15. And Salah lived after he begat Eber, 403 years, &c.] In all 433: and begat ſons and daughters; of whom alſo there is no other account: the ſame Arabic writer [c] ſays, he died in the month Adar, which is called Barhamath, at the cloſe of A. M. 2950. and the Jewiſh chronologer [d] ſays, he died in the 14th year of Jacob.

℣. 16. And Eber lived 34 years and begat Peleg.] Of Peleg, ſee the note on ch. x. 25.

℣. 17. And Eber lived after he begat Peleg, 430 years, &c.] All the years of his life were 464: and he begat ſons and daughters; one of which is elſewhere mentioned, whoſe name is Joktan, ch. x. 25. according to the above Jewiſh writer [e], he died in the 79th year of Jacob.

℣. 18. And Peleg lived 30 years, and begat Reu.] Or Ragau, as he is called in the Septuagint verſion, the letter ע being pronounced as a G, as in Gaza and Gomorrah: he is ſuppoſed to give name to a large plain called Ragau near Aſſyria, about Tigris and Euphrates, Judith. i. 5. and to Ragis in Media, Tobit. iv. 1. where Strabo [f] makes mention of a city of the ſame name.

℣. 19. And Peleg lived after he begat Reu 209 years, &c.] In all 239, little more than half the age of his father: and begat ſons and daughters; but not named: the Arabic writers [g] ſay, he begat Melchizedek the prieſt, and that he died in the month Elul, A. M. 3126. and a Jewiſh writer [h] ſays, he died in the 48th year of Abraham.

℣. 20. And Reu lived 32 years, and begat Serug.] He is thought to give name to a city called Sarug, which, according to the Arabic geographer [i] was near Charræ or Haran in Chaldea; and another Arabic writer * ſpeaks of a city called to this day سروج Sarug, which he places in Meſopotamia.

℣. 21. And Reu lived after he begat Serug 207 years, &c.] So that the whole of his life was 239 years, the exact age of his father: in his days various kingdoms aroſe; according to the Arabic writer [k] in the 130th year of his life began Nimrod to reign at Babylon, the firſt king that reigned on earth: and according to the Jewiſh writers [l], in his days began the kingdom of Egypt, which continued to the times of Octavian; and the kingdom of the Bohemians, the metropolis of which was Prague, and the kingdom of the Amazons, which continued to the times of Alexander: in his time alſo, the Arabic writers [m] ſay, idolatry prevailed, the worſhip of the ſun, moon and ſtars, and other things; and images of men and women, were made by the Babylonians and Egyptians, and worſhipped by them: and he begat ſons and daughters; of whom no account is given; according to a Jewiſh writer [n], he died in the 75th year of Abraham.

℣. 22. And Serug lived 30 years, and begat Nahor.] The grandfather of Abraham, one of the ſame name was Abraham's brother, ℣. 26.

℣. 23. And Serug lived after he begat Nahor 200 years, &c.] The years of his life were 230: and he begat ſons and daughters; no where elſe mentioned: he died, according to the above Jewiſh writer [o], in the 100th year of Abraham, and in his days, according to the eaſtern writers [p], idolatry began, and the kingdom of Damaſcus was ſet up [q]; and Samirus king of the Chaldeans invented weights and meaſures, weaving ſilk, and the art of dying [r].

℣. 24. And Nahor lived 29 years, and begat Terah.] The father of Abraham, and the firſt of the patriarchs of this line of Shem that fell off from the true religion to idolatry.

℣. 25. And Nahor lived after he begat Terah 119 years, &c.] In all 148 years; ſo ſenſibly did the lives of the patriarchs decreaſe: in the days of Nahor, the Arabic writers [s] ſay, was a great earthquake, which had never been obſerved before; idolaters increaſing and offering their children to dæmons, God raiſed a tempeſt like a deluge, which broke their images and deſtroyed their temples in Arabia, and covered them in heaps of ſand, which remained to the days of thoſe writers, as they affirm: in his days it is alſo ſaid Spain, Portugal and Arragon were founded [t]: and begat ſons and daughters; of whom no other account is given: he died, as a Jewiſh chronologer ſays [u], in the 110th year of Abraham.

℣. 26. And Terah lived 70 years, and begat Abram, Nahor and Haran.] Abram, though named firſt, does not appear to be the eldeſt, but rather Haran; nay, it ſeems pretty plain that Abram was not born until the 130th year of his father's life, for Terah was 205 years old when he died, ℣. 32. and Abram was but 75 years of age when he went out of Haran to Canaan, ch. xii. 4. and that was as ſoon as his father died there; and ſo that if 75 are taken out of 205, there will remain 130, in which year and not before Abram muſt be born: the wife of Terah, of whom Abram was born, according to the Jewiſh writers [x], her name was Chamtelaah, the daughter of Carnebo, or as others [y] call her, Amthalai; but by the Arabic writers [z] ſhe is called Juna: the Jews ſay [a] Terah was the firſt that found out the way of coining money, and that in his days men began to worſhip images, and that he

he was the chief of their prieſts, but afterwards repented; and that he was an idolater appears from Joſh. xxiv. 2.

℣. 27. Now theſe are the generations of Terah, &c.] Or the genealogy of his poſterity, which is a very ſhort one; for it only gives an account of his three ſons as before, Terah begat Abram, Nabor and Haran; and of three grand children, Lot, Milcah and Iſcah, the children of Haran; and chiefly for the ſake of Abram it is given, and indeed the above genealogy of Shem, which ends with him; and of whom and whoſe poſterity the remaining part of this book of Geneſis treats: and Haran begat Lot; of whom we have ſome further account in ch. xiii. xiv. xix.

℣. 28. And Haran died before his father Terah, &c.] In his father's preſence, before his face, in his life-time, as Jarchi; he ſeeing him, as Aben Ezra: it does not ſo much reſpect the time of his death, that it was before his father, though that is true, as the place where he died, his father being preſent there at the time this was: in the land of his nativity, in Ur of the Chaldees; Ur, which Ben Melech renders a valley, was the place of his birth, as it was of Abram's; it was in Meſopotamia, that part of it next to Aſſyria being called the land of the Chaldeans; hence theſe are ſpoken of as the ſame by Stephen, Acts vii. 2. 4. mention is made by Pliny [b], of a place in thoſe parts called Ura, which ſeems to be the ſame with this: Eupolemus [c] ſays, "that Abram was born at Camarine, a city of Babylon, ſome call Urie, and is interpreted a city of the Chaldeans," now Camarine, is from כמר Camar, to heat or burn, and Ur ſignifies fire, ſo that both words are of the ſame ſignification: Joſephus [d] ſays, that Haran died among the Chaldeans, in a city called Ur of the Chaldees, where, he adds, his grave is ſhewn to this day: the Jews [e] have a fable concerning the death of Haran; they ſay that Terah was not only an idolater but a maker and ſeller of images; and that one day going abroad, he left his ſon Abraham in the ſhop to ſell them, who, during his father's abſence, broke them all to pieces, except one; upon which, when Terah returned and found what was done, he had him before Nimrod, who ordered him to be caſt into a burning furnace, and he ſhould ſee whether the God he worſhipped would come and ſave him; and whilſt he was in it, they aſked his brother Haran in whom he believed? he anſwered, if Abraham overcomes, he would believe in his God, but if not, in Nimrod; wherefore they caſt him into the furnace, and he was burnt; and with reſpect to this it is ſaid, and Haran died before the face of Terah his father; but Abraham came out ſafe before the eyes of them all.

℣. 29. And Abram and Nahor took them wives, &c.] Very probably after the death of their elder brother Haran, whoſe daughters they married, at leaſt one of them did, and ſome think both; the name of Abraham's wife was Sarai: it is not ſaid whoſe daughter ſhe was, unleſs ſhe is the ſame with Iſcah, the daughter of Haran, and ſo had two names, Iſcah her name before marriage, Sarai after it, Abram calling her my miſtreſs, as Sarai ſignifies, as ſhe called him my lord; ſo the Targum of Jonathan, Iſcah, this is Sarai; in like manner Jarchi, Baalhatturim, and other Jewiſh writers [f], take them to be the ſame; but according to ch. xx. 12. Sarai ſhould be the daughter of Terah, the father of Abraham, by another woman; and ſo the Arabic writers [g] ſay, "the mother of Abraham died, whoſe name was Juna; and Terah married another wife, whoſe name was Lahazib; ſhe bore him Sarah, whom Abraham afterwards married:" and the name of Nahor's wife Milcah, the daughter of Haran, the father of Milcah, and the father of Iſcah: ſo that Nahor married his brother's daughter, which ſort of marriage was then allowed of, as formerly that of own brothers and ſiſters, but afterwards was ſtrictly forbidden in the Levitical law: this account is given of Nahor's wife, as Aben Ezra obſerves, to ſhew the pedigree of Rebekah, Rachel and Leah: ſome think, as before obſerved, that Abram married the other daughter of his brother Haran, Iſcah, and that ſhe is the ſame with Sarai; and indeed, without ſuppoſing that, it is difficult to conceive, for what reaſon this ſhould be obſerved, that Haran the father of Milcah, was alſo the father of Iſcah; and if Sarai is not Iſcah, no account is given by Moſes of her deſcent, which may ſeem ſtrange; and it can hardly be thought he would omit it, when it muſt be ſo agreeable to his people to know from whom they deſcended, both by the father's and mother's ſide.

℣. 30. But Sarai was barren, ſhe had no child.] Aben Ezra obſerves, there are ſome that ſay that Abraham was impotent, and not Sarai barren; the very reverſe of the ſcriptures; but as he rightly adds, his ſon Iſhmael and his ſons by Keturah ſhew the contrary, ſee Gen. xv. 2. and xvi. 1.

℣. 31. And Terah took Abram his ſon, and Lot the ſon of Haran, his ſon's ſon, and Sarai his daughter in law, his ſon Abram's wife, &c.] Many words are made uſe of in deſcribing Lot and Sarai, and yet ſtill we are left pretty much in the dark, who Sarai was; for, as Aben Ezra obſerves, if ſhe was the ſiſter of Abram and daughter of Terah, the ſcripture would have ſaid, Terah took Abram his ſon and Sarai his daughter, and wife of Abram; and if ſhe was the ſiſter of Lot, it would have ſaid, and Sarai the daughter of his ſon, as it does of Lot: and they went forth with them from Ur of the Chaldees, to go into the land of Canaan; that is, as Jarchi interprets it, Terah and Abram went forth with Lot and Sarai, or with them may mean with Nahor and Milcah; for Joſephus [h] ſays, that all went into Charan of Meſopotamia, the whole family of Terah; and the Arabic hiſtorian [i] is expreſs for it, "Terah went out from Choraſan, and with him, Abram, Nahor, Lot, his children, and their wives, and he went to Charan, where he dwelt:" and it is certain, if Nahor and his wife did not ſet out with them, they followed them afterwards, for Haran was the city of Nahor, where his family in after-times dwelt, ſee Gen. xxiv. 10. 15. and xxvii. 43. and xxix. 4, 5. what moved Terah to depart from Ur of the Chaldees ſeems to be the call of God to Abram, which, though after related, was previous to this; and he acquainting his father Terah with it, he liſtened to it, being now convinced of his idolatry and converted from it, and readily obeyed the divine will; and being the father of Abram is repreſented as the head of the family, as he was, and their leader in this tranſaction; who encouraged their departure from the idolatrous country in which they were, and ſet out out with them to ſeek another, where they might more freely and ſafely worſhip the true God. Tho' Joſephus [i] repreſents it in this light, that Terah hating the country of Chaldea, becauſe of the mourning of Haran, he and all his went out from thence: and they came unto Haran, and dwelt there; which Joſephus [k] calls Charan of Meſopotamia, and yet Stephen ſpeaks of Abraham being in Meſopotamia before he dwelt in Charan; but then Meſopotamia is to be taken both in a more general and a more limited ſenſe; in general, it took in Meſopotamia and Chaldea, and in the eaſtern part of it was Ur of the Chaldees, and when Abram came from thence to Haran, he came into Meſopotamia, ſtrictly ſo called. Stephen calls it Charran; it is by Herodian [l] called Καρραι, by Ptolemy [m] Carræ, by Pliny [n] Carra, a city famous in Lucan [o] for the ſlaughter of Craſſus, by whom it is called an Aſſyrian city. Benjamin of Tudela [p] ſpeaks of it as in being in his time, and as two days journey from the entrance into the land of Shinar or Meſopotamia; and ſays, that in that place where was the houſe of Abraham, there is no building on it, but the Iſhmaelites (the Mahometans) honour the place and come thither to pray. Rauwolf, who was in this town A. D. 1575. calls it Orpha; his account of it is this [q], that it is a coſtly city, with a caſtle ſituated on the hill very pleaſantly; that the town is very pleaſant, pretty big, with fortifications well provided; and that ſome ſay, it was antiently called Haran and Charras: a later traveller [r] ſays, who alſo calls it Orpha, "the air of this city is very healthful, and the country fruitful; that it is built four-ſquare, the weſt part ſtanding on the ſide of a rocky mountain, and the eaſt part trendeth into a ſpacious valley, repleniſhed with vineyards, orchards and gardens: the walls are very ſtrong, furniſhed with great ſtore of artillery, and contain in circuit three Engliſh miles, and for the gallantneſs of its ſight, it was once reckoned the metropolitical ſeat of Meſopotamia." What detained Terah and his family here, when they intended to go further, is not ſaid. Aben Ezra ſuggeſts, that the agreeableneſs of the place to Terah cauſed him to continue there; but it is very probable he was ſeized with a diſeaſe which obliged them to ſtay here, and of which he died.

℣. 32. And the days of Terah were 205 years, &c.] His days are ſummed up as none of the reſt are in this genealogy, that it might be obſerved; his death being the æra of Abram's leaving Chaldea and coming into the land of Canaan, given to him and his ſeed for an inheritance; ſee Acts vii. 4, 5. and Terah died in Haran: the Arabic hiſtorian [s] ſays, he died in Haran in the month Elul, in the year of his age 265; but he gives him 60 years too many: a Jewiſh chronologer [t] ſays, he died in the 35th year of Iſaac. Perhaps he gave the name to this place, where he dwelt a while, in memory of his ſon Haran, which before might be called by another name, Padan Aram, as it ſeems to be called even after this; ſee Gen. xxiv. 10. and xxv. 20. and xxviii. 2. 5, 10. and xxix. 4, 5.

CHAP. XII.

IN this chapter an account is given of the call of Abraham to depart from his own country, with a promiſe of a divine bleſſing, ℣. 1, 2, 3. of his obedience to it, ℣. 4, 5. of his journey through the land of Canaan, and of the Lord's appearance to him in it, and his promiſe of it to his ſeed, and of Abram's building altars in it, and calling on the name of the Lord, ℣. 6, 7, 8, 9. and of a famine there, which occaſioned him to go into Egypt, ℣. 10. where, through fear of being ſlain, he deſired his wife to call herſelf his ſiſter, ℣. 11, 12, 13. and ſhe being greatly admired by the Egyptians for her beauty, it went well with Abram for her ſake, ℣. 14, 15, 16. but the Egyptians were plagued becauſe of her, who, when they underſtood ſhe was Abram's wife, ſent them both away, and all that belonged to them, ℣. 17, 18, 19, 20.

℣. 1. Now the Lord had ſaid unto Abram, &c.] In Ur of the Chaldees, before he came and dwelt in Charran, as ſeems from Acts vii. 2. and ſo Aben Ezra interprets it; but Jarchi and others think, that what follows was ſaid to him in Haran, and ſo the words may be more literally rendred [u], and the Lord ſaid unto Abram; after the death of Terah, who died in Haran; and indeed it is highly probable, there were two appearances of God to Abram, and that the ſame words, or very near the ſame, were ſpoken to him at two ſeveral times, firſt in Ur of the Chaldees and then in Haran: get thee out of thy country; the land of Chaldea, and the city of Ur, which was in it, or out of Meſopotamia, in which, when taken in a large ſenſe, were both Ur and Haran; and this country was now become idolatrous, for though it was firſt inhabited and peopled by the poſterity of Shem in the time of Arphaxad, yet theſe, in proceſs of time, degenerated from the true religion and fell into idolatry. The ſame Maimonides [w] calls Zabæans, in whoſe faith and religion, he ſays Abram was brought up, and who aſſerted there was no other God but the ſun, moon and ſtars; and theſe Zabæans, as he relates from their books and annals, ſay of Abram themſelves, that he was educated in Cuthia, and diſſented from the common people; and aſſerted, that beſides the ſun, there was another creator; to whom they objected, and ſo diſputes aroſe among them on this ſubject: now Abram being convinced of idolatry, is called out from thoſe people, and to have no fellowſhip with them; it is literally in the Hebrew text [x], go to thee out of thy country; for thy profit and good, as Jarchi interprets it; as it muſt be to quit all ſociety with ſuch an idolatrous and ſuperſtitious people: and from thy kindred; as Nahor his brother, and his family, who are are not mentioned, and ſeem to be left behind when Terah, Abram, Lot, and Sarai came out of Ur of the Chaldees; though it looks as if afterwards Nahor did follow them to Haran or Padan-Aram, which are the ſame, and where he continued, and therefore is called his city; ſee Gen. xxiv. 10. and xxv. 20. and xxviii. 2, 5, 10. and xxix. 4, 5. ſo with great propriety Abram might be called a ſecond time to leave his kindred as well as his country; and certain it is, Haran, or Padan-Aram, as well as Ur of the Chaldees, is called by himſelf his country, and Nahor and his family, his kindred, Gen. xxiv. 4. and from thy father's houſe; or houſhold, his family, which better agrees with the ſecond call at Haran, than with the firſt at Ur; for, upon the firſt call, Terah and his family came along with Abram, and therefore this phraſe is omitted by Stephen, who ſpeaks of that call, Acts vii. 3. but Terah dying at Haran, his houſe or family went no farther, but continued there with Nahor; only Abram and Lot, upon this ſecond call, went from thence, as the following hiſtory makes it appear; and ſo Abram left, as he was bid, his father's houſe and family to go, as it follows: unto a land that I will ſhew thee; meaning the land of Canaan, though not mentioned, and ſeems to be omitted for the trial of Abram's faith; hence the author of the epiſtle to the Hebrews, ch. xi. 8. obſerves, that he obeyed and went out, not knowing whither he went; and yet it is ſaid, that, when he and Terah came out of Ur of the Chaldees, they went forth to go into the land of Canaan, ch. xi. 31. and, when he and Lot went firſt from Haran, the ſame is ſaid of them, ℣. 5. it is probable the caſe was this; there was no mention made at firſt what land he was to go to, and when he prepared for his journey, he knew not where he was to go, but afterwards it was revealed to him that Canaan was the land, and therefore ſet out in order to go thither; and ſtill, though he might know the place by name where he was to go, he might neither know the way to it, nor what ſort of country it was for quality or quantity; and therefore God promiſes to ſhew him the way, and direct his courſe right unto it, and give him a view of it, that he might ſee what ſort of a country and how large it was, that he would give to his poſterity. This call of Abram is an emblem of the call of men by the grace of God out of the world, and from among the men of it, and to renounce the things of it, and not be conformed unto it, and to forget their own people and their father's houſe, and to cleave to the Lord, and follow him whitherſoever he directs them.

℣. 2. And I will make of thee a great nation, &c.] In a literal ſenſe, as the people of the Jews were that deſcended from him, and in a ſpiritual ſenſe believers in all ages and of all nations, that walk in the ſteps of the faith of Abram, who are his children, and are bleſſed with him: and I will bleſs thee; not only with temporal bleſſings, but principally with ſpiritual ones, ſince Abram in perſon had no ſhare of the land of Canaan; even with the adoption of children and friendſhip with God; with juſtification by the imputed righteouſneſs of Chriſt, which bleſſedneſs came upon him when uncircumciſed; with a large meaſure of faith and every other grace; with the ſanctification of the ſpirit, and an increaſe of it, until brought to perfection; and with eternal glory and happineſs, a right, title and meetneſs for it, and the full poſſeſſion of it: and make thy name great; as it was among the Jews his deſcendants, who boaſted of having Abram for their father; and among the ſeveral nations of the world; his name is famous in prophane hiſtory, and is in high eſteem with the Mahometans to this day; and eſpecially his name is great and famous, and the memory of him precious, among all thoſe who have obtained like precious faith with him, in every age and in every nation: and thou ſhalt be a bleſſing; to all that knew him and converſed with him, they receiving ſpiritual light and knowledge by means of his inſtruction, and to all that ſhould hear and read of his faith and piety, being encouraged by his example: or, ſhall be bleſſing; bleſſing itſelf, that is, moſt bleſſed, exceedingly bleſſed; as a very wicked man may be called wickedneſs itſelf, as ſcelus for ſceleſtus with the Latins; ſo a good man may be called bleſſing itſelf, extremely happy.

℣. 3. And I will bleſs them that bleſs thee, &c.] Not the prieſts only that ſhould bleſs his children, the children of Iſrael, as the Targum of Jonathan, but all men of all nations, and of every age, that ſpeak well of him, commend him for his faith and holineſs, and tread in his ſteps, theſe are bleſſed with faithful Abraham, Gal. iii. 7, 9. And curſe him that curſeth thee; here is a change of numbers before the plural, here the ſingular, denoting, it may be, that many would bleſs him, and but few curſe him, and that every individual perſon that did curſe him, ſhould be curſed himſelf: the Targum of Jonathan wrongly reſtrains this to Balaam's curſing Abraham's children, and was curſed by God; Maimonides[y] thinks, there is no doubt to be made of it, that the Zabæans, the idolatrous people Abram was brought up with, when he contradicted them, loaded him with curſes and reproaches; and, becauſe he bore them all patiently, for the glory of God, as became him, therefore theſe words are ſaid; but they, without queſtion, reſpect future as well as preſent times, and regard all ſuch, in every age and of every nation, that diſapproves of, or rejects and reproaches Abram's God, his faith, his religion, and his people. And in thee ſhall all families of the earth be bleſſed; that is, in his ſeed, as in ch. xxii. 18. and which is interpreted of Chriſt, Acts iii. 25. Gal. iii. 8, 16. meaning not every individual of all the families or nations of the earth; but that as many as believe in Chriſt, of all nations, are bleſſed in him; and that whoever of them are bleſſed, they are bleſſed and only bleſſed in him, and that they are bleſſed for his ſake with all ſpiritual bleſſings; ſee Eph. i. 3. ſuch as redemption, juſtification, remiſſion of ſins, ſanctification, adoption, and eternal life.

℣. 4. So Abram departed, as the Lord had ſpoken unto him, &c.] Or, when the Lord had ſpoken to him, as Coccius renders the words; when he had called him a ſecond time, even when in Haran, immediately after the death of his father Terah; as ſoon as ever the words were ſpoken to him before recorded, he immediately prepared and got all things ready for his journey, and departed from Haran, as he had done before from Ur of the Chaldees: and Lot went with him; of his own accord, and he only, beſides his wife Sarai and his ſervants, for Terah was dead, and Nahor and his family ſtayed behind. And Abram was 75 years old when he departed out of Haran; by which it appears, as has been obſerved, that he was not Terah's eldeſt ſon, born when he was 70 years of age, ch. xi. 26. for then he muſt have been at this time 135 years old, ſince his father, who was juſt now dead, lived to be be 205 years old, ch. xi. 32. so that Abram must be born in the 130th year of Terah: how many years before this time he was converted from idolatry, cannot be said with any certainty; various are the accounts given by the Jewish writers; some say, that at 3 years of age he knew his Creator; others at 8; others 13; others more probably when 40; others 51; others 52; and others say he was 60 years old when he began publickly to assert the unity of God in heaven [z]: however, all agree it was before the age here mentioned, as it may well be concluded.

℣. 5. And Abram took Sarai his wife, and Lot his brother's son, &c.] The son of Haran his brother, not against their wills, but with their full consent: Sarai went readily with him, not only as being his wife, and so obliged by the law of marriage and tie of relation, but on the score of religion; and Lot as being a good man, and so willing to go with him, as his near relation too, for the sake of religion. And all their substance that they had gathered; either in Ur of the Chaldees, or in Haran, and indeed in both; which, as it was their own property, they had a right to take with them, and it was their wisdom so to do, both for the support of their families, and for the service of religion; and it appears from hence, that they were not slothful, but industrious persons, and by the blessing of God were succeeded in their employments: and the souls that they had gotten in Haran; the more excellent part of man being put for the whole; and the meaning is, either that were procreated [a], as some render it, or begotten by them; for, though Abram had no children, Lot had, and possibly some that might be begotten whilst there; and their servants might have children by their fellow-servants, and to which Abram and Lot had a right, and therefore took them with them; or rather it means servants which they had bought with their money there, and so had gotten or obtained them as their own property: some understand it of the proselytes made during their stay there; and no doubt they were as industrious in spreading and propagating the true religion, as in acquiring substance and servants; and to this sense are the several Chaldee paraphrases; that of Onkelos is, "and the souls which they made sub-"ject to the law in Haran;" the Targums of Jerusalem and Jonathan are, "and the souls of the "proselytes, or which they proselyted in Haran;" and with this agrees the note of Jarchi, "which "they brought under the wings of the Shekinah; "Abram proselyted the men, and Sarai the wo-"men;" though in the literal sense he takes it to be, the acquiring of servants and handmaids; there might be of both sorts, both proselytes and servants bought with money, which made up the number of 318 trained servants, Gen. xiv. 14. how long Abram stayed in Haran is not certain, it must be some time, to gather more substance, increase servants, and make proselytes; the Jews [b] generally say he was there 5 years. And they went forth to go into the land of Canaan, and into the land of Canaan they came; which last clause is very fitly added, since, when they came out of Ur, they went forth to go into the land of Canaan, ch. xi. 31. but they did not then come into it, but stopped by the way at Haran; but now, when they went out from thence, they proceeded on in their journey, and made no stay any where, of any length, until they came into the land of Canaan; which is reckoned to be 300 miles from the one to the other, and by some 400 to Sichem, and a troublesome way through the deserts of Palmyrene, and over the mountains of Lebanon and Hermon [c]: of Ura Pliny says [d], which seems to be the same with Ur, it is a place where, turning to the east, we leave the Palmyrene deserts of Syria, which belong to the city Petra, and the country called Arabia Felix; and, as it was at the northern part of Canaan they entered, they must come over Lebanon, which was the northern border of it.

℣. 6. And Abram passed through the land, &c.] Entering the northern part of it, as appears by his going southward, ℣. 9. he went on unto the place of Sichem, unto the plain of Moreh; the place afterwards called Shechem, from a prince of that name in the times of Jacob; and so it was called when Moses wrote, and therefore, by way of anticipation, calls it so here; it was about the middle of the land of Canaan, and the same with Sychar, a city of Samaria, in the times of Christ, John iv. 5. Moreh was the name of a man, from whence the plain took its name, which was near Sichem; some render it the oak of Moreh [e], perhaps the same with that in ch. xxxv. 4. or a grove of oaks of that name; the Syriac and Arabic versions render it the oak of Mamre wrongly. And the Canaanite was then in the land; in that part of the land where they were in Jacob's time, see ch. xxxiv. 40. this land belonged to the posterity of Shem, but Canaan's offspring seized upon it and held it, as they did in the times of Moses, but were then quickly to be removed from it; but now they were settled in it in Abram's time, which was a trial of his faith, in the promise of it to his seed, as well as it was troublesome and dangerous to be in a country where such wicked and irreligious persons lived.

℣. 7. And the Lord appeared unto Abram, &c.] Perhaps in an human form, and so it was the son of God; for whenever there was any visible appearance of a divine person, under the former dispensation, it seems to be always of the essential word, that was to be incarnate, and who spake with an articulate voice: and said, unto thy seed will I give this land; the whole of it inhabited by Canaanites and others; and it was for this end chiefly that Abram was called out of Chaldea into Canaan, to be shown the land, and have the grant of it for his posterity: and there builded an altar unto the Lord, who appeared unto him; by way of gratitude and thankfulness for his kind and gracious appearance, and for the gift of the land of Canaan to his offspring; for on this altar he no doubt offered sacrifice in a way of thanksgiving, as Noah did when he came out of the ark.

℣. 8. And he removed from thence unto a mountain on the east of Bethel, &c.] As it was afterwards called by Jacob, which before and at this time had the name of Luz, Gen. xxviii. 19. now to the east of this place was a mountain, whither Abram removed his tent from Sichem, which was about 20 miles from it, as Sir Walter Raleigh [f] observes, some say 28 [g]: and pitched his tent; that is, upon the mountain, as before upon the plain, fitly representing the state of the people of God, as sojourners journers in this world, living like Abram in tents and tabernacles, having no abiding place: having Bethel on the weſt, or on the ſea [h], the Mediterranean ſea, which Aben Ezra calls the Spaniſh ſea, and lay to the weſt of the land of Canaan: and Hai on the eaſt; the ſame which is called Ai, and ſaid to be on the eaſt ſide of Bethel, Joſh. vii. 2. hard by this place, Rauwolff [i] ſays, you ſhall ſtill find ſome old ruins of old ſtones, where firſt Abraham the patriarch did build a tent, as you read in Gen. xii. 8. and he ſays that Bethel is ſtill called to this day Bethiſella, and is ſituated half a league farther towards the weſt, at the foot of the hill, in a very fruitful country: and there he builded an altar unto the Lord; as he had done at Sichem; for wherever he went he worſhipped God, and offered ſacrifice unto him: and called upon the name of the Lord; prayed unto him for freſh mercies, as well as gave thanks for paſt ones; or, he called in the name of the Lord [k]; he called upon Jehovah the father, in the name of his ſon, the glorious mediator, who had appeared unto him, and whoſe day he ſaw and was glad.

℣. 9. And Abram journeyed, &c.] He did not ſtay long in the mountain between Bethel and Hai, but moved from thence, and kept on journeying in the land of Canaan: going on ſtill toward the ſouth; the ſouthern part of the land of Canaan, which lay neareſt Egypt, into which he is ſaid to go next, the occaſion of which follows.

℣. 10. And there was a famine in the land, &c.] The land of Canaan, which was a very fruitful country, abounding with all kind of proviſions uſually, but now there was a ſcarcity of all; and which was both for the ſins of the inhabitants of the land, and for the trial of Abram's faith, who was brought out of his own country, where was bread enough and to ſpare, into one in which there was a famine; and this might be a temptation to Abram to return from whence he came, and to ſlight and deſpiſe the country that was given him: and Abram went down into Egypt to ſojourn there; not to dwell there, only till the famine was over; and rightly is he ſaid to go down to Egypt, ſince that lay lower than the land of Canaan; and his going thither only to ſojourn, and with an intention to return again to Canaan, ſhows the ſtrength of his faith in the promiſe; and ſo far was he from going back to his own country, from whence he came, that he went directly the contrary, for Chaldee lay north-eaſt of Canaan, and Egypt ſouth-weſt: this country is in the Hebrew text called Mizraim, from the ſecond ſon of Ham, ſee ch. x. 6. it had its name Egypt not from Ægyptus, one of its kings, as ſome [l] ſay, but from the blackiſh colour of its ſoil, and alſo of its river Nile, and of its inhabitants; which colour is by the Greeks called ægyptios, from ægyps, a vulture, a bird of that colour: it is bounded on the ſouth by the kingdom of Sennar, tributary to the king of Ethiopia, and the cataracts of the Nile; on the north by the Mediterranean ſea; on the eaſt by the Arabian gulph, or Red ſea, and the iſthmus of Suez; and on the weſt by a region of Lybia, called Marmorica [m]. For the famine was grievous in the land; in the land of Canaan, and perhaps no where elſe; God ordering it ſo in his wiſe providence, that there ſhould be plenty of food in one land, when there is a ſcarcity in another, that countries may be helpful to one another: of this famine, and of Abram's going down to Egypt on account of it, mention is made by heathen writers; Nicolaus of Damaſcus ſays [n], that Abram came out of Chaldee into Canaan, now called Judea, and a grievous famine being there, and underſtanding there was plenty in Egypt, he readily went thither, partly to partake of their plenty, and partly to hear what the prieſts would ſay of the gods; and Alexander Polyhiſtor relates, from Eupolemus [o], that Abram removed from the place of his nativity, Camarine, called by ſome Urie, and ſettled in Phœnicia, where being a famine, he went with all his family into Egypt and dwelt there.

℣. 11. And it came to paſs, when he was come near to enter into Egypt, &c.] Juſt entering into it, having travelled from the mountain between Bethel and Hai, 240 miles [p]; or when he cauſed to come near [q], either his camp, as Aben Ezra ſupplies it, or his tent, or his family, as others: that he ſaid unto Sarai his wife, behold now, I know that thou art a fair woman to look upon; though 65 years of age, being 10 years younger than her huſband, ſee ch. xvii. 17. who was now 75 years old, ℣. 4. yet might ſtill be a fair woman, having a good complexion and comely features, and having never bore children, and eſpecially ſhe would be reckoned ſo among the Egyptians, whoſe women were of a blackiſh, ſallow, ſwarthy complexion.

℣. 12. Therefore it ſhall come to paſs, when the Egyptians ſhall ſee thee, &c.] Who were a luſtful people, and whoſe eyes would ſoon be faſtened upon, and be taken with the beauty of Sarai: that they ſhall ſay, this is his wife; this beautiful woman is ſuch a man's wife: and they will kill me, but they will ſave thee alive; ſo great a regard had they in thoſe times, and even in heathen countries, to the laws of marriage, that they choſe rather to be guilty of murder than of adultery, though a luſtful people; and therefore would, as Abram feared, take away his life, that it might be free and lawful for them to marry Sarai.

℣. 13. Say, I pray thee, that thou art my ſiſter, &c.] Which though it was not putting a direct lye into her mouth, ſhe being his ſiſter in ſome ſenſe, as appears from ch. xx. 12. yet it was done to conceal truth and to deceive the Egyptians, and tended to endanger his wife's chaſtity, as well as ſhewed great timorouſneſs in him, and diſtruſt of the divine care and protection of him; and upon the whole it muſt be criminal in him, and ſhews that the beſt of men are liable to ſin, and the ſtrongeſt believer to fall, and that a ſaint may fail in the exerciſe of that grace for which he is moſt eminent, as Abram was for his faith, and yet fell into unbelief, and through that into other ſins; this he ſaid to his wife, and deſired her to ſay on occaſion, when ſhe found it neceſſary: that it may be well with me for thy ſake; his life ſpared, as follows: and my ſoul ſhall live becauſe of thee; his life be ſafe and ſecure for her ſake, being reckoned her brother, whereas he feared it would be in the utmoſt danger ſhould it be known ſhe was his wife.

℣. 14. And it came to paſs, that when Abram was come into Egypt, &c.] To the city of Heliopolis; for there it was that Abram had his abode, as Eupolemus [r] ſays, when upon the famine he went into Egypt, and where he converſed with the Egyptian prieſts, priests, and taught them astrology, and other things belonging to it; and of this descent of Abram into Egypt, and teaching astrology, Artapanus [s], another heathen writer, speaks; Abram, he says, having learned the science of astrology, went first into Phœnicia and taught it the Phœnicians, and afterwards went into Egypt, and taught it there. The Egyptains beheld the woman, that she was very fair; Abram knew that Sarai was a fair woman; but in the eyes of the Egyptians she was very fair, exceeding fair, they not being used to see very beautiful women.

℣. 15. The princes also of Pharaoh saw her, and commended her before Pharaoh, &c.] The king of Egypt; so it seems by this, that Abram and Sarai were at the place where the court was kept, which the Arabic writers [t] say was Mesr (or Memphis) the capital of the kingdom. And these princes were the king's courtiers, who taking notice of Sarai, and admiring her beauty, praised her for it to the king, and recommended her to be taken into the number of his wives or concubines, they understanding that she was a single woman, and the sister of Abram; and this they did to gratify their king, and gain his favour: and the woman was taken into Pharoah's house; or palace, as the Jerusalem Targum; his royal palace, as the Targum of Jonathan; very probably into that part of his palace where his women were kept, or to some apartment where she might be purified and prepared for him; and this requiring time, was the means of preserving her from the danger she was exposed unto, see Esth. ii. 8—12. The kingdom of Egypt, according to the Jewish and Arabic writers [u], was set up in the times of Reu, about 300 years before Abram was here; its first king was Mizraim, a son of Ham, the same with the Menes of Herodotus; by whom also mention is made of a king of Egypt, whose name was Pheron [w], which seems to bear some likeness to the name of this king, who by Artapanus [x] is called Pharethone, and whom, he says, Abram taught astrology. It is generally thought, that Pharaoh was a common name to the kings of Egypt, and continued to be so to the times of Ezekiel, as Ptolemy was some time after, and as Cæsar with the Romans: whether this king was the first of the name, is not certain, but probable; according to some [y], he was one of the Hycsi or shepherd-kings. Mr. Bedford [z] calls him Janias, their fifth king, and this was about A. M. 2084, and before Christ 1920. A Jewish chronologer [a] asserts, he was the first Pharaoh, who was in the times of Abram, and that his name was Totis, or Tutis, as the Arabic writers [b], one of which [c] says, that in the times of Serug lived Apiphanus king of Egypt, (the same with Apophis; who according to bishop Usher [d] was this Pharaoh) after him was Pharaoh, the son of Sanes, from whom they (the kings of Egypt) were called Pharaohs. The name of Pharaoh is derived by some [e] from פרע, which signifies both to be free, and to revenge; and so kings were called, because free from laws themselves, and were revengers of them that do evil: but it rather seems to come from the Arabic word [f], which signifies to be above others, and rule over them; and so may be thought to be not the proper name of a man, but an appellative, or the name of an office; or in other words, a king, see Gen. xli. 44. and so it may be always rendered, where it is used, as here, the king's courtiers saw her, and commended her to the king, and she was taken into the king's house; though to this may be objected, that Pharaoh is sometimes called Pharaoh king of Egypt, and then there would be a tautology; wherefore it may be better perhaps to take it in the former sense.

℣. 16. And he intreated Abram well for her sake, &c.] Pharaoh was very complaisant to him, shewed him great respect, and bestowed many favours on him on account of Sarai, whom he took to be his sister, and which were done, that he would consent that she might be his wife: and he had sheep, and oxen, and he-asses, and men-servants, and maid-servants, and she-asses, and camels; which were some at least, if not all, the gifts of Pharaoh to him, or otherwise there seems to be no reason why they should be made mention of here. The Jews say [g], that Pharaoh, because of the love he had to Sarai, gave to her by writing all his substance, whether silver or gold, or servants or farms, and also the land of Goshen for an inheritance; and therefore the children of Israel dwelt in the land of Goshen, because it was Sarai our mother's, say they.

℣. 17. And the Lord plagued Pharaoh and his house with great plagues, &c.] Perhaps with the same sort that Abimelech and his servants were smote with on a like account, chap. xx. 17, 18. The Jews [h] say they were smitten with ulcers; not only Pharaoh was plagued, but those of his household also, his courtiers and servants, who were accessory to the bringing of Sarai into his house: for all this was because of Sarai Abram's wife; or upon the word of Sarai [i], as it may be literally rendered: hence the Jews have a notion, that an angel stood by Sarai with a scourge in his hand, and when Sarai bid him smite Pharaoh, he smote him [k]; but דבר signifies not a word only, but thing, matter and business; and so Onkelos renders it here: and the sense is, that Pharaoh and his courtiers were smitten, because of the affair and business of Sarai; because she was taken by them, and detained in Pharaoh's house, and designed to be made his wife or concubine; and thus for evil intentions was this punishment inflicted; so that evil designs, not brought into execution, are punishable; though the word of Sarai may mean, what she was bid to say, and did.

℣. 18. And Pharaoh called Abram, and said, &c.] Understanding how it was, that Sarai was his wife, which he came at the knowledge of, either by consulting his priests and diviners, as some say, on account of the plagues inflicted; or rather suspecting they were on the account of Sarai, from the nature of them, sent for her, and questioned her about this affair, who confessed the whole matter to him; unless it can be thought that he was warned of God in a dream, as Abimelech was on a like occasion; however he sent for Abram on what intelligence he had, and justly, though gently, reproved him: what is this that thou hast done unto me? to impose upon me, and deceive me after this manner, by giving out that Sarai was thy sister, when she is thy wife; by which means I have been led to prepare to take her for my wife, and have brought plagues upon myſelf and family? and thus he reſented it as an injury done him, as he well might: why didſt thou not tell me that ſhe was thy wife? when he firſt took her into his houſe, and no doubt Abram was preſent then, and very often afterwards was in company with Pharaoh, and converſed with him, having reſpect for him for the ſake of Sarai, he took to be his ſiſter, and yet would never tell him ſhe was his wife.

℣. 19. Why ſaidſt thou, ſhe is my ſiſter? &c.] He could not imagine what could be the reaſon of it, what could induce him to give out ſuch a ſtory as this; for he knew not the fears that Abram was poſſeſſed with, which led him to it, and which might be in a good meaſure groundleſs, or elſe Pharaoh might have gueſſed at the reaſon; or this he ſaid as being willing to be ſatisfied of the true one: ſo I might have taken her to me to wife; ignorantly, and without any ſcruple, ſuppoſing her to have been free; and ſo ſhould have been guilty of taking another man's wife, and of depriving him of her; which with him were crimes he did not chuſe to commit, though polygamy was not accounted any by him, for no doubt he had a wife or wives when about to take Sarai for one: now therefore behold, thy wife, take her and go thy way; Sarai it ſeems was preſent at this interview, who was delivered to her huſband untouched, as his own property, and is ordered to depart the country, that ſo neither the king, nor any of his courtiers or ſubjects might be under any temptation to do him an injury, by violating the chaſtity of his wife. The whole of this affair is related by Eupolemus [l], an heathen hiſtorian, in a few words, in great agreement with this account; only he repreſents Sarai as married to the king of Egypt; he ſays, that Abram, on account of a famine, went to Egypt, with all his family, and there dwelt, and that the king of the Egyptians married his wife, he ſaying ſhe was his ſiſter: he goes on to relate more at large, ſays Alexander Polyhiſtor that quotes him, that the king could not enjoy her, and that his people and family were infected with a plague, upon which he called his diviners or prophets together, who told him, that the woman was not a widow; and when the king of the Egyptians ſo underſtood it, that ſhe was the wife of Abram, he reſtored her to her huſband.

℣. 20. And Pharaoh commanded his men concerning him, &c.] His courtiers and ſervants, not to do him any hurt or injury in his perſon or ſubſtance; who he might ſuppoſe would be enraged at hearing how the king and they had been impoſed upon and deceived; he ordered a guard about him whilſt he was there, and to conduct him, and all that belonged to him, ſafely out of his dominions, as appears by what follows: but Dr. Lightfoot [m] is of opinion, that he gave charge to the Egyptians, making it as it were a law for the time to come, that they ſhould not converſe with Hebrews, nor with foreign ſhepherds, in any ſo near familiarity, as to eat or drink with them, which the Egyptians obſerved ſtrictly ever after, Gen. xlii. 32. and xlvi. 34. and they ſent him away, and his wife, and all that he had; they did not drive him out by force, or in any diſgraceful manner, but being committed to a guard of men, appointed by the king, he had ſafe-conduct out of the land, with his family, and all that he had; all that he brought with him, and all the increaſe he had made there, and all the gifts he had received of the king. The Jews [n] interpret it of the writings and gifts he had given to Sarai; and they [o] obſerve a great likeneſs between Abram's deſcent into Egypt, his being there, and departure out of it, and that of his poſterity in after-ages; as that they both went thither on account of a famine; that they both went down to ſojourn there; and that they both went out with great ſubſtance; with other particulars obſerved by them.

CHAP. XIII.

THIS chapter gives an account of the return of Abram from Egypt to the land of Canaan, and to the ſame place in it he had been before, ℣. 1—4. and of a ſtrife between the herdſmen of Abram and Lot, and the occaſion of it, ℣. 5, 6, 7. which was compoſed by the prudent propoſal of Abram, ℣. 8, 9. upon which they parted; Abram continued in Canaan, and Lot choſe the plain of Jordan, and dwelt near Sodom, a place infamous for wickedneſs, ℣. 10—13. after which the Lord renewed to Abram the grant of the land of Canaan to him, and to his ſeed, ℣. 14—17. and then he removed to the plain of Mamre in Hebron, and there ſet up the worſhip of God, ℣. 18.

℣. 1. And Abram went up out of Egypt, &c.] That country lying low, and ſo more eaſy to be watered by the river Nile, as it was, and Canaan being higher; whither he went, but not till the famine in Canaan ceaſed: he went out of Egypt, as the Jewiſh [p] chronologers ſay, after he had been there 3 months; but Artapanus [q], an heathen writer, ſays, he ſtayed there 20 years: he and his wife, and all that he had; ſervants and cattle: and Lot with him; from whence it is clear, that he went down with him into Egypt, and it is highly probable had great reſpect and favour ſhown him on account of his relation to Abram and Sarai; for it appears by what follows, that he was become very rich: and they all went up into the ſouth; into the ſouthern part of the land of Canaan, for otherwiſe they came to the north; for as Egypt lay ſouth with reſpect to Canaan, Canaan was north from Egypt; but they journeyed to that part of that land which was commonly called the ſouth, either Negeb, as here, or Daroma; ſee the note on Zech. vii. 7.

℣. 2. And Abram was very rich, &c.] He was rich in ſpiritual things, in faith, and in all other graces, and was an heir of the kingdom of heaven; and in temporal things, as it ſometimes is the lot of good men to be, though but rarely, at leaſt to be exceeding rich, as Abram was; or very heavy [r], as the word ſignifies, he was loaded with wealth and riches; and ſometimes an abundance of riches are a burden to a man, and inſtead of making him more eaſy, create him more trouble; and as we may obſerve preſently, were the occaſion of much much trouble to Abram and Lot. Abram's riches lay in cattle, in ſilver, and in gold; cattle are mentioned firſt, as being the principal part of the riches of men in thoſe days, ſuch as ſheep and oxen, he and ſhe-aſſes and camels, ſee ch. xii. 16. and beſides theſe he had great quantities of ſilver and gold: the Jews ſay [s] he coined money in his own name, and that his coin had on one ſide an old man and an old woman, and on the other ſide a young man and a young woman. His riches no doubt were greatly increaſed by the gifts and preſents he received from the king of Egypt during his ſtay there.

℣. 3. And he went on in his journeys from the ſouth, &c.] He took the ſame tour, went the ſame road, ſtopping at the ſame reſting places, as when he went down to Egypt; having learned, as Jarchi obſerves, the way of the earth, that a man ſhould not change his hoſt. Though ſome, as Ben Gerſom, underſtand it of his taking his journeys as were ſuitable for his cattle, as they were able to bear them, and not over-drive them, leſt he ſhould kill them, but made ſhort ſtages, and frequently ſtopped and reſted. And thus he went on through the ſouthern part of the land, until he came even to Bethel; as it was afterwards called, tho' now Luz, ch. xxviii. 19. unto the place where his tent had been at the beginning; when he firſt came into the land of Canaan, to a mountain between Bethel and Hai; afterwards called mount Ephraim, and was four miles from Jeruſalem on the north [t]; ſee ch. xii. 8.

℣. 4. Unto the place of the altar, which he had made there at the firſt, &c.] When he firſt came to that place, and before he went down to Egypt: it is not ſaid he came to the altar, but to the place where it had ſtood, for it ſeems now to have been demoliſhed, either having fallen of itſelf, being made of earth, or had been deſtroyed by the Canaanites, ſince Abram left it; or perhaps it might be pulled down by Abram himſelf before he went from thence, that it might not be uſed and polluted by the idolatrous Canaanites. And there Abram called on the name of the Lord; prayed unto him, and gave him thanks for the preſervation of him and his wife in Egypt; for the ſupport of himſelf and his family there during the famine in Canaan; for the increaſe of his worldly ſubſtance, and for the protection of him, and all that belonged to him in his journey from Egypt thither; and for all the inſtances of his grace, and the rich experiences of his goodneſs he had favoured him with; ſee the note on ch. xii. 8. where the ſame form of expreſſion is uſed.

℣. 5. And Lot alſo which went with Abram, &c.] Into Egypt, and was now come back with him: had flocks, and herds, and tents; flocks of ſheep, and herds of cattle, of oxen, aſſes and camels, and tents for himſelf and his ſervants to dwell in, and put his ſubſtance in.

℣. 6. And the land was not able to bear them that they might dwell together, &c.] That part of the country where Abram and Lot were could not afford them room enough for their ſeveral tents; or however could not furniſh them with ſufficient paſturage for their flocks and herds, they were ſo numerous; at leaſt could not do it ſo as to be contiguous to each other, that there was a neceſſity of one of them going farther off: for their ſubſtance was great, ſo that they could not dwell together; we have before an account of the ſubſtance of each of them, how great it was; and here now is noted an inconvenience which ariſes from a large increaſe of riches, that relations and friends are obliged to part, and can't dwell together; what one would think would make them more comfortable together, is the cauſe and occaſion of their ſeparation.

℣. 7. And there was a ſtrife between the herdmen of Abram's cattle, and the herdmen of Lot's cattle, &c.] Not between the two maſters, but between their ſervants, their upper ſervants, that had the care of their herds to feed them, and water them; and it is very probable their ſtrife was about paſturage and watering places, the one endeavouring to get them from the other, or to get the beſt; which is much more likely than what Jarchi ſuggeſts, that the herdmen of Lot were wicked men, and fed their cattle in the fields of others, and the herdmen of Abram reproved them for their robbery; but they ſaid, the land is given to Abram, and he hath no heir, but Lot is his heir, and what robbery is this? and to this ſenſe are the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem: and the Canaanite, and the Perizzite dwelled then in the land; which obſervation is made by Moſes to point to a reaſon why they could not both of them have a ſufficiency for their large flocks and herds, becauſe the country was in the poſſeſſion of others; and though there was to ſpare, yet not enough for them both. The Canaanite, though it was a general name for the people of the whole land, yet was given to a particular family in it, and was derived from their firſt founder Canaan, the ſon of Ham; the Perizzite was another family or tribe of the ſame nation, who had their name from פרזן a village; theſe being pagans or villagers, living in huts, or houſes, or tents ſcattered up and down in the fields, and were a rough, inhuman and unſociable ſort of people, and therefore it could not be expected that they would oblige them with much paſturage and water for their flocks; and beſides, this may be remarked, partly to ſhew the danger that Abram and Lot were in through the diſſention of their herdmen, ſince thoſe people that were ſo nigh might take the advantage of their quarrels among themſelves, and fall upon them both, and deſtroy them, and therefore a reconciliation was neceſſary; and partly to obſerve the reproach that was like to come upon them, and upon the true religion, for their ſakes, ſhould they differ among themſelves, which ſuch ſort of men would gladly catch at, and improve againſt them.

℣. 8. And Abram ſaid unto Lot, &c.] Being either an ear-witneſs himſelf of the contentions of their ſervants, or having it reported to him by credible perſons, he applied himſelf to Lot, in order to make peace, being a wiſe and good man; and though he was ſenior in years, and ſuperior in ſubſtance, and higher in the claſs of relation, and upon all accounts the greateſt man, yet he makes the propoſal firſt, and lays a ſcheme before Lot for their future friendſhip, and to prevent quarrels, and the miſchievous conſequences of them: let there be no ſtrife, I pray thee, between me and thee; there had been none yet, but it was very likely there would, if the diſſention ſhould go on between their ſervants; they could not well avoid intereſting themſelves in it, when it related to their reſpective properties; and there muſt be a right and wrong in ſuch caſes to be looked into and adjuſted, which might occaſion a difference between them; and this Abram was deſirous of preventing, and therefore be-beſpeaks his kinſman in this loving, affectionate and condeſcending language: and or or between my herdmen and thy herdmen; as he underſtood there was, and which, if not timely put an end to, might be of bad conſequence to them both, eſpecially as to their peace and comfort, giving this excellent reaſon to enforce his requeſt: for we be brethren; or men brethren we be [u]; we are men, let us act like ſuch, the rational and humane part; they were brethren being men, ſo by nature all are brethren; by natural relation, Lot being the ſon of his brother Haran; brethren in religion, of the ſame faith in the one true and living God, and worſhippers of him; and therefore on all accounts, by the ties of nature, relation and religion, they were obliged to ſeek and cultivate peace and love.

℣. 9. Is not the whole land before thee? &c.] Signifying, that though there were not room and convenience for them both in that part of the country in which they were, yet there were in other parts; and though the land was given to Abram, he did not deſire Lot to depart out of it; nay, he ſets it all before him to chuſe what part he would dwell in, which was great condeſcenſion in him: ſeparate thyſelf, I pray thee, from me; not that he was weary of his company and fellowſhip with him, but as things were circumſtanced, a ſeparation was neceſſary for the ſubſiſtence of their herds and flocks, and for the peace and comfort of their reſpective families; nor did he deſire him to go out of the land, or be ſo far from him, that he could be of no advantage to him; but though ſeparate, yet ſo near him as to give him help and aſſiſtance, as there might be occaſion for it, and as there was ſome time after, which appears from the hiſtory of the following chapter. If thou wilt take the left hand, then I will go to the right, or if thou depart to the right hand, then I will go to the left; or as the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan are, "if thou wilt go to the north, I will "go to the ſouth, or if thou wilt go to the ſouth, "I will go to the north:" for when a man ſtands with his face to the eaſt, the principal part, the north is on his left hand, and the ſouth on his right; and this was an uſual way of ſpeaking in the eaſtern countries; but they were not, as Grotius obſerves, Ariſtotelians, who make the eaſt the right hand, and the weſt the left. This was an inſtance of the peaceable diſpoſition of Abram, and of his humility and condeſcenſion to give his nephew leave, who was in all reſpects inferior to him, to make his choice, to go which way he would, and take what part of the country he pleaſed.

℣. 10. And Lot lifted up his eyes, &c.] He immediately fell in with Abram's propoſal, but had not the ingenuity to return back the choice to Abram which he gave him, but took the advantage of it; nor did he ſhew any uneaſineſs or unwillingneſs to part from Abram, though ſo near a relation, and ſo wiſe and good a man, and by whoſe means greatly he had obtained his riches; but without giving himſelf any concern about this, he at once caſt about in his mind where to make his choice; he conſidered within himſelf which was the beſt part of the country, and moſt convenient for his flocks and herds, and where he was moſt likely to increaſe his ſubſtance; for this phraſe chiefly has reſpect to the eyes of the underſtanding, he made uſe of, conſulted with himſelf with his rational powers what was fitteſt to be done; unleſs we can ſuppoſe him ſituated on ſome conſiderable eminence, from whence he could have a view of the whole country he made choice of, as follows: and beheld all the plain of Jordan, that it was well watered; a large plain, full of rich paſturage, which had its name from the river Jordan, which by various windings and turnings ran through it, and which at harveſt-time overflowed its banks, and greatly contributed to the richneſs of the ſoil: before the Lord deſtroyed Sodom and Gomorrah; as he afterwards did by fire from heaven, and then that part of the plain on which thoſe cities ſtood was turned into a ſulphurous lake: even as the garden of the Lord; as any moſt excellent garden that is full of plants and trees, well watered, and well cultivated, and taken care of; as things moſt excellent are ſometimes expreſſed by having the name of God, or the Lord, added to them, as the cedars of God, &c. or as the garden of Eden, which was planted by the Lord, abounding with all kind of trees, and was well watered by a river running through it: and ſome think that the plain of Jordan, and the parts thereabout, were the real garden of Eden; wherefore one learned [w] man takes the as here not to be a note of ſimilitude, but of reality, and not merely comparative but cauſal, giving a reaſon why it was ſo watered, being the garden of God; ſo that the plain was not like unto, but really was the garden of Eden: and another obſerves [x], that the words ſhould be rendered, ſo was the garden of the Lord, as the land of Egypt, and that the repetition of the ſimilitude only makes one compariſon, and not two; not that the plain of Jordan is firſt compared with the garden of the Lord, and then with the land of Egypt; but the plain of Jordan, or garden of the Lord, is only compared with the land of Egypt; and with that undoubtedly it is compared, it being once a year overflowed by the river Jordan, as the land of Egypt was with the Nile, and was a moſt delightful and fruitful ſpot like that: as thou comeſt unto Zoar; which is not to be connected with the land of Egypt, for Zoar was at a great diſtance from Egypt, but with the plain of Jordan, well watered every where till you come to Zoar, at the ſkirts of it, and which is by an anticipation called Zoar; for at this time when Abram and Lot parted, it was called Bela, and afterwards, on another account, had the name of Zoar; ſee ch. xiv. 2. and xix. 20, 22.

℣. 11. Then Lot choſe him all the plain of Jordan, &c.] Becauſe of its good paſturage, and becauſe of the plenty of water there; the want of both which was the inconvenience he had laboured under, and had occaſioned the ſtrife between his and Abram's ſervants: and Lot journeyed eaſt, or eaſtward; for the plain of Jordan, and that part of the land on which Sodom and Gomorrah ſtood, were to the eaſt of Bethel: the phraſe is by ſome rendered from the eaſt [y], and the particle uſed moſt commonly ſo ſignifies; and Jarchi obſerves, that he journeyed from eaſt to weſt; and Aben Ezra ſays, that Sodom was at the weſt of Bethel, in which he is moſt certainly wrong, for it was moſt clearly in the eaſtern part of the land; wherefore others that follow this verſion, interpret it, that he went from the eaſt of Bethel, or he went into that country ſituated at the eaſt with reſpect to the land of Canaan; but it is beſt to render it as we do, eaſt or eaſtward, to or towards the eaſt [z]: and they ſeparated parated themſelves the one from the other; that is, Abram and Lot, they parted good friends by conſent; and the one went with his family, flocks and herds to one place, and ſettled there; and the other in another place, and ſo further animoſities and contentions were prevented.

℣. 12. Abram dwelled in the land of Canaan, &c.] In that part of the land, ſtrictly ſo called, where the family of the Canaanites had their abode; for otherwiſe taking Canaan in a more general ſenſe, the plain of Jordan, and cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, were in the land of Canaan. And Lot dwelled in the cities of the plain; in the neighbourhood of them, or near thoſe cities, which were built on the plain of Jordan, for he could not dwell in more than one, if in one; for it looks as if at his firſt ſettlement he did not dwell in any, but near them all, eſpecially Sodom: ſince it follows, and pitched his tent toward Sodom, or even unto Sodom [a]; and it may be rendered, as it is by ſome, he pitched his tents [b], for himſelf, his family, and his ſervants, his ſhepherds and his herdmen, which reached unto Sodom, and where he afterwards dwelt, at leaſt at the gate of it.

℣. 13. But the men of Sodom were wicked, &c.] Which either he knew not, and ſo ignorantly made this bad choice, to take up his abode among ſuch very wicked men, which occaſioned a great deal of grief, trouble and vexation to him; or if he knew it, the pleaſing proſpect of convenience for his cattle, and of enriching himſelf, was a temptation to him, and prevailed upon him to take ſuch a ſtep; and ſo Jarchi interprets it, although they were ſo, Lot was not reſtrained from dwelling among them: and ſinners before the Lord exceedingly; exceeding great ſinners, guilty of the moſt notorious crimes, and addicted to the moſt ſcandalous and unnatural luſts that can be thought of; and theſe they committed openly and publickly in the ſight of God, in the moſt daring and impudent manner, and in defiance of him, without any fear or ſhame. The Targum of Jonathan reckons up many of their ſins, as defrauding of one another in their ſubſtance, ſinning in their bodies, inceſt, unclean copulation, ſhedding of innocent blood, worſhipping of idols, and rebelling againſt the name of the Lord; ſee Iſ. iii. 9. Ezek. xvi. 49.

℣. 14. And the Lord ſaid unto Abram, after that Lot was ſeparated from him, &c.] The Lord appeared unto him, as he had before, and with an articulate voice ſpoke unto him, to comfort him upon the ſeparation of his kinſman from him, and to renew the grant of the land of Canaan to him and his ſeed, and to aſſure him, that though Lot had choſen the moſt delightful and fruitful part of the country, yet it ſhould not be an inheritance to him and his poſterity, but the whole land ſhould be Abram's and his ſeed's. Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art; being upon mount Ephraim, between Bethel and Hai, ſee ch. xii. 8. and xiii. 3. from whence his view of the land might be extended very far: northward, and ſouthward, and eaſtward, and weſtward; the north of the land of Canaan was mount Lebanon, the ſouth of it Edom or Idumea, the eaſt the plain and river of Jordan, the weſt the Mediterranean ſea; and the word for weſtward here is to the ſea [c]; northward of it was Babylon, ſouthward Egypt, eaſtward Arabia, and weſtward the Mediterranean ſea.

℣. 15. For all the land which thou ſeeſt, to thee will I give it, &c.] Not only ſo much of it as his eye could reach, but all of it, as far as it went, which way ſoever he looked; and this he gave him to ſojourn in now where he pleaſed, and for his poſterity to dwell in hereafter; he gave him the title to it now, and to them the poſſeſſion of it for future times: and to thy ſeed for ever; the meaning is, that he gave it to his poſterity to be enjoyed by them until the Meſſiah came, when a new world would begin; and which Abram in perſon ſhall enjoy, with all his ſpiritual ſeed, after the reſurrection, when that part of the earth will be renewed, as the reſt; and where particularly Chriſt will make his perſonal appearance and reſidence, the principal ſeed of Abram, and will reign a thouſand years, ſee Matt. xxii. 32. and the note there; beſides, this may be typical of the heavenly Canaan given to Abram, and all his ſpiritual ſeed, and which ſhall be enjoyed by them for evermore.

℣. 16. And I will make thy ſeed as the duſt of the earth, &c.] An hyperbolical expreſſion denoting the great multitude of Abram's poſterity, as they were in the days of Solomon, and as they will be in the latter day; and eſpecially as this may reſpect all the ſpiritual ſeed of Abram, Jews and Gentiles, and as they will be in the ſpiritual reign of Chriſt, ſee Hoſ. i. 10, 11. ſo that if a man can number the duſt of the earth, then ſhall thy ſeed be numbred; but as it is impoſſible to do the one, ſo the other is not practicable, ſee Numb. xxiii. 10.

℣. 17. Ariſe, walk through the land, &c.] And take a ſurvey of it, and ſee what a land it is, how good and how large, and take poſſeſſion of it for himſelf and his, though he was only to be a ſojourner in it; and ſo the Targum of Jonathan adds, and making in it a poſſeſſion, which in civil law was done by walking: in the length of it, and in the breadth of; the extent of it is variouſly ſettled by geographers; ſome giving it no more than about 170 or 180 miles in length, from north to ſouth, and about 140 in breadth from eaſt to weſt, where broadeſt, as it is towards the ſouth, and but about 70 where narroweſt, as it is towards the north: but it is obſerved [d] from the lateſt and moſt accurate maps, that it appears to extend near 200 miles in length, and about 80 in breadth about the middle, and 10 or 15 more or leſs where it widens or ſhrinks: for I will give it unto thee; that is, to his ſeed, the whole of it in its utmoſt extent, as to length and breadth; which if he pleaſed for his own ſatisfaction he might take a tour thro', whereby he would be a judge what was beſtowed on him and his.

℣. 18. Then Abram removed his tent, &c.] From the mountain between Bethel and Hai, ℣. 3. and came and dwelt in the plain of Mamre, or in the oaks of Mamre [e]; in a grove of oaks there, as being ſhady and pleaſant to dwell among or under, and not through any ſuperſtitious regard to ſuch trees and places where they grew; which has obtained ſince among the heathens, and particularly among the Druids, who have their name from thence. Indeed ſuch ſuperſtitions might take their riſe from hence, being improved and abuſed to ſuch purpoſes; and both Jerom [f] and Sozomen [g] ſpeak of the oak of Abram being there in the times of Conſtantine, and greatly reſorted to, and had in great veneration; and they and others make mention of a turturpentine tree, which it is pretended ſprung from a walking ſtick of one of the angels that appeared to Abram at this place, greatly regarded in a ſuperſtitious way by all ſorts of perſons: this plain or grove of oaks, here ſpoken of, was called after a man, whoſe name was Mamre, an Amorite, a friend and confederate of Abram: which was in Hebron; or near it, an ancient city built ſeven years before Zoan or Tanis in Egypt, Numb. xiii. 22. it was firſt called Kirjath Arbah, but in the times of Moſes, Hebron, ch. xxiii. 2. The place they call the Turpentine, from the tree that grows there, according to Sozomen [g], was 15 furlongs diſtant from Hebron to the ſouth; but Joſephus [h] ſays, it was but 6 furlongs, or 3 quarters of a mile; who ſpeaking of Hebron ſays, "the inhabitants of it ſay, that it is "not only more ancient than the cities of that "country, but than Memphis in Egypt, and is "reckoned to be of 2300 years ſtanding: they report, that it was the habitation of Abram, the "anceſtor of the Jews, after he came out of Meſopotamia, and that from hence his children deſcended into Egypt, whoſe monuments are now "ſhown in this little city, made of beautiful marble, and elegantly wrought; and there is ſhown, "ſix furlongs from it, a large turpentine tree, "which they ſay remained from the creation to "that time." A certain traveller [i] tells us, that the valley of Mamre was about half a mile from old Hebron; from Bethel, whence Abram removed to Mamre, according to Sir Walter Raleigh [k], was about 24 miles; but Bunting [l] makes it 32: and built there an altar unto the Lord; and gave thanks for the prevention of ſtrife between Lot and him, and for the renewal of the grant of the land of Canaan to him and his ſeed; and performed all acts of religious worſhip, which the building of an altar is expreſſive of.

CHAP. XIV.

THIS chapter gives an account of a war that was waged, and a battle fought between four kings on one ſide, and five on the other, and of the occaſion and iſſue of it, who were the firſt kings, and this the firſt battle the ſcriptures ſpeak of, ℣. 1—11. Lot and his goods being taken and carried off, with thoſe of Sodom, by the conquerors, Abram hearing of it armed his men, and purſued after them, and overtook and overcame them, and reſcued Lot and his goods, with others, and returned, ℣. 12—16. when he was met by the kings of Sodom and Salem, who congratulated him on his victory, ℣. 17, 18, 19. and what paſſed between him, and thoſe great perſonages, is related, ℣. 20—24.

℣. 1. And it came to paſs in the days of Amraphel king of Shinar, &c.] Or Babylon, as Onkelos, where Nimrod began his kingdom. This was Nimrod himſelf, as the Jewiſh writers generally ſay [m]; tho' more likely Ninyas the ſon of Ninus and Semiramis, and grandſon of Nimrod; or rather ſome petty prince or deputy-governor of Shinar, under the king of Babylon; ſince, though named firſt, he was not the principal in this war, but fought under the king of Elam, and as an ally and auxiliary of his; and it may be the kingdom of Babylon was not as yet of any great extent and power, and that all thoſe ſtories told of Ninus, Semiramis and Ninyas are mere fables; and indeed we hear nothing in ſcripture of this kingdom, and the kings of it, from this time, until the times of Merodach Baladan the ſon of Baladan king of Babylon, in the reign of Hezekiah king of Judah; nor of the Aſſyrian kingdom, and the kings of it, until Pul king of Aſſyria in the times of Menahem king of Iſrael; wherefore it is greatly to be queſtioned, whether thoſe kingdoms roſe to any conſiderable height until theſe times: though ſome think that Shinar here does not intend Shinar in Chaldea or Babylon, which was too far diſtant from Abram, but Shinar in Meſopotamia, a large city at the foot of a mountain, three days diſtant from Manſil, which is now in Arabic, called Singjar, and by Ptolemy, Singara [n]. Arioch king of Ellaſar; or Telaſſar, according to the Targum of Jonathan, a place in Meſopotamia, inhabited by the children of Eden, Iſ. xxxvii. 12. and Stephanus [o] makes mention of a city in Cœleſyria, upon the borders of Arabia, called Ellas, of which this prince may be thought to be the governor; or rather he was king of a people called Eleſari, whoſe country is placed by Ptolemy [p] in Arabia; and could Ninyas be thought to be Amraphel, this king would bid fair to be Ariæus a king of Arabia, or a ſon of his of the ſame name, that was a confederate of Ninus, as Diodorus Siculus [q] relates out of Cteſias. Next follows, Chedorlaomer king of Elam; or the Elamites, as the Vulgate Latin verſion, the Perſians, ſee Acts ii. 9. This led Diodorus [r] to ſay, that the war Moſes ſpeaks of, is what the Perſians waged againſt the Sodomites. This ſeems to have been the moſt powerful prince at this time, to whom the five kings of Sodom, &c. had been ſubject for 12 years, but now had rebelled, and to ſubdue them again he came forth, with three other kings his allies, ſee ℣. 4, 5. but if Elam is the ſame with Perſia, as it often ſignifies, or with Elymais, a part of Perſia, that kingdom could not be at this time ſo large and potent as it has been ſince; or Chedorlaomer would not have ſtood in need of the aſſiſtance of other princes againſt ſuch petty kings as thoſe of Sodom, &c. Nor does it ſeems credible that he ſhould come out of Perſia, and paſs through ſo great a part of the world as the countries of Aſſyria, Chaldea, Meſopotamia, Syria, and part of Arabia and of Canaan, to bring five ſuch ſmall towns or cities into ſubjection to him, as he muſt, as Sir Walter Raleigh [s] obſerves; nor could the trifle of goods, as they may be comparatively called, he carried off, be an equivalent to the expence he muſt be at in ſo long a march. It is more probable therefore, that this was the name of ſome place near to the land of Canaan, built by ſome of the poſterity of Elam, the ſon of Shem, and called after the name of their anceſtor; or it may be a colony of the Elamites in thoſe parts, of which this prince was their head and chief: and Tidal king of nations; tions; that is, either of other nations diſtinct from thoſe before mentioned, ſo Aben Ezra; or elſe, as he alſo obſerves, the name of a province; or as Jarchi and Ben Melech, the name of a place called Goim, becauſe there were gathered together many out of various nations and places, and they ſet a man to reign over them, whoſe name was Tidal; juſt as one of the Galilees in after-times was called Galilee of the nations, for a like reaſon. Sir Walter Raleigh [t] conjectures, that as there were many petty kingdoms joining to Phœnicia and Paleſtine, as Palmyrene, Batanea, Laodicene, Apamene, Chalcidice, Caſſiotis and Celibonitis, theſe might be gathered together under this man. According to Eupolemus [u], an heathen writer, theſe ſeveral princes were Armenians that fought with the Phœnicians, and overcame them, by whom Lot was carried captive. Joſephus [w] indeed accommodating himſelf to the Greek hiſtorians, and in favour of them ſays, that the Aſſyrians at this time were maſters of Aſia, and led out an army under four generals, and made the kings of Sodom, &c. tributary to them; and they rebelling againſt them, made another expedition upon them under theſe four kings as their generals, and conquered them: but it ſeems not likely that the Aſſyrian monarchy was ſo large at this time; or if it was, theſe five petty kings of the plain of Jordan, who had not ſo much ground as our Middleſex, as Sir Walter Raleigh [x] obſerves, and perhaps not a quarter of the people in it, would never have dared to have engaged with ſo powerful an adverſary.

℣. 2. That theſe made war with Bera king of Sodom, &c.] A city in the plain of Jordan, which with the 4 following made the Pentapolis, or 5 cities of the plain. Strabo [y] ſays, in this place formerly were 13 cities, the metropolis of which was Sodom, and which yet had remaining a compaſs of 60 furlongs; according to Dr. Lightfoot [z], it ſhould be placed in the ſouthern extremity of the lake Aſphaltites, whereas it is uſually ſet in the maps in the northern bounds of it: and with Birſha king of Gomorrah; another city in the plain of Jordan, called by Solinus [a], Gomorrum: Shinab king of Admah; a third city ſituated in the ſame plain: and Shemeber king of Zeboim; a fourth city of the plain, which ſeems to have its name from the pleaſantneſs of its ſituation: and the king of Bela, which is Zoar; ſo it was afterwards called by Lot, being a little city, ch. xix. 20, 22. but before, Bela; the name of its king is not mentioned, being a perſon of no great note and importance, and his city ſmall.

℣. 3. All theſe were joined together in the vale of Siddim, &c.] Or of fields, or ploughed lands [b], a fruitful vale abounding with corn; or of gardens or paradiſes, as the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem, being full of gardens and orchards, and was as the garden of the Lord, even as Eden, ſee ch. xiii. 10. though Aben Ezra thinks it had its name from the ſlime or bitumen, of which there was great plenty in it, ſee ℣. 10. Now the above five kings, as they all dwelt in the plain, they entered into a confederacy, met together, and joined their forces in this vale, to oppoſe the four kings that were come to make war with them, as being an advantageous place as they judged, perhaps on more accounts than one; and here they ſtayed to receive the enemy, and give him battle, ſee ℣. 8. which is the Salt Sea; afterwards ſo called, not at this time, for then it would not have been fit for armies to be drawn up in battle-array in it; but it was ſo called in the times of Moſes, and after this fine vale was turned into a bituminous lake, and had its name from the ſaltneſs of the waters of the lake, or from the city Melach, or city of ſalt, which was near it, Joſh. xv. 62.

℣. 4. Twelve years they ſerved Chedorlaomer, &c.] King of Elam, who was of the race of Shem, and ſo the prophecy of Noah began to be fulfilled, that Canaan ſhould be ſervant to Shem, ch. ix. 26. for the kings of Sodom, &c. and their ſubjects were of the race of Ham in the line of Canaan, who had by violence ſeized on that part of the earth which was allotted to the ſons of Shem, and therefore Chedorlaomer being a deſcendant of his claimed his right, and made them tributary to him, which they were for the ſpace of 12 years: and in the thirteenth year they rebelled; refuſed homage to Chedorlaomer and to pay tribute to him.

℣. 5. And in the fourteenth year came Chedorlaomer, &c.] Not in the 14th year of their rebellion againſt him, as Jarchi, but from their becoming vaſſals to him: and the kings that were with him; thoſe kings before mentioned: and ſmote the Rephaims in Aſhteroth Karnaim; which were in their way to Sodom, &c. and very probably were confederates with the five kings; the Targum, and ſo the Septuagint render the word giants, as it is in Deut. ii. 11. but they were one of the nations or tribes of the Canaanites, Gen. xv. 20. and had their name either from the Hebrew word רפא which ſignifies to be healthful and robuſt, as thoſe people might be, or from Rephas, the Remphan of Stephen, Acts vii. 43. called Chiun, Amos v. 26. and with Cronus or Ham the father of Canaan, as biſhop Cumberland [c] obſerves; and theſe dwelt in Aſhteroth Carnaim, which was a place in Baſhan, Deut. i. 4. it is about 6 miles, as Euſebius [d] ſays, from Adraa or Edrei, and in 2 Maccab. xii. 26. mention is made of a place called Carnion, where was a temple of Atergates, a Phœnician deity, as Aſhteroth or Aſtarte was; and this city here had its firſt name, from Aſtarte the wife of Cronus or Ham, and whoſe name may be preſerved in Carnaim, as biſhop Cumberland thinks; though as Aſtarte is ſaid by Sanchoniatho [e], to put on her head the mark of her ſovereignty, a bull's head, that is with its horns, this might be another of her names retained in this city; and it is certain that ſhe was a Phœnician goddeſs, called the goddeſs of the Sidonians, 1 Kings xi. 5. and Sanchoniatho relates [f], that the Phœnicians ſay that Aſtarte is ſhe, who among the Greeks is called Aphrodite or Venus; and Aſtarte is called by Lucian [g] the Phœnician Venus, and by Cicero [h] the Syrian Venus; and if ſhe was the ſame with Diana or the moon, as ſome think, ſhe might have the name of Carnaim from its two horns, horns, as the word ſignifies: our Engliſh poet [1] ſeems to have this in his thoughts, when he ſpeaks of Aſtoreth as the goddeſs of the Phœnicians: however the inhabitants of this place who belonged to the Canaanites were firſt attacked by the four kings and routed, though not utterly deſtroyed, becauſe we hear of them afterwards, as well as they that follow: and the Zuzims in Ham; or Hemtha, as Onkelos and Jonathan render it, a place ſo called from Ham the father of Canaan, and was ſomewhere in the land of Canaan or near it, and near the former place; for it can hardly be thought the land of Egypt, ſometimes called the land of Ham, is meant; theſe Zuzim are ſuppoſed by Jarchi to to be the ſame with the Zamzummim in Deut. ii. 20. the word is by Onkelos and Jonathan rendred ſtrong and mighty ones, as alſo by the Septuagint, mighty nations: and the Emims in Shaveh-Kirjathaim: a people, great, and many, and tall, as the Anakim, and were accounted giants as they, and who in aftertimes were by the Moabites called Emim, Deut. ii. 10, 11. and therefore Moſes gives them the ſame name here, which they had from the dread and terror they injected into men, and ſo the word in all the three Targums is rendered terrible ones; and theſe dwelt in Kirjathaim, a city in the tribe of Reuben, taken from Sihon king of the Amorites, and which ſeems to be ſituated in a plain, ſee Joſh. xiii. 19.

℣. 6. And the Horites in their mount Seir, &c.] Or the Horim who dwelt in mount Seir, ſo called from Seir the Horite, who continued here till they were drove out by the ſons of Eſau or Edom, from whom their country was afterwards called Edom or Idumea, ſee Gen. xxxvi. 20—30. Deut. ii. 12. 22. unto El-paran, which is by the wilderneſs; ſo far theſe Horites inhabited, and the four kings ſmote all they met with unto this place, which was either the plain or oak of Paran, near a wilderneſs of the ſame name; the wilderneſs of Arabia, thro' which the Iſraelites travelled 40 years, in their way to Canaan.

℣. 7. And they returned, and came to En-Miſhpat, which is Kadeſh, &c.] Purſuing their victories as far as El-paran by the wilderneſs, they had paſſed by the country of the Amalekites; wherefore they returned, or came back to fall upon them, and they came to a place called En-Miſhpat, or the fountain of judgment; which was not its future name, as Jarchi thinks, becauſe there Moſes and Aaron were to be judged concerning the buſineſs of that fountain, even the waters of Meribah, with which agrees the Targum of Jonathan; "and they re-"turned and came to the place where the judg-"ment of Moſes the prophet was determined by "the fountain of the waters of contention:" but it ſeems to have been the antient name of the place, and by which it was called at this time, as Kadeſh was the name of it at the time of Moſes writing this; and therefore he adds, which is Kadeſh; that is, which is now called Kadeſh, becauſe there the Lord was ſanctified when the rock at that place was ſmitten and waters guſhed out: it was a city on the uttermoſt border of the land of Edom, Numb. xx. 1. 12, 13. 16. and ſeems formerly to have been a place where cauſes were heard and judgment paſſed; and ſo Onkelos paraphraſes it, "to the plain of the diviſion or deciſion of judg-"ment;" which, as Jarchi himſelf interprets it, "is "a place where the men of the province gathered "together for all judgment;" or for hearing all cauſes and determining them: and ſmote all the country of the Amalekites; which, according to Joſephus [k], reached from Peluſium in Egypt to the Red ſea; they inhabited Arabia Petræa, for he [l] ſays, the inhabitants of Gobolitis and Petra are called Amalekites; which name is generally ſuppoſed to have been given them here by way of anticipation, ſince the commonly received opinion is, that they were the deſcendants of Amalek, a grandſon of Eſau, who was not born when this war was waged, ſee Gen. xxxvi. 12. but the Mahometan writers derive the pedigree of Amalek, from whom theſe people had their name from Noah in the line of Ham, and make him to be ſome generations older than Abram, which with them ſtands thus, Noah, Ham, Aram, Uz, Ad, Amalek [m]; and they ſpeak of the Amalekites as dwelling in the country about Mecca, from whence they were driven by the Jorhamites [n]: and indeed it ſeems more probable, that the Amalekites were of the poſterity of Ham, ſince Chedorlaomer, a deſcendant of Shem, falls upon them, and ſmites them; and they being confederates with the Canaanites, and are with the Amorites, Philiſtines, and other Canaaniti∫h nations, always mentioned, ſeem to be a more ancient nation than what could proceed from Amalek the ſon of Eliphaz, ſince Amalek is ſaid to be the firſt of the nations, Numb. xxiv. 20. nor does there ever appear to be any harmony and friendſhip between them and the Edomites, as it might be thought there would, if they were a branch of Eſau's family; nor did they give them any aſſiſtance, when deſtroyed by Saul, ſo that they ſeem rather to be a tribe of the Canaaniti∫h nations; and they are, by Philo [o] the Jew, expreſly called Phœnicians: and alſo the Amorites, that dwelt in Hazazon-tamar; the ſame with the Emorites, ſee ch. x. 16. another tribe or nation of the Canaanites, deſcended from Amor or Emor, a ſon of Canaan: the place of their habitation has its name of Hazazon-tamar, from the multitude of palm-trees which grew there: for Tamar ſignifies a palm-tree, and Hazazon is from חָצַץ to cut; and this part of the name ſeems to be taken from the cutting of the top, crown or head of the palm-tree, for the ſake of a liquor which has a more luſcious ſweetneſs than honey; and is of the conſiſtence of a thin ſyrup, as Dr. Shaw [p] relates; the head of the palm-tree being cut off, the top of the trunk is ſcooped into the ſhape of a baſon, as he ſays, where the ſap in aſcending lodges itſelf at the rate of three or four quarts a day during the firſt week or fortnight, after which the quantity daily diminiſhes; and at the end of ſix weeks or two months the juices are entirely conſumed, and the tree becomes dry, and ſerves only for timber or fire-wood. This place is the ſame with Engedi, 2 Chron. xx. 2. and ſo the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan here tranſlate it, in Engedi; and which place Pliny [q] ſays was famous for groves of palm-trees; it was a city near the dead ſea, ſee Ezek. xlvii. 8, 9. and Joſephus ſays [r] it was ſituated by the lake Aſphaltites, that is, the place where Sodom and Gomorrah ſtood; and he adds, that it was 300 furlongs diſtant from Jeruſalem, where were the beſt palm-trees and balſam: ſo that now the four kings kings had got pretty near Sodom; wherefore it follows,

℣. 8. And there went out the king of Sodom, &c.] With his armed men to meet the four kings, and give them battle, being ſo near him, and in ſo much danger from them, that if they could not ſtand their ground, they might flee to the mountains, and not periſh in the city: and the king of Gomorrah, and the king of Admah, and the king of Zeboim; whoſe names are before given, ℣. 2: and the king of Bela, the ſame is Zoar; as in ℣. 2: and they joined battle with them in the vale of Siddim; where the five Canaanitiſh kings met, of which ſee ℣. 3. and fought the four kings that were come forth againſt them, and whoſe names are repeated, and are as follow:

℣. 9. With Chedorlaomer king of Elam, &c.] Who is here mentioned firſt, being the principal in the war, and againſt whom the kings of Sodom, &c. had rebelled: and with Tidal king of nations, and Amraphel king of Shinar, and Arioch king of Ellaſar; who were his allies, confederates and auxiliaries: 4 kings with 5; thoſe 4 laſt mentioned, with the other 5 before ſpoken of, that is, they fought with them; or rather 4 kings againſt 5, as the Vulgate Latin and Tigurine verſions, and ſome others.

℣. 10. And the vale of Siddim was full of ſlime pits, &c.] Or wells or fountains of ſlime or bitumen [s]; a liquid of a pitchy nature, caſt out of fountains, and which was uſed for a cement in building; ſuch fountains were near Babylon, ſee the note on ch. xi. 3. ſo that this place was naturally prepared for what it was deſigned to be, a bituminous lake; and hence, when turned into one, it was called the lake Aſphaltites, from this ſlime or bitumen, called by the Greeks aſphaltos. Brocardus [t] ſays, theſe pits or wells of bitumen are at this day on the ſhore of the lake, each of them having pyramids erect, which he ſaw with his own eyes; and ſuch pits caſting out bitumen, as fountains do water, have been found in other countries, as in Greece [u]. Now this vale being full of ſuch pits, the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah choſe it to fight in, and here drew up in a line of battle, hoping that the enemy, being ignorant of them, would fall into them and periſh, and their ranks be broke and fall into confuſion; but as it often is, that the pit men dig and contrive for others, they fall into themſelves, ſo it was in this caſe: and the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah fled; the battle going hard againſt them, and they not able to ſtand before their enemies: and fell there, or into them [w]; the ſlime-pits, or fountains of bitumen, into which they precipitantly fell, and many periſhed; or of their own accord they threw themſelves into them for their own ſafety, as ſome think; though the ſenſe may be this, that there was a great ſlaughter of them made there, as the word is frequently uſed, ſee 1 Sam. iv. 10. this is to be underſtood not of the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah; for it is certain that they were preſerved alive, at leaſt the king of Sodom, for we hear of him afterwards, ℣. 17, 21. but of their ſoldiers: and they that remained fled to the mountain; or mountains hard by, where Lot after went when Sodom was deſtroyed, ch. xix. 30. hither ſuch fled that eſcaped the ſword of the enemy, or periſhed not in the ſlime-pits, judging it more ſafe to be there, than to be in their cities, which would fall into the hands of their enemies, and be plundered by them, and where they would be in danger of loſing their lives.

℣. 11. And they took all the goods of Sodom and Gomorrah, &c.] They entered theſe cities and pillaged them, and carried off every thing valuable in them, that was portable or could be driven, as their cattle, &c. they did not burn theſe cities, nor take poſſeſſion of them, and leave garriſons in them, which ſhows them to be petty princes that came for plunder, and to get an equivalent for non-payment of tribute to one of them: and all their victuals, and went away; all the meat and drink they could light of, with which they refreſhed their troops, and then departed.

℣. 12. And they took Lot, Abram's brother's ſon, &c.] The ſon of Haran, his elder brother, who was now, as the Jews ſay [x], 50 years of age: who dwelt in Sodom; or near it, in the country adjacent to it, ſee ch. xiii. 12. and ſo being a neighbour of the men of Sodom, and a ſojourner among them, he partakes of their puniſhment; and this was a juſt correction of him for chuſing to dwell among ſuch a people: and they took his goods and departed; as him and his family, ſo all his ſubſtance, his cattle, wealth, and riches of every ſort, and went off with it: Eupolemus [y], an heathen writer, makes mention of this circumſtance in his relation of this war, and ſays, that the Armenians, as he calls the four kings, having conquered the Phœnicians, carried away captive the brother's ſon of Abraam.

℣. 13. And there came one that eſcaped, &c.] Both the ſword of the enemy and the ſlime-pits; either one of the inhabitants of Sodom, who had an acquaintance with Lot and a friendſhip for him, and knew his relation to Abram; or one of Lot's family, that might eſcape being taken and carried captive: for not Michael the prince, ſo called, becauſe when the angels fell they would have drawn him with them, but God delivered him, and therefore his name was called פלימ, or one that eſcaped, as the Jews [z] ſay; nor Og, that eſcaped the waters of the flood, as they alſo ſay [a], and now from this war, and was the only one left of the Rephaim, or giants, whom Amraphel ſlew, which they gather from Deut. iii. 11. who they ſuppoſe came with the following meſſage to Abram with an ill deſign, that he might go out to war with the kings and be ſlain, and then he thought to marry his wife; but theſe are idle fancies, what is firſt ſuggeſted is right. And told Abram the Hebrew; that there had been a battle of 4 kings with 5, that the latter were beaten, among whom were the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah; and that Lot, his kinſman, who dwelt in or near Sodom, was carried captive, with all his goods. Abram is called the Hebrew, either from his paſſing over or coming beyond the river Euphrates from Chaldea into Canaan; with which the Septuagint verſion agrees, rendering it the paſſer-over; and ſo Jarchi ſays he is called, becauſe he came beyond the river: or rather from his having lived beyond it, as ſuch as dwelt there were called; for it can hardly be thought that he ſhould peculiarly have this name from that ſingle action of his paſſing the river, which multitudes did beſides him: but rather why ſhould he not be called Ibri, the word here uſed, from the place of his birth? For, according cording to the Talmudiſts [b], Ur of the Chaldees was called עיברא זעירא, little Ibra: though it is more generally thought he had this name from his being a deſcendant of Eber, and who was not only of his ſons ſons, and ſpoke the ſame language, but profeſſed the ſame religion, and which was continued in his poſterity, who to the lateſt ages were called Hebrews, and ſometimes Eber, Numb. xxiv. 24. and which is the opinion of many Jewiſh writers [c], and ſeems moſt probable: for he dwelt in the plain of Mamre the Amorite; ſee ch. xiii. 18. it was about 40 miles from Sodom, but from it to Dan, whither he purſued the 4 kings, and where he overtook, fought, and ſmote them, is by ſome computed 124 miles [d]: this Mamre, from whom the plain or grove of oaks were called, was the brother of Eſhcol, and brother of Aner; who are particularly mentioned, becauſe of their concern in the following expedition: and theſe were confederate with Abram; or were maſters or authors of a covenant [e] with him; they had entered into a league to defend one another, their perſons and properties, from the inſults of invaders and tyrants, or thieves and robbers: and it may be lawful to form ſuch leagues with irreligious perſons on ſuch accounts, where there is no prohibition from God, as there was none as yet, though there afterwards was one; and the Iſraelites were forbid to make covenants with the Canaanites, but that was after they were drove out of the land for their ſins, Deut. vii. 1, 2. beſides, it is not improbable that theſe men were religious men, and worſhipped the ſame God with Abram, for ſuch there were among the Canaaniti/h princes, of which Melchizedek, after ſpoken of, is an inſtance; and as yet the ſin of the Amorites was not full, of which tribe or nation theſe men were.

℣. 14. And when Abram heard that his brother was taken captive, &c.] That is, his brother's ſon Lot, as in ℣. 12. which was contrary to the law of nations; ſince Lot was only a ſojourner, and not an inhabitant in Sodom, and therefore had no concern in the quarrel between the kings, and this juſtified Abram's taking up arms on his behalf: he armed his trained ſervants; ſuch as were trained up by him in religious exerciſes, ſee ch. xviii. 19. in the affairs and buſineſs of civil life, in the care of flocks and herds, and particularly in the art of war; which was both lawful and neceſſary, for the preſervation of his family and ſubſtance from oppreſſors: born in his own houſe; of his ſervants, and ſo were his property, and at his diſpoſal and command; their number was 318, a large number for ſervants, and which ſhewed how great a man Abram was, what poſſeſſions he muſt have to employ ſo many, and yet but a ſmall number for an army, to go forth with againſt 4 kings who had conquered 5; tho' how many his confederates brought with them is not certain: and purſued them unto Dan; the Jeruſalem Targum is, to Dan of Ceſarea, meaning Ceſarea of Philippi, as in the times of Chriſt and his apoſtles it was called; which at firſt had the name of Leſhem, or Lais, and was not called Dan until the times of the judges, Judg. xviii. 29. wherefore, if the ſame place is intended here, it is ſo called not only by anticipation, but by a ſpirit of prophecy; ſince it had not the name of Dan even in the times of Moſes, the writer of this hiſtory, unleſs it may be thought to be inſerted by Samuel, or ſome other inſpired writer, after Moſes; though there is no need to ſuppoſe either of theſe, ſeeing there might be a town or city of this name in thoſe parts at this time, or however one of the ſprings of Jordan might be ſo called, from whence the river had its name as early, ch. xiii. 11. and ſo Joſephus [f] expreſly ſays, ſpeaking of this expedition, that Abram fell upon them at Dan, for ſo, adds he, the other fountain of Jordan is called.

℣. 15. And he divided himſelf againſt them, he and his ſervants by night, &c.] Together with his confederates; and very probably their whole force was divided into 4 parts, under their 4 leaders; and this might be done in order to attack the 4 kings and their ſoldiers, who might be in 4 ſeparate bodies; or to fall upon their camp in the 4 quarters of it, and to make a ſhew of a greater army, thereby to intimidate the enemy: Abram ſeems to have underſtood the art of war, and the uſe of ſtratagems in it; and, as it might be night before he could come up to them, he took the advantage of that, and fell upon them unawares, when ſome were aſleep in their beds, and others drunk, as Joſephus [g] relates; and who alſo ſays, it was on the 5th night after Abram had knowledge of what had happened at Sodom: and ſmote them, and purſued them unto Hoba, which is on the left hand of Damaſcus; a famous city in Syria; it was in after-times the metropolis of that country, Iſ. vii. 8. and was moſt delightfully ſituated in a vale, ſee the note on Jer. xlix. 25. according to Joſephus [h] it was built by Uz, the ſon of Aram and grandſon of Shem, and ſome ſay [i] by Shem himſelf, and that it is to this day called Sem in the Saracene language, and lay between Paleſtine and Cœleſyria; on the left hand of this city, or on the north of it, as all the Targums paraphraſe it, lay a place called Hoba, and is computed to be 80 miles from Dan, from whence he purſued them hither, after he had diſcomfited them there.

℣. 16. And he brought back all the goods, &c.] Taken from Sodom and Gomorrah, ℣. 11. and alſo brought again his brother Lot; his brother's ſon, ℣. 12. for whoſe ſake chiefly he engaged in this enterprize: and his goods; money, cattle, &c. and the women alſo, and the people; not only that belonged to Lot, but to Sodom and Gomorrah, who had been taken and carried captive; theſe were all reſcued and brought back by Abram, ſee ℣. 21.

℣. 17. And the king of Sodom went out to meet him, &c.] Whilſt Abram was in purſuit of the 4 kings, the king of Sodom came down from the mountain whither he and thoſe that eſcaped with him fled, and came to Sodom; and from hence he went out, not alone, but accompanied with his retinue, to meet Abram: after his return from the ſlaughter of Chedorlaomer, and of the kings that were with him; to congratulate him upon the victory he had obtained over them; and this meeting was at the valley of Shaveh; a moſt plain and even valley, as the word ſignifies, clear of trees and every thing that obſtructs ſight or paſſage, as Jarchi obſerves, and ſo a proper place to have an interview in: which is the king's dale; ſome ſay king Melchizedek's, but one ſhould rather think it was the king of Sodom's; the Targum of Jonathan calls it the place of the king's exerciſe, where he had his diverſions in riding, walking, &c. it can hardly be that that in 2 Sam. xviii. 18. though ſome are of this opinion, being near to Jeruſalem, which they ſuppoſe to be the ſame with Salem in the next verſe.

℣. 18. And Melchizedek king of Salem brought forth bread and wine, &c.] Both the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem ſay, this is Shem the ſon of Noah, and which is the ſenſe of the Jewiſh writers in general, and of many Chriſtian ones; but, tho' it is highly probable he was living at this time, yet it is not eaſy to account for it, why his name ſhould be changed, or that he ſhould reign in a country in the poſſeſſion of his brother's ſon; or that he ſhould meet Abram, and congratulate him on the ſlaughter of one of his own deſcendants, as Chedorlaomer was; and eſpecially it cannot be ſaid of him that he was without father or mother, or that thoſe were not known, ſince Shem's parentage and pedigree are notorious enough; ſome have thought him to be more than a mere man, even the Son of God himſelf, but he is manifeſtly diſtinguiſhed from him in Heb. vii. 3. he ſeems to be what Joſephus [k] ſays he was, a Canaanitiſh prince, a pious and religious man, eminently raiſed up by God, and whoſe genealogy was kept a ſecret, that he might be in this as in other things a type of Chriſt: but that he ſhould be Canaan himſelf, as Dr. Clayton [l] thinks, a brother of Metſir, or Mizraim, the ſecond ſon of Ham, being by Sanchoniatho called Sedec, is not likely, ſince he was curſed by Noah. Salem, of which he was king, is by the above Targums ſaid to be Jeruſalem, and which is the opinion of many writers, Jewiſh and Chriſtian, and of which opinion I myſelf was formerly, ſee the note on Heb. vii. 1. Jeruſalem being plainly called Salem, Pſ. lxxvi. 2. but it ſeems clear from hence, that it muſt be near to Sodom, and lay in the way between Damaſcus and Sodom; whereas Jeruſalem was in a contrary ſituation, and lay near 40 miles from Sodom; for Joſephus ſays [m], the lake Aſphaltites, where Sodom once ſtood, was 300 furlongs from Jeruſalem, which is about 38 miles; and Jerom relates [n], that Salem was a town near Scythopolis, which was ſo called in his times, and where was ſhewed the palace of Melchizedek, which, by the largeneſs of the ruins, appeared to have been very magnificent, and takes it to be the ſame place with Shalem in Gen. xxxiii. 18. and Salim, near to which John was baptizing, John iii. 23: this great man brought forth bread and wine; not as a prieſt for an offering, but as a munificent king, to refreſh Abram and his weary troops, and which the king of Sodom could not do, becauſe the victuals of that place were carried off by the four kings, ℣. 11. and as Abram had the land of Canaan by promiſe, and now had made conqueſt in it over the invaders of it, Melchizedek, ſenſible of his right unto it, brings forth the beſt fruits of it, and, as Dr. Lightfoot obſerves [o], tenders them to him as livery and ſeiſin of it: in this Melchizedek was a type of Chriſt, who comforts and refreſhes his hungry and weary people with himſelf, the bread of life, and with the wine of his love, as well as his name and title agree with him, who is a righteous king and prince of peace, Jer. xxiii. 5. Iſ. ix. 6: and he was the prieſt of the moſt high God; a prieſt as well as a king, as in many countries princes were both [p]; and in this he was a type of Chriſt in his kingly and prieſtly offices, who is a prieſt upon the throne, both king and prieſt, Zech. vi. 13. Melchizedek was a prieſt not of any of the Phœnician deities, but of the true and living God, who is above all gods, dwells in the higheſt heaven, and is the moſt high over all the earth; by him was he called to this office and inveſted with it, and he miniſtered to him in it.

℣. 19. And he bleſſed him, &c.] Melchizedek bleſſed Abram, which was one part of his office as a prieſt, to wiſh and pray for a bleſſing on others, ſee Numb. vi. 23, &c. and herein typified Chriſt, who really bleſſes or confers bleſſings on all his people, even ſpiritual bleſſings, ſuch as redemption, remiſſion of ſins, and juſtifying righteouſneſs, adoption, and eternal life: and ſaid, bleſſed be Abram of the moſt high God; that is, may he be bleſſed by him who is the moſt high God, with all kind of bleſſings, both temporal and ſpiritual; or he declares him to be bleſſed of him, as he undoubtedly was, or foretels that he would be, as was certainly his caſe: and another epithet of God is added, which abundantly ſhews he was able to bleſs him, ſince he is the poſſeſſor of heaven and earth; is the maker of both, and has a right to diſpoſe of all things in them both heavenly and earthly.

℣. 20. And bleſſed be the moſt high God, &c.] Let his name be praiſed, and thanks be given to him for all mercies temporal and ſpiritual, ſince all flow from him, and particularly for the mercies Abram and others through him were now made partakers of; for whoever were the inſtruments, God was the efficient cauſe, and to him all the glory was to be given: which hath delivered thine enemies into thine hand; the 4 kings, who are called Abram's enemies, becauſe the enemies of God and of true religion, and becauſe they had been injurious to a relation of his; and eſpecially they may be ſo called, if their intention was, as ſay the Jewiſh writers [q], to ſlay him, beginning firſt with Lot: and thoſe 4 kings, according to them, ſignify the four monarchies, the Babylonian, Perſian, Grecian, and Roman [r], who in their turns diſtreſſed his poſterity, but in the latter day ſhall fall into their hands, as thoſe did into Abram's, and fall by them: and he gave him tithes of all; not Melchizedek to Abram, but Abram to Melchizedek, as appears from Heb. vii. 4. and theſe tithes were given not out of the goods that were recovered, for they were reſtored to the proprietors of them, but out of the ſpoils that were taken from the enemy, as is evident from the ſame place referred to; and theſe were given both as a return for the reſpect ſhewn him by Melchizedek, and by way of thankfulneſs to God for the victory, whoſe prieſt he was; otherwiſe, as a king, he ſtood in no need of ſuch a preſent; nor was it for his maintenance as a prieſt, or what Abram was obliged unto, but was a voluntary action, and not out of his own ſubſtance, but out of the ſpoils of the enemy, and to teſtify his gratitude to God: this was imitated by the heathens in after-times; ſo the Tarentines, having got a victory over the Peucetians, ſent the tenth (of the ſpoil) to Delphos [s]: the Jews [t] ſay Abraham was the firſt in the world that began to offer tithes; but they are miſtaken, when they ſay in the ſame place, that he took all the tithes of Sodom and Gomorrah, and of Lot his brother's ſon, and gave them to Shem the ſon of Noah. Eupolemus [u] makes mention of this interview between Abram and Melchizedek by name; he ſays, Abram was hoſpitably entertained in the holy city Argarizin, which is by interpretation the mountain of the Moſt High (but ſeems ſeems to be the mount Gerizzim) and that he received gifts from Melchizedek, the prieſt of God, who reigned there.

℣. 21. And the king of Sodom ſaid unto Abram, &c.] After the converſation between him and Melchizedek was over: give me the perſons, and take the goods to thyſelf; meaning by perſons or ſouls, as in the original, his own ſubjects that had been taken and carried away by the four kings, and were now brought back by Abram; and by the goods, thoſe of his own and his ſubjects, which their conquerors had ſpoiled them off, but were now recovered, and which he was very willing Abram ſhould have as his right, according to the laws of war, and as a reward of his labours; and very modeſtly aſks for the other, which he did not deny, but he might claim as the fruits of his victory: and this alſo ſhews, that the king of Sodom, though a heathen prince, and perhaps a wicked man, yet had more regard to the perſons of his ſubjects than to his own or their goods: the word for goods includes all the ſubſtance and poſſeſſion of a man, gold, ſilver, cattle, and all moveables [w].

℣. 22. And Abram ſaid to the king of Sodom, &c.] In reply to his requeſt: I have lift up my hand to the Lord; which was both a geſture of praying and of ſwearing, and both may be intended here; when he ſet out on his expedition, it is very probable he prayed to God for ſucceſs, and ſwore that if he proſpered him, that he would receive no profit or advantage from it to himſelf; or now in the preſence of Melchizedek he lift up his hands and ſwore, that he would take none of the goods he had recovered to his own uſe; and in this form of praying or ſwearing, he makes uſe of the ſame epithets of God, Melchizedek had juſt uſed: the moſt high God, the poſſeſſor of heaven and earth; having his heart ſtruck with thoſe juſt and glorious repreſentations of God, and awed with a ſenſe of ſuch a glorious being, and being forward to learn and retain every thing that tended to make for the glory of God.

℣. 23. That I will not take from a thread even to a ſhoe-latchet, &c.] That is, from a thread uſed in ſowing garments to a ſhoe-latchet, or the ſtring which faſtens the ſhoes to the foot, the leaſt belonging to that; or from the hair-lace of the head, to the ſhoe-latchet of the foot; that is, he would take nothing of his from head to foot: the meaning is, that he would not take that which was of the leaſt value and importance that could be conceived of, and which is more clearly expreſſed by what follows: and that I will not take any thing that is thine; the leaſt thing that belonged to him, or to any of his ſubjects, for this reaſon: leſt thou ſhouldſt ſay, I have made Abram rich; leſt he ſhould upbraid him with it afterwards, and ſay, that all his riches were owing to him; whereas God had promiſed to bleſs him, and make him rich and great, as he had begun to do, and ſtill would more and more; and in whom he truſted, and to whom he was deſirous all the glory of his greatneſs and riches ſhould be aſcribed.

℣. 24. Save only that which the young men have eaten, &c.] His 318 trained ſervants, and thoſe of his confederates, who having recovered the victuals taken away from the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah, had eat of it for their refreſhment, as it was but juſt and right they ſhould: and the portion of the men which went with me; the part in the ſpoil which belonged unto them by the laws of war; wherefore, though he abridged himſelf of rights and privileges that belonged unto him, which he might do, and thereby ſhewed his great generoſity, and that it was not covetouſneſs but kindneſs that moved him to do what he did; yet he did not take upon him to abridge the rights and privileges of others, which would have been injurious to them: the men he means were Aner, Eſhcol and Mamre; his confederates, who went with him in the purſuit of the enemy, and were aſſiſting to him in recovering the men and goods they had carried away: and as it was but juſtice they ſhould have their ſhare in the ſpoils, therefore he ſays, let them take their portion; in the goods recovered, and in the ſpoils taken. Eupolemus [x] the heathen writer, above quoted, relates this affair thus, that "Abram being aſſiſted by his ſervants became maſter of thoſe who had captivated others, and carried captive the wives and children of the ſoldiers; and when embaſſadors came to him to ranſom them with money, he would not ſuffer the conquered to be inſulted, but taking food for the young men, returned the captives freely."

CHAP. XV.

THIS chapter informs us of a gracious appearance of God to Abram, and of a kind promiſe made unto him, ℣. 1. of Abram's requeſt for an heir, ℣. 2, 3. of an anſwer to it, that he ſhould have one, and even a numberleſs ſeed, ℣. 4. 5. which he gave credit to, ℣. 6. upon which he has a freſh promiſe of the land of Canaan, ℣. 7. of his inheriting, of which he deſires a ſign, and this was given him, ℣. 8—12. and at the ſame time it was predicted to him how long his poſterity ſhould be afflicted in a land not theirs, and afterwards come out with great ſubſtance, ℣. 13—16. and the grant of the land of Canaan to his ſeed is renewed, ℣. 17—21.

℣. 1. After theſe things, &c.] The battle of the kings, the captivity of Lot, the reſcue of him and his goods, and of thoſe of Sodom and Gomorrah by Abram, and the converſation that paſſed between him, and the kings of Sodom and Salem: the word of the Lord came unto Abram in a viſion; Chriſt, the eſſential Word, appeared to Abram in an human form viſible to him, and with an articulate voice ſpoke unto him: ſaying, as follows, fear not, Abram; calling him by his name, the more to encourage him, and to diſſipate his fears to which he was ſubject; which might be, leſt the nations that belonged to the four kings he had conquered and ſlain, ſhould recruit their armies, and come againſt him with greater force; and the brethren and relations of thoſe he had ſlain ſhould avenge themſelves on him, as the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem ſuggeſt: and therefore the Lord bids him not give way to thoſe fears, for, adds he, I am thy ſhield; to protect him againſt all his enemies, be they ever ſo ſtrong and numerous; as Chriſt is the ſhield of his people againſt all their ſpiritual enemies, ſin, ſatan, and the world, which being held held up in the hand of faith, called therefore the shield of faith, is a security against them: and thy exceeding great reward; though he had generously refused taking any reward for the service he had done in pursuing the kings, and slaughtering them, and bringing back the persons and goods they had took away; yet he should be no loser by it, the Lord would reward him in a way of grace with greater and better things; nay, he himself would be his reward, and which must be a great one, an exceeding great one; as Christ is to his people in his person, offices and grace, all being theirs, and he all in all to them; all the blessings of grace and glory coming along with him, and he being their portion here and hereafter, to all eternity; for since he is theirs, all are theirs, all things appertaining to life and godliness, and eternal life itself.

℣. 2. And Abram said, Lord God, what wilt thou give me, seeing I go childless, &c.] As if he should say, what signifies what thou givest me of temporal blessings, if thou witholdest from me the blessing of a child; from whom it might be hoped and believed would spring the promised Messiah, in whom all nations of the earth shall be blessed. All my wealth and riches, victories and honours, are of no avail to me, whilst I am deprived of this favour; and since I am advanced in years, and going the way of all the earth; or out of the world, as the Targums of Jonathan and Jerusalem paraphrase it, and which is the sense of the word in many places, see Josh. xxiii. 14. Luke xxii. 22. Should I depart from hence childless, as I am like to do, what pleasure can I take in them, and comfort from them, when I have none to inherit them? and the steward of my house is this Eliezer of Damascus; who was his head-servant, perhaps the same with him in ch. xxiv. called the eldest servant of his house, who had the care of it, of providing food for it, and supplying with it, and giving to every one their portion in due season. Some render it, the son of leaving my house[y]; to whom he left the care of his house, and should leave the administration of all things in it after his death, making him his heir should he die childless; and so it may be supplied, he Eliezer of Damascus is or shall be my heir. Strange and various are the fancies of the Jewish writers concerning this Eliezer; the Targum of Jonathan on ch. xiv. 14. calls him the son of Nimrod; others say he was the grandson of Nimrod, and others, a servant of his, who gave him to Abram for a servant; and when Isaac married Rebekah he was made free, and through Abram's influence became a king, and was Og king of Bashan[z]; and others say he was Canaan the son of Ham[a]; and others again, that he was Lot, who was very desirous of being Abram's heir: but with neither of these will this description of him agree, who is said to be of Damascus; either he was born there, or his parents, one or other, were from thence, who very probably were Abram's servants; and this Eliezer was born in his house, as seems from the following verse: or the words may be rendered Damascus Eliezer[c], that is, Damascus the son of Eliezer; so that Eliezer was his father's name, and Damascus the proper name of this servant: and some say Damascus was built by him, and had its name from him, which is not likely, since we read of it before, and it is ascribed to another builder, see the note on ch. xiv. 15. Indeed Justin[d] says it had its name from a king of it, so called; but who, according to him, was much more ancient than Abram, whom he also makes to be a king of Damascus: after king Damascus, he says was Azelus, then Adores, and Abram and Israel were kings in that place. And Nicolas of Damascus[e] relates, that Abram reigned at Damascus, when with an army he came out of the land of Chaldea, beyond Babylon; and that the name of Abram was still famous in the region of Damascus, and a certain village was shewn, called Abram's habitation: and the Jewish writers say[f], that the servants of Abram built Damascus, and he reigned over it: that Abram lived there some time seems reasonable from this Eliezer, who was born in his house, being called Eliezer of Damascus; for which no other reason can well be assigned than his being born there, which must be therefore when Abram dwelt there, since he was born in his house; and this might be the foundation of the above traditions.

℣. 3. And Abram said, behold, to me thou hast given no seed, &c.] He had bestowed many temporal blessings on him, as well as spiritual ones, having given himself in covenant, and all things in it, but he had not given him a child: and lo, one born in my house is mine heir; meaning either Eliezer or his son, whom he had made his heir, or intended to make him, since he had no child; or of course he would have been so, Lot his nephew having no sons; and this Eliezer descending from Aram, the youngest son of Shem, was like to be next heir, if Abram should have no child of his own, as Dr. Lightfoot observes[g].

℣. 4. And behold, the word of the Lord came unto him, &c.] Either having disappeared, and then came a second time, or he again spoke unto him: saying, this shall not be thine heir; this Eliezer, this servant of thine, as thou hast made him, or hast intended to make him, giving up all hopes of having issue by Sarai: but he that shall come forth out of thine own bowels, shall be thine heir; that is, one shall inherit all thou hast, that shall be begotten by thee; an own son of Abram's, and not a servant born in his house; one that should spring out of his own loins: the Vulgate Latin version renders it, out of thy womb, that is, out of his wife's, which was his; the phrase designs a genuine and legitimate son of his, who would be legally his heir.

℣. 5. And he brought him forth abroad, &c.] Out of his tent into the open air, which was done thro' his call, and at his direction; or by an impulse upon his mind; or this might not be real and local, only in vision: and said, look now towards heaven; either with his bodily eyes, or with the eyes of his mind: and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them; this looks as if it were in a vision that this was said to him, and what follows done in the day, since it was in the day-time, before the sun was set, ℣. 12. when the stars could not be seen; and therefore were represented to his mind, and he was directed to consider them in it, whether they could be numbered by him or not: but this might be in the preceding night, or early in the morning, before the sun arose, that Abram was directed to go out out of his tent, and view the heavens, and the multitude of ſtars in them, and try if he could number them; and he might be employed all the day following till ſun-ſet, in preparing the creatures for the ſacrifice, in cutting them aſunder, laying their pieces in order, and watching them, and driving the fowls from them. The multitude of his ſeed is before ſignified by the duſt of the earth, which cannot be numbered, ch. xiii. 16. and here by the ſtars of the ſky innumerable; as they are to man, though not to God: ſome have pretended to number them, as Aratus, Eudoxus and Hipparchus among the ancients, and alſo modern aſtronomers; but then they are ſuch only that are viſible to the eye, and in one hemiſphere, and their accounts are very various; whereas there are multitudes to be diſcerned by glaſſes, and ſome not to be diſtinguiſhed, as in the galaxy or milky way, and others in the other hemiſphere. Now Abram here is bid to try what he could do, and this was in his own way; for he is ſaid by many heathen writers [g] to be famous for arithmetic and aſtrology, or aſtronomy; but as great a maſter as he was in theſe ſciences, he was not able to number the ſtars, which is here plainly intimated, ſince it follows: and he ſaid, ſo ſhall thy ſeed be; as innumerable as the ſtars, as they were, even his natural ſeed, Heb. xi. 12. and eſpecially his ſpiritual ſeed, who have the ſame kind of faith he had, and as they will be in the latter day particularly, Hoſ. i. 10, 11.

℣. 6. And he believed in the Lord, &c.] The Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan are, "in the word "of the Lord;" in the eſſential Word of the Lord, in Chriſt the Lord his righteouſneſs; he believed in the promiſe of God, that he ſhould have a ſeed, and a very numerous one; he believed that the Meſſiah would ſpring from his ſeed; he believed in him as his Saviour and Redeemer; he believed in him for righteouſneſs, and he believed in his righteouſneſs as juſtifying him before God: and he counted it to him for righteouſneſs; not the act of his faith, but the object of it; and not the promiſe he believed, but what was promiſed, and his faith received, even Chriſt and his righteouſneſs; this was imputed to him without works, and whilſt he was an uncircumciſed perſon, for the proof of which the apoſtle produces this paſſage, Rom. iv. 3, 10, 22, 23, 24. wherefore this is not to be underſtood of any action of his being eſteemed and accounted a righteous one, and he pronounced and acknowledged a righteous perſon on account of it; for Abram was not juſtified before God by his own works, but by the righteouſneſs of faith, as all that believe are, that is, by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt revealed to faith, and received by it: what is imputed is without a man, and the imputation of it depends upon the will of another; ſuch is the righteouſneſs of Chriſt without works imputed by God the Father. This is the firſt time we read of believing, and as early do we hear of imputed righteouſneſs.

℣. 7. And he ſaid unto him, &c.] After he had expreſſed his faith in him, and in his word, and the bleſſedneſs of a juſtifying righteouſneſs came openly upon him, and he was declared a juſtified perſon: I am the Lord that brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees; not only called him, but brought him out of it; not out of a furnace there, as the Jews fable; but out of a place ſo called, an idolatrous one, where fire was worſhipped, and from whence it might have its name; God had brought him out of this wicked place, and ſeparated him from the men of it, and directed him to the land of Canaan for the following end and purpoſe: to give thee this land to inherit it; to be an inheritance to his poſterity for ages to come; he gave him the promiſe of it, and in ſome ſenſe the poſſeſſion of it, he being now in it; and he mentions his having brought him out of Chaldea into it, to confirm his faith in the promiſe of it; that that God who had called him, and brought him from thence, and had protected him, and given him victory over his enemies, was able to make good, and would make good the promiſe and grant of this land for an inheritance to him, that is, to his poſterity.

℣. 8. And he ſaid, Lord God, wherebу ſhall I know that I ſhall inherit it?] Not as queſtioning or doubting whether he ſhould or no; but this he aſked for the further confirmation of his faith in the promiſe, and for the ſake of his poſterity, that they might more eaſily and ſtrongly believe that they ſhould inherit the land given and promiſed to them; nor is it culpable to aſk a ſign of God with ſuch a view; good men have done it, as Gideon and Hezekiah, without being blamed for it; yea Ahaz is blamed for not aſking one.

℣. 9. And he ſaid unto him, take me an heifer of 3 years old, &c.] This, with what follows, is the ſign by which Abram might know that he, that is, his ſeed, ſhould inherit the land of Canaan; for the whole of this is an emblem of the ſtate and condition of his poſterity, until they ſhould enter into that land: wherefore he is ordered to take out of his herds and flocks this and the following creatures, which were uſed in ſacrifice before the ceremonial law was given, as well as under it; and the diſtinction of creatures for ſacrifice, though not for food, was known as early, as appears from Gen. viii. 20. hence Onkelos renders the phraſe, offer before me; and the Targum of Jonathan is, "take "unto me oblations, and offer before me." Tho' this difference is to be obſerved, that the Levitical law required creatures of a year old only to be offered; whereas theſe were 3 years old, becauſe they are then at their full growth, and in their full ſtrength and greateſt perfection; and ſuch were uſed among the heathens for ſacrifice; ſo Lucian [h] repreſents Ganymedes as propoſing to Jupiter, that if he would let her go ſhe would offer a ram of 3 years old: but it ſhould be remarked, that theſe creatures here were not taken merely for ſacrifice, nor is there any mention made of their being offered; though it is probable they might be offered after they had anſwered the principal end, which was to be a ſign, whereby Abram might know that his ſeed ſhould inherit the land; but the intention of God was, that as by them Abram's ſeed might be taught what ſort of creatures they were to offer for their ſins, ſo chiefly to ſhew that they themſelves would fall a ſacrifice to the rage and fury of their enemies, in a land not theirs, and be uſed as theſe creatures were: and the number 3 may denote the 3 complete centuries in which they would be afflicted, and in the 4th come out ſafe and whole like the undivided birds, the turtle, dove and pigeon, to which they were comparable. Ramban [i] thinks, that this number repreſents the 3 ſorts of ſacrifices, the burnt-offering, the ſin-offering, and the peace-offering; and that of theſe three kinds of animals, only one individual of them was taken, and is called called treble, becauſe each individual were joined together. Onkelos renders it 3 heifers, and ſo 3 goats and 3 rams afterwards; in which he is followed by Jarchi and Ben Melech; the former thinks the 3 heifers refer to the heifer of the day of atonement, that for uncertain murder, and the red heifer; and in like manner he interprets the 3 goats and rams; but the Targum of Jonathan, and Aben Ezra, interpret them as we do of creatures of 3 years old: it follows, and a ſhe-goat of 3 years old, and a ram of 3 years old, and a turtle-dove and a young pigeon. Some Jewiſh writers [k] have a notion that theſe creatures repreſent the 4 monarchies; the heifer, the Babylonian monarchy, which had 3 kings, Nebuchadnezzar, Evil-merodach and Belſhazzar; but others make this to be the 4th monarchy, they call Idumæan or Roman, which is like an heifer at graſs, Jer. l. 11. which paſſage better ſuits with Babylon; the goat, Media (or Perſia) which had 3 kings, Cyrus, Darius and Ahaſuerus; and the ram, Grecia; but others ſay the goat ſignifies the Grecian monarchy, and the ram the Medo-perſian monarchy, which latter agrees with Dan. viii. 3, 5, 20, 21; and by the turtle, the word for which, in the Syriac language, ſignifies an ox, they underſtand, ſome the children of Iſhmael, or the Turkiſh empire, and others Edom or the Roman: but it is much better to interpret them of Abram's poſterity, comparable to theſe creatures, both for their good and bad qualities; to an heifer for laborioufneſs in ſervice, and patience in ſufferings; and for their backſlidings, Hoſ. iv. 16; to a goat for their vicious qualities, their luſts and laſciviouſneſs; and to a ram, for their ſtrength and fortitude; and to a turtle, and a young pigeon, for their ſimplicity, innocence and harmleſſneſs, when they were in their pureſt ſtate, ſee Pſ. lxxiv. 19. and it may be obſerved, that theſe were the only fowl uſed in ſacrifice.

℣. 10. And he took unto him all theſe, &c.] The heifer, goat, ram, turtle, and young pigeon, not to himſelf, but to the Lord, as he was bid, and offered them before him, as the above Targums paraphraſe it; or however he took them for his uſe, and ſet them before him, and did with them as he directed him: and divided them in the midſt; that is, the 3 animals, the heifer, goat and ram; he did not take off their ſeveral limbs, and cut them up in ſmall parts, but cut them in halves: and laid each piece one againſt another; one half againſt the other, the left ſide againſt the right, ſhoulder againſt ſhoulder, and leg againſt leg, ſo that they might ſeem to join, or might be eaſily joined together again, or however anſwer one another; tho' it is generally thought there was ſuch a diſtance of the one from the other, as that there might be a paſſage between them; it being uſual in making covenants for the covenanters to paſs between the parts of a creature ſlain, ſignifying, that ſhould they break the covenant made, they deſerved to be cut aſunder as that creature was, ſee Jer. xxxiv. 18. and the note there. So a burning lamp, or lamp of fire, an emblem of the divine being, is ſaid, ℣. 17. to paſs between thoſe pieces: all this was expreſſive of the afflictions of the poſterity of Abram, of their being diſtreſſed in the land of Egypt, cut as it were in twain there, and of their various diſperſions in other countries; and yet, like the bones in Ezekiel's viſion, were gathered together, and united again: and it may be this may have reſpect to the diviſion of the people of Iſrael into 2 kingdoms, in the times of Rehoboam, and their after re-union, and eſpecially in the latter day, Ezek. xxxvii. 7. 16—22: but the birds divided he not; but laid them one againſt another, as the pieces were laid; ſo the birds uſed in ſacrifice under the law were not to be divided, Lev. i. 17. which may ſignify, that when the people of the Jews, in the latter day, are converted, and brought together into their own land, when they will better anſwer the character of turtles and doves than they ever did, will be no more divided and ſeparated from each other.

℣. 11. And when the fowls came down upon the carcaſes, &c.] Upon the birds, as Aben Ezra and Ben Melech interpret it, whoſe carcaſes were whole; or rather upon the divided carcaſes of the animals, and indeed on both: this is to be underſtood of birds of prey, as eagles, vultures, kites, crows, &c. and are an emblem of the Egyptians chiefly, and other enemies of Iſrael, who came upon them to devour them; ſo the Targum of Jonathan, "and "the idolatrous nations deſcended, who were like "to an unclean fowl, to ſpoil the goods of the "Iſraelites;" and likewiſe the Targum of Jeruſalem, "this unclean fowl are the idolatrous king-"doms of the earth:" Abram drove them away; that they might not ſettle upon the carcaſes, and devour them: the Septuagint verſion is, Abram ſat with them; he ſat by the carcaſes and watched them, that no hurt came to them, and to take notice of them, and conſider and learn what they were an emblem of. The Jews [l] alſo obſerve, that "Abram ſat and waved over them with his nap-"kin or handkerchief, that the birds might not "have power over them until the evening." This may reſpect not the merit of Abram, as the above Targums, by which his poſterity were protected, and the deſigns of their enemies fruſtrated; but the effectual fervent prayer of Abram, his prayer of faith for them, in anſwer to which they were delivered out of the hands of the Egyptians, and other enemies, whom Abram foreſaw they would be diſtreſſed with.

℣. 12. And when the ſun was going down, &c.] Juſt ſetting, deſcending below the hemiſphere; or about to enter [m] into his chamber, as Piſcator obſerves, from whence he went forth in the morning, as a ſtrong man to run his race; which at ſun-ſetting is finiſhed according to human appearance, and the vulgar apprehenſions of men, who have thought it goes under the earth, or drops into the ocean, ſee Pſ. xix. 5: a deep ſleep fell upon Abram; through the great fatigue he had had the preceding day, in doing what is before related; or rather through a more than ordinary influence of God upon him, which bound up his ſenſes, and caſt him into an extacy or trance, when he had the following prophecy and viſion, which more fully explained to him the emblem he had been converſant with; this was ſuch a ſleep as fell on Adam, ch. ii. 21: and lo, an horror of great darkneſs fell upon him; or ſuch darkneſs as was horrible and terrible, ſo it was repreſented to his mind in viſion; which ſignified the great afflictions after expreſſed by darkneſs, that ſhould come upon his children in Egypt and elſewhere: and ſo Jarchi ſays it refers to the diſtreſſes and darkneſs of their captivities in Egypt, and in other places. The Targumiſts obſerve, that Abram in this viſion ſaw the four monarchies that ſhould bring his children into bondage.

℣. 13. And he ſaid unto Abram, &c.] Whilſt he was in a deep ſleep; this he ſaid to him in a viſion of prophecy: know of a ſurety, or in knowing thou ſhalt or mayeſt know [n]; and be aſſured of it, being now told it by the Lord himſelf, who foreknows all things that ever come to paſs; many of which he acquaints his people with beforehand, nor would he hide from Abram his friend what ſhould befal his poſterity, as follows: that thy ſeed ſhall be a ſtranger in a land that is not theirs; this prophecy could not take place at this time, ſince Abram had then no ſeed; but at the birth of Iſaac, in whom his ſeed was called, who ſojourned, or was a ſtranger in Gerar, a part of the land of Canaan, as Jacob alſo in the ſame land, Gen. xxvi. 3. and xxxvii. 1. as well as he and his poſterity ſojourned or lived as ſtrangers in the land of Ham, in Egypt, Pſ. cv. 23. and neither of theſe countries were theirs; for though there was a grant of Canaan to Abram and his ſeed, yet it was not in poſſeſſion; though a land of promiſe, it was a ſtrange land, a land of their pilgrimage, and where all the patriarchs lived in it as ſuch, ſee Exod. vi. 4. Heb. xi. 9: and ſhall ſerve them; the inhabitants of the land not theirs, that is, the Canaanites and the Egyptians, eſpecially the latter; and theſe they ſerved after the death of Joſeph, by whom their lives were made bitter with hard bondage: and they ſhall afflict them 400 years; this term 400 years is not to be joined either with the word afflict or ſerve; for their hard ſervitude and ſevere affliction did not laſt long, but a few years at moſt; but with the phraſe, a ſtranger in a land not theirs, and the reſt is to be included in a parentheſis thus, and thy ſeed ſhall be a ſtranger in the land not theirs (and ſhall ſerve them, and they ſhall afflict them) four hundred years; ſo long they ſhould be ſtrangers and ſojourners, as they were partly in the land of Canaan, and partly in the land of Egypt, neither of which were in their own land, however not in poſſeſſion; within which ſpace of time they would be in a ſtate of ſubjection and ſervitude, and be greatly afflicted and oppreſſed, as they were particularly by the Egyptians before their deliverance from them, ſee Exod. i. 11—22. and v. 6—14. Theſe 400 years, as before obſerved, are to be reckoned from the birth of Iſaac to the Iſraelites going out of Egypt, and are counted by Jarchi thus; Iſaac was 60 years of age when Jacob was born, and Jacob when he went down into Egypt was 130, which make 190; and the Iſraelites were in Egypt 210 years, which complete the ſum of 400: according to Euſebius, there were 405 years from the birth of Iſaac to the Exodus of Iſrael; but the round number is only given, as is very uſual; and tho' the ſojourning of the Iſraelites is ſaid to be 430 years, Exod. xii. 40. this takes in the ſojourneying of Abram in that land, who entered into it 25 years before the birth of Iſaac, which added to 405, the ſum total is 430; for Abram was 75 years of age when he left Haran and went to Canaan, and Iſaac was born when he was 100 years old, ſee Gen. xii. 4. and xxi. 5.

℣. 14. And alſo that nation whom they ſhall ſerve will I judge, &c.] It is not ſaid the land in which they were ſtrangers, though God did judge, condemn, and puniſh the inhabitants of the land of Canaan, and drove them out of it, to make way for Iſrael; but the nation they ſhould ſerve, meaning the Egyptians, to whom they became ſervants, and were very hardly and ſeverely uſed by them; thoſe the Lord threatens to enter into judgment with, and take vengeance upon them, as he did by inflicting the ten plagues on them, which brought them at laſt to be willing to let Iſrael go: and afterward ſhall they come out with great ſubſtance; as they did after the 400 years were ended, and after the Egyptian nation was judged and puniſhed; then they came out of Egypt, with much gold, ſilver, jewels, and raiment, which they borrowed of the Egyptians, who were ſpoiled by them, though very juſtly; this being but a payment of them for the hard and long ſervice with which they had ſerved them; ſee the exact fulfilment of prophecy, Exod. xi. 2, 3. and xii. 35, 36. Pſ. cv. 37.

℣. 15. And thou ſhalt go to thy fathers in peace, &c.] Or die, which is a going the way of all fleſh, to a man's long home, out of this world to another, to the world of ſpirits, to thoſe that are gone before them; which is no inconſiderable proof of the immortality of the ſoul: Jarchi infers from hence, that Terah, Abram's father, was a penitent, and died a good man, and went to heaven, the place and ſtate of the bleſſed, whither Abram ſhould go at death; but the phraſe of going to the fathers, is uſed both of good and bad men: it is moreover ſaid of Abram, that he ſhould go in peace; being freed from all the fatigues of his journeying from place to place in his ſtate of pilgrimage, and not living to ſee the afflictions of his poſterity, and to have any ſhare in them; and dying in ſpiritual peace, in tranquillity of mind, knowing in whom he had believed, and where his ſalvation was ſafe and ſecure, and whither he was going; for a good man dies with peace of conſcience, having his ſins freely forgiven, and he juſtified from them by the righteouſneſs of the living Redeemer, and enters into eternal peace, ſee Pſ. xxxvii. 37: thou ſhalt be buried in a good old age; this ſignifies, that he ſhould live long, ſee many days and good ones, enjoy much health and proſperity, continue in the ways of truth and righteouſneſs to the end, and come to his grave like a ſhock of corn fully ripe, and fit for another world; and that he ſhould have a decent interment in the land of Canaan, where he purchaſed a burial-place, and which was a pledge and earneſt of the future poſſeſſion of it by his ſeed, the thing here promiſed.

℣. 16. And in the 4th generation they ſhall come hither again, &c.] The ſeed of Abram were in the land of Canaan before their deſcent into Egypt; and it is here predicted and promiſed, that they ſhould come thither again, as they did, in the 4th generation of thoſe that deſcended thither; for Moſes and Aaron were the 4th from Levi, or Eleazar from Kohath, and Caleb from Judah; or rather this was in the 4th age or century from the birth of Iſaac, when the 400 were up before-mentioned, men living at that time about 100 years: Grotius interprets this of the 4th generation of the Amorites, becauſe of what follows: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full; and therefore as yet would not be turned out of the land, and the ſeed of Abram could not till then inherit it: wicked people have a meaſure of iniquity to fill up, which is known of God; ſome are longer, ſome are quicker in filling it up, during which time God waits patiently and bears with them; but, when it is completed, he ſtays no longer, but takes vengeance on them, Matt. xxiii. 32. The Amorites were only one of the nations of the Canaanites, but were a very ſtrong and powerful one, and are put for them all, and are the rather mentioned, becauſe Abram at this time dwelt among them; and it ſeems as if there there were ſome good men among them, ſuch as the confederates of Abram might be, and they were not arrived to that pitch of wickedneſs they afterwards would and did, and which brought on their ruin, and ſo made way for the poſterity of Abram to inherit their land. Ben Melech interprets it of the puniſhment of the ſin of the Amorites, the time for that was not come to diſpoſſeſs them of their land.

℣. 17. And it came to paſs, when the ſun went down, &c.] It was going down when the deep ſleep fell on Abram, and now it was quite gone or ſet: and it was dark; which is not always the caſe as ſoon as the ſun is ſet, there is a twilight for a while, and if a clear night the ſtars appear; but, as Aben Ezra obſerves, this was a dark and cloudy night; ſo it was a dark night, a time of great affliction and diſtreſs to the poſterity of Abram, when their ſun was ſet, or after the death of Joſeph: behold a ſmoking furnace; or the likeneſs of one, as Aben Ezra notes; for all this was repreſented in a viſionary way to Abram, and was an emblem of the great troubles and afflictions of the children of Iſrael in Egypt, called the iron furnace, Deut. iv. 20. and may have reſpect to the furnaces in which they burnt the bricks they made, ſee Exod. ix. 8. the Jewiſh paraphraſes make this to be a repreſentation of hell, which is prepared for the wicked in the world to come, as a furnace ſurrounded with ſparks and flames of fire; and Jarchi ſays, it intimated to Abram, that the kingdoms would fall into hell: and a burning lamp, that paſſed between thoſe pieces; or, a lamp of fire [o]; an emblem of the Shekinah, or majeſty of God, who afterwards appeared in a pillar of fire before the Iſraelites in the wilderneſs, after their deliverance out of Egypt, and when their ſalvation went forth as a lamp that burneth, of which this was a token: this burning lamp paſſed between the pieces of the heifer, goat, and ram, that Abram had divided in the midſt, as was uſually done when covenants were made, ſee Jer. xxxiv. 18. and here God made a covenant with Abram, as appears from the following verſe; and, as a confirmation of it, paſſed between the pieces in a lamp of fire, ſhewing that he was and would be the light and ſalvation of his people, Abram's ſeed, and an avenger of their enemies; only God paſſed between the pieces, not Abram, this covenant being as others God makes with men, only on one ſide; God in covenanting with men promiſes and gives ſomething unto them, but men give nothing to him, but receive from him, as was the caſe between God and Abram: however, it is very probable, that this lamp of fire conſumed the pieces, in like manner as fire from heaven uſed to fall upon and conſume the ſacrifices, in token of God's acceptance of them.

℣. 18. In the ſame day the Lord made a covenant with Abram, &c.] Which he confirmed by paſſing between the pieces and accepting his ſacrifice: ſaying, unto thy ſeed have I given this land; he had given it in his purpoſe, and he had given the promiſe of it, and here he renews the grant, and ratifies and confirms it, even the land of Canaan, where Abram now was, though only a ſojourner in it; and which is deſcribed by its boundaries and preſent occupants, in this and the following verſes, as is uſually done in grants of lands and deeds of conveyance: from the river of Egypt, unto the great river, the river of Euphrates; the river of Egypt is the Nile, which overflowed it annually and made it fruitful; ſo the Targum of Jonathan calls it the river of Egypt; it may be rendered, from the river Mizraim or Egypt, for the name of Egypt was given to the river Nile as well as to the country, and ſo it is called by Homer [p]; and Diodorus Siculus [q] ſays, the Nile was firſt called Egypt; ſome [r] think the Nile is not here meant, but a little river of Egypt that ran through the deſart that lay between Paleſtine and Egypt; but it ſeems to be a branch of the river Nile, which was leſſer about Paleſtine or Damiata, at the entrance of Egypt, than at other places. Brocardus [s] ſays, "from Delta to Heliopo- "lis were 3 miles, where another river was ſepa-"rated from the Nile, and carried to the city of "Peluſium; and, adds he, this river is properly "called in ſcripture the river of Egypt, and at it is
"bounded the lot of the tribe of Judah." This river of Egypt, or the Nile, was the ſouthern boundary of the land of Canaan, and from hence to the river Euphrates, the eaſtern boundary, was the utmoſt extent of it in which it was ever poſſeſſed, as it was in the times of David and Solomon, 2 Sam. viii. 3. 1 Kings iv. 21.

℣. 19. The Kenites, and the Kenizzites, and the Kadmonites.] In this and the following verſes 10 nations are reckoned as occupying the land of Canaan at this time, whereas only 7 are mentioned in the times of Moſes and Joſhua; and theſe 3 are not among them, and ſeem before thoſe times to have been extinct, or were mixed with the other nations, and were no more diſtinct ones; though Aben Ezra thinks theſe people had two names, and Jarchi interprets them of the Edomites, Moabites, and Ammonites, who ſhall be the inheritance of the children of Iſrael in future times, according to Iſ. xi. 14. and ſo the Jeruſalem Talmud [t], from whence he ſeems to have taken it; and ſome are of opinion that the Midianites are meant by the Kenites, ſince Jethro, Moſes's father-in-law, who was of Midian, is called the Kenite, as was alſo Heber, who was of the ſame race, Judg. i. 16. and iv. 11. there were Kenites near to the Amalekites in the times of Balaam, and who dwelt among them in the times of Saul, Numb. xxiv. 20, 21. 1 Sam. xv. 6. as there were alſo ſome of this name that deſcended from the father of the houſe of Rechab, or the Rechabites, who were aſſociates and proſelytes to the people of Iſrael, 1 Chron. ii. 55. the Kenizzites are ſuppoſed by ſome to be the deſcendants of Kenaz, a grandſon of Eſau, Gen. xxxvi. 11. but then they muſt be ſo called here by anticipation, ſince Kenaz was not now born, and rather then would have had the name of Kenazites; beſides, none of the land of the children of Eſau, at leaſt of thoſe that dwelt about mount Seir, was to be given to the children of Iſrael, Deut. ii. 5. could indeed the Edomites or Idumeans be intended, it might be thought this had its accompliſhment in the times of David, and more eſpecially when the Idumeans became Jews, embraced their religion, and were one people with them, in the times of Hyrcanus [u]: the Kadmonites, or the Orientals, were, as Bochart [w] very probably thinks, the Hivites, who inhabited the eaſtern part of the land of Canaan about mount Hermon, and from thence might have their name, as they are in the Jeruſalem Targum called the children of the eaſt; and hence came the names of Cadmus and

CHAP. XVI.

THIS chapter gives an account of Abram's marrying his maid, at the inſtance of his wife Sarai, ℣. 1, 2, 3. who, upon conceiving, deſpiſed her miſtreſs; of which complaint is made to Abram, who leaving his maid to his wife, to deal with her as ſhe pleaſed, dealt hardly by her, and therefore fled from her, ℣. 4, 5, 6. when ſhe was met by an angel, who adviſed her to return and ſubmit herſelf to her miſtreſs, and told her, her ſeed would be greatly multiplied, gave a name to the child ſhe went with, and deſcribed his temper and diſpoſition, ℣. 7—12. and then we have the name of God that ſpoke to her, and of the place where the diſcourſe paſſed between them, ℣. 13, 14. and the chapter is concluded with the birth of Iſhmael, and the age of Abram at his birth, ℣. 15, 16.

℣. 1. Now Sarai Abram's wife bare him no children, &c.] She is before ſaid to be barren, and he to be childleſs, ch. xi. 30. and xv. 2. God had promiſed him a ſeed, but as yet he had none, which was a trial of his faith; he had been married many years to Sarai his wife, ſhe was his wife when they came out of Ur of the Chaldees, and how long before cannot be ſaid; they ſtayed and dwelt ſome time at Haran, the Jews [x] ſay 5 years, and they had been now 10 years in the land of Canaan, ℣. 3. and were advanced in years, the one being 75, and the other 85, ſo that there was no great probability of having any children, wherefore the following ſtep was taken: and ſhe had an handmaid, an Egyptian, whoſe name was Hagar; no doubt but ſhe had many, but this was a principal one, that might be over others, and was chiefly entruſted with the care and management of family-affairs under her miſtreſs; ſhe might be the daughter of an Egyptian, born in Abram's houſe, as Eliezer was the ſon of a Syrian of Damaſcus, born there alſo; or ſhe might be one of the maid-ſervants Pharaoh, king of Egypt, gave to Abram, ch. xii. 16. the Jews [y] have a tradition, that ſhe was a daughter of Pharaoh, who, when he ſaw the wonders done for Sarai, ſaid, it is better that my daughter ſhould be a handmaid in this houſe, than a miſtreſs in another, and therefore gave her to Sarai; others ſay [z], ſhe was a daughter of his by a concubine, but neither is probable: from her came the people called Hagarites, 1 Chron. v. 10. and Hagarenes, Pſ. lxxxiii. 6. and there were a people in Arabia called Agræi, both by Strabo [a] and Pliny [b]; and the latter ſpeaks of a royal city in that country called Agra, which ſeem to have their names from this perſon. Melo [c], an heathen writer, ſpeaking of Abram, ſays, that he had two wives, one of his own country and a-kin to him, and the other an Egyptian, a ſervant; of the Egyptian he begat 12 ſons, who, going into Arabia, divided the country among them, and were the firſt that reigned over the inhabitants of it; as to her 12 ſons, he miſtakes, for theſe were not Hagar's ſons by Abram, but her grandſons, the ſons of Iſhmael, ſee Gen. xvii. 20.

℣. 2. And Sarai ſaid unto Abram, behold now, the Lord hath reſtrained me from bearing, &c.] Or, hath ſhut me up [d]; that is, her womb, as were the wombs of the houſe of Abimelech, ch. xx. 18. ſo that ſhe could not conceive and bear children; ſhe now at this age deſpaired of having children, perceiving very probably that it ceaſed to be with her after the manner of women; and this ſhe refers to the will and power of God; for, as children are his gift and an heritage from him, ſo it is his will and pleaſure ſometimes to withold this bleſſing from thoſe who are very deſirous of them: I pray thee go in unto my maid; Hagar the Egyptian beforementioned; her meaning is, that he would take her to wife, and uſe her as ſuch: it may be that I may obtain children by her; for whatſoever were born of her handmaid, and in her houſe, were her own, and ſo ſhe ſhould account them, and eſpecially as they would be her huſband's, ſee Exod. xxi. 4. or, may be builded by her [e]; for women by bearing children build up an houſe, ſee Ruth iv. 11. hence a ſon in Hebrew is called ben, from banah, to build: and Abram hearkened to the voice of Sarai; without conſulting God about it, the propoſal being agreeable to the fleſh, which may be imputed to the infirmity of the good man; though it does not appear to ariſe from previous luſt predominant in him; but both Sarai's propoſal, and his compliance with it, might be owing to the eager deſire of each after the promiſed ſeed; they both believed the promiſe, but did not know it, being not as yet revealed, that Abram ſhould have a ſon by Sarai; ſo that Sarai, knowing her own caſe and circumſtances, might conclude it was to be by another, and by her handmaid; and Abram might reaſon and judge after the ſame manner, which inclined him to liſten to her: Joſephus [f] ſays, indeed, that Sarai moved this to Abram Abram by the direction and order of God himſelf; and the Jewiſh writers ſay [g], that Abram hearkened to the Holy Spirit of God that was in her.

