PREFACE.

HIS little treatife is divided into three parts; the first of which relates chiefly to the word and work of God in the redemption of fouls by Jefus Christ: the second, to the inward and practical experience of this redemption in the beart of the believer, and the third, to his outward conversation and conduct with others. The addresses to God, at the end of each part, may be read alone, or all together, in their order, as one prayer.

On this wide and great subject, the reflections, which might have been greatly multiplied, are brought into as narrow a compass as possible, being intended rather our bints to carry on the mind to farther meditations, than for full or exact meditations themselves. The treatise therefore is printed for the pocket, that the serious christian may find it a little Remembrancer with many short errands to his heart, which will neither encumber him to carry, nor fatigue him to read.

As the author humbly believes, that he has bad no other view in these reflections, which have employed some of his solitary hours, than the glory of a gracious God, and the edification of believers; he only requests, as one of the greatest favours he needs, that the picus reader will remember him, in return, before the throne of grace ; that these things, of which he hath endeavoured to put others in remembrance, may never be forgotten by himself, but be felt, experienced, and enjoyed, more and more. The acquisition of many prayers on this account from his christian brethren is of such value and importance in his mind, as would make him a far higher compensation indeed, than he has a right to expect, for these humble labours, which need the mercy and favour of God, and the kindnefs and candour of every good man.

ON ENTRANCE INTO SPIRITUAL LIFE.

HEREWITH Shall I come before the LORD, and bow mysclf before the high GOD? How shall I, a sinner, approach the eyes of that Majesty, which cannot look upon sin without abhorrence? My iniquities are more in number than the hairs of my head, and my heart finketh within me on their remembrance. My affections are naturally inclined to the world and worldly things. My judgment is depraved; my will is perverfe; my under-ftanding is darkened; my knowledge vain; and I fee nothing in me or about me but what by guilt is altogether defiled. I have fore proof of that feripture, that every imagination of the thoughts of man's heart is only emil conti of the thoughts of man's heart is only evil continually, and that from the sole of the fost, even to the head, there is no foundnefs in my nature; butonly the wounds, and bruifes, and putrifying Jores of fin.

How then can I pleafe God ? How shall fuch a worm, luch a lump of perverse ungod-lines, obtain his favor? Shall I feek to deferve it by my own good thoughts?--Alas! I am not sufficient of myself to think even one. Shall I by excellency of words approach my offended Maker ?---He regardeth not words, but the fpirit and the heart; and my spirit and heart are wholly defiled. Shall I then by good works attempt to render him propitiou ?--- O my God, where shall I find them! How can I begin to act, befere I have begun to think, what is right ? How can the exercises of the body be pure and free, when the foul is unholy and enflaved by fin ? And if; from this day, I could cease from evil, and do perfectly what is just and right, which the experience of all men tells me is impossible ; yet, what will become of the long black; catalogue of iniquities, both in heart and life, which are already writ-ten against me? How shall I wipe off the sins of my nature and my life, respecting the times that are past.

O Lord, thou haft revealed thyfelf, as a holy God, and a juft. Thou haft declared, that the offended thy righteous law in every hour and every action of my life. How then can I be faved? How is it poffible for me to effcape the wrath to come? My anxieties, like my fins, might juftly overwhelm me; and I ought to tremble at the righteous judgment, which I know I deferve. There are but a rew days at the most for me to live upon the earth ; and I am not fure of one. O how shall I thee from the wrath to come! how shall I avoid eternal burnings, in which no man can dwell but with misery, and of which no man can think strictly but with horror! Lord, can such a sinner as I escape! Canst thou have mercy upon me!

Such are the breathings of the heart when it first begins to awake, and live, and feel that there is an evil and a curse in sin, and that fin, with all its evil, lieth at the door.

CHAP. II.

The Method of Merry.

UCH a flowing from the heart, as that just mentioned, gladdens all heaven. It is the motion of the divine Spirit upon the troubled deep, and will ere long produce both life and peace.

Soul, doit thou feel the power of thy own corruption? Are these thy meek, yet bitter cries?—O hear, and may thy God enable thee to believe, the glad tidings of his own falvation!

Thou art a finner, it is true; and thy mercy it is to lee, in due measure, how great a finner thou art. It is the first line in the large book of humiliation, which thou must be reading all thy line long. But Christ died for finners fuch as thee; for all finners that come unto God by him; for the vileft of finners that lee the vileness of fin, and bemoan it, as thou doft. He faved Mary Magdalene the harlot, Matthew the publican, Paul the perfecutor, Peter the swearer, liar, and denier of his master, the malefactor on the cross, who had been a thief and a murderer, and ten thousand more like thes; and he hath just the same power, means, and mercy to save thy foul, even thine.

means, and mercy to fave thy foul, even thine. He faves gracioufly, that is, freely; because no wildom nor worth of man have contrived or could have obtained his greatness of falvation. It was planned in grace, and performed by grace. It is all of grace, and bounty, and love, from beginning to end.

For this purpose he came into the world and took our nature upon him. He took it in its meanest and humblest form ; and was content to be born in a stable, to be brought up by a labouring man, to labour with him too, to fuffer the worst evils of human life, and the forest pains of human death, that so he might be an oblation or facrifice in the stead of his people, and render an atonement to the justice of God for them. These sufferings and this atonement are the debt due to the law and holinessofGod, without which, consistent with his attributes, he could not spare the sinner, but by which he can be both just, and yet the justifier of him who taketh refuge in JESUS. Yea, this dear Saviour having paid the penalty ducto his tranf-greffions, God is now faithful and just to forgive him his fins, or rather more faithful and jult to forgive them, than he could be in laying on the punifhment again, which Christ endured in that behalf.

Chrift also lived upon earth to fulfil all righteousness; and he fulfilled it completely for his redeemed. He makes himself over to them; and all he hath is theirs, through faith in him. Thus they have a right to call him, what heis, THEIR LORDOUR RIGHTEOUSNESS. God is well pleafed for his righteousness fake, and beholds every poor finner who trufts in Chrift, and lives in him, as unblamable and unreproveable in his own most piercing fight, yea, without spot or wrinkle, or any such thing. This righteousness is that garment of falvation, which covers them wholly, and fits them perfectly for the kingdom of heaven.

Contrite foul, believest thou this? Is this good news, the very gospel or good news of God? Search and see. Read and pray over thy bible, and thou wilt find, that it is the very voice and will of thy Lord. O that the fallow the hard and barren ground of thy heart may be so broken up by his power, as to welcome this joyful news, like the thirsty foil receiving the showers from the set. I AESE are glad tidings indeed (the foul may fay) to one weary and heavy laden with fin as I am, could they be apprehended rightly, and maintained constantly;, in the strivings of fin and the doubtings of nature. I am therefore earnest to know theis two things; 1. How shall I embrace this mercy of Christ proposed in the gospel? And, a. How shall I keepiup the spirit and incentions of it in my heart and life, so as to endure to the end and be saved? - I know not how it is with others, but: L find myself very unable, nay, most unable mach I have the greatest occasion, to lay hold upon this mighty mercy of God, and to reft upon it, and to make it my own, and to ble it for my confelation and Exprorty I long for this with the ful purpole of my heart; and my groans and trars in fecret are well known unto God-++ But ! have allo an evil heart of unbelief, which fuggests a: thousand doubts and fears, sometimes of God's willingnefs to fave me particular'y, who am so very vile and faithles; and fometimes of my own reality of defire towards him, which is often dreadfully mixed with the defire of other things, and overwhelmed with cares and forrows, difficulties and temptations.

Owhat great troubles and adversities hath God shown me ! How shall I be delivered from the body of this death ! How shall I lay hold on eternal life ! How shall I know, that I have falt hold for be affured, that none shall be able to pluck me from it ! O Lord, to be affured of this shy favor, is both in life and death, of more worth to me than a thousand times ten thousand works. For I might lave these, and be wretched; but, with thee, I are these, and

The nature and exercise of faith.

T AITH is the gift and the operation of God. It comes by the Holy Spirit's power, moving and firengthening the fubliment faculties of the foul, and is really a regeneration, a rebegetting a revival of life from the dead. Thus the believer is faid to be born of the Spirit because it is the Spirit's office in the covenant of grace to regenerate, and because it is the promise concerning the Spirit to all, even as many as God shall call. And thus also the Christian is faid to be born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God.

When this principle of divine life and light is given to the foul, it enables the foulite feel its own loss and misery, and to see its own sin and darkness. A man can have no true light of the nature of fin but by this grace. He is, therefore, in some senfe, a believer before he knows himself to be one. Faith acts in him, before he can be sensible of the reflex act of faith. He first lives ; and then he feels his milery; and then he cries for mercy. He cries for mercy, and then is enlightened to fee the way of mercy in the word of mercy. He is next enlightened to behold the free welcome and rich bounty of this mercy to all returning finners. He is enabled to contemplate upon himfelf, and to view the fitness of God's mercy for him, and his fitnels as a convinced finner, for it. He is then strengthened to embrace it, like a poor creature who must perish without it, but who shall never perish with it. And at length God's grace seals itself upon the foul, by giving a true taste of joy and peace in believing, infomuch that the broken drooping heart revives, and is able to fay, "I do humbly venture to believe that Christ died for me, and will save me for evermore."

Now, through all the courfe of this gracious work, which according to the will of God, is flower in fome than in others, there is often much doubting and disputing in the man's own conficience. It is a fore struggle, at times, to quell the clamors of unbelief, and the suggestions of stan : and at last, perhaps, the foul embraces the reality of God's love in Christ, with a trembling kind of hopeless hope, and doubting believing. These things often puzzle the understanding, and perplex the whole will and affections. A true believer is like Rebecca labouring with twins, a faithlefs Elau and a trusting Jacob; and fo like her, he cries out, If it be so, why am I thus? Whereas, if it were not so, if he where not of God, it would not be thus. Nature alone could not struggle; nor can what is dead strive against the stream. The bent of nature is against grace. So again, if he were all grace and no fin, he would feel no trouble; for the opposition of grace is to nature and to the sin which is in it. And it is a good fign, though not a pleasant feeling, that there is this conflict : It demonstrates the life of God to be within.

In this way the Chrift an embraces the gofpel. He is enabled in hope against hope to believe it, as the grand charter of his falvation. And this very act of believing is the evidence within, concurring with the evidence of the written word without, that his name is enrolled in the charter, and that he is confequently entitled to all its bleffings.

Take heart, therefore, thou child of God, and fear not. Thou hall the promife, the power, the mercy, and the truth of Jehovah on thy fide; and who can prevail against him? If thou dost not wholly believe, or art not perfectly cleared from all doubts, be not however difmayed. The faithfulness of thy Lord is not grounded upon the perfect exercise of thy faith, but upon his own fovereign grace and love. Thou defirest to trust him with thy whole heart ; but thou never couldest have defired this, if he had not wrought that disposition within thee. He was the Author, and he will be the Finisher, of all in thee, as well as of all for thee. If God did not spare his own Son for thy fake, what will he spare beside? Who shall, or who can, lay any thing to the charge of God's elect ?—It is God himself, with whom there is neither evil nor folly, that justifieth thee from both. Who can condemn thee !--- It is Christ, who blotteth out thy fins by his precious blood, or rather is rifen again to present thee faultless in his righteousness before the throne, and to plead for thee as that Advocate who never lost a cause. Who shall feparate thee from the love of Chrift? Shall the evils of life, all the diffress of time, and all the rage of the devil ? Nay, in all these things thine almighty Saviour, will render thee a conqueror, and more than a conqueror, because he hath loved thee. O divine words that follow ! From thine inmost affections, from the very ardour and spirit of faith, mayest thou breathe them forth ! I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things prefent, nor things 10 come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, thall be able to feparate me from the love of Gold which is in Christ Jejus my Lord.

REMEMBRANCER. CHAP.V.

On communion with the divine persons in Jehovah.

URIOUS speculations upon the Trinity profit not. There is a fort of knowledge in this, as in other things, which betrays its own falsehood by puffing up the foul. Much time hath been lost, and many hurtful disputes have been raifed concerning the mode of the Son's generation from the Father, and the manner of the Spirit's procession from both; points which have not been revealed, and which therefore are not necessary to faith. It is fufficient for us to apprehend, that there are three perfons in one Jehovah, or felf-existent Godhead, and that this Godhead is One; that we are privileged to have communion with these divine perfons in their feveral offices of falvation; and that, by the unction of the Spirit, we come into the grace of the Son, and posses the love of the father, now and for evermore. He that doth not thus apprehend the doctrine of the Trinity, only appreciate b the phantom of his own istra line, mus is never the better for his specula loss, however abstruse or refined.

Of what avail to my foul are all the besch disquisitions of men? I want food and besch reality and enjoyment. These do thy word, O Lord, afford in plentiful measure, when they grace opens the well-spring to his heart. I am there taught to pray for that anointing of the Holy One, which fhall lead and guide me in-to all thy faving truth. By him I am both instructed and enabled to renounce myself, to put on Christ, and to cleave to my Redeemer as my only portion and hope. By the Spirit and Son of God, I am led up to fellowship with the Father, and to call upon him as my Father, even mine. O my bleffed God, my Abba, my Father, my life and my All, what hast thou revealed to my poor foul; and how much more thou hast done and prepared than thou hast hitherto revealed to men, or than men in this state are able to conceive! O thou Fountain of unutterable bleffedness, thou unfathomable height and depth of love, help me thus to know thee in the fecret of my foul; and may all thy works of providence and grace increase this inward knowledge to the end! While others dispute let me enjoy. Manifest thy precepts to my mind, and say to my longing spirit, Peace be unto thee, for I am thy falvation.

II

One spark of this life is of more worth than the whole universe of notions; for this not only brings an understanding of divine things superior to all speculations, but gives with it a fulnels of fatisfaction, arising from the vety taste and perception of the things themfelves. Faith takes them for realities, hope is enkindled by them as such, and love finds them to be so, and embraces them with joy to the end.

On the Incarnation of Christ, by which he became Immanuel.

W HO shall unfold this mystery, or unfathom this love of my God! The Ancient of days became a child of days, and the Lord of all would be the servant of all, that he might be a Redeemer, a Brother, a Friend of poor unworthy mortals, of vile apostates and rebels, such as I am, and such as, without him, I and all others for ever must have been.

He took our nature without fin, that he might bear our fin. If fin had been in that which he took for himfelf, it would not have been poffible that one, who was equally finful, fhould have taken off finfulnefs from others. Thus he, who was not, and could not be a finner by nature, did, by imputation, become the greateft of finners: He bare our fins in his own body on the tree; and Jehovah laid upon him the iniquities of us all. This dear Immanuel was a lamb without fpot, and therefore mete to be flain for attonement; and a fcape-goat, or ftrong-one going off, laden with iniquities; and fo able to bear them away into everlating forgetfulnefs.

He was very God and very man in one Christ. As Christ he is Immanuel, or God with us. What his name implies, that he truly is. He is God with us, able to fave and to fuccour, able to blefs and to enliven, in all our pilgrimage from earth to Leaven. Lo! I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world.

And is this thy promise, O thou meek and lowly Jesus! and shall I be still flow of heart to believe it! Shall I always be hanging my head like a bulrush; and shall my eyes be still gushing out their faithless tears; when thou hast promised not only the best of creatures in earth and heaven, but thine own bleffed Self to be with me, who art Lord of ali! O my dear Redeemer, be fo with me by thy gracious power, that I may be deeply fensible of thy continual presence; manifest thyfelf to me as thou doft not unto the world, for I am thine, and I defire to give up myfelf and all I am and have, to thy bleffed will, for ever more. Be indeed, according to thy name, my Immanuel, my God with me, and in me of a truth, that I may walk with thee as one agreed, and draw from thee all those fupplies of grace, life and peace, without which I can neither be happy, nor alive to thy glory; O hear and answer, for mine cyes are upon thee.

On Christ's descent into Egypt.

T behoved this Immanuel in all things to be made like unto his brethren; therefore he went down into Egypt. All he did upon earth had fome use and meaning. By some facts, he testified what he was doing. and by others, what he would continually do for his people.

Out of Egygt have I called my Son, faith the Lord. His redeemed were spiritually in E. gypt, the house of bondage. They were there under the service of a cruel king, a prince who ruleth in the world by usurpation till the time appointed. Grievous are the tasks, and sad are the wages of this tyrant of souls. Jesus went down and came upagain for a sign. As the head of his people he did this, preaching their redemption from bondage in himself. In their order and times, they come up out of Egypt too, by the strong hand of this captain of falvation. He is great in might, and therefore not one of them faileth. The prince of the air loseth his dominion over them; and though he follows them like Pharaoh, and chafe them all the way, he cannot hinder their course of faith, nor rob them of their Canaan in glory.

O marvellous love of my Saviour! Was it not enough for thee to take up my nature in its best estate, without submitting to a manger, to contempt, to perfecution, to banishment, and all the wrongs of men? O how low must I be fallen, that it should be needful for thee, (for it it had not been needful, this act had been spared) to endure poverty, wretchedness, and shame, that I might be delivered from all ! I was in Egypt, and thou camest to me. Thy grace preached liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prifon to them that were bound. Thy power performed what thy love proclaimed; thou broughtest the prisoners from the prison, and those that fate in darkness out of the prison-house. I, O wonderful to tell! I, among thy ranfomed, have followed thee in the regeneration out of this difmal Egypt, and have tasted a little of the glorious liberty of thy children. Not unto me, my dear Saviour, not unto me, but unto thy name be all the praise. I was wallowing in the mire of Egypt, and in the mud of the Nile; I was entirely given up to the filth and pollutions of this world, and should have remained therein till I had been funk for ever in its woe; unlefs thy mighty arm had wrought my deliverance, and fet me free. Glory to thee, Jehovah-Jesus, thou Saviour all-divine, for mercy unmeasurable like this, for grace and glory yet before me, to which there is no end ! O how shall I show forth thy praise for all which thou hast done for my foul !

CHAP. VIII.

On the miracles of Christ.

W E see but little into the true worth and importance of the miracles of Jesus, if we look no farther than the outward facts. These indeed do speak aloud the glory of his divine perfon to the carnal fense of man, and did so even to those, who hated and blasshemed him; but the grandeur of his works consisted in this, that they were only outward testimonies of the far more noble operations of his grace within the soul, which were not to endure for a time only, like their outward signs, but throughout eternity.

He gave fight to the blind, that he might teltify unto men his fovereign power in giving light and understanding to the mind. He opened the deaf ear that men might know by whom alone they can hear aright the good news of falvation, and live forever. The lame he caused, in a moment to walk, that his people taight learn, that they can only move, as well as live by him, and that without him they can do nothing. He cured the foul leprofy of the body in order to fhew that only by him can be healed the far more deplorable leprofy of fin, which covers and deales the mind. All sicknesses vanished at his command, that we might have hope in him, as the only Restorer of our souls. He cast out unclean spirits, and suffered them to posses the fwine, who were thereby lost, that he might teach his redeemed, that he only delivered and can deliver them from the power of darknefs, which being let loofe upon the world, drive them violently and swiftly down the steep course of time into a gulph of inextricable woe. The hungry multitudes were fed by his miraculous power to explain this great truth, that he is not only the giver of spiritual life, but the constant Sustainer and Nourisher of it from day to day : And he did this by faiall means, that the excellency of the power might be known to be his, and not in the creatures, however fanctified, bleffed, and used. The winds and waves were instantly. obedient to his word, that his beloved might rejoice in him, as the Stiller of all spiritual waves, the tumultuous madness of this world, the ragings of Satan, and the confusion of all things. These can roar and foam no long-er than it pleaseth him; and when they roar and foam at all, it shall turn out in the end for the good of his people. The dead were raifed to proclaim his rifing power, and to declare, that the iffues alfo of fpiritual life and endlefs death are altogether in his hands. Whatever he did, was an act of mercy, under which he revealed as a parable, innumerable leffons, of grace and love. All his works proclaimed him to be both the Creator of all (and what feems more comforting to his chofen) the redeemer and reftorer of millions that were loft.

Learn from thefe things, O believer, what thy Lord God hath done for thy foul. He quickened thee from the death of trefpaffes and fins; he giveth light and peace to thy mind; he feedeth thee with the bread of life; he cureth all thy fpiritual difeafes; he quelleth all thy manifold enemies and temptations; he ftrengtheneth thee with ftrength in thy foul; he doth all that is done in thee by grace; and he will never ceafe working in thee both to will and to do, no, not even when he hath brought thee to his kingdom in heaven.

O pray fervently my foul, rightly to apprehend these precious things. If thou teach me, bleffed Lord, then shall I know them, in fome measure at least, according to my capacity, as they ought to be known. Such knowledge indeed is too excellent for my clouded faculties of nature ; they cannot, if left to themselves, attain unto it. I therefore feck not to obtain the apprehension of these truths, as fallen man can teach or attain them, but as thou dost teach and enforce them. In thy teaching, though the substance of the truths, be the same, there is a wide difference from all the teaching of men. Man by his own study gropeth in the dark, and wearieth himself in vain to reach up to the perception of thine excellent wildom ; but thou art light in thyfelf, and fendeth down both illumination and influence at once, to fuch as are taught by thee, by which they not only know thy truth, as a truth in itself, but feel the bleffings of it, as a truth applied and made their own. They find strength and nourishment in what thou givest for food, and not airy words or unprofitable speculations, which without thee are all that can be found in the best and wisest instructions of men. O raise me up, then, my bleffed Teacher, above the pictures of things, which may be gained by words, to the true enjoyment of the things So shall I not hear or give difthemfclves. course only of thy spiritual feast, like a man in a dream, but shall taste and see indeed how good and gracious thou art, and that all life, power, and confolation are from thee.

CHAP. IX.

On the word of Christ.

OR ever O Lord, thy word is fettled in beaven? and upon earth it runneth very fwiftly. The righteoufnefs of thy testimenies is everlasting: Give me understanding, and I shall live.

Such is the word, and the end of the word, of my gracious Redeemer. It is called a word, becaufe it is a revelation; all words being only the revelation or expression of things. This revealed word is fettled in heaven upon the throne of God, is ordered by the Divine Perfons in all things, and is fure, becaufe ordered by them in a covenant, which cannot be broken.

It is a word too of testimony, because it testifieth of my Saviour throughout, either directly by the institutions and declarations of his grace, or indirectly by the courses and actions of his providence, meeting in one and the fame end, which is the guidance and falvation of his people.

This word, in the conduct of the Divine-Spirit, is also a word of power, and the fit influment of all his works. It is his fpiritual fword, by which he divides afunder the foul and fpirit, and effects that circumcifion of the heart, whereby his people are enabled to live no longer unto themselves, but unto God.---The operation is painful indeed to the flefh, or to nature; but it caufeth the fpirit to rejoice in Chrift Jelus, and to give up its confidence in all things befice.

For this purpole, then, of tellifying for Chrift, and of acting by the Spirit in the redeemed, is all the written word calculated and given. Hence, the inflitutions of the law preached Je/us and his falvation, the prophecies declared the fame truth, the hiftories are records of God's conduct towards his people from age to age, the gofpels are 'evidences of the accompliftment of all thefe things in Chrift, and the epifiles are explanations and enforcements of thefe things to believers. In fhort, all the holy writings relate to Chrift, and to the redeemed in him. Jefus is the Alpha and Omega of the whole word and work of the Moft High.

In this word and its experience confift all the wifdom and comfort of a Chriftian. Here is truth without error; fo that he may read without fear, and truft without danger. All other books, as they come from men, have more or lefs of folly or vanity in them, and often are looked over with little true fatisfaction and improvement. But in this volume, grace not only difcovers fomething new, but brings new force out of old truths, which have charmed the foul a thoufand times. It discovers the multiform and manifold wildom of God, in what he hath spoken; infomuch that, from under the veil of one precious instruction, another and another shall arise, as the soul is improved to bear them. These are the steps of the kingdom; and the higher the renewed mind can ascend, it not only understands better what it hath already passed over, but sees farther and wider into the glories yet before it, till it is ravished with unspeakable delight in the infinite knowledge and love of God.

The right understanding of this word doth not puff up, but humbleth. He hath not a true apprehension of its fense, who is listed by it in himself. The lowly reader is the only learner. To him is not a word lettered or founded, so much as a living and lively word engrasted. It enters into his heart more than his ears, and diffuseth its sweet favour through all the faculties, setting them into delightful exercises for the divine glory.

The great depth of the word of God keeps the real chriftian ever a learner. He knows, that it is impossible to reach the utmost of God's wifdom. There will be always mysteries to be unfolded, because man's capacity is infinite; at the bound of which, how wide soever it may extend, remaineth ignorance. One who had been in the third heaven and in spirit caught up into paradife itself, where he heard unspeakable words, could only fay, when he talked of the divine counfels, O the depth of the riches both of the wifdom and knowledge of God! How unfearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding cut! He could fland upon the fhore and taite, but all beyond was an infinite ocean.

The true disciple, however, knows enough to make him fee the vanity and unprofitableness of all learning and wildom, (if so they may be called) out of Christ. The speculations of men are but dreams, and their purfuits but idle labours at the best, which begin and end in felf, and have no higher object than this evil world. The poor fimple countryman who hath learned Chrift (and many fuch, blessed be God, there are) can pity the pompous ignorance of those, who know almost every thing but God and the proper value of their own fouls. By a logic, far beyond that of the schools, he hath been led to this conclusion, that God is his Father, that Chrift is his Saviour, that the Holy Spirit is his Guide, that the Bible is his charter and his library, that the devil, the world, and the flesh are his foes, that the earth is the wilderness of his banishment, that heaven is his home, and that all the favour, love, and power of the Godhead are engaged to bring him thither. The worldly wile can only valie this (if at all) when carnal knowledge is dying with there bodies, and all their triffing thoughts are about to perifh .--- Hence it is that the poor man's knowledge being found and true, though ever fo fmall, can fland the onfet of trials in the world and death at laft; while the learned and knowing, with none or fmall degrees of the true understanding, fall into errors, fail in their course, or die almost doubting and despairing.

O my foul, feek thou the fubftantial wifdom, which cometh from God, and which time, or rather eternity itfelf, cannot diminis for the will brighten and improve. Though other knowledge may be valuable for the purposes of this world, yet this alone can ripen for heaven, and is therefore most earness of the fought by thee, whose business and calling, whose citizenship and hope, are most principally there.

And, O thou, who art the living and lifegiving WORD itfelf, through whom and for whom all the written word was given, come and poffefs my foul! I long for nothing and would always long for nothing, but for thy witdom and thee. O forgive my unfettled heart, which hath fo often been taken up with a multitude of unprofitable things, inftead of being fixed wholly upon thee, who art the only Way, the Truth, and the Life ! I can have no reft, no firm eftablifhment, but upon thee. My nature is unftable as water; and I live moreover in a flippery world. Leave, O leave me, therefore, not to myfelf, nor to the power of the evils, which are above, beneath, and on every fide. Set me upon thyfelf; my bleffed Rock, and order thou my goings in the way, and lead me into the way everlasting. Who is sufficient for these things, but thou, who art all-sufficient? How can I, so poor a creature, hope either to stand or to prevail, but through that strength which is made perfect in weakness, through that wisdom, which cannot be deceived by fraud, and that love which is stronger than death, and durable as the days of heaven! O Lord, be on my fide, and then neither my own flesh, nor the corruption of the flesh in others, no, nor all the powers of darkness, shall be able so much as to hurt me. I am thine, O fave me now, fave me to the end, and fave me for ever!

CHAP. X.

On the Life of Chrift.

HOUGH my Redeemer was to be, and was a man of forrows and acquainted with grief; though he was to have, and had all our iniquities in his own body on the crois; though he was to bear the curfe, and was curfed for the transgression of his people; and, for a token of it, was hanged on a tree; yet, in his own perfon, he was pure, harmlefs, and undefiled, and fo was called typically the holy Lamb of God, without blemifh, or any poffible defect. He was without fin, from the manger to the tomb. When Satan tried him in the defert, he found nothing in him of weaknefs of mind or defilement of body; and therefore his temptations had nothing to lay hold of, but fell to the ground. His enemies among men, flirred up by the malice of the advertary, could not, when he challenged them, convince him of fin; nor was any thing like guilt to be found in his mouth. All his words were wifdom itfelf, and all his actions were purity and love.

There are three principal reasons why such a Redeemer became us; and these are to be found only in Christ.

A factifice in the first place, was necessary for our iniquities; for, without fixed ing of blood there is no remifficut of fins. The judice of God required atonement; because it is inconfistent with the holiness of his mature to spare the guilty. No truth, in all his word, is more plain that this. But nothing could be substituted in the room of finners, which was finful in itself; for this would only increase the wrath of the Most High. And, therefore, as his love was pleased to provide and accept a substitute; such an one appeared, as was without spot, or defect of any kind in himself, and had nothing to answer for which was. This is the fignification of all the pure facti28

THE CHRISTIAN

fices under the law, which lpake aloud, that they are another vicarious, or one offered in the flead of another.

In the next place, the redectord, as finners, wanted righteousness, without which they cannot appear with acceptance before God: And, as a perfect righteoufuels can on-ly be pleasing to him, and all men are incapable of producing fuch an one, and as therefore it can only be obtained by account-in; the righteoufne's of a substitute for their own: Jesus Christ was Jehovah in our nature, in order to be JEHOVAH OUR BIGHTEOUS-NESS. G dis well-pleased for his righteousnels sake, which is infinite and everlasting, capable of just arying from all things, and through all times, even into eternity. Christ, not for him ell, but for his people, fulfilled all righteoulnels, and upon their account magnified the law of their God. It was for this end, that he lived fo many years upon earth, and went through all the stages of human life to methood; by which his people of all ages might have, dirough faith, a right of acceptance in him.

And, thirdly, the merit of the facrifice for fin, and the 'ubidication of righteoufness for finners, required fone perton to intervene, or to ftand between God and finners, and to offer these exchanges in their behalf. This office is the office of a prieft, who is a mediator between God and man, and who must therefore be holy in himself. Christ was this perfect perfon; and fo was fuch an High-Priest as became us, holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from finners, and made ligher than the heavens, having an unchangeable priesthood, to which he is confecrated for evermore.

These are the reasons of all his labours in love and righteousness: And he was able to merit and go through them, being Jehovah in man; as well as to suffer what he took upon him, being man in Jehovah.

O what a task of unparalleled grace and humility is here! Who could have done such unimpeachable works; but he who is perfect in himself? Who could have done them to render others perfect for ever before God; but one so much above all created perfection, as to have for others an unbounded persection to spare?

Lord, help me to meditate upon thee, and upon all that thou haft done upon my foul ! O put on this garment of falvation, this robe of righteoufnels which thy bleffed hands have perfectly wrought, that it may be my wedding-garment in the day of my efpoufals, when I fhall leave the world, and appear before the Majefty on high ! This is the righteoufnels of faints, pure, white, and fhining, in which they walk with thee in glory, and in which I allo hope to walk, unworthy creature as I am, both with thee and with them. O then fhall I appear without fpot, or wrinkle, or any fuch thing, all-acceptable to God, allilluftrious in thee ! Lord what haft theu wrought indeed ? Thou hast wrought for me to entitle me to heaven; and thou halt, wrougliffin me to fit me for heaven; 'a work, as it seems to me no iels difficult chan the other; fo stubborn and vile am 1, and so opposite to thy pure nature is mine. I marvel, and with tears of joy I marvel, at all the mysterious wonders of thy redemption, at thy plain and clear, yet unsearchable love, at thine awful justice magnified even by grace itself, at the kindness thou hast shewn and the goodness thou hast promised, at the neverending line of wildom in thy holy word; and at the unbounded scene of glory yet before me. I am overwhelmed, I am astonished, at the weight and grandeur of thy divine benevolence. Accept the faculties of my body and soul, all I am and all I have; and let them be found to thy praise, and honor, and glory, both now and at the day of thine appearing! Amen.

CHAP. XI.

On the death of Christ.

EHOLD, and fee if there be any forrow like anto my forrow, which is done unto me, wherewith the LORD afflicted me, in the day of his fierce anger.

No, my Jefus, never was forrow like thine. Thou beareft the griefs of millions; griefs, which would have funk those millions into unfufferable woe. Ounipotence itfelf groaned under the tremendous load, which forced from thy pure and perfect body, not common fweat (the curfe, inflicted with human labeur,) but a dreadful fweat, burfting forth in great drops of agonizing blood. O what a doleful cry didft thou utter; and who but thyfelf- can conceive those to us unknown pange and fufferings, which forced from thy facted lips, My God, my God, why bast thou forficken me !

The meditation of thy fufferings and death is painful in the fympathy of nature; yet I cannot with that thou hadft not endured them, nor didft thou fully with it for thyfelf. Then wast contented to be betrayed into the hand; of finful men for this very purpofe. It was by the determinate counfel and foreknowledge of God, that all the parts of this folemn event were transacted. And it is for the everlasting interest of me and of thousands that all the foriptures concerning thee were thus awfully fulfilled.

Lord, what is fin, that thou thyfelf couldeff not be spared; when from the fouls of thy people it was taken off, and laid upon thee? Can any thing more solemnly describe the hatred of the divine nature to fin, and the severity of the divine justice upon account of it, than the pangs, the horrors, the cries of thee, my Jefus, thou fuffering Son of God ? And if thou wert facrificed for fin, who in thyfelf knewest no fin; what shall become of those, who reject thy faving facrifice, and yet all the while have nothing but fin in themselves ?

Who could support such excruciating tortures, unassisted and uncomforted as thou wert, even upon a just account ? It was not in the power of a creature to fustain thine inward griefs, thine outwards torments, and the entire dereliction or forfaking of God, of men, and of nature, all together and at once, as thou didst sustain them, upon any account or motive in the world. But thou endurest the whole with dignified complacency and satisfaction, even for thine enemies, to convert them into friends, and to make rebels and apostates heirs of God, and joint-heirs with thyself of an eternal weight of glory. May I not turn thine own words, and fay, "Behold, and fee, was there ever love like " thy love, which thou shewedst for thy peo-" ple, when the Lord afflicted thee in the day " of his fierce anger!"

Lord, how shall I speak, and what shall I fay to these things? Shall my incredulous heart be still backward to believe? If Jesus died for my fins, can I die for them too? If he freely bare the curse for my sake, will the justice of my God still require the curse at my hands? If my iniquities were taken by my Saviour, and he made a full and perfect atonement for them, can I dare to affront the divine Majesty by supposing, that he is yet so unrighteous as to charge them all again upon me? O forgive my hard and impenitent heart, that I should ever imagine such blas. phemy against thy faithfulness and love; that I should even think, that thou canst be so unjust and untrue, even in contradiction to thine own word, as to lay that still upon myself, which for my fake was entirely laid upon my dearest and most blessed Redeemer ! Lord, I melt into tears of shame at myself, and into tears of comfort upon the remembrance of all this thy kindness to my soul. Thy blood, O my Jesus, cleanseth from ALL fin; and if from all, what fin shall remain to be now charged home upon me! O help me thou mighty God, thou Prince of peace, that I may not be faithlels but believing !

C H A P. XII.

On the Resurrection of Christ.

NEVER fact was more ftrongly and undeniably established than this. Divine Providence ordained, that it should be so; because upon this great truth depend, all the allocance and efficacy of our redemption. If Christ be not raised (fays the apossile) your fuith is vain; ye are yet in your fins.

n

But is there no proof of Christ's refurrection but the historical evidence ?-Yes, blessed Lord, as thou givest thy people to know of the doctrine of falvation, that it is thine by the demonstration of the Spirit; so thou assordest to them a most convincing testimony, that thou art indeed risen from the dead, by their fuper-resurrection from the death of trespasses If thou hadst not been railed up and fins. from the dead by the glory of the Father, it would have been impossible for any of them to have either received or walked in the newness of life. Their being spiritually quickened with thee, is a proof in itself of thy glorious refurrection, and a confirmation to their souls, that they are thine own unalienable inheritance, and that they shall also live with thee for ever.

