LIST OF LATEST SOURCES EXAMINED

THE following Tables show the dates of latest sources examined, and the editions of legislative sources used.

TABLE I

Table I shows in Col. 2 the code or compilation of legislation used.

Col. 3 shows the latest year-laws (session laws) examined.

Col. 4 shows the latest official report of judicial decisions cited. For England and Ireland, only the official reports were examined. For Canada, only the unofficial reports (Dominion Law Reports) were examined; as no table of parallel citations is available, the official reports are not cited in this book for cases reported since 1912 (the date of beginning of the D. L. R.); hence, the official report here shown in Col. 4 is merely the latest volume that had appeared at the time of going to press; indicating that the citations of cases in this work will include at least the cases down to those official numbers of volumes, as well as a few later ones. For the United States, only the unofficial reports (National Reporter System) were examined; except for Alaska, Hawaii, Philippine Islands, and Porto Rico, and for District of Columbia down to 1919, — these not being included in the National Reporter System. Parallel citations of the official reports are invariably given, so far as these had appeared at the date of going to press. The official report shown in Col. 4 is merely the latest volume cited; the cases examined come down to a later date in the unofficial citations (Table II).

Col. 5 shows, by jurisdictions, the latest unofficial report examined and cited, — for Canada, the Dominion Law Reports; for the United States, the National Reporter System.

The decisions of the Appellate (intermediate) Courts which exist in some States have been cited only on interesting matters for which there is scanty authority; partly because their rulings are not final (except in Texas and in Oklahoma, for criminal cases), and partly because in some jurisdictions they are expressly made not binding as precedents. The rulings of Federal District Courts have also been left unnoticed to a similar extent.

[1] The legislation and decisions of this region are now continued by those of Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Yukon.

[2] There being no Compilation here, and the Evidence Act of 1889 having codified most of the rules, no search was made for statutes prior to 1889, except that those of 1873 and 1867, dealing with Evidence, were collated.

[3] At the time of going to press, still pending in the Senate; passed in the House of Representatives, May 16, 1921.

The printing of this treatise began in August, 1922, and occupied many months; it was therefore desirable to set a definite point of time for the ending of citations (instead of inserting current late cases in the latter portions of the book only), in order that those who use the book may know where to begin in examining later sources appearing since its publication. The point of stoppage taken was therefore that volume of the several National Reporters which ended nearest to July 1, 1922; this ranged (dating by the weekly issues) between May, 1922, and August, 1922. The latest volumes of Reporters consulted were as follows:

TOPIC V: TESTIMONIAL RECOLLECTION

CHAPTER XXVI.

§ 725. General Principle. The second of the necessary elements (ante, § 478) in every properly qualified testimonial statement is Recollection, — the adequate mental reproduction of the impressions obtained by Observation. The element of Recollection thus stands between the element of Observation (or Knowledge) which it reproduces, and the element of Communication (or Narration), by which it is in turn reproduced and made apprehensible by others.

The general canon applicable to Recollection is simple: the Recollection should (so far as can be expected) correspond to and represent the impressions originally gained by Observation or Knowledge. Various situations are conceivable in which this essential quality of Recollection may be lacking; and various detailed requirements with reference to curing or avoiding these possible deficiencies are also conceivable. There are, however, in practice, only a few situations commonly calling for judicial rules.[1]

At the outset an important distinction is met between that present actual recollection which a witness on the stand may ordinarily be expected to exhibit (called here Present Recollection), and that recollection which once existed, but now, having irrevocably vanished, depends on artificial preservation (called here Past Recollection). The use of the latter sort was for a time little recognized, and is even now often confused with the use of a present recollection.

It is convenient to deal with the subject under three heads: I. Recollection in General; II. Past Recollection Recorded; III. Present Recollection Revived.

I. RECOLLECTION IN GENERAL

§ 726. Quality of Recollection; "Impression", "Belief", and the like. The general principle is (as just noted) that Recollection should correspond to Observation, so far as can be expected. It is in a qualitative way that the deficiency usually occurs. The witness, it may happen, cannot recollect positively, — is not sure, — "thinks" it was so, — has an "impression", — "believes", or the like. How far is such a degree of recollection satisfactory?

It is a commonplace of judicial experience that testimony most glibly delivered and most positively affirmed is not always the most trustworthy.

§ 725. [1] From the point of view of logic and psychology as applicable to argument before the jury (not the rules of Admissibility), see the materials collected in the present author's "Principles of Judicial Proof, as given by Logic, Psychology, and General Experience, and illustrated in Judicial Trials" (1913), §§ 239–243.

The honest witness who will not exaggerate the strength of his recollection is well worth listening to because of this very caution. Moreover, to accept such "impressions" and "beliefs" is after all not dangerous, since they carry in themselves a warning of their evidential weakness. The best judicial opinion does not insist on any degree of positiveness in the recollection, but accepts whatever the witness feels able to present. Much must here be left to the trial Court to determine:

1839, WESTON, C. J., in Clark v. Bigelow, 16 Me. 247: "If we are to understand from this language [a 'strong impression'] that the fact is impressed with some strength upon his memory, but that it does not rise to positive assurance, it would be admissible. . . . If no other recollection than that of the most positive character is to be received in a court of justice, the difficulty of verifying facts resting in memory would be greatly increased."

1850, EASTMAN, J., in Hoitt v. Moulton, 21 N. H. 588: "Witnesses are not required to give their testimony with absolute positiveness. If the fact is impressed on the memory, but the recollection does not rise to positive assurance, it is still admissible to be weighed by the jury."

1852, LUMPKIN, J., in Franklin v. Mayor, 14 Ga. 260: "Every witness must swear according to the impressions on his mind. They are the materials of his knowledge. It is usually only a more cautious mode of expressing their belief. . . . The impressions of Mr. R., we think, were sufficiently certain and positive to be admissible. I have long been satisfied that we are too hide-bound and restricted in our practice with regard to the admissibility of evidence. It is high time that the practice should be discouraged."

1857, LEGRAND, C. J., in Wilson v. Carson, 10 Md. 75: "Opinion is belief, and nothing more; it is not absolute certainty, nor does the law require it to be so."

1859, SAWYER, J., in State v. Flanders, 38 N. H. 332: "An impression as to a past fact may mean personal knowledge of the fact as it rests in the memory, though the remembrance is so faint that it cannot be characterized as an undoubting recollection. . . . In this sense the impression of a witness is evidence, however indistinct and unreliable the recollection may be. No line can be drawn for the exclusion of any record left upon the memory as the impress of personal knowledge, because of the dimness of the inscription."