℣. 3. And Sarai Abram's wife took Hagar her maid, the Egyptian, &c.] Took her by the hand, it is probable, and led her into the apartment where Abram was, and preſented her to him; their characters are very exactly deſcribed, and the contraſt beautifully given, that the affair might be the more remarkable and obſervable: after Abram had dwelt ten years in the land of Canaan; ſo that he was now 85 years of age, for he was 75 when he departed from Haran and came into Canaan, ch. xii. 4. and Sarai, being 10 years younger than he, muſt be 75; the Jews from hence have formed a rule or canon, that if a man marries a woman, and ſhe has no children in 10 years, he is obliged to marry another [h]: and gave her to her huſband Abram to be his wife; his ſecondary wife, or concubine; which, though contrary to the firſt inſtitution of marriage, was connived at of God, and was practiſed by good men: nothing can excuſe them but their earneſt deſire after the Meſſiah, the promiſed ſeed; and one may conclude, that nothing but this eſpecially could move Sarai to take ſuch a ſtep, ſo contrary to the temper and diſpoſition of women in common.

℣. 4. And he went in unto Hagar, and ſhe conceived, &c.] The formality of the marriage being over, he enjoyed her as his wife, and ſhe immediately conceived by him: and when ſhe ſaw that ſhe had conceived; when ſhe perceived that ſhe was with child: her miſtreſs was deſpiſed in her eyes; ſhe thought herſelf above her, and treated her as her inferior, with contempt, and reproached her for her barrenneſs, as Peninnah did Hannah; and it was the more ungrateful, as it was at the motion of her miſtreſs that ſhe was given to Abram for wife.

℣. 5. And Sarai ſaid to Abram, &c.] Being affronted with the behaviour of her maid to her, ſhe applies to Abram for the redreſs of her grievance, judging it perhaps below her dignity to enter into an altercation with her maid: my wrong be upon thee; in her paſſion imprecating evil on him, as a juſt puniſhment upon him for ſuffering wrong to be done her by her maid; or, is upon thee [i]; pointing at his duty, and ſuggeſting to him what he ought to do; that it was incumbent on him as her huſband to right her wrongs, and do her juſtice, and vindicate her from the calumnies and reproaches of her ſervant; and tacitly complaining of him, and accuſing him with indolence and unconcern at the injury done her, being ſilent when it became him to check her inſolence and chide her for it: or, is for thee [k]; for thy ſake; it was for the ſake of Abram chiefly, that he might have a ſon and heir, for which he was very ſollicitous, that ſhe gave him her maid to wife; the conſequence of which was, that ſhe was now inſulted and abuſed by her, and ſo ſuffered wrong for his ſake; and the rather ſhe might be tempted to ſay it was on his account, as ſhe might be jealous of a growing affection in him to Hagar, and that he ſhewed greater reſpect to her, being likely to have a child by her, and ſo connived at her haughtineſs and arrogance: I have given my maid into thy boſom; to be his wife, Mic. vii. 5. Sarai had no reaſon to upbraid Abram with this, ſince it was not at his ſollicitations ſhe gave her to him, but it was her own motion: and when ſhe ſaw that ſhe had conceived, I was deſpiſed in her eyes; when ſhe found herſelf with child, and hoped to bring forth a ſon, that ſhould be heir to Abram's large poſſeſſions, and inherit the land of Canaan, given to his ſeed; ſhe began to think highly of herſelf, and looked with diſdain upon her miſtreſs, ſet lightly by her, made no account of her, ſhewed her no reſpect, carried it haughtily to her, as if ſhe was beneath her, and as if ſhe had more authority in the houſe, and a better claim to the affection of Abram, and deſerving of more honour and reſpect, as ſhe was favoured of God with conception, a bleſſing Sarai never enjoyed: the Lord judge between me and thee; which was very raſhly and haſtily ſaid, as if Abram was not inclined and was unwilling to do her juſtice, and therefore ſhe appeals to God againſt him, as an unrighteous man, and deſires that he would interpoſe, and by his providence ſhew who was in the right and who in the wrong: or, the Lord will judge [l]; expreſſing her confidence not only in the juſtneſs of her cauſe, but in the appearance of Divine Providence in her favour; believing that the Lord would ariſe and help her and defend her againſt the inſults made upon her, and reſent the injury done her.

℣. 6. But Abram ſaid unto Sarai, &c.] In a meek, mild, and gentle manner: behold, thy maid is in thine hand; though Hagar was Abram's ſecondary wife, he ſtill conſiders her as Sarai's maid, and as ſubject to her, and allows her to exerciſe authority over her; for he ſtill retained the ſame love and affection for Sarai, his firſt and lawful wife, and ſhewed the ſame reſpect he ever did, and ſupported her in her honour and dignity: do to her as it pleaſeth thee; not giving her liberty to take away her life, nor even to uſe her cruelly, but to deal with her as a miſtreſs might lawfully do with a ſervant, or however exerciſe that power which a firſt wife had over a ſecond: perhaps Abram, in complaiſance to Sarai, gave her too large a commiſſion, and left it too much in her power to diſtreſs Hagar; and it might have been righteſt to have heard both ſides, and judged between them, and uſed his own authority, by reproving and correcting as he ſaw meet; had ſhe been only Sarai's maid and not his wife, it would have been leſs exceptionable; however, for peace-ſake, he gave leave to Sarai to do as ſhe would: and when Sarai dealt hardly with her; or afflicted her [m], not only with words but with blows, as ſome think, and unmercifully beat her, and laid hard ſervice upon her, ſhe was not able to go through, eſpecially in her circumſtances; though it may be ſhe only chaſtized her in ſuch a manner as a miſtreſs may chaſtize her maid, ſince the angel ſeems to approve of what ſhe did, ℣. 9. which her proud ſpirit not being able to bear, ſhe fled from her face; which was ſet againſt her, and was full of wrath and fury; ſhe deſerted her ſervice, quitted Abram's houſe tho' with child by him; unmindful of the various relations ſhe ſtood in, which ſhould have obliged her to have kept her place, and eſpecially until ſhe had made proper remonſtrances of her ill uſage, and could have no redreſs; but, unable to bear the treatment ſhe met with, meditated a flight into her own country Egypt, for by what follows it appears ſhe ſteered her courſe that way; this flight of hers was agreeable to her name, for Hagar in the Arabic language ſignifies to flee, hence the flight of Mahomet is called the Hegira.

℣. 7. And the angel of the Lord found her, &c.] This is the firſt time that mention is made of an angel in ſcripture, but is not to be underſtood of a created angel, but of a divine perſon, as appears from ℣. 10, 13. an increated angel, the Logos or Son of God, called the angel of God's preſence, and the angel of the covenant, Iſ. lxiii. 9. Mal. iii. 1. who often appeared in an human form before his incarnation, being ſent by his divine Father on one account or another; and hence called an angel, a meſſenger, or one ſent, as in the fulneſs of time he was ſent in human nature to be the Redeemer of his people; though many of the Jewiſh writers take this angel to be a man ſent of God. Gerſom [n] ſays he was one of the prophets that lived in thoſe times, and obſerves, that ſome of their Rabbins ſay [o] he was Shem, the ſon of Noah; and Maimonides [p] ſuggeſts, that this angel was but a mere man, by comparing this paſſage with that in Gen. xxxvii. 15. a certain man found him, &c. but the context moſt clearly confutes this notion, and proves him to be the almighty and omniſcient God; ſince he promiſes to do what none but the omnipotent being could do, and declares ſuch things as none but the omniſcient God could know: and when it is ſaid he found Hagar, it is not to be underſtood as if it was a chance-matter, or the fruit and effect of ſearch and enquiry, or as if he had not ſeen her before; but rather it ſhews that his eye was upon her, and he had a concern for her, and at a proper time and place appeared to her at once, and unawares, and unthought of by her. And the place where he found her was by a fountain of water in the wilderneſs; which lay between Egypt and Canaan, the ſame through which the Iſraelites paſſed afterwards from the one to the other: here was a fountain of water, and meeting with it ſhe ſtopped to refreſh herſelf, by the fountain in the way to Shur; a place before or over-againſt Egypt, from whence the wilderneſs had its name, ſee Gen. xxv. 18. 1 Sam. xv. 7. Exod. xv. 22. which ſhews that ſhe was making her way to Egypt, as faſt as ſhe could, her native country, where in all probability ſhe propoſed to continue, and never return more: what the name of the place the angel found her at, was at that time, is not certain, or whether it had any; for it ſeems to be ſo called from the Lord's looking upon her here, which Shur ſignifies: the Jeruſalem Targum calls it Chalaza; and both the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan name it Chagra or Hagra, after her own name, as it ſhould ſeem: and it is remarkable, that this very place, and the wilderneſs, and parts adjacent, were the habitation of her poſterity, the ſons of Iſhmael, Gen. xxv. 18. and muſt be in Arabia Petræa, which they inhabited; and Ptolemy [q] ſpeaks of a city called Suratta, in that country.

℣. 8. And he ſaid, Hagar, Sarai's maid, &c.] He calls her by her name, which might ſurpriſe her, and deſcribes her by her character and condition, in order to check her pride, and put her in mind of her duty to her miſtreſs; and to ſuggeſt to her, that ſhe ought to have been not where ſhe was, but in the houſe of her miſtreſs, and doing her ſervice: whence cameſt thou? this queſtion the angel aſked, not as ignorant, for he that could call her by her name, and deſcribe her character and ſtate, knew from whence ſhe came; but he ſaid this not only to lead on to what he had further to ſay to her, but to put her upon conſidering from whence ſhe came, what ſhe had left behind, and what bleſſings ſhe had deprived herſelf of; ſhe had not only left her huſband and her miſtreſs, but the houſe of God; for ſuch Abram's family was, where the worſhip of God was kept up, and where the Lord granted his preſence, and indulged with communion with himſelf: and whither wilt thou go? he knew her intention and reſolution was to go to Egypt, and he would have her think of the place whither ſhe intended to go, as well as that ſhe had left, as that her journey to it was dangerous, thro' a wilderneſs; that the country ſhe was bound for was a wicked and an idolatrous one, where ſhe would not have the free exerciſe of her religion ſhe had embraced, nor any opportunity of attending the pure worſhip of God, and would be liable to be drawn into a ſinful courſe of life, and into idolatrous worſhip: and ſhe ſaid, I flee from the face of my miſtreſs Sarai; this was very ingenuouſly ſaid, ſhe acknowledges Sarai to be her miſtreſs, and owns that ſhe had diſpleaſed her, and cauſed her face to be againſt her; and confeſſes the truth, that ſhe had fled from her, not being able to bear her frowns and corrections, at leaſt her ſpirit was too high to ſubmit to them.

℣. 9. And the angel of the Lord ſaid unto her, &c.] The ſame angel; though Jarchi thinks that one angel after another was ſent, and that at every ſpeech there was a freſh angel; and becauſe this phraſe is repeated again and again, ſome of the Rabbins have fancied there were four angels [r], and others five, but without any reaſon: return to thy miſtreſs, and ſubmit thyſelf under her hands; go back to her, humble thyſelf before her, acknowledge thy fault, enter into her ſervice again, and be ſubject to her; do her work and buſineſs, bear her corrections and chaſtiſements; and ſuffer thyſelf to be afflicted [s], by her, as the word may be rendered; take all patiently from her, which will be much more to thy profit and advantage than to purſue the courſe thou art in: and the more to encourage her to take his advice, he promiſes the following things.

℣. 10. And the angel of the Lord ſaid unto her, &c.] The ſame as before, who by what follows, appears to be Jehovah himſelf: I will multiply thy ſeed exceedingly; not that ſhe ſhould have many children herſelf, for that ſhe had more than this one ſhe now went with, is not certain; but that that ſeed ſhe had conceived ſhould be exceedingly multiplied, and he ſhould have a numerous poſterity, as he had twelve princes ſprung from him, the heads of Arab nations: that it ſhall not be numbred for multitude; ſuch the Turks are at this day, ſuppoſed to be the ſeed of Iſhmael, Hagar's ſon.

of it, that the child ſhe went with was a ſon, which none could foretel but God, that is omniſcient: and ſhalt call his name Iſhmael; the Jews [s] obſerve, there were ſix perſons who had their names given them before they were born, and Iſhmael is one of them; the ſix were Iſaac, Iſhmael, Moſes, Solomon, Joſiah, and the Meſſiah: the reaſon of his name follows, becauſe the Lord hath heard thy affliction; heard of it, had took notice of it, and obſerved, and fully underſtood the nature and cauſe of it; he had heard her groans and ſighs under it, and her prayer and cries for deliverance from it; and ſo the Targum of Onkelos, "for the Lord hath "received thy prayer," which ſhe had put up in her affliction, both when in the ſervice of her miſtreſs, and ſince her flight from her.

℣. 12. And he will be a wild man, &c.] Living in a wilderneſs, delighting in hunting and killing wild beaſts, and robbing and plundering all that paſs by; and ſuch an one Iſhmael was, ſee ch. xxi. 20, 21. and ſuch the Saracens, his poſterity were, and ſuch the wild Arabs are to this day, who deſcended from him; or the wild aſs of a man [t]; or a wild aſs among men, as Onkelos; or like to a wild aſs among men, as the Targum of Jonathan; wild, fierce, untamed, not ſubject to a yoke, and impatient of it, ſee Job xi. 12. ſuch was Iſhmael, and ſuch are his poſterity, who never could be ſubdued or brought into bondage, neither by the Aſſyrians, nor Medes and Perſians, nor by the Greeks nor Romans, nor any other people [u]; and at this day the Arabs live independent on the Turks, nay oblige the Turks to pay a yearly tribute for the paſſage of their pilgrims to Mecca, and alſo to pay for their caravans that paſs through their country, as travellers into thoſe parts unanimouſly report; wherefore Aben Ezra tranſlates the word rendered wild or wild aſs, by פרא free, and refers to the paſſage in Job xxxix. 5. Theſe people having been always free, and never in bondage, always lived as free booters upon others: his hand will be againſt every man, and every man's hand againſt him; ſignifying, that he would be of a quarrelſome temper and warlike diſpoſition, continually engaged in fighting with his neighbours, and they with him in their own defence; and ſuch the Arabs his poſterity always have been, and ſtill are, given to rapine and plunder, haraſſing their neighbours by continual excurſions and robberies, and pillaging paſſengers of all nations, which they think they have a right to do. Their father Iſhmael being turned out into the plains and deſarts, which were given him as his patrimony, and as they ſuppoſe a permiſſion from God to take whatever he could get. And a late traveller into thoſe parts obſerves [w], that they are not to be accuſed of plundering ſtrangers only, or whomſoever they may find unarmed or defenceleſs; but for thoſe many implacable and hereditary animoſities which continually ſubſiſt among themſelves, literally fulfilling to this day the prophecy of the angel to Hagar, Gen. xvi. 12. the greateſt as well as the ſmalleſt tribes are perpetually at variance with one another, frequently occaſioned upon the moſt trivial account, as if they were from the very days of their firſt anceſtor naturally prone to diſcord and contention. And he ſhall dwell in the preſence of all his brethren; the ſons of Abram by Keturah, the Midianites, and others; and the Edomites that ſprung from Eſau, the ſon of his brother Iſaac; and the Iſraelites, the deſcendants of Jacob, another ſon of Iſaac; and his kinſmen the Moabites and Ammonites, upon all which he and his poſterity bordered, ſee Gen. xxv. 18. It may be rendered, he ſhall tabernacle [x], or dwell in tents, as he did, and his poſterity afterwards; particularly the Scenite Arabs, ſo called from their dwelling in tents, and the Bedoweens ſuch were the tents of Kedar, one of his ſons, Cant. i. 5. the ſame with them to this day: according to Jarchi, the ſenſe of the phraſe is, that his ſeed ſhould be large and numerous, and ſpread themſelves and reach to the borders of all their brethren.

℣. 13. And ſhe called the name of the Lord that ſpake unto her, &c.] Either ſhe called on the name of the Lord, and prayed unto him, that he would forgive her ſin, and give her ſome freſh tokens of his love; and alſo gave him thanks for his gracious regards unto her, that he ſhould look upon, and look after ſo mean a creature, and ſuch a backſlider as ſhe was, and return her, and make ſuch gracious promiſes to her; ſo the Targum of Onkelos, "ſhe prayed in the name of the Lord;" and the Targum of Jonathan is, "and ſhe confeſſed, "or gave thanks before the Lord, whoſe word "ſpake unto her;" and the Jeruſalem Targum takes in both prayer and praiſe, "and Hagar gave thanks, "and prayed in the name of the word of the Lord, "who was revealed unto her:" in which may be obſerved the ſenſe of the ancient ſynagogue, that this angel that appeared to Hagar, and talked with her, was the Word of the Lord, the eternal Logos, or Son of God: or elſe the ſenſe is, that ſhe gave the following name or epithet to the Lord, that vouchſafed to diſcourſe with her, thou God ſeeſt me; ſhe perceived by experience his eye was upon her wherever ſhe was, and ſaw all ſhe did; ſaw all her tranſgreſſions, her contempt of her miſtreſs, and her flight from her; ſaw her when ſhe was at the fountain, and reproved and recalled her, and ſent her back; ſaw all the workings of her heart, her repentance and ſorrow for her ſins; looked and ſmiled upon her, and gave her exceeding great and precious promiſes: he looked upon her, both with his eye of omniſcience and providence, and with his eye of love, and grace, and mercy; yea, ſhe was ſenſible that he was not only the God that ſaw her, but ſaw all things; was God omniſcient, and therefore gives him this name under a thorough conviction, and deep ſenſe of his omniſcience; and ſo Onkelos paraphraſes the words, "thou art he, "the God that ſees all things:" for ſhe ſaid, have I alſo here looked after him that ſeeth me? this ſhe ſaid within herſelf, either as blaming herſelf, that ſhe ſhould not look after God in this deſolate place until now, and call upon him, and praiſe his name, whoſe eye was upon her, and had a concern for her, and care over her; and yet ſo ungrateful ſhe had been as to neglect him, and not ſeek after him as it became her: or as wondering that here, in this wilderneſs, ſhe ſhould be favoured with the ſight of God, and of his angel, whom ſhe had ſeen in Abram's houſe; where to ſee him was not ſo ſtrange and marvellous, but it was to have a ſight of him in ſuch a place, and under ſuch circumſtances as ſhe was: or elſe as admiring that ſhe ſhould be alive after ſhe had had ſuch a viſion of God, it being a notion that pretty much obtained, that none could ſee God and live, only his back parts were to be ſeen; wherefore others read the words, and and they will bear ſuch a verſion, have not I alſo ſeen here the back parts of him that ſeeth me? [y] ſo Moſes did, Exod. xxxiii. 23.

℣. 14. Wherefore the well was called Beer-lahai-roi, &c.] That is, the fountain where the angel found her, ℣. 7. this from the appearance of God to her at it, was afterwards called by her and others by this name, which ſignifies the well of him that liveth and ſeeth me; that is, of the living and all-ſeeing God, and who had took a ſpecial care of her, and favoured her with a peculiar diſcovery of his love to her: or this may have reſpect to herſelf, and be rendered, the well of her that liveth and ſeeth; that had had a ſight of God, and yet was alive; lived though ſhe had ſeen him, and after ſhe had ſeen him, and was ſtill indulged with a ſight of him. Aben Ezra ſays, the name of this well, at the time he lived, was called Zemum, he doubtleſs means Zemzem, a well near Mecca, which the Arabs ſay [z] is the well by which Hagar ſat down with Iſhmael, and where ſhe was comforted by the angel, ch. xxi. 19: behold, it is between Cadeſh and Bered; Cadeſh is the ſame with Cadeſh Barnea in the wilderneſs, Numb. xiii. 3, 26. Joſh. xiv. 7. The Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan call it Rekam, the ſame with Petra, the chief city of Arabia Petræa, inhabited in after times by the Nabathæans, the poſterity of Iſhmael; and Bered is no where elſe mentioned, it is called by Onkelos Chagra or Hagra, by which he interprets Shur, ℣. 7. and by the Targum of Jonathan it is called Chaluza, a noted town in Idumea, the ſame with Chellus, mentioned with Cades in Judith i 8. and ſo Jerom [a] ſpeaks of a place called Eluſa, near the wilderneſs of Cadeſh, which in his times was inhabited by Saracens, the deſcendants of Iſhmael; and this bids fair to be the Bered here ſpoken of, and ſeems to be its Greek name, and both are of the ſame ſignification; for Bered ſignifies hail, as does Chalaza in Greek, which the Targumiſts here make Chaluza; between Cadeſh and Barath, as Jerom [b] calls it, Hagar's well was ſhewn in his days.

℣. 15. And Hagar bare Abram a ſon, &c.] Being returned to his houſe, and received by him, and reconciled to Sarai, ſhe brought forth a ſon to Abram, according to the prediction of the angel: and Abram called his ſon's name, which Hagar bare, Iſhmael; and this name Jarchi ſuggeſts he gave by the inſpiration of the Holy Spirit that dwelt in him: but it is highly reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that Hagar upon her return reported to Abram the whole of the converſation ſhe had with the angel; wherefore Abram believing what ſhe ſaid, in obedience to the order and command of the angel, gave him this name.

℣. 16. And Abram was 86 years old, when Hagar bare Iſhmael to Abram.] Which is eaſily reckoned, for he was 75 years of age when he left Haran, ch. xii. 4. and he had been 10 years in Canaan when Hagar was given him by Sarai for his wife, ℣. 3. and ſo muſt be then 85 years of age, and of courſe muſt be 86 when Iſhmael was born.

CHAP. XVII.

THIS chapter treats of a covenant made with Abram, ſometimes called the covenant of circumciſion, the time when God appeared to him, and promiſed to make it, and did, ℣. 1, 2, 3. the particulars of it, both with reſpect to himſelf, whoſe name was now changed, and to his poſterity, ℣. 4—8. the token of it, circumciſion, the time of its performance, and the perſons obliged to it, ℣. 9—14. the change of Sarai's name, and a promiſe made that ſhe ſhould have a ſon, to the great ſurprize of Abraham, ℣. 15, 16, 17. a prayer of his for Iſhmael, and the anſwer to it, with a confirmation of Sarah's having a ſon, whoſe name ſhould be called Iſaac, and the eſtabliſhment of the covenant with him, ℣. 18—22. and the chapter is cloſed with an account of the circumciſion of Abraham, and all his family of the male ſort, agreeable to the command of God, ℣. 23—27.

℣. 1. And when Abram was 99 years old, &c.] Which was 13 years after the birth of Iſhmael laſt mentioned; ſo many years more it was before he is expreſsly told he ſhould have a ſon by Sarai, or had the promiſe of Iſaac, which was for the trial of his faith; and his age is here obſerved, that the power of God might be more manifeſt in fulfilling his promiſe, and giving him a ſon by Sarai: the Lord appeared to Abram; in a viſible manner, in an human form very probably, even the Logos, the Word and Son of God: it ſeems as if the Lord had not appeared to him ſince the birth of Iſhmael, until this time; and if ſo, it may be thought to be a correction of him for liſtening to the voice of his wife in marrying Hagar, without aſking counſel of God: and ſaid unto him, I am the almighty God; as the Word of God is, as appears by his creation of all things, his ſuſtentation of them, his government of the church, his redemption of it, and preſervation of his people ſafe to glory, ſee Rev. i. 8. and this epithet is very appoſite here, when the Lord was about to give out a promiſe of a ſon to Abram and Sarai ſo much ſtricken in years. Some render it all-ſufficient [c], as Jehovah is, ſufficient in and of himſelf, and for himſelf, and ſtands in no need of any, or of any thing from another; and has a ſufficiency for others, both in a way of providence and grace: walk before me; not as though Abram had not ſo walked, or had diſcontinued his walk before God, but that he would go on to walk by faith in a dependence on him for every thing he wanted, both with reſpect to things temporal and ſpiritual; and to walk in all his commandments and ordinances, that he either had given, or ſhould give him; and all this as in his preſence, and under his watchful eye, that ſees and obſerves all things, and before whom all things are naked and open, as all are to the eſſential Word of God, Heb. iv. 12, 13. and be thou per- perfect; upright and ſincere in acts of faith, and in duties of religion, and go on to perfection; which though a ſinleſs one is not attainable in this life, is deſirable, and is to be had in Chriſt, tho' not in ourſelves: but here it chiefly denotes an holy and unblameable life and converſation, which tho' not entirely free from ſin, yet without any notorious ones, which bring diſhonour to God, and diſgrace upon a man's character and profeſſion, ſee ch. vi. 9. This reſpects not perfection in his body or fleſh, as the Targum of Jonathan paraphraſes it, through circumciſion, by which the Jews[d] fancy Abram became perfect, but was not till circumciſed.

℣. 2. And I will make my covenant between me and thee, &c.] The covenant of circumciſion, ſo called from the token of it, which God is ſaid to make or give[e], being his own conſtitution, and depended on his ſovereign will and pleaſure, ſee Acts vii. 8. and will multiply thee exceedingly; as he had before promiſed at ſeveral times, and now renews it, leſt he ſhould think that Iſhmael was the promiſed ſeed; for though Hagar's ſeed is promiſed to be multiplied, yet here Abram's ſeed by Sarai is intended, which ſhould be exceeding exceedingly, or in great abundance multiplied; and eſpecially as this may include both his natural ſeed by her, and his ſpiritual ſeed among all nations, who are of the ſame faith with him, ſee ch. xii. 2. and xiii. 16. and xv. 5.

℣. 3. And Abram fell on his face, &c.] At the ſight of ſo glorious a perſon that appeared to him, and in reverence of his majeſty, and as ſenſible of his unworthineſs of ſuch a viſit, and of having ſuch favours beſtowed upon him; and not becauſe he was not as yet circumciſed, as the Targum of Jonathan expreſſes it; and ſo other Jewiſh[f] writers obſerve, that before he was circumciſed he fell, when God ſpoke to him, but afterwards he ſat and ſtood, ch. xviii. 1. but it may be obſerved, that not only uncircumciſed perſons, as Balaam, in whom Jarchi inſtances, but circumciſed ones, as Ezekiel and others, have fallen on their faces at a divine appearance: and God talked with him; after he was raiſed up, and was ſtrengthened and encouraged to ſtand up before God, and hear what he had to ſay to him; for after this we read of his falling on his face again, ℣. 17. which ſhews that he had been erect, after he firſt fell on his face: ſaying; as follows,

℣. 4. As for me, behold, my covenant is with thee, &c.] Who was gracious to make it, faithful to keep it, and immutable in it, though Abram was but a man, and ſinful: and thou ſhalt be a father of many nations; as he was of many Arabian nations, and of the Turks in the line of Iſhmael; and of the Midianites, and others, in the line of his ſons by Keturah; and of the Iſraelites in the line of Iſaac, as well as of the Edomites in the line of Eſau; and in a ſpiritual ſenſe the father of all that believe, in all the nations of the world, circumciſed or uncircumciſed, as the apoſtle explains it, Rom. iv. 11, 12, 16, 17, 18.

℣. 5. Neither ſhall thy name be any more called Abram, &c.] Which ſignifies an high father, which name he bore for many years before he was the father of any one: but thy name ſhall be Abraham; with an addition of the letter ה inſerted into it, and makes the laſt ſyllable two, raham; which word in the Arabic language, as Hottinger[g] obſerves, ſignifies numerous[h]; ſo that with this addition his name Abraham may be interpreted, the father of a numerous offſpring; and with this agrees the reaſon of it, as follows: for a father of many nations have I made thee; not that he was ſo already in fact, but in the purpoſe and promiſe of God, Rom. iv. 17. Abraham has not only been the father of many nations, in a literal ſenſe, as before obſerved, but in a myſtical ſenſe of the whole world; that is, of all in it that believe, whether Jews or Gentiles; and ſo the Rabbins[i] interpret it: at firſt, they ſay, he was the father of Aram, and therefore his name was called Abram, but now he is the father of the whole world, and therefore called Abraham; and ſo Maimonides[k] himſelf ſays, quoting this paſſage, "behold he is the "father of the whole world, who are gathered un-"der the wings of the Shekinah."

℣. 6. And I will make thee exceeding fruitful, &c.] In children, for he had not only a ſon by Sarai, from whom ſprung a numerous offſpring, but he had ſix ſons by Keturah, who became the heads of large nations: and I will make nations of thee; as the nations of Iſrael and Judah, of the Midianites and Edomites, of the Arabs, Saracens and Turks: and kings ſhall come out of thee; as the 12 princes of Iſhmael, the kings of Edom and Midian, of the Arabs, Saracens and Turks, and of Iſrael and Judith; and eſpecially, as obſerved by Grotius, and others, the king Meſſiah: to which may be added, in a myſtical ſenſe, all chriſtian kings and princes of the ſame faith with him; nay, all believers, who are all kings and prieſts unto God.

℣. 7. And I will eſtabliſh my covenant between me and thee, &c.] Not only renew it, but confirm it by the following token of circumciſion: and thy ſeed after thee, in their generations; ſuch bleſſings in it as belonged to his natural ſeed, as ſuch he confirmed to them, to be enjoyed by them in ſucceſſive ages; and ſuch as belonged to his ſpiritual ſeed, to them alſo, as they ſhould be raiſed up in future times in one place and another: for an everlaſting covenant; to his natural ſeed, as long as they ſhould continue in the true worſhip of God, and in their own land; or until the Meſſiah came, in whom the covenant of circumciſion had its accompliſhment, and was at an end; and to all his ſpiritual ſeed, with reſpect to the ſpiritual bleſſings of it, which are everlaſting, and are never taken away, or become void. To be a God unto thee, and to thy ſeed after thee; to his natural ſeed, as the God of nature and providence, communicating the good things of life unto them; protecting, preſerving and continuing them in the land he gave them, and in the poſſeſſion of all the good things in it, ſo long as they were obedient to him as their king and their God; and to his ſpiritual ſeed, as the God of all grace, ſupplying them with grace here, and beſtowing upon them glory hereafter.

℣. 8. And I will give unto thee, and to thy ſeed after thee, &c.] To him in right, and to them in poſſeſſion, and for an inheritance: the land wherein thou art a ſtranger; or the land of ſojournings or pilgrimages[l], which were many; for he often removed moved from place to place, and ſometimes ſojourned in one place, and ſometimes in another: all the land of Canaan for an everlaſting poſſeſſion; this reſpects only the natural ſeed of Abraham, and thoſe in the line of Iſaac and Jacob, to whom this land was given to hold for ever, in caſe they were obedient to the will of God; and therefore whenever they were diſobedient, they were carried captive from it, as they are at this day; but when they ſhall be converted, they will return to this land and poſſeſs it to the end of the world; and which was a figure of the heavenly inheritance, which is an eternal one, and will be enjoyed by all his ſpiritual ſeed to all eternity: and I will be their God; as he was to all the natural ſeed of Abraham in a ſpiritual ſenſe, to whom the adoption belonged, and whom he choſe and ſeparated as a peculiar people to himſelf, and beſtowed in providence many peculiar favours upon them, both in a civil and religious way; and as he is to all his ſpiritual ſeed in an evangelic ſenſe, to whom he ſtands in the relation of their Covenant-God and Father in Chriſt, in whom he bleſſes them with all ſpiritual bleſſings, and will continue to be ſo unto death, and to all eternity.

℣. 9. And God ſaid unto Abraham, thou ſhalt keep my covenant therefore, &c.] Obſerve the ſign or token of it, circumciſion, in the manner after related: thou, and thy ſeed after thee, in their generations; in ſucceſſive ages until the Meſſiah come, the end of the law for righteouſneſs.

℣. 10. This is my covenant, &c.] The token of it, for the promiſe itſelf was given before, which is more properly the covenant; circumciſion is ſo called in an improper ſenſe, being only the ſign of it: which ye ſhall keep between me and you, and thy ſeed after thee; which was to be obſerved by Abraham, and the males in his houſe then with him, as Iſhmael, and thoſe that were born in his houſe, or bought with his money, and by his poſterity in ſucceeding ages, and it is what follows: every manchild among you ſhall be circumciſed; this was the firſt inſtitution of circumciſion, and it was an inſtitution of God, and not of man. Indeed Herodotus ſays [m], that "the Colchi, Egyptians and Ethio- "pians only of all men circumciſed from the be- "ginning; and the Phœnicians and Syrians, which "are in Paleſtine, learnt it of the Egyptians, as "they themſelves confeſs." So Diodorus Siculus ſpeaks of circumciſion as an Egyptian rite, and ſays there are ſome who make the nation of the Colchi, and of the Jews, to come from the Egyptians: hence he obſerves, that with theſe nations there is an ancient tradition to circumciſe their new-born infants, which rite was derived from the Egyptians: but as the original of the Jewiſh nation is miſtaken, ſo likewiſe the original of this rite. And they may as well be thought to be miſtaken in the one as in the other. Thoſe in Paleſtine that were circumciſed were the Jews only, as Joſephus [o] obſerves; but they did not learn this rite from the Egyptians, nor do they ever confeſs it, but on the contrary ſuggeſt, that the Egyptians learnt it from them in the times of Joſeph; for their principal lexicographer ſays [p], the Egyptians were circumciſed in the times of Joſeph, and when Joſeph died they drew over the foreſkin of the fleſh. The Colchi indeed, who were a colony of the Egyptians, might learn it from them; and ſo the Ethiopians, who were their neighbours likewiſe, and agreed with them in many things. Artapanus [q], an heathen writer, ſays indeed, that the Ethiopians, though enemies, had ſuch a regard for Moſes, that they learned from him the rite of circumciſion; and not only they, but all the prieſts, that is, in Egypt; and indeed the Egyptian prieſts only, and not the people, were circumciſed. It is not very difficult to account for it, how other nations beſides the Jews ſhould receive circumciſion, which was firſt enjoined Abraham and his ſeed; the Iſhmaelites had it from Iſhmael the ſon of Abraham; from them the old Arabs; from the Arabs, the Saracens; and from the Saracens, the Turks to this day: other Arabian nations, as the Midianites, and others, had it from the ſons of Abraham by Keturah; and perhaps the Egyptians and Ethiopians from them, if the former had it not from the Iſraelites; and the Idumæans had it from Edom or Eſau, the ſon of Iſaac, the ſon of Abraham; ſo that all originally had it from Abraham, and he by a divine command. It is not ſo much to be wondered at, that Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, men either impoſed upon by the Egyptian prieſts, as the former, or wrote in favour of that nation, as the latter, and wholly ignorant of divine revelation, ſhould aſſert what they have done; but that chriſtian writers, who have the advantage of divine revelation, and have read the hiſtory of the bible, ſuch as Marſham, Spencer and Le Clerc, ſhould incline to the ſame ſentiment, is amazing; and eſpecially when our bleſſed Lord has expreſsly ſaid [r], that circumciſion is of the fathers, Abraham, Iſaac and Jacob, firſt given to them, and practiſed by them. Even Theodotus [s], an heathen writer, agrees with this ſacred teſtimony of Moſes, when ſpeaking of the circumciſion of Shechem, in the times of Jacob, he traces this rite to its original, and obſerves, that when Abraham was brought out of his own country, he was ordered from heaven to circumciſe every man in his houſe. It may indeed ſeem ſtrange how it ſhould obtain in the iſlands of the Weſt-Indies, as in Juatana, Sancta Crux, and others, where the Spaniards found in the beginning of the 16th century thoſe iſles inhabited by idolaters, who were circumciſed [t].

℣. 11. And ye ſhall circumciſe the fleſh of your foreſkin, &c.] Or the foreſkin of your fleſh [u]; by an hypallage, the manner in which this was performed may be ſeen in the Jewiſh writers [w], as well as the cure of the wound made, is particularly deſcribed by Leo Modena [x], and which when performed, they uſed to provide a diſh full of ſand to put the foreſkin into; and which was done, as Buxtorf [y] relates, to ſhew that their ſeed ſhould be as the ſand of the ſea, and to call to mind what Balaam ſaid of them, Numb. xxiii. 10. and with reſpect to the old ſerpent that deceived man, whoſe food is the duſt of the earth: the inſtrument with which this operation was performed, according to the Jewiſh canons, was as follows [z], "they may "circumciſe with any thing, with a flint or with "glaſs, and with any thing that cuts, excepting "with a cane or reed, becauſe of danger; but it "is

" is beſt to circumciſe with an iron inſtrument, " either with a knife or a razor; all Iſraelites uſe " a knife." The perſons who might perform it, according to their rules, are theſe; " all are fit to " circumciſe, ſays Maimonides [a], even an uncir- " cumciſed perſon, and a ſervant, and a woman, " and a little one may circumciſe where there is no " man, but a Gentile may not circumciſe at all; " and if he does circumciſe, there is no need to re- " peat it, and to circumciſe a ſecond time." It is a little differently expreſſed by another [b] writer of theirs, " all are fit to circumciſe, even a ſervant, a wo- " man, and a little one, and an uncircumciſed " Iſraelite, whoſe brethren died through circum- " ciſion; but if there is an Iſraelite grown, and " knows how to circumciſe, he is to be preferred " before them all; (ſome ſay a woman may not " circumciſe) but an idolater, though he is cir- " cumciſed, may not circumciſe at all; but if he " does, there is no need to repeat it, and to cir- " cumciſe a ſecond time: and it ſhall be a token of the covenant betwixt me and you; of the promiſe of God to Abraham, that he ſhould be the father of many nations. The apoſtle explains it, Rom. iv. 11. to be a ſeal, or what gave aſſurance to Abraham, or was a ſure token to him, that righteouſneſs would be wrought out by Chriſt, by his obedience, and the ſhedding of his blood, which is received by faith; and that this was imputed to him whilſt he was uncircumciſed, Gen. xv. 6. and that this alſo would be in the uncircumciſion, or uncircumciſed Gentiles that ſhould believe as he did, and be imputed to them, as to him, and ſo he would appear to be the father of them all. Moreover, this was a ſign or token of that part of the promiſe or covenant, which gave to his ſeed the land of Canaan: this was a ſeal of the leaſe of that land, which was made whilſt Abraham was in it, and which the Iſraelites were obliged to ſubmit to, upon entrance into it in Joſhua's time, as a token of it; and which they were to obſerve whilſt in it until the Meſſiah's coming, and by which they were diſtinguiſhed from other nations, and kept a diſtinct nation, that it might appear he came of them: and to uſe the words of Tacitus [c], this rite was inſtituted ut diverſitate noſcantur, that they might be diſtinguiſhed and known from others; it was typical of Chriſt, the end of it, who ſubmitted to it, that it might appear he was really man, a ſon of Abraham, and a miniſter of the circumciſion, and was made under the law, and ſo laid under obligation to fulfil it; and that he was to ſatisfy for the ſins of men by the effuſion of his blood, and endure pains and ſufferings, ſignified thereby: it was alſo an emblem of ſpiritual circumciſion, or circumciſion of the heart, which lies in the putting off the body of ſin, in renouncing man's own righteouſneſs, and in his being by the grace of God, and blood of Chriſt, cleanſed from the impurity of his nature, propagated by carnal generation, in which the member circumciſed has a principal concern.

℣. 12. And he that is eight days old, ſhall be circumciſed among you, &c.] A ſon or infant of eight days old; it might not be circumciſed before, but for ſome reaſons might be deferred longer. The reaſons why this rite was ordered to be performed in infancy, according to Maimonides [d], were, becauſe if it had been deferred to riper age it might have been neglected, and never performed; and becauſe at ſuch an age the pain is not ſo ſenſibly felt, by reaſon of the tenderneſs of the ſkin, and the weakneſs of the imagination; as alſo becauſe the affections of parents are not then ſo ſtrong as they are when one year, and eſpecially three or four years old; and particularly it was ordered on the 8th day, becauſe all animals as ſoon as born, on account of their great humidity, are very weak, and ſcarce any other than they were in their mother's womb, until the end of 7 days, after which they begin to be reckoned among thoſe that perceive the air of this world; and ſo he remarks the ſame is to be obſerved in beaſts, that 7 days they were to be with their dam, Exod. xxi. 30. According to the Jewiſh canon [e], " an infant might " be circumciſed on the 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th and " 12th, neither leſs or more; (not leſs than 8 days, " nor more than 12 [f]) according to the uſual cuſ- " tom on the 8th; if he was born between the 2 " evenings, he is circumciſed on the 9th; if be- " tween the 2 evenings of the evening of the ſab- " bath, he is circumciſed on the 10th; if on a " feſtival-day, after the ſabbath, he is circumciſed " on the 11th; if on the 2 days of the beginning " of the year, he is circumciſed on the 12th: an " infant that is ſick, they don't circumciſe it un- " til it is well." Which ſickneſs they interpret not of ſore eyes, and the like, but of an ague or fever; and when a child on the 8th day is red or yellow, or a woman has loſt her children through circumciſion, 2 or 3 one after another, then it is deferred; and they reckon 7 days from a child's recovery from ſickneſs, and then circumciſe it [g]; but circumciſion on the 8th day was always reckoned moſt valid and authentic, and according to rule, ſee Phil. iii. 5. and the note there; and the Jews were careful to do it on the 8th day as ſoon as they could, though only when and while it was day. Their canon or rule runs thus [h], " they don't " circumciſe until the ſun ſhines out on the 8th " day of a child's birth, and all the day is fit for " circumciſion; but they that are prepared haſten " to the commandment, and circumciſe immedi- " ately in the morning; and indeed circumciſion, " which is not in its proper time, is never per- " formed but in the day:" for they obſerve [i] it is ſaid on the 8th day, Lev. xii. 3. the day, and not the night. And this was to be done to every man-child in your generations; in all ſucceeding ages until the Meſſiah came, the end of the law; and when the leaſe of the land of Canaan, of which this was a ſeal, would be out; and when the righteouſneſs of faith, it was alſo a ſeal of, would come upon the uncircumciſed Gentiles: he that is born in the houſe, or bought with money of any ſtranger, which is not of thy ſeed; concerning which Maimonides [k] gives theſe rules, " a ſervant is born " in the power of an Iſraelite, and another that is " taken from heathens, the maſter is bound to cir- " cumciſe them; but he that is born in the houſe " is circumciſed on the 8th day; and he that is " bought with money is circumciſed on the day " that he is received, even if he received him on " the day he is born, he is circumciſed on that day; " if he receives a grown ſervant of heathens, and " the ſervant is not willing to be circumciſed, he " bears

" bears with him a whole year, but more than " that it is forbidden to keep him, ſeeing he is " uncircumciſed, but he muſt ſend him again to " the heathens." No man was to be forced to embrace the true religion, or obliged againſt his will to ſubmit to its ordinances.

℣. 13. He that is born in thine houſe, and he that is bought with thy money, muſt needs be circumciſed, &c.] Or in circumciſing ſhall be circumciſed [l], ſhall certainly be circumciſed; this is repeated to denote the neceſſity of it, and what care ſhould be taken that this be done, becauſe there was to be no uncircumciſed male among them, ℣. 10. nor any converſation and communion to be had among them, eſpecially in a religious way. And my covenant ſhall be in your fleſh for an everlaſting covenant; circumciſion was to be ſeen in their fleſh, and no methods were to be taken to draw over the foreſkin again, but it was to continue as long as they lived; and ſo in their poſterity, in all ſucceeding ages, as a ſign of the covenant and promiſe which ſhould remain until the Meſſiah's coming.

℣. 14. And the uncircumciſed man-child, whoſe fleſh of his foreſkin is not circumciſed, &c.] Whoſe circumciſion was neglected by his father, or by his mother, or by the civil magiſtrate, or by himſelf; for each of theſe, according to the Jewiſh canons, were obliged to ſee this performed; " the " commandment lies upon a father to circumciſe " his ſon, and upon a maſter to circumciſe his ſervants born in his houſe, or bought with mo- " ney [m]:" and it is elſewhere ſaid [n], " if a father " does not circumciſe his ſon, the Sanhedrim are " bound to circumciſe him; and if they do not " circumciſe him, he is obliged when he is grown " up to circumciſe himſelf; and if he does not " circumciſe himſelf, he is guilty of cutting off," as it here follows: that ſoul ſhall be cut off from his people; which Jarchi interprets of his being childleſs, and dying before his time; and which, according to ſome in Aben Ezra, is, when a man dies before he is 52 years of age; and ſome erroneous perſons, as the ſame writer calls them, thought that if a child died, and was not circumciſed, it had no part in the world to come. The ſimpleſt and plaineſt meaning of the phraſe ſeems to be, that ſuch ſhould be cut off, and deprived of all civil and religious privileges with the Iſraelites in the land of Canaan, and be reckoned as heathens. Concerning this matter, Maimonides [o] thus writes; " a father or a mother that tranſgreſs, " and circumciſe not, make void the affirmative " commandment, but are not guilty of cutting " off; for no cutting off depends but upon the un- " circumciſed perſon himſelf; and the Sanhedrim " are commanded to circumciſe a ſon or a ſervant in " its time, that they may not leave an uncircumciſed " perſon in Iſrael, nor among their ſervants;— " if the thing is hid from the Sanhedrim, and " they don't circumciſe him, when he is grown up, " he is bound to circumciſe himſelf; and every " day that paſſes over him, after he is grown up, " and he does not circumciſe himſelf, lo, he mak- " eth the commandment to ceaſe; but he is not " guilty of cutting off until he dies, and he is a " preſumptuous uncircumciſed perſon;" and ſo, according to him, this muſt reſpect his puniſhment after death in another world: he hath broken my covenant; made it null and void, neglecting the token of it, circumciſion.

℣. 15. And God ſaid unto Abraham, &c.] After he had changed his name, and given him the covenant of circumciſion: as for Sarai thy wife, thou ſhalt not call her name Sarai, but Sarah ſhall her name be; her former name Sarai ſignifies my princeſs, or rather princeſſes, being to him in the room of many, and better than ten thouſand; yet only a princeſs to him, and in his family, being ſole miſtreſs there: but Sarah ſignifies, as Jarchi obſerves, princeſs abſolutely, becauſe ſhe was princeſs over all the princes and people that ſhould come of her, as well as be the mother and princeſs of all female believers, who are called her daughters, 1 Pet. iii. 6.

℣. 16. And I will bleſs her, &c.] The Targum of Jonathan adds, in her body, with fruitfulneſs, who before was barren, and in her ſoul with ſpiritual bleſſings, and in both with the bleſſing of eternal life: and give thee a ſon alſo of her; as he had given him one of Hagar: God had before promiſed Abraham a ſon that ſhould be his heir, but he had not till now told him, that he ſhould be born of Sarah his wife: yea, I will bleſs her; which is repeated for the confirmation of it, and for the greater ſtrengthening Abraham's faith in it: and ſhe ſhall be a mother of nations; of the twelve tribes of Iſrael; of the two nations of Iſrael and Judah: kings of people ſhall be of her; as David, Solomon, and others, and eſpecially the king Meſſiah.

℣. 17. Then Abraham fell upon his face, &c.] In reverence of the divine being, and as amazed at what was told him: and laughed; not through diſtruſt and diffidence of the promiſe, as Sarah did, for he ſtaggered not at that through unbelief, but for joy at ſuch good news; and ſo Onkelos renders it, and he rejoiced, with the joy of faith; it may be our Lord refers to this in John, viii. 56. he ſaw Chriſt in the promiſe of Iſaac, and rejoiced that he ſhould ſpring from his ſeed: the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem paraphraſe it, and he wondered; he was amazed at the grace of God that gave him ſuch a promiſe, and he was aſtoniſhed at the power of God that muſt be exerted in the fulfilment of it: and therefore it follows, and ſaid in his heart; within himſelf, without expreſſing any thing as to be heard and underſtood by any creature; but the omniſcient God knew what he ſaid, and the language of it, whether of unbelief or not: Shall a child be born unto him that is 100 years old? not that he was now a full 100 years old, he was 99, and going in his 100th year; but then he would be, as he was, 100 years old when this child was born to him, ch. xxi. 5. It had been no unuſual thing for a child to be born to a man when a hundred, and even many hundred years old, but it was ſo in Abraham's time; though indeed after this we read that Abraham himſelf had 6 ſons by Keturah, when his natural ſtrength was afreſh invigorated, and his youth was renewed like the eagle's; and beſides Abraham ſaid this, not ſo much with reſpect to himſelf, though his age was a circumſtance that ſerved to heighten the wonder, as with reſpect to Sarah, and the circumſtances in which ſhe was, who was to bear this ſon to him: and ſhall Sarah that is 90 years old, bear? and with whom it had ceaſed to be after the manner of women, which made it more difficult of belief how it could be. Some think that Abraham ſaid this, as ſomewhat doubting of it, until he was more ſtrongly aſſured by the Lord that ſo it would would be indeed, as is expreſſed in a following verſe; but meeting with no reproof for what he ſaid and did, as Sarah, it ſeems to ſhew the contrary.

℣. 18. And Abraham ſaid unto God, &c.] Being told he ſhould have a ſon by Sarah, that ſhould be his heir, he is concerned for Iſhmael what would become of him; and who being grown up, had doubtleſs a large ſhare in his affections, and it is highly probable he began to think he was the promiſed ſeed, ſince he had lived to ſuch an age, and had no other ſon, and Sarah was paſt bearing children; but now perceiving it would be otherwiſe, he puts up a petition for Iſhmael, whom he did not neglect upon the promiſe of another, and to ſhew his love to him, and regard for his welfare: O that Iſhmael might live before thee; he prays that his life might be preſerved, and that it might be ſpent in the fear, worſhip and ſervice of God; ſo the Targum of Jonathan, "O that Iſhmael might live "and worſhip before thee," and to the ſame ſenſe Jarchi alſo; that he might enjoy the favour of God, his gracious preſence and communion with him; that he might live a holy, ſpiritual life here, acceptable and well-pleaſing to God, and poſſeſs eternal life hereafter: for we muſt take this prayer in as large a ſenſe, as we can ſuppoſe the heart of a father to be drawn forth in it for the good of his child; though it may greatly reſpect his ſharing with the promiſed ſon in his bleſſings, and particularly regards the propagation of his offspring, or his living in his poſterity at leaſt; this was what the Lord took notice of, and anſwered him in.

℣. 19. And God ſaid, Sarah thy wife ſhall bear thee a ſon indeed, &c.] This is repeated for the confirmation of it, and thus expreſſed to remove all doubt about it, if any there were, that hung upon Abraham's mind; as well as to let him know that the promiſe of a ſon by Sarah was not to be ſuperſeded by his prayer for Iſhmael, for whom he might have a greater flow of natural affection than for his unborn ſon, in whom his ſeed ſhould be called: and thou ſhalt call his name Iſaac; which ſignifies laughter; and which name was given him from the laughter of Abraham at the promiſe of him, and not from the laughter of Sarah, which as yet was not; wherefore Joſephus [p] is wrong when he ſuggeſts, that Iſaac had this name from Sarah's laughing at God's ſaying that ſhe ſhould bear a ſon: though his birth was matter of laughter and joy to both, as it was to all good people that heard of it, ch. xxi. 8. So Polyhiſtor [q] from Melo, an heathen writer, ſpeaking of Abraham, ſays, that of his married or lawful wife one ſon was born to him, whoſe name in Greek is Gelos, that is, laughter. Iſaac is one of thoſe the Jews [r] obſerve had his name given him before he was born: and I will eſtabliſh my covenant with him, for an everlaſting covenant, and with his ſeed after him; the covenant of circumciſion juſt made with Abraham, the promiſe of the land of Canaan to him and his poſterity, and of the Meſſiah that ſhould ſpring from him, until whoſe coming this covenant would continue, and therefore called everlaſting.

℣. 20. And as for Iſhmael, I have heard thee, &c.] Took notice of his prayer for him, and accepted of it, and would anſwer him, and did, as follows: behold, I have bleſſed him; determined in his mind to bleſs him, promiſed to bleſs him, ch. xvi. 10, 12. had bleſſings laid up and in reſerve for him: and will make him fruitful, and will multiply him exceedingly; as he did, many of the Arabian nations, the Hagarenes, Saracens and Turks, all ſpringing from him: 12 princes ſhall he beget; whoſe names are given, ch. xxv. 13, 14, 15. and their number there exactly agrees with this prophecy. Melo [s], the heathen writer above mentioned, ſays, that Abraham of his other wife, the Egyptian ſervant (that is, Hagar) begat 12 ſons, which he miſtakes for 12 ſons of Iſhmael, his ſon by Hagar; and, adds he, theſe going into Arabia divided the country among them, and were the firſt that reigned over the inhabitants of it; hence down to our times the kings of the Arabians have 12 names like to thoſe. So the Saracens were divided into twelve tribes, of which there were ſo many phylarchi or governors; and the Turks alſo are divided into the ſame number of tribes [t]. And I will make him a great nation; as the nation of the Turks eſpecially is; and the Turkiſh empire is frequently called in Jewiſh writings the kingdom of Iſhmael, as the Arabic language is called the Iſhmaelitiſh language.

℣. 21. But my covenant will I eſtabliſh with Iſaac, &c.] The covenant of circumciſion; for though Iſhmael was circumciſed, and his poſterity practiſed that rite, yet it was not enjoined them of God; nor was it to them, or ſerved the ſame purpoſe as to the Iſraelites; and particularly the promiſe of the land of Canaan made in that covenant, belonged only to the poſterity of Iſaac, and to thoſe only in the line of Jacob, and eſpecially that of the Meſſiah ſpringing from him, which circumciſion had a reſpect unto: whom Sarah ſhall bear unto thee, at this ſet time, in the next year; that is, at the end of 9 months, which is the ſet time a woman goes with child.

℣. 22. And he left off talking with him, &c.] After he had finiſhed all he had to ſay to him at this time. It was great condeſcenſion in the divine Being to talk with a creature; it was wonderful grace and kindneſs to make ſuch promiſes to him, as he did, and indulge him with anſwers of prayer and communion with him; but the higheſt enjoyments of God here are not laſting; uninterrupted communion with him is reſerved for another world: and God went up from Abraham; from the earth, where he had been with Abraham, and aſcended above him up to heaven, in a viſible, and very likely in an human form, in which he deſcended: the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan paraphraſe it, the glory of the Lord, the glorious Shekinah, the Lord of life and glory.

℣. 23. And Abraham took Iſhmael his ſon, &c.] To circumciſe him; he took his ſon firſt to ſet an example to his ſervants, and that they might the more readily comply when they ſaw that Abraham's ſon, and at that time his only ſon, was circumciſed before their eyes: and all that were born in his houſe; which were 318 when he reſcued Lot from the kings, ch. xiv. 14. and perhaps they might be now increaſed: and all that were bought with his money; how many thoſe were, it is not eaſy to ſay, no doubt they were many: every male among the men of Abraham's houſe; whether children or ſervants, and thoſe little or grown up: and circumciſed the fleſh of their foreſkin, in the ſelf-ſame day, as God had ſaid unto him; he performed this operation in the manner God directed him, the ſame day he ſpoke to him of it; he was not diſobedient, nor dilatory to obey the command of God,

God, but at once complied with it, not conſulting fleſh and blood, not regarding the pain he and his ſhould endure, or the ſhame or danger they ſhould be expoſed unto through the heathens about them; but truſting in God, and committing himſelf to him, and having his fear before his eyes, he heſitated not, but chearfully did the will of God. In doing this work he might have ſome aſſiſtance: it is highly probable he began it himſelf, and circumciſed ſeveral; and having taught ſome of his ſervants how to perform it, according to the divine preſcription, they might aſſiſt him in going through with it.

℣. 24. And Abraham was 99 years old, &c.] See ℣. 1. This circumſtance of his age is obſerved the more to commend his faith and obedience, that tho' he was an old man, he did not conſider his age, or make that an objection; that he was unable to bear the pain, or it would be ſhameful for a man of his years to be uncovered before his ſervants: when he was circumciſed in the fleſh of his foreſkin; who circumciſed him is not ſaid, very probably Eliezer his head-ſervant: the Jews, who affect to know every thing, ſay [u], that he ſent for Shem, the ſon of Noah, who circumciſed him and his ſon Iſhmael; but it is moſt likely that Iſhmael was circumciſed by Abraham himſelf, as ſeems from the preceding verſe; and Abraham might circumciſe himſelf, as Ben Melech thinks.

℣. 25. And Iſhmael his ſon was 13 years old, when he was circumciſed in the fleſh of his foreſkin.] Hence the Arabians, as Joſephus [w] relates, circumciſe their children when at 13 years of age, becauſe Iſhmael, the founder of their nation, was circumciſed at that age; and Origen [x] aſſerts the ſame; and with which agrees what an Arabic writer ſays [y] of the Arabians before Mahomet, that they uſed to circumciſe at a certain age, between the 10th and 15th years of their age. So Rauwolf ſays [z], there are ſome, chiefly among the Arabians, that imitate their patriarch Iſhmael. As for the Mahometans, though they circumciſe, they don't always do it in the 13th year, as ſome write; for it is performed by them ſometimes in the 13, 14, 15, or 16, and ſometimes in the 6th or 7th year [a]. The Egyptians, according to Ambroſe [b], circumciſed their children at 14 years of age, which comes pretty near to the time of the Iſhmaelites or Arabs, from whom they might receive circumciſion, if not of the Iſraelites, as before obſerved. A certain traveller ſays [c], the modern Egyptians, as the reſt of the Mahometans, are not circumciſed until the 13th year. The Africans circumciſe on the ſeventh day, which come nearer to the Jews [d].

℣. 26. In the ſelf-ſame day was Abraham circumciſed, and Iſhmael his ſon.] This is repeated that it might be taken notice of, that both were circumciſed according to the command of God, and on the very day in which it was given. Jarchi obſerves, it was in the day, and not in the night; which ſhows, ſays he, he was not afraid of the heathen, and of mockers, and that his enemies, and the men of that generation might not ſay, if we had ſeen him, we would not have ſuffered him to be circumciſed, and keep the commandment of God: and ſome of the Jewiſh writers [e] fable, that he was circumciſed on the day afterwards appointed by Moſes for the day of atonement, and that in the place where he was circumciſed, the altar was built; but all this is without any foundation. This affair was tranſacted, according to biſhop Uſher [f], A. M. 2107, and before Chriſt 1897.

℣. 27. And all the men of his houſe, &c.] All the males, whether children or adult: born in the houſe, or bought with money of the ſtranger, were circumciſed with him; by their will, and with their conſent; not forced to it, as Aben Ezra rightly obſerves; and theſe being before trained up by him in religious exerciſes, were more eaſily prevailed upon by him to follow his example; this alſo is repeated, that it might be obſerved, and be an example to follow in after-generations.

CHAP. XVIII.

ANOTHER appearance of God to Abraham is here recorded; three perſons are ſeen by him in an human form, whom he kindly invites to ſtop with him, and generouſly entertains them, ℣. 1—8. they enquire concerning Sarah his wife, and one of them renews the promiſe of her bearing a ſon to him, which occaſions laughter in her, for which ſhe is reproved, ℣. 9—15. upon their departure the Lord thought fit, for reaſons given, to make known to Abraham his intention to deſtroy Sodom and Gomorrah, ℣. 16—22. when Abraham intercedes for the preſervation of thoſe cities in a moſt importunate and affectionate manner, ℣. 23—33.

℣. 1. And the Lord appeared unto him in the plains of Mamre, &c.] That is, to Abraham; and very likely this appearance of God was quickly after the affair of the circumciſion, to ſhew his approbation of his ready obedience to his command; and at this time he was in the plains, or at the oaks of Mamre, the oaken grove there, as has been obſerved on ch. xiii. 18. and which ſeems to be the beſt rendering of the words, ſince in ℣. 4, 8. mention is made of a tree to ſit and ſtand under; and Abraham might chuſe this place for his habitation, becauſe of the ſhadineſs of it in thoſe hot countries: and he ſat in the tent-door, in the heat of the day; partly to cool and refreſh himſelf, and partly to obſerve if any paſſengers paſſed by to invite them in; this being a time of day when ſuch needed refreſhment, and it was proper for them to lie by a while, and not proceed on their journey until it was cooler: or rather to or near the tent-door, as Noldius [g], or before it, without or under the ſhade of the tree, after mentioned.

℣. 2. And he lift up his eyes and looked, &c.] To ſee if he could obſerve any paſſengers coming that way: and lo, three men ſtood by him; having perhaps deſcended at once from heaven upon the ſpot near where Abraham ſat; for theſe, whoever they were, were, appeared in an human form, and they were took by Abraham at firſt ſight to be men, and as ſuch he treated them: ſome have taken theſe to be the three Divine Perſons, as ſome of the antients; of which opinion was Dr. Lightfoot, who expreſly ſays [h], "three months after this, (i. e. the inſtitution of the circumciſion) the three perſons in the "Trinity dine with Abraham, and foretel the birth "of Iſaac; again, the Son and the Holy Ghoſt "go down to Sodom, but the firſt perſon in the "Trinity ſtayeth with Abraham;" and elſewhere [i], "the three perſons in the Trinity, in the ſhape of "three men, appear to Abraham and dine with "him, and eat the firſt fleſh mentioned eaten in "all the ſcripture." But to this may be objected, that the Father and the Holy Spirit are never ſaid to appear in an human form, ſee John v. 37. or are ever called angels, as theſe are, ch. xix. 1. but they rather ſeem to be angels, as the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem call them, in the likeneſs of men, who were ſent on three meſſages, as they ſuggeſt; one to bring the news of Sarah's bearing Iſaac; the other to deliver Lot; and the third to overthrow Sodom and Gomorrah; which is a much better ſenſe than that of Ben Gerſom, who takes them to be three prophets, and mentions the names of two of them, Shem and Heber; for two of theſe are expreſly called angels, ch. xix. 1. and the apoſtle ſeems to refer to this hiſtory, Heb. xiii. 2; in the Talmud [k] they are ſaid to be Michael, Gabriel, and Raphael: the truth of the matter ſeems to be this, that one of them was the Son of God in an human form, that chiefly converſed with Abraham, and who rained from heaven brimſtone on Sodom; and the other two were angels in the like form that accompanied him in that expedition: and when he ſaw them, he ran to meet them from the tent-door; for, though they are before ſaid to ſtand by him, it muſt be underſtood of their being near him, but at ſome little diſtance; and as ſoon as he ſaw them, he did not ſtay for their coming up to him, but, to ſhew how ready he was to entertain them, he ariſes from his ſeat at the tent-door and ran to meet them, and gave them an hearty welcome to what he would provide for them: and bowed himſelf toward the ground; not in a way of religious adoration, for, had he took them for angels, he could not have done that, and he knew not as yet that one of them was Jehovah; but in a civil manner, as was the cuſtom of thoſe countries when in the preſence of, or when they received, great perſonages, and ſuch, by their look and habit, Abraham took theſe to be.

℣. 3. And ſaid, my Lord, &c.] He addreſſed himſelf to one of them, who appeared to him to be the greateſt and moſt honourable, either by the appearance of his countenance, or by his dreſs, or by the ſituation in which he was between the other two, and by their carriage and behaviour to him: if now I have found favour in thy ſight; ſignifying he ſhould eſteem it an honour done him, that he and his companions would vouchſafe to ſtop and refreſh themſelves: paſs not away, I pray thee, from thy ſervant; they might ſeem, by ſome motion they made, as if they were going another way, and declined turning in to him.

℣. 4. Let a little water, I pray you, be fetched, and waſh your feet, &c.] Which was very refreſhing to travellers in hot countries, who walked barefoot or in ſandals; and this he propoſes to be done by one of his ſervants, whoſe buſineſs it was, only deſires they would give him leave to order it, 1 Sam. xxv. 41. and ſo it was uſual in other countries, and in after-times, for ſervants to fetch water to waſh the hands and feet of gueſts [l]: and reſt yourſelves under the tree; before the tent-door, under which doubtleſs were ſeats to ſit down upon, where they might reſt their weary limbs; it is very probable this was an oak-tree, and which and a turpentine-tree the antient writers ſpeak of continued unto the times of Conſtantine, ſee the note on ch. xiii. 18. and the Jewiſh writers ſay [m], that now near the city (Hebron) between the vineyards, are the oaks of Mamre, where is the houſe of Abraham our father, on whom be peace, and the tree under which the angels ate, and the ſtone on which he (Abraham) ſat when he was circumciſed.

℣. 5. And I will fetch a morſel of bread, &c.] A piece or a loaf of bread, as De Dieu ſhews the word ſignifies; bread being put for all the neceſſaries of life: and comfort ye your hearts; eat to refreſh your ſpirits and renew your ſtrength, that ye may be able to purſue your journey: and after that ye ſhall paſs on your way; I'll retard you no longer: for therefore are ye come to your ſervant; not that he thought they came this way on purpoſe to take ſome refreſhment with him, but ſo it was ordered by the providence of God; and, ſince it was, he deſires that they would accept of his invitation: and they ſaid, ſo do as thou haſt ſaid; they agreed to it, that water ſhould be fetched to waſh their feet, and food for them to eat.

℣. 6. And Abraham haſtened into the tent unto Sarah, &c.] In order to acquaint her with his gueſts, and to give proper inſtructions for providing food for them; and this he haſted to do, being hearty in the entertainment of them, and that he might not keep them too long from their journey: and ſaid, to Sarah his wife, make ready quickly three meaſures of fine meal; which was ready ſifted from the bran, and was the fineſt flour that was in the houſe, and only wanted to be mixed and kneaded and made up into cakes; and he ordered three meaſures or ſeahs of them, each of which held more than our peck, and all three made an ephah or buſhel, being willing to have enough, and to make a generous entertainment for them; this he enjoined Sarah to do, but not of herſelf, but by her maids, and no doubt, for quicker diſpatch, ſhe might aſſiſt herſelf, wherefore it follows: knead it, and make cakes upon the hearth; after the fine flour was made dough and kneaded, it was made into round cakes, and theſe were put upon an hearth made hot, and then covered with hot embers, by which means they were ſoon baked and fit to eat: this was done upon hot ſtones [n]; and a traveller [o] into thoſe parts ſome years ago reports, that, paſſing through the deſarts of Arabia, when they choſe to eat new bread, inſtead of, or for want of biſcuits, they made a paſte of flour and water, and wrought it into broad cakes about the thickneſs of a finger, and put them in a hot place on the ground, heated on purpoſe by fire, and covered them with aſhes and coals, and turned them ſeveral times until they were enough, and that theſe cakes were ſavoury and good to eat: ſome of the Arabians, he ſays, have in their tents ſtones or copper-plates, made on purpoſe to bake them, and gives [p] an inſtance of of a woman they met with in a country lying between Mesopotamia and Media, making such cakes for them in the same manner.

℣. 7. And Abraham ran unto the herd, &c.] Whilst Sarah and her maids were kneading the dough and making the cakes: and fetched a calf tender and good; a fine fat calf, which was reckoned very delicious food, and much in use with the antients [q], and generally made a part in any grand entertainment, and was accounted fit for a king, see 1 Sam. xxviii. 24, 25. Luke xv. 23: and gave it unto a young man; one of his servants, to kill and dress as soon as possible; Jarchi says this was Ishmael, whom he trained up to such service: and he hasted to dress it; the young man made all the haste he could to get it ready, according to the orders of Abraham.

℣. 8. And he took butter and milk, &c.] Jarchi says, it was the fat of the milk gathered from the top of it, he means cream, and is different from butter and both from milk: this was either Abraham himself who took and brought these, as Sarah or her maidens might bring the cakes when baked; or else Abraham's young man, since it follows: and the calf which he had dressed; either the whole of it, or some principal parts of it, reckoned the finest and choicest; though by what follows it seems to be Abraham himself, who may be said to dress the calf, it being done by his orders: and set it before them; a table being placed under the tree, he set, or ordered to be set all those provisions before the three men, to feed upon, the cakes and butter, the milk and fatted calf: and he stood by them under the tree; not only to bid them welcome, but to minister to them; nor will this seem strange, or that the above several things were chiefly done by Abraham and Sarah, when it is observed that the greatest personages in the eastern countries, in early times, used to perform such services, and still do to this day, as a late traveller [r] informs us: "it is "here, says he, no disgrace for persons of the "highest character to busy themselves in what we "should reckon menial employments; the great-"est prince assists in the most laborious actions of "husbandry; neither is he ashamed to fetch a lamb "from his herd and kill it, whilst the princess his "wife is impatient till she has prepared her fire "and her kettle to seethe and dress it: the custom "that still continues of walking either barefoot or "with slippers, requires the antient compliment of "bringing water upon the arrival of a stranger to "wash his feet; and who is the person that pre-"sents himself first to do this office, and to give "the mar-habbeh, or welcome, but the master of "the family himself? who always distinguishes "himself by being the most officious; and, after "his entertainment is prepared, accounts it a breach "of respect to sit down with his guests, but stands "up all the time and serves them." All which serves greatly to illustrate this passage; and the same learned author observes, that in this manner we find Achilles and Patroclus employed, as described by Homer [s], in providing an entertainment: and they did eat; or seemed to eat, as the Targum of Jonathan and Jarchi; though as they assumed bodies so animated as to be capable of talking and walking, why not of eating and drinking? and there must have been a consumption of food some way or other, or Abraham would have known they had not eat: we read of angels food, Ps. lxxviii. 25. our English poet had a notion of angels eating, and represents Eve providing a repast for the angel, which he owns to be no ungrateful food [t].

℣. 9. And they said unto him, where is Sarah thy wife? &c.] One of them put the question; and so the Septuagint version renders it, and he said unto him, the principal of them, whom Abraham at first addressed and called him my Lord, and was no other than the Son of God in an human form; and various things in the context shew him to be a divine person, particularly his promise of return next year, and Sarah should have a son: and the question here put by him was not out of ignorance, for he who knew the name of Abraham's wife, knew where she was; but this was asked in order to lead on to say something more concerning her, and that, hearing her name, she might draw nearer and listen to what was said of her: and he said, behold, in the tent; for in those times they dwelt in tents, and this was either the tent common to the family, or rather was Sarah's own tent, ch. xxiv. 67. Sarah was where she should be, in her own apartment, attending to the business of her family, and answered to the description the apostle gives of a good housewife, a keeper at home, Tit. ii. 5.

℣. 10. And he said, &c.] The same that put the question, Jehovah himself, as appears by what follows: I will certainly return unto thee according to the time of life; not by a personal appearance as now, but by the fulfilment of his promise which he had before given to Abraham, that he should have a son by Sarah, and now renews it; and this would be about the same time in the next year, perhaps at the spring of the year, which may be called a time of life, when all things revive, which in the winter-season seem to be dead; a fit emblem this of the case and condition of Abraham and Sarah, both as they now were, and afterwards would be; for, though their bodies were as it were dead and unfit for generation, yet nature would revive in them again: unless it be understood of the whole time of the conception, quickening, and birth of an infant, at the usual time a woman goes with child, which is nine months, when the infant is a perfect living child. All the Targums paraphrase it, "in which ye shall be alive," safe and well, and so most of the Jewish commentators; as if it was a promise to Abraham and Sarah, that they should live to see the promise made good next given; but this seems not so agreeable as either of the former, see 2 Kings iv. 16: and lo, Sarah thy wife shall have a son; it was by degrees that this was made known to Abraham; first he was told he should have a son, but it was not said by whom he should have it; some years after that he is informed he should have a son by Sarah, but not when; but now it is revealed to him, that he should have one by her the next year: and Sarah heard it in the tent-door, which was behind him; or, and it was behind him [u]; that is, the tent-door was at the back of the person speaking; Sarah, hearing her name mentioned, got to the tent-door to listen to what might be further said; and the place where she was, was behind the speaker, who stood between her and Abraham, with whom he was conversing; Abraham was before him and Sarah behind him, so that he could not see her when she laughed, and yet he knew she did; and for the sake of that, this circumstance cumſtance is remarked: both the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem paraphraſe the clauſe, "and "Iſhmael ſtood behind it," the tent-door; and the former adds, and hearkened to what the angel ſaid.

℣. 11. Now Abraham and Sarah were old, and well ſtricken in age, &c.] The one being 99 years of age, and the other 89; and which is obſerved to make it the more ſurprizing that they ſhould have a ſon at ſuch an age; and what follows ſtill makes it more ſo: and it ceaſed to be with Sarah after the manner of women; her monthly viſiters had left her, ſo that ſhe was unfit for conception, and there could be no hope of it in a natural way; though the philoſopher [w] intimates, that there are ſome, that it is poſſible, may conceive without them.

℣. 12. Therefore Sarah laughed within herſelf, &c.] Not for joy of a ſon, and as pleaſed with it, believing ſo it would be; but as diſbelieving it, and perhaps deriding it, and confuting it with a laugh, which, though it did not appear in her countenance, was ſecretly in her heart: ſaying, not with her mouth but in her mind, after I am waxed old, being almoſt 90 years of age, ſhall I have pleaſure? in conception, or rather in having a ſon, and in ſuckling and nurſing him and bringing him up; for in bearing and bringing forth is ſorrow: and my Lord being old alſo; which increaſed the difficulty and her unbelief: the apoſtle Peter ſeems to have reſpect to this in 1 Pet. iii. 6.

℣. 13. And the Lord ſaid unto Abraham, &c.] This diſcovers who the perſon was that had been converſing with Abraham, that he was a divine perſon, as appears by his name Jehovah, as well as by his knowledge of Sarah's behaviour; he did not turn himſelf to her, that it might be more manifeſt, that it was not upon the ſight of her he judged ſhe laughed, but from his own omniſcience; and he choſe rather to ſpeak to her huſband than to her, appearing as a ſtranger, and that he might reprove her: wherefore did Sarah laugh, ſaying, ſhall I of a ſurety bear a child which am old? ſuggeſting there was no reaſon for it, and ſignifying his diſpleaſure and indignation at it.

℣. 14. Is any thing too hard for the Lord, &c.] Whoſe power is infinite; or too wonderful [x], ſo wonderful and beyond all belief, that it can never be thought it will be done by him; and why then ſhould it be thought incredible or impoſſible that Sarah ſhould have a child, though ſhe is old? Or, is any thing hidden from the Lord [y]? Nothing can be, not Sarah's laughter. At the time appointed will I return to thee, according to the time of life, and Sarah ſhall have a ſon; which words are repeated not merely for the confirmation of Abraham's faith, which ſtaggered not, but to remove Sarah's unbelief, and to encourage her faith in the divine promiſe.

℣. 15. Then Sarah denied, ſaying, I laughed not, &c.] Some render the words, Sarah lied [z]; and indeed it was no other than a lie, to ſay ſhe did not laugh when ſhe did; which ſhe might be tempted to ſay in her confuſion, partly becauſe the back of the ſpeaker was to her, and he could not ſee her, and partly becauſe it was inward, and very little, at leaſt diſcoverable in her countenance: for ſhe was afraid; of the reproof of her huſband, and of the charge of ill manners to a ſtranger; and eſpecially as ſhe had reaſon to believe that it was the Lord himſelf that had ſpoken theſe words, and therefore could gladly have excuſed herſelf, and wiped off the reproach: and he ſaid, nay, but thou didſt laugh; it is not true what thou ſayeſt, for thou didſt certainly laugh; this he knew being the omniſcient God, notwithſtanding, as he appeared as a man, his back was to her, and though her laughter was more internal than external.

℣. 16. And the men roſe up from thence, &c.] From their ſeats at Abraham's table under the tree, all three of them: and looked toward Sodom; ſet their faces and ſteered their courſe that way, by which it appeared they intended to go thither: the Targum of Jonathan ſays, that he that brought the news to Sarah went up to the higheſt heavens, and two of them looked toward Sodom; but it ſeems moſt likely, that, when the two went on their way to Sodom, the third ſtayed with Abraham: and Abraham went with them to bring them on the way; which was another piece of civility to ſtrangers uſed in thoſe early times, as well as in later ones, Acts xx. 38. and xxi. 5.

℣. 17. And the Lord ſaid, &c.] Either unto Abraham himſelf, ſo leading on to what he was about to make known to him; and without ſuppoſing this it will be difficult to account for Abraham's interceſſion for Sodom upon this: or to the two angels with him; not as conſulting them whether he ſhould or no do what he next ſuggeſts, but to give to them Abraham's juſt character, and the reaſons of his uſing him in ſuch a friendly manner: or it may be, to the other divine perſons, the Father and Spirit, one with the Son of God, and always preſent with him: ſhall I hide from Abraham the thing which I do? which he was about to do, namely, the deſtruction of Sodom and Gomorrah: the Jewiſh writers [a] obſerve, that theſe cities were given in the grant of the whole land to Abraham, and therefore it was right to acquaint him with it firſt: but other and better reaſons are given in the next words; Abraham was a friend of the Lord, and he had ſhewed himſelf friendly to him, not only now but heretofore, and therefore will treat him as his friend, by imparting his ſecrets to him.

℣. 18. Seeing that Abraham ſhall ſurely become a great and mighty nation, &c.] Which was fulfilled in the nation of Iſrael, ſo called, not ſo much for the largeneſs of the place they dwelt in, and the number of its inhabitants, as for the law of God that was given them, and the worſhip of God kept up among them; on account of which there was no nation ſo great, Deut. iv. 8: and all the nations of the earth ſhall be bleſſed in him; in his ſeed, the Meſſiah, in whom ſome of all nations are bleſſed with all ſpiritual bleſſings. Now, ſince God had promiſed, and would do ſuch great things for him and his, he judged it right and proper not to hide from him what he was about to do at Sodom, and the rather, as he had a near relation that dwelt there.

℣. 19. For I know him, &c.] Not only by his omniſcience, but with a ſpecial knowledge, ſuch as is accompanied with peculiar love and affection; and ſo Jarchi ſays, it is expreſſive of love. God loved Abraham, he was a peculiar favourite of his, and therefore he would reveal his ſecrets to him, ſee Amos iii. 2, 7. and he knew not only who he was, but what he was, a holy good man, made ſo by his own grace, and what he would do by the aſſiſtance of that grace, and particularly what follows: that he will command his children and his houſhold after him; to ſerve and worſhip the Lord; not his own children only, but his ſervants alſo, all in in his family; lay his injunctions on them, uſe his authority with them, give them all needful inſtructions, and take ſuch methods with them, as would tend to propagate and preſerve the true religion after his death: and they ſhall keep the way of the Lord; which he has preſcribed to men, and directed them to walk in, even every thing reſpecting inſtituted worſhip then revealed, and particularly, to do juſtice and judgment; to attend to all the laws, ſtatutes, and judgments of God; to do that which is juſt and right between man and man; not as a juſtifying righteouſneſs, by which Abraham himſelf was not juſtified before God; but to ſhew their regard to the will of God, in gratitude for favours received from him, and to glorify him, as well as for the good of their fellow-creatures: that the Lord may bring upon Abraham that which he hath ſpoken of him; not only on Abraham perſonally, but upon his poſterity, they walking in the ways of the Lord, according to his command and direction: the word that here rather ſignifies, as Vatablus rightly obſerves, the conſequence than the cauſe, what would follow upon theſe things, rather than as procured by them; theſe being the way in which God deſigned to beſtow them, though not for them.

℣. 20. And the Lord ſaid, &c.] The Targum of Jonathan adds, to the miniſtring angels, the two angels that were with him in the likeneſs of men; or to Abraham, at leaſt in his hearing, by which he underſtood that Sodom and other cities were about to be deſtroyed for their ſins: becauſe the cry of Sodom and Gomorrah is great; either of Lot in it, whoſe righteous ſoul was vexed with the filthy converſation of the wicked, and cried to heaven againſt them; or of the inhabitants that were oppreſſed by others, either in their bodies, being forced to ſubmit to their unnatural uſage of them, or in their eſtates, of which they wronged them; particularly the cry of the poor among them, whom they ſuffered to ſtarve, though there were fulneſs of bread in the midſt of them, ſee Ezek. xvi. 49, 50. the Jews [b] ſay, they appointed falſe judges, who oppreſſed all ſtrangers that came to Sodom, and made a law, that whoever relieved a poor perſon ſhould be burnt with fire: or the cry of their ſins, which were many and great, and openly and impudently committed; the cry of which came into the ears of the Lord of Hoſts, and called for vengeance. Thoſe two cities, which perhaps were the greateſt and the moſt remarkable for their ſins, are put for all the five cities of the plain, called Pentapolis. And becauſe their ſin is very grievous; attended with very aggravated circumſtances, they enjoyed great plenty of good things; and were not to be bore with, being ſo exceeding ſinful, and ſo publickly and audaciouſly committed, eſpecially that ſin ſo frequent among them, which has its name from Sodom, ſee ch. xiii. 13.

℣. 21. I will go down now, &c.] The Son of God in an human form now with Abraham, who propoſes to go from the place where he was, which perhaps was on higher ground, to the plain in which Sodom and Gomorrah ſtood; and whither it ſeems certain he did go down, after he had done talking with Abraham, ſee ch. xix. 24: and ſee whether they have done altogether; committed all the ſins, and in ſuch manner, and with ſuch circumſtances as reported; or, have made a full end [c], have filled up the meaſure of their iniquities, and ſo are ripe for ruin: according to the cry of it which is come unto me; this is ſpoken after the manner of men; for otherwiſe God ſaw all their wickedneſs, and knew full well the nature and circumſtances of it, and how general it was; but this method he propoſes to take, to ſhew the juſtice of his proceedings, and to inſtruct judges, and ſet an example to them, not to condemn any without thoroughly examining their cauſe: and if not, I will know; the reaſon of this cry, and what is proper to be done. The note of Aben Ezra is, "if they have ſo done "(according to the cry) I will make a conſumption among them; (ſo he takes the ſenſe of the "word [d] we render altogether); but if not, I will "know, I will have mercy on them."

℣. 22. And the men turned their faces from thence, &c.] From the place to which Abraham brought them on; theſe were only two of them, for the third continued with Abraham: and went towards Sodom; and are the two angels ſaid to come thither at evening, ch. xix. 1: but Abraham ſtood yet before the Lord; before the third perſon, whom Abraham now began to know more clearly; he ſtood before him with all reverence and humility, to hear what he had further to ſay to him, as well as to ſay ſomething to him himſelf; he ſtood yet, he continued to ſtand after the departure of the two angels that were gone to Sodom. Onkelos and Jonathan paraphraſe it, "he miniſtered in prayer before the "Lord."

℣. 23. And Abraham drew near, &c.] To the Lord; he approached nearer to him, to have more cloſe and intimate converſation with him on the ſubject of the deſtruction of Sodom, which he perceived, by what had been ſaid, was like to be; he drew nigh to God in prayer; ſo the Targum of Jonathan, "and Abraham prayed and ſaid;" he drew nigh with faith and freedom, and an holy boldneſs and confidence, and yet with great reverence of the divine Majeſty, and in all humility, under a deep ſenſe of his own meanneſs and unworthineſs: and ſaid, wilt thou alſo deſtroy the righteous with the wicked? having in his mind righteous Lot, who dwelt in Sodom, whom he knew to be a juſt man, though he had departed from him and was dwelling in ſuch a wicked place; and he might charitably hope there were more in ſo large a city and in the parts adjacent, at leaſt that were not ſo flagitious and abominably wicked as the greater part were, and who, in compariſon of them, were ſober and moral people.

℣. 24. Peradventure there be 50 righteous within the city, &c.] Within the Pentapolis, which conſiſted of 5 cities; and ſo 10 righteous perſons are ſuppoſed to be in each, as Jarchi obſerves, agreeable to the Targum of Jonathan; "perhaps there "may be 50 righteous perſons in the city who "pray before thee, 10 for every city, anſwerable "to the 5 cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, Admah "Zeboim, and Zoar:" wilt thou alſo deſtroy, and not ſpare the place for the 50 righteous that are therein? here Abraham becomes an advocate and interceſſor for all the inhabitants of the place, even the wicked, that they might not be deſtroyed, but ſpared, and be delivered from impending ruin, for the ſake of the 50 righteous among them; before he ſeemed only concerned for the righteous, leſt they ſhould periſh with the reſt, and that ſome method might be found out and taken to diſtinguiſh them from them; but here he expreſſes himſelf in favour favour of the wicked alſo, that they might be ſpared, provided ſuch a number of righteous ones was found among them.

℣. 25. That be far from thee to do after this manner, &c.] He repreſents it as a thing unbecoming the divine Majeſty, and contrary to the nature and perfections of God, to ſlay the righteous with the wicked; which is true of eternal puniſhment, but not of temporal calamities, in which the righteous are often involved with the wicked, though not for the ſame reaſons, and under the ſame conſiderations, and for the ſame ends: and that the righteous ſhould be as the wicked, that be far from thee; the one ſuffer as the other; that he judged was not agreeable to his divine Majeſty; nor are they treated without any difference; what befals the righteous is not for their ſins, nor conſidered as a puniſhment for them, nor intended for their hurt, but for their good, as the iſſue of them proves; but it is the reverſe with the wicked: ſhall not the Judge of all the earth do right? meaning the Lord, to whom he drew nigh, and was praying to, and pleading with, even the Son of God in human form, who, as he made the world, was the governor of it and judge in it; and indeed, as Mediator, has all judgment committed to him, and is appointed to be judge of quick and dead at the laſt day, and who does all things that are juſt and equitable in providence now; for there is no unrighteouſneſs in him, nor in any of his ways and works, and who will judge righteous judgment hereafter. Though by right Abraham ſeems to mean, not ſtrict rigorous juſtice, but a mixture of mercy with juſtice, even moderation and clemency; for ſuch are uſed by earthly judges, with whom it is a maxim, ſummum jus ſumma injuria; and therefore Abraham argues, ſurely the ſupreme Judge of all the earth will ſhew mercy, and in the midſt of deſerved wrath remember it, and not deal according to the rules of inexorable and inflexible juſtice; and to this ſenſe the anſwer of the Lord inclines.

℣. 26. If I find in Sodom 50 righteous within the city, &c.] Sodom is particularly mentioned becauſe Lot dwelt there, and being the metropolis, and the city of greateſt note, as Jarchi obſerves, it is put for the reſt; and the ſenſe is, if 50 righteous perſons could be found in all the 5 cities, mercy ſhould be ſhewn them: then will I ſpare all the place for their ſakes; not Sodom only, but the whole country, of which Sodom was the chief; the Lord takes up and agrees to the number Abraham pitched upon, and grants the requeſt he makes.

℣. 27. And Abraham anſwered and ſaid, &c.] In a very humble and modeſt manner, encouraged by the anſwer given him: behold now, I have taken upon me to ſpeak unto the Lord; ſuggeſting that it was bold and daring in him, and was what he was unfit for and unworthy of; or, I have begun to ſpeak [c]; and ſince he had, he intimates, it would be a favour, and what he was undeſerving of, might he be permitted to proceed; or, I am deſirous to ſpeak [f]; it is a pleaſure to me, as well as an honour done me, to be permitted to ſpeak unto the Lord, though I deſerve it not, which am but duſt and aſhes; whoſe original was out of the duſt, and to which he would return, and was now a frail, feeble, mortal creature, mean and deſpicable, unworthy to ſpeak to God; the diſproportion between the ſpeaker and the perſon ſpoken to was infinite; wherefore the moſt profound humility and ſelf-abaſement are neceſſary in a creature's approach to the divine Being.

℣. 28. Peradventure there ſhould lack 5 of the 50 righteous, &c.] Or there ſhould be but 45; for Abraham perceived, by the Lord's anſwer, that there were not 50 righteous perſons in the place: wilt thou deſtroy all the city for lack of five? Abraham proceeds gradually in his requeſts, and does not aſk too much at once, leſt he ſhould not ſucceed: and he ſaid, if I find there 45, I will not deſtroy it; that is, 45 righteous perſons.

℣. 29. And he ſpake unto him yet again, and ſaid, &c.] Being encouraged by ſuch a gracious anſwer: Peradventure there ſhall be 40 found there; 40 righteous perſons; and, from preceding paſſages, it muſt be ſupplied, "wilt thou deſtroy "and not ſpare the place for their ſakes?" and he ſaid, I will not do it for 40 ſake; but ſpare them for their ſake.

℣. 30. And he ſaid unto him, Oh, let not the Lord be angry, and I will ſpeak, &c.] He feared, through his importunity, he ſhould be weariſome to him and incur his diſpleaſure; this being often the caſe among men, eſpecially when inferiors are ſolliciting their ſuperiors, and not content with one favour, are preſſing for more: Peradventure there ſhall 30 be found there; the abatement is larger than before; he only made an abatement of 5 at a time, now 10 at once, and ſo he proceeds: and he ſaid, I will not do it, if I find 30 there; not deſtroy the place for their ſake.

℣. 31. And he ſaid, behold now, I have taken upon me to ſpeak unto the Lord, &c.] See the note on ℣. 27: Peradventure there ſhall be 20 found there; wouldeſt thou deſtroy it, ſuch a number being in it? or, wouldeſt thou ſpare it for their ſakes? and he ſaid, I will not deſtroy it for 20 ſake; if there were no more in it, I would ſpare it for their ſake.

℣. 32. And he ſaid, Oh, let not the Lord be angry, and I will ſpeak yet but this once, &c.] This ſhould be the laſt requeſt he ſhould make on this account, and therefore he deſired he might be heard without any marks of his diſpleaſure: Peradventure 10 ſhall be found there; how would the place be dealt with then? would it be conſumed or not? and he ſaid, I will not deſtroy it for 10 ſake; tho' no more righteous perſons were found in it. Some of the Jewiſh writers ſay [g], he ended at 10 becauſe he ſuppoſed there were 10 righteous perſons in Lot's family, Lot and his wife, and their 4 daughters, and their 4 huſbands; but they forgot that 2 of Lot's daughters were unmarried, and how many he had married is not known; 10 they ſay make a congregation, and wherever there are 10 righteous perſons, a place is ſaved for their ſakes.

℣. 33. And the Lord went his way, as ſoon as he had left communing with Abraham, &c.] It is great and wonderful condeſcenſion for God to commune with a creature; it is an act of ſovereignty how long he will continue to do ſo; communion with him always is not to be expected in this life; he communes for a while, and then leaves off and goes his way, ſee Jer. xiv. 8. the Son of God in an human form, as ſoon as he had done talking with Abraham, perhaps diſappeared to him, and went his way to Sodom, for there we find him in the next chapter: and Abraham returned unto his place; to his tent in the plains of Mamre, waiting to obſerve or hear what would be the iſſue and event of things reſpecting Sodom and Gomorrah.

CHAP. XIX.

THE contents of this chapter are Lot's entertainment of two angels that came to Sodom, ℣. 1, 2, 3. the rude behaviour of the men of Sodom towards them, who for it were ſmote with blindneſs, ℣. 4—11. the deliverance of Lot, his wife and two daughters, by means of the angels he entertained, ℣. 12—17. the ſparing of the city of Zoar at the intreaty of Lot, to which he was allowed to flee, ℣. 18—22. the burning of Sodom and Gomorrah, ℣. 23, 24, 25. Lot's wife turned into a pillar of ſalt for looking back, ℣. 26. Abraham's view of the conflagration of the cities, ℣. 28, 29. Lot's betaking himſelf to a mountain, and dwelling in a cave with his two daughters, by whom he had two ſons, the one called Moab, and the other Ben-Ammi, ℣. 30—38.

℣. 1. And there came two angels to Sodom at even, &c.] Or the two angels [h], the two men who were angels in the likeneſs of men, that had been with Abraham in the heat of the day at Hebron, on the evening of the ſame day came to Sodom: and Lot ſat in the gate of Sodom; not as a civil magiſtrate to try cauſes there, being appointed a judge over them, as Jarchi relates; yea, the Jews ſay [i], that that day five judges were appointed by the men of Sodom, and Lot was the chief of them; but this is not likely, and ſeems to be contradicted, ℣. 9. but he ſat there to obſerve ſtrangers that might paſs by, and invite them into his houſe, and that they might not fall into the hands of the wicked Sodomites, who might abuſe them; this being a time when not only travellers would be glad to put up and take refreſhment, but his wicked neighbours lay in wait for them to ſatisfy their luſts on them: he had learnt this hoſpitality from Abraham: and Lot ſeeing them, roſe up to meet them; he aroſe from his ſeat, and went forward to meet them, which ſhewed his readineſs and heartineſs to receive them: and he bowed himſelf with his face toward the ground; not in a religious way, as paying worſhip to angels, for as yet he did not know them to be ſuch, and if he had, would not have given them divine adoration; but in a civil way, as was the cuſtom of the eaſtern countries to bow very low in their civil reſpects to men, eſpecially to great perſonages; and ſuch Lot took theſe to be by their goodly looks and by their dreſs, as appears by his ſalutation of them in the next verſe.

℣. 2. And he ſaid, behold now, my lords, &c.] Taking them to be, and beſpeaking them as perſons of quality, who appeared with majeſty in their countenances, and looked as if they had been well brought up, and were upon their travels; not knowing them to be angels, whom he received and entertained unawares, as the apoſtle, referring to Lot and Abraham, obſerves, Heb. xiii. 2. turn in, I pray you, into your ſervant's houſe; meaning himſelf, who was their humble ſervant, and intreats them to turn in to his houſe, which perhaps was hard by, and take up their lodging with him: the ancient Jews [k] give the ſenſe of the phraſe thus, go a round-about, winding, crooked way to my houſe, that the men of Sodom may not ſee you go in there, and know you are there. This is taken from the ſignification of the word to turn in, which in a different conſtruction ſignifies to decline, to go back; and ſo the Targum of Jonathan, "turn here, and there, and go into the "houſe of your ſervant:" and tarry all night, and waſh your feet; the meaning is, that they would ſtay all night, and take up their lodging with him, when they had waſhed their feet, which was uſually done before they laid down, and even before they ſupped; and indeed was the firſt thing that was done to a ſtranger upon his entering into the houſe, ch. xviii. 4. Luke vii. 44: and ye ſhall riſe up early, and go on your ways; ſignifying that he would not detain them longer than they thought fit; they might riſe as ſoon in the morning as they pleaſed, and purſue their journey, only he intreats they would accept of a night's lodging with him: and they ſaid, nay, but we will abide in the ſtreet all night; which they ſaid partly out of modeſty, it not becoming ſtrangers to be too forward in accepting an invitation, and partly to try whether Lot was hearty in the invitation he gave them; and hereby alſo feigning ignorance of the manners and behaviour of the men of Sodom, as if they might be ſafe from their inſults in the ſtreet in the night; and this made Lot the more preſſing upon them, that they might not be expoſed to his wicked neighbours.

℣. 3. And he preſſed them greatly, &c.] He prayed, he intreated, he perſuaded, he made uſe of a multitude of words, and of all the arguments he could think of, to prevail upon them; and might not only preſs them with words, but make uſe of geſtures, as taking them by the hand, or by their clothes, and as it were forcing them into his houſe, whereby it plainly appeared he was cordial and hearty in his invitation: and they turned in unto him, and entered into his houſe; went along with him to it, and inſtead of proceeding forward, or continuing where they were, or ſteering their courſe to a ſtreet in the city, they turned in to Lot's houſe: and he made them a feaſt; a large, liberal and generous entertainment, as Abraham did, conſiſting of a variety of eatables and drinkables; indeed it has its name only from drinking, wine being a principal part of a banquet: and did bake unleavened bread; not becauſe it was the time of the paſſover, as Jarchi ſuggeſts, for as yet that was not inſtituted; but for quicker diſpatch, that his gueſts might have their ſupper the ſooner, and get to bed the earlier, and reſt themſelves; bread without leaven in it being ſooner baked than that which is made with it: and they did eat; the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem are, "they ſeemed as if "they ate." See the note on ch. xviii. 8.

℣. 4. But before they lay down, &c.] Upon their beds to ſleep; it was between ſupper-time and bedtime that the following affair happened, whilſt the angels were talking to Lot about the men of Sodom, and enquiring what ſort of men they were, as the Jewiſh writers [l] ſuggeſt: the men of the city, even the men of Sodom, compaſſed the houſe round about; the houſe of Lot, where the angels were: both old and young; the males of the city of every age; ſome that were paſt committing the ſin, they were ſo so infamous for, as well as those that burned with that unnatural lust; some that could not be actors were willing to be spectators; and all were curious to see the lovely persons, that it was reported all over the city, were seen to go into Lot's house: all the people from every quarter; all from one end of the city to the other, and from every corner in it; which shows the general corruption and depravity of the city, that it was so far from having ten righteous persons in it, that of the proper inhabitants of it, there was not, as Jarchi notes, one righteous person, no not one.

℣. 5. And they called unto Lot, &c.] With a loud voice, that he might hear, they being in the street, and he within doors; and perhaps there might be a court before his house, through which there was a passage up to it, as seems from the following verse: and said unto him, where are the men which came in to thee this night? for though they were angels, they appeared like men, and they seemed to be so to them who saw them go into Lot's house: bring them out unto us, that we may know them; not who they were, and from whence they came, and what their business was; nor did they pretend any thing of this kind to hide and cover their design from Lot, but they were open and impudent, and declared their sin without shame and blushing, which is their character, Isa. iii. 9. their meaning was, that they might commit that unnatural sin with them, they were addicted to, and in common used, and which from them to this day bears the name of Sodomy. As lawful copulation with a man's wife is modestly expressed by knowing her, Gen. iv. 1, 17, 25. so this unlawful and shocking copulation of man with man is expressed by this phrase; and that this was their meaning, is plain from Lot's answer to them.

℣. 6. And Lot went out at the door unto them, &c.] At the door of his house: and shut the door after him; the door of the passage to his house, the court yard-door, for another word is here used; unless the one was properly the door, and the other a hatch: however, this precaution of shutting it was used to prevent the men of Sodom rushing in, and taking away the men by violence; and that Lot might have some opportunity of trying what he could do by arguments, to prevail upon them to desist from their attempt.

℣. 7. And said, I pray you, brethren, &c.] Not by family or nation, for the Sodomites were of the race of Ham, in the line of Canaan, and Lot was a descendant of Shem, in the line of Arphaxad; nor by religion, for the one were idolaters, and the other a worshipper of the true God, but by community of nature; and especially he called them so by reason of their having been neighbours a considerable time, and on the score of friendship, see 1 Kings ix. 13. and with this soft and loving language Lot hoped to win his neighbours, and to persuade them from pursuing their unlawful measures: for which purpose and that alone he used it, saying to them, do not so wickedly; as to use ill a man's guests, to abuse strangers, to break the laws and rules of hospitality, and especially to commit that unnatural sin they were bent upon.

℣. 8. Behold now, I have two daughters, which have not known man, &c.] Though some think they were espoused to men, but had not yet cohabited with them, see ℣. 14: let me, I pray you, bring them out unto you, and do ye to them as is good in your eyes; this was a very great evil in Lot to make such an offer of his daughters; it was contrary to parental love and affection, an exposing the chastity of his daughters, which should have been his care to preserve; nor had he a power to dispose of them in such a manner: and though fornication is a lesser evil than Sodomy, yet all evil is to be avoided, and even it is not to be done that good may come: nothing can be said to excuse this good man, but the hurry of spirit, and confusion of mind that he was in, not knowing what to say or do to prevent the base designs of those men; that he might be pretty certain they would not accept of his offer, their lust burning more after men than women; that this showed his great regard to the laws of hospitality, that he had rather sacrifice his daughters to their brutal lusts, than give up the men that were in his house to them; and that he might hope that this would soften their minds, and put them off of any further attempt; but after all it must be condemned as a dangerous and imprudent action: only unto these men do nothing; for as yet he knew them not to be angels; had he, it would not have given him the concern it did, since he must have known that they were able to defend themselves, and that the sin these men offered to commit could not be perpetrated on them: but he took them for mere men, and his request is, that no injury might be done to their persons in any respect, and especially in that way which their wicked hearts put them upon, and is so shocking to nature: for therefore came they under the shadow of my roof; for though it was not their intention in coming, nor the design of Providence in bringing them into Lot's house, to secure them from the violence of the men of Sodom, but for the preservation of Lot and his family, which as yet he knew nothing of, yet it was what Lot had in view in giving the invitation to them: and the laws of hospitality being reckoned sacred and inviolable, a man's house was accounted an asylum for strangers when taken into it.

℣. 9. And they said, stand back, &c.] Turn on one side, get away from the door, that we may come to it: and they said again; to one another: this one fellow came in to sojourn, and he will needs be a judge; this one man, and he a stranger and sojourner, no free-man or citizen of this city, sets himself against the whole body of the inhabitants, and takes upon him to judge what is right and wrong to be done; and if he is let alone in judging he will judge[m], as it may be rendered; he'll take upon him this office, and continue to exercise it, and determine and decide all matters among us at his pleasure. This confutes the above notion of the Jews, that Lot was appointed a judge by the men of Sodom, yea, the president of the court for that day; see the note on ℣. 1: now will we deal worse with thee, than with them; the men in his house, both by abusing his body in their unnatural way, and by beating and bruising him, and pulling him in pieces, limb from limb; something of this kind they seem to threaten him with, and attempted to effect, as follows: and they pressed sore upon the man; even Lot, not only with words in a bullying way, with menaces and threats, with oaths, and curses, and imprecations; for it is the same word that is used of Lot, pressing the angels with words and arguments to come into his house, ℣. 3. but they rushed in upon him in a body, and pushed him away, and pulled him about, and would, in all probability, have torn him to pieces, had he not been rescued by the angels: and and came near to break the door; that which was ſhut, the door of the paſſage that led to the houſe.

℣. 10. But the men put forth their hand, &c.] They came to the door, and opened it, and put out their hands, one on one ſide the door, and the other on the other: and pulled Lot into the houſe to them, and ſhut to the door; and thus they reſcued Lot from the fury and rage of the men of Sodom, and prevented his daughters being expoſed unto them, as he had offered. This action ſhewed them to be more than men, that they ſhould open the door, take in Lot, and ſhut it ſo ſuddenly, that the men of Sodom could take no advantage of it, could neither retain Lot, nor enter the door when opened, and eſpecially what follows.

℣. 11. And they ſmote the men that were at the door of the houſe with blindneſs, both ſmall and great, &c.] Or with blindneſſes [n]; with extreme blindneſs, with blindneſs both of eye and heart, as Aben Ezra interprets it; and indeed had they not been given up to a judicial blindneſs and hardneſs of heart, ſuch a ſtroke upon them might have convinced them that their ways were evil, and their works not right, and that by them they had incurred the diſpleaſure of God, and would have deſiſted from their enterprize; but on the contrary, they went on with it, and ſought with all diligence and labour as much as poſſible to effect it. The word for blindneſs is only uſed here and in 2 Kings vi. 18. and denotes a peculiar ſort of blindneſs; not an entire blindneſs with reſpect to every object, but only with regard to that they were intent upon; for otherwiſe they would not have continued about Lot's houſe, or fatigued themſelves with ſearching for the door of it, but would rather have been glad to have groped to their own houſes as well as they could: and thus it was with the Syrians, when they were ſmitten at the prayer of Eliſha, it was not total, for they could follow the prophet in the way he went and led them, but they could not ſee their way to the place where they intended to go; and ſo theſe men of Sodom could ſee other objects, but not the door of Lot's houſe, their heads were ſo confuſed, and their imaginations ſo diſturbed as in drunken men; or the medium of the viſive faculty, the air, ſo altered, or the form of the object to be ſeen ſo changed, that they could not diſcern it; when they ſaw the door, it looked like the wall, and that which ſeemed to them to be the door, proved to be the wall: ſo that they wearied themſelves to find the door; went backwards and forwards, fancying the door was here, and then it was there, and when they came to it, they perceived it was not; and thus they went to and fro, until they were quite weary of ſeeking it, and deſpaired of finding it, and left off.

℣. 12. And the men ſaid unto Lot, &c.] When they had got him into the houſe again, they began to make themſelves known unto him, and to acquaint him with the buſineſs they came to do: haſt thou here any beſides? which they aſk not as being ignorant, though angels know not every thing relative to men, but to ſhew their great regard to Lot, who had been ſo kind to them, and ſo careful of them; that for his ſake they would ſave them all, if they would take the benefit of their protection, and in this they doubtleſs had the mind of God revealed to them: ſon-in-law, and thy ſons, and thy daughters; it ſhould be rendered, either ſon-in-law, or thy ſons, or thy daughters [o]; if thou haſt any ſon-in-law that has married a daughter of thine, or any ſons of thine own that live from thee; or grandſons, the ſons of thy married daughters, as Jarchi interprets it; or any other daughters beſides thoſe two we here ſee: and whatſoever thou haſt in the city, bring them out of this place; that is, whatſoever relations he had, whether more near or remote; for as for his goods, whether in his own houſe, or in any other part of the city, there was no time for ſaving them.

℣. 13. For we will deſtroy this place, &c.] Or we are deſtroying it [p], are about to do it, and will quickly and immediately do it: becauſe the cry of them is waxen great before the face of the Lord; the cry of the ſins of the inhabitants of it, which were many, and openly, and daringly committed, and reached to heaven, and called for immediate vengeance and puniſhment: and the Lord hath ſent us to deſtroy it; by which they diſcovered themſelves to be angels, and what their buſineſs was, to deſtroy Sodom; and which confutes the notion of the Jews, that they were ſent on different errands; whereas it is clear from hence, theſe two were ſent to do one and the ſame thing; ſee the note on ch. xviii. 2.

℣. 14. And Lot went out, &c.] From his houſe, after the men of Sodom were gone from it, and before the morning, very probably about midnight: and ſpake unto his ſons-in-law, which married his daughters; according to Aben Ezra, he had two other daughters that periſhed in Sodom, which he gathers from the following verſe, which are here, as if he had ſome elſewhere; and ſo Jarchi ſays, he had two daughters married in the city. And the Jewiſh writers [q] ſpeak of one of them, whoſe name was Pelothith, married to one of the grandees of Sodom: but it ſeems rather, that theſe were the daughters Lot had at home with him; who, according to Joſephus [r], were eſpouſed to men in the city, but not yet married; and on account of ſuch eſpouſals, as were uſual in the eaſtern countries, Lot calls them his ſons-in-law, as they were intended, and ſo the words may be rendered, that were about to take his daughters [s]; to take them for wives, and to their own houſes, neither of which they had as yet done; for if theſe had been daughters of his married, and taken home, he would not only have ſpoke unto their huſbands, but to them alſo; and would have been ſtill more preſſing upon them to ariſe and make their eſcape; of which nothing is ſaid, nor of any anſwer of theirs to him, only of his ſons-in-law, as they are called on the above account: and ſaid, up, get ye out of this place; that is, get up from your beds, ariſe immediately, and make your eſcape out of the city: for the Lord will deſtroy this city; now, directly, immediately; therefore there is no time to be loſt, but at once prepare for your ſafety: but he ſeemed as one that mocked to his ſons-in-law; as one that was in jeſt, and had a mind to have a little ſport with them, to get them out of their beds, and put them into a fright, and then laugh at them.

℣. 15. And when the morning aroſe, &c.] When it was break of day, for as yet the ſun was not riſen, nor did it riſe until Lot got to Zoar, ℣.

℣. 23. He was now returned from his ſons-in-law, and by this time it began to be light: then the angels haſtened Lot; urged him to get out of his houſe as faſt as he could: ſaying, take thy wife, and thy two daughters, which are here; from whence Aben Ezra, and others, have concluded, as has been obſerved, that he had other daughters elſewhere, which they ſuppoſe were married to men of Sodom; but the phraſe, which are here, or are found, or are preſent [t], relates to his wife, as well as his daughters, and only ſignifies, that he ſhould take all his relations that were preſent; and theſe may be only oppoſed to and diſtinguiſhed from his ſons-in-law that were abſent, and refuſed to hearken to his advice and exhortations. Onkelos paraphraſes the words, who are found faithful with thee; who believed what the angels ſaid concerning the deſtruction of Sodom, as well as he, as did his wife and two daughters: leſt thou be conſumed in the iniquity of the city; in the puniſhment inflicted on the city for their iniquity. See Rev. xviii. 4.

℣. 16. And while he lingred, &c.] Delayed going out of his houſe, either loth to leave his goods and ſubſtance behind him; or waiting to ſee whether his ſons-in-law would come to him; or, as others, praying that God would ſpare the city: though rather the ſenſe is, that he was ſo amazed, and filled with horror and trembling at the thought of what judgments were coming on the city, that he was like one ſtupid, that had no power to ſtir nor move, which ſeems beſt to agree with the ſenſe of the word uſed [u]: the men laid hold upon his hand, and upon the hand of his wife, and upon the hand of his two daughters; one of them took hold of his hand with one of his hands, and on his wife's with the other, and the ſecond took hold of one of his daughters with one hand, and of the other with his other hand, and ſo led them out: the Lord being merciful unto him; and ſo ſaved them from the ruin and deſtruction of the city, in which had they ſtayed a little longer they would have been involved. It was not owing to their merits, but to the mercy of God that they were ſpared: and they brought him forth, and ſet him without the city; not him only, but his wife and two daughters alſo, and having ſo done, left them and returned to the city; for ſo the laſt clauſe may be rendered, and left him without the city [w], to ſhift for themſelves; or rather well knowing that there would be one that would immediately appear and take them under his care and protection, as the event ſhews.

℣. 17. And it came to paſs, when they had brought them forth abroad, &c.] Into the fields of Sodom, or the ſuburbs of it: that he ſaid, eſcape for thy life; not one of the two men or angels that had been with him all the night paſt, for they had now left him, and were gone back to the city; but Jehovah the Son of God, who had been communing with Abraham, and now came to Sodom, and appeared to Lot, juſt at the time the two angels left him, and bid him eſcape with all haſte, if he had any regard for his life, and that of thoſe with him: look not behind thee; as ſhewing any concern for his goods and ſubſtance he had left behind him, or for his ſons-in-law, who refuſed to come with him, and much leſs for the wicked inhabitants of the city; and this command was not given to Lot only, but to his wife and daughters, as appears by the ſequel: neither ſtay thou in all the plain; in the plain of Jordan, for the whole plain, and the cities in it, were to be deſtroyed: eſcape to the mountain, leſt thou be deſtroyed; the ſame mountain the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah, and they that were with them after the battle of the kings, fled to, ch. xiv. 10. here only he and his could be ſafe from the conflagration of the plain.

℣. 18. And Lot ſaid unto them, &c.] Suppoſing three preſent, not obſerving that the two angels had left him that had brought him thither; tho' it is but to one of them he addreſſes himſelf, even to him who had bid him make the beſt of his way to the mountain, as appears by what follows: oh not ſo, my Lord; that is, let me not be obliged to go ſo far as to the mountain; though R. Samuel takes it to be an aſſent, and interprets the phraſe of his being willing: but this does not agree with what follows, and is rejected by Aben Ezra, who relates it; and who alſo obſerves, that the word Lord is a common name, that is, that belongs to a creature; but Jarchi ſays their Rabbins take it to be an holy name, that is, a name that belongs to God, and gives a good reaſon why it is ſo to be underſtood here; ſince the perſon ſpoken to had it in his power to kill or make alive, to ſave or deſtroy, as the following words ſhew; ſo Ben Melech, and the Targum of Onkelos render it by Jehovah.

℣. 19. Behold, now thy ſervant hath found grace in thy ſight, &c.] In ſending two of his angels to him, to inform him of the approaching deſtruction of Sodom; to pluck him out of it as a brand out of the burning, and to place him without the city, and in directing and encouraging him to eſcape for his life: and thou haſt magnified thy mercy which thou haſt ſhewed unto me in ſaving my life; he owns it was owing to the mercy of this illuſtrious perſon, whom he knew and acknowledges, by what he ſays, to be a divine one, that his life was ſaved; and that this appeared exceeding great in it, that he ſhould ſpare him and his family, when ſuch multitudes of ſouls would periſh; and he might have periſhed with the reſt, if he had not had timely notice in ſuch a gracious manner: and I cannot, or but now [x], I cannot eſcape to the mountain; it is too far for me; he ſignifies that his ſtrength would not hold out through the fatigues of the night paſt, and want of ſleep and reſt; but this was owing more to the infirmity of his mind than of his body, for he could go to this ſame mountain afterwards: leſt ſome evil take me, and I die; or that evil [y], the burning of Sodom, and the cities of the plain, leſt that ſhould overtake him before he got to the mountain: thus he began to diſtruſt the power of God to ſtrengthen him to go thither, who had appeared ſo wonderfully for him in his preſent deliverance; and he might have aſſured himſelf, that he that brought him out of Sodom, would never ſuffer him to periſh in the deſtruction of it.

℣. 20. Behold now, this city is near to flee unto, &c.] Pointing to Bela, afterwards called Zoar, from what follows: it is ſaid to be two miles diſtant from Sodom [z]. But the Jews [a] ſay, it was four miles, and ſome ſay [b] five; for they reckon that a man may go five miles from the aſcent of the morning (or break of day) till the ſun ſhines out: and and it is a little one; a little city, and the houſes and buildings in it few, the inhabitants few; and the ſins of it few, as the Targum of Jonathan adds, in compariſon of Sodom and Gomorrah; and therefore Lot hoped this favour would be granted him, that this city might be ſaved, and he be allowed to flee to it, and go no further; but others think this refers not to the city, which ſome ſay [c] was a large and ſpacious one, but to his requeſt, that it was a ſmall thing he aſked, and hoped therefore it would not be denied, and in which he was very importunate: oh, let me eſcape thither (is it not a little one?) or, is it not a little thing [d]? a ſmall requeſt that I make: and my ſoul ſhall live; I ſhall not only be able to get thither, and ſo my life will be preſerved; but I ſhall be in good ſpirits, rejoice and be glad, that I am got ſafe and out of the reach of danger; my ſpirits, which are now faint, and therefore can never think of getting ſo far as to the mountain, but, if this favour is granted me, they will revive, and I ſhall chearfully purſue my journey thither and be comfortable.

℣. 21. And he ſaid unto him, ſee, I have accepted thee concerning this thing alſo, &c.] Accepted thy prayer and granted thy requeſt, as well as in other things; ſhewn grace and mercy to thee; or, have liſted up thy face [e]; alluding to the cuſtom of the eaſtern countries, where perſons, when they come into the preſence of their ſuperiors, uſed to proſtrate their faces to the ground; when, as a token of their acceptance of them, and good-will to them, they uſed to order them to be lifted up, or them to lift up their faces, and ſtand before them: that I will not overthrow this city for the which thou haſt ſpoken; for, though he had not in expreſs words petitioned that the city might be ſpared, yet he had tacitly done it, inſomuch as he had requeſted he might flee unto it, where he could not have been ſafe had it been deſtroyed.

℣. 22. Haſte thee, eſcape thither, &c.] Seeing he had granted him his requeſt, he is urgent upon him to be gone, and not to delay upon any account, or make other excuſes: for I cannot do any thing till thou be come thither; that is, conſiſtent with the decree of God, that Lot and his family ſhould be delivered and preſerved, and with his promiſe made to him, that he would not overthrow that city; and therefore the cataſtrophe which would befal all the cities at once, could not begin until he was ſafely arrived there: therefore the name of the city was called Zoar; in after-times, and probably firſt by Lot, from his uſe of the word little, which was his requeſt, which Zoar ſignifies; it before was called Bela, ſee ch. xiv. 2.

℣. 23. And the ſun was riſen upon the earth when Lot entered into Zoar, &c.] Which is obſerved partly to point at the time of his entrance into the city, and of the burning of Sodom, which began at the ſame time; and partly to ſhew what a fine morning it was, and what little appearance there was of ſuch a tempeſt riſing as quickly did; ſo that the inhabitants of Sodom, who were up ſo early, little thought of ſo ſudden a cataſtrophe, and thoſe that were in their beds, were at once ſurprized with it: it was a morning of light and joy to Lot, who was ſo wonderfully delivered, but a dreadful one to the men of Sodom and the reſt of the cities of the plain, with whom the ſcene was ſoon altered; likewiſe from hence it appeared, that the following tempeſt was extraordinary, and did not proceed from natural cauſes.

℣. 24. Then the Lord rained upon Sodom and upon Gomorrah brimſtone and fire from the Lord out of heaven, &c.] And not upon thoſe two cities only, but upon Admah and Zeboim alſo, ſee Deut. xxix. 23. this was not a common ſtorm of thunder and lightning, with which often there is a ſmell of ſulphur or brimſtone; but this was a continued ſhower of ſulphurous fire, or of burning flaming brimſtone, which at once conſumed thoſe cities and the inhabitants of them; and the land adjacent being bituminous, or however ſome parts of it, full of ſlime-pits, or pits of bitumen, a liquid of a pitchy quality, ch. xiv. 10. this flaming ſulphur falling thereon, muſt burn in a moſt fierce and furious manner; and which utterly conſumed not only houſes, goods, and every thing upon the land, but the land itſelf, and turned it into a bituminous lake, called to this day, from thence, the lake Aſphaltites, the Greek word for bitumen being Aſphaltos. Of this conflagration ſome heathen writers ſpeak, as particularly Tacitus [f], who ſays, ſome large and famous cities, or, as ſome copies have it, Jewiſh ones, not far from Jordan, were ſtruck with thunderbolts, and were fired igni cæleſti, with fire from heaven, and were conſumed; and ſo Solinus [g] relates, that, "at ſome diſtance from Jeruſalem, a "ſorrowful lake appears, which the black ground "teſtifies was ſtricken by Heaven and turned into "aſhes; where were two towns, the one called So-"domum, the other Gomorrum." This was a righteous judgment on thoſe cities, and a juſt retaliation for their ſin; their ſin was an unnatural one, and nature is inverted to puniſh them, fire comes down from heaven, or hell from heaven, as Salvian's words are, to conſume them; they burned with luſts one againſt another, and flaming ſheets of ſulphurous fire fall upon them, burn and deſtroy them; and, in alluſion to this terrible conflagration, hell is called the lake which burns with fire and brimſtone, Jude, ℣. 7. Rev. xx. 14, 15. and xxi. 8. and this deſtruction was brought upon them by Jehovah the Son of God, who had appeared to Abraham in an human form, and gave him notice of it, and heard all he had to plead for thoſe cities, and then departed from him to Sodom, and was the author of this ſad cataſtrophe; this amazing ſhower of fire and brimſtone was rained by him from Jehovah his father, out of heaven; ſo the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem both call him, the Word of the Lord.

℣. 25. And he overthrew thoſe cities, &c.] Of Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, and Zeboim: very probably at the ſame time that this fiery tempeſt was in the heavens, there was an earthquake which overthrew the cities; and ſo Strabo [h] makes the lake, which is now the place where they ſtood, to be owing to earthquakes and eruptions of fire, and of hot bituminous and ſulphurous waters; and ſays nothing of fire from heaven, which yet Tacitus and Solinus do, being unacquainted with the ſacred hiſtory: and all the plain; the plain of Jordan, and the cities on it, all but Zoar; not all the five cities, as Joſephus [i], Egeſippus [k], and other authors miſtake, only the four above-mentioned. Strabo [l] ſpeaks of 13 cities being formerly upon this ſpot, of of which Sodom was the metropolis: and all the inhabitants of the cities; none were ſpared, all were deſtroyed, but Lot, his wife, and two daughters: and that which grew upon the ground; the trees, herbs, and plants; theſe were all turned up by the earthquake, and burnt with fire from heaven: Tacitus, in his account of this conflagration, ſays, "the fields, which were formerly fruitful, and inhabited by many cities, were burnt up with lightning; and there are traces, he adds, yet remain; the earth itſelf looks torrid, and has loſt its fruitful virtue; for whatſoever grows up of itſelf, or is ſown and riſes up in the plant or flower, or grows up to its uſual ſpecies, becomes black and empty, and vaniſhes into aſhes." The place where thoſe cities ſtood is now a lake, and is ſometimes called the ſalt ſea, ch. xiv. 3. and ſometimes the dead ſea, becauſe it is ſaid, no creature can live in it; and ſometimes called the lake Aſphaltites, from its bituminous and pitchy quality: though Reland [o] has attempted to confute the notion that the cities of Sodom, &c. ſtood where this lake now is: and the many things that have been reported of this lake and parts adjacent, by various hiſtorians, ſuppoſed to be of good credit, are by modern travellers exploded [p]; as thoſe of no living creature being bred in it; of bodies not ſinking in it; and of birds being unable to fly over it; and of the cities appearing under water in a clear day; and of the apples of Sodom, which look beautiful to the eye, but when touched fall into aſhes; many of which Joſephus [q] himſelf relates: indeed, Ludovicus Vartomanus [r], a traveller in thoſe parts in the beginning of the 16th century, ſays, "there yet remain the ruins of the deſtroyed city, as a witneſs of God's wrath; we may affirm, there are 3 cities, and each of them ſituated on the decline of 3 hills, and the ruins appear about the height of 3 or 4 cubits; there is yet ſeen, I ſcarce know what, ſomething like blood, or rather like red wax mixed with earth:" and our countryman Mr. Sandys [s], though he queſtions ſome of the above things before related, eſpecially concerning the apples, yet ſays, "not far from thence grows a tree whoſe fruit is like a green walnut, which he ſaw, and which they ſay never ripens." This lake of Sodom, according to Joſephus [t], is 580 furlongs in length unto Zoar, and 150 broad; but, according to modern accounts, it is no more than 24 in length, and 6 or 7 in breadth [u]; the Arabic geographer [w] ſays, it is 60 miles in length, and 12 in breadth; it is now called by the Arabs, Bahar Louth, Lot's lake.

℣. 26. But his wife looked back from behind him, &c.] That is, the wife of Lot, whoſe name the Jewiſh writers [x] ſay was Adith, or as others Irith [y]; and, according to the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem, ſhe was a native of Sodom: now, as they were going from Sodom to Zoar, ſhe was behind Lot, his back was to her, ſo that he could not ſee her; this was a temptation to her to look back, ſince her huſband could not ſee her; and this ſhe did, either, as the above paraphraſes ſuggeſt, that ſhe might ſee what would be the end of her father's houſe and family, or whether her married daughters, if ſhe had any, were following her, after whom her bowels yearned; or being grieved for the goods and ſubſtance left behind, and for the people of Sodom in general, for whom ſhe had too much concern; however, be it on what account it may, ſhe was ſeverely puniſhed for it: and ſhe became a pillar of ſalt; was ſtruck dead at once, either by the immediate hand of God, or by the ſhower of fire and brimſtone; and her body was at once changed into a metallic ſubſtance, a kind of ſalt, hard and durable, ſuch as Pliny [z] ſpeaks of, cut out of rocks, with which houſes were built, and hardened with the ſun, and could ſcarcely be cut with an iron inſtrument; ſo that ſhe did not fall to the ground, but ſtood up erect as a pillar, retaining very probably the human form. Joſephus [a] ſays, this pillar continued to his times, and that he ſaw it; Irenæus [b] and Tertullian [c] ſpeak of it as in their times, a thing incredible; and Benjamin of Tudela ſays [d], it ſtood in his times two parſa's from the ſea of Sodom; and, though the flocks were continually licking it, yet it grew again to its former bigneſs. Rauwolff [e] relates ſomething of the ſame kind by information, but not on his own teſtimony; that the pilgrims who viſit it, uſed to beat off ſome ſmall pieces, and yet was found whole again; nay, which is beyond all credit, that they once knocked off a whole hand and took it away, and when they returned found it whole again: and one [f] that travelled in thoſe parts in the beginning of the 16th century affirms, that almoſt in the midway to Zoar is ſeen to this day the pillar of ſalt into which Lot's wife was turned; he does not ſay indeed that he ſaw it, but leaves his reader to think ſo; and the Jeruſalem Targum ſays, it will remain until the reſurrection: but modern travellers of credit and intelligence could never ſee it; and when they have enquired of the country-people about it, they either tell them there is no ſuch thing, or ſay it ſtands in the mountains, where it cannot be come at, becauſe of the Arabs, or becauſe of wild beaſts [g]: but no doubt there was ſuch a ſtatue, but how long it continued cannot be ſaid; nor ſhould it be thought incredible, when there are ſimilar facts affirmed by authors of the beſt credit and reputation: Aventinus [h] reports, that in Bavaria, in 1348, more than 50 peaſants, with the cows they had milked, at the time of an earthquake were ſtruck with a peſtilential air, and ſtiffened into ſtatues of ſalt, and which he himſelf ſaw, and the chancellor of Auſtria: and Biſſelius relates [i], that Didacus Almagrus, who was the firſt perſon that with his army penetrated thro' the cold countries from Peru into Chili, loſt abundance of his men, through the extremity of the cold and a peſtiferous air; and that, returning to the ſame place five months afterwards, he found his men, horſe and foot, ſtanding unmoved, unconſumed, in the ſame ſituation, form, and habit the peſtilence had faſtened them; one lying on the ground, another ſtanding upright, another holding his bridle in his hand, as if about to ſhake it; in ſhort, he found them juſt as he left them, without any ill ſmell or colour, common to corpſes: indeed, the very fables of the heathens, which ſeem to be hammered out of this hiſtory, ſerve to confirm firm the truth of the whole of it; as the fable of Jupiter and Mercury coming to a certain place in Phrygia, where they were hoſpitably entertained by Baucis and Philemon, when the doors were ſhut againſt them by others; wherefore they directed their gueſts, after being entertained by them, to leave the place and follow them to the mountains, when they turned the town into a ſtanding lake [k]: and alſo that of Niobe being changed into a marble ſtone while weeping for the death of her children: and of Olenus and Lethæa, turned into ſtones alſo [l]. But, leaving theſe, and paſſing by other inſtances that might be obſerved, we are directed to remember this wonderful caſe by our Lord himſelf, Luke xvii. 32. and it ſhould be an inſtruction to us, not to look back nor turn back from the profeſſion of the true religion we have made, but to follow Chriſt, and abide by his truths and ordinances.

℣. 27. And Abraham got up early in the morning, &c.] Perhaps he had had but little ſleep the whole night, his thoughts being taken up with what was to befal the cities of the plain; and eſpecially being in great concern for Lot and his family: to the place where he ſtood before the Lord; ch. xviii. 22. to the very ſpot of ground where he had ſtood the day before in the preſence of the Lord, and had converſed with him, and prayed unto him; and ſo the Targum of Jonathan, "to the place "where he miniſtered in prayer before the Lord;" here he came and ſtood waiting for an anſwer to his prayers; and perhaps this place was an eminence, from whence he could have a view of the plain of Jordan and the cities on it; and ſo it appears from the next verſe.

℣. 28. And he looked toward Sodom and Gomorrah, and toward all the land of the plain, &c.] To ſee how it fared with them: very probably the Lord had hinted it to him, that the deſtruction would be that morning, and therefore he roſe early, got to the place betimes, and being on an eminence, looked wiſhly to ſee if he could obſerve any ſign of it: and beheld, and lo the ſmoke of the country went up as the ſmoke of a furnace; after the fiery ſhower was over, and the cities burnt down, the ſmoke aſcended toward heaven, as the ſmoke of myſtical Babylon will do, Rev. xix. 3. like the reek of a boiling cauldron; or, as Jarchi, like the ſmoke of a lime-kiln always burning.

℣. 29. And it came to paſs, when God deſtroyed the cities of the plain, &c.] Not when he had deſtroyed them, but when he was about to deſtroy them; for Lot was ſent out from them, and delivered out of them, before they were deſtroyed; and therefore Noldius rightly renders the words, before God deſtroyed [m] them: that God remembered Abraham; his promiſe to him, that he would bleſs them that bleſſed him, ch. xii. 3. and his prayer to him for Lot in the preceding chapter; for, though he does not mention him by name, he bore him on his heart, and he was always in the number of the righteous ones, on whoſe account he interceded for the ſparing of the cities; and, though God did not hear and anſwer him with regard to the cities, yet he did with reſpect to the righteous men in them: and ſent Lot out of the midſt of the overthrow; by two angels, who took him by the hand and brought him out of Sodom, now overthrown: when he overthrew the cities in which Lot dwelt; that is, in one of which Lot dwelt, namely, Sodom, as Aben Ezra rightly obſerves, comparing the paſſage with Judg. xii. 7. unleſs it can be thought that Lot firſt dwelt in one of thoſe cities and then in another, and firſt and laſt in them all, which is not very likely.

℣. 30. And Lot went up out of Zoar, &c.] Which lay in the plain, and therefore when he went from thence to the mountain, it was by an aſcent: and dwelt in the mountain; which the Lord had directed him to go to before, but was unwilling, and choſe Zoar, and deſired he might flee thither, and that that might be ſpared; but now he likes God's advice for him better than his own, and therefore betook himſelf to the mountain, where he might think himſelf ſafeſt, and where he continued; very probably this was the mountain Engaddi, under which Zoar is ſaid to lie by Adrichomius [n]: and his two daughters with him; his wife was turned into a pillar of ſalt, and theſe two were all of his family that with him were ſaved from the deſtruction; and theſe are the rather mentioned for the ſake of an anecdote hereafter related: for he feared to dwell in Zoar; it being near to Sodom; and the ſmoke of that city and the reſt might not only be terrible but troubleſome to him, and the tremor of the earth might continue and reach as far as Zoar; and perceiving the waters to riſe and overflow the plain, which formed the lake where the cities ſtood, he might fear they would reach to Zoar and ſwallow up that; and eſpecially his fears were increaſed, when he found the inhabitants were as wicked as thoſe of the other cities, and were unreformed by the judgment on them; and ſo he might fear that a like ſhower of fire would deſcend on them and deſtroy them, as it had the reſt, though it had been ſpared for a while at his interceſſion; and, according to the Jewiſh writers [o], it remained but one year after Sodom: and he dwelt in a cave, he and his two daughters; which was in the mountain, the mountain of Engedi. Joſephus [p] makes mention of the mountains of Engedi; and here was a cave, where David with 600 men were, in the ſides of it, when Saul went into it, 1 Sam. xxiv. 3. and perhaps may be the ſame cave where Lot and his two daughters lived.

℣. 31. And the firſt-born ſaid unto the younger, &c.] That is, the firſt-born of thoſe two, or the elder of them; for, if Lot had other daughters that were married in Sodom, it is probable they were elder than either of theſe: Aben Ezra intimates, that Lot had another wife, who died firſt, and theſe were by his ſecond; the following motion is made by the eldeſt of them to the youngeſt, as being bolder, having more authority, and a greater influence to perſuade: our father is old; if he was 50 years of age when he was taken captive by the kings, as ſays the Jewiſh chronologer [q], he muſt now be 65, ſince the deſtruction of Sodom, according to biſhop Uſher [r], was 15 years after that: and there is not a man in the earth to come in unto us after the manner of all the earth; to marry them, cohabit with them, and procreate children of them, which was the common way of the propagation of mankind in the earth; they thought the whole world was deſtroyed by fire, as it had been by a flood; they underſtood it would be no more conſumed by water, but they had been told it would be by fire, and they imagined the time was now come, and this was the caſe; that not only Sodom and Gomorrah were deſtroyed by fire, and that by this time the fire had reached to Zoar, and had conſumed conſumed that, but that the whole earth was deſtroyed, and not a man left but their father, and therefore thought it could be excuſable in them, and lawful for them to take the following method to re-people the world; or elſe they ſuppoſed there were none in the land, the land of Canaan, not of any of their kindred and relations, for they might be ignorant of Abraham and his family, or however of any good man that they knew of, that they could be joined to in marriage; for as for the inhabitants of Zoar, they had juſt left, they were as wicked as any, and therefore could not think of living with them in ſuch a near relation: but, all this is not a ſufficient excuſe for contriving and executing what is after related; for they ſhould have enquired of their father, who could have informed them better.

℣. 32. Come, let us make our father drink wine, &c.] Meaning to exceſs, ſo as to be inebriated with it, and not know what he did: this wine might be brought with them from Sodom, with other proviſions for their refreſhment and ſupport; or it may be rather from Zoar, where they furniſhed themſelves with a quantity for their ſupport in the mountain they betook themſelves unto: and we will lie with him, that we may preſerve the ſeed of our father; have children by him, and propagate and preſerve the human ſpecies; this they might think lawful, ſuch inceſtuous copulations being uſual among their neighbours the Arabs, as appears from Strabo [s] and other writers, and eſpecially when there ſeemed to them to be a neceſſity for it; and it may be this did not ariſe from a ſpirit of uncleanneſs, or a brutiſh luſt prevailing in them, having been religiouſly educated, and having preſerved their chaſtity among ſuch an impure generation as the men of Sodom: wherefore this might rather ariſe, as biſhop Patrick and others have thought, from an eager deſire after the Meſſiah, they might hope would ſpring from them; their father being a deſcendant of Shem, a ſon of Abraham's elder brother, and now remarkably ſaved from Sodom, which they might conclude was for this purpoſe; and they knew of no way in which it could be brought about but in this they propoſed; and the rather this may be thought to be their view, as the above learned commentator obſerves, when we remark their former chaſte life in Sodom; their joining together in this contrivance, which, had it been a luſtful buſineſs, they would have been aſhamed to have communicated their thoughts of it to one another; and their impoſition of names on their children to perpetuate the memory of this fact, which they rather gloried in, than were aſhamed of: to which may be added, that the antient Jewiſh writers [t] interpret this of the Meſſiah; and they obſerve, "it is not ſaid a ſon, but ſeed, that "ſeed, which is he that comes from another place; "and what is this? this is the king Meſſiah:" and Ruth, the Moabiteſs, who was of the race of the eldeſt daughter of Lot, ſtands in the genealogy of our Lord: however, let the intention be ever ſo good, it will not juſtify an action ſo monſtrouſly vile.

℣. 33 And they made their father drink wine that night, &c.] They perſuaded him to drink liberally, urged him to it again, in order to make him drunk, and ſo complete their deſign; and Lot might be the more eaſily prevailed upon to drink freely, in order to remove his ſorrow, and refreſh his ſpirits under the loſs of his wife, and his daughters, if he had any married in Sodom, as ſome ſuppoſe, and his ſons-in-law, and of all his goods and ſubſtance; though this will not excuſe his drinking to exceſs, nor can ignorance of the ſtrength of wine be pleaded, ſince he muſt needs know it as well as his daughters, who, it is plain, did, and therefore plied him with it: and the firſt-born went in and lay with her father; went to his bed, and lay down by him, which ſhe would not have dared to have done, but that ſhe knew he was drunk and inſenſible: and he perceived not when ſhe lay down, nor when ſhe aroſe; never heard her come to bed nor get up, ſo dead drunk and faſt aſleep was he; but finding a woman in bed with him, lay with her, taking her to be his wife, forgetting, through the force of liquor, that ſhe was dead. There is an extraordinary prick on the Vau in Kumah, rendered ſhe aroſe, which the Jews ſay [u], is to ſhow that he knew her not when ſhe lay down, but when ſhe aroſe he knew her; and indeed it may be rendered, but in her riſing up.

℣. 34. And it came to paſs on the morrow, &c.] The day following the night, in which the above was tranſacted: that the firſt-born ſaid to the younger, behold, I lay yeſternight with my father; informed her, that what they had contrived ſucceeded according to their wiſh, and therefore for her encouragement to go on, propoſes to take the ſame method again: let us make him drink wine this night alſo, and go thou in and lie with him, that we may preſerve ſeed of our father; may have children by him, and ſo our family be kept up, from whence it may be hoped the Meſſiah will ſpring, ſee the note on ℣. 32.

℣. 35. And they made their father drink wine that night alſo, &c.] Until he was drunk; which is an aggravation of his ſin, that he ſhould be overtaken a ſecond time, and that ſo ſoon as the next night, when he ought to have been upon his guard, knowing how he had fallen into it the night before: and the younger aroſe and lay with him; aroſe from her own bed, and went to her father's, and lay down by him: and he perceived not when ſhe lay down, nor when ſhe aroſe; ſee the note on ℣. 33.

℣. 36. Thus were both the daughters of Lot with child by their father.] We learn from hence what the beſt of men are when left to themſelves; a good man, a righteous Lot, is guilty of crimes the moſt ſhocking; he expoſed the chaſtity of his daughters to the men of Sodom, and now his daughters attacked him, and ſucceeded, being both with child by him; and this brought about by exceſſive drinking, a ſin which often leads on to the fouleſt crimes, and therefore to be carefully avoided; theſe ſins Lot fell into when as it were alone, on a mountain, in a cave, none but his family with him, and theſe only his two daughters; he that had ſtood his ground in the midſt of Sodom, notwithſtanding all the exceſſes of that place, the impurities in it, and the temptations that every day offered, now falls when ſeemingly out of the way of all: theſe ſins and failings of good men are recorded for our admonition and caution, that we may ſhun all appearance of evil, and be careful leſt we fall, and neither be preſumptuous nor ſelf-confident, ſee 1 Cor. x. 12.

℣. 37. And the firſt-born bare a ſon, and called his name Moab, &c.] As if it was Me-ab from the father, as Aben Ezra and ſo Joſephus, that is, which ſhe had by her father; and ſhe was ſo far from being aſhamed that it might be known in time to come, come, she gave him this name. Hillerus [w] makes it to be a compound of אב and מובא and to signify going into, or lying with a father, which still more notoriously points to her own action. Drusius has another derivation of the word, at least proposes it, and renders it aqua patris; mo in the Egyptian language signifying water, which is sometimes used for seed, see Is. xlviii. 1: the same is the father of the Moabites; a people that lived on the borders of the land of Canaan, often troublesome to the Israelites, and frequently spoken of in the Old Testament.

ẏ. 38. And the younger, she also bare a son, and called his name Ben-ammi, &c.] That is, the son of my people, being the son of her father; which though it does not so manifestly appear in this name, as in the other, yet there is some trace of it; and she would have it be known by this, that he was not the son of a stranger, but of a relation of her own: some attribute this to her being more modest than her elder sister; but it looks as if neither of them were sensible of any crime they had been guilty of, but rather thought it a commendable action, at least that it was excusable: the same is the father of the children of Ammon unto this day; a people that lived near their brethren the Moabites, and were both enemies to the people of God; they quickly falling into idolatry, and whose names we often meet with in the sacred writings; and of these two sons Josephus says [x], the one begat the Moabites, being still a great nation, and the other the Ammonites, and both inhabit Cœlesyria; they are both called the children of Lot, Ps. lxxxiii. 8. After this we hear no more of Lot in this history; and it is remarkable, that there never was, as we know of, any town or city that had in it any trace of his name; but we are not from hence to conclude, that he was a wicked man, whose memory perished with him; for mention is made of him in the New Testament, where he has a very honourable character, and is called just Lot, 2 Pet. ii. 7.

CHAP. XX.

THIS chapter relates the removal of Abraham to Gerar, ẏ. 1. the king of Gerar's taking to him Sarah, whom Abraham had called his sister, ẏ. 2. who is rebuked of God for it in a dream, ẏ. 3. for which he makes an apology that is admitted, only he is ordered to restore to Abraham his wife, ẏ. 4—7. and accordingly early in the morning he called his servants, and acquainted them with what had happened, ẏ. 8. and then sent for Abraham, and expressed his resentment at his usage of him, ẏ. 9. which Abraham defended as well as he could, ẏ. 10—13. the issue of all which was, great kindness was shewn to Abraham, and his wife restored to him, though with a reproof to her from the king, ẏ. 14, 15, 16. upon which Abraham prayed for the healing of Abimelech and his family, in which he was heard and answered, ẏ. 17, 18.

ẏ. 1. And Abraham journeyed from thence towards the south-country, &c.] He returned from the plains or oaks of Mamre, where he had lived 15 or 20 years, into the more southern parts of the land of Canaan: the reason of this remove is not certain; some think, because he could not bear the stench of the sulphurous lake, the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah were become; and others, because of the scandal of Lot's incest with his daughters, which prejudiced the idolatrous people in those parts more against the true religion; neither of which are likely, by reason of the distance; but the better reason seems to be, that it was so ordered in providence that he should remove from place to place, that it might appear that he was but a sojourner in the land: and dwelt between Cadesh and Shur; two wildernesses, as Jerom says [y], one of which joined to Egypt, to which the people of Israel went when they passed over the Red Sea, and the other, Cadesh, reached to the desert of the Saracens. Onkelos and Jonathan paraphrase the words between Rekam and Chagra, or Hagra, the same place where the angel of the Lord met with Hagar at the well, ch. xvi. 7, 14. see the note there: and sojourned in Gerar; or Gerara, as Jerom [z] calls it, "from whence he says the Geraritic country in his time "beyond Daroma, or the south, had its name, "and was 25 miles distance from Eleutheropolis to "the south, and was formerly the southern bor-"der of the Canaanites, and the metropolis of Pa-"lestine." According to the Samaritan version, Gerar is the same with Ashkelon, which was afterwards, when aristocracy took place in this country, one of the five lordships of the Philistines; and so says Africanus [a]; and that Gerar was in the country of the Philistines, and Abimelech was king of them, is clear from ch. xxi. 32. and xxvi. 1. This place was about 6 miles from Mamre [b], from whence Abraham removed.

ẏ. 2. And Abraham said of Sarah his wife, she is my sister, &c.] This he gave out in all conversation he came into, and said it to every one that asked who she was, which was little better than a lie; it at least was an equivocation and deception, and not at all justifiable, and tended to expose his wife's chastity, and discovered a distrust of divine providence; the same infirmity he had given way to, and the same evil he had fallen into in Egypt, and therefore was the more inexcusable now; good men not only fall into sin, but have their relapses: and Abimelech king of Gerar sent and took Sarah; having heard or seen what a beautiful woman Sarah was, though ninety years of age, having never bore children; and understanding she was a single person, sent his servants to take her, and bring her to his house, in order to be his wife, which seems to be done with some kind of force; and it can hardly be thought that Abraham and Sarah would freely agree to it, at least it must be done with reluctance on their parts. Whether Abimelech was the first king of Palestine of this name, is not certain; if he was, which is not improbable, it became usual afterwards for the kings thereof to be so called, as Pharaoh was a common name to the kings of Egypt; it signifies father and king, as kings should be the fathers of their people.