Thou hast truly and graciously faid, I am the Refurrection and the Life; He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosever liveth and believeth in me, shall never die. Lord, I was long, and too long, dead to God and dead to thee, shut up under the ban of thy law through sin, yet infensible, as a dead carcase is of all outward impressions, to my alienation and separation from thy life and peace. I was dead also to my own true interest and everlassing concerns, and alive only to sin, and to the service of the Lord of sin, without perceiving his bitter tyranny and horrible designs. So foolish was I and ignorant, yea, even as a beast before thee. The beasts 'R E M E M B R A N C E R.

indeed follow the end of their being, but I did not think upon mine. In tender mercy didst thou open mine eyes, that I might know my-felf and my milery, and that I behold thee as the only refuge and hope of my foul. Thou gavest me the powers of a new and spiritual life; and then I ran towards thee with an affection I had never felt before, and defired to know more and more of thee and the power of thy refurrection, t' it so I might no longer live in or for mysel, but in thy faith and for thy glory. All . is way thy work, and thine alone. I migh as easily have created a world, as thus have new created myself in opposition to the mil ions of hindrances from within and without. No; it was thou, my dearest Redeemer, it was thou that restoredst my soul, and leddest me in the paths of righteousness for thy nome's fake; and therefore I truff, (and tho' i vm sometimes afraid, yet still do I trust, and we ild trust again) that furely good-nefs and mercy j'all follow me all the days of my life, and that I shall dwell in the house of the Lord for ever.

Owhat an evidence of by refurrection haft thou thus brought home to my heart ! Confirmed, as it is, by thy holy written word, it is, demonstration itself, and is not to be argued away by all the corrupt reasonings of men. It is a demonstration both of word and of deed, of spirit and of thy faithfulness and truth, and of all my bleffed and joyful interest therein. Sing, O ye heavens, for the Thomas doubted, that I might believe more strongly. He was suffered to fail in his faith, that my faith, and that of all thy children after him, might be improved and confirmed. But the mere evidence of sense can draw no bleffing. His bodily view of thy refurrection was indeed followed by faith; but, from hence thou tookest occasion, most happily for thy people, to fay, Bleffed are they that have not Jeen, and yet have believed. Through thy mercy, I have believed, and, according to thy word, have tafted thy bleffing. Joy and peace in believing, quietness and assurance of mind, peace and relignation of soul, some holines and strong desires after more, contempt of this world and foretalte of a better, preparation for death and views of a transporting eternity, are among the many proofs that thou art risen and livest, that thou art gracious and true. O that these proofs may increase in number and measure, that my faith may be more and more lively, and that my hopes may continually abound.

On the ascension of Christ.

HOU bast ascended on bigh, thou hast led capivity captive; thou bast received gifts, in thy human nature, for men; yea for the rehellicus also, that the Lord God might dwell among them, or that they might become an habitation of God through the Spirit.

This was prophefied of Jesus long before his advent in the flesh. It was so prophefied, as though it were a fact already past; because the things to come are, as it were, present with God, being foreknown by his omniscient mind, and ordained in his holy will, which must be accomplished in all its decree.

He afcended to the throne of the Higheft, with the full merits of his blood and righteoufness, which were a fweet fmelling favour, or a favour of reft, to the everlasting THRER. By this gracious afcension Jehovah is become propitious to the redeemed, receives them in Christ, loves them for Christ's fake, favours them with his peace in their hearts, carries them on by his providence and grace, makes all things work together for their good, bears them through life and death, and finally receives them to glory.

By his holy power they are brought to believe, and are kept in believing to the end.

Jefus afcended likewife to prepare a place for his chofen. In a fhort time they are to be difmiffed from wretched houfes of clay, ftanding in the wafte wildernefs of the world; and then they are to have in heaven everlasting manfions of beauty and glory, fitted and furnished by Christ himfelf. They are soon to leave their bodies, now thoroughly defiled by fin, and to put on fome fpiritual fabrick, appointed for them, in which they are to remain with Christ and the bleffed, till the final confummation of all things.

O what gifts, my bleffed Redeemer, naft thou procured and purchafed for my unworthy foul! What halt thou not brought down of grace for time, and of promise for eternity, to me, and to helples finners like me! Yea, thou hast given thine own felf to thy brethren, that in thee they might be given up to God, and like thee be a sweet smelling favor, ascending by the merits to the highest heaven. for mercies like these! I can give, poor as the gift is, only my heart and foul to thy dear glory; and I would not, surely I would not, restrain these. Yet I cannot offer these, so weak and so corrupt am I without the affistance of thy strength. Favor me, then, more and more, with thy gracious power, that my affections may be constantly mounting upward, longing for the place of my everlasting refidence, and counting all things worfe than dung, that would ftop my progress thither. Where thou art, dear Lord, soon do I hope to be. I am tired of this earth, and of all its shifting milerable scenes; I am weary of this body, full of diforder and fin; I loathe the hulks, which the fwine of this world quarrel for and devour; and I can be satisfied with nothing lefs than thee and thy prefence for ever. O my Beloved, when shall I ascend up after thee! All below is Mesech and Ke dar, But, with thee there is the fuinefs not the mere Madow, of joy; and, at thy right hand, there are pleasures, not for a moment only, but for evermore. Thou hast said, Surely, I come quickly.—Amen, (reply the hearts of thy people, and my poor heart among them) yez, come, Lord Jesus!

CHAP. XIV.

On the glorification of Chrift.

HE miffion and work of Jefus for our falvation was completed in the eternal glorification of his perfon in heaven. His body was fpiritually, though not fubftantially, changed in this great event, and thus, with his human foul, as one complete and perfect manhood, was taken into God. He now thines in the brightnefs of the divine glory, far above all principality and power, and every name that is named, whether in heaven or in earth ; and he thus thines as the head of our redeemed nature, that his people may alfo be glorified with him, and be fo united to him and to each other, as to become an holy temple and a glorious habitation of God through the Spirit.

I pray, (faid the gracious Redeemer) that they all may be one, as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee; that they also may be one with us: and the glory which thou gavest me, I have given them, that they may be one, even as we are one: I in them and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one.

O what transcendent height ofg'ory is this, to which such creatures as my elf, believing in Jesus, shall shortly be raised! What mind could have been sublime enough so much as to have thought of these wonders, if the Lord of glory himself had not revealed them ?

The glory of Chrift is not like the airy phantom which men call glory, but hath everlafting weight and folidity; it not only fends forth light, but is light: and all that can be conceived of fplendour, excellency, durability, and blifs, meets in this glory, as its fole and fubftantial effence. The believer, therefore is faid to enjoy Chrift an exceeding and eternal weight of glory—exceeding all conception and comparison; eternal in its enjoyment and duration.

It doth not yet appear, what we shall be; but we know, that when Christ shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is: So that with open face, beholding as in a glass the giory of the Lord, we shall be changed into the same image, from glory to glory, even as by the spirit of the Lord.—Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us ! O that my heart may feel the shanks; which no tongue can utter, and, in humble adoration, blus my God for his unspeakable gift.

On the intercession of Christ.

WHEN the high prieft, once a year, entered into the molt hely place, he carried the fume of the sweet incense and the blood of the fin-offering with him. The fume was to cover the mercy-feat upon the ark of the teltimo. ny, and the blood was to be sprinkled before This hadowed forth the interceding of-નંદ. fice of the great High-Priest, of our profession in the holiest of all. He is entered there with his own blood, by which he hath made a perfect atonement for his people, and with his own righteousness, which both covers himself as the propitiation, and his whole church under him, so as to render all, and all together, acceptable to the pure attributes of Jehovah.

Hence my Redeemer received his name of Angel, Interpreter, Advocate, or intercessor. He pleaded for me, and for all poor sinners who come unto God by him, before the throne of the Highest. He sumeth out the merit of his blood, and the excellent perfection of his righteousness, filling all heaven (as it were) with the fragrance of that, which is unutterably delightful to God himself. No broken.

hearted rebel, who cometh unto God by this High-prieft Jefus, shall ever bewail the infufficiency of his advocate, but rather shall blefs the Lord for his mercy, in laying his help upon One fo almighty. If he look to this Saviour, then certainly be will be with bim as his Angel Interpreter, or Advocate, one among a thousand to shew unto him bis uprightness; and be is gracious unto him, and saith, Redeem him from going down to the pit, I have found a ransom. Then, his soul is brought back from the pit, and enlightened with the light of the living.

Our High-Priest, bearing our nature, can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, the without their fin; and he is able to fave us to ibe uttermost, or for evermore, feeing be ever liveth to make intercession for us. O that I may come therefore boldly, with liberty of speech and with confidence of heart, to the throne of grace, that I may obtain the mercy I want, and find grace to help in the time of my need! Bleffed Lord, thou hast shewed me what Bleffed Lord, thou haft fhewed me what thou haft done for me on earth, and what thou art now doing for the interests of my foul in thy kingdom. Thou settest before me, in both respects, the motives of the most sure and the most strong consolation; fo that, in thee, I might have the fullest affurance of faith and hope. O work, if it be thy will, this rich consolation within me: for without the effectual aid of thy power, I may reason upon these motives, but I cannot apprehend them; I may conclude for my mind, that they are true, but I shall not be able to apply their fweetnels, strength, or truth to my heart — Lord, take thy poor servant's cause into thine own hand; plead it for him in the court of heaven; urge it upon him in the court of his own confcience on earth; let him feel the comfort of both in all the forrows of his present state, fo that no trial nor outrage from his enemies may be able to stagger his confidence in thee.

Though thou art in heaven my Jesus, yet thou knowest where I am and whereof I am made; and thou rememberest, that I am but duft. O leave me not, neither forsake me; left my own heart, without any thing elfe, and especially my own heart with ten thousand evil ones beside, draw me off from my only true hope to some wretched, stupid, corrupting refuge of lies! Intercede for me, as for Peter, that my faith fail not. He needed an advocate not more than I. O thou, that didst plead his cause with everlasting success, plead and take care of mine; that I, together with him, and all the clients of thy grace, may rejoice in thy goodness to my foul, and bless thy holy name for ever and ever !

CHAP. XVI.

The love of the Father.

N this is manifested the love of God towards us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him. We could have had no life but through the Redeemer; and we could not have had him but through the tender love of the Father. Nothing more forcible can shew the love of God towards us than this, that he should give up Chrift to the deepest humiliation and fufferings for our rescue and redemption. Had there been any possible method of falvation besides this, consistent with the divine attributes; furely the bitter cup would have passed away from the bleffed Jefus, and God would not have permitted him to drink it. But God did not, and therefore could not, in this cafe, spare his Son, but delivered him up to death for our sakes; and thus, in a most admirable manner and degree, commendeth his love 10wards us, while we were yet finners, who these fore as fuch could have done nothing to deserve it. Herein is love; not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and fent his Son ha be a propitiation for our fins.

All this enfued according to the covenant of grace, which was fettled between the divine Perfons upon the throne of heaven; and when the Lord Jefus was facrificed, then was this covenant ratified and established. Jehovah interposing himself therein, and through the divided sheft and spirit of the Messiah satisfying his law and justice for the remission of sins.

By this new testament in the blood of the Saviour, his people are not only admitted into fellowship with himself as their brother, yea as flesh of their slesh, and bone of their bone in a more than espoused nearness; but they are also entitled, by a gracious right to approach unto God as their Father. They are adopted into his family; and the covenant, established in the hands of the Mediator, is the testimony and the feal of it. Hence, they are no more strangers and foreigners, and much less flaves and enemies, but sons and heirs, children and ieirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ Jelus; and so when they look up and pray, they do not take God's name in vain and speak falsely, when they call Jehovah himself, Abba, Father; but they utter what they have a right and privilege to utter, and what the Lord delights to hear.

O my foul, thou canft not be in a ten thoufandth part fo ready to be joyful in this matter, as thy God is to rejoice over thee. If he could regard thee fo much when thou wert dead in condemnation and an alien, as to give up his Son for thy fike; how much more, when thou art reconciled by this very means, will he pour forth his compation upon thee : If he was kind to thee, when he stood as thy Judge, and smote thy Substitute for thy fins; will he, can he, cease to be kind under the character of thy Father, thy merciful and gracious Father, in Christ Jelus? Lord remove fo wicked a thought fo diabolical a notion, of unbelief from my mind! It is treason against thy love, thy jullice, thy truth, and all those attributes in thee, which are the fhining rays of thy nature, to harbour so foul an opinion : It is atheifm, madnefs, yea, the very falle-hood and blasphemy of hell. Holy Father, drive by thy Spirit such base and abominable suggestions from my heart; and let me claim the privilege of my adoption, let me call myfelf thy child, though an unworthy child, and thus honour thy faithfulness and truth by living in the sense of my nearness and dearness to thee !

When my foul can most ascend to this its proper station; then time and the things of time are most under my feet; the world and all its bustles annoy me less; my heart beats freely for heaven; and I can look down from the hill, feeing the vanities and pitying the follies, which carry men away from God, and too often drown them in ruin and perdition.

C H A P. XVII.

The love of the Spirit.

F God be love, then the Spirit is love, because the Spirit is God. He manifests himself as the God of love by unfolding and bestowing such love, as only God himself could have, and from himself could pour forth unto others.

The Holy Spirit, as one of the parties in the everlafting covenant, loveth his people with an everlafting love. By him alfo they are made fenfible of the love of the Father, and of the Son, when he fheddeth forth his own love upon their hearts; for it is He, who enables each of them to cry Abba, Father, under the tafte of his mercy, and to fay to Chrift, Thou art my Saviour, my Lord and my Gcd, in the rich experience of his grace. Without the love of the Spirit, as they could not know, fo they could not come up to the love of the whole Trinity; for by him alone it is fhed abundantly upon all that are his, both in earth and heaven.

If I were left to love God by my own fallen powers, and had not the continual help of the Spirit of love; I should fear, that I could do nothing but have him entirely. The carnal mind is enmity itfelf again/t God; for it is not fubject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. The law of God is the pure life and love of God; and only by his Spirit can I delight therein, and then only after the inner man. Hence it must follow, that, if any man hath not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his. Without him, every man must remain as he was born, earthly, fenfual, develish. O how deeply then am I indebted to this

O how deeply then am I indebted to this divine Agent, for taking up his holy refidence in my unworthy foul! What loving kindnefs and mercy have I not felt and enjoyed by his bleffed power within me! How is it, that He, whom the heaven of

How is it, that He, whom the heaven of heavens cannot contain, fhould vouchfafe to take up his abode in a poor finner's breaft ? What marvenous love is this, that he fhould ftoop to dwell with one, whofe heart hath been the refidence of the evil fpirit, and the cage of every unclean bird ? Surely, it must be infinite love, which could cleanse for unholy a tenement, and keep it clean for himfelf against the manifold attempts to pollute it on every fide.

Whatever I may lose then, O thou bleffed Spirit, may I never lose the love of thee! The loss of fame, of riches, and of all things here, are but of a fmall account in themfelves, and can foon be made up by thy power; but the loss of thee is the loss of more than life itself, the parting with the very anchor of my foul, and turning me adrift into a dark ocean of doubt and defpair. O then forfake not thine own, who could never have been thine own but from thy mere love and bounty, and perfect all the work of grace in me, that, before men and angels, I may give indubitable proof, that indeed I am thine !

C H A P. XVIII.

The Work of the Spirit.

HE nature of man, fince the fall, is carnal and prone to evil; nor can it raife up itfelf to the defire and enjoyment of heavenly things, but rather fhuns and abhors them. It favourcth not the things that be of God, but the things that be of men and of the world.

Now, as whatfoever is born of the flefh is flefh, and as flefh and blood cannot inherit, nor even know the kingdom of God; it is not marvelle us that Chrift fhould fay, Te mult be lorn again, or that it is abfolutely neceflary for a man to be renewed in the fpirit of his mind, before he can apprehend or enjoy the things of God. We fee this plain neceflity proved by the cafe of men; for no man teeks and knows God by all his own natural power; and every one who toth know him, frceby confeff is, that it is by f ace alone he obtained that knowledge. The first work of the Spirit, then, in a finner is, "a new birth unto righteoutnefs." As this is the Spirit's office in the covenant of grace, fo believers under it are faid to be born of the Spirit. This is their entrance into the knowledge of themfelves and of God. They are united unto God in Chrift by the act of his Spirit, and fo partake a new life, with new functions, faculties, and affections; which life is in all things opposite to the carnal life of their fallen nature, and creates, from the time of its birth, a constant warfare in them against the being and power of evil.

As this generation in its effence is the fole work of the fpirit; fo is it likewife in all its effects. When the Christian begins to live fpiritually, he is foon enabled to think and act spiritually. And as the views and objects of this life are out of the creature, and rest in God and in Christ; the Holy Spirit leads up the heart to a dependance on the divine Perfons for the attainment of them. This is faith: And thus it appears, that it is the gift and operation of the spirit.

By this faith, the christian defires, and attains what he defires: By this he prays, and hopes, and waits, and expects: By this he wreftles against fin and fatan, and the world: By this he looks with an holy contempt on all dying things, and beholds those delightful realities, which are invisible to fense: By t is he knows himfelf to be a child of God, and the purchase of Christ: By this he sees a glorious immortality provided for him, and longs often to enjoy it : By this he fuffers the will of God, as well as obeys it, knowing that it must work together for his good : By this he welcomes death itself, and at length obtains the victory over it through Jesus Christ his Lord. All this work of faith is carried on by the effectual agency of the Holy Spirit. It is an action upon the spirit of a man, which none but the God of spirits either would or could perform.

He is called the Spirit of Christ, because he not only is one with him in Jehovah, but also takes of the things of Christ and shews them to his people. Thus, where his Spirit dwells, Christ is faid to dwell, because of their infeparable union. If Christ dwell in our hearts by faith, it is therefore because the Spirit of Christ is in us, and is in us of a truth. It was the Spirit of Christ in the apostle which enabled him to fay, I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God who loved me, and gave himfelf for me.

To thee then, O thou Holy Spirit of truth, and by thine own power, do I look up for and hope, and for the increase of faith and hope, and every bleffing! O work in me to will and to do what is right, for without thee, I can neither will nor do any thing but evil, I am all depravity; but Thou art grace itself, and the God of all grace. I am weakness, instability, and want; but thou art everlasting, Strength, the Rock of ages, the Fulnels which filleth all in all. I have nothing, but thou hast all things. O behold thy poor fervant, whom thou hast made willing to serve thee; and let all the good pleasure of thy will be done in me and by me. Abate my pride, subdue my unbelief, mortify my corruptions, strengthen my soul. All that I need, supply, according to thy riches in glory by Chrift Jesus. So shall I be stedfast in thy stedfastness, lively in thy life, active in thy power, faithful in thy grace, wife in thy wifdom, ho-ly in thine holinefs, happy in thy love, perfevering to the end by thy care, comfort, and prefervation. O who and what am I, that thou hast fo tenderly brought me hitherto; when, like millions around me, I might have been justly cut off, and left filent in darkness! Help, O help me to adore thee, and to testify of thy goodness and grace, in heart, in mind, and in lip and in life, both now and for ever !

C H A P. XIX.

On the equal Obligation of Believers to the three Persons in Jehovah.

T is an error to suppose, that we are indebted to one more than another of the divine Persons; for their love is but one and the same love, as their essence or nature is one and the fame; and there could not exift fach a difference or inequality of kindness to men, unless there was such a difference or inequality in themfelves, as would not stand with the unity of their Godhead.

The love of the three Persons formed the covenant of grace from everlasting, in which they were equally and undividedly concern-ed; and though the fulfillment of this covenant had necessarily an order and distinction, according to the feveral engagements of the three distinct perfons, yet the mind and will of the Godhead were but one, and the object of their power but one, even Jehovah's glory in the falvation of finners.

The Father loved, and concurred in the redemption of his chosen by Christ; the Son loved, and bare their fins in their nature, glorifying in that nature all the attributes of the Godhead; the spirit loved, and engaged to make effectual the whole plan, by fitting the heart to receive, and by carrying to the heart the benefits of eternal falvation. Thus God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself; Christ fulfilled all that was given him to do; the spirit enlivens, enlightens, and feals to the day of redemption. This is the order of the covenant; beginning with the Father, and through the fon and Spirit defcending from heaven to the falvation of his people; but, in the order of their enjoyment of this covenant, the Spirit begins with them, and they afcend by him next to the Son, and then to the Father. This is a bleffed mystery of faith, which (however plain in the scriptures) can only be understood truly in the course of a gracious experience. No mere notions, and especially of the carnal mind, can possibly reach it. The tuition, or rather intuition, is alrogether divine.

What a bleffed thing is it to believe and to know assuredly, that the wildom, will, affection, and power, of all the Perfons in Jehovah are concerned in the falvation of every poor finner, that repenteth ? What a confidence of spirit ought not this to inspire in the children of God! If their Lord be thus engaged and concerned for their welfare; how can any of them be loft, or fail of what he hath prepared for them? O my foul, rejoice in the love of the Father, Son, and Spirit, that one God, who hath done fuch great things for thee, and who will yet do more, yea, more than eye hath feen, ear heard, or entered into the heart of man to conceive. To this ONE GOD be glory. Amen. Hallelujah!

CHAP. XX.

On the particular Defign and Use of the several Holy Scriptures.

DLESSED Lord, thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path ! Without this glorious revelation, I must have remained as I was born, a poor, heiplefs, hopelefs, and miferable finner.

By this is thy fervant taught the order and excellency of thy first creation, when man was made in righteousness and true holiness, and lived therefore in tranquility and peace. Hence I learn how he fell from thee, and, in falling, became spiritually dead and cut off from thy life in his foul; while his body received the feeds of diffolution, and began to die, from that very hour. I also am instructed to see thy mercy, proclaiming a Redeemer in the midst of thy justice, which otherwise must have destroyed, or made wretched without remedy, my whole race. Thou ordainest a covenant by facrifice with the first believers, firewing thereby in type and shadow the great atonement of Jesus Christ, who, by thine own everlassing covenant, was the Lamb slain from before the foundation of the world. By faith in this propitiation, they offered up their spiritual sacrifices, when they presented before thee the appointed creatures; and according to this faith they died, not having reccived the promises, but having scen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth.

By this holy word balfo learn, how, for the dreadful impieties of the old world, thou broughtest on a flood upon the earth, destroying all mankind but the small remnant of one family. My eyes have seen abundant testimonies of this truth, within the bowels as well as upon the face of this globe; in beholding, what once lived upon the furface at great depths beneath, and what once inhabited the feas upon the tops of the higheft mountains.

By thy bleffed record I understand, that thou madelt a covariant with Noab and Abrabane, and the otler patriarces, promising the great Saviour to them and t ir feed. Thou didst suffer their offspring to go down into Egypt, and broughtest them up again with thy mighty hand, that by this thou mightest proclaim a more gracious deliverance to thy people. The plagues of Egypt were strong emblems of the curses and evils, which fin brings upon the fouls of all men by nature; and thy visitations of Ifracl were likewife representations of thy conduct in grace towards all thy redeemed. Thou deliverest to this day thy people from the world and the devil, by the blood of the paschal Lamb, and sendest them forth from their power, to become fojourners as in a wildernefs, and to feek a better country and a heavenly.

Thou didft appoint all the rites and ceremonies of the holy law to fhew forth the Saviour's love, life and death, till he fhould come. They are lively prophecies, and wife memorials, of what he was to be, and to do, and to fuffer, for the falvation of poor finners. No mind, but thine, could have contrived such a long train of mysterious truths, which were all to be fulfilled; no power, but thine, could have established and accomplished them all from age to age; no love but thine, could have undertaken falvation at so costly an expence, as the fufferings and death of thy bleffed Son.

In this facred volume, I further read the conduct of thy providence, in preferving the chosen remnant, and in punishing the ungodly. and profane. The histories of men are composed by prejudice, and are full of falsehoods. What passeth in my own times is fo different-ly represented by different men; nay, what I have seen myself hath been so variously seen and understood by others; that, were we alike-minded to report the truth, our misapprehensions and errors are so many, that by them the fame facts would fcarce appear to be the fame things. But thy record is faithful and true, and spareth not the faults and evils of any man, neither of thy chosen people as a nation, nor of thy dearest children as individuals. Here I see thy constant love of holiness and hatred of sin. Here I read many great lessons of human infirmity, and many itrong proofs of thy forbearance, thy justice, or thy mercy. O let me while I read, remember and understand.

In this book of books, I am also instructed by large and various prophecies given forth in deep and mysterious words. By thy holy prophets thou hast indeed spoken at fundry times, and in divers manners or figures; but all their prophecies, whether by fymbol, type, vision, inspiration, or voice, declare but one final purpose, even the falvation of souls by Jesus Christ. His testimony was the very life and spirit of all their predictions.

By other parts of this blessed volume, I am edified and built up in my most holy faith.----The final patience and felf-renunciation wrought in Job, under thy visitation, instruct me in the way of thy righteoufness. The pro-verbs or fimilitudes, full of mystic sense under moral ideas, teach me to look unto thee for all my wisdom, grace, and strength. By one book I am convinced of the vanity and vexation of all worldly things; and, by another, of the mysterious height and depth of the love of Christ. I am also taught what to fing and how to fing of thy wonderful praises, by words, which thine own Spirit hath revealed, which millions of thy children have gracioufly communed with, and which infinitely exceed all the compositions of men. They are words, full of prophecy and vigorous fense, and full of joy in the faithful forelight of the prophecy fulfilled. The love of Christ is the substance, the form, yea, the very life and breath of all thy holy pfalms.

In thy gracious gospels, dear Lord, I am taught the accomplishment of every mystery and of the great work of falvation, covenanted and foretold, in the person, life, death, refurrection, ascension and intercession of my Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. O what a picture do they hold forth of the meeknefs, wifdom, grace, and compaffion of that dear Redeemer! Lord, thou knowelt how often my heart hath burned within me, when thou haft talked with me by these records, and while thou baft opened to me the feriptures. And yet thou knowest too, how often I have been one of the foels and flow of heart to believe all that thy prophets have fpoken. O give me an understanding that is true; and fo shall I be taught thy word!

The life, deeds, and writings of thy holy apostles are, in thy bleffed hands, most glori-ous and lively demonstrations of thine ever-lasting truth. They shew me how thy faints have walked; and they encourage me to be a follower of them, who now through faith and patience inherit the promifes. O my gracious
Mafter, ftrengthen me, as thou wert pleafed to ftrengthen them, with might by thy Spirit in the inner man; and fo fhall I hold on and hold out, till I receive, as they have received, the blessed end of my faith in the falvation of my soul! Thou hast also been pleased to close the prophecy, and to feal the vision, with an awful revelation, which reacheth outward to the very ends of time, and almost unveils the mighty majesty of eternity itself. I read this mystic book with solemn awe, and often tremble as I read. Thy grace hath unfolded some little of this important mystery to my mind; O grant me more understanding, fo far as may be proper for my welfare, or as my weaknefs in grace may be able to bear it. Keep me from reading with my own eyes, which are but carnal and cannot profit me, and let me be thy difciple, and thy humble difciple, alone! The ideas of this folemn book are all framed upon the principle of the ancient part of thy volume, and can only be apprehended at all through the intimate analogy of the whole.

O Lord, I bless thee, I daily bless thee, for this wonderful record of life and peace, which, if all men could spiritually read, all men would confess, that it is, and could be of no origination but thine. The impressions of divinity are so glorious and evident, that he that runs, if he hath but eyes, may read and own them. And yet in nothing is this record more true, and in nothing is human experience of it more strong and striking, than in this, that no man can believe or understand a word of it, to the falvation of his foul, unless it be given him from above, unless all his instruction be imparted by thee. Not that in thy book there is any defect indeed, but wholly in the gross, sensual, and sinful, apprehenfion of fallen man.

Open thou mine eyes, O Lord, and then shall I behold wondrous things from thy Law! Things bid.len to carnal lense, but clear and obvious to the view of that faith, which thou givest to thy children. I wait upon thee for this end. While I read and while I write, while I praise and while I pray, I seek for thine instruction.

I am a fool, without thee; but, by thee, I am made wife for eternity. Speak then in thy holy word, for thy fervant heareth; and enable me to lay up what I hear, like Mary, within my heart, that I may be a true fcribe indeed, inftructed in the kingdom of heaven, bringing forth, out of the treafure of my heart, thing new and old !

The Recollection of this first Part in Prayer to God.

O THOU ever-bleffed Jehovah, three Perfons in one Godhead, full of grace and full of glory, have mercy upon me a miferable finner! I am not worthy fo much as to look up to the throne of thy holinefs, being polluted in my nature, wicked in my life, and covered entirely with innumerable tranfgreffions. But, O, whither, whither, fhall I go for bell and fuccour, but unto thee, O Lord, where is, thefe my manifold abominations, and most jully difpleafed ! Wonderful goodnefs! Thou haft com-

Wonderful goodness! Thou hast commanded me to come, and invited me to prefent myself before thee, with most astonishing testimonies of favor and acceptance. Thou hast found a way to make satisfaction to thine offended majesty and justice, not by my punishment and ruin fo fully deferved, but by the fufferings and death of thy dear Son. By high thou hait magnified thy law and made it honorable through an infinite and perfect righteoufnefs, which he hath completed for it. For thefe wonderful ends, by thine everlassing covenant he took into his divinity our human flesh, and became our Immanuel, or God with us: And thus he became capable of fuffering, doing, and substituting for his people, whom thus he purchased, all that was given him from thee. Having completed this whole work of falvation, he is now ascended up on high, pleading and interceding for poor finners, that they might be partakers of his glory. O how great was his love; stronger indeed than death; mightier than fin and Satan; yea, almighty to redeem !

Holy Father, how great alfo was thy love in fparing thine own Son from heaven for guilty worms, and yet in not fparing him upon earth, when bearing their nature and tranfgreffions! I am overwhelmed with a fenfe of thine unutterable benignity and compaffion, joined as it is with everlasting justice, purity, and truth.

And, thou bleffed Spirit, what do I owe unto thee, for all thy gracious work in my poor heart, enflaved as it was by fin, and by nature departed as it is from all righteoufnefs! Thou haft taken of the things of Jefus, and explained, and enforced, and enlivened them into my foul. By thee alone, I have heard, and believed, all the mysteries of redemption, needful for me to know. By thee I have experienced fome of them; and by thine aid I hope to experience-more. Be with me throughout my pilgrimage, and, in these days of rebuke and blassphemy against thy person, O grant me the evidence of thy prefence, by enabling me to abound in every word and work for thy glory.

word and work for thy glory. O thou bleffed Trinity! Thou Three-One Jehovah! God in covenant for redeemed finners! God in truth over all the world! hear and regard my prayer. Accept and fanctify my praife. I adore thee for all thine abundant mercy. I glorify thee, O Father, Son and Spirit, equal in nature, love, and majefty, with earness, though poor returns of gratitude and praise. Receive me, and whatever I am and have, graciously for Jefus' fake, who is my Master, my Saviour, my Priess, my Prophet, my King, my Lord, and my All, and also thine only Son, in whom thou art well-pleased for ever.

Lord, I am frail and full of wants. I am a poor, weak, despised, and despicable man; and yet thine own adopted child notwithstanding. Give, O give me the bread of life; lighten my dim eyes with the light of life; and supply all my need, great and various as it truly is, according to thy riches in glory by Christ Jesus! I bring a thousand and a thoufand wants, imperfections, and cares before thee; and, Lord, I can bring no other.---

REMEMBRANCER.

Thefe, and fuch as thefe, are all I have both in body and in foul. O then take me as I am, and make me what thou wouldeft have me to be. I know not of myfelf what is right or good, or wife; but thou knoweft: Therefore, I befeech thee, my bleffed God, undertake even for me! I have no refuge, but in thy power; I have no hope, but in thy promifes; and I defire nothing in this world, no, nor in the world to come, but the fweetnefs, the teftimony, the poffeffion, the glory, of thy great falvation.

O let the evidence of this falvation be made more and more clear to my mind, and the experience of it more and more firm and folid to my foul, through thy word and by thy Spirit. May I read, and understand; may I understand, and grow; till I come to the stature and measure appointed for me. Keep me from leaning on myself, less I fall into error. Help me to depend upon thee, that I may be led into all the truth ! So shall I praise thee with joyful lips, and, through my gracious Saviour, bless and adore thee, O God, my God, for ever and ever !

PART II. CHAP. I.

Upon Unbelief.

HE corruption of our nature renders the life and exercise of faith the most difficult affair in the world. It is indeed far beyond ourfelves. The apostle, therefore, ascribes our believing to the exceeding greatness of God's power, even to the effectual working of his mighty power.

Many talk of this believing, and yet but few have attained it. The affenting to a chain of principles is eafy; but the grounding of the heart in thefe principles upon Chrift, and efpecially in the times of trial; the giving up a man's felf, as nothing; the patient waiting of the foul upon the truth and promife of God; the cool and deliberate parting with the things of fenfe for the things of the fpirit, the difcovery and fuppression of the carnal and corrupt motives in the heart; all thefe are matters, which are neither in the compas, nor talke, nor inclination of flesh and blood. Hence it is, that, when men are made ferious by affliction, ficknefs, or the approach of death, they find themfelves fo much at a lots for the ufe of that faith, which perhaps, from a long profellion, they did not fulpect they had wanted. O it is dreadful to be in the dark, when we want the most light, and to have no affurance of everlasting things, when we are called to part for ever with the things of time.

The soul, indeed, that never doubted, hath never yet believed. The office of faith being to subdue unbelief in all its activities; this often makes a fore and difficult conflict in the foul. Carnal reason looks for the demonstrations of sense, and cannot receive the things of the Spirit of God; for these being in their nature out of its comprehension, they appear foolishness unto it; and therefore this weak and fleshly reason cannot bring a strong and living confidence to the foul. Faith is chiefly occupied in things above animal fense, and often against it; but reason, beginning with ignorance, and proceeding upon doubt, feeks its rest in sensation, and can rise no higher. A man, therefore, cannot be reasoned by natural deductions and convictions out of unbelief into faith, but must be faved, through the gift and working of the divine power, first to possels faith, and afterwards to use it.

The mind likewise can never subdue its diftreffing doubts by its own exercise, but only by the gracious help of God: And the very looking for this help is from faith. Faith brings indeed its proper evidences with it; but thefe are all in the divine record, which, by the demonstration of the Spirit, answers the ignorant objections of carnal reason, and (what is vaftly beyond the power of all the reason in the world) at once filences, fatisfies, comforts, and renews the mind. Thus faith relies, and the Spirit testifies; and this conjunction of what the foul is enabled to yield with what in that act it immediately receives, constitutes that full abundance of certitude, which should be the grand aim of the children of God. After ye believed, ye were fealed with that Holy Spirit of promise, which is the EARNEST of our inheritance.

This is not the work of a day. Conflicts and exercises are repeated continually; because while flesh remains in the believer, it will be unbelieving flesh, ever expecting sensation instead of faith, which is directly contrary to God's method of falvation. Man fell by difbelieving; and he is raised again through believing. He is to trust God for every thing, before he can have the true enjoyment of any.