§ 727. Same: Quality of Observation, distinguished: "Impression", "Belief", and the like. But it has already been noted (ante, § 658) that there is also — and the Courts recognize it — a sense in which the terms "impression", "belief", and the like, may mean, not a faintness of recollection, but a weakness in the original impressions of observation; for example, "I was some distance away, but the person seemed to me to be A."; "I am not certain, but I thought, supposed, judged, at the time, that the hour was about four o'clock." Such expressions indicate a deficiency in the quality of the Observation, not of the Recollection; and this sense of the phrases is equally common with the preceding one. It will not do to accept mere guesses as testimony. Nevertheless, it is clear that the law cannot and does not require absolute certainty of Observation. A mere deficiency in the quality of Observation is of itself no good reason for excluding whatever results the observer did actually obtain. Some men's doubts are better than other men's certainties; and there is here nothing to do but leave to the trial judge to determine when the "impression" is so trivial and faint as to be not worth receiving:

1824, Mr. Thomas Starkie, Evidence, 153: "It has been said that [1] a witness must not be examined in chief as to his 'belief' or 'persuasion', but only as to his knowledge of the fact, since judgment must be given 'secundum allegata et probata.' . . . As far as regards mere belief or persuasion which does not rest upon a sufficient and legal foundation, this position is correct, — as where a man believes a fact to be true merely because he has heard it said to be so. But with respect to persuasion or belief as founded on facts within the actual knowledge of the witness, the position is not true. On questions of identity of persons and of handwriting, it is every day's practice for witnesses to swear that they 'believe' the person to be the same or the handwriting that of a particular individual although they will not swear positively."

§ 728. Same: State of the Law in the Various Jurisdictions. In examining the authorities, then, it must be remembered that the result depends on the sense of the words used. (1) So far as the terms "impression", "belief", and the like, signify a total lack of original observation, a mere conjecture based on rumors, intuitions, prejudices, or the like, such testimony is inadmissible; the authorities in which this sense is unmistakably the one intended by the Courts have already been examined (ante, § 658); (2) So far as these terms signify merely an inferior quality (a) in the observation or (b) in the recollection of the witness, such testimony is receivable, subject to the trial Court's discretion (as just noted in §§ 726, 727).[1] However, in § 727. [1] The position which Mr. Starkie here repudiates was based upon an early and loosely phrased passage of Coke's authorship, which was for a time much relied on: 1621, Adams v. Canon, 1 Dyer 53 b ("In this case much was said about the depositions of witnesses. . . . Secondly, that it is not satisfactory for the witness to say that he thinks or persuadeth himself; and that for two reasons: 1st, Because he is to give an absolute sentence, and therefore ought to have more sure ground than thinking").

§ 728. [1] In the following cases the testimony was admitted, except as otherwise noted:

ENGLAND: 1773, Miller's Case, 3 Wils. 428 ("should rather believe"); 1794, Horne Tooke's Trial, 25 How. St. Tr. 71 (belief as to handwriting); 1801, Garrells v. Alexander, 4 Esp. 37 (handwriting "like" another).

UNITED STATES: Federal: 1822, Bouldin v. Massie's Heirs, 7 Wheat. 153 ("appeared to be"); 1824, Riggs v. Tayloe, 9 Wheat. 483, 486 ("impression" as to destroying a document);
Alabama: 1846, Hill v. Hill's Adm'r, 9 Ala. 792 (belief); 1878, Turner v. McFee, 61 Ala. 470, semble (belief); 1886, Bass Furnace Co. v. Glasscock, 82 Ala. 456, 2 So. 315 ("best judgment"); 1893, Shrimpton v. Brice, 102 Ala. 655, 666, 15 So. 452 (that handwriting "resembled B.'s"); 1897, Thornton v. State, 113 Ala. 43, 21 So. 356 (identification "in his best opinion"); 1913, Trailer v. State, 8 Ala. App. 217, 63 So. 37 ("It seemed like a knife", allowed);
California: 1859, McGarrity v. Byington, 12 Cal. 426, 430 ("to the best of his recollection", by an attesting witness); 1882, People v. Rolfe, 61 Ala. 540 (identity); 1899, People v. Soap, 127 Ala. 408, 59 Pac. 771 ("presume", as a statement of best recollection);
Connecticut: 1831, Lyon v. Lyman, 9 Conn. 60 (certainty not required);
Florida: 1905, Jordan v. State, 50 Fla. 94, 39 So. 155 (identity of a person "to the best of my judgment");
Georgia: 1855, Dawson v. Callaway, 18 Ga. 579 ("I do not know positively, but I think" was held properly rejected; but "I saw . . . as I supposed", improperly rejected; the difference being practically a quibble); 1856, Goodwyn v. Goodwyn, 20 Ga. 620 ("best of belief", admitted); 1890, Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Sheppard, 85 Ga. 751, 777, 12 S. E. 18 (that the witness "thought he glimpsed S. as he fell", admitted as signifying "a direct reference to an immediate perception of the senses"); that a comparatively fainter recollection should be accepted from hostile witnesses is laid down by Walker, J., in Huguley v. Holstein, 35 Ga. 272 (1866); but compare the same judge's exclusion of "I think" in Morris v. Stokes, 21 Ga. 570 (1857), and the similar case of Parker v. Chambers, 24 Ga. 524 (1858);
Illinois: 1840, Gorham v. Peyton, 3 Ill. 364 (that the assignor does not recollect making certain admissions); 1865, Fash v. Blake, 38 Ill. 364, 368 (belief as to handwriting); 1919, Abbott v. Church, 288 Ill. 91, 123 N. E. 306 ("when a witness prefaces his testimony with 'I think', he is to be taken as testifying to what he remembers");
Indiana: 1847, Rhode v. Louthain, 8 Blackf. 413 ("best of recollection");

the great majority of rulings to this effect it is either difficult or impossible to learn which of these senses ((a) or (b)) the Court had in mind. Moreover, in rulings rejecting testimony couched in the above terms, it is sometimes impossible to know whether the Court is justly repudiating " impressions " in Iowa: 1871, State v. Porter, 34 Ia. 133 ("suppose", "took it", "concluded", "inferred"); 1881, State v. Lucas, 57 Ia. 502, 10 N. W. 868 ("can't positively identify, but am satisfied in my own mind"): 1894, State v. Farrington, 90 Ia. 673, 677 (that handwriting "looked some like his"; undecided); 1895, State v. Seymore, 94 Ia. 699, 63 N. W. 663 ("I don't know positive, but am satisfied in my own mind"; "best judgment"); 1905, State v. Richards, 126 Ia. 497, 102 N. W. 439 (identity of a person): 1920, State v. Christ, 189 Ia. 474, 177 N. W. 54 (homicide; to a witness to identity of defendant, "You are not certain, are you? You only think so, isn't that it?" "Well, I don't remember, but I think it was": allowed);