ẏ. 3. But God came to Abimelech in a dream by night, &c.] Put a dream into his mind, by which he cautioned him against taking Sarah to be his wife; wife; ſo careful was the Lord that no wrong ſhould be done to ſuch a godly and virtuous perſon, to which ſhe was expoſed through the weakneſs of her huſband. Aben Ezra wrongly interprets this of an angel, when it was God himſelf: and ſaid unto him, behold, thou art but a dead man for the woman which thou haſt taken; that is, God would puniſh him with death, unleſs he reſtored the woman, whom he had taken, to her huſband; not for any uncleanneſs he had committed with her, but for taking her without her free and full conſent, and without enquiring more ſtrictly into her relation to Abraham, and connexion with him, and for his impure and unlawful deſires after her, if perſiſted in: for ſhe is a man's wife, or married to an huſband[c]; and therefore it was unlawful in him to take her to be his wife.

℣. 4. But Abimelech had not come near her, &c.] Sarah had been put into an apartment in his palace, and not yet admitted into his company, not at leaſt to his bed; he had not lain with her, which is the deſign of the expreſſion: the Septuagint verſion is, had not touched her, as in ℣. 6. which is another phraſe expreſſive of the ſame thing: and he ſaid, Lord, wilt thou ſlay alſo a righteous nation? meaning either his family, the greater part of which were not acceſſory to this affair; or rather his kingdom, as Aben Ezra, ſee ℣. 9. which though not a nation of righteous men, in a ſtrict ſenſe, ſee ℣. 11. yet with regard to this buſineſs of Sarah were no ways criminal: either God had threatened to deſtroy his people, as well as himſelf, if he did not return Sarah to her huſband, or committed iniquity with her; or he knew that this had been uſual for people to ſuffer for the crimes of their governors, and like a true father of his country ſhews an affectionate concern for their welfare in the firſt place; for this may be the ſenſe of the word alſo, on which an emphaſis is put; wilt thou not only ſlay me, but alſo a whole nation for my ſake, a nation free from all fault and blame in this matter? though ſome think he has reference to the deſtruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, a recent action, and freſh in his mind; as if he ſhould ſay, thou haſt juſtly deſtroyed a wicked people for their ſins, and wilt thou alſo deſtroy a nation that at leaſt, in compariſon of them, is a juſt and righteous one?

℣. 5. Said he not unto me, ſhe is my ſiſter? &c.] By this it appears, that Abimelech had a perſonal converſation with Abraham, and enquired of him about Sarah, who ſhe was, and what relation ſhe was to him, who told him that ſhe was his ſiſter; and for the truth of this he appeals to the omniſcient God, who knew that Abraham had told him this: and ſhe, even ſhe herſelf ſaid, he is my brother; when Sarah was aſked what relation ſhe ſtood in to Abraham, and he to her, ſhe declared he was her brother; ſo that Abimelech had reaſon to conclude from what both of them had ſaid, that this was the truth of the matter, and eſpecially from what Sarah ſaid, who he thought might be depended on, and would ſpeak out the whole truth on ſuch an occaſion: in the integrity of my heart, and innocency of my hands have I done this; hereby declaring, that his deſign was not to defile the woman, and to gratify his luſt, but to take her to be his wife; and this he thought to be no evil, tho' he had a wife, ℣. 17. polygamy not being reckoned a ſin in thoſe times; and that he had uſed no violence in taking her, they both ſeemingly agreeing to it.

℣. 6. And God ſaid unto him in a dream, &c.] The ſame dream continued: yea, or alſo I know that thou didſt this in the integrity of thy heart; not only thou knoweſt, but I, who know all things, know and acknowledge that this was ſo done by thee. Abimelech's plea is admitted, and a very great teſtimony borne to his integrity in this matter; and throughout the whole account he appears to be a man of great honour and uprightneſs, eſpecially in this affair, if not a good man: for I alſo with-held thee from ſinning againſt me; for had he committed adultery with her, it had been not only a ſin againſt her, and againſt her huſband, but againſt God, being contrary to his will revealed in the minds of men by the law and light of nature, before the law of Moſes was given: and indeed all ſin againſt the neighbour is ultimately againſt God, ſee Pſ. li. 4. and now from the commiſſion of this ſin God reſtrained Abimelech, either by ſome impulſe upon his mind not to take her to be his wife as yet, or by throwing ſome thing or other in the way of it, in his providence, or by inflicting ſome diſeaſe upon him, which rendered him incapable of it, ℣. 17. therefore ſuffered I thee not to touch her; that is, to have carnal knowledge of her, ſee 1 Cor. vii. 1. as there is nothing done but what is done by divine permiſſion, ſo many more evils would be committed than there are, were it not that men are reſtrained from them by the power and providence of God, not ſuffering them to do them; and in particular this ſin was prevented, that it might not in any reſpect be a doubtful point whether Iſaac, whom Sarah had now conceived, was a legitimate ſon of Abraham; and theſe expreſſions of Abimelech not coming near her, ℣. 4. and not touching her as here, are uſed for that purpoſe.

℣. 7. Now therefore reſtore the man his wife, &c.] Which will be a full proof and evidence to all of the integrity of thy heart, and the innocence of thine hands, which thou pleadeſt, and which I own: for he is a prophet; familiar with God, dear unto him, a friend of his, to whom he communicates his ſecrets; is able to foretel things to come, as well as to interpret the mind of God, and inſtruct in the knowledge of divine things, all which agrees with Abraham's character; and he is the firſt man that is dignified in ſcripture with the title of a prophet; ſo he is called in Tobit, iv. 13. Jarchi thinks this is obſerved to encourage Abimelech to return his wife to him, becauſe being a prophet he knew he had not touched her, and therefore would receive her more readily, and entertain no ill opinion of her; but rather it is mentioned for the reaſon following: and he ſhall pray for thee, and thou ſhalt live; it being one part of the buſineſs of a prophet to pray for others, and make interceſſion for them, eſpecially in any diſtreſs or trouble, ſee Jer. xxvii. 18. Prophets were praying perſons, had uſually a great gift in prayer, and great power with God, and prevailed with him for the good of others; and ſuch an one was Abraham; and it is here intimated, that upon the reſtoration of his wife to him, as he was familiar with God, and had an intereſt with him, he would make uſe of it, and pray for Abimelech, that whatſoever offence he had been guilty of to God or men, it might be forgiven, and that he might be healed of the diſeaſe with which he was ſmitten, and ſo recover of it, and live in health and happineſs: and if thou reſtore her not, know thou, that thou ſhalt ſurely die, thou, and all that are thine; if he proceeded ceeded to take her to be his wife, and defile her, he is ſtrongly aſſured that he ſhould die, death being the puniſhment for adultery before the law of Moſes, ſee Gen. xxxviii. 24. and not only he, but all his family, eſpecially ſuch who had been, or would be acceſſory to this affair, and even all who might be juſtly puniſhed of God for other ſins they had committed; and Abimelech being puniſhed, both in his own perſon, and in his ſervants and ſubjects, the greater his puniſhment was, the greater abhorrence and deteſtation was ſhown to the ſin he would be guilty of, to deter him from which this threatening is given out.

v. 8. Therefore Abimelech roſe early in the morning, &c.] Awaking upon the dream, could ſleep no more, his thoughts running upon what had been ſaid to him by the Lord in it: wherefore as ſoon as it was light he roſe from his bed, and called all his ſervants; his houſhold-ſervants, and particularly his courtiers and counſellors, who had adviſed him to take Sarah for his wife, and had been aſſiſting in it: and told all thoſe things in their ears; how that God appeared to him in a dream, and told him that Sarah, whom he had taken into his houſe, was another man's wife, and that if he did not immediately return her to her huſband, he would die, and all that belonged to him: and the men were ſore afraid; leſt they ſhould be ſtruck with death; and perhaps they might call to mind the burning of Sodom and Gomorrah for their ſins, they had lately heard of, and might fear that ſome ſuch calamity would befal them.

v. 9. Then Abimelech called Abraham, &c.] Who might be in the king's palace, being taken into it, and careſſed by the king for the ſake of Sarah: and ſaid unto him; not in a paſſion, as might have been expected, but in a mild and gentle manner, yet with great ſtrength of reaſoning, and making very juſt expoſtulations with him: what haſt thou done unto us? what evil to him, his family, and his ſubjects? this was very probably ſaid in the preſence of his ſervants he had called, and therefore the plural number is uſed: and what have I offended thee, that thou haſt brought on me, and on my kingdom a great ſin? the ſin of adultery, he had been in danger of committing, which by the light of nature was known and acknowledged to be a great ſin, and therefore was avoided by heathens, and prohibited and puniſhed by them; or elſe a great puniſhment [d], as death to him, and all his ſubjects: and now Abimelech expoſtulates with him, and deſires to know what he had done to incur his diſpleaſure, that he ſhould take ſuch a method as this to avenge himſelf of him; he plainly intimates that he was not conſcious to himſelf that he had done any thing to offend him; he had ſuffered him to come into his kingdom, and ſojourn in it, and uſed him well, and in no inſtance, as he knew of, had done any thing to affront him: thou haſt done deeds unto me that ought not to be done; in ſaying Sarah was his ſiſter, and perſuading her to ſay the ſame, and ſo virtually diſowning his marriage with her, equivocating in this affair, and diſſembling truth, and thereby expoſing the chaſtity of his wife, and the king to the commiſſion of ſin with her; things that ought not to be done by any man, and much leſs by a man profeſſing religion and godlineſs.

v. 10. And Abimelech ſaid unto Abraham, &c.] Continuing his diſcourſe with him: what ſaweſt thou, that thou haſt done this thing? he deſires to know what he had obſerved, either in him or his people, that gave him any reaſon to conclude that they were a luſtful people, and would ſtick at nothing to gratify their luſts, which put him upon taking ſuch a method to ſecure his life, leſt they ſhould kill him for his wife's ſake.

v. 11. And Abraham ſaid, &c.] In defence of himſelf, as well as he could: becauſe I thought; within himſelf, concluding from the general depravity of the Canaanites, that this was the caſe of the inhabitants of Gerar: ſurely the fear of God is not in this place; this is a certain truth, which he thought might be depended upon, and taken for granted, ſince ſo it was every where: or only [e], as the word uſed ſignifies; this was the only thing he had to plead, that he verily thought with himſelf that there was no true religion and godlineſs in Gerar; that the inhabitants of it were without any fear of God before their eyes, or in their hearts; and he knew, where this is the caſe, there is nothing to reſtrain from the commiſſion of the groſſeſt ſins: and they will ſlay me for my wife's ſake; that they might marry her, ſee ch. xii. 12.

v. 12. And yet indeed ſhe is my ſiſter, &c.] In the ſame ſenſe as Lot was his brother; for ſhe was ſiſter to Lot, and both were the children of Haran, the brother of Abraham: ſhe is the daughter of my father, but not the daughter of my mother; ſhe was the daughter of his father, being his grand-daughter, grand-children are ſometimes called children, but not the daughter or grand-daughter of Abraham's mother; Terah having had two wives, by the one he had Haran, the father of Sarah, and by the other Abraham. According to the Arabic writers [f], Abraham and Sarah were the immediate children of Terah, but by two mothers: "the mother of Abraham, they ſay, died, "whoſe name was Juna, and Terah married another wife, whoſe name was Lahazib, ſome ſay "Tahuitha, who bore him Sarah, afterwards married to Abraham; hence Abraham ſaid ſhe is my "ſiſter on my father's ſide, but not on my mother's ſide:" and ſhe became my wife; as in thoſe times it was judged lawful, and ſo it has been accounted lawful in many nations to marry ſiſters on the father's ſide, when thoſe on the mother's were prohibited [g].

v. 13. And it came to paſs, when God cauſed me to wander from my father's houſe, &c.] In Ur of the Chaldees, from whence God called him to go forth; which laid him under an obligation to depart from thence, and move from place to place, and go he knew not where, as in Heb. xi. 8. or the Gods, as it is in the plural number, and ſo the verb in conſtruction with it; not the Idol-gods, the Gods of the Gentiles, as the Targum of Jonathan, who interprets the words thus, "and it was when the "worſhippers of idols ſought to cauſe men to err, "and I went from my father's houſe;" but the true God, as Jarchi, Aben Ezra and Ben Melech acknowledge, and is by many chriſtian interpreters underſtood of the three perſons in the Godhead: that I ſaid unto her, this is thy kindneſs which thou ſhalt ſhew unto me; this I ſhall take as a favour done me, as an inſtance of tender affection unto me: at every place whither we ſhall come, ſay of me; or for the ſake of me, as Aben Ezra and Kimchi, in order to ſave me from the hands of wicked men, whom he feared would ſlay him for her ſake: he is my brother; and ſo he hoped inſtead of being ill uſed, uſed, he ſhould meet with favour and friendſhip on her account, being thus nearly related to her: this he obſerves to Abimelech, to ſhew that this was an old agreement, near 30 years ago, when they firſt ſet out on their travels, and was no new device and ſcheme which they purſued on account of him and his people in particular; but what they had formerly agreed upon ſhould be ſaid in all places wherever they came, and therefore there was no intention to affront Abimelech; only it ſuppoſed they might come into places where wicked men dwelt.

℣. 14. And Abimelech took ſheep, and oxen, and men-ſervants, and women-ſervants, and gave them unto Abraham, &c.] In a good meaſure ſatisfied with what Abraham had ſaid to excuſe himſelf; and theſe gifts he gave unto him, that he might, as Jarchi obſerves, pray and intercede for him, that he and his family might be healed, having underſtood by the divine oracle that he was a prophet, and if he prayed for him he would be reſtored to health: and theſe were not given to bribe him to give his conſent that Sarah might be continued with him, ſince it follows, and reſtored him Sarah his wife; untouched by him, as he was directed by God to do.

℣. 15. And Abimelech ſaid, behold, my whole land is before thee, &c.] Inſtead of bidding him be gone, and ſending him away in haſte out of his country, as the king of Egypt did in a like caſe, he ſolicits his ſtay in it; and to encourage him to it, makes an offer of his whole kingdom to him, to chuſe which part of it he would to dwell in: dwell where it pleaſeth thee; if there was any one part of it better than another, or more convenient for him, his family and his flocks, he was welcome to it.

℣. 16. And unto Sarah he ſaid, behold, I have given thy brother a thouſand pieces of ſilver, &c.] Or ſhekels of ſilver, as the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem, which if two ſhillings and ſixpence of our money, amount to 125 pounds; though perhaps little pieces of ſilver, current in this country, may be meant, that were not worth ſo much. Some think that the ſheep, oxen, &c. Abimelech had given to Abraham, were worth ſo many pieces of ſilver: but it rather ſeems that he gave theſe over and above them, and chiefly for Sarah's uſe, as will be obſerved hereafter; ſince the words are directed to her, and in which there is a ſharp cutting expreſſion, calling Abraham her brother, and not her huſband, thereby putting her in mind and upbraiding her with her equivocation and diſſimulation: behold, he is to thee a covering of the eyes, unto all that are with thee; a protection of her perſon and chaſtity; ſo an huſband, in our language, is ſaid to be a cover to his wife, and ſhe under a cover: thus Abraham being now known to be the huſband of Sarah, would for the future be a covering to her, that no one ſhould look upon her, and deſire her, and take her to be his wife; and he would alſo be a protection to her maidens that were with her, the wives of his ſervants, that that theſe alſo might not be taken from him: but it ſeems beſt to refer this to the gift of the 1000 pieces of ſilver, and read the words, behold, this is to thee [g] a covering of the eyes; ſo the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem; for the words are a continued biting ſarcaſm on Sarah; as Abimelech twitts her, with calling Abraham her brother in the preceding clauſe, ſo in this he tells her that he had given him ſo much money to buy her a veil with, and to ſupply her with veils from time to time to cover her eyes, that no body might be tempted to luſt after her, and that it might be known ſhe was a married woman; for in theſe countries married women wore veils for diſtinction, ch. xxiv. 65. and ſo not to be had by another, nor would any be deceived by her; and not only was this money given to buy veils for her, but for her female ſervants alſo that were married, that they might be known to be another's property; though this latter phraſe unto, or with all that are with thee [i], may be underſtood, not of perſons, but of things, even of all the gifts which Abimelech had given her whilſt in his houſe; theſe he did not take back again, but continued them with her, either for the above uſe, or whatever ſhe pleaſed; and the following phraſe, and with all other, as we render it, making a conſiderable ſtop, ſhould, according to the accents, be read with what follows thus, and with all this was ſhe reproved [k]; ſo Aben Ezra; and ſo they are the words of Moſes, obſerving, that by and with all this that Abimelech had ſaid and done, Sarah was reproved for ſaying that Abraham was her brother: or the words may be rendered thus, and ſo before all ſhe was reproved [l]; before her huſband, and before Abimelech's courtiers, and perhaps before her own ſervants; tho' Ainſworth, and others, take them to be the words of Abimelech, and render them, and all that, or all this is that thou mayeſt be rebuked [m], or inſtructed; all that I have ſaid and done is for this end, that thou mayeſt be warned and be careful for the future to ſpeak out truth, without any equivocation, and not call Abraham thy brother, when he is thy huſband.

℣. 17. So Abraham prayed unto God, &c.] As the Lord had told Abimelech he would, ℣. 7. he might pray for the forgiveneſs of him and his wife, and might give thanks that Sarah had been reſtored to him; but chiefly it was on account of Abimelech and his family: and God healed Abimelech, and his wife, and his maid-ſervants; who by reaſon of ſome diſeaſe were rendered unfit for and uncapable of cohabitation with their huſbands, and they with them; but upon Abraham's prayer for them, who was heard, they were healed, and the diſorder removed; the Targum of Jonathan is, "his wife and concu-"bines:" and they bare children; cohabited and conceived, and bare and brought forth children, all which are comprehended in this expreſſion.

℣. 18. For the Lord had faſt cloſed up all the wombs of the houſe of Abimelech, &c.] With large tumors probably, ſo that they could not cohabit with their huſbands and conceive; nor could thoſe that had conceived, bring forth: and this diſorder they were ſmitten with, becauſe of Sarah Abraham's wife; who was taken into the houſe of Abimelech, in order to be his; to rebuke and puniſh for which, and to convince of the evil of it, and cauſe to abſtain from it, this diſorder was inflicted on them.

CHAP. XXI.

THIS chapter gives an account of the conception, birth, circumciſion, and weaning of Iſaac, ℣. 1—8. of the mocking of Iſhmael, and of the caſting out of him and his mother from Abraham's houſe, at the requeſt of Sarah, which though grievous to Abraham, he complied with at the direction of God, ℣. 9—13. of the proviſion Abraham made for their departure, and of the ſupply they met with in the wilderneſs from God, where Iſhmael was brought up, and where he married, ℣. 14—21. and of a covenant between Abraham and Abimelech, king of Gerar, ℣. 22—32. and of Abraham's planting a grove, and calling on the name of the Lord, ℣. 33. and the chapter is cloſed with this obſervation, that Abraham ſojourned in the land of the Philiſtines many days, ℣. 34.

℣. 1. And the Lord viſited Sarah as he had ſaid, &c.] To Abraham, ch. xvii. 16, 19, 21. and xviii. 10, 14. in a way of mercy and kindneſs, by fulfilling his promiſe, giving ſtrength to conceive and bear a child, ſee 1 Sam. ii. 21: and the Lord did unto Sarah as he had ſpoken; which intends the ſame thing in different words; and the repetition is made to cauſe attention to God's fulfilment of his promiſe, who is always faithful to his word, even in things very difficult and ſeemingly impoſſible, as in the preſent caſe: hence the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem paraphraſe it, God did a wonder or wonders for Sarah in cauſing her to conceive when ſhe was ſo old, and in ſuch circumſtances as ſhe was.

℣. 2. For Sarah conceived, &c.] This explains what is meant by the Lord's viſiting her, and doing to her according to his word, ſee Heb. xi. 11. and bare Abraham a ſon in his old age; which circumſtance is remarked, that the favour might appear the greater, and the more wonderful; or unto, or for his old age [n], for the comfort of him in his old age; who having lived ſo many years under the promiſe of a ſon, and in the expectation of one, even of the promiſed ſeed, from whom the Meſſiah ſhould ſpring, now has one, than which nothing could yield him greater conſolation: at the ſet time of which God had ſpoken to him, ch. xvii. 21. and xviii. 10—14. God was not only faithful in fulfilling his promiſe, but in keeping the exact time of it.

℣. 3. And Abraham called the name of his ſon that was born unto him, whom Sarah bare to him, Iſaac.] Which is the name he was directed to give him, ch. xvii. 19. and he remembers the order, and is obedient to it; the reaſon of which name, which ſignifies laughter, was on account of his laughing for joy at the promiſe made him, as well as there might be afterwards a further reaſon for it, from Sarah's laughing through diſtruſt; and it might preſignify the joy and laughter that would be expreſſed by others at his birth; and perhaps alſo that he would be the object of the laughter and deriſion of his brother; ſuch a number of events agreeing with his name.

℣. 4. And Abraham circumciſed his ſon Iſaac being 8 days old, as God had commanded him.] Gen. xvii. 12. and was the firſt that we read of that was circumciſed on that day, according to the divine precept, which Abraham ſtrictly obſerved; for though this was the ſon of the promiſe, and of his old age, for whom he had the moſt affectionate regard, yet he adminiſtred this bloody ordinance on him; nor did he defer it beyond the time, and was himſelf the operator, as it ſeems; all which ſhews his ſtrict regard, and ready and chearful obedience to the command of God.

℣. 5. And Abraham was 100 years old, when his ſon Iſaac was born unto him.] So that this was 25 years after his departure from Haran, and coming into the land of Canaan, for then he was 75 years of age, ch. xii. 4. and this exactly agrees with the account of Demetrius, as related by Polyhiſtor an heathen writer [o], who makes Iſaac to be born juſt 25 years from Abraham's coming into the land of Canaan, and who muſt be now an 100 years old, being 99 at the time the Lord appeared unto him, and promiſed him a ſon at the ſet time the next year, ch. xvii. 1, 21. This is obſerved, both to ſhew the wonderful favour to Abraham, and the faithfulneſs of God in the exact performance of his promiſe: according to biſhop Uſher [p], Iſaac was born A. M. 2108, and before Chriſt 1896, and probably at Beerſheba, ſee ℣. 33, 34.

℣. 6. And Sarah ſaid, God hath made me to laugh, &c.] This ſhe ſaid on occaſion of the name of her ſon Iſaac, which name her huſband had given him by divine direction, and to which ſhe aſſented. This doubtleſs brought to her mind her former laughing, when ſhe firſt heard that ſhe ſhould have a ſon, which was in a way of diffidence and diſtruſt; but now God having given her a ſon, laid a foundation for laughter of another kind, for real, ſolid joy and thankfulneſs: ſo that all that hear will laugh with me; not laugh at her, and deride her, as Piſcator interprets it; but congratulate her, and rejoice with her on this occaſion, as on a like one the neighbours of Elizabeth did with her, Luke i. 58.

℣. 7. And ſhe ſaid, who would have ſaid unto Abraham, &c.] No one a year ago could ever have thought of ſuch a thing, much leſs have come and told Abraham that he ſhould have a child or children by Sarah; the thing was incredible, and next to impoſſible; none but God himſelf, or an angel from him, could have declared this, as none but he could bring it about, the thing is ſo marvellous and aſtoniſhing: that Sarah ſhould have given children ſuck? that ſhe who was 90 years of age ſhould bear a child, and ſuckle it, as ſhe did; and in doing which ſhe ſet an example to her daughters to do the like, ſince neither age nor grandeur, nor the buſineſs of her family, were any objection to this duty of nature; and her being able to do this, was a clear proof that this was truly a child of her own. The plural number may be put for the ſingular, as it often is, ſee Gen. xlvi. 45. or Sarah might think as ſhe had ſtrength given her to bear and ſuckle one child, ſhe might bear and ſuckle more; though the phraſe ſeems only to be expreſſive and deſcriptive of her as a nurſing-mother: for I have borne him a ſon in his old age; ſee the note on ℣. 2.

[n] לזקניו pro ſenectute ejus, Vatablus; ſenectuti ejus, Junius & Tremellius. [o] Apud Euſeb. Præpar. Evangel. l. 9. c. 21. p. 425. [p] Annales Vet. Teſt. p. 9.

℣. 8. And the child grew, and was weaned, &c.] It throve under the nurſing of its mother, and through the bleſſing of God upon it; and being healthy and robuſt, and capable of digeſting ſtronger food, and living upon it, it was weaned from the breaſt: at what age Iſaac was when weaned, is not certain, there being no fixed time for ſuch an affair, but it was at the diſcretion of parents, and as they liked it, and the caſe of their children required; and in thoſe times when men lived to a greater age than now, they might not be weaned ſo early, as we find their marrying and begetting children were, when they were more advanced in years. The Jewiſh writers are not agreed about this matter. Jarchi and Ben Melech ſay, that Iſaac was weaned 24 months after his birth: a chronologer of theirs ſays [q], it was in the 103d year of Abraham, that is, when Iſaac was 3 years old, which agrees with 2 Maccab. vii. 27. According to Jerom [r], it was the opinion of ſome of the Hebrews that he was five years old; and at this age biſhop Uſher [s] places the weaning of him; for to make him 10 or 12 years of age, as ſome of the Rabbins do [t], when this was done, is very unlikely. Philo the Jew [u] makes him to be ſeven years of age at this time: and Abraham made a great feaſt the ſame day that Iſaac was weaned; becauſe he had now eſcaped the dangers of infancy, and had gone through or got over thoſe diſorders infants are expoſed unto, and had his health confirmed; and there was great likelihood of his living and becoming a man, ſince now he could eat and digeſt more ſolid and ſubſtantial food; and this was great joy to Abraham, which he expreſſed by making a grand and ſumptuous entertainment for his family, and for his neighbours, whom he might invite upon this occaſion. Jarchi ſays, the great men of that age were at it, even Heber and Abimelech. The Jews very impertinently produce this paſſage, to ſhew the obligation they lie under to make a feaſt at the circumciſion of their infants [w]; for this was not at Iſaac's circumciſion, but at his weaning.

℣. 9. And Sarah ſaw the ſon of Hagar the Egyptian, &c.] That is, Iſhmael, who is not expreſſed by name, but deſcribed by being a ſon of Hagar, a ſervant of Sarah's, and an Egyptian woman; all which ſeems to be obſerved by way of ſlight, both to Hagar and her ſon: which ſhe had born unto Abraham; not unto Sarah, as ſhe propoſed to herſelf, when ſhe gave her maid to Abraham, ch. xvi. 2. This ſon of Abraham ſhe ſaw mocking; either at the entertainment made at the weaning of Iſaac; or rather at Iſaac himſelf, laughing at his name, and treating him with contempt as his younger brother, and boaſting that he was the firſt-born, and that the inheritance belonged to him; and threatening what he would do to him, ſhould he hereafter offer to diſpute it with him, under pretence of the promiſe of God that he ſhould be Abraham's heir, and at which promiſe alſo he may be ſuppoſed to mock: and that this contention was about the inheritance ſeems plain from the words of Sarah in the next verſe; and in it Iſhmael might not only riſe to high words, but come to blows, and beat his brother; for it is obſerved the word uſed ſometimes ſo ſignifies, 2 Sam. ii. 14—17. wherefore the apoſtle might truly call it a perſecution, Gal. iv. 29. and as even cruel mockings are, Heb. xi. 36. As for the various ſenſes the Jewiſh commentators put upon this, there does not ſeem to be any foundation for them; as that Iſhmael was committing idolatry, and endeavouring to draw his brother into it; or was talking in an indecent and laſcivious manner, in order to corrupt his mind; or that he was intending and attempting to take away his life, by ſhooting an arrow at him, and pretending it was but in jeſt and in play; ſee the note on Gal. iv. 29.

℣. 10. Wherefore ſhe ſaid unto Abraham, caſt out this bond-woman and her ſon, &c.] Hagar, Sarah's handmaid and bond-ſervant, and her ſon Iſhmael; by this it appears that Hagar was concerned in this affair, and ſet her ſon on to mock Iſaac, at leaſt ſhe encouraged him in it, buoying him up with his being the firſt-born, and having a right to the inheritance; wherefore Sarah ſaw plainly that there would be no peace nor comfort for her and her ſon, unleſs Hagar and her ſon were turned out of doors, for which ſhe moves Abraham; and this not merely in a paſſion, but by divine direction and influence, as is evident from God's approbation of it: for the ſon of this bond-woman ſhall not be heir with my ſon, even with Iſaac; which he would ſeem to be, if continued, and would think himſelf ſo, and there would be continual bickerings about it; wherefore to put it out of all doubt who was heir, ſhe deſires that he and his mother both might be caſt out of the houſe, which would be a clear determination of this matter. Sarah may ſeem to take upon her too much, to be ſo peremptory, as to declare who ſhould, and who ſhould not be heir, which more properly belonged to Abraham, whom ſhe called her lord; but what will ſufficiently free her from any charge of this kind, is the revelation of the divine will, and the promiſe of God that ſo it ſhould be; namely, that the covenant God had ſo often renewed with Abraham, ſhould be eſtabliſhed with Iſaac, and not with Iſhmael, ch. xvii. 19, 20, 21. Now what was the deſign of God in guiding Sarah to make ſuch a motion as this to Abraham, is taught us by the apoſtle Paul, who makes theſe two women to be types and figures of the two covenants, and their ſons of thoſe that are under them, ſee Gal. iv. 22, &c.

℣. 11. And the thing was very grievous in Abraham's ſight, &c.] The motion that Sarah made to turn out of his houſe Hagar and Iſhmael, was not agreeable to him, but the reverſe; it ſeemed an ill thing to him; it was greatly diſpleaſing to him, and he was unwilling to come into it: becauſe of his ſon; his ſon Iſhmael; not grieved and uneaſy for what he had done; not for committing idolatry, as the Targum of Jonathan ſuggeſts, or for mocking at Iſaac; but for what was propoſed to be done to him, the ejection of him from his houſe, becauſe of the great love he had for him, and the great concern he had for his education, and that he might enjoy the bleſſing promiſed him, he was loth to have him caſt out of his family: no concern is expreſſed for Hagar, though both by what God ſaid to Abraham, and by the proviſion he made for her, he had a regard unto her; but his chief concern was for his ſon, who perhaps had a greater ſhare in his natural affections than as yet Iſaac had; nor did he expreſs ſo much reluctance when he was bid to offer him up, as he did at this time, that being at the command of God, this at the inſtance of his wife, and which he

he ſuppoſed only proceeded from paſſion and reſentment: the Hebrew writers ſay [x], that of all the evils that came upon Abraham this was the hardeſt and moſt grievous in his ſight.

℣. 12. And God ſaid unto Abraham, &c.] Either by an articulate voice, or by an impulſe on his mind, ſuggeſting to him what he ſhould do, being no doubt in great perplexity how to conduct between his wife and his ſon, but God determines the caſe for him, and makes him eaſy: let it not be grievous in thy ſight becauſe of the lad, and becauſe of the bond-woman; that is, let not the motion diſpleaſe thee, which Sarah has made to turn out the bond-woman and her ſon; let not thine affection to the one, and to the other, hinder compliance with it; don't look upon it as an ill thing, or as an hard thing; it is but what is right and proper to be done, and leave the bond-woman and her ſon to me; I'll take care of them, be under no concern for them, and their welfare: in all that Sarah hath ſaid unto thee, hearken to her voice; the Targum of Jonathan adds, for ſhe is a propheteſs: and indeed in this affair ſhe ſpoke under a ſpirit of prophecy, according to the will of God; at leaſt what ſhe ſaid became a divine oracle, and is called the ſcripture, Gal. iv. 30. for the word all here muſt be reſtrained to what ſhe had ſaid concerning Hagar and Iſhmael, and their ejection, and not to be extended to every thing ſhe had ſaid, or ſhould ſay to Abraham, to which he was always to be attentive: whereas, on the other hand, it became her, as a wife, to hearken and be obedient to the voice of her huſband: but in this particular Abraham is bid to liſten to her, and do accordingly, for the following reaſon, for in Iſaac ſhall thy ſeed be called; he, and thoſe that deſcended from him, ſhould be called and reckoned the ſeed of Abraham more eſpecially; and Abraham's ſeed in his line ſhould inherit the land of Canaan, given to him and his ſeed for an inheritance: and this is a good reaſon why the bond-woman and her ſon ſhould be caſt out, that they or their offſpring might not inherit the land with Iſaac, or his deſcendants; and particularly from Abraham in his line, and not in the line of Iſhmael, ſhould the Meſſiah ſpring, that ſeed in whom all the nations of the earth ſhould be bleſſed; and therefore a ſeparation was neceſſary, that this might abundantly appear.

℣. 13. And alſo of the ſon of the bond-woman will I make a nation, &c.] A great nation, as is promiſed, ch. xvii. 20. and ſuch the Iſhmaelites and Saracens have been, and the Turks now are, the deſcendants of Iſhmael. The Targum of Jonathan paraphraſes it, a people of thieves, or a thieving people; as were the Saracens, and who are thought to have that name from the Arabic word ſarac [y], to thieve; though they would have it derived from Sarah: but it is not agreeable to the promiſe of God to Abraham, that when for his comfort he is told that his ſon Iſhmael and his deſcendants ſhould become a great nation, that they ſhould be deſcribed as a company of thieves and robbers; and eſpecially when the reaſon of the promiſe is given, becauſe he is thy ſeed; or thy ſon; here the word ſeed is again uſed of a ſingle individual; ſee Gen. iv. 25. Gal. iii. 16.

℣. 14. And Abraham roſe up early in the morning, &c.] It was in the night the Lord ſpoke to him, and bid him hearken to the voice of Sarah; and, as ſoon as it was morning, he aroſe, and was not diſobedient to the heavenly viſion; for, though the thing he was directed to was diſagreeable to fleſh and blood, and contrary to his natural affection, yet, it being the will of God, he readily complied with it: and took bread and a bottle of water; a loaf of bread very probably, and a leathern or wooden bottle of water, as Aben Ezra ſuppoſes it to be; for there is no need to ſay that theſe are put for all neceſſaries, and a liberal proviſion that might be made by Abraham; but it is to be taken ſtrictly, according to the letter and hiſtory, as a matter of fact, ſince it could be no more than Hagar could carry, and did carry upon her ſhoulder: and, tho' Abraham could have ſent cattle laden with proviſions, and ſervants to attend them, yet he did not, which his natural affection and liberal diſpoſition might dictate to him; but, as he was to hearken in this affair to whatſoever Sarah ſaid, and act accordingly, perhaps this was all ſhe would grant; or it might be ſo ordered by the providence of God, as a chaſtiſement for their ill behaviour, and that they might know the difference between being in Abraham's houſe and out of it; and that there might be an opportunity given to ſhew favour to them for Abraham's ſake, who might probably direct them to ſome place where to go; and, till they came there, this might be a ſufficient ſupply, when he gave them reaſon to expect more from him; but they got into the wilderneſs, wandered about and loſt their way, and ſo became deſtitute of proviſions; and this may be an emblem of the low, mean, and ſtarving condition ſuch are in who are under the law, and ſeek for happineſs by the works of it: and gave it unto Hagar, putting it on her ſhoulder; that is, the bread and the water, which might be put in one parcel or bundle, or in a baſket, and ſo laid and carried on her ſhoulder: the Targum of Jonathan adds, "and bound it to "her loins, to ſhew that ſhe was an handmaid:" and the child; not that the child was on her ſhoulder, which is quite improbable; for, ſince he was 13 years of age when he was circumciſed, he muſt be 14 when Iſaac was born; and if Iſaac was 2 years old when weaned, Iſhmael muſt be 16; and if he was 3 years of age, he muſt be 17; and if 5 years, he muſt be 19: ſome of the Jewiſh writers ſay [z], he was 27 years of age when he went out of his father's houſe; but they ſeem to come neareſt the truth that make this event to be when he was at the age of 17 [a], and when he muſt be too big to be carried on his mother's ſhoulder: but the ſenſe is, that Abraham, when he put the proviſion on her ſhoulder, gave Iſhmael to her, delivered him into her hand, to be taken care of by her; and very probably ſhe led him in her hand: and ſent her away; out of his houſe to ſome place aſſigned for her; the Targum of Jonathan adds, with a bill of divorce, diſmiſſing her not only from his houſe, but as his wife; and ſo the Jewiſh writers [b] generally underſtand it: but there is no reaſon to believe there was any ſuch cuſtom before the law of Moſes: nay, they go farther, and ſay, that he diſmiſſed her from himſelf, and from Iſaac his ſon, and from this world, and from the world to come: and ſhe departed, and wandered in the wilderneſs of Beer-ſheba; or, as the Targum of Jonathan, in the wilderneſs which was near to Beer-ſheba; the place where it is probable Abraham now lived, and and where Isaac was born, and the above affair was transacted, which was afterwards called by this name; for this is said by way of anticipation, see ℣. 31. Beer-sheba is said [c] to be 12 miles from Gerar, and 20 miles from Hebron, to the south [d].

℣. 15. And the water was spent in the bottle, &c.] It was all drank up by them, being thirsty, having wandered about some time in a wilderness, where they could not repleniſh their bottle: the Jewish writers say [e], that when Hagar came into the wilderness, she began to wander after the idols of the house of Pharaoh her father, and immediately the water ceased from the bottle, or was drank up by Ishmael, being seized with a burning fever: and she cast the child under one of the shrubs; not from off her shoulder, but out of her hand or bosom; being faint through thirst, he was not able to walk, and she, being weary in dragging him along in her hand, perhaps sat down and held him in her lap, and laid him in her bosom; but, imagining he was near his end, she laid him under one of the shrubs in the wilderness, to screen him from the scorching sun, and there left him; the Greek version is, under one of the fir-trees, and so says Josephus [f]: some Jewish writers [g] call them juniper-trees; and some make this to be Ishmael's own act, and say, that, being fatigued with thirst, he went and threw himself under the nettles of the wilderness [h], see Job xxx. 7.

℣. 16. And she went and sat her down over-against him, a good way off, &c.] Not being able to bear the sight of her child in his agonies, and as she apprehended ready to expire, she went from the place where she had laid him, and sat down under one of the shrubs or trees to shade herself, right over-against that where her child was, though at some distance, which is next expressed: as it were a bow-shot; about as far off from him as an arrow can be shot, or is usually shot out of a bow; according to the Jews this was about half a mile, for they say [i] two bow-shots make a mile; here she sat waiting what would be the issue, whether life or death, which last she expected: for she said, let me not see the death of the child; she could not bear to hear his dying groans, and see him in his dying agonies: and she sat over against him, and lift up her voice and wept; on account of her desolate and forlorn condition, being in a wilderness, where she could get no water, and her child, as she thought, dying with thirst: the Septuagint version is, and the child cried and wept; and certain it is, from the following verse, that the child did lift up its voice and cry, but that is not expressed in the text; it is quite clear in the original that it was Hagar and not her son that is said to weep, since the verb is feminine.

℣. 17. And God heard the voice of the lad, &c.] By which it appears that he cried also; but whether it was in prayer to God, or through the distress and misery he was in, is not certain; and, be it which it will, his cries came up into the ears of the Lord, and he had compassion on him, and supplied his wants, and delivered him out of his miserable condition: and the angel of God called to Hagar out of heaven; not a created angel, but the increated one, the Son of God, the angel of the covenant, who appeared in the visible heavens, and called to Hagar from thence with an articulate voice, and so loud that she could hear him: and said unto her, what aileth thee, Hagar? or, what has befallen thee? what is the matter with thee? why criest, why weepest thou? this he said, not as being ignorant of her case, but in order to relieve and comfort her: fear not; distrust not the power and providence of God in taking care of thee and thy son; do not be afraid of the death of the child. for God hath heard the voice of the lad where he is; though in a wilderness, and under one of the shrubs in it: God is every where, and he can hear the cries of men be they where they will, or in ever so desolate a condition: by this Hagar would know that her son was alive, that he had been crying, and God had heard his cry; he that regards the prayer of the destitute, or of shrubs, Ps. cii. 17. heard the cry of Ishmael under a shrub.

℣. 18. Arise, lift up the lad, &c.] She had set herself down at some distance, and now she is bid to rise up and go to the place where she had left her son, and raise him up from the ground, on which he lay along: and hold him in thine hand; or take hold on him with thine hand, and hold him up with it, he being so weak that he could not sit up without being supported: for I will make him a great nation; which is a renewal of a promise before made both to her and to Abraham, ch. xvi. 10. and xvii. 20. and xxi. 13. and by this Hagar is assured that he would recover and live, and become a man and the father of children, who in time would become a great nation; see the notes on the places above referred to: this shews that the angel of God here speaking is God himself, or a divine person, since none but he could make him a great nation.

℣. 19. And God opened her eyes, and she saw a well of water, &c.] Which she saw not before; not that she was really blind and had her eyes opened, or her sight restored, but they might be holden or restrained by the providence of God, that she should not see it before; or, through inattention and distraction of mind, might not observe it; or her eyes might be swelled with weeping and crying, that she saw it not; though it is not improbable that this well was not in being before, but was immediately produced by the power of God, who when he pleases can open fountains in the midst of the vallies, and make the wilderness a pool of water: the Jewish writers [k] say, it was created between the two evenings, that is, on the evening of the seventh day of the creation. Happy are those whose eyes are opened by the spirit and grace of God, to see the well of living water, the fountain and fulness of grace that is in Christ, where thirsty souls may come and drink and take their fill. And she went and filled the bottle with water, and gave the lad to drink; with which he was refreshed and recovered from his fainting, and was restored to health again.

℣. 20. And God was with the lad, &c.] To confirm his health, to provide for him the necessaries of life, to protect him from danger in the wilderness where he was, and to prosper and succeed him in temporal things; all which is owing to the providential goodness of God: and he grew; increased in bodily stature, and arrived to manhood; or, he became great, in riches and in substance, as Ben Melech interprets it: and dwelt in the wilderness; of Beer-sheba, where he now was, or of Paran after mentioned, a fit place for a wild man to dwell in, as it was said he should be; and by this means the oracle was fulfilled, ch. xvi. 12: and became an archer; skilful in the use of the bow and arrow, both for hunting and slaying of wild beasts, on on whoſe fleſh he lived, and for fighting with men, againſt whom his hand would be: the Jewiſh writers [l] ſay, he was born with a bow, and brought up with one, and that he ſhot an arrow at his brother Iſaac, with an intention to kill him, whilſt he was in Abraham's houſe; but it does not appear that he had any knowledge or uſe of the bow until he was in the wilderneſs and was grown up, by which he lived and defended himſelf; and ſo his poſterity the Kedarenes, who ſprung from his ſon Kedar, were famous for archery, Iſ. xxi. 17. and the Ituræans, from Jetur, another of his ſons, were remarkable for their bows, of which Virgil [m] ſpeaks; and ſo the Arabians that live in the deſarts and round about them, called Nabathees, from Nabaioth, another ſon of Iſhmael, are now extraordinary markſmen for bows and arrows, and to fling darts which are made of cane [n]: the Saracens got their living not by the plough, but chiefly by the bow, and were all of them warriors, and lived upon wild fleſh, and as rapacious as kites [o]; and now the troops of the governor of Mecca, whereabout Iſhmael by the Arabs is ſuppoſed to live, which are only infantry, are called Al-Harrabah, that is, archers or dartmen [p].

℣. 21. And he dwelt in the wilderneſs of Paran, &c.] So called from Paran, a city in Arabia Petræa; it reached from the wilderneſs of Shur to mount Sinai: the account Adrichomius [q] gives of it is this; Paran or "Pharan is a wilderneſs, very "large, deſolate, unpaſſable, and without water, "containing, from mount Sinai to Cadeſh-barnea, "a journey of eleven days; its land can neither be "plowed nor ſown, is wholly dry, barren, and "uncultivated; uninhabitable to men, deſtitute of "villages, houſes, and cottages; where neither "men are ſeen, nor beaſts nor birds; yea, neither "trees nor any graſs, only rocks and high rough "ſtony mountains;—it is taken ſometimes for the "firſt part of the deſart of Arabia near mount Si-"nai, and ſometimes for the laſt part towards the "land of promiſe; ſometimes it is called the de-"ſart of Sin, and ſometimes the deſart of Sinai, "from the mount; but this name Pharan ſeems "to be the moſt general of the names of this very "long deſart:" this is the wilderneſs the Iſraelites wandered in 38 years; what this writer ſays of it muſt be underſtood only of ſome parts of it, otherwiſe Iſhmael could not have lived in it: and his mother took him a wife out of the land of Egypt; her own country, for ſhe was an Egyptian, ch. xvi. 1. and where they dwelt was not far from it: according to the Jewiſh writers, he had two wives; the firſt he divorced, and then married the Egyptian; his firſt wife they ſay [r] he ſent for, and took out of the plains of Moab, whoſe name was Aiſhah, and the other Phatimah; ſo the Targum of Jonathan here, "and he dwelt in the wilderneſs of Paran, "and took to wife Adiſha (or Aiſha) whom he di-"vorced, and then his mother took him Phatimah "to wife, out of the land of Egypt:" the names of Iſhmael's wives ſeem to be taken from the Arabic writers; for Aiſhah, or Ayeſha, was the name of a daughter of Abubeker, and one of the wives of Mahomet, and Phatimah the name of one of his daughters.

℣. 22. And it came to paſs at that time, &c.] Not when Iſhmael was grown up and married, but when Iſaac was weaned and Iſhmael was expelled: that Abimelech, and Phicol, the chief captain of his hoſt, ſpake unto Abraham; Abimelech was king of Gerar, the ſame that is ſpoken of in the preceding chapter, and Phicol was the general of his army; theſe two great perſonages came together and paid Abraham a viſit, and had ſome converſation with him, who was ſtill in Gerar, or however in ſome part of that country not far from it: ſaying, God is with thee in all that thou doſt; greatly proſpered him in the things of the world, for of them only could they make a judgment; they ſaw that he increaſed in worldly ſubſtance, and that his family was increaſed, and that he ſucceeded in every thing in which he engaged; and, being jealous of his growing greatneſs and power, were deſirous of ſecuring an intereſt in him and in his favour.

℣. 23. Now therefore ſwear unto me here by God, &c.] By the true and living God, by whom only an oath is to be taken, who was Abraham's God, and whom Abimelech ſeems to have known and to have been a worſhipper of; and therefore moves for an oath to be taken by him, which he knew would be ſacred and binding to Abraham, could he prevail upon him to ſwear: that thou wilt not deal falſly with me, nor with my ſon, nor with my ſon's ſon; perhaps he had heard that God had promiſed to give the whole land of Canaan to him and his poſterity, and among the reſt his kingdom, which was a part of it; and, ſeeing him grow great and powerful, he could not tell how ſoon it might be ere he was put in the poſſeſſion of it, whether in his own time, or his ſon's, or his grandſon's; and therefore deſires Abraham that he would ſwear to do no hurt to them whenever it ſhould be; but according to the kindneſs I have done unto thee, thou ſhalt do unto me, and to the land wherein thou haſt ſojourned; that, as he had given him full liberty to ſojourn in any part of his kingdom where he pleaſed, ſo, when the whole country ſhould come into his poſſeſſion, that he, or his ſon, or his grandſon, in whatſoever time it ſhould be, might quietly enjoy their own land, and all the inhabitants of it; at leaſt that they might not be driven out of it, but ſojourn in it as he had done.

℣. 24. And Abraham ſaid, I will ſwear.] Senſible of the many favours he had received from Abimelech in times paſt, and was ſtill indulged with, he very readily agreed to his propoſal; and the rather as he knew, by the viſion between the pieces, that it would be 400 years before his poſterity ſhould be put into the poſſeſſion of the land of Canaan; and therefore could take an oath that neither he, nor his ſon, nor his grandſon, ſhould be injured or diſpoſſeſſed.

℣. 25. And Abraham reproved Abimelech becauſe of a well of water, &c.] Before he ſwore and entered into covenant with him, he thought it adviſeable to inform him of an affair that had happened concerning a well of water, which in thoſe hot and dry countries, as the ſouthern parts of the land of Canaan were, was an affair of great importance; and to make complaint of the ill uſage of Abimelech's ſervants with reſpect to it, and to reaſon with him about it, that the thing might be adjuſted to mutual ſatisfaction, and ſo a firm baſis and foundation be laid for the continuance of friendſhip for the future; which was wiſely done before their their league and covenant was ratified: this it seems was a well which Abimelech's servants had violently taken away; that is, had by force taken the use of it to themselves for their cattle, and had deprived Abraham of it, though it was of his own digging; and perhaps there might be more than one, and the singular may be put for the plural; and so the Septuagint version has it, the wells; see Gen. xxvi. 15, 18.

℣. 26. And Abimelech said, I wot not who hath done this thing, &c.] He pleads ignorance; he knew nothing of it before, nor now which of his servants had done it; intimating, that if he could know who it was, he should severely reprimand him for it: neither didst thou tell me; signifying that he was to blame he did not complain of it sooner; and at least he had no reason to blame him, since he had never informed him before of it, and therefore could not expect to be redressed: neither yet heard of it but to-day; he had not heard of it from others, as the Targum of Jonathan rightly adds, by way of explanation, but that very day, and very probably not till the moment he had it from Abraham himself.

℣. 27. And Abraham took sheep and oxen, and gave them unto Abimelech, &c.] In gratitude for former favours he had received from him, in token of the friendship that subsisted between them, and for the confirmation of it; and to shew that he was fully satisfied with Abimelech's answer to his complaint, as well as willing to enter into covenant by sacrifice, when such creatures were divided, and the covenanters passed between the pieces, for so it follows: and both of them made a covenant; or, cut or struck a covenant; [t] cut the sacrifice in pieces and passed between them, in token of the compact and agreement they entered into with each other; signifying that whoever broke it, deserved to be cut in pieces as those creatures were.

℣. 28. And Abraham set seven ew-lambs of the flock by themselves.] Separate from the sheep and oxen he gave to Abimelech, and from those that were used in making the covenant.

℣. 29. And Abimelech said unto Abraham, &c.] Observing what he had done, and not knowing the design of it: what mean these seven ew-lambs which thou hast set by themselves? he understood what the sheep and oxen were for, that they were presents to him, at least some of them, and the rest were for the solemnizing and ratifying the covenant between them; but what these were for he could not devise.

℣. 30. And he said, &c.] That is, Abraham replied to Abimelech: for these seven ew-lambs shalt thou take of my hand; as a present from him, to be retained as his own: that they may be a witness to me that I have digged this well; these were to be a testimony that the well that had been taken away from Abraham, was one that he had dug, and was his property, and which Abimelech acknowledged by his acceptance of these seven lambs; and very probably Abraham received a note from the hand of Abimelech, owning his reception of the seven lambs, and his title to the well, which these were a witness of.

℣. 31. Wherefore he called that place Beer-sheba, &c.] Either Abraham or Abimelech, or both, called it so; or it may be read impersonally, therefore the place was called Beer-sheba [u], for two reasons, one implied, the other expressed; one was, because of the seven lambs before mentioned; so the Targum of Jonathan, "and therefore he called the "well the well of seven lambs;" Beer signifying a well, and sheba seven; the other, and which is more certain, being expressed, is as follows: because there they sware both of them; by the living God, to keep the covenant inviolably they had made between them.

℣. 32. Thus they made a covenant at Beer sheba, &c.] Which took its name from the oath annexed to the covenant there made; and which is observed, for the sake of what follows, to shew that when they finished their agreement, and the ceremony of it, then Abimelech rose up, and Phicol, the chief captain of his host; from the place where they had been conversing and covenanting with Abraham: and they returned into the land of the Philistines; from Beer sheba, which was in the extreme border of it, unto Gerar, which lay in the midst of it, and was the capital city in it; otherwise both places were in Palestine, or the land of the Philistines, a people that came out of Egypt originally and settled here: in Jerom's [w] time Beer-sheba was a large village 20 miles from Hebron to the south.

℣. 33. And Abraham planted a grove in Beer-sheba, &c.] The Jewish writers [x] are divided about the use of this grove, as Jarchi relates; one says it was for a paradise or orchard, to produce fruits out of it for travellers and for entertainment; another says it was for an inn to entertain strangers in; it rather was for a shade, to shelter from the sun in those sultry and hot countries; and perhaps for a religious use, and to be an oratory, as the following words seem to suggest: in the midst of it very likely Abraham built an altar and sacrificed to the Lord; hence might come the superstitious use of groves among the heathens; and, when they came to be abused to idolatrous purposes, they were forbidden by the law of Moses, which before were lawful. And, though the name of Abraham is not in the text, there is no doubt but he is designed, and was the planter of the grove, and which is expressed in the Septuagint version, as it is supplied by us. What sort of trees this grove consisted of, cannot with certainty be said, very probably the oak. R. Jonah [y] thinks it may be the tree which in Arabic they call ethel, and is a tree like that which is called tamarisk; in general it signifies any tree, and especially large trees [z]; and called there on the name of the Lord, the everlasting God; who is from everlasting to everlasting, or the God of the world [a]; the creator and upholder of it, and the preserver of all creatures in it; him Abraham invoked in this place, prayed unto him, and gave him thanks for all the mercies he had received from him.

℣. 34. And Abraham sojourned in the Philistines land many days.] Even many years, days being sometimes put for years; having entered into covenant with Abimelech, the king of the country, and settled a good correspondence with him, and having his friendship and good-will, which commanded respect from his subjects, Abraham sojourned very quietly and comfortably for many years, chiefly at Beer-sheba; the Jewish writers say [a] he sojourned here 26 years.

CHAP. XXII.

IN this chapter we have an account of an order given by God to Abraham to ſacrifice his ſon, ℣. 1, 2. of his readineſs to obey the will of God, he immediately preparing every thing for that purpoſe, ℣. 3—10. of the order being reverſed, and another ſacrifice ſubſtituted in its room, which occaſioned the giving a new name to the place where it was done, ℣. 11—14. upon which the promiſe of ſpecial bleſſings, of a numerous offspring, and of the ſeed in whom all nations ſhould be bleſſed, is renewed, ℣. 15—18. after this Abraham returns to Beer-ſheba, where he is informed of the increaſe of his brother Nahor's family, ℣. 19—24.

℣. 1. And it came to paſs after theſe things, &c.] Recorded in the preceding chapter: according to the Talmudiſts [b], the following affair was tranſacted, quickly after the weaning of Iſaac, when he was about 5 years old, which is the opinion of ſome, as Aben Ezra on ℣. 4. makes mention of; but that is an age, when it can hardly be thought, he ſhould be able to carry ſuch a load of wood as was ſufficient to make a fire to conſume a burnt-offering, ℣. 6. the age of 13, which he fixes upon, is more likely: Joſephus [c] ſays, that Iſaac was 25 years of age; and in this year of his age Biſhop Uſher [d] places this tranſaction, 20 years after the weaning of him, in A. M. 2133. and before Chriſt 1871; and near to this is the computation of a Jewiſh chronologer [e], who makes Iſaac to be at this time 26 years of age; but ſome make him much older: according to the Targum of Jonathan, he was at this time 36 years old; and it is the more generally received opinion of the Jewiſh writers [f], that he was 37, and with whom the Arabic writers [g] agree: ſo that this affair after related, was 32 years after the weaning of Iſaac and the expulſion of Iſhmael, ſuppoſing Iſaac to be then 5 years old. But, however this be, what came to paſs was after many promiſes of a ſon had been given him, and thoſe fulfilled; and after many bleſſings had been beſtowed upon him; and when he ſeemed to be well ſettled in the land of the Philiſtines, having entered into an alliance with the king of the country; his family in peace, and his ſon Iſaac, the ſon of the promiſe, grown up and a hopeful youth; the firſt appearance of which ſeemed to threaten the deſtruction of all his comforts, hopes, and expectations; and it was ſo, that God did tempt Abraham; not to ſin, as Satan does, for God tempts no man, nor can he be tempted in this ſenſe; and, had Abraham ſlain his ſon, it would have been no ſin in him, it being by the order of God, who is the Lord of life, and the ſovereign diſpoſer of it; but he tempted him, that is, he tried him, to prove him, and to know his faith in him, his fear of him, his love to him, and chearful obedience to his commands; not in order to know theſe himſelf, which he was not ignorant of, but to make them known to others, and that Abraham's faith might be ſtrengthened yet more and more, as in the iſſue it was. The Jewiſh writers [h] obſerve, that Abraham was tempted 10 times, and that this was the 10th and laſt temptation: and ſaid unto him, Abraham; calling him by his name he well knew, and by that name he had given him, to ſignify that he ſhould be the father of many nations; and yet was going to require of him to ſlay his only ſon, and offer him a ſacrifice to him: and he ſaid, behold, here I am; ſignifying that he heard his voice, and was ready to obey his commands, be they what they would.

℣. 2. And he ſaid, take now thy ſon, &c.] Directly, immediately; not thine ox, nor thy ſheep, nor thy ram, nor thy lamb, nor thy ſervant, but thy ſon: thine only ſon; for, though Iſhmael was his ſon, he was a ſon by his maid, by his concubine, and not by his wife; Iſaac was his only legitimate ſon, his only ſon by his lawful wife Sarah; the only ſon of the promiſe, his only ſon, in whom his ſeed was to be called: whom thou loveſt; on whom his affections were ſtrongly ſet, being a lovely youth, a dutiful ſon, and the child of promiſe; on whom all his hope and expectation of a numerous offspring promiſed him was built, and in whoſe line the Meſſiah was to ſpring from him; even Iſaac, which ſtands laſt in the original text: ſo that, if what had been ſaid was not ſufficient to deſcribe him, he is expreſſed by name, and the deſcription is gradually given, and the name of his ſon reſerved to the laſt, that he might be by degrees prepared to receive the ſhocking order; every word is emphatical and ſtriking, and enough to pierce any tender heart, and eſpecially when told what was to be done to him. The Jews [i] repreſent God and Abraham in a diſcourſe together upon this head: God ſaid, take now thy ſon, ſays Abraham, I have two ſons; take thine only ſon, ſays he, they are both only ſons to their mothers; take him whom thou loveſt, I love them both, replied he; then take Iſaac, thus ended the debate: and get thee into the land of Moriah; ſo called by anticipation, from a mountain of that name in it; the Septuagint render it, the high land, the hill-country of the land of Canaan, particularly that part of it where Jeruſalem afterwards ſtood, which was ſurrounded with hills: hence Aquila, another Greek interpreter, renders it, conſpicuous, as hills and mountains are, and a mountainous country is; Onkelos and Jonathan paraphraſe it, a land of worſhip, of religious worſhip; for in this country afterwards the people of God dwelt, the city of the living God was built, and in it the temple for divine ſervice, and that upon mount Moriah; and the Targum of Jeruſalem has it here, "to mount Moriah:" the Jews are divided about the reaſon of this name, ſome deriving it from a word [k] which ſignifies to teach, and think it is ſo called, becauſe doctrine or inſtruction came forth from thence to Iſrael; others from a word [l] which ſignifies fear, and ſo had its name becauſe fear or terror went from thence to the nations of the world [m]; but its derivation is from another word [n], which ſignifies to ſee, and which is confirmed by what is ſaid ℣. 14: and offer him there for a burnt-offering; this was dreadful work he was was called to, and must be exceeding trying to him as a man, and much more as a parent, and a professor of the true religion, to commit such an action; for by this order he was to cut the throat of his son, then to rip him up, and cut up his quarters, and then to lay every piece in order upon the wood, and then burn all to ashes; and this he was to do as a religious action, with deliberation, seriousness and devotion: upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of; for there were several of them adjoining to, or pretty near each other, which afterwards went by different names, as mount Sion, the hill Acra, mount Calvary, and mount Moriah, supposed to be the mount intended; and so Aben Ezra says it was the place where the temple was built, and where was the threshing-floor of Araunah, 2 Chron. iii. 1. Some learned men are of opinion, that the account which Sanchoniatho [n] gives of Cronus or Saturn sacrificing his own son, refers to this affair of Abraham's; his words are, "there "being a pestilence and a mortality, Cronus offered up his only son a whole burnt-offering to "his father Ouranus;" which Porphyry [o], from the same historian, thus relates, Cronus, whom the Phœnicians call Israel, (a grandson of Abraham's, thought, through mistake, to be put for Abraham himself) having an only son of a nymph of that country called Anobret (which according to Bochart [p] signifies one that conceived by grace, see Heb. xi. 11.) whom therefore they called Jeoud, (the same with Jehid here, an only one) so an only one is called by the Phœnicians, when the country was in great danger through war, this son, dressed in a royal habit, he offered up on an altar he had prepared. But others [q] are of a different sentiment, and cannot perceive any likeness between the two cases: however Isaac may well be thought, in the whole of this, to be a type of the Messiah, the true and proper Son of God, his only-begotten Son, the dear Son of his love, in whom all the promises are yea and amen; whom God out of his great love to men gave to be an offering and a sacrifice for their sins, and who suffered near Jerusalem, on mount Calvary, which very probably was a part of mount Moriah; and which, with other mountains joining in their root, though having different tops, went by that common name.

℣. 3. And Abraham rose up early in the morning, &c.] For it seems it was in a dream or vision of the night that the above orders were given; and as soon as it was morning he rose and prepared to execute them with all readiness, and without any hesitation and delay: and saddled his ass; for his journey, not to carry the wood and provision on, which probably were carried by his servants, but to ride on; and this Jarchi thinks he did himself, and the words in their precise sense suggest this; but it does not necessarily follow, because he may be said to do, what he ordered his servant to do; of the Jews fabulous account of this ass, see Zech. ix. 9: and took two of his young men with him; the Targum of Jonathan says, these were Ishmael his son, and Eliezer his servant; and so other Jewish writers [r], who tell us, that just at this time Ishmael came out of the wilderness to visit his father, and he took him with him; but for this there is no foundation: they were two of his servants, of whom he had many: and Isaac his son; who was the principal person to be taken, since he was to be the sacrifice: whether Abraham acquainted Sarah with the affair, and she consented to it, cannot be said with certainty; it is plain Isaac knew not what his father's design was; and though Sarah, and the whole family might know, by the preparation made, he was going to offer a sacrifice, yet they knew not where, nor what it was to be; and clave the wood for the burnt-offering; not knowing whether he should find wood sufficient on the mountain, where he was to go; and that he might not be unprovided when he came there, takes this method, which shows his full intention to obey the divine command: and rose up, and went unto the place of which God had told him; that is, he mounted his ass, and rode towards the place God had spoken of to him, and who had directed him which way to steer his course.

℣. 4. Then on the third day, &c.] After he had received the command from God, and from his setting out on his journey; for he had now travelled 2 days, mount Moriah being 40 miles from Beersheba, where Abraham dwelt [s]; or, as others compute it, 42: Hebron [t] was 20 miles from Beersheba, and Jerusalem, 22 from Hebron; and to travel 20 miles a day on foot, as Isaac and the servants seem to have done, there being but one ass among them, was far enough in those hot countries. Now all this while Abraham had time to reconsider things in his mind, and deliberate thoroughly what he was going about; and by proceeding in it, after he had such leisure to revolve things in his mind, it appears that he was satisfied it was not an illusion, but an oracle of God he was going to obey; and that he did not do this rashly and hastily, and that his faith and obedience were sufficiently tried, and found genuine. The Jews [u] take great notice of this third day, and compare the passage with Hos. vi. 2. and which they interpret of the third day of the resurrection; and the deliverance of Isaac on this third day was doubtless typical of Christ's resurrection from the dead on the third day; for from the time that Abraham had the command to offer up his son, he was reckoned no other by him than as one dead, from whence he received him in a figure on this third day, Heb. xi. 19: Abraham lift up his eyes, and saw the place afar off; where he was to offer his son. Baal Hatturim says, the word place, by Gematry, signifies Jerusalem: it seems by this, that as God had signified to Abraham that he would tell him of the place, and shew it to him, where he was to sacrifice, so that he gave him a signal by which he might know it, which some of the Jewish writers [w] say was a cloud upon the mount; with which agrees the Targum of Jonathan, "and Abraham "lift up his eyes and saw the cloud of glory smoking upon the mountain, and he knew it afar "off." And others say [x], he saw the glory of the divine Majesty standing upon the mount, in a pillar of fire, reaching from earth to heaven; and they further observe, that the place, where he was when he saw this, was Zophim, a place not far from Jerusalem; and from hence, when the city and temple were built, a full view might be taken of them [y], from whence it had its name.

℣. 5. And Abraham said unto the young men, abide you here with the ass, &c.] At the place from from whence he had his firſt ſight of mount Moriah: he choſe not to take his two ſervants with him, leſt when they ſaw him binding his ſon, and going about to ſacrifice him, they ſhould lay hold upon him, and reſtrain him from doing it; and to prevent this he takes this precaution, which ſhows how fully intent he was to yield obedience to the divine precept: and I and the lad will go yonder and worſhip; pointing to the place where the ſignal was, but whether they ſaw it or no, is not certain: the Jews ſay [z] Iſaac did ſee it, but they did not; however Abraham made them to underſtand that he was going to one of the mountains which were in ſight, and there worſhip God by offering ſacrifice to him. Iſaac is here called a lad; of what age he was at this time, ſee the note on ℣. 2. and he might be at the largeſt number of years there mentioned, and yet be ſo called, ſince Joſhua the ſon of Nun has this appellation when he was 56 years of age, Exod. xxxiii. 11: and come again to you; both he and Iſaac; this he ſaid under a ſpirit of prophecy, as Jarchi thinks, or in the faith of Iſaac's reſurrection from the dead, Heb. xi. 19.

℣. 6. And Abraham took the wood of the burnt-offering, &c.] Which Joſephus [a] ſays was laid upon the aſs, and carried by that; and if ſo, he took it from thence: but it is probable it was carried by his two ſervants, ſince it was not more than Iſaac himſelf afterwards carried, as in the next clauſe: and laid it upon Iſaac his ſon; who was a grown man, and able to carry it: in this alſo he was a type of Chriſt, on whom the wood of his croſs was laid, and which he bore when he went to be crucified, John xix. 17. and this wood may be alſo a figure of our ſins laid on him by his father, and which he bore in his body on the tree; and which were like wood to fire, fuel for the wrath of God, which came down upon him for them: and he took the fire in his hand and a knife; a veſſel in one hand, in which fire was to kindle the wood with, and a knife in the other hand to ſlay the ſacrifice with; the one to ſlay his ſon with, and the other to burn him with; and to carry theſe for ſuch purpoſes muſt be very trying. This is the firſt time we read in ſcripture of fire for uſe, or of a knife. Some ſay the firſt inventor of fire was Prometheus, others Phoroneus [b], from whence he ſeems to have his name; but according to Sanchoniatho [c], the immediate poſterity of Cain firſt invented it, whoſe names were light, fire and flame; and theſe, he ſays, found out the way of generating fire, by rubbing pieces of wood againſt each other, and taught men the uſe of it. Knife, in the Hebrew language, has its name from eating and conſuming, as Ben Melech obſerves; ſome render it a ſword [d], but wrongly, and which has led the painter into a miſtake, to repreſent Abraham with a ſword in his hand to ſlay his ſon: and they went both of them together; from the place where they left the young men, to the place where the ſacrifice was to be offered.

℣. 7. And Iſaac ſpake unto Abraham his father, &c.] As they were walking together: and ſaid, my father; a cutting word to Abraham, who knew what he was going to do with him, ſo contrary to the relation and affection of a parent: and he ſaid, here am I, my ſon; what haſt thou to ſay to me? I am ready to anſwer thee; he owns the relation he ſtood in unto him, a ſenſe of which he had not put off, and curbs his affections, which muſt be inwardly moving towards him, and ſhewed great ſtrength of faith to grapple with ſuch a trying exerciſe: and he ſaid, behold, the fire and the wood; the fire which his father had in his hand, and the wood which was upon his own ſhoulders: but where is the lamb for a burnt-offering? he perceived by the preparation made, by the fire and the wood, that it was to be a burnt-offering which they were going to offer; but there being no creature provided for the ſacrifice, he puts this queſtion, by which it appears that as yet he was quite ignorant of the true deſign of this journey, and little thought that he was to be the ſacrifice: however, from what he ſaid, it is plain he had been uſed to ſacrifices, and had been trained up in them, and had ſeen them performed, and knew the nature of them, and what were requiſite unto them.

℣. 8. And Abraham ſaid, my ſon, God will provide himſelf a lamb for a burnt-offering, &c.] In which anſwer Abraham may have reſpect to the Meſſiah, the Lamb of God, whom he had provided in council and covenant before the world was; and who in promiſe, and type, and figure, was ſlain from the foundation of the world; and whom in due time God would ſend into the world, and make him an offering for ſin, and accept of him in the room and ſtead of his people: and this was a proviſion that could only be made by the Lord, and was the produce of his infinite wiſdom, and the fruit of his grace, favour and good-will, and of which Abraham had a clear ſight and ſtrong perſuaſion, ſee John viii. 56. though as the words may be conſidered as a more direct anſwer to Iſaac's queſtion, which related to the ſacrifice now about to be offered, they may be regarded as a prophecy of Abraham's, and of his faith in it, that God would, as in fact he did, provide a lamb or ram in the room of that he was called to offer; or he may mean Iſaac himſelf, whom he was bid to take and offer, and ſo was a lamb of God's providing; though he did not chuſe directly to ſay this, but puts him off with ſuch an anſwer, ſuggeſting that it was beſt for him to leave it with God, who, as he had called them to ſuch ſervice, would ſupply them with a proper ſacrifice; and in ſpeaking in this manner he might give room for Iſaac to ſuſpect what was intended, and ſo by degrees bring him to the knowledge of it. Some Jewiſh writers [e] ſay, that Abraham to this anſwer added in expreſs terms, "my ſon, thou art the lamb:" ſo they went both of them together; they proceeded on in their journey until they came to the place they were directed to go. The Targum of Jonathan ſays, "they went both of them with a perfect heart as "one;" the Jeruſalem Targum is "with a quiet, eaſy and compoſed mind or heart;" and Jarchi "with a like heart;" all intimating that Iſaac was thoroughly acquainted with what was to be done, that he was to be the ſacrifice, and that he heartily agreed to it; and that he and his father were of one mind in it, and that he went with the ſame will to be offered up, as his father did to offer him; and indeed the expreſſion being repeated from ℣. 6. ſeems to ſuggeſt ſomething remarkable and worthy of attention.

℣. 9. And they came to the place which God had told him of, &c.] Mount Moriah. Maimonides [f] ſays, "it is a tradition in or by the hands of all, "that

" that this is the place where David and Solomon
" built an altar in the threshing-floor of Araunah
" the Jebusite, and where Abraham built an altar, " and bound Isaac on it; and where Noah built
" one when he came out of the ark, and is the altar
" on which Cain and Abel offered; and where the " first man offered when he was created, and from
" whence he was created." And so the Targum of Jonathan, and other Jewish writers [g]. The Mahometans say [h], that Meena or Muna, a place about 2 or 3 miles from Mecca, is the place where Abraham went to offer up his son Isaac, and therefore in this place they sacrifice their sheep. And Abraham built an altar there; of the earth, and turf upon it he found on the mount, erected an altar for sacrifice, even for the sacrifice of his own son: he had built many before, but none for such a purpose as this, and yet went about it readily, and finished it. But if there was one before, Abraham could not with any propriety be said to build it, at most only to repair it; but there is no doubt to be made of it that he built it anew, and perhaps there never was an altar here before: and laid on the wood in order; for the sacrifice to be put upon it: and bound Isaac his son; with his hands and feet behind him, as Jarchi says; not lest he should flee from him, and make his escape, as Aben Ezra suggests, but as it was the usual manner to bind sacrifices when offered; and especially this was so ordered, that Isaac might be a type of the Messiah, who was bound by the Jews, John xviii. 12. Matt. xxvii. 2. as well as he was bound and fastened to the cross: and laid him on the altar upon the wood; it is highly probable with his own consent; for if he was 25, and as some say 37 years of age, he was able to have resisted his father, and had he been reluctant could have cleared himself from the hands of his aged parent: but it is very likely, that previous to this Abraham opened the whole affair to him, urged the divine command, persuaded him to submit to it; and perhaps might suggest to him what he himself had faith in, that God would either revoke the precept, or prevent by some providence or another the fatal blow, or raise him again from the dead; however, that obedience to the will of God should be yielded, since disobedience might be attended with sad consequences to them both; and with such like things the mind of Isaac might be reconciled to this affair, and he willingly submitted to it; in which he also was a type of Christ, who acquiesced in the will of his Father, freely surrendered himself into the hands of justice, and meekly and willingly gave himself an offering for his people.

℣. 10. And Abraham stretched forth his hand, &c.] All things being ready for execution, the altar built, the wood laid on it, the sacrifice bound and laid on that, nothing remained but to cut the throat of the sacrifice; and in order to that, the instrument for it laying by him, he put forth his hand, one would think in a trembling manner, for it is enough to make one tremble to think of it: and took the knife to slay his son; with a full intention to do it, which was carrying his obedience to the divine will to the last extremity, and shows he was sincere in it, and really designed to complete it; and this was taken by the Lord as if it was actually done. He had his knife in his hand, and was near the throat of his son, and just ready to give the fatal thrust; in another moment as it were, it would have been all over; but in the nick of time God appeared and prevented it, as follows:

℣. 11. And the angel of the Lord called unto him out of heaven, &c.] Not a created angel, but the increated one, the Son of God, who perhaps appeared in an human form, and spoke with an articulate voice, as he frequently did; for that this was a divine person, is clear from his swearing by himself, and renewing the promise unto Abraham, ℣. 16, 17, 18: and said, Abraham, Abraham; the repeating his name denotes haste to prevent the slaughter of his son, which was just upon the point of doing, and in which Abraham was not dilatory, but ready to make quick dispatch; and therefore with the greater eagerness and vehemency the angel calls him by name, and doubles it, to raise a quick and immediate attention to him, which it did: and he said, here am I; ready to hearken to what shall be said, and to obey what should be ordered, see the note on ℣. 1.

℣. 12. And he said, lay not thine hand upon the lad, &c.] Which he was just going to stretch out, with his knife in it, to slay him; and though the Lord had bid him take his son, and offer him for a burnt offering, to try his faith, fear, love and obedience, yet he meant not that he should actually slay him, but would prevent it when it came to the crisis; for he approves not of, nor delights in human sacrifices; and that this might not be drawn into an example, it was prevented; though the Gentiles, under the influence of satan, in imitation of this, have practised it: neither do thou any thing unto him; by lacerating his flesh, letting out any of his blood, or wounding him ever so slightly in any part: for now I know that thou fearest God; with a truly childlike filial fear; with such a reverence of him that has fervent love, and strong affection, joined with it; with a fear that includes the whole of internal religious worship, awe of the divine Being, submission to his will, faith in him, and love to him, and obedience springing from thence. And this is said, not as though he was ignorant before how things would issue; for he knew from all eternity what Abraham would be, and what he would do, having determined to bestow that grace upon him, and work it in him, which would influence and enable him to act the part he did; he knew full well beforehand, what would be the consequence of such a trial of him; but this is said after the manner of men, who know things with certainty when they come to pass, and appear plain and evident: or this may be understood of a knowledge of approbation, that the Lord now knew, and approved of the faith, fear, love and obedience of Abraham, which were so conspicuous in this affair, see Ps. i. 6. Saadiah Gaon [i] interprets it, I have made known, that is, to others; God by trying Abraham made it manifest to others, to all the world, to all that should hear of or read this account of things, that he was a man that feared God, loved him, believed in him, and obeyed him, of which this instance is a full and convincing proof: seeing thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son from me; but as soon as he had the order to offer him up, prepared for it, took a three days journey, and all things along with him for the sacrifice; when he came to the place, built an altar, laid the wood in order, bound his son, and laid him on it, took the knife, and was going to put it to his throat; so that the Lord looked upon the thing as if it was really done: it was a plain case that he did not, and would not have withheld his son, but would have freely offered him a sacrifice unto God at his command; and that he loved loved the Lord more than he did his ſon, and had a greater regard to the command of God than to the life of his ſon, and preferred the one to the other. And thus God ſpared not his own ſon, but delivered him up for us all, Rom. viii. 32.

℣. 13. And Abraham lifted up his eyes, &c.] They were before fixed upon his ſon lying upon the altar, and intent upon that part he was going to thruſt his knife into; but hearing a voice from heaven above him, he lift up his eyes thitherward: and looked, and behold, behind him a ram caught in a thicket by his horns; the ram making a noiſe and ruſtling among the buſhes behind the place where Abraham was, he turned himſelf, and looked and ſaw it: the Targum of Onkelos introduces the clauſe thus, after theſe things; and ſo the Arabic verſion: after Abraham had heard the voice of the angel, and had lift up his eyes to heaven, he was directed to look behind him; and both that and the Targum of Jonathan paraphraſe it, "and he "ſaw and beheld one ram;" and ſo the Septuagint, Syriac and Samaritan verſions reading אחד inſtead of אחר. This ram was caught and held by his horns in a thicket of briars, brambles and thorns, or in the thick branches of the ſhrubs or buſhes which grew upon the mount; and the horns of a ram being crooked, are eaſily implicated in ſuch thickets, but not eaſily looſed. From whence this ram came is not known; it can hardly be thought to come from Abraham's fold, or to be his property, ſince he was three days journey diſtant from home; very likely it had ſtrayed from neighbouring flocks, and was by the providence of God directed hither at a ſeaſonable time. The Jewiſh writers [k] ſay, it was from the creation of the world; and there is no abſurdity or improbability to ſuppoſe it was immediately created by the power of God, and in an extraordinary manner provided; and was a type of our Lord Jeſus, who was foreordained of God before the foundation of the world, and came into the world in an uncommon way, being born of a virgin, and that in the fulneſs of time, and ſeaſonably, and in due time died for the ſins of men. The ram has its name from ſtrength, in the Hebrew language, and was an emblem of a great perſonage, Dan. viii. 3. and may denote the ſtrength and dignity of Chriſt as a divine perſon; being caught in a thicket, may be an emblem of the decrees of God, in which he was appointed to be the Saviour; or the covenant-agreement and tranſactions with his father, in which he voluntarily involved himſelf, and by which he was held; or the ſins of his people, which were laid upon him by imputation, were wreathed about him, and juſtice finding him implicated with them, required ſatisfaction, and had it; or the hands of wicked men, ſons of Belial, comparable to thorns, by whom he was taken; or the ſorrows of death and hell that encompaſſed him, and the curſes of a righteous law which lay upon him; and perhaps he never more reſembled this ram caught in a thicket, than when a platted crown of thorns was put upon his head, and he wore it: and Abraham went and took the ram; without regarding whoſe property it was, ſince God, the owner and proprietor of all, had provided it for him, and brought it to him at a very ſeaſonable time, and directed him to take it: and offered him up for a burnt-offering, inſtead of his ſon; in which it alſo was a type of Chriſt, who was made an offering for ſin, and a ſacrifice to God of a ſweet ſmelling ſavour; and its being a burnt-offering, denotes the ſufferings of Chriſt, and the ſeverity of them; and which were in the room and ſtead of his people, of God's Iſaac, of the ſpiritual ſeed of Abraham, of the children of God and of the promiſe, of all his beloved ones; who therefore are let go, juſtice being ſatisfied with what Chriſt has done and ſuffered, it being all one as if they had ſuffered themſelves; as here in the type, the ram having its throat cut, its blood ſhed, its ſkin flead, and the whole burnt to aſhes, were as if Iſaac himſelf had been thus dealt with, as Jarchi obſerves. Alexander Polyhiſtor [l], an heathen writer has, in agreement with the ſacred hiſtory, given a narrative of this affair in a few words, "God, he ſays, com-"manded Abraham to offer up his ſon Iſaac to "him for a burnt-offering, and taking the lad "with him to a mountain, laid and kindled an "heap of wood, and put Iſaac upon it; and when "he was about to ſlay him, was forbidden by an "angel, who preſented a ram to him for ſacrifice, "and then Abraham removed his ſon from the pile, "and offered up the ram."

℣. 14. And Abraham called the name of that place Jehovah-jireh, &c.] Which may be rendered either the Lord hath ſeen, as the Septuagint, or has provided, the future being put for the paſt, as Abendana obſerves, and ſo it is called, in anſwer to what Abraham had ſaid, ℣. 8, God will provide: now he had provided, and as a memorial of it, gives the place this name; or he will ſee or provide [m], as he has provided for me, ſo he will for all thoſe that truſt in him; as he has provided a ram in the room of Iſaac, ſo he has provided, and will ſend his only Son in the fulneſs of time to be a ſacrifice for the ſins of his people: as it is ſaid to this day, in the mount of the Lord it ſhall be ſeen; from this time to the times of Moſes, and ſo on in after-ages, even until now, it has been uſed as a proverbial ſaying, that as God appeared to Abraham, and for his ſon, in the mount, juſt as he was going to ſacrifice him, and delivered him, ſo the Lord will appear for his people in all ages, in a time of difficulty and diſtreſs, and when at the utmoſt extremity, who call upon him, and truſt in him. This may alſo refer to the preſence of God in this mount, when the temple ſhould be built on it, as it was, 2 Chron. iii. 1. and to the appearance of Chriſt in it, who was often ſeen here: ſome chuſe to render the words, in the mount the Lord ſhall be ſeen [n]; God manifeſt in the fleſh, the Immanuel God with us, who was frequently in the temple built on this mount, and often ſeen there in his ſtate of humiliation on earth.

℣. 15. And the angel of the Lord called unto Abraham out of heaven the ſecond time.] The angel having reſtrained him from ſlaying his ſon, and having provided another ſacrifice, which he offered, calls to him again; having ſomething more to ſay to him, which was to renew the covenant he had made with him, and confirm it by an oath.

℣. 16. And ſaid, by myſelf have I ſworn, ſaith the Lord, &c.] Which Aben Ezra obſerves is a great oath, and abides for ever; for becauſe he could ſwear by no greater, he ſwore by himſelf, his own nature, perfections and life, Heb. vi. 13. hence it appears, that the angel that called to Abraham was a divine perſon, the true Jehovah: for becauſe thou haſt done this thing, and haſt not withheld hold thy ſon, thine only ſon; that is, from the Lord, as in ℣. 12. and is here repeated as being a moſt marvellous thing, a wonderful inſtance of faith in God, and fear of him, and of love and obedience to him; for, with reſpect to the will of Abraham, and as far as he was ſuffered to go, it was as much done as it was poſſible for him to do, and was looked upon as if actually done: yet this is not obſerved as meritorious of what follows; the promiſe of which had been made before, but is now repeated to ſhew what notice God took of, and how well pleaſed he was with what had been done; and therefore renews the promiſe, which of his own grace and good-will he had made, for the ſtrengthening of Abraham's faith, and to encourage others to obey the Lord in whatſoever he commands them.

℣. 17. That in bleſſing I will bleſs thee, &c.] With temporal and ſpiritual bleſſings; with the Spirit and all his graces; with Chriſt, and redemption, juſtification, and ſalvation by him; and with eternal life, as the gift of God, through him: and in multiplying I will multiply thy ſeed as the ſtars of the heaven, and as the ſand which is upon the ſea-ſhore; both his natural ſeed, deſcending from him in the line of Iſaac, and his ſpiritual ſeed, both among Jews and Gentiles, that tread in his ſteps; ſee Gen. xiii. 15, 16. and xv. 5: and thy ſeed ſhall poſſeſs the gate of his enemies; gate for gates, where courts of judicature were held, and which are the ſecurity of cities and put for them, and which alſo include the whole country round about: ſo that this phraſe is expreſſive of an entire juriſdiction and dominion over them; and was literally fulfilled in the times of Joſhua, David, and Solomon; and ſpiritually in Chriſt, Abraham's principal ſeed, when he deſtroyed Satan and his principalities and powers; overcame the world; made an end of ſin and aboliſhed death; and delivered his people out of the hands of all their enemies; and in all Abraham's ſpiritual ſeed, who are made more than conquerors over them, through Chriſt that has loved them.

℣. 18. And in thy ſeed ſhall all nations of the earth be bleſſed, &c.] That is, in his one and principal ſeed, the Meſſiah, that ſhould ſpring from him, Gal. iii. 16. in whom all the elect of God, of all nations under the heavens, are bleſſed with all ſpiritual bleſſings; with peace, pardon, righteouſneſs, and eternal life, with grace here and glory hereafter; ſee the note on ch. xii. 3. or, ſhall bleſs themſelves [o] in him; or, account themſelves bleſſed; apply to him for bleſſings, claim their intereſt in them, and glory in them, and make their boaſt of them: becauſe thou haſt obeyed my voice; in taking his ſon and offering him up unto him, as much as he was permitted to do; and thus honouring God by his obedience to him, he of his grace and goodneſs honours him with the promiſe of being the father of multitudes, both in a literal and ſpiritual ſenſe, and with being the anceſtor of the Meſſiah, in whom all the bleſſings of grace and goodneſs meet.

℣. 19. So Abraham returned to his young men, &c.] He had left at a certain place with the aſs, whilſt he and Iſaac went to the mount to worſhip; and who ſtayed there till he came to them, according to his order, ℣. 5. no mention is made of Iſaac, but there is no doubt that he returned with Abraham, ſince we hear of him afterwards in his houſe; for as to what the Targum of Jonathan ſays, it cannot be depended on, that the angels took Iſaac and brought him to the ſchool of Shem the great, and there he was three years: and they roſe up, and went together to Beer-ſheba; that is, when Abraham and Iſaac came to the place where the young men were, they got up and proceeded on in their journey along with them to Beer-ſheba, from whence Abraham came, and where he had for ſome time lived; and Abraham dwelt at Beer-ſheba; there he continued for ſome time afterwards, and but for a time, for in the next chapter we hear of him at Hebron.

℣. 20. And it came to paſs after theſe things, &c.] Abraham's taking his ſon Iſaac to the land of Moriah, building an altar on one of the mountains there, and laying him on it with an intention to ſacrifice him, and offering of a ram in his ſtead, and the return of them both to Beer-ſheba: that it was told Abraham; by ſome perſon very probably who was lately come from thoſe parts where the following perſons lived; though Jarchi ſuggeſts, this was told him by the Lord himſelf, and, whilſt he was thinking of taking a wife for Iſaac of the daughters of Aner, or Eſhcol, or Mamre; and to prevent which the following narration was given him: ſaying, behold Milcah, ſhe hath alſo borne children unto thy brother Nahor: as Sarah, ſuppoſed to be the ſame with Iſcah, a daughter of Haran, had borne a ſon to him, and whom he had received again as from the dead; ſo Milcah, another daughter of Haran, had borne children to his brother Nahor, whom he had left in Ur of the Chaldees, when he departed from thence, and who afterwards came and dwelt in Haran of Meſopotamia; ſee ch. xi. 27, 29.

℣. 21. Huz his firſt-born, and Buz his brother, &c.] The firſt of theſe gave name to the land of Uz, where Job dwelt, and who ſeems to be a deſcendant of this man, Job i. 1. and from whom ſprung the Auſitæ of Ptolemy [p], who dwelt near Babylon and by the Euphrates. The latter was the father of the Buzites, of which family Elihu was, that interpoſed between Job and his friends, ch. xxxii. 2: and Kemuel the father of Aram; not that Aram from whom the Syrians are denominated Arameans, he was the ſon of Shem, ch. x. 22. but one who perhaps was ſo called from dwelling among them, as Jacob is called a Syrian, Deut. xxvi. 5. or he had this name given him in memory and honour of the more antient Aram: from this Kemuel might come the Camelites, of which there were two ſorts mentioned by Strabo [q], and who dwelt to the right of the river Euphrates, about three days journey from it.

℣. 22. And Cheſed, &c.] From whom it is generally thought ſprung the Chaldees, who are commonly called Chaſdim; but mention is made of the Chaldees before this man was born, unleſs they are called ſo by anticipation; ſee the note on ch. x. 22: and Hazo, and Pildaſh, and Jidlaph, and Bethuel; of theſe men and their poſterity we hear no more, excepting the laſt, for whoſe ſake the reſt are mentioned. Hazo or Chazo ſettled in Elymais, a country belonging to Perſia, where is now a city called Chuz after his name, and from whence the whole country is called Chuziſtan; and the inhabitants of it are by the Aſſyrians called Huzoye or Huzæans [r]; the ſame which Strabo [s] makes mention of under the name of Coſſæans, who are deſcribed as a warlike people, inhabiting a barren and mountainous country, and given to ſpoil and robbery; and are mentioned mentioned by him along with Elymæans, Medes, and Perſians. Some Arabic writers ſay, the Perſians are from Pars, the ſon of Pahla; and Dr. Hyde [t] queries whether Pahla is not the ſame with Paldas, that is, Pildaſh, another of the ſons of Nahor.

℣. 23. And Bethuel begat Rebekah, &c.] Who was to be and was the wife of Iſaac; and, for the ſake of her genealogy, the above account is given, as Aben Ezra obſerves, and ſo Jarchi; and this is obſerved to pave the way for the hiſtory of the 24th chapter; for no notice is taken of any other of Bethuel's children but her, not even of Laban her brother: theſe eight Milcah did bear to Nahor, Abraham's brother; this is obſerved, and the exact number given, as well as their names, to diſtinguiſh them from other children of Nahor he had by another woman, as follows:

℣. 24. And his concubine, whoſe name was Reumah, &c.] Not an harlot, but a ſecondary wife, who was under the proper and lawful wife, and a ſort of a head-ſervant in the family, and chiefly kept for the procreation of children; which was not thought either unlawful or diſhonourable in thoſe times, ſuch as was Hagar in Abraham's family: ſhe bare alſo Tebah, and Gaham, and Thahaſh, and Maachah; of whom we have no account elſewhere; only it may be obſerved, that here Maachah is the name of a man, which ſometimes is given to a woman, 1 Kings xv. 13.

CHAP. XXIII.

THIS chapter treats of the age, death, and funeral of Sarah, and the place of her interment: of her age, ℣. 1. of her death, ℣. 2. of the motion Abraham made to the ſons of Heth, to obtain a burial-place among them, ℣. 3, 4. of the anſwer of them to him, giving him leave to bury in any of their ſepulchres, ℣. 5, 6. of a ſecond motion of his to them, to uſe their intereſt with Ephron the Hittite, to let him have the cave of Machpelah for the above purpoſe, ℣. 7, 8, 9. of Ephron's conſent unto it, ℣. 10, 11. of the purchaſe Abraham made of it for 400 ſhekels of ſilver, ℣. 12—16. and of its being ſecured unto him, in which he interred Sarah his wife, ℣. 17—20.

℣. 1. And Sarah was 127 years old, &c.] This following immediately upon the account of the offering up of Iſaac, led many of the Jewiſh writers to conclude, that Iſaac was then 37 years of age, as he muſt be when Sarah his mother was 120, for he was born when ſhe was 90 years of age; but this ſeems not to be obſerved on that account, but to give the ſum of her age at her death, ſince it follows: theſe were the years of the life of Sarah; who, as it is remarked by many interpreters, is the only woman the years of whoſe life are reckoned up in ſcripture.

℣. 2. And Sarah died in Kirjath-Arba, &c.] Which was ſo called either, as Jarchi ſays, from the four Anakim or giants that dwelt here, Joſh. xv. 13. or elſe, as the ſame writer obſerves, from the four couple buried here, Adam and Eve, Abraham and Sarah, Iſaac and Rebekah, Jacob and Leah; but then it muſt be ſo called by anticipation; rather as Aben Ezra thinks it had its name from Arba, a great man among the Anakim, and the father of Anak, Joſh. xiv. 15. though ſome take it to be a Tetrapolis, a city conſiſting of four parts: but, be it as it will, here Abraham and Sarah were at the time of her death; when they removed from Beer-ſheba hither is not ſaid: the ſame is Hebron in the land of Canaan; ſo it was afterwards called: here Abraham and Sarah had lived many years ago, ſee ch. xiii. 18. and hither they returned, and here they ended their days and were buried: and Abraham came to mourn for Sarah, and to weep for her; Aben Ezra obſerves, that, when Sarah died, Abraham was in another place, and therefore is ſaid to come to mourn for her; and the Targum of Jonathan is, "and Abraham came from the "mount of worſhip (Moriah) and found that ſhe "was dead, and he ſat down to mourn for Sarah, "and to weep for her." Others [u] report, that, upon hearing of the offering up of Iſaac, ſhe ſwooned away and died. But the meaning is, that he came from his own tent to Sarah's, ſee ch. xxiv. 67. where her corpſe was, to indulge his paſſion of grief and ſorrow for her; which, in a moderate way, was lawful, and what natural affection and conjugal relation obliged him to. The Hebrews [w] obſerve, that, in the word for weep, one of the letters is leſſer than uſual, and which they think denotes, that his weeping for her was not exceſſive but little; but both phraſes put together, ſeem to denote, that his ſorrow was very great; and the one perhaps may refer to his private, and the other to his public mourning for her, according to the cuſtom of thoſe times.

℣. 3. And Abraham ſtood up from before his dead, &c.] The corpſe of Sarah, by which he ſat penſive and mourning, perhaps upon the ground, as was the cuſtom of mourners, Job ii. 13. where having ſat a while, he roſe up and went out of the tent, to provide for the funeral of his wife as became him: and ſpake unto the ſons of Heth; the deſcendants of Heth the ſon of Canaan, ſee ch. x. 15. who were at this time the inhabitants and proprietors of that part of the land where Abraham now was; ſaying as follows:

℣. 4. I am a ſtranger and a ſojourner with you, &c.] Not a native of the place, only dwelt as a ſojourner among them for a time; but had not ſo much as a foot of ground he could call his own, and conſequently had no place to inter his dead: give me a poſſeſſion of a burial-place with you; not that he deſired it as a free gift, but that he might be allowed to make a purchaſe of a piece of ground to bury his dead in; ſo the Targum of Jonathan, "ſell me a poſſeſſion," &c. ſee ℣. 9. and this he was the rather deſirous of, not only becauſe it was according to the rules of humanity, and the general cuſtom of all nations, to provide for the burial of their dead; but he was willing to have ſuch a place in the land of Canaan for this purpoſe, to ſtrengthen his faith and the faith of his poſterity, and to animate their hope and expectation of being one day put into the poſſeſſion of it; hence the patriarchs in after times, as Jacob and Joſeph, were deſirous of having their bones laid there: that I may bury my dead out of my ſight; for, though Sarah was a very very lovely perſon in her life, and greatly deſireable by Abraham, yet death had changed her countenance and was turning her into corruption, which rendered her unpleaſant, and began to make her loathſome; ſo that there was a neceſſity of removing her out of his ſight, who before had been ſo very agreeable to him; and this is the caſe of the deareſt relation and friend at death.

℣. 5. And the children of Heth anſwered Abraham, &c.] In a very civil and reſpectful manner: ſaying unto him, as follows:

℣. 6. Hear us, my lord, &c.] One of them ſpake in the name of the reſt, who calls Abraham not our lord, but my lord; addreſſing him very honourably, and deſires he would hear what he had to ſay on the behalf of others with himſelf; hear us, repreſenting not the body of the common people, but the princes among them, the heads of their families: thou art a mighty prince amongſt us; though he was pleaſed to call himſelf a ſtranger and a ſojourner, yet they had an high opinion of him, as a perſon of great wealth and ſubſtance, and of great power and authority; and who lived like a prince, and was a potent one, having a large train of ſervants under him: or, a prince of God [x], as it may be rendered; one raiſed up to grandeur and dignity by him; with whom he was, and in whoſe ſight he had favour, and was very grateful and acceptable; and by whom he was highly honoured, and had in great eſteem as a friend of his: in the choice of our ſepulchres bury thy dead; as they had many, every family a diſtinct ſepulchre for itſelf, they made offer of them to him, to bury his dead in the choiceſt of them, the moſt grand and magnificent, or in which of them ſoever he pleaſed; which was very kind, generous, and reſpectful: none of us ſhall withold from thee his ſepulchre, but that thou mayeſt bury thy dead; there is not a man among us but what has ſuch a regard for thee, that he will not deny thee the uſe of his ſepulchre to bury thy dead in; and therefore need not ſcruple to make uſe of any that may be judged moſt proper and convenient: no doubt the ſpeaker full well knew the mind of thoſe in whoſe name he addreſſed Abraham.

℣. 7. And Abraham ſtood up, &c.] For, having made his ſpeech to the children of Heth, he ſat down waiting for an anſwer; or rather perhaps they obliged him to ſit down, out of reverence to ſo great a perſonage; and, when they had done ſpeaking, he roſe up: and bowed himſelf to the people of the land; the principal of them, in token of the grateful ſenſe he had of the honour they had done him, and of the great civility with which they had uſed him: even to the children of Heth; this ſeems to be added to diſtinguiſh them from the common people, and as an explanation of the preceding clauſe; ſee the note on ℣. 3.

℣. 8. And he communed with them, &c.] Entered into a diſcourſe and converſation with them upon the above ſubject: if it be your mind that I ſhould bury my dead out of my ſight; that is, in ſome place belonging to them, otherwiſe they could have no objection to the burying of his wife any where elſe: if now what they had ſaid were not ſpoken in a complaiſant way, but it was their real mind and will, and they were ſincere and hearty in it, and very deſirous of obliging him with a place among them for the interment of his dead; then he had this favour to aſk of them: hear me, and intreat for me to Ephron the ſon of Zohar; a principal man among the Hittites, who had a field and a cave in it, near where Abraham dwelt, and very convenient for him, and for this purpoſe of his now under conſideration: this man ſeems to be preſent at this time, as appears from ℣. 10. but Abraham did not think fit to addreſs him himſelf, leſt he ſhould not ſo well and ſo eaſily ſucceed; and therefore intreats the princes of Heth to unite in a requeſt to Ephron for the favour after-mentioned, which he ſuppoſed they would not be backward to, if they were hearty in this affair: and, if Ephron was preſent, as he ſeems to be, it was a very handſome, honourable, and modeſt addreſs to him through his brethren, which he could not with any politeneſs well withſtand. The requeſt follows.

℣. 9. That he may give me the cave of Machpelah, which he hath, which is in the end of his field, &c.] The Targum of Jonathan renders it, the double cave, and ſo do the Septuagint and Vulgate Latin verſions; and, according to Aben Ezra and Ben Melech, it was ſo called, becauſe there was a cave within a cave in it; and, as Jarchi thinks, becauſe it was a houſe and chamber over it [y], or, as he adds, becauſe it was fit for couples, for two corpſes to be laid in it; and the Jews ſay [z], here Adam and Eve were buried, which made Abraham ſo deſirous of having it for a burying-place: but it ſeems rather to be the proper name of a place, and indeed of a tract of land, in which the field and the cave in the corner of it lay, and which all belonged to Ephron; for both the field and the cave in it are diſtinguiſhed from Machpelah, in which they were, and that from them, ℣. 17. and it is highly probable, that this cave was never made uſe of before for ſuch a purpoſe as it was now ſought for, ſince Abraham did not think fit to accept of the offer made him of any of their ſepulchres; and choſe rather that his dead ſhould not lie with them, but in a ſeparate place, though among them, they being heathens and idolaters, and unacquainted with the reſurrection of the dead, and would have no part in the firſt reſurrection, which Abraham believed and hoped for: for as much money as it is worth he ſhall give it me, for a poſſeſſion of a burying-place amongſt you; or, for full money [a], that which is full weight, for money was paid by weight in thoſe times, as appears from ℣. 16. or for the full price and value of it: for, as Abraham did not deſire to have it as a free gift, ſo neither at an under price; he was very willing to give the full worth of it; he did not aſk it with any covetous view, or to encroach upon them.

℣. 10. And Ephron dwelt among the children of Heth, &c.] Or ſat [b] among them, in the preſent aſſembly of them; and, according to Jarchi, as their preſident for the time on this occaſion; but if ſo, Abraham would have directed his ſpeech to him: however, he was upon the ſpot, as appears from what follows, and Ephron the Hittite anſwered Abraham in the audience of the children of Heth; he roſe up in the aſſembly upon the mention of his name, and in the hearing of the reſt of the princes gave an anſwer himſelf to Abraham's requeſt: even of all that went in at the gates of his city; the city of Kirjath-arba, afterwards called Hebron, ℣. 2. where he was born, or however where he now lived; and perhaps it, or the greater part of

of it, was his poſſeſſion and property: it was now at one of the gates of this city, where the aſſembly of the princes was held; it being uſual to hold aſſemblies on any buſineſs, or courts of judicature in ſuch places, they being public, where multitudes reſorted, or were continually paſſing and repaſſing, and ſo had the opportunity of hearing, and of being witneſſes: ſaying; as follows, ℣. 11. Nay, my lord, hear me, &c.] Or not ſo, my lord, as Aben Ezra paraphraſes it; not that he denied his requeſt entirely, or refuſed him the cave at any rate, but that he ſhould not buy it of him, he would give it to him, and therefore he deſires he would hear what he had to ſay farther: the field give I thee, and the cave that is therein I give it thee; which was more than Abraham aſked to purchaſe; he only deſired to have the cave which lay in one corner of the field, but Ephron propoſes both to give him the cave, and the field alſo: in the preſence of the ſons of my people give I it thee; both field and cave; three times he ſays I give it thee, to ſhew that he freely gave it, and that Abraham was welcome to it, and for the confirmation of the grant: bury thy dead; in the cave, at once, immediately, without any more ado.

℣. 12. And Abraham bowed down himſelf before the people of the land.] Showing hereby great reſpect, and giving much honour both to them and Ephron; and ſignifying that he had ſomething to ſay, and deſired audience of them, and humbly ſubmitted to them what he ſhould ſay.

℣. 13. And he ſpake unto Ephron in the audience of the people of the land, &c.] He addreſſed himſelf to Ephron who ſpoke laſt, with an audible voice, ſo that all could hear him: ſaying, but if thou wilt give it, I pray thee, hear me; the words are very conciſe, and in the original text are only if thou, and differently ſupplied; by ſome, if thou art he [c], Ephron, whom it is ſuppoſed Abraham knew not by face, or that he was preſent; which is not likely, ſince Abraham had lived in thoſe parts now ſo as to be well known himſelf, and muſt know his neighbours; and had lived formerly here, and could not but know ſo great a prince as Ephron, whoſe city he dwelt in. The Targum of Jonathan is, "if thou art willing to do me a kindneſs, "hear me;" it will be taken as a favour to admit me to ſpeak once more, and to grant what ſhall be deſired. Others read the words thus, "if thou "wilt hear me, or I pray thee hear me, or if thou, "if (I ſay) thou wilt hear me [d]:" then follows his propoſal, I will give thee money for the field; Abraham did not chuſe to receive it as a free gift, but to make a purchaſe of it, that it might be ſure to him and his poſterity; for though Ephron was now in this generous mood, he might change his mind, or hereafter upbraid Abraham with it, ſhould he fall out with him, or his poſterity might claim it again, and diſpute his right to it: take it of me; the purchaſe-money, the full worth of the field: and I will bury my dead, or then will I bury, &c. [e] and not before.

℣. 14. And Ephron anſwered Abraham, ſaying unto him.] The following words, ℣. 15. My lord, hearken unto me, &c.] Since it is your mind to buy the field, and not receive it as a gift, then hear what I have to ſay as to the value of it: the land is worth 400 ſhekels of ſilver; which, reckoning a ſhekel at two ſhillings and ſix-pence, comes to 50 pounds of our money: what is that betwixt thee and me? between two perſons ſo rich, the ſum was trifling and inconſiderable, whether the one paid it, and the other received it, or not; or between two ſuch friends it was not worth ſpeaking of, it was no matter whether it was paid or not: or elſe the ſenſe is, between us both it is honeſtly worth ſo much; it is a good bargain, and muſt be owned to be ſo, what is it? the ſum is ſo ſmall, and it is ſo clearly the worth of it, that there needs no more to be ſaid about it: bury therefore thy dead; in it, and give thyſelf no more trouble and concern about it.

℣. 16. And Abraham hearkened unto Ephron, &c.] He agreed at once to give him the ſum propoſed, judging it be a moderate price between man and man, and he was ſatisfied with it, and well content to pay him the money: and Abraham weighed to Ephron the ſilver; for in thoſe times money had no mark or ſtamp upon it to ſhew its value, and therefore was not told by pieces, but weighed, by which its full worth was known; and that Ephron might have his whole and juſt demand, the ſilver was weighed to him: which he had named, in the audience of the ſons of Heth; who were witneſſes of the bargain, of the price ſet by Ephron, and of the payment of it by Abraham: four hundred ſhekels of ſilver; the ſum before mentioned: current money with the merchant; ſuch as was uſed by merchants in buying and ſelling; ſuch as they would receive, who knew the value of it, and were careful not to take any that was bad; wherefore ſuch as would paſs with them would go any where, was current money; how all this is conſiſtent with what Stephen ſays, Acts vii. 16. ſee the note there.

℣. 17. And the field of Ephron, which was in Machpelah, &c.] This clearly ſhows that Machpelah is the proper name of a place or tract of ground, and not an appellative, or to be rendered the double cave, ſince a field could never be ſaid to be in a cave: and yet ſome have been ſo ſtupid, as Vatablus obſerves, as to render the words, "the "field of Ephron, which was in the double cave," whereas, on the contrary, the cave was in that field; and ſo the Vulgate verſion, to better ſenſe, though not agreeable to the Hebrew text, "the "field of Ephron, in which was the double cave:" which was before Mamre; or over-againſt it, the place where Abraham dwelt, which was in Hebron, ch. xiii. 18. and xviii. 1. the field and the cave which was therein, and all the trees that were in the field, that were in all the borders round about, were made ſure; or roſe, or ſtood up [f]. Jarchi thinks the reaſon of this phraſe, or way of ſpeaking, is, becauſe this field, with all belonging to it, came into the hands of a greater perſon; out of the hands of a private man, into the hands of a king; and ſo Abraham indeed is called by ſome heathen writers [g]; but Aben Ezra and Ben Melech much better interpret it, "it was confirmed and ſtood;" that is, it was inſured to him, and remained with him, even that, and all upon it and in it, throughout the whole circumference of it.

℣. 18. Unto Abraham for a poſſeſſion, &c.] To be enjoyed by him and his for ever, as his own property, being purchaſed by his money: in the preſence of the children of Heth; they being witneſſes of the bargain, and of the payment of the money by Abraham, and of the ſurrender of the field field unto him, for his own uſe: before all that went in at the gates of his city; not of Abraham's city, for he had none, but of Ephron's city, which was Hebron, ſee ℣. 10. theſe are either the ſame with the children of Heth, and ſo the clauſe is added by way of explanation, and including all the inhabitants of the place; or elſe different from them, they intending the princes of the people that compoſed the aſſembly Abraham addreſſed, and theſe the common people, the inhabitants of the place. Aben Ezra takes them to be the travellers that paſſed and repaſſed through the gates of the city: however, the deſign of the expreſſion is to ſhow in what a public manner this affair was tranſacted, and that the field was made as firm and as ſure to Abraham as it could well be, no writings on ſuch occaſion being uſed ſo early.

℣. 19. And after this, &c.] After this affair was over, the bargain ſtruck, the money paid, and poſſeſſion ſecured: Abraham buried Sarah his wife in the cave of the field of Machpelah, before Mamre; and here he himſelf was buried, and alſo Iſaac and Rebekah, and Jacob and Leah, ch. xxv. 9, 10. and xlix. 29, 30. and l. 13. Benjamin of Tudela[h] ſays, in his time (who lived in the latter end of the 12th century) in the field of Machpelah was a city or town, and in it a large temple called Saint Abraham, where were ſhown the ſepulchres of the ſix perſons before mentioned, and inſcriptions over each of them, ſhewing whoſe they were; and that at the end of the field was the houſe of Abraham, and before the houſe a fountain, and no other was ſuffered to be built there in honour to Abraham: the ſame is Hebron in the land of Canaan; that is, Mamre is the ſame place which afterwards was called Hebron, a city in the land of Canaan, in the tribe of Judah, about 22 miles from Jeruſalem to the ſouth, and was one of the cities of refuge. Hebron has the title of Hhaleah, i. e. the choſen or beloved, among the Arabs, where the (Mag-gar-el Mamra) cave of Mamre or Machpelah is ſtill ſhown, and is always lighted up with lamps, and held in extraordinary veneration by the Mahometans[i].

℣. 20. And the field, and the cave that is therein, was made ſure to Abraham for a poſſeſſion of a burying-place, by the ſons of Heth.] Who were witneſſes of the tranſaction between Abraham and Ephron; and this was further made ſure by Sarah's being buried in it, which was taking poſſeſſion of it, for the uſe for which it was bought; and was a pledge and earneſt of the future poſſeſſion of the land of Canaan by the ſeed of Abraham: this was the firſt piece of ground in it poſſeſſed by Abraham and his ſeed; and it being called the poſſeſſion of a burying-place, ſhews that there is no contradiction between this and what Stephen ſays, Acts vii. 5. he had a poſſeſſion to bury in, but not to live upon; not any ground of his own to till and ſow, or build upon.

CHAP. XXIV.

THIS chapter ſhews Abraham's concern to get a ſuitable wife for his ſon Iſaac, for which purpoſe he commits the affair into the hands of his eldeſt ſervant, and makes him ſwear that he will not take one from among the Canaanites, but out of his own country, and from among his own kindred, ℣. 1—4. which his ſervant agreed to, after having the nature of his charge, and of the oath, explained to him, ℣. 5—9. upon which he departed to Meſopotamia, and coming to the city of Nahor, and to a well near it, he prayed for ſucceſs, and deſired direction by a token, which was granted him, ℣. 10—22. and enquiring of the damſel, who anſwered to the token, whoſe daughter ſhe was, and whether they had room for him and his in their houſe; and an agreeable anſwer being returned, he gave thanks to God that had directed him, and had ſo far made his journey proſperous, ℣. 23—27. the damſel acquainting her parents whom and what ſhe met with at the well, a brother of her ſteps out, and invites the ſervant in, and makes him welcome, ℣. 28—33. but before he would eat any thing, he tells his errand he was come upon, at the inſtance of his maſter; how he had prayed for direction, and was heard, and for which he had given thanks, ℣. 34—48. and then treats with the relations of the damſel about her marriage to his maſter's ſon, to which they agreed, ℣. 49, 50, 51. and after having bleſſed God, and given his preſents he brought with him to the damſel, and her family, and eat and drank with them, was for departing the next morning, ℣. 52, 53, 54. but the friends of the damſel being deſirous of her ſtay with them ſome few days, and he urgent to be gone, the affair was referred to her, and ſhe agreed to go with him directly, ℣. 55—58. upon which they diſmiſſed her with their bleſſing, ℣. 59, 60. who being met by Iſaac in the way, was received and introduced into his mother's tent, and married by him, ℣. 61—67.

℣. 1. And Abraham was old, and well ſtricken in age, &c.] Being now 140 years of age, for as he was 100 years old when Iſaac was born, and Iſaac was 40 years of age when he married Rebekah, which was at this time, Abraham muſt be of the age mentioned, ſee ch. xxi. 5. and xxv. 20. and the Lord had bleſſed Abraham in all things; with all kind of bleſſings, with temporal and ſpiritual bleſſings; the former ſeems chiefly deſigned here, becauſe of what follows; God had bleſſed him, as Aben Ezra obſerves, with long life, and riches, and honour, and children, things deſirable by men.

℣. 2. And Abraham ſaid unto his eldeſt ſervant of his houſe, &c.] To Eliezer his ſervant, according to the Targum of Jonathan, and as is generally thought; and who may well be called an old ſervant, and his oldeſt ſervant, ſince he muſt have lived with him 50 years and upwards; one may trace him near 60 years in Abraham's family, and it is highly probable he lived much longer; he was his ſervant when he had the viſion between the pieces, ch. xv. 2. and then he was the ſteward of his houſe, and bid fair to be his heir; which was ſome time before Hagar was given to Abraham; and Iſhmael his ſon by Hagar was 14 years of age when Iſaac was born, and he was now 40 years old, which make 55 years, or thereabout. Biſhop Uſher places the viſion of the pieces in A. M. 2092, and the marriage of Iſaac in 2148, 56 years from each other; and ſo long Eliezer, if he is the ſervant here meant, muſt have been in Abraham's family, and how much longer cannot with certainty be ſaid: that ruled over all that he had; had the care and manage-management of his houſe, and the affairs of it under him; this agrees with the character of Elieezer in ch. xv. 2: put, I pray thee, thy hand under my thigh; as a token of his ſubjection to him as a ſervant, and of his readineſs, willingneſs and fidelity to execute any commands he ſhould lay upon him, and in order to take an oath, as appears by what follows; for it ſeems this rite was uſed in ſwearing, and is ſtill uſed in India, as Aben Ezra affirms; and ſome ſay among the Ethiopians. The Jewiſh writers are pretty much of opinion, that reſpect is had to the covenant of circumciſion, by which Abraham made his ſervant to ſwear, which is not likely: rather reſpect is had to his ſeed, the promiſed Meſſiah, that ſhould ſpring from his thigh, by whom the adjuration was made, as follows: tho' Dr. Clayton [k] thinks this is no other than an equivalent term for approaching in an humble ſervile manner, and means no more than come near me, and I will make thee ſwear; and that, as a reſpectable method of approach with the Egyptians, as Herodotus [l] relates, was by bowing the body reciprocally when they met, and ſaluted one another, and by carrying their hands to each other's knee; ſo ſome ſuch like ceremony as embracing the knee, and putting the hand under or round the thigh, might be uſed by ſervants when they approached their maſters; but it ſhould be obſerved, that this ſame rite or ceremony was required of Joſeph, governor of Egypt, by his father Jacob; ſee Gen. xlvii. 29.

℣. 3. And I will make thee ſwear by the Lord, the God of heaven, and the God of earth, &c.] The maker and poſſeſſor of heaven and earth, by whom Abraham uſed to ſwear whenever he did, and by whom only men ſhould ſwear, ſee ch. xiv. 22. The Targum of Jonathan is, "I will make thee ſwear "by the name of the Word of the Lord God," which ſtrengthens the ſenſe given of the rite before obſerved: that thou wilt not take a wife unto my ſon of the daughters of the Canaanites, among whom I dwell; theſe being not only idolaters, and very wicked people, degenerated yet more and more, but were the ſeed of the accurſed Canaan; and who in proceſs of time would be diſpoſſeſſed of the land, and be deſtroyed. Now though Iſaac was forty years of age, and one would think at an age ſufficient to have choſe a wife for himſelf; but as Abraham knew that he had a great reſpect for this ſervant, and would be influenced by him in ſuch a choice, and eſpecially as this affair was now about to be committed to his care, and no doubt with the conſent of Iſaac, therefore he thus charges and adjures him.

℣. 4. But thou ſhalt go unto my country, &c.] Not Canaan, which though his by promiſe, yet not in poſſeſſion, but Meſopotamia, as appears from ℣. 10. which taken largely included the Chaldea, ſee Acts vii. 2. the country where Abraham was born, and from whence he came: and to my kindred; the family of Nahor his brother, which now dwelt at Haran in Meſopotamia, called the city of Nahor, ℣. 10. ſee ch. xxix. 4, 5. of the increaſe of whoſe family Abraham had heard a few years ago, ch. xxii. 20—24: and take a wife to my ſon Iſaac; from among them, who though they were not clear of ſuperſtition and idolatry, yet they worſhipped the true God with their idols; and a woman taken out of ſuch a family, and removed at a diſtance from it, it might be reaſonably concluded would be brought off of thoſe things, and adhere to the pure and undefiled religion; and the rather this family was choſen, not only becauſe related to Abraham, but becauſe it ſprung from Shem, who was bleſſed of God, and whoſe God the Lord was; nearneſs of kin was no objection and hindrance to ſuch a marriage, the laws relating to marriage not being given till the times of Moſes.

℣. 5. And the ſervant ſaid unto him, &c.] Before he would take the oath, being cautious of it, and deſirous of knowing how far it reached, and what it would or would not oblige him to, which was prudently done: peradventure the woman will not be willing to follow me into this land; ſuppoſing this ſhould be the caſe, as it is not unlikely that the woman would object to coming along with him to the land of Canaan, and inſiſt upon Iſaac's coming into her country, and dwelling there, what muſt then be done? muſt I needs bring thy ſon again unto the land from whence thou cameſt? that is, muſt I agree with the woman on theſe terms, and promiſe that Iſaac ſhall come and dwell with her in Meſopotamia? Now there was good reaſon for the ſervant's putting this queſtion, ſince he was neither ignorant of the call of Abraham out of that land, no more to return to it, nor of the promiſe of the land of Canaan to him and his poſterity: and as for bringing Iſaac again, where he never had been in perſon, this may be accounted for by his being in the loins of Abraham when he was there, and came from thence, as Levi is ſaid to be in his loins when he paid tithes to Melchizedek, and to pay them in him, Heb. vii. 9, 10. and in like manner he might be ſaid to be brought again, or return to Abraham's country, ſhould he ever go there, as all the ſeed of Abraham are ſaid in the fourth generation to come to Canaan again, though they had none of them been in perſon there before, Gen. xv. 16. beſides, as Druſius obſerves, to bring again or return, ſignifies ſometimes only to bring on, or to go to ſome certain place, ſee Ruth i. 10, 22. however, the juſtneſs of the expreſſion is confirmed by Abraham's anſwer in the next words.

℣. 6. And Abraham ſaid unto him, &c.] Not blaming him for putting ſuch a queſtion, nor charging him with impertinence, but plainly ſeeing the propriety of it: and in order to clear up this matter to him, gives the following inſtructions, beware thou, that thou bring not my ſon thither again; for the command to come out of the land of Chaldea, never to return more, and to come into the land of Canaan, and there abide, reſpected both Abraham and his poſterity; and beſides, it was dangerous for Iſaac to go into a family where though there was ſome knowledge of the true God, yet there was much ſuperſtition and idolatry in it, as appears by various hints in the ſequel of this hiſtory, leſt he ſhould be corrupted, and degenerate from the true religion.

℣. 7. The Lord God of heaven, which took me from my father's houſe, and from the land of my kindred, &c.] Jarchi diſtinguiſhes between his father's houſe, and the land of his kindred; the former he takes to be Haran, in which he ſeems to be right; for his father and his family came with him from Ur of the Chaldees to Haran, and there ſtayed, from whence Abraham was taken and ſeparated from them; by the latter he underſtands Ur of the Chaldees, interpreting the phraſe of the land in which he was born, as Onkelos and Jonathan, and the Septuagint verſion render it: but the ſame is meant as before, for Haran was the land of

of his kindred, where Terah his father died, and Nahor his brother and family lived; from whence he was taken and removed into the land of Canaan, by the call, direction and providence of the Lord God, who made the heavens, and dwels therein: which ſpake unto me, and that ſwore unto me; made a promiſe to him, and confirmed it with an oath, ch. XV. 18. and XXII. 16, 17: ſaying, unto thy ſeed will I give this land; the land of Canaan; and therefore his ſon, in whom his ſeed was to be called, muſt not be removed from hence, and ſettled in another country: he ſhall ſend his angel before thee; Aben Ezra takes this to be a prayer or wiſh, may he ſend his angel before thee; for if it was a prophecy, he adds, why did he ſay if the woman will not be willing? but from ℣. 10. and from what follows, that the ſervant ſhould take a wife to his ſon from thence, and the encouragement he had for his faith in it, and from what God had done for him, and ſaid unto him; it ſeems as if he was fully aſſured in his own mind of the event: this angel may be either underſtood of a created angel, ſuch being frequently made uſe of in the affairs of Providence, directing and ſucceeding men, or of the increated angel the Son of God, ſince the ſervant attributes his direction and ſucceſs wholly to the Lord.

℣. 8. And if the woman will not be willing to follow thee, &c.] Or but if [m], which is ſaid by Abraham, not as doubting ſhe would be willing, of which he was ſatisfied, being perſuaded that that God that had made him willing to leave his own country, and his father's houſe, would make her willing to do the like, and come and ſettle with his ſon in the land that God had given him; but this, and what follows, he ſaid to make the mind of his ſervant eaſy, who had ſome doubt about it, or however was deſirous of knowing how he muſt act ſhould that be the caſe, and what it was he was to take an oath to do, and how far, and how far not that would oblige him: then thou ſhalt be clear from this my oath; which he enjoined his ſervant to take; the ſenſe is, when he had done all he could to get the conſent of the damſel, and her friends, to go with him and marry his maſter's ſon; and after all ſhe could not be prevailed upon to come with him, then he was free from his oath, having done all that that obliged him to, and he not attempting to take one from any other quarter: only bring not my ſon thither again; neither agree with the damſel and her parents, that he ſhall come to them, nor perſuade him to comply with ſuch terms.

℣. 9. And the ſervant put his hand under the thigh of Abraham his maſter, &c.] Or then or therefore the ſervant, &c. [n] being ſatisfied of the nature and extent of his oath, and thoroughly underſtanding how he was to act upon it, readily took it by uſing this rite, ſee the note on ℣. 2: and ſware to him concerning that matter; of taking a wife to his ſon, engaging to do every thing he had directed and enjoined him relative to it.

℣. 10. And the ſervant took ten camels, of the camels of his maſter, and departed, &c.] Camels were much in uſe in the eaſtern countries; where, as Pliny [o] ſays, they were brought up among their herds of cattle, and their riches much conſiſted in them. Arabia abounded with them; Job had three thouſand of them; how many Abraham had is not ſaid, only ten of them his ſervant took, being ſufficient for his preſent purpoſe, and which he took with his maſter's leave, and by his order. Theſe creatures are very ſtrong and fit for carrying great burdens, even a thouſand pound weight, as is affirmed; and for riding, eſpecially ſuch as have two bunches on their backs, for ſome have but one; and for long journeys, being very ſwift, and will travel without water many days, and ſo very proper to take on ſuch journeys in hot and deſart countries, ſee the note on Lev. xi. 4. for all the goods of his maſter were in his hand; which agrees with what is before ſaid, that he was the ſteward of his houſe, and ruled over all that he had; this in our verſion, and others, is put in a parentheſis, and given as a reaſon why the ſervant took, as it may ſeem of himſelf, ſo many camels as he did, and then ſet forward on his journey: though it may be rendered, and of all the goods of his maſter in his hand; that is, he took ſome of the choiceſt and moſt valuable things his maſter had, and carried them along with him as preſents to the damſel and her friends; to which ſenſe the Septuagint and Vulgate Latin verſions interpret the words, as well as ſome others, and which may receive confirmation from ℣. 22, 53. Jarchi thinks, that Abraham's ſervant carried a ſchedule of all his maſter's goods and ſubſtance, which he had under his hand given to his ſon, whereby it would appear how rich he was, and how good a match Iſaac would be to the woman, and which might the more incline her and her friends to liſten to the propoſal. Other Jewiſh writers [p] ſay, it was his teſtament or will that he carried: and he aroſe, and went to Meſopotamia; or Aram Naharaim, Syria of the rivers, which lay between the two rivers Tigris and Euphrates, called therefore by the Greeks Meſopotamia; the three Targums render it Aram or Syria, which is by Euphrates: unto the city of Nahor; this was the brother of Abraham, and his city was Haran, whither he came, either with his father, or with Abraham, out of Ur of the Chaldees, or followed them thither, and where he and his family ſtayed and ſettled. From Hebron, where Abraham now was, to Haran, is reckoned a journey of 17 days; the diſtance between them, according to Ptolemy, as Druſius obſerves, were 8 degrees, which make 120 German miles; the journey Abraham's ſervant took is computed to be 468 miles [q].

℣. 11. And he made his camels to kneel down, &c.] Which theſe creatures are uſed to do when they are loaded and unloaded, and alſo when they take reſt, and it was for the ſake of the latter they were now made to kneel. It ſeems that this is what is not natural to them, but what they are learned to do: it is ſaid [r], "as ſoon as a camel is born they tie "his four feet under his belly, put a carpet over "his back, and ſtones upon the borders of it, that "he may not be able to riſe for 20 days together; "thus they teach him the habit of bending his "knees to reſt himſelf, or when he is to be loaded or unloaded." This was done without the city; the city of Nahor, Haran, near to which the ſervant was now come: and it was by a well of water; which place was choſen for the refreſhment of his camels, as well as of himſelf and his men. Rauwolf [s] ſays, that near Haran, now called Orpha, "there is a plentiful well ſtill to this day (1575) "called Abraham's well, the water of which hath "a more whitiſh troubledneſs than others. I have, "ſays he, drank of it ſeveral times, out of the "con-

" conduit that runs from thence into the middle of " the great camp, and it hath a peculiar pleasant- " ness, and a pleasant sweetness in its taste." The time of Abraham's servant coming hither was at the time of the evening, even the time that women go out to draw water; which was the custom for women to do, for the necessary uses of their families; as it was especially in the eastern countries: and the Arabian women to this time, after they have been hard at work all day, weaving, or grinding, or making bread, at evening they set out with a pitcher or a goat's skin, and, tying their sucking children behind them, trudge it in this manner 2 or 3 miles to fetch water [t].

℣. 12. And he said, O Lord God of my master Abraham, &c.] He does not call the Lord his God, though no doubt he was, since he appears throughout the whole to be a good man; but the God of Abraham, because God had often manifested and renewed his covenant with Abraham in an eminent manner, and had bestowed many favours upon him, and admitted him to much nearness and communion with him; and it was not on his own account, but on his master's business he now was: I pray thee, send me good speed this day; or cause something to happen before me this day [u]; some extraordinary event, which depends not upon the will, or skill, or contrivance of men, but upon the pleasure of God; and which, with respect to second causes, men call hap or chance, but with respect to God, is according to his determinate counsel and will. The Targum of Jonathan is, " pre- " pare now a decent wife before me this day." But the servant's meaning is, that something might turn up in providence that would lead on to such an event: and shew kindness unto my master Abraham; which he would be ready to acknowledge as a favour, an instance of kindness and mercy, and not merit.

℣. 13. Behold, I stand here by the well of water, &c.] Wishing, hoping, and expecting that something would turn out that would direct and instruct what further to do, and that would lead on to the business he came about: and the daughters of the men of the city came out to draw water; which was the usual custom in those parts about that time. So Homer speaks [w] of meeting a girl before the city υδρευουσαν drawing or fetching water. And this was a principal reason why Abraham's servant stopped at the well, not only to refresh himself, his men, and his cattle, but in hopes he should meet with the damsel there he was come for; or at least should hear of her, or meet with some one or another that would direct him to her; or something would fall out there that would be a means in providence of bringing about what he was sent to do.

℣. 14. And let it come to pass, that the damsel to whom I shall say, let down thy pitcher, I pray thee, that I may drink, &c.] The pitcher of water she should have upon her shoulder, after she had drawn it out of the well: and she shall say, drink, and I will give thy camels drink also; not only very readily and courteously invite him to drink himself, but also propose to draw water for his camels too: let the same be she that thou hast appointed for thy servant Isaac; to be his wife; he desired this might be the token by which he might know who the person was God had appointed, and whom he approved of as a proper wife for Isaac, and whom he pointed at in his providence most clearly to be the person he had designed for him; and this was a very agreeable sign and token; for hereby he would know that she was a careful and industrious person, willing to set her hand to business when necessary; that she was humane and courteous to strangers; humble and condescending, and willing to do the meanest offices for the good of others; and such a wife as this he sought for, and knew would be a good one, and greatly acceptable to his master and to his son: and thereby shall I know that thou hast shewed kindness to my master; by directing to so good a wife for his son, and prospering the journey of his servant according to his wishes.

℣. 15. And it came to pass before he had done speaking, &c.] In his heart, ℣. 45. for his prayer was mental; whilst the last words were dropping from him, that very moment, as the Targum of Jonathan; so soon were his prayers heard and answered, Is. lxv. 24: that behold Rebekah came out; out of Haran, the city of Nahor: who was born to Bethuel son of Milcah, the wife of Nahor, Abraham's brother; a daughter of Bethuel, which Bethuel was the eighth and last son of Milcah, and who was the daughter of Haran and the wife of Nahor, both brothers to Abraham: this is the genealogy of Rebekah, and for the sake of her is the account of Nahor's family given, ch. xxii. 20, 24: with her pitcher upon her shoulder; to fetch water from the well for the use of the family; which, though the daughter of a wealthy person, she did not disdain to do; an instance of diligence and humility this.

℣. 16. And the damsel was very fair to look upon, &c.] Of a good countenance and beautiful aspect: a virgin, neither had any man known her; not only was reckoned a virgin, but was really one, pure and incorrupt: and she went down to the well and filled her pitcher, and came up; by which it appears the well lay low, there was a descent unto it, and an ascent from it. Rebekah was very diligent and speedy in doing her work, she did not stay to look at strangers, or hold an idle conversation with other damsels that came thither on the same account; but, having filled her pitcher, was making the best of her way home.

℣. 17. And the servant ran to meet her, &c.] He did not stop her as she went to the well, but stayed till she had been there and filled her pitcher, and then he made all the haste he could to meet her, in order to have the sign and token answered he had requested, which could not be done until she returned: and said, let me, I pray thee, drink a little water of thy pitcher; or taste a little of it, as the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan; or suffer me to swallow a little of it; for it was not so much to quench his thirst that he asked for this, for he could have got, and perhaps had had water out of the well before this time, or however could easily have supplied himself; but this was done to try whether she was the person, and whether her conduct and carriage would answer the token. Josephus [x] says, he asked other virgins and they refused him, for which churlishness Rebekah rebuked them, and gave him water liberally.

℣. 18. And she said, drink, my Lord, &c.] Signifying at once that he was welcome to drink what he would, giving him a very honourable title, observing that he had a pretty large retinue with him of men and camels; so that she took him for some considerable personage: and let down her pitcher upon her hand; from off her shoulder, and let it rest upon her hand or arm: and gave him drink; let him drink what he would of it.

[t] Shaw's Travels, p. 241. Ed. 2. [u] הקרה נא לפני occurere fac nunc coram me, Pagninus, Montanus, Vatablus; so Junius & Tremellius, Schmidt, Ainsworth. [w] Odyss. 10. ℣. 109. [x] Antiq. l. 1. c. 16. § 2.

℣. 19. And when ſhe had done giving him drink, &c.] Whatever he pleaſed to have: ſhe ſaid, I will draw water for thy camels alſo, until they have done drinking; ſhe propoſed to go back to the well, and did, and fill her pitcher, and repeat it as often as was neceſſary, until the camels had enough; and this now was the ſign or token the ſervant had deſired might be, by which he would know who was the perſon intended for the wife of his maſter's ſon; and this was granted him, which ſhews that it was not a raſh and ill thing which he aſked, but what was agreeable to the will of God, and to which he was directed by an impulſe of his.

℣. 20. And ſhe haſted and emptied her pitcher into the trough, &c.] The place out of which cattle drank water, being put there for that purpoſe, which was of wood or of ſtones made hollow; into this Rebekah poured out what was left in her pitcher after the ſervant had drank: and ran again to the well to draw water; and which muſt be repeated ſeveral times to have enough for all the camels, for it follows: and drew for all his camels; and there were ten of them; and theſe, being thirſty after ſo long a journey, required a great deal of water to ſatisfy them; therefore Rebekah muſt take a vaſt deal of pains and labour to draw water for them all until they had enough.

℣. 21. And the man wondering at her, &c.] At her affability and courteouſneſs to a ſtranger; at her humility and condeſcenſion to take upon her ſuch a ſervice; at her readineſs, diligence, and laborioufneſs in it, and the quick diſpatch ſhe made; and at her expreſſions and conduct being ſo exactly agreeable to the token he deſired to have; and at the providence of God in bringing him to this place ſo ſeaſonably; and at the damſel, that ſhe ſhould come juſt at this time, and every way anſwer his expectations and deſires: held his peace to wit; or to know, to think and conſider further with himſelf, whether or if the Lord had made his journey proſperous or not, or if not; he was muſing and ſaying within himſelf, ſurely God had made his journey proſperous; or if not, how was it that ſuch ſtrange ſurprizing circumſtances ſhould occur? or what elſe muſt be done by him? or what methods muſt be taken for the future?

℣. 22. And it came to paſs when the camels had done drinking, &c.] Having had enough to abate their thirſt and ſatisfy them, by means of Rebekah's drawing water for them: that he took a golden earring; out of his pocket, or out of a box or parcel that was upon the camels; it is in the margin of our bibles, a jewel for the forehead; or, as ſome render it, a noſe-jewel [y]; and ſo in ℣. 47. an earring upon her face, or noſe; and this was a jewel that hung from the forehead upon a lace or ribband between the eyes down upon the noſe; and ſuch the daughters of Sion wore in after-times, Iſ. iii. 21. ſee Ezek. xvi. 12. and noſe-jewels are ſtill in uſe with the Levant Arabs, as Dr. Shaw [z] relates. Rauwolff [a], who travelled through Meſopotamia and the parts adjacent in 1574, ſays of the women in thoſe parts that are of greater ſubſtance, and have a mind to be richer and finer in their dreſs, that they wear ſilver and gold rings in one of their noſtrils, wherein are ſet garnets, turquois, rubies, and pearls: and in Egypt they wear noſe-jewels [b] and ſmall gold rings in their right noſtrils, with a piece of coral ſet in them [c]: and this earring or jewel was of half a ſhekel weight; which was 80 barley-corns, for a whole ſhekel weighed 160. The Targum of Jonathan is, "the weight "of a drachma, which was the half of a di-"drachma or common ſhekel:" and two bracelets for her hands, of ten ſhekels weight of gold; a ſhekel of gold, according to Calmet [d], was worth 18 ſhillings and 3 pence of Engliſh money, ſo that 10 of them amount to 9 pounds 2 ſhillings and 6 pence: according to Waſerus [e], theſe made 20 Hungarian pieces of gold, which were worth upwards of 90 pounds of Swiſs money. A handſome preſent this was, and ſuitable to a virgin. Jarchi and Jonathan allegorize the 2 bracelets of the 2 tables of the law, and the 10 ſhekels of the 10 commands on them.

℣. 23. And ſaid, &c.] After he had given her the ear-rings and the bracelets, he put the following queſtion, according to Jarchi, and ſo our verſion ſeems to intimate the ſame; but, as it is related in ℣. 47. the queſtion was put before thoſe were given, therefore ſome render the words, and he had ſaid, or, and after he had ſaid [f], namely, what follows; though, as Schmidt obſerves, the matter is eaſily reconciled, and both accounts ſtand clear and plain, if it be only remarked, that he took out the ear-ring and bracelets before he put the queſtion, but it was after it that he gave her them, or put them upon her: whoſe daughter art thou? the reaſon of this queſtion is, becauſe by her anſwer to it he would know whether ſhe was of the family related to Abraham or no; from whom only, according to his oath, he was to take a wife for Iſaac, and which would in a good meaſure ſatisfy him as to what he had been muſing about, whether the Lord had made his journey proſperous or not: tell me, I pray thee, is there room in thy father's houſe for us to lodge in? by her anſwer to this he would know whether her family was wealthy, and ſo fit to be in connexion with his maſter's; and beſides, if ſhe appeared to be the perſon he hoped ſhe was, he was deſirous of lodging in her father's houſe, that he might have the better opportunity of managing the affair he was come about.

℣. 24. And ſhe ſaid unto him, I am the daughter of Bethuel the ſon of Milcah, &c.] Which Milcah was the daughter of Haran, Abraham's elder brother, and, as thought by many, ſiſter to Sarah Abraham's wife, ſee Gen. xi. 29: which ſhe bare unto Nahor; Abraham's brother; ſo that her father was Nahor's ſon, not by his concubine Reumah, but by his lawful wife Milcah, which ſets Rebekah's deſcent in a true light, ſee ch. xxii. 20—24. whether ſhe told her own name is not certain, it may be, ſince the ſervant had it, ℣. 45.

℣. 25. She ſaid moreover unto him, &c.] In anſwer to the ſecond queſtion: we have both ſtraw and provender enough; for the camels, ſtraw for their litter, and provender for their food, as hay, barley, &c. and room to lodge in; for him and his men; this ſhe could venture to ſay, and invite him to come and take up his quarters in her father's houſe, without going home to relate the queſtion put to her, and to have leave to give the invitation, knowing full well the generoſity, liberality, and hoſpitable ſpirit of her father.

℣. 26. And the man bowed down his head, &c.] To ſhew what a deep ſenſe he had of the divine goodneſs, and in humble acknowledgment of the favours favours he had received in being thus providentially directed: and worshipped the Lord; gave thanks unto him, that he had thus far prospered him, hoping and believing that things were in good forwardness, according to his master's mind and will.

℣. 27. And he said, blessed be the Lord God of my master Abraham, &c.] See the note on ℣. 12: who hath not left destitute my master of his mercy and truth; or hath not withdrawn his mercy, grace and goodness, truth and faithfulness; for his loving-kindness he does not take away from his people, nor suffer his faithfulness to fail; his mercy and grace in making kind and gracious promises continue, and his truth in performing them sooner or later appear, and both in this case; as Abraham believed in the grace and goodness of God, that he would send his angel and direct his servant, and make his way prosperous, here was now an appearance of his truth and faithfulness, in making good the promise or prophecy on which Abraham's faith was built, see ℣. 7: I being in the way; by the way of the well; in the right way, as Jarchi, in which he was directed; in the way of his duty, following the steps of divine providence, and observing them. It is good to be in the way which God directs to and prescribes, especially in religious things, where the blessing and presence of God may be expected: the Lord led me to the house of my master's brethren; Nahor, whose grand-daughter Rebekah was, was Abraham's brother, and Bethuel her father might be called so, as Lot was, who stood in the same relation to Abraham as he did, ch. xiv. 16. and, though the servant was not as yet come to the house where they lived, he had met with one of the family, and had got an invitation to it, and was on his way thither and near it.

℣. 28. And the damsel ran, &c.] Having invited him to come and lodge at her father's house, that he might not be brought in abruptly, she ran before to acquaint the family of what had passed: and told them of her mother's house these things; she did not go to her father to inform him of it; some think he was dead, as Josephus [g], but the contrary appears from ℣. 50. rather the reason was, because her mother had an house, tent, or apartment to herself, as women in those times and places used to have, see ℣. 67. and because daughters are generally more free to converse with their mothers and impart things to them than to their fathers, which may be the true reason of Rebekah's conduct.

℣. 29. And Rebekah had a brother, and his name was Laban, &c.] Perhaps he was her only brother, or however the elder brother, the principal in the family, her father Bethuel being old: and Laban ran out; out of his house, and out of the city of Haran: unto the man unto the well; this was after Rebekah had got home and had related to the family whom she had met with at the well, and what had passed between them, as follows:

℣. 30. And it came to pass, when he saw the earring, and bracelets upon his sister's hands, &c.] From whence he concluded that he was a rich and generous man she had met with, and might hope to receive a gift also upon giving him an invitation to his house; or however might judge he should be no loser by receiving him kindly and entertaining him generously; therefore it was that he made haste and ran to him to bring him in; for that Laban was of a covetous disposition, appears from the whole story of him: and when he heard the words of Rebekah his sister, saying, thus spake the man unto me; enquiring whose daughter she was, and whether there was any room in her father's house for him and those that were with him to lodge in: that he came unto the man; made haste and ran till he came to him: and behold he stood by the camels at the well; he did not follow Rebekah, but kept still at the well, expecting somebody would come out of the house and give him an invitation into it, upon Rebekah's representation of him.

℣. 31. And he said, come in, thou blessed of the Lord, &c.] Both with temporal and spiritual blessings; he concluded he was blessed with the former by the presents he had made to his sister, and by the men that attended him, and the number of camels that were with him; and with the latter by his devotion, his worshipping of God, and thankfulness to him, which Rebekah had observed and related: some Jewish writers say [h], he thought he was Abraham, and therefore gave him this title and this invitation to come into the house: wherefore standest thou without? this he said either as reproving him that he did not follow his sister upon her invitation, or rather as pressing him to make no more delay: for I have prepared the house; swept it clean, or ordered it to be so, as the word [i] signifies; had fitted and furnished it with every thing convenient for him and those with him: Jonathan and Jarchi interpret it, of purging the house from idols and strange worship, which he knew would be offensive to Abraham or any that belonged to him; but the former sense is best: and room for the camels; he had ordered the stable to be cleansed also, and every thing provided there fit for the camels; so that some time elapsed between Rebekah's return home and Laban's coming to the well, tho' no doubt every thing was done with as much dispatch as possible.

℣. 32. And the man came into the house, &c.] Upon the pressing instance made unto him; for so it may be rendered, wherefore the man came, &c. [k] and he ungirded his camels; took off their bridles, which hindered them from eating, as the Targum of Jonathan and Jarchi; or loosed their girts and took off their burdens, that they might have rest: this may be interpreted either of the servant and of his men by his order doing this, it being the first thing that travellers do when they come to an inn to take care of their cattle; or rather of Laban, as what follows must be interpreted of him: and gave straw and provender for the camels; straw for their litter and provender to eat; this Laban did, or ordered to be done: the Targum of Jonathan expresses his name, and no doubt he is intended, for who should give these but he? and water to wash his feet, and the men's feet that were with him; which was usually done to strangers and travellers in those hot countries, see ch. xviii. 4. The Vulgate Latin version is, and water to wash the feet of the camels; which, though it is possible might be done, yet is without any foundation in the text.

℣. 33. And there was set meat before them to eat, &c.] By the order of Bethuel or Laban, or both; or, afterwards was set [l]; that is, after care had been taken of the camels, then food being provided was set before the men to refresh them: but he said, I will not eat, until I have told mine errand; or, or, ſpoke my words [m]; delivered the meſſage he was ſent with, and declared the buſineſs he came about; which ſhews him to be a diligent faithful ſervant, who had his maſter's intereſt at heart, and preferred it to his neceſſary food: and he ſaid; either Bethuel or Laban, for both were preſent, to whom the ſervant directed his diſcourſe, ℣. 47, 50. perhaps Laban ſpoke in the name of his father, and bid him ſpeak on; go on with his diſcourſe until he had ſaid all he had to ſay, ſignifying that they were ready to give attention to him.