Faith doth not take away all doubting, becaufe it doth not take away the body, nor the indwelling of fin in that body; but it fubdues the reigning fury and the raging prevalence of doubting. It conftantly attacks the body of fin, which is the grand caufe of doubting. Sometimes, it gives the Christian such clear views, as make him wonder, how he could doubt at all. And yet the doubting will again and again return, though perhaps with lefs frequency and strength. Its fudden attacks however are very distressing : And these are permitted of God, in order to shew, that the soul is not to live by any thing imparted to it here, but fimply and continually by that faith, which sleads the foul out of itfelf to God in all its views and defires.

This is a difficult, though a daily leffon.-Lord, teach it thy fervant; or the knowledge will be too excellent and fublime for him to attain it! Let it be also not a lesson of theory and notion only, but of practice and experience, that I may become skilful in the word of righteousness, and know how to repel by it the fad assaults, which while I am here, will daily be made against me. O let thy mercies come to me O Lord; even thy salvation according to thy word: So shall I have wherewith to answer him that reproacheth me, for I trust in thy word!

CHAP. II.

How have I received Christ?

IIE apostle says, As ye have received Christ Jesus the Land, so walk ye in him. I must therefore receive him, before I can walk at all. It is a matter of the deepest consequence to my foul, that I should do both.

THE CHRISTIAN

How, then, Lord, did I receive thee? Did I seek thee first, by my own will? Alas, I was gone out of the way, like all other men; I was altogether become abominable, having no will for good, but only for evil. Did I resolve to seek thee by my best endeavours? I must confess, with shame and forrow, that my refolutions were weaker to me than Sampson's bands were in his full strength to him; and that the first or the least temptation led me away. Could my fincere obedience merit thy favour? I see, that if a man could fincerely obey in his natural state, but which indeed he cannot, having no love to the work, but only a flavish fear of hell; Lord, I fee, that thy law requires, if I would be faved by thy law, a sinless and perfect obedience, instead of this fincere and defective one, upon pain of my utter destruction. Thou hast faid in thy word, that he who offendeth in one point is guilty of all, and that by the deeds of the law shall no man living be justified. How then could I, who have offended in fo many points, be faved ? How then didit thou, in thy righteoufnefs, bring me to expect falvation?

Lord, I was poor, and vile, and miferable, I was helplefs, yet laden with iniquities; I was wounded, and lying in my blood; my cate and condition no man knew, or, knowing it, could relieve. In the midft of my mifery, was the appointed moment of thy mercy. Into my deepeft wounds thou didit pour thy oil and thy wine. Thou alone chearedft my heart with thy free falvation. In the view of what Chrift had done and fuffered for poor finners like me, and by thy gracious power applying his twofold merit; joy and gladnefs came into my foul, yea, greater than any found by men of the earth, when their corn, and wine, and cil bave encreafed.

Thy word was the inftrument, and thy Spirit the worker. He new-created me in Chrift Jefus; he renewed me in the fpirit of my mind; he made darknefs light before me, and rough places plain: By his teaching I know thy truth, by his grace I enjoy it, by his power I am kept therein, and fhall be kept, I truft, to the end. Lord, all the glory of my conversion wrought in me, and of thy complete falvation wrought for me, wholly belongeth unto thee from beginning to end ? It was in this way I received Chrift; and

It was in this way I received Chrift; and thy word, O Lord, affureth me it is the true way; becaufe it giveth to thee all the glory, and fecures to me all the benefit. In this way of humbly receiving, I must alfo walk continually. I have nothing of my own, but fer, Thou hast nothing. O my Redeemer, but grace and mercy for thy people. Help me to receive out of this eternal fulness grace for grace, according to my need, that I may walk unto all well-pleasing, and adorn thy doctrine in all things I would love much, because much hath been forgiven me. I would ferve heartily, becaufe thou haft kindly done great things indeed for me. I would live holily, becaufe it is the way to thy kingdom, and the very happines of thy kingdom itself. Let, let me, my Saviour, be more like unto thee; for, Lord, I would be thine, and only thine, forever!

Thus my heart often venteth its desires; though at times it is unsteady, dull, and ready to droop, under the weight and groffnefs of a finful body. I have no remedy for this malady but Christ, sought for in humble prayers. And when my prayers are faint and drooping, as they too frequently are, I bewail and am fick of myself, but 1 dare not leave him, lest a worse evil befall me. I therefore in compunction of spirit cast myself down before him as low as I can, praying for prayer, and intreating him that he would not leave me to my evil self, but enliven my soul with an answer of peace. When I can put forth this act of faith, there is often peace in the act itself which refreshes me, and usually comfort follows upon it, or (what is better) more faith to throw all upon him, and to live more by him, for the time to come.

CHAP. III.

· How do I live upon Christ.

ALAS! my foul, in fpiritual things, thou too often livest upon thyself. Thou seekest in frames, in forms, in creatures, and in animal life, what is only to be found in thy Redeemer, even a right inward peace and stability of mind. Outward duties are well in their . place, but they have no divine life in themfelves, and can give none to thee. They are to be performed, but not trusted in; to be ufed with grace, but not to buy grace. They are as the scaffold to the building, a mean for carrying on the spiritual work, but not the end of the great design. In the power of Christ, they are blessings; without his power, they have no help in them.

Thy first and last trust must be in Jefus.— He is the way, the truth, and the life. Without him, all prayers, praifes, rites, and ordinances dwindle into carcases without a foul. —Every performance will be carnal and corporal, unless the Saviour fill it with his divine Spirit: And when this comes, then there is a fweet communion of heart, and reviving of the foul after Christ: Then there appears a delightful view behind the veil of outward ordinances, such as no carnal eye can behold, of the Lord in his goodness, beauty, grandcur, bleffedness, and glory.

Mere professors stick in the flesh, and mistake the worship of the body and the motion of the lips, for the love, talte, action, and adoration of the soul. Religion is too sentimental for those, who rather walk by a course than live in it. The road indeed may be a good one; but these no more travel therein, than a corpse in a hearse can be faid to be making a journey.

My foul, thy life and thy liveliness are all laid up in Christ, and to be drawn from him according to thy need. Thou hast no stock left to thy own disposal. As the manna was received daily from above, to thou must live out of thyself for thy spiritual daily bread. Having pleaded thy pardon by his blood, and thy justification by his righteousnes, thou must live on him for grace still to plead both, to enjoy both, to commune with him from time to time, to deny thyself, to renounce the world and the devil, to master corruptions, to be growing wifer in his word, and more rich in its experience, and, in short, to use him for thine all in all. The whole of this is fpiritual and therefore difficult work; and thou art quite unable to perform it in any respect, but through that strength which is made persect in weakness. If Christ indeed be thy life; then, because he liveth, thou shalt live also.

In living thus upon Christ, thou art to live above thyself, and certainly above every thing, which thou thyself canst perform. This is the true and sublime life of the inner man, which is not corruptible, nor dependeth for vigor upon corruptible things. It is therefore a hidden life. Ye are dead (fays the apostle) and your life is bid with Christ in God. No outward or carnal eye can fee it at all, except in fome of its holy outward effects, the true excellence of which it cannot apprehend; and the spiritual understanding of other believers can only discern its inward truth and growth, but in proportion as they themselves are spiritually grown up in Christ Jesus the Lord.

As thou art not to live upon thyfelf, O my foul, fo thou canst not live this true life by the aid or opinion of others. If they are instruments of good to thee, it is thy heavenly Father, who employeth them for that end. They themselves must live upon him, as well as thou, for all their wisdom, grace and strength and not by the life of their own hand. Christ is and must be as much their life, as he is thine.

Thou fometimes waxest and wanest in thy duties, as the moon in her light. At one time, thou art full of spiritual appetite and vigor; at another, in lowness and want of strength. The cause is not in the Sun of rightcould for the substance of the substance of the who turnest not the substance of the substance of the who turnest not the substance of the substance of the moon the stars around thee, instead of the Sun; thou wilt be like the dark part of the moon turned away from the natural Sun, which often scarce appears, or, when it doth, appears very dull. In all providence, ordinances, and situations, Christ must be thy point of view, thy succour, thy light, thy life, and thy all; or they will be found, however excellent in his hand, only beggarly elements in thine.

his hand, only beggarly elements in thine. In all things that are truly divine and fpiritual, the flefh foon becomes weary, and flags, and fails. When the exercise grows difficult especially; then corrupt nature soon declines, and cannot fustain or endure the toil. Hence it is, that so many seem to receive the word with joy, and to run well for a time, who, when perfecutions or trials arise, having no root in themselves, begin to find diflikes and offences, and so prefently fall away. Their fallow hearts have not been broken up deep enough by the gospel-plough (i. e. the law) to cover well the gospel-feed. The feed of the word hath never been hidden in the beart; and so hath taken no root downward in humble and fecret contrition, nor grown into substance upwards to bring forth fruit unto perfection.

This hidden and spiritual life is often most active and strong, when the flesh is lowest and hath least to do. Be filent, O all flesh, before the Lord; for he is raifed up out of his holy habitation. When the Lord is rifen upon the foul, all that is weak and carnal, is as nothing before him. A sweet proof of this may sometimes be found in sick and dying believers. How do they triumph in spirit, with a glorious livelines, over all the infirmities of a dying body? When their heart and their flesh fail, God then appears most eminently to be the very Arength of their beart, and their portion for ever.

There is a knowledge of Christ after the flesh, which will carry men a great way into all the splendors of religious profession. It shall make a man look and talk seriously; carry him constantly to ordinances; give him great personal zeal and confidence; enable him to be very exact in all outward discipline and form of doctrine; nay, it shall bring him with a fervent activity (if a Minister) into the pulpit, help him to deliver found discourses with feeming earnestness and able oratory, so that multitudes shall hear and admire, and perhaps be wrought upon by him; and yet in himfelf it may be mere flesh, and the poor low knowledge of Christ by the flesh, after all. There is sometimes a little true life in this, and then it is strengthaned and refined by trials and temptations; but when there is none, then by time or trouble it will finally fall away. If they had really been of us, no doubt they would have continued with us.

O my foul, there are depths of fatan, as well as of God : and there is no fecurity for thee, but in renouncing the flefh, and all the fecret as well as open works of the flefh, and by following jefus thoroughly in the regeneration. In the poverty of carnal nature, the Lord will manifest the riches of his grace. Thou must be poor in thine own spirit, or thou canst not be rich in his. He filleth the hungry with good things; but those that are increased with their own goods, he will always send empty away.

O Lord, look upon me a poor and helples creature, who cannot fo much as look up to thee for aid, without thy special grace for that end. How can I live upon thee, my Saviour, unless thou come down to me in this dark and wretched world, and visit me with thy falvation ! I have waited for thy falvation, O'Lord; and I would still patiently wait in all the ways of thine appointment, expecting thy presence in the troubled pool to bless me. I expect thee, and only thee. None else can do me good. My foul graveth for true and immortal life; and this is thy gift: O give it unto me: In all thy means of grace, let my heart wait for thy grace by the means. Without thy presence all outward things are barren and dry; and my foul can find no fustenance: Lead me, O my gracious Shepherd, by thine own hand to the green pastures, and beside the waters of thy holy rest; restoring my soul, and conducting me in the paths of righteous ness for thy name's fake. So shall I walk thro' the valley of the shadow of death, neither fearing nor finding any evil; and at length arrive at the heavenly house of my God, in which I shall dwell for ever and ever.

CHAP. IV.

On Self-Seeking.

A S they, that are in the flefh, cannot pleafe God at all; fo they, that follow the flefh in any inftance, do fo far difpleafe him. This flefh is a fubtle adverfary, and will creep into our duties as well as our fins; mixing itfelf, under a thoufand forms, into almost all that we can fay, think, or do.

Who could expect to feel this deceiver in the deepeft contrition of foul, or to find him in peals of groans and fhowers of tears? Yet felf will endeavour to make a man proud of this very humility, to be plumed upon his own abafements, and to be fancying himfelf fomething, in the midft of his confessions about his vileness and nothing.

A poor foul shall own itself, with much pain and fincerity, to be a miferable finner; and felf, from this very acknowledgment, will stir up a notion of worth in the creature, and give it to believe, that there are fome feeds at least of excellency within itself, which others have not, and for having of which he is higher and better than they. Self will bid fome men confess themselves finners, that they may be confidered as faints. To take them at their word, would mortify and displease them.

When the heart of the believer is melted in duty and enjoys the liveliest frame of communion and love; how often and how much is felf to be found therein, either attempting to puff up with an high opinion, or to inflill a carnal fecurity concerning its fpiritual intereft and welfare? If it can abate the power and watchfulnefs of faith, it will lay a ground of diftrefs to the believer in the next trial; fc that he will ioon find himfelf yet to be in the nefh, and that (as one fays) " He must never think to put off his armour, till he is ready for cthers to put on his strond."

A man may appear excellent in religious conversation, and be eminent in public duties; he may speak and write much, and perhaps well, upon the things of God, and may recom-mend them with zeal to others; and yet fo much of self may be in ali, that, when he looks over his heart and discovers it, he will rather find reason to be ashamed of the whole than to be fatisfied with any one part of it. I know not, whether, in writing these pages, there be not so much of this evil mixing itfelf, as to defile and almost nullify any good that may be in them. And though I can humbly look to God for the fincerity and uprightness of my general aim, yet such are my apprehensions of my own carnality, vanity, emptineis, and felflove, and of the finfulnels of given them indulgence, in ferious things especially, that I am sometimes inclined to throw the whole afide. I fee this hateful principle in almost every thing I can fay or do, and am ashamed of myself and of it; but still it rifes again and again, though often detected; and therefore 1 am obliged continually to cast myself with a redoubled fense of my mean, weak, vain, and vile condition of nature, upon the sole and free mercy of God my Saviour.

In fuccels of duty for God, and in being the instrument of good to others, this selfishness of our hearts will endeavour, if not to rob God entirely of his glory, yet at least to share with him in it. Self will be pleased, because we ourselves have been concerned, because we have been honored, and because by us the Lord hath been magnified in the fouls of others. It is felf, which is vexed. when this is not the cafe, and when we have toiled for nothing, or others have caught the Whereas, our spirits should rejoice fishes. in the will of the Lord, and be as much pleafed when his work prospers in other hands, as in our own. And thus indeed they would rejoice, if this corrupt self did not mix with and seek its own establishment in the most spiritual exercises of our souls. We too much forget, that we are only inflruments, and that we can do no more of ourselves for God, than our pens can write down our thoughts, when not taken up by our hands.

All this may ferve to shew, what a fevere jealously we should hold concerning ourfelves. We should not only pray, but watch unto prayer; we should both perform our religious duties with zool and should examine well the zeal with which we perform them ; we fhould abound in every work and labour of love, and fhould entreat for wifdom and grace, that flesh and self may not abound in them too; we should ask again and again for a single eye and a fimple heart, that all the glory of every good may be given to God its right Owner, and that we may be kept in our true place, admiring his mercy, and shewing forth entirely, his honour and praise.

CHAP. V.

On the different appearances of grace in differcnt persons.

HERE are diversities of operations, but it is the same God, who worketh all in all. Some believers are remarkable for the strength of their faith in trials even unto death; others for their liveliness and activity in duty; others for their wildom, conduct, and prudence both in temporals and spirituals; others for their zeal in defence of the truth; others for their knowledge in the mysteries of the truth; others for their patience, meekneis and gentlenefs; others for their fubmission to the will of God; others for outward usefulnes in the church; and others for an inward and spiritual life of communion with God. But all these are the various gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit, dividing to every man feverally as he will, and not the talents or abilities of fallen nature.—They are alfo given to every man, who hath them to prophet withal, according to his place in the church or in the world. He, who hath one of these graces should not undervalue or despise him, who hath another; for the Giver is the same, though his gifts may be granted for different ends.

REMEMBRANCER.

Very often particular graces are bestowed to counteract and oppose particular corruptions, of which the Lord himself can be the only true judge. Some situations of Christians require gifts of grace, which might be less necessary, or less manifestative of the divine glory in them, than they would be in others. The Lord distributeth wisely and kindly to all his people, according to their day and duty, or according to his own defigns in them and for them. But they are all of them his workman/bip, and could, not more in grace than in nature, either create or fashion themselves.

This fhould teach thee, my fellow christian, a lesson of forbearance to thy brethren. It is not right for thee to judge another by thine own pattern. He may have graces, not less pleasing to God, nor less useful in their purpose, than those which are given to thee. Art thou a warm and active christian ? condemn not him whose endowments may be more placid and contemplative than thine. He who now creeps as a inale in humble filence, may, by one lift of divine power get into heaven before thee, and perhaps be raifed higher there than thou. God judgeth not like man, according to the outward shew, but according to the fecret riches of his love. Art thou a quiet and retired believer? Do not censure him, who is called forth to more flirring duty, than thou art. Though his work may feem less spiritual to thee, it may be to introduce figns of providence and grace, which only God can foreknow, and which may be the means of carrying out his faving power far and wide. Some of the first reformers were less remarkable for a quiet and gentle spirit, than some who have followed them; but these last do not seem so sit instruments for grappling with papal outrage and tyranny, as they were. When rough work is to be done, men use the axe and the faw; but, for gentler operations, the plane, the razor, or the knife. These last would not cut down a forest; nor would the first serve to polish or smoothe.

Honor then the work and bleffing of God upon his people, in what form foever it may be found. Every member has his appointed office from him. It is felf-love and conceit, which difparage others; and these we will not call gifts from above, but rather worms from beneath, which seek to gnaw the root of the vine. Covet, indeed, and earnestly, the best gifts; but the love of God and man is, after all, the more excellent way.

CHAP. VI.

On the difference of myself from myself.

ORD, how variable a creature am I ? Unitable as water, changeable as wind, different as the weather, when I am left, in any inftance or degree, to myfelf. One of our English kings, from his flackness, was called the unready; and the fame name, with respect to my best concerns, will often serve for me.

Sometimes I have a fair day of comfort and hope; but the clouds come on again, and gather blacknefs over my foul. Suavis hora, brevis mora: Short and fweet was the hour of my fpiritual delight, but the time of my dullnefs and drooping hath been frequent and long.

Bleffed be thy name, O Lord, that my real state with thee doth not depend upon my vigor, livelines, and constancy, but upon those only sure grounds, thy faithfulness, mercy, omnipotence, and truth. Whatever I II 2 am or may be in myself, thou art and wilt be always the fame, and always the fame to me.

The time, or rather the eternity, is at hand, when my flate will be unchangeable, and my frames will be unchangeable too. The crowns of glory cannot fade; nor those that wear them, alter or decay. I shall both know, as I am known, and in all things shall be like to my immutable and glorious Saviour, when I get into his kingdom.

Why then should my present variations distress me? I live not by them, nor for them, but upon a higher principle, and for a more exalted end. This is the time of faith, in which I must wrestle, and labour, and strive, against all the difadvantages of an evil nature and an evil world; and I am to look for strength from Christ. who will be honoured in my weakness and deficiency, which compel me to give up myself inceffantly to him. He is engaged to preferve me by his own oath and unchangeable covenant; and therefore, come fair, come foul; let me have either comfort or forrow; all must be well at the last, for he hath promised, and most affuredly will give me, a safe and abundant entrance into heaven.

CHAP. VII.

On bridling the Tongue.

T hath been a frequent confession of wise and good men, that they have often lamented their speaking too much, but seldom their holding their tongue. In the multitude of words, there will be fome folly, something that will not tend to edification, something that may rather weary and offend than delight and inform.

This evil of over-fpeaking usually comes from an over-weening opinion of felf. Unchastified and unsubdued felf is fond of its own display; although it can display nothing, or, were it not deceiving and deceived, nothing but its own wretchedness and ruin. The apostle hath a striking hint for professors of religion: If any man among you seem to be religious, and bridleth not his tongue, but deceiveth his own heart, this man's religion is vain.

What is our end in religious conversation ? If we speak without a purpose, surely it is folly. If we speak for our own praise, it is a wrong to our own souls, and a robbery of God. If we speak for his honour, and the edification of others, we should look up to him for his bleffing, that our words as they ought, may be weighty and wife. In this humble dependence upon God, and with a warm and generous concern for the spiritual welfare of others, our discourse may be com-fortable and edifying, both to them and to ourselves. The more of this kind of confer. ence, the better; care being taken of the fpirit in which we speak, of the time and propriety of speaking, and of not mixing other things (as it is too often the case) with our religious discourse, which may render it triffing or unfavory. When we have faid all that we could with to fay upon things divine, it will be profitable to withdraw, that there may be a due opportunity for reflection, meditation, digestion, and prayer.

C H A P. VIII.

Upon false Appearances.

HE whole world walketh in a malquerade, or, as the fcripture calls it, an image, or vain flow. Scarce any man would appear as he is, but as he is not, before others; and he loves to indulge even his own mind in the fame deceitful view of himfelf. The more artfully he can put on the veil, the finer man he feems, often in his own effeem, generally in the effeem of others; and nothing mortifies him more than when fome wind of trial blows this veil but a little afide, fo that others perceive a part at least of what he hath been always very industrious to conceal.

This difguife is the handy work of evil and corrupted nature fallen from the truth and purity of God, into a ftrong love and likenefs of the perplexed and foolifh fubtlety which fully occupies that being, who is the father and author of lies from the beginning. To plead for this diffimulation, as fome have done, is to turn advocate for the evil one, whofe fees are vanity and vexation in this world, and fomething worfe in the world to come.

Our depraved nature cannot bear to fee its own wickednefs, and much lefs to have it exposed. What shifts and turns, what labours and difficulties, will it not encounter, to obtain a great name and opinion, though it be but a false one? And how will it be delighted, as with a prize, in the fleeting breath of dying creatures, who have only for a memorial of themselves fome filthy monument of fin or of shame? To be open and fincere, is counted a weaknefs; because it lowers a man's power of taking those advantages for interest and same, which all men by nature are pursuing, and which, in a state of nature, they think to be the only object worth pursuing, as the highest and greatest good.

And, alas, how much of this difguife is brought into the things and church of God! I lament, for one, how prone I am to cheat myfelf, and to wifh more for the effeem of others, than I ought to think of, or than I can pofibly deferve! I would be all fair, and valuable, and excellent, and what not, in their efteem; while I am confcious to myfelf, that there is within me fo much vanity, weaknefs, dullnefs, wretchednefs and evil, az might juftly fuffice to render me in their eyes, what any of them, that can look into themfelves, must appear to be in their own.

I have difpleafed fome, whom I did not intend to difpleafe; and others have offended me, perhaps with a contrary intention: The fame perfons and myfelf have been mutually fatisfied at one time, and diffatisfied at another; and wherefore? Not becaufe my nature or their's was better or worfe at any time; but only becaufe it fometimes difcovered itfelf more according to the occafion: And when it drops the difguile of goodnefs which we can regard, or difcovers itfelf too plainly; finners as we are, we cannot love it, fo odious and depraved is it become fince the original ruin. We cannot love it in others, nor others becaufe of it; though we are at a world of pains to conceal, to indulge, or to drefs off the ugly monster in ourfelves.

It is this depravity, which hath begotten hypocrify not only in the world at large, or in courts or particular callings of men, where certainly it doth reign absolutely and univerfally, but also in religious profession, where furely it ought not. It hath reigned especially in this last, since it hath been esteemed a scandal not to be called a christian. It is true, indeed, that the appearance of religion is certainly better than the appearance of evil; but however, when men feek to appear religious, for the selfish honor or carnal comfort which may follow from others upon account of it, they only feek themfelves, and are but the less truly religious for all their professions.

Why am I grieved, if others think lightly of my gracious attainments?—Becaufe I am grown unjuftly great in my own effects for things, which are not invown, but given to me. But doth not this very grief prove, that their judgment is but too right, and that my real flature is not fo tall as I think it? If I were humbled in myfelf, in tome degree as I ought to be (for, in the full and juft degree, no man can be humbled in this life) I fhould approve their fincerity towards me, and contentedly fit down before them in the loweft room. Their low opinion would not hurt me, becaufe it would be the fame as my own. The vilenefs of my heart, and the low progress I have made in christian experience, are indeed sufficient to humble me every day I breathe; and it is only my own blindnefs, or a falseness to myself, that leads me to forget either my own real condition, or the place where I ought to stand.

We are not naturally honeft to ourfelves; and we do not wish that others should deal honeftly with us. If we were truly honeft and wile (and grace only can make us fo in any degree) we should meekly hear, and even wish to hear, of our own frailties, errors and defects, that we might grow the true chrif-tian growth, which does not confift in the favourable opinion of men and of our own minds; but in lowlinefs of heart, and spirituality of life, respecting ourselves; in patience, quietness, and good will, with regard to c-thers; in contrition, humiliation, and submillion before God.

Professors live too much outwardly. Religion is carried often into the ftrong animal passions, not to subdue, but to feed them. Hence the poor anger and violence of a corrupted nature are frequently mistaken for zeal, for life, and for power. But noise, and bustie, and tumult, and hurry; the agitations of temper, and strong concerns for influence, or authority, or direction, among men; the parade of religion, or the superiority of a party; may all be carried on with very small degrees of real grace, and reihaps with none at all. If we do not live for God in our religion, we must live outwardly, and fo shall endeavour to make a fair shew in the fless; but if we have his prefence indeed, the truest part of our life will be bidden, and we shall much and gladly retire within to enjoy it. The most certain fign of our real growth will be, the finking into ourfelves as vileness and nothing; the being thought meanly of with content, if not pleasure; and the rising up of our feuls towards God with fecret delight, ardour, affection, and constancy. All this may be done before HIM, who feeth in fecret, far better than in the corners of the stress, or places of public refort. We shall aim, through grace, to be gracious, rather than to appear fo.

This hidden life my foul pants for, O Lord, thou knowelt; whatever becomes of my outward respect among men. If I have the more of thee for the loss of this, it will be indeed a rich amends. Nay, it will be better for me to be without human regards, left I should grow more proud than I already am, and so lose that fight of thee, which I always enjoy most sweetly and clearly in the deepest renunciation and depression of myfelf. O make me more and more dead to the opinion of even gracious men, that my poverty and meannels may ever be before me, and that I may constantly be relinquishing my it in all form- and circumstances, fo that I may have more inward and intimate fellowship, friends: p, complacency, and nearness, with thee!

> Carelefs, myfelf a dying man, Of dying men's estcem; Happy, O Lord, if thou opprove, I hough all beside condemn.

CHAP. IX.

On the Spirit of the World.

N OTHING more fully proves the fall of man from his original creation, than the opposition and temper of his foul, while in his natural state, to the things of God. His wishes, his hopes, his labours, his principles of action and thinking, are all turned directly to another way. God is not really (whatever a man of the world may speculate) in all his thoughts. He is without God, or rather, in sober truth, he is (as the apolite calls him) an atheist in the world.

Hence it is, that the people of the world have in all ages reputed the people of God either to be fools, in not laying themfelves out for fuch things as wholly engage themfelves, or knavifh hypocrites, who only take a pretended fpiritual method to accomplifh the fame carnal and felfish ends. And if they can find an inftance or two (as they often have done and may do) to confirm this opinion; O how do they infult over professors of all kinds, and run down religion itself, as tho' it were a trap or an engine for all manner of deceit, or at best a whimfical paradife, framed by superstition for dunces and fools !

On the other hand, how wild, mad, befoited, and phrenetic, do all the agitations of. these men seem to the christian, in his retired and confiderate hours? They are pursuing, in his view, lies and shadows, vapours and dreams. They grasp after something, they fcarce know what. Ever restless, they are always upon the hunt; but never finding, never satisfied. They live weary and tired lives, full of envy, disappointment and care : and they die hopeless deaths, either in abject terror at what may come upon them hereafter, or in the stupid opinion, that God created them only to live like maggots upon the trash of the earth, and then at last to be thrown into a hole to rot away into nothing. Such is the fordid spirit and wildom of this world!

CHAP. X.

On the Pride of the Heart.

NOST of the difcomforts of our lives arile from the pride of our hearts, unmortified and unfubdued. Did I think as meanly and humt'y of myself, as from the knowledge of my weakness and sinfulness I ought; the contempt or the infult of others would not hurt cr afflict me. But I am falfe to myself, and therefore lifted up, alluming to my vile nature what it hath no right to expect; and I am falle to others, wearing appearances to create respect and efteem, which is walking in a maik, and rendering myself foolishly proud. If men faw me, and I faw them as we really are; we should none of us be much inclined to boast of ourselves; but our glorying must exher cease, or ele be wholly in the Lord.

This pride hath occasioned to my foul a world of trouble, both when it hath reigned unfubdued, and while, through grace and trials it hath been in the acts of fubduing.

When it is unfuedued, the heart is open to all manner of mortifications. A look, a gefture, or a word shall put it to pain; and when this pain rages, the passions will begin to rave, and throw the whole frame into miserable violence and diforder. Outward opposition will make it worfe. The inflamation then grows often to a degree of phrenzy, which nothing hardly, can foothe or allay. And it is one of the wonders of providence, that this pride of man, when combined and raging in multitudes, doth not confound all order and rules, more than it doth, and utterly ruin and deftroy the world.

To fubdue this fore evil, in his people, is one great end of God in afflicting dispensations.—They are high in themselves; and it is necessary for their good, that they should be brought down. Whatever answers this end, come in what shape it may, it is all a blessing.

Did fuch an one use me ill, or speak con-temptuously of me? As David said of She-mei, it is because the Lord hath permitted him.—Hath he treated me as I deferve ? Why then am I angry? He hath been to me a mel-fenger of truth, whatever were his inten-tions, with which I have nothing to do; and, therefore, let me own the truth, and fall down in abasement and contrition before God.—Is the censure false ? I have no right to be offended: he hath not hit me, but him-Telf, and becomes therefore the object of my prayer. If in this instance, his condemnation hath been wrong; my heart knoweth in how many others, and perpaps in worse, it would have been just and right. In every view, I have no fair claim to be flattered with the applagfes of men, but to be humbled in myself for all the weakness, worthlessness and evil,, that cleave to me in all things. If I felt this as I ought, and walked as I ought in the continual tenfe of it; I should be afhamed to be proud, and should abhor myself for the bold injustice and iniquity of being so, in dust and ashes.

I believe, that fome chriftians have more trials and afflictions in the flefh than others, because there is more natural stubbornness of pride and wilfulness in them. The Lord will have these to be subdued. And he suiteth all his chassifiements with great and unerring wisdom to the occasion.—If they thought of this aright, they would not be so much in care to ged rid of the visitation, as to have the design of it answered within them. They would pray to be humbled under the mighty hand of God, that he might exalt them in the right way, and in the due time.

It is my pride, and my felf-will which proceeds from pride, that renders me fo uneafy with God and others. Were I truly lowly, and deeply fenfible of my own condition, not the opinion and hard words of others, but my own fin would offend me. I am imperfect, as in all other graces, fo elpecially in humility; and therefore I fret in myfelf, and am inclined to fpeak and to render evil for evil. O Lord, help me, a poor feeble man, and hide pride from mine eyes! Suffer me not to fall upon this flumbling-block, which hath overturned the world; but help me to follow Jefus, who was meek and lowly in heart, and by him find reft to my foul!

REMEMBRANCER.

CHAP. XI.

Comparison between carnal and spiritual Wisdom.

CARNAL wildom is the highest attainment of the carnal mind. It is an exhibition of fallen ...an in his fairest and most cultivated form; and is therefore the aim and defire of the best of natural men.

This wifdom (for we will call it at prefent by that name) arifing from a depraved and corrupt principle, is neceffarily weak and corrupt likewife. It feeks earthly and carnal things, is occupied entirely upon them, and looks no higher, and finds no more, when left to its own inclinations and powers. I his wifdom, therefore, is called in the fcripture, earthly, fenfual, develifb. It acts only upon and for this prefent world: It is plunged in the fenfuality and defigns of it through an earthly evil nature : It is like fatan, in total oppofition to the will and holinefs of God, ferving, as its laft end, the creature inftead of the Creator.

Thus the learned man is proud of his knowledge, as it gives him superiority over others: The statesman, by his political understanding, pursue and triumphs in his own grandeur: The merchant by his skill in trade, heaps up to himself riches: The meshanic by his art and ingenuity, assumes his peculiar diffinction: The carnal divine (for such an one there may be) is learned, and zealous for his party or profession, or for his own carnal exaltation in it. In short, it is no matter whether the means be high or low, but every man of every condition, employs all his understanding and all his powers for carnal views, for earthly glory, and for temporal attainments. If his plans are calculated for these, and especially if they succeed, he is admired, applauded and admitted to be a great, a wife, or an extraordinary man.

But, alas! how vain and perifhing, how delufive and unfatisfactory, is this fhort lived wifdom, and all that it can feek after or find! To what purpole are the eager wearifome toils and cares, the fludious anxieties and reftlefs purfuits, of all the millions of mortals in ages paft, whofe airy glory is forgotten, and whofe very names are extinguished and loft? And, if not lost and ext aguished, yet of what value or confequence are they now, beyond the fleeting idea and imagination of mortals like themfelves? And to how few, even in this laft poor way, doth the remembrance extend? And how unknown and infignificant is all this to the owners, whofe very image is departed from the world on which they doted ?

This is the highest prize of all earthly wisdom; and is not this perfectly fanciful, fleeting, trivial, and vain? In the grave all its thoughts perish, equally with the low notions and opinions of the ignorant and the foolish, the noor and the despised, REMEMBRANCER.

But there is a WISDOM, which (unlike the other) deferves the name, and, being no production of this corrupted earth but coming from above, is pure and ipiritual in its nature, and, in all its purposes and exects, true, real, lasting, and happy.

Its origin is in grace from HIM, who is the Fountain of wildom. And its first effect is in. the renunciation and abasement of felf, as that which is falle and contrary. Thus the fear of the Lord is the beginning, or first fruits which the foul can preferit, of wildom; and thus a man must become a tool, that he may be wife. This wildom fees the ignorance of all other pretended wildom, detects its bale and grovelling pursuits, and lifts up the soul, not to a temporary dying fame, which is often infamy with God, but to a folid and perpetual good. It discovers the deceivable. noss of unrighteousness in the heart and in the world, the poornels of every thing out of Christ, and the great value of Christ and of the soul above all other things. It doth not lift up a man in himself, as a great and glor:ous doctor for human admiration; but it makes him low in his own eyes, through a view of the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus his Lord; and it keeps him from aiming at vain glory, as being a kind of trea. fon against God, and as an unjust attainment for himself a poor, dependent, ignorant sin-ner. The christian, made wile to salvation. dreads to be left to his own wildom; be cause, he knows, that blindness is its other and its truer name.

Chrift is made, of God, wildom to the believer. He spake, as never man spake; and none teacheth like him. He often gives a poor and ignorant countryman such instructions, as render him abundantly more wise, than the mere scholar by all the florid pomp of the schools. So engrasted too are his instructions, that the art of man, and the sophistry of starn cannot bassle those who possess them. His knowledge is solid, and real, and enjoyable; such as the heart can feel, the soul live by, the spirit exult in, the whole man act upon, amidst a thousand trials in the world, and in the nearest prospect of death and eternity.

Poffeffing this wildom, how ferenely can the christian look down upon the bustling. cares and pursuits of men, upon their honors, their pleasures, their riches; even as a man of great natural wildom would look down upon the follies and recreations of boys? Toys and games employ the attention of children, and engage their passions, though frivolous and fleeting: And are the folicitudes of men, and of old men too, less idle or extravagant, when they lay out all their time, and strength, and souls, for that which profiteth not even here, and which none pretend to be profitable in the day of wrath? What poor things are these of the world in the hours' of fickness and pain? and how much poorer ftill in the hour of approaching death ? Honors, titles, and eftates, cannot remove a pang, nor give one drop of confolation; but, in many cafes, afford a wifh of difmal remorfe to their owners, that they had never obtained them. There is, I fear, more than one Dives in eternity, who laments that he had not been a hundred times poorer and forer than any Lazarus (with grace) was or could be in this world.