Louisiana: 1846, Bradford v. Cooper, 1 La. An. 326 ("belief" as to handwriting); 1885, State v. Goodwin, 37 La. An. 713, 715 ("best of knowledge and belief", for a witness to handwriting);
Maine: 1840, Lewis v. Freeman, 17 Me. 260 (the witness "was confident", but "would not swear" that it was so); 1852, Hopkins v. Megquire, 35 Me. 80 ("strong impression", "could not swear"); 1864, Humphries v. Parker, 52 Me. 504 ("impression", "I think");
Maryland: 1856, Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Thompson, 10 Md. 84 ("suppose"); 1862, Fulton v. McCracken, 18 Md. 542 ("think");
Massachusetts: 1866, Hamilton v. Nickerson, 13 All. 352 ("belief" as to the existence of a trade usage); 1897, Com. v. Kennedy, 170 Mass. 18, 48 N. E. 770 ("best of his knowledge, belief, and recollection", as to a person's identity);
Michigan: 1895, Johnston v. Ins. Co., 106 Mich. 96, 64 N. W. 5 (one who knew "very near" what the value was);
Missouri: 1880, Ferris v. Thaw, 72 Mo. 450 ("thought"); 1881, Greenwell v. Crow, 73 Mo. 640 (would not swear to it); 1882, State v. Bable, 76 Mo. 504 (here it was suggested that a closeness of resemblance, something short of an apparently exact identity, would suffice as evidence); 1884, State v. Hopkirk, 84 Mo. 288 ("looked like"); 1895, State v. Harvey, 131 Mo. 339, 32 S. W. 1110 (handwriting; "opinion", enough); 1897, State v. Dale, 141 Mo. 284, 42 S. W. 722 (that goods said to be stolen "resembled" those stolen); 1899, State v. Guild, 149 Mo. 381, 50 S. W. 909 (that stolen goods "looked like" those found); 1900, State v. Weber, 156 Mo. 249, 56 S. W. 729 ("belief" as to identity of stolen mare); State v. Cushenberry, 157 Mo. 168, 56 S. W. 737 (same, as to identity of person);
Montana: 1910, State v. Vanella, 40 Mont. 326, 106 Pac. 364 (identity inferred from voice):
New Hampshire: 1858, Burnham v. Ayer, 36 N. H. 185 (belief sufficient; mere impression excluded); 1860, Nute v. Nute, 41 N. H. 68 ("I think");
New York: 1877, Carrington v. Ward, 71 N. Y. 364 ("impression"); 1878, Blake v. People, 73 N. Y. 586 ("think"; "best of my knowledge");
North Carolina: 1839, Beverly v. Williams, 4 Dev. & B. 237 (would not swear positively); 1851, McRae v. Morrison, 13 Ired. 48 ("impression"); 1906, Gilliland v. Board, 141 N. C. 482, 54 S. E. 413 ("I think he always voted", admitted);
Ohio: 1854, Crowell v. Bank, 3 Oh. St. 411 ("impression");
Oregon: 1889, State v. Chee Gong, 17 Or. 638, 21 Pac. 882, semble (belief);
Pennsylvania: 1820, Sigfried v. Levan, 6 S. & R. 313 ("will not swear, but it is like his writing"); 1823, Farmer's Bank v. Whitehill, 10 Pa. 112 (belief); 1854, Shitler v. Bremer, 23 Pa. 413 (the handwriting "looks like it; can't say I believe it to be his writing"); 1860, Duvall's Ex'r v. Darby, 38 Pa. 59 ("impression"); 1868, Dodge v. Bache, 57 Pa. 424 ("belief"); 1886, Pittsburgh V. & C. R. Co. v. Vance, 115 Pa. 332, 8 Atl. 764 (less than a certainty in an opinion as to value);
Tennessee: 1874, Woodward v. State, 4 Baxt. 324 ("think");
Texas: 1866, Swinney v. Booth, 28 Tex. 116 ("impression"); 1913, Heflin v. Eastern R. Co., — Tex. Civ. App. —, 159 S. W. 499 ("impression" as to a man's conduct when hurt);
Vermont: 1888, State v. Ward, 61 Vt. 187, 17 Atl. 483 ("impression", "I think so"); 1895, State v. Bradley, 67 Vt. 465, 32 Atl. 240 ("thought"); 1910, Herrick v. Holland, 83 Vt. 502, 77 Atl. 6 ("judgment" and "idea" admitted);
Virginia: 1893, Combs v. Com., 90 Va. 88, 91, 17 S. E. 881 (identification of stolen corn by opinion and belief);
Washington: 1912, State v. Elliott, 68 Wash. 603, 123 Pac. 1089 (identity of a person; "best recollection", admitted);
Wisconsin: 1876, Erd v. R. Co., 41 Wis. 68 (opinion on value).

In the following cases the testimony was held insufficient: Federal: 1843, Wilcocks v. Phillips' Ex'rs, 1 Wall. Jr. 49, 53 ("so far as I know"); Ind. 1894, Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Stein, 140 Ind. 61, 39 N. E. 246 ("think"); Ia. 1878, Simonson v. R. Co., 49 Ia. 88, semble ("thought"); 1895, Orr. v. R. Co., 94 Ia. 423, 62 N. W. 851 (suppose); Ky. 1833, the sense (1) above, or, contrary to the best opinion and the great weight of authority, is rejecting " impressions " in either of the senses (2) above. All that can be done, therefore, is to note the different principles involved, and to leave the authorities to be interpreted in that light.

§ 729. Same: Other Senses of " Impression", etc., to which Other Principles are Applicable. Three distinct senses have now been noted in which the terms " impression ", " belief ", or the like, may call for the application of different principles of Testimonial Qualifications: (1) That the witness is merely conjecturing or guessing, never having had any real observation of the facts; this evidence being inadmissible; (2) That the witness, though once possessed of some acquaintance with the facts, is more or less uncertain, by reason of (a) weakness of the original impression of observation, or (b) faintness of the present recollection; this evidence being generally acceptable.