℣. 34. And he ſaid, I am Abraham's ſervant, &c.] Not Abraham himſelf, this undeceived Laban, if he ſo thought, but a ſervant of his; which was enough to introduce his diſcourſe, his maſter being a near relation of theirs, and well known to them by name, if not in perſon.

℣. 35. And the Lord hath bleſſed my maſter greatly, &c.] With temporal bleſſings, after enumerated, which are of God, and are here aſcribed to him, the father, fountain, author, and giver of all ſuch mercies: and he is become great; in the world, and highly honoured and eſteemed among men: and he hath given him flocks and herds, and ſilver and gold, and men-ſervants and maid-ſervants, and camels and aſſes; though many of them were obtained in the diligent uſe of means, yet with the bleſſing of God; and others were the gifts of princes to him, as of Pharaoh king of Egypt, and Abimelech king of Gerar; yet, as it was the Lord that put it into their hearts to be ſo liberal to him, they are here called his gifts; ſee ch. xii. 16. and xiii. 2. and xx. 14.

℣. 36. And Sarah my maſter's wife, &c.] Who muſt be well known to this family, by name at leaſt, being, as is generally ſuppoſed, the ſiſter of Milcah, Nahor's wife, and Bethuel's mother; the ſame bare a ſon to my maſter when ſhe was old; even when 90 years of age; this is mentioned becauſe it was an extraordinary thing, and an inſtance of divine power and of the favour of God; and this ſon of their old age muſt be very dear unto Abraham, as it follows: and unto him hath he given all that he hath; by his will: Jarchi ſays, the ſervant had now the ſchedule of all in his hands, which he ſhewed; but this is mere conjecture.

℣. 37. And my maſter made me ſwear, &c.] From hence to the end of ℣. 41. the ſervant relates the oath his maſter made him take, and the charge he gave him, much in the ſame language as in ℣. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8. ſee the notes there.

℣. 42. And I came this day unto the well, &c.] Hither he was come at length by ſeveral days journey; not on the ſame day he came from Abraham, as the Jewiſh writers ſay [n], by means of a miracle: and ſaid, O Lord God of my maſter Abraham; being come to the well, he prayed as follows: if now thou do proſper the way which I go; his meaning is, that if it was the pleaſure of God that he ſhould ſucceed in what he was come about, that he would let him know it by a token; and from hence to the end of ℣. 48. he relates the token he deſired, which was granted him, and his ſucceſs, as before recorded, from ℣. 21. to 27. ſee the notes there.

℣. 49. And now, if you deal kindly and truly with my maſter, tell me, &c.] The ſervant directs himſelf to more than one, to the whole family, eſpecially to Laban and Bethuel; if you will do my maſter a kindneſs, and grant him the favour he requeſts, that a damſel of this family may be given for a wife to his ſon; and, if you are hearty and ſincere in granting this, tell me at once: and if not, tell me; if you do not chuſe to gratify my maſter, and are not hearty in this matter, let me know: that I may turn to the right hand or to the left; look out elſewhere among the daughters of ſome of the other ſons of Nahor; for he had 7 more which Milcah bare to him beſides Bethuel, as well as 4 others by a concubine, ch. xxii. 20—24. though ſome of the Jewiſh writers [o] by the right hand underſtand the daughters of Iſhmael, that dwelt to the right, and by the left hand the daughters of Lot, who were to the left, which is not likely: it ſeems to be only a proverbial expreſſion, that, if they did not chuſe to attend to his propoſal in his maſter's name, he muſt take ſome other method, as he might be directed; he knew not for the preſent which way, whether he ſhould ſteer his courſe to the right or left, but ſome way he muſt take. The Targum of Jonathan paraphraſes it, "to the ſouth or to the north;" becauſe when a man ſtands with his face to the eaſt, the ſouth is on his right hand and the north on his left.

℣. 50. Then Laban and Bethuel anſwered, &c.] The order of the words in the original is, then anſwered Laban and Bethuel; the word for anſwered is in the ſingular number, from whence it may be concluded, that Laban gave the anſwer in the name of Bethuel, he conſenting to it, who might be an old man, and left the management of his family-affairs to his ſon, who, Aben Ezra thinks, excelled his father in wiſdom and honour; but Jarchi repreſents him as a wicked and impudent man, who took upon him to ſpeak before his father: but ſome have thought that this Bethuel was not old Bethuel, the father of Rebekah, but young Bethuel his ſon, the younger brother of Laban and Rebekah, their father Bethuel being dead, as Joſephus ſays, before obſerved; and this ſeems to be countenanced by ℣. 59. and 60. where they are repreſented as bleſſing Rebekah and calling her their ſiſter: and ſaid, the thing proceedeth from the Lord; that Rebekah ſhould be given to Iſaac, as the Targum of Jonathan adds: this matter appears to be according to his will and pleaſure, he ſeems to have appointed it in his decree, and to be bringing it about by his providence; for theſe men, though they were in part idolaters, yet had ſome good notions of the true God, and of his government of the world, and of his ordering all things in it according to the counſel of his will: we cannot ſpeak unto thee good or bad; cannot deny the requeſt; the thing was ſo plain that they had not any thing to object to it.

℣. 51. Behold, Rebekah is before thee, &c.] Not only was preſent, but ſhe was delivered to him, or his requeſt was granted: take her, and go, and let her be thy maſter's ſon's wife; not that they meant he ſhould go away directly with her; for they afterwards ſolicit her ſtay with them ſome time; but they agreed that he ſhould have her and conduct her to Iſaac, to be taken by him for his wife: as the Lord hath ſpoken; for ſo they underſtood the token given to the ſervant to know her by, as the determination of God.

℣. 52. And it came to paſs, that when Abraham's ſervant heard theſe words, &c.] That Laban and Bethuel ſaid; and no doubt but the mother of Rebekah, and ſhe herſelf conſented that ſhe ſhould be the wife of Iſaac, believing it was agreeable to the will of God: he worſhipped the Lord; bowing himſelf himſelf to the earth; in the moſt humble manner, he proſtrated himſelf before the Lord, acknowledging his kindneſs and goodneſs, his faithfulneſs and truth, his power and his providence in this affair.

℣. 53. And the ſervant brought forth jewels of ſilver, and jewels of gold, &c.] Ornaments for women, which he had brought along with him for preſents, and which were a proof of the riches of his maſter, and of his generoſity and liberality, who had furniſhed him with ſuch a profuſion of rich things to beſtow on the perſon that ſhould be got for his ſon's wife: and raiment, and gave them to Rebekah; coſtly ſuits of clothes, ſuch as in thoſe times were given to perſons at their marriage, or in order to it; and which cuſtom ſtill continues among the Arabs, who, as Dr. Shaw ſays [p], have the marriage-contract previouſly made between the parents, wherein is expreſs mention made not only of the Saddock, as they call that particular ſum which the bridegroom ſettles on the bride; but of the ſeveral changes of raiment, and the quantity of jewels, and the number of ſlaves that the bride is to be attended with when ſhe firſt waits upon her huſband; a gold and ſilver Sarmah, he ſays [q], which is a thin flexible plate of gold or ſilver of a triangular ſhape, artfully cut through and engraven in imitation of lace; one or two ſetts of ear-rings, bracelets and ſhekels, a gold chain to hang over their breaſts, with half a dozen veſts; ſome of brocades, others of rich ſilk, were uſually the wedding-clothes of a lady of faſhion. And ſo in Barbary, the man buys his bride a ſuit of apparel, ear-rings, bracelets, a cheſt, &c. and gives the father a conſiderable ſum of money, according to the qualities and circumſtances of the parties [r]: and he gave alſo to her brother, and to her mother, precious things; things of worth and value, which were part of the good things he brought with him from Abraham, ℣. 10. the word being ſometimes uſed for fruit, Jarchi interprets it of various kinds of the fruits [s] of the land of Iſrael; but it is not likely that theſe ſhould be carried by him on ſo long a journey; much better Aben Ezra underſtands by them honourable and coſtly raiment; and it is obſerved by ſome [t], that the word in general ſignifies every thing valuable and excellent, as gold, ſilver, &c. no mention being made of her father, only of her brother Laban, and of her mother, ſeems to confirm the notion of Joſephus that he was dead; or however he concerned himſelf no further in this affair than to give his conſent to the marriage, and left every thing elſe to his wife and ſon to take care of, and therefore the preſents are only made to them.

℣. 54. And they did eat and drink, he, and the men that were with him, &c.] Every thing being ſettled with reſpect to the affair he came about, he then ſat down at table, and eat of the proviſions ſet before him; he and the men that came along with him, and refreſhed themſelves: and tarried all night; lodged there all night: and they roſe up in the morning; the ſervant and his men: and he ſaid, ſend me away to my maſter; either to Abraham, who was waiting to hear what ſucceſs his ſervant would have; or to Iſaac, who alſo was ſolicitous about the matter: the ſenſe is, that he deſired leave to go away, and begged he might not be detained any longer, having now done the buſineſs he came about; ſtill ſhewing himſelf a diligent faithful ſervant, heartily and ſincerely attached to his maſter's intereſt, and not conſulting his own eaſe and pleaſure, which might have been indulged by ſtaying longer in a family, where he would have been entertained in a ſumptuous manner.

℣. 55. And her brother and her mother ſaid, &c.] Here her brother Laban is ſet before his mother, as above before his father, being the chief ſpeaker and the principal manager of buſineſs: let the damſel abide with us a few days, at the leaſt ten; which was but a reaſonable requeſt; and if no more time is intended, it is much the ſervant ſhould object, and not readily agree to it; but in the margin it is, a full year or ten months; and ſo Onkelos and Jonathan, and other Jewiſh writers [u], who ſay it was cuſtomary for a virgin to have 12 months allowed her to furniſh herſelf with ornaments; and therefore if a full year could not be admitted of, it is requeſted that at leaſt ten months would be granted: this by many is thought to be unreaſonable, that a ſervant ſhould be deſired to ſtay ſo long from his maſter, and eſpecially it would not be aſked, when it was perceived he was in ſuch haſte to be gone directly; but when it is obſerved that it was the uſual cuſtom of thoſe times, for virgins eſpouſed to continue in their father's houſe a conſiderable time before the marriage was conſummated, and that Rebekah was going into a diſtant country, and very likely ſhe and her friends would never ſee each other, the motion will not appear ſo very extravagant: after that ſhe ſhall go; when that time is elapſed, but cannot think of it before.

℣. 56. And he ſaid unto them, hinder me not, &c.] Don't detain me, let me ſet forward on my journey: ſaying, the Lord hath proſpered my way; ſucceeded him in what he came about; and by his being ſucceeded ſo well, and ſo ſoon, it ſeemed to be the mind of the Lord that he ſhould haſten his journey homeward: ſend me away, that I may go to my maſter; and carry him the good news of his ſucceſs, and attend his domeſtic affairs over which he was ſet.

℣. 57. And they ſaid, we will call the damſel, &c.] Who perhaps through modeſty had withdrawn herſelf to her own apartment, whilſt the man and her friends were diſcourſing on this ſubject: and enquire at her mouth; what ſhe ſays to it, whether willing to go directly or not; the matter in queſtion was referred to her, and left to her deciſion.

℣. 58. And they called Rebekah, &c.] Or ordered her to be called by one of the ſervants: and ſaid unto her, wilt thou go with this man? that is, directly; the queſtion was not about her marriage of Iſaac, that was agreed upon, and ſhe had doubtleſs given her conſent, and which ſhe tacitly did by accepting of the preſents, but about taking the journey immediately: and ſhe ſaid, I will go; the note of Jarchi is, "of myſelf, and even if you "are not willing," which ſeems to make her anſwer rude, as well as reſolute; but it muſt be interpreted conſiſtent with her decent and modeſt behaviour, and as expreſſive of her agreeing to go with the man directly, having no manner of objection on her mind to it; but on the contrary found a ſtrong inclination to it, and was determined on it; and perhaps was under a divine impulſe, which ſtrongly wrought upon her, and cauſed her to be ſo willing to leave her own people, and her father's houſe.

℣. 59. And they ſent away Rebekah their ſiſter, &c.] Not in a pet or angry humour, but with good-will; they agreed ſhe ſhould go, and took their leave in a very honourable and affectionate manner. This is to be underſtood of her brother Laban, and of other brethren and ſiſters ſhe might have; though by the connexion of the words with the preceding, they ſeem to deſign her brother and mother, who ſpoke laſt; and probably all her relations are meant, who call her their ſiſter, becauſe ſo nearly related to them: and her nurſe; who had been her nurſe in former times, as Aben Ezra obſerves, in her infancy, for whom ſhe had a particular affection, as is often the caſe; her name was Deborah, as appears from ch. xxxv. 8: and Abraham's ſervant, and his men; who were diſmiſſed in an handſome manner by the family.

℣. 60. And they bleſſed Rebekah, &c.] That is, her parents and her friends, they wiſhed the beſt and choiceſt of bleſſings might deſcend upon her: and ſaid unto her, thou art our ſiſter; the Targum of Jonathan is, "hitherto thou haſt been our ſiſter," as if the relation now ceaſed, having entred into another; and eſpecially as ſhe was going away from them into a diſtant country, and might never ſee her more, it was as if ſhe was no more to them, or to be enjoyed by them: be thou the mother of thouſands of millions; as ſhe was, the Edomites and Iſraelites both ſpringing from her: and let thy ſeed poſſeſs the gate of thoſe that hate them; exerciſe dominion and authority over their enemies; let them not only be numerous, but powerful and victorious, as both the nations were at times, and eſpecially the latter; and particularly this had its accompliſhment in Chriſt, who ſprung from her in the line of Jacob; ſome reſpect ſeems to be had to the promiſe made to Abraham, ch. xxii. 17. of which this family might have knowledge from Abraham's ſervant, who might report not only how great his maſter was, but what promiſes were made to him with reſpect to his poſterity.

℣. 61. And Rebekah aroſe, and her damſels, &c.] Her maids that were given her by her parents to wait upon her, as was uſual in thoſe times and countries: and they rode upon the camels; that Abraham's ſervant had brought with him: and followed the man; who rode before and directed the way; the ſenſe is only, that ſhe went along with him: and the ſervant took Rebekah, and went his way; took her under his care, and to be the wife of his maſter's ſon, at the hands of her friends, and then ſet forward on his journey.

℣. 62. And Iſaac came from the way of the well Lahai-roi, &c.] The well at which the angel met with Hagar, when ſhe fled from her miſtreſs, ch. xvi. 7, 14. The Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem ſay, that Iſaac came from the ſchool of Shem the great: for he dwelt in the ſouth country; at Beerſheba, to which Abraham, it ſeems, was returned again; for that they dwelt together as yet, is clear from his mother Sarah's tent, into which he introduced Rebekah, ℣. 67. ſee ch. xxii. 19.

℣. 63. And Iſaac went out to meditate in the field at even-tide, &c.] Both the time and place were very proper for meditation: the place in the field; where he might view the works of nature, and be led to the creator of them, and the praiſe of him, and where he might be alone, and nothing to diſturb his thoughts: and the time, at evening; after the labour, care and hurry of the day were over, and before repoſe at night, and when the air was cool and refreſhing, and every thing was aſſiſting to, and ſerved to compoſe the mind, and help thought and contemplation. Onkelos and Jonathan render the word to pray, and the time and place he choſe were very fit for that ſervice; and perhaps his thoughts in prayer might be directed to, and greatly employed in deſiring ſucceſs to his father's ſervant in the buſineſs he was gone on his account, and that he might ſafely and ſpeedily arrive, and if ſo, his prayers were quickly anſwered: and he lift up his eyes, and ſaw, and behold, the camels were coming; which his ſervant had took with him in his journey, and was now returning with them, and which Iſaac knew full well.

℣. 64. And Rebekah liſt up her eyes, &c.] And looked about: and when ſhe ſaw Iſaac; whom ſhe ſuſpected him to be, and therefore enquired of the ſervant, who told her who he was: ſhe lighted off the camel; or fell [w] from it, not accidentally, or through ſurprize, but willingly, and in honour to Iſaac, as was cuſtomary; for had ſhe ſat on her camel when ſhe met him, it would not have ſeemed reſpectful enough to him; though Jarchi thinks ſhe did not get off, but only bowed herſelf upon the camel, when ſhe came near him.

℣. 65. For ſhe had ſaid unto the ſervant, &c.] As ſoon as ſhe ſaw a man walking towards them, who ſhe thought with herſelf might be Iſaac: what man is this that walketh in the field to meet us? for by the courſe he ſteered, ſhe perceived that he was coming towards them, and ſo concluded it muſt be one of the family, and probably the perſon ſhe was to be married to; for otherwiſe had he not by his look and motion diſcovered that he knew the ſervant, and was coming towards them, ſhe would have took no notice of him: and the ſervant had ſaid, it is my maſter; meaning not Abraham, but his ſon, who alſo was his maſter: therefore ſhe took a veil, and covered herſelf; both out of modeſty, and as a token of ſubjection to him: for the veil was put on when the bride was introduced to the bridegroom, as among the Romans [x] in after-times. The Arab women always have veils when they appear in public, ſo that their faces cannot be ſeen; and though in the ſummer months they walk abroad with leſs caution, yet then upon the approach of a ſtranger, they put on their veils [y].

℣. 66. And the ſervant told Iſaac all things that he had done.] By what means he found out the perſon deſigned for his wife, and got knowledge of her father's houſe, to which he was introduced, and where he was made welcome; and what agreement he had made with the parents and relations of Rebekah to be his wife, whom he had brought with him.

℣. 67. And Iſaac brought her into his mother Sarah's tent, &c.] The apartment in which ſhe dwelt when living; for women in thoſe times and places had ſeparate apartments from their huſbands; this was done after many other things had paſſed, not here recorded; a converſation with her, an eſpouſal of her, and an introduction of her to Abraham, with whoſe conſent, no doubt, ſhe had his wife's apartment allotted to her: and took Rebekah, and ſhe became his wife; conſummated the marriage, firſt contracted by his ſervant, then confirmed by himſelf, and now finiſhed: and he loved her; as a man ought to love his wife, even as his own body; and ſhe was a perſon to be beloved, being very fair, and of a goodly countenance, ℣. 16. The Jews ſay [z], ſhe was but 14 years of age at this this time: and Iſaac was comforted after his mother's death; which was 3 years ago, and had made ſuch impreſſions upon his ſpirit, that at times he was very ſorrowful, and much diſtreſſed on that account; but now being bleſſed with ſo agreeable a yoke-fellow, his ſorrow for his mother ſubſided, and he became chearful and comfortable.

CHAP. XXV.

THIS chapter contains an account of Abraham's marriage with another woman, and of the children he had by her, and of their poſterity, ℣. 1—4. of Abraham's diſpoſal of his ſubſtance, and his ſons, ℣. 5, 6. of the years of his life, his death and burial, ℣. 7—11. of the children of Iſhmael, and of the years of his life, and of his death, ℣. 12—18. and of the ſons of Iſaac the fruit of prayer, and of the oracle concerning them before they were born, and of their temper and diſpoſition, conduct and behaviour, ℣. 19—34.

℣. 1. Then again Abraham took a wife, &c.] Three years after the death of Sarah, and when his ſon Iſaac was married, and he alone, and now 140 years of age: and her name was Keturah; who ſhe was, or of what family is not ſaid. An Arabic writer [z] ſays ſhe was a daughter of the king of the Turks; another [a] of them calls her the daughter of king Rama; and another [b] the daughter of Pactor, king of Rabbah; but there were then no ſuch people in being. Very probably ſhe was one of Abraham's hand-maids born in his houſe, or bought with his money, perhaps the chief and principal of them. The Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem ſay ſhe is the ſame with Hagar, and ſo Jarchi; but this is rejected by Aben Ezra, ſince mention is made of Abraham's concubines, ℣. 6. whereas it does not appear he ever had any other than Hagar and Keturah, and therefore could not be the ſame; and beſides, the children of Hagar and Keturah are in this chapter reckoned as diſtinct. Cleodemus [c], a heathen writer, makes mention of Keturah as a wife of Abraham's, by whom he had many children, and names three of them. Sir Walter Raleigh [d] thinks, that the Kenites, of whom Jethro, the father-in-law of Moſes was, had their name from Keturah, being a nation of the Midianites that deſcended from her.

℣. 2. And ſhe bare him Zimran, &c.] That Keturah ſhould bear children, who probably was a young woman, is not ſtrange; but that Abraham, whoſe body 40 years before this was dead, ſhould now have any bore to him, may ſeem difficult to account for, and only can be attributed to the freſh vigour his body was endued with at the generation of Iſaac; and which ſtill continued for the fulfilment of the promiſe to him of the multiplication of his ſeed. But if the notion of a late learned biſhop [e] is right, there will be no need to have recourſe to any thing extraordinary; which is, that Abraham took Keturah for his concubine, about 20 years after his marriage with Sarah, ſhe being barren, and long before he took Hagar; though not mentioned till after the death of Sarah, that the thread of the hiſtory might not be broken in upon; and there are various things which make it probable, as that ſhe is called his concubine, 1 Chron. i. 32. which one would think ſhe ſhould not be, if married to him after the death of Sarah, and when he had no other wife, and ſeeing before he died he had great grand-children by her, and the children of her are reckoned down to the third generation; whereas there are only mention of two generations of Hagar; as in ℣. 1—4, 12—16. and therefore ſeems to have been taken by him before Hagar, and even when he was in Haran, and the children by her are thought to be the ſouls gotten there; nor does it ſeem very probable that he ſhould take a wife after the death of Sarah, when he was 140 years of age, and was reckoned an old man 40 years before this; and Dr. Lightfoot [f] is of opinion, that Abraham married her long before Iſaac's marriage, or Sarah's death; and if this was the caſe, the difficulty of accounting for Abraham's fitneſs for generation vaniſhes. The firſt ſon of Keturah, born to him, was called Zimran, from whence came the Zamareni, a people in Arabia Felix mentioned by Pliny [g]; and hereabout the ſons of Keturah ſettled, being ſent by Abraham into the eaſt country, even into Arabia, which lay eaſt of the place where he then was; and very probably Zabram; or it may be rather Zamram, a royal city in the country of the Cinædocolpites, a part of Arabia Felix, as placed by Ptolemy [h], may have its name from this man: five more of Abraham's ſons by Keturah follow, and Jokſhan, and Medan, and Midian, and Iſhbak, and Shuah; ſome think that the firſt of theſe is the ſame with Cahtan, whom the Arabs call the father of their nation; but that Cahtan rather ſeems to be Joktan the ſon of Eber, ſee Gen. x. 25. Philoſtorgius [i] ſpeaks of a nation in his time, called Homerites, who were a people that ſprung from Keturah, and inhabited Arabia Felix, and who uſed circumciſion on the 8th day: and biſhop Patrick obſerves from Theophanes, a chronologer of the 9th century, that the Homerites, who lived in the interior parts of Arabia, deſcended from Jettan, which he conjectures ſhould be read Jocſhan, though perhaps he is no other than the Joktan before mentioned. From Medan and Midian ſprung the Midianites, ſo often mentioned in ſcripture; their poſterity ſeem to be confounded together, for the ſame people are called Medanites and Midianites, Gen. xxxvii. 28, 36. from theſe men the towns in Arabia might have their names, as the Modiana and Madiana of Ptolemy [k]: as for Iſhbak, there is no tracing of his name any where, unleſs, as biſhop Patrick obſerves, ſome footſteps of it are to be found in Bacaſcami, a town of the Zamareni, who deſcended from his brother Zimran, and in the people Backilitæ, both mentioned by Pliny [l]; though Junius think that Scabioſa Laodicea, in Laodicene of Syria, has its name from him; which ſeems not likely. The name of Shuah or Shuach may be traced in Socacia, Soaca and Sochcher, cities placed by Ptolemy [m] in Arabia Felix: tho' ſome think the poſterity of this man are thoſe whom the geographers call Sauchites, Sauchæans and Saccæans, who ſettled in Arabia Deſerta, and from from whom Bildad the Shuhite deſcended; which is not improbable. But others have been of opinion, that the town of Suez, which Pliny calls Suaza, had its name from this Shuah, ſituate at the extremity of the Red Sea [n].

℣. 3. And Jokſhan begat Sheba and Dedan, &c.] Bochart [o] is of opinion, that the poſterity of this Sheba are the ſame with the Sabæans who inhabited at the entrance of Arabia Felix, not far from the Nabathæans; and who, by Strabo [p], are mentioned together as near to Syria, and uſed to make excurſions on their neighbours; and not without ſome colour of reaſon thought to be the ſame that plundered Job of his cattle. From Dedan came the Dedanim or Dedanites, ſpoken of with the Arabians in Iſ. xxi. 13. Junius thinks Adada in Palmyrene of Syria had its name from this man, and in which country is the mountain Aladan or Alladadan. Bochart [q] more probably takes Dedan, a city in Idumea, to derive its name from him. There is a village called Adedi in the country of the Caſſanites, a people of Arabia Felix, which Ptolemy [r] makes mention of, and ſeems to have ſome appearance of this man's name: and the ſons of Dedan were Aſhurim, and Letuſhim, and Leummim; theſe names being plural are thought not to be proper names of men, but appellatives, deſcriptive of their places of abode, or of their buſineſs: hence the Targum of Onkelos repreſents them as ſuch that dwelt in camps, in tents, and in iſlands; and the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem call them merchants, artificers and heads of the people: however, Cleodemus [s] the heathen hiſtorian is wrong in deriving Aſſyria from Aſhurim, whom he calls Aſhur; ſince Aſſyria and Aſſyrians are ſo called from Aſhur, the ſon of Shem, ch. x. 22.

℣. 4. And the ſons of Midian, &c.] The fourth ſon of Abraham by Keturah; he had five ſons next mentioned, who were heads of ſo many tribes or families in Midian: hence we read of five kings of Midian, Numb. xxxi. 8. their names follow, Ephah and Epher, and Hanoch, and Abidah, and Eldaah; the two firſt of theſe, whom Cleodemus [t] calls Aphra and Apher, and makes them to be ſons of Abraham by Keturah, when they were his grandſons, he ſays, from them the city Aphra, and all Africa, had their names, and that theſe accompanied Hercules into Lybia, he having married a daughter of Aphra. Ephah is mentioned along with Midian in Iſ. lx. 6. but of the reſt no notice is taken in ſcripture. Ptolemy [u] makes mention both of a mountain, and of a village, near Madiana in Arabia Felix, called Hippos, which perhaps had their name from this man. Some trace of Epher is thought to be in Tapharon, which Philoſtorgius ſays [w] was the metropolis of the Homerites, before mentioned; and Arrianus, as biſhop Patrick obſerves, expreſly ſays, the metropolis of the Homerites is called Aphar: to which may be added, that Ptolemy [x] ſpeaks of a people called Tappharites, near the Homerites. Hanoch, the next ſon, is thought to have ſome footſteps of his name in Cane, a mart, which Ptolemy [y] places in the country of the Adramites in Arabia Felix, and alſo in the country of Canauna in Arabia, mentioned by Pliny [z]: near Canauna, is placed by the ſame writer, the iſland Devadæ, called by Philoſtorgius [a] Διὸς, Divus, in which it is ſuppoſed there is ſome trace of the name of Abidah, by an inverſion of the two laſt ſyllables; and perhaps alſo in Abiſſa, which Ptolemy [b] places in the country of the Sachalites in Arabia Felix. As for Eldaah, biſhop Patrick thinks there are no remains of this name, unleſs in the city of Elana, from whence there was a gulph called Elanites, and a people that lived there Elanitæ; but one would think there are ſome traces of it in the cities Alata, Lattha and Leaththa, all, according to Ptolemy [c], in Arabia Felix: all theſe were the children of Keturah; her children and grandchildren.

℣. 5. And Abraham gave all that he had unto Iſaac.] By his laſt will and teſtament; not all out of his own hand, whilſt his lived, at leaſt he reſerved ſomewhat for himſelf, and for gifts to his other children; ſo his ſervant declared to the parents and friends of Rebekah, ch. xxiv. 36. wherefore ſome render the words here had given [d]; or the ſenſe is, that he had at that time purpoſed and promiſed to give all that he had to Iſaac, and now he actually did it.

℣. 6. But unto the ſons of the concubines which Abraham had, &c.] Theſe were Hagar and Keturah, though they are both called his wives, ch. xvi. 3. and xxv. 1. yet they were concubines; ſo Keturah, 1 Chron. i. 32. they were, as ſome render the word, concubine wives [e]; they were half-wives or ſecondary ones: the Jewiſh writers ſay, that they were eſpouſed, but not by writing as wives were; they were under the lawful wife, when there were any, and a kind of head-ſervants in the family, and their children did not inherit; now the ſons of the concubines of Abraham were Iſhmael by Hagar, and the ſix abovementioned by Keturah: to theſe Abraham gave gifts; money, gold and ſilver, of which he had plenty: the Targum of Jonathan calls them ſubſtance and moveable goods; by this it appears, that though he had ſent Iſhmael away without any thing, yet he afterwards remembered him, and gave him a portion with the reſt of the children of his concubines: and ſent them away from Iſaac his ſon; that they might not be troubleſome to him and his family; and that there might be no contention among them about inheriting the land of Canaan given to him and his ſeed: and this Abraham did while he yet lived; or otherwiſe after his death a ſeparation would not have been eaſily made; but his authority had weight with them: and they were ſent by him eaſtward, into the eaſt country; into Arabia, and the parts thereabout, which lay eaſt from the place where Abraham was; theſe are the children of the eaſt, mentioned along with the Midianites, who ſprung from Keturah, Judg. vi. 3.

℣. 7. And theſe are the days of the years of Abraham's life which he lived, &c.] Being about to die, an account is given of his age, which was 175 years; ſo that Iſaac was now 75 years of age, for he was born when Abraham was an 100 years old, and Jacob and Eſau muſt now be 15 years of age at this time, ſince they were born when Iſaac was 60 years of age, ℣. 26. and Iſhmael muſt be 89 years old; it may be obſerved, that as Abraham was 75 years old when he went from Haran into the land of Canaan, ch. xii. 4. he had been juſt 100 years a ſojourner in this country.

℣. 8. Then Abraham gave up the ghoſt, &c.] Very readily and chearfully, without any previous ſickneſs or preſent pain, but through the decay of nature by reaſon of old age, in a very eaſy quiet manner: and died in a good old age; for quantity, in in those times few arriving to a greater; for quality, not attended with those inconveniencies and disadvantages with which old age generally is, and therefore called evil: and full of years; in the original it is only, and full; the Targum of Jonathan adds, of all good; temporal and spiritual, with which he was filled and satisfied; or he had had enough of life, and was willing to depart, and was full of desires after another and better world: and was gathered to his people; which is to be understood not of his interment, there being only the body of Sarah in the sepulchre in which he was laid; but of the admission of his soul into the heavenly state upon its separation from the body, when it was at once associated with the spirits of just men made perfect. The Arabic writers [f] say, that he died in the month of Nisan, others say Adar, in the year of the world 3563; but, according to bishop Usher, he died A. M. 2183, and before Christ 1821.

℣. 9. And his sons Isaac and Ishmael buried him in the cave of Machpelah, &c.] Isaac, though the younger brother, is set first, because he was born of the lawful wife of Abraham, the free woman, whereas Ishmael was born of a concubine and a bond woman; Isaac was heir not only to Abraham's temporal estate, but of the promise made concerning the Messiah, not so Ishmael, and was on all accounts the greater man. It appears from hence, that, though there had been a quarrel between Ishmael and Isaac, and the latter had been persecuted by the former, yet the difference was now made up, and they were reconciled, at least they agreed in this act of shewing their last respect to their father; and that, though Ishmael had been expelled his father's house, yet he was not at any great distance from him, and there was a correspondence between him and his father; nor was he forgotten by him, as is clear from ℣. 6. and he retained a filial affection for him; and Jarchi from hence concludes, that he was a penitent and a good man. The place where these two brothers buried their father was the cave of Machpelah, in the field of Ephron, the son of Zohar the Hittite, which is before Mamre; see ch. xxiii. 8, 9, 17, 19. wherefore very false is the tradition of the Mahometans [g], that Abraham's sepulchre is at Mecca, which they now show, and stands about 12 paces from the temple there, inclosed with iron rails.

℣. 10. The field which Abraham purchased of the sons of Heth, &c.] Of one of them, Ephron, the rest being witnesses of it, ch. xxiii. 16, 18, 20. there was Abraham buried, and Sarah his wife; Sarah had been buried there 38 years before, which was the reason why his sons buried him there; if he died in Beer-sheba, as seems probable, see ch. xxiv. 62, 67. from thence to Hebron were 16 miles [h]; so far was he carried to be interred.

℣. 11. And it came to pass, after the death of Abraham, that God blessed his son Isaac, &c.] Yet more and more, both with spiritual and temporal blessings; shewing hereby, that, though Abraham was dead, he was not unmindful of his covenant, which should be established with Isaac, ch. xvii. 19. and xxii. 17, 18: and Isaac dwelt by the well Lahai-roi; which was near the wilderness of Beer-sheba and Paran, where Ishmael dwelt; so that they were not far from one another, see ch. xvi. 14. and xx. 14, 21.

℣. 12. Now these are the generations of Ishmael, Abraham's son, &c.] Or the genealogy of his posterity; and which is given to shew that the Lord was not unmindful of his promise made to Abraham, concerning the multiplication of his seed, ch. xvi. 10. and xvii. 20: whom Hagar the Egyptian, Sarah's handmaid, bare unto Abraham; see ch. xvi. 1, 15.

℣. 13. And these are the names of the sons of Ishmael, &c.] After-mentioned: by their names, according to their generations; which were imposed upon them at their birth, and are recited according to the order in which they were born, as follows: the first-born of Ishmael, Nebaioth; mentioned in Is. lx. 7. and from whence a people of the Arabs are called Nabathæans, and their country Nabathæa. Josephus [i] says, that all the country from Euphrates to the Red-sea is called the Nabatene country. The posterity of this man inhabited part of Arabia Deserta and of Arabia Petræa, even to the entrance of Arabia Felix. Strabo [k] reckons the Nabatæans among the Arabians, and calls Petra, the metropolis of Arabia Petræa, Petra Nabatæa, and Petra of the Arabian Nabatæans, who he says dwelt about Syria, and often made excursions into it; and observes, that their country is populous and abounds with pastures; hence the rams of Nebaioth, mentioned in Is. lx. 7. Pliny also [l] places them in Arabia, and says they inhabit the town called Petra, and that they border upon Syria. Kedar is the second son of Ishmael; and the posterity of this man and their country are reckoned in Arabia by Isaiah, ch. xxi. 13, 16, 17. and they are so well known to be Arabians, that the Arabic language is most frequently, in Jewish writings, called the language of Kedar. These are the people whom Pliny [m] names Cedrei, and mentions them along with the Nabathæans, as near unto them; and indeed they dwelt in the same country, Arabia Petræa, and in tents, living by pasturage, hence they are sometimes called Scenites; and mention is made of the tents of Kedar in Cant. i. 6. these are the Scenite Arabs, called Saracens by Ammianus Marcellinus [n]. Two other sons of Ishmael follow: and Adbeel and Mibsam; of whom no mention is made elsewhere, nor are there any traces of their names, unless the Agubeni, placed by Ptolemy [o] near Arabia Felix.

℣. 14. And Mishma, and Dumah, and Massa.] Of Mishma and Massa, and of their posterity, there is not any thing said elsewhere, unless the Masani, Ptolemy [p] places near Arabia Felix, came from Massa. Duma seems to be the same Isaiah speaks of in ch. xxi. 11. and in Arabia Deserta, where some of Ishmael's posterity settled, is a place called Dumætha by Ptolemy [q], which perhaps had its name from this son of his. The Targum of Jonathan translates these three names, "hearing, silence, and patience;" which the Jews use as a proverb, when they would signify that there are some things to be heard and not spoken of, and to be patiently borne. If Ishmael had in view to teach such lessons by the names he gave his children, he will seem to be a better man than he is usually thought to be.

℣. 15. Hadar and Tema, &c.] From the first of these the city Adra in Arabia Petræa, and from the other the city Themma in Arabia Deserta, both mentioned by Ptolemy [r], may be thought to have their names; or the city Adari and the Athritæ in Arabia Felix [s]; and the inhabitants of the land of Tema

Tema are mentioned as Arabians, If. xxi. 13, 14. and Pliny [t] ſpeaks of a people called Thimaneans, whom he ſays the antients joined to the Nabathæans: the troops of Tema mentioned in Job were of this people; and Eliphaz the Temanite is thought by ſome not to be the deſcendant of Teman the grandſon of Eſau, but to be of this man's people and country. The three laſt ſons follow: Jetur, Naphiſh, and Kedomah; the two firſt of theſe are reckoned among the Hagarites, as the Iſhmaelites were ſometimes called, 1 Chron. v. 19. from Jetur came the Itureans, whom Pliny [u] places in Cæleſyria; and their country Iturea is reckoned by Strabo [w] along with Arabia; and the Ithyreans with Virgil [x] are famous for their bows, as Iſhmael and his poſterity were for archery in all ages, and ſtill are, ſee the note on ch. xxi. 20. As for the poſterity of Naphiſh and Kedomah, we have no account elſewhere, nor any traces of their names, unleſs thoſe of the latter ſhould be meant by the men of the eaſt, or the men of Kedem, Jer. xlix. 28. which is not improbable; ſince they are mentioned with the poſterity of Kedar the ſecond ſon of Iſhmael; and the Nubæans by Lebanon may be from Naphiſh.

℣. 16. Theſe are the ſons of Iſhmael, &c.] The 12 before-mentioned: theſe are their names, by their towns and by their caſtles; their towns and their caſtles being called after their names, ſome of which we are able to trace at this diſtance, as the above notes ſhew: twelve princes according to their nations; theſe were princes, or heads of tribes, and there were 12 of them, and continued ſo, ſee ch. xvii. 20. where is the prophecy, and here an acccompliſhment of it.

℣. 17. And theſe are the years of the life of Iſhmael, 137 years old, &c.] So that he lived 48 years after the death of Abraham; and, though he did not live to be ſo old as he, yet it was a conſiderable age he attained unto, ſee the note on ℣. 7: and he gave up the ghoſt and died, and was gathered unto his people; ſome of the ſame expreſſions being uſed of him as of his father, have led ſome to conclude, that he was a penitent and died a good man, and was gathered to the ſame people; but theſe phraſes are uſed both of good and bad men.

℣. 18. And they dwelt from Havilah unto Shur, &c.] That is, the poſterity of Iſhmael, whoſe country reached from one place to the other; not from India to Chaluza, as the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem; but the extent is that vaſt deſart of Arabia, which eaſtward was called the wilderneſs of Havilah, and weſtward the wilderneſs of Shur; ſo that they inhabited it from eaſt to weſt: that is before Egypt, as thou goeſt to Aſſyria; which laſt place was over-againſt Egypt, and bordered on that part where lies the way to the land of Aſſyria: and he died in the preſence of all his brethren; they being preſent when he died, or in peace with them, in all proſperity along with them: but, ſince his death is ſpoken of before, and here the ſituation of his poſterity, the words may be read, it fell [y] in the preſence of his brethren; his lot, or the habitation of his poſterity fell by lot between his brethren the Egyptians on one ſide of him, and the Iſraelites on the other; or between the ſons of Keturah on the eaſt, and the poſterity of Iſaac on the weſt.

℣. 19. And theſe are the generations of Iſaac Abraham's ſon, &c.] Moſes, having given the genealogy of Iſhmael and his poſterity, returns to Iſaac the other ſon of Abraham, with whom and his children the following part of his hiſtory is chiefly, if not altogether concerned: Abraham begat Iſaac; for the further confirmation of his being his proper legitimate ſon this clauſe is added.

℣. 20. And Iſaac was 40 years old when he took Rebekah to wife, &c.] Which was 3 years after the death of his mother; Iſaac was born when ſhe was 90, and therefore muſt be 37 when ſhe died. The Jews ſay Rebekah was but 14, though it is highly probable ſhe was older; who is deſcribed as the daughter of Bethuel the Syrian, of Padan-Aram; ſo called to diſtinguiſh it from other Arams, as Aram of Damaſcus, &c. this ſeems to be the ſame with Aram Naharaim, or Meſopotamia, which lay between the rivers Euphrates and Tigris; for Padan, as Jarchi obſerves from the Targum, ſignifies two; but rather, as he, and Aben Ezra, and others ſay, Padan in the Arabic language ſignifies a field; it here intends the field or country of Syria, as in Hoſ. xii. 12. Haran, in Syria or Meſopotamia, was the place where Bethuel and Laban lived, ſee ch. xxviii. 5, 10. and xxix. 4. Some traces of Padan in Meſopotamia are thought to be in the cities of Aphphadana and Aphadana, which are placed by Ptolemy [z] in that country. Moreover, Rebekah is alſo ſaid to be the ſiſter to Laban the Syrian, the ſon of Bethuel, who are both called Syrians, becauſe they now lived in Syria; otherwiſe they were originally Chaldees, being deſcended from Nahor the brother of Abraham, who both were of Ur of the Chaldees; ſo Jacob is called a Syrian, becauſe he lived long in the ſame place, Deut. xxvi. 5.

℣. 21. And Iſaac intreated the Lord for his wife, &c.] Was very earneſt and conſtant in his ſupplications for her, as the word ſignifies, as is obſerved by Jarchi; or, before his wife [a], ſhe being preſent and joining with him in his prayers: the reaſon was, becauſe ſhe was barren; which appeared by the length of time they had been married, which was near 20 years, ſee ℣. 26. The Jewiſh writers [b] ſay, that, after 20 years, Iſaac took her and went with her to mount Moriah, to the place where he was bound, and prayed that ſhe might conceive; putting the Lord in mind of the promiſe he there made of the multiplication of Abraham's ſeed, ch. xxii. 17, 18: and the Lord was intreated of him; he granted him his requeſt; for, though God has purpoſed and promiſed to do many things for his people, yet he will be ſought unto by them to do them for them: and Rebekah his wife conceived; two ſons at once, as it follows.

℣. 22. And the children ſtruggled together within her; When ſhe was quick with child: this was ſome time before her delivery, and was not a common and ordinary motion felt by women in ſuch circumſtances, but an extraordinary one; the two children in her ſtrove with each other, as if it was for maſtery, or who ſhould get out firſt before the proper time; which not only gave her great uneaſineſs of mind, but pain of body: this was an emblem of the future difference between thoſe two children, Eſau and Jacob, and of the contentions that would be between their reſpective offspring, and of the enmity and war between good and bad men in all ages, and of the conflict between fleſh and ſpirit in all good men: and ſhe ſaid, if it be ſo, why am I thus? that is, either if it be ſo with me as

as is not with others in the like condition; for, as Aben Ezra ſuggeſts, ſhe had enquired of other women, whether it had ever been ſo with them, and they replied, no: then, ſays ſhe, how comes it to paſs that it ſhould be different with me from others? or, if thoſe children by ſtruggling ſhould kill one another, or be abortive and kill me, why ſhould I have been ſo deſirous of conception? or prayed for it, as Jarchi obſerves? or, if ſo it is, and this will be the caſe, why am I thus? [c] this unhappy woman, to be in ſuch circumſtances, to endure ſo much pain, and to no purpoſe? why have I conceived and carried my burden ſo long, and at laſt cannot be delivered, or bring forth a live child? all my prayers and pains have been in vain: and ſhe went to enquire of the Lord; to the ſchool of Shem the Great, ſay the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem, and ſo Jarchi: the Arabic writers ſay [d], ſhe enquired of Melchizedek; and, according to Aben Ezra, of ſome prophet, or of Abraham, who lived 15 years after this event: and indeed, if ſhe enquired of any particular perſon of note for religion, and as a prophet, there is none ſo likely as he, who was the friend of God, and had great intimacy with him, and to whom he revealed his ſecrets. But perhaps no more is meant by it, than that ſhe went either to ſome proper and private place and prayed unto the Lord, that he would ſhew her the reaſon of what had happened unto her; or to ſome public place of worſhip, and where prayer was wont to be made, and where ſhe enquired by means of ſuch as were engaged therein concerning this matter; ſee Pſ. lxxiii. 17.

℣. 23. And the Lord ſaid unto her, &c.] Either by one or other of the above perſons ſhe acquainted with this affair, and intreated to ſeek the Lord for her; or by an impulſe upon her own mind: two nations are in thy womb; or two perſons, from whom two nations will ſpring, the Edomites and Iſraelites, the one from Eſau, the other from Jacob: and two manner of people ſhall be ſeparated from thy bowels; different in their bodies, complexions, manner of life, religion, as well as place of abode: and the one people ſhall be ſtronger than the other people; the Edomites, the poſterity of Eſau, were a very potent people, and had a ſucceſſion of dukes and kings, before the Iſraelites, the poſterity of Jacob, made any figure in the world, and whilſt they were ſlaves in Egypt, ſee Gen. xxxvi. though in aftertimes the Iſraelites became the ſtrongeſt: and the elder or greater ſhall ſerve the younger or leſſer; the offſpring of Eſau the eldeſt ſhould become tributary to the poſterity of Jacob the younger; which was verified in the times of David, when the Edomites were ſubdued by him, 2 Sam. viii. 14. and ſtill more in the times of Hyrcanus, when the Edomites or Idumeans became one people with the Jews, and embraced their religion [e], rather than to be diſpoſſeſſed of their country; and will have a further accompliſhment in the latter day, when the propheſies in Obad. ℣. 18—21. ſhall be fulfilled. Of the uſe which the apoſtle Paul makes of this paſſage, ſee Rom. ix. 11, 12. and the notes there.

℣. 24. And when her days to be delivered were fulfilled, &c.] The 9 months were up from the time of her conception; or, as the Targum of Jonathan, when the 270 days ſhe went with child were compleated: behold, there were twins in her womb; as was perceived by the midwife; a double mercy was granted, more given than aſked for; probably only one child was aſked for, but two given.

℣. 25. And the firſt came out red, &c.] Either his body, or rather the hair it was covered with, red; which was a ſign, as Jarchi obſerves, that he would be a ſhedder of blood, fierce and cruel, as were he and his poſterity: all over like an hairy garment; his body was all over full of hair, which ſtood as thick as a garment made of hair, and was a ſign of the roughneſs of his diſpoſition, as well as of the ſtrength of his body: and they called his name Eſau; his parents, and thoſe preſent at his birth, all that ſaw him thus covered with hair; for he had his name not from the colour of his body or hair; for the word does not ſignify red, but comes from a word which ſignifies to make, he being a maker; that made his way out before his brother, or an active man as afterwards, or becauſe of his hair was made or born more like a man than a child; and ſo the Targum adds, "becauſe he was "wholly perfect, with the hair of his head and "beard, and with his teeth and grinders:" but chiefly becauſe of his hairineſs, for Eſau in the Arabic language ſignifies covered [f] as he was with hair: ſome ſay, a word in that language ſignifies a hairy garment made of camels hair [g].

℣. 26. And after that came his brother out, &c.] Out of his mother's womb, either by his own ſtrength, or by the help of the midwife: and his hand took hold on Eſau's heel; to pluck him back and get out firſt; and this was not caſual, but was ſo ordered in providence, and had a meaning and myſtery in it: and his name was called Jacob; by his parents and others, and that for the above reaſon, becauſe he took his brother by the heel, which his name has the ſignification of, and Eſau has reſpect to in ch. xxvii. 36: and Iſaac was threeſcore years old when ſhe bare them; and ſo it was 20 years after he had been married to her; ſo long was his faith tried and exerciſed about the promiſed ſeed that was to ſpring from him.

℣. 27. And the boys grew, &c.] In ſtature, became ſtrong and fit for buſineſs, and betook themſelves to different employments: and Eſau was a cunning hunter, a man of the field; whoſe buſineſs lay in tilling and ſowing it, which his father Iſaac followed ſometimes; or rather he choſe to range about the field and hunt after beaſts and birds, in which he was very expert, and contrived traps and ſnares to catch them in; and this courſe of life was moſt agreeable to his temper and diſpoſition, being active, fierce, and cruel; according to the Targum of Jonathan, he was alſo a hunter and ſlayer of men, Nimrod and Henoch his ſon: and Jacob was a plain man; an honeſt plain-hearted man, whoſe heart and tongue went together; a quiet man, that gave no diſturbance to others; a godly man, ſincere, upright, and perfect, that had the truth of grace and holineſs in him, as well as the perfect righteouſneſs of his Redeemer on him: dwelling in tents; keeping at home and attending the buſineſs of the family, as we afterwards find him boiling pottage; or rather this denotes his paſtoral life, being a ſhepherd, he dwelt in tents, which could be removed from place to place for the convenience of paſturage: Jarchi's note is, "in the tent of Shem and in the tent of Eber;" agreeable to the Targum of Jonathan, "a miniſter in

" in the ſchool of Shem, ſeeking doctrine from the " Lord;" a ſtudent there, where he reſided a while, in order to be inſtructed in the doctrines of truth and righteouſneſs.

℣. 28. And Iſaac loved Eſau, becauſe he did eat of his veniſon, &c.] Better than Jacob, not only becauſe he was his firſt-born, but becauſe he brought him of the fleſh of creatures which he took in hunting, and being dreſſed were ſavoury food to him: it is in the original, becauſe veniſon (or what he hunted) was in his mouth [h], into which he put it, and was very grateful to his taſte: but Rebekah loved Jacob; more than Eſau, being more at home with her, and of a milder diſpoſition; and more eſpecially being a good man, a partaker of the grace of God, and to whom ſhe knew by the oracle the bleſſing and promiſe belonged.

℣. 29. And Jacob ſod pottage, &c.] Or boiled broth; this he did at a certain time, for this was not his uſual employment; the Targum of Jonathan ſays, it was on the day in which Abraham died; and whereas this pottage was made of lentiles, as appears from ℣. 34. this the Jewiſh writers [i] ſay was the food of mourners; and ſo this circumſtance furniſhes out a reaſon for Jacob's boiling pottage of lentiles at this time: and hence alſo they [k] gather, that Jacob and Eſau were now 15 years of age; for Abraham was 100 years old when Iſaac was born, and Iſaac was 60 at the birth of his ſons; and Abraham lived to be 175, and therefore Eſau and Jacob muſt be 15 years old when he died: and Eſau came from the field, and he was faint; for want of food, and weary with hunting, and perhaps more ſo, having toiled and got nothing.

℣. 30. And Eſau ſaid to Jacob, feed me, I pray thee, with that ſame red pottage, &c.] Or, with that ſame red, [l] red; not knowing what it was, or what it was made of, and therefore only calls it by its colour; and the word being doubled may denote that it was very red; or he, being in haſte and greedy of it through hunger, repeats it in a quick and ſhort way: this pottage was made of lentiles, as we learn from ℣. 34. which ſort of food was much in uſe with the Egyptians, Egypt abounding with lentiles; and particularly Alexandria was famous for them, from whence they were carried into other countries, as Auſtin [m] relates. The lentiles of Peluſium, a city in Egypt, are made mention of by Virgil [n] and Martial [o], for which that place was famous; where, as Servius ſays [p], lentiles were firſt found, or where they grew the beſt; and, in the Miſnah [q], an Egyptian lentile is ſpoken of, as neither large nor ſmall, but middling. Pliny [r] ſpeaks of two ſorts of it in Egypt, and ſays he found it in ſome authors, that eating of theſe makes men even-tempered, good-humoured, and patient; and obſerves [s], that they delight in red earth, or where there is much ruddle or red oaker, from whence they may receive a red tincture; and the pottage made of them is of ſuch a colour. And Dr. Shaw [t] ſays, that lentiles diſſolve eaſily into a maſs, and make a pottage or ſoup of a chocolate colour, much uſed in the eaſtern countries: and, as Scheuchzer obſerves [u], coffee is of the bean kind, and not unlike a lentile, and makes a red decoction. The colour of it took with Eſau, as well as it was ſweet and ſavoury, as Athenæus [w] reports; and eſpecially, he being faint and hungry, deſires his brother to give him ſome of it, and even to feed him with it: for I am faint; ſo faint that he could not feed himſelf, or however wanted immediate ſuſtenance, and could not wait till other food was dreſſed he had uſed to live upon: therefore was his name called Edom; not from his red hair, but from this red pottage; for Edom ſignifies red, and is the ſame with Pyrrhus and Rufus.

℣. 31. And Jacob ſaid, ſell me this day thy birthright.] Which had many privileges annexed to it, as honour and authority in the family next to parents; a double portion of inheritance; ſome ſay the exerciſe of prieſthood, but that is queſtioned; the parental bleſſing, and eſpecially in this the promiſes of the Meſſiah, and of inheritance of the land of Canaan, and which was typical of the heavenly inheritance: all which Rebekah knew by the divine oracle were deſigned for Jacob, and which no doubt ſhe had acquainted him with, and adviſed him to deal with his brother about parting with his birth-right as he had opportunity; and very likely they had talked together about it before in a diſtant manner, and Eſau had ſhewn ſome indifference to his right, and made no great account of it; and now, an opportunity offering to get him in the mind to part with it, he takes it, and moves for a ſale of it immediately, at once, without any more delay, and even before he had his pottage; thus taking the advantage of his brother's neceſſity: or, ſell it me as the day [x], let the bargain be as clear as the day, as Jarchi interprets it; let it be made in plain and full terms, that there may be no diſpute about it hereafter, or any revocation of it: but the former ſenſe ſeems beſt, as appears from ℣. 33. where the ſame way of ſpeaking is uſed.

℣. 32. And Eſau ſaid, behold, I am at the point to die, &c.] Or, going to die [y], going the way of all fleſh; which he might ſay on account of the common frailty and mortality of man, and the brevity of life at moſt, or by reaſon of the danger of life he was always expoſed to in hunting of wild beaſts, as Aben Ezra ſuggeſts; or rather becauſe of his preſent hunger and faintneſs, which, unleſs immediately relieved, muſt iſſue in death. Dr. Lightfoot [z] thinks it was now the time of the famine ſpoken of in the following chapter: and what profit ſhall this birth-right do to me? a dying man, or when dead? In ſuch a caſe, all the privileges of it in courſe would devolve on Jacob; and as for the promiſes of the Meſſiah, and of the land of Canaan, made to Abraham and his ſeed, theſe ſeemed to be at a great diſtance, and if he lived ever ſo long might never enjoy them; and therefore judged it moſt adviſeable to conſult his preſent intereſt, and have ſomething in hand, than to truſt to futurity; and, by thus ſaying, he ſignified an entire willingneſs to part with his birth-right on the terms propoſed.

℣. 33. And Jacob ſaid, ſwear unto me this day, &c.] For the more ſure and certain confirmation of the bargain; and by this oath oblige himſelf to let him peaceably enjoy the birth-right, nor ſeek to revoke it, or diſpute it with him, or diſturb him in the poſſeſſion of it: and he ſware unto him; that he would abide by the bargain, and never give him any trouble on that account; and hereby he made it it over to Jacob as firm as it could be; God himself being appealed to as a witneſs of it, whoſe will it was that Jacob ſhould have the birth-right, the bleſſing, and the promiſes: and he ſold his birthright unto Jacob; with all the privileges and appurtenances of it, and that for one morſel of meat, as in Heb. xii. 16.

℣. 34. Then Jacob gave Eſau bread and pottage of lentiles, &c.] This ſhews what the pottage was made of, of which ſee ℣. 30. and that Jacob gave to Eſau more then he aſked and bargained for, bread as well as pottage; but neither of them until the bargain was made and ſwore to, and he had got the birth-right ſecured unto him; as cunning as Eſau, and as ſimple and plain as Jacob were, the latter out-witted the former, and was too crafty for him: and he did eat, and drink, and roſe up, and went his way; following his former courſe of life, without any remorſe of conſcience, reflexion of mind, or repentance for what he had done; for tho' he afterwards carefully ſought the bleſſing with tears he had parted with, yet not until his father was upon his death-bed, Heb. xii. 17. Gen. xxvii. 34. thus Eſau deſpiſed his birthright; by ſetting it at ſo mean a price, and by not repenting of it when he had ſo done; having no regard eſpecially to ſpiritual bleſſings, to the Meſſiah, and to the heavenly inheritance, eternal glory and happineſs by Chriſt: the Jeruſalem Targum adds, "and he deſpiſed his "part in the world to come, and denied the reſur-"rection of the dead;" and the Targum of Jonathan on ℣. 29. ſays, that "on that day he commit-"ted five tranſgreſſions; he performed ſtrange wor-"ſhip (or committed idolatry) he ſhed innocent "blood, he lay with a virgin betrothed, he de-"nied the life of the world to come (or a future "ſtate) and deſpiſed the birth-right;" which confirms the character the apoſtle gives of him, that he was a fornicator and a prophane perſon, Heb. xii. 16.

CHAP. XXVI.

THIS chapter treats of Iſaac's removal to Gerar, occaſioned by a famine, ℣. 1. of the Lord's appearance to him there, adviſing him to ſojourn in that place, and not go down to Egypt; renewing the covenant he had made with Abraham, concerning giving that country to him and his ſeed, ℣. 2—6. of what happened unto him at Gerar on account of his wife, ℣. 7—11. of Iſaac's great proſperity and ſucceſs, which drew the envy of the Philiſtines upon him, ℣. 12—15. of his departure from hence to the valley of Gerar, at the inſtance of Abimelech; and of the contentions between his herdſmen, and thoſe of Gerar, about wells of water, which cauſed him to remove to Beerſheba, ℣. 16—23. of the Lord's appearance to him there, renewing the above promiſe to him, where he built an altar, pitched his tent, and his ſervants dug a well, ℣. 24, 25. of Abimelech's coming to him thither, and making a covenant with him, ℣. 26—31. which place had its name from the oath then made, and the well there dug, ℣. 32, 33. and laſtly, of the marriage of Eſau, which was a great grief to Iſaac and Rebekah, ℣. 34, 35.

℣. 1. And there was a famine in the land, &c.] In the land of Canaan, as the Targum of Jonathan expreſſes it: beſides the firſt famine that was in the days of Abraham; of which ſee ch. xii. 10. which was 100 years before this: and Iſaac went unto Abimelech king of the Philiſtines, unto Gerar; where his father Abraham had ſojourned before he was born; and therefore the preſent king of this place can ſcarce be thought to be the ſame Abimelech that was king of it in Abraham's time; but it is highly probable that this Abimelech was the ſon of the former king, and that this was a common name to the kings of Gerar or the Philiſtines, as Pharoah was to the kings of Egypt. Iſaac came to this place from Lahai-roi, where he had dwelt many years, ſee ch. xxiv. 62. and xxv. 11. which was at or near Beerſheba, and was about 8 miles from Gerar [a].

℣. 2. And the Lord appeared unto him, &c.] In a viſion or dream, when he was at Gerar: and ſaid, go not down into Egypt; as his father had done in the like caſe, and where Iſaac thought to have gone, and the rather, as that was a fruitful country; and ſo the Targum of Jonathan, "and "it was in the heart of Iſaac to go down "into Egypt, and the Lord appeared unto him, "&c." and charged him not to go thither; partly to try his faith in him, and dependance on his providence for ſupport in this time of famine, and partly leſt he ſhould think of continuing there, and be unmindful of the promiſe of the land of Canaan to Abraham's ſeed: dwell in the land which I ſhall tell thee of; even the land of Canaan, which he was now about to give him on account of the promiſe of it to Abraham and his ſeed, and to renew it to him and to his ſeed.

℣. 3. Sojourn in this land, &c.] The land of Canaan where he now was; either in Gerar, which though in the land of the Philiſtines was a part of Canaan, the place of his preſent reſidence; or in any other part of it he ſhould be directed to: however, by this it appears it was the pleaſure of God that he ſhould not go out of that land, and which Abraham his father was careful of, that he ſhould not whilſt he lived; ſee ch. xxiv. 6, 8: and I will be with thee, and I will bleſs thee; with his preſence; with protection from all enemies; with a ſupply of all the neceſſaries of life; and with all ſpiritual bleſſings, and with eternal life and happineſs: for unto thee, and to thy ſeed, will I give theſe countries; inhabited at that time by the Philiſtines, Canaanites, and the ſeveral tribes of them: and I will perform the oath which I ſware unto Abraham thy father; concerning the promiſe of the Meſſiah from him and his ſeed, the gift of the land of Canaan to them, and the multiplication of them, ch. xxii. 16—18.

℣. 4. And I will make thy ſeed to multiply as the ſtars of heaven, &c.] Meaning in the line of Jacob eſpecially, if not only; from whom ſprung 12 patriarchs, the heads of ſo many tribes, which in proceſs of time became very numerous, even as the ſtars of heaven: and I will give unto thy ſeed all theſe countries; which is repeated from the preceding verſe for the greater confirmation of it: and in thy ſeed ſhall all the nations of the earth be bleſſed; meaning in the Meſſiah that ſhould ſpring from him, ſee ch. xxii. 18.

℣. 5. Becauſe that Abraham obeyed my voice, &c.] In all things, and particularly in offering up his ſon at his command: and kept my charge; whatever ever was given him in charge to obſerve; this, as Aben Ezra thinks, is the general, of which the particulars follow: my commandments, my ſtatutes, and my laws; whether moral, ceremonial, or civil and judicial; all and every one which God enjoined him, he was careful to obſerve. Here ſeems to be ſomething wanting, for the words are not to be joined with the preceding, as if Abraham's obedience was the cauſe of the above promiſes made to Iſaac, or to himſelf: but this is mentioned rather as an example to Iſaac, and to ſtir him up to do the like, as if it was ſaid, becauſe or ſeeing that Abraham thy father did ſo and ſo, do thou likewiſe.

℣. 6. And Iſaac dwelt in Gerar.] Continued there; in this he was obedient to the command and will of God.

℣. 7. And the men of the place aſked him of his wife, &c.] The inhabitants of Gerar enquired of Iſaac who ſhe was, whether ſhe was his wife or no, or in what relation ſhe ſtood in to him; this was not a mere civil enquiry, but what aroſe from the prevalence of luſt in them towards her; and yet it was under ſome reſtraint, they being not ſo abandoned to their luſts as to exerciſe them upon any; not upon a man's wife, the ſin of adultery being deteſtable to them, though that of fornication was made no account of by them: and he ſaid, ſhe is my ſiſter; herein imitating his father Abraham in his infirmity and unbelief, who in the ſame place had made ſuch an anſwer to a like queſtion concerning Sarah; and which if Iſaac knew of, as probably he did, one would wonder that he ſhould fall into the ſame evil, and eſpecially when he had not ſo much to ſay to ſupport his aſſertion as Abraham had; for Rebekah was not ſo near akin to him as Sarah was to Abraham; and though couſins might be called ſiſters, yet this was mere diſſimulation to call his wife ſiſter, and was done with an intention to deceive, and therefore not juſtifiable: for he feared to ſay, ſhe is my wife; which was the real truth; but the fear of men, which brings a ſnare, led him to this, and from which good men are not always free: leſt, ſaid he, that is, within himſelf, in his own mind; and ſo the Targum of Jonathan, he thought in his heart; the men of the place ſhould kill me for Rebekah; that they might marry her, one or other of them; for, it ſeems, they had not ſo great a ſenſe of the ſin of murder, as of adultery: becauſe ſhe was fair to look upon; which he feared would be a temptation to them, and ſtir up their impure deſires after her, in order to gratify which he was afraid they would kill him; Rebekah retaining her beauty ſtill, though ſhe had been married in all probability 40 years or more, ſee ch. xxiv. 16.

℣. 8. And it came to paſs, when he had been there a long time, &c.] Perhaps ſome years: for though it is in the original, when days were prolonged to him there [b]; yet days are ſometimes put for years: that Abimelech king of the Philiſtines looked out at a window; in his own palace, near to which, in all likelihood, were the apartments that Iſaac and Rebekah dwelt in; and this he did accidentally, and not out of curioſity, or with any intention to obſerve or pry into the behaviour and conduct of theſe two perſons one towards the other: and ſaw, and behold, Iſaac was ſporting with Rebekah his wife; laughing and joking with her, which by his motions and geſtures, and the airs and freedoms he took, Abimelech could perceive were ſuch as were not uſual between brothers and ſiſters, though honeſt and lawful between man and wife; ſuch as embracing her in his arms, and frequently kiſſing her, and the like.

℣. 9. And Abimelech called Iſaac, &c.] Sent a meſſenger to deſire him to come to him: and ſaid, behold, of a ſurety ſhe is thy wife; and then perhaps told him of what he had obſerved that paſſed between them; which was a clear proof that they muſt be man and wife, or he would never have took ſuch liberties with her: and how ſaidſt thou ſhe is my ſiſter? what reaſon hadſt thou for it? what could induce thee to ſay ſo? and Iſaac ſaid unto him; not alledging, as Abraham did, any relation that was between them before marriage: becauſe I ſaid; that is, within himſelf, for he did not ſpeak it out to others: leſt I die for her; for her ſake, that another might have and enjoy her; it was fear of loſing his life, that led him to take ſuch a ſtep, and give out that ſhe was his ſiſter.

℣. 10. And Abimelech ſaid, what is this thou haſt done unto us? &c.] By entertaining ſuſpicions and jealouſies of us as bad men, and by expoſing us to the temptation of committing iniquity; why haſt thou dealt thus with us, and what have we done, or is in our character, that thou ſhouldſt act after this manner? one of the people might lightly have lien with thy wife; it is much one or other had not before this time, not looking upon it criminal to have to do with a ſingle woman, when they would not have meddled with another man's wife. Jarchi interprets this of Abimelech himſelf; and ſo the Targum of Jonathan, who perhaps had been thinking of taking her to his bed; and was within a little [c], as the word for lightly may be rendered, of accompliſhing his deſign: and thou ſhouldeſt have brought guiltineſs upon us; been the occaſion of their committing the ſin of adultery, which was heinous in the eyes of heathens, and of bringing on them the puniſhment due thereunto.

℣. 11. And Abimelech charged all his people, &c.] All his ſubjects throughout his kingdom, and particularly the inhabitants of Gerar, and more eſpecially his courtiers and ſervants about him: ſaying, he that toucheth this man or his wife; that does any injury to one either by words or deeds, or behaves immodeſtly to the other, or attempts to raviſh her; this phraſe being ſometimes uſed as a modeſt expreſſion for carnal knowledge of a woman; or that does either of them any harm or hurt in any reſpect whatever: ſhall ſurely be put to death; this ſevere edict he publiſhed, in order to deter his ſubjects from uſing them ill, to which they might be provoked by Iſaac's diſſimulation, and by his evil ſuſpicions of them.

℣. 12. Then Iſaac ſowed in that land, &c.] In the land of Gerar; after matters were ſettled between him and Abimelech, and he had ordered his ſervants to do him no hurt, he ſowed wheat or barley, or ſome ſuch grain: and received in the ſame year 100 fold; in which he ſowed it, and which many take to be a year of famine; and ſo it was the more extraordinary, that there ſhould be ſuch a plentiful crop produced on Iſaac's ground, when there was ſuch barrenneſs elſewhere: but it does not ſeem likely that it ſhould be the ſame year of famine in which Iſaac came to Gerar, ſince he is ſaid to have been there a long time, ℣. 8. before this ſowing and plenty upon it were. This increaſe is far from being incredible; for Pliny [d], beſides inſtances he gives of 100 fold, ſays, that in a field at Byzacium in Africa, one buſhel produced 150 buſhels; and from the ſame ſame place, the deputy of Auguſtus there ſent him from one grain very few leſs than 400, and to Nero 340 ſtalks from one grain. Herodotus [c] ſpeaks of a country, near to the place where the Euphrates runs into the Tigris, on which the city Ninus was, which no where failed of producing 200 fold, and the better ſort of it even 300; ſee Matt. xiii. 23: and the Lord bleſſed him; and proſpered and ſucceeded all his endeavours; and this was the true reaſon of the fertility of the land he manured and ſowed.

℣. 13. And the man waxed great, &c.] In ſubſtance, as well as in honour and glory, among men: and went forward; in the world, and in the increaſe of worldly things: and grew until he became very great; as he muſt needs be, ſince Abraham his father left him all that he had, who was very rich in cattle, in gold and ſilver, and had been increaſing ever ſince; and eſpecially ſince he came to Gerar, where he was gradually increaſing, until he became to be exceeding great indeed, even the greateſt man in all the country, yea greater than king Abimelech himſelf, as it ſeems from ℣. 16.

℣. 14. For he had poſſeſſion of flocks, and poſſeſſion of herds, &c.] Many flocks of ſheep, and herds of cattle, of oxen, aſſes and camels, in which the riches of men in thoſe times and countries chiefly lay: and great ſtore of ſervants; to look after his flocks and herds, and fields; or much huſbandry [f]; Jarchi interprets it much tillage; as, much land, many farms, fields and vineyards, and the like; to cultivate which required many ſervants: and the Philiſtines envied him; for his proſperity and ſucceſs, that his land ſhould bring forth ſo plentifully, and that he ſhould have ſuch an increaſe of flocks, and herds, and ſervants, which made him ſo very ſignificant, great and honourable.

℣. 15. For all the wells which his father's ſervants had digged in the days of Abraham his father, &c.] For the watering of his flocks and herds, ſee Gen. xxi. 25: the Philiſtines had ſtopped them, and filled them with earth; that they might be of no uſe; and this they did through envy to him, and is mentioned as a proof of it.

℣. 16. And Abimelech ſaid unto Iſaac, go from us, &c.] Which was either ſaid by way of advice, conſulting Iſaac's good, and the peace of his own kingdom; or elſe by way of command, enjoining him to depart, having a ſecret envy to him himſelf, or at leaſt was jealous of his growing power and wealth: for thou art much mightier than we; in riches or goods, as the Targum of Jonathan adds; or in number, his family being greatly increaſed, his ſervants numerous, many being born of them in his houſe; Abraham had 318 trained ſervants in his houſe; how many Iſaac had, is not certain; they muſt be a large number for Abimelech to fear any thing from them. Some chuſe to interpret the words, thou haſt increaſed, or thou haſt got much from us, and by us; and therefore it is high time for thee to be gone from us.

℣. 17. And Iſaac departed thence, &c.] At once, peaceably and quietly, though to his loſs and diſadvantage, without taking himſelf either to argument or arms, in favour of himſelf; he departed immediately, as ſoon as he perceived his abode was diſagreeable to the king and his people; which gives us a very agreeable idea of the calm and peaceable diſpoſition of Iſaac: and pitched his tent in the valley of Gerar, and dwelt there; at ſome diſtance from the city of Gerar, as Jarchi obſerves. Joſephus [g] ſays, it was not far from it; but how far, is not certain; very probably it was not out of the country, though on the borders of it. Some render it, the brook of Gerar [h], and interpret it, that he pitched his tent, and dwelt by it; and the word uſed does ſignify a brook as well as a valley; and there was a brook of Gerar, which Sozomen [i] makes mention of.

℣. 18. And Iſaac digged again the wells of water which they had digged in the days of Abraham his father, &c.] This ſeems to refer to the ſame wells made mention of ℣. 15. ſince it follows, for the Philiſtines had ſtopped them after the death of Abraham; theſe were what Abraham's ſervants had dug, when he lived at Gerar, and which the Philiſtines durſt not ſtop during his life; but when he was dead, and particularly out of envy to Iſaac his ſon, whom they obſerved to proſper much, they ſtopped them up, that he might have no benefit by them; for otherwiſe they would ſcarcely have ſtopped them, if he had not been upon the ſpot, but would have made uſe of them themſelves. The opening of them again by Iſaac ſeems to be done, as Jarchi obſerves, before he removed from Gerar to the valley, though it is here related; unleſs it can be thought that Abraham dwelt in the valley alſo, and had dug wells there, which the Philiſtines ſtopped up after his death, and Iſaac opened when he came there; and if ſo, one would think he ſhould have had no occaſion to have dug other new wells, as we find he afterwards did; beſides, this ſeems to be out of the juriſdiction of the Philiſtines, and not in their power to have ſtopped them here; it ſeems therefore moſt probably that theſe were Abraham's wells at Gerar, and not in the valley. Origen [k] makes mention of wonderful wells being dug in the land of the Philiſtines by righteous men, meaning Abraham and Iſaac; and particularly in Aſcalon, which according to ſome is the ſame with Gerar; ſee the note on ch. xx. 1. and he called their names after the names by which his father had called them; which he did out of reſpect to his father, to preſerve the memory of his name, as well as to make his title and claim to them the more clear and certain.

℣. 19. And Iſaac's ſervants digged in the valley, &c.] In the valley of Gerar, as the Septuagint verſion expreſſes it: and found there a well of ſpringing water; or living water [l], which continually flows, as Aben Ezra rightly interprets it: hence this phraſe is uſed of the perpetual and ever living graces of the Spirit of God, John iv. 10, 11. and vii. 38.

℣. 20. And the herdmen of Gerar did ſtrive with Iſaac's herdmen, &c.] About the well which was dug in the valley; and this ſhows it was near Gerar, or at leaſt was upon the border of the country, and ſo it was a diſputable point to whom it belonged: ſaying, the water is ours; though the well was dug by Iſaac's ſervants, yet they laid claim to the water, pretending it was their ground, being on their borders: and he called the name of the well Eſek; which ſignifies contention: the reaſon of the name name follows, becauſe they ſtrove with him; wrangled, contended and diſputed with him about whoſe right it was.

℣. 21. And they digged another well, &c.] That is, Iſaac's ſervants: and ſtrove for that alſo; the herdmen of Gerar diſputed their right to that alſo, and ſtrove to get it from them: and he called the name of it Sitnah; which ſignifies hatred, it being out of hatred and malice to him, that they gave him ſo much trouble; from this word ſatan has his name, and theſe men were of a diabolical ſpirit, envious, ſpiteful and malicious.

℣. 22. And he removed from thence, &c.] A little further from their border, to cut off all pretence, and put a ſtop to all diſpute and controverſy for the future: and digged another well; in the place he removed to: and for that they ſtrove not; it being at ſuch a diſtance from their border, they could not have the face to claim any right to it: and he called the name of it Rehoboth; which ſignifies broad and ſpacious places, enlargements: for now hath the Lord made room for us; for himſelf, his family, his herds, and flocks, and freed them from thoſe difficulties under which they laboured, and the ſtraits into which they were brought through the contention of the herdmen of Gerar: and we ſhall be fruitful in the land; his flocks and his herds increaſe, having good paſturage and watering for them, and ſo he and his family be in proſperous circumſtances.

℣. 23. And he went up from thence to Beerſheba.] From the place he laſt removed unto Beerſheba; the famine being over, he returns to the place, where he and his father formerly lived, ch. xxi. 33. and xxii. 19.

℣. 24. And the Lord appeared to him in the ſame night, &c.] The firſt night he came to Beerſheba, in a dream or viſion, in which the Lord was repreſented as ſpeaking to him: and ſaid, I am the God of Abraham thy father; though he was dead, he remembered the covenant he made with him, and the promiſes he made unto him: and beſides, tho' Abraham was dead as to his body, yet alive in his ſoul; for God is not the God of the dead, but of the living, Matt. xxii. 32: fear not; any future famine, nor want of any good things, nor any enemies, the Philiſtines his neighbours, who had drove him from their country, and had haraſſed him from place to place: for I am with thee, and will bleſs thee; and if God is with his people, they have nothing to fear from men; and if he bleſſes them, they are bleſſed, and no curſe can light upon them: and multiply thy ſeed, for my ſervant Abraham's ſake; who was a faithful, diligent ſervant of his; whoſe ſervice was not forgotten by him, but would be rewarded in a way of grace, tho' not of debt.

℣. 25. And he builded an altar there, &c.] At Beerſheba, where his father Abraham had planted a grove before, and very probably had built an altar alſo, though it might not be now ſtanding, ch. xxi. 33: and called upon the name of the Lord; and gave him thanks for all his mercies to him; for the care he had taken of him, and proviſion he had made for him and his during the time of famine; and for the protection and preſervation of him in Gerar; and for his deliverance of him out of the hands of envious, malicious and unreaſonable men; as well as prayed unto him for preſent and future mercies, for providential care of him and his; and for communications of ſpecial grace, and for meetneſs for eternal glory; all which every good man daily prays to God for: and pitched his tent there; intending to take up his abode and ſettle there: and there Iſaac's ſervants digged a well; in order to find water for the family, and for the flocks and herds; and which was neceſſary to be done, as they perceived their maſter deſigned to fix his habitation here; wells of water being of great moment and conſequence in thoſe hot and deſart countries, as the above contentions about them abundantly ſhew.

℣. 26. Then Abimelech went to him from Gerar, &c.] After Iſaac was ſettled at Beerſheba, and was ſtill increaſing in his family and ſubſtance, of which Abimelech very probably was informed; and fearing leſt he ſhould reſent his being ſent out of his country by him, and the ill treatment he met with afterwards from the herdmen of Gerar in the valley about the wells, and ſhould employ his riches and power againſt him, and fall upon him, and take his kingdom from him, he took a journey from Gerar to Beerſheba to pay Iſaac a viſit, and make a covenant with him: and Ahuzzah one of his friends; Jarchi and Jonathan takes Ahuzzah for an appellative, and interpret it of a collection or company of his friends, which the king took along with him to attend him in his journey: but it ſeems rather to be the proper name of a man, who was very intimate and familiar with the king, and always kept him company, and ſo went along with him to Beerſheba: and Phicol the chief captain of his army; his general, as the other was his principal counſellor or prime miniſter. There was one of this name, and in the ſame office, in the days of Abraham, and who attended the then preſent king, who alſo was called Abimelech on a like account as here, ch. xxvii. 22. but as the one affair was at the diſtance of 100 years or more from the other, it is probable, that as this Abimelech might be the ſon of that Abimelech that lived in the times of Abraham, ſo this Phicol might be the ſon of him that lived then, and who ſucceeded his father in his office; tho' ſome think that Phicol is the name of an office, and ſignifies the mouth of all, by whom the addreſſes of the people were made to the king; but this is not likely, ſince he is deſcribed by his office as general of the army; which is very different from the maſter of ceremonies, or any thing of that kind, and plainly ſhows it to be the name of a man.

℣. 27. And Iſaac ſaid unto them, wherefore come ye to me, &c.] What is the meaning of this viſit? what has brought you hither? it can't be from affection and friendſhip to me: ſeeing ye hate me, and have ſent me away from you? the latter he mentions as a proof of the former; they envied his proſperity, and hated him on that account, and therefore expelled him their country, or at leaſt would not ſuffer him to dwell among them; and ſtill more glaring proofs were given of the hatred of the men of Gerar to him, not only by ſtopping up his father's wells, but by ſtriving and contending with him about thoſe he dug in the valley after he was gone from them; one of which he called Sitnah, from their hatred of him.

℣. 28. And they ſaid, we ſaw certainly, that the Lord was with thee, &c.] Not only whilſt he was among them, by the fruitfulneſs of the land he ſowed, by the increaſe of his family, his flocks and herds, but alſo ſince he was gone from them, in the valley of Gerar, and now in Beerſheba: and we ſaid; one to another, aſſembled in privy-council, in which this affair was talked over and debated: let there now be an oath betwixt us, even betwixt us and thee; what was between us and thy father, or between thine anceſtors and ours, let it be renewed and confirmed before us; ſo Onkelos and Jarchi;

Jarchi; see ch. xxi. 23: and let us make a covenant with thee; the articles of which follow.

℣. 29. That thou wilt do us no hurt, &c.] Neither to our persons nor properties, to our kingdom and subjects, by invading our land, and seizing on our kingdom, all which was feared from Isaac's growing wealth and power: as we have not touched thee; not done the least injury to him, to his person, family and substance, but suffered him to go away with all he had untouched: and as we have done unto thee nothing but good; by royal authority, or by the command and direction of the king and his nobles; for as for the stopping up the wells his father's servants had dug, and the controversy that was about those in the vale, and the trouble Isaac had on that account, these things were not by the order of the king and council, and perhaps without their knowledge: and have sent thee away in peace; no one being suffered to do any injury to him, or molest him in carrying off every thing that belonged unto him: thou art now blessed of the Lord; so it appeared by the prosperity he was attended with, and by the Lord's protection of him, and the constant and continual favours he was bestowing on him; and this induced Abimelech and his nobles to seek to cultivate friendship, and be on good terms with him. De Dieu gives a different sense of these words, and considers them in the form of an oath or imprecation, "if thou "should'st do us any hurt, seeing we have not "touched thee, &c. be thou now accursed of the "Lord," taking the word used in a contrary sense, as in Job i. 5, 10. and ii. 5, 9. 1 Kings xxi. 10, 13.

℣. 30. And he made them a feast, &c.] Made a feast like a king, for the king and his grandees; he treated them in a generous way, according to their dignity, and agreeable to his own disposition and substance: and they did eat and drink; freely, chearfully, and in a friendly manner; for both having spoken their minds, they agreed to bury all former things in oblivion, and live in peace and friendship; though this feast was not on account of the covenant made between them, as is observed by some interpreters, but as an hospitable act, and a token of good-will; for the covenant and the oath confirming it, seem to be made next morning, as follows:

℣. 31. And they rose up betimes in the morning, &c.] Abimelech and his friends, in order to return home, and Isaac to take his leave of them, and both to make the covenant between them in form, and confirm it by an oath, for which the morning was the fittest time; when the mind is quite free and composed, and attentive to what is done, as so solemn a transaction should be performed with the utmost attention and seriousness: and swore one to another; to live in amity and friendship, and not distress and disturb each other: and Isaac sent them away, and they departed from him in peace; he took his leave of them in a friendly manner, and they departed well pleased with the reception they had met with, and the success they had had, having agreed on and settled articles of peace to mutual satisfaction.

℣. 32. And it came to pass the same day, &c.] That the above things were transacted: that Isaac's servants came, and told him concerning the well which they had digged; they had dug it before Abimelech came to Isaac, but they had not had an opportunity of acquainting him with it until he was gone, and then they came to give him an account of it, what a sort of a well it was, and how it answered their expectations and wishes; and which in those countries was a very great blessing, and served very much to recommend a place to dwell in: and said unto him, we have found water; not only had dug a well, but they had found plenty of water, and that which was good; or otherwise it would not have been worth while to have troubled Isaac with the account of it.

℣. 33. And he called it Sheba, &c.] Which, according to Jerom, signifies fulness, as if it had its name from the abundance of water in it; but rather it signifies an oath, and was so called from the oath, which he and Abimelech had just took to one another; and these circumstances meeting together, the taking of the oath, and the account of the well, therefore the name of the city is Beersheba unto this day; that is, the well of the oath: it had been so called by Abraham an 100 years ago or more; but now upon this occasion it was renewed and confirmed, and so continued until the times of Moses, and many ages after.

℣. 34. And Esau was forty years old, &c.] The same age his father was of when he married, ch. xxv. 20: when he took to wife Judith, the daughter of Beeri the Hittite; Josephus [m] makes her to be the same with Aholibamah; but her father's name was Zibeon, and an Hivite, and must therefore be another person, not only the name being different, but the tribe, Gen. xxxvi. 2: and Bashemath the daughter of Elon the Hittite; whom Aben Ezra takes to be the same with Adah, and so does Josephus; and in this they may be right, since the name of her father, and his nation or tribe agree, ch. xxxvi. 2. The fathers of these two women are represented by Josephus as men of great power and authority among the Canaanites, as very probably they were. Esau had another wife of the same name with this last, but she was daughter of Ishmael, and sister of Nebaioth, ch. xxxvi. 3. for he had more wives than those; these were his two first, who very probably were not taken together, but one after another, though it may be but at a short distance from each other.

℣. 35. Which were a grief of mind unto Isaac, and to Rebekah.] The marriage of them itself was a trouble to them, it being contrary to their will that any of their children should marry with the Canaanites, and those the worst sort of them, the Hittites; it having been the care of Abraham, the father of Isaac, that his son should not marry with them, and laid a strict injunction on his servant not to take a wife for his son from among them; and which was an example to be followed in after-times, and which Esau very likely was not ignorant of: and besides this, the women themselves he took for wives were very disagreeable on all accounts, partly because of their religion, being idolaters, and partly by reason of their temper and behaviour being proud, haughty and disobedient; as all the three Targums intimate.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXVII.

IN this chapter we are informed, that Iſaac being old and dimſighted ſent for Eſau to get him veniſon, that he might eat of it, and bleſs him before he died, ℣. 1—4. that Rebekah hearing of this formed a ſcheme for Jacob to get the bleſſing before him, which ſhe communicated to Jacob, to which he at firſt objected, but afterwards complied, ℣. 5—17. and alſo how that he ſucceeded in the attempt, and got the bleſſing from his brother, ℣. 18—29. and that this was confirmed to him by his father, even when his miſtake was diſcovered upon Eſau's coming, ℣. 30—33. which occaſioned a moſt bitter cry in Eſau, a ſevere reflexion on his brother, and an earneſt expoſtulation with his father for a bleſſing, which he obtained, ℣. 34—40. the conſequence of this were hatred in Eſau to Jacob, and an intention to kill him, which Rebekah hearing of, adviſed Jacob to flee to her brother Laban, ℣. 41—45. and to facilitate this, complains to Iſaac of Eſau's wives, and ſuggeſts, that ſhould Jacob marry among the ſame people, it would add to the diſtreſs of their lives; and therefore hints it to him, that it was neceſſary and proper he ſhould go to her family for a wife, ℣. 46. and whither Iſaac ſent him, as the following chapter ſhews.

℣. 1. And it came to paſs that when Iſaac was old, &c.] He is generally thought to be about 137 years of age at this time, which was juſt the age of his brother Iſhmael, when he died, ch. xxv. 17 and might put him in mind of his own death as near at hand; though if he was no older, he lived after this 43 years, for he lived to be an 180 years old, ch. xxxv. 28: and his eyes were dim, ſo that he could not ſee; which circumſtance is mentioned, not only as a ſign of old age, and as common to it, but for the ſake of the following hiſtory, and as accounting for it, that he ſhould not know Jacob when he bleſſed him; and this was ſo ordered in providence, that by means of it the bleſſing might be transferred to him, which otherwiſe in all probability would not have been done, if Iſaac had had his ſight: he called Eſau his eldeſt ſon; who though he was married, and had been married 37 years at this time, yet ſtill lived in his father's houſe, or near him; for as he was born when his father was 60 years of age, and he married when he himſelf was 40, and his father muſt be an 100, ſo if Iſaac was now 137, Eſau muſt have been married 37 years; and though he had diſobliged his father by his marriage, yet he retained a natural affection for him; nor had he turned him out of doors, nor had he any thoughts of diſinheriting him; but on the contrary intended to beſtow the bleſſing on him as the firſt-born, for which reaſon he is here called his eldeſt ſon: and ſaid unto him, my ſon; owning the relation, expreſſing a tender affection for him, and ſignifying he had ſomething further to ſay unto him: and he ſaid unto him, behold here am I; by which Eſau intimated he was ready to hear what his father had to ſay to him, and was willing to obey him. The Targum of Jonathan ſays, this was the 14th of Niſan, when Iſaac called Eſau to him.

℣. 2. And he ſaid, behold now, I am old, &c.] See the note on the preceding verſe: I know not the day of my death, how ſoon it will be; every one knows he muſt die, but the day and hour he knows not, neither young nor old; and tho' young men may promiſe themſelves many days and years, an old man cannot, but muſt or ſhould live in the conſtant expectation of death.

℣. 3. Now therefore take, I pray thee, thy weapons, &c.] Or thy veſſels, or inſtruments [a], his inſtruments of hunting: as thy quiver, and thy bow; the former is the veſſel or inſtrument, in which arrows were put and carried, and has its name in the Hebrew language from its being hung at the girdle, though another word is more commonly uſed for a quiver; and Onkelos and Jarchi interpret this of a ſword; and which is not diſapproved of by Aben Ezra and Ben Melech, who explain it either a quiver or a ſword; and the latter was as neceſſary for hunting as the former, ſee ℣. 40. and ſuch a ſword may be meant, as Mr. Fuller obſerves [b], which we call a hanger; and of the bow being an inſtrument of hunting, not any thing need be ſaid: and go out to the field, and take me ſome veniſon; this does not neceſſarily intend what we commonly call ſo, but any thing hunted in the field, as hares, wild goats, &c. and indeed the latter ſeems to be what Iſaac loved, by the preparation Rebekah afterwards made.

℣. 4. And make me ſavoury meat, ſuch as I love, &c.] For, though he had loſt his ſight, he had not loſt his taſte, nor his appetite for ſavoury food: and bring it to me, that I may eat; this was enjoined to make trial of his filial affection and duty to him, before he bleſſed him: that my ſoul may bleſs thee before I die; not only that he might do it with chearfulneſs and vivacity, having eat a comfortable meal, and being refreſhed with it, but that, having had proof of his ſon's duty and affection to him, he might confer the bleſſing on him heartily: this bleſſing was not an ordinary and common one, but what parents uſed to beſtow upon their children at the time of their death, or a little before it; and good men oftentimes did this under a ſpirit of prophecy, declaring what would be the caſe and circumſtances of their children in time to come; and particularly the principal part of the bleſſing of Iſaac, which Abraham had entailed upon him by divine direction, and he thought to have entailed on Eſau his firſt-born, was the promiſe of the deſcent of the Meſſiah from him and his ſeed, and of the poſſeſſion of the land of Canaan by them: and this ſhews that Rebekah had not made known the oracle to Iſaac, that the elder ſhould ſerve the younger; or, if ſhe had, he had forgot, or did not underſtand it, and might think it reſpected not the perſons of his ſons, but their poſterity; or however from a natural affection for Eſau his firſt-born, and, that the bleſſing and inheritance might go in the common channel, he was deſirous he ſhould have it; and he might alſo be ignorant of Eſau's having ſold his birth-right to Jacob, or that he made no account of it.

℣. 5. And Rebekah heard when Iſaac ſpake unto Eſau his ſon, &c.] She might hear Iſaac call to him him by one means or another, that he had ſent for him, or might ſee him go into his father's tent, and might ſtand at the door of it and liſten to hear what he ſaid to him; though the Targum of Jonathan ſays, ſhe heard by the Holy Spirit: and Eſau went to the field to hunt for veniſon, and to bring it; as his father directed and enjoined him; and thus it was ordered by divine providence, that there might be time and opportunity for Jacob to get the bleſſing before his brother.

℣. 6. And Rebekah ſpake unto Jacob her ſon, &c.] Who was in the tent with her, and for whom ſhe had the ſtrongeſt affection: ſaying, behold, I heard thy father ſpeak unto Eſau thy brother; heard the converſation that paſſed between them, and particularly what Iſaac had given in charge to Eſau, ſaying as follows:

℣. 7. Bring me veniſon, and make me ſavoury meat, &c.] Fetch him veniſon out of the field, and dreſs it in a ſavoury manner, and bring it to him: that I may eat, and bleſs thee before the Lord before my death; the phraſe before the Lord is here added, which yet perhaps might be expreſſed by Iſaac, though before omitted by the hiſtorian, and has a very conſiderable emphaſis in it; for this ſolemn bleſſing was given not only in the preſence of the Lord, and before him as a witneſs, but by calling upon him, and praying for direction in it, and then pronouncing it in his name and by his authority, he approving of it, ſo that it was ever after irrevocable.

℣. 8. Now therefore, my ſon, obey my voice, &c.] Hearken to what I am about to ſay, and do according to that which I command thee, in every particular; ſhe required of him filial obedience to all that ſhe enjoined him; which, though not difficult to be performed, ſhe was aware Jacob would make objections to, as he did; and therefore ſhe is ſo preſſing and peremptory in her injunctions, as well knowing it was reſpecting an affair of the greateſt moment and importance.

℣. 9. Go now to the flock, &c.] To the flock he had the care of, and that immediately, for the eaſe required haſte: and fetch me from thence two good kids of the goats; two young kids that were fat, as Jonathan and Ben Melech interpret it; and, though two may ſeem to be too much to be dreſſed for Iſaac only; it may be obſerved, that Rebekah intended only to take out ſome of the choiceſt and moſt tender and delicate parts of them, and which would beſt ſuit her purpoſe, and which ſhe would make moſt like to veniſon; and the reſt could be diſpoſed of for the uſe of the family: and, if it ſhould be queſtioned whether Rebekah had a right to do this without her huſband's leave, the Jewiſh writers have an anſwer ready; that, in her dowry or matrimonial contract, Iſaac had allowed her to take two kids of the goats every day [p]: and I will make them ſavoury meat for thy father, ſuch as he loveth; ſuch as would paſs with him for veniſon: Jarchi ſays, that the taſte of a kid is like the taſte of a young roe or fawn; however, by ſeaſoning, the natural taſte might be altered ſo as not to be diſtinguiſhed, as we find it was; and ſuch as have the beſt ſkill in veniſon may be impoſed upon and deceived by more ways than one, as well as Iſaac was.

℣. 10. And thou ſhalt bring it to thy father, &c.] For veniſon; and as if he was Eſau that brought it: that he may eat, and that he may bleſs thee before his death; to whom ſhe knew by the divine oracle the bleſſing belonged, as well as by virtue of the ſale of the birth-right to him by his brother, and through Eſau's forfeiting of it by marrying with the Canaanites: in theſe her ſentiments ſhe was right, but wrong in the ways and means ſhe took to get it for him.

℣. 11. And Jacob ſaid to Rebekah his mother, &c.] Being timorous leſt he ſhould do an ill thing, and be accounted a deceiver, and bring a curſe upon himſelf: behold, Eſau my brother is an hairy man; covered all over with hair, as with a hairy garment; ſo he was born and ſo he continued, and no doubt his hair increaſed, ch. xxv. 25: and I am a ſmooth man; without hair, excepting in thoſe parts where it is common for all men to have it.

℣. 12. My father peradventure will feel me, &c.] For, though he could not ſee him, and ſo diſcern whether he had any hair or no on him, yet, ſuſpecting him by his voice, he might call him to him to feel him, as he did; for Jacob underſtood his mother right, that he was to perſonate his brother Eſau in the tranſaction of this affair: and I ſhall ſeem to him as a deceiver; one that impoſes upon another and cauſes him to err, leads him to ſay or do wrong things; and not only appear as one, but be really one, and even a very great one, as the doubling of the radical letters in the word ſhews; yea, the worſt of deceivers, a deceiver of a parent, of one that was both aged and blind: and I ſhall bring a curſe upon me, and not a bleſſing; and he might juſtly fear, that ſhould he be found out, it would ſo provoke his father, that, inſtead of bleſſing him, he would curſe him, ſee Deut. xxvii. 18.

℣. 13. And his mother ſaid unto him, upon me be thy curſe, my ſon, &c.] That is, if thy father ſhould curſe thee, which I am well aſſured he will not, let the curſe, be what it will, fall upon me, and not on thee; I'll bear the blame and the puniſhment: this ſhe ſaid in the ſtrong faith of the divine oracle, being fully perſuaded her ſcheme would ſucceed, and that Jacob would have the bleſſing, and therefore ſhe feared no curſe falling upon her or her ſon; and this ſhe ſaid to encourage him: the Targum of Onkelos is, "to me it has "been ſaid in prophecy, that the curſes ſhall not "come upon thee, my ſon:" only obey my voice, and go fetch me them; the two fat kids of the goats from the flock.

℣. 14. And he went and fetched and brought them to his mother, &c.] Being ſatisfied with what his mother had ſaid, he went to the field where the flock was, and took out of it two young kids, and brought them to his mother; and thus far he did right to obey her commands: and his mother made ſavoury meat, ſuch as his father loved; by picking out proper pieces, and ſeaſoning them well, it was as grateful to him as if it had really been veniſon, ſuch as he loved.

℣. 15. And Rebekah took goodly garments of her eldeſt ſon Eſau, &c.] Or deſireable [q] ones, exceeding good ones: which were with her in the houſe; which ſhe had the care and keeping of, and were wore only on particular occaſions: ſome think theſe were prieſtly garments, which belonged to him as the firſt-born, and were not in the keeping of his wives, being idolaters, but in his mother's keeping;

ing; which is not very probable, yet more likely than that they were, as some Jewish writers [r] say, the garments of Adam the first man, which Esau seeing on Nimrod, greatly desired them, and slew him for them, see ch. x. 10. and hence called desireable garments: and put them upon Jacob her younger son; that he might be took for Esau, should Isaac examine him and feel his garments, or smell at them.

℣. 16. And she put the skins of the kids of the goats upon his hands, &c.] Upon both his hands, and the whole of them that was bare, that he might appear to be like Esau: and upon the smooth of his neck; which in Esau was covered with hair as his hands; and Hiscuni a Jewish writer [s] observes, that the skins of goats are rough and like the skin of an hairy man; and so Bochart [t] remarks, that goats hair in the eastern countries is not much unlike human hair; see 1 Sam. xix. 13, 16.

℣. 17. And she gave the savoury meat, &c.] Seasoned and dressed in such a manner as might be taken for venison: and the bread which she had prepared to eat with it, into the hand of her son Jacob; the dish of meat in one hand, and the bread in the other.

℣. 18. And he came unto his father, &c.] Into the tent and apartment where he was: and said, my father; to try whether he was awake, and to let him know that he was come, since he could not see him: and he said, here am I; what hast thou to say to me? who art thou, my son? or which of my sons art thou, Jacob or Esau? for, from the voice and the quick dispatch made, he suspected it was not his son Esau.

℣. 19. And Jacob said unto his father, I am Esau thy first-born, &c.] Had he only said that he was his first-born, he might have been excused from lying, because he had bought the birth-right of Esau; but, when he says, I am Esau, he can by no means be excused; for to say he personated Esau, will not do; besides, he afterwards says he was his very son Esau, ℣. 24: I have done according as thou baddest me; which is another lye; for Isaac had not bid him bring him any venison, nor go into the field for it, and take it and dress it for him; nor indeed had Jacob done either of these: arise, I pray thee, sit and eat of my venison; or hunting [u], what he had hunted; another untruth, for it was not venison he brought him, nor any thing that was hunted by him: by this it seems that Isaac lay upon a bed or couch through infirmity, and therefore is bid to arise and put himself in a proper posture for eating, which in those times and countries was usually sitting: that thy soul may bless me; as this was the thing in view, so speaking of it as soon as he came in, and which he desired might be done after his father had eat and drank, might serve to take off the suspicion of his being another person; since this was what Isaac himself proposed to Esau to do; and this he said when there were none else present.

℣. 20. And Isaac said unto his son, &c.] Supposing him to be Esau: how is it that thou hast found it so quickly, my son? that is, the venison; that he had met with it so soon in the field, and got it dressed and ready in so short a time, which was not common, and seemed to be too little for doing all this in it, and so still created some suspicion of deceit: and he said, because the Lord thy God brought it to me; which was another falshood; for it was not the Lord, but his mother brought it to him: and this seems to be the most marvellous of all, that so good a man should dare to bring the name of the Lord God into this affair; indeed he does not say, the Lord my God, or our God, but thy God; which some think was done on purpose the more to cover the deceit, because they suppose that Esau, whom Jacob personated, was an idolater, but this is not so evident; rather it looks as if Jacob had not the confidence to call the Lord his God with a lye in his mouth.

℣. 21. And Isaac said unto Jacob, come near, I pray thee, that I may feel thee, my son, &c.] Still suspecting some fraud in the case; and, whereas he knew that Esau was a hairy man, and Jacob smooth, he thought by feeling he could discover the imposture, if there was any: whether thou be my very son Esau, or not; which he still pretty much questioned.

℣. 22. And Jacob went near unto Isaac his father, &c.] Boldly and without trembling; which he could the better do, as his father could not see him, and so not capable of discerning any change in his countenance or outward behaviour: and he felt him; some parts of his body, especially his hands: and said, the voice is Jacob's voice; very like it, as if it was the same, as indeed it was: but the hands are the hands of Esau; are like them, being hairy as they; or, as the Targums of Jonathan and Jerusalem, "the feeling of the hands is as "the feeling of the hands of Esau;" they feel like them.

℣. 23. And he discerned him not, &c.] As he could not see, he could make no judgment by that sense; and, though he had his hearing, and thought the voice was like Jacob's, he might imagine there might be an alteration in Esau's voice, coming in haste and weary from the fields; yet, as there could not be any deception in his feeling, he thought it safest to trust to that, as it follows: because his hands were hairy as his brother Esau's hands; which could not in a short time become so naturally; it was more reasonable to think that Esau's voice should be altered and become like Jacob's, than that Jacob's hands should become like Esau's: so he blessed him; or intended and determined within himself to bless him, for the blessing was not given till afterwards; unless this is to be understood of a common blessing, congratulating him on the quick dispatch he made, and the great success he met with; and after this gave him the patriarchal blessing, which as yet he had not, being not thoroughly satisfied of him, as appears by what follows.

℣. 24. And said, art thou my very son Esau? &c.] Still having some doubt on his mind whether he really was so or no, because of his voice: and he said, I am; as for the observation of Jarchi upon this, in order to excuse Jacob from lying, that he does not say, I am Esau, only I; it will not do, since it is an answer to Isaac's question, with a design to deceive him; and he intended by it that he should understand him as he did, that he was really Esau.

℣. 25. And he said, bring it near to me, &c.] Being in a good measure satisfied that it must be Esau that was with him, he agreed that he should set his savoury meat before him he had prepared and brought to him: and I will eat of my son's venison, that my soul may bless thee; this shewed that as yet he had not blessed him, at least that the main and principal blessing was yet to come: and he

he brought it near to him, and he did eat; ſet it on a table before him and guided his hands to it, or fed him with it, and he made a meal of it: and he brought him wine, and he drank; and ſo was comfortably refreſhed, and in a good temper and diſpoſition of mind to confer the bleſſing.

℣. 26. And his father Iſaac ſaid unto him, &c.] After he had eat and drank, and the repaſt was over, and all were took away: come near now, and kiſs me, my ſon; which was deſired either out of affection to him, excited by this inſtance of preparing ſuch ſavoury and agreeable food; or elſe having ſome ſuſpicion ſtill, and willing to have more ſatisfaction before he proceeded further to bleſs, from the ſmell of his breath, and of his garments.

℣. 27. And he came near, and kiſſed him, &c.] Jacob came near and kiſſed Iſaac his father: and he ſmelled the ſmell of his raiment; which being not like the ſmell of a ſheep-coat, but of a field, might give him more full ſatisfaction that it was truly Eſau: and he bleſſed him; with his patriarchal and prophetic bleſſing, which here begins: and ſaid, ſee, the ſmell of my ſon is as the ſmell of a field which the Lord hath bleſſed; like a field full of fragrant herbs, flowers and ſpices, watered with the dews and rain of heaven, and ſo made fruitful, which emits a moſt delightful odour; this may reſpect the ſcent of Eſau's clothes, now on Jacob's back, which they received from the fields which Eſau continually frequented; or rather from the odoriferous herbs and fruits which were put among them in the cheſt, in which Rebekah had laid them up; and it may be, that whereas the goats ſkins on his hands and neck would be apt to ſend forth a rank and diſagreeable ſmell, theſe might be ſo ſcented by Rebekah as to prevent that. Some render theſe words, ſee the ſmell of my ſon, whom the Lord hath bleſſed [w], as the ſmell of a field; and ſo Iſaac pronounces him bleſſed of the Lord, as well as by himſelf; the ſenſe is the ſame: as to the ſmell, many intepreters conſider this as a type and figure of the acceptance of believers with God, being clothed with the goodly, excellent and deſirable garment of the righteouſneſs of Chriſt their elder brother, even of their perſons, ſervices and ſacrifices; which is indeed truly ſpiritual and evangelical; but is liable to this objection, that it makes prophane Eſau a type of Chriſt: I ſee not that any thing can well be objected to the application of this ſon of Iſaac's to the Meſſiah himſelf, whom he may have a ſpecial regard unto in this prophetic bleſſing, reading the words, the ſmell of my ſon ſhall be as the ſmell of a field; or my ſon, whom the Lord hath bleſſed, and prevented with all the bleſſings of goodneſs, and in whom all nations ſhall be bleſſed, ſhall be as the ſmell of a field; all whoſe garments ſmell of myrrh, aloes and caſſia, Pſ. xlv. 8. even Iſaac's principal ſon, that ſhould be of his ſeed, of whom Jacob his preſent ſon was a type, and who was to ſpring from him.

℣. 28. Therefore God give thee of the dew of heaven, &c.] Or ſhall or will give thee [x], ſeeing he was bleſſed of God, and the bleſſed ſeed ſhould ſpring from him, as well as his poſterity ſhould inherit the land of Canaan; for this is ſaid rather by way of prophecy than wiſh, and ſo all that follow; and the dew of heaven is the rather mentioned, not only becauſe that makes the earth fruitful on which it plentifully falls, but likewiſe becauſe the land of Canaan, the portion of Jacob's poſterity, much needed it, and had it, for rain fell there but ſeldom, only twice a year, in ſpring and autumn; and between theſe two rains, the one called the former, the other the latter rain, the land was impregnated and made fruitful by plentiful dews; and theſe ſignified figuratively both the doctrines and bleſſings of grace, which all Jacob's ſpiritual offspring, ſuch as are Iſraelites indeed, are partakers of, and eſpecially under the goſpel-diſpenſation, ſee Deut. xxxii. 2. Hoſ. xiv. 5. Mic. v. 7: and the fatneſs of the earth, and plenty of corn and wine; and ſuch the land of Canaan was, a fat and fertile land, abounding with all good things, ſee Deut. viii. 8. by which are figured the plenty of goſpel-proviſions, the word and ordinances, which God has given to his Jacob and Iſrael in all ages, as he has not given to other people, and eſpecially in the times of the Meſſiah, Jacob's eminent ſeed and ſon, ſee Pſ. cxlvii. 19, 20. Iſ. xxv. 6. Zech. ix. 17.

℣. 29. Let people ſerve thee, and nations bow down to thee, &c.] Which was literally true in the times of Joſhua and the Judges, when the Canaanites were conquered and ſubdued, and thoſe that remained became tributary to the Iſraelites; and ſtill more ſo in the times of David, a ſon of Jacob, in the line of Judah, when the Philiſtines, Moabites, Syrians, Ammonites and Edomites became ſubject to him, his ſervants and tributaries; and yet more ſo in the times of the Meſſiah that was to ſpring from Jacob, and did, to whom many nations have been already ſubject, and all will in the latter day, Pſ. lxxii. 11. Rev x[illegible]. And this paſſage is applied to the Meſſiah, and his times, by the Jews, in an ancient book [y] of theirs, at leaſt ſaid to be ſo. The Targum of Jonathan paraphraſes it of the children of Eſau or the Edomites, and of the children of Keturah; and that of Jeruſalem, of the children of Eſau, and of Iſhmael: be lord over thy brethren, and let thy mother's ſons bow down to thee; theſe ſeem rather to be the children of Eſau, Jacob's brother, and his mother's ſons; the Targum of Jeruſalem interprets the latter of the ſons of Laban, his mother's brother, the Arabians and Syrians; which will be more fully accompliſhed, when the kingdoms of this world ſhall become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Chriſt, Rev. xi. 15. who will then appear to be king of kings, and lord of lords, even the king of the whole earth: curſed be every one that curſeth thee; it ſignifies, that thoſe who were the enemies of Jacob, or would be the enemies of the church and people of God, his ſpiritual Iſrael, and of the Meſſiah, would be reckoned the enemies of God, and treated as ſuch; and that thoſe that were his friends, and the friends of the people of God, and heartily wiſh well to the intereſt of Chriſt, theſe ſhould be accounted the friends of God, and be uſed as ſuch. The ſame bleſſing is pronounced on Abraham the grandfather of Jacob, ch. xii. 3.

℣. 30. And it came to paſs, as ſoon as Iſaac had made an end of bleſſing Jacob, &c.] So that he had the whole entire bleſſing, and nothing wanting; and takes in bleſſings of all ſorts, temporal, ſpiritual and eternal, of which the land of Canaan, and the fruits of it, were typical: and Jacob was yet ſcarce gone out from the preſence of Iſaac his father; which no doubt he made haſte to do, as ſoon as he had got the bleſſing; partly to avoid his brother, whom he might expect to come in every moment, and partly to relate to his mother the ſucceſs he had met with: or ſcarce in going out was gone out [z], was juſt gone out, and that was all; the Targum of Jonathan ſays, he was gone about two hands breadths; that is, out of the door of his father's tent, which was a ſmall ſpace indeed. Jarchi interprets this doubling of the word, of the one going out, and the other coming in at the ſame time; but Ainſworth more rightly obſerves, that it makes the matter the more remarkable, touching God's providence herein: that Eſau his brother came in from his hunting; and not only was come out of the field from hunting, but had been at home ſome time, and had dreſſed what he had caught in hunting, and was juſt coming in with it to his father, as appears from the following verſe.

℣. 31. And he alſo made ſavoury meat, and brought it unto his father, &c.] Which was made of real veniſon, or of creatures taken in hunting, and not like Jacob's, made of other fleſh, in imitation of it; for what the Jewiſh writers [a] ſay is not to be regarded, that he was hindered from getting true veniſon, by angels looſing the deer he bound; ſtill leſs what the Targum of Jonathan ſays, that he killed a dog, made ſavoury meat of it, and brought it to his father: and ſaid unto his father, let my father ariſe, and eat of his ſon's veniſon, that thy ſoul may bleſs me; this addreſs is made by Eſau to his father in a very reſpectful manner, as became a dutiful ſon to an aged and honoured parent; who in obedience to his command had prepared agreeable food for him, and now brought it to him, in order to receive his bleſſing, which he had himſelf propoſed to give him upon it.

℣. 32. And Iſaac his father ſaid unto him, who art thou? &c.] Hearing another voice more like Eſau's than what he had heard before ſurprized him, and therefore in haſte puts this queſtion: and he ſaid, I am thy ſon, thy firſt-born Eſau; all which was true in a ſenſe; he was his ſon, and he was Eſau, and he was his firſt-born by nature, but not by right, for he had ſold his birth-right.

℣. 33. And Iſaac trembled very exceedingly, &c.] Or trembled with a great trembling exceedingly [b]; he was amazed, and aſtoniſhed, and ſeized with a trembling all over his body, and with terror and confuſion of mind; at the craft of Jacob in getting the bleſſing; at the diſappointment of Eſau in loſing it; at his own act in bleſſing Jacob inſtead of Eſau, contrary to his inclination and intention; and at the over-ruling providence of God in bringing this about in ſo ſtrange a manner, agreeable to the oracle he had given Rebekah; which now perhaps came freſh into the mind of Iſaac, if he had heard it before; and all together threw him into this amazement: and he ſaid, who, where is he; which words ſpoken in haſte, and without order, ſhew the hurry and conſternation of mind he was in: that hath taken veniſon, and brought it me, and I have eaten of all before thou cameſt; he was here but juſt now; he was ſcarce gone out before thou cameſt in; who, and where is he, that has done this? He knew it muſt be Jacob that had prepared and brought him food he called veniſon, which he had eat ſufficiently of, though in the confuſion of his mind he puts theſe queſtions: and have bleſſed him? yea, and he ſhall be bleſſed; for he now ſaw clearly, that it was according to the divine will that Jacob ſhould be bleſſed, though his natural affection led him to bleſs Eſau; and no doubt whilſt he was pronouncing the bleſſing on Jacob, he felt an uncommon impulſe upon his mind, by which he was aſſured that he was right in bleſſing him, that it was according to the will of God, was by his direction, and with his approbation; and therefore he here, even after Jacob's deceit was detected, confirms and ratifies it; and this is added, leſt any queſtion ſhould be made of the validity of the bleſſing of Jacob, when it was given through miſtake, and got by deceit; but this Iſaac did and ſaid knowingly, and by faith, as the apoſtle ſays, Heb. xi. 20.

℣. 34. And when Eſau heard the words of his father, &c.] That another perſon had been before him, and got the bleſſing; and eſpecially when he heard this ratified, and confirmed, and made irrevocable: he cried with a great and exceeding bitter cry; as loud as he poſſibly could, and in as doleful and hideous a manner as can be imagined; according to the Vulgate Latin verſion, he roared like a lion: and ſaid unto his father, bleſs me, even me alſo, O my father; thou art my father, and I am a child of thine as well as Jacob, ſhow paternal affection to me; give me alſo a child's bleſſing, one at leaſt equal to what thou haſt given Jacob, if not a greater, as being the firſt-born.

℣. 35. And he ſaid, thy brother came with ſubtlety, &c.] The Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan, and ſo Jarchi, interpret it, with wiſdom, taking it in a good ſenſe, and as excuſing the fact; or rather commending it, as if it was wiſely and prudently managed; but the word ſignifies fraud and deceit, and ſo it muſt be underſtood; though it may be Iſaac ſays this, not ſo much to blame Jacob for what he had done, as to excuſe himſelf to Eſau, that he did not intend to give the bleſſing from him, but that he was impoſed upon through the craft and ſubtlety of his brother, who feigned himſelf to be Eſau; pretending he had been a hunting, and had had wonderful ſucceſs, and had got veniſon, and had prepared it; and came with goats ſkins upon his hands and neck, that he might ſeem to be hairy as Eſau was; and by theſe artful tricks he had deceived him, and therefore Eſau could not blame him for what he had done: and hath taken away thy bleſſing; which belonged to him as the firſt-born, and he expected to have, and Iſaac intended to have given it to him.

℣. 36. And he ſaid, is not he rightly named Jacob? &c.] As he was by his parents, and thoſe that were at his birth, becauſe he took his brother by the heel as he came out of his mother's womb; for Jacob ſignifies heeler, a ſupplanter, and was given him to keep up the memory of what he had done, to which Eſau here refers: for he hath ſupplanted me theſe two times; to ſupplant another is to put his foot under the heel of another, in order to trip him up, to which Eſau alludes; but uſes the word in a figurative ſenſe, for circumventing him, and dealing fraudulently and deceitfully with him, though he is not able to ſupport his charge; for if he dealt fraudulently with any, it was with his father, and not with him, and the two times he refers to prove it not: he took away my birth-right; which is not true, he did not take it away from him either by force or fraud, Eſau ſold it to him for a meſs of pottage; he had deſpiſed and made light of it himſelf, and had parted with it at ſo mean a price, and now falſly charges his brother with with taking it away from him, and wrongly accuſes him of being a ſupplanter on that account: and behold, now he hath taken away my bleſſing; this alſo is not true, he had not taken it away; it was given him by his father; and though he had uſed ſome artful methods with him to get it, he had neither ſupplanted Eſau, but if any one, his father; nor had he done any injuſtice to Eſau, ſince as he had bought of him the birth-right, the bleſſing annexed to it went along with it, and of right belonged to Jacob: and he ſaid, haſt thou not reſerved a bleſſing for me? is the whole fund of bleſſings exhauſted? are all beſtowed upon Jacob? is there not one left for me? he hoped there was, and that as good a one as he had beſtowed on his brother, and intreats he might have it.

℣. 37. And Iſaac anſwered and ſaid unto Eſau, &c.] Giving an account of the bleſſing he had beſtowed upon his brother: behold, I have made him thy lord; the lord of his poſterity, who would be ſubdued and become tributary to his ſeed: and all his brethren have I given to him for ſervants; the Edomites, who ſprung from his brother Eſau, who according to this prophetic bleſſing became ſervants to David, who was a ſon of Jacob's, ſee the note on ℣. 29: and with corn and wine have I ſuſtained him; promiſed him a fruitful country, the land of Canaan, abounding with all good things, particularly with corn and wine, which are put for all the reſt: and what ſhall I do now unto thee, my ſon? what is there remains? what can be beſtowed upon thee? there's nothing left; dominion over others, even over all nations, yea over thyſelf and thy poſterity, and plenty of all good things are given already to Jacob; what is there to be done for thee, or thou canſt expect?

℣. 38. And Eſau ſaid unto his father, haſt thou but one bleſſing, my father? &c.] He ſeems to ſpeak diminutively of what had been given to Jacob, calling it one bleſſing; whereas there were many, and of different ſorts, both temporal and ſpiritual; but it may be, Eſau had not ſo clear and comprehenſive a view of what was contained in Jacob's bleſſing; or at leaſt was willing to think and hope that there was not ſo much given, but there might be ſome behind for him, and that his father had a greater ſtock than to be drained of all at once: bleſs me, even me alſo, O my father; with another bleſſing, with one equal to what has been given my brother: and Eſau liſt up his voice, and wept; in order to move the affections of his father, and to prevail upon him to reverſe the bleſſing he had beſtowed on Jacob, and give it to him; but he could not bring his father to repentance, to change his mind, and revoke the bleſſing, and give it him, with all his crying and tears, as the apoſtle obſerves, Heb. xii. 17.

℣. 39. And Iſaac his father anſwered and ſaid unto him, &c.] Being willing to beſtow what he could upon him, without leſſening or breaking in upon the grant made to Jacob: behold, thy dwelling ſhall be the fatneſs of the earth, and of the dew of heaven from above; this agrees with part of the bleſſing of Jacob, only the clauſes are inverted, and no mention made of corn and wine; the land of Edom not being ſo fat and fruitful as the land of Canaan. Caſtalio renders the words very differently, thy habitation ſhall be from the fatneſs of the earth, or without the fatneſs of the earth, and without the dew of heaven from above; [c] or otherwiſe he thinks Eſau would have the ſame bleſſing with Jacob, and ſo would have no occaſion of complaint or grief, or to have hated his brother and ſought his life; to which may be added, that the land of Edom, which Eſau and his poſterity inhabited, was a very deſart country, ſee Mal i. 3.

℣. 40. And by thy ſword ſhalt thou live, &c.] By what he could get by it; his land being ſo poor that he could not live upon it, but muſt be obliged to ſuch methods for a livelihood; or his country being ſurrounded with enemies, his poſterity would be obliged to defend themſelves by the ſword, and other weapons of war: and ſhalt ſerve thy brother; which is the ſenſe and language of the oracle, ch. xxv. 23. and which Iſaac perhaps now remembered, and had a clear underſtanding of it, and delivers out his prophetic bleſſing agreeable to it: and it ſhall come to paſs, when thou ſhalt have the dominion; not over the Iſraelites, the poſterity of Jacob, which the Edomites, Eſau's poſterity, never had; but when they ſhould get a greater degree of ſtrength, power, authority and dominion in the world: that thou ſhalt break his yoke from off thy neck; the Edomites ſhould revolt from the poſterity of Jacob, and ſhake off the yoke of bondage and ſubjection they had been long under; as they did in the times of Joram, king of Judah, and ſet up a king of their own, and continued in ſuch a ſtate of freedom a long time, ſee 2 Kings viii. 20, 21, 22.

℣. 41. And Eſau hated Jacob becauſe of the bleſſing wherewith his father bleſſed him, &c.] It being a better bleſſing than his; giving him a better country, and greater plenty of good things, a larger dominion, and even dominion over him and his ſeed; for as for the promiſe of the Meſſiah, and ſpiritual bleſſings, he ſeems to have no concern about them, only temporal ones: and Eſau ſaid in his heart; within himſelf, but he did not long keep it there, but told ſomebody of it; or otherwiſe, how ſhould Rebekah be informed of it, as afterwards related? what he ſaid follows, the days of mourning for my father are at hand, then will I ſlay my brother Jacob; that is, the time of his father's death was drawing nigh, when there would be a mourning for him for ſome days; at which time, or at the end of it, he propoſed to pick a quarrel with Jacob about his title to his father's ſubſtance, and in the quarrel kill him, and ſo regain the birth-right and the bleſſing; and Jacob dying unmarried, and without iſſue, would defeat both the oracle of God, and the prophetic benediction of his father; but he failed in all, the time of his father's death was not ſo near as he imagined, for he lived 43 years after this; and this deſign of his being diſcovered, was the occaſion of Jacob's going to Haran, where he married two ſiſters, and by them and their maids had a numerous offſpring, whereby both the oracle and the bleſſing had their accompliſhment. Eſau ſeems to have retained ſome affection for his father, and therefore put off the execution of this wicked deſign until his death, being unwilling to grieve him, but had no regard for his mother, who he knew loved Jacob better than he, and was aſſiſting to him in getting the bleſſing from him. Schmidt gives a ſenſe of this paſſage different from all interpreters, and renders the words, the days of my father's mourning will draw nigh; not in which his father would be mourned for, being dead, but in which his father, being alive, would himſelf mourn for his ſon Jacob, being ſlain by Eſau; and accordingly he renders the next clauſe, for I will ſlay my brother Jacob; and and that will make him mourn, and perhaps die of his grief; and so he shews an ill will to his father, because he confirmed the blessing to Jacob, as well as to Jacob, because he had it.

℣. 42. And these words of Esau her eldest son were told to Rebekah, &c.] Jarchi and Jonathan say, by the Holy Ghost; but Aben Ezra thinks, by one of Esau's friends and confidents, to whom out of the abundance of his heart he had revealed this secret, which is not at all unlikely: and she sent and called Jacob her younger son; who might be in another tent or apartment, or with the flocks in the field: and said unto him, behold, thy brother Esau, as touching thee, doth comfort himself purposely to kill thee; he has determined on it, and has laid a scheme for it, and comforts himself with the thought of it, that he shall be able to accomplish it, and so be the heir of the promise, and get the blessing; and even such is his nature, that thy death will be a comfort to him under the loss of his blessing, tho' he gets nothing by it, so sweet is revenge unto him.

℣. 43. Now therefore my son, obey my voice, &c.] Hearken to what I say, and do according to it, as he had already in many instances, and particularly in a late one, in which he succeeded, and therefore had good reason to attend to her advice and direction, see ℣. 13. and arise, flee thou to Laban my brother, to Haran; where Laban her brother dwelt.

℣. 44. And tarry with him a few days, &c.] Which Aben Ezra interprets a few years; rather, as Hiscuni, one year; perhaps it may be better, should it be said, one or two years; but instead of so short a time Jacob stayed there 20 years, and perhaps Rebekah never saw him more, being dead before he returned; after this account, no more mention is made of her: until thy brother's fury turn away; which she hoped would abate, subside, and be entirely gone in process of time, and especially when the object of it was out of sight, and so it might be thought would be out of mind.

℣. 45. Until thy brother's anger turn away from thee, &c.] Which is repeated from the preceding verse to carry on the connexion: and he forget that which thou hast done to him; in getting the blessing from him; being either convinced that Jacob had done him no injury, and that he had no just cause of being angry with him, it being the will of God that he should have the blessing; and besides, having bought the birth-right of him, the blessing belonged to him in course; or however would in time forgive and forget what he thought was an injury done him: then I will send, and fetch thee from thence; send messengers to him that should acquaint him with the disposition of his brother towards him, and if agreeable, bring him along with them to his mother again; this is said to encourage him to go: why should I be deprived also of you both in one day? who might either in the quarrel kill one another; or however, as one would be murdered, so the other, the murderer, must die by the hand of the civil magistrate, according to the law in Gen. ix. 6. or should he escape justice being done him by men, yet the hand of God would find him; or if obliged to fly and hide himself, it would be as if he was not.

℣. 46. And Rebekah said to Isaac, &c.] Not what she had told Jacob concerning the enmity of Esau to Jacob, and his intention to kill him, lest it should grieve him, and bring his grey hairs with sorrow to the grave; but what follows, as an excuse to get Isaac's leave for Jacob's departure, concealing the true reason of it: I am weary of my life, because of the daughters of Heth; whom Esau had married, ch. xxvi. 34, 35. who were continually vexing and teizing her by their impiety and idolatry, their irreligion and profaneness, their disobedience and contradiction, their froward temper and behaviour: if Jacob take a wife of the daughters of Heth; as his brother has done, and after his example, as the best are too apt to be led by bad examples: such as these which are of the daughters of the land; like those Esau had married, of the same tribe, or of other of the tribes of the Canaanites, which were in religion and manners like unto them: what good shall my life do me? I shall have no comfort in it; death would be more eligible than such a life: this she said with great vehemence and affection to move and work upon Isaac to lay his commands on Jacob, and give him orders and directions to go to her family and friends, and there take him a wife; and she succeeded according to her wishes, as the following chapter shews.

CHAP. XXVIII.

IN this chapter an account is given of the charge Isaac gave to Jacob not to marry a Canaanitess, but to go to Padan-Aram, and take a wife from his mother's family, and of his blessing him before he sent him away, ℣. 1—5. of the notice that Esau took of this blessing and charge, which led him to take a wife of the family of Ishmael, ℣. 6—9. of the dream of the ladder, which Jacob had in his way to Haran, ℣. 10, 11, 12. of the blessing which God conferred upon him there, ℣. 13, 14, 15. of the awfulness of the place upon his awaking, and of his erecting a pillar in it, and giving a name to it, ℣. 16—19. and of the vow he made to God, should he be supplied with the necessaries of life, and be kept in safety by him, ℣. 20, 21, 22.

℣. 1. And Isaac called Jacob, &c.] Or therefore [d], because of what Rebekah had said to him related in the latter part of the preceding chapter, he sent for Jacob to come to him from his tent or apartment where he was, or from the field where he was keeping the flocks; thus paying a great regard to what his wife Rebekah had suggested to him, and which appeared to him very right and reasonable: and blessed him; he did not send for him to chide and reprove him for his fraudulent dealings with him to get the blessing from his brother, much less to revoke it, but to confirm it; which was necessary to prevent doubts that might arise in the mind of Jacob about it, and to strengthen him against the temptations of satan; since he was about to be sent away from his father's house solitary and destitute, to go into another country, where he was to be for a while in a state of servitude; all which might seem to contradict the blessing and promises he had received, and would be a trial of his faith in them, as well as a chastisement on him for the fraudulent manner in which he obtained them: and charged him, and

and ſaid unto him, thou ſhalt not take a wife of the daughters of Canaan; it was time that he was married; for he was now, as the Jewiſh writers [e] ſay, 77 years of age, which exactly agrees with what Polyhiſtor [f], an heathen writer, relates from Demetrius, that Jacob was 77 years of age when he came to Haran, and alſo his father Iſaac was then 137 years old; and ſo it is calculated by the beſt chronologers, and as he muſt be, ſince he was born when his father was 60 years of age, ſee the note on ch. xxvii. 1. and being now declared the heir of the promiſed land, it was proper he ſhould marry, but not with any of the Canaanites, who were to be diſpoſſeſſed of the land of Canaan, and therefore their ſeed, and Abraham's, to whom it was given, muſt not be mixed. Iſaac takes the ſame care, and gives the ſame charge concerning the marriage of his ſon Jacob, on whom the entail of the land was ſettled, as his father Abraham did concerning his, ch. xxiv. 3.

℣. 2. Ariſe, go to Padan-Aram, &c.] Of this place, ſee the note on ch. xxv. 20. either he is bid to go directly, in haſte, and alone; perhaps by this time Rebekah had given Iſaac ſome hint of the ill deſign of Eſau againſt him, which made Iſaac the more urgent upon him to be gone, as well as it was high time he had took to himſelf a wife: to the houſe of Bethuel thy mother's father; who tho' now dead in all probability, yet the houſe and family went by his name: and take thee a wife from thence of the daughters of Laban thy mother's brother; who had daughters unmarried, of which no doubt Iſaac and Rebekah had knowledge, a correſpondence being kept up between the two families, though at a great diſtance.

℣. 3. And God Almighty bleſs thee, &c.] This is not a new bleſſing, diſtinct from that in ℣. 1. but the ſame; there it is expreſſed in general, here the particulars of it are given; and by which it appears, that Iſaac's bleſſing Jacob was prayerwiſe, wiſhing a bleſſing from God upon him, and was the prayer of faith, delivered out under the ſpirit of prophecy; and they are bleſſed indeed that are bleſſed of God, and they muſt needs be bleſſed who are bleſſed by the Almighty; for what is it he cannot do or give? The Targum of Jonathan adds, "with much riches;" but no doubt all kind of bleſſings are included, both temporal and ſpiritual: and make thee fruitful, and multiply thee; with a numerous offſpring: that thou mayeſt be a multitude of people; or an aſſembly or congregation [g] of them; which may all unite in one body and make one nation, as the twelve tribes deſcending from Jacob did.

℣. 4. And give thee the bleſſing of Abraham, to thee, and to thy ſeed with thee, &c.] Which was promiſed to Abraham, and was entailed upon Iſaac and his ſeed, and now upon Jacob and his ſeed, which follows: that thou mayeſt inherit the land wherein thou art a ſtranger, which God gave to Abraham; the land of Canaan, which was given to Abraham by promiſe, but not in poſſeſſion; he was a ſojourner and ſtranger in it, and ſo Iſaac had been all his days, and now Jacob, who through the bleſſing was become heir of it; but as yet neither he nor his poſterity muſt enjoy it, but be ſtrangers and ſojourners in it, for the exerciſe of faith, and for the leading of their minds off of all earthly enjoyments, to the better and heavenly country God has provided for his people; ſee Heb. xi. 9, 10, 13, 16.

℣. 5. And Iſaac ſent away Jacob, &c.] From Beer-ſheba; not in anger, or in a diſhonourable way, but took his leave of him no doubt in an affectionate manner; as it is clear he went with his bleſſing, and had his good wiſhes for a proſperous journey: and he went to Padan-Aram; which from Beer-ſheba, according to ſome [h], was 480 miles: unto Laban, ſon of Bethuel the Syrian; ſome verſions make Laban to be the Syrian, others Bethuel; it is a matter of no great moment which is here ſo called, ſince they were both called Syrians, ſee ch. xxv. 20: the brother of Rebekah; this refers to Laban, for Bethuel was her father: Jacob's and Eſau's mother; Jacob is ſet firſt, not only as being moſt beloved by his mother, but as now having the birth-right and the bleſſing.

℣. 6. And when Eſau ſaw that Iſaac had bleſſed Jacob, &c.] Had conferred the bleſſing before given, or had wiſhed him a good journey; which perhaps may be all that Eſau underſtood by it, and ſo was not ſo much offended with it: and ſent him away to Padan-Aram, to take him a wife from thence; which likewiſe might not be diſpleaſing to him, partly as he underſtood it to be only on account of taking a wife, and not on account of his ill deſign upon him, which he might imagine his parents knew nothing of; and partly as he would now be out of the way, and he might find means the eaſier to ingratiate himſelf into his father's favour, and get him to revoke the bleſſing, and ſettle the inheritance upon him: and that as he bleſſed him, he gave him a charge, ſaying, thou ſhalt not take a wife of the daughters of Canaan; or of the Canaanites, of any of the tribes or nations that belonged to that people, whether Hittites or others.

℣. 7. And that Jacob obeyed his father and his mother, &c.] As it became him, and as it becomes all children to be obedient to their parents in all things lawful they command them; and it would have been well if Eſau had been obedient to them alſo in a like caſe, the caſe of his marriage: and was gone to Padan-Aram; as they had enjoined him, to take a wife from thence.

℣. 8. And Eſau ſeeing that the daughters of Canaan pleaſed not Iſaac his father.] Who he perceived was diſpleaſed with the daughters of Canaan, or that they were evil in his eyes [i], offenſive to him, and diſapproved of by him, becauſe of their ill manners: Rebekah is not mentioned, whoſe diſpleaſure he cared not for.

℣. 9. Then went Eſau unto Iſhmael, &c.] Not to Iſhmael in perſon, for he was now dead, ch. xxv. 17. and had been dead as is reckoned about 14 years before this, but to the houſe of Iſhmael: and took unto the wives which he had; the daughters of Heth, and who ſeem by this to be both alive at this time: Mahalath the daughter of Iſhmael, Abraham's ſon; the ſame with Baſhemath, ch. xxxvi. 3. as the Targum of Jonathan expreſſes it, this perſon having two names, and is further deſcribed, the ſiſter of Nebaioth, to be his wife; who was the eldeſt ſon of Iſhmael, and, his father being dead, was the principal in the family; and this woman Eſau took to wife, was his ſiſter by his mother's ſide, as the above Targum expreſſes, as well as by his father's; whereas he might have other ſiſters only by his father's ſide, he having had more wives than than one. This Eſau ſeems to have done in order to curry favour with his father, who was diſpleaſed with his other wives, and therefore takes one of his father's brother's daughters; but in this he acted an unwiſe part, on more accounts than one; partly as it was taking to wife the daughter of one that was caſt out of his grandfather's houſe, and had been a perſecutor of his father, and therefore not likely to be agreeable to him; and partly as being a daughter of the bond-maid's ſon: children born of her could not inherit the land promiſed to Abraham and Iſaac.

℣. 10. And Jacob went out from Beer ſheba, &c.] Where Iſaac and Rebekah now lived: from hence he went alone, without any ſervants to attend him, though perhaps not without letters of recommendation from his parents, teſtifying their affection to him, and that he came with their knowledge and conſent, and was their heir, as Iſaac had been to Abraham; nor without proviſions, at leaſt not without money to purchaſe them by the way, as appears by the oil he had, ℣. 18: and went toward Haran; for thither he could not get in one day, being many days journey; ſee the note on ℣. 5.

℣. 11. And he lighted upon a certain place, &c.] Without any deſign to take up there, but as it were caſually to him, though very providentially, after he had travelled 48 miles; for ſo far it ſeems it was from Beer-ſheba to Luz or Bethel[k], as this place was called: and tarried there all night, becauſe the ſun was ſet; which hindered his purſuing his journey any further that day, and therefore took a night's lodging here: and he took of the ſtones of that place; one of the ſtones that lay there, as Aben Ezra and Ben Melech rightly interpret it, as appears from ℣. 13. though the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem will have it, that theſe were 4 ſtones that he took, and that by a miracle they became one, and is one of the five miracles they ſay were done for Jacob on that day: and put them for his pillows, and lay down in that place and ſlept; being weary with his journey, though he had no other bed than the earth, and for his pillow a ſtone, and for his canopy or curtain the open heaven; a different lodging this from what he had been uſed to in his father's houſe, and under the indulgence of his mother; and one would wonder how he could ſleep in ſuch circumſtances, and that he did not take cold, after ſuch a journey: but it muſt be conſidered, that it was in a warm climate, and in an age when they did not uſe themſelves to ſuch ſoft beds as now, and eſpecially that he was under the particular care of Divine Providence.

℣. 12. And he dreamed, &c.] As he ſlept; not a common dream, but under divine direction and influence: and behold, a ladder ſet upon the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven; denoting either the providence of God, and the various ſteps of it, bringing about his own glory and the good of his people; and which is ſteady, firm, and ſure, and reaches to all things here on earth; and in an eſpecial manner is concerned about the people of God, their protection and ſafety; and is directed and governed according to the will, counſels, and purpoſes of God in heaven; a view of which muſt be very encouraging to Jacob in his preſent circumſtances: or elſe the incarnation and mediation of Chriſt, who in his human nature was to be in the fulneſs of time on earth, there to live a while, obey, ſuffer, and die, and ſo was the ladder ſet on earth; and his divine nature was the top of it, which reached heaven; here he was in that nature before his incarnation, and from hence he came; and indeed here he was in that when on earth; and as man, he aſcended on high when he had done his work, and is now higher than the heavens; he may be fitly repreſented hereby as the mediator, who has reconciled things in heaven and things on earth, and has as it were joined and united heaven and earth together: and the various rounds in this ladder ſo conſidered, are Chriſt's interpoſition as a ſurety from eternity; his incarnation in time; his being under the law, and his obedience to it; his ſufferings, the ſhedding of his blood, and the death of the croſs; his reſurrection from the dead, aſcenſion to heaven, ſeſſion at the right hand of God, and interceſſion there. Moreover this may point out to us Chriſt as the way to his father, of acceſs unto him, and acceptance with him, by which he communicates the bleſſings of his grace to men, and by which they aſcend to God with their prayers and praiſes to him: as alſo as being the way to heaven and eternal happineſs; the various ſteps to which are election in him, redemption by him, regeneration by his ſpirit and grace, the ſeveral graces of his ſpirit, faith, hope, and love, juſtification by his righteouſneſs, pardon by his blood, adoption thro' him, and the reſurrection of the dead: and behold, the angels of God aſcending and deſcending on it; which may be expreſſive of the employment of angels in the affairs of providence, who receive their commiſſion from heaven, and execute it on earth, in which they are diligent, faithful, and conſtant; and of the miniſtry of them, both to Chriſt perſonal, and to his church and people, even to every particular believer; ſee John i. 51.

℣. 13. And behold, the Lord ſtood above it, &c.] Ordering, directing, and over-ruling all things in providence, for the glory of his name and the good of his people; and may ſignify, as the ladder may be a figure of Chriſt, that Jehovah, the father, is above him, as man and mediator, and makes himſelf known in and by him, and delivers out all his bleſſings and promiſes through him, both temporal and ſpiritual, and ſuch as follow: and ſaid, I am the Lord God of Abraham, and the God of Iſaac; their covenant-God and father in Chriſt, who had made promiſes unto them, and beſtowed bleſſings upon them; and the ſame was and would continue to be the God of Jacob, which is ſtrongly intimated: the land whereon thou lieſt, to thee will I give it, and to thy ſeed; meaning not that ſmall pittance of land only on which his body then lay, and which it covered, but all the land of which it was a part, even the whole land of Canaan; hereby entailing it on him and his ſeed, and ſo explaining and confirming the bleſſing of his father Iſaac; and by which it appears, that all that had been done was under a divine direction, and according to the will of God.

℣. 14. And thy ſeed ſhall be as the duſt of the earth, &c.] Innumerable, ſee ch. xiii. 16. Numb. xxiii. 10: and thou ſhalt ſpread abroad to the weſt; or the ſea, the Mediterranean ſea, which was weſt of the land of Canaan: and to the eaſt, and to the north, and to the ſouth; not of the whole world, but of the land of Canaan: the meaning is, that his poſterity ſhould be numerous, and break out and ſpread themſelves like a flood of water, and reach to the utmoſt bounds of the land on all ſides: and in thee and in thy ſeed ſhall all the families of the earth be bleſſed; that is, in that eminent and principal ſeed that ſhould ſpring from him, the Meſſiah, in whom ſome of all nations ſhould, as they they have been, bleſſed with all ſpiritual bleſſings, as redemption, peace, pardon, juſtification, adoption, and eternal life; the ſame promiſe had been made to Abraham, was renewed to Iſaac, and now confirmed to Jacob, ſee Gen. xxii. 18. and xxvi. 4.

℣. 15. And behold I am with thee, &c.] Tho' alone, at a diſtance from his father's houſe, no friend to keep him company, or ſervant to attend him; but the preſence of God here promiſed is abundantly more than an equivalent for all this: and will keep thee in all places, whither thou goeſt; from beaſts of prey, in loneſome places through which he might travel; from thieves and robbers, to whom he might be expoſed; from his brother Eſau, and all his ill deſigns againſt him; and from being always under the bondage of Laban, into which he would be brought: and will bring thee again into this land; the land of Canaan, which was entailed on him and his ſeed for an inheritance; but, as he would now ſoon be out of it, and continue in another land for many years, as he did, which would make it look very unpromiſing that he and his ſeed ſhould inherit it, this is ſaid unto him: for I will not leave thee, until I have done that which I have ſpoken to thee of; made good all his promiſes to him: and the ſenſe is, not that he would then leave him when he had done ſo, but as not before, ſo never after; for God never does, nor never will, utterly forſake his people.

℣. 16. And Jacob awaked out of his ſleep, &c.] Which had been ſweet unto him, and out of his dream, it being now over; and it having left ſuch a weight upon his mind, and ſuch an awe upon his ſpirits, it might tend the ſooner to awaken him; what time it was, is not ſaid, perhaps it was in the middle of the night or towards morning, ſince after this it is ſaid, that he roſe early in the morning: and he ſaid, ſurely the Lord is in this place, and I knew it not; God is every-where, in a general way, upholding all things by his power, as he is immenſe and omnipreſent; but here he was in a ſpecial ſenſe, by ſome ſignal token of his preſence; by a ſtream of light and glory darting from the heavens, hence Onkelos and Jonathan paraphraſe it, "the glory of the Lord, and the glory of the "majeſty of the Lord;" and by the appearance of angels, and by the communications of his mind and will, and grace to Jacob, and that communion he had with him in his dream, of which he was very ſenſible: for, when he ſays, I knew it not, the meaning is, he did not think or expect to meet with God in ſuch a place; he did not know that God ever appeared any where but in the houſes of his people, ſuch as his father's houſe; and in the congregation of the faithful, or where the ſaints met for public worſhip, or where an altar was erected for God: though ſometimes God is preſent with his people, and they are not ſenſible of it; as the church in Iſ. xli. 10. and as Mary, when Chriſt was at her elbow, and ſhe knew him not, John xx. 13.

℣. 17. And he was afraid, &c.] Not with a ſervile but filial fear; not with a fear of the wrath and diſpleaſure of God, but with a fear of his grace and goodneſs; not with a fear of diſtruſt of it, of which he had juſt had ſuch a comfortable aſſurance; but with an awe of the greatneſs and glory of God, being conſcious of his own unworthineſs to receive ſuch favours from him; and ſaid, how dreadful is this place! not terrible and horrible, being not like mount Sinai, but like Sion; not as the ſuburbs of hell, but as the gate of heaven; majeſtic and venerable, becauſe of the glory of God that appeared in it, whoſe name is holy and reverend; and becauſe of the holy angels here preſent: and ſo the church, of which this was an emblem, is a ſolemn aſſembly, awful and venerable; a city of ſolemnities, becauſe of the worſhip of God in it, and his preſence there; who is to be feared in the aſſembly of his ſaints, and to be had in reverence of all that are about him; and where perſons ſhould behave in a ſerious and ſolemn manner. The Targum of Jonathan is, "how tremendous and praiſe-worthy is "this place! this is not a common place:" this is none other but the houſe of God; wherefore he afterwards called it Bethel, which ſignifies the houſe of God; and ſo the church of God is often called, Pſ. xxiii. 6. and lxix. 9. 1 Tim. iii. 15. 1 Pet. iv. 17. which is of God's building, where he dwells, and his family is, of which he is the maſter and governor; which he beautifies and adorns, fills, repairs, and defends: and this is the gate of heaven; Mr. Mede renders it, the court of heaven, becauſe of the angels; ſince in gates juſtice was adminiſtred by kings, attended with their retinue; but royal courts were not kept there, only courts of judicature: this place ſeems to be ſo called, becauſe the heavens were opened and the glory of God was ſeen, attended by his angels, who were paſſing and repaſſing, as people through the ſtreets of a city; and was an emblem of the church of Chriſt, who is figured by the ladder ſet on earth, whoſe top reached to heaven, the door, the gate, the way of aſcent to it; here he is preached in the word as the way of ſalvation, the way to heaven and eternal happineſs; here he is held forth in the ordinances; here he grants his preſence to his people, and indulges them with communion with him, which makes it like and next to heaven unto them: and, generally ſpeaking, though not always, God brings his people to heaven this way, through a goſpel-church ſtate, and by means of the word and ordinances; and here angels alſo attend, 1 Cor. xi. 10.