True wildom proves its own worth by obtaining a proper and valuable end. On the other hand, that cannot be real, but delusive, wildom, which is always working and promifing, and at last concludes in nothing, or nothing but ruin. But this is the most, which is attained by the wildom of this world, spiritually viewed; It gains air and dirt, a name and a perishing good (if a good) below; and then it ceases to act, leaving its poor possifier only misery and disappointment, except a fearful expectation of an unwished and unwelcome hereaster. Can the end of the meerest ideot be more stupid and unwise?

Without a doubt, the affairs of this life must be carried on, and the christian must more or lefs be engaged in them; but the wisdom of grace in his foul will teach him, that there are also other affairs to mind; affairs of infinitely more moment to him, than all the world put together. If he should gain the utmost or the whole of this earth, and lose himself and the end of his being, where would be his profit and advantage? People, who can speculate clearly and nicely for gains in common matters, would do well to carry. their thoughts of profit and loss a little farther towards the end of time, when all things are to be balanced and settled forever.

Lord, above all wildom of earth, and earthly gain, may I obtain that wildom, which leadeth to an happy immortality, and which shall abide with me beyond the bounds of time! I am a poor dying creature, going fast out of this world, and almost upon the very threshold of another. Othelp me to see then, what can truly profit, or what may really hinder me; that the loins of my mind may be girt up with the girdle of faving wildom, and that I may always be fo running, as at length to obtain the crown! O preferve my heart from that unwife wildom, which layeth up what must foon be lost, and squanders a-way what can never be regained! which thinketh much of airy trifles, and almost not at all, or not at all to any purpose, of an unperishing good !-Of a good which thy Spi-rit hath called, an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, a crown of glory that fadeth not a-way, a building of God cternal in the heavens, a kingdom which cannot be shaken, a blessednels which eye hath not feels nor car heard, nor entered into the heart of man, yea, rivers of joy and pleasure for evermore !--I.ord, if the give but the wisdom to obtain these; I shall very foon ceafe to lament the want of all wifdom beside!

Upon Independence.

MEN desire what is called independent fortunes, through their natural arrogance, and fond indulgence to their flesh ! And because believers are flesh as well as spirit, therefore, in proportion as that flesh is spiritually uncircumcifed and unfubdued, even do these require this meat of the world for their lust. It is very irksome to a believer's carnal nature, that he lives in his spirit the life of faith; and it will be more and more irkfome to nature, as this life grows in him and is proved by trials, which tend to deny or abridge his earthly defires. The flesh cannot delight in any thing, that doth not gratify its fenses; but the life of the spirit consists greatly in crucifying the flesh with its affections and lusts, in trusting God through a naked promise for what is yet unseen, and in giving up will, hope, defire, and every thing within and without, to his disposal. This is all horrid and difmal, yea, death itself, to the natural man. He hates, and abhors, and fcoffs, and fets all his wits and passions at work to cry down a life fo strange and peculiar, that he must even die to himself and all he loves, before he can live it. But wholoever will fave this life of the carnal mind, shall lose it; and whofoever shall lose it, by the mercy of

THE CHRISTIAN

God, shall find a better, even a life of confidence and communion with Christ Jesus.

This princple of independence, or averfion to live in fimple truft upon God, is the fecret caufe why many profeffors baften to be rich, or will be rich in this world, though by it they fall into a fnare, and is to many foolifb and burtful lufts, which drown men into ruin and perdition. If I can get fuch and fuch a fortune, I will do fo and to (fay they) and then ferve God without diffraction. But the fleft is not to be laid afleep by indulgence, nor the fire to be put out by heaping up fuel. Experience fhews that large poffeffions do much oftener damp any little life or zeal for God, than quicken the chriftian's hope and concern for a better world

The fpirit of faith teaches another leffon. It bids a man commit all bis way to the Lord, and rather to fear than to court great riches; knowing what mifchiefs and wretchednefs they have brought upon many, who once feemed to run well; and knowing alfo the natural defire of the carnal mind to covet thefe things merely for its own food and feafting.

The goodnels of God, therefore providentially keeps his children, for the most part, poor in this world, that they might live in the fuller trust and dependence upon himself. He that doth not expect much from this world, cannot be much disposinted by it.

REMIMBRANCER.

When a man h in little or nothing before him, he looks to e best help: So the poor christian sees, that God is his best help, and therefore lives humbly upon his bounty. In this way of continual trust and daily dependence, and not by fulness of bread or independence, he is made rich in faith by additional experiences, and walks with more and more strength and sweetness of spirit as an beir of the kingdom.

On the other hand, how many rich pro-fessors are there, who plead their very fitua-tions in life, as so many falle reasons, why they should be gay and splendid, why they should see all forts of fine company, no mat-ter of whom, why they should have pom-pous eqipage and luxurious tables, and why, in short, they should have every thing in dress, manner and custom, which their poor, vain, foolish, unmortified flesh can defire to have? They feem not to fee, how in all this they are living to themfelves or to earth, and not to God or his glory among men. How it is, that they support faith at any rate, with every indulgence and ease to the flesh, with full conformity to the world, and with the entire good opinion of the world, I know not; but this I know, that, if the true life be supported amidst so much contagion and disease, it is because all things are possible with God, though with men this, among others, is impos-fible. I speak not against rank and station, for these are providential appointments and neceffary in therafelves; but against the abuse of these to pride, sloth, vanity, and all the common evils and excesses of a polluted world. And I believe also, that I do not speak from envy or chagrin; for I really know not the man in this world, with whom I should wish or dare to wish an exchange of situation.

Lord, let me have what is beft for my true life and welfare, and that only. Make me contented in thy allotment. I have often been otherwife, and am ftill prone to defire unneceffary and 'dangerous things: O forgive me this error and blindnefs, and correct the madnefs of my proud and rebellious heart by the fervent faithful life of thy Holy Spirit. So fhall I defire only what wilk pleafe thee, and be content in my foul with what thou giveft, or when thou denieft, however my flefh may ftrive to murmur and repine. O hear me; and let my whole truft, my God, be in thee !

wretched, is the common eager purfuit after high distinctions in the world! They not only come up, and are cut down, like the grass, withering into dust and oblivion; bur, while they appear, they are empty and fleeting shadows, or (if it can be conceived) the very "shadow of a shade." If viewed at a distance, they seem solid as a mountain; if embraced closely, they are found but a cloud. Their possessions are poor, because ever in want; one blast of honour will not serve him, that wishes for two; nor a thousand him, that can hope for more. The dominion of, Europe would make a natural man pant for Asa; and he that cannot be satisfied without an additional province or river, would not be satisfied with this whole world if he had it, but like Alexander, would grasp and la-ment for another. Whatever a natural man hath, it is no matter; he never hath enough; he always wants more. Consequently he is poor; and he is wretched, because he perpe-tually feels himself poor. He hath both miferies from his poverty, and torments from his pride.

The real christian is enabled to pity the anxious absurdity and vexatious vanity of those things, which are the great jet and concern of the wordly great and wordly wise. He looketh indeed for a name, but it is for an everlasting name, which cannot be cut off. He is not content to be happy only for a few days or years, but defires to be bleffed and joyful for thousands and millions of ages to come. He longs for a crown, but it is for a crown of glory that fadeth not away. He pants for a kingdom, but it is for the kingdom of Christ and of God.—He is really a perfon of boundless ambition; for nothing less will ferve him than the infinite realms of everlasting glory. Riches are much upon his heart; but they are the durable, the unfearchable riches of Christ. He cannot be put off with the paltry cares and thorny honors of worldly greatness; but nobly purfues, and with certainty too, the very happiness and grandeur of God himself, even that very glory which Christ received from the Father, and which, as their Head, he will share with his members.

Compared with this, all the pride and glory of man appear but as stubble or falsehood, the mere dream of a shadow, a nothing. And if human greatness can appear thus in the believers ideas now; what will it seem, when the earth itself shall be dissolved, and the Babylon of sin upon it shall be thrown down into perpetual ruins?

On worldly Company.

ALL things may be lawful, but all are not expedient. It may be lawful for a chrif-tian to be much among the men of this world, and in some cases it may be necessary, for the discharge of lawful callings; but, it is not expedient certainly to be more among them, than is thus strictly proper and ne-ceffary. Either the christian must enter into their spirit, or they into his, before they can be agreeable companions. If he takes up their spirit, surely it will be to his grief, and his burden. And it is very unlikely that they should come into his; unless God might bless his faith<sup>f</sup> l discourses to the good of their souls. But this is feldom the case in worldly company, and especially in the company of many worldly men 'together. The corruptions of one will bear up and harden the corruptions of another; and he, that perhaps would not have jeered alone, will scoff by sympathy with a mocking croud. It is best in first of miritual things with carnat men by themielves; when common decency magnifice them to give a patient hearing, sreat though grave may not crown the difcourfe with a bleffing. An whole herd may trample upon your jewels, and then turn again to rent you.

That man's religion is much to be doubted of, who frequents the fociety of the men of this world for fatisfaction and pleafure.— Hw can two, even two only walk together, unles they be agreed? If ye were of the world, the world would love its own; but because ye are not of the world; but I have chosen you (fays Chrift) out of the world, therefore the world bateth you.

Can a man touch filth, and not be defiled; or fire and not be hurt? How much lefs then can a man conform to the fpirit of this world, without pollution to his foul, or without feeling the lofs of that peace, if he ever had it, which the world can neither give nor take away? it is no wonder that men complain of fpiritual falls and defertations, when they ftand upon flippery places, and leave the prefence of God for the prefence of mammon. How can a heart, reeking from the hot dunghill of this filthy world, be offered as a fweet fmelling favor to God, or hope to be accepted with returns of his heavenly fire?

CHAP. XV.

The manners of the world are hurtful and hine dering to Believers.

HE apostle declared it, as his privilege, that the world was crucified to him, and he to the world. Another apostle fays, that whofoever will be a friend to the world, is the enemy of God. And Christ assures us, that we cannot ferve God and mammon, infomuch that if we would approve outfelves to be his disciples, we must take up our cross daily and follow kim.

This is very evident; they, who are the most given to the modes of this world, and inix most with its customs and pursuits, are the least alive to God, and the least lively in the things of God. Gaiety and foppery of drefs, mimicry of worldly pride, and parade, the hollow language of fashionable companies and friendship, do ill become a christian, and never promote his true welfare. It is not indeed the custom at this day to fay such things to professions; but they are not however, the less true, or the less needful.

Poor and wretched are all these fooleries, when weighed in the balance of the fanctuary, and especially when they thrust out the 1841 THE CHRISTIAN enjoyment of things divine. To have gay bodily apparel with cold and naked fouls; to posses fulnels of bread with emptinels of grace; to enjoy much worldly company, and lose the fociety of God and his faints; to be esteemed polite and genteel in manners with men, and to be aukward and dumb in addreffes to God; is all such a complication of folly, meannels, misery, and fin, as a chriftian, in his right mind, should be amazed at and abhor.

Are we loved by the world? It is for this reason, the world will love its own. But how then are we chosen out of the world? How then can we belong to Christ, whom the world hateth? This trimming between God and the world is neither for the comfort of our souls, nor for the credit of our profession on.

Do we fear to be cenfured for fingularity and precision? A christian must be fingular; for he is one of those, who is not to be numbered with the nations, a Aranger and a pilgrim, or passenger, here; and he must be precise, neither loving the world nor living for the world, for otherwise the love of the Father is not in him.

On the other hand, an open and generous civility, a gentle and benevolent deportment, bespeaking fincerity of heart and holiness of life, are truly ornamental to the christian. In avoiding the ape, a believer needs not to stumble upon the bear; nor, in shunning grimace and affectation, to plunge into fournels and brutality. If meeknels, patience, gentlenels, good will, and good works, will pleafe all men; it is his duty, by these means, to study to pleafe them. But if they expect his conformity to the world for their pleafure, and are difgusted at the transformation and renewal of his mind, as it is more than probable they will be; it is then his honour and his privilege not in this way to pleafe them, if he would approve himself to be the fervant of Christ

Though- the christian, in one fense, must be in the world and put his best hand to its businels and affairs, according to his lot from God's providence; yet, in another sense, he must come out from the world, and be separate, less his sould be hindered and defiled. He cannot enter into the spirit of the world without injury and loss: And it is the spirit, not the lawful business of the world, which contains all the evil. In his calling and concerns, a believer is to glorify God: And he is enabled to do this, first by the prayer of faith over them, and then by the life of faith in them. That business and those intentions, which will not admit of these, are to be avoided as the very plague.

Lord, how poor and vile are all the gay modes of this world, compared with the fimplicity and enjoyment of thy truth ! how beggarly and unfatisfying are its vanities, how low and crawling its ambition, how foolis and cheating its hopes, how vain and unprofitable its cares, how various and continual its troubles, how wretched and horrible its end! O give me thy wildom and love, thy grace and thy truth; for this is that better part, which shall never be taken from me!

CHAP. XVI.

On conversation among Profess.

HERE are many professors of religion, who are always craving for company. They think, that to be alone, is to be dull, and that, without conversing with creatures, they must be filent and stupid, whimfical or melancholy. Such perfons are to be pitied, ho have not learned the divine fecret of talking with God in private by fervent faith and prayer, who know not how to listen to the still small voice of his spirit in his holy word, who cannot find an endless delight in discovering and tasting the sweets of redemption, and who loathe to commune with their own hearts, in their closet or their chamber, and be still.

When such persons get into company, and especially into great company, they soon difcover how unfit, as christian professors, they are to be in it. The discourse, if of God and his truths, will be light and unfavory, without unction or folid experience; or if their converse turn, as it generally will upon men and earthly things, it will only differ from the language and spirit of this world, by being spoken by persons who wish to be thought of as living for another.

It is a melancholy truth, that the levity, diffipation, envy, calumny, and detraction, too often found among companies and parties, profeffedly religious, as well as among the people of the world, make retirement very neceffary to the christian who would walk much with God, and far more cheerful than the generality of talkative professions can conceive it to be. But the foul, which is led to the true enjoyment of divine communion, finds it a relief, rather than a burden, to cease from man.

The christian should not, if possible, get into company, but either to impart fome if ritual good, or to receive it. If he hath grace and talents for the former, he will, before discourse, secretly look up to God for aid and blessing, and afterwards will defire, rather to be humbled for what he could not say, or for the manner of saying it, than to be pleased, on his own account, for any thing he did fay, or for the satisfaction afforded to others. If, on the other hand, he hath received edification from godly conversation, he will then pray, that it may abide with him, that the fweet favor may not be loft, that it may be carried into lively act and experience, and that, like good feed upon good ground, it may increase with the increase of God, and bring forth fruit abundantly to perfection.

All this implies, that large and mingled affemblies must be more noify than profitable. There hath been of this at all times very fufficient evidence. Great entertainments and many perfons called together to enjoy them, may ferve to keep out the calm ferenity and fweet poffeffion of divine reflections, but perhaps too rarely promote them. In many words, there will probably be errors and tolly; nor do numbers in a company always multiply wifdom. The flefh may be gratified and feasted, while the fpirit may be flarved, and wearied, and dry, and at last fent empty way.

• It is the way of God to feed his people with the rod [of his gracious and felecting power] even his flock his heritage, which dwell folitarily in the wood, in the mid/t of Carmel [the field of the world :] And they do feed [like Abraham and the patriarchs, who were ftrangers and pilgrims upon earth] in Bashan and Gilead [the lang appointed for them] as in the days of old. Wicah vii. 14. They were ever a people dwelling alone [in abstraction from the spirit of this world] and not reckoned among the nations. Numb. xxiii. 9.

If I have thee, O my God, I have pleni-tude of fociety, though (like the bleffed John at Patmos) no creature should be nigh, or though I should be an outcast from all the world. Thou canst talk with me by thy works, by thy providences, and chiefly by thy Spirit and word. O what delight have I felt in the testimonies of thy faithfulness and truth, of thy mercy and grace, of thy prefence and love, of thy glory and power! Surely, furely, when I have enjoyed these in their genuine sweetness, retired from every eye but thine; it hath seemed hard to go forth again into the world, or even into the converse of those, whom thy own providence converie of thole, whom thy own providence and grace have endeared to me. And if this be to divinely delightful, in a mortal body and a miferable world, O what thall my fe-licity be, when I become a pure exalted fpi-rit with pure life, in the calm and unfpotted regions of glory —When I think of eliefe induterable mercies, how can I but long and pant, how can I but hunger and thirft for God, the living God, my God, my own God and my own for ever! God, and my own for ever !

C H A P. XVII.

On the changes of time.

OW do the things of this world pafs away! One generation followeth another, and another that, and fo on from age to age, filling up the long rolls of time in melancholy array. They appear long to me, becaufe my rule of comparison is taken from the fhortness of human life; but to eternity, to the everlasting existence and infinitude of my God, these ages are almost a nothing. Into this eternity all that can be called time is continually passing, as into a gulph which hath neither bottom nor bound. Thus time is full changes and vicifitudes; while eternity is not only a perpetual now, but also a perpetual fame.

When I look back into the hiftories of ancient days, and review the confusions and violences that have passed (for the history of the world is little more than a record of its fins;) I ask my heart, to what purpose have all these things been, and where is now the profit to those evil men, who promoted them? Their works are in the dust, or at best upon paper; fo that, excepting perhaps for punishment, they have neither remained here, nor followed their authors. All their hopes, and cares, and commotions; their own reftlefinefs, and their inquietudes to others; are buried all in everlafting gloom. The pleafant remembrance of their gayeft hours is either extinguished, or swallowed up in forrow for their fin; and the prospect before them—O what can this be, but a complication of all that is dreadful, unavoidable, and eternal!

This cool and ferious review of all worldly things and affairs paffes to often upon my mind, and feems to neceffary in reminding me, how much I am but a ftranger and fojourner here, that, if I have dwelt a little the more upon the vain wickednefs of this world, the reader will know the reafon in me, if he feel no occasion to apply it to himfelf.

A state of the second second

One cannot take up an annual kalendar of names, published only twenty or thirty years ago, without almost considering one elf among the tombs. The gay courtier and the plotting statesman, who once figured away within the senate or about the throne, now say in undistinguishable ruin with the beggar and the clown; not less vile than these, and perhaps not less regarded and forgotten that the lowest of the low.

And what shall preferve, from the like difaster, all the present system of cares and pleafures ? If, indeed, that can be called a system, which begins in evil, is carried on with diforder, and ends in folly or nothing. O but (fays one) I bave much goods laid up for many years; and I will fay to my foul; foul, take thy eafe, eat, drink; and be merry. One of this fort, not worthy to be named, is put down in God's record for an everlafting fool. In the fame night his foul was required of him, and had fomething elfe to think of than to attend the abfurd bufinefs, which only the body could do, of eating, drinking, and being merry, in the abufe of temporal good.

In the midfl of all this perifhing and difordered flate, there is one rich bleffing, which never can fail. The mercy of Jehovah in Chrift Jefus endureth, yea endureth for ever. This is often repeated by the Lord himfelf, that it might be confiantly and cheerfully believed.

O my foul, thy time faileth, thy body is decaying, the world is daily changing, and nothing about thee continucth in one flay. Bleffed be God, to thee likewife a change thall foon come, and come for the better in the midth of it all ! Whatever alterations appear, thou haft an unalterable God, and an unalterable home before thee. If the earth fall into defiruction, as foon it will, thy effate cannot be loft; for thou art only a pilgrim and traveller here, and thy inheritance is above, out of the reach of ruin. Thy intereft being fafe in Chrift, all is fafe, that is worth faving, with refpect to thee. Thou canft only pafs from death into life, from fin to holinefs, from pain to peace, from earth to heaven, from mortals to God.

God. O how then fhould I rejoice in thee, my Saviour and my Lord! In thee, who makeft all things mine; all, either as good, or to lead me to good. I adore thee, that thou thus dispose the world, life, death, things present, or things to come, in my behalf; calling them mine, making them really mine, because they contribute to my welfare. Above all, I bless thee for the end. I am lost in love and admiration, when thou tellest me, that I am thine, O my Redeemer; as thou art God's!

What manner of love is this; that I, a mutable worm, fhould become an immutable spirit; that I, who live in a tottering house of clay amidit a people of unclean lips, should be raifed to a mansion of glory among the innumerable company of faints and angels; that I, a dull inhabitant of a miserable world, ruined and ravaged by fin and time, should be translated to a joyful rest, unchanging as eternity; that I, who was once a slave to fatan and deferve only to live with him, should be made and kept a child of God, yea, an heir of God and a joint heir with Christ Jesus, of a kingdom which cannot be shaken ! O what manner of love is this indeed !

CHAP. XVIII.

On the patient enduring of wrongs.

IKE the bleffed Pfalmist, I have sometimes been rewarded evil for good, to the great discomfort of my soul. It seems trying to flesh and blood; that is to my animal and corrupt passions to bear all and to say nothing: But yet this is generally my wisdom and my duty.

It is my wifdom, because then I do not stir up further evil or strife in my own bosom, or in others; and I moreover engage my gracious Master to undertake for me, by committing all in silent patience to him, who hath engaged to make every thing, and such things as these most certainly among the rest, work together for my good. Thus that, which appears to be only a natural evil, will, by his superior management and controul, be turned into a spiritual blesfing.

It is also my duty to endure, confidering him who bore the most severe contradiction of sinners against himself; because thereby I prove that I belong to him; for which purpose, perhaps, trials of this kind may have been permitted to fall upon me. If I have right and truth on my fide, it is not only faithlefs but also unreasonable to be impatient. I ought rather to be thankful in that behalf, and to alk mercy and grace for those, who flander me against all equity and without a cause. It is indeed unpleasant to have the treatment, which he experienced who said, I became a reproach among all my neighbours; and they of mine acquaintance were afraid of me, and they that did see me without conveyed themselves from me : But this may be God's physic to my foul, which is not given me for my pleasure, but as the painful means of fu-ture good. My worldly attachments, or my christian attachments in a worldly way, may be growing stronger than are for the true health of my soul; and, therefore, this is 2 call to live more inwardly upon grace, and to wait in faith and prayer for more sommu-nion with God. When I gain his company by losing the company of the friendship of men, and even of good men with great cor-ruptions like my own; I have no reason to lament any loss, but to be thankful, with all humility for the kindness of arous provide humility, for the kindness of every provi-dence, which leads me nearer and keeps me closer to my bleffed Lord. He is a tried and sure friend indeed, a friend for eternity.

If I took another fort of conduct, and exposed those as I might, and perhaps as they justly may deferve, who have done me evil for good; I should indulge only that base revenge of my fallen nature, which would pluage me as deep another way-in the corruption, of which I may have right to complain. While I am only wronged, I am fafe; but I am open to all manner of evil, when guilty of wrong.

Above all the harm that can be done me by creatures, let me tremble at my own passions, which, like tinder, are ready to kindle by the smallest spark of mental fire. May I tremble too at the officious readiness of others to increase my inflamation by their own. And alas! how much more ready is corrupt nature to feel and to foment discord, than to subdue and abhor it! Let me pray then to be delivered from the strife of other men's tongues, and to have a strong restraint, for such I greatly need, upon mine. Sin " is the great kill-friend," as one calls it; may I therefore beg to be guarded against sin, both in myself and in them.

O Lord, what a nature, and what a world, do I live in! I groan under a nature, which is ready to meet all the evils and confusions that are in the world, and to make every one of them my own. How doth the unquiet spirit of man plunge himfelf and all about him, into confusions, miseries, and distreffes; engendering unhappy discords among individuals, and bloody cruel wars among the nations! And how often, my bleffed Master, instead of retiring to thy bosom, have I myfelf allowed this spirit of violence within me, and met it in other men! How much have I wronged my enemies by not praying for them, as I ought, when they have ver d their wrongs against me! With how little patience and submission to thy will have I endured these wrongs; not confidering, that they could not have come, unless they had been permitted by thee, and were allowed to come altogether for my good! O Lord, wipe off my guilt by thy most precious blood, and enable me in future, as well not to take offence, as to be earness to give none. So shall I appear indeed to be the disciple of thee, my Saviour, who, like a patient speechlets lamb, didit endure all manner of infults and injuries, and so, in following thee, I shall find peace at least by thy grace, both in thy bosom and in my own, though I find none beside throughout this distracted world !

CHAP. XIX.

On Prayer,

RAYER is the very breath of faith, and the first evidence of life in the new man. The Lord faid of Paul, Behold he Prayeth; because the Lord had then given him a heart to pray. Doubtles, he had often fasted and prayed before, as far as the lips were concerned: But the spirit, not words; life, not expression only, constitute prayer with God.

Language may give it a form; but language alone is like mere body without a foul; and he, that fo offers it, renders to God a dead unclean carcafe for a living facrifice, which is an abomination in his fight.

Whatever hath life must breathe; and if the life be found and strong, it will breathe freely. Short, irregular, difordered breath, difcovers either great exercise or ill health. It is the fame in the life of faith. If the foul be quickened by Christ, it will breathe out its defires after him; perhaps, like a child at first, mingled with strong crying, bitter fobs, and many tears; but still it breathes on and prays on; its breath of prayer is not stopped, but struggles for life and increase. If the prayer be faint and weak, difordered and low, the person is not in full life and health, or elfe fome great temptation oppresses him heavily. The Physician of souls must be looked to for medicine, and the Redeemer of fouls for deliverance. Certainly all is not right; and a speedy help should be fought for and applied.

When the mind is touched by grace, it will and mult pray. If the heart cannot find words to carry up its requests, it will fend them forth in earnest groans. Prayer can no more be kept from ascending than flame from the fire. The Spirit (said one who understood this matter well) belpeth our infirmities : for we know not what we should pray for as we ought; but the Spirit itself maketh interceffion for us with groanings which cannot be uttered. The cries of a drowning man are above the formality of words, and aim to pierce the ear for help : So the deep-felt! anguish of a convinced heart is inexpressibly! eager for mercy, and with moans and groans fues it out from God in right earness. It doth not feek a florid oration, but pours out afpirations, at times, too ardent and mighty for words. O how God loveth fuch addresses at these! One Abba Father, one tearful figh; one inward groan; are beyond, and better than, all the fine speeches in the world.

Let not the broken-hearted finner grieve then too much, that he cannot find language to express the fullness of his defires. His defires are the better for being found in his bofom too large and strong for utterance: There is more of heaven in them, and they will break out at last the twifter towards heaven. If he can find fit words, let him use them; if he cannot, let not their absence increase his concern. God knows and loves the language of the heart, and in due time will answer the prayer.

ļ

As to the gift of wordy prayer, it is generally beltowed for the fake of others. If accompanied with faith, it is highly valuable for godly edifying: If not, it will rather weary than improve. This gift is ftirred up to more ulefulnefs by exercise; and when exprefilons flow eafily, the heart can freely open itself without over-much labor or fear.

M

150 THE CHRISTIAN

As to public ministrations of prayer, the un-happy zeal of party renders it difficult to fpeak of them without danger of offence. However, this every candid christian may ven-ture to allow, that a form of found words may more decently be used for congregations, than the loofe, crude, and incoherent expresfions of raw and unexperienced men. On the other hand, could the church be always fure of found and able ministers, who might rightly pray over the word of truth, as well as divide it; there certainly would be lefs occasion for forms, which seem to have been composed to prevent disorders, or keep out heresies, or to shew to the church at large, what should be the objects of prayer at all times. No one furely can deny, that, in both the Jewish and christian church, where public forms have been used, men have prayed together with the Spirit, and perhaps with the more under-standing and cor munion because they knew the words, and that it is possible to do so now with any sound and gracious form. So, on the other hand, it would be bigotted and unchristianlike to affirm, that the Spirit of grace hath not bleffed what is called free prayer to the edification of souls; when, doubtles, there are now living numberless witness, of great truth and piety, to the contrary. It never was the form or the want of it, that made true prayer; but the grace of God in Christ Jesus, flowing through the words, that were used, to the heart. And if all these gracious perfons, divefting themfelves of narrow prejudices, were afked, How and by what means they prayed? They would probably anfwer to a man, that it was by faith in Chrift Jefus and by the good Spirit of their God. If both fides, then, are thus in debt to grace for the very life and being of all their prayers, and are thus alibe free to confederite how the and are thus alike free to confess it; how then should the meekness and forbearance of their dear Lord glow in all their hearts towards each other, and caufe them to love one another gladly, because he hath made no difference in his love to them ? Surely, this would be much better than to wrangle about a mode or no mode of prayer, in either of which, just zs God blesses, there may be much true prayer or no prayer at all. It is the spirit of faith which carries on the real business; not the form or the gesture, the lip or the tongue.

Having ventured thus far to walk upon ground, which party and prejudice have made very tender; it may be expedient for my foul to confider the fubject of prayer in a view more interesting and necessary to its welfare.

My Saviour commands me to watch, as well as to pray; and his apoftle exhorts me to be fober and watch unto prayer. My flefh is prone to be intoxicated with the myftic cup of Babylon, with the love of this prefent evil world, and therefore is unruly and unfteady. From hence arife all my dullnefs and diftractions of mind in the things of God; my coldness and weariness in prayer, my feebles ness in duties, and my faintness in praise. I had need to be fober, for I have a great concern before me; I ought to watch, for my enemies are fubtle and mighty. They watch, if I do not, and are always ready to take advantages to hinder, whenever I am careless to get forward. I have an open door, and many adverfaries. If I do not watch unto prayer, the world will get between me and my duty; if I do not watch in prayer, fatan will do his utmost to prevent my fweet or continued approach unto God: if I do not watch after prayer, pride, prefumption, fecurity, or negligence, will find a way into my heart. O Lord, if I were fully and constantly aware of my true fituation, how could I think to do less than always to pray and not to faint !

My vile heart is ever ready to take up with the mere performance of duty. How often have I prayed for fpiritual mercies; and not confidered afterwards whether God hath granted them, or not? For increase of faith, wisdom, holines, and other graces, I have asked with earnestness at the time, and then foon have forgotten what I asked for, or neglected to mark the event. Hence all the lowness of my attainments in divine things, and my overborne subjection to things earthly. And when I have requested temporal bleffings; how little have I confidered the hand of God in granting, or the wisdom of God in refusing them! How often have I fought the good for its own fake, inflead of feeking it for God's glory and my fpiritual welfare, and thereby was ready to turn it, if granted, into an evil! How little use have I made of temporal benefits, when they have been given me, and sometimes given, unexpectedly too, that I might notice God's providence; and how ready hath my corrupt nature been to take and apply them all to itself! Surely, I am as much the monument of God's patience, as of his love.

It is a matter always to be had in remembrance, that prayer should be followed up with thanksgiving. I ought to be thankful, if what I have prayed for is received; and I should be thankful also, if what I have prayed for is restrained. God is better to me than I am to myself; and he only restrains any thing from his children, either because it is not good for them at all, or not good in the time and purpose, for which they defired it.

The practice of many faints under the Old Testament was to pray thrice in a day. According to opportunity, I cannot pray too often, either in the closet, the family, or the church. There are indeed stated times for these; but one kind of prayers may be used at all times, and in every circumstance of life. The prayers of ejaculation, or of darting up the heart towards God, in short and pathetic sentences, have a wonderful effect in them, and tend very much to keep up the feul's communion with God, and the life of holinefs in all things. Many fuch may be taken from the Pfalms in particular. O how fweetly will they often pais towards heaven from the foul ! How warmly (tir up the affections, and raife the mind ! How ftrongly check the inordinate care of earthly things !

Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart, be always scoeptable in thy fight; O LORD, my strength, and my Redeemer !

CHAP. XX.

On finging praises to God.

HE first of all earthly singers gave this as an inspired rule; Sing ye praises with understanding. Without spiritual understanding, we can only make a noise. Unless we know how deeply we are indebted to God, and have the sweet sense of his goodness in our sould be found of his goodness in our sould be source with a tune, but we yield no music to him. Some of old chanted to the sound of the viol, and invented to themselves instruments of music; but, at the same time, they were among those, who were at ease in Zion, and who put far aREMEMBRANCER. 135 way the evil day, to whom we was denounc-ed. God never instituted music in his fervice, however, like other carnal ordinances, he might bear with it under the Jewith œconomy; but only trumpets and rams' horns, to usher in the seasons and solemnities. It is spiritual harmony which is the delight of heaven, and not outward jingle and found; and therefore if we are not spiritual, we can have no true notion of this delight, nor make melo-dy in our hearts to the Lord. The thrills of music, and the divine joys of the soul, are very different things. Worldly men have had the sirft, and thought them from heaven; but they continued no longer than the found; while the peace of gracious praise, is full, sublime, and abiding. We must indeed be real christians before any of us can say with the apostle, I will pray with the SPIRIT, and I will pray with the understanding also; I will fing with the SPIRIT, and I will fing with the understanding also.

I cannot but shake my head, when I hear an officer of the church calling upon the people, "to fing to the praise and glory of God;" and immediately half a dozen merry men, in a high place shall take up the matter, and most loudly chant it away to the praise and glory of themselves. The tune perhaps shall be too difficult for the most part of the congregation, who have no leifure to study crotches and quavers; and so the most delightful of all public worship shall be wrested from them, and the praifes of God taken out of their months. It is no matter whence this cuitom arole: In itself it is neither holy, decent, nor useful, and therefore ought to be banished entirely from the churches of God.

When christians sing altogether in some eafy tune, accommodated to the words of their praise, and not likely to take off their attention from sense to sound; then, experience shews, they fing most luftily (as the Pfalmist expresses it) and with the best good courage. The symphony of voice and the sympathy of heart may flow through the whole congregation, which is the finest rausic to truly serious perfons, and the most acceptable to God, of any in the world. To fing with grace in their bearts to the Lord, is the melody of heaven itfelf; and often brings a foretalte of heaven to the redeemed even here. But jingle, piping, found, and finging, without this divine accompanyment, are grating discordant harshness with God, and vapid wretched insipidity to the fouts of his people.

I am no enemy to much as an human art; but let all things be in their place. The pleafures of the ear are not the gracious acts of God's Spirit in the foul; but the effect of vibrated matter upon an outward fenfe. This may be indulged as an innocent and ingenious amufement; but what have our amufements to do with folemn and facred adorations of God? Would not this be carnal, and after the modes of the world, and not after Obrif!?

Surely, no believer will venture to call any thing spiritual, which doth not proceed from the Spirit of life, or tend to mortify the old man with his affections and lusts.

Neither founds of air, nor words of fense, alone, however excellent, can please Ged. He is a Spirit; and they, who worship him, muse worship bim, in spirit and in truth; for such he seeketh.

Lord, help me, I befeech thee, thus to laud and adore thee! Give me a lively sense of thy mercy to my foul; and then my foul shall offer up her gracious returns of lively praise. Sacrifice and burnt offering thou requirest not, for no outward thing even of thine own appointment, when not inwardly understood, can please thee; the music of my voice, without the incense or breachings of my soul, thou wilt not accept: G affift me, then, to praise thee aright; for, without thee. I can do nothing. Thou alone givent occasion to praise; and then also givent the Spirit of praise to use the occasion. Vouchsafe both unto me. Then shall I one day join the great affembly of the first-born, whose names are written in heaven, and fing, with joy unspeakable and full of glozy, that ever new long, Salvation to our God wbs litteth upon the spronc and to the Lamb! Amen: Bleffing, and glary, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and bonour, and power, and might, be unto our God for ever and ever, Amen?