But there must also be noted at least three other senses, perhaps four, involving still other principles, two of them genuinely principles of evidence:

(3) In testifying to a conversation or to prior testimony of another witness, the witness may attempt to give, not the detailed words or phrases, but his " understanding " or " best of recollection " as to the general purport or effect of what was said. Here the Court may insist on applying the principle of Completeness (post, §§ 2097, 2098), i.e. the details, not the substance, must be given whenever utterances, spoken or written, are concerned. It is not really a question of deficient Observation or Recollection; for, though the witness may sometimes fail to give details because he did not hear all or does not recollect all, the principle would still, if applied, exclude his evidence if, though hearing all or recollecting all, he still did not narrate all on the stand; in other words, it is the principle of Completeness that excludes such Carrico v. Neal, 1 Dana 162 ("impression" of the sole will-witness, held insufficient as sole proof); La. 1860, Paty v. Martin, 15 La. An. 620 ("conjecture" of medical men); Me. 1860, Hovey v. Chase, 52 Me. 313 ("could not tell, but presumed"); Md. 1870, Elbin v. Wilson, 33 Md. 144 ("impression"); N. Y. 1860, Sanchez v. People, 22 N. Y. 154 (an expert's "doubt"); Pa. 1839, Carmalt v. Post, 8 Watts 411 (impression excluded, with qualifications); 1897, Fullam v. Rose, 181 Pa. 138, 37 Atl. 197 (that a signature "looks like" O.'s excluded); Vt. 1873, Guyette v. Bolton, 46 Vt. 232 (insufficient recollection).

Add also the cases cited ante, § 658.

L. C. Eldon, that inveterate distinguisher of the undistinguishable, tried once (in 1803, Eagleton v. Kingston, 8 Ves. 475) to distinguish between "think" and "believe": "I doubt the authority of the case of Garrels v. Alexander [4 Esp. 37], where if a man will not take upon him to say he believes it to be the writing of a person, but says he thinks it like [the writing], Lord Kenyon is made to say that is evidence. I doubt that. Formerly that would not have been deemed evidence." But modern practice, as seen in the above citations, has accepted Lord Kenyon's opinion.

It was once argued (on the authority of Adams v. Canon, cited supra, § 727) that a "belief" could not be received because no indictment for perjury was possible on such a form of statement. The conclusion does not follow from the premises; but at any rate it was early settled that a false statement of the sort would constitute a perjury: 1773, Miller's Case, 3 Wils. 428, semble; 1782, Lord Mansfield in Folkes v. Chadd, 3 Doug. 159, semble; 1784, R. v. Pedley, 1 Leach Cr. C. 325; 1847, R. v. Schlesinger, 10 Q. B. 670. But even in modern times the heresy is still not unknown: 1871, Maulsby, J., in Hayes v. Wells, 34 Md. 518: "Liability of a witness to the penalties of perjury, if he corruptly misstate facts, is one of the securities for truth which ought not to be removed, unless on necessity; and in proportion as opinion is admitted, that liability is removed."

evidence (if it is to be excluded), and the deficiency of Observation, or Recollection is a mere casual incident which may or may not be present.

(4) There is a general principle excluding Opinion testimony whenever the facts are before the tribunal and the witness' judgment or opinion is superfluous. This exclusion has nothing to do with "opinion" as involving the strength of the witness' impressions (the subject of the foregoing sections); it concerns the convenience of the tribunal, which cannot spend its time in listening to wholly superfluous evidence. So far as "opinions" are excluded on this ground, they are elsewhere dealt with (post, §§ 1917, 1978). A witness' "opinion" or "understanding" of the effect of a conversation may in this aspect also be open to criticism (post, §§ 1969–1971).

(5) The witness' "understanding" or "supposition" as to the terms of a contract, made by conversation or by letter, will often be wholly immaterial, according to the principle of substantive law which usually determines the effect of legal acts by their outward effect, not by the secret or imperfectly expressed intention of the actor. When a witness "understood" the other party to a contract as saying a certain thing, the substantive law may or may not allow this "understanding" to be regarded. This question — one of a group commonly treated under the Parol Evidence Rule — is dealt with under that head (post, §§ 2413, 2465).

(6) In Alabama, in the course of a confused series of highly unsatisfactory precedents, a witness' statement as to another person's intent or motive (sometimes employing the phrase "understanding" or "belief") has been repudiated, on the ground that no man can say that he knew what another's intent or motive was, i.e. on grounds of the impossibility of knowledge (ante, § 661). This unsound doctrine is dealt with under the Opinion rule (post, § 1966).

§ 730. Witness Specifying on Direct Examination his Grounds for Recollection; Cross-Examination to Impeach Recollection. (1) On the direct examination a witness may properly be asked to specify the grounds for his recollection; because the circumstances which have contributed to fix or to strengthen it may show how the witness is justified in his confidence of assertion, and the party offering him is entitled to the benefit of this.[1]

(2) On cross-examination, the opponent is equally entitled to bring out such circumstances as exhibit the untrustworthiness of the witness' recollection. But here the general principles of Impeachment control this process.[2]

II. Past Recollection Recorded

§ 734. General Principle. In dealing with the two sorts of Recollection, Past and Present, it is desirable to consider first the former.

The situation is one in which the witness is devoid of a present recollection, and therefore desires to use a past recollection. This he proposes to do by employing some record of this past recollection and adopting it as his present statement. Thus, he says: "I made a correct memorandum of this conversation while my recollection was fresh; I now remember nothing, but can offer my prior recollection as embodied in the memorandum"; or, "I remember nothing of sending the notice, but I know from this entry that I must have sent it." The chief difficulties here to be met have no direct dependence on the principles of Recollection. It must appear that the witness had a good recollection when it was recorded, but that is all that is required by the canons of Recollection. It is as to the nature of the record and the means of making it now available that certain restrictions must be applied, and this is a matter of the accuracy and identity of the record, i.e. on principle, of the Narration or Communication of his evidence. The cardinal principle of Narration (post, § 765) will be seen to be this, that it must correspond to the Recollection; the story told by the witness, whether orally or in writing, must represent his knowledge and recollection. Whether or not the record must be by the witness himself, whether it may be a copy of the original, whether when used it is itself evidence, and the like, — these seem in strictness to involve the element of Narration or Communication. Nevertheless, for convenience of exposition, the use of such records must be treated under a single outline, the detailed rules being examined in sequence; and it will be enough to remember that there are after all two underlying general principles involved.

§ 730. [1] The authorities are for convenience collected ante, §§ 665, 416.
[2] Post, §§ 942, 973, 994, 1259.

Broadly, then, we have to provide, in using a record of past recollection, for certain practical tests of the accuracy and identity of the record; furthermore, we must require some guarantee that the past recollection thus recorded was a satisfactory one, e.g. that it was recorded at or about the time of the events. A question may also arise whether one sort of recollection is to be preferred to the other. It will also be found that historically there has been much confusion, great delay, and possibly an occasional refusal to allow the use of a past recollection at all. These topics may best be taken up in the reverse order, as follows: (a) History of the use of past recollection; (b) Preference for a present recollection; (c) Tests to secure the adequacy of the past recollection and the accuracy and identity of the record of it.

a. History of the Use of Past Recollection Recorded.