℣. 18. And Jacob roſe up early in the morning, &c.] In order to proceed on his journey, being comfortably refreſhed both in body and mind; but firſt he took the ſtone that he had put for his pillows, and ſet it up for a pillar; not for a ſtatue or an idol to be worſhipped, but for a memorial of the mercy and goodneſs of God unto him, ſee Joſh. iv. 3—9. indeed, among the heathens, ſtones, even rude and unpoliſhed ones, were worſhipped as gods; and this was the antient cuſtom among the Greeks, and which, as Pauſanias [l] ſays, univerſally obtained among them: and poured oil upon the top of it; which he had brought with him for neceſſary uſes in his journey, or fetched from the neighbouring city; the former is moſt likely: and this he did, that he might know it again when he returned, as Aben Ezra remarks, and not for the conſecration of it for religious uſe; though it is thought, by ſome learned men [m], that the Phœnicians worſhipped this ſtone which Jacob anointed; and that from this anointed ſtone at Bethel came the Bætylia, which were anointed ſtones conſecrated to Saturn and Jupiter, and others, and were worſhipped as gods; the original of which Sanchoniatho [n] aſcribes to Uranus, who he ſays, deviſed the Bætylia, forming animated mated ſtones, which Bochart renders anointed ſtones; and ſo Apuleius [o], Minutius Felix [p], Arnobius [q], and others, ſpeak of anointed ſtones, worſhipped as deities; and hence it may be through the early and ancient abuſe of ſuch pillars, it was, that they were forbidden by the law of Moſes, and ſuch as the heathens had erected were to be pulled down, Lev. xxvi. 1. Deut. vii. 5. and xii. 3.

℣. 19. And he called the name of that place Bethel, &c.] The houſe of God, which he took this place to be: but the name of that city was called Luz at the firſt; which ſignifies an almond or haſel nut, ch. xx. 37. perhaps from the number of this ſort of trees that grew there, under which Jacob might lay himſelf down, which was probably in the field of Luz; and being benighted, he might not know there was a city ſo near, until the morning. Tho' Joſephus [r] ſays he did it purpoſely, out of hatred to the Canaanites, and choſe rather to lie under the open air. This was about 12 miles from Jeruſalem, as Jerom [s] ſays.

℣. 20. And Jacob vowed a vow, &c.] Which is the firſt vow we read of in ſcripture: ſaying, if God will be with me; the word if is not a ſign of doubting, but is either an adverb of time, and may be rendered, when God ſhall be with me [t]; or as a ſuppoſition, expreſſive of an inference or concluſion drawn, ſeeing God will be with me [u]; which he had the utmoſt reaſon to believe he would, ſince he had not only promiſed it, but had ſo lately granted him his preſence in a very ſingular and remarkable manner, referring to the promiſe of God, ℣. 15: and will keep me in this way that I go; as he had ſaid he would, and as hitherto he had, and for the future he had reaſon to believe he ſtill would: and will give me bread to eat, and raiment to put on; which is included in that clauſe, I will not leave thee, &c. even not without food and raiment; which is all men can deſire or uſe, and therefore with them ſhould be content.

℣. 21. So that I come again to my father's houſe in peace, &c.] In ſafety from Eſau, and all other enemies, as God promiſed him he ſhould: then the Lord ſhall be my God; not as if he ſhould not be his God if he did not do all this for him; which would ſavour not only of a mercenary ſpirit, but of great impiety; neither of which were to be found in Jacob: but the meaning is, that he ſhould not only continue to own him as his God, and to worſhip him, but having freſh obligations upon him, ſhould be ſtirred up more eagerly and devoutly to ſerve him in a very ſingular way and manner, and particularly by doing what is expreſſed in the following verſe. Some think he has reſpect to the Meſſiah, owning him to be the true God with the Father and the Bleſſed Spirit, who had appeared to Abraham, and was the fear of Iſaac, and whom Jacob now owned as his God: this receives ſome confirmation from the Targum of Jonathan, which begins the paragraph thus, "if the Word of the "Lord will be my help, &c. then the Lord ſhall "be my God."

℣. 22. And this ſtone which I have ſet for a pillar, ſhall be God's houſe, &c.] Building an altar of it with ſome others, and ſacrificing to God on it; and wherever God is worſhipped, that place is his houſe, be it what or where it will; and Jacob did as he promiſed to do, ſee ch. xxxv. 3, 7: and of all that thou ſhalt give me, I will ſurely give the tenth unto thee; for the ſupport of his worſhip; for the maintenance of ſuch that were employed in it; for the proviſion of ſacrifice, and for the relief of the poor, or for any uſe or ſervice in which God might be glorified: this was imitated by the heathens in after-times, who gave the tenth of their ſubſtance to their gods Jupiter, Hercules, and others [w].

CHAP. XXIX.

THIS chapter informs us of Jacob's coming to a well near Haran, where meeting with ſome ſhepherds he enquires after Laban, ℣. 1—8. and there alſo with Rachel his daughter, the ſhepherds made known to him, and acquainted her who he was, ℣. 9—12. upon which ſhe ran to her father, and told him who was at the well, who went forth and brought him to his houſe, and kindly entertained him, ℣. 13, 14. with whom he agreed to ſtay and ſerve ſeven years for Rachel his daughter, ℣. 15—20. at the end of which Jacob demands his wife, but inſtead of Rachel, Leah was brought to him as his wife, ℣. 21—25. which being diſcovered, and complained of, it was propoſed he ſhould have Rachel alſo, provided he would ſerve yet ſeven years more, to which he agreed, ℣. 26—30. and the chapter is concluded with an account of four ſons being born to Jacob of Leah, ℣. 31—35.

℣. 1. Then Jacob went on his journey, &c.] After the above vow at Bethel, and having had ſome intimation that what he deſired would be granted him; or he lift up his feet [x], which not only ſhews that he walked a foot, but that he went on his journey with great chearfulneſs; for having ſuch gracious promiſes made him, that God would be with him, and keep him, and ſupply him with all neceſſaries, and return him again to the land of Canaan, which made his heart glad; his heart, as the Jewiſh writers ſay [y], lift up his legs, and he walked apace, and with great alacrity: and came into the land of the people of the eaſt; the land of Meſopotamia or Syria, which lay to the eaſt of the land of Canaan, ſee Iſ. ix. 11. hither he came by ſeveral days journeys.

℣. 2. And he looked, and behold, a well in the field, &c.] Near Haran; he might purpoſely look out for a well, as knowing that there people frequently came for water for their families, or ſhepherds to water their flocks, of whom he might get intelligence concerning Laban's family, and where they dwelt; or he might look out for this particular well, where his grandfather's ſervant had met with his mother Rebekah, of which he had been informed, and very probably had ſome directions how to find it; of this well, ſee the note on ch. xxiv. 11. to which may be added what another traveller ſays [z], there is in this city (Orpha, the ſame with Haran) a fountain, which both Jews, Ar-

Armenians and Turks reported unto us was Jacob's well, and that here he ſerved his uncle Laban: near Alexandretta is a fine well, called Jacob's well, and its water is excellent; not far from which the Greeks ſay are the remains of Laban's houſe [a]: and lo, there were three flocks of ſheep lying by it; in order to be watered, when it ſhould be opened: for out of that well they watered the flocks; the ſhepherds: and a great ſtone was upon the well's mouth; ſo that until that was rolled off, they could not be watered, which was the reaſon of their lying by it: this ſtone was laid upon it, partly to keep the water from flowing out, and being waſted, that there might be a ſufficiency for the flocks; and partly to keep the water pure and clean, that it might be wholeſome for the flocks, as well as entire for the uſe of thoſe that had a property in it.

℣. 3. And thither were all the flocks gathered, &c.] The three above-mentioned: and they rolled the ſtone from the well's mouth, and watered the ſheep; that is, when they watered the ſheep, they uſed to roll away the ſtone from the mouth of the well in order to do it; for as yet the flocks, now lying by it, had not been watered, as appears from ℣. 7, 8: and put a ſtone upon the well's mouth in this place; this they were wont to do every time they watered the flocks.

℣. 4. And Jacob ſaid unto them, &c.] To the ſhepherds, tho' not expreſly mentioned; it can't be imagined he ſpoke to the flocks, but to the keepers of them: my brethren, whence be ye? a kind and affable way of ſpeaking, uſed even to ſtrangers, ſince all men are brethren by nature; or might be uſed by Jacob, becauſe they were of the ſame occupation with himſelf, ſhepherds, aſking them of what city they were, and from whence they came? and which being anſwered, would lead on to a converſation, which was what he wanted: and they ſaid, of Haran are we; the very place he was bound for, and was ſent unto, ch. xxvii. 43. and xxviii. 10.

℣. 5. And he ſaid unto them, know ye Laban the ſon of Nahor? &c.] He was the ſon of Bethuel, and grandſon of Nahor; grandſons being called the ſons of their grandfather; and Nahor might be more known than Bethuel, Haran being Nahor's city, ch. xxiv. 10. and not Bethuel his mother's father, but Laban her brother is enquired after; perhaps Bethuel was dead, and Laban was the head of the family, and well known, and it was to him he was ſent: and they ſaid, we know him; perfectly well; he lives in our city, and is our neighbour.

℣. 6. And he ſaid unto them, is he well? &c.] In good health, he and his family, or is peace unto him? [b] does he enjoy proſperity and happineſs? for this word was uſed in the eaſtern nations, and ſtill is, for all kind of felicity: and they ſaid, he is well; or has peace; he and his family are in good health, enjoying all the comforts and bleſſings of life: and behold, Rachel his daughter cometh with the ſheep; at that very inſtant ſhe was coming out of the city with her father's flock of ſheep, to water them at the well; an inſtance of great humility, diligence and ſimplicity; this was very providential to Jacob.

℣. 7. And he ſaid, lo, it is yet high day, &c.] Noon-day, when the ſun is higheſt; at which time in thoſe hot countries flocks uſed to be made to lie down in ſhady places, and by ſtill waters, to which the alluſion is in Pſ. xxiii. 2. Cant. i. 7. or however the ſun was ſtill up very high, and there was a great deal of the day yet to come; for ſo the phraſe is, yet the day is great or much [c], a long time ſtill unto night: neither is it time that the cattle ſhould be gathered together; off of the paſtures, to be had home, and put into folds, which was uſually done in the evening: water ye the ſheep, and go and feed them; give them water out of the well to drink, and then lead them out on the paſtures, and let them feed until the night is coming on: this he ſaid not in an authoritative way, or in a ſurly ill-natured manner, and as reproving them for their ſlothfulneſs; but kindly and gently giving his advice, who was a ſhepherd himſelf, and knew what was proper to be done; and this appears by the ſhepherds taking in good part what he ſaid, and returning a civil anſwer.

℣. 8. And they ſaid, we cannot, &c.] That is, water the ſheep; either becauſe the ſtone was a great one, as Jarchi obſerves, and therefore uſed to be removed by the joint ſtrength of all the ſhepherds when they came together, tho' Jacob rolled it away of himſelf afterwards; but this is imputed to his great ſtrength: or rather it was a cuſtom that obtained among them, or an agreement made between them, that the ſtone ſhould not be removed from the mouth of the well, and any flock watered, until all the flocks be gathered together; and therefore they could not fairly and rightly do it, without violating the law and cuſtom among them: and till they roll the ſtone from the well's mouth; that is, the ſhepherds of the ſeveral flocks: then we water the ſheep; and not till then.

℣. 9. And while he yet ſpake with them, &c.] While Jacob was thus diſcourſing with the ſhepherds: Rachel came with her father's ſheep; to water them at the well. She was within ſight when Jacob firſt addreſſed the ſhepherds, but now ſhe was come to the well, or near it, with the ſheep before her: for ſhe kept them; or ſhe was the ſhepherdeſs [d]; the chief one; ſhe might have ſervants under her to do ſome parts of the office of a ſhepherd, not ſo fit for her to do; it may be Laban's ſons, for ſome he had, ch. xxxi. 1. were not as yet grown up, and Leah, the eldeſt daughter, having tender eyes, could not bear the open air, and light of the ſun, nor ſo well look after the ſtraying ſheep; and therefore the flock was committed to the care of Rachel the younger daughter, whoſe name ſignifies a ſheep. The Jews ſay [e], that the hand of God was upon Laban's flock, and there were but few left, ſo that he put away his ſhepherds, and what remained he put before his daughter Rachel, ſee ch. xxx. 30. and ſome aſcribe it to his covetouſneſs that he did this; but there is no need to ſuggeſt any thing of that kind; for keeping ſheep in thoſe times and countries was a very honourable employment, and not below the ſons and daughters of great perſonages, and ſtill is ſo accounted. Dr. Shaw [f] ſays, it is cuſtomary even to this day, for the children of the greateſt Emir to attend their flocks; the ſame is related of the ſeven children of the king of Thebes, of Antiphus the ſon of Priam, and of Anchiſes, Æneas's father [g].

℣. 10. And it came to paſs, when Jacob ſaw Rachel the daughter of Laban his mother's brother, &c.] Coming with her flock towards the well, and for whom and whoſe flock only the ſhepherds might be be waiting: and the ſheep of Laban his mother's brother; wherefore out of reſpect to him and his, he being ſo nearly allied to him, it was that Jacob went near, and rolled the ſtone from the well's mouth; either with the help of the ſhepherds, or of himſelf by his own ſtrength; which the Jewiſh writers [h] ſay amazed the ſhepherds, that he ſhould do that himſelf, which required their united ſtrength. The Targum of Jonathan ſays, he did it with one of his arms; and Jarchi, that he removed it as eaſily as a man takes off the coverlid of a pot: and watered the flock of Laban his mother's brother; this he did partly out of reſpect to his relations, and partly that he might be taken notice of by Rachel.

℣. 11. And Jacob kiſſed Rachel, &c.] Which he did in a way of courteſy and civility; this was done after he had acquainted her with his relation to her; he ſaluted her upon that: and lifted up his voice, and wept; for joy at the providence of God that had brought him ſo opportunely to the place, and at the ſight of a perſon ſo nearly related to him; and who he hoped would be his wife, and was the perſon deſigned of God for him.

℣. 12. And Jacob told Rachel, &c.] Or had told [i] her; before he kiſſed her, and lift up his voice and wept, as Aben Ezra obſerves: that he was her father's brother; his nephew by his ſiſter, for ſuch were ſometimes called brethren, as Lot, Abraham's brother's ſon is called his brother, ch. xiv. 12, 14, 16: and that he was Rebekah's ſon; ſiſter to her father, and aunt to her, and whoſe name and relation ſhe doubtleſs knew full well: and ſhe ran and told her father; leaving the care of her flock with Jacob; Rebekah, in a like caſe, ran and told her mother, which is moſt uſual for daughters to do; but here Rachel runs and tells her father, her mother very probably being dead, as ſay the Jewiſh writers [k].

℣. 13. And it came to paſs, when Laban heard the tidings of Jacob his ſiſter's ſon, &c.] That there was ſuch a man at the well, thus related to him, and what he had done there, had rolled away the ſtone, and watered his flock. The Jewiſh writers [l] make this report chiefly to reſpect his great ſtrength ſhewed in the above inſtance, with other things: that he ran to meet him, and embraced him, and kiſſed him, and brought him to his houſe; Jarchi, and other interpreters repreſent this as done with avaritious views, and that he expected Jacob had brought preſents with him, as pieces of gold, pearls and jewels, and ſuch like precious things, Abraham's ſervants brought and gave him when he came from Rebekah, ch. xxiv. 53. but I ſee not why we may not take all this to be hearty, ſincere and affectionate, ariſing from nearneſs of relation, and a ſenſe of it: and he told Laban all theſe things; how he was ſent hither by his parents on account of the hatred of his brother Eſau, becauſe he had got the birth-right and bleſſing from him; how God had appeared to him at Luz, and the promiſes he had made him; how providentially he had met with Rachel at the well, and perhaps might hint at, if he did not openly declare, the end of his coming thither for a wife.

℣. 14. And Laban ſaid to him, ſurely thou art my bone, and my fleſh, &c.] Nearly allied in blood, being his ſiſter's ſon: and he abode with him the ſpace of a month; or a month of days [m], a full month to a day; all this while feeding his flocks, and doing whatſoever ſervice he had for him to do.

℣. 15. And Laban ſaid unto Jacob, becauſe thou art my brother, &c.] Or nephew, his ſiſter's ſon, ſee the note on ℣. 12: ſhouldeſt thou therefore ſerve me for nought? nearneſs of kin was no reaſon why he ſhould ſerve him freely, or for nothing, but rather why he ſhould be more kind to him than to a ſtranger, and give him better wages: tell me, what ſhall thy wages be? by the day, or month, or year; ſignifying he was willing to give him any thing that was juſt and reaſonable, which was very well ſpoken; and this gave Jacob a fair opportunity of opening his mind more freely to him, and for anſwering a principal end for which he came, as follows:

℣. 16. And Laban had two daughters, &c.] Grown up and marriageable: the name of the elder was Leah; which ſignifies labour or wearineſs: and the name of the younger was Rachel; before mentioned, whom Jacob met with at the well; and whoſe name ſignifies a ſheep, as before obſerved.

℣. 17. Leah was tender-eyed, &c.] Blear-eyed, had a moiſture in them, which made them red, and ſo ſhe was not ſo agreeable to look at; though Onkelos renders the words, "the eyes of Leah were "beautiful," as if her beauty lay in her eyes, and no where elſe; but Rachel was beautiful and well-favoured; in all parts, in the form of her countenance, in her ſhape and ſtature, and in her complexion, her hair black, her fleſh white and ruddy, as Ben Melech obſerves.

℣. 18. And Jacob loved Rachel, &c.] As he ſeems to have done from the moment he ſaw her at the well, being beautiful, modeſt, humble, affable, diligent and induſtrious: and he ſaid, I will ſerve thee ſeven years for Rachel thy younger daughter; ſignifying, that he deſired no other wages for his ſervice than that, that he might have her for his wife, at the end of ſeven years ſervitude, which he was very willing to oblige himſelf to, on that condition; for having no money to give as a dowry, as was cuſtomary in thoſe times, he propoſed ſervitude inſtead of it; tho' Schmidt thinks this was contrary to cuſtom, and that Laban treated his daughters like bond-maids, and ſuch as are taken captives or ſtrangers, and ſold them, of which they complain, ch. xxxi. 15.

℣. 19. And Laban ſaid, &c.] Deceitfully, as the Targum of Jonathan adds, pretending great reſpect for Jacob, and that what he had propoſed was very agreeable to him, when he meant to impoſe upon him: it is better that I ſhould give her to thee, than that I ſhould give her to another man; by which he not only intimates, that he preferred him, a relation, to another man, a ſtranger; but as if he did not inſiſt upon the ſervitude for her, but would give her to him; unleſs he means upon the terms propoſed, and ſo it ſhould ſeem by what follows: abide with me; the term of ſeven years, and ſerve me; ſuggeſting, that then he agreed Rachel ſhould be his wife; and ſo Jacob, a plain-hearted man, underſtood him; but he deſigned no ſuch thing.

℣. 20. But Jacob ſerved ſeven years for Rachel, &c.] The whole term of time, diligently, faithfully and patiently. Reference is had to this in Hoſ. xi. 12: and they ſeemed unto him but a few days, for the love he had to her; for though to lovers time ſeems long ere they enjoy the object beloved; yet Jacob here reſpects not ſo much the time as the toil and labour of ſervice he endured in in it; he thought that ſeven years ſervice was a trifle, like the ſervice of ſo many days, in compariſon of the lovely and worthy perſon he obtained thereby; all that he endured was nothing in compariſon of her, and thro' the love he bore to her: beſides, the many pleaſant hours he ſpent in converſation with her, made the time ſlide on inſenſibly, ſo that it ſeemed to be quickly gone; which ſhows that his love was pure and conſtant.

℣. 21. And Jacob ſaid unto Laban, give me my wife, &c.] Meaning Rachel, who was his wife by contract; the conditions of her being his wife were now fulfilled by him, and therefore he might challenge her as his wife: for my days are now fulfilled; the ſeven years were up he agreed to ſerve him for his daughter; and therefore it was but juſt and right ſhe ſhould be given him: that I may go in unto her; as his lawful wife, and it was high time Jacob had her; for he was now, as the Jewiſh writers generally ſay [n], and that very rightly, 84 years of age; and from him were to ſpring 12 princes, the heads of 12 tribes, which ſhould inhabit the land of Canaan.

℣. 22. And Laban gathered together all the men of the place, &c.] Of the city of Haran, which may be underſtood of the chief and principal of them, to make the marriage of his daughter public and authentic: and made a feaſt; a marriage or marriage-feaſt, as the Septuagint verſion, ſee Matt. xxii. 2. which was uſual, when a marriage was ſolemnized, expreſſive of joy on that account.

℣. 23. And it came to paſs in the evening, &c.] After the feaſt was over, and the gueſts were departed; when it was night, a fit ſeaſon to execute his deſigns, and practiſe deceit: that he took Leah his daughter, and brought her to him; to Jacob, in his apartment, his bed-chamber, or to him in bed; for it is ſtill the cuſtom in ſome eaſtern countries for the bridegroom to go to bed firſt, and then the bride comes, or is brought to him in the dark, and veiled, ſo that he ſees her not: ſo the Armenians have now ſuch a cuſtom at their marriages, that the huſband goes to bed firſt; nor does the bride put off her veil till in bed [o]: and in Barbary the bride is brought to the bridegroom's houſe, and with ſome of her female relations conveyed into a private room [p]; then the bride's mother, or ſome very near relation, introduces the bridegroom to his new ſpouſe, who is in the dark, and obliged in modeſty not to ſpeak or anſwer upon any account: and if this was the caſe here, as it is highly probable it was, the impoſition on Jacob is eaſily accounted for: and he went in unto her; or lay with her as his wife; a modeſt expreſſion of the uſe of the bed.

℣. 24. And Laban gave unto his daughter Leah Zilpah his maid, for an handmaid.] It was uſual to have many given them at this time, as Rebekah ſeems to have had, ch. xxiv. 59, 61. but Leah had but one, and this was all the portion Jacob had with her. The Targum of Jonathan is, "and Laban" gave her Zilpah his daughter, whom his con-"cubine bore unto him:" hence the Jews ſay [q], that the daughters of a man by his concubines are called maids.

℣. 25. And it came to paſs, that in the morning, behold it was Leah, &c.] The morning-light diſcovered her, and her veil being off, her tender eyes ſhewed who ſhe was: it is much her voice had not betrayed her; but perhaps there might be a likeneſs of voice in her and her ſiſter; or ſhe might keep ſilence, and ſo not to be diſcovered in that way; but to excuſe her from ſin is not eaſy, even the ſin of adultery and inceſt. Many things may be ſaid indeed in her favour, as obedience to her father, and being the eldeſt daughter, might be deſirous of having an huſband firſt, and eſpecially of having the promiſed ſeed, which God promiſed to Abraham, and was to be in the line of Jacob: and it may be, as Schmidt obſerves, that Laban had perſuaded her to believe, that the matrimonial contract he had made with Jacob was on her account, and that ſhe was truly his ſpouſe; and the ſame he might ſay to Rachel, which made her eaſy, or otherwiſe it is difficult to account for it, that ſhe ſhould acquieſce in it; for it can hardly be thought to be done without her knowledge, when it was for the ſolemnity of her marriage that the men of the city were called together, and a feaſt made for them; for that ſhe ſhould deliver up to her ſiſter the things or ſigns that Jacob had given her to carry on the fraud, as the Jewiſh writers [r] ſay, is beyond belief: and he ſaid to Laban; when he aroſe in the morning, and at firſt meeting with him: what is this that thou haſt done unto me? what a wicked thing is it? as it was, to put another woman to bed to him that was not his wife, and in the room of his lawful wife; or why haſt thou done this to me? what reaſon was there for it? what have I done, that could induce thee to do me ſuch an injury? for Jacob knew what he had done, of that he does not enquire, but of the reaſon of it, and expoſtulates with him about the crime, as it was a ſin againſt God, and an injury to him: did I not ſerve with thee for Rachel? even ſeven years, according to agreement; was not this the covenant I made with thee, that ſhe ſhould be my wife at the end of them? wherefore then haſt thou beguiled me? by giving Leah inſtead of her: tho' Laban is not to be juſtified in this action, yet here appears in Providence a righteous retaliation of Jacob; he beguiled his own father, pretending he was his brother Eſau; and now his father-in-law beguiles him, giving him blear-eyed Leah inſtead of beautiful Rachel.

℣. 26. And Laban ſaid, it muſt not be ſo done in our country, &c.] Or in our place [s]; in this our city it is not uſual and cuſtomary to do ſo; he does not deny what he had done in beguiling him, nor the agreement he had made with him, but pleads the cuſtom of the place as contrary to it: to give the younger, that is, in marriage, before the firſt-born; but it does not appear there was any ſuch cuſtom, and it was a mere evaſion; or otherwiſe, why did not he inform him of this when he aſked for Rachel? and why did he enter into a contract with him, contrary to ſuch a known cuſtom? and beſides, how could he have the face to call the men of the city, and make a feaſt for the marriage of his younger daughter, if this was the caſe.

℣. 27. Fulfil her week, &c.] Not Rachel's week, or a week of years of ſervitude for her, but Leah's week, or the week of 7 days of feaſting for her marriage; for a marriage-feaſt uſed to be kept 7 days, according to the Jewiſh writers [t], and as it ſeems from Judges xiv. 17. and the Targum of Jeruſalem fully expreſſes this ſenſe, "fulfil the week "of

" of the days of the feaſt of Leah;" and to the ſame ſenſe the Targum of Jonathan, Aben Ezra and Jarchi: and we will give this alſo; meaning Rachel that ſtood by; and the ſenſe is, that he and his wife, if he had any, or his friends about him, would give to Jacob Rachel alſo to be his wife, upon the following condition: for the ſervice which thou ſhalt ſerve with me yet ſeven other years; which ſhows the avaritious temper of the man.

℣. 28. And Jacob did ſo, and fulfilled her week, &c.] The week of the days of the feaſt of Leah, as the Targum of Jonathan adds; he agreed to it; during which time he cohabited with Leah as his wife, and which confirmed the marriage; how juſtifiable this was, muſt be left. The marrying of two ſiſters was forbidden by the law of Moſes, Lev. xviii. 18. and polygamy was not allowed of in after-times, and yet both were diſpenſed with in times preceding; and there ſeems to be an overruling Providence in this affair, which oftentimes brings good out of evil, ſince the Meſſiah was to ſpring from Leah, and not Rachel; and having more wives than one, and concubines alſo, ſeems to be permitted for this reaſon, that Jacob might have a numerous progeny, as it was promiſed he ſhould: and indeed Jacob was under ſome neceſſity of marrying both ſiſters, ſince the one was ignorantly defiled by him, and the other was his wife by eſpouſal and contract; and tho' he had ſerved 7 years for her, he could not have her without conſenting to marry the other, and fulfilling her week, and ſerving 7 years more; to ſuch hard terms was he obliged by an unkind uncle, in a ſtrange country, and deſtitute: and he gave him Rachel his daughter to wife alſo; not after 7 years ſervice, as Joſephus [u] thinks, but after the 7 days of feaſting for Leah; tho' on condition of the above ſervice, as appears from various circumſtances related before the 7 years ſervice could be completed; as his going in to Rachel, ℣. 30, her envying the fruitfulneſs of her ſiſter, ch. xxx. 1. giving Bilhah her handmaid unto him, ℣. 3. and the whole ſeries of the context, and life of Jacob.

℣. 29. And Laban gave to Rachel his daughter, Bilhah his handmaid to be her maid.] As he had given Leah an handmaid, he gave Rachel another; and this in the Targum of Jonathan is ſaid to be a daughter of Laban by a concubine alſo, as the former.

℣. 30. And he went in alſo unto Rachel, &c.] Cohabited with her as his wife: and he loved alſo Rachel more than Leah; ſhe was his firſt love, and he retained the ſame love for her he ever had; as appears by his willingneſs to agree to the ſame condition of 7 years ſervitude more for her ſake, and which he performed as follows: and ſerved with him yet ſeven other years; that is, Jacob ſerved ſo many years with Laban after he had married his two daughters, and fulfilled the weeks of feaſting for each of them.

℣. 31. And when the Lord ſaw that Leah was hated, &c.] Not properly and ſimply hated by Jacob, as appears by his doing the duty of an huſband to her, but comparatively; ſhe was leſs loved than Rachel: and there are many things to be ſaid for it; ſhe was not beautiful as Rachel was; ſhe was not Jacob's choice, as ſhe was but impoſed upon him through deceit, and he was forced to marry her, or he could not have Rachel his beloved wife: but the Lord had pity on her, and that ſhe might have a ſhare in her huſband's affections, he opened her womb; or gave her conception, as Onkelos paraphraſes it: but Rachel was barren; bare no children as yet, and for many years after.

℣. 32. And Leah conceived, and bare a ſon, and ſhe called his name Reuben, &c.] That is, ſee the ſon; as if ſhe by this name called upon her huſband, her friends, and all about her, to look at him, and view him; perhaps hoping and imagining he might be the famous ſon, the promiſed ſeed, the Meſſiah that was to ſpring to Abraham, in the line of Jacob; but if ſhe ſo thought, ſhe was greatly miſtaken; for this ſon of hers proved unſtable, and did not excel; or rather God hath ſeen or provided a ſon, as Hillerus [w] gives the ſignification of the name, which ſeems better to agree with what follows: for ſhe ſaid, ſurely the Lord hath looked on my affliction; being deceived by her father, not ſo much loved by her huſband as her ſiſter was, and perhaps ſlighted by her: now therefore my huſband will love me; more than he has done, and equally as my ſiſter, having bore him a ſon.

℣. 33. And ſhe conceived again, and bare a ſon, &c.] As ſoon as ſhe well could. The Jews [x] have a notion, that Leah brought forth her ſons at ſeven months end: and ſaid, becauſe the Lord hath heard that I was hated; or leſs loved than her ſiſter: he hath therefore given me this ſon alſo; to comfort her under the trial and exerciſe, and engage her huſband's love the more unto her: and ſhe called his name Simeon; which ſignifies hearing, and anſwers to the reaſon of her having him as ſhe concluded.

℣. 34. And ſhe conceived again, and bare a ſon, &c.] A third time, as ſoon as ſhe well could after the former birth: and ſaid, now this time will my huſband be joined to me; in greater affection and ſtronger ties of love, and cleave unto her: becauſe I have born him three ſons; which ſhe conſidered as a threefold cord, binding his affections to her, which could not be eaſily broke; and therefore was his name called Levi; which ſignifies joined; from him the Levites ſprung, and had their name.

℣. 35. And ſhe conceived again, and bare a ſon, &c.] A fourth ſon, a ſon in whoſe line, and from whoſe tribe the Meſſiah was to ſpring: and ſhe ſaid, now will I praiſe the Lord; ſhe had praiſed him before for looking on her affliction, and hearing her cries, and giving her one ſon after another; but now ſhe determines to praiſe him more than ever, having a freſh inſtance of his goodneſs to her: the Targum of Jonathan adds this as a reaſon, "becauſe from this my ſon ſhall come forth kings, "and from him ſhall come forth David the king, "who ſhall praiſe the Lord." And why may it not be as well ſuppoſed, that ſhe had knowledge of the Meſſiah ſpringing from him, which would greatly heighten and increaſe her joy and praiſe? and therefore ſhe called his name Judah; which ſignifies praiſe. A further improvement is made of this name, and the ſignification of it, in ch. xlix. 8. According to the Jewiſh writers [y], theſe 4 ſons of Jacob were born, Reuben on the 14th day of Ciſleu, or November, and lived 124 years; Simeon on the 21ſt of Tebet, or December, and lived 120 years; Levi on the 16th of Niſan, or March, and lived 137 years; and Judah on the 15th of Sivan, or May, and lived 119 years. And all theſe names being of the Hebrew language, and derived from words in it, ſhew that this language, or what was much the ſame with it, was ſpoken in Laban's family, mily, and had been continued from Nahor, as it had been in Iſaac's family from Abraham: and left bearing; that is, for a while, for after this ſhe bore two ſons and a daughter; ſee ch. xxx. 17, 18, 19.

CHAP. XXX.

THIS chapter gives an account of Rachel's envy of her ſiſter for her fruitfulneſs, and of her earneſt deſire of having children, which ſhe expreſſed to Jacob in an unbecoming manner, for which he reproved her, ℣. 1, 2. of her giving her maid Bilhah to Jacob, by whom he had two ſons, Dan and Napthali, ℣. 3—8. and of Leah's giving her maid Zilpah to him, by whom he had two other ſons, Gad and Aſher, ℣. 9—13. and of Reuben's mandrakes he found in the field, and the agreement made between Rachel and Leah about them, ℣. 14, 15, 16. and of Leah's bearing Jacob two more ſons and one daughter, ℣. 17—21. and of Rachel's alſo bearing him a ſon, whoſe name was Joſeph, ℣. 22, 23, 24. upon which he deſires leave of Laban to depart into his own country, his time of ſervitude being up, ℣. 25, 26. which brought on a new agreement between him and Laban, that for the future he ſhould have all the ſpeckled, ſpotted, and brown cattle for his ſervice, ℣. 27—36. and the chapter is concluded with an account of a cunning ſcheme of Jacob's to increaſe that ſort of cattle, which ſucceeded, and by which he became rich, ℣. 37—43.

℣. 1. And when Rachel ſaw that ſhe bare Jacob no children, &c.] In the ſpace of 3 or 4 years after marriage, and when her ſiſter Leah had had 4 ſons: Rachel envied her ſiſter; the honour ſhe had of bearing children, and the pleaſure in nurſing and bringing them up, when ſhe lay under the reproach of barrenneſs: or, ſhe emulated her ſiſter [z]; was deſirous of having children even as ſhe, which ſhe might do, and yet not be guilty of ſin, and much leſs of envy, which is a very heinous ſin: and ſaid unto Jacob, give me children, or elſe I die; Rachel could never be ſo weak as to imagine that it was in the power of Jacob to give her children at his pleaſure, or of a barren woman to make her a fruitful mother of children; though Jacob at firſt ſight ſeems ſo to have underſtood her: but either, as the Targum of Jonathan paraphraſes it, that he would pray the Lord to give her children, as Iſaac prayed for Rebekah; ſo Aben Ezra and Jarchi: or that he would think of ſome means or other whereby ſhe might have children, at leaſt that might be called hers; and one way ſhe had in view, as appears from what follows: or otherwiſe ſhe ſuggeſts ſhe could not live comfortably; not that ſhe ſhould deſtroy herſelf, as ſome have imagined; but that ſhe ſhould be ſo uneaſy in her mind, that her life would be a burden to her; that death would be preferred to it, and her fretting herſelf for want of children, in all probability, would iſſue in it.

℣. 2. And Jacob's anger was kindled againſt Rachel, &c.] Whom yet he dearly loved, hearing her talk in ſuch an extravagant manner, as her words ſeemed to be, and were not only expreſſive of great uneaſineſs and impatience, but implied what was not in the power of man to do: and he ſaid, am I in God's ſtead; do you take me to be God, or one that has a diſpenſing power from him, to do what otherwiſe no creature can do; and which alſo he never gives to any? for, as the Targum of Jonathan on ℣. 22. ſays, this is one of the 4 keys which God delivers not to an angel or a ſeraph; even the key of barrenneſs. Children are the gift of God, and his only, and therefore he is to be ſought unto for them: hence Onkelos and Jonathan paraphraſe it; "wherefore doſt thou "ſeek them of me? ſhouldſt thou not ſeek them of "the Lord?" who hath withheld from thee the fruit of the womb? children, Pſ. 127. 3. not Jacob but the Lord.

℣. 3. And ſhe ſaid, &c.] In order to pacify Jacob, and explain her meaning to him; which was, not that ſhe thought it was in his power to make her the mother of children, but that he would think of ſome way or another of obtaining children for her, that might go for hers; ſo the Arabic verſion, obtain a ſon for me: but, ſince no method occurred to him, ſhe propoſes one: behold my maid Bilhah, go in unto her; take her and uſe her as thy wife: and ſhe ſhall bear upon my knees; either ſit on her knees in the time of labour, and ſo bring forth as if it was ſhe herſelf; or rather bear a child, which Rachel would take and nurſe, and dandle upon her knees as her own, ſee Iſ. lxvi. 12: that I may alſo have children by her; children as well as her ſiſter, though by her maid, and as Sarah propoſed to have by Hagar, whoſe example, in all probability, ſhe had before her, and uſes her very words, ch. xvi. 2. ſee the note there.

℣. 4. And ſhe gave him Bilhah her hand-maid, &c.] To be enjoyed as a wife, though ſhe was no other than a concubine; yet ſuch were ſometimes called wives, and were ſecondary ones, and were under the proper lawful wife, nor did their children inherit; but thoſe which Jacob had by his wives maids did inherit with the reſt: and Jacob went in unto her; conſenting to what Rachel his wife propoſed to him: having concubines, as well as more wives than one, were not thought criminal in thoſe times, and were ſuffered of God, and in this caſe for the multiplication of Jacob's ſeed; and perhaps he might the more readily comply with the motion of his wife, from the example of his grandfather Abraham, who took Hagar to wife at the inſtance of Sarah.

℣. 5. And Bilhah conceived, and bare Jacob a ſon.] This was ſo far countenanced by the Lord, that he bleſſed her with conception, and Jacob with a ſon by her.

℣. 6. And Rachel ſaid, &c.] As ſoon as ſhe heard that Bilhah had bore a ſon: God hath judged me; and hereby teſtified his approbation, as ſhe underſtood it, of the ſtep ſhe had took in giving her maid to her huſband, and ſhe was juſtified in what ſhe had done: and hath alſo heard my voice; of prayer; ſhe had prayed to God that her maid might have a child, or ſhe have one by her: and hath given me a ſon; whom ſhe reckoned her own, Bilhah being her ſervant, and ſo her children born of her, hers; or whom ſhe adopted and called her own, and therefore took upon her to give it a name, as follows: and here let it be obſerved, that ſhe looked upon this child as a gift of God, as the fruit of prayer, and as in mercy to her, God dealing ing graciouſly with her, and taking her part, and judging righteous judgment: therefore called ſhe his name Dan; which ſignifies judgment; the reaſon of it lies in the firſt clauſe of the verſe.

℣. 7. And Bilhah Rachel's maid conceived again, &c.] Soon after the birth of her firſt child: and bare Jacob a ſecond ſon; this was his ſixth ſon, but the ſecond by Bilhah.

℣. 8. And Rachel ſaid, with great wreſtlings have I wreſtled with my ſiſter, &c.] Or, with the wreſtlings of God [a], wreſtling and ſtriving in prayer with God; being vehement and importunate in her petitions to him, that ſhe might have children as well as her ſiſter: ſome render it, I uſed the craftineſſes of God, or great craftineſs with my ſiſter [b]; by giving her maid Bilhah to her huſband, and having children by her: and I have prevailed; as ſhe ſtrove in her deſires and prayers, to have another child before her ſiſter had; in that ſhe prevailed, or ſhe was ſucceeded in her deſires, ſhe had children as ſhe wiſhed to have: and ſhe called his name Naphtali; which ſignifies my wreſtling, being a child ſhe had been ſtriving and wreſtling for: theſe two ſons of Bilhah were born, as ſay the Jews, Dan on the 29th day of Elul or Auguſt, and lived 127 years; Naphtali on the 5th of Tiſri or September, and lived 133 years.

℣. 9. When Leah ſaw that ſhe had left bearing, &c.] For a little while, for ſhe afterwards bore again, and obſerving alſo what her ſiſter had done; ſhe took Zilpah her maid, and gave her Jacob to wife: in this ſhe was leſs excuſable than Rachel, ſince ſhe had 4 children of her own, and therefore might have been content without deſiring others by her maid; nor had ſhe long left off bearing, and therefore had no reaſon to give up hope of having any more.

℣. 10. And Zilpah Leah's maid bore Jacob a ſon.] For it ſeems he conſented to take her to wife at the motion of Leah, as he had took Bilhah at the inſtance of Rachel; and having gratified the one, he could not well deny the other; and went in to her, and ſhe conceived, though neither of theſe things are mentioned, but are all neceſſarily ſuppoſed.

℣. 11. And Leah ſaid, a troop cometh, &c.] A troop of children, having bore 4 herſelf, and now her maid another, and more ſhe expected; or the commander of a troop cometh, one that ſhall head an army and overcome his enemies; which agrees with the prophecy of Jacob, Gen. xlix. 19. and ſhe called his name Gad; which ſignifies a troop, glorying in the multitude of her children, that ſhe had or hoped to have.

℣. 12. And Zilpah, Leah's maid, bare Jacob a ſecond ſon.] As well as Bilhah, and no more.

℣. 13. And Leah ſaid, &c.] Upon the birth of the ſecond ſon by her maid: happy am I; or, in my happineſs; or, for my happineſs [c]; that is, this child is an addition to my happineſs, and will ſerve to increaſe it: for the daughters will call me bleſſed; the women of the place where ſhe lived would ſpeak of her as a happy perſon, that had ſo many children of her own, and others by her maid; ſee Pſ. cxxvii. 5: and ſhe called his name Aſher; which ſignifies happy or bleſſed. Theſe two ſons of Zilpah, according to the Jewiſh writers [d], were born, Gad on the 10th day of Marcheſvan or October, and lived 125 years; and Aſher on the 22d day of Shebet or January, and lived 123 years.

℣. 14. And Reuben went in the days of wheat-harveſt, &c.] Leah's eldeſt ſon, who is ſuppoſed to be at this time about 4 or 5 years of age [e], who went out from the tent to the field, to play there perhaps; and this was at the time of wheat-harveſt, in the month Sivan, as the Targum of Jonathan, which anſwers to part of our May; a time of the year when the earth is covered with flowers: and found mandrakes in the field; the flowers or fruit of mandrakes, mandrake apples, as the Septuagint. This plant is ſaid to excite love, provoke luſt, diſpoſe for, and help conception; for which reaſons it is thought Rachel was ſo deſirous of theſe mandrakes, which ſeem to have their name dudaim from love: the word is only uſed here and in Cant. vii. 13. where they are commended for their good ſmell, and therefore cannot be the plant which goes now by that name; ſince they neither give a good ſmell, nor bear good fruit, and are of a cold quality, and ſo not likely to produce the above effects aſcribed unto them. It is very probable they were lovely and delightful flowers the boy picked up in the field, ſuch as children delight in; ſome think the jeſſamin, others lilies, and others violets [f]; it is not eaſy to determine what they were; ſee the note on Cant. vii. 13: and brought them unto his mother Leah; as children are apt to do, to ſhow what fine flowers or fruit they have gathered: then Rachel ſaid to Leah, give me, I pray thee, of thy ſon's mandrakes; being taken with the colour or ſmell of them; for as for the notion of helping conception, or removing barrenneſs and the like, there is no foundation for it; for Rachel who had them did not conceive upon having them; and the conception both of her and Leah afterwards is aſcribed to the Lord's remembering and hearkening to them.

℣. 15. And ſhe ſaid unto her, &c.] Leah to Rachel, taking this opportunity to bring out a thing which had ſome time lain with uneaſineſs upon her mind: is it a ſmall thing that thou haſt taken away my huſband? got the greateſt ſhare of his affections, and had moſt of his company; which laſt was very probably the caſe, and more ſo ſince Leah had left off bearing; and this ſhe could not well ſtomach, and therefore upon this trifling occaſion outs with it: and wouldeſt thou take away my ſon's mandrakes alſo? which were poor things to be mentioned along with an huſband; and beſides, Rachel did not offer to take them away from the child without her leave, which ſhe in a very humble manner aſked of her: and Rachel ſaid, therefore he ſhall lie with thee to-night for thy ſon's mandrakes; which ſhewed no great affection to her huſband, and a ſlight of his company, to be willing to part with it for ſuch a trifle; and it ſeems by this, as if they took their turns to lie with Jacob, and this night being Rachel's turn ſhe agrees to give it to Leah for the ſake of the mandrakes: or however, if ſhe had engroſſed him to herſelf, very much, of late, as ſeems by the words of Leah above, ſhe was willing to give him up to her this night, on that conſideration; which Leah agreed ſhe ſhould have, as appears by what follows.

℣. 16. And Jacob came out of the field in the evening, &c.] From feeding his flocks; and Leah went out to meet him; knowing full well the time he uſed to come home: and ſaid, thou muſt come in unto me; into her tent, for the women had ſeparate tents from the men; as Sarah from Abraham;

Abraham; and ſo theſe wives of Jacob had not only tents ſeparate from his, but from one another: for ſurely I have hired thee with my ſon's mandrakes: that is, ſhe had hired that night's lodging with him of Rachel, with the mandrakes her ſon Reuben had brought out of the field. Jacob made no objection to it, but conſented, being willing to pleaſe both his wives, who he perceived had made this agreement between themſelves: and he lay with her that night; and that only, for the preſent; for, by the way of ſpeaking, it looks as if he did not continue with her more nights together at that time, but went, as before that evening, to Rachel's tent.

℣. 17. And God hearkened unto Leah, &c.] To the prayer of Leah, as the Targum of Jonathan, for more children: the deſire of theſe good women for the company of their huſband, was not from luſt, or an amorous deſire in them, but for the ſake of having many children, as appears by giving their maids to him; and the reaſon of this was, as biſhop Patrick well obſerves, that the promiſe made to Abraham of the multiplication of his ſeed, and of the Meſſiah ſpringing from thence, might be fulfilled; and is the true reaſon of Moſes's taking ſuch particular notice of thoſe things, which might ſeem below the dignity of ſuch a ſacred hiſtory: and ſhe conceived, and bore Jacob the fifth ſon; the 5th he had by her, but the 9th in all, that were born unto him.

℣. 18. And Leah ſaid, God hath given me mine hire, &c.] Of the mandrakes with which ſhe had hired of Rachel a night's lodging with Jacob, and for which ſhe had a ſufficient recompence, by the ſon that God had given her: and ſhe added another reaſon, and a very prepoſterous one, and ſhews ſhe put a wrong conſtruction on the bleſſing ſhe received: becauſe I have given my maiden to my huſband; which, ſhe judged, was ſo well pleaſing to God, that he had rewarded her with another ſon; and ſhe called his name Iſſachar, which ſignifies hire or reward; or, there is a reward, or a man of reward.

℣. 19. And Leah conceived again, &c.] For bearing children Jacob took more to her, and more frequently attended her apartment and bed: and bare Jacob a ſixth ſon; the ſixth by her, but the tenth by her and his two maids.

℣. 20. And Leah ſaid, God hath endued me with a good dowry, &c.] Having ſo many children; for though her huſband could give her nothing at marriage, and her father gave her no more than one handmaid, yet God had abundantly made it up to her, in giving her ſo many ſons: theſe are the heritage of the Lord, Pſ. cxxvii. 3. now will my huſband dwell with me; conſtantly; and not come to her tent now and then only, as he had uſed to do; becauſe I have born him ſix ſons; this ſhe thought would fix his affections to her, and cauſe him to cleave to her, and continue with her: and ſhe called his name Zebulun; which ſignifies dwelling. Theſe two ſons of Leah, according to the Jewiſh writers [g], were born, Iſſachar on the 10th day of Ab or July, and lived 122 years, and Zebulun on the 7th of Tiſri or September, and lived 124 years.

℣. 21. And afterwards ſhe bare a daughter, &c.] Which ſome writers, as Aben Ezra obſerves, ſay, was at the ſame birth with Zebulun, a twin with him; but being ſaid to be afterwards, ſhews the contrary: and called her name Dinah; which ſignifies Judgment: perhaps ſhe may have ſome reference to the firſt ſon of Bilhah, Rachel's handmaid, whom ſhe called Dan, a name of the ſame ſignification; intimating as if it was a clear caſe, that judgment went on her ſide; and that by the number of children ſhe had, it was plain God had determined in her favour.

℣. 22. And God remembered Rachel, &c.] In a way of mercy and kindneſs, whom he ſeemed to have forgotten, by not giving her children: and God hearkened to her; to her prayer, which had been made time after time, that ſhe might have children; but hitherto God had delayed to anſwer, but now gives one: and opened her womb; gave her conception, and made her fruitful, and ſhe became the mother of a child ſhe ſo much deſired.

℣. 23. And ſhe conceived and bare a ſon, &c.] Through the goodneſs of God unto her, and for which ſhe was greatly thankful; and ſaid, God hath taken away my reproach; the reproach of barrenneſs with which ſhe was reproached among her neighbours; and perhaps by her ſiſter Leah, and indeed it was a general reproach in thoſe times; and eſpecially, it was the more grievous to good women in the family of Abraham, becauſe they were not the means of multiplying his ſeed according to the promiſe, and could have no hope of the Meſſiah ſpringing from them.

℣. 24. And ſhe called his name Joſeph, &c.] Which ſignifies adding, or rather, to be added, or, God ſhall add, giving this reaſon for it; and ſaid, the Lord ſhall add to me another ſon: which is expreſſive of ſtrong faith; that as ſhe had begun to bear children, ſhe ſhould bear another, as ſhe did; though ſome read the words as a wiſh or prayer, may the Lord, or, and that the Lord would add, &c. [h] but our verſion ſeems beſt: the name Joſeph is compoſed of two words, one which ſignifies to gather or take away, uſed in the preceding verſe, and another which ſignifies to add; and ſo has reſpect to the Lord's taking away her reproach, and adding to her another ſon: Melo, an heathen writer, makes mention of Joſeph by name, as Polyhiſtor [i] relates, and makes him the 12th and laſt ſon of Abraham, whereas he was the 11th of Jacob. He was born, as the Jews ſay [k], the 27th of Tammuz or June, and lived 110 years.

℣. 25. And it came paſs, when Rachel had borne Joſeph, &c.] At which time his 14 years of ſervitude were ended; for Jacob was in Laban's houſe 20 years, 14 were ſpent in ſerving for his wives, and the other 6 for his cattle, which begun from this time, as the context clearly ſhews; ſee ch. xxxi. 41. ſo that, as the Jewiſh writers [l] truly obſerve, in 7 years time Jacob had 12 children born to him, 11 ſons and 1 daughter; for he had ſerved 7 years before he had either of his wives: they alſo pretend that a twin was born with each, except with Joſeph, but for that there is no foundation: that Jacob ſaid unto Laban, ſend me away; give me leave to depart thy houſe: he had a right to demand his liberty, and to inſiſt upon it, ſince the time of his ſervitude was up; but he choſe to have leave, and part in a friendly manner: that I may go unto mine own place, and to my own country; to Beerſheba, Beerſheba, where his father and mother lived, and whom, no doubt, he longed to ſee; and to the land of Canaan, in which that place was, which was his native country, and was given him by promiſe, and was to be the inheritance of his ſeed.

℣. 26. Give me my wives, &c.] His two wives, Leah and Rachel, and the two maids, Bilhah and Zilpah, which they had given him for wives alſo; he deſires leave not to have them, but to take them away with him: and my children; his 12 children; he did not deſire his father-in-law to take any of them, and keep them for him, but was deſirous of having them with him: no doubt, for the ſake of their education, though he had nothing of his own wherewith to ſupport them; not doubting that God would make good his promiſe in giving him food and raiment, and returning him to his country; and which his faith applied to his family as well as to himſelf: for whom I have ſerved thee; not for his children, but for his wives, his 2 wives; and let me go; free from thy ſervice, and to my own country; for thou knoweſt my ſervice which I have done thee: how much and great it is, and with what diligence and faithfulneſs it has been performed, and that the time of it fixed and agreed upon was at an end.

℣. 27. And Laban ſaid unto him, I pray thee, if I have found favour in thine eyes, tarry, &c.] One would think he could not expect to have much from him, by his treatment of him; but he craftily cajoles him in this fawning, flattering way, in order to gain a point, and begs of him, in a very humble and ſuppliant manner, if he had any love for him, that he would not depart from him, but ſtay with him, which he ſhould take as a great favour; for he could not inſiſt upon it, as bound in duty, or as a point of juſtice: for I have learned by experience; by the obſervations made in the 14 years paſt; that the Lord hath bleſſed me for thy ſake: Laban had ſo much religion as to aſcribe the bleſſings, the good things he had, to the Lord, as the author and giver of them; and ſo much honour, or however, thought it was more his intereſt to own it, that it was for Jacob's ſake that he was thus bleſſed: the word tranſlated is uſed ſometimes, of divination, and the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem render it, I have uſed divinations; and according to Jarchi and Aben Ezra, Laban was a diviner and ſoothſayer; and by the Teraphim he had in his houſe, ch. xxxi. 19. he divined, and knew thereby that he was bleſſed for the ſake of Jacob; but as Schmidt obſerves, it is not credible that the devil ſhould give ſo famous a teſtimony to Laban of Jehovah and Jacob.

℣. 28. And he ſaid, appoint me thy wages, and I will give it.] Say what thou wilt have, fix what ſalary thou thinkeſt ſufficient, and I will agree to it, and punctually pay it: this he craftily ſaid, not chooſing to propoſe any thing himſelf, but leaving it to Jacob, knowing very well the honeſty and modeſty of Jacob, that he would mention leſs wages than he could have the face to offer him.

℣. 29. And he ſaid unto him, &c.] Jacob to Laban, thou knoweſt that I have ſerved thee; not only diligently and faithfully, without any ſalary, excepting for his wives; otherwiſe he had no wages for his ſervice all this time, which therefore ſhould be conſidered for the future: and how thy cattle was with me; always under his care, and he ever watchful of them; ſpent all his time and labour with them, and had no opportunity of getting any thing for himſelf.

℣. 30. For it was little which thou hadſt before I came, &c.] Perhaps but a ſingle flock, and that not a very large one, ſince Rachel, his youngeſt daughter had the care of it: and it is now increaſed unto a multitude; or broke forth[m], ſpread itſelf over the fields and plains, hills and mountains adjacent, ſo that they were covered with his ſheep, theſe bringing forth thouſands and ten thouſands, Pſ. cxliv. 13. and the Lord hath bleſſed thee ſince my coming, or at my foot[n]; ever ſince he ſet foot in his houſe. Aben Ezra obſerves it as a proverbial ſaying, ſuch a one has a good foot, a lucky one wherever he comes, a bleſſing or ſucceſs goes with him; or the meaning may be, wherever Jacob went or led his flock, and fed it, it proſpered, the bleſſing of God going with him. Onkelos renders it, for my ſake; and ſo it is the ſame with what Laban had obſerved and owned, ℣. 27. and now, when ſhall I provide for mine own houſe? ſuggeſting it was his duty to do it, and it was high time he did it, ſince he had a large family to provide for; ſee 1 Tim. v. 8.

℣. 31. And he ſaid, what ſhall I give thee? &c.] So ſaid Laban to Jacob, ſtill avoiding making any offer himſelf, but waiting for Jacob, and preſſing upon him to fix his wages: and Jacob ſaid, thou ſhalt not give me any thing; a ſpeech Laban liked very well: his meaning is, that he ſhould give him no certain ſettled ſalary, nor even of any thing that Laban was now poſſeſſed of, and God had bleſſed him with for his ſake; he did not deſire any part of it; but if thou wilt do this thing for me; which he was about to mention, and does in the following verſe; I will again feed and keep thy flock: there is an elegance in the original; I will return, I will feed, I will keep thy flock: it ſeems by this, that Jacob had relinquiſhed the care of the flock, upon the time of his ſervitude being out; but, upon the following condition, propoſes to return to it, lead it out to the paſtures, and feed it on them, and keep it night and day as he had uſed to do.

℣. 32. I will paſs through all thy flock to day, &c.] Not alone, but Laban and his ſons with him; removing from thence all the ſpeckled and ſpotted cattle: that is, ſuch as were black and had white ſpots on them, or were white and had black ſpots on them; and the ſpeckled, according to Jarchi and Ben Melech, were ſuch as had ſmall ſpots on them; and the ſpotted were ſuch as had larger: and all the brown cattle among the ſheep; the ruſſet coloured ones, or the black[o] ones, as ſome render it; and ſo Aben Ezra, and who makes mention of another ſort, called Barud, which ſignifies ſpotted with white ſpots like hailſtones, but is not to be found in the text here, but in ch. xxxi. 10. and beſides coincide with thoſe before deſcribed: and the ſpotted and ſpeckled among the goats; that had larger and leſſer ſpots upon them as the ſheep; and of ſuch ſhall be my hire: not thoſe that were now in the flock, but ſuch as were like them, that ſhould be brought forth for the time to come; which ſeems to be a ſtrange propoſal, and what was not likely to turn out much to the advantage of Jacob; but he knew what he did, and very probably was directed of God, if not in a viſion, yet by an impulſe on his mind, that ſuch a method would be right, and would ſucceed; ſee ch. xxxi. 10, 11, 12.

℣. 33. So ſhall my righteouſneſs anſwer for me in time to come, &c.] Either by the ſucceſs I ſhall have, and the bleſſing of God upon me, making it proſperous; it will appear in time to come, and to all poſterity, that I have moſt righteouſly and faithfully ſerved thee: or rather, ſuch a ſeparation being made in Laban's flock, all the ſpotted ones being removed, and only white ones left with Jacob to keep; it would be a clear caſe hereafter, if any ſuch ſhould be found with Jacob, they were not taken from Laban's flock, but were what in providence he was bleſſed with, and came by honeſtly and righteouſly: when it ſhall come for my hire before thy face; when any ſpotted ones would be brought forth, it would be plain and manifeſt to his face, that they belonged to him for his hire or wages; or, as Schmidt, when any complaint ſhould come before Laban concerning his hire, or about any ſpeckled and ſpotted cattle that were Jacob's hire, as if he had wronged him of it; the action now done, by making ſuch a ſeparation, would be a ſufficient vindication of him, and juſtify him from ſuch an aſperſion: and every one that is not ſpeckled and ſpotted amongſt the goats, and brown among the ſheep, that ſhall be accounted ſtolen with me; if any ſuch were found among thoſe that Jacob ſhould hereafter call his flock, as were without ſpecks and ſpots, or were brown, he was content they ſhould be reckoned as ſtolen, and what he had no right unto.

℣. 34. And Laban ſaid, &c.] Being well-pleaſed with the propoſal Jacob made, as knowing, that generally ſpeaking, cattle of a colour produced thoſe that were of the ſame; and whereas Jacob propoſed to have a flock of ſheep only white committed to his care, and to have ſuch for his own that ſhould be produced of them, that were ſpeckled, ſpotted and brown, Laban concluded from the general nature of things, that he could have but very few, if any, and therefore was for ſtriking the bargain at once: behold, I would it might be according to thy word; he agreed it ſhould be as Jacob had ſettled it, and he hoped and wiſhed he would abide by it; he was afraid he would not keep to it.

℣. 35. And he removed that day the he-goats that were ring-ſtraked, &c.] That had ſtrakes of a different colour from the reſt on their ſhoulders, thighs, legs or feet, or in any part of the body: the word here uſed ſtands in the room of that before tranſlated ſpeckled; this Laban did, as the context ſhows; he went about it immediately at the motion of Jacob, with which he was pleaſed: and all the ſhe-goats that were ſpeckled and ſpotted; ſo that there might be neither male nor female of thoſe mixed colours; this he did to prevent any generation of them: and every one that had ſome white in it; any white ſpot in it, as the Targum of Jonathan; that is, every one of the brown or black colour, that had any white in it: and all the brown among the ſheep; that were entirely ſo: and gave them into the hands of his ſons; not the ſons of Jacob, as ſome in Aben Ezra; for they were not fit for the care of a flock, the eldeſt ſon Reuben not being 7 years of age; but the ſons of Laban, who were now grown up and fit for ſuch ſervice.

℣. 36. And he ſet three days journey between himſelf and Jacob, &c.] Not 3 days journey for a man, but for cattle; this diſtance there was between the place where Laban and his ſons kept the ſpotted, ſpeckled and brown cattle, and that in which Jacob kept the flock only conſiſting of white ſheep; and this was done, that the flocks might not be mixed, and that there might be no opportunity to take any of the ſpotted ones, and that they might not ſtray into Jacob's flock; or leſt any of his ſeeing them might bring forth the like, ſuch precaution was uſed: and Jacob fed the reſt of Laban's flock; thoſe that remained after the ſpotted, ſpeckled and brown were taken out; and Jacob having none but white ſheep, there was no great likelihood, according to the courſe of nature, of his having much for his hire; ſince he was only to have the ſpotted, ſpeckled and brown ones that came from them, and generally like begets like; and, according to the Jewiſh writers [p], thoſe that were committed to his care were old and barren, and ſick and infirm, that ſo he might have no profit from them.

℣. 37. And Jacob took him rods of green poplar, &c.] Of the white poplar tree, called green, not from the colour, but from the moiſture, being ſuch as were cut off of the tree: and of the haſel and cheſnut tree; the former ſome take to be the almond tree, as Saadiah Gaon, and others; and the latter to be the plantane or plane tree, ſo Ainſworth, and others: and pilled white ſtrakes in them; took off the bark of them in ſome places, and left it on in others, which made white ſtrakes: and made the white appear which was in the rods; that part of the rods which was ſtripped of the bark appeared white; and it appeared the whiter for the bark that was left on in other parts; and both made the rods to appear to have various colours, which was the deſign of Jacob in pilling them.

℣. 38. And he ſet the rods which he had pilled, before the flocks, &c.] Over-againſt them, in the view of them: in the gutters in the watering troughs, when the flocks came to drink; that is, in places of water, where troughs or veſſels were made, into which the water ran convenient for the cattle to drink out of; and here he placed his party-coloured rods right over-againſt the flocks: that they ſhould conceive when they came to drink; as it was moſt likely they ſhould when they were together at the water, and had refreſhed themſelves with it; and being heated [q]; as the word ſignifies, with a deſire of copulation, might conceive in ſight of the above rods; which were ſet to move upon their imagination at the time of their conception, in order to produce cattle of different colours; to which no doubt he was directed of God, and it had, thro' his bleſſing, the wiſhed-for ſucceſs, as follows.

℣. 39. And the flocks conceived before the rods, &c.] At them, and in ſight of them; which had ſuch influence upon them through the force of imagination, and a divine power and providence ſo directing and ſucceeding this device, that they brought forth cattle ring-ſtraked, ſpeckled and ſpotted; ſuch as Jacob was to have for his hire; and tho' there was no doubt a more than ordinary concourſe of divine providence attending this affair; yet there have been many ſtrange things brought about in a natural way by the ſtrength of imagination, as may be obſerved in thoſe marks which women are ſaid to mark their children with, whilſt with child of them; as alſo in conceiving and bearing ſuch like unto them they have fancied, as the woman that bore a blackamoor, through often looking at the picture of one in her chamber; and an Ethiopian queen, who by the ſame means bore a white child, fair and beautiful, which ſhe expoſed, leſt ſhe ſhe ſhould be thought an adultereſs[r]: and what comes nearer to the caſe here, Jerom reports[s] the like things done in Spain among horſes and mares, by placing beautiful horſes before mares at the time of leaping; and the Apis or Egyptian ox, which had peculiar ſpots in it, was produced in like manner, ſo that there was always in ſucceſſion one of the ſame form and colour; as Auſtin aſſerts[t]; and it may be obſerved, what is affirmed by ſome writers[u], that ſheep will change their colours according to the different waters they drink of at the time of their being covered; and that ſome rivers drank of, will make white ſheep black, and black white, and others red and yellow. But as Jacob was directed of God to take this method, this is ſufficient to juſtify him, and upon his bleſſing and providence the ſucceſs depended, whatever there may be in nature to bring about ſuch an effect; and as it was to do himſelf juſtice, who had been greatly injured by Laban, it was equally as juſt and righteous a thing to take this courſe, as it was for the Iſraelites by a divine direction to borrow jewels, &c. of the Egyptians, whereby they were repaid for their hard ſervice.

℣. 40. And Jacob did ſeparate the lambs, &c.] The ring-ſtraked, ſpeckled and ſpotted; and ſet the faces of the flocks, that were all white, towards the ring-ſtraked, and all the brown in the flock of Laban; either to go before thoſe that were all white, that they by looking at them might conceive and bring forth ſuch, which was another artifice of Jacob's to increaſe his own ſheep; or elſe he ſet at the water-troughs the white ſheep on one ſide of them, and on the oppoſite ſide the ſpeckled ones, &c. that the ſame effect might alſo be produced the more ſucceſsfully both by the rods and by the ſpeckled lambs: and he put his own flocks by themſelves, and put them not unto Laban's cattle; partly that they might not be mixed together, but kept diſtinct, that what was his property might be diſcerned from Laban's; and partly, leſt his ſpotted ones, being mixed with Laban's white ſheep, by continual looking at them, ſhould conceive and bring forth ſuch likewiſe, and ſo his flocks be leſſened.

℣. 41. And it came to paſs, whenſoever the ſtronger cattle did conceive, &c.] Whoſe limbs were well compact, and were ſtrong and healthy: that Jacob laid the rods before the eyes of the cattle in the gutters, that they might conceive among the rods; and bring forth party-coloured ones, and ſuch as were robuſt and ſtrong like themſelves; and this was another device of Jacob's to get the beſt of the flock. Aben Ezra thinks this refers to the two ſeaſons of the year, when the flocks conceived; the one was in Niſan, in the ſpring, and ſuch as were brought on that conception were ſtrong, and therefore Jacob choſe to lay the rods in the gutters at that time, that he might have the beſt cattle; and ſo the Targum of Jonathan calls theſe here the forward ones, as it does thoſe in next verſe we render feeble, the latter ones; which, according to Aben Ezra, conceived in Tiſri or September, and what they brought were weak and feeble.

℣. 42. And when the cattle were feeble, he put them not in, &c.] Or when covered, as Menachem, that is, with wool, and ſo not ſo deſirous of copulation with the males, nor ſo fit and ſtrong for generation; and therefore he put not in the rods into the gutters, partly that he might have none feeble in his flock, and partly that he might not ſpoil Laban of his whole flock, ſtrong and weak: ſo the feebler were Laban's, and the ſtronger Jacob's; not only his flocks became more numerous than Laban's, but were in better plight.

℣. 43. And the man increaſed exceedingly, &c.] Jacob grew very rich: and had much cattle; the greater part of Laban's flocks brought forth ſpeckled, ſpotted and brown cattle, which, according to agreement, were Jacob's: and maid-ſervants, and men-ſervants; which he got to take care of his houſhold affairs, and to aſſiſt him in keeping his flocks: and camels, and aſſes; for his flocks increaſing ſo very much, he ſold many of his ſheep at a good price, as Jarchi obſerves, and with it bought camels and aſſes; and theſe were very fit for his uſe, when he ſhould be obliged or think fit to remove into his own country, and which he was meditating, and had a direction from the Lord for, as in the following chapter.

CHAP. XXXI.

THIS chapter relates how that Jacob obſerving that Laban and his ſons envied his proſperity, and having a call from God to return to his own country, acquaints his wives with it; and reports to them Laban's ill uſage of him, and the wonderful appearance of God to him, and for him, and his orders to him to depart from thence, ℣. 1—13. to which they agreed, knowing full well their father's unkindneſs, and that they had nothing to expect from him, and therefore judged it beſt to go off with what they had got through the gift of God unto them, ℣. 14, 15, 16. upon which Jacob ſet out privately, with all he had, towards his own country, whilſt Laban was ſhearing his ſheep, ℣. 17—21. three days after Laban being informed of it purſued after Jacob, and overtook him at mount Gilead; but was warned by the way to be cautious what he ſaid to him, ℣. 22—25. yet nevertheleſs he warmly expoſtulated with him about his ſecret flight, not giving him the opportunity of taking his leave of his children, and eſpecially for taking away his gods, ℣. 26—30. to which Jacob gave an anſwer, ℣. 31—35. and in his turn was warm likewiſe, and chid Laban ſeverely for his hot purſuit of him, his charge of ſtealth, when he could find nothing on him, his hard labour for the ſpace of 20 years with him, and his ill requital of him for it, ℣. 36—42. however, upon the whole, an amicable agreement was made between them, and they parted in a friendly manner, ℣. 43—55.

℣. 1. And he heard the words of Laban's ſons, &c.] That is, Jacob, as is expreſſed in the Septuagint and Syriac verſions, either with his own ears, over-hearing their diſcourſe in their tents, or in the field, or from the report of others, his wives or ſome of his friends, who thought proper to acquaint him with it; theſe were the ſons of Laban, who had the care of the cattle committed to them, ſeparated by the direction of Jacob, and with the conſent of Laban, ch. xxx. 35. ſaying, Jacob

Jacob hath taken away all that was our father's; meaning not preciſely all that their father had, for that would have been a downright lie; for what was become of them that were committed to their care? beſides, we afterwards read of Laban's ſhearing his ſheep, ℣. 19. but that all that Jacob had was their father's, and he had taken it away from him, if not by force and ſtealth, yet by fraud; and ſo Jacob might fear he would treat him in an ill manner, and therefore began to think it was high time for him to be gone: and of that which was our father's hath he gotten all the glory; his many ſervants, numerous cattle, ſheep, camels and aſſes, in which carnal men place all their happineſs; or thoſe riches, as the Targum of Jonathan, by which he got the name, and glory of a rich man among men: and it was ſo far true what they ſay, that it was out of their father's flock that Jacob got all his increaſe; but then it was according to a covenant that Laban and he entered into, and therefore was obtained in a juſt and lawful manner.

℣. 2. And Jacob beheld the countenance of Laban, &c.] Upon this he obſerved Laban's looks, that he might gather from thence how he took his proſperity; what were his thoughts about it, and what he might expect from him on that account: and behold it was not towards him as before; he ſaid nothing to Jacob, nor charged him with robbing of him, or any falſe dealing with him, yet was uneaſy at his growing proſperity; he put on ſour looks, and an envious countenance, ſad, and ſurly, and lowering; ſo that Jacob ſaw it foreboded no good to him, and therefore thought it moſt adviſeable to depart as ſoon as he could; though perhaps he firſt ſought the Lord about it, who ſpoke to him as in the following verſe.

℣. 3. And the Lord ſaid unto Jacob, &c.] In anſwer to a prayer of his; or ſeeing what difficulties and diſcouragements Jacob laboured under, he appeared unto him for his encouragement and inſtruction how to proceed: return unto the land of thy fathers; the land of Canaan given to Abraham and Iſaac by promiſe: and to thy kindred; his father, and mother, and brother, who all dwelt in the land of Canaan at this time, or as many as were living: or to thy nativity [w], the place where he was born, and to which he muſt have a natural deſire to return: and I will be with thee; to protect him from any injury that might be attempted to be done unto him, either by Laban or Eſau.

℣. 4. And Jacob ſent, &c.] Having this encouragement and direction from the Lord, which ſeems to have been given him in the field, whilſt he was attending his flocks, he diſpatched a meſſenger home to his wives, one of his ſervants or under-ſhepherds. The Targum of Jonathan ſays it was his ſon Napthtali, whom he ſent, becauſe he was a ſwift meſſenger; the Targumiſt alludes to Gen. xlix. 21. but the former is more probable: and called Rachel and Leah; Rachel is mentioned firſt, as being his proper and lawful wife, and is only called ſo ch. xlvi. 19. and it was for her ſake Jacob had Leah. Jacob like a prudent man, and an affectionate huſband, thought proper to acquaint his wives with his caſe, and adviſe with them, and neither leave them, nor take them away ſuddenly and by force; and therefore ſent for them, to the field unto his flock; where he was feeding his flock: this he might do for divers reaſons; he might not judge it ſo proper and convenient to go home to them, ſince it might be difficult to get one of them to come to the apartment of the other; and it was proper they ſhould be together, and that might cauſe ſome ſuſpicion in Laban's family, who might liſten to over-hear what paſſed between them; and beſides, he might be afraid of Laban and his ſons, that being in ſuch an ill temper they would lay violent hands on him, and do him a miſchief; and therefore he ſent for his wives to him in the field, where they could more privately and freely converſe together, without being over-heard or interrupted, and the flock in the mean while not neglected.

℣. 5. And ſaid unto them, I ſee your father's countenance, that it is not towards me as before, &c.] See the note on ℣. 2. no notice is taken of what their brethren, the ſons of Laban had ſaid: but the God of my father hath been with me; not only by affording him his gracious preſence with him, which ſupported him under all his troubles; but by his good providence proſpering and ſucceeding him in his outward affairs, as well as he had lately appeared to him, and encouraged him to return to his own country.

℣. 6. And ye know, that with all my power I have ſerved your father.] With all faithfulneſs and uprightneſs; with all diligence and induſtry; with all wiſdom and prudence; with all my might and main, contriving the beſt methods, and ſparing no pains by day or night to take care of his flocks, and increaſe his ſubſtance: of this his wives had been witneſſes for 20 years paſt, and to them he appeals for the truth of it; ſo that there was no juſt reaſon for their father's behaviour towards him.

℣. 7. And your father hath deceived me; &c.] In the bargain he had made with him about his wages for keeping his cattle the ſix years paſt, after the 14 years ſervitude were ended: and changed my wages ten times; that is, either very often, many times, as the number ten is ſometimes uſed for many, ſee Lev. xxvi. 26. or preciſely ten times, ſince he repeats it afterwards in the ſame form to Laban's face, ℣. 41. he had now ſerved him ſix years upon a new bargain; that he ſhould have all that were of ſuch and ſuch different colours, which were produced out of his flock of white ſheep. Laban was at firſt highly pleaſed with it, as judging it would be a very good one to him, as he might reaſonably think indeed: and it is highly probable he did not attempt any alteration the firſt year, but obſerving Jacob's cattle of the ſpeckled ſort, &c. prodigiouſly increaſing, he did not chuſe to abide by the bargain any longer. Now it muſt be obſerved, that the ſheep in Meſopotamia, as in Italy [x], brought forth their young twice a year; ſo that every yeaning time, which was ten times in five years, Laban made an alteration in Jacob's wages; one time he would let him have only the ſpeckled, and not the ring-ſtraked; another time the ring-ſtraked, and not the ſpeckled; and ſo changed every time, according as he obſerved the prevailing colour was, as may be concluded from the following verſe: but God ſuffered him not to hurt me; to hinder his proſperity, or having juſtice done him for his ſervice; for whatſoever colour Laban pitched upon for Jacob to have the next ſeaſon of yeaning, there was always the greateſt number of them; or all of them were of that colour, whether ſpeckled or ring ſtraked, &c.

℣. 8. If he ſaid then, the ſpeckled ſhall be thy wages, &c.] Sometimes Laban would ſay to Jacob, only the ſpeckled lambs which the ewes ſhall bring forth ſhall be thine hire, and not the ſpotted; or the ring-ſtraked, or the brown, which according to the bargain ſhould have been his, the one and the other: then all the cattle bare ſpeckled; that ſeaſon, God ordering it ſo in his providence, that Laban might be diſappointed, and Jacob might have his full hire; that is, the greateſt part of the cattle bore ſuch, as Ben Melech obſerves: and if he ſaid thus, the ring-ſtraked ſhall be thine hire; obſerving the cattle to bring forth only ſpeckled, or the greateſt part ſuch, then he changed his hire, and would have it be not the ſpeckled, nor the brown, only the ring-ſtraked, there being none or few of that colour the laſt yeaning time: then bare all the cattle ring-ſtraked; or the greateſt part of them were ſuch; ſo that let Laban fix on what colour he would as Jacob's wages, there were ſure to be the greateſt part of that colour; which ſhows the hand of God in it, as is next obſerved by Jacob.

℣. 9. Thus God hath taken away the cattle of your father, &c.] Not all of them, ſee ℣. 19. but a great part of them; his flock was much leſſened by thoſe means, and more were taken away, and came to Jacob's ſhare, than if Laban had abode by the original agreement: and gave them to me; who has the diſpoſing of all things in the world; whoſe the world, and all in it are, and gives of it to the ſons of men as he pleaſes. Jacob takes no notice of any artifice of his, or of any means and methods he made uſe of, but wholly aſcribes all to the providence of God, and points to his wives the hand of God only; and indeed it ſeems to be by his direction, that he took the method he did, as appears from the following verſes.

℣. 10. And it came to paſs at the time that the cattle conceived, &c.] Whether in ſpring or in autumn cannot be ſaid, for it ſeems this was twice a year; this probably was at the beginning of the ſix years ſervitude, or juſt before the agreement was made between Laban and Jacob, and was an inſtruction to the latter how to make his bargain with the former: that I lifted up mine eyes and ſaw in a dream; in a viſion of the night, ſo things were repreſented to his fancy and imagination: and behold, the rams which leaped upon the cattle were ring-ſtraked, ſpeckled and griſled; from whence he might conclude, that the cattle they leaped upon would bring forth the like, and ſo be a direction to him to make his agreement with Laban to have ſuch for his hire; not that the rams in the flock were really of thoſe colours, for they were all white, but ſo they were repreſented to Jacob in the viſion, to ſuggeſt to him, that ſuch would be produced by them; and it is not improbable by the artifice Jacob was directed to, and took, that the ewes, when they came to the watering troughs to drink, upon ſeeing the party-coloured rods in the water, theſe made ſuch an impreſſion upon their imaginations, that they fancied the rams that leaped upon them were of thoſe colours, and ſo conceived and brought forth the like. Here is another colour mentioned, not taken notice of before, at leaſt by this name, griſled; it ſtands in the place of ſpotted, and ſeems to be the ſame with that, and ſignified ſuch as had ſpots on them like hail-ſtones, and diſtinguiſhes them from the ſpeckled: the ſpeckled were ſuch as were white with black ſpots, theſe ſuch as were black, and had white ſpots like hail.

℣. 11. And the angel of God ſpake unto me in a dream, &c.] In the ſame dream before related, and to direct him to obſerve what was preſented to him, and to confirm what he ſaw, and lead him to the deſign and uſe of it. This was not a created angel, but the uncreated one, the Son of God, and who is afterwards called God, and to whom Jacob had made a vow, which he would never have done to an angel; but to God only, as Ben Melech obſerves: ſaying, Jacob, and I ſaid, here am I; the angel called him by his name, to which he anſwered, and ſignified that he was ready to attend to whatſoever he ſhould ſay to him.

℣. 12. And he ſaid, lift up now thine eyes, and ſee, &c.] This was all viſionary, Jacob was ſtill in a dream; but it was ſo impreſſed upon his mind, that he was ſpoke to, and bid to obſerve, and take notice, as follows: that all the rams that leap upon the cattle are ring-ſtraked, ſpeckled and griſled; thereby aſſuring him, that ſuch would be thoſe the ewes would bring forth, which would be right in him to agree with Laban for as his hire; and it is probable, that there was ſome diſtance of time, at leaſt a night, between the firſt motion of Laban's to Jacob to ſettle his wages, ch. xxx. 28. and his repeating that, and being urgent to have it done, ℣. 31. and in this interval of time might be the night Jacob had this dream and viſion in, for his direction; or if it was after the bargain made, ſince it is ſaid to be at the time the cattle conceived, he had it to aſſure him of God's approbation of it, and of his ſucceſs in it: for I have ſeen all that Laban doth to thee; had took notice how he had made him ſerve 14 years for his wives, and had given him nothing for his ſervice; and how he now was taking advantage of Jacob's modeſty to get him to fix his own wages, which he ſuppoſed would be lower than he could have the face to offer him.

℣. 13. I am the God of Bethel, &c.] The ſame angel that appeared to Jacob in a dream at the beginning of his ſix years ſervitude, now appeared to him at the cloſe of it, declaring himſelf to be the God of Bethel; or that God that manifeſted himſelf to him at Bethel, as Onkelos and Jonathan paraphraſe the words; for this is a diſtinct viſion from that in the preceding verſes, concerning the rams of different colours, and are both put together for the ſake of brevity, and becauſe they belong to the ſame affair: where thou anointedſt the pillar, and vowedſt a vow unto me; ſee ch. xxviii. 19, 20. and the notes there; hereby ſignifying the divine approbation of the name Jacob gave to that place, and of what he did in it, and to put him in mind of his promiſe there made: now ariſe, get thee out from this land; of Meſopotamia, or Syria, and out of Haran, a city there, where Jacob now was, and Laban lived: and return unto the land of thy kindred; to the land of Canaan, the place of his nativity, and where his relations dwelt: this ſhows, that this appearance of God to him, as the God of Bethel, was at the cloſe of his ſix years ſervice.

℣. 14. And Rachel and Leah anſwered and ſaid unto him, &c.] One after another, and their anſwers agreeing, are put together; it may be Rachel anſwered in the name of Leah, and for herſelf, ſince ſhe is mentioned firſt, and the verb is ſingular. The Targum of Jonathan is, Rachel anſwered with the conſent of Leah; is there yet any portion or inheritance for us in our father's houſe? it was what might have been juſtly expected as they were his children, that they ſhould have been uſed as ſuch, and have had childrens portions given them; but by the whole of Laban's carriage towards them, both at their marriage, and ever ſince, it was plain he never intended to give them any thing; but kept all he had to himſelf, or deſigned it for his ſons, and therefore it was in vain for them to hope for any thing; ſignifying to Jacob hereby, that they were willing to leave their father's houſe, and go with him when he pleaſed, ſince they could expect nothing by their ſtay here.

℣. 15. Are we not accounted of him ſtrangers? &c.] He had not treated them as children, nor even as free-born perſons; but as if they were foreigners that he had taken in war, or bought of others; or at leaſt, that they were born bondmaids in his houſe, and ſo had a right to ſell them as he had: for he hath ſold us; he had ſold them to Jacob for 14 years ſervice, as if they had been his ſlaves, inſtead of giving dowries with them as his children: and hath quite devoured alſo our money; that which he got by the ſervitude of Jacob, inſtead of giving it to them as their portion, he ſpent it on himſelf and his ſons, and there was nothing left for them.

℣. 16. For all the riches which God hath taken from our father, &c.] And given to Jacob for his labour: that is ours, and our childrens; it belonged to us by the law of nature, before it came into thine hands; and our right unto it is ſtill more manifeſt, and is confirmed by the ſervice thou haſt done for it, by which means it came into thy poſſeſſion; and therefore it is no point of conſcience with us, nor need it be any with thee eſpecially, to go off with it: now therefore, whatſoever God hath ſaid unto thee do; for that muſt needs be right: this was well ſpoken indeed; they mean, that he ſhould quit their father's houſe, and go into the land of Canaan, as God had directed him; and they ſignified that they were willing to go along with him.

℣. 17. Then Jacob roſe up, &c.] And went with them to Laban's houſe, where his children were, as is plain from Rachel's theft, ℣. 19: and ſet his ſons and his wives upon camels; which were his own, ſee ch. xxx. 43. creatures fit for travelling; on theſe he ſet his wives, Rachel and Leah, and his concubine-wives, Bilhah and Zilpah; for theſe went with him, as appears from ch. xxxiii. 6. and xxxv. 22. and his ſons, or rather his children; for they were not all ſons, there was one daughter, and they were all young; his eldeſt ſon Reuben could not be much more than 12 years of age, and his youngeſt ſon Joſeph about ſix.

℣. 18. And he carried away all his cattle, &c.] His ſheep, camels and aſſes: the Jews ſay [y] he had 5500 head of cattle: and all the goods which he had gotten; all the reſt beſides his cattle; his men-ſervants, and maid-ſervants, and all his gold and his ſilver, and whatſoever elſe he had: the cattle of his getting, which he had gotten in Padanaram; or Meſopotania: this ſeems to be purpoſely obſerved, to ſhew that he took nothing but what was his own getting, not any thing that belonged to Laban: for to go to Iſaac his father in the land of Canaan; but it was ſome years before he got to his father's houſe, ſtaying at ſeveral places by the way. No mention is made of his mother Rebekah, ſhe perhaps being now dead.

℣. 19. And Laban went to ſhear his ſheep, &c.] Which were under the care of his ſons, and were three days diſtance from Jacob's flocks; this gave Jacob a fair opportunity to depart with his family and ſubſtance, ſince Laban and his ſons were at ſuch a diſtance, and their ſervants with them alſo: and Rachel had ſtole the images that were her father's; afterwards called gods, which he made uſe of in an idolatrous and ſuperſtitious manner, one way or other: they ſeem to be a kind of penates, or houſhold-gods; in the Hebrew they are called teraphim; and which De Dieu thinks were the ſame with ſeraphim [z]; and were images of angels, conſulted on occaſion, and placed in the houſe for the protection of it, and to increaſe the ſubſtance thereof: ſome take them to be plates of braſs deſcribing the hours of the day, a ſort of ſun-dials; or were ſuch forms, that at certain times were made to ſpeak, and ſhew things to come: but they rather ſeem to be images of an human form, as ſay the Jewiſh writers, and as ſeems from 1 Sam. xix. 13—16. and which it is ſuppoſed were made under certain conſtellations, and were a ſort of Taliſmans, and were conſulted as oracles, and in high eſteem with the Chaldeans and Syrians, a people given to aſtrology, and by which they made their divinations; ſee the note on Hoſ. iii. 4. Zech. x. 2. and therefore Rachel took them away, that her father might not conſult them, and know which way Jacob fled, as Aben Ezra; but this looks as if ſhe had an opinion of them, and that they had ſuch a power of diſcovering perſons and things that were attributed to them: and indeed ſome think ſhe took them away from an affection and veneration for them, ſuppoſing ſhe ſhould not be able to meet with ſuch in Canaan in Iſaac's family; and what is obſerved in ch. xxxv. 2. ſeems to countenance this; but one would think ſhe had been better inſtructed by Jacob during his 20 years converſation with her; and beſides, had ſhe been tinctured with ſuch ſort of ſuperſtition and idolatry, ſhe would never have uſed them ſo indecently, as to have ſet upon them in the circumſtances in which ſhe was, ℣. 34, 35. it is more to her credit and character to ſay with Jarchi, that ſhe did this to take off her father from the idolatrous worſhip of them, and to convince him that they were no gods; ſince they could not inform him of the deſigns of Jacob, and of his flight, nor ſecure themſelves from being carried away by her; unleſs it can be thought that ſhe took them becauſe of the metal of which they were made, gold or ſilver, being willing to have ſomething of her father's goods as her portion, which ſhe thought ſhe had a right unto, or in recompence of her huſband's ſervice. Dr. Lightfoot [a] thinks, ſhe took them for a civil uſe, to preſerve the memory of ſome of her anceſtors, of which theſe were the pictures, and Laban had idolized; but whether pictures were ſo early, is queſtionable.

℣. 20. And Jacob ſtole away unawares to Laban the Syrian, &c.] Went away without his knowledge, or giving him any notice of it; he was too cunning for Laban the Syrian; notwithſtanding his aſtrology and ſuperſtitious arts, which the Syrians are addicted to, he had no foreſight of this matter: or he ſtole away the heart of Laban [b], that which his heart was ſet upon; not his gods, theſe Rachel ſtole away; nor his daughters, for whom he does not appear to have had any great affection and reſpect; but rather the cattle and goods Jacob took with him, which Laban's eye and heart were upon, upon, and hoped to get into his poſſeſſion by one means, or at one time or another; but the former ſenſe, that he ſtole from his heart [d], or ſtole away without his knowledge, ſeems beſt to agree with what follows; in that he told him not that he fled; or that he deſigned to go away, and was about to do it.

℣. 21. So he fled with all that he had, &c.] His wives, his children, cattle and ſubſtance; and he roſe up, and paſſed over the river; the river Euphrates, as the Targum of Jonathan expreſſes it, which lay between Meſopotamia and Canaan; and ſet his face toward the mount Gilead: he travelled and bent his courſe that way: this was a mountain on the border of the land of Canaan, adjoining to Lebanon, near which was a very fruitful country, which had its name from it: it is ſo called here by way of anticipation; for this name was afterwards given it from the heap of ſtones here laid, as a witneſs of the agreement between Laban and Jacob, ℣. 45.

℣. 22. And it was told Laban on the third day, that Jacob was fled.] Three days after Jacob was gone he had the report of it, by ſome means or another; by ſome of his neighbours, or ſervants left at home, and ſooner he could not well have it, ſince the flock he went to ſhear was 3 days diſtance from Jacob's, ch. xxx. 36.

℣. 23. And he took his brethren with him, &c.] Some of his relations, the deſcendants of his father's brethren, the ſons of Nahor, of whom there were 7, beſides Bethuel; and who all perhaps lived in Haran the city of Nahor, ſee ch. xxii. 20—24. or ſome of his neighbours and acquaintance whom he might call to: and purſued after him ſeven days journey; which muſt be reckoned, not from Jacob's departure from Haran, but from Laban's; for Laban being 3 days journey from thence, whither he had to return, after he received the news of Jacob being gone; Jacob muſt have travelled 6 days before Laban ſet out with his brethren from Haran; ſo that this was, as Ben Gerſon conjectures, the 13th day of Jacob's travel; for Laban not having cattle to drive as Jacob, could travel as faſt again as he, and do that in 7 days which took up Jacob 13: and they overtook him in the mount Gilead; ſaid to be 380 miles from Haran [e].

℣. 24. And God came to Laban the Syrian in a dream by night, &c.] It is probable that Laban came to mount Gilead late in the evening, and ſo had no ſight of, or converſation with Jacob until the morning; and that night God came to him, and in a dream adviſed him as follows: or it may be rendered, and God had come, &c. [f] in one of the nights in which he had lain upon the road; though the former ſeems beſt to agree with ℣. 29. the Targum of Jonathan has it, an angel came; and the Jews [g] ſay, it was Michael; by whom, if they underſtand the increated angel, the ſon of God, 'tis right: and ſaid unto him, take heed that thou ſpeak not to Jacob either good, or bad; not that he ſhould keep an entire ſilence, and enter into no diſcourſe with him on any account, but that he ſhould ſay nothing to him about his return to Haran again; for it was the will of God he ſhould go onward towards Canaan's land; and therefore Laban ſhould not attempt to perſuade him to return, with a promiſe of good things, or of what great things he would do for him; nor threaten him with evil things, or what he would do to him if he would not comply to return with him.

℣. 25. Then Laban overtook Jacob, &c.] He was come to the mount the over-night, but now in the morning he came nearer to him, ſo as to hold a converſation with him: now Jacob had pitched his tent in the mount, and Laban with his brethren pitched in the mount of Gilead; both on the ſame mount; one perhaps at the the bottom, and the other at the top; or one on one hill of it, and the other on another, or right over againſt one another.

℣. 26. And Laban ſaid unto Jacob, &c.] Upon their meeting together; perhaps in ſome middle place between their two tents: what haſt thou done? what evil haſt thou committed? what folly art thou guilty of? and what could induce thee to take ſuch a ſtep as this? ſuggeſting that he could ſee no neceſſity for it; and as if he had done nothing that ſhould occaſion it, and that Jacob had done a very ill thing: that thou haſt ſtolen away unawares to me: of this phraſe ſee the note on ℣. 20. and carried away my daughters, as captives taken with the ſword; as were commonly done by a band of robbers that made incurſions upon their neighbours, and plundered them of their ſubſtance, and carried away by force their wives and daughters; and ſuch an one Laban repreſents Jacob to be, a thief and a robber; who had not only ſtolen away from him, but had ſtole away his goods, and even his gods, and carried away his daughters againſt their will: all which were falſe, and particularly the latter, ſince they went along with him with their free and full conſent.

℣. 27. Wherefore didſt thou flee away ſecretly, and ſteal away from me? &c.] Intimating as if he ſhould not have been againſt his departure, if he had but acquainted him with it, and the reaſons of it; ſo that he had no need to have uſed ſuch privacy, and go away like a thief by ſtealth, as if he had done ſomething he had reaſon to be aſhamed of: and didſt not tell me, that I might have ſent thee away with mirth, and with ſongs, with tabret, and with harp? pretending that he would have given him leave to depart; and not only have diſmiſſed him from his houſe and ſervice in an honourable way, but very chearfully and pleaſantly: he would have got a band of muſic, men-ſingers and women-ſingers, and others to play on muſical inſtruments, as the tabret and harp; and ſo had a concert of vocal and inſtrumental muſic, which would have ſhewn that they parted by conſent, and as good friends: whether this was a uſual cuſtom in this country, of parting with friends, I cannot ſay, but it ſeems to be very odd; for uſually, relations and friends that have a cordial affection for each other, part with grief and tears: by this Laban appears to be a carnal man, and had but little ſenſe of religion, as well as acted the hypocritical part.

℣. 28. And haſt not ſuffered me to kiſs my ſons and my daughters? &c.] Did not give him an opportunity of taking his farewell, which uſed to be done with a kiſs, as it is with us at this day: by his ſons he means his grandſons, and ſo the Targum of Jonathan, my daughters ſons; and by his daughters Rachel and Leah, and Dinah his granddaughter: thou haſt done fooliſhly in ſo doing; ſince, as he would have him believe, that he was both a loſer by this ſtep he took, and expoſed himſelf to danger danger, ſeeing it was in the power of Laban to do him hurt, as in the following verſe; but Jacob knew what he did, and that it was the wiſeſt part to follow the direction of God.

℣. 29. It is in the power of my hand to do you hurt, &c.] Jacob and his family, wives, children and ſervants, who were not able to ſtand againſt Laban and the men he brought with him; and ſo the Jeruſalem Targum paraphraſes it, "I have an "army and a multitude;" a large force which Jacob could not withſtand: or, my hand could have been for a God [h] to me: you could have no more eſcaped it, or got out of it, or withſtood me, than you could God himſelf: ſuch an opinion had he of his ſuperior power and ſtrength, and that this would have been the caſe: but the God of your father ſpoke unto me yeſternight; the night paſt, or the other night, ſome very little time ago, ſince he came from home at leaſt: by his father, he means either his father Iſaac, or his grandfather Abraham, whoſe God the Lord was, and who came to Laban and told him who he was. This ſerves to ſtrengthen the opinion that Laban was an idolater, and adhered to the gods of his grandfather Terah, from whom Abraham departed, and which Laban may have reſpect to; intimating that he abode by the religion of his anceſtors at a greater remove than Jacob's: however, though he does not call him his God, he had ſome awe and reverence of him, and was influenced by his ſpeech to him; ſaying, take heed that thou ſpeak not to Jacob either good or bad: this, though greatly to Jacob's honour, and againſt Laban's intereſt, yet his conſcience would not allow him to keep it a ſecret; though, doubtleſs, his view was to ſhew his ſuperior power to Jacob, had he not been reſtrained by Jacob's God.

℣. 30. And now though thou wouldeſt needs be gone, &c.] Or, in going wouldeſt go [i], was determined upon it, and in haſte to do it; becauſe thou ſore longedſt after thy father's houſe, or, deſiring didſt deſire it [k]; had a vehement deſire for it, which Laban ſignifies he ſhould not have oppoſed, if he had let him know his mind: but be it ſo that he had ever ſo great deſire to leave him and return to his father's houſe, yet, wherefore, ſays he, haſt thou ſtolen my gods? what reaſon had he for that? if he took away himſelf, his wives, his children, his goods, what buſineſs had he with his gods? he could not claim theſe as his, meaning the images or teraphim before mentioned, ℣ 19. by which it appears that Laban was ſome way or other guilty of idolatry in the uſe of theſe images; looking upon them as types, or repreſentations of God, as Joſephus [l] calls them, and worſhipped God in them, or along with them and by them; for he could never think they were truly and really gods, that could not preſerve themſelves from being ſtolen away, and that muſt be a poor god that a man may be robbed of.

℣. 31. And Jacob anſwered and ſaid to Laban, becauſe I was afraid, &c.] That he would have done all he could to have hindered him from going away himſelf; and not only ſo, but would have prevented his taking his daughters with him; and eſpecially would have detained his cattle; but of this laſt Jacob makes no mention, only of the former: for I ſaid; either within himſelf, or to his wives; peradventure thou wouldeſt take by force thy daughters from me; which of right belonged to him; for though they were Laban's daughters, they were Jacob's wives; and being given in marriage to him, he had a right unto them, and to take them with him; nor had Laban any right to detain them, which Jacob feared he would have attempted to have done, had he known his deſign; and this muſt have been done by force if done at all; for neither Jacob nor his wives would have agreed that they ſhould ſtay with Laban upon his departure: what Laban charges Jacob with, in going away with his wives, he himſelf would have done, namely, uſing force to them. Laban's charge was falſe, but there was much reaſon for Jacob's ſuſpicion.

℣. 32. With whomſoever thou findeſt thy gods, let him not live, &c.] This is the anſwer to his laſt queſtion, as what goes before is to his firſt: Jacob knew nothing of their being taken away by any, and thought himſelf ſafe in ſaying what he did, being confident that no one with him could ever take them; but it was too raſhly ſpoken by him, giving leave to Laban to put to death the perſon with whom they ſhould be found, or imprecating death on him by the hand of God; may he not live, but die, die immediately or before his time, as the Targum of Jonathan; hence the Jewiſh writers [m] obſerve, that Rachel died in childbed in conſequence of this imprecation, but without any foundation: before our brethren diſcern thou what is thine with me, and take it to thee: not only his gods but any of his goods or cattle, whatſoever he could find in his tents, or in his flocks, that were his property, he was welcome to take; and this he declared before the men that Laban brought with him, whom he alſo calls his brethren, being his kinsfolks and neighbours; and theſe he appeals to as witneſſes of his honeſty, integrity and fair dealing; being conſcious to himſelf that he had took nothing but what was his own: for Jacob knew not that Rachel had ſtolen them; the images or gods; or he would have been more careful of his expreſſion, in love and tenderneſs to his moſt beloved wife.

℣. 33. And Laban went into Jacob's tent, &c.] Into that firſt where he moſt ſuſpected they were, being taken not out of value for them, but contempt of them; and not Leah's tent next, whom next to Jacob he might ſuſpect of taking them out of veneration to them, becauſe her tent lay next: and into the two maid-ſervants tents; Bilhah and Zilpah; or the tent of them; for the word is ſingular, and perhaps they had but one tent for them both, which diſtinguiſhed them from the principal wives: but he found them not; in neither of theſe tents: then went he out of Leah's tent, and entered into Rachel's tent; which he went into laſt of all, as leaſt ſuſpecting her, being leſs addicted to the ſuperſtition and idolatry of his family than Leah and the maid ſervants: Aben Ezra thinks that he was twice in Leah's tent, and at the laſt time came out of that into Rachel's; and that Jacob's tent lay between Leah's and Rachel's. From this account it more clearly appears, that men and their wives had ſeparate tents or apartments; ſee ch. xxiv. 67.

℣. 34. Now Rachel had taken the images, &c.] Hearing her father enquire about them, and her huſband having given leave to ſearch for them, them, and to put to death whoever ſhould be found to have them, took them from the place where ſhe had before laid them: and put them into the camel's furniture; perhaps the camel's furniture ſhe rode on, and therefore it was in her tent, which ſome underſtand of the ſaddle on which ſhe rode; rather, it ſeems to be the ſaddle-cloth or houſing, in which ſhe might wrap the images and put them under her clothes; though ſome interpret it, of the ſtraw or litter of the camel, which is not ſo probable: and ſat upon them; the images which, if ſhe had the veneration for, as ſome ſuggeſt, ſhe would never have uſed in ſuch a manner: and Laban ſearched all the tent, but found them not; excepting the place where Rachel ſat; but Aben Ezra thinks, ſhe was not in the tent, but in ſome place without it, and if ſo, there needs no exception.

℣. 35. And ſhe ſaid to her father, &c.] As he approached nearer to her, having ſearched her tent all over: let it not diſpleaſe my Lord that I cannot riſe up before thee: ſhe addreſſes him with great honour and reſpect; calling him her lord, being her father, though an unkind one, and intreats him not to be diſpleaſed that ſhe did not riſe up and yield that obeiſance to him which was due from her to a father: for the cuſtom of women is upon me; her menſtrues; which before the law of Moſes, were reckoned a pollution, and ſuch perſons were not to be touched or come near unto, and every thing they ſat upon was unclean and not to be touched alſo; Lev. xv. 19—23. and he ſearched; all about her, and around her; but did not oblige her to get up, nor could he imagine that ever the images could be under her in ſuch circumſtances: but found not the images; and ſo left off ſearching; nor do we find that he ſearched the flock for any of his cattle there, knowing full well Jacob's honeſty and integrity.

℣. 36. And Jacob was wroth, and chode with Laban, &c.] Having anſwered Laban's queſtions to the ſilencing of him, and nothing of his, upon ſearch, being found with him; Jacob took heart and was of good courage and in high ſpirits, and in his turn was warm alſo; and perhaps might carry his paſſion a little too far, and is not to be excuſed from ſome degree of ſin and weakneſs; however, his reaſoning is ſtrong and nervous, and his expoſtulations very juſt and pathetic; whatever may be ſaid for the temper he was in, and the wrath and reſentment he ſhewed: and Jacob anſwered and ſaid to Laban; that whereas he had ſuggeſted that he had done a very bad thing; he aſks him, what is my treſpaſs? what is my ſin? what hainous offence have I committed? what law of God or man have I broke? that thou haſt ſo hotly purſued after me? with ſo much haſte and ſwiftneſs, and with ſuch a number of men, as if he came to take a thief, a robber, or a murderer.

℣. 37. Whereas thou haſt ſearched all my ſtuff, &c.] Or all my veſſels [n], or utenſils; whether houſhold-goods, or ſuch as were uſed with regard to the cattle, or armour for defence: what haſt thou found of all thy houſhold ſtuff? is there any veſſel or utenſil, or any thing whatever thou canſt claim as thine own? is there any thing that has been taken away from thee either by me or mine? ſet it here before my brethren, and thy brethren; publicly before them all, and let it be thoroughly enquired into whoſe property it was, and whether lawfully taken or no: that they may judge betwixt us both; Jacob was ſo conſcious to himſelf of his own uprightneſs, that he could ſafely leave any thing that might be diſputed, in arbitration with the very men that Laban had brought with him: it was ſo clear a caſe that he had not wronged him of any one thing.

℣. 38. This 20 years have I been with thee, &c.] So that he now muſt have been 97 years of age: thy ewes and thy ſhe-goats have not caſt their young; or very few of them: it was a rare caſe for any to be abortive, if ever: this, though owing to the bleſſing of God, was for Jacob's ſake, and, under God, to be aſcribed to his care and diligence in watching and keeping the flock, and doing every thing needful for them: and the rams of the flock have I not eaten: being content with meaner food, as lentile-pottage and the like; ſee the contrary of this in ſhepherds, Ezek. xxxiv. 3.

℣. 39. That which was torn of beaſts I brought not unto thee, &c.] To ſhew what had befallen it; that ſo it might appear he had one the leſs to account for to him: I bore the loſs of it; took it upon himſelf, as if it had been ſomewhat blameworthy in him, as the word uſed ſignifies; and ſo made ſatisfaction for it; which, how he did, when he had no wages, is difficult to ſay: he might have ſome perquiſites allowed him by Laban, though he had no ſettled ſalary; or he might lay himſelf under obligation to make it good whenever it was in his power, as follows: of mine hand didſt thou require it, whether ſtolen by day, or ſtolen by night; whether by men or beaſts; or by men in the daytime, and by beaſts in the night, as the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem diſtinguiſh: Laban was ſo rigorous and unjuſt as to require the reſtoration of them, or an equivalent for them at the hand of Jacob; all which were contrary to the law of God, Exod. xxii. 10—13.

℣. 40. Thus I was, &c.] In ſuch a ſituation, as well as in the following uncomfortable plight and condition: in the day the drought conſumed me, and the froſt by night: the violent heat in the daytime ſcorched him, and the ſevere froſts in the night pinched him: that is, in the different ſeaſons of the year, the heat of the day in the ſummer-time, and the cold of the night in the winter-time; for it cannot well be thought, that there ſhould be exceſſive heat in the day and ſharp froſts in the night, in the ſame ſeaſon of the year: it looks as if Laban did not allow Jacob the proper conveniencies of clothes, and of tents to ſecure him from the inclemency of the weather, which other ſhepherds uſually had: and my ſleep departed from mine eyes; through diligent care and watchfulneſs of the flocks in the night-ſeaſon, which on ſome occaſions were neceſſary; ſee Luk. ii. 8.

℣. 41. Thus have I been 20 years in thy houſe, &c.] Attended with theſe difficulties, inconveniencies and hardſhips: I ſerved thee 14 years for thy two daughters; Rachel and Leah; firſt 7 years for Rachel; and having Leah impoſed upon him inſtead of her, was obliged to ſerve 7 years more, which he did for her ſake; whereas he ought to have given them, and a dowry with them, to one who was heir to the land of Canaan, and not have exacted ſervitude of him: and 6 years for thy cattle; to have as many of them for his hire, as were produced from a flock of white ſheep, that were ſpeckled, ſpotted, or ring-ſtraked, or brown: and thou haſt changed my wages ten times; ſee the note on ℣. 7.

[n] כל כלי omnia vaſa mea, Montanus, Munſter, Vatablus, Druſius, Schmidt.

℣. 42. Except the God of my father, the God of Abraham, and the fear of Isaac had been with me, &c.] One and the same God is meant, who was the God of his father Isaac, and before him the God of Abraham, and now the fear of Isaac, whom he feared and served with reverence and godly fear, being at this present time a worshipper of him: now Jacob suggests, that unless his father's God had been on his side, and had protected and preserved him, as well as before blessed and prospered him, surely thou hadst sent me away now empty; coming with such force upon him, he would have stripped him of all he had, of his wives and children, and servants and cattle: God hath seen my affliction, and the labour of my hands; what hardships he endured in Laban's service, and what pains he took in feeding his flocks: and rebuked thee yesternight; in a dream, charging him to say neither good or evil to Jacob, which he himself had confessed, ℣. 29.

℣. 43. And Laban answered and said unto Jacob, &c.] Not denying the truth of what he had said, nor acknowledging any fault he had been guilty of, or asking forgiveness for it, though he seemed to be convicted in his own conscience of it: these daughters are my daughters; though thy wives, they are my own flesh and blood, and must be dear to me; so pretending strong natural affections for them: and these children are my children; his grand-children, for whom also he professed great love and affection: and these cattle are my cattle; or of my cattle, as the Targum of Jonathan, sprung from them, as indeed they did: and all that thou hast is mine; all this he observed in a bragging way, that it might be thought that he was generous in not insisting upon having it, but giving all back to Jacob again: and what can I do this day unto these my daughters, or unto their children which they have born? I cannot find in my heart to do them any hurt, or wrong them of any thing, and am therefore willing all should be theirs.

℣. 44. Now therefore, come thou, let us make a covenant, I and thou, &c.] Let us be good friends, and enter into an alliance for mutual safety, and make an agreement for each other's good. Laban perceiving that Jacob's God was with him, and blessed him, and made him prosperous, and protected him, was fearful, lest growing powerful, he should some time or other revenge himself on him or his, for his ill usage of him; and therefore was desirous of entering into a covenant of friendship with him: and let it be for a witness between me and thee; that all past differences are made up, and former quarrels subside, and every thing before amiss is forgiven and forgotten, and that for the future peace and good-will subsist; of which a covenant made between them would be a testimony.

℣. 45. And Jacob took a stone, and set it up for a pillar.] To shew his readiness to agree to the motion, he immediately took a large stone that lay upon the mount, and set it up on one end, to be a standing monument or memorial of the agreement now about to be made between them.

℣. 46. And Jacob said unto his brethren, gather stones, &c.] Not to his sons, as the Targum of Jonathan and Jarchi; these would not be called brethren, and were not fit, being young, to be employed in gathering large stones, as these must be, to erect a monument with; rather his servants, whom he employed in keeping his sheep under him, and might so call them, as he did the shepherds of Haran, ch. xxix. 4. and whom he could command to such service, and were most proper to be made use of in it; unless it can be thought the men Laban brought with him, whom Jacob before calls his brethren, ℣. 37. are meant; and then the words must be understood as spoken, not in an authoritative way, but as a request or direction, which was complied with: and they took stones, and made an heap; they fetched stones that lay about here and there, and laid them in order one upon another, and so made an heap of them: and they did eat there upon the heap; they made it like a table, and set their food on it, and eat off of it; or they eat by it [o], it being usual in making covenants to make a feast, at least to eat and drink together, in token of friendship and good-will. The Chinese [p] call friendship that is most firm and stable, and not to be rescinded, stony friendship: whether from a like custom with this, does not appear.

℣. 47. And Laban called it Jegar sahadutha, &c.] Which in the Syriac and Chaldee languages signifies an heap of witness; it being, as after observed, a witness of the covenant between Laban and Jacob: but Jacob called it Galeed; which in the Hebrew tongue signifies the same, an heap of witness, or an heap, the witness, for the same reason. Laban was a Syrian, as he sometimes is called, wherefore he used the Syrian language; Jacob was a descendant of Abraham the Hebrew, and he used the Hebrew language; and both, that their respective posterity might understand the meaning of the name; tho' these two are not so very different but Laban and Jacob could very well understand each other, as appears by their discourse together, these being but dialects of the same tongue.

℣. 48. And Laban said, this heap is a witness between me and thee this day.] A witness of the covenant now about to be made between them that day, and a witness against them should they break it: therefore was the name of it called Galeed; by Jacob, as before observed.

℣. 49. And Mizpah, &c.] Which being an Hebrew word, it looks as if the heap had also this name given it by Jacob, which signifies a watch or watch tower; though by what follows, it seems to be given by Laban, who could speak Hebrew as well as Syriac, or Chaldee: for he said, the Lord watch between me and thee, when we are absent one from another; or hid one from another [q]; when being at a distance, they could not see each other, or what one another did in agreement or disagreement with their present covenant: but he intimates, that the Lord sees and knows all things, and therefore imprecates that God would watch over them both, them and their actions, and bring upon them the evil or the good, according as their actions were, or as they broke or kept, this covenant.

℣. 50. If thou shalt afflict my daughters, &c.] In body or mind, by giving them hard blows, or ill words, and by withholding from them the necessaries of life, food and raiment, and the like: or if thou shalt take other wives besides my daughters; which also would be an affliction and vexation to them, see Lev. xviii. 18. Laban, though he

he had led Jacob into polygamy, and even obliged him to it, did not chuſe he ſhould go further into it, for the ſake of his daughters, to whom he profeſſes now much kindneſs and affection, though he had ſhown but little to them before; as well as talks, in a more religious ſtrain, than he had been uſed to do: no man is with us; the ſenſe is not that there were none with them at the preſent time, for the men or brethren that Laban brought with him were preſent; or that there were none fit to be witneſſes, becauſe theſe were kinſmen, for they are appealed to by Jacob as judges between them, ℣. 33. but this refers to time to come, and may be ſupplied thus, when no man be with us; when there is none to obſerve what is done by either of us, contrary to mutual agreement, and to report it to one or other: then ſee, take notice, and obſerve, God is witneſs betwixt me and thee; who is omniſcient and omnipreſent, ſees, obſerves all the actions of men, and deals with them accordingly; and ſo will be a witneſs for or againſt each of us, as we ſhall behave in obſerving, or not obſerving, the terms of our covenant.

℣. 51. And Laban ſaid to Jacob, &c.] Continued ſpeaking to him, as follows: behold this heap, behold this pillar which I have caſt betwixt me and thee; the heap of ſtones ſeems to be gathered and laid together by the brethren, and the pillar to be erected by Jacob; and yet Laban ſays of them both, that he caſt them, or erected them, they being done by his order, or with his conſent, as well as Jacob's; unleſs the pillar can be thought to deſign another beſide that which Jacob ſet up, and was like that, a ſingle ſtone at ſome little diſtance from the heap: but the Samaritan and Arabic verſions read, which thou haſt ſeen or ſet, &c. agreeable to ℣. 45.

℣. 52. This heap be witneſs, &c.] Agreeable to its name, which both he and Jacob gave unto it: and this pillar be witneſs; which was ſet up for the ſame purpoſe: that I will not paſs over this heap to thee, and that thou ſhalt not paſs over this heap, and this pillar unto me, for harm; not that theſe were to be the boundaries of their reſpective countries; for neither of them at preſent were poſſeſſed of lands that reached hither, if of any at all; nor that it would be a breach of covenant to paſs over, or by thoſe from one country into another, but ſo as to do, or with an intent to do, hurt to each other.

℣. 53. The God of Abraham, and the God of Nahor, the God of their father judge between us, &c.] And the father of theſe was Terah, ſo that the god of them was not the true God, and is not meant, at leaſt not as truly worſhipped; but the god or gods of Terah, Nahor and Abraham worſhipped whilſt idolaters, and Laban ſtill continued to do, though perhaps not in ſo groſs a manner as ſome did: and Jacob ſwore by the fear of his father Iſaac; that is, by the true God his father Iſaac feared, ſerved and worſhipped: or but Jacob[r], &c. which ſeems plainly to ſuggeſt, that the God whom Laban called upon to be a judge between them, ſhould they break covenant, and ſwore by, and he whom Jacob ſwore by were different; each ſwore by their own deities.

℣. 54. Then Jacob offered ſacrifice upon the mount, &c.] On mount Gilead, not in a religious way, in which he could not join with Laban, or admit him to it; but in a civil way he ſlew a ſlaughter[s], or rather made one; that is, as Jarchi explains it, he ſlew cattle for a feaſt, as it was uſual to make feaſts for the ſeveral parties concerned in covenant, ſee ch. xxvi. 30: and called his brethren to eat bread; the men that came with Laban, and him alſo, theſe he invited to his feaſt, for all ſorts of food is called bread: and they did eat bread, and tarried all night in the mount; this affair between Laban and Jacob had took up the whole day, at evening they feaſted together upon the covenant being made, and then tarried all night to take their reſt.

℣. 55. And early in the morning Laban roſe up, &c.] In order to prepare for, and ſet forward on his journey home: and kiſſed his ſons and his daughters; Jacob and his ſons, who were his grandſons, and his daughters Rachel and Leah, with Dinah his grand-daughter, as was the cuſtom of relations and friends in thoſe countries and times, at parting: and bleſſed them; wiſhed all happineſs to them: and Laban departed, and returned unto his place; to the city of Haran, where he dwelt; and after this we hear no more of him, nor of any tranſaction of his in life, or when and where he died, only his name is once mentioned by Jacob, ch. xxxii. 4.

CHAP. XXXII.

THIS chapter informs us of Jacob's proceeding on in his journey, and of his being met and guarded by an hoſt of angels, ℣. 1, 2. of his ſending meſſengers to his brother Eſau, acquainting him with his increaſe, and deſiring his favour and good-will, ℣. 3, 4, 5. who return and report to him, that Eſau was coming to him with 400 men, which put him into a panic; and after deviſing ways and means for the ſecurity of himſelf, and thoſe with him, at leaſt a part, if not the whole, ℣. 6, 7, 8. then follows a prayer of his to God, expreſſing his unworthineſs of mercies, and his ſenſe of them, imploring deliverance from his brother, and putting the Lord in mind of his promiſes, ℣. 9—12. after which we have an account of the wiſe methods he took for the ſafety of himſelf and family, by ſending a preſent to his brother, dividing thoſe who had the charge of it into ſeparate companies, and directing them to move at a proper diſtance from each other, he, his wives and children following after, ℣. 13—23. when they were over the brook Jabbok, he ſtopped, and being alone, the Son of God in an human form appeared to him, and wreſtled with him, with whom Jacob prevailed, and got the bleſſing, and hence had the name of Iſrael, ℣. 24—28. and though he could not get his name, he perceived it was a divine perſon he had wreſtled with, and therefore called the name of the place Penuel, ℣. 29—31. the hollow of his thigh being touched by him, with whom he wreſtled, which put it out of joint, he halted as he went over Penuel, in commemoration of which the children of Iſrael eat not of that part of the thigh, ℣. 31, 32.

℣. 1. And Jacob went on his way, &c.] From Gilead towards the land of Canaan: and the angels of God met him; to comfort and help him, to protect and defend him, to keep him in all his ways, that nothing hurt him, Pſ. xci. 11, 12. theſe are miniſtring ſpirits ſent forth by God, to miniſter to his people the heirs of ſalvation; and ſuch an one Jacob was.

℣. 2. And when Jacob ſaw them, &c.] Theſe appeared in a viſible form, moſt probably human, and in the habit, and with the accoutrements of ſoldiers, and therefore afterwards called an hoſt or army. Aben Ezra thinks, that Jacob alone ſaw them, as Eliſha firſt ſaw the hoſt of angels before the young man did that was with him, 2 Kings vi. 17: he ſaid, this is God's hoſt; or army, hence he is often called the Lord of hoſts; angels have this name from their number, order, ſtrength and military exploits they perform: and he called the name of the place Mahanaim; which ſignifies two hoſts or armies; either his own family and company making one, and the angels another, as Aben Ezra obſerves; or they were the angels, who very probably appeared in two companies, or as two armies, and one went on one ſide of Jacob and his family, and the other on the other ſide; or the one went before him, and the other behind him; the latter to ſecure him from any inſult of Laban, ſhould he purſue after him, and diſtreſs him in the rear, and the former to protect him from Eſau, near whoſe country Jacob now was, and of whom he was in ſome fear and danger; thus ſeaſonably did God appear for him. The Jewiſh writers [t] ſay, the hoſt of God is 60,000, and that the Shekinah, or Divine Majeſty never dwells among leſs, and that Mahanaim, or two hoſts, are 120,000; there was afterwards a city of this name near this place, which very likely was ſo called in memory of this appearance, Joſh. xxi. 38. and there ſeems to be an alluſion to it in the account of the church, Cant. vi. 13. it was in the land of Gilead, and tribe of Gad, 44 miles from Jeruſalem to the ſouth-eaſt [u].

℣. 3. And Jacob ſent meſſengers before him unto Eſau his brother, &c.] Or angels; not angels ſimply, as Jarchi, for theſe were not under the command, and in the power of Jacob to ſend, nor would they have needed any inſtruction from him afterwards given, but theſe were ſome of his own ſervants. Eſau it ſeems was removed from his father's houſe, and was poſſeſſed of a country after mentioned, called from his name; and which Aben Ezra ſays lay between Haran and the land of Iſrael; but if it did not directly lie in the road of Jacob, yet as it was near him, he did not chuſe to paſs by without ſeeing his brother; and therefore ſent meſſengers to inform him of his coming, and by whom he might learn in what temper and diſpoſition of mind he was towards him: unto the land of Seir, the country of Edom; which had its firſt name from Seir the Horite; and Eſau having married into his family, came into the poſſeſſion of it, by virtue of that marriage; or rather he and his ſons drove out the Horites the ancient poſſeſſors of it, and took it to themſelves, from whom it was afterwards called Edom, a name of Eſau, which he had from the red pottage he ſold his birth-right for to his brother Jacob, ch. xxv. 30. perhaps it is here called Edom by an anticipation, not having as yet that name, though it had in Moſes's time, when this hiſtory was wrote; ſee ch. xxxvi. 18, 20, 24. Deut. ii. 12, 22.

℣. 4. And he commanded them, &c.] Being his ſervants: thus ſhall ye ſpeak unto my lord Eſau; being not only a lord of a country, but his eldeſt brother, and whom he choſe to beſpeak in this manner, to ſoften his mind, and incline it to him; and that he might ſee he did not pique himſelf upon the birth-right and bleſſing he had obtained; and as if theſe were forgotten by him, though hereby he does not give up his right in them: thy ſervant Jacob ſaith thus; expreſſing great humility and modeſty; for though his father Iſaac by his bleſſing had made him lord over Eſau, the time was not come for this to take place, his father not being yet dead; and beſides, was to have its accompliſhment not in his own perſon, but in his poſterity: I have ſojourned with Laban, and ſtayed there until now; had been a ſojourner and a ſervant in Laban's family for 20 years paſt, and had had an hard maſter, and therefore could not be the object of his brother's envy, but rather of his pity and compaſſion.

℣. 5. And I have oxen, and aſſes, flocks, and men-ſervants, and women-ſervants, &c.] This he would have ſaid, leſt he ſhould think he was come to aſk any thing of him, and put himſelf and his family upon him; and leſt he ſhould treat him with contempt, as a poor mean beggarly creature, and be aſhamed of the relation he ſtood in to him: and I have ſent to tell my lord; of his coming, and of his ſtate and circumſtances: that I may find grace in thy ſight; ſhare in his good-will, which was all he wanted, and that friendſhip, harmony and brotherly love might ſubſiſt between them, which he was very deſirous of.

℣. 6. And the meſſengers returned to Jacob, &c.] After they had delivered their meſſage, with the anſwer they brought back: ſaying, we came to thy brother Eſau; which though not expreſſed, is implied in theſe words, and is ſtill more manifeſt by what follows: and alſo he cometh to meet thee; and pay a friendly viſit as they ſuppoſed: and 400 men with him; partly to ſhew his grandeur, and partly out of reſpect to Jacob, and to do honour to him; though ſome think this was done with an ill deſign upon him, and which indeed ſeems probable; and it is certain Jacob ſo underſtood it, as is evident by the diſtreſs it gave him, and by the methods he took for his ſafety, and by the gracious appearance of God unto him, and the ſtrength he gave him on this occaſion, not only to pray to and wreſtle with him, but to prevail both with God and men, as the following account ſhews. The Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem call theſe 400 men leaders or generals of armies, which is not probable; they were moſt likely Eſau's ſubjects, his tenants and ſervants.

℣. 7. Then Jacob was greatly afraid and diſtreſſed, &c.] Knowing what he had done to his brother in getting the birth-right and bleſſing from him, and what an enmity he had conceived in his mind againſt him on that account, and remembering what he had ſaid he would do to him; and therefore might fear that all his profeſſions of reſpect to him were craftily and cunningly made to take him off of his guard, and that he might the more eaſily fall into his hands, and eſpecially when he heard there were 400 men with him; this ſtruck a terror into him, and made him ſuſpicious of an ill deſign againſt him; though herein Jacob betrayed much weakneſs and want of faith, when God had promiſed again and again that he would be be with him, and keep him, and protect him, and return him safe to the land of Canaan; and when he had just had such an appearance of angels to be his helpers, guardians and protectors: and he divided the people that was with him, and the flocks, and the herds, and the camels into two bands; some of his servants and shepherds, with a part of the flocks and herds, in one band or company, and some with the rest of them, and the camels, and his wives, and his children in the other.

℣. 8. And said, if Esau come to one company, and smite it, &c.] The first, which perhaps consisted only of some servants, with a part of his cattle; so that if Esau should come in an hostile manner, and fall upon that, and slay the servants, and take the cattle as a booty: then the other company which is left, shall escape; by flight, in which most probably were he himself, his wives and children, and the camels to carry them off, who would have notice by what should happen to the first band; but one would think, that notwithstanding all this precaution, and wise methods taken, there could be little expectation of escaping the hands of Esau, if he came out on such an ill design; for whither could they flee? or how could they hope to get out of the reach of 400 men pursuing after them, unless it could be thought, or might be hoped, that the first company falling into his hands, and the revenge on them, and the plunder of them, would satiate him, and he would proceed no further? but Jacob did not trust to these methods he concerted, but betakes himself to God in prayer, as follows.

℣. 9. And Jacob said, O God of my father Abraham, and God of my father Isaac, &c.] In this distress he does not consult the Teraphim Rachel had taken from her father; nor does he call upon the hosts of angels that had just appeared to him, to help, protect and guard him; but to God only, the God of his fathers, who had promised great things to them, and had done great things for them; who was their God in covenant, as he was his also, tho' he makes no mention of it, and who was heir of the promises made to them, the birth-right and blessing being entailed upon him: the Lord which saidst unto me, return unto thy country, and to thy kindred; the same God had appeared to him, when in Laban's house, and bid him return to his own country, and father's house; in obedience to which command he was now on his journey thither, and being in the way of his duty, and acting according to the will of God, though he had no dependance on, nor put any confidence in any thing done by him, as appears by what follows; yet he hoped God of his grace and goodness would have a regard unto him, as he was doing what he was directed to by him, and especially since he had made the following gracious promise: and I will deal well with thee; bestow good things on thee, both temporal and spiritual, and among the former, preservation from evils and dangers is included.

℣. 10. I am not worthy of the least of all thy mercies, &c.] Or of any of them, according to his humble sense of things his mind was now impressed with; he was not worthy of the least mercy and favour that had been bestowed upon him; not even of any temporal mercy, and much less of any spiritual one, and therefore did not expect any from the hands of God, on account of any merit of his own: or I am less than all thy mercies [w]; Jacob had had many mercies and favours bestowed upon him by the Lord, which he was sensible of, and thankful for, notwithstanding all the ill usage and hard treatment he had met with in Laban's house, and those were very great ones; he was not worthy of all, nor any of them; he was not deserving of the least of them, as our version truly gives the sense of the words: and of all the truth which thou hast shewed unto thy servant; in performing promises made to him; grace, mercy and goodness are seen in making promises, and truth and faithfulness in the performance of them; Jacob had had a rich experience of both, and was deeply affected therewith, and which made him humble before God: for with my staff I passed over this Jordan; the river Jordan, near to which he now was, or at least had it in view, either with the eyes of his body, or his mind; this river he passed over when he went to Haran with his staff in his hand, and that only, which was either a shepherd's staff, or a travelling one, the latter most likely: he passed alone over it, as Onkelos and Jonathan add by way of illustration; unaccompanied by any, having no friend with him, nor servant to attend him. Jarchi's paraphrase is, "there was "not with me neither silver nor gold, nor cattle, "but my staff only." And now I am become two bands; into which he had now divided his wives, children, servants and cattle; this he mentions, to observe the great goodness of God to him, and the large increase he had made him, and how different his circumstances now were, to what they were when he was upon this spot, or thereabout, 20 years ago.

℣. 11. Deliver me, I pray thee, from the hand of my brother, from the hand of Esau, &c.] For though his brother, it was his brother Esau, that had formerly vowed revenge upon him, and had determined to kill him, and he knew not but that he was still of the same mind; and now having an opportunity, and in his power to do it, being accompanied with 400 men, he feared he would attempt it; and therefore intreats the Lord, who was greater than he, to deliver him from falling into his hands, and being destroyed by him: for I fear him, lest he will come and smite me, and the mother with the children; for whom Jacob seems to be more concerned than for himself; the phrase denotes the utter destruction of his family, and the cruelty and inhumanity that would be exercised therein; which shows what an opinion he had of his brother, and of his savage disposition.

℣. 12. And thou saidst, I will surely do thee good, &c.] All kind of good, most certainly and constantly; so Jacob rightly interpreted the promise, I will be with thee, ch. xxxi. 3. for the promise of God's presence includes and secures all needful good to his people; and from this general promise Jacob draws an argument for a special and particular good, the preservation of him and his family, he was now pleading for; and the rather he might hope to succeed, since the following promise was also made him: and make thy seed as the sand of the sea, which cannot be numbred for multitude; which could not be fulfilled, if he and his family were cut off at once, as he feared; but God is faithful who has promised.

℣. 13. And he lodged there that same night, &c.] At Mahanaim, or some place near it: and took of that which came to his hand; not what came next to hand, for what he did was with great deliberation, judgment and prudence; wherefore the phrase signifies what he was possessed of, or was in his power, as Jarchi rightly interprets it: a present for

Eſau his brother; in order to pacify him, gain his good-will, and avert his wrath and diſpleaſure, ſee Prov. xviii. 16. though Jacob had prayed to God, committed himſelf and family to him, and left all with him, yet he thought it proper to make uſe of all prudential means and methods for his ſafety: God frequently works in and by means made uſe of: the account of the preſent follows.

℣. 14. 200 ſhe-goats, and 20 he-goats, 200 ewes, and 20 rams, &c.] And it ſeems this proportion of 1 he-goat to 10 ſhe-goats, and of 1 ram to 10 ewes, is a proper one, and what has been ſo judged in other times and countries [x].

℣. 15. Thirty milch camels with their colts, &c.] Milch camels were in great eſteem in the eaſtern countries; their milk being, as Ariſtotle [y] and Pliny [z] ſay, the ſweeteſt of all milk: 40 kine and 10 bulls; 1 bull to 10 cows; the ſame proportion as in the goats and rams: 20 ſhe-aſſes and 10 foals; and ſuppoſing 30 colts belonging to the camels; the preſent conſiſted of 580 head of cattle: a large number to ſpare out of his flocks and herds, that he had acquired in 6 years time; and ſhewed a generous diſpoſition as well as prudence, to part with ſo much in order to ſecure the reſt.

℣. 16. And he delivered them into the hand of his ſervants, &c.] To preſent them to Eſau as from him: every drove by themſelves; there ſeems to have been 3 droves, ſee ℣. 19. very probably the 220 goats, male and female, were in the firſt drove; and the 220 ſheep, ewes, and rams were in the 2d drove; and the 30 camels, with their colts, and the 50 cows and bulls, with the 20 ſhe-aſſes, and 10 foals; which made in all 140, were in the 3d drove: though Aben Ezra thinks there were 5 droves; nor is it improbable, the goats in one drove, the ſheep in another, the camels and colts in a 3d, and the kine and bulls might make a 4th, and the aſſes with their foals a fifth: and ſaith unto his ſervants, paſs over before me; over the brook Jabbok, ℣. 22. a day's journey or leſs before him, as Jarchi obſerves, or rather a night's journey, as ſeems by the context; for theſe were ſent out at evening, and Jacob ſtaid behind all night, as appears by what follows: and put a ſpace betwixt drove and drove; his meaning is, that they ſhould not follow each other cloſely; but that there ſhould be a conſiderable diſtance between them, and which he would have them careful to keep: his view in this was, partly to prolong time, Eſau ſtopping, as he ſuppoſed he would, at each drove, and aſking queſtions of the men; and partly that he might the better and more diſtinctly obſerve the largeneſs of his preſent, and his munificence in it, and ſo, both, by the preſent, and by the frequent repetition of his ſubmiſſion to him as his ſervant, his wrath, if he came out in it, would be gradually abated, and before he came to him he would be in a diſpoſition to receive him with ſome marks of affection and kindneſs, as he did.

℣. 17. And he commanded the foremoſt, &c.] He that had the care of the firſt drove, which conſiſted of goats, male and female: ſaying, when Eſau my brother meeteth thee; as there was reaſon to believe he would, being on the road, and him firſt of all, being the foremoſt: and aſketh thee, ſaying, what art thou? that is, whoſe ſervant art thou? to whom doſt thou belong? and whither goeſt thou? what place art thou travelling to? and whoſe are theſe before thee? whoſe are theſe goats? to whom do they belong thou art driving? for in driving and travelling on the road, ſheep and goats went before thoſe that had the care of them; whereas in leading out to paſtures the ſhepherds went before, and the flocks followed, Joh. x. 4.

℣. 18. Then thou ſhalt ſay, they be thy ſervant Jacob's, &c.] Both the goats before them, and they themſelves that had the care of them, belonged to Jacob, who directed them to ſpeak of him to Eſau as his ſervant: it is a preſent ſent unto my lord Eſau; which is the anſwer to the ſecond queſtion: and behold alſo he is behind us: that is Jacob: this they were bid to tell, leſt he ſhould think that Jacob was afraid of him, and was gone another way; but that he was coming to pay a viſit to him, and might expect ſhortly to ſee him, which would prepare his mind how to behave towards him.

℣. 19. And ſo commanded he the ſecond and third, &c.] Thoſe who had the care of the 2d and 3d droves, he ordered them to ſay the ſame things, and in the ſame words as he had the firſt: and all that followed the droves; either all that were with the principal driver; that if any of them ſhould happen to be interrogated firſt, they might know what to anſwer; or thoſe that followed the other droves, beſides the 3 mentioned, which countenances Aben Ezra's notion of five droves, before obſerved: ſaying, on this manner ſhall you ſpeak to Eſau, when you find him; that is, when they met him and perceived it was he that put queſtions to them.

℣. 20. And ſay ye moreover, behold, thy ſervant Jacob is behind us: this is repeated to impreſs it upon their minds, that they might be careful of all things, not to forget that, it being a point of great importance; for the preſent, would have ſignified nothing, if Jacob had not appeared in perſon; Eſau would have thought himſelf, at beſt, but ſlighted, as if he was unworthy of a viſit from him, and of converſation with him: for he ſaid; that is, Jacob, or had ſaid [a], in his heart, within himſelf, as might be ſuppoſed from the whole of his conduct; for what follows are the words of Moſes the hiſtorian, as Aben Ezra obſerves, and not of Jacob to his ſervants, nor of them to Eſau: I will appeaſe him with the preſent that goeth before me, and afterwards I will ſee his face: he hoped the preſent would produce the deſired effect; that it would turn away his wrath from him, and pacify him; and then he ſhould be able to appear before him, and ſee his face with pleaſure: or, I will expiate his face [b], as ſome render the words, or make him propitious and favourable; or cover his face, as Aben Ezra interprets it, that is, cauſe him to hide his wrath and reſentment, that it ſhall not appear; or cauſe his fury to ceaſe, as Jarchi; or remove his anger, wrath, and diſpleaſure, as Ben Melech; all which our verſion takes in, by rendering it, appeaſe him; and then, peradventure he will accept of me: receive him with marks of tenderneſs and affection, and in a very honourable and reſpectable manner.

℣. 21. So went the preſent over before him, &c.] Over the brook Jabbok, after mentioned, the night before Jacob did: and himſelf lodged that night in the company; or in the camp [c], either in the place called Mahanaim, from the hoſts or crowds of angels ſeen there; or rather in his own camp, his family mily and ſervants; or, as Aben Ezra diſtinguiſhes, in the camp with his ſervants, and not in his tent, leſt his brother ſhould come and ſmite him; and ſo Nachmanides.

℣. 22. And he roſe up that night, &c.] In the middle of it, for it was long before break of day, as appears from ℣. 24. and took his two wives, Rachel and Leah, and his two women-ſervants, Bilhah and Zilpah, or, his two concubines, as the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan; which diſtinguiſhes them from other women-ſervants or maid-ſervants, of which, no doubt, he had many: and his eleven ſons; together with Dinah his daughter, though not mentioned, being the only female child, and a little one: and paſſed over the ford Jabbok; over that river at a place of it where it was fordable, or where there was a ford or paſſage: this was a river that took its riſe from the mountains of Arabia, was the border of the Ammonites, waſhed the city Rabba, and ran between Philadelphia and Geraſa, and came into the river Jordan, at ſome little diſtance from the ſea of Geneſaret or Galilee [d], about 3 or 4 miles from it.

℣. 23. And he took them, and ſent them over the brook, &c.] His wives and children, under the care of ſome of his ſervants: and ſent over that he had: all that belonged to him, his ſervants and his cattle or goods.

℣. 24. And Jacob was left alone, &c.] On the other ſide of Jabbok, his family and cattle having paſſed over it; and this ſolitude he choſe, in order to ſpend ſome time in prayer to God for the ſafety of him and his: and there wreſtled a man with him; not a phantaſm or ſpectre, as Joſephus [e] calls him; nor was this a mere viſionary repreſentation of a man, to the imagination of Jacob; or done in the viſion of prophecy, as Maimonides [f]; but it was ſomething real, corporeal, and viſible: the Targum of Jonathan ſays, it was an angel in the likeneſs of a man, and calls him Michael, which is not amiſs, ſince he is expreſsly called an angel, Hoſ. xii. 4. and if Michael the increated angel is meant, it is moſt true; for not a created angel is deſigned, but a divine perſon, as appears from Jacob's deſiring to be bleſſed by him; and beſides, being expreſsly called God, ℣. 28. 30. and was, no doubt, the ſon of God in an human form; who frequently appeared in it as a token and pledge of his future incarnation: and this wreſtling was real and corporeal on the part of both; the man took hold of Jacob, and he took hold of the man, and they ſtrove and ſtruggled together for victory as wreſtlers do; and on Jacob's part it was alſo mental and ſpiritual, and ſignified his fervent and importunate ſtriving with God in prayer; or at leaſt it was attended with earneſt and importunate ſupplications; ſee Hoſ. xii. 4. and this continued until the breaking of the day: how long this conflict laſted is not certain, perhaps not long; ſince after Jacob roſe in the night he had a great deal of buſineſs to do, and did it before this affair happened; as ſending his wives, children, ſervants and cattle over the brook: however this may denote, that in the preſent ſtate or night of darkneſs, wreſtling in prayer with God muſt be continued, until the perfect ſtate commences, when the everlaſting day of glory will break.

℣. 25. And when he ſaw that he prevailed not againſt him, &c.] That he, the man, or the ſon of God in the form of man, prevailed not againſt Jacob, by caſting him to the ground, or cauſing him to deſiſt and leave off wreſtling with him; not becauſe he could not, but becauſe he would not, being willing to encourage the faith of Jacob againſt future trials and exerciſes, and eſpecially under his preſent one: beſides, ſuch were the promiſes that this divine perſon knew, were made to Jacob, and ſo ſtrong was Jacob's faith at this time in pleading thoſe promiſes in prayer to God, that he could not do otherwiſe, conſiſtent with the purpoſes and promiſes of God, than ſuffer himſelf to be prevailed over by him: he touched the hollow of his thigh; the hollow part of the thigh or the groin, or the hollow place in which the thigh bone moves, and is ſaid to have the form of the hollow of a man's hand recurved: and the hollow of Jacob's thigh was out of joint, as he wreſtled with him; that is, the huckle bone, or the thigh bone, was moved out of the hollow place in which it was: this was done to let Jacob know that the perſon he wreſtled with was ſuperior to him, and could eaſily have overcome him, and obliged him to ceaſe wreſtling with him if he would; and that the victory he got over him was not by his own ſtrength, but by divine aſſiſtance, and by the ſufferance of the perſon himſelf he wreſtled with; ſo that he had nothing to boaſt of: and this ſhews the truth and reality of this conflict; that it was not viſionary but a real fact, as well as it teaches the weakneſs and infirmities of the ſaints, that attend them in their ſpiritual conflicts. The word uſed in this and the preceding verſe comes from a root which ſignifies duſt; it being uſual with wreſtlers to raiſe up the duſt with their feet when they ſtrive together, as Kimchi [g] remarks, as well as it was common with the ancients to wreſtle in duſt and ſand [h]; and hence the phraſe deſcendere in arenam, combatants were called arenarii.

℣. 26. And he ſaid, let me go, for the day breaketh, &c.] This was ſaid that he might ſeem to be a man that was deſirous of going about his buſineſs, as men do early in the morning; though the true reaſon, perhaps was, that his form might not be more diſtinctly ſeen by Jacob, and much leſs by any other perſon: and he ſaid, I will not let thee go except thou bleſs me; for by his touching his thigh, and the effect of that, he perceived, he was more than a man, even a divine perſon, and therefore inſiſted upon being bleſſed by him: thus faith in prayer lays hold on God, and will not let him go without leaving the bleſſing it is pleading for; which ſhews the great ſtrength of faith, and the efficacy of the prayer of faith with God; ſee Exod. xxxii. 10. Iſ. lxii. 7. Jam. v. 15, 16.

℣. 27. And he ſaid unto him, what is thy name? &c.] Which queſtion is put, not as being ignorant of it, but in order to take occaſion from it, and the change of it, to ſhew that he had granted his requeſt, and had bleſſed him, and would yet more and more: and he ſaid, Jacob; the name given him at his birth, and by which he had always been called, and therefore tells it him at once, not ſtaying to aſk the reaſon of the queſtion.

℣. 28. And he ſaid, thy name ſhall be called no more Jacob, but Iſrael, &c.] That is, not Jacob only, but Iſrael alſo, as Ben Melech interprets it, or the one as well as the other; or the one rather and more frequently than the other: for certain it is, that he is often after this called Jacob, and his poſterity alſo, the ſeed of Jacob, though more commonly monly Iſrael, and Iſraelites: for as a prince haſt thou power with God and with men, and haſt prevailed: this is given as a reaſon of his name Iſrael, which ſignifies a prince of God, or one who as a prince prevails with God; which confutes all other etymologies of the name, as the upright one of God, the man that ſees God, or any other: he now prevailed with God in prayer, and by faith got the bleſſing, as he had prevailed before with Eſau and Laban, and got the better of them, and ſo would again of the former: hence ſome render the word, and ſhalt prevail [i]: and indeed this tranſaction was deſigned to fortify Jacob againſt the fear of his brother Eſau; and from whence he might reaſonably conclude, that if he had power with God, and prevailed to obtain what he deſired of him, he would much more be able to prevail over his brother, and even over all that ſhould riſe up againſt him, and oppoſe him; and this may not only be prophetical of what ſhould hereafter be fulfilled in the perſon of Jacob, but in his poſterity in future times, who ſhould prevail over their enemies, and enjoy all good things by the favour of God: for it may be rendered, thou haſt behaved like a prince with God, and with men, or, over men thou ſhalt prevail.