CHAP. XXI.

A Christian, in losing bis Life, faves it.

HRIST hath faid, Whofoever will come after me, let him deny himfelf, and take up his crofs daily and follow me. For whofoever will fave his life, shall lose it; but whofoever shall lose his life for my sake, the same shall save it. In doing this, the christian must die daily.

In doing this, the christian must die daily. He is crucified with Christ in the flesh, that he may live with Christ in the spirit. His mortal body is brought into subjection to the rule of grace; and grace mortifies that body, by crucifying its affections and lusts.

These words are easy and plain; but alas! how few do know them! To die to felf, is the most painful thing to flesh and blood, that can be. To be stripped of all pretended worth, to renounce a man's own righteousness as well as his fins, to give up in earnest his own will and way, to live in an empty frame of mind simply upon Christ for strength, wisdom, grace, and falvation, to defire nothing but what may please him, to be contented with the trials he secause they are his, to have a heart carried above the world, not to fear man against God, to bear, to believe, to hope, to endure all things as the best, and to maintain a firm view of eternal glory; all this is losing a man's own carnal life, and faving the life of his foul in Jefus Chrift. The chriftian, who hath this in him, may fay with the apostle : I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life, which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me.

At first sight, this kind of life appears gloo-my and dreadful; but, when once truly tasted, it is fweet and pleasant to the foul. It grows less difficult and painful, as the carnal life is more and more subdued. The life of the flesh can only indulge some poor, base, and vexatious gratifications in earthly and perishing things; but the renewed life of the spirit consists in righteousness, joy, and peace in the Holy Ghost, which cannot be lost, and which never can cloy. The enjoyment of this renders the christian, in proportion to his enjoyment, a steady man, unshaken or unfubdued by the diforders and diftress of the world, and cleaving the faster to God when come. A worldly man is often terrified to his wit's end, or to death, where a real christian can be calm and refigned. He hath learned • the worth of all life in Christ; and he knows, that what is really worth his anxiety, can never be lost. In throwing all upon God, he loses the fears and terrors of his weak and corrupt flesh, and gains strength and live-liness in his soul. God gives him a tranqu lity of courage, which the braveit human heart cannot put on. Women of delicate tendernels, by this gracious gift, have met the very king of terrors, with a lobernels of triumph, unknown to mortal heroes.

These mortal heroes indeed may have ventured upon death, despising life and all its enjoyments; but were evidently concerned for their vain glory and the useless perpetuity of a name. The peculiar distinction of the christian he b is, that he not only can meet death as a vanquished foe, but also can look down upon the infamy of the world with a noble form, valuing it and all reputation among worms, as trilling pageantry or idle pride. He can live and die in fecret, which none of these oftentatious morals can either endure or dare to do.

No man can live truly by his own power, but only by power from on high. The chriftian, therefore, is daily looking up to Jefus, his head of life for the maintenance and fupport of all his graces. If Chrift withdraw his hand, he must fall; for, in himfelf, the ftrongest, the wilest, the holiest christian, is confusion, and wickedness, weakness and nothing. He feels himself void of all good, and to flies to Jefus to obtain it. When he doth not enjoy his Saviour, he cannot enjoy himself. But when he hath him, he hath more than all things, because he hath him who posses them all.

They who are great, and love to be great, in outward things, have commonly bet little of this life within them. When the foul hath no feaft within, it gads abroad for delight, and will put up with mean and carnal trafh, unfuitable to its proper nature, rather than have nothing. Outward pomp and carnal fhew, in religion, commonly proclaim an inward emptines and want.

There is a carnal knowledge of spiritual things, which the apostle calls a knowing Chrift after the flesh, and which is very dit-terent from the divine knowledge of those things. The apostles appear to have been in the former state till the day of Pentecost, when they received power from on high. They indeed loved Chrift and fincerely followed him before; but their love and knowledge of the Saviour had in it a large mixture of flesh and corruption. Hence, they were astonished to hear of his sufferings and death, and their own humiliation, when, it is plain enough, , they expected great temporal advancement and honor for themselves, and a glorious temporal kingdom for him. Even after his refurrection, like the Jews at large, they thought of a kingdom to be reflured unto Ifracl: But, when the true kingdom cause into their hearts, we hear no more of these carnal expectations, but of joy and readinats to suffer persecution and death for their Lord, and to go fomewhere else, instead of this world, to enjoy him.

So among us called christians, there is this carnal knowledge of Christ, consisting in outward profession and a natural understanding of the truths of the gospel, which is also mix-ed sometimes with the degrees of grace and spiritual life. But persons, in this state, are much in outward things, are great outwardly, talk of religion outwardly and of its great ad-vancement in the world. They are strong in their animal passions, carry these into religious matters, make a great noise and bustle among men, are great rulers if possible, seek to carry all church-affairs in their own way, and in short are never easy out of a busile, and in mort are never easy out of a buille, and certainly never easy in it. When these peo-ple fink into themselves by getting more true life in Christ, they are found to be more and more mild, humble, patient, gentle, not ob-truding themselves into things which they have not seen, nor vainly puffed up by their flessly mind. Then Christ is all in all to them; and they themselves nothing at all. Then it is that they lose their own lives, and find them with great interest and sweetness in Christ.

If the love and word of Chrift dwell in us richly in all wisdom, we shall defire to be much with Christ in our spirits, and to shut out all possible interruptions and hindrances in our communion with him.

CHAP. XXII.

On the opinion of carnal Men.

HE judgment, which natural men form of fpiritual, is altogether wild and extravagant, grofs and injurious. The things of God himfelf are foolifhnefs unto them, neither can they know them, becaufe they are fpiritually difcerned. And can those think rightly of the people of God, who have not the faculties to think rightly of the things, which render them diffict from other men, and which are the very grounds and principles of God's conduct towards them ? And ought a christian to be moved exceedingly at the judgment of ignorance and error ?

This world's opinion of all divine things is indeed very foolish and vain. It condemns what it hath not feen, and despifes what it doth not know. It laughs at the wisdom of God, which it is too weak to apprehend, and sets up its own perishing foily in its stead. a few years shall lay it low; and the wisest of the wordly wise will be the first to condemn themselves for the madman and the fools. Wisd. v. 4.

Be fatisfied then fellow-christian, with the just judgment of God. Thou could not be more despised than thy Saviour. The indeed deferved no scorn, but thou much more than thou canst have. If they called the Master of the house Belzebub; shall those, who are of the houshold, think to escape a hard name? No; let them bear it for his sake: It will never disgrace them in heaven.

CHAP. XXIII.

On the effcem of good Men.

HOUGH a nice sense of honor, confistent with his profession, becomes a christian; yet an over-nice care to get honor from any, man is neither the duty nor practice of the christian life.

But not too anxious, my brother, for the good opinion even of the beft ot men, nor altogether judge of thy flate by fo uncertain a rule. Concern of this kind feems to argue a too fond regard of thy carnal felf, or of thy own flate in the world. If they differpect, and if it arife from milt? e; rejoice that thy true hidden life depends not on the opinion of mortals, but on the love and juft judgment of an unerring Redeemer. The opinion of others can neither make nor unmake thee, as a chriftian. But if their difefteem be founded in truth, four not to dive to the bottom of thing one undefervings, and ceale not to pray for grace to correct them. Be not offended with thy brethren, in either cafe; for this will lead to ruptures neither for their profit nor thine. The glory of God and of his truth is alfo concerned, which fhould fill thee with the greater forbearance and caution in all thy dealings with the houfhold of faith. Pray for wifdom to examine thy caufe faithfully, to know the worft that can be found of thyfelf, and to fee into the truth or miftake of others. And if, in thine own confcience, the right be with thee; be thankful for the mercy, and ceafe not, becaufe they need it, to pray for them who are in the wrong. Thy true charity fhould relieve, in this way, their fpiritual neceffity, and for ife, with that lawful triumph of a chriftian, by an holy and inward fuperiority of meeknefs and of truth.

Beware of anger and offence. The wrath of man cannot work the righteoufnefs of God. Be humbled by every difesteem, whether just or unjust, within thyself. This is gaining a step in the great inward and spiritual progress of felf-renunciation; for which end these means, though unpleasant to proud nature, may have been mercifully and providentially ordained. Fear not to see the worst of thine own infirmities: Tremble tather, less they should be hidden from these. When thou art made truly low in thine own eyes, the flights and contempts even of good men, proceeding as they usually do, not from grace but common infirmities, will not over-much vex thee.

THE CHRISTIAN

It is the fondness of self, and the pride of our hearts which render all outward insult and injury distressing and painful. He that thinks little of himself, can bear to be thought little of by others : But he, that is listed up within, is grieved, when he cannot find that tribute of respect, which his own foolish fondness hath ordained for himself.

The best remedy for spiritual diforder is spiritual prayer. Corruption inflicts or seels pain; and grace should subdue corruption. It is the true wildom of a christian to set his faith, and not the passions of his unholy nature, at work upon evil. Grace will teach him not to huff, or fnort, or refent, or speak great swelling words of carnal indignation; but to bear and forbear, and pray, and wait, and intreat, according to the occasion. When the rough north wind of trial rages and raves; - then the graces of the christian should more abundantly flow. All this is difficult without a doubt ; but will not a gracious success be afterwards a comfort to the believer, both as it affords a real proof of the true life of Christ within him, and an occasion of glorifying God before men? And if it answer these ends; how great is his reason to be thankful?

When gracious men see all this work upon the the will honour God in his own gifts; But, if they do not, it is in no man's power to alter thy condition with him. Be deeply thankful that thou hast found mercy; and shew tenderness to those, who need it from thee.

CHAP. XXIV.

Weaknefs is Impatient.

T is not ftrength, but weaknefs, which complains. He, that is ftrong, can well bear the infirmities of the weak: He that is weak, cannot bear at all, but is overwhelmed with his own. A father in Chrift can put up with the frowardnefs and indiferetion of the babe in Chrift; but the latter, having his mind but little exercifed, is full of diflikes, and always wants his own will and way: Otherwife, he complains.

This weakness is commonly captious; fonder of finding errors than healing them, and more able to discover the grounds of disterence than to take up the methods of unity. Sincere, yet quarrelsome; troubled, yet headstrong; young in the faith, yet presuming; fond of parties and persons, of modes and of forms of doctrine, with warm life and little experience; all this is the character of most young or weak professors. When they grow older in grace, they become wifer in the kingdom, more catholic, patient, forbearing, can-did, and forgiving. They see a thousand mistakes and wilfulnesses in their own first profession; and these incline them, through an increase of wildom and strength, to endure kindly the infirmities and frailties of others. They then love what is real, encourage what is weak, pardon what is childin, endure what is troublefome, correct what is evil, and pray, not rave, when they fee but flow improvements.

CHAP. XXV.

On Retirement.

W HATEVER is a man's first great businefs in life, that he will purfue most, and defire to study with the least interruption and disorder. A man of this world hath his heart in the world; but a christian gets as much as possible into heavenly things, because his beart and his treasure are in heaven.

The God of wildom himself hath faid, that no man can serve him and mammon. We have but one heart, which we cannot divide; and, if it were possible, an heart and an heart, or a heart divided, would be an hateful offering to the Most High.

There is no christian, but who feels and bewails how often his common affairs draw off his mind from his best affairs, and throw him into dullness and distraction. He feels and bewails this, because he is a christian, and because his best affections are somewhere else. His grief is not so much, that he must apply himself to social duties, which are indispensible to every one according to his place under

Providence, but that he cannot carry more of the true spirit and unction of religion into. them. Could they be more and more fancti-fied by the word of God and prayer, and could his mind be more delivered from the worldliness both of them and of those with whom he must have to do; they would grow. into a kind of holy ordinances to him, and, instead of hindering his faith, would improve his joy. We forget to bring religion into our common course of life; and so that course is fuffered to bring its own punishment and trouble upon us. A christian, living like a chris-tian in his outward profession, is far more in the way of rendering glory to God, and of doing good to men, than a hermit, who do-eth nothing in his wilderness but seek himself, or a monk, who by the torture of his body thinks to work out his own richteousness, by, which to merit heaven. The true retirement is retiring from the finful cultoms and spirit of this world, and giving up the foul to God. in all things.

Having faid this, it is also right to fay, that there should be hours of secret retirement to every christian, if possible; or at least as much time as possible, for prayer, meditation, and reading, upon the things of God. Where this time is through necessity short, as it often must be among the poor, who generally are God's own rich ones; still, the retired believer, in the midst of any or of all his business, may now and then sweetly, 150 -

Lart up his foul to God in fervent ejaculations, which will keep up the true frame of his mind, and draw down many comforts from above. These short and silent breathings will shew a lover's heart, and prove that, whatever may employ his hands, his m ' is truly engaged for heaven.

Where circumstance of life, and the capacity of persons, will admit of farther separation from the world; it will be right, because advantageous, to use it. The retirement, however, must be for God, and not for felf; in the spirit of religion, and not of lazines; to be more quickened for heaven, and not to be more useles upon earth. Hence it will be seen, that all christians are neither called to nor fit for an entire secusion from the world: Their habits, dispositions, calls, and occupations of life render it improper for them.

When a chriftian can fill up all his retirement with the things of God and for his glory, with no just demand upon him from fecular affairs; it is certainly a most high and defirable privilege. Such an one may and ought to further himfelf in knowledge, and to devote all he knows, through grace, to the glory of God and the edification of men. Leifure is abused, when employed in tattle and diffipation, as it often is; and the abuser had much better be engaged in some active calling and employment.

To retire indeed unto God, is the most fevere and solemn business in the world. It is a sort of middle state between heaven and earth, which no carnal mind can either understand or love. The froth and levity of the fiesh must be subdued ; else all the retirement will end in vanity. Humble and ardent prayer should begin the day, the study or the exercise of gracious things should carry it one intervals must be found for supplicetions and praise, frict watchfulness and trials must be continually made upon the heart, and growing meetness for death and heaven must appear in the life, and no rest be taken at night but after humble prayer and surrender of all into the hande of God for time and eternity. A truly retired chriftian is more careful of his time than any other man, because he can spend it more preciously. He thinks it a fad loss to throw away hours, which might have been employed in the works or word of God.

When the truly retired christian is alone, he is (as one fays) "never lefs alone;" for God is with him and in him of a truth. He not only goeth into his study or his closet, but he gets within himself, into the closet of his heart, and watches all the motions of nature and grace. Thus in time he becomes truly learned in that most difficult subjecthis own felf.

When we talk much with others, it is hardly possible, in a nature so fallen and corrupt as our's, not to talk amiss. But when we commune with God, he speaketh so with us, as to give an increase of wildom and grace, with much solid refreshment of mind. His word and will become plain and familiar to our souls; we enter into the spirit of his ways; and our spirits feel many undoubted proofs both of their own immortality and of the great blessedness of approaching glory. This wherever it abounds, deadens the affection of a christian to the low and vain discourse of the world, renders him more happy in and fit for his retirement, and enlivens his hopes for God and heaven. What improvement, thus to live! What blessedness, thus to die!

Many retire, that they may fee and hear more of the world, and be entertained with its novelties and news: But the believer would withdraw to dive more fully into himfelf, as into a fubject deep and little known, and to be more acquainted with his Redeemer in all the wonders and manifestations of his grace. It is a day lost indeed, when he gets no news of heaven, or hath made no steps towards it.

If a man doth not thus retire, he only opens a wide door to all forts of temptations to rufh in upon him. So very few are fitted for or called to this kind of leifure (though by abufe only it becomes leifure) that God in his wifdom hath appointed fo much corporal employment in the world, even for his own children. As the earth would be more an Aceldama, or field of blood, than it is, but for neceffary labours, which call away, in fome r-5., respect or other, almost all men; so the church itself would be more desiled, and individuals more unholy, than they are already, if manual or active duties did not take up the greatest part of their time.

I have known many professors, and some of an order too which should have engaged them entirely in things divine, who have wasted in frivolous diffeourses, mean pursuits, idle engagements, and other fad diffipations, large portions of that time, which should have been devoted to studious improvement, ferious conversation, or active piety. Vessels thus ever unning out; how and when can they be filled? And what have they for others, who lay up fo little for themselves ?

O Lord, help me to retire indeed, but yet chiefly for thee, and for greater communion with thee. When I find thee not in my heart, it is hard and darkened : When thou art not in my clofet, it is either full of confufion as a market, or it is defert as the wildernefs. I can get nothing ; and I foon feel that I am nothing, but an empty, unprofitable void. O cheer thy poor fervant with thy prefence who would indeed be a ftranger and a pilgrim upon earth ; yea, if it be thy will, a ftranger to every thing but thee; having my heart in thy home, and my foul in every refpect under thy command. Lord, thus help me to withdraw from the world, only to draw nearer, both in fpirit and in life, unto thyfelf, and to whatever relates to thy glory !

CHAP. XXVI.

On the Fear of Man.

E, that unduly fears man, cannot truly fear God: And he, that lives much in the fear of God, will not regard over-much what man can do unto him. The want of faith is the root of all carnal fear, which becomes lefs and lefs, as faith gathers ftrength and increase in the foul. It is a fad hindrance in the ways of God, as well as torment, to live under the views, opinions, prejudices, and passions of worldly men.

The fear of man bringeth a fnare; and a fnare for all forts of evils. Mild, gentle, feeling, and delicate tempers, are most exposed to this danger; and they should pray much to him, who strengtheneth the weak, for fortitude without rudeness, for resolution without roughness, and for stability without stubbornness, that fo they may properly act and hold out in the time of trial.

When it is a principle graciously established in the foul, that men can do nothing to us but what is for our good, and that they must do. whatever is; it greatly abates that fickle feebleness of nature, which, out of too much love and care for itself, brings us into bondage of heart to wretched worms, whose breath is in their nogerils, and themselves, in this way, not to be accounted of.

CHAP. XXVII.

On my own Imperfections.

W HILE I am in the flesh, I must be encompassed with many infirmities; and while I am in the world, I cannot escape trial and temptation. These things are grievous to my spirit; but I fee, that they are permitted, to wean me from myself, and to draw off my heart from the creatures to my only true refuge in God.

What feeblenefs, at times, do I not feel in duty; what ficklenefs and unfteadinefs, in following my Redeemer; what dullnefs and diftraction in prayer; fo that I can hardly remain firm and lively, long together, in the purfuit of that good, which my foul most defires and  $\tau_c$  proves. It is a war indeed in my members to get my corrupted nature down, and to have the life of grace warm and vigorous within me. I cannot but groan, at times, in this tabernacle, being burdened, and almost oppressed, by the evils within and about me.

Were it not for divine help, O what fhould I do ! Like Peter on the fea, I have fometimes ventured boldly after my Lord; but, like him too, through faintnefs of heart and weaknefs of faith, at other times, I have cried out, Lord, fave, or I perifh! Thou haft helped me indeed, bleffed be thy name, O my God; but yet I cannot but reproach snyfelf for the cold forgetfulnefs and weaknefs of my fpirit, in doubting fo often of thy faithfulnefs, and in not keeping hold of thy promifes.

Thus, Lord, I feel myfelf, a poor, a frail, and altogether, a weak and worthlefs man; fit for nothing but thy mercy, and capable of nothing, when left to my nature, but rebellion againft it. When I furvey myfelf, and all my confufed and ruined faculties, I am filled with fhame, and cannot but wonder at thy longfuffering towards me. O wretch that I am, in what a vile body of fin do I live ! How am I always ftruggling againft thee with my perverfe and wicked flefh, contrary to the true and lafting interefts of my foul ? How ready to yield to thine enemy and mine; or to give up all for loft, rather than maintain the hard and painful ftruggle with corruption and fin ?

When I have been lively and zealous for my God; how often have I been ready to overlook, to mifapply, or to turn his grace to the foolifh vanity of my own mind? Infomuch, at times I feem all flefh to myfelf, and to have neither true light, life, wifdom, or strength, from above within me. My failures are and have been fo numerous, the apoftacy of my heart fo great, the conduct of my life and temper fo mutable and irregular, and all my frame fo poor and wavering, fo cold and weak in smbracing the beft things; that I am ready to bernoan with the prophet, Woe is me, for I am undone; because I am a man of unclean lips! My whole head is fick, and my whole heart is faint.

Others may talk of their wills and their powers, their duties and their deferts; but, as for me, I can fearce lift up my eyes to heaven when I confider myfelf; rather with the publican my brother, I must finite upon my breast and fay, God be merciful to me a finner ! Instead of looking on myfelf as a fine holy creature, who can appear confidently before my God; I shrink with constrition and shame a she thought, that I have done little elfe tha dishonour him all my days, and deferve nothing for the best thing I was ever able to do, but confusion and forrow.

O what a plague is a man's own heartwhen he knows himlelf; and how little doth he appear in his own eyes, when he hath been made to view, in some true light and degree, the vastness of the purity and perfections of God !

And yet, O marvellous to fay, God is pleafed, by all the weak and contrary things in me, to magnify his own power and glory.

C 2

By these, he makes me out of humour with myself; by these, he drives me from a thoufand refuges of lies; by these, he compels me to cleave unto him, as my only Rock, Succour, and Remedy. In this way I can feel, as well as read, what the apostle meant, where he fays, Most gladly therefore will I glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me :--for when I am weak, then I am strong.-These are strange paradoxes to the natural heart; but blessed is the man, who can truly understand and enter into the experience of them.

Ł

CHAP. XXVIII.

The Believer receives food as well as light, in the word and doctrine of Christ.

HE mere notion of divine things, without their power, cannot profit the foul. As a man may be poor with the plan of a large eftate, of which he hath no possession; fo a professor of christianity may have the Bible before him, and may be able to raise very high and fine speculations from it, and yet have no true knowledge or enjoyment of the truths which it contains.

A minister may preach of these truths with great clearness, great readiness, great noise; and yet have no true favour, no so id experience, and no real communion, of the truths themselves within him. What proves this is, that he is not the fame man in the pulpit and in the world. The doctrines of the gospel will ferve for orations as well as other topics; nay, will ferve for the best orations, because there is more of sublimity and truth in them than in any other.

An author likewise may write about divine revelation, and all the mysteries of redemption, with precision, accuracy, force and elegance, and yet be destitute of the main concern, which is the faith and inward perception of these things for his own soul. I would deal fairly and clofely with my own self in this respect, as well a with others; and I will own, that my light is far beyond my liveliness; and though I humbly trust that I have some little real life in my knowledge of God and his truths, yet I acknowledge with anaching heart, that it is indeed but little, too little, and much less than my own fondness for myself, or vanity, or pride, or conceit (for, Lord, thou knowest, and I know, that I have all these in abundance within me!) will fuffer me at times to think that I have. Perceiving then my own weakness, and the deceivableness of unrighteousness in my own heart; I am able to see, and yet to pity and bear with, the same infirmities and defects in others.

However, no real believer can fine nuch or long fatisfaction in any notions or onceptions of divine truth, though very fublime, elear, full, extensive and convincing, without fomething more in them and from them. He doth not despise head-knowledge, indeed because by this he can see the wisdom of God ; but he would have heart-knowledge too, because he wishes to taste, to enjoy, to be asfured of his interest in the love of God. He can no more feed upon words and fyllables in his foul, than he can live upon air only for his body.

The Lord, therefore, when he imparts the demonstration of the spirit to a man, imparts it not in word but in power. Thus the gospel is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth. He cannot receive it aright without this power; he cannot live upon it but by this power; nor hold out in living and believing to the end but by the fame power.

This gracious feeding of the foul upon the things of God is its greatest comfort here upon earth, and one of its bright evidences for heaven. It is a fecret holy act, carried on best without the clutter of the animal passions, or the intercourse of corporal things. The how ly bread was eaten in the holy place, before the holy light, and all out of the air, or view, or correspondence of the world. Thus, in the fecret places of the Most High, the soul feeds upon Christ, beholds Christ, and enjoys all its divine communion with the things of God. And when it hath thus tasted that the Lord is gracious, it loves to be with him, and fays earness as Peter did, It is good to be here. The carnal notion even of the best things will no longer fatisfy or feed it.

CHAP. XXIX.

On the Spirit of Scoffing.

T is no lefs ungracious than unwife to indulge a fcoffing temper in our fouls. Pride and an unmortified opinion of felf are the true origin of this evil. It is the more dangerous, and not fo much to the fcorned as to the fcorning, when fet off with wit and mimicry. point and fatire. But attic falt is not the falt of the covenant; and, in facred things effectially, is not to be ufed by a chriftian.

It may be diverting to mimic and to take off others, in order to expose their foibles or defects; but how and to whom is it diverting ! Is it to the humble, spiritual, and mortified mind ? No, but to the profane and the carnal; or, at least, to what is carnel and profane in a christian, which the very principle of all others, that he would not strengthen or encourage, but subdue.

There is fo much inhumanity, as well as irreligion, in this jeering temper, and ufually fo little good fenfe, that the christian is bound to oppose it both in himfelf and in others.— Cheerfulnes is his privilege; but furely he may be happy in his own mind without planting thorns elsewhere; nay, it proceeds. from the want of true happines, if he can endure at any rate such a contemptible shadow of it. True peace is gentle in itself, and glows most sweetly in diffusing gentleness and kindness on every fide. The happy christian would increase his own joy by making, if possible, every one happy about him.

CHAP. XXX.

ł

It is a great Point of christian Wisdom to disting guish well between Nature and Grace.

VERY real believer hath an old man and a new, an E/au and a Jacob, a carnal mind and a spiritual mind, within him: And these are contrary the one to the other; so that he cannot always do the right things that he would do for God, nor crush the evil things that he would not do, within himself.

These opposite principles have two oppofite laws, or rules of action and power. The inclination and effect of the one are constantly directed to self, and to carnal things for the indulgence of self; and those of the other, to God, and to spiritual things for the glory of God.

Men under nature, having only one of these principles, cannot, in their natural state, discern the other. It is by grace, as by a rule, that they are able to measure nature, and to know the proportions of both grace and nature, within themselves. He that is spiritual, judgeth, or discerneth, all things; yet be himself is judged of no man. Nature in the christian is for cleaving to Nature in the christian is for cleaving to fense, in its own doings, and to its own powers, even in religion : But grace in his foul is for living by faith, above and often against the feelings of sense, upon the truth of God, and upon his work and working, for life and salvation.

Nature loves to shew and set off itself, and to be admired as excellent, eminent, wise, and great, in the eyes of men. Grace doth not set much by itself, but is lowly and humble, vaunteth not itself, is not pussed up, dreads the applauses of men, and makes the foul see, that it is so mere a nothing in itself, that it must receive every thing good, both the least spark of grace and the bright crown of glory, from God in Christ.

Nature is quarrelfome, impatient, and full of reftlefinefs, defiring its own objects immediately and independently, and applying all it receives to its own eafe or aggrandizement.—Grace feeketh not her own, but the things which are Jefus Chrift's, makes the fpirit meek and mild, and patient, and quiets it with the will and love of God in all things.

Nature hates the crofs, and fhuns it as a bitter and evil thing; it ftruggles hard not to feel it, and, when it feels it, to get rid of it without any other confideration than that it is painful and hinders all indulgencies and gratifications. But grace fubmits to the crofs with humble refignation, and defires that God's purpole may be answered in it; like as a wife patient wishes that his physic may have its due effect, however unpleasant and diftasteful it may be in the act of receiving.

When nature attempts holy duties, as fhe fometimes will either in fear or in pride, it is to make herfelf rich and increafed in goods by them, fo that fhe may have fomething wherewith to purchafe even of God himfelf. But grace comes to the obedience of faith, not to live or purchafe life, but becaufe fhe is truly alive already to God; and fhe acts not for her own exaltation, but for the glory of him, who only can exalt, and who fills the hungry with good things, while the rich he fends empty away.

Nature admires dignity, and parade, and pomp, and outward fplendour; it feeks to be pleafed with fweet founds, fine language, decorated places, and genteel company; and all this in religion too. Whereas grace fhuns and diftaftes all gay appearances of earth, thinks of Chrift in a ftable, and of all he did and fuffered to ftain the pride of flefh and blood; and receives the favor of God as a precious pearl for its own eternal value, and not for the fake of any outward things, different in kind from its own.

Nature loves life, and to fee good days in this world, and as many of them as poflible; it fludders to give up its temporal enjoyments and carnal hopes, and would endure a great alloy of care and trouble, rather than part with the lying vanities, to which it is wedded, and in which it delights. Grace, contrariwife, can fay with holy Job, I would not live always upon earth, if I might; for I have a defire to depart and to be with Chrift, which is far better. Grace can think upon death as a friend, and hath often met him as fuch; looking forward to the crown of glory, which death can only lead to, but never can take away: And all its trials here only caufe a ftronger breathing and expectation of the heavenly home.

Nature is formed to speak, and loves to be heard, and will be angry if not regarded, and will do much to be feen and known. Grace is flow to fpeak, and flow to wrath; wifnes to hear, and learn, and understand; delights not to be in the chief feat, but is content with the lowess; and had rather lay up spiritual treasure in the heart, than babble it away, for selfiss aims, with the tongue. It is not petulant or vexed if difregarded, but commits itself and the whole of the matter to God.

Nature draweth all from its own fund, and carrieth all back, and with interest if possible, to itself again. But grace receiveth all from God, and is never fo truly delighted, as when God receiveth the whole of the glory, as his just return.

These are a few of the many diffinct operations of nature and grace. But sometimes they are so perplexed and interwoven with each other, through the craft and duplicity of the failen natural principle, that it requires the greatest watchfulness and attention of the christian, to unravel and divide them. The fact is, the two principles live at one time, act at one time, and will be found in one and the same person at all times and in all things, while he lives upon earth. The christian cannot avoid the activity of his natural or carnal mind ; though, by that faith and prayer which removes the spiritual mountains of difficulty, he is to strive and may prevail against its high rule and predominancy. Carnality will exist, while he exists below; but it must not be the reigning and triumphant principle within him. On the other hand, grace, which is pure and fimple in all its own acts and intentions, and refolves every thing with a fingle eye and a fingle heart into God, must take the lead, and bring the other into the closest captivity and obedience that can be unto Christ. This is the daily battle and warfare, which passes within the christian, and which no eye can fee, but the eye of God and his own; yea, not his own always, nor always alike. Thus not his own always, nor always alike. when grace prevails, there enfues what is called mortification, felf-denial, humiliation, renunciation, and all the other exercises, which are painful to the flesh, or nature, and its will and ways. On the contrary, when nature is uppermost, there ever will arise coldness towards God, faintness in duty, doubts, reasonings, discomforts, sear of man, sear of death, and a whole world full of weaknesses, hindrances, and temptations. By the fuperiority of these different effects in the soul, may eafily be seen, if attended to, the superiority of one or other of their respective principles. When there is a strong animal or carnal nature in the believer with a good meafure of grace, and a trial comes of a powerful and threatening kind; O what a tumuit is raised within ! Nature straggles for ease, and winds, and turns, and free, and laments, and uses a thousand shifts to carry off the believer from the battle, or to melt away his heart in the midft of it. Grace, on the other hand, tells him, that now is his time to act like a christian, to lay hold upon Christ and his promises, to take up the shield of faith, the fword of the Spirit, and the helmet of falvation, and to withstand at least, if not even to meet the enemy; that he shall conquer the trial by fuffering the will of God, it being his present duty to trust, to hope, to pray, to wait; and that, in a short time at the utmost, all shall end well, and redound both to his. Redeemer's honour and his own improvement. What conflicts, perturbations, hopes, refignations, confolations, will not the chriftian find in the opposition of the carnal and fpiritual life; when temptations, troubles, or trials of any kind are to try the strength of both? And yet, after the temptation, it is in fome measure with him as it was with Christ: after his; comforts, like angels, will minifter unto him. There is such a peaceable: fruit of righteousness succeeding to these grievous things, as will make the believer a most ample amends for all his forrows. But if this fruit should be deferred in this life, it will be the more welcome and giorious, when the foul bursts the bonds of clay, and leaves fin and a finful nature behind it.

CHAP. XXXI.

On Temptations.

T is a great part of the christian warfare to encounter temptations. When a man truly becomes Christ's soldier, he is armed from head to foot by him; because from head to foot will his enemies attack him, with all forts of weapons, for distress at least, if not for destruction. He hath, because he needs, the whole armour of God, that he may both stand and withstand, during the evil day of this mortal life.

O how many fiery darts are thrown, with all the vehemence of fpirits, against the chriftian's foul ! If his armour doth not fit close upon him, and if the shield of faith be not well and constantly held up to catch and repel the assaults; how many fore, and almost venomous wounds will he not endure ? Nay, if the christian think to be only upon the defence, and fight not in his turn; it will be with him, as it is in all defensive wars among men, very troublesome, and very disadvantageous. He hath therefore a weapon given him, that he may attack too; and when he wields, in the strength of, his Captain, the fword of the Spirit, which is the word of God; the great spirit all foe remembers the three deep strokes he received by it from Christ himself, and shrinks away from its edge. If the christian should be so unwise as to fight If this enemy by his own might, and without this armour; he would suffer as a man must do, that would encounter a whole hoft in array (every individual of which is almost infinitely stronger than himself) naked, unsupported, unarmed. None know the strength of the world, the flesh, and the devil, but those who have life and are called to oppose them; just as the force of a stream is tried by the resistance made against it. The people of Christ too often fall into this vain way of fighting, through a prefumption of their own conduct and power, and therefore are often brought off from the field wounded and half dead: And it is through the mercy and grace of their Lord, that they are not entirely captured and destroyed. They are more ready to look to their armour and call upon their Leader in great trials, and therefore they prevail: But when they despise the strength of a little temptation, and fight against it in their own, then it is that they are often taught their inward and natural weakness by losing the day. In their Captain's armour, in his strength, and by his sword, they must result the devil; and then to their joy shall they find, that he will presently sty away from them.

Nothing escapes the vigilance of this foe. He observes the particular constitutions of perfons; and he makes his attacks upon all the weak and unguarded parts. He fuits his devices to the frame of their dispositions; and, if they are ignorant of them, he will often make fad havoc and distref.

He also knows, that the christian hath traitors in his own bosom, once under full diabolical command, and now not fully suppressed and confined. These he bribes, entices, advises, corresponds with, and acts by; so that, when the assault is made from without, these sufficients inmates are not idle within, but join hand, head and heart, (as it were) to throw all open to the enemy.

Hence, for these inbred foes, envy, pride, malice, lust, and all the confederacy of black and carnal principles, fatan finds out and proposes their several objects of defire. These are soon converted into engines of war against the soul; and if the christian cannot bring his very thoughts into captivity to the law of Christ, they will lead him in bonds (as it were) to his old master, who used, before he was a christian, to take him captive at his will. What disgrace doth this bring to his holy profession; and what misery, before and after his recovery; to himself!

Satan hath also fly and fubtle temptations, perverted from religion itself, by which he often alfaults the mind. Sometimes he will raile fnares from zeal, love, light, enlargement and fuccess in duties, by which to flatter the christian into a high opinion of himfelf, and of his gifts and graces, in order to take him off his guard, or to unclothe him of his humility. When he can make a man proud, he makes him like himfelf; and when unclean, like a beast. At other times he will inject the very poifon and curfe of his own diabolical spirit, by darting evil thoughts; despairing or blasphemous sug-gestions; vile conceptions of Christ, his word, his work, and all his falvation; pre-posterous, doubting, distracting, and presum-ing fancies; and an almost infinite variety of abominable suggestions; which, if the foul be unarmed and unguarded, will harras it to the utmost distress. He hath no pity; nor will he leave off for groans and wailing, agonies or teats. These rather encourage him, if there be nothing but these. The only thing he dreads is the fword of the Spirit; and the only thing he cannot pierce is the armour of God. Therefore, when all this fad bufinefs is going forward, the christian should not lay crying on the ground like one bereft of his senses, but should call upon his Captain for the armour and the fword, and with these should venture on boldly, trusting to the divine strength which is promised, against the foe. When he can do this, the conflict will be foon over : It is yielding, hearkening, reasoning, and parley-ing, which occasion all the mischief.