§ 735. History in England and the United States. The use of a paper or other memorandum as an aid to recollection was recognized at an early stage in the history of reported trials. But the distinction between a past and a present recollection seems hardly to have been appreciated at first:

1660, Scroop's Trial, 5 How. St. Tr. 1034, 1039; murder of King Charles I, the defendant being charged as one of the judges sitting to condemn him. Carr: "Amongst others that were judges of that Court, as was printed in a paper which I then had in my hand, I found the name of Mr. A. Scroop, who I saw did there sit and appear" (Mr. Carr looked in that paper when he gave his evidence). Scroop: "I hope you will not take any evidence from a printed list." Counsel: "The manner of his evidence is, he saith, this: that he had this printed paper in his hand when the names of that Court were called, and marking the persons in that paper who were present, and that you were one of them who did appear." Scroop: ". . . By your favor, I do suppose there is no witness ought to use any paper or look upon any paper when he gives evidence." Sol. Gen.: "Ask him the question without the paper; yet nothing is more usual than for a witness to make use of a paper to help his memory."

So far as any distinction was at this time observed, it was merely between referring to a paper from time to time and reading it outright;[1] and the refusal to permit the latter process was practically a repudiation of the use of past recollection. But by the middle of the 1700s the legitimacy of the latter process is found fully conceded; the only distinction being (post, § 749) that the original must be produced in Court:

1756, Tanner v. Taylor, quoted by BULLER, J., in Doe v. Perkins, infra: The witness proved delivery of goods from an account which he had in his hand, a copy from his day-book which he left at home; it was objected that the original should be produced. LEGGE, B.: "If he would swear positively from [present] recollection, and the paper was only to refresh his memory, he might make use of it. But if he could not from recollection swear to the delivery any further than as finding them entered in his book [past recollection], then the original should have been produced."

1790, Doe v. Perkins, 3 T. R. 654; the witness had gone about with a rent-collector and made entries in a book; the original was not in Court, but the witness spoke from extracts made by himself, having "no memory of his own of those specific facts"; this was objected to on the ground of "the known distinction between cases [1] where the witness swears from his own [present] knowledge of the facts, though his memory may be assisted by memoranda, and [2] where he does not speak from any recollection which he has, but merely from such memoranda; in the latter case it has always been required that the original minutes should be produced, because of the great door which might otherwise be opened to fraud and concealment"; and the Court approved the objection.

1824, Mr. Thomas Starkie, Evidence, 176: "The law goes further, and in some instances, permits a witness to give evidence as to a fact although he has no present recollection of the fact itself. This happens, in the first place, where the witness, having no longer any recollection of the fact itself, is yet enabled to state that at some former time, and whilst he had a perfect recollection of a fact, he committed it to writing. If the witness be correct

§ 735. [1] 1660, Downes' Trial, 5 How. St. Tr. 1209, 1213 (Downes: "I have an unhappy memory; I have slipt many things"; L. C. B. Bridgman; "Remember yourself by papers, if you have any; no man will hinder you"); 1662, Sir Henry Vane's Trial, 6 How. St. Tr. 119, 149 (an under-clerk used the Commons Journal to prove Vane's attendance, "and said, though he will not take upon himself to say when Sir Henry Vane was there and when he was absent, yet he said positively that, at what time soever he is set down in the Journal to have acted or reported anything, he was there"); 1678, Stayley's Trial, 6 How. St. Tr. 1501, 1504 (witness testifies to the defendant's remarks, from a paper in which he "writ them down presently"); 1679, Knox's Trial, 7 How. St. Tr. 763, 789 (a justice wished to read his examination of an informant; "because my memory is bad"; Recorder: "No, that can't be; you must not read them, but only refresh your memory by them"); 1680, Cellier's Trial, 7 How. St. Tr. 1043, 1047 (similar); 1684, Lady Ivy's Trial, 10 How. St. Tr. 555, 582 (notes allowed to be used to refresh memory, but not otherwise); 1696, Friend's Trial, 13 How. St. Tr. 1, 21 (Witness for prosecution; "All that I can say to this business is written in my paper, and I refer to my paper"; Att'y-Gen'l: "You must not refer to your paper, Sir, you must tell all what you know"; L. C. J. Holt: "He may look upon any paper to refresh his memory"); 1754, Canning's Trial, 19 id. 488 (witness allowed to use a memorandum which he would not have recorded unless correct); 1754, L. C. Hardwicke, in Anon., 1 Ambl. 252 ("There is no certain rule how far evidence may be admitted from notes; some judges had thought, and he was inclined the same way, that the witness might speak from notes which were taken at the time of the transaction in question, but not if they were wrote afterwards").

in that which he positively states from a present recollection, viz. that at a prior time he had a perfect recollection, and having that recollection, truly stated it in the document produced, the writing, though its contents are thus but mediately proved, must be true."

The reports show a constant use of this past recollection in the English courts from that time until the present.[2] There was more or less delay and doubt in settling some of the conditions of its use; yet it does not appear that any of the judges ever had any doubts as to the radical question of using it all. It is true that the bar for a long time did not seem to grasp the distinction;[3] and as late as 1834 the Court was called upon to reaffirm the legitimacy of the use, against a strong argument, which cannot be supposed to have been made (in England, and in those days) by a counsel who really knew better:

R. v. St. Martin's, 2 A. & E. 210; the witness looked at a memorandum of a lease; "he had no memory of these things but from the book, without which he should not of his own knowledge be able to speak to the fact; but on reading the entry he had no doubt the fact really happened." Counsel, opposing this: "Even supposing this to be a mere memorandum such as the witness might refresh his memory from, still his evidence does not go far enough. He says, after looking at the memorandum, that he has no doubt, but that he has no memory of these things; so that his memory, after being refreshed, does not supply the proof." TAUNTON, J.: "When a bond is put into the hands of an attesting witness, and he says that he does not recollect attesting, but that, from seeing his name there, he has no doubt that he did, is not that proof of his attestation?" Counsel, replying: "A naked fact may be so proved; but here the question was as to the proof of the contents of an instrument, or of particulars appearing from those contents only." But the Court unanimously rejected his claim.

That there should have been misunderstanding is not strange, in view of the loose use of the term "refreshing the memory" to cover both the revivification of a present actual memory and the adoption of a past recorded memory. This unfortunate parsimony of phrase is mainly responsible for the conflict of views still often found in prescribing the conditions of using a present recollection. It was left for an Irish judge, at a comparatively late date, to point out this impropriety of language:

[2] The order of cases to 1850 is as follows: 1773, Miller's Case, 3 Wils. 420, 427; 1795, Digby v. Stedman, 1 Esp. 328; 1801, Jacobs v. Lindsay, 1 East 460; 1806, Lord Melville's Trial, 29 How. St. Tr. 916, 996; 1809, Burrough v. Martin, 2 Campb. 112; 1810, Mayor of Doncaster v. Day, 3 Taunt. 262; 1826, Loyd v. Freshfield, 2 C. & P. 332; 1828, Maugham v. Hubbard, 2 M. & Ryl. 5; 1834, R. v. St. Martin's, 2 A. & E. 210; 1834, Burton v. Plummer, 2 A. & E. 341; 1836, Howard v. Canfield, 5 Dowl. 417; 1844, Topham v. McGregor, 1 C. & K. 320; 1848, Beech v. Jones, 5 C. B. 696.