℣. 29. And Jacob aſked him, and ſaid, tell me, I pray thee, thy name, &c.] Being aſked his own name, and told it, and having another given him more ſignificative and expreſſive, he is emboldened to aſk the perſon that wreſtled with him, what was his name; Exod. iii. 13. for Jacob knew that he was God, as appears by his earneſt deſire to be bleſſed by him; and he knew it by the declaration juſt made, that he had power with God as a prince; but he hoped to have ſome name, taken by him from the place or circumſtance of things in which he was, whereby he might the better remember this affair; as he was pleaſed to call himſelf the God of Bethel, from his appearance to Jacob there, ch. xxxi. 13. therefore ſince he did not chuſe to give him his name, Jacob himſelf impoſed one on the place afterwards, as a memorial of God being ſeen by him there: and he ſaid, wherefore is it, that thou doſt aſk after my name? which is both a reproof of his curioſity, and a denial of his requeſt; ſignifying that he had no need to put that queſtion, it was enough for him that he had got the bleſſing, and which he confirms: and he bleſſed him there; in the ſame place, as the Vulgate Latin verſion, where he had been wreſtling with him, as he was taking his leave of him; for this was a farewell bleſſing, and a confirmation of that he had received, through the name of Iſrael being given him.

℣. 30. And Jacob called the name of the place Peniel, &c.] In ℣. 31. Penuel, which ſignifies the face of God, or God hath looked upon me, or hath had reſpect to me: there was afterwards a city built here, called by the ſame name; ſee Judg. viii. 8. 1 Kings xii. 25. it is ſaid [k] to be 4 miles from Mahanaim; the reaſon of it follows: for I have ſeen God face to face; it may be obſerved, that in wreſtling, men are face to face, and in this poſition were Jacob and the man that wreſtled with him; which he ſeems to have reſpect unto, as well as to the familiarity and intimate communion he was admitted to: and my life is preſerved; though he had wreſtled with one ſo vaſtly ſuperior to himſelf, who could have eaſily cruſhed this worm Jacob to pieces, as he is ſometimes called; and tho' he had had ſuch a ſight of God, as face to face, referring, as is thought, to a notion that obtained early, even among good men, that upon ſight of God a man inſtantly died; though we have no example of that kind: but perhaps he obſerved this for his encouragement; that whereas he had met with God himſelf, and wreſtled with him in the form of a man, and yet was preſerved, he doubted not, that when he ſhould meet with his brother and debate matters with him, he ſhould be ſafe and unhurt.

℣. 31. And as he paſſed over Penuel, the ſun roſe upon him, &c.] It was break of day when the angel deſired to be let go, and by that time the parley held between them, and they parted, the ſun was riſing; and as Jacob went on it ſhone upon him, as a token of the good-will and favour of God to him, and as an emblem of the ſun of righteouſneſs ariſing on him with healing in his wings, Mal. iv. 2. and he halted upon his thigh; it being out of joint, of which he became more ſenſible when he came to walk upon it; and beſides, his attention to the angel that was with him cauſed him not ſo much to perceive it until he had departed from him: ſome think he went limping all his days; others, that he was healed immediately by the angel before he came to Eſau, but of either there is no proof.

℣. 32. Therefore the children of Iſrael eat not of the ſinew which ſhrank, &c.] Which was contracted by the touch of the angel, and by which it was weakened and benumbed; or the ſinew of the part that was out of joint, the ſinew or tendon that keeps the thigh bone in the ſocket, together with the fleſh that covered it, or the muſcle in which it is; or that ſinew, as others, that contracts itſelf and gives motion to the thigh-bone to work itſelf: of this the Iſraelites eat not: which is upon the hollow of the thigh; or the cap of it: unto this day; when Moſes wrote this hiſtory: becauſe the angel touched the hollow of Jacob's thigh, in the ſinew that ſhrank; and very ſuperſtitiouſly do they abſtain from it unto this day: they have a whole chapter in one of their treatiſes in the Miſnah [l], giving rules concerning it; where it is forbidden to eat of it, whether in the land of Iſrael or out of it; whether in common food or ſacrifices, even in burnt-offerings it was to be taken out; and whether in cattle of the houſe or of the field; and both in the right and left thigh, but not in fowls, becauſe they have no hollow, and butchers are not to be truſted; and whoever eats of it to the quantity of an olive is to be beaten with forty ſtripes; and becauſe the Jews are more ignorant of this nerve, as Mercer obſerves, therefore they abſtain from all nerves in the poſteriors of animals. Leo of Modena ſays [m], of what beaſt ſoever they eat, they are very careful to take away all the fat and the ſinew which ſhrunk: and hence it is, that in many places in Italy, and eſpecially in Germany, they eat not at all of the hinder quarters of ox, lamb, or goat; becauſe there is in thoſe parts of the beaſt, both very much fat, and alſo the forbidden ſinew; and it aſketh ſo much care to cleanſe the parts of theſe, that there are few that are able to do it, or dare to undertake it.

CHAP. XXXIII.

IN this chapter we find Esau meeting Jacob in a friendly manner, contrary to his fears and expectation, having set his family in order in case of the worst, ℣. 1—4. putting questions to Jacob concerning the women and children with him, who make their obeisance to him as Jacob had done before, ℣. 5, 6, 7. and concerning the drove he met, which was a present to him, and which he refused at first to take, but at the urgency of Jacob accepted of it, ℣. 8—11. proposing to travel with him, unto which Jacob desired to be excused, he, with the women, children, and flocks, not being able to keep pace with him, ℣. 12, 13, 14. and to leave some of his men with him to guard him, which Jacob judged unnecessary, upon which they parted friendly, ℣. 15, 16. and the chapter is concluded with an account of Jacob's journey, first to Succoth, then to Shalem, where he pitched his tent, bought a field and built an altar, ℣. 17—20.

℣. 1. And Jacob lifted up his eyes, and looked, &c.] After he had passed over the brook, and was come to his wives and children; which was done either accidentally or on purpose, to see if he could espy his brother coming: some think this denotes his chearfulness and courage, and that he was now not distressed and dejected, as he had been before: and behold Esau came, and with him 400 men; see ch. xxxii. 6. and he divided the children unto Leah, and unto Rachel, and unto the two hand-maids; some think he made 4 divisions of them; Leah and her children, Rachel and her son, Bilhah and hers, and Zilpah and hers: but others are of opinion, there were but 3, the 2 hand-maids and their children in one division, Leah and her children in another, and Rachel and her son in the third; which seems to be confirmed in the following verse, though the word for divide, signifies, to halve or divide into two parts; according to which, the division then must be of the two wives and their children in one company, and of the 2 hand-maids and theirs in the other: and this Jacob did partly for decency and partly for safety.

℣. 2. And he put the hand-maids and their children foremost, &c.] In the first division, as being less honourable and less beloved by him: and Leah and her children after; still according to the degree of honour and affection due unto them; Leah being a wife that was imposed and forced upon him: and Rachel and Joseph hindermost; being most beloved by him, and therefore most careful of them; Rachel being his principal and lawful wife, and who had the greatest share in his affection, and Joseph his only child by her.

℣. 3. And he passed over before them, &c.] At the head of them, as the master of the family, exposing himself to the greatest danger for them, and in order to protect and defend them in the best manner he could, or to endeavour to soften the mind of his brother by an address, should there be any occasion for it: and bowed himself to the ground 7 times; in a civil way, as was the manner in the eastern countries, towards great personages; and this he did to Esau as being his elder brother, and as superior to him in grandeur and wealth, being lord of a considerable country; and at the same time religious adoration might be made to God, whilst he thus bowed to the ground, his heart might be going up to God in prayer, that he would appear for him at this instant, and deliver him and his family from perishing by his brother; and so the Targum of Jonathan introduces this clause, "praying, and asking mercies of the Lord, and bowed, "&c." 7 times, perhaps, may not design an exact number, but that he bowed many times as he came along: until he came near to his brother; he kept bowing all the way he came until they were within a small space of one another.

℣. 4. And Esau ran to meet him, &c.] If he rode on any creature, which is likely, he alighted from it on sight of his brother Jacob, and to express his joy on that occasion, and affection for him, made all the haste he could to meet him, as did the father of the prodigal, Luke xv. 20. and embraced him; in his arms, with the greatest respect and tenderness: and fell on his neck; laid his head on his neck, where it remained for a while, not being able to lift it up, and speak unto him; the word is the dual number, and signifies, as Ben Melech thinks, the two sides of the neck, the right and the left; and he might lay his head first on one side, and then on the other, to shew the greatness of his affection: and kissed him; in token of the same: there are 3 pricks over this word in the original more than ordinary, directing the attention of the reader to it, as something wonderful and worthy of observation: the Jewish writers [n] are divided about it; some think that this points at the insincerity of Esau in kissing his brother when he hated him; others, on the contrary, to his sincerity and heartiness in it, and which was matter of admiration, that he who laid up hatred in his heart against his brother, and had bore him a grudge for so many years, and it may be came out now with an intention to destroy him, should have his heart so turned toward him, as to behave in this affectionate manner, which must be owing to the power of God working upon his heart, changing his mind, and making him thus soft, flexible and compassionate; and to Jacob's humble submission to him, subservient to divine providence as a means; and thus as he before had power with God in prayer on this same account, the effect of which he now perceived, so he had power with men, with his brother, as it was intimated to him he should: and they wept; they both wept, as the Septuagint version adds, both Jacob and Esau for joy at the sight of each other, and both seriously; and especially there can be no doubt of Jacob, who must be glad of this reconciliation, if it was only outward, since, hereby his life, and the lives of his wives and children would be spared.

℣. 5. And he lift up his eyes, and saw the women and children, &c.] After the salutation had passed between him and his brother Jacob, he looked, and saw behind him women and children, Jacob's 2 wives and his 2 hand-maids, and 12 children he had by them; and said, who are those with thee? who do those women and children belong to that follow thee? for Jacob had made no mention of his wives and children, when he sent his messengers to him, ch. xxxii. 5. and therefore Esau might very well ask this question, which Jacob replied to: and he said, the children which God hath graciously given given thy ſervant; he ſpeaks of his children as gifts of God, and as inſtances and pledges of his favour and good-will to him, which he thankfully acknowledges; and at the ſame time ſpeaks very reſpectfully to his brother, and in great condeſcenſion and humility, owns himſelf his ſervant, but ſays nothing of his wives; not that he was aſhamed, as Abarbinel ſuggeſts, that he ſhould have four wives, when his brother, who had leſs regard for religion, had but three; but he mentions his children as being near akin to Eſau, and by whom he might conclude who the women were, and of whom alſo he might give a particular account, though the ſcripture is ſilent about it; ſince Leah and Rachel were his own couſins; and who they were no doubt he told him, as they came to pay their reſpects to him, as follows.

℣. 6. Then the handmaids came near, they and their children, &c.] Being foremoſt, and next to Jacob, as Bilhah and her two ſons, Dan and Naphtali, and Zilpah and her two ſons, Gad and Aſher: and they bowed themſelves; in token of reſpect to Eſau, as Jacob had done before them, and ſet them an example, and no doubt inſtructed them to do it.

℣. 7. And Leah alſo with her children came near, and bowed themſelves, &c.] Who were in the next diviſion or company; her children were ſeven, Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Iſſachar, Zebulon, and Dinah, ſix ſons and one daughter: and after came Joſeph near and Rachel, and they bowed themſelves; it is obſerved, that Joſeph is mentioned before his mother; it may be, becauſe they might put him before her in the proceſſion for greater ſafety; or ſhe might preſent him to Eſau, being a child of little more than ſix years of age, and teach him how to make his obeyſance to him, which ſhe alſo did herſelf.

℣. 8. And he ſaid, what meaneſt thou by all this drove which I met? &c.] Not as being ignorant of the deſign of it; for no doubt the ſeveral drovers, according to their inſtructions from Jacob, had acquainted him with it; but he choſe not to take the preſent on what they ſaid, but was willing to have it from Jacob's own mouth, and that he might have the opportunity of refuſing it: and he ſaid, theſe are to find grace in the ſight of my lord; to gain his favour and good-will; and which, as it was a token of Jacob's good-will to him, ſo by his acceptance of it, he would know that he bore the ſame to him alſo. It was uſual in the eaſtern countries to carry preſents to friends, and eſpecially to great men whenever viſits were paid, as all travellers in general teſtify to be ſtill the uſage in thoſe parts, to this day.

℣. 9. And Eſau ſaid, I have enough, my brother, &c.] Or I have much [o], and ſtand in no need of this preſent, or have much more than thou haſt: keep that thou haſt unto thyſelf; for the uſe of himſelf and family, which is large; in this Eſau ſhewed himſelf, not only not a covetous man, but that he was truly reconciled to his brother, and needed not any thing from him, to make up the difference between them.

℣. 10. And Jacob ſaid, nay, I pray thee, &c.] Don't ſay ſo, as the Targum of Jonathan ſupplies it, or don't refuſe my preſent: if now I have found grace in thy ſight, then receive my preſent at my hand; ſignifying, that the acceptance of his preſent would be a token to him, and give him full ſatisfaction that he bore a good-will to him, and did not retain anger and reſentment againſt him: for therefore I have ſeen thy face as though I had ſeen the face of God; or of princes, as Onkelos, as the face of ſome great perſonage, as he was; or as the face of an angel, very pleaſant and lovely; or as the face of God himſelf, he obſerving the love and favour of God to him, in working upon the heart of Eſau, and cauſing him to carry it ſo lovingly to him; wherefore for this reaſon receive it, becauſe I have had ſuch an agreeable ſight of thee: and thou waſt pleaſed with me; accepted of me, and kindly received me: becauſe God hath dealt graciouſly with me; in giving him ſo much ſubſtance, and now in giving him ſo much favour in the ſight of Eſau, whom he dreaded: and becauſe I have enough; a ſufficiency of all good things, being thoroughly contented with his ſtate and circumſtance; or I have all things [p], all kind of good things, every thing that was neceſſary for him, the expreſſion is ſtronger than Eſau's; and indeed Jacob had, beſides a large ſhare of temporal mercies, all ſpiritual ones; God was his Covenant-God and Father, Chriſt was his redeemer, the Spirit his ſanctifier; he had all grace beſtowed on him, and was an heir of glory: and he urged him, and he took it; being preſſing on him, or importunate with him, he accepted of his preſent.

℣. 11. Take, I pray thee, my bleſſing that is brought thee, &c.] The preſent he had ſent him, now carrying home to his houſe, which was a part of what God had bleſſed Jacob with; and which he from a beneficent generous ſpirit gave his brother, wiſhing the bleſſing of God to go along with it; it was an inſinuation, and ſo he would have it taken, that he wiſhed him all happineſs and proſperity.

℣. 12. And he ſaid, let us take our journey and let us go, &c.] To Seir, where Eſau lived, and whither he invited Jacob to ſtop a while, and refreſh himſelf and his family: and I will go before thee; to ſhew him the way to his palace, and to protect him on the road from all dangers; or beſides thee [q], along ſide on him, keeping equal pace with him, thereby ſhewing great honour and reſpect, as well as in order to converſe with him as they travelled.

℣. 13. And he ſaid unto him, my lord knoweth the children are tender, &c.] The eldeſt being but thirteen years of age, and the youngeſt about ſix; and Eſau might eaſily perceive by their ſtature, that they were young and tender, and not able to bear either riding or walking very faſt: and the flocks and herds with young are with me; or upon me [r]; the charge of them was upon him, it was incumbent on him to take care of them, and eſpecially in the circumſtances in which they were, being big with young, both ſheep and kine; or ſuckling, giving milk to their young, as the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan, and ſo having lambs and calves, ſome of them perhaps juſt yeaned and calved, they required more attendance and greater care in driving them, not being able to travel far in a day: and if men ſhould over-drive them one day, all the flock will die; if he, and the ſervants under him, ſhould puſh them on too faſt, beyond their ſtrength, even but one day, all in the above circumſtances cumſtances would be in danger of being loſt thro' over-much fatigue and wearineſs.

℣. 14. Let my lord, I pray thee, paſs over before his ſervant, &c.] He deſired in a very reſpectable manner, that he would not keep his pace in complaiſance to him, but proceed on in his journey, and go on with his men, and he with his family and flocks would follow after as faſt as he could, and their circumſtances would admit of: and I will lead on ſoftly; ſlowly, gently, eaſily, ſtep by ſtep: according as the cattle that goeth before me, and the children be able to endure; or according to the foot [s] of them; of the cattle, whom he calls the work [t], becauſe his buſineſs lay in the care of them, and theſe were the chief of his ſubſtance; and of the children, as the feet of each of them were able to travel; or becauſe of them, for the ſake of them, as Aben Ezra, conſulting their ſtrength, he propoſed to move on gently, like both a wife, careful and tender father of his family, and ſhepherd of his flock: until I come unto my lord unto Seir; whither, no doubt, he intended to come when he parted with Eſau; but for reaſons which after appeared to him he declined it: or more probably he did go thither then, or quickly after; though the ſcripture makes no mention of it, he might go with ſome of his ſervants directly, and ſend his family, flocks and herds under the care of other ſervants forward on their journey, and quickly come up to them again; for that he ſhould tell a lye is not likely, nor does he ſeem to be under any temptation to it: and beſides, it would have been dangerous to have diſobliged his brother when on his borders, who could eaſily have come upon him again with 400 men, and picked a quarrel with him for breach of promiſe, and deſtroyed him and his at once.

℣. 15. And Eſau ſaid, let me now leave with thee ſome of the folk that are with me, &c.] To ſhew him the way, and guard him on the road, and he appear the more honourable when he entered into Seir: and he ſaid, what needeth it? Jacob ſaw not the neceſſity of it; he knew the direct way very probably; he thought himſelf in no danger, ſince he was at peace with Eſau, and he did not affect the grandeur of an equipage: let me find grace in the ſight of my lord; having his favour and good-will, that was enough for him; and among the reſt of the favours he received from him, he begged this might be added, that he might be excuſed retaining any of his retinue with him.

℣. 16. So Eſau returned that day on his way unto Seir.] Took his leave of Jacob the ſame day he met him, and proceeded on in his journey towards Seir; whether he arrived there the ſame day, is not certain, probably it was more than a day's journey.

℣. 17. And Jacob journeyed to Succoth, &c.] Perhaps after he had been at Seir, and ſtayed there ſome little time. Succoth was on the other ſide of Jordan, ſo called by anticipation, for it had its name from what follows; as yet there was no city built here, or at leaſt of this name; afterwards there was, it lay in a valley, and belonged to Sihon king of Heſhbon, and was given to the tribe of Gad, Joſh. xiii. 27. it is mentioned along with Penuel, and was not far from it, Judg. viii. 8. It is ſaid to be but two miles diſtant from it [u], but one would think it ſhould be more: and built him an houſe, and made booths for his cattle; an houſe for himſelf and family, and booths or tents for his ſervants or ſhepherds, and for the cattle they had the care of, ſome for one, and ſome for the other. This he did with an intention to ſtay ſome time here, as it ſhould ſeem; and the Targum of Jonathan ſays he continued here a whole year, and Jarchi 18 months, a winter and two ſummers; but this is all uncertain: therefore the name of the place is called Succoth; from the booths or tents built here, which this word ſignifies.

℣. 18. And Jacob came to Shalem, a city of Shechem, &c.] Not Salem, of which Melchizedek was king, much leſs Jeruſalem, for it was 40 miles from it [w]; more likely Salim near Ænon, where John was baptizing, John iii. 23. thoi perhaps it is the ſame with Shechem; for the words may be read, he came to Shalem, the city Shechem, a city which Hamor had built, and called by the name of his ſon Shechem, the ſame with Syckar, John iv. 5. this was on this ſide Jordan, and therefore Jacob muſt have paſſed over that river, though no mention is made of it; it is ſaid to be about eight miles from Succoth [x]: though ſome think Shalem is not the name of a place, but an appellative, and to be rendered ſafe and ſound, or whole; and ſo the Jewiſh [y] writers generally underſtand it of his coming in peace, health and ſafety: which is in the land of Canaan; it belonged to that tribe of the Canaanites called Hivites; for Hamor, the father of Shechem, from whom it had its name, was an Hivite, ch. xxxiv. 2. ſo that Jacob was now got into the land of Canaan, his own country, and where his kindred dwelt: when he came from Padan-Aram; from Meſopotamia, from Haran there; Shechem was the firſt place in the land of Canaan he came to, when he came from thence, and whither he came in the greateſt ſafety, he himſelf, wives, children and ſervants, in good health, without any loſs of any of his cattle and ſubſtance; and without any ill thing befalling him all the way thither, being delivered from Laban and Eſau, and from every danger, and from every enemy: and to ſignify this, is this clauſe added, which may ſeem otherwiſe ſuperfluous: and pitched his tent before the city; the city of Shechem, not in it, but near it.

℣. 19. And he bought a parcel of a field, &c.] Not the whole, but a part of it; this he did, tho' he was heir of the whole country, becauſe, as yet, the time was not come for him or his to take poſſeſſion of it: where he had ſpread his tent; the ground that it ſtood upon, and what was adjoining to it, for the uſe of his cattle: this he bought at the hand of the children of Hamor; of ſome one of them, in whoſe poſſeſſion it was, and perhaps with the conſent of the reſt, and before them, as witneſſes: for 100 pieces of money; Onkelos, the Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, Samaritan, Syriac and Arabic verſions render it 100 lambs or ſheep, cattle being uſed to be given in exchange for things in trade and commerce; but as money was in uſe before the times of Jacob, and Stephen is expreſs for pieces of money, Acts vii. 16. and this beſt agrees with the uſe of the word in Job xlii. 11. the only place beſides this, excepting Joſh. xxiv. 32. in which it is uſed, it ſeems beſt ſo to interpret it here; and the pieces of money might be ſuch as were of the value of a lamb or ſheep, or rather had the figure of one impreſſed upon them. Laban, from whom Jacob might have them, or his neighbours, and alſo Jacob himſelf, being ſhepherds, might chuſe thus thus to impreſs their money; but the exact value of theſe pieces cannot be aſcertained: the Jewiſh writers generally interpret them of a Meah, which was the value of one penny of our money, and 20 of them went to a ſhekel; ſo that 100 of theſe muſt make a very ſmall and contemptible ſum to purchaſe a piece of ground with.

℣. 20. And he erected there an altar, &c.] To offer ſacrifice upon to God, by way of thankſgiving, for the many mercies he had received ſince he went out of the land of Canaan, whither he was now returned; and eſpecially for his ſafety in journeying hither from Padan-Aram, and for deliverance from Laban and Eſau, and for all other favours that he and his had been partakers of. And this he alſo erected for the ſake of religious worſhip, to be continued in his family; he intending to reſide here for ſome time, as appears by the purchaſe he had made, and as it is certain he did: and called it El-Elohe-Iſrael; God, the God of Iſrael; that is, he called the altar, the altar of God, who is the God of Iſrael, who had been his God, his preſerver and protector; and had lately given him the name of Iſrael, and had made good what anſwered to it, and was deſigned by it, that as he had had power with God, and prevailed, ſo he ſhould with man; and as a memorial of all theſe favours and mercies, he erected this altar, and devoted it to God and his ſervice, and called it by this name: or he called upon God, the God of Iſrael, as the Septuagint and Vulgate Latin verſions; he prayed unto him at the time he offered ſacrifice on the altar, and gave him praiſe for all the great and good things he had done for him. Jacob muſt have ſtayed at Succoth, and at this place, many years, eſpecially at the latter; ſince, when he came into thoſe parts, Dinah was a child of little more than ſix years of age, and Simeon and Levi were very young, not above eleven or twelve years of age; and yet before he left Shechem, Dinah was marriageable, and Simeon and Levi were grown ſtrong and able-bodied men, and did a moſt ſtrange exploit in ſlaying all the males in Shechem, as recorded in the next chapter.

CHAP. XXXIV.

THIS chapter gives an account of the raviſhment of Dinah by Shechem, ℣. 1—3. of his father Hamor and him treating with Jacob and his ſons about the marriage of her, ℣. 6—12. of the condition propoſed by Jacob's ſons, circumciſion of all the males in Shechem, which was agreed to by Shechem and his father, ℣. 13—19. of the men of Shechem being perſuaded to yield to it, ℣. 20—24. and of the deſtruction of them on the third day by Simeon and Levi, and of the plunder of their city and field, and of the captivity of their wives and children by Jacob's ſons, which gave Jacob great offence, and in which they juſtified themſelves, ℣. 25—31.

℣. 1. And Dinah the daughter of Leah, which ſhe bare unto Jacob, &c.] Who is ſuppoſed to be at this time about 14 or 15 years of age; for that ſhe was but about 9 or 10 years old, is not to be credited, as ſome compute it [z]: ſhe is obſerved to be the daughter of Leah, partly that the following miſcarriage might bring to mind her forwardneſs to intrude herſelf into Jacob's bed, and be a rebuke unto her; and partly to account for Simeon and Levi being ſo active in revenging her abuſe, they being Leah's ſons: of Dinah it is ſaid, that ſhe went out to ſee the daughters of the land; of the land of Canaan, to viſit them, and contract an acquaintance with them; and ſhe having no ſiſters to converſe with at home, it might be a temptation to her to go abroad. According to the Targum of Jonathan, ſhe went to ſee the manners, cuſtoms and faſhions of the women of that country, to learn them, as the Septuagint verſion renders the word; or to ſee their habit and dreſs, and how they ornamented themſelves, as Joſephus [a] obſerves; and who alſo ſays it was a feſtival day at Shechem, and therefore very probably many of the young women of the country round about might come thither on that occaſion; and who being dreſſed in their beſt clothes would give Dinah a good opportunity of ſeeing and obſerving their faſhions; and which, with the diverſions of the ſeaſon, and ſhows to be ſeen, allured Dinah to go out of her mother's tent into the city, to gratify her curioſity. Aben Ezra's note is, that ſhe went of herſelf, that is, without the leave of either of her parents: according to other Jewiſh writers [b], there was a ſnare laid for her by Shechem, who obſerving that Jacob's daughter dwelt in tents, and did not go abroad, he brought damſels out of the city dancing and playing on timbrels; and Dinah went forth to ſee them playing, and he took her, and lay with her, as follows.

℣. 2. And when Shechem the ſon of Hamor, &c.] From whom the city had its name, near which Jacob and his family now were: the Hivite, prince of the country; Hamor was an Hivite, which was one of the nations of the land of Canaan, and this man was the prince or a principal man of that nation, as well as of Shechem. Joſephus [c] calls him a king: when the ſon of this man ſaw her; that is, Dinah, what a beautiful perſon ſhe was, and was enamoured with her: he took her; by force, as the Targum of Jonathan: and lay with her, and defiled her; or humbled or afflicted her [d]; and it is a rule with the Jews, that every ſuch act, which is done by force, is called an humiliation and affliction [e]: the child begotten in this act of fornication, is ſaid [f] by them to be Aſenath, who was had into Egypt, and brought up by Potipherah's wife as her daughter, and afterwards married to Joſeph, ch. xli. 45, 50.

℣. 3. And his ſoul clave unto Dinah the daughter of Jacob, &c.] His inclination was to her, ſhe was always in his thoughts; it was not a mere luſtful deſire that was ſuddenly raiſed, and ſoon over, but a conſtant and continued affection he bore to her, as follows: and he loved the damſel; ſincerely and heartily: and ſpake kindly unto the damſel; or to the heart [g] of her, ſuch things as tended to comfort her, ſhe being ſad and ſorrowful; or to ſoften her mind mind towards him, and take off the reſentment of it to him, becauſe of the injury he had done her, and to gain her good-will and affection, and her conſent to marry him; profeſſing great love to her, promiſing her great things, what worldly grandeur and honour ſhe would be advanced to, and how kindly he would behave towards her; which might take with her, and incline her to yield to his motion, which having obtained, he took the following method.

℣. 4. And Shechem ſpake unto his father Hamor, &c.] And told him the whole affair, at leaſt what a ſtrong affection he had for Dinah: ſaying, get me this damſel to wife; by which he meant not only that he would give his conſent, that he might marry her, but that he would get her parents conſent unto it, and ſettle the matter with them; by which it appears how early, and that even among heathen nations, conſent of parents on both ſides was judged neceſſary to marriage. It ſeems by this, as if Dinah was now detained in the houſe of Hamor or Shechem, and was upon the ſpot, or near at hand, when Shechem addreſſed his father about her, ſee ℣. 26.

℣. 5. And Jacob heard that he had defiled Dinah his daughter, &c.] That is, that Shechem had defiled her; the report of this was brought him very probably by one of the maids which attended her to the city; for it was hardly to be thought that ſhe would go thither alone, and which muſt be very diſtreſſing to Jacob to hear of: this was his firſt affliction in his own family, but it was not the only one, nor the laſt, others quickly followed: now his ſons were with his cattle in the field; he had bought, or in ſome other hired by him for his cattle, feeding and keeping them, being arrived to an age fit for ſuch ſervice; here they were when the above report was brought to Jacob: and Jacob held his peace until they were come; neither murmuring at the providence, but patiently bearing the chaſtiſement; nor reflecting upon Leah for letting Dinah go out, or not keeping a proper watch over her; nor ſaying any thing of it to any in the family; nor expreſſing his diſpleaſure at Shechem, nor vowing revenge on him for it, nor taking any ſtep towards it until his ſons were come home from the field; with whom he choſe to adviſe, and whoſe aſſiſtance he would want, if it was judged neceſſary to uſe force to get Dinah out of the hands of Shechem, or to avenge the injury done her.

℣. 6. And Hamor the father of Shechem went out unto Jacob, &c.] Unto the tent of Jacob without the city: to commune with him; to talk with him about the affair of Dinah, to pacify him, and endeavour to gain his conſent, that his ſon might marry her, and to ſettle the terms and conditions of the marriage.

℣. 7. And the ſons of Jacob came out of the field, when they heard it, &c.] Either by a meſſenger Jacob ſent to them, to acquaint them with it, or by ſome other hand: however, be it as it will, as ſoon as they heard of the abuſe of their ſiſter, they immediately left their flocks to the care of their ſervants, and came to their father's tent: and the men were grieved, and were very wroth; they were grieved for the ſin committed againſt God, very probably, as well as for the injury done to their ſiſter, and they were wroth againſt Shechem the author of it: becauſe he had wrought folly in Iſrael, in lying with Jacob's daughter; all ſin is folly, being a tranſgreſſion of the law of God founded in the higheſt wiſdom, and particularly uncleanneſs, and that branch of it, deflouring a virgin; and this action being committed on Jacob's daughter, whoſe name was Iſrael, is ſaid to be in, or rather againſt Iſrael [h], to his grief, and to the reproach of him and his family: though theſe words may be rather the words of Moſes, than of the ſons of Jacob; or however, are expreſſed not in the language uſed by them, but in what was in uſe in the times of Moſes, when Iſrael was the name of a nation and church, whereas it was now but a perſonal name, and at moſt but the name of a family; and though this was done to one of the family, yet not in it, but in the houſe of Hamor or Shechem: which thing ought not to be done; being againſt the law and light of nature to do ſuch an action by force and violence, and againſt the law of nations to ſuffer it to go with impunity.

℣. 8. And Hamor communed with them, &c.] With Jacob and his ſons, who came in juſt at that time: ſaying, the ſoul of my ſon Shechem longeth for your daughter; the daughter of the family, and the only daughter in it; for her Shechem had a vehement affection, a ſtrong deſire to marry her, and could not be ſatisfied without her: I pray you, give her him to wife; he not only requeſts the conſent of the parents of the damſel, but of her brothers alſo, which in thoſe times and countries ſeems to have been uſual to aſk and have, ſee ch. xxiv. 50, 51, 55, 59.

℣. 9. And make ye marriages with us, &c.] There was no objection on their ſide, it lay on the other; Abraham's ſervant was charged by him, not to take a wife of the Canaanites to his ſon Iſaac; and the ſame charge was given Jacob by Iſaac, ch. xxiv. 3. and xxviii. 1. and therefore Jacob would never agree that his children ſhould marry any of that nation; and marriages with them were afterwards forbidden by the law of Moſes, Deut. vii. 3: and give your daughters unto us, and take our daughters unto you; for though at preſent there were no other daughters in Jacob's family, yet there might be hereafter; and the requeſt is, that for the future there might be intermarriages between them, as would be practicable in a courſe of time.

℣. 10. And ye ſhall dwell with us, &c.] Peaceably and quietly, not as ſojourners only, but as inhabitants: and the land ſhall be before you; to chuſe what part of it they pleaſed to dwell in, and which they ſhould have in their own power and poſſeſſion: dwell and trade you therein; in any ſort of traffic and commerce, the land would admit of, and they ſhould beſt chuſe: and get you poſſeſſions; buy houſes and land, and enjoy them, they and their poſterity; theſe are the arguments uſed by Hamor to gain the conſent of Jacob and his family, that his ſon might marry Dinah; and the propoſals are honourable and generous.

℣. 11. And Shechem ſaid unto her father and unto her brethren, &c.] To the father and brethren of Dinah; he addreſſed them after his father Hamor had done ſpeaking: let me find grace in your eyes; forgive the offence committed, the injury done to Dinah, and grant the requeſt of her marriage, and it will be conſidered as a great favour: and what ye ſhall ſay unto me, I will give; to her, to her parents, to her brethren and relations; let what will be fixed, ſhall be given; which ſhewed great affection for her, and that he was willing to do any thing to make amends for the injury done; he cared cared not what it was that might be demanded of him, ſo be it that ſhe became his wife.

℣. 12. Aſk me never ſo much dowry and gift, &c.] Or multiply them exceedingly[1], fix them at as high a rate as may be thought fit; the dowry was what a man gave to a woman at her marriage; for in thoſe times and countries, inſtead of a man having a portion with his wife, as with us in our times, he gave one to his wife, or to her parents for her; and eſpecially in after times this was uſed, and became a law in Iſrael, in the caſe of a vitiated virgin, ſee Exod. xxii. 16, 17. and the gift was either of jewels and clothes to the women, or of ſuch like precious things to her brethren and friends, ſee ch. xxiv. 53. and I will give according as ye ſhall ſay unto me; determine among yourſelves whatever ſhall be the dowry and gift, and it ſhall be punctually obſerved: but give me the damſel to wife; only agree to that, and I care not what is required of me.

℣. 13. And the ſons of Jacob anſwered Shechem and Hamor deceitfully, &c.] Propoſing the marriage of their ſiſter on terms after mentioned, when they never intended it ſhould ever be: Onkelos, Jonathan and Jarchi interpret it, with wiſdom, as if they anſwered wiſely and prudently, but the word is never uſed in a good ſenſe; and if it was wiſdom, it was carnal wiſdom and wicked cunning, and was diſapproved of by plain-hearted Jacob: and ſaid; or ſpoke in this deceitful manner: becauſe he had defiled Dinah their ſiſter; and therefore were filled with indignation at him, and fixed with reſentment againſt him, and vowed within themſelves revenge upon him.

℣. 14. And they ſaid unto them, &c.] Levi and Simeon, to Hamor and Shechem: we cannot do this thing, to give our ſiſter to one that is uncircumciſed; not that there was any law againſt it at that time; and there were, on the other hand, precedents for it both in Iſaac and Jacob, who had married the daughters of uncircumciſed perſons; nor indeed do they plead any law, only that it was not becoming their character, nor agreeable to their religion, nor honourable in their eſteem: for that were a reproach unto us; and they ſhould be reflected upon for ſlighting the inſtitution of circumciſion, which was of God: ſo they pretend it might be interpreted, ſhould they enter into affinity with uncircumciſed perſons.

℣. 15. But in this will we conſent unto you, &c.] Upon the following condition, that Dinah ſhould be given in marriage: if ye will be as we be, that every male of you be circumciſed; as the ſons of Jacob were, according to the command given to Abraham their great grand-father, ch. xvii. 10.

℣. 16. Then will we give our daughters unto you, &c.] Meaning Dinah, whom they call their daughter, ℣. 17. becauſe ſhe was the daughter of their family, and becauſe they were treating in the name of their father, and in conformity to the language uſed by thoſe they were treating with, ℣. 9. and we will take your daughters to us; in marriage for wives: and we will dwell with you; not as ſojourners but as fellow-citizens: and we will become one people; being ſo nearly related by marriage, and profeſſing one religion, alike ſubmitting to circumciſion, which was the diſtinguiſhed badge of Abraham's ſeed.

℣. 17. But if ye will not hearken to us to be circumciſed, &c.] Will not agree to this condition, circumciſion: then will we take our daughter; by force, as the Targum of Jonathan adds: and we will be gone; depart from this part of the country, and go elſewhere.

℣. 18. And their words pleaſed Hamor, and Shechem Hamor's ſon.] The condition propoſed was acceptable by them both, and they agreed to comply with it; Hamor, becauſe of the great love he had for his ſon; Shechem, becauſe of the great love he had for Dinah.

℣. 19. And the young man deferred not to do the thing, &c.] To be circumciſed himſelf, and to get all the males of the city circumciſed; he delayed not a moment, but made all the haſte he could to get it accompliſhed: becauſe he had delight in Jacob's daughter; he really loved her, and delighted in her perſon and company: it was not the effect of a brutiſh luſt, but a true affection he bore to her, that he deſired her in marriage: and he was more honourable than all the houſe of his father; for though he had done a baſe thing in defiling Jacob's daughter, yet in this he was honourable, that he ſought to marry her, and to do any thing that was in his power to recompenſe the injury; and he was honourable in keeping covenant and compact with men; and was honeſt, upright, and ſincere, to fulfill the condition impoſed on him, and he had agreed to, as well as he was in greater eſteem among the citizens, than any of his father's houſe, which made it the more eaſy to him to get their conſent to be circumciſed; they having a very high and honourable opinion of him, and ready to oblige him in any thing they could.

℣. 20. And Hamor and Shechem his ſon went unto the gate of their city, &c.] Where courts of judicature were held, and all public affairs reſpecting the common intereſt of the city were tranſacted: here, no doubt, Hamor their prince ſummoned them to come, by the uſual method in which the citizens were convened on certain occaſions: and communed with the men of their city; upon the ſubject of entering into an alliance with Jacob's family, of admitting them to be fellow-citizens with them, and of their being incorporated among them, and becoming one people with them, taking no notice of the true reaſon of this motion: ſaying, as follows.

℣. 21. Theſe men are peaceable with us, &c.] Meaning Jacob and his ſons, pointing to their tents which were near their city; and no doubt, more was ſaid than is here expreſſed, and that theſe words were introduced with a preface, in which notice was taken of Jacob and his family, and their names mentioned, as here their character is given; that they were men of peaceable diſpoſitions, harmleſs and inoffenſive, as appeared they had been ever ſince they came into theſe parts; and there was a great deal of reaſon to believe they ſtill would be, and which was an argument in their favour, to admit them to a reſidence among them: therefore let them dwell in the land, and trade therein; give them leave to dwell where they pleaſe, and carry on what trade and traffick in the land they think fit; ſince they are not like to be quarrelſome and troubleſome, but will deal honeſtly and honourably, and pay duly for what they agree for or merchandize in: for the land, behold, it is large enough for them; there is room enough for them to dwell in, and paſturage enough for their cattle, and land enough to manure and till, without in the leaſt incommoding the inhabitants: yea, it is likely to be to their advantage, ſince they would pay for what they ſhould purchaſe purchase or hire, and would improve the land which lay uncultivated: let us take their daughters to us for wives, and let us give them our daughters; this was the thing principally aimed at; and the reſt, both what goes before, and what follows after, were in order to this.

℣. 22. Only herein will the men conſent unto us, &c.] The only term or condition inſiſted upon, to come into an alliance and affinity with us, and, for to dwell with us, to be one people, to become one body politic, is the following one: if every male among us be circumciſed, as they are circumciſed; ſubmitting to this rite, they agree to take up their reſidence with us, and be incorporated among us, and become one people.

℣. 23. Shall not their cattle, and their ſubſtance, and every beaſt of theirs be ours? &c.] Which would in courſe come into their families in proceſs of time, by intermarrying with them, or being more numerous and powerful than they, could ſeize upon them when they pleaſed, and take all they had: thus they argue from the profit and advantage that would accrue to them by admitting them among them, upon their terms; and this argument, taken from worldly intereſt, they knew would have great influence upon them: only let us conſent unto them; in the affair of circumciſion: and they will dwell with us; and what by trading with them, and marrying among them, all their wealth and riches will come into our hands.

℣. 24. And unto Hamor and unto Shechem his ſon hearkened all that went out of the gate of his city, &c.] That is, all the inhabitants of the city who came to the gate of it, upon the ſummons given them, and departed from thence to their habitations, having a great opinion of their prince and his ſon; and moved either with awe of them or love to them; and influenced both by their arguments and example, they agreed to what was propoſed to them: and every male was circumciſed, all that went out of the gate of his city; all the men-citizens; and not only the adult, and who now went out by the gate of the city, but all their male-children likewiſe were circumciſed.

℣. 25. And it came to paſs on the third day, when they were ſore, &c.] Or in pain [k], when their pains were ſtrong upon them, as the Targum of Onkelos; or when they were weak through the pain of circumciſion, as the Targum of Jonathan; for it ſeems that the pain of circumciſion was more intenſe on the third day [l], and the part the more inflamed, and the perſon more feveriſh, and which is obſerved by phyſicians of other wounds; and therefore Hippocrates [m] adviſed, not to meddle with wounds on the 3d or 4th days, or do any thing that might irritate them, for on thoſe days they were apt to rankle or be inflamed, and bring on fevers; and in this caſe, not only the wound was ſore in itſelf and diſtreſſing, but being in ſuch a part of the body, motion muſt give great uneaſineſs: nor could perſons in ſuch circumſtances eaſily ariſe and walk, and go forth to defend themſelves; and of this Jacob's ſons availed themſelves: ſo that two of the ſons of Jacob, Simeon and Levi, Dinah's brethren; by the mother's ſide as well as the father's, being Leah's children, and ſo moſt provoked at this indignity and abuſe of their ſiſter: took each man his ſword, and came upon the city boldly; not fearing the inhabitants of it, and their riſing up againſt them to defend themſelves, knowing in what circumſtances they were: or upon the city that dwelt ſecurely; as the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan; for the men of the city had no ſuſpicion of any ſuch attempt that would be made upon them, and therefore were quite eaſy and ſecure, not expecting nor fearing any thing of this kind: and ſlew all the males; the males that were grown up, for the little ones are after ſaid to be carried captive, ℣. 29. Joſephus takes no notice of this circumſtance of their being circumciſed, but repreſents them as ſurprized in the night of their feſtival, overcharged with feaſting, and their watch aſleep, who were firſt killed. Though only two of Jacob's ſons were mentioned, they might be aſſiſted by the reſt; at leaſt, no doubt, they were attended with ſervants, who were aiding in accompliſhing this cruel and bloody attempt.

℣. 26. And they ſlew Hamor and Shechem his ſon with the edge of the ſword, &c.] Whom they had been juſt treating with in a ſeeming friendly manner: Shechem was the chief aggreſſor, and his crime was very hainous, but conſidering, that he did all he could after the fact was committed, to make recompence for the injury done; he deſerved other treatment, at leaſt, mercy ſhould have been ſhewn him. Hamor, perhaps, was too indulgent to his ſon, connived at his ſin, and did not puniſh him for it; and, it may be, approved of it, and now dies for it: and took Dinah out of Shechem's houſe, and went out; where ſhe was kept from the time of her being raviſhed by Shechem, with an intention to marry her, could the conſent of her parents and relations be obtained; for it does not appear that he kept her to carry on a criminal converſation with her, but a courtſhip in order to marriage.

℣. 27. The ſons of Jacob came upon the ſlain, &c.] That is, the reſt of them, as the Targum of Jonathan paraphraſes it; underſtanding what their two brothers had done, they came and joined them, and partook of the plunder, ſtripping the ſlain of their clothes, or taking from them what they found of any worth about them: and ſpoiled the city; plundered it of all its goods and ſubſtance, ſpoiled all the inhabitants of it of their wealth: becauſe they had defiled their ſiſter; one of them had done it, which is imputed to them all, they not reſtraining him from it, when it was in their power; and perhaps approving of it, and made a laugh of it, and jeſt at it; or however did not puniſh him for it.

℣. 28. They took their ſheep, their oxen, and their aſſes, &c.] The Shechemites hoped to have the cattle and ſubſtance of Jacob's family, and in a hypocritical manner ſubmitted to circumciſion, for the ſake of worldly advantage; for that, and pleaſing their prince, ſeem to be the only views they had in it; wherefore, in this there is a juſt retaliation of them in providence: and that which was in the city, and that which was in the field; the cattle that were kept at home, and thoſe that were brought up in the field, all became a prey.

℣. 29. And all their wealth, &c.] Or power [o] or ſtrength; every thing that made them mighty and powerful; their gold and ſilver, their jewels, and rich furniture of their houſes, their arms and weapons of war, their goods and ſubſtance, in which they trafficked: and all their little ones, and their wives wives took they captive; they ſpared the women and children, as was uſual in war, and in the plunder of towns and cities: and ſpoiled even all that was in the houſe; of Shechem or Hamor, or in any of the houſes of the inhabitants; they rifled and plundered every one, and took away whatſoever they found in them; but as Jacob diſapproved of this unjuſt, cruel, bloody and perfidious action, ſo no doubt, as he ſet the captives at liberty, he reſtored to them their cattle and ſubſtance.

℣. 30. And Jacob ſaid to Simeon and Levi, &c.] who were the principals concerned in this affair: ye have troubled me; becauſe of the ſin they had committed, becauſe of the diſhonour brought upon religion, and becauſe of the danger he and his family were hereby expoſed unto; it greatly diſquieted him, made him very uneaſy, he was at his wits end almoſt, knew not what to do, what courſe to take to wipe off the ſcandal, and to defend himſelf and family; ſince it ſerved he ſays, to make me ſtink among the inhabitants of the land; to make him odious and abominable, to be hated and abhorred by all the people round about, and to be looked upon and treated as a deceitful, treacherous and perfidious man, that had no regard to his word, to covenants and agreements made by him; as a cruel and blood-thirſty man that ſpared none, made no difference between the innocent and the guilty; and as a robber and plunderer, that ſtuck at nothing, committing the greateſt outrages to get poſſeſſion of the ſubſtance of others: amongſt the Canaanites and the Perizzites; who were the principal inhabitants of the land, the moſt numerous, and the moſt ruſtic and barbarous, and perhaps neareſt, and from whom Jacob had moſt to fear: and I being few in number; or men of number [p]; he and his ſons and ſervants, in all, making but a ſmall number in compariſon of the nations about him: they ſhall gather themſelves together againſt me, and ſlay me; and I ſhall be deſtroyed, I and my houſe; not that Jacob was afraid that this would be really the caſe, for he knew and believed the promiſes of God to him, of the multiplication of his ſeed, and of their inheriting the land of Canaan, and of the Meſſiah ſpringing from him; but this he ſaid to aggravate the ſin and folly of his ſons, in expoſing him and themſelves to ſo much danger, which not only on the face of things appeared probable, but even certain and inevitable, without the interpoſition of divine power and providence.

℣. 31. And they ſaid, &c.] Simeon and Levi, in a very pert and unſeemly manner: ſhould he deal with our ſiſter, as with an harlot? make a whore of her, and then keep her in his houſe as ſuch? is this to be borne with? or ſhould we take no more notice of his behaviour to our ſiſter, or ſhew no more regard to her than if ſhe was a common proſtitute, whom no man will defend or protect? ſo ſay the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem, "nor let Shechem the ſon of Hamor mock at us, "or boaſt and ſay, as an harlot whom no man "ſeeks after, or no man ſeeks to avenge her; ſo "it is done by Dinah the daughter of Jacob:" they tacitly inſinuate as if Jacob had not that regard for the honour of his daughter and family, nor ſhewed his reſentment at the wicked behaviour of Shechem, as he ought to have done. It is obſerved that there is a letter in the word, for harlot, greater than uſual, which may either denote the greatneſs of the ſin of Shechem in dealing with Dinah as an harlot, or the great impudence and boldneſs of Jacob's ſons, in their anſwer to him, and their audacioufneſs in juſtifying ſuch baſeneſs and cruelty they had been guilty of. The whole of this hiſtory, as related in this chapter, is given by Polyhiſtor out of Theodotus the poet [q].

CHAP. XXXV.

THIS chapter gives an account of Jacob's going to Bethel, and building an altar there by the order and direction of God, ℣. 1—7. where Deborah, Rebekah's nurſe, died and was buried, ℣. 8. and where God appeared to Jacob, confirmed the new name of Iſrael he had given him, and renewed to him the promiſes of the multiplication of his ſeed, and of their inheriting the land of Canaan, ℣. 9—13. all which is gratefully acknowledged by Jacob, who erected a pillar in the place, and called it Bethel, in memory of God's gracious appearance to him there, ℣. 14, 15. from hence he journeyed towards his father's houſe, and on the way Rachel his wife fell in travail, and bore him a ſon, and died, and was buried near Ephrath, ℣. 16—21. near this place Reuben committed inceſt with Bilhah, ℣. 22. and the names of the 12 ſons of Jacob are given, ℣. 23—26. and the chapter is cloſed with an account of Jacob's arrival at his father's houſe, of the death of Iſaac, and of his burial at the direction of his two ſons, ℣. 27, 28, 29.

℣. 1. And God ſaid unto Jacob, &c.] When he was in great diſtreſs, on account of the ſlaughter of the Shechemites by his ſons, not knowing what ſtep to take, or courſe to ſteer for the ſafety of him and his family; then God, for his comfort and direction, appeared and ſpoke to him, either in a dream or viſion, or by an impulſe on his mind, or by an articulate voice: perhaps this was the ſon of God, the ſecond perſon, who might appear in an human form, as he often did; ſince he afterwards ſpeaks of God as of another divine perſon, diſtinct from him, even his divine father: ariſe, go up to Bethel, and dwell there; which is ſaid to be 28 miles from Shechem [r]; hither he is bid to go in haſte, and where, it is ſuggeſted, he would be ſafe, and where it would be right and proper for him to dwell a while: and make there an altar to God; and offer ſacrifice to him, praiſe him for ſalvation and deliverance wrought, pray to him for preſent and future mercies that were needful, and pay the vows he had there made, even to that God, that appeared unto thee when thou fleddeſt from the face of Eſau thy brother; who, reſenting his getting the birthright and bleſſing from him, threatened to kill him; which obliged him to flee from his father's houſe, and go into Meſopotamia, and in his way thither, God appeared to him, at the place called by him from thence Bethel, and gave him many pretious promiſes; and Jacob, there, made a ſolemn vow that if God would be with him, and keep him, and give him food and raiment, and return him to his his father's houſe, the pillar that was then and there ſet up ſhould be God's houſe, as well as he ſhould be his God. Jacob had now been 9 or 10 years in the land of Canaan, and had all done for him he deſired, and much more abundantly, and yet had not been at Bethel to make good his vow, either through forgetfulneſs or neglect; and therefore, as Jarchi thinks, was chaſtiſed for it in the affair of Dinah; or rather, for one can hardly think ſo good a man could forget, or would wilfully neglect ſuch a vow as this, that he wanted opportunity of going thither, or waited for a divine order, and now he had both, which he readily embraced.

℣. 2. Then Jacob ſaid unto his houſhold, &c.] His wives and children; and to all that were with him; his men-ſervants and maid-ſervants, and ſuch as remained with him of the captives of Shechem, who might chuſe to continue with him: put away the ſtrange gods that are among you; meaning not the Teraphim or images of Laban's which Rachel had ſtolen from him; for it can hardly be thought that theſe ſhould be retained ſo many years in Jacob's family, and uſed in an idolatrous manner; but rather ſuch as might be among the Canaanitiſh ſervants that had been lately taken into Jacob's ſervice, or that were among the captives of Shechem, or taken along with the ſpoil of that city; and ſo the Targum of Jonathan calls them, the idols of the people, which they brought from the idols temple at Shechem; and the words may be rendered, the gods of the ſtrangers [s], that is, of the Shechemites, who were heathens and aliens, ſtrangers to the true God, the knowledge and worſhip of him: and be clean; either by abſtaining from their wives, as ſome interpret it, from Exod. xix. 10. 15. or rather by waſhing their bodies, as Aben Ezra gives the ſenſe of it; their hands were full of the blood of the Shechemites, and needed to be waſhed and purified, as the Targum of Jonathan has it, from the pollutions of the ſlain, before they went to Bethel, the houſe of God; and theſe outward ablutions and purifications were ſignificative of inward cleanſing, by the grace of God, and of outward reformation of life and manners; ſee Iſ. i. 15, 16. and change your garments; which might be ſtained with blood, and therefore not fit to appear in before God, or were old and worn out, or ſordid apparel: changing and waſhing of garments were alſo emblems of the renewing of the mind, and cleanſing of the ſoul, and of the change of heart and life, as well as of pleaſure, delight and chearfulneſs in appearing before God.

℣. 3. And let us ariſe and go up to Bethel, &c.] Thus prepared and purged, their tents clear of idols, their bodies waſhed with pure water, and their garments new, neat and clean; all ſymbolical of inward purity, and of freedom from idolatry and evil works, as became thoſe who go to the houſe of God, and are his worſhippers, ſee Heb. x. 22. I will make there an altar unto God; as he has directed, and ſacrifice to him, and worſhip him, and give the tenth unto him, and ſo make it a Bethel, an houſe of God indeed, as he had vowed, ch. xxviii. 22. who anſwered me in the day of my diſtreſs; on account of his brother Eſau, from whoſe wrath he fled: and was with me in the way which I went; from his father's houſe to Padan-Aram; in which journey he was alone and deſtitute, and expoſed to many difficulties and dangers, but God was with him, and preſerved him, and directed and brought him to Laban's houſe in ſafety.

℣. 4. They gave unto Jacob all the ſtrange Gods which were in their hands, &c.] Whether in the hands of his ſervants or of the captives taken at Shechem, or in the hands of his ſons, who had them along with the ſpoil they took there; ſo the Targum of Jonathan, "they delivered into the hand "of Jacob, all the idols of the people which were "in their hands, which they had took of the idols "of Shechem:" and all their ear-rings which were in their ears; not the ear-rings that women wore in common, ſuch as Abraham's ſervant gave to Rebekah, and which Jacob's wives might wear, for ſuch were not unlawful; but either, which were worn in the ears of the ſtrange gods or idols; for ſuch uſed, it ſeems, according to ſome writers, to be decorated and ornamented after that manner; or rather in the ears of the idolaters themſelves, worn by them in a ſuperſtitious way, having the images of theſe idols on them: ſo the Targum of Jonathan, "and the "ear rings which were in the ears of the inhabi-"tants of the city of Shechem, in which were "formed the likeneſs of their idols:" and Jacob hid them under the oak which was by Shechem; that is, the idols, which, after he had broke to pieces perhaps, he dug a hole under an oak, and there buried them, that they might be no more made uſe of in an idolatrous way; and he choſe to put them under an oak, becauſe it is a tree which often ſtands many years before it is cut down, and beſides was uſed for religious purpoſes, and had in great veneration, and therefore ſeldom felled. Thoſe idols ſeem not to be made of any thing valuable, perhaps of wood or ſtone, for had they been of gold or ſilver, Jacob would, doubtleſs, have melted them, and converted them to other uſes, and not have buried them under ground. The Jews [t] ſay, that the idol Jacob hid under the oak, was in the form of a dove, which the Samaritans after ſome time found, and ſet it on the top of mount Gerizzim. Some take this oak to be the ſame with that mentioned in Joſh. xxiv. 26. but of that there can be no certainty, ſince Jacob, as it is highly probable, laid theſe images alone, and never intended any ſhould know any thing of them where they were.

℣. 5. And they journeyed, &c.] Jacob and his family, with all that were with them from Shechem to Bethel: and the terror of God was upon the cities that were round about them; an exceeding great pannic ſeized the inhabitants of the cities of the land of Canaan, all about Shechem, which was from God himſelf impreſſing it on their minds, through what the ſons of Jacob had done to that city: and they did not purſue after the ſons of Jacob; as it might have been thought they would, and take revenge on them for their ill uſage of the inhabitants of a neighbouring city; but inſtead of this, they were afraid they ſhould be uſed in the ſame manner; wherefore Jacob and his family journeyed in ſafety, and came to Bethel in peace.

℣. 6. So Jacob came to Luz, which is in the land of Canaan, that is Bethel, &c.] The place Jacob had called Bethel when he was there before, was formerly called Luz, ch. xxviii. 19. and is here ſaid to be in the land of Canaan, that is, in that part of the land which was inhabited by thoſe who were properly called Canaanites, to diſtinguiſh it from another Luz, which was in the land of the Hittites; Judg. i. 26. he and all the people that were with with him; wives, children, ſervants, or whoever elſe came from Shechem, theſe all came ſafe to Luz without any moleſtation or loſs.

℣. 7. And he built there an altar, &c.] As he was bid to do, and as he promiſed he would, ℣. 1. 3. and called the place El-beth-el; the God of Bethel; a title which God takes to himſelf, ch. xxxi. 13. or rather, the ſenſe is, that he called the place with reſpect to God, or becauſe of his appearance to him there, Bethel, confirming the name he had before given it, ch. xxviii. 19. ſee ℣. 15. as the following reaſon ſhews: becauſe there God appeared; or the divine perſons, for both words are plural that are here uſed; the Targum of Jonathan has it, the angels of God, and ſo Aben Ezra interprets it; but here, no doubt the divine being is meant, who appeared to Jacob in this place, as he went to Meſopotamia, and comforted and encouraged him with many promiſes: when he fled from the face of his brother; his brother Eſau, who was wroth with him, and ſought to take away his life, and therefore was forced to flee for it.

℣. 8. But Deborah, Rebekah's nurſe died, &c.] That is, when, and quickly after they were come to Bethel; a nurſe of Rebekah's came with her to Canaan, when ſhe married Iſaac, and is generally thought to be this Deborah, which is not improbable, Gen. xxiv. 59. though ſhe might have more nurſes than one, as great perſonages ſometimes have, and then it will not be ſo difficult to anſwer the objection made here; that Rebekah's nurſe, whom Jacob is ſuppoſed to leave in Canaan when he went to Padan-Aram, ſhould now be in his family when he returned from hence; ſince the reply would be, that that nurſe and this Deborah were not the ſame; but ſuppoſing them to be the ſame, which is moſt likely, this is accounted for ſeveral ways: according to Jarchi, who had it from an antient writer of theirs [u], Rebekah ſent her to fetch Jacob home, according to her promiſe, ch. xxvii. 45. but it is not very probable that ſhe ſhould ſend a woman, and one ſo ancient, on ſuch an errand: rather, this nurſe of hers, after ſhe had accompanied her to Canaan, and ſtayed a while with her there, returned to Haran again, and being very uſeful in Jacob's large family, and having a great reſpect for them, returned again with them, and which ſhe might chuſe in hopes of ſeeing Rebekah once more, whom ſhe had a ſtrong affection for; or, when Jacob was come into the land of Canaan to Shechem he might ſend for her from Hebron to be aſſiſting in his family; or going to viſit his parents, which he might do before he went with his whole family to them, might bring her with him to Shechem, who travelling with him to Bethel died there: her name ſignifies a bee, as Joſephus [w] obſerves: and ſhe was buried beneath Bethel; at the bottom of the hill or mountain on which Bethel ſtood: under an oak; of which there were many about Bethel, 1 Kings xiii. 14. 2 Kings ii. 23, 24. and it was not unuſual to bury the dead under trees, ſee 1 Sam. xxxi. 13. and the name of it was called Allon-bachuth; the oak of weeping, becauſe of the weeping and mourning of Jacob's family at her death, ſhe being a good woman, an antient ſervant, and in great eſteem with them. The Jews have a tradition that the occaſion of this weeping, or at leaſt, of the increaſe of it, was, that Jacob at this time, had the news of the death of Rebekah his mother; ſo the Targum of Jonathan, "there tidings were brought "to Jacob of the death of Rebekah his mother, "and he called the name of it another weeping;" and ſo Jarchi.

℣. 9. And God appeared unto Jacob, &c.] At Bethel, as he had at Shechem, when he bid him go thither, ℣. 1. or rather as he had at the brook Jabbok, where he ſaid to him the ſame things as here, ch. xxxii. 24, 28. though Jarchi interprets it of his appearing again to him at the ſame place at Bethel, where he had appeared to him the firſt time, at his going to Haran, and now a ſecond time: when he came out of Padan-aram; or returned from thence: and bleſſed him; with the ſame bleſſings as before, renewing and confirming them. Jarchi ſays, with the bleſſing of mourners, becauſe of the death of his mother, and her nurſe.

℣. 10. And God ſaid unto him, thy name is Jacob, &c.] Which his parents gave him at his birth, and by which he had been always called: thy name ſhall not be called any more Jacob, but Iſrael ſhall be thy name; not Jacob only, as Aben Ezra and Ben Melech interpret it, but Iſrael alſo, and that more commonly and frequently, and not only he himſelf perſonally, but his poſterity alſo: and he called his name Iſrael; confirmed the name he had before given him, ch. xxxii. 28. and by this confirmation of it ſignifying, that as he had prevailed over his brother Eſau, and eſcaped his hands, ſo he ſhould prevail over all that roſe up againſt him, and oppoſed him, even as he had power with God, and prevailed: though ſome think this name was only promiſed him before, but now actually given him; but then they take the angel that appeared wreſtling with him in the likeneſs of a man, to be a created angel, and that what he promiſed in the name of God, was now made good by God himſelf; there is great reaſon to believe that that angel was the increated one, the Son of God, as here alſo.

℣. 11. And God ſaid unto him, I am God almighty, &c.] And ſo able to protect and defend him, and to fulfil all promiſes made to him, and to ſupply him with every thing he wanted; being, as ſome chuſe to render the word, God all-ſufficient; having a ſufficiency of all good things in him to communicate to his people: be fruitful and multiply; which carries in it a promiſe or prophecy, that he ſhould increaſe and multiply, though not he himſelf perſonally, he having but one ſon born after this, yet in his poſterity: a nation, and a company of nations ſhall be of thee; the nation of Iſrael, called ſo after his name, and the 12 tribes, which were as ſo many nations, of which the above nation conſiſted: and kings ſhall come out of thy loins; as Saul, David, Solomon, and many others, who were kings of Iſrael and of Judah, and eſpecially the king Meſſiah; yea, all his poſterity were kings and prieſts, or a kingdom of prieſts, Exod. xix. 6.

℣. 12. And the land which I gave Abraham and Iſaac, to thee I will give it, &c.] Meaning the land of Canaan, which, as he had by promiſe given it to his grandfather and father, ſo he would give it to him; thus renewing the grant of it for his comfort, and the encouragement of his faith, when he had been in danger of being deſtroyed by the inhabitants of it, and was obliged to remove from one part of it to another: and to thy ſeed after thee will I give the land; and not only make a grant of it to them, but put them into the poſſeſſion of it, as in proceſs of time he did.

℣. 13. And God went up from him, &c.] Or from above him [x]; by this is ſeems that there was a viſible ſible appearance of the glory of the Lord, as Onkelos, or of the Shekinah, as Jonathan; even of the Son of God in an human form, who either appeared juſt above him, or on the ſame ſpot with him, converſing with him as above related; and when he had done, aſcended in a viſible manner from him, till he diſappeared: in the place where he talked with him; whether it was over him, or by him; thence he removed from him, and ceaſed talking with him; for communion with a divine perſon is not conſtant and uninterrupted in the preſent ſtate.

[u] R. Moſes Hadarſan. [w] Antiq. l. 5. c. 5. §. 2. [x] מעליו deſuper eum, Montanus.

℣. 14. And Jacob ſet up a pillar in the place where he talked with him, &c.] He had ſet up a pillar in this place before he went to Padan-aram, ch. xxviii. 18. and ſome think this pillar is here referred to, and render the words, had ſet up a pillar [y]; but as that was done 30 years ago, it is very likely it was demoliſhed by the heathens before this time, or was fallen to ruin, wherefore this muſt be at leaſt a renewal or reparation of it: tho' it rather ſeems to be another pillar, and quite a new one, being ſet up in that very ſpot of ground, over, or on which God had been talking with him: and the following account of it ſeems to confirm the ſame, even a pillar of ſtone; made of ſeveral ſtones hewed and poliſhed, and well put together; whereas the former was but a ſingle ſtone, rude and unpoliſhed, though it is probable it was one of theſe: and he poured a drink-offering thereon; of wine, of which drink-offerings under the law were, thereby conſecrating it to the worſhip and ſervice of God. Aben Ezra ſays, it was either of water or of wine, with which he waſhed it, and after that poured oil on it; and the Targum of Jonathan ſays, he poured a drink-offering of wine, and a drink-offering of water: and he poured oil thereon; as he did before, ſee the note on ch. xxviii. 18.

℣. 15. And Jacob called the name of the place where God ſpake with him, Bethel.] He confirmed the name he had before given it, when he went to Meſopotamia, and now upon his return renews and eſtabliſhes it; or he gave this name more eſpecially to that particular ſpot where God converſed with him, and on which he erected a pillar, and conſecrated it to religious worſhip, and ſo made it God's houſe, as he promiſed he would, ch. xxviii. 22. both building an altar for ſacrifice, and ſetting up a pillar, which was beginning an houſe for God.

℣. 16. And they journeyed from Bethel, &c.] Jacob and his family; how long they ſtayed there is not certain, ſome ſay four months [a]; hence they removed towards Bethlehem, which was 12 miles from Bethel [a], in their way to Hebron: and there was but a little way to come to Ephrath; or Bethlehem, as it was alſo called, ℣. 19. a mile off of it, according to the Targums of Onkelos and Jeruſalem; or about a mile, as Saadiah Gaon; for it was not a preciſe exact mile, but ſomething leſs than a mile, as Ben Melech obſerves; and ſo Benjamin of Tudela, who was on the ſpot, ſays [b], that Rachel's grave is about half a mile from Bethlehem. Ben Gerſom thinks the word here uſed ſignifies cultivated land, and that the ſenſe is, that there were only fields, vineyards and gardens to go through to the city, ſee Gen. xlviii. 7. 2 Kings v. 19: and Rachel travailed, and ſhe had hard labour; the time of child-birth was come, and which came ſuddenly upon her as travail does, even while journeying, which obliged them to ſtop; and her pains came upon her, and theſe very ſharp and ſevere, ſo that ſhe had a difficult time of it: pains and ſorrow in child-bearing are the fruit of ſin, and more or leſs attend all in ſuch a circumſtance; but in ſome, labour is more painful than in others, and more at one time than at another, and is the moſt painful in women, than in other creatures.

℣. 17. And it came to paſs when ſhe was in hard labour, &c.] In the midſt of it, and at the worſt: that the midwife ſaid unto her, fear not; for Rachel being big with child, it was neceſſary to take a midwife with them in the journey; and perhaps this might be one that was always kept in the family, and had been aſſiſting to all Jacob's wives and concubines at their labours; and this ſeems probable from what follows, ſince ſhe not only bids her be of good courage, and not fear, comforting her under her pains, giving her hopes they would ſoon be over, and that ſhe would have a ſafe delivery, and do well: but this ſhe aſſures her of, thou ſhalt have this ſon alſo; as ſhe had one before, at whoſe birth ſhe ſaid, the Lord ſhall add to me another ſon; and therefore called his name Joſeph, ch. xxx. 24. this the midwife remembered, and endeavours to comfort her with the accompliſhment of it.

℣. 18. And it came to paſs, as her ſoul was departing, for ſhe died, &c.] In child-birth; ſhe had moſt paſſionately deſired children, without which ſhe could not live with eaſe and peace of mind, and now ſhe dies by having one, ſee ch. xxx. 1. and by this account of her death it appears, that death is the ſeparation and diſunion of ſoul and body; that at death the ſoul departs from the body; that the ſoul does not die with it, but goes elſewhere, and lives in a ſeparate ſtate, and never dies; it goes into another world, a world of ſpirits, even unto God that gave it, Eccl. xii. 7: and ſhe called his name Benoni; which ſignifies the ſon of my ſorrow, having borne and brought him forth in ſorrow, and now about to leave him as ſoon as born, which might increaſe her ſorrow; or the ſon of my mourning, as Aben Ezra and Ben Gerſom interpret it; or the ſon of my ſtrength, all her ſtrength being exhauſted in bringing him forth: but his father called him Benjamin; that is, the ſon of the right hand, being as dear to him, and as beloved by him as his right hand; or who would be as the right hand to him, his ſtaff, and ſupport in his old age; or elſe as being the ſon of her who was as his right hand, dear and aſſiſting to him. Some render it, the ſon of days, or years, that is, the ſon of his old age, as he is called, ch. xliv. 20. Jarchi and Ben Gerſom interpret it, the ſon of the ſouth; the right hand being put for the ſouth; and they think this ſon was ſo called, becauſe he only was born in the land of Canaan, which lay, they ſay, to the ſouth with reſpect to Meſopotamia, where the reſt were born; but be the etymology of the word as it will, the change of the name ſeems to be made by Jacob, becauſe that which Rachel gave her ſon would have perpetually put Jacob in mind of the ſorrow of his beloved Rachel, and therefore gave him a name more pleaſant and agreeable. The Jews ſays [c], he was born the 11th of October, and lived 111 years.

℣. 19. And Rachel died, and was buried in the way to Ephrath, which is Bethlehem.] Hence called Bethlehem-ephratah, Mic. v. 2. with great pertinency tinency is Rachel repreſented as if riſen from her grave, and weeping for her children, when the children of Bethlehem, and thereabout, were ſlain by Herod, ſhe being buried ſo near that place, Matt. ii. 16,17,18. at what age ſhe died is not ſaid. Polyhiſtor, out of Demetrius [d], reports, that ſhe died after Jacob had lived with her 23 years.

℣. 20. And Jacob ſet a pillar upon her grave, &c.] A ſepulchral monument erected in memory of her; this, according to Benjamin of Tudela [e], was made of 12 ſtones, according to the number of the ſons of Jacob, and over it was a vault or roof, ſupported by four pillars: that is the pillar of Rachel's grave unto this day; it continued to the times of Moſes, the writer of this hiſtory, and to the times of Samuel, as appears from 1 Sam. x. 2. and even travellers of late times affirm it to be ſeen ſtill, to the north of Bethlehem on the right hand of the way as you go from Bethlehem to Jeruſalem; but the preſent ſepulchral monument, as Mr. Maundrel ſays [f], can be none of that which Jacob erected, for it appears plainly to be a modern Turkiſh ſtructure. Near the grave are found ſome little black ſtones, which ſtrangers pick up, and are fancied to be helpful to women, to give them an eaſier birth, the ſame the above traveller ſays reſemble peas. The Jews that paſs by it were uſed to engrave their names on the ſtones of the pillars [g].

℣. 21. And Iſrael journeyed, &c.] Having ſtayed near Bethlehem, as it is ſaid, about two months [h]; this is the firſt time Jacob is by Moſes called Iſrael, after this name was given him; the reaſon of which the Jews ſay is, becauſe he bore the death of Rachel with ſo much patience: and ſpread his tent beyond the tower of Eder; which was a place of paſturage, and fit for his flocks, ſee Mic. iv. 8. it was about a mile from Bethlehem to the ſouth [i], and is ſuppoſed to be the place where the ſhepherds were watching their flocks, when the angel reported to them the birth of Chriſt, Luke ii. 8. pretty remarkable are the words added here in the Targum of Jonathan, "the place from whence the "king Meſſiah will be revealed in the end of "days."

℣. 22. And it came to paſs when Iſrael dwelt in that land, &c.] In that part of it near Bethlehem: that Reuben went and lay with Bilhah his father's concubine; his concubine-wife; ſhe was the maid that Rachel gave him, and this added to his affliction, and made it double, to loſe Rachel by death, and to have her favourite maid, his concubine, defiled by his own ſon, and whom it is highly probable he abſtained from hereafter. This, though a very hainous ſin of his ſon's, yet might be ſuffered as a chaſtiſement to Jacob, for making uſe of concubines: and Iſrael heard it; tho' the crime was committed ſecretly, and was thought it would have been concealed, but by ſome means or other Jacob heard of it, and no doubt ſeverely reproved his ſon for it; and though nothing is here related, as ſaid by him on this occaſion, it is certain it gave him great offence, grief and trouble, and he remembered it to his dying day, and took away the birth-right from Reuben on account of it, ch. xlix. 3, 4. an empty ſpace here follows in the original text, and a pauſe in it, denoting perhaps the amazement Jacob was filled with when he heard it; and the great grief of his heart, which was ſuch, that he was not able to ſpeak a word; the Septuagint verſion fills up the ſpace by adding, and it appeared evil in his ſight: now the ſons of Jacob were 12; who were the heads of 12 tribes, Benjamin the laſt being born, and Jacob having afterwards no more children, they were all reckoned up under their reſpective mothers, excepting Dinah a daughter, from whom there was no tribe, in the following verſes.

℣. 23. The ſons of Leah, &c.] Jacob's firſt wife, which are ſix, and are reckoned in order, according to their birth, Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Iſſachar and Zebulun; then Rachel's, his next wife, though in right his firſt and only one, who had two children, Joſeph and Benjamin, ℣. 24. then Bilhah's ſons, who was Rachel's handmaid, and theſe were two, Dan and Naphtali, ℣. 25. and laſtly, the ſons of Zilpah, Leah's handmaid, which were two alſo, Gad and Aſher, ℣. 26. where it is added, theſe are the ſons of Jacob, which were born to him in Padan-aram, all excepting Benjamin; and becauſe they were by far the greater part, even all but one, that were born there, this is ſaid in general; and there having been given in the context ſuch a particular account of the birth of Benjamin, and of the place of it, there was no need for the hiſtorian particularly to except him, ſince the reader would be in no danger of being led into a miſtake.

℣. 27. And Jacob came unto Iſaac his father, &c.] No mention being made of his mother, it is very probable ſhe was dead; and Iſaac being alone, and very old, and the time of his death drawing nigh, he might ſend for Jacob to come with his family, and be with him; for it can hardly be thought that this was the firſt time of Jacob's viſiting his father ſince he came into the land of Canaan, which muſt be about 10 years; but as yet he had not come with his family to him, and in order to abide with him: unto Mamre, unto the city of Arbah, which is Hebron; Mamre was a plain, ſo called from the name of a man, a friend and confederate of Abraham, ch. xiii. 18. and xiv. 13. where, or near to which, ſtood a city, called Kirjath Arbah, or the city of the four, Arbah and his three ſons; ſo that it might be called Tetrapolis, and was in after-times called Hebron: where Abraham and Iſaac ſojourned; lived good part of their days, ſee ch. xiii. 18. and xviii. 1. and xxiii. 2. it was about 20 miles from Bethlehem, and the tower of Eder [k], where Jacob was laſt.

℣. 28. And the days of Iſaac were 180 years.] He lived 40 years after he had made his will, and bleſſed his two ſons. Jacob was now 120 years of age, being born when his father was 60; and Joſeph was now 29 years of age, ſo that Iſaac lived 12 years after the ſelling of Joſeph into Egypt; he was five years older than his father Abraham was when he died.

℣. 29. And Iſaac gave up the ghoſt, and died, &c.] According to an Arabic writer [l], he died at the end of the year 3668, in the month Jiar, in the 120th year of Jacob, and his children buried him in the cave in which Abraham was buried, in the city Chabil: and was gathered unto his people; his ſoul was gathered to the righteous, his body was laid where Abraham and Sarah were buried: being old, and full of days; the number of which is obſerved in the the preceding verſe: and his ſons Eſau and Jacob buried him; in the cave of Machpelah near Mamre, where he lived and died, and where his parents had been buried, and Rebekah his wife. Eſau very probably was ſent for upon his father's death, or a little before it. This ſhews, that there was a reconciliation between Jacob and Eſau, and that it continued; and that Jacob did not decline the viſit of him at Seir, nor in a clandeſtine manner took his journey another way, and avoided going thither on his invitation.

CHAP. XXXVI.

THIS chapter gives us a genealogical account of Eſau's family, of his wives and ſons, with whom he removed from Seir, ℣. 1—10. of his ſons ſons, or grandſons, who were dukes in the land of Edom, ℣. 11—19. after which is inſerted a genealogy of Seir the Horite, into whoſe family Eſau married, and of his children, and the dukes among them, ℣. 20—30. then follows a liſt of the kings of Edom, before there were any in Iſrael, ℣. 31—39. and the chapter is cloſed with a brief narration of the dukes of Eſau, according to their families, ℣. 40—43.

℣. 1. Now theſe are the generations of Eſau, who is Edom.] Who was ſirnamed Edom, from the red pottage he ſold his birth-right for to his brother Jacob, ch. xxv. 30. an account is given of him, and his poſterity, not only becauſe he was a ſon of Iſaac, lately made mention of as concerned in his burial; but becauſe his poſterity would be often taken notice of in the ſacred ſcriptures, and ſo their genealogy would ſerve to illuſtrate ſuch paſſages; and Maimonides [m] thinks the principal reaſon is, that whereas Amalek, a branch of Eſau's family, were to be deſtroyed by an expreſs command of God, it was neceſſary that all the reſt ſhould be particularly deſcribed, leſt they ſhould all periſh together; but other ends are anſwered hereby, as partly to ſhew the fulfilment of the promiſe to Abraham, concerning the multiplication of his ſeed, and the accompliſhment of the oracle to Rebekah, ſignifying that two nations were in her womb, one of which were thoſe Edomites; as alſo to obſerve how the bleſſing of Iſaac his father came upon him with effect, ch. xxii. 17. and xxv. 23. and xxvii. 39, 40.

℣. 2. And Eſau took his wives of the daughters of Canaan, &c.] Of the Canaanites, the poſterity of curſed Canaan, moſt of them were of them, though not all, the two following were, and ſo thoſe, if different from them in ch. xxvi. 34. one of his wives was of the family of Iſhmael, as after related: Adah the daughter of Elon the Hittite; according to Jarchi and Aben Ezra, this is the ſame with Baſhemath, ch. xxvi. 34. and that ſhe had two names: and Aholibamah the daughter of Anah, the daughter of Zibeon the Hivite; the daughter of the one, and the grand-daughter of the other, it being uſual in ſcripture to call grandchildren children, for Zibeon and Anah were father and ſon, ℣. 24, 25. and the Samaritan, Septuagint and Syriac verſions read here, the daughter of Anah the ſon of Zibeon: there are an Anah and a Zibeon who were brethren, ℣. 20. wherefore Aben Ezra ſuppoſes that theſe two brothers, or the father and ſon lay with the ſame woman, and it could not be known whoſe child it was that was born of her, and therefore this was called the daughter of them both. Jarchi ſuppoſes this wife of Eſau to be the ſame with Judith, ch. xxvi. 34. but not only the names differ, but alſo the names of their fathers, and of the tribe or nation they were of.

℣. 3. And Baſhemath, Iſhmael's daughter, ſiſter of Nebaioth.] The eldeſt ſon of Iſhmael, ſee ch. xxviii. 9. called there Mahalath.

℣. 4. And Adah bare to Eſau Eliphaz, &c.] This ſon of Eſau, according to Jerom [n], is the ſame with him mentioned in the book of Job, as one of his friends that came to viſit him; and ſo ſays the Targum of Jonathan on ℣. 12. but he rather was the grandſon of this man, ſince he is called the Temanite: and Baſhemath bare Reuel; the name is the ſame with Reuel or Raguel, the name of Jethro; but cannot be the ſame perſon as is ſaid by ſome, for he was a Midianite and not an Edomite, Exod. ii. 18. Numb. x. 29.

℣. 5. And Aholibamah bare Jeuſh, and Jaalam, and Korah, &c.] In this genealogy mention is made of another Korah among the ſons of Eliphaz, ℣. 16. which Jarchi thinks is the ſame with this, and takes him to be a baſtard, and begotten in inceſt by Eliphaz, on his father's wife Aholibamah; but Aben Ezra obſerves, that ſome are of opinion, that there were two Korahs, one the ſon of Aholibamah, and the other the ſon of Adah; but he thinks there were but one, which was the ſon of Aholibamah, and is reckoned among the ſons of Eliphaz, becauſe he dwelt among them; or perhaps his mother died when he was little, and Adah brought him up with her ſons, and ſo was reckoned her ſon; ſuch were the children of Michal, Saul's daughter: theſe are the ſons of Eſau, which were born to him in the land of Canaan; and we dont read of any born to him elſewhere; ſo that of all his wives, which ſome think were four, others five, he had but five ſons; what daughters he had is not related, though from the following verſe it appears he had ſome.

℣. 6. And Eſau took his wives, and his ſons, and his daughters, &c.] The names of his wives and ſons are before given; but what were the names of his daughters, or their number, is not ſaid: and all the perſons of his houſe; his men-ſervants and maid-ſervants that were born in his houſe, or bought with his money; the word for perſons ſignifies ſouls [o], and is ſometimes uſed for ſlaves that are bought and ſold, ſee Ezek. xxvii. 13. Rev. xviii. 13: and his cattle, and all his beaſts; his ſheep and oxen, camels and aſſes: and all his ſubſtance which he had got in the land of Canaan; before he went to Seir the firſt time, part of which he might leave behind in Canaan, with ſervants to improve it; and alſo that part of his father's perſonal eſtate which fell to him at his death, as well as what he might further acquire after his death, during his ſtay in Canaan: and went into the country from the face of his brother Jacob; not into another part of the ſame country; but into another country, as the

the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan ſupply it; and ſo the Arabic verſion, even unto Seir, as appears by what follows; and whither he had been before, and had obtained large poſſeſſions, and now having got all he could at his father's death, and collecting together all his other ſubſtance, thought fit to retire from thence to Seir, which he liked better, and for a reaſon afterwards given; God thus diſpoſing his mind, and making the circumſtances of things neceſſary, that he ſhould remove in order to make way for Jacob, and his poſterity, to dwell in a land which was deſigned for them: and ſo the Samaritan and Septuagint verſions read it, and he went out of the land of Canaan; and the Syriac verſion is, and he went to the land of Seir. Some render the words to this ſenſe, that he went thither before the coming of Jacob [p]; and it is true that he did go thither before his brother came again into Canaan; but of this, the text ſpeaks not, for what follows will not agree with it; others better, becauſe of Jacob [q]; not for fear of him, as the Targum of Jonathan, which paraphraſes the words, "for the terror of his brother Jacob was caſt upon "him;" but becauſe he knew, by the bleſſing of his father, and the oracle of God, and his concurring providence in all things, that the land of Canaan belonged to him, and alſo for a reaſon that follows.

℣. 7. For their riches were more than that they might dwell together, &c.] And therefore it was proper to part, as Abraham and Lot had done before, ch. xiii. 6. and the land wherein they were ſtrangers could not bear them, becauſe of their cattle; their cattle were ſo numerous that they could not get paſturage for them, there not being enough left them by the inhabitants of it for them to occupy; nor could they hire land of them ſufficient for them both; they being not poſſeſſors but ſojourners in it, and therefore could have no more of it than the inhabitants thought fit to let unto them.

℣. 8. Thus dwelt Eſau in mount Seir, &c] Before he is ſaid to be in the land of Seir, ch. xxxii. 3. now to dwell in a mount of that name; from which, driving the Horites, he ſeized upon and dwelt in it; it had not its name from his own rough, ſhaggy hair, as Joſephus ſays [r], much leſs from the ſatyrs, and hairy dæmons that frequented it as R. Abraham Seba [s], but rather from Seir the Horite who inhabited the land, ℣. 20. unleſs he had his name from the mountain which might be ſo called, from its being rough and rugged like ſhaggy hair, and being covered with buſhes and brambles which carried ſuch a reſemblance; and ſo it ſtands oppoſed to mount Halak near it, Joſh. xi. 17. which ſignifies, the bald or ſmooth mountain, being deſtitute of ſhrubs, &c. The Targum of Jonathan calls this mountain mount Gabla, and one part of the land of Edom or Idumea, was called Gobolites, as Joſephus [t] relates, perhaps the ſame with Gebal, Pſ. lxxxiii. 7. hither Eſau went and took up his reſidence, after things were amicably adjuſted between him and his brother Jacob; the Jews ſay [u], that Iſaac left all he had to his two ſons, and that after they had buried him, Eſau ſaid to Jacob, let us divide what our father has left us into two parts, and I will chooſe becauſe I am the firſt-born; ſo Jacob divided it into two parts; all that his father had left he made one part, and the land of Iſrael the other part, and Eſau took what his father left, ſee ℣. 6. and the land of Iſrael and the cave of Machpelah he delivered to Jacob, and they drew up everlaſting writings between them. Now this or ſome thing like it being the caſe, and thoſe the circumſtances of things, thus, and by that means, ſo it came to paſs, that Eſau dwelt in Seir; and Jacob remained ſecure and quiet in the land of Canaan; Eſau in Edom, ſo called from the red pottage he had of Jacob, which is repeated to fix the odium of that tranſaction upon him, as well as for the ſake of what follows, ſhewing the reaſon why his poſterity were called Edomites.

℣. 9. And theſe are the generations of Eſau, &c.] Or the poſterity of Eſau, his children and grandchildren, as before and hereafter related: the father of the Edomites in mount Seir; from whom they of that mountain and in the adjacent country had the name of Edomites or Idumeans.

℣. 10. Theſe are the names of Eſau's ſons, &c.] In this and ſome following verſes, an account is given of the ſons of Eſau, which agrees with what is before obſerved, and of his ſons ſons: Eliphaz the ſon of Adah the wife of Eſau; who ſeems to be his firſt wife, and this his firſt ſon: Reuel the ſon of Baſhemath and wife of Eſau; his ſecond ſon by another wife, a daughter of Iſhmael, ℣. 3, 4.

℣. 11. And the ſons of Eliphaz were Teman, &c.] This was his firſt-born, and from him the city of Teman in Edom or Idumea had its name, ſee Jer. xlix. 7. Amos i. 12. and Eliphaz is called the Temanite from hence Job ii. 11. 4 more ſons are mentioned, Omar, Zepho, and Gatam, and Kenaz; but I do not find that any towns or cities, or any part of the land of Edom were denominated from any of them; only it may be obſerved that Zepho is called Zephi in 1 Chron. i. 36. the account ſeems fabulous and not to be depended on; which Joſephus Ben Gorion [w] gives of him, of oppoſing the burial of Jacob, being taken by Joſeph and carried into Egypt, and at his death fleeing to Carthage, and from thence to the Romans, and was king of them [x].

℣. 12. And Timna was concubine to Eliphaz Eſau's ſon, &c.] She is ſaid to be the ſiſter of Lotan, the eldeſt ſon of Seir the Horite, ℣. 22. in 1 Chron. i. 36. mention is made of Timna among the ſons of Eliphaz, and of duke Timnah here, ℣. 40. and Gerundinſis [y] is of opinion, that Timna the concubine of Eliphaz, after ſhe had bore Amalek, conceived and bore another ſon, and ſhe dying in child-birth, he called it by her name to perpetuate her memory: but Jarchi ſays, that Eliphaz lay with Lotan's mother, the wife of Seir the Horite, of whom was born Timna, and when ſhe grew up ſhe became his concubine, and ſo was both his daughter and his concubine: and ſhe bare to Eliphaz Amalek; from whence the Amalekites ſprung, often mentioned in ſcripture, whom the Iſraelites were commanded utterly to deſtroy: theſe were the ſons of Adah Eſau's wife; that is, her grandſons.

℣. 13. And theſe are the ſons of Reuel, &c.] Another ſon of Eſau's; this man had 4 ſons as follow, Nahath, and Zerah, Shammah and Mizzah; of whom we know no more than their names, unleſs Maps or Maſſa, which Ptolemy [z] places in Idumea, ſhould have its name from Mizzah: theſe were were the ſons of Baſhemath Eſau's wife; her grandſons, as before.

℣. 14. And theſe were the ſons of Aholibamah the daughter of Anah, the daughter of Zibeon Eſau's wife, &c.] See the note on ℣. 2. here alſo the Samaritan and Septuagint verſions read, the daughter of Anah the ſon of Zibeon: and ſhe bare to Eſau, Jeuſh, and Jaalam, and Korah; this is repeated from ℣. 5. no mention is made of her grand-children, as of his other wives.

℣. 15. Theſe were dukes of the ſons of Eſau, &c.] Ben Melech ſays, the difference between a duke and a king was, that a king is crowned and a duke is not crowned; but Jarchi interprets the word of heads of families, which ſeems probable; ſo that as Eſau's ſons and grandſons are before related, here it is ſuggeſted that they had large and numerous families, of which they were the heads and governors; and in this and the following verſes, 16, 17, 18, 19. the ſons and grandſons of Eſau by his ſeveral wives, are rehearſed as in the preceding verſes with the title of duke given to each of them; only among the ſons of Eliphaz is reckoned duke Korah, not before mentioned among his ſons, and is left out in the Samaritan verſion; ſee the note on ℣. 7, to which it may be added, that according to Gerundenſis [a], this is the ſame with Timna, related among the ſons of Eliphaz, 1 Chron. i. 36. who was called by his father Korah: or this might be a grandſon of Eliphaz.

℣. 20. Theſe are the ſons of Seir the Horite, who inhabited the land, &c.] Before, as the Targum of Jonathan adds, that is, before it was inhabited by Eſau and his poſterity, and called Edom, and had from him the name of Seir; but the Horites dwelt here before him, even in Abraham's time, Gen. xiv. 6. and who were ſo called from their dwelling under ground in holes and caves, with which the further part of the land of Edom abounded, and are the ſame the Greeks call Troglodite: Jarchi ſays, from their Rabbins, theſe were very expert in the nature of the land, and knew what was fit for olives and what for vines. Now the genealogy of this man is here given, partly to ſhew who were the antient inhabitants of this land before they were drove out, and ſucceeded by Eſau and his ſons, Deut. ii. 12. 22. and partly becauſe of the inter-marriages of Eſau and his poſterity with them, whereby they more eaſily came into the poſſeſſion of the country; for Eſau married the daughter of Anah the ſon of Zibeon a ſon of Seir, ℣. ii. 24. 25. and Eliphaz took Timna, a ſiſter of Lotan the ſon of Seir to be his concubine, ℣. xii. 22. the names of the ſons of Seir follow, Lotan, and Shobal, and Zibeon, and Anah; the firſt of theſe is ſaid [b] to be the ſame with Latinus, a king that reigned in Italy, which ſeems to be taken from the fancied reſemblance of names. Zibeon and Anah are here ſpoken of as brethren, the ſons of Seir; whereas in ℣. 24. they are made mention of as father and ſon, ſee the note on ℣. 2. Zibeon, according to the Jewiſh writers [c], committed inceſt with his mother, whence came Anah, and is called his brother, becauſe of the ſame mother, and his ſon, as being begotten by him. They ſeem to ſeek for ſuch kind of copulations to reproach the Edomites.

℣. 21. And Diſhon, and Ezer, and Diſhan, &c.] Theſe were 3 others of the ſons of Seir, which with the other 4 before-mentioned made 7: theſe are the dukes of the Horites, the children of Seir in the land of Edom; theſe were in the land of Edom before it was ſo called and poſſeſſed by the Edomites, and whoſe poſterity afterwards became tributary to them.

℣. 22. And the children of Lotan were Hori and Heman, &c.] The firſt of theſe ſeems to have his name from the general name of the tribe or nation, and the other is called Homam, 1 Chron. i. 39. and Lotan's ſiſter was Timna; whom Eliphaz the firſt-born of Eſau took for his concubine, ℣. 12. for the ſake of which, her relation to Lotan is here mentioned; and ſhe is ſaid to be the ſiſter of this man particularly, though there were 7 brethren of them, becauſe ſhe might be his ſiſter both by father and mother's ſide, when ſhe was not of the other only by the father's ſide.

℣. 23. And the children of Shobal were theſe, &c.] Who was the ſecond ſon of Seir, and whoſe ſons were the 5 following: Alvan, and Manahath, and Ebal, Shepho, and Onam; in 1 Chron. i. 40. Alvan is called Alian, and Shepho is Shephi.

℣. 24. And theſe are the children of Zibeon, &c.] The 3d ſon of Seir, and who had two ſons; both Ajah and Anah; of the latter it is obſerved: this was that Anah that found the mules in the wilderneſs, as he fed the aſſes of Zibeon his father; who obſerved, whilſt he was feeding his father's aſſes in the wilderneſs, that the he-aſſes coupled with mares, or horſes with the ſhe-aſſes, and produced another ſort of creatures called mules; and by this means found out the way how ſuch creatures might be produced, and practiſed it: ſo Ælianus ſays [d], that mules are not the produce of nature, but you may call it an adulterous invention of human contrivance and boldneſs, and a theft: this is the common interpretation, and to which our verſion leads: but againſt it it may be obſerved, that the word for mules is different from this here uſed, nor is this word ever uſed of mules, nor does it appear that there were any creatures of this ſort before the days of David; nor is the word tranſlated found ever uſed of that which before was not in being, but of what already exiſted; nor is there any mention of horſes or mares in this account alſo; had it referred to a mixture of theſe creatures with aſſes, it would not have been omitted. Some think therefore the words are to be rendered, he found waters in the wilderneſs; ſources and collections of waters which were not uſual in a wilderneſs, and of great worth and uſe in deſert lands, as Edom was, and in thoſe hot countries, and the Vulgate Latin verſion render it, hot waters; but then to the fixing of either of theſe verſions, the word muſt be altered either in its points or letters, for which there is no authority. The Targum of Onkelos renders it mighty ones or giants, and may ſignify the Emim, the aleph being changed for yod, as Aben Ezra obſerves; and then the ſenſe is, that theſe gigantic people, who were ſo called from the terror they brought upon their neighbours, and who dwelt near the Horim in Seir, Deut. ii. 10, 11, 12. as they uſed to ſteal from their flocks, Anah lighted on them in the wilderneſs, and fell upon them, and took them; and with this agrees the Samaritan verſion, he found giants in the wilderneſs; and ſo Abendana interprets the words: Aben Ezra obſerves, that many interpret the word of plants or herbs; and a very learned [e] man is of opinion that the word uſed is is the name of an useful herb or plant, first discovered by Anah. This Anah, though a keeper of his father's asses, is afterwards called duke Anah; it being the custom of the sons of great personages to be the keepers of flocks and herds; see the note on ch. xxix. 9.

℣. 25. And the children of Anah were these, &c.] Dishon, the name of one of his uncles, ℣. 21. and Aholibamah the daughter of Anah; Aben Ezra thinks this is not the same Anah that was mentioned in the beginning of this verse; since, if he was the same, there was no need to mention him again, but that he is the same that is mentioned in ℣. 1. but if he is not the same that is spoken of in this and the preceding verse, it is difficult to account for the mention of him at all in this place: that he is the same as in ℣. 1. seems to be right, though it is attended with this difficulty that the Anah and Aholibamah there, are represented as of the Hivites, whereas here they are reckoned among the Horites; but it may be, as Ainsworth observes on ℣. 20. that the Horites were of the race of the Hivites originally; and indeed this Aholibamah being the wife of Esau, seems to be the reason of this particular notice taken of her here. She is omitted in 1 Chron. i. 41.

℣. 26. And these are the sons of Dishon, &c.] Not of Dishon the son of Anah, but of Dishon the son of Seir, ℣. 21. and they are the 4 following; Hembdan, and Eshban, and Ithran, and Cheran; the first of these is called Amram, or rather Chamram, 1 Chron. i. 41.

℣. 27. The children of Ezer are these, &c.] Another son of Scir, who had the following sons: Bilhan, and Zaavan, and Achan; the 2 last are called Zavan and Jakan, in 1 Chron. i. 42.

℣. 28. The children of Dishon are these, &c.] The last of the 7 sons of Seir, and who had 2 sons Uz and Aran; from the former of these the land of Uz, inhabited by the Edomites, had its name, Lam. iv. 21. some have taken this to be the country of Job, ch. i. 1.

℣. 29. These are the dukes that came of the Horites, &c.] Not that succeeded one after another, as the kings next mentioned did, but were together at the same time, heads of respective families, and governors of them; and then the 7 sons of Seir are rehearsed in this and the following verse in their order, with the title of duke annexed to each of them, duke Lotan, &c.

℣. 30. These are the dukes that came of Hori, &c.] The ancestor of Seir, whence he is called the Horite, unless the singular is put for the plural, used in the preceding verse: among their dukes in the land of Seir; not that there were other dukes besides them in the land of Seir until Esau got among them, but these were they whose habitations were before in the land of Gabla (or Seir); as the Targum of Jonathan paraphrases it; or in, or according to their dukedoms, as the Septuagint version; in their respective families where they had the government, and which became very numerous.

℣. 31. And these are the kings that reigned in the land of Edom, &c.] In the land that was afterwards called the land of Edom; for this land was not so called when these kings began to reign: for, according to bishop Cumberland [f], and those that follow him [g], these were Horite kings, who, after their defeat by Chedorlaomer, ch. xiv. 6. in order to secure themselves the better from such a calamity for the future, set up a kingdom, and which appears by the following account, to be elective; and so Maimonides [h] observes, that not one of these kings were of Edom: and these were, before there reigned any king over the children of Israel; and there being no kings over Israel until many years after the times of Moses, hence some have thought, these words are inserted by some other writer after him; but there is no need to suppose that, for Moses knew from foregoing prophecies and promises, that kings would arise out of them and reign over them, ch. xvii. 6. and xxxv. 11. and this he was so certain of, that he himself, by divine direction, gave laws and rules to the children of Israel respecting their future kings, Deut. xvii. 14—20. besides Moses himself was king in Jeshurun or Israel, Deut. xxxiii. 5. so that it is the same as if he had said, these are the kings that reigned in Edom before his time.

℣. 32. And Bela the son of Beor reigned in Edom, &c.] His name was not Balac, as the Septuagint version, which may lead to think of Balak king of Moab; nor is this the same with Balaam, the son of Beor, who lived ages after, as some in Aben Ezra: who he was we know no more of than what is here said; he was the first Horite king, and is placed by Mr. Bedford [i] in A. M. 2002: and the name of his city was Dinhabah; the place either where he was born, or where he had been governor before, but of it we read no where else.

℣. 33. And Bela died, &c.] How long he reigned is not known with any certainty, nor whether he left any sons behind him; if he did, they did not succeed him in the throne; for Jobab the son of Zerah of Bozrah reigned in his stead; this king, some have thought to be the same with Job, and from whom one of the books of scripture has its name; but neither their names, nor age, nor country agree: who this Jobab and his father Zerah were, cannot be said: they seem to be of the same country in which Jobab reigned, since he is said to be of Bozrah, a famous city of Idumea, after spoken of in the prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah and others. Jarchi takes it to be a city of Moab, and indeed it is sometimes placed in Moab, and sometimes in Edom, it being on the borders of both, and sometimes belonged to the one and sometimes to the other. According to Mr. Bedford [k], this king began his reign, A. M. 2135. so that the former king must have reigned about 42 years; which is a space of time he allows to each successor, taking them one with another, the particular and exact time of each reign he not being able to fix.

℣. 34. And Jobab died, &c.] According to the above chronologer, A. M. 2177. and Husham of the land of Temani reigned in his stead; or of the land of the south, as the Targum of Jonathan, of the southern part of the land of Idumea, as it was afterwards called; the metropolis of which was the city of Teman, after spoken of in scripture, which had its name from Teman the son of Eliphaz, ℣. 11. see the note there.

℣. 35. And Husham died, &c.] As is thought, about A. M. 2219. above 40 years after the death of Abraham, as computed by the above writer: and Hadad the son of Bedad (who smote Midian in the field of Moab) reigned in his stead: who he or his father were, we have no other account, nor of this warlike action of his: probably the Midianites came came out to invade him, hearing of which, he went out againſt them, and met with them in the fields of Moab, which were near to Midian, and fought them and conquered them: Jarchi ſays, the Midianites came out to make war againſt the Moabites, and the king of Edom went out to help the Moabites, and hence, he ſays, we learn, that Midian and Moab were near each other; and in the days of Balaam they made peace, that they might combine againſt Iſrael: this battle is ſuppoſed to be fought in the 12th year of his reign, and it is thought to be in his reign that Eſau came with his family and dwelt in Seir [l]; tho' ſome place it later, either in the following reign, or in that of his ſucceſſor [m]: and the name of his city was Avith; where it was is not certain.

℣. 36. And Hadad died, &c.] As is ſuppoſed, about A. M. 2241. and Samlah of Maſrekah reigned in his ſtead; but who he was, or the place he was of, cannot be ſaid.

℣. 37. And Samlah died, &c.] As is ſuppoſed, about A. M. 2283. and Saul of Reboboth by the river reigned in his ſtead: Reboboth was one of the cities built by Aſhur, ch. x. 11. and was ſituated near the river Euphrates; and ſo the Targum of Jonathan calls it, Reboboth which is by Euphrates; but Jerom [n], from Euſebius takes it to be another city by a river in Edom, and ſays, that there was in his days, a garriſon in the country of Gabalena (a part of Idumea), a large village called by that name.

℣. 38. And Saul died, &c.] About A. M. 2325. and Baal-hanan the ſon of Achbor reigned in his ſtead: whoſe name inverted, is obſerved by Grotius to be the ſame with Hannibal; it ſignifies a gracious lord or king.

℣. 39. And Baal-hanan the ſon of Achbor died, &c.] About A. M. 2367. and Hadar reigned in his ſtead; the laſt of the Horite kings, when an end was put to this monarchy by the united families of Seir and Eſau, and changed into dukedoms; of which there were 7 of the race of Seir, and 14 of the race of Eſau, of whom an account is given in the preceding part of this chapter: as for this laſt king it is further ſaid of him: and the name of his city was Pau; but where it was cannot be ſaid: and his wife's name was Mehetabel, the daughter of Matred, the daughter of Mezahab: this woman ſeems to be a perſon of note, by the particular mention made of her; but whether the names of her anceſtors are the names of men or women it is not certain: ſome take Matred to be the name of her father, and Mezahab the name of her grand-father; but according to Aben Ezra, Matred was the name of her mother, who was the daughter of Mezahab her grand-father; whom the Targum of Jonathan interprets, melter of gold, as does Saadiah Gaon.

℣. 40. And theſe are the names of the dukes that came of Eſau, &c.] After the regal monarchy ceaſed, the government in Edom was by dukes, and of theſe there were two ſorts, one of which an account has been given of already, who were partly of the race of Seir, and partly of the race of Eſau; and who were dukes not by ſucceſſion but together, in and over their reſpective families: and it may be obſerved, that neither Eſau, nor his ſons by his two firſt wives, Eliphaz and Reuel, are called dukes, only his 3 ſons by his laſt wife; all the reſt are his grandſons and ſons of the 2 former, which ſeems to give ſome light as to the time when thoſe dukedoms took place; and very probably it was by the joint influence of Seir and Eſau, whoſe families had intermarried, that an end was put to the regal power, and who, for a courſe of years governed in the above manner: and they of Eſau's race in thoſe times, are ſaid to be dukes in the land of Edom, as a learned man [o] has obſerved; whereas thoſe that follow, which are a ſecond race of them, are called dukes of Edom, ℣. 43. who took poſſeſſion of the country and ruled in it, driving out the Horites and ſucceeding in their ſtead: theſe are deſcribed according to their families, they were the heads of: after their places by their names; the places where they lived, which were called after their names, and are as follow: duke Timnah, duke Alvah, duke Jetheth: theſe were both the names of the dukes, and of the places where they governed, called after their names; ſo Timnah or Themna, as Jerom calls it, is by him ſaid to be a city of the princes of Edom, the ſame he ſays of Jetheth [p], ſo the like may be concluded of Alvah.

℣. 41. Duke Aholibamah, duke Elah, duke Pinon.] The former is the name of a woman, ℣. 2. 25. here the name of a man, and alſo of the place of which he was duke; for Jerom obſerves [q], that Oholibama is a city of the princes of Edom, and who alſo makes mention of Elath, a country of the princes of Edom, and a city of Eſau, 10 miles from Petra to the eaſt [r], and the ſeat of duke Pinon was very probably Phinon, which lay between Petra and Zoar [s].

℣. 42. Duke Kenaz, duke Teman, duke Mibzar.] There was a Kenaz the ſon of Eliphaz, and ſo a Teman a ſon of his, who were both dukes; but theſe ſeem to be different from them, though the latter might be duke of the place called Teman from him; which, in Jerom's time [t], was a village 5 miles diſtant from Petra, and where was a Roman garriſon, and ſo Mabſar in his times [u], was a large village in the country of Gabalena (a part of Idumea) and called Mabſara, and belonged to the city Petra.

℣. 43. Duke Magdiel, duke Iram, &c.] Magdiel alſo, Jerom [w] ſays, was in the country of Gabalena, formerly poſſeſſed by the dukes of Edom; and the Targum of Jonathan ſays, this duke was called Magdiel from the name of his city, which was a ſtrong migdal or tower; and Jarchi's note upon this word is, this is Rome; ſo the Jewiſh writers elſewhere ſay [x], that Eſau had 100 provinces from Seir to Magdiel, as it is ſaid, duke Magdiel, duke Iram, this is Rome: theſe be the dukes of Edom, according to their habitations, in the land of their poſſeſſion; the former race of dukes, as has been obſerved, were dukes in the land of Edom, were ſojourners in the land, at leaſt had not ſovereign dominion, or were not the only dukes in it; there were dukes of the race of Seir at the ſame time; but now theſe having driven out the Horites, were ſole poſſeſſors and ſovereign lords; and thus while Iſrael and his poſterity were ſojourners in a ſtrange land, Eſau and his family were poſſeſſors and lords of a country they could call their own: he is Eſau the father of the Edomites; that is, Edom, the dukes of whoſe race are before reckoned up; the ſame is Eſau, who had the name of Edom from ſelling his birth-right for a meſs of red pottage: and this is the man from whom the Edomites or Idumeans ſprung, often hereafter ſpoken of in the ſcripture, tho' no more in this hiſtory. He is ſaid [y] to be killed by the tribes

CHAP. XXXVII.

IN this chapter begins the hiſtory of Joſeph, with whom the remaining part of this book is chiefly concerned; and here are related the hatred of his brethren to him, becauſe he brought an ill report of them to his father, and becauſe his father loved him, and which was increaſed by the dream he dreamed, and told them of, ℣. 1—11. a viſit of his to his brethren in the fields, whom he found after a long ſearch of them, ℣. 12—17. their conſpiracy on ſight of him to ſlay him, but by the advice of Reuben it was agreed to caſt him into a pit, which they did, ℣. 18—24. and after that, at the motion of Judah, ſold him to the Iſhmaelites, who were going to Egypt, ℣. 25—28. this being done, Reuben being abſent, and not finding Joſeph in the pit, was in great diſtreſs, ℣. 29, 30. their contrivance to deceive their father, and make him believe that Joſeph was deſtroyed by a wild beaſt, which on the ſight of the coat he credited, and became inconſolable, ℣. 31—35. and the chapter concludes with the ſale of Joſeph in Egypt to Potiphar, an officer of Pharaoh's, ℣. 36.

℣. 1. And Jacob dwelt in the land wherein his father was a ſtranger, &c.] And this ſtands oppoſed unto, and is diſtinguiſhed from the caſe and circumſtances of Eſau, and his poſterity, expreſſed in the preceding chapter, who dwelt in the land of their poſſeſſion, not as ſtrangers and ſojourners, as Jacob and his ſeed, but as lords and proprietors; and ſo theſe words may be introduced and read in connexion with the former hiſtory; but Jacob dwelt, &c. [a] and this verſe would better conclude the preceding chapter, than begin a new one. The Targum of Jonathan paraphraſes the words, and Jacob dwelt quietly, or peaceably, in tranquillity and ſafety; his brother Eſau being gone from him into another country, he remained where his father lived and died, and in the country that by his bleſſing belonged to him: in the land of Canaan, and particularly in Hebron, where Iſaac and Abraham before him had dwelt.

℣. 2. Theſe are the generations of Jacob, &c.] But no genealogy following, ſome interpret this of events or of things which befel Jacob, and his family, particularly with reſpect to his ſon Joſeph, as Aben Ezra and Ben Melech take the ſenſe of the word to be from Prov. xxvii. 1. but the words may refer to what goes before in the latter end of the 35th chapter, where an account is given of Jacob's ſons, with regard to which it is here ſaid, theſe are the generations of Jacob; the whole 36th chapter, which contains the genealogy of Eſau, being a parentheſis, or at leaſt an interruption of the above account, the hiſtory of Jacob and his poſterity is here reaſſumed and carried on: Joſeph being ſeventeen years old, was feeding his flock with his brethren; or in the flock [b]; he was with them in the paſtures, where the flocks were fed, not ſo much to aſſiſt them in it, as to be taught by them how to feed, they being older than he: and the lad was with the ſons of Bilhah, and with the ſons of Zilpah, his father's wives; his ſecondary wives or concubines, called his wives, becauſe their children ſhared in the inheritance. Theſe ſons of theirs were Dan and Naphtali the ſons of Bilhah, and Gad and Aſher the ſons of Zilpah; with theſe Jacob rather choſe Joſeph ſhould be, than with the ſons of Leah; and eſpecially that he ſhould be with the ſons of Bilhah, who was the hand-maid of Rachel, Joſeph's mother, and ſhe being dead, it might be thought that Bilhah and her ſons would have the moſt reſpect for Joſeph: and Joſeph brought unto his father their evil report; for not being able to bear with their evil deeds, and yet not having authority enough, being a junior, to reprove, correct and check them, he reported them to his father: what the things were reported, is not ſaid, perhaps their quarrels among themſelves, their contempt of Joſeph, their neglect of their flocks, &c. Some of the Jewiſh writers make them to be abominable acts of uncleanneſs [d], others eating of the member of a creature alive, particularly the fleſh of the tails of lambs while living [e].

℣. 3. Now Iſrael loved Joſeph more than all his children, &c.] He being the firſt-born of his beloved Rachel, and a lovely youth of a beautiful aſpect, very promiſing, prudent and pious: the reaſon given in the text follows, becauſe he was the ſon of his old age; being 91 years of age when he was born; and the youngeſt children are generally moſt beloved, and eſpecially ſuch as are born to their parents when in years. Benjamin indeed was younger than Joſeph, and is deſcribed in like manner, ch. xliv. 20. and for this reaſon one would think had the greateſt claim to his father's affections; wherefore ſome give a different ſenſe of this phraſe, and render it, the ſon or diſciple of elders, ſenators, i. e. a wiſe and prudent man: and indeed, if being the ſon of his old age was the reaſon of his affection, Benjamin had the beſt claim to it, being the youngeſt, and born to him when he was ſtill older; and this ſenſe is countenanced by Onkelos, who renders it, "becauſe he was a "wiſe ſon to him:" and ſo the reaſon why he loved him more than the reſt was, becauſe of his ſenile wiſdom; though a child in years, he was old in wiſdom and knowledge. Abendana obſerves, that it was a cuſtom with old men to take one of their little children to be with them continually, and attend upon them, and miniſter to them, and lean upon their arm; and ſuch an one was called the ſon of their old age, becauſe he miniſtred to them in their old age: and he made him a coat of many colours; that is, had one made for him, which was interwoven with threads of divers colours, or painted, or embroidered with divers figures, or made with different pieces of various colours: according to Jerom [f], it was a garment which reached down to the ancles, and was diſtinguiſhed with great variety by the hands of the artificer, or which had long ſleeves reaching to the hands; and ſo the Jewiſh writers [g] ſay it was called paſſim, becauſe it reached to the palms of the hands: this might be an emblem of the various virtues which early early appeared in him; or rather of the ſeveral graces of the Spirit of God implanted in him, and of the raiment of needlework, the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, with which he was clothed, Pſ. xlv. 14. and of the various providences which Jacob, under a ſpirit of propheſy, foreſaw, he would be attended with.

℣. 4. And when his brethren ſaw that their father loved him more than all his brethren, &c.] Which they perceived by various things in his behaviour to him, by his words, his looks, his geſtures, and particularly by the coat he had made him, which diſtinguiſhed him from the reſt: they hated him, and could not ſpeak peaceably unto him; they not only inwardly hated him, but they could not conceal their hatred, but betrayed it by their ſpeech unto him; they could not ſpeak to him on any occaſion, but in a croſs, ſurly, ill-natured manner; they could not ſalute him, or give him the common ſalutation, peace be to thee, as Aben Ezra ſuggeſts.

℣. 5. And Joſeph dreamed a dream, and he told it his brethren, &c.] As a dream, in the ſimplicity of his heart; not underſtanding it, or imagining there was any meaning in it; he told it not with any deſign to affront them, but as an amuſement, and for their diverſion, there being ſomething in it odd and ridiculous, as he himſelf might think: and they hated him yet the more; not only becauſe he had carried an ill report of them to his father, and becauſe he loved him more than they, but ſtill more becauſe of this dream; the meaning of which they at once underſtood, though he did not, which yet they ſuppoſed he did, and that he told them it in a boaſting manner, and to irritate them.

℣. 6. And he ſaid unto them, hear, I pray you, this dream which I have dreamed.] Hear now, ſo the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan, immediately, directly, leſt he ſhould forget it, having perhaps dreamt it the night before; though our verſion expreſſes more modeſty and ſubmiſſion. The dream follows:

℣. 7. For behold, we were binding ſheaves in the field, &c.] So it was repreſented in his mind in a dream, as if it was harveſt-time, and he and his brethren were at work together in the field binding up ſheaves of corn that were reaped, in order to be carried home: and lo, my ſheaf aroſe, and ſtood upright; it ſeemed to him, that after he had bound and laid it on the ground, that it roſe up of itſelf, and ſtood erect: and behold, your ſheaves ſtood round about, and made obeiſance to my ſheaf; the ſheaves which his brethren bound up, they alſo ſtood upright, and all around his ſheaf, and bowed unto it; ſo it appeared to him in his dream. This was a fit emblem of their coming to him into Egypt for corn, and bowing to him, when their ſheaves were empty, and his was full. In an ancient book of the Jews [h] Joſeph's ſheaf is interpreted of the Meſſiah, whom they call the ſon of Ephraim. Joſeph no doubt was a type of the true Meſſiah, and in this of his exaltation and glory, and of that honour given him by all his ſaints who come to him, and receive from him all the ſupplies of grace.

℣. 8. And his brethren ſaid unto him, &c.] After he had told his dream, being highly offended with him, underſtanding the dream, and the meaning of it, better than he did: ſhalt thou indeed reign over us? ſhalt thou indeed have dominion over us? denying that he ever ſhould, and reproving him for his vanity, in concluding from hence, that he would have the dominion over them. So the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan, doſt thou think, ſuppoſe or imagine that thou ſhalt rule over us? it looks as if by telling us this dream, that ſuch a whim and fancy has got into thine head: and they hated him yet the more for his dreams and for his words; for it ſeems by this that he had dreamt, and told them more dreams beſides this, and they hated him both for them, and for his telling them to them; though Jarchi thinks the phraſe, for his words, refers to the ill report he gave of them to his father.

℣. 9. And he dreamed yet another dream, &c.] Relating to the ſame ſubject as the former, and for the confirmation of it, only the emblems are different, and more comprehenſive: and told it his brethren, and ſaid, behold, I have dreamed a dream more; another dream, and which he told, either as not knowing fully the reſentment of his brethren at his former dream, or in order to clear himſelf from any charge of feigning the dream, or having any ill intention in telling it; ſeeing he had another to the ſame purpoſe, and therefore thought fit to acquaint them with it, that they might more ſeriouſly conſider of it, whether there was not ſomething divine in it, which he himſelf began to think there was: and behold, the ſun, and the moon, and the eleven ſtars made their obeiſance to me; in his dream it ſeemed to him, either that he was taken up into the ſtarry heaven, and theſe luminaries bowed unto him, or elſe that they deſcended to him on earth, and paid their reſpects unto him.

℣. 10. And he told it to his father, and to his brethren, &c.] After he had told it to his brethren, he told it to his father a ſecond time in their hearing, that he might paſs his judgment on it, and give his ſenſe of it before them: and his father rebuked him; not as being ignorant of the meaning of the dream, for by what follows he had a clear underſtanding of it, or as if he thought it was an idle dream, and would never have any accompliſhment; but he thought fit, in his great wiſdom and prudence, to put on ſuch an air, partly to check young Joſeph, leſt he ſhould grow proud, and haughty, and inſolent upon it, and behave in a diſagreeable manner to himſelf and to his brethren; and partly to conciliate the minds of his brethren to him, which he perceived were exaſperated by his dreams: and ſaid unto him, what is this dream that thou haſt dreamed? what doſt thou take to be the meaning of it? canſt thou imagine that it is of God? is it not a mere whim and imagination of thine own wandring brain in thy ſleep? why doſt thou tell ſuch an idle dream as this, as if there were ſomething divine in it, when it appears the moſt abſurd and irrational? ſhall I, thy mother, and thy brethren indeed come to bow down ourſelves to thee to the earth? whereby it plainly ſhews he underſtood the meaning of the dream, though he would not ſeem to countenance it. By the ſun he underſtood himſelf, the principal and head of the family, the active inſtrument of the generation of it, the light, life, and ſupport of it; and by the moon his wife, the paſſive inſtrument of generation, who had the leſſer ſhare of rule in the family, yet contributed much to its good and welfare; by whom is meant not Rachel, the real mother of Joſeph, who was dead, unleſs this is obſerved to ſhew the ſeeming abſurdity of it, from whence the whole might appear ridiculous; but rather Leah, who was now Jacob's only true wife, and the ſtep-mother of Joſeph; or elſe Bilhah, Rachel's hand-maid, who ſince her death was was a mother to Joſeph; and by the 11 ſtars he underſtood the 11 brethren of Joſeph, who were as ſtars that receive their light from the ſun; and in alluſion to the 12 conſtellations in the Zodiack. to which Joſeph and his 11 brethren anſwered This had its fulfilment, in ſome meaſure, when Jacob ſent preſents to Joſeph when governor of Egypt, though unknown to him, and when he and his family went thither, when, no doubt, Jacob ſhewed a civil reſpect according to his dignity, and in regard to the office he bore: and ſo his wife, if he then had any, that went with him, and if not perſonally, yet in her poſterity paid a deference to him, as it is certain all his brethren did. Grotius obſerves from the Oneirocritics or interpreters of dreams, particularly Achmes, that according to the doctrine of the Perſians and Egyptians, that if any one ſhould dream that he rules over the the ſtars, he ſhall rule over all people.

℣. 11. And his brethren envied him, &c.] Notwithſtanding all the precaution Jacob took to prevent it; they ſuſpecting and fearing that theſe dreams portended the pre-eminence of Joſeph over them, or however ſerved to fill his mind with the hopes and expectation of it: but his father obſerved the ſaying; what Joſeph had ſaid in relating his dream; he laid it up in his mind and kept it there, often thought of it, and waited to ſee its accompliſhment.

℣. 12. And his brethren went to feed their father's flock in Shechem.] Very probably ſome conſiderable time after the telling of the above dreams; it was uſual to remove flocks from place to place for the ſake of paſturage; and ſometimes at a great diſtance, as Shechem was from Hebron, where Jacob now dwelt, ſaid [l] to be about 60 miles; but this is not ſo much to be marvelled at as the place itſelf, whither they went, for though Jacob had bought a parcel of a field in this place, ch. xxxiii. 19. which might be a reaſon for their going thither to feed their father's flocks in his own field; yet it was the place where they had committed a moſt outrageous action in deſtroying all the males there, and therefore might fear the inhabitants of the neighbouring cities would riſe upon them and cut them off.

℣. 13. And Iſrael ſaid unto Joſeph, &c.] After his brethren had been gone ſome time to Shechem: do not thy brethren feed the flock in Shechem? this queſtion is put, not as ignorant of it, or doubting about it, but to put Joſeph in mind of it, and in order to what follows: come, and I will ſend thee unto them; which is pretty much he ſhould, conſidering the length of the way, 60 miles, the dangerous place in which they were feeding their flocks, and eſpecially ſeeing his brethren envied and hated him; but Jacob might think that by this time things had wore off of their minds; and it is certain he had no ſuſpicion of their hatred riſing ſo high as to attempt his life; and it is plain he had none concerning them, when his coat was brought to him, but believed it was wild beaſts that had devoured him: and he ſaid unto him, here am I; ſhewing his readineſs to obey his father, and go on this errand, though it was a long journey, and he to go it alone, and his brethren alſo bore no good will to him.

℣. 14. And he ſaid to him, go I pray thee, &c.] Or now [k] directly, immediately, which is more agreeable to the authority of a father: ſee whether it be well with thy brethren, and well with the flocks; it having been many days, and perhaps months, ſince he had heard any thing of them; and the rather, Jacob might be under a concern for them, becauſe of the danger they were expoſed to from the neighbouring tribes and nations of the Canaanites, on account of their having ſome time ago deſtroyed the Shechemites; ſo the Targum of Jonathan paraphraſing on the preceding part, makes Jacob to ſay, "I am afraid, leſt the Ho-"rites ſhould come and ſmite them, becauſe of "their ſmiting Hamor and Shechem, and the inhabi-"tants of that city, come, and I will ſend thee, &c." and bring me word again; of their welfare, and of the ſtate of their flocks: ſo he ſent him out of the vale of Hebron; the ſame with the plains of Mamre near the city of Hebron, which was built on a hill: and he came to Shechem; after he had travelled 60 miles.

℣. 15. And a certain man found him, &c.] Many of the Jewiſh writers [l] ſay, this was an angel, the angel Gabriel, in the likeneſs of a man; but according to Aben Ezra, it was a traveller he met on the road; but it is more probable, as Schmidt obſerves, that it was ſome man at work in the field that lighted of him and took notice of him: and behold, he was wandering in the field; in ſome field near Shechem, perhaps, the ſame his father Jacob had purchaſed, and where he expected to have found his brethren, and was looking out for them, going to and fro in ſearch of them, which the labouring man in the field obſerved: and the man aſked him, ſaying, what ſeekeſt thou? ſeeing him walking about, and firſt looking one way, and then another, concluded he was in ſearch of ſomething, either of ſome man or of ſome creature, a ſheep or an ox that was loſt; and therefore put this queſtion to him, with a view to give him what direction and aſſiſtance he could.

℣. 16. And he ſaid, I ſeek my brethren, &c.] Whom, no doubt, he deſcribed to the man, and told him who they were, and to whom they belonged; or otherwiſe the man would have been at a loſs to know who he meant, and what further to ſay to him, and without which Joſeph would never have made the following requeſt to him: tell me, I pray thee, where they feed their flocks; in what part of the country they are, what field they are in, how far to it, and which the way.

℣. 17. And the man ſaid, they are departed hence, &c.] They had been there, in the field where he and Joſeph were, and which was probably the field before-mentioned; but for good reaſons, perhaps, for want of paſture, or in order to find better feeding for their cattle, they were gone from thence, from the fields about Shechem: for I heard them ſay, let us go to Dothan; this was, as ſome ſay, 4 miles from Shechem, others 8 [m]; according to Brochardus [n], it was a plain country between fruitful hills, contiguous to fountains, was paſture-ground and very fit for feeding cattle; and its very name, as Hillerus [o] notes, ſignifies graſſy, or a place of tender graſs: here, afterwards was a city built, not far from Samaria, 2 Kings vi. 13. about 12 miles to the north of it, as ſays Jerom [p]; it was in the tribe of Manaſſeh, about 44 miles from Jeruſalem to the

the north, and 6 miles from Tiberias to the weſt [q]: and Joſeph went after his brethren, and found them in Dothan; which ſhews that he had a real deſire to ſee them, and know their ſtate and condition, that he might report it to his father; ſince he might have returned on not finding them at Shechem, that being the place he was ſent to, and would have been ſufficient to have ſhewn obedience to his father's commands, though perhaps it might not have come up to his full ſenſe and meaning.

℣. 18. And when they ſaw him afar off, &c.] They knew him as ſoon as they ſaw him, by his ſtature, his geſture or manner of walking, and eſpecially by his coat of various colours he now had on, ℣. 23. even before he came near unto them; the diſtance he was from them when they firſt ſpied him is particularly remarked and repeated, not to ſhew the quickneſs of their ſight, but for the ſake of what follows; to obſerve how ſoon their paſſions were raiſed, how intenſe and perpenſe their malice, and which put them upon deviſing ways and means to deſtroy him, for it follows: they conſpired againſt him, to ſlay him; they entered into a conſultation, and deviſed the moſt crafty methods they could think of to take away his life and yet conceal the murder.

℣. 19. And they ſaid one to another, &c.] According to the Targum of Jonathan, Simeon and Levi ſaid what follows: nor is it unlikely, ſince they were hot, paſſionate, cruel, and bloody-minded men, as appears by the affair of Shechem; and perhaps this may be the reaſon why Joſeph afterwards, when governor of Egypt, took Simeon and bound him, ch. xlii. 24. which was but a juſt retaliation for his advice to caſt him into a pit when ſlain: behold, this dreamer cometh; or maſter of dreams [r]; not of the interpretation of them, but of dreaming them; that had them at his command when he pleaſed, as they jeeringly flouted him; as if he was a framer and contriver of them, and only pretended to them when he had none, or elſe that he was frequently dreaming and telling his dreams; this they ſaid, in a ſarcaſtic way, and perhaps, as pleaſed, and rejoicing that ſuch an opportunity offered to take their revenge on him: this ſhews that it was on the account of his dreams chiefly that they bore ſuch a grudge againſt him, that this was uppermoſt on their minds, and was revived at firſt ſight of him, and from whence their malice ſprung.

℣. 20. Come now therefore, and let us ſlay him, &c.] Agree to do it, and actually do it: and caſt him into ſome pit; or, one of the pits [s], which were near, and were dug for the collection of rain-water, as was uſual in thoſe countries where water was ſcarce: and we will ſay, ſome evil beaſt hath devoured him; which would ſeem plauſible, ſince wild beaſts were frequent in thoſe parts, as lions and bears, ſee 1 Kings xiii. 24. 2 Kings ii. 24. and we ſhall ſee what will become of his dreams; who will be the Lord then, and reign, and have the dominion, he or we.

℣. 21. And Reuben heard it, &c.] Over-heard what they ſaid, not being in the conſultation; perhaps knowing his temper and diſpoſition to be more mild and gentle, and being the elder brother, might fear he would over-rule matters againſt them, and therefore Simeon and Levi did not chuſe to have him in the debate; or he might be at ſome diſtance and entirely abſent when the conſultation was held, and their intention was reported to him by ſome of them: and he delivered him out of their hands; from ſlaying him, that is, he endeavoured to do it by propoſing another ſcheme: and ſaid, let us not kill him; or let us not ſmite the ſoul [t]; the dear ſoul, or take away life.

℣. 22. And Reuben ſaid unto them, ſhed no blood, &c.] Innocent blood, as the Targum of Jonathan; the blood of a man, a brother's blood, one that had not done any thing wherefore it ſhould be ſhed, and which would involve in guilt, and bring vengeance on them: he ſeems to put them in mind of the original law in Gen. ix. 6. but caſt him into this pit that is in the wilderneſs, and lay no hand upon him; which might ſeem to anſwer the ſame purpoſe, namely, by depriving him of his life in another way, by ſtarving him; but this was not Reuben's intention, as appears by the next clauſe, and by his going to the pit afterwards, as it ſhould ſeem, with a view to take him out of it privately; this advice he gave, that he might rid him out of their hands, to deliver him to his father again; ſafe and ſound, in order, as it is thought by many interpreters, to reconcile his father to him, whoſe bed he had abuſed.

℣. 23. And it came to paſs when Joſeph was come unto his brethren, &c.] To the very place where they were, and had, in a kind and obliging manner, aſked of their welfare, and related their father's concern for them, who had ſent him on this errand: that they ſtript Joſeph out of his coat; his coat of many colours that was on him; according to Jarchi and Aben Ezra, this was not one and the ſame coat, but divers, and that the ſenſe is, that with his coat of many colours, and beſides that, they ſtripped him of his lower garment, which was next to his ſkin, his ſhirt; ſo that he was quite naked when they caſt him into the pit, and this they did as ſoon as he came up to them, ſo cruel and hard-hearted were they.

℣. 24. And they took him, and caſt him into a pit, &c.] Into the ſame that Reuben pointed to them, whoſe counſel they gladly took and readily executed, ſuppoſing he meant the ſame thing they did, ſtarving him to death: and the pit was empty, there was no water in it; only ſerpents and ſcorpions, as the Targum of Jonathan, and Jarchi adds this remark, that there was no water in it, ſeems to be made either to furniſh out a reaſon why Reuben directed to it, that he might be the more eaſily got out of it, and not be in danger of loſing his life at once, or of being drowned in it; or elſe to ſhew the uncomfortable ſituation he was in, having not ſo much as a drop of water to refreſh him; ſee Zech. ix. 11. Dothan is ſaid to remain to this day, and the inhabitants of it ſhew the antient ditch into which Joſeph was caſt [u].

℣. 25. And they ſat down to eat bread, &c.] Not at all concerned at what they had done, nor in the leaſt grieved for the affliction of Joſeph, and without any pity and compaſſion for him in his diſtreſs, but joyful and glad they had got him into their hands, and like to get rid of him for ever: and they lift up their eyes, and looked; after they had eat their food, or while they were eating it: and behold, a company of Iſhmaelites came from Gilead; a place of merchandiſe for ſpices and balm, and ſuch like things after mentioned. The Targums of of Onkelos and Jonathan call them Arabians; and the Targum of Jeruſalem, Saracens; theſe were the poſterity of Iſhmael, who came out of Arabia to Gilead, where they took up their merchandiſe, at leaſt part of it, and were travelling to Egypt with it, and their way thither lay by Dothan; theſe travelled in companies, now called caravans, partly on the account of robbers, and partly by reaſon of wild beaſts, with both which they were ſometimes beſet in the deſarts through which they travelled: with their camels, bearing ſpicery, and balm, and myrrh; the firſt word is general according to our verſion, and others, and ſignifies various ſpices, a collection of them; and ſo Jarchi takes it; but Aquila tranſlates it ſtorax; and Bochart [w], by various arguments, ſeems to have proved, that this is particularly intended; though the Targum of Jonathan renders it wax [x]; and ſo other verſions: and balm is by ſome taken to be roſin, ſince there was no balm or balſam in Gilead, on the other ſide Jordan, nor indeed any in Judea, until it was brought thither from Arabia Felix, in the times of Solomon; and what we render myrrh, is in the Hebrew called Lot, and is by ſome thought to be ſame with Laudanum: this their merchandiſe was carried on camels, very fit for their purpoſe every way, as they were ſtrong creatures made to carry burdens, and could travel many days without water, which they were ſometimes obliged to do in the deſarts: going to carry it down to Egypt; where theſe things grew not, and were much in uſe, at leaſt ſome of them, both in medicines, and in embalming dead bodies, much practiſed in Egypt; an Arabic writer [y] makes this merchandize to conſiſt of nuts, turpentine and oil.

℣. 26. And Judah ſaid unto his brethren, &c.] In ſight of the Iſhmaelites, a thought came into his mind to get Joſeph ſold to them: what profit is it, if we ſlay our brother, and conceal his blood? it could be no advantage to them even if they could have concealed his blood from men; and if it was diſcovered, as it would in all likelihood by ſome means or another, then they muſt be anſwerable for it; and if not, God would take vengeance on them, from whom they could never conceal it; and therefore it would be moſt profitable and advantageous to them to ſell him, and not deſtroy him, or take away his life; and to ſuffer him to lie in the pit and die, was the ſame thing.

℣. 27. Come, and let us ſell him to the Iſhmaelites, &c.] For a ſlave, and that will defeat his dream; and as theſe were going down to Egypt, where they would ſell him, he would be far enough from them, and there would be no probability of his ever being lord over them: and let not our hand be upon him; to take away his life, either by ſtabbing or ſtarving him: for he is our brother, and our fleſh; they had all one father, though different mothers, and therefore as the relation was ſo near, ſome ſympathy and compaſſion ſhould be ſhown; ſome degree of tenderneſs at leaſt, and not ſavageneſs and cruelty: and his brethren were content; they agreed to the motion, inaſmuch as they ſuppoſed it would anſwer their end as well, which was to prevent his dominion over them.

℣. 28. Then there paſſed by Midianites merchantmen, &c.] The ſame with the Iſhmaelites before mentioned, as appears from the latter part of this verſe; for as theſe were near neighbours, ſo they might join together in merchandiſe, and travel in company for greater ſafety, and are ſometimes called the one, and ſometimes the other, as well as they might mix together in their habitations and marriages; and are hence called Arabians by the Targums, as before obſerved, and ſo by Joſephus, which ſignifies a mixed people: and they drew and liſt up Joſeph out of the pit; not the Midianites, but his brethren: and ſold Joſeph to the Iſhmaelites for 20 pieces of ſilver; for 20 ſhekels, which amounted to 15 ſhillings of our money. The Jews ſay, they each took two ſhekels apiece, and bought with them a pair of ſhoes, according to Amos viii. 6. but there were but nine of them, Reuben was abſent: and they brought Joſeph into Egypt; ſome think theſe Midianites were different from the Iſhmaelites, and that Joſeph was ſold many times, firſt to the Midianites, and then by them to the Iſhmaelites, and by the latter to Potiphar. Juſtin [a], an heathen writer, gives an account of this affair in ſome agreement with this hiſtory; "Joſeph, he ſays, "was the youngeſt of his brethren, whoſe excel-"lent genius they feared, and took him ſecret-"ly, and ſold him to foreign merchants, by whom "he was carried into Egypt."

℣. 29. And Reuben returned unto the pit, &c.] It is very probable he had pretended to go ſome where on buſineſs, with an intention to take a circuit, and come to the pit and deliver his brother, and go home with him to his father. The Jews ſay [b], he departed from his brethren, and ſat down on a certain mountain, that he might deſcend in the night and take Joſeph out of the pit, and accordingly he came down in the night, and found him not. So Joſephus [c] ſays, it was in the night when Reuben came to the pit, who calling to Joſeph, and he not anſwering, ſuſpected he was killed: and behold, Joſeph was not in the pit; for neither by looking down into it could he ſee him, nor by calling be anſwered by him, which made it a clear caſe to him, he was not there: and he rent his clothes; as a token of diſtreſs and anguiſh of mind, of ſorrow and mourning, as was uſual in ſuch caſes; Jacob afterwards did the ſame.

℣. 30. And he returned unto his brethren, &c.] From the pit, and whom he ſuſpected had took him and killed him, as was their firſt deſign, not being with them, when they propoſed to ſell him, and did: and ſaid, the child is not; not in the pit, nor in the land of the living, but is dead, which is ſometimes the meaning of the phraſe, Jer. xxxi. 15. he calls him a child, though 17 years of age, becauſe the youngeſt brother but one, and he himſelf, was the eldeſt, and alſo becauſe of his tender concern for him: and I, whither ſhall I go? to find the child or flee from his father's face, which he could not think of ſeeing any more; whom he had highly offended already in the caſe of Bilhah, and now he would be yet more incenſed againſt him for his neglect of Joſeph, who, he might have expected would have taken particular care of him, being the eldeſt ſon: he ſpeaks like one in the utmoſt perplexity, not knowing what to do, what courſe to ſteer, being almoſt diſtracted and at his wits end.

℣. 31. And they took Joſeph's coat, &c.] After they had told Reuben what they had done with him, who being willing to make the beſt of things as it was, joined with them in the following ſcheme: by this it appears, that when they took Joſeph out of

of the pit they did not put his coat on him, but ſold him naked, or almoſt ſo, to the merchants: and killed a kid of the goats, and dipped the coat in the blood; that being, as the Targum of Jonathan and Jarchi obſerve, moſt like to human blood.

℣. 32. And they ſent the coat of many colours, &c.] Which was what they dipped in the blood of the kid; this they ſent to Jacob in ſuch a condition, by the hand of ſome meſſenger; the Targum of Jonathan ſays, the ſons of Zilpah and Bilhah; but more probably ſome of their ſervants, whom they inſtructed what to ſay to their father when they preſented it to him; not caring to appear in perſon at firſt, leſt they be thrown into ſuch commotion and confuſion at their father's diſtreſs, as might tend to lead on to a diſcovery of the whole affair: and they brought it to their father, and ſaid, this we have found; that is, the meſſengers carried to the father of Joſeph's brethren, who were ſent with it, and taught to ſay, that they found it in ſome field in this condition, but found no man near it, only that by itſelf, and ſuſpected it might be the coat of his ſon Joſeph, if he had ſent him out in it: know now whether it be thy ſon's coat, or no; look upon it, ſee if any marks can be obſerved in it, by which it may with any certainty be known whether it is his or no.

℣. 33. And he knew it, and ſaid, it is my ſon's coat, &c.] He took it, and examined it, and was ſoon convinced, and well aſſured it was his ſon's coat; read the words without the ſupplement it is, and the pathos will appear the more, my ſon's coat! and think with what a beating heart, with what trembling limbs, with what wringing of hands, with what flowing eyes, and faultering ſpeech, he ſpoke theſe words, and what follow: an evil beaſt hath devoured him; this was natural to conclude from the caſe the coat was in, and from the country he was ſent into, which abounded with wild beaſts, and was the very thing Joſeph's brethren contrived to ſay themſelves; and in this view they wiſhed and hoped the affair would be conſidered, and ſo their wickedneſs concealed: Joſeph is without doubt rent in pieces; or in rending is rent [d]; he is moſt certainly rent in pieces, there is no queſtion to be made of it; it is plain and it muſt be the caſe.

℣. 34. And Jacob rent his clothes, &c.] As expreſſive of his grief and mourning for the death of his ſon, as he ſuppoſed: and put ſackcloth upon his loins; put off his uſual apparel, and put on a coarſe garment on his loins next to his fleſh, as another token of his great trouble and affliction for the loſs of his ſon; which tho' afterwards was frequently done in times of public or private mourning, yet this is the firſt time we read of it; whether Jacob was the firſt that uſed it, whom his poſterity and others imitated, is not certain; however it appears that this uſage, as well as that of rending clothes on ſorrowful occaſions, were very ancient: and mourned for his ſon many days; or years, as days ſometimes ſignify; 22 years, according to Jarchi, even until the time he went down to Egypt and ſaw him alive.

℣. 35. And all his ſons, and all his daughters roſe up to comfort him, &c.] His ſons muſt act a moſt hypocritical part in this affair; and as for his daughters, it is not eaſy to ſay who they were, ſince he had but one daughter that we read of, whoſe name was Dinah: the Targum of Jonathan calls them his ſons wives; but it is a queſtion whether any of his ſons were as yet married, ſince the eldeſt of them was not more than 24 years of age; and much leſs can their daughters be ſuppoſed to be meant, as they are by ſome. It is the opinion of the Jews, that Jacob had a twin daughter born to him with each of his ſons; theſe his ſons and daughters came together, or ſingly, to condole his loſs, to ſympathiſe with him, and ſpeak a word of comfort to him, and intreat him not to give way to exceſſive grief and ſorrow: but he refuſed to be comforted; to attend to any thing that might ſerve to alleviate his mind, and to abſtain from outward mourning, and the tokens of it; he choſe not to be interrupted in it: and he ſaid, for I will go down into the grave unto my ſon, mourning; the meaning is, not that he would by any means haſten his own death, or go down to his ſon in the grave, ſtrictly and literally taken; ſince according to his apprehenſion of his ſon's death he could have no grave, being torn to pieces by a wild beaſt; but either that he ſhould go into the ſtate of the dead, where his ſon was, mourning all along till he came thither; or rather that he would go mourning all his days for his ſon [e], as ſome render it, till he came to the grave; nor would he, nor ſhould he receive any comfort more in this world: thus his father wept for him; in this manner, with ſuch circumſtances as before related, and he only; for as for his brethren they hated him, and were glad they had got rid of him; or, and his father, &c. [f] his father Iſaac, as the Targum of Jonathan, he wept for his ſon Jacob on account of his trouble and diſtreſs; as well as for his grandſon Joſeph; and ſo many Jewiſh writers [g] interpret it; and indeed Iſaac was alive at this time, and lived 12 years after; but the former ſenſe ſeems beſt.

℣. 36. And the Midianites ſold him into Egypt, &c.] Or Medanites, who ſprung from Medan, a brother of Midian, and ſon of Keturah, Gen. xxiv. 2. and were diſtinct from the Midianites, though they dwelt near them, and were now in company with them and with the Iſhmaelites, and were all concerned in the buying and ſelling of Joſeph, and therefore this is ſometimes aſcribed to the one, and ſometimes to the other: unto Potiphar, an officer of Pharaoh; the word is ſometimes uſed for an enunch, but cannot deſign one here, ſince Potiphar had a wife, and ſome ſay a child; but he either was a chamberlain, or however ſome officer at court, beſides what follows: and captain of the guard; of Pharaoh's guard, his body guard; ſome render it, of the ſlaughterers [h]; meaning either cooks or butchers, of whom he was the chief; or rather executioners, he having the charge of priſoners, and the care of executing them, like our ſheriffs. Joſeph was a moſt eminent type of Chriſt, and there are ſo many things in this chapter which ſhew an agreement between them that cannot be paſſed over. Joſeph was the ſon of his father's old age, Chriſt the Son of the ancient of days; Joſeph was in a peculiar manner beloved by his father, Chriſt is the dear Son of his Father's love; Jacob made for Joſeph a coat of many colours, God prepared a body in human nature for Chriſt, filled and adorned with the various gifts and graces of the Spirit without meaſure. Joſeph was hated by his brethren, and they could not endure to think he ſhould have the dominion over them. The Jews, of whom Chriſt was according to the fleſh, hated him, and would not have him to reign over them; Joſeph was ſent by his father a long journey to viſit his brethren, and know the welfare of them and their flocks, Chriſt was ſent from heaven to earth to ſeek and ſave the loſt ſheep of the houſe of Iſrael; Joſeph's brethren, when they ſaw him come to them, conſpired to take away his life, the Jews, who were Chriſt's own, when he came to them, received him not, but ſaid, this is the heir, let us kill him, and they conſulted to take away his life; Joſeph was ſtript of his clothes, and ſold for 20 pieces of ſilver at the motion of Judah, and Chriſt, by one of the ſame name, was ſold for 30 pieces of ſilver, and was ſtript of his clothes by the Roman ſoldiers; Joſeph was delivered into the hands of foreigners, and Chriſt into the hands of the Gentiles; Joſeph being reckoned as dead by his father, and yet alive, may be herein an emblem of Chriſt's death, and his reſurrection from the dead.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

THIS chapter is wholly taken up with matters relating to Judah, the 4th ſon of Jacob, from whom the Jews have their name, and from whom Chriſt ſprung: it treats of his marriage with a Canaaniteſs, his children by her; their character and end, ℣. 1—11. of his inceſt with his daughter-in-law, tho' unknown by him, ℣. 12—23. of his reſentment againſt her, when he heard ſhe was with child, and of his confuſion when he found it was by himſelf, ℣. 24—26. and of the birth of twins by her, named Pharez and Zarah, ℣. 27—30.