I can talk of all this, my fellow christian, and I know it likewise to be right and true; but I am often beset, and have been often as much to feek as thou canst be, in this hard, yet glorious, service. To this moment I feel my own miserable weakness, when left, in the least degree to myself. I have had my drub-bings, my falls, my horrors, my conflicts, as well as thou; and I have been taught by them, though with much flowness (I speak it with shame and sorrow), to fly to the right refuge, to lay hold of the right strength, to buckle on the right armour, and to fall on with the right fword. When I have done this with most alertness and with the most. unreserved confidence in my divine Master, I have been most fuccessful, and most easily have prevailed. When I have lingered, or dallied, or tampered with my foe, or else thought I could cope with him by myself, because he hath appeared under a mean difguife; then I have fainted and failed; then have I funk, and been furely overthrown. My rebuffs have made me a little more wary of my own heart, as well as of my spiritual adversaries; and I find it the best way to begin speedily with prayer to HIM that heareth, that I may truly be ready for whatever may come upon me.

While we are in the flesh, all this must be more or less our daily exercise. And the use of it is, chiefly to keep our hearts from pride and floth, to bring down the love of felf in all its desires, and the love of fin in all its forms, to endear Christ to our souls in all the ways of his falvation, to cause us to give up ourselves to him with less referve, to wean us from earth and earthly comforts, and to fix our affections more firmly on heaven. If all this enfue, we shall then have happily disappointed the devil, and beaten him with his own weapons; and therefore shall rejoice for every trial and conflict, which have led us on towards the attainment of that bleffed state of mind, which is the true life and hope of a christian in this world. O that I may remember these things for myself; while I am aiming to stir up the minds of others to the remembrance of them ! Lord, thy strength is made perfect in weaknefs, and thy wildom in folly; I call upon thee, therefore, and upon thee alone, to be the Guide, the Help, the Defender and Deliverer of my foul! Thou art FAITHFUL, thou hast promised; and here I rest my fafety and falvation.

C H A P. XXXII.

On Adversity.

W E naturally love the world, and the things that are in the world; and this love, unfubdued, is the fole caufe and ground of what are called mortifications and difappointments from the world. If the love of Chrift prevailed more in us, it would not be in the power of outward things to give us fo much pain as they do; or, rather, if this love were perfect in us, we should be ashamed and forry that these things should give us any pain at all.

This is the truth ; but how do we use it ?----Very often, in the time of trial, we make no other use; than to assent to it as a truth, and there leave it. Reflections of this kind are orations to the winds, unless grace shall second and enforce them. The most trifling loss, as I have often observed in myself and others, is sufficient to unhinge and throw us out of order; if we have no stronger power than our own to keep us in it.

There is not a plant upon earth, how unfightly and bitter foever, but which hath an end for its being. God, likewife, hath not intended his providential works, however adverfe or difagreeable to our fenfe, but for fome just purpose and defign. There is a needs be, if we fall into divers temptations. And if needful, then they are right and profitable, and will appear to be fo at the last.

We have many evil humours, that require correction; and God fends adverfity, as a medicine to the foul. When it comes with grace into the fpirit of a christian, how doth it fosten and blunt his rough and acid dispofitions, how reform and lower his fwelling and consident frames, how chasten and subdue his rest less and impatient temper; while the better part, his renewed mind, gathers firength, and holinefs, and relignation, and hope? We shall indeed thank God heartily for all our adversities by and by; and, tho' they are not to be counted as any part of our inheritance, we shall rejoice eternally, that they were graciously made a part of the means for bringing us to it.

The apofile Paul was a chofen veffel, and dearly beloved of the Lord; but the Lord did not fay concerning him, what great things he was to do or enjoy (though nobody perhaps ever did more for Chrift, or enjoyed more of him upon earth) but what great things he must suffer for my name's fake. The flesh shrinks at this; but grace can enable the foul to count it all joy when it falls into divers temptations; not for the grief that is in them, for that would be unnatural, but for the peaceable fruits of righteousness which they shall produce in the end.

We must pray, then, to trust the wildom and love of God in all forrowful dispensations; fince he doth not willingly or wantonly afflict his children, nor fend one forrow more than what is absolutely necessary to their true edification and welfare.

When we can bear all trouble as a part of the burden of Christ, and can obtain his affiftance to bear it with us; we shall find it daily grow lighter and lighter, and at length become upon us like the burden of wings to a bird, enabling us to fly the fwister and higher towards heaven.

CHAP. XXXIII.

On Prosperity.

GOD's people are feldom trufted with much profperity; and when they are, it vory rarely appears for their good. The things of earth and time, in affluence or abundance, have a fafcinating power over the carnal fenfes, entice them first into the ways of evil, and then (if grace prevent not) intoxicate them with it. How many spiritual fots are there in the world, who, though averse to gross intemperance, are reeling instead of running in the path of duty, their heads being turned with the fumes of this carth, and their hearts waxed gross through the abundance of ber delivacies? And it is one dreadful proof of the strength of this intoxication upon them, when they hate to be told of it, and feel angry, not at themselves, but at the friendly and faithful informer.

The gaiety, parade, lightness, and lofty airs of many religious professors, too well shew what a dangerous thing it is to possess much of this world, and how easily our hearts may be made drunk and then drowned with sensuality, if not in perdition. If Christ and his apollies were now upon easth in their plain and howly form, it is much to be seared, that they would be thought bardly good company enough for many of the present race of gen-teel and modish professors of religion. It is an excellent prayer, which christians in worldly profperity cannot remember too often; "In all time of our WEALTH, good Lord, deliver us." We want his help, then, more if possible than in adversity, lest the lust of other things, entering in, should chake the word, and it become unfruitful. We have weak heads and a difordered appetite, which are soon overcharged with a full cup of temporal prosperity. They were filled (fays the Lord speaking by the prophet to the Jews) they were filled, and their heart was exalted: THEREFORE nave they forgotten me.

There is no doubt, but that christians with worldly riches may do abundance of worldly good to others; and it is one proof, that God is in them of a truth when they do fo: Yet, there is very great reason to pray, that, while they are God's stewards to feed other people, they may be careful not to be starved themselves, and that no pride may arise in their hearts, through these outward displays of zcal for the Lord of holts. These may seem great things to men; but if we remember the widow and her two mites, we may understand, that something else is greater before God, than any administration only of carnal and temporal things.

Our hearts need no damps of this world to cool them. On the contrary, God by troubles frequently ftirs up his own grace and life in them, as we stir our fires, that they may kindle more freely, shine more brightly, and glow more strongly for our comfort. Whatever draws us nearest to God, cannot be real adversity: Whatever entices us from him, deferves not the name of prosperity.

C H A P. XXXIV.

Luxury indecent for Christians.

UXURY is to pride, what the body is to the foul. It gives fubflance to that depraved temper, which fatan occafioned to man, and which reigns in himfeif with the most malignant fubtlety, ruling alfo, where it is permitted, the faculties of creatures and the groffnefs of matter. It first reduced him from angel to devil; and it hath degraded mankind almost to both devil and beast.

A very great part of the world's purfuit is indulgence to the flefh, by procuring, not the mere neceffaries (for thefe are in a finall compafs) but the pomps, the flews, the imaginary comforts, or the real luxuries, of this prefent life. If they have much goods laid up for many years, no higher thought remains, but to take their eafe, to eat, to drink, and be merry. They have ftrange and wretched notions of fpiritual and eternal enjoyments: Heaven and heavenly things are neceffarily in their very nature too refined for thofe, whofe heart is ever in the dirt, and whofe whole life and hope are fupported by what lives and grows upon it. Like a man whom I remember to have feen, they have no " defire to fit finging upon a bare cloud (as he expressed it) all the day long, without any thing to eat or to drink." This was his idea of heaven : And have those people any better or more folid thoughts of its glories, who prefer to them (as the men of this world uniformly do) the poor vile trash and fordid attainment of the earth? Alas! fo it is; no natural man hath any true regard for God or his foul, but only for his carcase and the world.

The primitive chriftians were diffinguished as well for the plainness and simplicity of their manners, as for an exact frugality in all their affairs. They thought, and with great truth, that to do otherwise would be both unseemly for their profession and injurious to the poor. People, who want all for themfelves, as the luxurious ever must (except in fome rare cases) can have but little, if any thing, to give to him that needeth; and, what is worse, a luxurious pampered person hath usually no heart to give at all, but hath loss his bowels of compassion, through the excess and voluptuous reigning within him. Hence it is, that the very rich and very great are commonly hard-hearted; while in the middle ranks of life, both fympathy and benevolence are frequently found to lighten the load of woe. Thefe, it is true, may be all mere nature; but they are however not the least precious remains among its ruins.

To glut the stomach, is to starve the mind; vainly to drefs up the body, is to strip the foul; to appear great before men, is really to be little in the eves of God; to be anxious for this world alone, is to lofe the true enjoyment both of it and a better. Yet all these compose the grandest wildom of this world. But can such be the object, the pursuit, the practice of a christian ? Can the pilgrim, or traveller, the stranger and sojourner upon earth, who talks of seeking a better country, and a heavenly, make it his businel's or delight to indulge his flesh and carnal affections in modes like these? It seems indeed a sort of burlesque upon godliness, that a creature pampered, glutted, adorned, and wallowing in luxurious life, should solemnly profess meekness and lowness of mind, abitraction from a finful world, deadness to earthly vanity, humble expectations of heaven, and a life of faith and communion with God till heaven be attained .---- I am not a monk, nor nionkishly inclined; but furely the modern luxery among many profeilors is neither the characteristic nor ornament of christian life, and cannot from its own nature be the means appointed either to win or to wean men from mammon to God. It is indeed with pain and reluctance, that this subject is here mentioned, and especially that there is so much occon for mentioning it, in our day and in our land. To use, and liberally to use, God's temporal mercies with humble thank-fulness, is one thing; but to nouris our car-nal bearts as in a day of flaughter, to live only for ourselves, and to be filled with a fulness of earth instead of God, is quite another. The apostle speaks of using the world, and not abusing it, plainly intimating the difficulty and the danger. For this reason most probably it is, that the Lord keeps the bulk of his people out of worldly fnares by poverty and trouble, for which they will fee more caufe to thank him hereafter, than the weal-thy and the great for all their riches. When the world lays heavy and clofe upon the heart, O with what fluggifh flownefs doth it mount up towards heaven !

Lord, above all thy gifts, give me thyfelf! I may be happy without the creatures, but I must be wretched for ever without thee. Against all my carnal affections and defires, above all my apprehensions and views, beyond all my hopes and expectations; O do thou lead me through time to eternity, and be my life, my love, my light, my Lord, and my all in all !

CHAP. XXXV.

There are many first, that shall be saft.

UR opinion of perfons and things is ulually taken from outward forms and appearances; but God looketh on the heart and fpirit, which are the true and holy fubftantial effence or being.

What a wonderful revolution shall the day of God make upon the earth! Many high and towering professions, extolled by others and prized by themselves, shall be glad to take even the meaness and the lowess rooms, deeply thankful not to be quite thruss out of the kingdom; while some poor dejected and despiled fouls, who passed their days almoss unknowing and unknown with respect to the world, shall shine forth as the stars in the firmament of heaven, to the surprize and astonissed to the servery eye.

We greatly mistake, in general, with refpect to spiritual glory. It doth not consist in the splendor of gifts and talents, or any bodily cxercife (as the apostle calls it) of the animal frame, but in the lefs glaring, though far more folid, ornament of a meek and quiet spirit; not in the attraction or admiration of men, but in the love and enjoyment of God; not in the subtle and loss afpirings even of the inward man, but in felf-abasement, fimplicity, humbleness and fincerity of mind, refignation of foul to God, victory over self, and every thing elfe that belongs to true lowliness and profound humiliation. This is real and living glory; but not the glory of the world or of the flesh, for these neither understand nor desire it. Alas! how little is it confidered, that an outward religious act and religion itself are two things, very distinct and very separable! Scribes, pharisees, and hypocrites, have performed the one with the greatest care and exactness; but, all the while, were farther from the kingdom of God than even publicans and harlots : The other, consisting in divine life and inward union of the soul with Christ, is the portion and experience of none but the children of God.

We may be proud of pretended virtues; and, perhaps, it is poffible to be proud even of grace itfelf, oppofite as it is to that fallen principle of corrupted stature; but it is not fo poffible to think ourfelves nothing, and to be contented with the flight and contempt of others; to prefer all God's children to ourfelves, and to place our feat far below their's; to love our meekeft and our humbleft thoughts, and to hate bitterly the emotions of pride, and the urgings of anger and arrogance. Yet all this is the true and folid dignity of a chriftian foul, and brings it neareft to the likenefs of Chrift, if not neareft to his throne.

REMEMBRANCER.

O Lord, help me to understand myself.-May I wish to see, not how great and good (as flesh would have it,) but how mean and vile, I am. Preserve me from high thoughts of myself; for these become not a sinful, dying worm, who lives every moment upon a breath of air ; nor yet do they become a redeemed finner, whose only plea must be mercy, who hath nothing of his own but fin, and who by grace alone can be faveu, according to thy gift, O Lord, my God !

C H A P. XXXVI.

It is through Grace, that all Ordinances are rightly used and become beneficial.

S there is a talent of speaking with grace, the things that are true and profitable; fo there is a talent of hearing with grace, that those things may be received with edification. We may too often see and bewail a customary slight mode of hearing, which, instead of enlivening, deadens, instead of warming fixes the cold, instead of promoting the life of God within, only confirms the life of the flesh throughout.

Some are for hearing a variety of preachers, others a multitude of fermons; not for profit but for pleasure, not to digest and turn the discourses into spiritual nourishment, but to fatisfy the hurry and bustle of nature, which doth not love patient reflection nor the meditating labour of the foul. To hear on-ly and commend this, and that, and the other preacher, however excellent and gracious, is poor employment indeed, which requires very little sense, and less grace, to perquires very little fenfe, and lefs grace, to per-form. To fet up men and forget God, to be extolling one man above another, and to be ready to quarrel and abufe for the fake of one poor worm against another; is all of it nothing more, than the vileness of the carnal nature perversely crept into religious profef-fion, and all of it equally wretched, imper-tinent, and vain. If this were the whole that is to be found in religion, it would not be a bad wish, that one's "Life might rather be spent with philosophers." To hear for amufement, to be delighted

To hear for amufement, to be delighted with flowry language, to be charmed with action, perfon, manner, and voice, may do very well for the theatre or fenate; but to attend upon God, to hear his word as for one's life, to be filled with the folid importance of divine things, and to carry them home in the heart for comfort and strength in the experience; this is quite another kind of business, which doth not fo much engage the carnal mind or ear, as it employs the gifts, the graces, the most fervent exertions, adn the holiest affections of the foul. The one is rank abuse of a facted institution, and perverted to luff the soul to sleep in carnal security, under the notion of a religious engagement: The other is finding, in the use of the means, the true advantage which the Lord intended by them.

It is better likewife to hear one fermon, and then to recollect it, to feed and ponder upon it, and to turn the matter of it into prayer, than to be prefent at four, five, or fix in a day, as fome have been, and not to be able at laft to give a tolerable account of any one of them. The divine life of a chriftian doth not confift in mere hearing, any more than his natural life in always eating; but in digefting, and bringing what he hears, as fo much nourifhment, into the very frame and ftrength of his foul.

Faith must be mixed with this, and all ordinances and facraments; otherwise the outward man alone acts, while the inner man is assessed or dead; and fo that which should have been for wealth, only becomes an occasion of falling.

"How have I heard, not how much?" is the best enquiry. Our Lord directs us to confider it well, where he fays, Take beed how ye hear. And if we reflect, that God's word is a favor of life unto life, or of death unto death, in them that do hear it; furely, in fo folemn an affair, we ought to pray before we hear, to watch unto prayer in hearing, and to mix faith and prayer with what we have herrd, that it may turn to our good, and not to our forrow.

CHAP. XXXVII.

On the profitable hearing of the Word.

HIS subject is of fo much importance, as to demand some further reflections.

It is a trite observation, that we have two ears; and but one tongue. The natural inference however, becomes the more important, when authorized by the Holy Ghost: Let every man be fuift to hear, and flow to speak.

But though fwiftness of hearing be right, it is only so upon just principles and for a proper end. A person may be swift to hear evil, through the corruption of nature, for no other purpose than to practice it. In such a case, slowness, or deafness itself, is comparatively a bleffing.

It appears then, that there are two forts of hearing, or faculties, the fpiritual and the carnal, the right and the wrong : The one formed and impowered by grace; the other left, as it came into the world, under the perveriences and depravity of nature. We will confider both of these as briefly as possible.

When man fell from God, he not only loft the right use of the natural faculties, which confisted in raising spiritual and divine ideas from the outward objects; but the facultics themselves were diminished, and instead of ferving the Creator and shewing forth his glo-ry in the knowledge and happiness of a perry in the knowledge and happinels of a per-fect creature, were corrupted to obey a fallen fpirit in every ministration of fin, whether in filthiness, baseness, ignorance, or malignity. The ear, amongst these, became the organ of a depraved understanding, and is often put, by a figure, for the depraved understanding itself. Thus, because men in their state of nature are so besotted and blinded by sin, as to have no understanding (or what is worfe than none) in fpiritual things; fo they are faid to have no cars in those things. Accord-ingly, our Lord frequently address himself to those, who have ears to hear; manifestly implying, that the faithful only can hear to purpose, and that all others are, in a certain fense, without cars, that is, incapable of un-derstanding what they outwardly do hear. This corrupted faculty cannot therefore re-ceive the truth; but, through gross milap-prehension, can only pervert it, turning good into bad, and the bad into worse and worse.

The true faculty is indeed a new creation, and confequently the operation and gift of God. The Lord makes the hearing ear and the fecing eye, faid the wife man; or, as Elihu expresses it to the fame purpose, God openeth R 190 THE CHRISTIAN the ears of men and fealeth their infitruction. In vain might men speak, as Ezchiel would have spoken to that emblem of sinners spiritually dead, the dry bones, unless the Lord of power vouchsafe to bless and to impart the truth and strength of a right understanding to the mind.

But where this new faculty is given, the believer should remember, with anxious concern, that even there also remaineth the old. They both remain in the fame perfon, and often produce, if care be not taken, and a better care than their own, a sort of neutral exercise of faculties, employing them upon the very best things to no purpose at all, and sometimes to purposes, which, it might be thought, no gracious person with the least good faculty could allow or endure. The fact is, they hear the truth too much in their old man, they do not mix faith with what they hear, and fo they become triflers in divine things, and grow infipid and indifferent to them. Their new man is not renewed day by day, through holy meditation and prayer, and therefore feems to grow weaker; while their old man grows stronger and stronger in the things of the sless and the world. They do not (as the martyr of old faid) " join the ears of their head and their heart together."

Hence, in christian profession, we have such just complaint of beavy cars. Persons shall have been long under the word, and yet shall have profited to little for the time, that they appear like infants when they ought to be full grown, or dwarfs, and milhapen dwarfs too, at the age of maturity. This dullnefs of hearing often makes it needful, that fuch fhould be taught again the first principles of the oracles of God; becaufe (as the apostle fays) being babes, they have no experience in the word of righteoufnefs. What a strange fight is this; a man in leading strings; a perfor in years wailing for the breast! And yet meat, and especially strong meat, is not good for him: he cannot digest it. He must, poor foul, have nothing but milk: And it is well, if the only pure milk will fatisfy him. There is also, in christian profession, what the foripture calls an uncircumcifed ear. A man, with an uncircumcifed ear, is unfub-dued by what he hears, fo that his thoughts are not brought into captivity, nor into fweet fubjection, unto Christ. He will hear for him-felf, and by himfelf. His foul is not bent into meeknefs under the word; but he comes to it as a critic or a judge, with a high look and a lofty heart, to fquare all things by his own rule and reafon, and to determine all by his own measure and understanding. When the truth is made particular to him, he acts like tome high professors of old, and like all who are uncircumcifed in heart and ears (Acts vii. 51.)—he refifts the Holy Ghost. Such an one receiveth not correction: Truth is perished to him, and cut off from his mouth. He is therefore not the better for what he hears but the worfe, converting the wholefome nourifhment, through his cachetic or bad habit, into poifon or difeafe. In procefs of time, he grows both carelefs and hardened under the word; and, being now fermonproof, receives no more real impression from the gospel, than the flinty rock from a shower of rain. Alas! alas! How often may one bewail these uncircumcifed ears!

The apostle reminds us also of itching ears, which are not so desirous of their own proper exercise of receiving the truth, as of being tickled and amused. A light thing, a mere feather, will answer this purpose better than that two-edged sword, which cuts be-neath the skin, and penetrates to the very thoughts and intents of the heart. The itch-ing ear takes a wonderful pleasure in quaint or odd expressions, or in flowing, polished, or rhetorical phrases and language. To it there are no fuch charms as the charms of manner and words; a rich and glowing diction, a correct and masterly stile, the grace of de-livery, the force of reason, and the sublimity of thought. These are excellencies indispenfable and invaluable to the curious ear. A good story, especially if there be any wit in it, will tickle it almost to an extacy. Sometimes mere rodomontade will ferve the end, which is, to divert and be diverted. A pathetic or melancholy discourse will also tickle well an itching ear, though in a different way; for, if the animal passions be moved, if the old man be wrought upon, if the common teelings of the carnal nature be excited with any degree of emotion, these will gratify and please that carnal nature, as in hearing tra-gedics and oratorios, even to rapture and ex-cess, so as almost to be mistaken for religion and grace. In all this, there may not be one particle of the life of the new man, which is renewed after the image of him that created him. I do not mean, that a christian is to be divested of the common feelings of humanity, but that he is not to mistake these for the actings of grace in the things of God, nor from the word of God to feek for so low an object as the gratification of these. He is not to be entertained, but edified; not to be amused, but corrected : not to be pleased only, but profited ; not to crave indulgence to the defires of the flesh and of the mind, for this every worldling craves, but through grace to subdue his evil propensities and affections, and to confine nature within its bounds, that the life of Christ may be made manifest, and that the fruits of faith may abound to the divine glory. O how much more wife and happy is this for the foul, than the mean and trifling enjoyment that can be procured for itching ears!

There is alfo, to mention no more, what a gracious and dear Friend of mine has well Itiled that monster in profession, who is all car. No faculty, in religious matters, but this one: No head to apprehend no heart to love R 2 and experience, no hands to act for Chrift, no feet to walk in the obedience of God; but all—all ear! A new preaches, a fine preacher, a long fermon, fermion after fermon, difcourfes about the talents of preachers and the beauty of fermons, and fometimes matters not quite fo good as thefe, are objects of fupreme delight for too many, who rather wifh to hear about Chrift than to live upon him, and to have a good feat under the found of the gofpel, than to be enjoying the power of it. O what a poor fort of profeffing life is this! To miftake air for food, and mere hearing for godlinefs, alas! what will this avail the foul, when it fhall need ftrength and courage to refift the powers of darkness, and to enter the gloomy valley of the dead! The true fervants of God have, in a cer-

The true fervants of God have, in a certain fubordinate fenfe, their ears opened, or pierced, according to the meaning of the rite in the law; and thus they are made his own for ever. They come willingly, in the day of his power, to the door of his houfe, even to CHRIST the only door of the true tabernacle which God hath pitched and not man; and there each of them joyfully declares, " I would not, and, in thy ftrength I will not, go away, O Lord, from thee, becaufe I love thee and I leve thine houfe, and becaufe it is good for me to be with thee." By this fpiritual operation, they are made alive to God, and are enabled fpiritually to hear his word, and to have it written in their inward parts, and thus to ferve and live for God in Christ with life eternal. They cannot endure another fervice; and any voice, but the voice of their Master, they will neither delight in, nor obey. As dutiful fervants, and adopted children, they listen to his holy word, follow his heavenly will, feek not their own but his honor and glory, and count nothing of fo much value beneath the fun as to finish their course with joy. O my foul, mayest thou be found with these, when the Lord shall make up bis jewels, and shall spare them as a man spareth bis own fon that ferveth bim? Thou shalt then enter into his house indeed, and dwell with him for ever and ever.

Another type in the law shews the inward virtue of the divine life. The fanctifying oil was not only to be put upon the right hand, the right foot, and the right ear of the leper, but upon the extremities, the thumb, the great toe, the tip of those right members; in order to shew, that, in our renewing by the Holy Spirit, we must expect all true strength, even the least and to the utmost, all our right obedience, and all our hearing to profit, from that UNCTION OF THE HOLY ONE. This ANDINTING, which is received of Christ, even the Spirit of tru h, which the world cannot receive, abideth in the real christian; and by this, in fact, he becomes a christian, that is, an anointed perfon ; and the fame anointing teacheth him all things, and is true and not a lie. Thus he hears, and hears aright. He hears inwardly, and with life; and by grace in this hearing increases life. Sounds, mere founds, are nothing, and words alone, nothing; but the word and truth of Christ, spiritually received and experimentally digested, are in his eye, and heart, and ear, the all in all of every ordinance and proclamation of the gospel.

I would come into the power of these things, O my Lord, more and more ; and I lament with deep compunction, that my pro-gretion is fo finall, my true hearing fo dull, my affections fo cold, my faith to weak, my hope so drooping, and my whole man so often difordered and defiled by fin. O how great and difficult a thing is it to be a chriftian ! To live, and hope, and walk, truly by the faith of thee the Son of God! Do thou, who art the High-Priest of my profession, circumcife and pierce my car, that I may be made affectionalely like thine own for ever; anoint it allo with thine HOLY OIL, that I might receive rightly and understand truly the words of eternal life, the rich and the profound mysteries of thy kingdom. So shall I hear, and live, and learn, and love, till I fee thee in thy glory; and then, ftripped of all my own imperfection and frailty, be cloathed with thy righteousness and falvation, I thall magnify thy holy name in the great, the universal, the coerlasting, Hallelu-JAIL.

C H A P. XXXVIII.

Upon Declensions from God.

A LAS! how prone I am to fall into fin, and to leave the Fountain of living waters! My infirmities often prevail against me, and, contrary to the better will of my foul, drag me into the fnares and bondage of corruption.

I have finned : what fhall I fay unto thee, O thou Preferver of Men ! If thou leave me to myfelf, if thou recover me not; I am gone for ever. O wretched man that I am, who fhall deliver me from the body of this death !

Thus I mourn and am vexed, when my corruptions are ready to over-power me. I should be lost, but for thy merciful aid : I must perish entirely, if the blood and righteoufnels of my dear Redeemer were not again and again applied to fave and to comfort me.

and again applied to fave and to comfort me. O what a miferable body do I bear about with me! It is the very load, and plague, and prifon of my foul. And yet how foolifhly do I love it, and care for it; and how much more time do I fpend in nourifhing this evil flefh, than in feeking the peace of God, or the advancement and profperity of my immortal mind?—I am afhamed, as a chriftian, wortal mind?—I am afhamed of thefe things.

C H A P. XXXIX.

On Sobricty of Spirit.

Christian should defire, as a great privilege, the constant sobriety and calm recollection of his mind. Worldly things often flutter the animal spirits; and the disorder of these will too frequently throw the soul into consusion; so that it is liable to be carried away into what it condemns through the sudden livelines of its affections, or to be turned aside from what it approves by the vehement onset of its passions. This want of inward sobriety is one great cause of all the irregularities, which believers feel and bemoan in their passing to heaven.

Be fober, be vigilant; is a most necessary admonition to us, while we are in this unstable flesh, and within reach of such an adverfary as the devil. If we are not abstracted, in due measure, from the crazy and drunken spirit of this world, to which we are naturally inclined, and from which grace only can deliver us at all; we shall be distracted with a thousand foolish and useless things, be exposed to numberless dangers and fnares, be harraffed with doubts and diforders, and often in our giddiness shall forget where we are, whither we are going, and what must shortly pass upon us. O this golden, glittering, dazzling cup of the mystic Babylon, this evil world! How often is it in her hand, held out towards us! How ready are we to take and to drink of it! But how full is it of the abominations and filthinefs of her spiritual fornication and departure from God!

How difficult, duly confidered, is the chriftian's raffage through life! how marvellous his fafe arrival in heaven! It appears indeed to be nothing lefs than one of the greatest wonders of almighty goodness and power.

If a man were commanded to put to fea by himself in a small open boat, without any suf-tenance but what might fall from the skies, and with no direction but a chart and compaís, and thus to país over a wide and tem-pestuous ocean; it may give some faint idea of the christian's voyage to heaven. He too in a feeble bark has no chart but the word of God, no compass but the Spirit of God, no provision but the daily grace of God in Christ, no fafety from the raging waves of the world or the roaring winds of the evil spirit but the power of God, no ability to keep himfelf for one moment from finking but through faith in the mercy of God, and no hope of getting fafe to the heavenly shore but by the truth of God in Christ Jesus. Indeed, and indeed, when a christian confiders all these perils on the one hand, and his own weakness on the other; it feems on act of most astonishing love and omnipotence, that he fhould ever inherit the kingdom of heaven. He feels it to be mercy, and faithfulness, and rich bounty, and kindness altogether, from beginning to end, and is at times lost in wonder, love, praise, and gratitude, for so great and unmerited a falvation.

Seeing that these things are so, verily he ought to watch and pray, that he may continue in faith and charity, and in holiness with sobriety unto the end.

CHAP. XL.

The Heart must be given to God.

F we could offer to God the whole world, and yet keep back our heart; it would be to him a worthless and an odious offering. He confiders not the greatness or outward grandeur of human works, but the spirit by which they are performed. Some build hospitals, make noble endowments, give large donations, and do many other great and wonderful voorks ; all which are not to be spoken against in themselves, because they are of use to the world and efpecially to the poor: But it is possible to do all these, without a heart for God, without confidering his glory, without faith in his mercy, or love of mercy to man, and without being in the least degree nearer to him or his holinefs. A widow with two poor mites, and a hand and a heart of faith, will be found to have done more than all thefe, in the fight of him who judgeth righteoufly.

If our heart be given to God, we shall not be barren or unfruitful indeed; but our fruit will not be for carnal vanity, but unto true holinefs. Christ in us the hope of glory, is a principle of such power, that it turns a man (as it were) out of himfelf, delivers him from his own felfish whims and intentions, releases him from a multitude of slavish fears and concerns, and causes him ardently to defire and delight in those things alone, which may exercise a gracious gratitude in shewing forth the praises of his kind Redeemer.

CHAP. XLI.

On Liberty of Soul.

H E real liberty of the foul confifts in a happy freedom from the abfolute dominion of fin and Satan. The christian therefore denies himfelf, because of fin in his mortal body; he shuns the spirit of the world, because by its finfulness it promotes his inbred corruptions; he prays and watches against the evil one, because he is the grand tempter and flirrer of all iniquity both in himself and others.

The more this frame is maintained, the more will the heart enjoy the glorious liberty of the children of God. This is a holy and righteous freedom, which the chriftian pants after continually, and which is most fweetly experienced, when the foul is most abstracted from the low folicitudes and dull fatisfactions of fense and time. The Father of mercies is the cause, the Son of his love is the means, and the Spirit of grace is the power, of all the fpiritual freedom in earth and heaven, and of all the transporting bleffedness resulting from it.

The world and the flesh are a dead weight pon the n ind in its possession and exercise of this d lightful liberty; and, therefore, in the mind struggles to gain and secure it, the world and the flesh must be brought down and kept down, having, like the devil's gaolers, nothing about them, but miserable chains and fetters, wherewith to blind and imprison the foul.

CHAP. XLII.

Upon Sicknefs.

I L L fickness and forrow arife from fin. If we were not unholy creatures, we could not be unhappy creatures. Because of the ill habit, occafioned by tranfgreffion, every element fights against our health by changes and inclemencies; and the very food we eat, while it nourishes for a time, lays the foundation of difease in our bodies, already prepared by their own weakness and ill temperament to receive and increase it.

Sicknefs is a difmal fcourge to the ungodly, and a painful fpur to the gracious. To the one, it is the harbinger of terror and mifery; but, to the other, a folemn remembrancer indeed, both of the vanity of all earthlythings, and of the nearer and nearer approach of immortal glory.

When fickness comes, and grace can meet it; O what a just representation do they make to the foul concerning the poor honors, riches, cares and pleasures, of this transitory world ! How unimportant do all the struggles for power, splendor, titles, wealth, and pre-eminence, which have employed or enraged the past and present ages, appear ! How childish and mean these objects pass before us, for which men have lavished their time, and thrown away their fouls! What bubbles, what nonfenfe, what glaring and horrid flu-pidity, have filled and directed, have engaged and overwhelmed, the counfels of the world; and all to no other profit than a little fleeting vanity with a rapid defcent to lasting oblivion or ruin! Thus the soul feels, when it is quickened by fickness to confider, the low and paffing affairs of earth and time.

On the contrary, how inexpreffibly great and tremendous do the things of God and eternity rife in full view to the mind! O the worth of worlds, what are they, in fome of thefe foul-fearching moments! How is the mind altonifhed with the grandeur of God, and with the deep and wide importance of all that belongs to him! Rapt in the folemn contemplation of unutterable glories, how doth the mind tremblingly examine and carefully inquire into the truth and extent of its intereft in them! And if grace feal an anfwer of peace upon the heart, how doth it flutter with gladnefs at its fafety, and how will the whole frame be agitated with a new delight, in the fure profpect of an eternal concern in thefe valuable, thefe only valuable things.

The chriftian will be wakingly alive to all this and more, if his diforder be fuch, as can admit of reflection. Bleffed be God, however, whether he can thus reflect or not; yet, being a chriftian, his ftate is equally fafe with God through his gracious Redeemer. Whatever be the frame, the promife is fure, the covenant of God is ordered in all things and fure, and fure and faithful is God himfelf to perform it. It is comfortable, and indeed defirable, to have pleafant foretaftes and feelings of grace and glory, under the pain or decay of the body; but they are no otherwife material to the true believer's fecurity for heaven. If he hath not thefe perceptions during the thort time of his ficknefs, he will have them abundantly after it, if it ends in his diffolution; or if it do not thus end, the want of them is a loud admonition to make his calling and election fure, in the days that may yet be appointed him.

If we cannot think of Christ, through the power of disease, O what an happines is it to be assured, that Christ thinks constantly and effectually of us! He m res all our bed in our fickness; that is, he turns the whole frame of our condition in it for our best advantage.

O Lord, leave me not, poor and helples finner that I am, in my most healthful state; leave me not especially, I beseech thee, in the low, the languid, the distressing circumstances of infirmity and difease! Jesus, Master, thou art said to have borne our sicknesses because thou bearest the fins which occasioned them; take, take away from my confcience the guilt which brought disease, and then the worst part of its misery shall be done away too. And when, through my feebleness or disorder, I cannot act faith upon thy love; O catch my drooping spirit, carry me as one of thine own lands in thy boson, enfold me in thy gracious arms, and let my foul wholly commit itself and give up its all in quiet refig-nation to thee! If thou raise me from my fickness, grant that it may be for the fetting forth of thy glory among men: If thou take me by ficknels from this world, O thou hope and life of my soul, receive me to thyself for my everlasting happines, and to be anoth a S 2 monument of soverign grace before the great assembly of faints and angels in thy kingdom of heaven !