In Scotland, in 1795, the judges were still divided as to the propriety of using a past recollection: Kinloch's Case, 25 How. St. Tr. 934-938 (Lord Eskgrove: "If a man comes to this bar as a witness, he is to swear to what he now remembers, not to what he formerly remembered"; Lord Justice Clerk, contra: "If a witness does not recollect any circumstance, he has a right to look at his notes, and then if he says, upon the great oath which he has taken, that these are facts, they ought to be received in evidence"; a majority rejected the evidence).

[3] There are some instances in which, when actual recollection failed, no attempt was made to use past recollection: 1820 Catt v. Howard, 3 Stark. 3. There are others in which, though there was apparently no recollection, the memorandum was used but the point not noted: 1796, Vaughan v. Martin, 1 Esp. 440; 1803, Rambert v. Cohen, 3 id. 213.

In Ontario, the Supreme Court has had to correct a trial judge: 1911, Fleming v. Toronto R. Co., 25 Ont. L. R. 317.

1864, HAYES, J., in Lord Talbot v. Cusack, 17 Ir. C. L. 213: "['To refresh the memory of the witness'], that is a very inaccurate expression; because in nine cases out of ten the witness' memory is not at all refreshed; he looks at it again and again, and he recollects nothing of the transaction; but, seeing that it is in his own handwriting, he gives credit to the truth and accuracy of his habits, and, though his memory is a perfect blank, he nevertheless undertakes to swear to the accuracy of his notes."

In the United States the legitimacy of employing a past recollection was early apprehended by the Supreme Court of South Carolina, and its views were carried into effect in a series of decisions which have ever since served as the leading precedents:

1817, CHEVES, J., in Pearson v. Wightman, Mills' Const. Ct. 344 (the witness had no recollection of witnessing a will, but recognized his handwriting): "I hold it not to be necessary that a subscribing witness should recollect the time and occasion when he subscribed the instrument as a witness. It is enough if he recognizes his handwriting and is perfectly assured in his own mind that he never subscribed an instrument as a witness without having seen it executed or acknowledged as the nature of the act requires. . . . Such testimony was better evidence than an adventurous and unaided recollection."

1817, COLCOCK, J., in Haig v. Newton, ib. 423 (the clerk of a notary testified from a minute-book, having no actual recollection): "If a witness is not allowed to recur to a memorandum book of such transactions as these in a large and populous city, there would be many instances of a defect in testimony, even where notices had been duly given. . . . Can it be supposed that one engaged in such an infinite number of cases, all of the same nature, could retain in his memory an exact account of the day and place and manner of giving the notice?"

1820, NOTT, J., in State v. Rawls, 2 N. & McC. 333 (the witness, having no positive recollection, referred to an affidavit of the facts): "The propriety of the rule . . . may be inferred from its necessity. And the occurrences of every day furnish abundant proof that the ordinary transactions of life could not be carried on upon any other principle."[4]

On many occasions since then, the Courts of this country have emphasized the distinction between the use of a present and the use of a past recollection, and have vindicated the legitimacy of the latter as well as the former:

1836, SHAW, C. J., in Shore v. Wiley, 18 Pick. 558 (the witness had used a book of notices to indorsers and makers of notes): "It is very obvious to remark that if such evidence is not sufficient, it would be extremely difficult to prove such acts done. . . . The witness may testify to other facts which with the aid of the memorandum will afford a very satisfactory inference that the act was done, — such as his usual practice and habit, his caution never to make such a memorandum unless the acts were done, and his consciousness of the importance and necessity of accuracy in this particular. In this respect it is like the testimony of an attesting witness to an instrument. He recognizes his handwriting, he knows he put his hand there, he testifies that he believes he would not have put it there if he had not seen the instrument executed; but he has no present recollection of the fact other than that derived from the recognition of his handwriting."

1857, SELDON, J., in Halsey v. Sinsebaugh, 15 N. Y. 485: "The efforts of memory are seldom equal to the task of recalling after any considerable laspe of time even the exact substance of words and phrases. . . . To exclude such a record, when honestly made, would be to reject the best and frequently the only means of arriving at the truth."

[4] Three other corroborative rulings were made at an early date: 1818, Columbia v. Harrison, 2 Mills Const. Ct. S. C. 213; 1823, Nicholson v. Withers, 2 McC. S. C. 429; 1834, Cleverly v. McCullough, 2 Hill S. C. 445.

1879, STONE, J., in Acklen's Executors v. Hickman, 63 Ala. 498: "The law recognizes the right of a witness to consult memoranda in aid of his recollection under two conditions: First, when after examining a memorandum made by himself, or known and recognized by him as stating the facts truly, his memory is thereby so refreshed that he can testify, as a matter of independent recollection, to facts pertinent to the issue. In cases of this class the witness testifies to what he asserts are facts within his own knowledge, and the only distinguishing difference between testimony thus given, and ordinary evidence of facts, is that the witness, by invoking the assistance of the memorandum, admits that without such assistance his recollection of the transaction he testifies to had become more or less obscured. . . . In the second class are embraced cases in which the witness after examining the memorandum cannot testify to an existing knowledge of the fact, independent of the memorandum, — in other words, cases in which the memorandum fails to refresh and revive the recollection and thus constitute it present knowledge. . . . [If the witness] testify that at or about the time the memorandum was made he knew its contents and knew them to be true, this legalizes and lets in both the testimony of the witness and the memorandum. The two are the equivalent of a present, positive statement of the witness, affirming the truth of the contents of the memorandum."

1880, SIMPSON, C. J., in Bank v. Zorn, 14 S. C. 444: "The rule upon this subject, in its broadest outline, embraces two classes of cases; first, where the witness, after referring to the paper, speaks from his own memory and depends upon his own recollection as to the facts testified to; second, where he relies upon the paper and testifies only because he finds the facts contained therein."