℣. 1. And it came to paſs at that time, &c.] This ſome refer to the time of Jacob's coming from Padan-aram into Canaan, ſoon after he came to Shechem, and before the affair of Dinah; but to this may be objected, the marriage of Judah at an age that may ſeem too early for him, his ſeparation from his brethren, and having a flock of his own to keep, which ſeems not conſiſtent with the above hiſtory: wherefore it is better to connect this with the hiſtory of Joſeph's being ſold into Egypt; for tho' there were but 23 years from hence to Jacob's going down into Egypt, Joſeph being now 17, and was 30 years when he ſtood before Pharaoh, after which were ſeven years of plenty, and two of famine, at which time Jacob went thither with two of Judah's grandſons, Hezron and Hamul, ch. xlvi. 12. which make the number mentioned; yet all this may be accounted for, at 17 Er, Judah's firſt-born, might marry, being the 18th from the ſelling of Joſeph, and the marriage of his father; and Onan at the ſame age, which was the 19th; and allowing two or three years for Tamar's ſtaying for Shelah, there was time for her intrigue with Judah, and bearing him two ſons at a birth, before the deſcent of Jacob into Egypt; as for his two grandſons, they may be ſaid to go into Egypt, as Benjamin's ſons did in their father's loins, being begotten there during Jacob's abode in it: that Judah went down from his brethren; not from Dothan to Adullam, as Ben Melech obſerves, as if this ſeparation was at the time and place of the ſelling of Joſeph; but rather from Hebron thither, after he and his brethren were come home to their father, and had reported and condoled the death of Joſeph; and Judah is ſaid to go down, becauſe he went from the north to the ſouth, as Aben Ezra notes; whether this departure from his brethren was owing to a miſunderſtanding or quarrel between them on account of the affair of Joſeph, or on any account, is not certain: and turned in to a certain Adullamite; an inhabitant of Adullam, a city which afterwards fell to the tribe of Judah, and where was a famous cave, that had its name from thence in David's time; it was 10 miles from Eleutheropolis to the eaſt [i], and eight from Jeruſalem to the ſouth-weſt [k]; hither he turned, or ſtretched out [l]; that is, his tent, with his flock, which he extended to Adullam, as Ben Melech interprets it, and joined to this man, whoſe name was Hirah; whom the Jews [m] fabulouſly report to be the ſame with Hiram king of Tyre, in the days of David and Solomon, and that he was the huſband of Nebuchadnezzar's mother, and lived 1200 years.

℣. 2. And Judah ſaw there a daughter of a certain Canaanite, &c.] Onkelos and Jonathan, and ſo Jarchi and Ben Gerſom interpret it a merchant, to take off the diſgrace of his falling in love with, and marrying a Canaanitiſh woman; which was forbidden by his anceſtors Abraham and Iſaac, and which his father avoided: whoſe name was Shuah; not the name of the woman he married, but the name of her father, as appears from ℣. 12. and who very probably was a man of note in the country: and he took her; to be his wife, with her and her father's conſent, not by force: and went in unto her; cohabited with her as his wife.

℣. 3. And ſhe conceived, and bare a ſon, and he called his name Er.] Which ſignifies a watchman; but the reaſon of the name given by the Targum of Jonathan is, "becauſe he ſhould die without "children;" as if it was the ſame with Ariri, childleſs.

℣. 4. And ſhe conceived again, and bare a ſon, &c.] As ſoon as ſhe well could: and ſhe called his name Onan; the firſt ſon Judah gave the name to, but his wife named this, ſo called from grief or ſorrow; the reaſon of it, according to the above Targum, was, "becauſe his father would mourn "for him;" he was a Benoni, whoſe ſin and immature death cauſed ſorrow.

℣. 5. And ſhe conceived, and bare a ſon, &c.] A third ſon: and called his name Shelah; which ſignifies tranquil, quiet, peaceable and proſperous, and is a word that comes from the ſame root as Shiloh, that famous ſon of Judah that ſhould ſpring from him, ch. xlix. 10. the reaſon of the name, as given by the Targum, is, "becauſe her huſband forgot "her:" [n] and ſhe was at Chezib when ſhe bare him; Chezib is the name of a place, by ſome taken to be the ſame with Achzib or Ecdippe, now Zib, ſee Mic. i. 14. it ſeems to be a city in the tribe of Judah;

Judah; and Jerom [n] says, in his time there was a desart place of this name near Adullam, on the borders of Eleutheropolis; the reason of her being here at the time of her delivery, and of this circumstance being related, is not certain.

℣. 6. And Judah took a wife for Er his first-born, &c.] Chose one for him, and presented her to him for his liking, whom he approving of married: whose name was Tamar; which signifies a palm-tree: the Targum of Jonathan says, she was the daughter of Shem; but it is altogether improbable that a daughter of his should be living at this time, and young enough to bear children: it is much more probable that she was a daughter of Levi, Judah's brother, as an Arabic writer [o] asserts; but it is more likely still, that she was the daughter of a Canaanite, who was living in the same place, though his name is not mentioned, ℣. 11.

℣. 7. And Er, Judah's first-born, was wicked in the sight of the Lord, &c.] That is, exceedingly wicked, as this phrase signifies, ch. xiii. 13. was guilty of some very hainous sin, but what is not mentioned; according to the Targum of Jonathan and Jarchi, it was the same with his brother Onan's, which it is suggested he committed, lest his wife should prove with child, and lose her beauty; but if it had been the same with his, it would have been expressed as well as his. An Arabic writer [p] says, that he cohabited with his wife not according to the course of nature, but in the sodomitical way: and the Lord slew him; by his immediate hand, striking him dead at once, as Ananias and Sapphira were stricken; or by sending some distemper, which quickly carried him off, as a token of his displeasure at his sin.

℣. 8. And Judah said unto Onan, &c.] Some time after his brother's death: go in unto thy brother's wife, and marry her; Moses here uses a word not common for marriage, but which was peculiar to the marrying of a brother's wife according to a law given in his time: it appears to have been a custom before, and which the patriarch might be directed to by the Lord, in such a case when a brother died, and left no issue, for the sake of multiplication of seed, according to the divine promise, and which in the time of Moses passed into a law, see Deut. xxv. 5: and raise up seed unto thy brother; that might bear his name, and enjoy his inheritance. For this law or custom was partly political to continue the paternal inheritance in the family, and partly typical to direct to Christ the first-born among many brethren, who in all things was to have the pre-eminence; and this was not taken from the Canaanites, among whom Judah now was, but from the ancient patriarchs, which they had no doubt from divine revelation, and was taught in the school of Shem, and handed down from father to son; for as to this being a law among the Egyptians in after-times, and which continued to the days of Zeno Augustus [q], it is most likely they took it from the Jews.

℣. 9. And Onan knew that the seed should not be his, &c.] Should not be called a son of his, but a son of his brother Er; this is to be understood only of the first-born; all the rest of the children born afterwards were reckoned the children of the real parent of them; this shows this was a custom in use in those times, and well known, and was not a peculiar case: and it came to pass that when he went in unto his brother's wife; to cohabit with her, as man and wife, he having married her according to his father's direction: that he spilled it on the ground, lest he should give his seed to his brother; lest his brother's wife he had married should conceive by him, and bare a son that should be called his brother's, and inherit his estate; and this is the sin, which from him is called Onania, a sin condemned by the light of nature, as well as by the word of God, and very prejudicial to mankind, as well as displeasing to God, as follows:

℣. 10. And the thing which he did displeased the Lord, &c.] Being done out of envy to his brother, and through want of affection to the memory of his name; and it may be out of covetousness to get his estate into his own hands, and especially as it frustrated the end of such an usage of marrying a brother's wife; which appears to be according to the will of God, since it afterwards became a known law of his; and it was the more displeasing, as it was not only a check upon the multiplication of Abraham's seed as promised, but since the Messiah was to come from Judah. This was doing all to hinder it, that lay in his power: wherefore he slew him also; in like manner as he had slain his brother.

℣. 11. Then said Judah to Tamar his daughter-in-law, &c.] After the death of his two sons, who had successively married her: remain a widow at thy father's house, till Shelah my son be grown; who was his third and youngest son, though perhaps not more than a year younger than Onan; but he might not chuse he should marry so soon as his brethren had done, for a reason following: according to the custom and law of marrying a brother's wife, who died without issue, she in course was to be the wife of Shelah; since if there were ever so many brothers, they all married such an one in turn, until there was issue by one of them, see Matt. xxii. 25. as Judah knew this, he pretended at least to give her to his son for wife, only would have it put off till he was at age of maturity, or was more grown; and therefore desires her to keep herself unmarried to any other person until that time; and advises her to go to her father's house, and continue there, which he did to prevent any intrigues between them, lest his son should be tempted to marry her sooner than it was his will, and she should solicit him to it: for he said; not to Tamar, but within himself: lest peradventure he die also as his brethren did; by which it seems, that he was ignorant of the true cause of their death, but thought it was either owing to their marrying too young, or to something in the woman unfortunate and unhappy; and he might not really intend he should marry her at all, only made use of an excuse for the present: and Tamar went and dwelt in her father's house; she had dwelt in Judah's house in the time of her two husbands, but now by his advice she removed to her own father's house; which very probably was in the same place, and her father yet living, who received her, and with whom she continued, see Lev. xxii. 13.

℣. 12. And in process of time the daughter of Shuah Judah's wife died, &c.] Shuah was his wife's father, who was a Canaanite, ℣. 2. what her name was is not certain, nor the exact time of her death; it was some time after Tamar was sent home to her father's house; and some take the death of Judah's wife to be a correction and reproof proof to him for his ill uſage of his daughter-in-law, in neglecting to give her to his ſon, or not deſigning to do it at all: and Judah was comforted; he mourned a while for the death of his wife, according to the cuſtom of the country, and of thoſe times, and then he laid aſide the tokens of it, and his ſorrow wore off, and he appeared in company and converſed with his friends: and went up unto his ſheep-ſhearers to Timnath; a city in the tribe of Judah, Joſh. xv. 57. ſaid [s] to be ſix miles from Adullam, where Judah lived; here he had his flocks of ſheep, at leaſt this was judged a proper place for the ſhearing and waſhing of them, and this time of the year a proper time for it, at which it was uſual to have a feaſt; and Judah went up to his ſhearers, not only to ſee how they went on with their work, but with this view to make an entertainment for them, ſee 1 Sam. xxv. 3, 4, 36: he and his friend Hirah the Adullamite; he took him along with him for a companion, and to partake of the entertainment.

℣. 13. And it was told Tamar, &c.] By ſome of her neighbours, or by ſome of Judah's family: ſaying, behold, thy father-in law goeth up to Timnath to ſhear his ſheep; which might be told her as an indifferent thing, without any deſign in it; but ſhe took notice of it, and it gave her an opportunity ſhe wanted.

℣. 14. And ſhe put her widow's garments off from her, &c.] By which it appears that in thoſe times and countries it was uſual for widows to have a different apparel from others, eſpecially in the time of their mourning, as it has been ſince in other nations, and with us at this day, and which is commonly called the widows weed: and covered herſelf with a vail, and wrapped herſelf; in it, or in a cloak, or ſome ſuch-like garment, which the Arabs now call hykes; this ſhe did that ſhe might not be known, and not that ſhe might appear as an harlot; for it was common to all women in thoſe countries to go abroad with their vails; and on the contrary, whatever might be the cuſtom here in thoſe early times, which cannot be ſaid what it was; in other countries, and in later times, harlots have been uſed to appear unveiled [t], and open to the view of all; tho' Juvenal [u] repreſents the empreſs Meſſalina as covering herſelf with a night hood, and hiding her black hair under a yellow bonnet or peruke, that ſhe might appear as an harlot going to the ſtews: and ſo the Arabs now, their whores as well as other women, veil themſelves in the ſtreets, but in Egypt they are uſed to ſit at the door or walk in the ſtreets unveiled [w]: and ſat in an open place, which is in the way to Timnah; the Septuagint verſion renders it, at the gates of Ænan; ſome take it to be the name of a place, and ſuppoſe it had its name, as Aben Ezra obſerves, from two fountains of water that were in the way, like a door, through which Judah paſſed when he returned home: ſo Philo the Jew [x] reads, ℣. 21. where is the harlot which was in Ainan by the way? and Jerom [y] ſpeaks of Aenan as you go to Timnath, now a deſert place, and near to the great village Timnath, which is between Ælia and Dioſpolis (i. e. Jeruſalem and Lydia) and there is a fountain in the above place, from whence it has its name: the Targum of Jonathan paraphraſes it, "in the diviſion "of the ways where all eyes look;" for the word has the ſignification of eyes as well as of fountains; and ſeems to deſign a place where two ways or more met, which were not only open and obvious to every eye, but required perſons to make uſe of their eyes, and look about them, and conſider which way they ſhould go; and where, perhaps a waymark was ſet up for them to look to, to direct them; and here Tamar placed herſelf as harlots uſed to do: hence Catullus [z] calls common proſtitutes Semitariæ Moechæ, pathway-whores; and on the contrary, ſuch an one as was a ſecret whore and leſs expoſed, Horace [a] calls devium ſcortum, an whore that was at ſome diſtance from the public road, not ſo common as others: ſo in the Apocryphal book of Baruch, ch. vi. ℣. 43. whoriſh women are repreſented as ſitting in the ways and by the road-ſide, girt with cords (of bullruſhes and ſo eaſily broken) to be picked up by men as they paſſed by; refering to what Herodotus [b] reports of the women in the temple of Venus at Babylon. This method Tamar took: for ſhe ſaw that Shelah was grown; was at leaſt at the age of her former huſbands when married, if not older: this might be 2 or three years after his brother's death; for it was in proceſs of time, or when there had been a multiplication of days after this, that Judah's wife died, and now his mourning for her was over, ℣. 12. and ſhe was not given unto him for wife; as he had given her reaſon to expect, ℣. 11. and as was uſually done.

℣. 15. When Judah ſaw her, he thought her to be an harlot, &c.] By her poſture and the place ſhe was in: becauſe ſhe had covered her face; with her vail, that he did not know her; for this is not given as a reaſon why he took her to be an harlot; the reaſon of this was, becauſe ſhe ſat in the public road; but having covered her face he could not diſcern who ſhe was, and therefore from the other circumſtance, concluded that ſhe was an harlot, and ſat there to proſtitute herſelf to any that paſſed by.

℣. 16. And he turned unto her by the way, &c.] Which led to her; he turned out of the way in which he was to that where ſhe ſat; and very probably it was at ſome little diſtance from the way, and therefore he turned aſide to it, his luſt towards her being excited at the ſight of her; perhaps he left his friend Hirah the Adullamite, and ſent him on his way whilſt he committed the following crime: go to, I pray thee, let me come in unto thee; that is, lie with her: for he knew not that ſhe was his daughter-in-law; or otherwiſe it is ſuggeſted by the hiſtorian, he would not have offered ſuch a thing to her: but though this may excuſe him from wilful inceſt, yet not from fornication; for he took her to be an harlot, and however knew ſhe was not his wife, and whom he ought not to have had any concern with in ſuch a manner: and ſhe ſaid, what wilt thou give me, that thou mayeſt come in unto me? perhaps ſhe ſaid this with a very low voice, that he might not know her by it; and ſhe behaved like an harlot by requiring an hire, on condition of which ſhe conſented: ſhe knew Judah though he did not know her, and therefore cannot be excuſed from wilful inceſt: ſome indeed extenuate her crime, by ſuppoſing that ſhe, though a Canaanite, was become a proſelyte to the true religion by marrying into Judah's family, and had knowledge knowledge of the Meſſiah being to be born of Jacob's line; and therefore was deſirous of being the mother or anceſtor at leaſt of that great perſon, and ſo took this method; that ſince ſhe could not have the ſon for her huſband, was deſirous of enjoying the father, not for the gratification of her luſt, but in hopes of the promiſed ſeed; and accordingly ſhe has a place in the genealogy of the Meſſiah, Matt. i. 3.

℣. 17. And he ſaid, I will ſend thee a kid from the flock, &c.] Either from Timnath, where his flock was ſhearing, or rather from Adullam where he lived; ſince it is probable he was now returning from Timnath, where he had been feaſting and making merry with his ſhearers, and ſo in a diſpoſition to commit ſuch an action: and ſhe ſaid, wilt thou give me a pledge, till thou ſend it? ſhe made no objection to the hire or preſent, only required a pawn, or ſecurity for it till ſhe had it; and this was her view indeed in aſking an hire, that ſhe might have ſomething to produce, ſhould ſhe prove with child by him, to convince him by whom it was.

℣. 18. And he ſaid, what pledge ſhall I give thee? &c.] Being willing to part with any thing for the gratification of his luſt: and ſhe ſaid, thy ſignet, and thy bracelets, and thy ſtaff that is in thine hand; ſhe aſks all theſe, that if one ſhould be loſt, or fail of being ſufficient proof, the other might: the firſt of theſe the Septuagint verſion renders, thy ring; the ring upon his finger, which had a ſeal on it, and was the ſignet of his right hand; ſo Onkelos and Ben Melech: the ſecond word ſeems not ſo well rendered, ſince bracelets were wore by women and not men: Jarchi takes it to be a garment with which he was covered; ſo Ben Melech and the Targum, a cloak, which is not likely, that ſhe ſhould deſire him to ſtrip off his cloaths: it ſeems to be either a covering of his head, a wrap of linen ſuch as the Turks wear, or elſe a handkerchief he had in his pocket; and the ſtaff in his hand, was either his walking-ſtaff or a ſhepherd's crook or ſtaff: and he gave it her, all the above things as a pledge: and came in unto her; not on the public road, but in ſome private place at ſome diſtance, to which they retired. Maimonides [c] ſays, before the law was given, if a man met a woman in the ſtreet, and he and ſhe agreed, he gave her hire, and he lay with her, and went away, and ſuch a one was called Kedeſhah, a harlot, the word uſed afterwards for Tamar: and ſhe conceived by him; ſhe proved with child upon it.

℣. 19. And ſhe aroſe and went away, &c.] To her father's houſe immediately, as ſoon as ever ſhe had parted with Judah; and leſt ſhe ſhould be found by the perſon that would be ſent with the kid, and be diſcovered, ſhe made all the haſte ſhe could: and laid by her vail from her, and put on the garments of her widowhood; that it might not be known or ſuſpected that ſhe had been abroad.

℣. 20. And Judah ſent the kid by the hand of his friend the Adullamite, &c.] Who went with him to Timnah, and was privy to all this wickedneſs, and kept the ſecret; but would have acted the more friendly and faithful part, had he diſſuaded him from it: him he employed to carry the kid he had promiſed, and not any of his ſervants, for the greater ſecrecy: and to receive his pledge from the woman's hand; his ſignet, bracelets, and ſtaff, or whatever they were: but he found her not; ſhe was gone from the place where ſhe ſat, or where ſhe retired to with Judah.

℣. 21. Then he aſked the men of that place, &c.] Or of her place [d], of the woman's place, ſuppoſing that ſhe dwelt ſome where thereabout: ſaying, where is the harlot that was openly by the way-ſide? that ſat there very publickly ſome little time ago: the word for harlot [e] comes from another, which ſignifies to ſanctify or ſeparate to holy uſes; and harlots were ſo called, either by an antiphraſis, by way of contradiction, being unholy; or becauſe, as Jarchi obſerves, they were ſeparated and deſtined to whoredom; or becauſe they were ſuch as were devoted to Venus, and the worſhippers of her, and proſtitutes in her temple, and in the temples of other heathen deities; but it is queſtionable, whether ſuch practices as yet were uſed: and they ſaid, there was no harlot in this place; they had not known any harlot to frequent that place lately, and Tamar ſat there ſo ſmall a time as not to have been obſerved by them.

℣. 22. And he returned to Judah, and ſaid, I cannot find her, &c.] That is, the Adullamite returned to him, and informed him that he could not find the harlot to whom he was ſent to deliver the kid and receive the pledge, after he had made the ſtricteſt enquiry for her he could: and alſo the men of the place ſaid, that there was no harlot in this place; by which it appears, that near the place where Tamar was, there was a town or city, and which was ſo free from ſuch infamous perſons that there was not one in it, that was known to be of ſuch a character, at leaſt, that in ſuch a publick manner expoſed herſelf: it would be well if the ſame could be ſaid of many other places.

℣. 23. And Judah ſaid, let her take it to her, &c.] The pledge, and make no farther enquiry after her; leſt we be ſhamed; Judah for committing fornication, which even among heathens, at leaſt, at that time a day was reckoned a ſhameful action; and be laughed at alſo, for committing ſuch a pledge to an whore, who had tricked him out of it; and his friend Hirah for conniving at the ſin, and being employed on ſuch an errand: behold, I ſent this kid, and thou haſt not found her; who could be a witneſs for him, if there ſhould be any occaſion, that he was faithful to his promiſe.

℣. 24. And it came to paſs about three months after, &c.] The above affair happened, and when the pregnancy of Tamar began to be ſomewhat viſible, as it does in women with child about that time: that it was told Judah, ſaying, Tamar thy daughter-in-law hath played the harlot; her being with child being obſerved by ſome of the family, or her neighbours, and knowing that ſhe did not cohabit with Shelah, who, according to cuſtom, ought to have been her huſband; concluded that ſhe had had a criminal converſation with ſome other perſon, which they were officious enough to report to Judah: and alſo behold, ſhe is with child by whoredom; which was judged to be a plain proof and evidence that ſhe had played the harlot: and Judah ſaid, bring her forth, and let her be burnt; not that Judah can be thought to be a civil magiſtrate in a Canaanitiſh and heathen city where he ſojourned, and as ſuch pronounced this ſentence on her at once, or even had the power of life and death in his own family; and beſides Tamar was not in his, but in her own father's houſe: but the ſenſe ſeems to be, that as he was a man of credit and eſteem in the neighbourhood, and had an an influence and intereſt in it; he moved that ſhe might be brought out of her father's houſe, and take her trial before the civil magiſtrates, and be committed to priſon until ſhe was delivered, for it would have been barbarous, and contrary to the law and light of nature to have burnt her when quick with child, and then indeed to be burnt to death, according to the uſage of this country; and as we find adultery in after-times was puniſhed with this kind of death, even among heathens, Jer. xxix. 22. 23. as it was in Egypt in the times of Seſoſtris the ſecond [f]; ſo Salæthus, prince of Croton in Italy, made a law that adulterers ſhould be burnt alive, as Lucian [g] relates; as did alſo Macrinus the emperor, that thoſe that were guilty of adultery ſhould be burnt alive together, their bodies joined to each other [h]: and this criminal action of Tamar was judged adultery, becauſe, ſhe was of right, and according to a cuſtom or law then in uſe, the wife of Shelah: the Targum of Jonathan intimates, ſhe was judged deſerving of this death, becauſe the daughter of a prieſt; the ſame law obtaining among the patriarchs as did in the times of Moſes, Lev. xxi. 9. and ſome, as Jarchi relates, ſay ſhe was the daughter of Shem [i], the ſame with Melchizedeck, prieſt of the moſt high God: one reaſon why Judah was in haſte to have the ſentence pronounced on her, and as ſoon as could be executed, was not only the diſgrace ſhe brought upon his family, but that ſhe might be diſpatched, and ſo his ſon Shelah freed from being obliged to marry her, which he did not care he ſhould, and was glad of this opportunity to prevent it.

℣. 25. When ſhe was brought forth, &c.] From her father's houſe, not to the place of execution, or in order to be burnt, but to the court of judicature, in order to take her trial: ſhe ſent to her father-in-law, ſaying, by the man whoſe theſe are, am I with child; ſhe ſent a meſſenger to him, and by him the ſignet, bracelets, and ſtaff, be they what they may, ſhe had received from him as a pledge for the kid he promiſed her; and ordered the meſſenger to ſay at the ſame time he ſhewed him theſe things, that ſhe was with child by the perſon to whom they belonged; which was a very modeſt way of laying it to his charge, and yet very ſtriking and convincing: and ſhe ſaid; by the meſſenger ſhe ſent: diſcern, I pray thee, whoſe are theſe, the ſignet, and bracelets, and ſtaff; which were the things given her as a pledge till ſhe received the kid, the hire ſhe was to have for his lying with her.

℣. 26. And Judah acknowledged them, &c.] He knew them, and owned them to be his: and ſaid, ſhe hath been more righteous than I; he means, not with reſpect to the ſin of uncleanneſs committed by them, in which ſhe was the greateſt criminal; ſhe ſat not only in the way to tempt him to it, but ſhe knew who he was, and wilfully committed inceſt with him; whereas he thought and knew of nothing elſe but ſimple fornication; but with reſpect to the affairs in connection between them: ſhe had on her part, according to his direction, kept herſelf a widow, in expectation of being given to his ſon Shelah for a wife; but he had not made good his part, he had not fulfilled his promiſe, he had neglected to give her to his ſon, which he ought to have done, according to the uſage of thoſe times, and as he had ſuggeſted to her he would; and his neglect of this had been the cauſe and occaſion of this criminal converſation between them; and this is the reaſon he himſelf gives of her being more righteous than he: becauſe I gave her not to Shelah my ſon; as he ought to have done, and as he promiſed he would: and he knew her again no more; in a carnal way; he did not repeat the ſin, but abſtained from it, having, no doubt, true repentance for it; though Jarchi obſerves, that ſome interpret the words, and Ben Melech ſays, ſome copies read, he did not ceaſe to know her; but took her for his wife and married her, which is ſuppoſed to be as juſtifiable as other things done before the law of Moſes; but this is not likely, and it looks as if he never married any wife after, or if he did, had no more children, ſince we read of no other but Shelah, and the twins he had by Tamar; and it ſeems as if Shelah alſo did not marry Tamar upon this, ſuch an inceſt being committed with her, ſince he appears to have had children by another woman, Numb. xxvi. 20.

℣. 27. And it came to paſs in the time of her travail, &c.] When her time to bring forth was come, and her pains were on her, and her midwife with her: that behold, twins were in her womb; which the midwife could diſcover before the birth of either.

℣. 28. And it came to paſs that when ſhe travailed, &c.] Her birth-throws came ſtrong and quick upon her: that the one put out his hand; which ſhewed that ſhe was like to have a difficult and dangerous time of it; that the birth was not like to be according to the uſual and natural order, which may be conſidered as a correction for her ſin: and the midwife took and bound upon his hand a ſcarlet thread, ſaying, this came out firſt; ſhe tied this to his wriſt, that ſhe might know whoſe hand it was, and ſo which was the firſt-born; which, to know was a matter of conſequence, ſince to the firſt-born there were ſome ſpecial and peculiar privileges.

℣. 29. And it came to paſs as he drew back his hand, &c.] Into the uterus again; that behold, his brother came out; out of his mother's womb, and ſo was properly born firſt: and ſhe ſaid; either Tamar, or rather her midwife: how haſt thou broken forth? it was aſtoniſhing to her how it could be, having never met with the like in her practice before; ſhe could not imagine how it was poſſible for him to come forth firſt, when his brother lay in the way of him, and neareſt the birth, as appeared by his putting out his hand: this breach be upon thee; if any damage comes either to the mother or to the brother, and ſo carries in it the nature of an imprecation; or rather, that the memory of ſo ſtrange an event might be preſerved, ſhe impoſed a name on him that ſhould continue it: therefore his name was called Pharez; or therefore he called, &c. [k] Judah called his name Pharez, agreeable to what the midwife had related. From him in a line of ſucceſſion, ſprang the Meſſiah, the Pharez or breaker, Mic. ii. 13. for the ſake of which, the whole hiſtory of this chapter ſeems to be recorded, Matt. i. 3.

℣. 30. And afterward came out his brother that had the ſcarlet thread upon his hand, &c.] By which it was known that he ſo far came out firſt; which confirms confirms the remarkable birth of his brother, who notwithſtanding got the ſtart of him: and his name was called Zarah; not from riſing, or his coming forth like the riſing ſun, as is uſually obſerved; but rather from his return, or drawing back his hand, and as it were returning to his mother's womb; and ſo, according to Hillerus [l], Zarah, by a tranſpoſition of letters comes from זור Chazar, to return: but Jarchi thinks he had his name from the refulgent appearance of the ſcarlet thread on his wriſt.

CHAP. XXXIX.

IN this chapter the hiſtory returns to Joſeph again, who being brought down to Egypt was ſold to Potiphar, with whom he found favour, and who ſet him over his houſe, the Lord proſpering every thing in his hands, ℣. 1—6. and being a young man of a comely aſpect, his miſtreſs luſted after him, and tempted him to lie with her from time to time, but he as conſtantly refuſed it, as being both ingratitude to his maſter, and a ſin againſt God, ℣. 7—10. at a certain time they being alone in the houſe, ſhe renewed her ſolicitations, and laid hold on his garment, which he left in her hand and fled, ℣. 11—12. upon which, ſhe called to her ſervants without and accuſed Joſeph of an ill deſign upon her, and reported the ſame to her huſband when he came home, ℣. 13—19. upon which his maſter put him into priſon, but he found favour alſo with the keeper of it, who committed the priſoners and all things relative to them into his hands, ℣. 20—23.

℣. 1. And Joſeph was brought down to Egypt, &c.] By the Iſhmaelites, ch. xxxvii. 28. as in a following clauſe: and Potiphar an officer of Pharaoh, captain of the guard, an Egyptian; as his name alſo ſhews, which ſignifies the fruit of Pot or Phut, that is, the ſon or grandſon of one of that name [m]; which might be common in Egypt, ſince it was the name of a ſon of Ham, from whom the land of Egypt is called the land of Ham; of this man and his offices ſee the note on ch. xxxvii. 36. he bought him; that is, Joſeph, of the hands of the Iſhmaelites, who had brought him down thither; what they gave for him we know, but what they ſold him for to Potiphar is not ſaid; no doubt they got a good price for him, and his maſter had a good bargain too, as appears by what follows.

℣. 2. And the Lord was with Joſeph, &c.] Bleſſing him with his gracious preſence, with diſcoveries of his love, and communion with himſelf, though deſtitute of the means of grace and ordinances of worſhip, he enjoyed in his father's houſe; favouring him with bodily health, and protecting him from all evils and enemies: and he was a proſperous man; in worldly things, and which was owing to the preſence of God with him, and his bleſſing on him: and he was in the houſe of his maſter the Egyptian; he continued there, and did not attempt to make his eſcape; or his employment lay chiefly if not altogether in the houſe, and herein he was proſperous, and continued to be ſo as long as he was in it; the Jews [n] ſay, he remained here 12 months. Near the pyramids built in the neighbourhood of Memphis, as is affirmed unanimouſly by the antients, to this day is ſhewn a hill, on which they ſay the houſe of Potiphar was built, whoſe ſervant the patriarch Joſeph was, and ſome of the rubbiſh of the bricks are yet to be ſeen [o].

℣. 3. And his maſter ſaw that the Lord was with him, &c.] He knew nothing of the ſpiritual and gracious preſence of God that was with him, he was no judge of that; but he perceived by the ingenuity of his mind, by his ready and ſpeedy learning the Egyptian language, by his dexterity in buſineſs, and by the prudence and faithfulneſs with which he did every thing, that he was highly favoured by the divine being, and had great endowments beſtowed upon him, and was an extraordinary perſon for his age: and that the Lord made all that he did to proſper in his hand; and though Potiphar might have no knowledge of the true Jehovah, whoſe name he uſes, yet he might have a notion of a ſupreme Being, and that all outward proſperity was owing to him; and knowing Joſeph to be an Hebrew, as it is plain his wife did, ℣. 14. and Jehovah to be the God of the Hebrews, he imputes all the proſperity that attended Joſeph and his ſervices, unto his God.

℣. 4 And Joſeph found grace in his ſight, &c.] In the ſight of his maſter, as he did in the ſight of God, he had favour both with God and man; his maſter had a high eſteem of him, and a great value for him, and ſhewed him much kindneſs and reſpect: and he ſerved him; readily, willingly, chearfully and faithfully; or he ſerved him perſonally; his maſter took ſuch a liking to him that he ſelected him from the reſt of his ſervants to wait on his perſon, and to be what we now call a valet de chambre, whoſe buſineſs was to dreſs and undreſs him, to wait upon him at table, &c. and he made him overſeer over his houſe, and all that he had he put into his hand; that is, after he had ſerved him ſome time, in the capacity of a valet, he advanced him, and made him the head-ſervant, or ſteward of his houſe, and committed all his buſineſs, caſh, and accounts to his care, and put all his ſervants under him.

℣. 5. And it came to paſs from the time that he had made him overſeer in his houſe, and over all that he had, &c.] How long he was in this office is not certain; there muſt be ſome time for the following obſervation; and during all the time he was in it, it was eaſily diſcerned, that the Lord bleſſed the Egyptian's houſe for Joſeph's ſake; that is, much more than before, every thing under his hands ſucceeded before, but now much more abundantly; Potiphar's family was bleſſed with health, his ſubſtance increaſed, he grew rich and wealthy, and abounded with all good things: and the bleſſing of the Lord was upon all that he had in the houſe, and in the field; his domeſtick affairs proſpered, his fields brought forth plentifully, his cattle were fruitful and ſtood well; every thing belonging to him within doors and without happily ſucceeded, through the bleſſing of God upon it, and all for Joſeph's ſake.

℣. 6. And he left all he had in Joſeph's hand, &c.] His maſter took no care of any thing but commited committed all to him, truſted him with his money and with his accounts, and with the management of all his affairs; ſuch confidence did he put in him: and he knew not aught he had, ſave the bread which he did eat; ſome underſtand this of Joſeph, that though he had all his maſter's ſubſtance in his hands, yet he made no uſe of it for himſelf, enjoyed nothing of it but the bread he eat; and it is the obſervation of a Jewiſh writer [p], that he eat nothing but dry bread, and yet, like Daniel, and his companions, was well favoured and of a goodly countenance, as in the next clauſe: but it is better to interpret it of Joſeph's maſter, who was ſo ſatisfied with Joſeph's good management and fidelity, that he never concerned himſelf about his affairs, how they ſtood or what money he had in his houſe, or what effects he was poſſeſſed of; all that he regarded was his food, and perhaps he knew not what that would be till it came to his table; tho' ſome take the expreſſion in this light, that he gave himſelf up to a luxurious life, regarding nothing but eating and drinking, and taking his pleaſure having ſo good and faithful a ſervant: but according to Aben Ezra the ſenſe is, that Joſeph had all committed to his care, excepting the bread, or making proviſion of that for him and his family, which he might not touch being an Hebrew, and had all things common with him but that, ſee ch. xliii. 32. which is a much better ſenſe than what the Targum of Jonathan and Jarchi give, who interpret bread of his wife, whom only he reſerved for himſelf of all things in his houſe: and Joſeph was a goodly perſon, and well-favoured; being like his mother, as Aben Ezra obſerves, ſee ch. xxix. 17. this is remarked for the ſake of what follows, and as leading on to that.

℣. 7. And it came to paſs after theſe things, &c.] After he was the overſeer of his houſe; in which office, after he had been ſome time, ſo it was, that his maſter's wife caſt her eyes upon Joſeph; he being a handſome young man, catched her eye, and that her heart, and led her on to luſt after him, and frequently fed her eyes with amorous glances at him; and at length being fired with luſt and having an opportunity, ſhe ſaid, to him, in a bold and impudent manner, in plain words, having given ſigns and hints, and dropt expreſſions tending thereto before, as it is probable: lie with me; now directly, there being both opportunity and convenience, perhaps her chamber was near: this was a very great temptation to a young man in ſingle life and living well, from his miſtreſs, who had it greatly in her power to make him ſhould he conſent, or ruin him ſhould he deny.

℣. 8. But he refuſed, and ſaid unto his maſter's wife, &c.] Reaſoning with her about the evil nature of the crime ſhe tempted him to, which to commit would be ingratitude, as well as injury to his maſter, and a ſin againſt God; by which it appears that Joſeph was a partaker of the grace of God, and that this was in ſtrong exerciſe at this time, by which he was preſerved from the temptation he was beſet with: behold, my maſter wotteth not what is with me in the houſe; what goods or money are in it: and he hath committed all that he hath to my hand; ſuch confidence did he repoſe in him, wherefore to do ſuch an injury to him as to commit adultery with his wife, would be making a ſad return, and acting a moſt ungrateful part for ſuch favour ſhewn him.

℣. 9. There is none greater in this houſe than I, &c.] Not any of the ſervants of the houſe, he was the chief of them, who had all the reſt under him; or rather, he himſelf, is not greater [q] in this houſe than I; that is, his maſter was not greater than he: he had a greater propriety in the houſe and the things of it, and he had the original power and authority in it, but had not a greater uſe of it; Joſeph had authority over all the ſervants, and every thing in the houſe at his command, and the free uſe of every thing his maſter had, excepting what follows: neither hath he kept back any thing from me, but thee, becauſe thou art his wife; and is a reaſon not only why his maſter retained her for his own uſe, but why he ſhould not touch her, and why ſhe ſhould not ſolicit him to it: how then can I do this great wickedneſs and ſin againſt God? the words are emphatical in the original, this! this wickedneſs! this great one! adultery was reckoned a great ſin among all nations, and this, had Joſeph committed it, would have been greatly aggravated by the favours his maſter had conferred upon him; and not only a ſin againſt himſelf, his ſoul and body, and againſt his maſter, but above all, a ſin againſt God, contrary to his holy nature, revealed will, and righteous law; all which prevailed upon Joſeph to refuſe the offer made him, which he could not comply with, in honour or with a good conſcience.

℣. 10. And it came to paſs, that as ſhe ſpake to Joſeph day by day, &c.] Continually, inceſſantly, hoping in time to prevail upon him to comply with her deſires; ſo that the temptation, as it was ſtrong, and very enſnaring, it was urgent, and frequent, and preſſed with great importunity; which required the more grace and ſpiritual ſtrength to reſiſt: that he hearkened not unto her; not only did not yield to her, but would not give her an hearing, at leaſt as little as poſſible he could, leſt he ſhould be overcome by her perſuaſions: to lie by her, or to be with her; ſhe might tempt him to lie by her, if he would not lie with her; or to lie, as Aben Ezra interprets it, in a place near her, in a chamber next to her's, in hopes by degrees to gain her point; but he would not yield to either, nor to be in her company, and have any converſation with her, at leaſt as little as poſſible, that he might not be in the way of temptation, and be led into it; though theſe phraſes may all ſignify carnal copulation with her, which was what his miſtreſs ſolicited, and he would not hearken to her in, and comply with her.

℣. 11. And it came to paſs about this time, &c.] About a week, or a month, or rather a year, as Aben Ezra thinks, after ſhe firſt began her ſolicitations to him. According to Joſephus [r], it was a public feſtival, at which women uſed to attend; but ſhe excuſed herſelf, pretending illneſs; and ſo Jarchi takes it to be ſome noted day at the idol's temple, to which all uſed to go; but ſhe pretended ſhe was ſick, and could not go, knowing that Joſeph would not be there, but at home, and therefore judged this a fit opportunity to attack him once more: and ſo it was, that Joſeph went into the houſe to do his buſineſs; to inſpect the accounts, as the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan paraphraſe it, and ſettle them: and there was none of the men of the houſe there within; being all gone to the public feſtival, or however there were none in that part of the houſe where Joſeph was.

℣. 12. And ſhe caught him by his garment, ſaying, lie with me, &c.] It is very probable that before this time, as ſoon as ever ſhe began to ſpeak to him, he got away as faſt as he could, and would not hear her; wherefore ſhe now laid hold on his garment, in order to detain him, that ſhe might have time to parley with him, and ſo prevail: and he left his garment in her hand, and fled, and got him out; it was his outward looſe garment ſhe laid hold on, out of which he ſlipt himſelf, and ſo got clear of her, and ran away, and got out of the houſe as faſt as he could: this he did, becauſe he would not ſtruggle with his miſtreſs for his garment, which no doubt by his ſtrength he could have got from her; and partly leſt he ſhould by handling of her have carnal deſires excited in him, and ſo be overcome with the temptation.

℣. 13. And it came to paſs, when ſhe ſaw that he had left his garment in her hand, &c.] And ſo all hopes of ſucceeding in her addreſſes to him were over: and (he) was fled forth; into the ſtreets, or into ſome out-houſe, where buſineſs was carried on by ſervants under him, ℣. 14. That ſhe called unto the men of her houſe, &c.] Of that part of the houſe which belonged to her; her eunuchs that waited upon her, or that were in another part of the houſe, at ſome diſtance: and ſpake unto them; when they came to her: ſaying, ſee, he hath brought in an Hebrew unto us to mock us; ſhe means her huſband, whom through contempt, and in her paſſion, ſhe names not, having loſt all affection for him, as her addreſſes to Joſeph ſhewed; and ſo the Targum of Jonathan ſupplies it, "your maſter hath brought, &c." and Joſeph ſhe calls an Hebrew by way of reproach, and with a view to ſet her ſervants againſt him; who before this might not have any great regard to him through envy at him, for the favours he enjoyed, and the authority he had; and becauſe he prevented them doing wrong things to ſerve themſelves, and hurt their maſter: and holding up his garment in her hand, which they knew full well, bid them look at it, and obſerve, that this was the iſſue of his being brought into the houſe by their maſter; that though it was not with ſuch an intention, which can hardly be thought to be her ſenſe, yet this was the event of it; an attempt to abuſe, vitiate and corrupt her, and ſo bring contempt upon the whole family, and expoſe them to the ſcorn and mockery of men, for their miſtreſs to be abuſed by a baſe foreigner: ſhe explains herſelf more fully by ſaying, he came in unto me to lie with me, and I cried with a loud voice; both of them lies; for it was ſhe that ſolicited him to lie with her, and not he; nor did ſhe cry out at all; and if ſhe did, how came it ſhe was not heard by them, as well as when ſhe called unto them; thus her impure love was turned into hatred, which put her upon framing lies and calumnies; and which has been alſo done in caſes ſimilar to this[s], as Sthenobæa againſt Bellerophon.

℣. 15. And it came to paſs, when he heard that I lifted up my voice, and cried, &c.] He attempting to raviſh her, as ſhe would have it underſtood, but afraid, leſt upon her outcry thoſe that were in the houſe ſhould come in to her aſſiſtance, and ſeize on him: that he left his garment with me, and fled, and got him out; but why ſhould he ſtrip himſelf of his garment, and leave that behind him? he might have fled with it.

℣. 16. And ſhe laid up his garment by her, &c.] As a proof of what ſhe laid to his charge, and as a teſtimony againſt him: until her lord came home; or until his lord came home, for the pronoun refers to Joſeph, and ſo Jarchi interprets it; who either was gone a journey, or gone to court that day, being an officer of Pharaoh's, or to the public place where the feſtival was kept that day, if it was ſuch an one.

℣. 17. And ſhe ſpake unto him according to theſe words, &c.] When her huſband came home ſhe related to him the above affair, according to the purport of the above words, and in much the ſame manner, and to the ſame import as ſhe had to the men of her houſe: ſaying, the Hebrew ſervant which thou haſt brought unto us came in unto me to mock me; in an obſcene manner, uſing filthy words and actions, contrary to the rules of chaſtity as well as good manners; or, in other words, to lie with her, which ſhe pretended he ſolicited.

℣. 18. And it came to paſs, as I lift up my voice, and cried, &c.] For help from the ſervants, and frighted at his inſolent attempt: that he left his garment with me, and fled out; and then ſhe brought it forth, and ſhowed him it.

℣. 19. And it came to paſs, when his maſter heard the words of his wife, &c.] The ſtory ſhe related concerning Joſeph, which was her own invention, and a lie: which ſhe ſpake unto him, ſaying, after this manner did thy ſervant to me; attempting to violate her chaſtity, as ſhe pretended: that his wrath was kindled; that is, againſt Joſeph, without ſtrictly examining her words, which they would not bear, her ſtory being but ill put together, and without hearing Joſeph's defence.

℣. 20. And Joſeph's maſter took him, and put him into the priſon, &c.] Which was in or adjoining to his houſe, ch. xl. 3. of himſelf he had power to do this, as the captain of the guard; and as he was the chief of the executioners, as ſome take his office to be, it is much he did not in his paſſion deliver him up into their hands to put him to death at once; but it may be thro' the great reſpect he had had for Joſeph, which was not wholly extinguiſhed by this impeachment of him, and eſpecially if he heard Joſeph's apology for himſelf before he committed him, his paſſion might ſubſide a little, tho' for the credit of his wife he might take this ſtep; or however things were ſo over-ruled by the providence of God, who has the hearts of all men in his hands, that he ſhould do what he did. The word for priſon has the ſignification of roundneſs, and may be rendered the round houſe[t], or round tower; and ſome Jewiſh writers, as Aben Ezra obſerves, take it to be in this form, that it was made under ground, and at the top of it was an hole which let in light, and at which they went into it. Aben Ezra is at a loſs to ſay whether it is an Hebrew or Egyptian word, and inclines to the latter, becauſe he thinks it is explained in the next clauſe: a place where the king's priſoners were bound; ſuch as were guilty of high-treaſon, or however of high crimes and miſdemeanors againſt him; and ſo was a priſon in which men were ſtrictly kept and uſed hardly, as was Joſeph at firſt, as appears from Pſ. cv. 18: and he was there in the priſon; he continued there, ſome of the Jewiſh writers ſay [u] 10 years, others 12 [w]; and ſo long he muſt be, if he was but one year in Potiphar's houſe; for there were 13 years between his being ſold into Egypt, and and his appearance before Pharaoh; he was 17 when he was ſold, and he was 30 when he ſtood before Pharaoh, being took out of priſon, ſee ch xxxvii. 2. and xli. 46. but it is more likely, that he was a longer time in Potiphar's houſe, and a leſſer time in priſon.

℣. 21. And the Lord was with Joſeph, &c.] Comforting him with his preſence under his afflictions; ſupporting him with his right-hand; ſanctifying all his troubles to him, and ſo cauſing him to bear them patiently and chearfully: and ſhewed him mercy, and gave him favour in the ſight of the keeper of the priſon; who was the under-keeper to Potiphar; God ſo wrought upon the heart of this man, that he was merciful to him, and took off the iron-fetters which hurt his feet, and gave him liberty to walk about; and many other favours and kindneſſes he ſhewed unto him, as follow.

℣. 22. And the keeper of the priſon committed to Joſeph's hand all the priſoners that were in the priſon, &c.] Who, as they were ſtate-priſoners, were a conſiderable charge; and this gave Joſeph great honour, credit and influence in the priſon: and whatſoever they did there, he was the doer of it; not that he learned and exerciſed every trade the priſoners were of, to get a living by, which is the ſenſe of ſome, as Aben Ezra relates; or that he in fact did every thing that was done in the priſon: but the meaning is, that he gave orders for the doing of every thing, and there was nothing done without him; all that was done, as the Targum of Jonathan paraphraſes it, he commanded it to be done; or as Onkelos, all that was done was done by his word, that is, by his authority and command.

℣. 23. The keeper of the priſon looked not to any thing that was under his hand, &c.] Under the hand of Joſeph; he did not enquire into, and examine his conduct and management of things; he took no account of what was in his hands, nor required any of him; ſo ſatisfied was he with what he did, and had ſuch an opinion of his prudence and faithfulneſs. The Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan paraphraſe it, "he ſaw no crime in him," either in the management of affairs he committed to him, or for which he was put into priſon, and therefore did not uſe him as he did other priſoners: becauſe the Lord was with him; ſupplying him with his grace, giving him wiſdom to do every thing in the beſt manner committed to him, which cauſed the keeper of the priſon to reſpect him as he did: and that which he did, the Lord made it to proſper; every method he took to ſecure the priſoners, every ſcheme he formed to bring them to a confeſſion of their crimes, or to clear thoſe that were innocent; and every other thing relative to priſon-affairs, all through the good hand of God upon him, guiding, directing and bleſſing him, ſucceeded well, which gained him the favour and goodwill of the keeper and the priſoners.

CHAP. XL.

THE hiſtory of this chapter is, the impriſonment of two of Pharaoh's officers, his chief butler and chief baker, who by the captain of the guard were made the charge of Joſeph, ℣. 1—4. they both dreamed in priſon, which made them ſad; Joſeph taking notice of their ſadneſs, aſked the reaſon of it, and encouraged them to tell him their dreams, ℣. 5—8. the chief butler told his dream of the vine and three branches, which Joſeph interpreted of his reſtoration to his office within three days, and deſired him to remember him unto Pharaoh when he ſtood before him, telling him his caſe, ℣. 9—15. then the chief baker told his dream of three white baſkets of food on his head, which the birds eat, and this Joſeph interpreted of his being hanged within three days, ℣. 16—19. and the events anſwered to the interpretation, but Joſeph was forgot by the chief butler, ℣. 20—23.

℣. 1. And it came to paſs after theſe things, &c.] After Joſeph had been accuſed and caſt into priſon, where he had been for ſome time: that the butler of the king of Egypt, and his baker had offended their lord the king of Egypt; committed ſome fault, at leaſt were accuſed of one, which raiſed his diſpleaſure at them. The Targum of Jonathan ſays, that they conſulted to put poiſon into his drink and food; which, it is not improbable, conſidering their buſineſs and office, they might be charged with; at leaſt it is much more probable than what Jarchi ſuggeſts, that the one put a flie into his cup, and the other a little ſtone or ſand into his bread.

℣. 2. And Pharaoh was wroth againſt two of his officers, &c.] The ſame above mentioned: againſt the chief of the butlers, and againſt the chief of the bakers; for as there were ſeveral butlers and bakers that belonged unto him, who were employed in providing wine and food for him, there was one of each who was over the reſt; and as their buſineſs was to ſee that thoſe under them did their work well, when they were faulty, the principal officers were anſwerable for it: wherefore, if in this caſe they had not been guilty of any thing criminal themſelves perſonally, yet they might have neglected to look after thoſe that were under them, and ſo were culpable, and drew upon them the wrath and reſentment of their lord and ſovereign.

℣. 3. And he put them in ward in the houſe of the captain of the guard, &c.] Who is generally thought to be Potiphar, ſince this was the office he was in, ch. xxxix. 1. unleſs he was dead, and there was another put into his room, or there were more than one in the ſame office: into the priſon, the place where Joſeph was bound; that is, where he had been bound, and where he was ſtill a priſoner, though not fetter'd and in that cloſe confinement he had been in.

℣. 4. And the captain of the guard charged Joſeph with them, &c.] Committed them to his care and cuſtody, he being very probably recommended to him by the keeper of the priſon for his prudence and fidelity; and if it was Potiphar, he knew his character full well, and might be now reconciled unto him, as having had a more full and clear account of the affair between him and his wife from the keeper of the priſon; and therefore, though he might not think fit for his own and his wife's reputation to remove him from priſon as yet, nevertheleſs might be inclined to do him what ſervice he could, as well as honour, as this was, to have two ſuch ſtate-priſoners committed to his care. Some render it, he committed Joſeph with them; them [x]; to be with them, as Jarchi interprets it; they were put together, not merely for the ſake of company, but that Joſeph might wait upon them, which might be beneficial as well as creditable, as it follows: and he ſerved them; he miniſtred unto them, and brought them every thing they wanted: and they continued a ſeaſon in ward; or days [y]; ſome certain days, many days, a year, as Jarchi and Ben Gerſom interpret it, and which is ſometimes the uſe of the word. The ſtory of the butler and baker is told, partly to ſhew the divine faculty of interpreting dreams Joſeph was poſſeſſed of; and partly to obſerve the remarkable ſteps in Providence, though ſecret, towards his advancement in Pharaoh's court.

℣. 5. And they dreamed a dream both of them, &c.] Not one and the ſame dream: each man his dream in one night; which made it the more remarkable, and the more impreſſed their minds, concluding from hence there muſt be ſomething of importance in their dreams: each man according to the interpretation of his dream; they dreamed each what was ſuitable to his office and character, and which portended what ſhould hereafter befal them, as the interpretation of them by Joſeph afterwards, and the event ſhewed; ſo that it was not a vain idle dream, but divine and certain: the butler and the baker of the king of Egypt, which were bound in the priſon; this is added for explanation-ſake, ſhewing who were the perſons ſpoken of that dreamed the dreams.

℣. 6. And Joſeph came in unto them in the morning, &c.] For though Joſeph and they were in the ſame priſon, yet not in the ſame ward. Aben Ezra thinks, that Joſeph lodged in the dungeon in the night, ℣. 15. and was let out in the morning to wait on theſe priſoners; but the great intereſt he had in the keeper of the priſon, and the favour ſhewn him by the captain of the guard, in putting ſuch priſoners under his care, will eaſily make one conclude, that Joſeph now had a better lodging than that; though it had been his caſe, he was now provided with a better apartment in the priſon; and when he aroſe in the morning, like a careful and faithful ſervant, he came to the ward where the priſoners under his care were, to ſee that they were ſafe, and what they wanted: and looked upon them, and behold they were ſad; they looked ſorrowful, dejected and uneaſy.

℣. 7. And he aſked Pharaoh's officers that were with him, &c.] The chief butler and baker that were committed to his care, and with whom he now was, in the ward of the lord's houſe; this ſeems to confirm what is before obſerved, that the captain of the guard that charged Joſeph with them was Potiphar his maſter; tho' indeed the keeper of the priſon that was under Potiphar, the captain of the guard, might be called Joſeph's lord or maſter, but the houſe could not with ſo much propriety be called his: ſaying, wherefore look ye ſo ſadly to-day? as they were officers, who had been in lucrative places, they lived well and merrily, and expected very probably they ſhould be releaſed in a ſhort time, nothing appearing againſt them; but now there was a ſtrange alteration in them, which was very viſible to Joſeph, and for which he expreſſes a concern, being of a kind, tender and benevolent diſpoſition, as the queſtion he puts to them ſhows.

℣. 8. And they ſaid unto him, we have dreamed a dream, &c.] Each of them: and there is no interpreter of it; in that place in which they were, the priſon; otherwiſe there were perſons enow in the land that pretended to the interpretation of dreams, ch. xli. 8. but they could not come at them, being in priſon: and Joſeph ſaid unto them, do not interpretations belong to God? that is, of dreams, and to him only, meaning the true God whom he worſhipped; for as dreams themſelves, which are of importance, and predict things to come, are of God; for none can foretel future events but he, and ſuch to whom he imparts the gift of prophecy; ſo none can interpret dreams with any certainty but God himſelf, and thoſe to whom he gives the faculty of interpretation of them; this Joſeph ſaid to take off their minds from the magicians, and wiſemen, and interpreters of dreams among the Egyptians, theſe officers were hankering after, and wiſhed they had them with them to interpret their dreams to them; and to ſuggeſt unto them, that though he did not arrogate ſuch a power to himſelf, as having it of himſelf, yet intimates that he doubted not, but upon an addreſs to his God, he would favour him with the interpretation of their dreams, and therefore encourages them to relate them to him: tell me them, I pray you; or now [z], directly, as the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan; ſignifying, that he would immediately interpret them to them; no doubt Joſeph ſaid this under a divine impulſe.

℣. 9. And the chief butler told his dream to Joſeph, &c.] He liſtened to what Joſeph ſaid, and paid a regard to it, and began to think he might be able to interpret his dream, and therefore was forward, and the firſt to tell him it at once; whereas the chief baker did not ſeem diſpoſed to do it, until he obſerved the good interpretation given of the butler's dream, ℣. 16: and ſaid unto him, in my dream, behold, a vine was before me; it appeared to him in his dream, as if a vine ſprung up at once, and ſtood before him; which was very ſuitable to his office as a butler, wine being the fruit of the vine, which he provided for the king his maſter, and preſented to him at table.

℣. 10. And in the vine were three branches, &c.] Which ſhot out from the root or body of it: and it was as though it budded; the branches ſeemed to ſprout out: and her bloſſoms ſhot forth; it knotted, and the flowers of the vine appeared, which blowing off, the tender grapes were ſeen: and the cluſters thereof brought forth ripe grapes; all which is agreeable to the order nature obſerves, from the firſt putting forth of the vine, to its producing ripe fruit; and which in this dream immediately followed one another, as it ſeemed according to the repreſentation of things to the mind of the butler, and which he perfectly remembered, it having made a ſtrong impreſſion upon him.

℣. 11. And Pharaoh's cup was in his hand, &c.] So it ſeemed to him in his dream, as it often had been when in his office: and I took the grapes; from off the vine that was before him: and preſſed them into Pharaoh's cup; which ſome think was the cuſtom of thoſe times, to take a bunch of grapes and ſqueeze them into a cup, eſpecially when they would make trial of what ſort of wine they would produce; for it can hardly be thought that this was uſually done, or that it was cuſtomary to drink ſuch new wine: but it is more probable, that the grapes were firſt preſſed into another veſſel, and ſo made wine of, and then poured into Pharaoh's raoh's cup, or mixed in it, though this circumſtance is omitted. Indeed Herodotus [a] relates of the Egyptian prieſts, that wine preſſed out of the vine is given them: and I gave the cup into Pharaoh's hand; as he had uſed to do.

℣. 12. And Joſeph ſaid unto him, this is the interpretation of it, &c.] Of the dream: the three branches are three days; ſignify three days, or as Jarchi expreſſes it, are a ſign of three days; which Joſeph could know only by divine revelation; for there is no more likeneſs between branches and days, than between them and months or years, and bid as fair to ſignify one as the other, if the interpretation depended on ſimilarity, or bare conjecture.

℣. 13. Yet within three days ſhall Pharaoh lift up thine head, &c.] The Targum of Jonathan adds, with glory; and the ſenſe is, either that Pharaoh would raiſe him up from the low eſtate in which he now was, to the ſame exalted ſtation in which he had been before; or that he would reckon and number him among his ſervants, when he ſhould take a catalogue of them, or make a new liſt, ſo Jarchi and Aben Ezra; and this phraſe is uſed of taking the ſum of perſons, or the number of them, and is ſo rendered, Exod. xxx. 12. Numb. iv. 2 22. the alluſion is thought to be to a cuſtom uſed by great perſonages, to have the names of their ſervants called over on a certain day, as Pharaoh perhaps uſed to do on his birth day, ℣. 20. when they ſtruck out of the liſt or put into it whom they pleaſed, and pardoned or puniſhed ſuch as had offended; and this ſenſe is the rather inclined to, becauſe Pharaoh is ſaid to lift up the head of both the butler and the baker, ℣. 20. yet it may be obſerved, that the phraſes uſed by Joſeph concerning them differ; for of the baker, he ſays, Pharaoh ſhall lift up thy head from off thee, ℣. 19. wherefore, though the heads of them both were lift up, yet in a different ſenſe: the one was lifted up to the gallows, and the other to his former dignity, as follows: and reſtore thee unto thy place; to his office in miniſtring to Pharaoh as his cup-bearer: and thou ſhalt deliver Pharaoh's cup into his hand, after the former manner when thou waſt his butler; which was ſignified in the dream, by ſqueezing the grapes into Pharaoh's cup he had in his hand, and gave unto him.

℣. 14. But think on me, when it ſhall be well with thee, &c.] He deſires no reward for the interpretation of his dream, only that he would remember him in adverſity, when he ſhould be in proſperity in Pharaoh's court, and ſpeak a good word for him, which was the leaſt he could do; and though Joſeph knew by his own dreams, that he ſhould be raiſed from his low eſtate to a very high and advanced one, yet he thought proper, in a dependance on God, to make uſe of all lawful means for his deliverance; nor is he to be blamed, as if he ſought help of man and not of God, as he is by ſome writers both chriſtian and Jewiſh, particularly by the Targum of Jonathan, "Joſeph loſt his ſuperior con- "fidence, and retained the confidence of men;" whereas means are always to be uſed in order to the end, in ſubordination to the divine will; and what Joſeph aſked of the butler was but reaſonable, and what he ought to have done for him, and was prudently moved by Joſeph, as a rational method of his deliverance, and in which he was, no doubt, guided and directed by the providence of God, as the event ſhews: and ſhew kindneſs, I pray thee, unto me; he pleads no merit for what he had done in interpreting his dream, but puts the good office he deſires him to do for him, upon the foot of kindneſs to a man in diſtreſs, and aſks it as a favour, by way of intreaty and requeſt: and make mention of me, and bring me out of this houſe; the priſon in which he was; for though he had much favour ſhewn him, and had more liberty granted him than other priſoners had, yet a priſoner he was, and a priſon he dwelt in, and deliverance from it was deſirable, could it be had; and this was a likely way to obtain it, if the butler would ſpeak a good word for him to Pharaoh, which he would have an opportunity to do, being often in his preſence and frequently when chearful.

℣. 15. For indeed I was ſtolen away out of the land of the Hebrews, &c.] Not the whole land of Canaan, ſo called, either from the Hebrews ſojourning in it, or from its being given unto them by God; neither of which could be a reaſon why Joſeph when talking with an Egyptian, ſhould give it this name, and which, it muſt be ſuppoſed, was known to him; but that part of the land of Canaan where the Hebrews had ſojourned for 3 generations, where Abraham, Iſaac and Jacob had lived, even at or near Hebron; and being perſons of great note, and having done great exploits, their names were well known, and the country where they lived, and particularly among the Egyptians: now Joſeph does not expoſe the ſin of his brethren in ſelling him to the Iſhmaelites, by whom he was brought into Egypt and ſold there; only relates that he was ſtolen out of his native country, being taken from it without his own or his father's conſent: and here alſo have I done nothing that they ſhould put me into the dungeon; ſince he had been in the land of Egypt, he had not been guilty of any criminal action, wherefore he ſhould be put into a priſon, and eſpecially into a dungeon, a dark and filthy place under ground, as dungeons uſually were, and into which Joſeph was put when firſt in confinement, though ſince took out of it: he makes no mention of the wickedneſs of his miſtreſs, and of her falſe accuſation of him, nor of the injuſtice of his maſter in putting him into priſon without hearing him; only aſſerts his own innocence, which was neceſſary to recommend himſelf to the butler, that he might not think he was ſome looſe fellow that was committed to priſon for ſome capital crime, and ſo it would have been a diſgrace to him to have ſpoken for him.

℣. 16. When the chief baker ſaw that the interpretation was good, &c.] Meaning not that it was right and juſt, though it was; but that it was agreeable and pleaſing, and portended good in the event; and therefore hoped a like interpretation would be given of his dream, and this encouraged him to tell it, which perhaps otherwiſe he would not have done: he ſaid unto Joſeph, I alſo was in my dream; or had a dream, and in it things were repreſented to his mind as follows: and behold, I had three white baſkets on my head; which were made of wicker, of rods that had the bark pulled off and ſo were white; or which had holes in them, baſkets wrought with holes, after the manner of net-work; though ſome think this denotes not the colour or form of the baſket, but of the bread in them, and interpret the words, baſkets of white bread, as Saadiah Gaon, and ſo the Targum of Jonathan, baſkets of moſt pure bread, and the Targum of Jeruſalem, baſkets of hot bread; this dream was very agreeable to his office and buſineſs as a baker.

[a] Euterpe, ſive, l. 2. c. 37.

℣. 17. And in the uppermoſt baſket there were of all manner of bake-meats for Pharaoh, &c.] All ſorts of paſtry, as tarts, pies, &c. Joſephus [b] ſays, 2 of the baſkets were full of bread, and the 3d had various ſorts of food, ſuch as is uſually prepared for kings: and the birds did eat them out of the baſket upon my head; all the 3 baſkets were upon his head, but this ſeems to be the uppermoſt, which the birds could more eaſily come at; though if the baſkets were full of holes they might through them peck the bread with their bills.

℣. 18. And Joſeph anſwered and ſaid, &c.] Immediately, directly, without any further thought and meditation, being divinely inſtructed: this is the interpretation thereof; of the above dream: the three baſkets are three days; ſignify 3 days.

℣. 19. Yet within 3 days ſhall Pharaoh lift up thine head from off thee, &c.] Order thee to be beheaded; ſo the Targum of Jonathan and Ben Melech interpret it, "Pharaoh ſhall remove thy "head from thy body with a ſword:" and ſhall hang thee on a tree; his body after his head was ſevered from it, this ſhould be hung upon a gallows or gibbet, and there continue: and the birds ſhall eat thy fleſh from off thee; as they uſually do when bodies are thus hung up, ſee 2 Sam. xxi. 9. 10. this was ſignified by the birds eating the bake-meats out of the uppermoſt baſket when upon his head, as it ſeemed to him in his dream.

℣. 20. And it came to paſs the 3d day, which was Pharaoh's birth-day, &c.] The 3d day from the time the dreams were told, and the interpretation of them given, was the birth-day of Pharaoh; either the day in which a ſon of his was born, or in which he himſelf was born, as Ben Melech obſerves; but the latter is more probable, ſince the former could not with propriety be called Pharaoh's birth-day; and this might be either the day of his natural birth, or of his political birth, the time of his acceſſion to the throne, which with the Romans was called natalis imperii, and was obſerved with feaſting and rejoicing [c], as well as the former, both among them and other nations: it is moſt likely this was Pharaoh's natural birth-day, which was obſerved among the Egyptians as birth-days were among the Perſians [d], and as Herod's was at his court in the days of Chriſt, Matt. xiv. 6. and as is uſual in our times in moſt countries: that he made a feaſt unto all his ſervants; his miniſters of ſtate, his courtiers, and all in his palace: and he lifted up the head of his chief butler, and of his chief baker among his ſervants; that is, among his ſervants, when their names were called over; or at this feſtival, theſe two were taken notice of, as being charged with crimes, and their caſes were looked into and examined, and their heads were lifted up in a different ſenſe: they were both lifted out of priſon, but the one was lifted up to his former poſt and place in Pharaoh's court, and the other was lifted up to a gallows or gibbet, as follows; though perhaps this lifting of them both may only ſignify the trial of them, when they were ſet on high to be ſeen by the judge and all the court, ſee 1 Kings xxi. 9.

℣. 21. And he reſtored the chief butler unto his butlerſhip again, &c.] Put him into the ſame office he was in before: and he gave the cup into Pharaoh's hand; miniſtred to him in his office the ſame day, according to his dream and the interpretation of it: the Targum of Jonathan adds this as a reaſon of his being reſtored, "becauſe he found "that he was not in that counſel," in which it was conſulted to poiſon Pharaoh, ſee the note on ℣. 1.

℣. 22. But he hanged the chief baker, &c.] That is, he ordered him to be hanged; becauſe, as the ſame Targum ſays, he conſulted to kill him (Pharaoh): as Joſeph had interpreted to them; the events as to both anſwered to the interpretation Joſeph had given of their ſeveral dreams.

℣. 23. Yet did not the chief butler remember Joſeph, &c.] To ſpeak of him to Pharaoh, neither on that day in which he was reſtored, nor for a long time after, even for the ſpace of two years, as ſeems from the following chapter: but forgot him; never more thought of him, of the favour he had done him in interpreting his dream; of the requeſt he made to him, and of the promiſe which he had probably given him; which was an inſtance of great ingratitude, and is frequently the caſe and character of courtiers, who being in high places themſelves, neglect others, their petitions to them, and their own promiſes to do all they can for them.

CHAP. XLI.

IN this chapter are related Pharaoh's dreams, which his magicians could not interpret, ℣. 1—9. upon which the chief butler now remembring Joſeph, recommended him to Pharaoh as an interpreter, having had an happy experience of him as ſuch himſelf, ℣. 10—13. when Joſeph was ſent for out of priſon; and Pharaoh having related his dreams, he interpreted them of ſeven years of plenty, and ſeven years of famine that ſhould be in the land of Egypt, ℣. 14—32. and having done, he gave his advice to provide in the years of plenty againſt the years of famine, and propoſed a ſcheme for doing it, which was approved of by Pharaoh and his miniſters, ℣. 33—37. and Joſeph himſelf was pitched upon as the moſt proper perſon to execute it, and was appointed chief over the kingdom next to Pharaoh, who gave him a new name and a wife upon this occaſion, ℣. 38—45. accordingly, in the years of plenty he took a tour throughout the whole land, and gathered and laid up food in vaſt quantities in every city, ℣. 46—49. an account is given of two ſons born to Joſeph, and of their names, ℣. 50—52. and of the ſeven years of famine, beginning to come on at the end of the ſeven years of plenty, which brought great diſtreſs on the land of Egypt, and the countries round about, who all came to Joſeph to buy corn, ℣. 53—57.

℣. 1. And it came to paſs at the end of two full years, &c.] It is not a clear caſe, as Aben Ezra obſerves, from whence theſe years are to be reckoned, whether from the time of Joſeph's being put into priſon, or from the time that the chief butler was taken out of it; the latter ſeems more probable, and better connects this and the preceding chapter: that Pharaoh dreamed, and behold, he ſtood by the river; it ſeemed to him, in his dream, as if he ſtood near the river Nile, or ſome canal or flow of water cut out of that river.

[d] Herodot.

℣. 2. And behold, there came up out of the river ſeven well-favoured kine, and fat-fleſhed, &c.] Seven cows or heifers, ſleek, fat and plump, goodly to look at; theſe ſeemed in the dream, as if they came out of the river, becauſe they were fed with the fruits of the earth, which the overflowing of the river Nile, and its canals, produced: and they fed in a meadow; adjoining to the river, where there was good paſture for them, and gives a reaſon of their being in ſo good a condition.

℣. 3. And behold, ſeven other kine came up after them out of the river, ill-favoured, and lean-fleſhed, &c.] Thin and hagged, their bones ſtuck out, having ſcarce any fleſh upon them, and made a wretched figure: and ſtood by the other kine; and looked ſo much the worſe, when compared with them: upon the brink of the river; it not being overflowed, ſo that there was no graſs to be had, but juſt upon the bank, where theſe kept for that purpoſe; for the fruitfulneſs of Egypt was owing to the river Nile, as that overflowed, or did not, there was plenty or famine; hence both theſe ſorts of creatures came up out of that.

℣. 4. And the ill-favoured, and lean-fleſhed kine did eat up the ſeven well-favoured and fat kine, &c.] So it ſeemed in the dream as if this was done, which was very ſtrange and ſurprizing that animals ſhould devour one another; and eſpecially that tame ones, cows or heifers, ſhould eat thoſe of their own ſpecies, which was never known to be done: ſo Pharaoh awoke; thro' ſurprize at the ſtrange ſight he had in his dream.

℣. 5. And he ſlept, and dreamed the ſecond time, &c.] He fell aſleep again quickly, and dreamed another dream the ſame night, and to the ſame purpoſe, being much of the like kind with the former: and behold, ſeven ears of corn came up upon one ſtalk, rank and good; which were very uncommon even in thoſe fruitful countries; though Dr. Shaw [e] obſerves of Barbary, which vied with Egypt for fruitfulneſs, that it ſometimes happens that one ſtalk of wheat will bear two ears, whilſt each of theſe ears will as often ſhoot out into a number of leſſer ones, thereby affording a moſt plentiful increaſe.

℣. 6. And behold, ſeven thin ears, and blaſted with the eaſt-wind, &c.] Which is very fatal to corn, to dry, burn, ſmite or blaſt it; and eſpecially to the corn in Egypt, whither it blew from the deſart of Arabia: theſe ſprung up after them; after the ſeven full ears, in the ſame place the other did, or near unto them.

℣. 7. And the ſeven thin ears devoured the ſeven rank and full ears, &c.] So it appeared to Pharaoh in his dream, which muſt be very amazing to behold, and unaccountable how it ſhould be: and Pharaoh awoke, and behold, it was a dream; not a real fact but a dream; yet not a common dream, but had ſome important ſignification in it; it not vaniſhing from his mind, but abode upon it, which made him conclude there was ſomething more than common in it, and made him very deſirous to have the interpretation of it.

℣. 8. And it came to paſs in the morning, that his ſpirit was troubled, &c.] With the thoughts of his dreams; they were uppermoſt in his mind; he was continually thinking of them; it was as if he had always the ſame images before him now awake, as well as when aſleep, and therefore could not be eaſy without getting knowledge of the meaning of them: and he ſent and called for all the magicians of Egypt, and all the wiſe men thereof; who pretended to have great ſkill in the things of nature, and in aſtrology and other ſciences, by which they pretended to know future events, and to interpret dreams among other things; and ſhew what they portended, and what things would happen for the accompliſhment of them: and Pharaoh told them his dream; both his dreams, which for the ſimilarity of them, and there being ſo little interruption between them, are repreſented as one dream; for that both were told them, appears by what follows: but there was none that could interpret them unto Pharaoh; they were nonpluſſed and confounded, and did not know what to ſay; the things were ſo ſtrange and ſurpriſing, that he related, that they could not offer any conjectures about them, or if they did, they were very unſatisfactory to Pharaoh.

℣. 9. Then ſpake the chief butler unto Pharaoh, &c.] When the magicians and wiſe men could not interpret his dreams, he was in diſtreſs of mind on that account: ſaying, I do remember my faults this day; which ſome interpret of his forgetfulneſs of Joſeph and his afflictions, and of his ingratitude to him, and breach of promiſe in not making mention of him to Pharaoh before this time; but they ſeem rather to be faults he had committed againſt Pharaoh, and were the reaſon of his being wroth with him, as in the next verſe; and theſe were either real faults, which the king had pardoned, or however ſuch as he had been charged with, and cleared from; and which he now in a courtly manner takes to himſelf, and owns them, that the king's goodneſs and clemency to him might appear, and leſt he ſhould ſeem to charge the king with injuſtice in caſting him into priſon; which circumſtance he could not avoid relating in the ſtory he was about to tell.

℣. 10. Pharaoh was wroth with his ſervants, &c.] Not with all of them, but with the butler and the baker. Aben Ezra obſerves here, that Pharach was not the proper name of this king, but a title of office, and ſignifies the king; for it cannot be thought that the butler would uſe ſuch freedom in his preſence as to call him by his name: the true name of this prince, according to the eaſtern writers [f] was Rian ben Walid; others take him to be Aphophis, the third of the Hyckſi, or paſtor-kings; but, according to biſhop Uſher [g], his name was Mephramuthoſis: and put me in ward in the captain of the guard's houſe; in conſequence of his wrath and diſpleaſure, for crimes really or ſuppoſed to be committed by him; and the captain of the guard's houſe was a priſon, or at leaſt there was a priſon in it for ſuch ſort of offenders; and this was Potiphar's, Joſeph's maſter's, houſe: both me and the chief baker; which explains who the officers were Pharaoh was wroth with, and who were for their offences committed to priſon.

℣. 11. And we dreamed a dream in one night, I and he, &c.] In one and the ſame night: we dreamed each man according to the interpretation of his dream; they both dreamed exactly what ſhould befal them, as it was interpreted to them; the dreams, the interpretation of them, and the events anſwered to each other.

℣. 12. And there was there with us a young man, &c.] Who was in the priſon with them, had the care of them, and waited upon them; he was then about 28 years of age; for it was two years ago he ſpeaks of, and Joſeph was 30 when he ſtood ſtood before Pharaoh, ℣. 46: an Hebrew ſervant to the captain of the guard; he firſt deſcribes him by his age, a young man, then by his deſcent, an Hebrew, and by his ſtate and condition, a ſervant; neither of them tended much to recommend him to the king: and we told him; that is, their dreams: and he interpreted to us our dream, to each man according to his dream did he interpret; told them what their dreams preſignified, what the events would be they portended; the interpretation was different according to their dreams.

℣. 13. And it came to paſs, as he interpreted to us, ſo it was, &c.] The event anſwered to the interpretation, and ſhewed it to be right; this is frequently hinted and repeated, to ſhew the exactneſs and certainty of the interpretation given, in order to recommend Joſeph to Pharaoh the more: me he reſtored unto my office, and him he hanged; that is, Joſeph interpreted the butler's dream to ſuch a ſenſe, that he ſhould be reſtored to his butlerſhip, and accordingly he was; and the baker's dream, that he ſhould be hanged, and ſo he was. Aben Ezra and Jarchi interpret this of Pharaoh, that he reſtored the one, and hanged the other, or ordered theſe things to be done, which anſwered to Joſeph's interpretation of the dreams; but the former ſenſe ſeems beſt, for Joſeph is the perſon immediately ſpoken of in the preceding clauſe; nor would it have been ſo decent for the butler, in the preſence of Pharaoh, to have ſpoken of him without naming him, and which would have been contrary to his uſage before.

℣. 14. Then Pharaoh ſent and called Joſeph, &c.] Sent meſſengers to him to come to him directly, and ordered the captain of the guard, or keeper of the priſon, to looſe him, and let him free, ſee Pſ. cv. 20. and they brought him haſtily out of the dungeon; that his, out of the priſon-houſe; which as Jarchi ſays, was made like a ditch or dungeon, or in which the dungeon was where Joſeph was firſt put when he was brought to priſon; though it can't be thought that he continued there when he had ſo much reſpect ſhown him by the keeper, and had other priſoners committed to his care: however, he was fetched in great haſte from his place of confinement, by the meſſengers that were ſent for him; or they made him to run [h], from the priſon to the palace, the king being ſo eager to have his dream interpreted to him: and he ſhaved himſelf; or the barber ſhaved him, as Aben Ezra; his beard had not been ſhaved, nor the hair of his head cut very probably for a conſiderable time; it being uſual for perſons in ſuch circumſtances to neglect ſuch things: and changed his raiment; his priſon-garments being ſuch as were not fit to appear in before a king, and put on others, which either the king ſent him, or the captain of the guard his maſter furniſhed him with: and came in unto Pharaoh; into his palace, and his preſence; what city it was in which this Pharaoh kept his palace, is no where ſaid; very probably it was Tanis, which the ſcriptures call Zoan, that being the ancient city of Egypt, Numb. xiii. 22.

℣. 15. And Pharaoh ſaid unto Joſeph, &c.] Immediately, upon his being introduced to him: I have dreamed a dream, and there is none that can interpret it; that he could yet meet with; none of his magicians or wiſe men, who made great pretenſions to ſkill in ſuch matters: and I have heard ſay of thee, that thou canſt underſtand a dream to interpret it; it had been reported to him, particularly by the chief butler, that when he heard a dream told him, he had ſuch knowledge and underſtanding, that he could interpret it, tell the meaning of it, what it portended, and what would be the events ſignified by it.

℣. 16. And Joſeph anſwered Pharaoh, ſaying, it is not in me, &c.] Which expreſſes his great modeſty, that he did not arrogate ſuch ſkill and wiſdom to himſelf; declaring that he had no ſuch power and abilities in and of himſelf, to interpret dreams; what he had was a gift of God, and wholly depended upon his influence, and the revelation he was pleaſed to make to him of ſuch things: God ſhall give Pharaoh an anſwer of peace; ſuch an anſwer to his requeſt in the interpretation of his dream, as ſhall give him full content, and make his mind quiet and eaſy, and which ſhall tend to the welfare of him and his kingdom. Some render the words, as a prayer or wiſh, may God give Pharaoh, &c. [i] ſo as it were addreſſing his God, that he would be pleaſed to make known to him his interpretation of the dream to the ſatisfaction of Pharaoh: but the other ſenſe ſeems beſt, which expreſſes his faith in God, that he would do it, and to whom it ſhould be aſcribed, and not unto himſelf.

℣. 17. And Pharaoh ſaid unto Joſeph, &c.] Relating both his dreams in a more ample manner, though to the ſame purpoſe, than before related: in my dream, behold, I ſtood upon the bank of the river; the river Nile, where he could have a full ſight of what were after preſented to his view.

℣. 18. And behold there came up out of the river ſeven kine, &c.] Cows or heifers, ſee the note on ℣. 2. the account of them is the ſame here as there, and of the place where they fed, only the words are tranſpoſed.

℣. 19. And behold, ſeven other kine, &c.] Here ſome addition is made: theſe are ſaid not only to be very ill-favoured, and lean-fleſhed; but poor, thin, meager, exhauſted of their fleſh and ſtrength through ſome diſeaſe upon them, or want of food: and it follows, what was not before expreſſed, ſuch as I never ſaw in all the land of Egypt, for badneſs; ſo poor, ſo lean, and ſo ill-favoured; for whatever might be ſeen in other countries, never were ſuch ſeen in Egypt, which was famous for good cattle.

℣. 20. And the lean, and the ill-favoured kine, &c.] The ſame as in ℣. 4. ſee the note there.

℣. 21. And when they had eaten them up, &c.] Or were come into their bowels [k], into their inward parts, their bellies, being ſwallowed and devoured by them: it could not be known that they had eaten them; or were in their bellies, they ſeemed never the fuller nor the fatter for them: but they were ſtill ill-favoured as at the beginning; looked as thin and as meager as they did when they firſt came out of the river, or were firſt ſeen by Pharaoh: ſo I awoke; ſurprized at what he had ſeen; this was his firſt dream.

℣. 22. And I ſaw in my dream, &c.] Falling aſleep again quickly, he dreamed a ſecond time; and this dream being of a like kind with the former, and ſo ſmall a ſpace between them, they are repreſented as one, and this is the continuation of it: and behold ſeven ears, &c. ſee the note on ℣. 5.

℣. 23. And behold, ſeven ears withered, &c.] Here a new epithet of the bad ears is given, and expreſſed by a word no where elſe uſed, which Ben Melech

[h] וירצהו & currere fecerunt eum, Pagninus, Montanus, Munſter, Vatablus; & fecerunt ut curreret, Piſcator. [i] יענה respondeat, Vatablus. [k] ותבאנה אל קרבנה & venerunt ad interiora earum, Pagninus, Montanus; in ventrem iſtarum, Junius & Tremellius, Piſcator, Druſius, Tigurine verſion.

Melech interprets, ſmall, little, according to the uſe of the word in the Miſnah; Aben Ezra, void, empty, ſuch as had no grains of corn in them, nothing but huſk or chaff, and obſerves that ſome render it images; for the word is ſo uſed in the Arabic language, and may ſignify that theſe ears were only mere ſhadows or images of ears, which had no ſubſtance in them: Jarchi ſays, the word in the Syriac language ſignifies a rock, and ſo it denotes that theſe ears were dry as a rock, and had no moiſture in them, laid dried, burnt up, and blaſted with the eaſt wind.

℣. 24. And the thin ears devoured the ſeven good ears, &c.] See the note on ℣. 7. and I told this unto the magicians; juſt in the ſame manner as he had to Joſeph: but there was none that could declare it unto me; the meaning of it; what all this ſhould ſignify or portend.

℣. 25. And Joſeph ſaid unto Pharaoh, the dream of Pharaoh is one, &c.] Though there were two diſtinct dreams expreſſed under different images and repreſentations, yet the meaning, ſenſe, and ſignification of them were the ſame; one interpretation would do for both: God hath ſhewed Pharaoh what he is about to do; that is, by the above dreams, when they ſhould be interpreted to him; for as yet he underſtood them not, and therefore there could be nothing ſhewed him, but when interpreted it would be clear and plain to him, what events were quickly to be accompliſhed: God only knows things future, and thoſe to whom he is pleaſed to reveal them, and which he did in different ways, by dreams, viſions, articulate voices, &c.

℣. 26. The ſeven good kine are ſeven years, &c.] Signify 7 years, and theſe years of plenty, as appears from the antitheſis in the following verſe: and the ſeven good ears are ſeven years; ſignify the ſame: the dream is one; for though the 7 good kine were ſeen in one dream, the 7 good ears in another, yet both dreams were one as to ſignification.

℣. 27. And the ſeven thin and ill-favoured kine that came up after them, are ſeven years, &c.] Signify other 7 years, and theſe different from the former, as follows: and the ſeven empty ears blaſted with the eaſt wind, ſhall be ſeven years of famine; or there will be 7 years of famine that will anſwer to them, and are ſignified by them: Grotius from the Oneirocritics or interpreters of dreams obſerves, that years are ſignified by kine, and particularly he relates from Achmes, that according to the doctrine of the Egyptians, female oxen (and ſuch theſe were) ſignified times and ſeaſons, and if fat (as the good ones here alſo were) ſignified fruitful times, but if poor and thin (as the bad ones here were) barren times: it ſeems as if all this ſkill of theirs was borrowed from Joſeph's interpretation of Pharaoh's dreams here given. Joſephus [l] relates a dream of Archelaus the ſon of Herod, who dreamed that he ſaw 10 ears of corn, full and large, devoured by oxen; he ſent for the Chaldeans and others to tell him what they ſignified; one ſaid one thing and another another; at length one Simon an Eſſene, ſaid that the ears ſignified years, and the oxen changes of affairs, becauſe, when they plough up the earth they turn it up and change it; ſo that he ſhould reign as many years as were ears of corn ſeen, and after many changes ſhould die, as he accordingly did.

℣. 28. This is the thing which I have ſpoken unto Pharaoh, &c.] As an interpretation of his dreams: what God is about to do, he ſheweth unto Pharaoh; the events of 14 years with reſpect to plenty and ſterility.

℣. 29. Behold there come ſeven years of great plenty throughout all the land of Egypt.] Not only a ſufficiency but an abundance, even to luxury, as when the Nile roſe to 16 cubits, as Pliny obſerves [m]; which though a natural cauſe, was owing to God, and that it ſhould thus overflow for 7 years ſucceſſively, and cauſe ſuch a continued plenty, can be aſcribed to no other.

℣. 30. And there ſhall ariſe after them ſeven years of famine, &c.] Which might be occaſioned by the river Nile not riſing ſo high as to overflow its banks, as when it did not riſe to more than 12 cubits, a famine enſued, as the above writer ſays [n]; and it muſt be owing to the over-ruling providence of God, that this ſhould be the caſe for 7 years running: and all the plenty ſhall be forgotten in the land of Egypt; the ſeven years plenty being all ſpent, it ſhould be as if it never was; the minds of men would be ſo intent upon their preſent diſtreſſed caſe and circumſtances, that they ſhould wholly forget how it had been with them in time paſt; or it would be as if they had never enjoyed it, or were never the better for it: this anſwers to and explains how it was with the ill-favoured kine, when they had eat up the fat kine; they ſeemed never the better, nor could it be known by their appearance that they had ſo done: and the famine ſhall conſume the land; the inhabitants of it, and all the fruits and increaſe of it, the former years produced.

℣. 31. And the plenty ſhall not be known in the land, by reaſon of that famine following, &c.] That is, before it would be over; otherwiſe the former plenty was in ſome meaſure known by the ſtores of proviſions laid up in the 7 years of it, and which were brought forth when the famine became very preſſing; but by that time, and before the 7 years of it were ended, there were no traces of the foregoing plenty to be obſerved: for it ſhall be very grievous; as it was both in Egypt and in all the countries round about.

℣. 32. And for that the dream was doubled unto Pharaoh twice, &c.] Or was repeated to him under different figures and images: it is becauſe the thing is eſtabliſhed by God; by a firm decree of his, and is ſure, and will moſt certainly be accompliſhed; of which Pharaoh might be aſſured, and to aſſure him of it was the repetition of the dream made: and God will ſhortly bring it to paſs; or make haſte to do it [o], that is, would ſoon begin to accompliſh theſe events; for, as biſhop Uſher [p] obſerves, from the harveſt of this (the then preſent) year, the 7 years of plenty are reckoned.

℣. 33. Now therefore let Pharaoh look out a man diſcreet and wiſe, &c.] Of good judgment and conduct, of abilities equal to the execution of a ſcheme hereafter propoſed: it can ſcarcely be thought conſiſtent with the great modeſty of Joſeph, that he meant himſelf, or that indeed, he ventured to give any advice at all, until it was firſt aſked of him by the king; who being ſo well ſatisfied with the interpretation of his dreams, thought him a proper perſon to conſult with what to be done in this caſe; who, as a true father of his country, as every king ſhould be, was concerned for the good of it, and to provide againſt the worſt for them: and ſet him over the land of Egypt; not to be governor of it in general, but with a particular reſpect to the preſent caſe, to take care of proviſion for it.

℣. 34. Let Pharaoh do this, &c.] Appoint ſuch a perſon, who as a ſovereign prince could do it of himſelf: and let him appoint officers over the land; not Pharaoh, but the wiſe and diſcreet governor he ſhould ſet over the land, who ſhould have a power of appointing officers or overſeers under him to manage things according to his direction: and take up the fifth part of the land of Egypt in the ſeven plenteous years; not the officers appointed but the appointer of them, the chief governor under Pharaoh, for the word is ſingular; it is propoſed that he ſhould, in Pharaoh's name, and by his order, take a 5th part of all the corn in the land of Egypt during 7 years plenty; not by force, which ſo good a man as Joſeph would never adviſe to, whatever power Pharaoh might have, and could exerciſe if he pleaſed; but by making a purchaſe of it, which in ſuch time of plenty would be bought cheap, and which ſo great a prince as Pharaoh was capable of. It is commonly aſked, why an half part was not ordered to be took up, ſince there were to be as many years of famine as of plenty? and to this it is uſually replied, that beſides this 5th part took up, as there might be an old ſtock of former years, ſo there would be ſomething conſiderable remain of theſe ſeven years plenty, which men of ſubſtance would lay up, as Pharaoh did; and beſides, a 5th part might be equal to the crop of an ordinary year, or near it: to which may be added, that in times of famine men live more ſparingly, as they are obliged, and therefore ſuch a quantity would go the further; as well as it may be conſidered, that notwithſtanding the barrenneſs of the land in general, yet in ſome places, eſpecially on the banks of the Nile, ſome corn might be produced; ſo that upon the whole a 5th part might be judged ſufficient to anſwer the extremity of the ſeven years famine, and even to allow a diſtribution to other countries.

℣. 35. And let them gather all the food of thoſe good years that come, &c.] That is, let the under-officers collect together the 5th part of all fruits of the land during the ſeven years plenty: and lay up corn under the hand of Pharaoh; as his property, and only to be diſpoſed of by his orders; for as it was to be purchaſed with his money, it was right that it ſhould be in his hands, or in the hands of his officers appointed by him, as the Targum of Jonathan: and let them keep food in the cities; reſerve it in the ſeveral cities throughout the land, againſt the years of famine.

℣. 36. And that food ſhall be for ſtore to the land, &c.] A depoſit in the ſaid cities, to be brought forth and uſed in a time of public diſtreſs; the Targum of Jonathan is, it "ſhall be hidden in a "cave in the earth:" againſt the ſeven years of famine which ſhall be in the land of Egypt; and ſo be a ſupply to the inhabitants of the land, when they ſhould be ſore preſſed with a famine, and know not what to do, nor where to go for food: that the land periſh not through the famine; that is, that the people of the land periſh not, as the above Targum, which, without ſuch a proviſion, they would have been in great danger of periſhing. Juſtin, an heathen writer [q], confirms this account of the advice of Joſeph, of whom he ſays, that "he was "exceeding ſagacious of things wonderful, and "firſt found out the meaning of dreams; and "nothing of right, divine or human, ſeemed un-"known to him, ſo that he could foreſee the bar-"renneſs of land many years before-hand; and all "Egypt would have periſhed with the famine, if "the king, by his advice, had not commanded an "edict, that the fruits of the earth, for many "years, ſhould be preſerved."

℣. 37. And the thing was good in the eyes of Pharaoh, &c.] He approved of the advice Joſeph gave, and of the ſcheme and plan which he propoſed: and in the eyes of all his ſervants; his nobles, miniſters of ſtate and courtiers, all highly commended and applauded it; and it was with the general and unanimous conſent of all agreed, that it ſhould be put into execution: but then the next queſtion, and the thing to be conſidered was, who was a perſon fit to be engaged in ſuch an affair.

℣. 38. And Pharaoh ſaid unto his ſervants, &c.] That were about him, and with whom he was conſulting about a proper perſon to be over this affair of gathering in the fruits of the earth in the time of plenty, and laying them up againſt a time of famine: can we find ſuch an one as this is, in whom the Spirit of God is? if we ſearch among all the ranks and degrees of men throughout the kingdom, let them be of what character they will, we ſhall never find a man like this, who appears to have the Spirit of God, or of the gods, as he in his heatheniſh way ſpoke, and which he concluded from his vaſt knowledge of things, and eſpecially of things future: hence the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan interpret it, the ſpirit of prophecy from the Lord.

℣. 39. And Pharaoh ſaid unto Joſeph, &c.] After his ſervants had agreed to his being the man; at leaſt Pharaoh had declared his mind that he ſhould be the perſon; which if any of them diſliked, as probably might be the caſe of ſome through envy, and as deſirous of the poſt themſelves, yet durſt not make any oppoſition to it: foraſmuch as God hath ſhewed thee all this; the interpretation of his dreams, what would be hereafter for 14 years to come, what was adviſeable to be done for the good of the nation, and had propoſed a plan ſo well contrived and formed: there is none ſo diſcreet and wiſe as thou art; and conſequently none ſo fit for this buſineſs, ſince he was ſo divinely qualified; and the above heathen writer [r] obſerves, that he had ſuch knowledge and experience of things, that his anſwers ſeemed to be given not from men, but from God.

℣. 40. Thou ſhalt be over my houſe, &c.] Have the care of his domeſtic affairs, and be the principal man in his palace and court: and according unto thy word ſhall all my people be ruled; not only in his family but in his whole kingdom; whatever he ordered and commanded them to do, they ſhould do it: or all my people ſhall kiſs [s], that is, either their hand at the ſight of him, or meeting him, in token of reſpect and veneration ſhall yield a ready and chearful obedience to him, of which the kiſs was a ſign, ſee Pſ. ii. 12. The Targum of Onkelos renders it, ſhall be fed [t], ſupplied with corn, and with all neceſſary proviſions, and ſo Jarchi interprets it; which is reſtraining it to that part of his office which concerned the gathering and laying up their ſtores for time to come; but the Targum of Jonathan is, ſhall be armed [u]; and ſo Aben Ezra makes him the prince or general of the army, or who had the militia at his command, and could arm them when he pleaſed; but it ſeems to denote a more large and unlimited power than either of theſe, even the government of the whole land under the king, who only excepts himſelf: only only in the throne will I be greater than thou; that is, he alone would be king, wear the crown, ſit upon the throne, and have all the enſigns of royal majeſty, in which Joſeph was to have no ſhare; otherwiſe he was to have an executive power and authority over all his ſubjects in the land, even to bind his princes at pleaſure, and to teach, inſtruct and direct his ſenators, Pſ. cv. 21, 22.

℣. 41. And Pharaoh ſaid unto Joſeph, &c.] He continued ſpeaking to him for the greater confirmation of what he had ſaid, and for further explanation of it: ſee, I have ſet thee over all the land of Egypt; not merely as the corn-maſter-general, to take care of a proviſion of corn in time of plenty, againſt a time of ſcarcity, but as a vice-roy or deputy-governor over the whole land, as appears by the enſigns of honour and dignity beſtowed on him; of which in the following verſes.

℣. 42. And Pharaoh took off his ring from his hand, and put it upon Joſeph's hand, &c.] Which as it was expreſſive of the intereſt he had in his royal favour, ſo was a token of that high office and great dignity to which he was promoted: thus among the Romans, in after-times, when any one was put into the Equeſtrian order, a ring was given to him [w]; for originally none but knights were allowed to wear rings; and it was ſometimes uſed to deſign a ſucceſſor in the kingdom, as when Alexander was dying, he took his ring from off his finger, and gave it to Perdicca [x], which was underſtood, though he did not expreſs it, that he ſhould be his ſucceſſor, ſee 1 Maccab. vi. 14, 15. Now, though Pharaoh did not by this intend to point out Joſeph for his ſucceſſor in the kingdom, yet he gave him his ring as a mark of honour, and as being in place next unto him, his viceroy or deputy: and beſides, as it is obſerved by many, this might be his ſignet, or the ring which had his ſeal upon it, by which he ſealed patents and public deeds, and which he gave to Joſeph to make uſe of in his name; though Schmidt doubts whether this was ſuch a ring, ſince kings and princes have been uſed to have larger for ſuch purpoſes, than what are wore on the finger: by this it appears, that Pliny [y] was miſtaken that there were no rings in and before the time of Troy: and arrayed him in veſtures of fine linen; of which there was the beſt ſort in Egypt, and which great perſonages uſed to wear: and put a gold chain about his neck; another badge of honour and dignity, ſee Dan. v. 16.

℣. 43. And he made him to ride in the ſecond chariot which he had, &c.] By which it appeared that he was next to Pharaoh, but not above him; as kings were wont to have more chariots than one, thoſe were diſtinguiſhed by firſt, ſecond, &c. being of greater ſtate the one than the other, ſee 2 Chron. xxxv. 24: and they cried before him, bow the knee; that is, his guard that attended him when he rode out in his chariot, called to the people as they paſſed along, to bow the knee to Joſeph, as a token of veneration and reſpect; or they proclaimed him Abrech, which Onkelos paraphraſes, this is the father of the king; and ſo Jarchi, who obſerves, that Rech ſignifies a king in the Syriac language; and this agrees with what Joſeph himſelf ſays, that God had made him a father to Pharaoh, ch. xlv. 8. Others render it a tender father; and the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem take in both ſenſes, "this is the father of the king, (or let the "father of the king live, ſo the Jeruſalem) who "is great in wiſdom, and tender in years:" tho' rather he may be ſo called, becauſe he acted the part of a tender father to the country, in providing corn for them againſt a time of ſcarcity: and he made him ruler over all the land of Egypt; appointed him to be governor of the whole land, and inveſted him with that office, and made him appear to be ſo, by the grandeur he raiſed him to.

℣. 44. And Pharaoh ſaid unto Joſeph, I am Pharaoh, &c.] Or I am king, which the word Pharaoh ſignifies, as Joſephus [z] ſays; and that this is not a proper name, but a title of office, ſeems plain from theſe words; and the ſenſe either is, that tho' Pharaoh had raiſed Joſeph to ſuch high honour and dignity, yet he alone was king; or this he ſaid to ſhew his power and authority to do what he had done, and would ſtand by him, and ſupport him in his office and grandeur: and without thee ſhall not a man lift up his hand or foot in all the land of Egypt; which is to be taken not in a ſtrict literal ſenſe, but proverbially, ſignifying, that nothing ſhould be done in the nation of any moment or importance, relating to political affairs, but what was by his order and authority; the hands and feet being the principal inſtruments of action. The Targum of Jonathan is, "without thy word (or "order) a man ſhall not lift up his hand to gird "on armour, or his foot to mount a horſe;" ſignifying thereby, that all things relating to war and peace ſhould be altogether under his direction.

℣. 45. And Pharaoh called Joſeph's name Zaphnath paaneah, &c.] Which, according to the paraphraſe of Onkelos, ſignifies one to whom hidden things are revealed; or, as Jonathan, a revealer of ſecrets; and ſo moſt of the Jewiſh writers explain it; and which ſeems to be given him from his interpreting Pharaoh's dreams, and revealing what was hereafter to come to paſs. The word is only uſed in this place, at leaſt the latter part of it; and Aben Ezra confeſſes his ignorance of it, whether it is an Egyptian word or no; but Kircher [a] moſt ſtrongly aſſerts it, and ſays it ſignifies a prophet (or foreteller) of future things. Tho' ſome think the firſt part of the name has ſome reſpect to the Egyptian idol Baal Zephon, Exod. xiv. 2. and that in this new name Pharaoh gave Joſeph upon his promotion, he inſerted the name of his God, as Nebuchadnezzar, when he gave new names to Daniel and his companions, Dan. i. 7. and v. 12: and he gave him to wife Aſenath the daughter of Potipherah; not the ſame with Potiphar, Joſeph's maſter, as Jarchi ſays, not only their names differ, but alſo their offices; nor would Joſeph, it is imagined, marry the daughter of ſuch a women, ſo wicked as his miſtreſs was, and had ſo much abuſed him, and been the cauſe of all his troubles; nor was this Aſenath the daughter of Dinah by Shechem, as ſome Jewiſh writers [b] aſſert, whom Potiphar's wife having no child brought up as her own, which is not at all probable; but an Egyptian woman, the daughter of the perſon before named: who was prieſt of On; the ſame with Aven, Ezek. xxx. 17. ſee the note there; and which in Ptolemy [c] is called Onii, about 22 miles from Memphis, and ſaid to be the metropolis of the Heliopolitan nome; and and has been ſince called Heliopolis, as it is here in the Septuagint verſion, which ſignifies the city of the ſun, and is the ſame with Bethſhemeſh, the houſe of the ſun, Jer. xlii. 13. where, as Herodotus [d] ſays, the ſun was worſhipped, and ſacrifice offered to it, and the inhabitants of this place are by him ſaid to be the wiſeſt and moſt rational of the Egyptians [e]; here Potipherah, Joſeph's father-in-law was prieſt; and Strabo [f] ſays, at Heliopolis we ſaw large houſes in which the prieſts dwelt; for here eſpecially of old it was ſaid, that this was the habitation of prieſts, of philoſophers, and ſuch as were given to aſtronomy: the Septuagint verſion and Joſephus [g], call this man Petephre; and an heathen writer [h], Pentephre, a prieſt of Heliopolis; which a very learned man [i] ſays, in the Egyptian tongue, ſignifies a prieſt of the ſun; and ſo Philo ſays [k], that Joſeph married the daughter of a famous man in Egypt, who had the prieſthood of the ſun. But the word may as well be rendered prince [l], as it is when there is nothing to determine its ſenſe otherwiſe, as there is none here; and it is more likely, that Pharaoh ſhould marry his prime miniſter into the family of one of his princes, than of his prieſts; this ſeems to be more agreeable to the high rank that Joſeph was raiſed to, as well as more ſuitable to his character as a worſhipper of the true God, who would not chuſe to marry the daughter of an idolatrous prieſt: though, according to Diodorus Siculus [m], the Egyptian prieſts were ſecond to the king in honour and authority, and were always about him, and were of his council; and Ælianus ſays [n], that formerly with the Egyptians the judges were prieſts, and the eldeſt of them was a prince, and had the power of judging all; and even Sethon, king of Egypt, was a prieſt of Vulcan: whether this prince or prieſt was of the king's family, or whether the kings of Egypt had a power to diſpoſe of the daughters of their ſubjects, eſpecially of their prieſts or princes when dead, is not certain: perhaps no more, as biſhop Patrick obſerves, is meant, than that Pharaoh made this match, and which was a mark of great honour and affection to Joſeph; and which, if even diſagreeable to him, being an idolater, he could not well refuſe: and Joſeph went out over all the land of Egypt; either the name and fame of him, as Aben Ezra interprets it, ſee Matt. iv. 24. or rather he himſelf went forth in all his grandeur before related, and took a tour throughout the whole land to obſerve the fruitfulneſs of it, and make choice of proper places to lay up his intended ſtores.

℣. 46. And Joſeph was thirty years old when he ſtood before Pharaoh king of Egypt, &c.] Interpreting his dreams, and had ſuch honour conferred upon him as to be made his prime miniſter; from whence it appears that Joſeph had now been thirteen years in Egypt, partly in Potiphar's houſe, and partly in priſon, ſince he was ſeventeen years of age when he was ſold thither, ſee ch. xxxvii. 2: and Joſeph went out from the preſence of Pharaoh; from ſtanding before him, and miniſtring to him as his counſellor and chief-ſtateſman, or he went out from his court and palace for a while: and went throughout all the land of Egypt; this ſeems to be a ſecond tour; before he went to ſurvey the land, and pitch upon the moſt proper places for granaries to lay up ſtore of corn in; and now he went through it, to gather in and give directions about it, and ſee it performed, for the years of plenty were now begun.

℣. 47. And in the ſeven plenteous years the earth brought forth by handfuls.] Such as the gatherers take up in their hands when reaped, in order to bind up in ſheaves: now ſuch was the fruitfulneſs of the land during the ſeven years plenty, that either one ſtalk produced as many ears as a man could hold in his hand; or one grain produced an handful, as Ben Melech obſerves; though Onkelos paraphraſes the words, "the inhabitants "of the earth in the ſeven years of plenty gather-"ed even into their treaſuries:" and this they did by the order and direction of Joſeph as he paſſed through the land; what he bought of them they brought, and put into the granaries, as he directed them.

℣. 48. And he gathered up all the food of the ſeven years, &c.] That is, of plenty; not all the fruits of the earth, or all that was eatable, but the corn, as in the following verſe; and not all of that the earth produced, but the fifth part of it, as he propoſed, which he bought with Pharaoh's money, and therefore had a right to ſell it again as he did: which were in the land of Egypt; in which only he had a concern, and where only was this plenty: and laid up the food in the cities; in places built for that purpoſe, and whither the people round about could eaſily bring it, and fetch it, when it was wanted: the food of the field which was round about every city, laid he up in the ſame; which was very wiſely done, for preſent carriage, and for the convenience of the people in time of famine. At this day, at old Cairo, is an edifice the moſt conſiderable in it, called Joſeph's granary; it occupies a ſquare, ſurrounded by a wall, and has divers partitions contrived within it, where is depoſited the corn, that is paid as a tax to the Grand Seignior, brought from different parts of Egypt [o].

℣. 49. And Joſeph gathered corn as the ſand of the ſea, very much, until he left numbring, &c.] At firſt he took an account of the quantities that were bought and laid up, how much there was in each granary, until it amounted to ſo much, that there was no end of numbring it; it was like the ſand of the ſea, an hyperbolical expreſſion, denoting the great abundance of it: for it was without number; not only the grains of corn, but even the meaſures of it, whatever were uſed; ſo Artapanus, an heathen writer ſays [p], Joſeph, when governor of Egypt, got together the corn of ſeven years, an immenſe quantity.

℣. 50. And unto Joſeph was born two ſons, &c.] The word for born is ſingular; hence Ben Melech conjectures, that they were twins: and this was before the years of famine came; or the year of famine [q]; the firſt year: which Aſenath the daughter of Potipherah prieſt of On, bare unto him; which is obſerved, to ſhew that he had them by his lawful wife; whom the Targum of Jonathan wrongly again makes the daughter of Dinah, and her father prince of Tanis, the ſame with Zoan; whereas this was On or Heliopolis, a very different place; ſo Artapanus ſays [r], that Joſeph married the daughter of the prieſt of Heliopolis, by whom he had children;

dren; and another heathen writer [a] mentions their names, Ephraim and Manasseh.

℣. 51. And Joseph called the name of the first-born Manasseh, &c.] Which signifies forgetfulness, as the reason of it shews: for God, said he, hath made me forget all my toil, and all my father's house; all his toil and labour in Potiphar's house, and especially in the prison; and all the injuries his brethren had done him; all this he was made to forget by the grandeur and honour, wealth and riches, power and authority he was possessed of; and indeed he had so much business upon his hands, that he had scarce time to think of his father, and his family.

℣. 52. And the name of the second called he Ephraim, &c.] Which signifies fruits or fruitfulness; and being of the dual number, may intend both his spiritual and temporal fruitfulness God had blessed him with: for God hath caused me to be fruitful in the land of my affliction; in the land of Egypt, where he had been long afflicted, even for the space of thirteen years, more or less, in his master's house, and in the prison; but God had made him fruitful in grace and good works, in holiness, humility, &c. and oftentimes afflictive seasons are the most fruitful ones in this sense. God also bestowed great gifts upon him, as skill in the interpretation of dreams, wisdom in political affairs, a large abundance of wealth, and riches, honour and glory; to which may be added, the fruit of his body, his two children.

℣. 53. And the seven years of plenteousness that was in the land of Egypt, were ended.] Perhaps quickly after the birth of Ephraim, Joseph's 2d son; since the account follows upon that, and it is certain that he was born before the years of famine began, ℣. 50. some connect the words, moreover when the 7 years of plenty were ended then began, as follows, 7 years of famine; these events were fulfilled just as Joseph had predicted.

℣. 54. And the seven years of dearth began to come, as Joseph had said, &c.] In the interpretation of Pharaoh's dreams; as soon as the 7 years of plenty were over, there were quickly some appearances of the famine coming on; as particularly the river Nile not flowing to its usual height at the season of it; hence there was a drought, the earth was parched, and every thing began to wither and decay, and the seed that was sown sprung not up: and the dearth was in all lands; adjoining to Egypt, as Syria, Arabia, Palestine, Canaan, &c. but in all the land of Egypt there was bread; which was in the hands of every one, and remained of their old stores in the years of plenty not yet exhausted, and which continued for some time after the dearth began. It is very probable that to this seven years drought in Egypt, Ovid [t] refers, which he makes to be nine; as does also Apollodorus [u].

℣. 55. And when all the land of Egypt was famished, &c.] Their old stock and store eat up, and the inhabitants ready to starve with hunger: the people cried to Pharaoh for bread; as their common father, and knowing that he had stores of provision laid up in all cities against this time: and Pharaoh said to the Egyptians, go unto Joseph; whom he had appointed over this business of providing and laying up corn against this time, and of distributing it: what he saith to you, do; give the price for the corn he fixes or requires; for this was the principal thing they had to do with him, to get corn for their money.

℣. 56. And the famine was over all the face of the earth, &c.] Not over the whole world, but the land of Egypt; all the inhabitants of it were pinched with it, rich and poor; it reached all parts and all sorts of men: and Joseph opened all the store-houses; in the several cities throughout the land where he had laid up corn: and sold unto the Egyptians; for, as he had bought it with Pharaoh's money, it was no injustice to sell it; and as it could be sold at a moderate price, and yet Pharaoh get enough by it, being bought cheap in a time of plenty, no doubt but Joseph who was a kind and benevolent man, sold it at such a price: and the famine waxed sore in the land of Egypt; there being no overflow of the Nile year after year, and nothing left of the old stock but what was in the store-houses.

℣. 57. And all countries came into Egypt to Joseph for to buy corn, &c.] All the neighbouring nations above-mentioned, when they heard there was corn there for money, came from all parts for it, and were glad to get it at such expence and trouble: because that the famine was so sore in all lands; that there was no bread to be got for money elsewhere. It is thought by many, that for this care of Joseph in laying up provision against this time of need, and which was the preservation of the Egyptians, he was worshipped by them under various names, as the Apis, which was an ox, a sign of fruitfulness; and Serapis, sometimes figured as a young man carrying a basket of bread on his head; and Osiris, who is sometimes represented with a bushel on his head. However, this is certain, that he was an eminent type of Christ in all this, both in his estate of humiliation and exaltation: as Joseph was wrongly charged by his mistress, so was Christ falsly accused by the Jews; as he was cast into prison and bound there, so Christ was taken and bound as a prisoner; as Joseph was raised to great honour and glory in Pharaoh's court, so Christ was exalted by his Father, and crowned with glory and honour; and if the new name given him Zaphnath-paaneah signifies the saviour of the world, as some interpret it, it agrees well with Christ, who was sent into the world for that purpose; and indeed, if it means a revealer of secrets, it suits with him, who hath declared his father's mind and will, and revealed the mysteries of his grace to the sons of men: and as Joseph had all the stores of corn under his care, and the needy were bid to go to him for it, so Christ has all the treasures of grace in his hand, and all that are sensible of their need of it are directed to go to him for it; and it is from him that men of all nations and countries receive grace for grace, and have all their supplies, and spiritual sustenance and nourishment.

CHAP. XLII.

THIS chapter relates how that Jacob having heard there was corn in Egypt, ſent all his ſons but Benjamin thither to buy corn, ℣. 1—5. and coming before Joſeph, they bowed to him, and he knowing them, though they knew not him, ſpoke roughly to them, and charged them with being ſpies, ℣. 6—9. they in their defence urged that they were the ſons of one man in Canaan, with whom their youngeſt brother was left, on which Joſeph ordered them to ſend for him, to prove them true men, ℣. 10—16. and put them all into priſon for three days, and then releaſed them, and ſent them away to fetch their brother, ℣. 17—20. this brought to mind their treatment of Joſeph, and they confeſſed their guilt to each other, which Joſeph heard and greatly affected him, they ſuppoſing he underſtood them not, and before he diſmiſſed them bound Simeon before their eyes, whom he retained till they returned, ℣. 21—24. then he ordered his ſervants to fill their ſacks with corn, and put each man's money in his ſack, which, one of them on the road found, opening his ſack for provender, filled them all with great ſurpriſe and fear, ℣. 25—28. upon their return to Jacob they related all that had befallen them, and particularly that the governor inſiſted on having Benjamin brought to him, ℣. 29—34. their ſacks being opened all their money was found in them, which greatly diſtreſſed them and Jacob alſo, who was very unwilling to let Benjamin go, though Reuben offered his two ſons as pledges for him, and himſelf to be a ſurety, ℣. 35—38.

℣. 1. Now when Jacob ſaw that there was corn in Egypt, &c.] That is, to be ſold there, or otherwiſe, it being there, unleſs it could be bought would have been of no avail to foreigners; wherefore the Septuagint verſion is, that there was a ſale [w] there, a ſale of corn; the word has the ſignification of breaking [x] in it, becauſe that bread-corn is broke in the mill, or is broken from the heap when ſold or diſtributed, or becauſe when eaten it breaks the faſt. Now Jacob had either ſeen perſons paſſing by with corn, of whom he enquired from whence they had it, who replied, from Egypt; or he underſtood by the report of others, that corn was to be bought there; tho' ſome of the Jewiſh writers would have it, as Jarchi obſerves, that he ſaw it by the revelation of the Holy Spirit: Jacob ſaid unto his ſons, why do ye look one upon another? like perſons in ſurprize, diſtreſs and deſpair, at their wits end, not knowing what to do, what courſe to take, and which way to turn themſelves, and ſcarce able to ſpeak to one another, and conſult with each other what was proper to be done; for it ſeems not ſo agreeable, that they ſhould be charged as idle perſons, careleſs and unconcerned, indifferent and inactive; but rather, if the other ſenſe is not acceptable, the meaning may be, why do ye look [y], here and there, in the land of Canaan, where it is to no purpoſe to look for corn, look where it is to be had.

℣. 2. And he ſaid, behold, I have heard that there is corn in Egypt, &c.] This explains what is meant by the phraſe he ſaw, one ſenſe being put for another: get ye down thither; as faſt as you can without delay; Egypt lay lower than Canaan, and therefore they are bid to go down, as when they went from thence to Canaan they are ſaid to go up, ch. xlv. 25. and buy for us from thence, that we may live, and not die; which ſhews the famine was very preſſing, ſince, unleſs they could buy corn from Egypt they could not live, but muſt dye.

℣. 3. And Joſeph's ten brethren went down to buy corn in Egypt, &c.] They obeyed their father's orders, and immediately ſet out for Egypt; ten of them went down in a body together, all but Benjamin, ſo that it is eaſily reckoned who they were, and they are called not Jacob's ſons as they were; but Joſeph's brethren, whom they had ſold into Egypt, and to whom now they were going, though they knew it not, to buy corn of him in their neceſſity, and to whom they would be obliged to yield obeyſance, as they did.

℣. 4. But Benjamin, Joſeph's brother, Jacob ſent not with his brethren, &c.] Benjamin is called Joſeph's brother, becauſe he was ſo both by father and mother's ſide, as the reſt were not; him Jacob kept with him, being the youngeſt and his darling, the only ſon he had with him of his beloved wife Rachel; and was very probably the more beloved by him ſince he had been bereft of Joſeph; and it was not only to keep him company that he retained him at home, but for the reaſon following: for he ſaid, leſt peradventure miſchief befall him; as had to Joſeph his brother, as he imagined; either that the journey would be too much for him, being young, or leſt he ſhould be ſeized with ſickneſs on the road, or rather with death, as Aben Ezra interprets it according to the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan.

℣. 5. And the ſons of Iſrael came to buy corn among thoſe that came, &c.] Either among the Egyptians that came to buy, or among thoſe who came from different countries, or rather particularly among the Canaanites, as the Targum of Jonathan; with theſe they might join upon the road and go together in a body where the market for corn was: for the famine was in the land of Canaan; which obliged the inhabitants of it as well as Jacob's family to ſeek for corn elſewhere, and confirms the ſenſe of the preceding clauſe: this, though a very fruitful land, yet when God withheld a bleſſing from it, it became barren, as it had been before, ch. xii. 10. and xxvi. 1. and was to try the faith of thoſe good men to whom God had given it, and to wean their hearts from being ſet upon it, and to put them upon ſeeking a better country, as they did.

℣. 6. And Joſeph was the governor over the land, &c.] Not the land of Canaan laſt mentioned, but the land of Egypt; under Pharaoh, he had the chief and ſole authority, and eſpecially in the affair of the corn, and the diſpoſal of that: and he it was that ſold to all the people of the land; of Egypt, and alſo to all that came out of other lands; not that he in perſon could do all this, but by thoſe that acted under him: and Joſeph's brethren came; to Joſeph to buy corn of him: and bowed down themſelves before him, with their faces to the earth; not only bowed the knee as the Egyptians did, but proſtrated their whole bodies, ſtretching out out their hands and feet, and touching the ground with their faces, as was the manner of the eaſtern countries, at leaſt ſome of them; and ſo of Canaan; and thus did they ſubmit themſelves to him in the moſt humble manner, and thereby, though without their knowledge, fulfilled his dream of their ſheaves making obeiſance to his ſheaf, ch. xxxvii. 7.

℣. 7. And Joſeph ſaw his brethren, &c.] Among thoſe that came to buy corn, and when they proſtrated themſelves before him: and he knew them; ſome of them being at man's eſtate, and their beards grown when they ſold him, and their habits and dreſs now being much the ſame it was then, and by them he knew the younger: but made himſelf ſtrange unto them; took no notice of them as his relations, but carried himſelf to them as he did to other foreigners, and yet more ſtrangely: and ſpake roughly unto them; or hard [z] things or words; put on a ſtern countenance, and ſpoke with a high tone and in a rough ſurly manner to them: and he ſaid unto them, whence come ye? who are ye? of what country are ye? what's your buſineſs here? and they ſaid, from the land of Canaan to buy food; which they could not get in Canaan, the famine being there ſo great.

℣. 8. And Joſeph knew his brethren, but they knew not him.] It being about 22 years ſince they ſaw him, and then he was young, and his beard not grown, as now it was; and beſides, he was cloathed as a prince, and ſpoke the Egyptian language; and being in ſuch great grandeur and ſplendor, and in ſuch power and authority, and having ſuch a retinue attending him, they never once thought of him, whom they ſuppoſed might be dead, having never heard of him all this time; or, however, it could not come into their minds, that he whom they ſold for a ſlave could ever be governor of the land of Egypt.

℣. 9. And Joſeph remembred the dreams which he dreamed of them, &c.] Their bowing and proſtrating themſelves before him brought to his remembrance his dreams of their ſheaves making obeiſance to his, and of the ſun, moon, and eleven ſtars doing the ſame to him, ch. xxxvii. 7. 9. and ſaid unto them, ye are ſpies; not believing they were, nor abſolutely aſſerting that they were ſuch; but this he ſaid to try them, and what they would ſay for themſelves, and in order to lead on to further diſcourſe with them, and to get knowledge of his father and brother Benjamin, whether living or no: he dealt with them as a judge on the bench, when examining perſons, whoſe charges have the nature of an interrogation as this has: ye are ſpies; are ye not? ſurely you muſt be, and unleſs you give a better account of yourſelves, I muſt take you up as ſuch: to ſee the nakedneſs of the land ye are come; what parts of it are weakeſt, moſt defenceleſs, and leſs fortified, and moſt eaſy to break in at, and invade the land; and it was not without reaſon that the Egyptians might ſuſpect the neighbouring nations round about them, being in diſtreſs, and hearing of corn in Egpyt, of forming a deſign of coming upon them and taking away their corn by force, and might be the reaſon why foreigners that came to buy corn were brought before Joſeph and examined by him.

℣. 10. And they ſaid unto him, nay, my lord, &c.] One in the name of the reſt, or each in his turn, denying that they were ſpies, and addreſſing him with the greateſt reverence and ſubmiſſion, calling him their lord, and thus farther accompliſhing his dreams: but to buy food are thy ſervants come; that and no other was the errand they came upon.

℣. 11. We are all one man's ſons, &c.] Therefore not likely to be ſpies; it could hardly be thought that a ſingle family ſhould engage in ſuch an affair; or that one man would ſend his ſons as ſpies, and eſpecially all of them, it being a dangerous affair, and they being liable to be taken up and put to death; and as more families than one muſt be concerned in ſuch an enterprize, it is reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that if they had been ſpies they would have been of different families, and alſo not together but in different parts of the kingdom, to obſerve the fitteſt place to enter in at and execute their deſign: we are true men; that ſpoke truth when they ſaid they came to buy corn; were honeſt, upright, and ſincere in what they ſaid, nor would they, nor durſt they tell a lie: thy ſervants are no ſpies; this they expreſſed in the ſtrongeſt terms, and with the fulleſt aſſurance they could, deteſting the charge and character of being ſpies.

℣. 12. And he ſaid unto them, nay, &c.] This argument will not do, I am not to be put off with ſuch words as theſe; if you can produce no better proof of your being honeſt men than this, or give no better account of yourſelves, I muſt abide by it, that, to ſee the nakedneſs of the land ye are come; this he urged in order to get a further account from them of their family and the ſtate of it, which he was anxious to know.

℣. 13. And they ſaid, thy ſervants are 12 brethren, &c.] Or rather, were 12, ſince one afterwards is ſaid not to be: the ſons of one man in the land of Canaan; of Jacob, who dwelt there; this is ſaid with the ſame view as before, to ſhew the improbability of their being ſpies; and behold, the youngeſt is this day with our father; meaning Benjamin, whom Joſeph was eager to hear of, and no doubt was glad to hear he was alive, and his father alſo, and that they were both together in the land of Canaan: and one is not; is not in the land of the living, is dead; for ſo they thought Joſeph was, who is the perſon intended, as appears from what both Reuben and Judah afterwards ſay, ℣. 22. and ch. xliv. 20. and yet he was before them, and was the perſon they were ſpeaking to: this muſt be very ſtriking and affecting to Joſeph, who knew full well they meant himſelf.

℣. 14. And Joſeph ſaid unto them, that is it that I ſpake unto you, ſaying, ye are ſpies.] This proves it, at leaſt gives ſtrong ſuſpicion of it; ſince at firſt they ſeemed to ſpeak of themſelves, as if they were the only ſons of one man and there were no more, now they ſpeak of 12, and make mention of one being at home with his father; but ſeeing he ſent ſo many of them, why not all? why ſhould one only be left at home?

℣. 15. Hereby ye ſhall be proved, &c.] Whether ſpies or no, namely, by producing their youngeſt brother, ſaid to be at home with his father: by the life of Pharaoh ye ſhall not go forth hence, except your youngeſt brother come hither; the phraſe, by the life of Pharaoh, ſeems to be the form of an oath, as it was common with many nations, eſpecially with the Scythians, who uſed to ſwear by the royal throne [a], and the Romans in after times, by the life, health, and genius of their emperor; and this cuſtom of ſwearing by the life of their king or by his his head, continued with the Egyptians, as Aben Ezra ſays, unto his times; though ſome take this to be a wiſh or prayer, for the life of Pharaoh, and render it, may Pharaoh live[b], or at moſt, but a ſtrong aſſeveration, that as dear as the life of Pharaoh was to him, ſo ſurely they ſhould not ſtir from the place where they were, unleſs their youngeſt brother Benjamin was brought thither.

℣. 16. Send one of you, and let him fetch your brother, &c.] He propoſes that one of them might be ſent by them to their father's houſe, and bring Benjamin down to Egypt: and ye ſhall be kept in priſon; the reſt of them till he came: that your words may be proved, whether there be any truth in you; by this it would be ſeen whether they were men of truth and honeſty or no; and ſhould their brother be brought they would appear to be good men and true: or elſe by the life of Pharaoh, ye are ſpies; ſhould not their brother they ſpoke of be produced, it would be a plain caſe, that they were not the honeſt men they pretended to be, nor did they come merely to buy corn, but had an ill intention.

℣. 17. And he put them all together into ward three days, &c.] In order to conſult together, and agree who ſhould be ſent to fetch their brother; and which it ſeems probable in this length of time they could not agree upon, no one caring to be the bringer of ſuch evil tidings to their father.

℣. 18. And Joſeph ſaid unto them the third day, &c.] His heart yearning towards them, though he put on ſuch an appearance; finding they could not come to an agreement among themſelves who ſhould go on the errand, he thought fit to recede from his former order, and to give them another: this do, and live; meaning what he was about to ſay to them, which if they punctually obſerved and performed, it would be the means of ſaving their lives: for I fear God; and therefore would not do either an unjuſt or cruel thing. This might have given them an hint who he was: but there being among the Gentiles, in all nations, ſome few that feared God, they took no further notice of it than this, that they might expect juſt and equitable dealings by him; ſince, though he was in ſuch an high place, he knew and owned there was one higher than he, to whom he was accountable.

℣. 19. If ye be true men, &c.] As you ſay you are: let one of your brethren be bound in the houſe of your priſon; agree among yourſelves which of you (for one of you muſt) remain in priſon where you are: and the reſt being ſet at liberty, go ye, carry corn for the famine of your houſes; Joſeph, though he dealt with them after this manner to get what knowledge he could of his family, and to get ſight of his brother; yet was concerned for the good of them and theirs, leſt they ſhould be in extreme want through the famine, and that they might have a ſpeedy ſupply of corn, was not willing to detain them any longer.

℣. 20. But bring your youngeſt brother unto me, &c.] Upon their return for more corn: ſo ſhall your words be verified; that they were true men, and had no ill deſign upon the land, but were come only to buy corn: and ye ſhall not die; as ſpies, which they were otherwiſe threatened with; and as it is cuſtomary in all nations to put ſuch to death when found out: and they did ſo; they left one of their brethren behind; they carried corn to their houſes or families in Canaan, and brought their brother Benjamin with them when they returned to Egypt.

℣. 21. And they ſaid one to another, &c.] Before they went out of the priſon, at leaſt whilſt in the preſence of Joſeph: we are verily guilty concerning our brother; meaning Joſeph, whom they had ſold for a ſlave, and who they ſuppoſed was dead through grief and hard ſervitude; and now being in trouble themſelves, it brings to mind the ſin they had been guilty of, which tho' committed 22 years ago, was ſtill freſh in their memories, and lay heavy on their conſciences; for length of time neither makes ſin leſs, nor the conſcience lighter, when it is revived and charged home upon it, and which was aggravated particularly by the following circumſtance: in that we ſaw the anguiſh of his ſoul, when he beſought us, and we would not hear; when in the utmoſt agony, with trembling limbs, and quivering lips, and floods of tears, as they ſtript him of his coat, he moſt earneſtly and importunately requeſted of them they would not put him into the pit, and leave him there; and in the ſame manner entreated them they would not put him into the hands of ſtrangers, but reſtore him alive to his father; but they turned a deaf ear to all his cries and entreaties, and hardened themſelves againſt him: therefore is this diſtreſs come upon us; the ſame meaſure that was meaſured by them to him, was now meaſured to them again, and they were dealt with according to lex talionis; they caſt Joſeph into a pit, and now they were committed to a priſon; they would not attend to his cries and tears, and the anguiſh of his ſoul did not move their pity, and now he is inexorable to them, and will not, at leaſt appear to have any compaſſion on them, or ſhew pity to them; and perhaps their being dealt with in this ſimilar way, brought to their remembrance what they had done.

℣. 22. And Reuben anſwered them, &c.] Being the eldeſt, and who had been moſt concerned for the life of Joſeph, and moſt tender and careful of him: ſaying, ſpake I not unto you, ſaying, do not ſin againſt the child, and ye would not hear? it ſeems by this, that Reuben endeavoured to diſſuade his brethren from ſelling Joſeph, when they firſt propoſed it, to which they would not attend; ſince it is certain they did hearken to him as not to kill him directly, as they firſt conſulted, and they hearkened to him to caſt him into a pit, where he did not intend he ſhould continue, but till he had an opportunity of taking him out, and returning him to his father: but it ſeems probable, that Reuben was with them when they firſt ſpied the Iſhmaelites, and propoſed to ſell Joſeph to them, which he objected to, and entreated they would not do it; and perhaps he went out from them, and took a circuit, with a view to get to the pit and take Joſeph out, but before he got thither his brethren had taken him out, and ſold him: or this may refer to the general advice he always gave them, to do nothing that might endanger the life of Joſeph, or be the means of his death, which ſelling him for a ſlave he ſuppoſed had been: therefore behold alſo, his blood is required; the Targum of Jonathan adds, of us; they were acceſſory to his death, and guilty of it; for Reuben ſuppoſed he was dead, and now they muſt ſuffer for it, as a juſt retaliation, being threatened with death unleſs they could clear themſelves.

℣. 23. And they knew not that Joſeph underſtood them, &c.] For what is above related they ſpoke in his preſence and hearing; but ſpeaking to one another in the Hebrew language, and he being an Egyptian,

[b] חי פרעה vivat Parhoh, Montanus, Junius & Tremellius; ſo Ainſworth and Lightfoot.

Egyptian, as they took him to be, they did not imagine that he could underſtand them, and therefore were not at all upon their guard in what they ſaid: and what confirmed them in this was, for he ſpake unto them by an interpreter; which he the rather choſe to do, that they might have no ſuſpicion of him; and which ſhows, that though there was a likeneſs between the Hebrew language and the Egyptian in many things, yet in ſome they differed, and the difference was ſuch that there was need of an interpreter, where the parties did not underſtand both languages: this interpreter between Joſeph and his brethren, according to the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem, was Manaſſeh, the eldeſt ſon of Joſeph, and ſo Jarchi; which is very improbable, he being but a child at this time, if not an infant; ſee ch. xli. 50, 51.

℣. 24. And he turned himſelf about from them, and wept, &c.] Hearing his brethren confeſs their ſin and guilt to one another in ſelling him, and Reuben's affectionate concern for him, it wrought ſo much upon his affections, being naturally of a tender ſpirit, that he could no longer act the part he had, and keep up the ſternneſs and ſeverity of his countenance; wherefore he turned his face from them, that they might not diſcern it, and his back upon them, and went into another room: and after he had given vent to his paſſion, and compoſed himſelf, he returned to them again, and communed with them; upon the ſame ſubject, of going with their corn to Canaan, and bringing their youngeſt brother with them upon their return, and promiſing moreover, for their encouragement, a free traffick in the land of Egypt, ℣. 34: and took from them Simeon, and bound him before their eyes; who perhaps was the moſt cruel and hard-hearted amongſt them; and it appears from the affair of Shechem, that he was a man of a fierce and bloody diſpoſition. According to Jarchi, it was he that ſaid to Levi, on ſight of Joſeph, behold this dreamer cometh; and that it was he that caſt him into the pit; and as the Targum ſays, adviſed to kill him: and perhaps Joſeph might pitch upon him as the hoſtage, not only becauſe he had uſed him more evilly than the reſt, but becauſe he might obſerve he was leſs concerned, and not ſo much humbled now for the evil he had done, as the reſt were; as alſo he might chuſe to detain him, as being not ſo much in his father's affection, becauſe of the affair of Shechem, and ſo be a leſs affliction to him than if it was another; and beſides, he might fear that being of a perverſe and boiſterous diſpoſition, he would vehemently oppoſe the ſending of Benjamin into Egypt, which Joſeph was ſo very deſirous of: and he bound him in their preſence to terrify them, and let them know what they muſt expect if they did not obey his orders, and the more to humble them for the ſin they had been guilty of, and was now upon their minds; though perhaps, as Jarchi obſerves, when they were gone he let him out, and gave him food and drink; or however might give him ſome liberty, and uſe him with mildneſs and gentleneſs.

℣. 25. Then Joſeph commanded to fill their ſacks with corn, &c.] Which was as much as they came for: and to reſtore every man's money into his ſack; the money paid by each for his quantity of corn delivered to him, not into the perſon's hands, but to be put into his ſack privately, and unknown to him: and to give them proviſion for the way; ſufficient both for themſelves and for their cattle, that they might carry the whole of what corn they bought to their families: and thus did he unto them; that is, not Joſeph, but his ſteward or deputy, or however the ſervant that he gave the above order to.

℣. 26. And they laded their aſſes with the corn, &c.] Cattle very fit to carry burdens, and no doubt they had each of them one at leaſt: and departed thence; from the place where Joſeph was, and from the land of Egypt.

℣. 27. And as one of them opened his ſack, &c.] According to the Targum of Jonathan and Jarchi, this was Levi; but Aben Ezra thinks it is more likely to be Reuben the firſt-born, who was one, that is, the firſt of them: to give his aſs provender in the inn; at which they lay very probably the firſt night of their journey; a good man regards the life of his beaſt, and takes care of that as well as of himſelf, and generally in the firſt place: he eſpied his money; the money which he paid for his corn: for behold it was in his ſack's mouth; juſt as he opened it.

℣. 28. And he ſaid unto his brethren, my money is reſtored, &c.] The money paid for the corn is returned: and lo, it is even in my ſack; this put them all upon opening their ſacks, where every man found his money, though not expreſſed, ſee ch. xliii. 21: and their heart failed them; through ſurprize and fear; or went out [c] from them, as it were, they were ready to faint and ſwoon away: and they were afraid; their conſciences being awakened, and loaded with the guilt of their former ſins, they were afraid that more evil was coming upon them for them; and that this was a ſcheme laid to entrap them, and that they ſhould be purſued and ſeized, and fetched back, and charged with a fraud and trick, as going off with their corn without paying for it: ſaying one to another, what is this that God hath done unto us? for whoever was the inſtrument, they concluded the overruling hand of divine Providence was in it, for the further chaſtiſement and correction of them for their iniquity: inſtead of being thus frighted and diſtreſſed, it is very much it did not give them ſuſpicion of Joſeph, that he was the perſon they had been converſing with, and that he had done this in kindneſs to them; but their minds were ſo preſſed with the guilt of their ſin, that they were poſſeſſed of nothing but fears and dreadful apprehenſions of things, and put the worſt conſtruction upon them they could, as men in ſuch circumſtances uſually do, even fear where no fear is, or no occaſion for it.

℣. 29. And they came unto Jacob their father, unto the land of Canaan, &c.] Without being purſued and fetched back, or retarded in their journey as they might fear: and told him all that befell unto them; chiefly what befel them whilſt in Egypt: ſaying; as follows.

℣. 30. The man, who is the lord of the land, &c.] Of Egypt; not the king, but the deputy-governor of it, whoſe authority under Pharaoh was very great, and reached to the whole land, and all political affairs, and eſpecially what related to the corn, and the ſale of it: he, ſay they, ſpake roughly to us; gave them hard words, and ſtern looks, and uſed them in a very rough manner, ſee ℣. 7: and took us for ſpies of the country; laid ſuch a charge againſt them, and treated them as ſuch; or gave them [d], committed them to priſon as ſuch.

℣. 31. And we said unto him, we are true men, &c.] Honeſt, upright men, not given to treacherous and treaſonable practices, either in the country where they lived, or any other; they came to Egypt with no ill deſign upon the country, only to buy corn for the relief of their families in neceſſity: we are no ſpies; or never were[e]; they had never been guilty of ſuch practices, and never charged with any thing of that kind; they denied the charge, and deteſted the character.

℣. 32. We be twelve brethren, ſons of our father, &c.] All brethren by the father's ſide, though not by the mother's, and by one father; they had been twelve, and were ſo now, though they knew it not, ſuppoſing that one was dead, as is next obſerved: one is not; is not alive, but dead; the Targum of Jonathan is, "what is become of one "we know not:" and the youngeſt is this day with our father in the land of Canaan; ſee ℣. 13.

℣. 33. And the man, the lord of the country, ſaid unto us, hereby ſhall I know that you are true men, &c.] This will be a proof and demonſtration of it: leave one of your brethren here with me; as an hoſtage; they dont ſay bound in the priſon, as Joſeph did, becauſe they would not grieve their father, at leaſt would not tell him of it at once, leſt it ſhould too much affect him: and take food for the famine of your houſhold, and be gone; that is, corn for the relief of their families, being diſtreſſed with a famine.

℣. 34. And bring your youngeſt brother unto me, &c.] Their brother Benjamin: then ſhall I know that you are no ſpies, but that you are true men; he knew they were no ſpies now, but true, honeſt, upright men with reſpect to any deſigns upon the country; but then he ſhould own and acknowledge them to be ſuch, having ſuch plain proof that what they had ſaid was true: ſo will I deliver you your brother; their brother Simeon, who was left bound; though this circumſtance they alſo here ſtudiouſly conceal from their father: and ye ſhall traffick in the land; not only for corn, but for any other commodity Egypt furniſhed its neighbours with.

℣. 35. And it came to paſs as they emptied their ſacks, &c.] Both thoſe in which were the corn they had bought, and thoſe in which were their provender for their cattle, and proviſion for themſelves: that behold, every man's bundle of money was in his ſack; the ſame purſe, and the ſame pieces of money, gold or ſilver, they had paid to the ſteward: and when both they and their father ſaw the bundles of money, they were afraid; the Targum of Jonathan adds, "becauſe of Simeon, whom they had "left there;" fearing that they ſhould be charged with theft or fraud, and that Simeon would be put to death; they had opened their ſacks before, and found their money in them, but put it up again as it was, in order to open them in their father's preſence, from whom they thought proper to conceal this circumſtance, leſt he ſhould blame them for not returning to the governor with their money upon the firſt notice of it, when they had travelled but one day's journey; wherefore they make no mention of it in the account of things that befel them, and expreſs their ſurprize and fear upon finding it when they opened their ſacks, as if they had known nothing of it before; tho' it may be their fears were renewed and increaſed by what Jacob might obſerve to them, as the conſequence of it, which they had not ſo thoroughly conſidered before.

℣. 36. And Jacob their father ſaid unto them, me have ye bereaved of my children, &c.] Which looks as if Jacob ſuſpected that they had either ſold or ſlain Joſeph, and had done one or the other by Simeon: Joſeph is not, and Simeon is not; neither of them were with him, and both were given up by him as dead, or, as the Targum of Jonathan paraphraſes it, "of Joſeph ye have ſaid an evil beaſt "hath devoured him; and Simeon, ye ſay, the "king of the country hath bound him;" as for Joſeph he knew not but he was dead, he feared he was; and as for Simeon, he being in the hands of ſo rough a man as they had repreſented the lord of the land to be, and eſpecially as his releaſe depended upon ſending Benjamin, which he was determined at preſent not to do; he was reckoned by him as a loſt or dead man: and ye will take Benjamin away; they were deſirous of it, and what their deſign was he could not tell; he ſeems to have a ſtrong ſuſpicion that it was not good: all theſe things are againſt me; againſt his will, his peace, and comfort, and happineſs, though they were all working and would work as they did for his good, and for the good of his family, for the preſervation of it during the 7 years famine; or are upon me[f], as heavy burdens, too heavy for him to bear, ready to ſink him down to the earth.

℣. 37. And Reuben ſpake unto his father, &c.] Being the eldeſt ſon, it moſt properly lay upon him to make anſwer to his father in the name of his brethren, and to offer a word of comfort to him: ſaying, ſlay my two ſons, if I bring him not to thee; meaning not Simeon, who was in Egypt, but Benjamin, whom it was propoſed to take thither, and whom Jacob was very loth to part with; and to perſuade him to it Reuben offers to him, and gives him leave to ſlay his 2 ſons, or rather 2 of his ſons[g], ſince he had 4, ch. xlvi. 9. if he did not bring Benjamin again to him: this was a ſtrange propoſal, for what were 2 ſons of his to his own ſon, ſo exceedingly beloved by him? beſides, to loſe his own ſon, and to have 2 of his grand-children ſlain, would have been an increaſe of his ſorrow and grief, inſtead of being an alleviation of it; but Reuben's meaning was, not that his children ſhould be ſlain, but this he ſays, to ſhew that he would be as careful and ſolicitous for the return of Benjamin as if the life of 2 ſons of his lay at ſtake, and was ſo confident of it that he could riſque the life of them upon it, who were as dear to him as one Benjamin was to his father: deliver him into my hand, and I will bring him to thee again; he undertook to be reſponſible for him.

℣. 38. And he ſaid, my ſon ſhall not go down with you, &c.] He gives a peremptory denial; this was his then preſent reſolution and determination: for his brother is dead; meaning Joſeph, Benjamin's own brother by father and mother's ſide; him he ſuppoſed to be dead, ſuch circmſtances being related and produced, which made it highly probable, and he had not heard any thing of him for twenty-two years: and he is left alone; Benjamin being the only ſurviving child of his dearly beloved Rachel, as he thought: if miſchief befal him by the way in which ye go; that is, to Egypt, whether by thieves and robbers, or by the fatigue of the journey, or by any means whatever, ſo that he loſes his life. All the Targums interpret this miſchief of death: then ſhall ye bring down my grey hairs with ſorrow to the grave; the ſenſe is, ſhould this be be the caſe he ſhould never lift up his head, or have any more comfort in this world, but ſhould paſs his time with continual ſorrow until his grey head was laid in the grave, or till he came to the ſtate of the dead.

CHAP. XLIII.