C H A P. XLIII.

Upon Death.

T is an awful and a folemn thing to die; and I am fometimes amazed at myfelf, that, feeing it is not only awful but fure, I can be fo void of reflection or recollection, as I frequently am, concerning it.

Some talk bravely about death, and of encountering it with great natural courage, or upon high philofophical principles. Thefe may indeed defy or meet the fting; but they can neither foften nor take it away. For a finner to bully death with no fpiritual life in his foul, and no everlafting life in reversion, is the act of a raving madman, who laughs at a horrible precipice before him, and rufhes down headlong to deftruction.

O eternity! eternity! It is fearful indeed to burft the bands of life, and to break forth into the boundlefs and unalterable regions of eternity! Nature, in its fenfes, cannot bear the fleeking reflection, which death affords, either of being an everlafting nothing as atheifts talk, or of enduring everlafting milery as fin deferves. It is grace only, which can inspire the heart with a hope full of joy and immortality, the , when this brittle transitory life is pass, the foul shall posses a being, happy and long as the days of heaven. Through Jesus Chulk alone is death difarm-

Through Jefus Chiff alone is death difarmed. When the Saviour speaks peace and falvation through his cross and righteousness, this last great enemy is no more the king of terrors. He gives up his fearful sting, and destroys nothing about the chiftian, but sin and the means of sin.

O how fweet is the fmile of that chriftian, who, dying in the body, feels bimfelf juft upon living for ever ! " He is not fick unto death, but unto life" indeed. He quits his cares, his forrows, his infirmities, and all that could diffrefs or diffract his fpirit here, and looks calmly into the world before him, where he can meet with nothing but concord and joy, in the fociety of the redeemer and of his Saviour throughout eternity. He is weaned from the earth, and therefore can part with it eafily : He is fitted for heaven, and therefore longs for it earneftly. He cannot but defire that, which is congenial with his own renewed mind; and nothing of that fort can truly and perfectly be found out of the regions of glory.

They who afflict themselves (said a primitive christian writer) about the loss of this life, are like infants unborn, who, if they could speak, might bewail their expulsion from the womb at the approaching time of their birth; foolifhly confidering it, not as the means, but as the end of being. Men, in their natural state, may indeed deplore their removal from this world, for which only they defire to live; but the renewed christian is privileged to have a more glorious hope of a life everlastingly pure like God's, and of an habitation wide and beautiful as the temple of heaven.

Lord, when I ihall quit this clay, I know not, nor do I defire to know. It will be fufficient for me, if thou fuftain me by thy grace now, and if I am divinely affured, that I fhall be for ever with thee in the world to come. O that this invincible joy of the Lord may indeed be my strength, when I lay down upon the bed of death, waiting from moment to moment for Chrift, and for my own difmiffion hence to be with him !

Soonthisbody shall return to the dust, from whence it was framed; but nothing can extinguish the life of my spirit, which hath no relation to earth, which cannot subsist by matter and form, and which, in all its faculties of will, understanding, love, and perception, is of a kin to a brighter world. And, O how reviving is the thought ! I am not only of kin to angels and heavenly spirits by the very nature of my soul; but I am doubly related to them and to my God, by being born again and renewed after his blessed image, or likeness, through Christ Jelus. I am made by this, a child and an heir of an everlassing inheritance. All that death, then, can do to me is, to tell me that I am of age, and to lead me forth from these chambers of darkness to celebrate my birth-day in the palace of glory. There is in this view (what hath often been tasted) a kind of luxury in dying. In such a blessed, such an animating sense of death, I ought to fay, that he deserves quite another name; or, rather, to exult with the prophet and apostle, O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?

Whence then, at times, is the fhuddering reluctance I feel at the prospect of dying? Surely it is, because my faith and hope are not so lively as they are privileged to be; it is because I do not so fteadily trust in the truth of those things, which my mind apprehends, and which I profess to be waiting for. Earth is too real, and heaven too unreal; or I could not thus hesitate, or tremblingly stand, on the bank of the brook which keeps me from the fruition of God. The struggle of my heart would not be for longer and longer coutinuance here, if my spirit were as stirmly perfuaded, as it should be, of my inheritance and mansfion in glory.

Thou bleffed Saviour of poor finners like me, on thee, and on thee alone, my eyes are fixed ! In the folemn laft hour of my pilgrimage below, O let my eyes of faith be yet more fleadily, and more ardently fixed upon thee ! And do thou, in the tender compafion of thy heart, which can fympathize with all thy people's woes, look down in my departing moments upon me. Soothe the pangs of death with thy rich confolation and care. Let me then lee thee by precious faith, who to carnal fenfe art invifible; ready, willing, glad to receive my foul; and let me pour it forth, in an extaly of praife and defire, as into the bofor of everlasting love !--O my God, thus to die, would not be dying; but only departing to live and to be happy for ever !

So true are th, gracious words, O my Jefus, that Whofoever liveth, and helieveth in thee, shall never die: No, he shall never perish, but is passed from death unto life, and shall live for evermore. Glory be to thee for this rich, this invaluable promise! Lord, I believe: O help mine unbelief!

C H A P. XLIV.

The Recollection of this second Part in Prayer to God.

NABLE me, O Lossi my God to enamine myfell, the flate of my foul, and the reality and growth of my experience, fericulsy, deeply, and conftantly. I am still clothed with a corrupt nature, and therefore am always inclined to favour myself; and nothing but thy grace can give me a faithful distrust of my own condition and attainments, or an holy watchfulness over all that passeth within me.

As I have received Chrift Jefus my Lord; fo, I know, it is my intereft, privilege, happinefs, and duty, to walk, to live, to grow, and to prefs forward in him. O keep me from fpiritual floth, or, as it may better be called, from carnal fecurity, that I may run with the loins of my mind always girt and difentangled, and with increasing faith and patience, the bleffed race which thou hast fet before me. Give zeal for every duty, wisdom and strength rightly to perform it, and a humble holy refignation of heart to leave all the fuccefs unto thee.

Make me wife to difcern the motions within my foul, and to trace out from whence they proceed. O let me not be deceived by the will, or the cunning force of the flefh, whenever it would mingle in holy things: But let my fpirit be thine own facred temple, where I may find thee indeed, working in me, enlightening and enlivening me for all thy fervice and glory, and drawing me, with a fingle eye, and a fimple heart, to feek not myfelf, nor lay own pride, profit, or pleaford, but all I want, and all I can rightly have in the alone. Draw me mearer and nearer to this just and perfect rule of action, to this fweet and bleffed fpiritual life; fo that I may be able indeed to fay, and with the increasing confidence of truth, I no longer live, but Chrift liveth in me; and the life, that I live in the flesh, is not after the flesh, but by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself freely for me. O let this be my humble and secret path. of life, which none can know but whom thou teachest, and which, for its narrowness, none can walk in but whom thou supportest by thy hand.

Thou knoweft, O my God, that I am in the world, furrounded by temptations, oppofed by men, attacked by devils, weakened by infirmities, and expofed by a corrupt nature to all manner of evils.

Without are fightings, within are fears. How fhall I get fafely on to the end, or rather, how fhall I get on at all, unlefs thou art with me! I plead then thine own promife of truth, that thou wilt guide me by thy counfel, and at last receive me to glory. Keep me while I am in the world, from

Keep me while I am in the world, from the envious, proud, hateful, dangerous, and unhappy fpirit, which aboundeth in it. Let me have conftant proof that I am thine, by having thy life manifest in my mortal body, controuling and subduing it in all things to thy righteous will. So shall even the world own, that I have been with Jesus; and if it hate me, upon that account, as it hated him, O welcome be it, and let me account it as one of my brightest evidences and greatest hollows. In all the circumstances and conditions of my outward life, O help me to look for thy special bleffing, without which nothing can succeed in itself, without which every thing may lead me astray. Help me to bear loss and crosses, as thy dispensations intended only for my good; and give me wisdom and grace to fee thine intention, and to get the good thou meanest by them. Restrain all the murmuring and rebellion of my carnal nature against thy holy will, and lead my spirit, by all visitations, to nearer fellowship and sweeter communion with thee. So shall my earthly forrows be turned into spiritual joys, and all the calamities, which can be all me here, shall become urging and fuccessful remembrancers to prepare for my mansion in thy heavenly kingdom.

And when fickness and death shall come, as come they must in a very little while at the longest, O stand by me, my dear and only Lord, in my drooping and needful moments. Make all my bed in my fickness, and overcome the forrows of nature by the lively joys of thy grace. Receive my spirit, which I commit unto thee, as thine only; for truly I am thine entirely, thine by purchase, thine by grace, thine by promise, thine by the immutable oath of all thine holy attributes. O carry me to the regions of peace, to the church of the sirft-born, to the city of God, and to Jefus my Lord, my life, and my only Redeemer ! Whom have I in heaven itself T but thee; and what can I defire, throughout all thy works, in comparison of thee! My heart and my flesh may fail; but thou, thou, even thou, art the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever!

THE CHRISTIAN REMEMBRANCER.

PART III.

CHAP. I.

The real Christian loves his Country, and is therefore the best of Patriots.

OLITICAL hypocrify hath made the laudable name of patriotifm almost fulpicious. But he, that is fincere in the bett things and walks as in the fight of God, will, of all men, be faithful in lower matters, and carry a fterling integrity from religion into every duty of focial life. On the other band, he, that regards not God, nor yet other men but as they are convenient to himfelt, nony very juffly be fulpected in his fidelity to his country. Profit and vain glory, meed, will carry fence men very far, as they have dene; but ftrip a worldly man of thele, and where 216 THE CHRISTIAN are his motives for promoting the national welfare?

The chriftian is not a mere flowy patriot, for lucre or for fame; but he is, what none but a chriftian can be, a patriot in fpirit and in truth, pouring out his fecret and earneft prayers before God for the true profperity of the land. The world, indeed, hath a low opinion of this artillery of heaven; but one, who is wifer than the world, hath told us, that the effectual forvent prayer of a righteous man availeth much. And if one fuch perfon, like an Elias, can be inftrumental in drawing down public bleffings; what may not be hoped for from the prayers of legions of chriftians throughout the nation? We may read what the prayers of fuch men have done, in Heb. xi. 33, 34.

xi. 33, 34. The christian patriot will rejoice in all the good done to his country; though other hands rather than his have been employed in the doing it. That man deferves not the name of a patriot, to whom the peace, honor, and prosperity of his country are valuable, only as they may contribute to his own.

As the christian's patriotifm is founded upon the pure principles of religion, he is more defirous of his country's prosperity in true worth and virtue, than in mere power and riches, which are often the dangerous fuel of luxury and pride both to states and individuals. He is no enemy to commerce, for a thousand reasons, but an utter enemy to commercial vices, for reasons infinite and eternal.

In withing for his country all kinds of tem-poral bleffings, he cannot forget to alk before God for a greater abundance of fpiritual mer-cies. His heart's defire is, that the gofpel and religion of Jefus Chrift, happily counte-nanced and established by the laws, may for ever flourish through the land in all its genu-ine power and purity. Though he is not, and cannot be an enemy to any man. yet he and cannot be an enemy to any man, yet he is a well principled adversary to all wicked and blasphemous errors and opinions, and to all profligacies of heart and life, which flow from them, and which have over-run the country with guilt and shame.

The christian carries religion into hispatrio-tism, but not his patriotism into religion. The things of God are too holy and facred with him, either to be mixed with or truckle to the little low politics of men. He is the citizen of a better country, and a pilgrim in all others, though a peculiar friend to that in which he was born.

As he can fay with Samuel, God forbid that I should fin against the Lord, in ceasing to pray for this nation; fo he would act upon all occafions, as Samuel did, and endeavour to promote the welfare of his country by being a good countryman. He will contribute fairly and cheerfully to her burdens, live in all godly quietness and honessy among his people, and pray faithfully and earnessly for the whole  $T_2$ public weal as a christian. Were all the subjects such patriots, the nation, with God's blessing, would have but small reason to live in fear of the most mighty and numerous enemies.

CHAP. II.

The real Christian is conficientiously a dutiful Subject to the King and his Government.

Le that faid, fear God, immediately added, as one evident proof of the reality of his godly fear, bonor the king. Being chief magnitrate, the king is God's first temporal minister, who is to bear the fword of justice and judgment, for the punishment of evil doers, and for the praise of them that do well. The christian then, living like a christian, has no just cause to fear a wound. We are commanded by God to reverence those who act under the king for these ends; how much more then are we bound to regard himself? And if the christian be concerned for his country, he can not be unconcerned for his fovereign, who is more deeply interested in its welfare than any other man.

He prays publickly and privately for his king, for his family, and for all that are put in authority under him. It is his wildom, interest, principle, and duty, thus to pray; because their prosperity is not only connected with his own, but their downfall would occasion the worst of hazard both to his country and his friends. He, who countenances strife and sedition, can no more be a true and benevolent christian than a real patriot and subject; for by these, confusion, rebellion, rapine, and murder, may overspread a land, to the destruction of millions, and to the reproachful hindrance of all godlinefs and piety. I can find examples of pardon for the molt attrocious private fins in the bible; but I do not recollect one instance of god's mercy extended to the public crime of rebellion. Possibly the reason is, because, as in an aggregate, it involves and induces every other wickedness, and is precisely that offence, which first ruined the fallen angels, and through them brought all mifery and mischief into this present world, as well as occasioned the irreparable forrows of eternity.

A true chriftian values private, public, and religious peace at too high a rate, ever to facrifice it to the caprices and furpicions of felfifh parties and wordly politicians. Corrupt as the world now is, he is thankful for the civil and religious liberty he enjoys, effeeding it a wonderful providence to him as a Briton above almost all other men; and therefore he is not captious and querulous that governors are frail mortal., like himfelf, and to canno; possibly please every one, nor be absolutely perfect in all things.

In cafes of real oppreffion, the chriftian hath a better God to go to, than his own paffions, or the violences of finful men, or the evil god of this evil world, who kindles those paffions and violences by his own. He doth not rave, but pray; not fwear and curfe, but bless; not ftrive to cut throats for his own felf will; but to fubdue his own heart first to the will of God, and to fosten the hearts of others by temperance of conduct, kindness of reason, and purity of life. And who is he that will harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good? But if ye fuffer for rightcouss fake, happy are ye; and be not afraid of their terrour, neither be troubled; but fanctify the Lord God in your hearts. The word of God is the chriftian's rule of

The word of God is the christian's rule of politics; not the false, fanciful, ignorant, and impracticable speculations of men, who knew not their own hearts, and who, deriving all from their own stock, could not have true wisdom or grace, and confequently could not truly and really govern themselves. Whatever principles, temper, and conduct, cannot be fanctified by the word of God and prayer, are absolutely unboly to a christian, and strictly to be avoided.

CHAP. III.

The real Christian will punctually obey the Laws of his Country in every thing, not opposite to the Will and Word of God.

NIQUITY, not righteousnels, is the object and occasion of law. Without law, fo finful is man, there could be no fociety, property, liberty, or peace. And though real christians would, as such, do nothing but right, were there no law at all; yet as the number of these is few, and as the nature of man is frail and requires order and direction, they cannot better shew, that they could live without laws, than by the most exact attention sever to break them.

There is only one cafe in which a christian can withdraw his obedience; namely, when the laws of men are directly opposite to the will, and word, and laws of God. But he ought to be very fure, that they are fo, and should not trust to his own single judgment; left, instead of suffering for God by resisting man, he only set up his natural felf-will against that of others, and so difgrace rather than glorify the cause of goodness and truth.

The laws of his country ought to be very dear, at this time, to a British christian; and allo to an American, because he is most unreservedly protected by them, in his liberty, 222 THE CHRISTIAN.

property, and religion. He can now fit and kneel too, under bis oven vine, none making him afraid.

A professor in religion acts unworthily, when he strives to evade the spirit and intention of the laws, or to profit by fecretly break-ing them. It is no act of faith either to fmug-gle, or to eat, drink, and wear, fuch things, as the prudence of the state hath forbidden. Persons, who can allow themselves in this licentiousness, ought to examine the upright-ness and fincerity of their own consciences, and whether they would not yet further contribute to the ruin and confusion of their country, if the punishment and force, meant for ungodly men, did not restrain even them. The christianity of a smuggler, or shuffler of just duties and taxes, is as much to be doubted, as the honor and justice of a professed highway-man. It may be added, that the man deserves the highest blame, who, professing religion, can venture to do what both religion and reason uniformly condemn. By his pro-fession he renders himself both a cheat and a hypocrite; whereas, without it, he would have proved himself only a knave. These are hard and bad names ; but they cannot be fo bad or offensive to us, as the persons, whom they describe, most certainly are to HIM, who hateth iniquity.

CHAP. IV.

How a real Christian should conduct himself towards the Church of God.

HE untamed corruptions and natural blindnefs of the human heart have introduced a great variety of diford 2.5 into chriftian profeflion, and occafioned the whole multitude of fects and parties. All believers agree, that there is but one fpiritual church, the bride of Chrift and the mother of the faithful; but all believers do not act, as if they really confented to this truth. What mifchiefs hath not tle carnal mind produced in all ages! Superfittion, bigotry, perfecution, pomp, parade, and intolerance, are all of them the proper fruits of an evil heart, uncircumcifed, unfubducd, untaught, by the Spirit and power of God. They are the evil and deteftable weeds in the fpiritual field, which do nothing but ftifle, overrun, rob, and impoverish the corn.

There are real christians perhaps in every christian church or fociety; and it will fcarce be denied, that there are hypocrites, formalists, carnalists, and ungodly men, in all. Let the christian's conficience be free; for God is his only master in these things; but to whatever particular protession he may belong, let his convertation we edifying to that, and let his charty be shewn to all the rest. He 224 THE CHRISTIAN fhould be willing to think the best things of any good men, confidering the prejudices of education, the differences of situation and temper, and the advantages which God hath given to some above others; and especially confidering, that real christians of all denominations are sincere in their views, and under deep concern for the falvation of their souls. These confiderations beget tenderness in every spiritual mind; and the want of this tenderness in any man is no prcof, that he is net yet carnal. "In things necessary there should be unity, in things not necessary liberty, and in all things charity."

Whatever difference be in the outward mode or form of real chriftians respecting their worship of God, their life and spirit of worship are one and the same. As believers under the law had the like grace of faith with those under the gospel, though there was a vast disparity in their outward dispensations; so these last have an inward and substantial unity, yea, and uniformity too, one with another. Let each then, in his several vocation, not so much strive for the honor of a party, the love of party being only the love of self; but to glorify Christ with all the gracious power which may be given them. It would be happy indeed for themselves, and honorable for the christian religion, if all its profesfors were like-minded in all outward things; but as this is not to be expected, while evil can mingle with good, or darkness with light, they ought however to labour hard, on all fides, to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.

Let him that uleth ceremonies, be candid to him that uleth them not; and let him, that will not obferve times, and days, and rituals, pray for, rather than revile, those who do. The love of Christ preaches this lesson, which the apostle of Christ, almost in-so many words, enforces and confirms.

With respect to those of the same denomination, the christian is called in a more especial manner to shew forth his works of faith and labours of love, for their comfort and edification. He will see, that the true distinction of a believer in Jesus, is not to rise over all and to set up himself as a great somebody, but to be the servant of all, shewing all meeknes, patience, gentleness, and truth. The infirm-ties of others he must not magnify, but pity and pray over, knowing that he himfelf also is in the flesh. The attainments of others he must not envy, because these are the free gift of God, which if a man can allow himself to envy, it is only becaufe he doth not know this gift aright. Strength of Spirit inspires another conduct : Weakness of the flesh alone submits to this. In fine, whether he be a public fervant or a private member in the visible church, he will pray, that he may demean himself according to the settled order, with all gravity and decency, that he may lay no . stumbling bleck in the way of the weak, and no offence before the eyes of the ftrong; but that he may be an example of godlinels, humility, faith, refignation, and charity, to all about him.

This, furcly, is far better than any nickname; for this is the true life and effence of the best name,—a CHRISTIAN.

CHAP. V.

On the reciprocal Duties of Ministers and People.

T would be prefumption in me to offer to teach those, by whom I would most gladly be taught. My words therefore, on this head, shall be few; and, I trust, they will not offend.

The faithful minifler is the fervant, the fhepherd or paftor, the overfeer, the teacher, the guide, the phyfician, the helper, and the comforter, of the people committed to his charge. It is not, confequently, a light bufinefs for light heads; but an awful and folemn concern, which requires all the grace, wifdom, prudence, learning, courage, faith, patience, and holinefs, that are difperfed among the laity at farge, to be collected in one affemblage for one man.

The profit of the flock, not the profit from the flock, is the grand object of a true paftor's concern. It is the character of the hireling, whose own the sheep are not, to care only for the fleece; and when he gets this, the sheep not being his (which he proves by his want of care for their fouls) he is nothing better than a robber. The world fwarms with these spiritual thieves, who facrifice all the plunder to their idleness, avarice, pride, or pleasures.

What a character doth the Lord give of whom he calls the faolifh flepherd! He doth not visit those that are cut off, nor seek the young, nor heal the broken, nor feed that which standeth still. Wo (continues he) to the ido! (the falle or foolish) shepherd: that leaveth the flock : the fword shall be upon his arm, and upon his right eye ; his arm hall be clean dried up, and his right eye shall be utterly darkened. He shall be without strength or understand. ing. Zach. xi. 16. See alfo Ezek. xxxiv.

When any congregation of people have the blessing of an able and faithful minister, how ought they to prize fo fearce and valuable a jewel! Such an one is worthy of all honor, both for his work's fake and for his own fake; and those christians are not wife for themfelves, ho do not all in their power to streng' ... his hands, and to assist him in his ministry.

One good way of accomplifting this, is to pray earnestly and constantly in private for the paftor. This would draw down mutual bleffings both on fpeaker and hearers, and much endear them to each other. The reafon, probably, of the diffatisfaction and ufeleffnels, which often arife between them, may be owing to the want of mutual prayer, which begets indifference or remiffnels, as well as difference too lax a fpirit of watchfulnels and faith. And, then, how can the word, on one fide, profit; and, on the other, how can the preacher be appoved ?

The minister of Christ, who gives up all his time, labor, and expectations to his holy calling, ought to be comfortably and honorably supported in it. The labourer is worthy of his hire; and the very beafts eat of the corn for which they toil. If the maintenance be voluntary, it ought to be the more liberal for that very reason; If it be settled, it ought to be punctually complied with. It is fad for ministers, whose business is of a higher kind, that the covetousness or dishonesty of their people should make it just and necessary for them to attend, with anxiety, to lower affairs. Certainly, it betrays a want of love to God, when man can suffer his ministers or his poor to starve by their dwellings. How can the pastor give himself up to the word and to prayer, when he is constrained to ferve tables? And how can he minister without distraction, when poverty and care haunt and worry him all the day long ?----As a layman, I may afk these questions, without sufpicion of any interested attachment to an order.

It is a melancholy fact, that the worldly pride and lazinefs of fome clegymen have made the laity regardlefs of their profession, and ready to treat it with wrongs; and that the spiritual ignorance and the irreligion of the laity have rendered the profession of the clergy, in all respects, not so honorable or defirable, as it should be, for themselves.

However these things may be, the christian hath one security of hope, which can never fail; The foundation of God standeth fure, baving this feal; "The Lord knoweth them that are his;" And, "Let every one, that nameth the name of Christ, depart from iniquity." God is our Refuge and Strength; we have found him abundantly fo in trouble: Therefore, will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the fea: There is a river, the streams whereof shall make glad the CITY of GOD.

Outward establishments may vary and fail; but the true temple of God shall endure for ever. Yet while Providence has ordained these outward establishments, it seems the business and privilege of grace cheerfully to observe and support them.

C H A P. VI.

On quarrels among Christians.

T is not grace which genders strife, but cor-ruption. If therefore my brother's corruption be raised against me, shall I oppose my corruption to his, and so enter into wrath; or shall I not rather beg of God, that his grace in me may invite the grace that is in my brother, and fo we may settle the whole in peace? If we are real christians, we must both desire only what is just and right, or we do not live like christians; and if we both agree in defiring this as the end, how is it, that we differ violently about the means? If either have done, or defired, the wrong ; the other, who is more under the conduct of grace, should kinaly and affectionately represent it; and, if he cannot be heard, should leave the matter to God, without raising the unholy and unhappy tumult of heat and refentment in his own mind. He that can bear and forbear most, is certainly most the christian. It is mifery and deadness to a real believer to walk and to war after the base fury and difcord of the flesh. When he deserves well, and patiently suffers evil, then he is like to his Master, and right in himself.

The apostle directs for believers, not the vengeance of the law, but christian arbitration. Law is the last refuge, and can only be lawful, when right is not to be had by better means.

If christians, who have a matter of difference, would graciously agree to meet with each other in prayer, and to pray together kindly for each other before the throne of grace'; furely, if they meant the attainment of that right and truth which they prayed for, they might foon find it out and fettle it accordingly. But, it is the flesh which comes in and mars all. One cannot stoop; and the other will not. They are not so wise as Luther's two goats, that met upon a narrow plank over a deep water. They could not go back, and they dared not to fight. At length one of them lay down, while the other went over him; and fo peace and fafety attended both. Why should not believers try this method? But, alas! while grace remains idle or neuter, the world jeers and triumphs; the devil is buly and excites; good men mourn and lament; the weak are stumbled and turned aside; and a long train of inquietudes and jealousies fill the breasts of those, who humbly hope to dwell with God and with each other throughout eternity. These things ought not to be.

If my brother be wrong, how shall I shew myself in the right? By wounding him more than he hath wounded himself? By doing wrong likewise, and rendering evil for evil? No; let me pray, that God would open his eyes, and not shut my heart; that he would give him more grace, and me more patience to meet what is not gracious in him; and, at the utmost, that I may not be a partaker with him of anger, or of those fins which may follow upon it.

Am I in the wrong? What then shall I do? Shall I persist in it, and make myself more in the wrong? This would not be gracious; this would be bringing misery by heaps upon myself. Rather let me go first to God, and then to my brother, acknowledging my fault, or my error, to both. There is no shame in confessing our fins to God, nor any meanness in owning them to men. It is the mark of a noble and generous spirit in common life; and it is the wisdom, as well as the duty and privilege, of a much better life in the christian.

O thou love of the brethren, whither art thou fled ! We profess to believe in the communion of faints; but where are the faints, who have this communion? We talk of the unity of God's church with respect to its members; but where are those members, who live in this unity? O shame upon us, that we differ at all, that we differ on trifles, that we love to differ, that we urge and promote differences, and that the healing spirit is not more to be found among it us ! Lord, if thou wouldit differ with us at any time, as we are ready at all times to differ with others; O how should we stand before thee, or what could we answer for ourselves! Give, O give, more of thy grace, that we may be humble in our own hearte, true and just in our desires, mild to others, and deeply submissive to thee!

On the marriages of real Christians, and their duties in that State.

T is the voice of reason and religion, that piety must not be yoked with prophaneness, nor the true believer with an infidel. When perfons have broken through this rule, they have always done it to their own fad cost; as abundance of examples can testify.

Some have ventured upon this transgression, from mere carnal motives, pretending at least to hope, that they might be instruments of bringing the other fide unto God. Many instances indeed occur, where both parties have married before they knew the grace of God, and have afterwards been called by it; but the example, perhaps, is not to be found, where a believer, acting directly against the rule of God for temporal ends, hath been bleffed with the fpiritual advantage of a partner's conversion, but on the contrary hath been vexed with trouble and mortification to the end of life. It may be expected, that God will be faithful to his own words, and that they who wilfully violate his order, cannot do it with his blessing.

This bleffing of God is all in all; and if we have not this, whatever we have befide, it is nothing, or worfe than nothing. When the marriage-contract is made gracioufly, and with grace; there is every reafon to hope for fuccels. The lefs water of earth, and the more wine of heaven, there is at the feaft, fo much the better.

After marriage, begins a life of care ; and confequently the life of faith fhould be ftrengthened to bear it. It is a good way for married perfons not only to pray in the family, or privately, but together. Mutual prayers will improve mutual affections, and turn the very commonest bleffings of life into fpiritual mercies. If Christ dwell indeed in both their hearts, he will not only keep out difgust and variance, but subdue or remove the causes of them.

As this flate requires much and ftrong grace to go through it properly towards God; fo it demands a larger exercise of charity, forbearance, and kindnels, than any other, that no duty fail between the first and dearest of neighbours, the husband and wife. These are more exposed to folicitude, trouble, and a thousand affecting circumstances, than perfons in the fingle state : they are yoked infeparably to meet them, and infeparably must bear them. Now, if grace be not the living and conquering principles in two perfons thus circumstanced; there are fo many imperfections in themselves, fo many unavoidable mortifications from others, and fo many evils on every fide, that it will be impossible for them to live, in a due degree as they ought, above the common difquietudes, which overwhelm the world. But grace in the heart will double every temporal mercy, foften every temporal mifery, and lead them on, with united hands, towards the kingdom of heaven.

What a comfort is it to true christians, truly married in grace as well as nature, to reflect, that, as they are helpers of each other's faith and joy in this world, fo they shall be everlasting friends, in a more exalted way of life, in the kingdom of God? They can remain together in this state for only a very few years at the most; but there, no further separation shall ensue : Being as the angels of God, they shall live with him and the whole church of the redeemed in unspeakable joy for ever. Their present union of heart and grace faintly typifies the union of themfelves and of all the faithful with Christ; and, when they part here, they do not separate in the best sense, but only pass off, one perhaps after the other, to enjoy this union in everlasting perfection.

C H A P. VIII.

On the Duty of Parents.

I HE general rule of parental duty is, to bring up children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. It is true, we cannot give them grace, but we can lead them to the means of grace: We cannot give them a new life, but we can correct the old one : We cannot make them to know Chrift favingly; but we can, and we ought to nurture them diligently in the ways of Christ, and admonish them in the fear of God. Whatever we can do for them, either temporally or spiritually, we are bound to do; and when we have done all, we must leave them to the Lord. We must not repine, if we cannot mend their outward circumstances; for these are in God's disposal: Nor should we faithlessly murmur, if all our prayers and diligence be lost for their spiritual good : for, as this is a gracious gift, we only feem to attribute too much to our own power and affections, when we unduly lament, that our children have not obtained it by us. When we have prayed to God for them; we must trust God with them, and wait the iffue in faith and patience. Nature will keep up our common endeavours, and grace will promote a thousand and athoufand prayers. These, when put together, will make up a good flock and foundation, and confequently no bad inheritance for them.

There is a promife of bleffing to more than the third and fourth generation of a christian's offspring; which love for them, and faith in the Promifer, will ever be prompting him to fue out, that they may obtain. I had rather be a good man's child covered by his prayers, than the fon of the first emperor in the world, undevoted and unblest.

Some that never had children, and others that would be wifer than Solomon, or rather than God's word itfelf, have written books to shew, that chastifements should be utterly excluded from education. Doubtless, it requires prudence and temper to chastife properly, and ought to be done with a fecret looking to God for a bleffing as well as on any other duty; but those have either taken up false principles of human nature, or have had but very little experience of it, who prefume that it will do very well without the fear of punishment, or that it can be reasoned into all the irksome duties and toils of life. Such methods, we know, will not restrain, even grown perfons, who certainly can reafon, and receive reason, better than children. Corruption is to be checked by all means; and if the gentler kinds fail of elfect, as they will in the far greater part of instances, the more severe must be used, but always without passion and in moderation. It should be understood to be a parent's fad duty, which therefore can give him no pleasure, but ou the contrary pain and mortification. When it is thus performed, it will not eafily be abufed: When otherwise, it is not really performed at all. The parent's ill conduct deserves a severer chastisement from God, than any that can be due to the mildemeanour of a child.

CHAP. IX.

On the Duty of Children.

HESE are to obey their parents in the Lord, for this is right. Till children have learned obedience, they have properly learned nothing, and will probably be fit for nothing.

As they owe to their parents, under God, their maintenance, protection, introduction to the duties of life, and their very life itfelf; God hath laid it upon them, as what is neceffary in the order of his providence, to honor and refpect their parents. Children, who tranfgrefs this order, rebel against God. And it hath been matter of great concern to many gracious perfons, after they have been brought to a true fense of things, that they have ' died particularly in this just and imporfant duty.

Their obedience is to be in the Lord, and for the Lord's fake. This is well pleafing to God, and profitable for themfelves. The only exemption is, if parents are forungracious and unjust, as to infult upon any thing which God forbids, or to oppose any thing which God forbids, or to oppose any thing which God forbids. Here, the most dutiful call for mult difolely, and can plead God's own abfolution. There is one great circumstance in life, which often strains the bond of filial duty. This is marriage. Children ought, if possible, to engage in this state with the full blessing and confent of their parents. On the other hand, parents should never constrain, and not always restrain, the affections of their children.

The two trying cases are fortune and religion.

As to the former; the difcretion of parents is ufually of great importance. Children are not to follow their passions into ruin; nor is it the duty of their parents to confent to it. On the other hand, mere lucre should not guide the parent's eye or mind, but the nobler confiderations of character, worth, and piety. Where these are wanting, all the wealth in the world is nothing but a gilded curfe.

As to religion, the unalterable rule for christians is, to marry in the Lord. If a parent direct otherwise, the command of God must first be regarded; and tho' he may have a right to put a negative perhaps upon almost any match, he cannot have a right to command one, which is contrary to the express word of God. He likewise hath not a right to facrifice his child's natural affections in any marriage, even where no objection can be made upon a religious account, because the peace and comfort of natural life are concerned, and because the child must be the fusifierer here, and be exposed to some dangerous temptations. On the other hand (to put the last difficult case) where the child hath placed affections in a manner, that religion and all other circumstances will justify, but, because of religion, the parent with-holds confent; it will be best to try all means to gain that confent, to wait as long as possible and with as much patience as possible for it, above all to supplicate the Father of mercies to dispose the hearts of the parties concerned aright, and not at last to venture on an act of such apparent disobedience, but sor fear of greater evils than what may arise from the unreasonable obitinacy, perverseness, or irreligion of the parent. The case is so nice, and may fo vary in its circumstances, that the wisdom, uprightnels, grace, and impartiality, of the ableit christian friends should be well confulted upon the occasion.

СНАР. Х.

On the Duty of christian Masters.

T is far more difficult rightly to command, than dutifully to obey. To be a mafter and a christian at the fame time, in the direction of worldly affairs, requires more grace than menufually imagine. The master may soon be acted, and the people are commonly very fond of acting this, from the luft of power which rages in corrupted nature; but to command under a fenfe of God's authority, the things which are juft and equal, and not to be lifted up with the pride and paffion of preeminence, this is to give a proof, that the heart indeed lives as in God's prefence, and that worldly fuperiority, which generally begets infolence, can be maintained with true meeknets and humility. But how can he, whom grace hath not made mafter of his own corruptions, expect obedience from others with all readinels and funcerity?

, cost

As in a higher cafe, fo in this it may be afked of every christian master, Who maketh thee to differ from another? Surely, God's providence never raifed men into power, that they might shew their pride only, but to do good, and to carry or, as far as their power may extend, the welfare of fociety. If any people act otherwise, they must one day be deeply convinced, that coll the little diffinctions of men have no natural reality in them, and that there is one common Master in heavon, with whom there is no fuch thing as respect of perfore.