1884, ROWELL, J., in Davis v. Field, 56 Vt. 426: "Nor was it necessary that the witness should have had an independent recollection. . . . The old notion that the witness must be able to swear from memory is pretty much exploded. All that is required is that he be able to swear that the memorandum is correct. There seem to be two classes of cases on this subject: 1. Where the witness by referring to the memorandum has his memory quickened and refreshed thereby, so that he is enabled to swear to an actual recollection; 2. Where the witness after referring to the memorandum undertakes to swear to the fact, yet not because he remembers it, but because of his confidence in the correctness of his memorandum. In both cases the oath of the witness is the primary, substantive evidence relied upon; in the former the oath being grounded on actual recollection, and in the latter on the faith reposed in the verity of the memorandum." [5]

1919, GAYNOR, J., in State v. Easter, 185 Ia. 476, 170 N. W. 748: "One called to testify as to the existence or nonexistence or a fact may be able to recall the fact by an effort of memory, and state the fact truthfully as of memory. He is then competent to testify as to what the fact actually is. He may be called as a witness to testify to a material fact, and, when called, may not be able to recall the fact; yet his memory may be refreshed by an examination of some instruments submitted to him. If then he is able to speak to the existence of the fact — independent of the memorandum — as of his own personal recollection, he is competent, and is permitted to testify. This is because his mind, by the refreshing influence of the memorandum, is able to recall its existence, and he then speaks to its existence as of his independent recollection, refreshed by the instruments. This does not make the instrument competent to speak, but, by its operation on the mind of the witness, the mind becomes repossessed of the fact, and the witness is able to speak to the fact through power of recollection.

"One may be called as a witness who cannot recall the matter about which he is called to testify. He may not be able to refresh his memory so that he is repossessed of the fact, but it may be made to appear that at some time in the past he had a personal knowledge of the fact, and made a record of it. If then he is able to say that he made the entry, or caused it to be made, and at the time it was his purpose or duty to record the fact as it then existed, the record becomes a competent witness, not because it is a record of an event, but because it speaks the past knowledge of a witness to a fact occurring within the knowledge of the witness, truthfully recorded."

§ 736. History and Local Anomalies in Particular Jurisdictions. It cannot be doubted that the use of a recorded past recollection (under the conditions to be examined later) now occupies a firm and unassailable place in our practice and doctrine. This is none the less a fact because in some jurisdictions where its use is now orthodox the history of the earlier precedents is confused and perplexing. It is worth while, however, to notice briefly the course of precedents, and some of the local anomalies here and there appearing, in certain of the jurisdictions of the United States.

(1) In Pennsylvania, modern rulings show that there is in this jurisdiction a definite and settled acceptance of past recollection, as distinguished from present recollection.[1]

(2) In New York the use of memoranda of past recollection is now firmly established, after some early vicissitudes;[2] but a local limitation persists,

§ 736. [1] 1808, Pigott v. Holloway, 1 Binn. 436 (attesting witness to a letter of attorney, who found his seal and signature there, and thence was convinced of the fact of execution; admitted); 1811, Miles v. O'Hara, 4 1 Binn. 108 (judge's notes of testimony; if the judge had appeared and sworn that they were correct, they would have been admissible), 1818, Lightner v. Wike, 4 S. & R. 203 (counsel's notes; he "believed he had taken down what E. had said, as it fell from him", but had no present recollection; excluded); 1819, Juniata Bank v. Brown, 5 S. & R. 226 (entries in a day-book offered by one of the firm; excluded, but it does not appear that the present question was raised); 1823, Cornell v. Green, 10 S. & R. 14 (counsel, after refreshing memory from notes, could not remember sufficiently; excluded, but "it seems, however, singular that instead of trusting to Mr. F.'s recollection, the plaintiff did not offer his [F.'s] notes in evidence, against which, when properly authenticated, there could be no sort of objection"); 1824, Smith v. Lane, 12 S. & R. 80 (issue as to flour delivered to the plaintiff; the books of the mill where it was ground were offered, the bookkeeper swearing to their correctness; Tilghman, C. J., rejected them (1) because they recorded flour ground, not flour delivered, (2) because they were not always made up at the time; Duncan, J., rejected them on mixed grounds, partly because the bookkeeper's recollection was not really revived; Gibson, J., was for admitting them, because (1) the amount ground was a real issue, and (2) the bookkeeper's swearing to the entries' correctness would suffice; the rule about parties' and third persons' account-books was confused with the question of using past recollections; the opinions show singular unfamiliarity with the precedents, and the confused thinking in this case has done much harm); 1828, Chess v. Chess, 17 S. & R. 409 (counsel's notes admitted, following Cornell v. Green); 1829, Farmers' & M. Bank v. Boracf, 1 Rawle 152 (bank-clerk's verification of an entry, admitted; he had no present recollection); 1865, King v. Faber, 51 Pa. 392 (memorandum, apparently of past recollection, allowed to be used); 1866, Selover v. Rexford's Ex'r, 52 Pa. 308 (memorandum; how treated does not clearly appear); 1888, Long v. Regen, 119 Pa. 403, 13 Atl. 442 (memorandum, apparently of past recollection, admitted as "a statement prepared by the witness fixing the several quantities delivered at the dates designated respectively"); 1886, First Nat'l Bank of D. v. First Nat'l Bank of W., 114 Pa. 7, 6 Atl. 366 (bank-book entries allowed to be used for the purpose of "fixing dates with accuracy"; no precedents referred to); 1905, Clark v. Union Traction Co., 210 Pa. 636, 60 Atl. 302 (obscure); 1922, Christian Moerlein Brewing Co. v. Rusch, 272 Pa. 181, 116 Atl. 145 (reports of an agent; general principle approved).

[2] 1810, Miller v. Hackley, 5 Johns. 375 (notary's testimony to his habit of giving notice and his certainty of belief; no actual recollection; admitted); 1822, Halliday v. Martinet, 20 Johns. 174 (past recollection rejected); 1829, Hart v. Wilson, 2 Wend. 515 (like Miller v. Hackley); 1830, Lawrence v. Barker, 5 Wend. 301 (memorandum excluded, except so far as it actually revived memory); 1833, Feeter v. Heath, 11 Wend. 486 (similar ruling); 1836, Clark v. Vorce, 15 Wend. 193 (witness allowed to use notes of the testimony of a deceased witness at a former trial, upon swearing to their accuracy; no actual recollection); 1837, Merrill v. R. Co., 16 Wend. 595 (entries of work, held admissible if "attested by the refusing the use of past recollection until the lack of present recollection is made to appear (post, § 738).

(3) In Massachusetts, after some early fluctuation, the use of past recollection has been placed beyond doubt;[3] yet it is apparently limited to regular entries in the course of business (post, § 747).