THIS chapter informs us how that the famine continued in the land of Canaan, and the corn that Jacob's family had from Egypt being conſumed, Jacob preſſed his ſons to go down for more, which they refuſed to do, unleſs Benjamin was ſent with them, for whoſe ſafety Judah offered to become a ſurety, ℣. 1—10. Jacob with reluctance was prevailed upon to let him go, and diſmiſſed them with a preſent to the governor of Egypt, and with double money to buy corn with, and with his bleſſing upon them, ℣. 11—14. upon which they ſet out for Egypt; and when they came into the preſence of Joſeph, he ſeeing Benjamin with them, ordered his ſteward to have them to his houſe, and get dinner ready, it being his pleaſure that they ſhould dine with him that day, ℣. 15—17. this threw them into a fright, ſuppoſing they were going to be called to an account for the money they found in their ſacks; wherefore they related to the ſteward very particularly the whole of that affair, who bid them not be uneaſy, for he had had their money; and as a proof, that things would go well with them, brought Simeon out to them, and treated them very kindly and genteelly, ℣. 18—24. and having got their preſent ready againſt Joſeph came home, they delivered it to him with great veneration and ſubmiſſion; who aſked of the welfare of their father, and whether that was not their younger brother they ſpoke of, the ſight of whom ſo affected him, that he was obliged in haſte to retire to his chamber, and weep, ℣. 25—30. and having waſhed his face, and compoſed himſelf, he returned and ordered dinner to be brought, which was ſet on different tables, one for himſelf and the Egyptians, and the other for his brethren, whom he placed according to their age, to their great ſurprize; and ſent them meſſes from his table to each, and to Benjamin five times more than the reſt, and they were ſo liberally entertained, that they became chearful and merry, ℣. 31—34.

℣. 1. And the famine was ſore in the land.] In the land of Canaan; it increaſed yet more and more: this is obſerved for the ſake of what follows, ſhewing the reaſon and neceſſity of Jacob's ſons taking a ſecond journey into Egypt.

℣. 2. And it came to paſs, when they had eaten up the corn which they had brought out of Egypt, &c.] Which, in ſo numerous a family as Jacob's was, having ſo many children, grand-children, and ſervants, what nine men on ſo many aſſes could bring with them, muſt be conſumed in a ſhort time, how long cannot be ſaid; no doubt they lived ſparingly on it in ſuch a time of ſcarcity, to make it laſt as long as they could, and perhaps only he, his children and grand-children might eat of it; the ſervants, as Calvin obſerves, might live on meaner food, as acorns, herbs and roots; and it muſt not be thought that all this corn was eaten up entirely, and none left, but the far greater part of it, and but very little remaining; or otherwiſe, how ſhould Jacob, and his ſons wives and children be ſupported until the return of his ſons from Egypt with freſh proviſions? indeed it may be ſuppoſed, that the land of Canaan produced ſome corn, though but little; and it is certain there were other fruits which were ſerviceable for food, as appears from ℣. 11: their father ſaid, go again, buy us a little food; juſt enough for him, and them, and theirs, for the preſent; hoping that the famine would be over quickly, and therefore orders them to go once more to Egypt, and buy ſome proviſions: they made no motion themſelves to go, as it is highly probable they determined they would not, ſince Jacob had reſolved Benjamin ſhould not go, but waited for their father's motion, and which he did not make until neceſſity obliged him.

℣. 3. And Judah ſpake unto him, &c.] Reuben the eldeſt ſon had met with a repulſe already, Simeon the next was now in Egypt, and Levi perhaps on account of the affair of Shechem, did not yet ſtand well in his father's favour and affection; wherefore Judah being next, with the conſent of his brethren, undertakes to manage the affair with him, who had doubtleſs an intereſt in him, as well as authority among his brethren, and was a prudent man, and could ſpeak well: ſaying, the man did ſolemnly proteſt unto us; meaning Joſeph, tho' he then knew not that it was he; whom he calls the man, not by way of contempt, or as thinking and ſpeaking meanly of him, but the reverſe, the great man, the honourable man, the governor of Egypt; and ſo the Septuagint verſion adds, "the "man, the lord of the land;" he in the ſtrongeſt terms, and in the moſt ſolemn manner, proteſted by the life of Pharaoh: ſaying, ye ſhall not ſee my face; with acceptance, ſhould not be admitted to come near him, or treat with him, and purchaſe any corn of him: except your brother be with you; their youngeſt brother Benjamin.

℣. 4. If thou wilt ſend our brother with us, &c.] Give orders for his going with us, and put him under our care: we will go down and buy thee food; ſignifying on the above condition, that they were ready and willing to take a journey into Egypt, and buy proviſions for him and his family, otherwiſe not.

℣. 5. But if thou wilt not ſend him, we will not go down, &c.] This they ſaid not, as undutiful, and from a ſpirit of rebellion and diſobedience to their father, or of ſtubbornneſs and obſtinancy, but becauſe they durſt not go down, nor could they with any ſafety; they might expect to be taken up as ſpies, and put to death as they were threatened; and beſides, it would be in vain, and to no purpoſe, ſince there was no likelihood of ſucceeding, or of getting any proviſion: for the man ſaid unto us, ye ſhall not ſee my face, except your brother be with you; which they repeat both for the confirmation of it, and as an apology for themſelves, to clear them from any charge of undutifulneſs.

℣. 6. And Iſrael ſaid, &c.] In anſwer to the ſpeech of Judah: wherefore dealt ye ſo ill with me; had done that which brought ſo much evil upon him, gave him ſo much grief and trouble, and threw him into ſuch perplexity and diſtreſs, that he knew not what to do, or courſe to take: as to tell the man whether ye had yet a brother? which he thought was done imprudently and unadviſedly, and that there was no need of it; which had it not been done, would have prevented this anxiety of mind he was now in, and the miſchief he feared would follow.

℣. 7. And they ſaid, &c.] Not Judah only, in the name of the reſt, but each of them in turn, being all charged with doing an ill thing: the man aſked us ſtraitly of our ſtate, and of our kindred; or in aſking aſked [h]; very particularly and cloſely, putting many queſtions to us, who we were? from whence we came? to whom we belonged? of what family we were? and enquired into the particulars and circumſtances of our relations: ſaying, is your father yet alive? have ye another brother? they had told him they were all one man's ſons, as they were obliged, when they were charged with being ſpies, in order to clear themſelves; upon which he enquired whether their father was living, and whether they were all the ſons their father had: and we told him according to the tenor of theſe words; they anſwered to theſe queſtions put to them, and which were ſo cloſely put, that they could do no other than ſay what they did: could we certainly know that he would ſay, bring your brother down? could they have foreſeen this, they would have been more upon their guard; though in all probability had they been ever ſo cautious this would have been the caſe; it would have been required of them to bring their brother with them, ſo deſirous was Joſeph of ſeeing him.

℣. 8. And Judah ſaid unto Iſrael his father, ſend the lad with me, and we will ariſe and go, &c.] Directly to Egypt for corn; Judah calls Benjamin a lad, becauſe the youngeſt brother, and tenderly brought up by his father, who had an affectionate fondneſs for him as if he had been a child; otherwiſe he muſt be 32 years of age, for he was ſeven years younger than Joſeph, who was now 39 years of age; yea Benjamin muſt have children of his own, who went with him and his father into Egypt, ch. xlvi. 21. for the computation of Benjamin's age, ſee ch. xxx. 22. and xxxi. 41. and xxxv. 18. and xxxvii. 2. and xli. 46, 53, 54. and xlv. 6: that we may live, and not die, both we, and thou, and alſo our little ones; he argues, that if they with Benjamin went down to Egypt for corn, there was a poſſibility, yea a probability that they would all live, even Benjamin alſo; but if not, they muſt all in courſe die, and Benjamin likewiſe; and therefore it was moſt prudent and adviſeable, for the ſake of all their lives, of them and theirs, and for the ſake of Benjamin among the reſt, for whom Jacob was ſo particularly concerned, to let him go with them to Egypt for corn, ſince he muſt die if they did not go, and he could but die if he did go; and there was great likelihood, if not a certainty, he would not; at leaſt Judah was confident he would not, as appears by what follows.

℣. 9. I will be ſurety for him, &c.] Engage for his ſafe return: of my hand ſhalt thou require him; I'll be anſwerable for him: if I bring him not to thee, and ſet him before thee; don't return him from Egypt, and bring him to Canaan, into his father's houſe and preſence ſafe and ſound: then let me bear the blame for ever; of perſuading his father to let him go with him; all this he ſaid, to ſhew what care he would take of him, and what confidence he had that no evil would befal him, that he would be returned with them in ſafety; which he might ground upon the aſſurance that Joſeph had given, that they ſhould not die if they brought their brother with them, ch. xlii. 20. and perhaps Judah, as Schmidt thinks, might be under a ſpecial inſtinct of divine Providence, which directed him to ſay theſe things: and it may be added, that Jacob alſo might be under a divine impulſe, which influenced him to regard what Judah ſaid, or otherwiſe his ſuretyſhip was but a poor ſecurity, and of little avail.

℣. 10. For except we had lingred, &c.] Delayed going down to Egypt, through the demur Jacob made of ſending Benjamin with them: ſurely now we had returned this ſecond time; they would have made their journey to Egypt, and returned again with their corn, and their brother Benjamin too, as Judah ſuppoſed, before this time; ſo that by theſe delays they were loſing time, and involving themſelves and families in diſtreſs for want of corn.

℣. 11. And their father ſaid unto them, &c.] Being in ſome meaſure convinced by their reaſonings, and in part at leaſt reconciled to let Benjamin go with them, there being nothing to be done, he perceived, unleſs he conſented to it: if it muſt be ſo now, do this; if nothing elſe will do but Benjamin muſt go, which after all he was reluctant to, then he adviſes them to do as follows: take of the beſt fruits in the land in your veſſels; ſuch as were the peculiar produce of the land of Canaan, and the beſt of it; for which it was moſt famous, and praiſed, as the word uſed ſignifies; theſe Jacob adviſes to take and put into their ſacks they carried to bring back their corn in: and carry down the man a preſent; the great man and governor of Egypt, whoſe name was not known, little thinking it was his ſon Joſeph; this he propoſed to be done, in order to procure his friendſhip, that he might carry it kindly and reſpectfully to them, releaſe Simeon, and ſend back Benjamin with them. The preſent conſiſted of the following things, a little balm; or roſin, of which there was great quantity in and about Gilead, Jer. viii. 22. ſee the note there: and a little honey; the land of Canaan in general is called a land flowing with milk and honey; and ſome parts of it were famous for it, as the parts about Ziph, called from thence the honey of Ziphim [i]: this is the firſt time mention is made of honey in ſcripture. Some ſay [k] Bacchus was the inventor of it. Juſtin [l] makes a very ancient king of a people in the country, now called Spain, to whom he gives the name of Gorgoris, to be the firſt that found out the way of gathering honey; but by this it appears to be of a more early date. Dr. Shaw [m] thinks, that not honey, properly ſo called, is meant, but a kind of rob made of the juice of grapes, called by the Arabs, Dibſa, a word near in ſound with, and from the ſame root as this. And who further obſerves, that Hebron alone (the place where Jacob now was) ſends every year to Egypt 300 camel-loads, i. e. near 2000 quintals of this rob; and Leo Africanus ſays [n], there is but little honey to be found in Egypt, wherefore it made this part of the preſent the more acceptable: ſpices; of various ſorts, a collection of them; though it is thought by Bochart and others, that the ſtorax is particularly meant; the beſt of that ſort being, as Pliny ſays [o], in Judea. The Targum and Jarchi take take it to be wax, as do alſo other Jewiſh writers: and myrrrhe; the liquor called ſtacte, that drops from the myrrhe-tree. Some will have this lot, as the word is, the ſame with ladanum; one ſhould rather think, that it ſhould be the lotus or lote-tree, the fruit of which Pliny [p] ſays is the bigneſs of a bean, and of a ſaffron colour, and Herodotus [q] ſays, it is ſweet like a date; but that it was frequent in Egypt, and needed not be carried there. The Targum renders it cheſnuts, and ſo Ben Melech, as it does what follows, nuts, and almonds, the oil of nuts, and the oil of almonds: the former deſign not common, but the Piſtachio nuts, as Jarchi obſerves from R. Machir; and theſe, as Pliny [r] ſays, were well known in Syria, and were good for food and drink, and againſt the bites of ſerpents; and, as Bochart [s] obſerves, are frequently mentioned by naturaliſts along with almonds, and as like unto them.

℣. 12. And take double money in your hand, &c.] Than what they carried before, either to buy as much more as they then did; or rather becauſe of the greater ſcarcity of corn, as Jarchi obſerves, which made it doubly dearer; for this ſeems to be different from the money they are alſo bid to take in return for that found in their ſacks, which was a third parcel, as follows: and the money that was brought again in the mouth of your ſacks, carry it again in your hand; that it might be ready to pay upon demand, ſhould they be charged with non-payment for the corn they had before: peradventure it was an overſight; a miſtake of the governor's, or of thoſe that were under him, concerned in the ſale of the corn, and receiving money for it, or of Jacob's ſons; he could not tell how it was, but ſome way or other he ſuppoſed a miſtake was made.

℣. 13. Take alſo your brother, &c.] Their brother Benjamin, committing him into their hands and to their care, hereby declaring his conſent and willingneſs that he ſhould go with them: and ariſe, go again to the man; the governor of Egypt to buy corn of him.

℣. 14. And God Almighty give you mercy before the man, &c.] Who has the hearts of all men in his hands, kings, princes, governors, even thoſe who are the moſt cruel and hard-hearted, rough and ſevere in their tempers and diſpoſitions, and ſuch an one they had repreſented this man to be; one that had ſpoke roughly to them, and uſed them roughly: Jacob therefore ſent him a preſent to ſoften his mind, and now he puts up a prayer to God, and diſmiſſes his ſons with his good wiſhes for them, that God would incline the heart of the governor to ſhew kindneſs to them, and let them have corn, nor uſe any of them ill: particularly, that he may ſend away your other brother and Benjamin; releaſe Simeon, and ſend him and Benjamin along with them when they returned: if I be bereaved of my children, I am bereaved; this he ſaid, not as utterly deſpairing of their return, but as expreſſive of his patient ſubmiſſion to the divine will, be it as it may be.

℣. 15. And the men took the preſent, &c.] Their father directed them to: and they took double money in their hand; beſides what they found in their ſacks-mouths, which they alſo carried with them: and Benjamin; they took him likewiſe with their father's leave: and roſe up, and went down to Egypt, and ſtood before Joſeph; preſented themſelves to him, and their petitions for more corn, as well as to anſwer to any queſtions that ſhould be aſked them.

℣. 16. And when Joſeph ſaw Benjamin with them, &c.] Whom he knew, though he had not ſeen him for 22 years, and though he muſt be very much altered, he being but about 10 years of age when Joſeph was ſold into Egypt, yet being with the reſt of his brethren, whom he knew very well, concluded it muſt be him: he ſaid to the ruler of his houſe; his ſteward, as he is after called, not his ſon Manaſſeh, as the Targum of Jonathan: bring theſe men home; to his own houſe, for Joſeph was now at or near the place where were the granaries of corn, and where that was ſold and diſtributed: and ſlay, and make ready; or ſlay a ſlaughter [t], that is, of beaſts for food; a ſheep, or a lamb, or a calf, very probably, and order it to be dreſſed, boiled or roaſted, or both, that it might be fit for food: wherefore Aben Ezra muſt be miſtaken when on ch. xlvi. 34. he ſays, that the Egyptians in thoſe times did not eat fleſh, nor might any kill a ſheep; for it cannot be thought that Joſeph could order a dinner for his brethren, to whom as yet he did not chuſe to make himſelf known, in direct violation of the cuſtoms and laws of Egypt, and who, it is plain by what follows, dined as an Egyptian, and with the Egyptians, and not as an Hebrew, and with his brethren as Hebrews; beſides, for what purpoſe did Pharaoh get and poſſeſs ſuch herds and flocks of cattle, if not for food as well as other uſes? ſee ch. xlvii. 6. 16, 17. though in after-times they abſtained from eating various animals, as Porphyry [u] from Chæremon relates, and particularly from ſheep and goats according to Juvenal [x]: for theſe men ſhall dine with me at noon; which was the uſual time of dining with the eaſtern people, as it is now with us, though with the Romans at evening.

℣. 17. And the man did as Joſeph bade: and the man brought the men into Joſeph's houſe.] Shewed them the way to it, and introduced them into it, and led them into ſome apartment in it, and ordered every thing to be got ready for dinner as his maſter had bid him, being a diligent and faithful ſervant: at old Cair is ſhewn to travellers [y], the houſe of Joſeph in the tower, and a very ſurpriſing well, ſaid to be made by him, and here, they ſay, the granaries were, in which the corn was laid up.

℣. 18. And the men were afraid, becauſe they were brought into Joſeph's houſe, &c.] It not being uſual, as Jarchi obſerves, for thoſe that came to buy corn to lodge there, but at an inn in the city: and they ſaid, becauſe of the money that was returned in our ſacks at the firſt time, are we brought in; to examine and enquire of them, how they came to go away without paying for their corn, take up their money again after they had laid it down, and take it away with them, and ſo were guilty of tricking and defrauding, if not of theft: that he may ſeek occaſion againſt us; or roll on us [z]; caſt all the ſhame on them, and leave the reproach and ſcandal of it on them: and fall upon us; with hard words, and ſevere menaces, if not with blows: and and take us for bond-men, and our asses; imprison them, which was the punishment for fraud and theft, and take their asses as a forfeiture.

℣. 19. And they came near to the steward of Joseph's house, &c.] The same person before called the ruler of his house, under whose direction they were; just before they came to the house, as it seems by what follows, they made up to him as having something to say to him: and they communed with him at the door of the house; before they went into it, being uneasy and eager to know what should be the meaning of their being brought thither, which was unusual.

℣. 20. And said, O sir, &c.] Or, on me, my lord[a], one said in the name of the rest, perhaps Judah, on me let the blame lie, if guilty of rudeness in making our address to thee; or as the Vulgate Latin version, we pray, sir, that thou wouldst hear us; and so Jarchi and Aben Ezra say, the phrase is expressive of beseeching, intreating and supplicating: we came indeed down at the first time to buy food; not to spy the land but to buy corn, and not to get it by fraud or tricking but by paying for it the price that was required.

℣. 21. And it came to pass when we came to the inn, &c.] Upon the road, on the first day's journey, to refresh themselves and their cattle: that we opened our sacks; to give provender to our cattle; by which it appears that they all did this, though it is only said of one of them at the inn, and of all of them when they came home, ch. xlii. 27. 35. and behold every man's money was in the mouth of his sack, our money in full weight; nothing wanting of it; it being usual in those times to pay money by weight, and not by the tale of pieces: and we have brought it again in our hand; in order to pay it for the corn we have had, having no design to defraud.

℣. 22. And other money have we brought down in our hands to buy food, &c.] Double money for a double quantity, or because the price of corn was now doubled; and their bringing this besides the other, shewed their honest and upright intentions: we cannot tell who put our money in our sacks; we are quite ignorant of it, and can by no means account for it, and therefore hope no blame will be laid on us.

℣. 23. And he said, peace be unto you, fear not, &c.] Do not be uneasy and disturbed, you have nothing to fear, you are in no danger: your God, and the God of your father hath given you treasure in your sacks; the hidden treasure, as the word signifies food in their sacks; was there by the providence of God, so disposing the heart of Joseph to order it to be put there, as the steward interpreted it; who by being in Joseph's family had got some knowledge of the true God, and of his allwise and disposing providence: I had your money; he received it of them, which he acknowledges, and that was sufficient to acquit them from guile and theft, though he does not say that he put the money into their sacks, or by whose order it was done: and he brought Simeon out unto them; either out of prison, or out of some other room to them, which was, no doubt, done by the direction of Joseph.

℣. 24. And the man brought the men into Joseph's house, &c.] After the above discourse had passed between them, and he had made their minds easy, both with respect to the money, and by bringing Simeon unbound to them: and gave them water, and they washed their feet; which was usually done in the eastern countries after travelling, and when about to take a meal, and was both for refreshment and cleanliness: and he gave their asses provender; thus were they hospitably entertained, they and all that belonged to them.

℣. 25. And they made ready the present against Joseph came at noon, &c.] They took it out of their vessels or bags in which they brought it, having unladen their asses, and disposed of it in a proper manner to present it to him when he came home at noon to dine: for they heard that they should eat bread there; dine there, bread being put for all provision: this was told them, very probably, by the steward, or by some of the servants in the house, or they overheard what Joseph said to the steward, ℣. 16.

℣. 26. And when Joseph came home, &c.] In order to dine, it being noon-time: they brought him the present which was in their hand into the house; every one took a part of it in his hand and brought it to Joseph in the parlour where he was, and delivered it to him as a present from their father, or from themselves, or it may be as from both: and bowed themselves to him to the earth; in the most prostrate and humble manner, now again fulfilling his dream, and more compleatly than before, for now all his 11 brethren were together, signified by the 11 stars in the dream, that made obeisance to him, see ch. xxxvii. 9. and xlii. 6.

℣. 27. And he asked them of their welfare, &c.] Or peace[b], their prosperity, especially of the health of their bodies, whether they were well and in good health after so long a journey: and said, is your father well, the old man of whom ye spake? when they were with him before, and told him they were all the sons of one man, who dwelt in Canaan: is he yet alive? which he was very desirous of knowing; for being advanced in years, he might fear he was removed by death in the time between their going and returning.

℣. 28. And they answered, thy servant our father is in good health, he is yet alive, &c.] Which is an answer to both his questions; and by calling their father Joseph's servant, he did obeisance to him in them, as well as by sending a present to him, which they delivered as coming from him his servant; and it is not improbable that Jacob sent his salutation to him as his servant, and so that part of the dream of Joseph's was also fulfilled, which represented the sun doing obeisance to him: and they bowed their heads, and made obeisance; a second time, as they did, no doubt, at every time they gave answer to Joseph's questions; and this is again observed, to shew the full completion of the above dream.

℣. 29. And he lift up his eyes, and saw his brother Benjamin, &c.] He had seen him before when his brethren first presented themselves to him, but then took no particular and special notice of him, only gave him a side-look as it were, but now he looked wishly at him: his mother's son; the son of Rachel his mother, and who was his only brother by his mother's side, the rest, though his brethren, yet only by his father's-side, not his mother's sons: and said, is this your younger brother, of whom ye spake unto me? he knew he was the same, but was willing to have it from their mouths to lead on to what he had further to say: and he said; after they had answered his question, and told him it was he: God be gracious unto thee, my son; speaking as a superior, ſuperior, a governor, in which capacity, he was a father to his inferiors; and as a man, a relation, a brother, though not as yet diſcovered; he ſpoke in the moſt tender and affectionate manner, and as a religious, good man, he wiſhes the beſt thing he could for his brother, the grace and goodneſs of God; and which may be underſtood in the largeſt and moſt expreſſive ſenſe, as including all good things, temporal, ſpiritual and eternal.

℣. 30. And Joſeph made haſte, &c.] To get out of the room where he was with his brethren as faſt as he could: for his bowels did yern upon his brother; his paſſions grew ſtrong, his affections were raiſed, his heart was full of tenderneſs, and there was ſuch a flow of love and joy at the ſight of his brother, and the little converſation he had with him, that he was ready to burſt out, and muſt have diſcovered himſelf if he had not immediately turned and got out of the room: and he ſought where to weep; a proper place to vent his paſſion in tears of joy, and relieve himſelf: and he entered into his chamber, and wept there; where he could be the moſt retired, and not likely to be overheard.

℣. 31. And he waſhed his face, &c.] From the tears on it, that it might not be diſcerned that he had been weeping: and went out; of his chamber into the room again, where his brethren were: and refrained himſelf; from weeping, or ſhewing any exceſs of paſſion, love, joy, &c. and ſaid, ſet on bread; gave orders to his ſervants to bring in dinner, and ſet it upon the table; bread, as before, being put for all kind of food.

℣. 32. And they ſet on for him by himſelf, &c.] A table was placed and proviſions ſet upon it in one part of the room for Joſeph by himſelf; which was done either becauſe he was an Hebrew, and the Egyptians might not eat with him, nor he with them; or rather for the ſake of grandeur, he being the next man in the kingdom to Pharaoh: and for them by themſelves; another table was placed and ſpread for Joſeph's brethren by themſelves, the reaſon of which is after given: and for the Egyptians, which did eat with him, by themſelves; a third table was laid for ſuch Egyptian noblemen and others, who were at this time Joſeph's gueſts, or uſed to dine with him: becauſe the Egyptians might not eat bread with the Hebrews, for that is an abomination unto the Egyptians; the reaſon of which as given by the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan is, becauſe the creatures the Egyptians worſhipped the Hebrews eat; but it is a queſtion, whether ſuch creatures as oxen, ſheep, goats, &c. which were eaten by the Hebrews, were ſo early worſhipped by the Egyptians; though they were in after-times, and particularly the Apis or ox, which is ſuppoſed by many to be worſhipped on the account of Joſeph, and ſo after his time; rather the abhorence the Egyptians had the Hebrews in, was on account of their being ſhepherds, on a political account, they having before this time ſuffered much by the inſurrections and rebellions of ſuch ſort of perſons among themſelves, who ſet up a kingdom and kings of their own, called the Hyckſi or paſtor-kings: or elſe this difference made between the Egyptians and Hebrews at eating, was not on account of what they did eat, as of the certain rites and cuſtoms the Egyptians had peculiar to themſelves in dreſſing their food, and eating it, and therefore would not eat with any of another nation; ſo that this was not any particular diſtaſte they had to the Hebrews, but was their uſage towards men of all nations; for ſo Herodotus ſays [c], that "no Egyptian, man or woman, might kiſs "the mouth of a Greek, or uſe a knife, or ſpit, "or pot;" that is, a knife a Greek had cut any thing with, or a ſpit he had roaſted meat on, or a pot he had boiled it in; and adds, "nor might "taſte of the fleſh of an ox, cut with the "knife of a Greek." And indeed, they would not eat nor converſe with any of another religion [d], be they who they would.

℣. 33. And they ſat before him, &c.] At a table, ſo placed, that they were in his ſight, and he had a full view of them: the firſt-born according to his birth-right, and the youngeſt according to his youth; every one according to his age, Reuben the firſt-born, firſt, and ſo on to Benjamin the youngeſt: thus they placed themſelves as they uſed to be in their father's family, or they were ſo placed by Joſeph; and if this was the caſe, it may be a reaſon, and a principal one, of what follows: and the men marvelled one at another; not the Egyptians, the gueſts of Joſeph, ſeeing 11 brethren placed in this manner, and theſe being Hebrews taken ſo much notice of; but Joſeph's brethren, who either wondered at the manner of their being ſeated ſo regular, according to their age; or at the honour done them to dine with the governor, and at the grandeur of the entertainment, and at the ſeparate manner in which the governor, and the nobles of Egypt, ſat at meals; or at what follows.

℣. 34. And he took and ſent meſſes unto them from before him, &c.] The ſeveral diſhes were brought before him, who cut them up, and ſent to every one their part and portion, as was uſual in thoſe times and countries, and afterwards elſewhere [e], for the maſter of the family or feaſt to divide the food into parts, and to give to every gueſt his part; and theſe were called from their being ſent, miſſus, and from whence ſeems to be our Engliſh word meſſes, here uſed: but Benjamin's meſs was five times ſo much as any of theirs; which was done out of his great affection to him, being his own brother both by father and mother's ſide; and as ſome think, to try his brethren, how they ſtood affected to Benjamin, and obſerve if this did not raiſe their envy to him, as his father's particular reſpect to him had raiſed it in them againſt himſelf; and that if it ſhould, he might provide for his ſafety, leſt they ſhould uſe him in like manner as they had uſed him. This undoubtedly was deſigned as a peculiar favour, and a mark of ſpecial honour and reſpect, it being uſual for princes to ſend meſſes from their tables to ſuch as they favoured; and particularly it was uſual with the Egyptians for their kings to have double meſſes more than the reſt, in honour of them, as Herodotus [f] relates: Benjamin's meſs conſiſted either of five parts, or it was five times bigger than what was ſent to the reſt; not but that they had all what was ſufficient; there was no want to any, but great plenty of every thing for them all; nor was this deſigned for Benjamin, that he ſhould eat the larger quantity, only to ſhew him diſtinguiſhing reſpect: and they drank, and were merry with him; after dinner they drank wine liberally and plentifully, but not to exceſs and intemperance, yet ſo as to be chearful and in good ſpirits; their fears being all diſſipated by this generous entertainment they met with.

CHAP. XLIV.

THIS chapter relates the policy of Joseph in making an experiment of his brethrens regard and affection for Benjamin; he ordered his steward to put every man's money into his sack, and his silver cup in Benjamin's, and when they were got out of the city, to follow after them, and charge them with the theft, as he did; and having searched their sacks, as they desired he would, found the cup with Benjamin, which threw them into the utmost distress, and obliged them to return to Joseph, v. 1—14. who charged them with their ill behaviour towards him; they acknowledge it, and propose to be his servants; but he orders them to depart to their father, retaining Benjamin in servitude, v. 15—17. upon which Judah addressed him in a very polite and affectionate manner, and relates the whole story, both of what passed between Joseph and them, concerning Benjamin, the first time they were in Egypt, and between their father and them upon the same subject, when he directed them to go a second time thither to buy corn, and how he became a surety to his father for him, and therefore proposed to be his bondman now, not being able to see his father's face without Benjamin, v. 18—34.

v. 1. And he commanded the steward of his house, &c.] Whom the Targum of Jonathan again calls Manasseh, the eldest son of Joseph: saying, fill the mens sacks with food, as much as they can carry; this he ordered out of his great affection for them, and that his father and his family might have sufficient supply in this time of famine: and put every man's money in his sack's mouth; not that which had been put into their sacks the first time, for the steward acknowledged his receipt of it, but what they had paid for their present corn, they were about to carry away.

v. 2. And put my cup, the silver cup, in the sack's mouth of the youngest, &c.] Benjamin; this he ordered to be done, partly to put him in apparent danger, and try how his brethren would behave towards him in such circumstances, and thereby know how they stood affected to him; and partly that he might have an excuse for retaining him with him. This cup was valuable both for the matter of it, being of silver, and for the use of it, being what Joseph himself drank out of; and by the word used to express it, it seems to have been a large embossed cup, a kind of goblet, for it has the signification of a little hill. Jarchi says, it was a long cup, which they called Mederno. The Septuagint render it by Condy, which is said to be a Persian word, and a kind of an Attalic cup, that held 10 cotylæ [g], or four or five quarts, and weighed 90 ounces; but a cup so large seems to be too large to drink out of: and his corn-money; what he had paid for his corn: and he did according to the word that Joseph had spoken; put every man's money in the mouth of his sack, and his silver cup with the corn-money into Benjamin's sack.

v. 3. As soon as the morning was light, &c.] When it was break of day, before the sun rose: the men were sent away, they and their asses; the men being refreshed with food, and their asses having provender given them, and saddled and loaded, they were handsomely and honourably dismissed.

v. 4. And when they were gone out of the city, and not yet far off, &c.] Which perhaps was Tanais, the Zoan of the scriptures; Joseph said unto his steward, up, follow after the men; who no doubt was ready provided with men and horses, to go out and pursue when Joseph should give the orders, he being privy to Joseph's intentions, and with whom the scheme was concerted, and the secret was. Joseph appears to have been up very early this morning, and had observed the exact time of his brethrens departure, and guessed whereabouts they might be when he sent his steward, and others, after them; for it can hardly be thought he sent alone after eleven men, and to charge them with a theft, and bring them back again: and when thou dost overtake them, say unto them, wherefore have ye rewarded evil for good? in taking away the silver cup, when they had been so kindly and bountifully entertained. This he was to represent as base ingratitude, as it would have appeared, had it been fact. In much such manner was Esop used by the inhabitants of Delphos, they being displeased with him, put a sacred cup or vial into his bags, which he being ignorant of, went on his way towards Phocis; and they ran after him, and seized him, and charged him with sacrilege [h].

v. 5. Is not this it, in which my lord drinketh? &c.] Which was for his own particular use, and so the more ungrateful in them to take it, and whereby indeed he divineth? according to our version and others, Joseph is here represented by his steward as a diviner or soothsayer, and so he might be thought to be by the Egyptians, from being such an exact interpreter of dreams, foretelling things to come, and that he made his divinations by the silver cup; and we are told that the Assyrians, Chaldeans and Egyptians used to fill basons with water, in which they put plates of silver and precious stones, marked with certain characters, and pronouncing certain words, called to the devil, who uttered a voice in the water like an hissing, and returned answers to the things enquired about [i]: a like practice is used by the Africans now [k]; which method Andronicus took to know who would be his successor, but was reckoned among the most infamous and scandalous parts of the magic art [l]: wherefore, as Joseph never practised any thing of this kind, so neither would he dissemble, or make, as if he did; though it must be owned that the Arabs [m] in Egypt at this day pretend to consult with the cup and divine by it: but the words will bear another version and sense, for it may signify to tempt, to try, to make an experiment, and by experience to know a thing, as in Gen. xxx. 27. and so the Arabic version, and indeed he hath tried you by it; so Aben Ezra interprets it of his trying of them by it, whether they were thieves or no, whether they were a parcel of light-fingered, filching fellows: the cup he pretends, was set before them, and he turned himself an-another way, either Joseph or the steward, and they took the opportunity of carrying it off; or else, as others think, he tried them by drinking in it very freely and liberally, what sort of men they were, how they would behave themselves in their cups, when truth is commonly spoke, the wit being out when the wine is in: but of these two senses the former is to be preferred; though it seems best of all to understand this, not of the cup as the instrument by which he tried, searched, and enquired into things, but as the object searched after and enquired of; for the word signifies to enquire, and make a strict observation of things, and thereby make shrewd guesses and conjectures, as in 1 Kings xx. 33. and so the sense is, either according to R. Jonah[n], that his master would diligently enquire of the soothsayers concerning it, in order to find out who took it away, and so Ben Melech; for the words may be rendered, for which he certainly makes, or has made, or will make divination, which agrees with ℣. 15. for if the cup was gone how could he make divination with it? it must be for it; or indeed they might well conclude themselves, that as such a thing would soon be missed, diligent enquiry would be made after it, and it would be at once conjectured that it was taken away, not by any of the household, but by those strangers that had dined with Joseph; and a man of his sagacity and penetration would soon find it out, and therefore it was madness and folly to do such an action, and think to get off clear: ye have done evil in so doing; both a mad and foolish action, and a base, wicked and ungrateful one, as well as what was infamous and scandalous; for nothing was reckoned more so than for a guest at a prince's table to carry away a cup, or any thing of that kind with him: so Claudius the Roman emperor, a guest of his, the day before, having taken away a golden cup, as was supposed, ordered an earthen one to be put in its place[o], which was a putting him to public shame and reproach: Dioxippus the Athenian, being at table with Alexander the great, a golden cup was took away privately, by some that envied him; and the hint being given as if he had done it, all eyes were turned on him as the thief, which he could not bear, but went out, and wrote a letter to the king and then killed himself[p].

℣. 6. And he overtook them, &c.] Their asses being laden with corn could not travel very fast, and he and his attendants being mounted on swift horses: and he spake unto them these same words; that Joseph had ordered him to say, and so what follows particularly, ℣. 10.

℣. 7. And they said unto him, wherefore saith my lord these words? &c.] One of them in the name of the rest, perhaps Judah, made answer, as astonished at the charge laid against them, suggesting that there was not the least foundation for it, and were quite surprized to hear any thing of this kind alledged against them: God forbid that thy servants should do according to this thing; expressing the utmost detestation of such a fact, as being what they could never be guilty of.

℣. 8. Behold, the money we found in our sacks mouths, &c.] Upon their return from Egypt, the first time they went thither for corn: we brought again unto thee out of the land of Canaan; which was a full proof of their honesty: they might have kept it until it was called for and demanded of them, but of themselves they brought it with them, as being money not their own; and they did not wait to be examined about it when they came to Egypt again, but of their own accord related the story of it, and offered the money to this same man the steward they were now speaking to, which he could not deny: yea, they brought it to him out of the land of Canaan, a foreign country at a considerable distance, and out of the jurisdiction of Egypt, and where they were not liable to be called to an account for it: how then should we steal out of thy lord's house silver or gold? that is, vessels of silver or vessels of gold, as the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan; it could not be reasonably thought they would, for if they would not retain the governor's money when in their own hand and out of his reach, much less would they steal any thing out of his house, which they might conclude would soon be missed, and they easily apprehended and committed to prison, and suffer for it.

℣. 9. With whom soever of thy servants it be found, &c.] The silver cup: both let him die; which was rashly said, since they might have thought the cup might be put in one of their sacks unknown to them, as their money had been before; and besides, death was a punishment too severe for such a crime, and therefore is by the steward himself moderated; but this they said the more strongly to express their innocence: and we also will be my lord's bond men; his servants, as long as they lived: this was likewise carrying the matter too far, and exceeding all bounds of justice, which could only require satisfaction of the offender.

℣. 10. And he said, now also let it be according unto your words; &c.] Not according to the full extent of their words, but according to a part of them; that he only should be a servant that was found guilty; so moderating the punishment which they had fixed, and were willing to submit to, and therefore could not object to what he next proposes: he with whom it is found shall be my servant; speaking in the name of Joseph, whom he personated, and who had directed him what to say: and ye shall be blameless; acquitted of the charge, and pronounced innocent, and let go free.

℣. 11. Then they speedily took down every man his sack to the ground, &c.] To be opened and examined, and this they did in all haste, as having a clear conscience, and being confident that nothing could be found upon them, and desirous of having the affair issued as soon as possible, that the steward might have full satisfaction, and they proceed on in their journey: and opened every man his sack; shewing neither reluctance nor fear, being conscious of their innocence.

℣. 12. And he searched, &c.] To the bottom of them, not content to look into the mouth of them being opened, but rummaged them, and searched deeply into them to find the cup, which was the thing charged upon them he was solicitous to find; as for the money in the sacks mouth he took no notice of that, nor is there any mention of it: and began at the oldest; at Reuben, as the Targum of Jonathan expresses it; the steward might know their different ages in course, by the order in which they were placed at Joseph's table when they dined with him: and left off at the youngest; at Benjamin, he ended his scrutiny with him; this method he took partly to hold them in fear as long as he could, and partly to prevent any suspicion of design, which might have been entertained had he went directly to Benjamin's sack: and the cup was found in Benjamin's sack; where the steward himself had put it, and as it is usually said, they that hide can find.

[n] Apud Aben Ezram in loc. [o] Suetonius in vita Claudii, c. 32. [p] Curtii Hist. l. 9. c. 7.

℣. 13. Then they rent their clothes, &c.] In token of ſorrow and diſtreſs, being at their wits end, like diſtracted perſons, not knowing what to do: this was uſually done in the eaſtern countries when any evil befel, as did Jacob, ch. xxxvii. 34. and as the Egyptians themſelves did when mourning for their dead, as Diodorus Siculus [q] relates: and laded every man his aſs; put their ſacks of corn on their aſſes again, having tied them up: and returned to the city; to the metropolis, as Jarchi, which was either Tanais, that is, Zoan, or as others think, Memphis: hither they returned to ſee how it would go with Benjamin, to plead his cauſe and get him releaſed, that he might go with them, they being afraid to ſee their father's face without him; otherwiſe could they have been content to have gone without him, they might have proceeded on in their journey, ſee ℣. 17.

℣. 14. And Judah and his brethren came to Joſeph's houſe, &c.] Judah is particularly mentioned becauſe he was the principal ſpokeſman, and was chiefly concerned for the ſafety of Benjamin, being his ſurety: for he was there; Joſeph was yet at his own houſe, was not as yet gone to the granaries, to look after the affairs of the corn, and the ſale and diſtribution of it, but was waiting for the return of his brethren, which he expected quickly: and they fell before him on the ground; not only in a way of reverence, again fulfilling his dream, but as perſons in the utmoſt diſtreſs and affliction, throwing themſelves at his feet for mercy.

℣. 15. And Joſeph ſaid unto them, what deed is this ye have done? &c.] An action ſo wicked, baſe, and ungrateful, attended with ſuch aggravated circumſtances, that it can ſcarcely be ſaid how bad a one it is, and may be well wondered at, that men who had received ſuch favours could ever be guilty of; this he ſaid, putting on a ſtern countenance, and ſeemingly in great anger and wrath: wot ye not, that ſuch a man as I can certainly divine? either that he could divine himſelf, though not by the cup, of which here no mention is made, but in ſome other way uſed by the Egyptians; or that he had diviners with him, as Aben Eza, with whom he could conſult, to find out the perſon that took the cup; or ſurely they muſt needs think that ſuch a man as he, who had ſuch great knowledge of things, natural and political, and whoſe name was Zaphnath-paaneah, a revealer of ſecrets, would be able to ſearch into and find out an affair of this kind; and they might well conclude, that a man ſo ſagacious and penetrating would eaſily conjecture who were the perſons that took away his cup, even the ſtrangers that had dined with him ſo lately, and therefore could never expect to go off with it.

℣. 16. And Judah ſaid, what ſhall we ſay unto my lord? what ſhall we ſpeak? &c.] Signifying that they were non-pluſſed, confounded, knew not what to ſay; they could not acknowledge guilt, for they were not conſcious of any, and yet could not deny the fact, the cup being found on one of them; and though they might have a ſuſpicion of fraud, yet were afraid to ſpeak out what they ſuſpected, and therefore were at the utmoſt loſs to expreſs themſelves: or how ſhall we clear ourſelves? to aſſert their innocence ſignified nothing, here was full proof againſt them, at leaſt againſt their brother Benjamin: God hath found the iniquity of thy ſervants; brought it to their remembrance, faſtened the guilt of it on their conſciences, and in his providence was bringing them to juſt puniſhment for it; meaning not the iniquity of taking away the cup, which they were not conſcious of, but ſome other iniquity of theirs they had heretofore been guilty of, and now God was contending with them for it; particularly the iniquity of ſelling Joſeph; this was brought to their minds before, when in diſtreſs, and now again, ſee ch. xlii. 21: behold, we are my lord's ſervants, both we, and he alſo with whom the cup is found; hereby fulfilling his dream more manifeſtly than ever; for by bowing down to the earth to him, they might be thought to do no other than what all did, that came to buy corn of him; but here they own themſelves to be his ſervants, and him to be lord over them, and to have dominion over them all, and them to be his ſlaves and bondmen.

℣. 17. And he ſaid, God forbid that I ſhould do ſo, &c.] This would be doing an unjuſt thing, Joſeph ſuggeſts, ſhould he take them all for bondmen, for the offence of one: but the man in whoſe hand the cup is found, he ſhall be my ſervant; not die, as they had ſuppoſed, but become his ſervant: and as for you, get ye up in peace unto your father; they had leave, yea an order to return to their father in the land of Canaan, with their corn and cattle, in peace and plenty; there being no charge againſt them, nor would any hurt or damage come to them: this Joſeph ſaid to try their affection to their brother Benjamin, and ſee whether they would leave him to diſtreſs, and then he ſhould know better how to conduct both towards him and them.

℣. 18. Then Judah came near unto him, &c.] Being the ſpokeſman of his brethren, and the ſurety of Benjamin; he plucked up a ſpirit, put on courage, and drew nearer to the governor, and with much freedom and boldneſs, and in a very polite manner, addreſſed him: and ſaid, O my lord, let thy ſervant, I pray thee, ſpeak a word in my lord's ears; not admit him to private audience, or ſuffer him to whiſper ſomething to him, but give him the hearing of a few words he had to ſay to him: and let not thine anger burn againſt thy ſervant; don't be diſpleaſed with his boldneſs, and the freedom he takes, but hear him patiently: for thou art even as Pharaoh; next, if not equal in power and authority with him; could exerciſe juſtice, or ſhew mercy, puniſh, or releaſe from puniſhment at his pleaſure; and having leave granted him, he began his ſpeech, and made the following narrative.

℣. 19. My lord aſked his ſervants, &c.] The firſt time they came down to Egypt to buy corn; he puts him in mind of what paſſed between them at that time: ſaying, have ye a father, or a brother? which queſtion followed upon their ſaying, that they were the ſons of one man, ch. xlii. 11. and xliii. 7.

℣. 20. And we ſaid unto my lord, we have a father, &c.] Yet living in the land of Canaan: an old man; being 130 years of age, ch. xlvii. 9. and a child of his old age; who was born when he was near 100 years of age: and a little one; not in ſtature but in age, being the youngeſt ſon, and much younger than they: ſo they repreſented him, on that account and becauſe he was tenderly brought up with his father, and not inured to buſineſs and hardſhip, and ſo unfit to travel: and his brother is dead; meaning Joſeph: ſo they thought him to be, having not heard of him for 22 years or more, and they

they had ſo often ſaid he was dead, or ſuggeſted as much, that they at length believed he was: and he alone is left of his mother; the only child left of his mother Rachel: and his father loveth him; being his youngeſt ſon, and the only child of his beloved Rachel, and therefore moſt dear unto him.

℣. 21. And thou ſaidſt unto thy ſervants, bring him down unto me, &c.] Judah does not relate the reaſon of his order, which was to give proof, that they were no ſpies, but as if Joſeph deſigned to ſhew favour to Benjamin, as undoubtedly he did: that I may ſet mine eyes upon him; not barely ſee him, as Aben Ezra interprets it, though that would be, and was, very deſirable by him, and agreeable to him; but he deſired to ſet his eyes upon him, not only for his own pleaſure, but for the good of Benjamin, as the Targum of Jonathan adds; he intimated that he ſhould receive him kindly, ſhew favour unto him, and uſe him well: the Septuagint verſion is, and I will take care of him; Joſeph's brethren had told him, that Benjamin was at home with their father, who they ſuggeſted was afraid to let him go with them, leſt evil ſhould befal him; wherefore to encourage him to let him go with them, Joſeph promiſed to take care of him, that no hurt ſhould be done to him, but he ſhould be provided with every thing that was proper and neceſſary; and this Judah improves into an argument with the governor in favour of Benjamin, that ſince he deſired his coming, in order to ſhew him a kindneſs, he hoped he would not detain him, and make a ſlave of him.

℣. 22. And we ſaid unto my lord, the lad cannot leave his father, &c.] That is, his father will not be willing to part with him: for if he ſhould leave his father, his father would die; with grief and trouble, fearing ſome evil was befallen him, and he ſhould ſee him no more.

℣. 23. And thou ſaidſt unto thy ſervants, &c.] In anſwer to the repreſentation of things made by them, and notwithſtanding that: except your youngeſt brother come down with you, you ſhall ſee my face no more; which, though not before related in the diſcourſe, which paſſed between Joſeph and his brethren in expreſs terms, yet might be juſtly inferred from what he ſaid; nay, might be expreſſed in ſo many words, though not recorded, and as it ſeems plainly it was, as appears from ch. xliii. 3.

℣. 24. And it came to paſs, when we came unto thy ſervant my father, &c.] In the land of Canaan: we told him the words of my lord; what he had ſaid to them, particularly reſpecting Benjamin.

℣. 25. And our father ſaid, &c.] After ſome time, when the corn was almoſt conſumed they had bought in Egypt: go again, and buy a little food; that may ſuffice till the famine is over; ſee ch. xliii. 1.

℣. 26. And we ſaid, we cannot go down, &c.] With any ſafety to their perſons, which would be in danger, or with any profit to their families, ſince their end in going down to buy corn would not be anſwered: if our youngeſt brother be with us, then will we go down; let it be agreed to, that Benjamin go along with us to Egypt, and then no difficulty will be made of it: for we may not ſee the man's face, except our youngeſt brother be with us; the face of the great man, the governor of Egypt; for that this phraſe, the man, is not uſed diminutively, but as expreſſive of grandeur, is clear, or otherwiſe it would never have been made uſe of in his preſence, and in ſuch a ſubmiſſive and polite ſpeech as this of Judah's.

℣. 27. And thy ſervant my father ſaid unto us, &c.] When thus preſſed to let Benjamin go with them: ye know that my wife bare me two ſons; meaning Rachel, by whom he had Joſeph and Benjamin, and whom he calls his wife, ſhe being his only lawful wife; Leah was impoſed upon him, and the other two were concubines.

℣. 28. And the one went out from me, &c.] Being ſent by him to ſee how his brethren did, who were feeding his flocks at Shechem, and he had never returned to him to that day: and I ſaid, ſurely he is torn in pieces; by ſome wild beaſt; this he ſaid on ſight of his coat, being ſhown him all bloody: and I ſaw him not ſince; now 22 years ago; for though Joſeph was not ſuch a great way off his father, eſpecially if he was at Memphis, as ſome think; yet what through his confinement as a ſervant in Potiphar's houſe, and then for ſome years in priſon, and through the multiplicity of buſineſs when advanced in Pharaoh's court, he had no leiſure and opportunity of viſiting his father; and eſpecially ſo it was ordered by the providence of God that he ſhould not, that he might be made known at the moſt proper time for the glory of God, and the good of his family.

℣. 29. And if ye take this alſo from me, &c.] His ſon Benjamin, as he perhaps ſuſpected they had taken Joſeph, and made away with him: and miſchief befal him; either in Egypt, or on the road, going or returning, any ill accident, eſpecially death, as the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan, or what may iſſue in it: ye ſhall bring my grey hairs with ſorrow to the grave; it would be the means of his death, and whilſt he lived, he ſhould be full of ſorrow and grief; ſee ch. xlii. 38.

℣. 30. Now therefore, when I come to thy ſervant my father, &c.] That is, ſhould he return to him in the land of Canaan with the reſt of his brethren: and the lad be not with us; his brother Benjamin, ſo called here, and in the following verſes, though 30 years of age and upwards, ſee ch. xliii. 8: ſeeing that his life is bound up in the lad's life; he is as cloſely united to him in affection, and is as dear to him as his own ſoul; quite wrapt up in him, and can't live without him; ſhould he die, he muſt die too; ſee 1 Sam. xviii. 1, ſo it follows:

℣. 31. It ſhall come to paſs, when he ſeeth that the lad is not with us, that he will die, &c.] As ſoon as ever he ſees us, without aſking any queſtion, and obſerves that Benjamin is miſſing, he will conclude at once that he is dead, which will ſo ſeize his ſpirits, that he will expire immediately: and thy ſervants ſhall bring down the grey hairs of thy ſervant, our father, with ſorrow to the grave; as he ſaid would be the caſe, ℣. 29. and which would be very afflicting to his ſons to be the cauſe of it, and could not be thought of without the utmoſt uneaſineſs and diſtreſs.

℣. 32. For thy ſervant became ſurety for the lad unto my father, &c.] Which is another argument uſed for the releaſe of Benjamin, though he ſhould be detained for him, which he offers to be: ſaying, if I bring him not unto thee, then I ſhall bear the blame unto my father for ever; ſee the note on ch. xliii. 9.

℣. 33. Now therefore, I pray thee, let thy ſervant abide inſtead of the lad, a bondman to my lord, &c.] Being, as Jarchi obſerves, preferable to Benjamin for ſtrength, for war and for ſervice: in this Judah was a type of Chriſt, from whoſe tribe he ſprung, who became the ſurety of God's Benjamins, his children, who are beloved by him, and as dear to him as his right-hand, and put himſelf in their law-law place and ſtead, and became ſin and a curſe for them, that they might go free, as Judah deſired his brother Benjamin might, as follows: and let the lad go up with his brethren; from Egypt to Canaan's land, to their father there.

℣. 34. For how ſhall I go up to my father, and the lad be not with me? &c.] Signifying that he muſt abide in Egypt, and choſe to do it, and could not go up to the land of Canaan any more, or ſee his father's face without Benjamin along with him, to whom he was a ſurety for him: leſt peradventure I ſee the evil that ſhall come on my father; ſee him die, or live a life of ſorrow worſe than death: this he could not bear, and choſe rather to be a ſlave in Egypt, than to be the ſpectator of ſuch an affecting ſcene. By this ſpeech of Judah, Joſeph plainly ſaw the great affection which his brethren, eſpecially Judah, had for his father and his brother Benjamin, as well as the ſenſe they had of their evil in ſelling him, which lay uppermoſt on their minds, and for which they thought themſelves brought into all this trouble; wherefore he could no longer conceal himſelf from them, but makes himſelf known unto them, which is the principal ſubject of the following chapter.

CHAP. XLV.

THIS chapter contains an account of Joſeph's making himſelf known to his brethren, which was done when they were alone, ℣. 1—4. when he encouraged them not to diſtreſs themſelves on account of their ſelling him into Egypt, for God in his providence had ſent him there for their good, ℣. 5—8. and he ordered them to go forthwith to Canaan, and acquaint his father with all the honour and glory they ſaw him in, and to deſire him to come thither to him, where he ſhould be provided for during the 5 years famine yet to come, in the beſt part of the land of Egypt, ℣. 9—13. upon which he expreſſed the ſtrongeſt affection to Benjamin, and to all his brethren, ℣. 14, 15. the fame of this was ſoon ſpread in the houſe of Pharaoh, which gave the king great pleaſure, who immediately expreſſed his earneſt deſire, that his father might come and ſettle in Egypt, and ordered proviſions to be ſent him, and carriages to bring him down, and all that belonged to him, ℣. 16—20. and Joſeph accordingly delivered to his brethren waggons and proviſions for the way, and gave gifts to them, and ſent a preſent to his father, and diſmiſſed his brethren with an exhortation not to fall out by the way, ℣. 21—24. and when they came to Canaan, they acquainted their father with all theſe things, who at firſt could not believe them; but when he ſaw the waggons, his ſpirit revived, and determined to go and ſee his ſon, ℣. 25—28.

℣. 1. Then Joſeph could not refrain himſelf, &c.] That he ſhould not weep, as the Targum of Jonathan adds; at leaſt he could not much longer refrain from tears, ſuch an effect Judah's ſpeech had on his paſſions: before all them that ſtood before him; his ſervants that attended him and waited upon him, the ſteward of his houſe, and others, upon whoſe account he put ſuch a force upon himſelf, to keep in his paſſions from giving vent, that they might not diſcover the inward motions of his mind; but not being able to conceal them any longer, he cried; or called out with a loud voice, and an air of authority: cauſe every man to go out from me; out of the room in which he and his brethren were; perhaps this order was given to the ſteward of the houſe to depart himſelf, and to remove every inferior officer and ſervant upon the ſpot; or other people that might be come in to hear the trial of thoſe men, and to ſee how they would be dealt with: and there ſtood no man with him, while Joſeph made himſelf known unto his brethren; not that Joſeph was aſhamed of them, and of owning before them the relation he ſtood in to them; but that they might not ſee the confuſion his brethren would be thrown into, and have knowledge of the ſin they had been guilty of in ſelling him, which could not fail of being mentioned by him, and confeſſed by them; and beſides it was not ſuitable to his grandeur and dignity to be ſeen in ſuch an extreme paſſion he was now going into.

℣. 2. And he wept aloud, &c.] Or gave forth his voice in weeping[r]; as he wept he cried aloud; for having put ſuch a violent reſtraint on himſelf, as the flood of tears was the greater, ſo his voice was the ſtronger and louder for it: and the Egyptians, and the houſe of Pharaoh heard; the Egyptians that were in the room or rooms adjoining to that where Joſeph was, heard his cry, and perhaps a great deal of what was ſaid; which they ſoon reported to others, and it quickly reached Pharaoh's court, which might not be at any great diſtance.

℣. 3. And Joſeph ſaid unto his brethren, I am Joſeph, &c.] As ſoon as he could compoſe himſelf a little, and utter his words, the firſt thing he ſaid was, that he was Joſeph; that was his right name, his Hebrew name; though he was called by the Egyptians Zaphnath-paaneah, and by which name Joſeph's brethren only knew him, if they knew his name at all; and it muſt be very ſtartling to them, to hear this ſound, and to be told by himſelf that that was his name; and which was not all he meant, and they underſtood, but that he was Joſeph their brother, as afterwards expreſſed: doth my father yet live? this he knew before, for they had told him he was alive; wherefore he puts this queſtion not through ignorance, or as doubting, but to expreſs his affection for his father, and his joy that he was alive: and his brethren could not anſwer him; they were ſo ſurprized and aſtoniſhed; they were like men thunder-ſtruck, they were not able to utter a word for a while: for they were troubled at his preſence; the ſin of ſelling him came freſh into their minds, the guilt of it preſſed their conſciences, and the circumſtances that Joſeph was in filled them with fear, that he would avenge himſelf on them.

℣. 4. And Joſeph ſaid unto his brethren, come near to me, I pray you, &c.] Very probably Joſeph ſat in a chair of ſtate whilſt they were under examination, and through reverence of him they kept at a proper diſtance; or being frighted at what he had ſaid, he might obſerve them drawing back, as Jarchi remarks, and ſo encourages them in a kind and tender manner, to return and come nearer to him, and the rather, that they might more privately converſe together without being over-heard; as alſo that they might, by approaching him, diſcern and and call to mind ſome of his features ſtill remaining, by which they might be aſſured he was Joſeph indeed: and they came near, and he ſaid, I am Joſeph your brother; not only his name was Joſeph, but he was that Joſeph that was their brother; he claims and owns the relation between them, which muſt be very affecting to them, who had uſed him ſo unkindly: whom ye ſold into Egypt; which is added, not ſo much to put them in mind of and upbraid them with their ſin, but to aſſure them that he was really their brother Joſeph; which he could not have related had he not been he, as well as to lead on to what he had further to ſay to them for their comfort.

℣. 5. Now therefore be not grieved, &c.] To an exceſs, ſo as to be ſwallowed up with overmuch ſorrow; otherwiſe it became them to be grieved for their ſin, and to ſhew a godly ſorrow and true repentance for it: nor angry with yourſelves, that ye ſold me hither; reflect upon themſelves, and afflict themſelves in an immoderate way; or break forth into anger and wrath with one another, upbraiding and blaming each other for their conduct in that affair, and ſo foment contentions and quarrels among themſelves: for God did ſend me before you to preſerve life; the life of thouſands of perſons in Egypt, Canaan, and other countries; and particularly to preſerve their lives was he ſent before them into Egypt; where, by interpreting Pharaoh's dreams, by which he underſtood and did foretel the 7 years of plenty and 7 years of famine, he was promoted to great honour and truſt, and laid up a ſufficiency of corn in the time of plenty to anſwer the exigencies of various countries in the time of famine, and among the reſt, of his own family; and therefore would have this attributed by them to the wiſe diſpoſing providence of God.

℣. 6. For theſe two years hath the famine been in the land, &c.] In the land of Egypt, and in the countries round about: and yet there are five years; ſtill remaining, which he knew by the above dreams and the interpretation of them: in the which there ſhall neither be earing nor harveſt; that is, no tillage of land, neither plowing nor ſowing, and ſo no reaping or gathering in of the fruits of the earth, as uſed to be in harveſt; at leaſt, there would be very little ground tilled, only it may be on the banks of the Nile, ſince they had no corn to ſpare for ſeed; and beſides, as the Egyptians knew by Joſeph's prediction that the Nile would not overflow, it was to no purpoſe to attempt to plow their land, which through 2 years drought was become very difficult, or to ſow, could they get the ſeed into the ground, ſince there was no likelihood of its ſpringing up again.

℣. 7. And God ſent me before you, &c.] This he repeats to impreſs the minds of his brethren with a ſenſe of the good providence of God in bringing him to Egypt before them, to make proviſion for their future welfare, and to alleviate their grief, and prevent an exceſſive ſorrow for their ſelling him into Egypt, when by the over-ruling hand of God it proved ſo ſalutary to them: to preſerve you a poſterity in the earth; that they and theirs might not periſh, which otherwiſe, in all human probability, muſt have been the caſe; and that the promiſe of the multiplication of Abraham's ſeed might not be made of none effect, but continue to take place, from whence the Meſſiah was to ſpring: and to ſave your lives by a great deliverance; from the extreme danger they were expoſed unto, through the terrible famine, and in which deliverance were to be obſerved the great wiſdom, goodneſs, power and providence of God.

℣. 8. So now it was not you that ſent me hither, but God, &c.] Which is to be underſtood not abſolutely, as if they had no concern at all in ſending him thither; they ſold him to the Iſhmaelites, who brought him down to Egypt and ſold him to Potiphar, and ſo were inſtrumental in his coming to Egypt; but comparatively, it was not they ſo much as God that ſent him; whoſe providence directed, diſpoſed, and overruled all thoſe events, to bring Joſeph to this place, and to ſuch an high ſtation, to anſwer the purpoſes and deſigns of God in providing for and preſerving Jacob's family in a time of diſtreſs: and he hath made me a father to Pharaoh; to be a teacher to him, as Aben Ezra, that is, to be his counſellor, to adviſe him well in all things, as a father his children; or to be his partner and patron, as Jarchi, to have a ſhare with him in power and authority, and to be reckoned as a father to him, ſee ch. xli. 43. and to provide for him and the welfare of his kingdom, as parents do for their children: the following phraſes explain it, of rule and government; and the meaning is, that he was a great man, and a prince [s] in Pharaoh's court: and lord of all his houſe; his prime miniſter, chief counſellor and courtier: and a ruler throughout all the land of Egypt; to whom all the deputies of the ſeveral provinces were ſubject under Pharaoh, and eſpecially in the affair of the corn.

℣. 9. Haſte you, and go up to my father, &c.] In Canaan, which lay higher than Egypt; being deſirous he ſhould know as ſoon as poſſible that he was alive, and in what circumſtances he was: and ſay unto him, thus ſaith thy ſon Joſeph; without any title, ſuch as the father and counſellor of Pharaoh and governor of Egypt, only Joſeph his ſon, which would be enough to revive the heart of Jacob: God hath made me lord over all Egypt; his exaltation to this dignity he aſcribes, not to Pharaoh, but to God; civil honour and promotion to worldly grandeur and dignity are from God, and not from man: come down unto me, tarry not; the great buſineſs on his hands not permitting him to go to his father and fetch him to Egypt; he deſires that he would come to him without delay, which would be greatly to the advantage of him and his family, and to their mutual comfort.

℣. 10. And thou ſhalt dwell in the land of Goſhen, &c.] Called by Artapanus [t], Kaiſan or Keſſan; the Septuagint verſion Geſan of Arabia, as it was that part of Egypt which bordered on Arabia: it ſeems to be the ſame with the land of Rameſes, ſee ch. xlvii. 11. and the Heliopolitan nome, which Strabo [u] ſays, was reckoned to be in Arabia, and in which were both the city of Heliopolis and the city Heroopolis, according to Ptolemy [w]; for in the Septuagint verſion of ch. xlvi. 28. inſtead of Goſhen is Heroopolis, or the city of the Heroes in the land of Rameſes, with which agrees Joſephus [x]: wherefore, Doctor Shaw [y] obſerves, the land of Rameſes or Goſhen could be no other than the Heliopolitan Nome, taking in that part of Arabia which lay bounded near Heliopolis by the Nile, and near Heroopolis by the correſpondent part of the red ſea. Now either before this time Joſeph had got a grant of this country, of Pharaoh, to diſpoſe of at pleaſure, or he had ſo much power and authority of himſelf to to put his father into it: or it may be, it was the domains of his father-in-law the prieſt of On, ſince On or Onii, according to Ptolemy [z], was the metropolis of the Heliopolitan nome, and by ſome thought to be Heliopolis itſelf, and perhaps might be Joſeph's own country, which he had with the daughter of the prieſt of On: indeed if what the Jewiſh writers ſay [a], that Pharaoh king of Egypt in Abraham's time, gave to Sarah the land of Goſhen for an inheritance, and therefore the Iſraelites dwelt in it, becauſe it was Sarah their mother's; it would account for Joſeph's propoſing to put them into the poſſeſſion of it without the leave of Pharaoh; but Goſhen ſeems to have been in the grant of Pharaoh, who agreed and confirmed what Joſeph propoſed, ch. xlvii. 6. and thou ſhalt be near unto me; as he would be in Goſhen, if Memphis was the royal ſeat at this time, as ſome think [b], and not Tanis or Zoan; or Heliopolis, or both, in their turn; and Artapanus [c] is expreſs for it, that Memphis was the ſeat of that king of Egypt, in whoſe court Moſes was brought up; and eſpecially Heliopolis may be be thought to be ſo, if Joſeph dwelt at On or Heliopolis, where his father-in-law was prieſt or prince, which was near if not in Goſhen itſelf: and according to Bunting [d], On or Oni was the metropolis of Goſhen; and Leo Africanus ſays [e], that the ſahidic province, in which was Fium, where the Iſraelites dwelt, ſee ch. xlvii. 11. was the ſeat of the nobility of the antient Egyptians: thou and thy children, and thy childrens children; for Jacob's ſons had all of them children, even Benjamin the youngeſt, as appears from the following chapter: and thy flocks, and thy herds, and all that thou haſt; and Goſhen being a place of paſturage, was fit and ſuitable for them; and ſo Joſephus [f] ſays, of Heliopolis, which he takes to be the place where Jacob was placed, that there the king's ſhepherds had their paſtures.

℣. 11. And there will I nouriſh thee, &c.] Provide for him and his family: for yet there are five years of famine; ſtill to come, 2 of the 7 only being paſt: leſt thou, and thy houſhold, and all that thou haſt, come to poverty; his whole poſterity be conſumed, as it would be in all probability, if he did not procure food for his family during the famine.

℣. 12. And behold, your eyes ſee, and the eyes of my brother Benjamin, &c.] They were eye-witneſſes of his being alive, having themſelves ſeen him, and even Benjamin, who could not be ſuſpected by his father of a fraud in impoſing on him; and ſome of them could doubtleſs remember his features, and had an ocular proof of his being the very perſon, which they could with great evidence relate unto Jacob; as alſo his voice in ſpeaking: that it is my mouth that ſpeaketh unto you; without an interpreter, as Aben Ezra, and in the Hebrew language, as the Targum and Jarchi; which might confirm them, and likewiſe their father upon their report, that the governor was not an Egyptian but an Hebrew; and by that and other concurrent teſtimonies that he muſt be Joſeph.

℣. 13. And you ſhall tell my father of all my glory in Egypt, &c.] His wealth and riches, his grandeur and dignity, his power and authority: and of all that you have ſeen; what a magnificent houſe he dwelt in; what a numerous train of ſervants he had; in what majeſty he rode in the ſecond chariot to the king; and what authority he exerciſed over the people, and what reverence they gave him, and what power he had, particularly in the diſtribution of corn: and ye ſhall haſte, and bring down my father hither; for Joſeph had an eager deſire to ſee him, wherefore this is repeated.

℣. 14. And he fell upon his brother Benjamin's neck and wept, &c.] On his neck firſt, becauſe he was his own brother by father and mother's ſide; and he wept over him for joy that he had a ſight of him once more: the word for neck is in the plural number, and being uſed, may ſignify that he fell firſt on one ſide of his neck, and then on the other, to ſhew his great affection for him: and Benjamin wept upon his neck; their love and the tokens of it were reciprocal.

℣. 15. Moreover he kiſſed all his brethren, &c.] In their turns, to teſtify his real affection for them, and hearty reconciliation to them: and wept upon them; that is, upon their necks, as he had on Benjamin's: and after that, his brethren talked with him; being emboldened by this carriage of his to them, and encouraged to believe that he really forgave them their ſin againſt him, and was truly reconciled unto them, and had a real affection for them, and had no reaſon to fear he would avenge himſelf on them: they entered into a free converſation, and talked of their father and their family, and the concerns of it, and of what paſſed ſince the time he was ſeparated from them.

℣. 16. And the fame thereof was heard in Pharaoh's houſe, &c.] The report was carried to court, and there it was told by ſome from Joſeph's houſe, who had overheard what had paſſed, at leaſt ſomewhat of it: ſaying, Joſeph's brethren are come; perhaps they might call him by his Egyptian name, though the hiſtorian gives him his Hebrew name, and which was his right name, and by which he was beſt known to the Hebrews, for whoſe ſake chiefly he wrote: and it pleaſed Pharaoh well, and his ſervants; for Joſeph being greatly beloved both by the king and his courtiers, who are meant by his ſervants, they were glad of an opportunity of ſhewing their further regard to him, by their reſpect and civilities to his relations and friends, who had been the means of providing for the welfare of the whole kingdom, and of ſaving all their lives: Pharaoh's expreſſions of pleaſure on this occaſion, were, no doubt, ſincere, whatever were thoſe of his courtiers; who might not ſo well affect a ſtranger, and one that had been in a very low eſtate of life, to be raiſed above them, and have ſo much truſt repoſed in him, and honour conferred upon him, and might diſſemble in their reſpect to Joſeph before their ſovereign; though ſuch might be the prudence and affability of Joſeph, and ſuch the ſenſe they had of their obligations to him in point of gratitude, that they might be really pleaſed to hear that his brethren were come; and the rather, Pharaoh and his court might be the more delighted, becauſe that it appeared that he came of a good family in Canaan; whereas they knew no more of him than of his having been a ſlave in Potiphar's houſe, and then caſt into a priſon for a crime charged upon him, out of which he was taken, and made the great man he was.

℣. 17. And Pharaoh ſaid unto Joſeph, &c.] Who, it is highly probable, waited upon Pharaoh to acquaint him with the coming of his brethren; for for it cannot be imagined that Pharaoh ſhould ſay what follows upon a bare report, without having a farther account of things from Joſeph, or that he would neglect giving it, but take the firſt opportunity to inform him, whereupon he gave him the following order: ſay unto thy brethren, this do ye; give them directions and inſtructions to do as follows: lade your aſſes; with proviſions for the preſent neceſſity of their father's houſhold in Canaan, and for their journey back to Egypt: and go, get you into the land of Canaan; with all the haſte they could make.

℣. 18. And take your father, and your houſholds, &c.] Or families, for they were all married perhaps, and had children, and no doubt ſervants alſo; all were to be brought with them, and come unto him, into his kingdom, to his metropolis, and to his palace, and into his preſence: and I will give you the good of the land of Egypt; the beſt things which it affords, and the beſt and moſt fruitful part of it, as he afterwards did, which was the land of Goſhen: and ye ſhall eat the fat of the land; the choiceſt fruits of the earth, ſuch as were produced in fields and gardens; meaning that they ſhould have the fineſt of the wheat for themſelves, and the fatteſt paſtures for their flocks.

℣. 19. Now thou art commanded, &c.] Had his orders from Pharaoh; had full power and authority to do the above things, and what follows: the ſenſe Joſeph Kimchi gives of this clauſe is, that Joſeph was ordered by Pharaoh not to let any waggons go out of Egypt with corn, leſt the Egyptians ſhould want; but now Pharaoh ſaid to him, though thou wert thus ordered, yet bid thy brethren do as follows: take you waggons out of the land of Egypt; and lade them with corn, as the ſame writer obſerves; the Targum of Jonathan adds, which were drawn by oxen: for your little ones, and for your wives; the waggons were to carry the women and children in when they returned: and bring your father, and come; in one of the carriages, or in what way was moſt agreeable to him in his old age.

℣. 20. Alſo regard not your ſtuff, &c.] Or your veſſels [f], utenſils, houſhold goods; he would not have them be concerned if they could not bring all their goods with them, but were obliged to leave ſome behind, and which, becauſe of the diſtance of the way and difficulty of the road, lying through ſandy deſarts could not well be brought, ſince there was enough to be had in the land of Egypt; therefore as it may be rendered, let not your eye ſpare [h], or pity: do not be grieved at it, or ſay it is a pity to leave theſe good things behind. Some render and explain the words juſt the reverſe, leave nothing of your houſhold goods [i]; bring all away with you, as if he would not have them think of returning again, but of ſettling and continuing in Egypt; but this does not ſo well agree with what follows as the former ſenſe does: for the good of all the land of Egypt is yours: whatever good things were in it, whether for food or uſe for themſelves, their houſes, or their flocks, all were at their ſervice, and they were welcome to them; or the beſt or moſt fruitful part of the country was deſigned for them, and would be given to them, or was at their option.

℣. 21. And the children of Iſrael did ſo, &c.] As Pharaoh commanded, and Joſeph from him directed them to do: and Joſeph gave them waggons, according to the commandment of Pharaoh; and beaſts, either horſes or oxen to draw them, and theſe not empty, though the principal uſe of them was to fetch his father and his family, and their goods: and gave them proviſion for the way; both going and returning, as much as would ſuffice for both.

℣. 22. To all of them he gave each man changes of raiment, &c.] Rich apparel, two ſuits of clothes, to ſhift and change upon occaſion, ſuch as Homer [k] calls ιματια εξαμειβα, changeable garments; thoſe he gave to every one of his brethren, partly that they might have ſomething to ſhew to their father and to their wives, which would cauſe them to give credit to the report they ſhould give of Joſeph, and his great proſperity; and partly that they might, upon their return, be provided with ſuitable apparel to appear before Pharaoh, and chiefly this was intended to ſhew his great reſpect and affection for them, and reconciliation to them: but to Benjamin he gave 300 pieces of ſilver; or ſhekels, as the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan, which amounted to between 30 and 40 pounds of our money; the Septuagint very wrongly renders it 300 pieces of gold; and beſides theſe he gave him alſo five changes of raiment; becauſe of his greater love and affection for him.

℣. 23. And to his father he ſent after this manner, &c.] Or according to this [l]; either in like manner, as he gave his brethren change of raiment, &c. ſo he ſent the like to him, as Aben Ezra and Ben Melech inrerpret it, referring it to what goes before; or rather as Jarchi, according to this account or number, even which follows: namely, ten aſſes laden with the good things of Egypt; the beſt things the land afforded; the Targum of Jonathan ſays with wine, but that Egypt did not abound with; and ſo Jarchi, out of the Talmud, obſerves, that it was old wine that was ſent, ſuch as is agreeable to ancient men: and ten ſhe-aſſes laden with corn; not made up into bread, next mentioned, and ſo diſtinguiſhed from it: and bread; ready made and baked: and meat for his father by the way; food and fruit of various ſorts; Aben Ezra reckons many, peaſe, beans, lentiles, millet, fetches, figs, currants and dates.

℣. 24. So he ſent his brethren away, and they departed, &c.] From Egypt to Canaan with the waggons, aſſes and rich preſents: and he ſaid unto them, ſee that ye fall not out by the way; the Targum of Jonathan adds, about the affair of ſelling me; which he had reaſon to fear they would, from what they, and particularly Reuben, had ſaid in his preſence, ch. xlii. 21, 22. he was jealous this would be the ſubject of their diſcourſe by the way, and that they would be blaming one another about it, and ſo fall into contentions and quarrels; that one would ſay it was owing to the reports of ſuch an one concerning him, that they entertained hatred againſt him; that it was ſuch an one that adviſed to kill him, and ſuch an one that ſtripped him of his clothes, and ſuch an one that put him into the pit, and ſuch an one that was the cauſe of his being ſold; and thus ſhifting of things from one to another, and aggravating each other's concern in this matter, they might ſtir up and provoke one another to wrath and anger, as the word uſed ſignifies, which might have a bad iſſue; to prevent which Joſeph gives them this kind and good advice; and eſpecially especially there was the more reason to attend to it, since he was reconciled unto them, and was desirous the whole should be buried in oblivion.

℣. 25. And they went up out of Egypt, &c.] That lying lower than the land of Canaan: and came into the land of Canaan unto Jacob their father; they found him alive and well.

℣. 26. And told him, &c.] What had happened to them in Egypt: saying, Joseph is yet alive; who was thought by him and them to have been dead long ago: and he is governor over all the land of Egypt; deputy-governor, and had such power and authority that nothing was done without his order; the executive power or administration of government was put into his hands, and all the officers of the kingdom were under him, he was next to Pharaoh: and Jacob's heart fainted, for he believed them not; it was too great and too good news to be true; though it was desirable, it was unexpected; it amazed him, he knew not what to think, or say or believe about it; there was such a conflict of the passions in him, that he could not compose himself, or reason with himself about it; and what might serve the more to hinder his belief of it was, that this report of theirs was contrary to what they themselves had before related of his death; and very likely upon the mention of the thing he fell into a swoon, and was not himself for a while; and when he came a little to himself, they went on with their account, as follows.

℣. 27. And they told him all the words of Joseph, which he had said unto them, &c.] Not concerning their selling of him, and his forgiveness of them, and reconciliation to them, which perhaps Jacob never heard of to his dying day, since he makes no mention of it, nor hints at it in his dying words to them; but of his great advancement in the court of Pharaoh, and how desirous he was to have his father and family with him, and provide for them, since there were five years of famine yet to come: and when he saw the waggons which Joseph had sent to carry him, and his sons wives and children, down to Egypt in; and which were so grand and magnificent, that he was easily persuaded could never have been provided by his sons, if what they had said concerning Joseph was not true: and then the spirit of Jacob their father revived; not the Holy Spirit, or spirit of prophecy, as the Targums, which the Jews say departed from him, and had not been with him since the loss of Joseph, but now returned; but his own natural spirit, he became lively and chearful, giving credit to the report of his sons.

℣. 28. And Israel said, it is enough, Joseph my son is yet alive, &c.] Or it is much or great [m]; he had much joy, as the Targums; this was the greatest blessing of all, and more to him than all the glory and splendor that Joseph was in; that he was alive, that was enough for Jacob, which gave him content and pleasure; not so much the news of his grandeur in Egypt, as of his being in the land of the living: I will go and see him before I die; tho' his age was great, the journey long and difficult, so great was his desire of seeing Joseph, that he determines at once upon going, expecting death shortly: no doubt but this was said in submission to the will of God, and in seeking him by prayer and supplication, and in the exercise of faith, believing that God would grant him his desire, than which nothing in life could be more desirable to him, and he only wished to live to enjoy this favour. In Joseph's making himself known unto his brethren, he was a type of Christ, who manifests himself to his people alone, and as he does not unto the world, saying unto them, that he is Jesus the Saviour, their friend and brother, and whom they crucified, whose sins were the cause of his sufferings; and yet encourages them to draw nigh unto him with an humble and holy boldness, giving them abundant reason to believe that he will receive them kindly, seeing that all that were done to him were by the determined counsel and foreknowledge of God, and for their good, even for their eternal salvation; and that they might not perish, but have everlasting life; and to whom he now gives change of raiment, riches and honour, yea durable riches and righteousness; and declares it to be his will, that where he is, they may be also, and behold his glory: and this is sufficient to engage them to reckon all their worldly enjoyments as mere stuff, contemptible things in comparison of the good and glories of another world they are hastening to, where there will be fulness of joy, and pleasures for evermore; and therefore should not fall out by the way, as they too often do.

CHAP. XLVI.

IN this chapter we are told, that Jacob with all his family and substance took a journey to Egypt to see his son Joseph, as he determined, in which he was encouraged to proceed by a vision from God, ℣. 1—7. and an account is given of all his sons, his sons sons and daughters that went thither with him, ℣. 8—27. when he came near to Egypt he sent Judah before him to Joseph, to acquaint him of his coming, who met him at Goshen, where there was a most affectionate interview between them, ℣. 28—30. and when he gave directions and instructions what answers to give to Pharaoh's questions, when they should appear before him, to whom he proposed to go and inform him of their being come into Egypt, ℣. 31—34.

℣. 1. And Israel took his journey with all that he had, &c.] Set forward in it immediately, as soon as possible after he had resolved to take it, and with him he took all his children and grand-children, and all his cattle and goods; which shows that he took his journey not only to see his son Joseph, but to continue in Egypt, at least during the years of famine, as his son desired he would, otherwise there would have been no occasion of taking all along with him: and came to Beersheba; where he and his ancestors Abraham and Isaac had formerly lived; a place where sacrifices had often been offered up, and the worship of God performed, and much communion enjoyed with him. This is said to be 16 miles from Hebron [n], where Jacob dwelt, and according to Musculus was six German miles from it: and offered sacrifices to the God of his father Isaac; which were attended with prayer and praise; with praise for hearing that his son Joseph was alive, and with prayer that he might have a good, safe and prosperous journey.

[m] רב multum, Montanus, Munster, Drusius, Schmidt; μεγα μοι εστιν, Sept.

[n] Bunting's Travels, p. 72.

℣. 2. And God ſpake unto Iſrael in the viſions of the night, &c.] He appeared to Jacob as he lay upon his bed in the night-ſeaſon, and with an articulate voice ſpoke to him as follows: and ſaid, Jacob, Jacob; not Iſrael, the more honourable name he had given him, but Jacob, putting him in mind of his former low eſtate; and doubling this name, either out of love and affection to him, as Jarchi intimates; or rather in order to awake him, at leaſt to ſtir up his attention to what he was about to ſay to him: and he ſaid, here am I; ſignifying his readineſs to hearken to him in what he ſhould ſay to him, and to obey him in whatſoever he ſhould command him.

℣. 3. And he ſaid, I am God, the God of thy father, &c.] His father Iſaac, who was now dead, and who is the rather mentioned, becauſe in him Abraham's ſeed was to be called, and in his line the promiſe both of the land of Canaan, and of the Meſſiah, ran, and from him Jacob received the bleſſing; and this might be a confirmation of it to him, in that Jehovah calls himſelf his God; he firſt declares himſelf to be his God, and ſo able to perform whatever he ſhould promiſe him, and his father's God, who would ſhew him favour, as he had to him: fear not to go down into Egypt; Jacob might have many fears ariſe in his mind about this journey, as interpreters generally obſerve; as leſt it ſhould not be agreeable to the will of God, ſince his father Iſaac was forbid to go into Egypt, when in like circumſtances with him, ch. xxvi. 1, 2. as well as he might fear it would be too great a journey for him in his old age, ſome evil would befal him, or he die by the way and not ſee his ſon; or leſt going with his family thither, and there continuing for ſome time, they might be tempted with the pleaſantneſs and fruitfulneſs of the land, and ſettle there, and forget and neglect the promiſed land of Canaan; and eſpecially leſt they ſhould be drawn into the idolatry of the Egyptians, and forſake the worſhip of the true God; and very probably he might call to mind the prophecy delivered to Abraham, of his ſeed being ſtrangers and ſervants, and afflicted in a land not theirs for the ſpace of 400 years, ch. xv. 13. and Jacob might fear this ſtep he was now taking would bring on, as indeed it did, the completion of this prediction, by which his offſpring would be oppreſſed and diminiſhed. The Targum of Jonathan makes this to be Jacob's principal fear; "fear not "to go down into Egypt, becauſe of the buſineſs "of the ſervitude decreed with Abraham;" as alſo he might fear his going thither might ſeem to be a giving up his title to, and expectation of the promiſed land: to remove which fears, the following is ſaid, for I will there make of thee a great nation; as he did; for though in proceſs of time his ſeed were greatly afflicted here, yet the more they were afflicted, the more they multiplied; and their increaſe in Egypt was vaſtly greater than it had been in a like ſpace of time before; for in the ſpace of 215 years before their deſcent into Egypt, they were become no more than 70 perſons, whereas in the like number of years in Egypt, they became 600,000, beſides children; ſee ℣. 27. and Exod. xii. 37.

℣. 4. I will go down with thee into Egypt, &c.] Which was enough to ſilence all his fears; for if the preſence of God went with him to protect and defend him, to bleſs and proſper him, and to direct, ſupport and comfort, he had nothing to fear from any quarter: and I will alſo ſurely bring thee up again: Jarchi takes this to be a promiſe that he ſhould be buried in the land of Canaan, which had its fulfilment, when his corps was carried out of Egypt to Macphelah and there interred; but rather, this refers to the bringing up of his poſterity from thence in due time, for which Jacob might be moſt ſolicitous, and ſo the Targum of Jonathan, "and I "will bring up thy children from thence:" and Joſeph ſhall put his hand upon thine eyes; and ſo cloſe them when he was dead; this, as Aben Ezra ſays, was a cuſtom of the living to the dead, and it uſed to be done by the neareſt relations and friends, though now with us commonly by ſtrangers, or thoſe that are not akin: this was a cuſtom among the Greeks and Romans, as appears from Homer [o], Virgil [p], Ovid [q], and other writers [r]; and ſo among the Jews, Tobias is ſaid to ſhut the eyes of his wife's father and mother, and to bury them honourably, Tob. xiv. 15. of the Vulgate Latin verſion: Maimonides [s] reckons this of cloſing the eyes of the dead, among the rites uſed towards them, and ſo in the Talmud [t]: now by this expreſſion Jacob was aſſured that Joſeph was alive, and that he ſhould live to ſee him, and that Joſeph would outlive him, and do this laſt office for him; and as Ben Melech obſerves, by this he had the good news told him that Joſeph ſhould remain behind him, to ſuſtain and ſupport his ſons, and his ſons ſons, all the years that he ſhould live after them.

℣. 5. And Jacob roſe up from Beerſheba, &c.] In high ſpirits, and proceeded on in his journey, being encouraged and animated by the promiſes of God now made unto him: and the ſons of Iſrael carried Jacob their father, and their little ones, and their wives, in the waggons which Pharaoh had ſent to carry him; it may be wondered at that Joſeph did not ſend his chariot to fetch his father; it could not be for want of due reſpect and honour to him, but it may be, ſuch a carriage was not fit for ſo long a journey, and eſpecially to travel in, in ſome parts of the road through which they went: no mention being made of Jacob's wives, it may be preſumed they were all now dead; it is certain Rachel was, ſee ch. xxxv. 19. and it is more than probable that Leah died before this time, ſince Jacob ſays, he buried her himſelf in Macphelah in Canaan, ch. xlix. 31. and it is very likely alſo that his two concubine-wives Bilhah and Zilpah were alſo dead, ſince no notice is taken of them.

℣. 6. And they took their cattle, and their goods which they had gotten in the land of Canaan, &c.] Some interpreters add, by way of explanation, and in Meſopotamia; much of Jacob's ſubſtance being yet there, though the greateſt part was got in Canaan, and ſo that is put for the whole; and Jarchi ſuppoſes that Jacob gave all that he got in Padan-aram to Eſau for his part in the cave of Macphelah, and therefore mention is only made of his ſubſtance in Canaan; but there is no need of any ſuch additions or ſuppoſitions, ſince the text only ſpeaks of the ſubſtance of Jacob's ſons, and what they had was only gotten in Canaan, into which they came very young; all which they brought with them as being their property, and not obliged to leave it behind to ſtrangers; though they were bid not to regard their ſtuff, yet they were not willing to live upon others, but upon their own, and as much as they could independent of others; and that they might not be upbraided hereafter that they came into Egypt poor and deſtitute of every thing:

thing: and came into Egypt, Jacob, and all his ſeed with him; ſafe and well.

℣. 7. His ſons, and his ſons ſons with him, &c.] His 11 ſons, and their ſons, his grand-children: and his daughters; his own daughter Dinah, and his daughters-in-law, the wives of his ſons; for theſe came with him into Egypt, as appears from ℣. 5. though the plural may be put for the ſingular, as in ℣. 23: and his ſons daughters; and mention is made of Sarah the daughter of Aſher, ℣. 17. Jarchi adds, Jochebed, the daughter of Levi, but it is certain ſhe was born in Egypt, Numb. xxvi. 59: and all his ſeed brought he with him into Egypt; left none behind him in Canaan, ſon or daughter; no mention is made of ſervants, though no doubt many came along with him: the deſign of the hiſtorian is to give an account of Jacob's children, who they were, and their number, when they came into Egypt, that the increaſe of them might be obſerved.

℣. 8. Theſe are the names of the children of Iſrael which came into Egypt, &c.] Not meaning preciſely Jacob's ſeed and offspring, but the body of the people of Iſrael, as they were when they went into Egypt, including Jacob himſelf: Jacob and his ſons; for he went with them to Egypt, and was the head and principal of them: Reuben, Jacob's firſt-born; ſee ch. xxix. 32.

℣. 9. And the ſons of Reuben, Hanoch, and Phallu, and Hezron, and Carmi.] From whom came the families named after them of which they were the heads, Numb. xxvi. 5. 6.

℣. 10. And the ſons of Simeon, &c.] Who was the ſecond ſon of Jacob: Jemuel, and Jamin, and Ohad, and Jachin, and Zohar; the firſt of theſe is called Nemuel, Numb. xxvi. 12. 1 Chron. iv. 24. the third Ohad, is omitted in the places referred to, he dying without children, as may be ſuppoſed, and ſo was not the head of any family; and the fourth, Jachin, is called Jarib, 1 Chron. iv. 24. and the fifth is called Zerah, in the above place, by a tranſpoſition of letters: and Shaul the ſon of a Canaaniteſh woman; whom Simeon married, very probably after the death of his firſt wife, by whom he had the above 5 ſons, or ſhe was his concubine: many Jewiſh writers [u] ſay, this was Dinah, married to a Canaanite, but this is impoſſible: according to the Targum of Jonathan, this Shaul was Zimri, who did the work of the Canaanites at Shittim, Numb. xxv. 14. which is not at all likely, the diſtance of time will not admit of it.

℣. 11. And the ſons of Levi, Gerſhon Kohath, and Merari, &c.] From theſe ſprung the prieſts and Levites, ſee Numb. iii and iv.

℣. 12. And the ſons of Judah, Er, and Onan, and Shelah, and Pharez, and Zarah, &c.] Five of them: but Er and Onan died in the land of Canaan; and ſo did not go with Jacob into Egypt; and which is obſerved that they might not be reckoned among them, though it was proper to take notice of them in the genealogy: and the ſons of Pharez were Hezron and Hamul; ſome think that theſe could not be born in Canaan but in Egypt; and that they are mentioned among thoſe that went down to Egypt, becauſe they went there in the loins of their father, and to ſupply the places of Er and Onan, who died before, and have the honour to be here named, becauſe they might be the firſt of Jacob's great grandchildren born there; though others ſuppoſe that Pharez was at this time 14 years of age, and inſtances are given of ſome, who before that age have been fathers of children; the difficulty is not eaſily ſolved: the Targum of Jonathan expreſsly ſays, "Shelah and Zarah did not beget children in Canaan, but there were 2 ſons of Pharez who went down into Egypt, Hezron and Hamul."

℣. 13. And the ſons of Iſſachar, Tola, and Phuvah, and Job, and Shimron.] The 1ſt of theſe was the father of a numerous race in the days of David, their number was 22600, 1 Chron. vii. 2. ſee the note there; the 2d is called Puah, and the third Jaſhub, and the 4th Shimrom, 1 Chron. 7. 1. and were all the heads of families, as appears from the places referred to.

℣. 14. And the ſons of Zebulun, Sered, and Elon, and Jahleel.] Whoſe names are the ſame in Numb. xxvi. 26.

℣. 15. Theſe are the ſons of Leah, which ſhe bare unto Jacob in Padan-aram, &c.] Which muſt be reſtrained to the 6 ſons only, who were properly Leah's, and not to their ſons ſons, for they were not born in Padan-aram but in Canaan: with his daughter Dinah; who alſo was by Leah: all the ſouls of his ſons and daughters were 33; that is, together with himſelf, or otherwiſe it will be difficult to give the exact number: if all before mentioned are to be reckoned there will be 34, wherefore ſome are for excluding Dinah; but ſhe is not only expreſly mentioned, but is the only one intended by his daughters here, the plural being put for the ſingular; and there is as much reaſon for retaining her here, as Sarah the daughter of Aſher hereafter: ſome think Er and Onan are to be excluded, as indeed they are, becauſe they died in the land of Canaan, and then there will be but 32; wherefore ſome are for adding Jochebed the daughter of Levi, but ſhe is neither mentioned in the genealogy, nor did ſhe go with Jacob into Egypt, but was born in Egypt long after: it ſeems beſt therefore to take Jacob himſelf into the account, as ſeveral Jewiſh writers do [w], and who is expreſsly named and ſet at the head of this account, ℣. 8. which will make 33.

℣. 16. And the ſons of Gad, &c.] A ſon of Jacob by Zilpah Leah's maid; for the hiſtorian, before he proceeds to give an account of his ſons by Rachel, finiſhes the account of all his ſons by Leah and her maid: Ziphlon, and Haggai, Shuni, and Ezbon, and Eri, and Arodi, and Areli; in all ſeven; the ſame number is given, and in the ſame order, Numb. xxvi. 15, 16, 17.

℣. 17. And the ſons of Aſher, &c.] Another ſon of Jacob by Leah's maid Zilpah, whoſe ſons were, Jimnah, and Iſhuah, and Iſui, and Beriah, and Serah their ſiſter; who is called Sarah, Numb. xxvi. 46. and by the Septuagint here. She ſeems to have been a perſon of ſome note, being ſo particularly remarked in both places: and the ſons of Beriah, Heber and Malchiel; this Beriah ſeems to be the youngeſt ſon of Aſher, and yet had two ſons; who, as the Targum of Jonathan adds, went down into Egypt; he muſt marry, and have ſons when very young; the thing is not impoſſible; ſee the note on ℣. 12.

℣. 18. Theſe are the ſons of Zilpah, whom Laban gave to Leah his daughter, &c.] To be her maid, when ſhe was married to Jacob, by whom he had Gad and Aſher: and theſe ſhe bare unto Jacob, even 16 ſouls; not that Zilpah bare 16 children to Jacob, for ſhe bore but two; but the children and grand-children of theſe two with them made 16.

℣. 19. The ſons of Rachel Jacob's wife, &c.] The wife of his affection and choice, his principal wife, yea his only lawful wife; Zilpah and Bilhah were his his concubines, and as for Leah ſhe was impoſed and forced upon him: Joſeph and Benjamin; the firſt was in Egypt already, the other now went down with Jacob.

℣. 20. And unto Joſeph in the land of Egypt were born Manaſſeh and Ephraim, &c.] And therefore not to be reckoned with thoſe that went down with Jacob thither; for which reaſon the clauſe, in the land of Egypt, is inſerted, ſee ch. xli. 50: which Aſenath the daughter of Potipherah, prieſt of On, bare unto him; here again the Targum of Jonathan makes Aſenath to be the daughter of Dinah, who it ſays was educated in the houſe of Potipherah prince of Tanis; ſee the note on ch. xli. 50.

℣. 21. And the ſons of Benjamin, &c.] The ſecond ſon of Jacob by his wife Rachel; whoſe ſons were Belah, and Becher, and Aſhbel, Gera, and Naaman, Ehi, and Roſh, Muppim, and Huppim, and Ard; in all 10. It is a difficulty to account for it, that Benjamin, Jacob's youngeſt ſon, often called a lad at this time, and generally ſuppoſed to be about 23 or 24 years of age, ſhould have ſo many ſons: ſome think he had more wives than one, which is not likely, ſince we never read of any of Jacob's ſons that had more than one at a time; and others, that his ſons were born twins, and ſo had them in a little time, which is a much better ſolution of the difficulty: but others are of opinion, that though the greater part of them might be born in Canaan, yet others might be born in Egypt; and being denominated from the greater part, and that being put for the whole, may be reckoned among the deſcendants into Egypt; and even thoſe that were in Egypt, being born whilſt Jacob was alive, might be ſaid to deſcend there in his loins; which may be the beſt of the ways propoſed for removing this difficulty: though I ſhould rather think they were all born before the deſcent into Egypt, the whole narrative ſeems to require this of them all; for otherwiſe many more might be ſaid to deſcend in the loins of Jacob, or in the loins of his ſons, which would greatly increaſe the number of thoſe ſaid to go down with him, after mentioned: to which it may added, that Benjamin was at leaſt 32 years of age, and ſo may very well be thought to have had theſe children before he went to Egypt.

℣. 22. Theſe are the ſons of Rachel, which were born to Jacob, &c.] That is, ſons and grandſons: all the ſouls were fourteen; two ſons, Joſeph and Benjamin; twelve grandſons, two of Joſeph's, and ten of Benjamin's.

℣. 23. And the ſons of Dan, Huſhim.] He had but one ſon, wherefore the plural is put for the ſingular, ſee ℣. 7, 15. Aben Ezra thinks he had two ſons, and that one of them was dead, and therefore not mentioned; but the other way beſt accounts for the expreſſion; though as Schmidt obſerves, the plural may be indefinitely put, and the ſenſe be this, as for the ſons of Dan, there was only one, whoſe name was Huſhim. Dan was a ſon of Jacob by Bilhah, Rachel's maid, as the following was another.

℣. 24. And the ſons of Naphtali, Jahzeel, and Guni, and Jezer, and Shillem.] The laſt is called Shallum in 1 Chron. vii. 13.

℣. 25. Theſe are the ſons of Bilhah, which Laban gave unto Rachel his daughter, &c.] To be her maid, when ſhe was married to Jacob: and ſhe bare theſe unto Jacob, all the ſouls were ſeven; not that ſhe bare ſeven ſons to Jacob, ſhe bore but two, Dan and Naphtali; but the children of theſe with them made ſeven, one of Dan's, and four of Naphtali's, who went down with Jacob into Egypt.

℣. 26. All the ſouls that came with Jacob into Egypt, &c.] Theſe are in parcels before mentioned, but here they are brought to a ſum total; and by this phraſe are excluded thoſe that died before, as Er and Onan, and thoſe that were in Egypt before, as Joſeph and his two ſons; and I ſhould think alſo, all that were born in Egypt afterwards, even whilſt Jacob was living: thoſe reckoned are only ſuch, which came out of his loins; ſuch as were his ſeed and offſpring. This is obſerved for the ſake of what follows, and to exclude them: beſides Jacob's ſons wives; theſe don't come into the account, becauſe they did not ſpring from him: all the ſouls were ſixty ſix; 32 of Leah's, leaving out Er and Onan, 16 of Zilpah's, 14 of Rachel's, and 7 of Bilhah's, make 69; take out of them Joſeph and his 2 ſons, who were in Egypt before, and you have the exact number of 66.

℣. 27. And the ſons of Joſeph, which were born in Egypt, were two ſouls, &c.] Ephraim and Manaſſeh; which is obſerved to ſhew, that they don't come into the above reckoning, but are to be taken into another that follows: all the ſouls of the houſe of Jacob, which came into Egypt, were threeſcore and ten; here it may be obſerved, the phraſe is varied; it is not ſaid, all the ſouls which came out of the loins of Jacob, but all the ſouls of the houſe or family of Jacob; all that that conſiſted of, and takes in Jacob himſelf, the head of his houſe or family; nor is it ſaid, which came with Jacob into Egypt, as before, but which came into Egypt; not which came with him thither, but yet were there by ſome means or another, as Joſeph and his two ſons; Joſeph by being brought down, and ſold there, and his two ſons by being born there; if therefore Jacob, Joſeph and his two ſons are added to the above number of 66, it will make 70; as for the account of Stephen, making the number 75, ſee the note on Acts vii. 14.

℣. 28. And he ſent Judah before him unto Joſeph, &c.] Who was the more honourable of his ſons, and in greater eſteem with Jacob than his elder brethren were, Reuben, Simeon and Levi, who by their conduct had greatly diſpleaſed him: moreover, he was a man of a polite addreſs, and had endeared himſelf to Joſeph by his ſpeech to him, in which he diſcovered ſo much affection both to his father, and his brother Benjamin, and was upon all accounts the fitteſt perſon to be ſent to Joſeph: to direct his face unto Goſhen; to inform Joſeph of his father's coming, that a place might be prepared for him to dwell in, as both the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem paraphraſe it; and particularly to direct what place in Goſhen he would have him come to, and meet him at: and they came into the land of Goſhen; which was the firſt part of the land of Egypt that lay neareſt to Canaan: the Greek verſion of the whole verſe is, "he ſent Judah before him to Joſeph, to meet him at Heroopolis, or the city of "the heroes, in the land of Rameſſes," which is confirmed by Joſephus [x]; ſee the note on ch. xlv. 10.

℣. 29. And Joſeph made ready his chariot, &c.] Or bound [y] it, faſtened the horſes to it, harneſſed them, and put them to; this he did not himſelf, as Jarchi thinks, for the honour of his father; but rather, as Aben Ezra, by ordering his ſerſervants to do it: and went up to meet Iſrael his father in Goſhen; that being higher than the other part of Egypt, as it muſt be, if it was in Thebais, or upper Egypt, as ſome Jewiſh writers ſay [z]; and Fium, ſuppoſed to be the place the Iſraelites dwelt in, ſee ch. xlvii. 11. ſtood very high [a]: and preſented himſelf unto him; alighted from his chariot, and came up to his father, and ſtood before him, and ſhewed himſelf to him, declaring who he was: and he fell on his neck, and wept on his neck a good while; either Jacob fell on the neck of Joſeph, and wept over him a good while before he could ſpeak to him, as the father of the prodigal ſon fell on his neck and kiſſed him, Luke xv. 20. or as Jarchi, Joſeph fell on his father's neck, as he had done upon his brethren before, but wept over him longer; their embraces were no doubt mutual and extremely affectionate, that for a while they were not able to ſpeak a word to each other.

℣. 30. And Iſrael ſaid unto Joſeph, &c.] He broke ſilence firſt: now let me die, ſince I have ſeen thy face; not that he was impatient to die, and not deſirous to live any longer; for it could not but yield pleaſure to him, and make the remainder of his life more comfortable to live with ſuch a ſon, his darling, and now in ſo much honour and grandeur; but this he ſaid to expreſs his great ſatisfaction at the ſight of him, that he could now be content to die, having all his heart could wiſh for, an interview with his beloved ſon: becauſe thou art yet alive; whom he had looked upon as dead, and the receiving him now was as life from the dead, and could not but fill him with the greateſt joy, ſee Luke xv. 23, 24, 32. Jacob lived after this 17 years, ch. xlvii. 28.

℣. 31. And Joſeph ſaid unto his brethren, and to his father's houſe, &c.] To them and their families, after he had paid his filial reſpects to his father, in honour, reverence and affection: I will go up and ſhew Pharaoh; acquaint him, that his father and all his family were come to Egypt; he ſays, I will go up; which ſame phraſe is uſed of him, ℣. 29. when he came, and carries ſome difficulty in it how to account for it, that he ſhould be ſaid to go up when he came, and to go up when he returned. Some have thought of upper Egypt, others of the upper part of the Nile, and others, that Pharaoh's palace was ſituated on an eminence; but then, as it is to be ſuppoſed, he went the ſame road he came, it would have been ſaid, that when he came, he came down; what Ben Melech ſuggeſts, ſeems moſt agreeable, I will go up to my chariot, mount that, and return to Pharaoh, and give him an account of his father's arrival, which it was very proper, prudent and politic to do: and ſay unto him, my brethren, and my father's houſe, which were in the land of Canaan, are come unto me; not merely to pay him a viſit, but to continue there.

℣. 32. And the men are ſhepherds, &c.] That was their occupation and employment, by which they got their livelihood. Joſeph was not aſhamed of the buſineſs his father and brethren followed, even though mean; and beſides, ſuch men were an abomination to the Egyptians: this he thought proper to tell Pharaoh, leſt he ſhould think of putting them into ſome offices of the court or army, which would expoſe them to the envy of the Egyptians, and might endanger the corruption of their religion and manners, as well as be the means of ſeparating them one from another, which he was careful to guard againſt, as Joſephus [b] the hiſtorian ſuggeſts: for their trade hath been to feed cattle; this was what they were brought up to from their youth, and were always employed in, and for which only they were fit: and they have brought their flocks and their herds, and all that they have; in order to carry on the ſame buſineſs, and lead the ſame courſe of life.

℣. 33. And it ſhall come to paſs, when Pharaoh ſhall call you, &c.] Order them to come before him, to ſee them, and have ſome converſation with them: and ſhall ſay, what is your occupation? or your works [c], their buſineſs and employment, whether they exerciſed any manufacture or handicraft, and what it was.

℣. 34. That ye ſhall ſay, thy ſervants trade hath been about cattle, &c.] Breeding, feeding and ſelling them: from our youth, even until now; this had been their conſtant employment, they never followed any other: both we, and alſo our fathers; their father, grand-father, and great grand-father, Abraham, Iſaac and Jacob, were all of the ſame occupation: that ye may dwell in the land of Goſhen; Joſeph inſtructed his brethren to be very particular in the account of their occupation to Pharaoh, that it might be a direction to him how to diſpoſe of them, and where to ſettle them, namely, in the land of Goſhen; which was a country that abounded with good paſture, and ſo the fitteſt place for them to be fixed in: and beſides this, Joſeph had ſome other reaſons for placing them there, as that they might be near to him, who might dwell at On or Heliopolis, to which nome Goſhen belonged; and that being alſo the neareſt part of the land to Canaan, they might the more eaſily and ſooner get away when there was an occaſion for it; as well as he was deſirous they ſhould not be brought into the heart of the land, leſt they ſhould be corrupted with the ſuperſtition, and idolatry, and vices of the people; and being afar off, both from the court, and the body of the people, might be leſs ſubject to their contempt and inſults, ſince it follows: for every ſhepherd is an abomination unto the Egyptians; not becauſe ſhepherds eat of the milk and fleſh of the creatures they fed, which the Egyptians abſtained from; for the Egyptians in thoſe times did eat the fleſh of ſlain beaſts, ſee ch. xliii. 16, 32. nor becauſe they fed, and ſlew, and eat thoſe creatures, which the Egyptians worſhipped as Gods, as Jarchi; for it does not appear that the Egyptians were ſo early worſhippers of ſuch creatures; nor is this phraſe, every ſhepherd, to be underſtood of any other than foreign ſhepherds; for one of the three ſorts of the people of Egypt, as diſtinct from, and under the king, prieſts and ſoldiers, according to Diodorus Siculus [d], were ſhepherds, and were not deſpiſed on that account; for as the ſame writer ſays, all the Egyptians were reckoned equally noble and honourable [e]; and ſuch it is plain there were in Egypt, in the times of Joſeph, ſee ch. xlvii. 6, 16, 17. and goat-herds were had in eſteem and honour by thoſe about Mendes, though ſwine-herds were not [f]: wherefore this muſt be underſtood of foreign ſhepherds, the Egyptians having been greatly diſtreſſed by ſuch, who either came out of Ethiopia, and lived by plunder and robbery [g], or out of Phœnicia or Arabia; for according cording to Manetho[h], it was ſaid that they were Arabians or Phœnicians who entered into Egypt, burnt their cities, &c. and ſet up kings of their own, called their Hycſi, or paſtor-kings; and therefore Joſeph might the rather fear his brethren, and father's family, would be the more contemptible in that they came from Canaan, which was near to Arabia and Phœnicia; but Dr. Lightfoot[i] is of opinion, that the Egyptians being plagued for Abraham's and Sarah's ſake, made a law, that for the future none ſhould converſe with Hebrews, nor with foreign ſhepherds ſo familiarly as to eat or drink with them.

CHAP. XLVII.

THIS chapter gives an account of the preſentation of five of Joſeph's brethren, and then of his father, to Pharaoh, and of what paſſed between them, ℣. 1—10. of Joſeph's ſettlement of them, according to the direction of Pharaoh, in the land of Rameſes in Goſhen, and of his proviſion for them there, ℣. 11, 12. of his getting into his hands, for Pharaoh, the money, cattle and lands of the Egyptians, excepting the lands belonging to the prieſts, for corn he had ſupplied them with, ℣. 13—22. of his giving them ſeed to ſow with, on condition of Pharaoh's having a fifth part of the produce, ℣. 23—26. of the increaſe of Jacob's ſubſtance in Egypt, and that of his children; of the time of his living there, and his approaching death, when he called Joſeph to him, and obliged him by an oath to bury him in the burying-place of his fathers, ℣. 27—31.

℣. 1. Then Joſeph came and told Pharaoh, &c.] After he had been with his father, had had an enterview with him, and had took his leave of him for a time, he came to Pharaoh's court: and ſaid, my father, and my brethren, and their flocks, and their herds, and all that they have, are come out of the land of Canaan; Pharaoh had deſired they might come, and Joſeph now acquaints him they were come; not being willing it ſhould be ſaid that they were come in a private manner, and without his knowledge; nor to diſpoſe of them himſelf without the direction and approbation of Pharaoh, who was ſuperior to him; and he makes mention of their flocks and herds, and other ſubſtance, partly to ſhew that they were not a mean beggarly family that came to live upon him, and partly that a proper place of paſturage for their cattle might be appointed to them: and behold, they are in the land of Goſhen; there they ſtopped at preſent, until they ſhould have further directions and orders where to ſettle; and this is the rather mentioned, becauſe it was the place Joſeph propoſed with himſelf to fix them in, if Pharaoh approved of it.

℣. 2. And he took ſome of his brethren, &c.] Along with him, when he left his father in Goſhen; the word for ſome ſignifies the extremity of a thing: hence ſome have fancied that he took ſome of the meaneſt and moſt abject, ſo Jarchi, leſt if they had appeared to Pharaoh ſtrong and robuſt, he ſhould have made ſoldiers of them; others on the contrary think, he took thoſe that excelled moſt in ſtrength of body, and endowments of mind, to make the better figure; and others, that he took of both ſorts, or ſome at both ends, the firſt and laſt, elder and younger; but it may be, he made no choice at all, but took ſome that offered next: even five men; whom the Targum of Jonathan names as follow, Zebulun, Dan and Naphtali, Gad and Aſher; but Jarchi will have them to be, Reuben, Simeon and Levi, Iſſachar and Benjamin; but on theſe accounts no dependance is to be had: and preſented them unto Pharaoh; introduced them into his preſence, that he might converſe with them, and aſk them what queſtions he thought fit.

℣. 3. And Pharaoh ſaid unto his brethren, what is your occupation? &c.] Which is the queſtion he had told his brethren before-hand would be aſked them, and prepared them to give an anſwer to it, ch. xlvi. 33, 34. which was perhaps an uſual queſtion Pharaoh aſked of perſons that came to ſettle in his dominions, that he might have no idle vagrants there, and that he might know of what advantage they were like to be of in his kingdom, and might diſpoſe of them accordingly: and they ſaid unto Pharaoh, thy ſervants are ſhepherds, both we and alſo our fathers; ſee ch. xlvi. 34.

℣. 4. They ſaid moreover unto Pharaoh, for to ſojourn in the land are we come, &c.] Not to obtain poſſeſſions and inheritances as if natives, and to abide there always, but to continue for a little time; for they kept in mind that the land of Canaan was given to them as an inheritance, and would be poſſeſſed by them in due time, and therefore had no thought for the preſent of continuing here long: for thy ſervants have no paſture for their flocks, for the famine is ſore in the land of Canaan; they ſay nothing of the want of corn for themſelves, becauſe they could have it from Egypt, fetching it, and paying a price for it, but of paſture for their cattle; for the land of Canaan lying higher, was ſo ſcorched with the heat of the ſun, and parched with drought, that ſcarce any graſs grew upon it; whereas Egypt, and eſpecially the land of Goſhen, lying lower, and being marſhy and fenny places, near the Nile, had ſome graſs growing on it, even when the Nile did not overflow to make it ſo fruitful as it ſometimes was: now therefore, we pray thee, let thy ſervants dwell in the land of Goſhen; which requeſt, Joſeph, no doubt, directed them to make, it being the ſpot he had choſen for them in his own mind, and even had promiſed it to his father; and which his brethren, by their ſhort ſtay in it as they came along, ſaw would be very convenient for them, and was the true reaſon why Joſeph inſtructed them to be particular in the account of their trade and buſineſs, that Pharaoh might be inclined of himſelf to propoſe it to them, or however to grant it when requeſted.

℣. 5. And Pharaoh ſpake unto Joſeph, &c.] Who was preſent at the converſation that paſſed between him and his brethren: ſaying, thy father and thy brethren are come unto thee; which is obſerved, not for Joſeph's information, but to lead on to what he had to ſay further.

℣. 6. The land of Egypt is before thee, &c.] To chuſe what part of it he ſhould judge moſt ſuitable and agreeable to his father and brethren: in the beſt of the land make thy father and brethren to dwell, in the land of Goſhen let them dwell; as is requeſted; and which was, as Pharaoh here ſuggeſts, the beſt part part of the land, the moſt fertile and fruitful, and the fitteſt for cattle, being full of paſtures through the river Nile and the canals of it, and Goſhen being the moſt fertile portion in the land of Rameſes, as in ℣. 11. this, doctor Shaw obſerves [k], could be no other than what lay within 2 or 3 leagues at the moſt from the Nile, becauſe the reſt of the Egyptian Arabia, which reaches beyond the influence of this river to the eaſtward, is a barren, inhoſpitable wilderneſs: and if thou knoweſt any man of activity among them; ſtrong in body, and of great parts, and endowments of mind, and of great ſkill, and diligence, and induſtry in the management of flocks and herds: then make them rulers over my cattle; or rulers of cattle over thoſe that are mine [l]: that is, over his ſhepherds, to take care that they do their work well and faithfully: from whence it appears that Pharaoh had flocks and herds and ſhepherds; and therefore it cannot be thought that the Egyptians in thoſe times abſtained from eating of animals, or that all ſhepherds, without exception, were an abomination to them, only foreign ones that lived on ſpoil and plunder, and made excurſions into their country for ſuch purpoſes: the office he aſſigned to men of ſkill and induſtry, was like that which Doeg the Edomite was in, who was the chief of the herdmen of Saul, 1 Sam. xxi. 7.

℣. 7. And Joſeph brought in Jacob his father, &c.] That is, ſome time after he had introduced his five brethren, and had got the grant of Goſhen for them, when he ſent for his father from thence, or he came quickly after to Tanis or Memphis, where Pharaoh's court was: and ſet him before Pharaoh; preſented him to him, and placed him right before him, perhaps in a chair, or on a ſeat, by Pharaoh's order, becauſe of his age, and in honour to him: and Jacob bleſſed Pharaoh; wiſhed him health and happineſs, prayed for his welfare, and gave him thanks for all his kindneſs to him and his; and he bleſſed him not only in a way of civility, as was uſual when men came into the preſence of princes, but in an authoritative way, as a prophet and patriarch, a man divinely inſpired of God, and who had great power in prayer with him: the Targum of Jonathan gives us his prayer thus, "may it be the pleaſure (i. e. of God) that "the waters of the Nile may be filled, and that "the famine may remove from the world in thy "days."

℣. 8. And Pharaoh ſaid unto Jacob, how old art thou?] Or, how many are the days of the years of thy life? which way of ſpeaking Jacob takes up, and very pertinently makes uſe of in his anſwer that follows: doctor Lightfoot [m] thinks Pharaoh had never ſeen ſo old a man before, ſo grave a head, and ſo grey a beard, and in admiration aſked this queſtion.

℣. 9. Jacob ſaid unto Pharaoh, the days of the years of my pilgrimage are 130 years, &c.] He calls his life a pilgrimage, as every good man's is; they are not at home in their own country, they are ſeeking a better, even an heavenly one: Jacob's life was very emphatically and literally a pilgrimage; he firſt dwelt in Canaan, from thence he removed to Padan-aram, and ſojourned there a while, and then came to Canaan again; for ſome time he dwelt at Succoth, and then at Shechem, and after that at Hebron, and now he was come down to Egypt, and he had ſpent 130 years of his life in this way: and with this perfectly agrees the account of Polyhiſtor from Demetrius [n], an heathen writer, who makes the age of Jacob when he came into Egypt 130, and that year to be the 3d year of the famine, agreeable to ch. xlv. 6. few and evil have the days of the years of my life been; he calls his days but few, in compariſon of the long lives of the patriarchs in former times, and eſpecially in compariſon of the days of eternity; and evil, becauſe of the many afflictions he had met with; as from Eſau, from whoſe face he was obliged to fly leſt he ſhould kill him; and in Laban's houſe, where he ſerved for a wife 14 years, and endured great hardſhips; and at Shechem, where his daughter was raviſhed, and his ſons made that ſlaughter of the Shechemites, which he feared would cauſe his name to ſtink; and at Ephrath, where he buried his beloved Rachel; and at Hebron, where his ſons brought him ſuch an account as if they believed his beloved ſon Joſeph was deſtroyed by a wild beaſt, ſee Job xiv. 1. and have not attained unto the days of the years of the life of my fathers in the days of their pilgrimage; his grandfather Abraham lived to be 175 years of age, ch. xxv. 7. and his father Iſaac lived to the age of 180, ch. xxxv. 28.

℣. 10. And Jacob bleſſed Pharaoh, and went out from before Pharaoh.] When he took his leave of him, he bleſſed him, in like manner as when he came into his preſence, by wiſhing all happineſs to him, and giving him thanks for the honour he had done him, and the favours he had conferred on him and his.

℣. 11. And Joſeph placed his father and his brethren, and gave them a poſſeſſion in the land of Egypt, &c.] Houſes to dwell in, lands to till, and paſtures to feed their flocks and herds in: in the beſt of the land, in the land of Rameſes, as Pharaoh commanded; according to Jarchi and Aben Ezra, the land of Rameſes was a part of the land of Goſhen: Jerom [o] ſays, that Rameſes was a city the children of Iſrael built in Egypt, and that the province was formerly ſo called in which Jacob and his ſons dwelt; but if it is the ſame with the city which was built by them, it is here called ſo by anticipation: but Aben Ezra is of opinion, that it is not the ſame, and indeed the names are differently pointed and pronounced; that built by the Iſraelites is Raamſes, and was one of the treaſure-cities of Pharaoh, and never inhabited by the Iſraelites; the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem call this land the land of Peluſium; but this part of the country lay not in the Peluſiac, but rather in the Heliopolitan nome: ſir John Marſham is of opinion [p], that Rameſes is the name of Pharaoh, the then preſent king of Egypt, as there were ſeveral of the kings of Egypt of that name; and therefore he thinks this land was the king's land, the land of king Rameſes, which Joſeph placed his father and brethren in by the order of Pharaoh: but it ſeems rather to be the name of a place, and is thought by Doctor Shaw [q] to be the ſame with Cairo: a very learned man [r], takes this to be the name of the land of Goſhen, after the coming of the Iſraelites into it, and obſerves, that in the Egyptian language, Remſoſch ſignifies men that live a paſtoral life, and ſo this country was called Ramſes or Remſoſch, as being being the country of the ſhepherds; and the ſame learned writer [s] is of opinion, that the land of Goſhen is the ſame with the Heracleotic nome, which lies in the great iſland the Nile makes above Memphis, and which is now called by the Arabs Fioum, it being the beſt and moſt fruitful part of all Egypt; which is confirmed by the teſtimony of Strabo, who ſays [t], it excells all the reſt of the nomes or diſtricts; that it is the only one that produces olives, large and perfect, with fine fruit, which if well gathered, make good oil, but all the reſt of Egypt is without oil; moreover it produces wine, not a little, (whereas Herodotus ſays [u], vines were wanting in Egypt, i. e. in other parts of it) alſo corn and pulſe and other ſeeds: and that Fioum, as it is now called, is the moſt fruitful, and is the pleaſanteſt part of all Egypt, having vines, olives, figs, and fruits of all ſorts; the moſt excellent, and ſome of which are not to be found in other parts of the country, the ſame writer proves from various travellers and hiſtorians [w]; particularly Leo Africanus ſays [x], that the Sabidic nome, in which he places Fium, excells all the other parts of Egypt in plenty of pulſe, as peaſe, beans, &c. and of animals and linen, though all Egypt is very fruitful: and Vanſleb [y] ſays, the province of Fium has been always eſteemed one of the moſt excellent in all Egypt, becauſe of its fruitful fields, its great riches, and pleaſant gardens,—all that grows here is of a better taſte than in other provinces: here are fields full of roſe-trees, and woods of fig-trees, which are not in other parts of Egypt; the gardens are full of all manner of trees, pears, oranges, lemons, peaches, plumbs, and apricots:—in Fium only, ſays he, of all the provinces of Egypt, are vineyards—nor is any province ſo much cut into channels as this: they all proceed from Joſeph's river, and have bridges over them, made with burnt bricks very ſtrong; and tradition ſays, they were built in the days of the Pharaohs; and it is the opinion of the Copties, that theſe kings employed the Iſraelites in making bricks for thoſe bridges, which is very probable, from the infinite number of men needful to make ſuch a prodigious quantity: this part of Egypt where Iſrael dwelt, by all relations, being ſo excellent, the impudence of Celſus [z], the heathen is very ſurpriſing; when he affirms that the nation of the Jews becoming numerous in Egypt, were ordered to dwell apart as ſojourners, and to feed their flocks in places vile and deſpicable.

℣. 12. And Joſeph nouriſhed his father, and his brethren, and his father's houſhold with bread, &c.] For though there might be in Rameſes paſture ſufficient for their cattle, yet not corn for their families, the famine ſtill continuing; during which time, Joſeph, as a dutiful and affectionate ſon, and as a kind brother, ſupplied them with all neceſſary proviſion ſignified by bread: according to their families; according to the number of them, ſome of his brethren having more and others leſs in their families; and in proportion to their number he diſtributed food unto them, ſo that there was no want: or according to the mouth of an infant [a]; he nouriſhed them like infants, he put as it were the bread into their mouths, and fed them with as much care and tenderneſs as infants are fed; and they had no more care to provide food for themſelves than children have, ſuch a full and conſtant ſupply was handed forth to them: in this Joſeph was an eminent type of Chriſt, who ſupplies the wants of his people.

℣. 13. And there was no bread in all the land, &c.] The land of Egypt and the parts adjacent, but in Pharaoh's ſtore-houſes, all being conſumed that were in private hands the firſt two years of the famine: for the famine was very ſore; ſevere, preſſed very hard: ſo that the land of Egypt, and all the land of Canaan fainted by reaſon of the famine; that is, the inhabitants of both countries, their ſpirits ſunk, as well as their fleſh failed for want of food: or raged [b]; became furious, and were like madmen, as the word ſignifies; according to Kimchi [c], they were at their wits end, knew not what to do, as Aben Ezra interprets it, and became tumultuous; it is much, they had not in a violent manner broke open the ſtore-houſes of corn, and took it away by force; that they did not, muſt be owing to the providence of God, which reſtrained them, and to the care and prudence of Joſeph as a means, who, doubtleſs, had well fortified the granaries; and very probably there were a body of ſoldiers placed every where, who were one of the three parts or ſtates of the kingdom of Egypt, as Diodorus Siculus [d] relates; to which may be added, the mild and gentle addreſs of Joſeph to the people, ſpeaking kindly to them, giving them hopes of a ſupply during the famine, and readily relieving them upon terms they could not object to.

℣. 14. And Joſeph gathered up all the money, &c.] Not that he went about to collect it, or employed men to do it, but he gathered it, being brought to him for corn as follows: even all, that was found in the land of Egypt, and in the land of Canaan, for the corn which they bought; by which means thoſe countries became as bare of money as of proviſions: and Joſeph brought the money into Pharaoh's houſe; into his repoſitory, as the Targum of Jonathan, into his treaſury, not into his own houſe or coffers, in which he acted the faithful part to Pharaoh; for it was with his money he bought the corn, built ſtore-houſes, kept men to look after them to ſell the corn; wherefore the money ariſing from thence belonged to him; nor did he do any injury to the people, they ſold their corn in the time of plenty freely; he gave them a price for it, it then bore, and he ſold it out again to them, at a price according to the ſeaſon; nor was it ever complained of, that it was an exorbitant one; it was highly juſt and neceſſary it ſhould be at a greater price than when it was bought in, conſidering the great expence in the collection, preſervation, and diſtribution of it: it muſt be a vaſt ſum of money he amaſſed together, and doctor Hammond [e] thinks it probable, that this Pharaoh, who, by Joſeph's advice, got all this wealth, is the ſame with Remphis, of whom Diodorus Siculus [f] ſays, that he ſpent his time in minding the taxes and heaping up riches from all quarters, and left more behind him than any of the kings that reigned before, even in ſilver and gold 4000000 talents, the ſame fame that Herodotus [s] calls Rhampſinitus, who, he ſays, had the greateſt quantity of money of any of the kings of Egypt.

℣. 15. And when money failed in the land of Egypt, and in the land of Canaan, &c.] It had been all ſpent in the 3d, 4th, and 5th years of the famine; for it ſeems to be at the end of the 5th or beginning of the 6th year of the famine that this was the caſe, ſince we after read of a ſecond or following year, which was very plainly the laſt, ſince ſeed was given them to ſow the land with, which ſhews the time of drought to be near at an end: all the Egyptians came unto Joſeph, and ſaid, give us bread; freely, for nothing, ſince they had no money to buy any with: no mention is made of the Canaanites, who could not preſume to come and aſk for corn on ſuch a footing: why ſhould we die in thy preſence? before his eyes, he not relieving them when it was in his power to do it; they knew ſuch an argument as this would work upon a mind ſo humane, tender, and generous as was Joſeph's: for the money faileth; all was gone, they had none left to purchaſe corn with; or they ſuggeſt, they ſhould not have deſired to have had it at free coſt.

℣. 16. And Joſeph ſaid, give your cattle, &c.] Oxen, ſheep, horſes, aſſes, as follows: and I will give you for your cattle, if money fail; that is, corn for them, if they had no money to give.

℣. 17. And they brought their cattle unto Joſeph, &c.] Which they might the more readily do, ſince there was ſcarce any graſs to feed them with; and though ſome of them were creatures uſed for food, yet might be ſo lean and poor for want of graſs, as not to be fit to eat; and beſides, they could do better without fleſh than without bread: and Joſeph gave them bread in exchange for horſes; with which Egypt abounded, to which many places of ſcripture have reſpect, Deut. xvii. 16. 1 Kings x. 28. Cant. i. 9. Iſ. xxxi. 1, 3. and for the flocks, and for the cattle of the herds; the ſheep and the oxen; which ſhews that theſe creatures were bred and fed by them, and were, no doubt, ſlain and uſed for food: and for the aſſes; which were uſed for carrying burdens: and he fed them with bread for all their cattle, for that year; which ſeems to be the ſixth year of the famine: one would wonder what Joſeph ſhould do with all their cattle, where put them, and feed them, in ſuch a time of drought; though it is probable the number was not exceeding large, ſince they only fetched one year's proviſion of bread.

℣. 18. When the year was ended, they came unto him the ſecond year, &c.] Which ſeems to be the 7th and laſt year of the years of famine; not the 2d year of the famine, as Jarchi, but the 2d year of their great diſtreſs, when having ſpent all their money they parted with their cattle; for it cannot be thought that they ſhould be drained of their money and cattle too in one year: and ſaid unto him, we will not hide it from my lord, how that our money is ſpent; my lord alſo hath our herds of cattle; both theſe were well known to Joſeph, and therefore cannot be the things which they ſay they would not hide: Muſculus thinks it ſhould be rendered in the paſt tenſe, we have not hid; this they told him the laſt year, that their money was gone, and he knew he had their cattle for their laſt year's proviſion: the ſenſe ſeems to be this, that ſeeing their money was ſpent, and their cattle were in the hands of Joſeph, they would not and could not conceal from him what follows: there is not enough left in the ſight of my lord, but our bodies and our lands; and the one were ſtarving and the other deſolate.

℣. 19. Wherefore ſhall we die before thine eyes, both we and our land? &c.] Beholding their miſerable condition, and not helping them; die they muſt unleſs they had bread to eat, and their land die alſo if they had not ſeed to ſow; that is, would become deſolate, as the Septuagint verſion renders it; ſo Ben Melech obſerves, that land which is deſolate, is as if it was dead, becauſe it produces neither graſs nor fruit, whereas when it does it looks lively and chearful: buy us and our land for bread; they were willing to ſell themſelves and their land too for bread to ſupport their lives, nothing being dearer to a man than life: and we and our land will be ſervants unto Pharaoh; both ſhould be his; they would hold their land of him and be tenants to him: and give us ſeed, that we may live, and not die, that the land may not be deſolate; entirely ſo; ſome parts of it they could ſow a little upon, as on the banks of the Nile, or perhaps that river might begin to overflow, or they had ſome hopes of it, eſpecially from Joſeph's prediction they knew this was the laſt year of famine, and therefore it was proper to ſow the ground ſome time in this, that they might have a crop for the proviſion of the next year; and they had no ſeed to ſow, and if they were not furniſhed with it, the famine muſt unavoidably continue notwithſtanding the flow of the Nile.

℣. 20. And Joſeph bought all the land of Egypt for Pharaoh, &c.] Not for himſelf, nor did he entail it on his poſterity, but for Pharaoh, who became ſole proprietor of it: for the Egyptians ſold every man his field, becauſe the famine prevailed over them; every one that had a field ſold it to buy bread for his family, ſo great was the famine; no mention is made of their houſes, either becauſe theſe went with their lands, or they were ſo mean that they were of little account, and would ſcarce bear any price; for as Diodorus Siculus [h] reports of the Egyptians, that they were leſs careful of the ſtructure of their houſes, and exceeded all bounds in the magnificence of their ſepulchres: ſo the land became Pharaoh's; not only with reſpect to dominion and government, ſo it was before, but with reſpect to property; before, every man's field, and garden, and vineyard were his own, and he was in poſſeſſion thereof for his own uſe, but now being ſold were Pharaoh's; and they held them of him, and paid a rent for them in a manner hereafter directed by a law.

℣. 21. And as for the people, he removed them, &c.] From the places where they dwelt, that it might appear they had no more property there, and might forget it, and be more willing to pay rent elſewhere; and their poſterity hereafter could have no notion of its being theirs, or plead preſcription; and beſides, by ſuch a removal and ſeparation of the inhabitants of cities, ſome to one place, and ſome to another, ſedition and mutiny might be prevented: he had them to cities, from one end of the borders of Egypt, even unto the other end thereof; according to the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem, thoſe that dwelt in provinces or in country towns and villages, he removed to cities, and thoſe that dwelt in cities he removed into provinces, and placed them at the utmoſt diſtance from their former habitations, for the reaſons before given; and the above Targums ſuggeſt another other reaſon, to teach the Egyptians not to reproach the Iſraelites with being exiles and ſtrangers, when they were all of them removed from their native places, and were ſtrangers where they were.

℣. 22. Only the land of the prieſts bought he not, &c.] Not from any ſpecial affection for them, or any ſuperſtitious veneration of them, which can never be thought of ſo good a man, but for a reaſon following, which ſhews they had no need to ſell them: for the prieſts had a portion aſſigned them by Pharaoh, and did eat their portion which Pharaoh gave them; they had a certain allowance by the day of proviſion granted them, on which they lived; ſo Herodotus ſays [i] of the prieſts of Egypt, that they ſpend nothing of their own, but ſacred food is provided for them, and great plenty of the fleſh of geeſe and oxen is given daily to every one of them. And this was a delicate affair which Joſeph could not intermeddle with, but in prudence muſt leave it as he found it, and do as had been uſed to be done; this depending on the will and pleaſure of Pharaoh, if not upon the conſtitution of the land, as it ſeems to be from Diodorus Siculus [k], who divides Egypt into three parts; and the firſt part he aſſigns to the prieſts, who, according to him, were maintained out of their own revenues. Some underſtand this of princes [l], the word ſometimes being uſed of them, and interpret it of the officers and courtiers of Pharaoh, his nobles, that dwelt in his palace, and had their portion of food from him; but the former ſenſe ſeems beſt: wherefore they ſold not their lands; they were not obliged to it, having proviſion from the king's table, or by his appointment.

℣. 23. Then Joſeph ſaid unto the people, &c.] After he had bought their land, and before the removal of them to diſtant parts: behold, I have bought you this day, and your land for Pharaoh; which he obſerves to them, that they might take notice of it, and confirm it, or object if they had any thing to ſay to the contrary: lo, here is ſeed for you, and ye ſhall ſow the land; by which it ſhould ſeem, that they were not removed from the ſpot where they lived, but retained their own land under Pharaoh, and had ſeed given them to ſow it with, which may ſeem contrary to ℣. 21. wherefore that muſt be underſtood of a purpoſe and propoſal to remove them, and not that it was actually done; or as Muſculus gives the ſenſe, Joſeph by a public edict called all the people from the extreme parts of Egypt to the cities neareſt to them, and there proclaimed the ſubjection of them, and their lands to Pharaoh, but continued them to them as tenants of his; unleſs it ſhould be ſaid, that in thoſe diſtant parts to which they were ſent, land was put into their hands to till and manure for the king, and have ſeed given them to ſow it with; but this ſeems to be ſaid to them at the ſame time the bargain was made.

℣. 24. And it came to paſs in the increaſe, &c.] When the land ſhall produce an increaſe, and it ſhall be gathered in: that you ſhall give the fifth part unto Pharaoh; a fifth part of the increaſe: and four parts ſhall be your own; for the following uſes, one part for ſeed of the field; to ſow again with for the next year: a ſecond part for your food; for food for themſelves: a third part for them of your houſhold; their ſervants and maids: and the fourth part for food for your little ones; for their children, be they young or old; or however four parts of five he propoſed they ſhould have for their own uſe, and for the maintenance of their families, which was a kind and generous propoſal, when all might have been demanded, and they and theirs treated as ſlaves.

℣. 25. And they ſaid, thou haſt ſaved our lives, &c.] Preſerved them from death through famine, by laying up ſtores of corn, which he had ſold out to them for their money, cattle and land, or otherwiſe they muſt have periſhed, they and theirs, and this favour they thankfully acknowledge: let us find grace in the ſight of my lord, and we will be Pharaoh's ſervants; ſignifying, that they eſteemed it a great favour to be ſo on the foot of the bargain made with them, and they deſired a continuance in it.

℣. 26. And Joſeph made it a law over the land of Egypt unto this day, &c.] With the conſent of Pharaoh, his nobles, and all the people of the land, who readily came into it; and ſo it became a fundamental law of their conſtitution, and which continued to the times of Moſes, the writer of this hiſtory: that Pharaoh ſhould have the fifth part; that is, of the increaſe the whole land of Egypt produced: except the land of the prieſts only, which became not Pharaoh's; it not being bought by him; ſo Diodorus Siculus [m], as he aſſigns the firſt part of the land to the prieſts, ſo he ſays they were free from all taxes and tribute, and next to the king, were poſſeſſed of honour and authority.

℣. 27. And Iſrael dwelt in the land of Egypt, in the country of Goſhen, &c.] The hiſtorian returns to the account of the Iſraelites, having before obſerved the placing of them in Goſhen by Joſeph, at the direction of Pharaoh, in compliance with their own requeſt; and here they continued until they were grown more numerous, when they were obliged to ſpread themſelves, and further in this ſame country: and they had poſſeſſions therein; fields and vineyards, as the Targum of Jonathan; all the land was Pharaoh's, and they rented of him as his people did, it may be ſuppoſed: and grew; and multiplied exceedingly; even in Jacob's life-time, they grew rich and numerous.

℣. 28. And Jacob lived in the land of Egypt 17 years, &c.] He lived juſt the ſame term of years with Joſeph in Egypt, as he had lived with him in Syria and Canaan, ch. xxxvii. 2. about two hours walk from Fium are now to be ſeen the ruins of an ancient town, which the Coptics ſay, was inhabited by the patriarch Jacob, and for this cauſe they name it yet, Modſellet Jacub, or the tabernacle of Jacob [n], which place is ſuppoſed to be in the land of Goſhen, ſee ℣. 11. ſo the whole age of Jacob was 147 years; he was 130 when he ſtood before Pharaoh, ℣. 9. and now had lived in Egypt 17 years, as in the above clauſe, which together make up the ſum; and this exact time of the years of his life is given by Polyhiſtor from Demetrius an heathen writer [o].

℣. 29. And the time drew nigh that Iſrael muſt die, &c.] As all men muſt, by the appointment of God, even good men, the Iſrael of God; tho' they ſhall not die a ſpiritual death, nor an eternal one, yet a corporal one, which is for their good, and is a bleſſing to them; the ſting being removed and ſo not a penal evil, which is owing to Chriſt's dying for them, who has aboliſhed death as as ſuch; and there is a time fixed for their death, beyond which they muſt not live, and before which they muſt not die, but when the time comes there is no avoiding it; the time of Jacob's death was drawing on, as he perceived, by the great decline of his natural ſtrength, and perhaps by a divine impulſe on his mind: and he called his ſon Joſeph; ſent for him by a meſſenger, to come to him: and ſaid unto him; when he was come: if now I have found grace in thy ſight; which is not ſpoken in a way of ſubmiſſion, as from an inferior to a ſuperior, as the phraſe is ſometimes uſed; or as ſignifying what would be eſteemed as a favour ſhould it be granted, but it is as if he ſhould ſay, if thou haſt any filial affection for me as a parent, and art willing to ſhew love and reſpect to me, do as follows: put, I pray thee, thy hand under my thigh: a geſture in ſwearing, as Jarchi obſerves, ch. xxiv. 2. 3. adding for explanation ſake, and deal kindly and truly with me; kindly, by promiſing and ſwearing to do what he after deſires; and truly, by obſerving his oath, and fulfilling his promiſe: bury me not, I pray thee, in Egypt; not chuſing to lie among idolaters at death, with whom he cared not to have any fellowſhip in life.

℣. 30. But I will lie with my fathers, &c.] Abraham and Iſaac, whoſe bodies lay in the land of Canaan, where Jacob deſired to be buried; partly to expreſs his faith in the promiſed land, that it ſhould be the inheritance of his poſterity; and partly to draw off their minds from a continuance in Egypt, and to incline them to think of removing thither at a proper time, and to confirm them in the belief of their enjoyment of it; as well as to intimate his deſire after, and faith in the heavenly glory he was going to, of which Canaan was a type: and thou ſhalt carry me out of Egypt; into the land of Canaan: and bury me in their burying-place; in the burying-place of his fathers, in the cave of Macphelah near Hebron: and he ſaid, I will do as thou haſt ſaid; Joſeph promiſed his father to fulfil his requeſt, and do as he had deſired of him.

℣. 31. And he ſaid, ſwear unto me, &c.] This he required, not from any diſtruſt of Joſeph, but to ſhew his own eagerneſs, and the intenſeneſs of his mind about this thing, how much he was ſet upon it, and what an important thing it was with him; as alſo, that if he ſhould have any objections made to it, or arguments uſed with him to divert him from it, by Pharaoh or his court, he would be able to ſay, his father had bound him by an oath to do it, which would at once ſtop their mouths, and be judged a ſufficient reaſon for what he did, ſee ch. l. 5, 6: and he ſware unto him; not only gave his promiſe, but confirmed it with an oath: and Iſrael bowed himſelf upon the bed's head; not in a way of civil reſpect to Joſeph, giving him thanks for the aſſurance he had given him, that he would bury him, not in Egypt, but in Canaan; but in a religious way to God, giving thanks to him that he had lived to ſee his ſon Joſeph, who, according to the promiſe, would cloſe his eyes, and that he had inclined his heart to fulfil his requeſt; though ſome think, that no more is meant, than that after Jacob had ſpent himſelf in diſcourſing with Joſeph, he ſunk down and reclined on his pillow at his bed's head, to take ſome reſt; for as for what the apoſtle ſays in Heb. xi. 21. that refers to another thing at another time; ſee the note there.

CHAP. XLVIII.

JOSEPH hearing that his father Jacob was ſick, paid him a viſit, ℣. 1, 2. at which time Jacob gave him an account of the Lord's appearing to him at Luz, and of the promiſe he made unto him, ℣. 3, 4. then he adopted his two ſons, Ephraim and Manaſſeh, and bleſſed them, and Joſeph alſo, ℣. 5—16. and whereas he croſſed his hands when he bleſſed the ſons of Joſeph, putting his right hand on the youngeſt, and his left hand on the eldeſt, which was diſpleaſing to Joſeph, he gave him a reaſon for ſo doing, ℣. 17—20. and then aſſured him that God would bring him, and the reſt of his poſterity, into the land of Canaan, where he aſſigned him a particular portion above his brethren, ℣. 21, 22.

℣. 1. And it came to paſs after theſe things, &c.] Some little time after Jacob had ſent for Joſeph, and converſed with him about his burial in the land of Canaan, and took an oath to bury him there, for then the time drew nigh that he muſt die: that one told Joſeph, behold, thy father is ſick; he was very infirm when he was laſt with him, and his natural ſtrength decaying apace, by which he knew his end was near; but now he was ſeized with a ſickneſs which threatened him with death ſpeedily, and therefore very probably diſpatched a meſſenger to acquaint Joſeph with it. Jarchi fancies that Ephraim, the ſon of Joſeph, lived with Jacob in the land of Goſhen, and when he was ſick went and told his father of it, but this is not likely from what follows: and he took with him his two ſons, Manaſſeh and Ephraim; to ſee their grandfather before he died, to hear his dying words, and receive his bleſſing.

℣. 2. And one told Jacob, &c.] The ſame that came from Jacob to Joſeph might be ſent back by him to his father to let him know, that he was coming to ſee him, or ſome other meſſenger ſent on purpoſe; for it can hardly be thought that this was an accidental thing on either ſide: and ſaid, behold, thy ſon Joſeph cometh unto thee; to pay him a viſit, and which no doubt gave him a pleaſure, he being his beloved ſon, as well as he was great and honourable: and Iſrael ſtrengthened himſelf, and ſat upon his bed; his ſpirits revived, his ſtrength renewed, he got freſh vigour on hearing his ſon Joſeph was coming; and he exerted all his ſtrength, and raiſed himſelf up by the help of his ſtaff, and ſat upon his bed to receive his ſon's viſit; for now it was when he bleſſed the ſons of Joſeph, that he leaned upon the top of his ſtaff and worſhipped, as the apoſtle ſays, Heb. xi. 21.

℣. 3. And Jacob ſaid unto Joſeph, &c.] Being come into his bed-chamber, and ſitting by him, or ſtanding before him: God almighty appeared unto me at Luz in the land of Canaan; the ſame with Bethel, where God appeared, both at his going to Padan-aram, and at his return from thence, ch. xxviii. 11—19. and xxxv. 6—12. which of thoſe times is here referred to, is not certain; very likely he refers to them both, ſince the ſame promiſes were made to him at both times, as after mentioned: and bleſſed me; promiſed he would bleſs him, both with temporal and ſpiritual bleſſings, as he did as follows.