Many proteffing matters are exceedingly deficient in one great duty to their fervants. They give them perilaps plenty of bread, and furnish them well in earthly things; but they neglect to hold out the best of all subsistence, the bread of life to their souls. The omission of family worship cannot be excused on any account. This (as one faid) like the hem to a garment, keeps all things together, and prevents other duties and affairs from ravelling out. Servants cannot have grace indeed but by God's mercy; but they can easily fee, if their masters do not live graciously, and will readily notice it too; nay, fometimes make from their failures an apology, though a bad apology for themselves. If masters would live and demean themselves like chriftians indeed, and walk in the fear of God; their fervants would mend their manners, if not their hearts, and we should have fewer complaints than we have, to the difgrace of religion and the difcomfort of our lives.

C H A P. XI.

On the duty of christian Servants.

Profeffing fervant should get by heart the following rule of the apostle, and in all his business keep it in mind. "Servants, be obedient to them that are your masters according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, in fingleness of your heart, as unto Christ: Not with eye-fervice, as men-pleasers, but as the fervants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart; with good-will doing fervice, as to the LORD; and not to men.

Our proud hearts do not naturally love obedience. We would all be mafters, and fet up for ourfelves; and if God fuffered this, corrupt as we now are, we should all soon be undone.

Is the mafter a man of the world? The chriftian fervant's light fhould fo fhine before him, that, though he may hate him for his religion, he may respect him for his diligence, dutifulnels, uprightnels, and truth. Some mafters have been won to God by the gracious and upright conduct and conversation of their fervants; and how do those fervants live, who fay, that they shall not be fo blessed? If the master be harsh, it is not likely that a fervant's faucinels should reclaim his mind, or do good to himself, or bring honor to the cause of God. Let all be done, which can be done, without murmurings and disputings; and if there be no other remedy, it is better to part than to commit the fins of impertinence, or to live in the fins of anger and of strife.

or to live in the fins of anger and of strife. Is the master a real christian? The faithful servant will render him double honor, and rejoice to obey him on a double account; both because providence hath made such an one his master, and grace his brother and friend. If he take any unhandsome liberties on that account, forgetting his own place and duty, he breaks the order and disposal of God, and lays for his own mind a foundation of much uneasines. It is a fad mistake of their duty, when truly serious servants imagine, that by the grace of God they are to take up a new fort of natural boldnefs, and that, inflead of putting on the ornament of a meek and quiet fpirit, they have from grace a privilege to be infolent, froward, rough, and difobedient. What a wretched thing is it to be faid in the world, as it too often is; I had rather have any kind of fervants, than profeffors of religion, becaufe they are always lazy or unruly: Or, "I had rather have any one for my mafter or mittrefs, than thofe who talk about godlinefs; they are always fo gloomy, humourfome, and perverfe: In their places of worfhip they feem faints; but at home they are wolves, and bears, and very devils."—O this is a fad light indeed before men; or rather an unfhining taper, that reeks only in a fmoke and a flink!

The laws of this country, above all others, are fo much in favor of fervants and the poor, that the chriftian fervant is obliged, in gratitude both to God and man, to conduct himfelf with the more zeal in his fervice to both. Servants here are confidered by the laws as equally free in perfon with their matters, and are not to be defrauded or abufed. How then fhould the chriftian blefs God, that he hath placed him in fuch a country as this, where the gofpel is freely preached and freely heard, and where he can enjoy his conficience with comfort and liberty? If he hath more work than his mafter (though that is not always the cafe) he hath lefs care, fewer diffractions, and is more out of the way of many deceitful and dangerous temptations.

CHAP. XII.

On the Christian's Duty in his Calling.

N the conduct of all things, whether fpiritual or temporal, a chriftian is called, not unto uncleannels, but unto bolinels, and to be blamelefs and barmlefs, the fon of God without rebuke, in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation. The methods and practices of evil men are to be no rule with him; but his outward life and conduct fhould be a luminous example unto them. He fhould remember, that though they cannot fee or know his inward life or principle of action, yet they are very able judges of the action itfelf, and can eafily difcern whether his temper, honefty, fincerity, goodnels, and charity, be fuch as become his profession.

The christian's station, therefore, in this life, should be maintained for his master's glory; for that is his chief business, not only in the church, but in the shop, the field, the house, the closet, and in all he hath and doth in the world; for which end, grace must come into and superintend the whole. Be he sich or poor, high or low; if he live with... grace in common life, he lives poorly to God, if at all, in fpirituals, and (to fay the beft) at a very cold and uncomfortable rate within himfelf. For a christian to think of getting fatisfaction or happiness out of the creatures without God's bleffing, argues a great want of faith and experience; and he cannot have this bleffing, unless he carry grace with him into his circumstances, and subject his own will, his vocation, his industry, and all his carnal affairs and affections to God's glory.

A christian is as much a man of grace at the market or in the shop, as in the church or the closet. He deals fairly and conscientiously, neither defrauding in the nature, measure, or weight, of commodities, nor ta-king base advantages of the ignorance of o-thers. The money, gotten by fraud, hath a curse, that will either bring torment with it, or melt itself away. There is a maxim, "Buy cheap and fell dear " And to commutation "Buy cheap and fell dear :" And to carry this maxim on, men will wrongly undervalue and difcommend, faying, It is naught, naught, in order to defraud the feller of the just worth; they will over-prize, and put into a false light by a thousand false words, what they have to part with, merely to take in the buyer. Thus shop-lies, as well as customhouses oaths, are become proverbial, and therefore trivial, even with some, who should treat all such a-bominable practices with detestation. But how can he be thought an upright man with God or in the church, who can pick another's pocket by words, which he knows to be deceitful and unjust, in the poor concerns of this world?

The putting double prices upon goods is also dishonorable and unworthy of a christian. If a man give the higher price for that which the feller can and will afford at the lower; the feiler is a thief and a cheat, for all the money in the difference. The law of man indeed will not lay hold of him ; but he should ask himself, What is that gain worth, which hath the curfe of God upon it? He may be sure, it hath not his blessing, because it is unclean and unjust. For aught he knows, it may bring a curse upon all his fair profits, and lay the ground of much future unhappinefs, if not of ruin. Would he do fuch things if he were dying? How then can he dare to attempt them, when he knows not but that he may die in the doing them ? It is a laudable custom, which some worthy persons have set up, to put one fair sum upon their goods, and to take no other.

With refpect to commodifies of fuctuating value, the market must be the standard of demand; it being understood, that the market is neither enhanced nor depressed by any known artifice or design.

In all cafes of traffic and business, every man oweth justice to himself and justice to others; and it is his duty to wrong neither. A christian must be an honest man, and will not wilfully, knowingly, and perfeveringly, do wrong: And therefore if any perfon will thus do and continue to do wrong, he cannot deferve the name of an honeft man, and much lefs that of a christian. The counfels of the wicked only are deceit.

Whenever doubts arife upon any fubject of this kind, let the christian do as the Pfalmist did---- fet the Lord always before him. If a man walk closely in the fear of God, he will very rarely through ignorance be guilty of injustice to man.

I believe, further, that a christian is conscientiously, though not legally bound, to supply all deficiencies in former failures, whenever providence may afford him the power. The christian seems a very strange one to me, who needs the chain of statutes to bind him to duty; and, therefore, though it may be his cafe, and the case of many an honest man, to become a bankrupt, but certainly a credit to no man; yet, when his certificate is granted, and he is thereby become clear of the compulsive force of the laws; how can he delay, with a clear conscience, to make good to the utmost any just loss, which others have fustained by him, as soon afterwards as God shall give him the ability? I have heard of fome, and these too were mere men of the world, who, recovering from ruin, had the magnanimity and good sense (for indeed it is both when underitood) to discharge all remainders to creditors, and, with those remainders, the interest accumulated upon them: And shall one, who calls himself a believer in Jesus and a child of God, neglect, in a similar case, to do both himself and his christian profession so beautiful an honor only by doing strict justice to those unfortunate sufferers, who, by their confidence in his integrity, have every fort of claim to expect it from him? I should doubt the faith of the professor, who could hesitate a moment to do or to own so plain a duty.

There are also fome professions, which no real christian can dare to follow. It is not neceffary to name them, because they fall under the stroke of one general rule, which every believer in Christ must approve. "The trade, the calling, or the gain, which cannot be prayed over, be lived upon in faith, and carried on with thanksgiving, is, like Achan's golden wedge and Babylonish garment, a curse to the owner, and an abomination to the LORD." On the other hand, "a small thing, which the righteous hath, is better than great riches of many wicked;" and he is much faster and happier too, who with grace in his heart, hath no money in his purse, than he, who, with thousands of gold and filver, hath the wrath of God along with them.

It is the privilege and duty of a christian to commit all his present concerns to the favour and blessing of God. He that prays, as well as works, loses no time by his prayers. He that works, but doth not pray, may often expect to labour in vain, as well as in fin, and to bring his affairs to no good end. " Duty hath much prefent comfort, and no curfe in it ;" which confideration alone is worth all the care of a christian.

CHAP. XIII.

That Duties are not to be measured by the success which may follow them, but by the Word of God only.

W E have much felf-love and felf-righteoufnefs in our fallen nature, which caufe us to expect fuccefs from our fpiritual or temporal duties, and to be mortified when we do not find it. Whereas if our minds were perfectly given to the Will of God, or in this frail ftate could be fo given; that Will would be perfectly our own.

Let not the christian grieve without hope, if after all his attention to duty in his commonconcerns, they may not seem to prosper in his hands; for, however they seem, they do prosper for his real good, and especially if his heart and soul are drawn by any disappointments the closer to God. "God's promises are not to be measured by his providences, but his providences by his providences," The christian therefore must keep in the straight path of duty, and leave it to God to appear faithful in the end, who can at no time be otherwife.

In religious duties, fuch as prayer and exhortation to bis family, the chriftian may likewife not always be attended with fuccefs; but is he, or can he dare, to ftop their performance upon that account? He fhould remember, what God hath appointed him, and he fhould pray to do it; but. as to the event, this doth not belong to him. It is God's concern entirely. He may indeed rejoice, when he feeth the hand of God; but he must trust and be doing, when he feeth it not. All will be well with him; and that furely is fufficient for him.

It hath been a fore trial to many faithful ministers, when they have worked hard in God's vineyard and have not fped. But it is scarce necessary to observe to these, that they shall be blessed in their labour, if not from it. They feel the comfort of God's promife and presence, or they would go on more heavily still. It is an old complaint, "I have stretched forth my hands all the day long to a rebellious and gainfaying people." So Noab was a preacher of righteousness for an hundred and twenty years, while the ark was in building; but it doth not appear, that he wrought upon one soul. He was not, however, the less blessed of God. Our Lord's apostles converted more than himself abundantly; and probably for this reason, that his faithful ministers should not afterwards be too much dif.

couraged, when they see not an immediate fruit of their labours.

CHAP. XIV.

On the Deportment of a Christian to others.

N the first place, "as much as lieth in him, the christian will, if possible, live in peace with all men." That blessed Dove, the Holy Spirit, harboureth not with contention and strife, but loveth peace, concord and unity, yea, and unanimity too. It is by him that men are of one mind in their own house, and in the house of God.

As the christian is no brawler; so, in his habit of life, he cannot be an arrogant, uplifted, conceited, and presuming person; because such an one, in this arrogant world, cannot possibly be free from brawling.

Not being a coxcomb of this world, the christian hath nothing to plume himfelf upon for the admiration of others. He knows, that the applause of men will not follow the true fervant of Christ, and that, if it did, it is too dangerous a thing for him to meddle with, whose inward felfishness costs him a constant hard labour to subdue it.

He values men, and defires to value them more, as God values them. The family of the faithful are his relations for eternity; and he will spiritually esteem these above all other men. He is to live with them in glory. "By this shall all men know, that ye are my disciples (said Christ) if ye have love one towards another.

His natural love to his natural friends, is not extinguished by the love of God, but elevated, purified, and increased. He sees more of the real worth of their souls, and is more anxious accordingly for their belt interest and immortal welfare. Those among them, who have obtained like mercy with himself, are more especially endeared. Those who want this mercy, have his servent prayers and compassion, because they want it. When he cannot love for Christ's sake, he will not cease to love them for their own.

Railing and evil-speaking, he will cordially detest. The good he knows of others he will rejoice to mention, and the harm (unless for prevention of further harm) he will study to conceal. It is a good rule, never to speak of men's faults to others, till we have first and faithfully spoken of them to the offenders themselves. This would prevent a world of mischief and slander, and perhaps fave many from persisting in fin.

He will esteem grace, and even common virtues and worth of character, above all manner of riches. A rich wicked man is, in a christan's eye, somewhat like a body bloated with unwholesome fat and disease; not very pleasant to look upon, but much to be pitied and deplored. O what an evil is fulnefs of bread, without emptinels of self, and fulnels of grace! The christian will behave to fuch, with the decency that becomes himself, and with the respect due to their station: At the same time, he cannot be partaker of their fins; nor ought he to mils the opportunity, if providence give it him, to set before them better riches than they now enjoy, even God's durable riches and righteoufness. Though few of this fort shall be faved, and it is only posfible with God to fave any of them; yet the christian will be the more tender and compasfionate to them upon this very account. they are to have their whole portion in this Tife; should not the anger, that may be felt from their insolence and pride, be turned into pity and prayer; fince their riches will soon be corrupted, and not an atom of their pomp can follow them.

With regard to the poor, the christian cannot, as a christian, be wanting in commiseration or relief, fo far as it lies in his power. The affliction of their circumstances will reach his heart most, when his hand can do least to abate it. No real christian can despise the poor. He that doeth this, is under a worse poverty than their's. God hath chosen the poor of this world to be rich in faith, and heirs of his kingdom: How then can those among the poor, who are thus blessed, receive contempt from God's children? Or how can the poor at large be treated with infolence and cruelty, when the Lord hath declared, that be will avenge their caufe? If a poor man be wicked, he is doubly entitled to pity; becaufe he hath nothing in this world, and worfe than nothing to expect in the world to come. If a poor man be gracious, he is doubly an object of love; becaufe he is now under many trials in the flefh, which the wealthy do not feel, and yet is dear to God, as his own bleffed child and future inheritor of his glory.

To men of every rank and flation the chriftian will endeavour to render their due; cuftom to whom cuftom, fear to whom fear, honor to whom honor. Let his own fituation in this world be what it may, he is the only gentleman in heart, whatever others may feem to be in outward grimace and manners. He is gentle, shewing all kindnefs to all men. This is the golden polifh; and without this, the reft is nothing but tinfel.

It will appear from hence, that the christian fchool teachesh the most difficult good manners of any in the world. It not only infifts upon a decent outfide, but leads to the correction of the heart, and to the strictest adjustment of all things into a right order within. No lax morals, no licentious conduct, no ill words, no indecent looks, no, nor yet one evil thought, are tolerated for a moment to the disciple of Jesus Christ. He would be, if he could; and he grieves because he cannot be, in this life, all holines and perfection. Thus though no part or cause of his final falvation Jepends upon what is done by him, or what in done in him; yet he defires to abound in all the fruits of faith, which are by Christ Jesus, to the prase and glory of God. And if these things be so; how can any presume to say, "That the doctrines of grace are pregnant with immorality?

CHAP. XV.

The christian's Conduct to the tempted and diftreffed in Mind.

HE members of the fame body have a natural care and fympathy for each other; and fo have the members of the church of Christ, which is his spiritual body. They cannot know of he forrow and trials of a brother's foul, without fome concern of fpirit, or feeling of compassion.

Godly conference and discourse are often rendered the means of comfort and relief. The Lord indeed usually works in this way, that his people may fee it to be their greater privilege and duty thus to help each other's faith, and so be joint partakers of his joy. This mutual regard and affistance tend also to unite the flock of Chrift, and to make them more and more dear to each other. For want of this, many congregations are like fcattered sheep, unaffectionate, disregarded, and careless of their brethren's true happiness and prosperity.

Whatever be the trial or the diforder, the word and premifes of God are the appointed help and remedy, which must chiefly be used and applied. If God's word cannot relieve the troubled mind; vain indeed must be the word of man. Besides, experience shews, that this word hath been blessed to the souls what this distressed people, when all other helps have failed.

And as t : bleffing must descend from above, so all siscourses, if not begun, should at least be ended in prayer. Very often in the prayer, the trouble shall be lightened, which the previous discourse did not seem in the least to remove.

There is not a possible case of distress into which a believer can fall, but there is something in the holy scripture which can meet it. It is the wisdom, then, of a gracious person, in all conferences with the afflicted, to have a store of fuitable passages with him or in his mind, that out of it he may be able to draw what may tend, under God's blessing, to remove or to lessen the trial.

Where the body as well as the foul is affected, proper remedies must be administered to both, and especially to the latter, that it may be encouraged to support the frailer and the weaker part. If it be a case of sickness, the mind above all things must be attended . to, for if that be well, it will not only enable the person to bear the other better, but it will have this noble cordial within, that all shall be well at the last. It is an abominable wickedness in some physicians, that they order all religious discourse out of the chambers of the fick and the dying, left it should lower the spirits (as they think) and perplex the mind. Are the dying then to be deceived into death, if they are ignorant of God and falvation? Or, if they know God, are they to have no comfort of his word, when they have the most occasion for it? It is equally wicked to flatter with life, when death itself is at the very door. I remember a man, who seemed to have some serious impressions from religious discourse, under a near prospect of dying; but when a deceiving physician had assured him of his recovery, he threw away all concerns for heaven, received with difgult any mention of the state of his foul, and was found with cards and idle company in the very evening of that night in which he fell speechless and died. Did not fuch a physician contribute what he could to the murder of a foul? And is not this the worst because the most lasting cruelty?

Certainly, religious discourses at such seafons shold not be thrust in at random, but by discreet persons, or (if they can be had) by pious ministers, who will neither be too long at one time in their attentions, nor offer what may be unsuitable or impertinent.

When the foul is relieved and confoled, every one knows how much it will fometimes contribute to the health of the body. But, if it be the will of God to remove the party from this world; furely, in the acts of faith and of the comforts which faith brings, it is the more meet to alcend up to another. Why fhould a chriftian go off thoughtlefs and fad to celebrate the marriage-fupper in heaven.

All trials and troubles are meant to take out the drofs from the christian. By grace, they have this effect, more or lefs, throughout his life: And all his distress likewife are exactly proportioned to his need of them. The last refinement is in death, in which he is perfectly cleansed and purified from every corruption, and removed to enjoy that pure state, which is void of forrow and fin to all eternity.

CHAP. XVI.

The Christian's conduct to old Age.

IT is the Lord's express command, Thou Shalt rife up before the heary head, and henor the face of the old man, and fear thy God. The experience and gravity, the judgment and wisdom, frequently found in old age, demand veneration; and even where 1 ele are in some measure wanting, the infirmities and inquietudes of that state call upon people of younger years to abound in compassion towards them.

I know not how it may be with others; but for myfelf I ever loved the company and conversation of the antient, preferably to the gay humours of the young, and have been exceedingly delighted at their explanations and informations of circumstances and events, which no books could possibly have given me.

To this day, I cannot meet an aged perfon, especially if he be infirm, without feeling some kind emotions of heart towards him; and these are always heightened by an anxious pity, if it appear that he hath not yet felt any true concern for himself. All this may be mere nature, it is true; but however, I do not wish to suppress it.

The grey hairs of the aged call aloud upon them, and through them to all men, Prepare to meet your God. They are remembrancers, at once, of death at hand and of eternity to come.

But the antient christian is effectively to be confidered as a venerable pile, refpecting his foul, built up in a long course of grace for the habitation of God himfelf. The Fathers in Christ, having known HIM who is from the beginning, are to be revered, confulied, and (if need be) defended, by the younger brethren upon all occasions. The apostle, encouraging this tribute of respect to the aged, exhorts, Rebuke not an elder, but entreat bim as a father, even when his conduct should be fuch, as is not to be approved. If these have tried grace and long experience, they have also increasing natural weakness and numberless infirmities, by which, it will be no wonder, if in some instances they should be overborne. Could a young man, with a very large portion of grace, change places with them for a day, it is to be doubted, whether he would manage the case any better; though it is not to be doubted, that he would learn extraordinary commiseration in future.

CHAP. XVII.

The Christian's conduct to Youth.

A N heathen could fay, That the greatest respect is due unto children. He meant, that nothing should pass before their sight which night either lead them to vices, or encourage vices in them.

There is no need of gloom in any of the things of God. True ferioufnels wants it not, and is very foreign to it in its nature. It is particularly unneceffary to indulge this fullen and morose humour of the natural heart (for it is seldom little better) before youth, or children. There is an easy cheerfulness and benevolence, remote from all filly levity, and highly confistent with grace and the best good sense, which ought to reside in a christian's heart, and which he might exhibit particularly upon occasions to younger persons. They are to be drawn by the cords of a man, that is, with natural affections; and though it is not in man's power to render them truly religious, yet surely religion ought not to appear before them, or any body else, as a poor miserable, dreadful thing, like a ghost, to frighten them away from her. They should fee as well as hear, by the example of real christians, That the ways of religion (or true wisdom, which is the fame thing) are ways of pleafantnefs, and all her paths are peace. Sournels may indeed be found very plentitully in nature; but there is not one fingle particle of it in all the being or exercise of grace. On the contrary, its tendency is to correct the natural moroseness of the human heart.

The Pfalmist gives this mild and gentle invitation : Come, ye children, bearken unto me: I will teach you the fear of the Lord. But wherefore? That they might fee good, and partake of the bleffings, which he immediately fets before them.

Our Lord's benevolence to children is above all comment. He gave an example of goodwill and "tendérnefs, in this respect, which not the greatest and wifest of his difei-ples can think himself too wife or too great to follow.

The fincerest faithfulness to their fouls is confistent with the greatest good nature to their persone; nay, we cannot be truly goodnatured to them, unless we are faithful. Instruction, even in the best things, may be set before them in an inviting form, without the . least deviation from the soundness of truth; and, by a little gracious skill, they may however be led to perceive, how deep an interest and concern they have in them. If God is pleased to second the instruction, by giving them a true sight of themselves; it is a known cafe, that they will love and honor those, who gave the instruction, as long as they live. And if God doth not bless it to the defired end, yet the piety and well-meant kindnefs of the instructor will not fail of their approbation and respect; for none can chuse but love those, who shew any real or disinterested regard for themfelves. Besides, who can tell, that the feed now fown in early age, though it seem buried and forgotten for many years, may not, in the secret workings of God, be brought forward into life at some future time? There are many inftances of perfons, who have been bleffed by instructions received in younger days, who appeared to have forgotten God, their instructors, themselves, and every thing else that was good for a very long portion of their life, and yet afterwards have been bleffed and made happy, through grace, in the very recollection of those things, which, like bread upon the waters, seemed to have been lost, but which were found, and found with great advantage, after many days.

Sin may be checked, nay punished, and yet the finner be loved. The finner shall love in return when he perceives, that love occasioned the correction, or rather, that there would have been no correction but from love. It is the fame in a higher case: Whom the Lord loveth be chasteneth: And he will not do this, but for those who are truly his fons.

It is very much their own fault, if there be not great weight in the conduct of parents and friends with young perfons and children. Thefe, it fhould be remembered, hear their words; but they watch their example. If the doctrine and life be the fame thing, they will regard the former for the fake of the latter, with reverence : If the preceptor divide them, it is ufual for them to defpife both, and to treat him with cenfure, or derifion, into the bargain.

C H A P. XVIII.

On the Death of Relatives and Friends.

T was the faying of a man, who had lost all his children and all his fubstance, and who found not one true friend to offer him the least real comfort : " Naked came I into the world, and naked shall I go out: The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; bleffed be the name of the Lord."

This is the refignation of a believer. He refers every thing to the will and work of God; and, having nothing of his own but fin, and nothing to lofe by death but fin, all he hath, being by bounty and favor, should be freely offered up to the disposal of the Giver. This confideration indeed, if by itfelf and alone, would not fatisfy him; but there is another which ought, and being fet home upon his heart by grace, most certainly will : " All providences, whether pleafant or trying, shall work together for good to them that love and fear God." When God loves, and loves for the best end; and when God contrives, and contrives only the beft means; why is the mind of any christian overcharged with disquietude and lamentation, with murmuring or forrow? Doth he not as much as fay by it, "Father, not thy will, but my own be done !"

" I have lost a friend," fays some anxious But who took that friend? Was it mind. not the God, who gave him? And hath he taken more than his own? And, if a pious friend, hath he not removed him to the best advantage? And is it not thy great privilege, after the enjoyment of such an one in this. deplorable world, to live and be with him again, not here, but in a better ? Befides, chriftian, thou haft neither loft thy God, nor thy friend; no, nor yet will they ever lofe thee. Thy friend, at the utmost, is but furrendered, not tunk, and shall be found again with advantage. Pray then agains the over-strong impressions of carnal sense; for all this is the striving of animal life, of mere flesh and blood, against God; and defire thou to find thy will in the divine will alone. Be filent when it strikes, contented when it denies, thankful when it gives, refigned when it takes away. It is not the gold in the furnace which bubbles and froths upwards, but the drofs and the fcum.

"I have loft a child," fays another : But alk thou, Who hath found him? Is it not that gracious Redeemer, who called little children unto himfelf when upon earth, and who gave them the higheft of benedictions? Hath not this child efcaped a thoufand evils and miferies and fins, which it muft have undergone or committed, had it lived longer among the miferable finners of this world? And doth it not enjoy unutterable happinefs with thine own beft Friend, with whom alfo thou thyfelf hopeft to live for ever? And is it worthy of thy love to thy child thus exceffively to bemoan its deliverance from grief, and its poffefion of peace? Or, rather, is it not the felfifh working of thine own too much empailioned heart, which lamen et its own lofs in the fleih, or feeketh its cwn pleafure more than thy child's happinels, or its own will more than God's ? I believe, if thou examinest closely, thou wilt find fomething of this within thee: But, however, be it what it may, it ought not to be there. It is no fruit of faith; and it will render no comfort to thy foul.

" I have lost a wife or an husband, the very desire of mine eyes, the outward comfort of my life, and my greatest outward support." -I would not fay, Do not feel any grief, but do not grieve beyond measure. When Lazarus died, even Jesus wept. Nature may suffer for its own loss; it may suffer for the losses of others; and in many cases it is decent to feel, and charitable to fympathize; but nature if alone is impatient and blind, efpecially in spiritual things, and makes all its reckonings from the outward fenses. To fay to nature, that grace gains where the lofes, will never comfort her; and to fay to perfons, who are at any time greatly under the affections of nature, or more under her impressions than under those of grace, that their souls may profit where their bodies have lost, will be dull news, which then at least can fearce find a hearing. The appeal then, mult be to grace itself; and nature, if not quite shut out, mult at least stand nearer the door. As grace becomes strengthened and quickened, nature will be fubdued and quieted, from her tumult and forrow. And, therefore, under these trials it is, that it may chiefly be feen in believers, how strong or weak their faith is in the Lord. I knew a pious and excellent woman, now with God, who, with as much natural tenderness of heart as ever mortal creature had, and with as much affection for her hutband as perhaps it is possible for human nature to feel for one every way worthy of her, received the account of his fickness and death, without a murmur or a groan, and with only fome filent tears, which shewed the greatness of her natural loss, the sense of her partner's gain, and the ftrong and lively hope which filled her foul, of living with him again in a blifsful eternity. I faw this amiable and beau-tiful example of the power of grace, and was convinced by it, how much above all fickness and feebleness of nature it can rise, and triumph, and glorify God.-Christian, couldest thou have seen this gracious instance as I saw it, it would have taught thee upon fast, how to mourn and bewail the fame kind of lofs, and how to live upon God; not without a feeling, for that is brutal infenfibility, but without being stunned or stupisied in the use of grace by the feelings of nature.

But, excellent as this example is, thou and I have a more fure word of tellimony to truft in, that we may get the better of our natural loffes and forrows. God, who gathereth all the fathers, will gather us ere long to the fathers in his glory. If our relatives, our deareft relatives, be dead as to this world, they now thank God, that they are fo; and we may be reminded of the promife of our gracious faviour, which affures us, that, respecting our fouls and the fouls of all the faithful, they never shall, they never can, so much as fce, or taste of death. Why then should we forrow, as those who

Why then fhould we forrow, as those who have no hope ? We ought to be assumed of our felfish grief, and to befeech of God, that he would at least turn it into tranquil refignation, if not into praises and joy. God hath wonderfully supported his people in all their extremities; and, if thou art one of them, why not thee ? The youngest child may claim his father's bounty and blessing, though he may not enjoy lo large a portion as the firstborn. Trust then in the Lord; and intreat him to still in thy heart all the passionate and perplexing tempests of difordered nature.

The intended effect of thefe folemn difpenfations to thyfelf is, to wean thee from time, and to fet thy face towards heaven. There thou haft many friends indeed, and one great Friend above all, who can never be loft; nor can the others, when met, be feparated from thee again. They are thy friends, in that holy and unchanging region, not for fuch a fhadow of a moment as thy time is here, but for a blifsful and boundlefs eternity. With what transport fhalt thou, one day, afcend to them; with what ecftafy will they all unite to receive thee ! the very forefight of this joy throws into contempt all the poor affairs of this world. —But O what fhall the possed of the start of the sta the poffibility of defcending again to earth, as earth now is, enter the views of the faints in glory; it would throw a damp into heaven itfelf, and beggar their unfpeakable joys. And yet this is almost, if not quite, the wish and defire of every one who murmurs at the departure of christian friends; or who would, if they could, bring their souls back again into clay.

It was a noble faying of one, over a dear departed friend: "There he lies (fays he) and with him all my worldly comfort; but yet, if the moving a straw would bring him to life again, without the will of my God, I would not be the mover of that straw for a thousand worlds."

My fellow christian, mayest thou be likeminded; and, instead of too much bewailing the departure of friends to heaven, let it be thy life of faith and preparation to follow them thither, that thou mayest enjoy, together with them, their and thy common great portion, the everlasting inheritance of the faints in light.

CHAP. XIX.

The Recollection of this third Part in Prayer to God.

MY heavenly Father, when I calmly look back upon my conduct to others in this world, and confider how fadly I have failed in all my known duties to men, against thy holy word and against the peace of my foul; I am humbled to the dust before thee. I have nothing to fay for myself, but, with thy prophet, Unclean! Unclean!

I have not loved my country as I ought; because I have not prayed for its welfare, as I ought. Intent enough I have been upon its vain-glory; its outward pomp, its carnal dignity, and its carnal prosperity; but O how little have I been earnest with thee for the greatest of a'l bless, that religion and piety might flourish in the land, without which no true happiness or welfare can be found.

I humbly implore thy bleffing upon my fovereign, his family, and his government; befeeching thee to grant, with all outward good, the inward mercies of thy grace, and, in thy due time, the life for evermore. Pardon me alfo for any failures of my duty on this account.

In obeying those, where thy providence hath fet over me, O teach me to fee how I 272 THE CHRISTIAN may best obey thee, and glorify thy goodnefs for a just government, good laws, and all the liberties I enjoy. If those in authority seem to fall into errors (for what man is he that sinneth not) keep my tongue from reviling, and direct my heart into praying for them, that thy wisdom may rectify what human ability could not apprehend or foresee. Deliver me from sedition and selfiss, from all the evils of political passion and resentment; and give peace, I besech thee, in my time, O Lord !

Enable me to conduct myself towards thy church, thy ministers, and all who profess to know thee, so as to give no just cause of offence in any thing to any man. I pray thee to heal all divisions among thy children, which may bring fad and deep reproach on thy gofpel, or lay dismal snares and stumbling-blocks in the ways of men. O that they might love and pity each other, confidering what infinitely tender pity and love thou hast manifested for them.

Help, O help me to fill up all my relations in life to thy honor and glory, and forgive me in the numberlefs inftances wherein I have failed. Let the blood of Jefu cleanfe me from all fins to others; and do thou forgive, as thou haft enabled me to forgive, all their tranfgrefilons against myfelf. Grant me larger measures of grace in the days to come, that I may praife thee more and monothroughout my whole life and conversation, and thus live and die to the edification of others, and above all to thy glory.

Keep me from all unreafonable and faithlefs grief, when thou art pleafed, with equal wifdom and goodnefs, to remove the friends of my heart, or the outward comforts of my life. Enable me to give them up without referve to thee, knowing that no good thing fhall be loft either for them or myfelf, but that all things fhall work together for our mutual, our real, our everlafting good. Having thefe hopes, help me to be more

Having thefe hopes, help me to be more and more purified from all uncleannels of flefh and fpirit, and to endeavour even to perfect holinels in thy faith and fear. Lord, I am a feeble worm, and of mine own felf can do nothing that is good : O do thou therefore work in me to will and to do of thy good pleafure, that I may neither be barren nor unfruitful in thy word or work among the children of men. Help me to bear wrongs patiently, to fpeak every truth meekly, to carry as much as poflible my whole conduct unblameably, with refpect to others, th t thy whole name may be exalted, and they themfelves be encouraged to feek the way of thy falvation.

O Lord, I give up mylelf, all I have and all I am, into thy blotled protection; befeeching thee to do for me and for mine, in all respects and at all times, exceeding abundantly above all that I can ask or think, for the take of Christ Jefus, my Lord and my

To THE PUBLIC.

IN this country, where opinions are every where freely circulated upon all fubjects, and where there is a great diverfity of fentiments refpecting Religion; it is of the utmost confequence to the caufe of truth, to promote a taste for reading the works of judicious and practical writers, upon the important doctrines of the gospel.

Diligent inquiry, and strict investigation into the principles of religion, are ever favourable to its progress and power upon the mind. The gospel invites, nay demands examination-and the more we enquire into its evidences, and inform ourfelves of its contents with a conscientious design to practice its duties, the more shall we be confirmed in our belief of its divine original; and the more shall we feel its beneficial and meliorating ef-fects upon our conduct in life. Hence it has been often found in experience, that when a general attention to the fearching of the Scriptures, and to the reading of those writings which are most evangelical in their spirit, has prevailed in various places; there, living, practical religion has been restored to a flourishing state :--- and again, where men have been most diligent in the exercise of the duties of piety, there, a zeal and tafte for pure and peculiarly evangelical principles, has e-ver revived and prevailed. It would, therefore, give us great pleasure, as ministers of the gospel, and be a happy presage of the increase and stability of the church of Christ in this country, to see such a disposition generally prevail.

Many books, remarkable for their evangelical principles, and experimental method of treating religious subjects, have been published by the learned and pious reformers of the church, and their fucceffors in the ministry, which, although fome of them are rather obfolete in the language, and not very fashionable in their arrangement of the several parts, contain those peculiar doctrines of grace, those scriptural truths, which have been frequently bleffed with a Divine influence to produce happy revolutions in favour of real piety; to shake the empire of sin and licentiousness; and to establish the kingdom of our bleised Saviour .--- Several such have appeared in the last and present age, written with a genuine spirit of piety, plainness, and simplici-ty, which have been crowned with a remarkable success.

We are happy to find, that the demand for these feems to increase of late, in various and distant parts of this country; and that, by the laudable exertions of some of the printers in America, who have published a great variety of practical works, and several editions of the Bible, this demand is likely to be supplied with convenience to the people, and on as reasonable terms as they can be imported from Europe. We, therefore, take the li[ 281 ] berty to recommend the following books, published in this country, to the esteem and perusal of our countrymen, both on patriotic and religious principles; and hope they will prove of eminent usefulness to the pious of all denominations, who may be able to procure them.