(4) In Illinois the use of a past recollection is undoubtedly intended to be sanctioned; but much confusion once existed as to the scope and grounds of the rule.[4] man who makes them", "though he remember nothing of the facts which they record"); 1837, Clute v. Small, 17 Wend. 237 (witness to contents of a letter; "he could speak either from positive recollection, or from seeing the letter and knowing it to be his own statement"); 1852, Huff v. Bennett, 6 N. Y. 337 (use of past recollection apparently affirmed); 1854, Cole v. Jessup, 10 N. Y. 96 (bank-teller's entries used; no actual recollection; the Merrill case followed); 1857, Halsey v. Sinsebaugh, 15 N. Y. 485 (counsel's notes of testimony used; past recollection distinctly sanctioned); this and the Merrill case put the question beyond doubt in this jurisdiction; and the two opinions give a careful survey to the whole subject; the subsequent cases accept the general principle as settled); 1858, Russell v. R. Co., 17 N. Y. 134; 1860, Guy v. Mead, 22 N. Y. 462; 1864, Marcly v. Shults, 29 N. Y. 346; 1871, Downs v. R. Co., 47 N. Y. 87; 1872, McCormick v. R. Co., 49 N. Y. 303; 1875, Gilchrist v. Assoc., 59 N. Y. 499; 1875, Squires v. Abbott, 61 N. Y. 535; 1876, Flood v. Mitchell, 68 N. Y. 509; 1876, Mandeville v. Reynolds, 68 N. Y. 528, 537; 1879, Howard v. McDonough, 77 N. Y. 592; 1886, Mayor v. R. Co., 102 N. Y. 572, 7 N. E. 905; 1889, National Ulster Co. Bank v. Madden, 114 N. Y. 280, 21 N. E. 408.

(5) In the remaining jurisdictions, the precedents are fewer, but a general recognition is accorded and no special anomalies have developed.[5]

[3] 1828, Glover v. Hunnewell, 6 Pick. 222 (witness had no present recollection, and was not allowed to use a schedule which he believed correct); 1829, Russell v. Conn, 8 Pick. 143 (a subscribing witness identified his hand and the grantor's, but had no recollection; the proof of handwriting was deemed sufficient); 1836, Shove v. Wiley, 18 Pick. 558 (book of notices to indorsers; past recollection sanctioned); 1838, Alvord v. Collin, 20 Pick. 430 (certificate of notice of sale: past recollection sanctioned); 1844, Bunker v. Shed, 8 Metc. 153 (a lawyer's docket-entry, admitted). Subsequent cases (showing not always a true appreciation of the grounds of admission) are as follows: 1855, Smith v. Johns, 3 Gray 517 (certificate of taking possession); 1857, Crittenden v. Rogers, 8 Gray 452 (same); 1858, Perkins v. Ins. Co., 10 Gray 323 (certificate of marine surveyor); 1860, Briggs v. Rafferty, 14 Gray 525; 1860, Parsons v. Ins. Co., 16 Gray 463; 1866, Dugan v. Mahoney, 11 All. 572; 1867, Morrison v. Chapin, 97 Mass. 72; 1869, Adams v. Coulliard, 102 Mass. 173; 1872, Cobb v. Boston, 109 Mass. 444; 1882, Costello v. Crowell, 133 Mass. 352; 1891, Com. v. Clancy, 154 Mass. 128, 27 N. E. 1001.

[4] 1859, Mineral Point R. Co. v. Keep, 22 Ill. 20 (counsel's notes, verified by him as correct, accepted); 1867, Elston v. Kennicott, 46 Ill. 205 (tax-collector's entry of "paid"; no actual recollection; rejected); 1870, Chicago R. Co. v. Adler, 56 Ill. 345 (inconsistent language and nothing left certain; "the witness must be able to state that he remembers the facts" in their substance, e.g. that a bell was not rung, but he may refer for dates to his memorandum, provided he knows they were true and correctly entered at the time); 1873, Chicago & W. Coal Co. v. Liddell, 69 Ill. 639 (same fault: the witness, using a memorandum, "testified from his own memory", yet "he knows the items to be correct because they were true when made"); 1875, Wolcott v. Heath, 78 Ill. 434 (sales-book entries; use of past recollection sanctioned); 1875, Brown v. Luehrs, 79 Ill. 575 (stenographer's notes, verified as correct, admitted; whether past or present recollection does not appear); 1884, Clifford v. Drake, 110 Ill. 135 (reporter using newspaper copy; admitted); 1887, Bonnet v. Glatfeldt, 120 Ill. 166, 11 N. E. 250 (copy of book-entries, admitted); 1899, Overtoom v. R. Co., 181 Ill. 323, 54 N. E. 898 (stenographer using notes without actual refreshment; culpably left undecided; why throw additional doubt on the preceding rulings?).

If Courts would rigorously consult their own precedents, the state of doctrine might sometimes be better ascertainable; in the second, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth of the above cases, none of those preceding were referred to.

[5] The following list is intended to include only the salient cases leading to the establishment of the general doctrine:
Federal: 1869, Insurance Co. v. Weide, 9 Wall. 681 (admitted); 1871, Insurance Co. v. Weides, 14 9 Wall. 379 (admitted); 187 3, Ruch v. Rock Island, 97 U. S. 695 (notes of testimony used); 1884, Maxwell v. Wilkinson, 113 U. S. 658, 5 Sup. 691 (sanctioned); 1886, Vicksburg R. Co. v. O'Brien, 119 U. S. 99, 7 Sup. 118 (sanctioned); 1893, Bates v. Preble, 151 U. S. 149, 14 Sup. 277 (a confusing opinion, which has done much to unsettle the law in that jurisdiction; it lacks acquaintance with the nature of the problems involved, and should be avoided in any study of the subject);

Alabama: In Vastbinder v. Metcalf, 3 Ala. 101 (1841), a past recollection was not recognized; but this was set right, on the authority of Professor Greenleaf, in Bondurant v. Bank, 7 Ala. 830 (1845), since followed frequently;

Alaska: Comp. L. 1913, § 1497 (like Or. Laws 1920, § 859);

Arkansas: 1895, Woodruff v. State, 61 Ark. 157, 32 S. W. 102 (admitted);

California: 1854, Treadwell v. Wells, 4 Cal. 263 (apparently employed); 1859, People v. Elyea, 14 Cal. 144 (apparently sanctioned); C. C. P. 1872, § 2047 (admissible if made "at the time when the fact occurred, or immediately thereafter, or at any other time when the fact was fresh in his memory, and he knew that the same was correctly stated in the writing . . . : so also a witness may testify from such a writing, though he retain no recollection of the particular facts: but such evidence must be received with caution"); 1894, Burbank v. Dennis, 101 Cal. 90, 35 Pac. 444 (shorthand-reporter; verified notes read as evidence); 1897, People v. Ammerman, 118 Cal. 23, 50 Pac. 15 (shorthand transcript admitted); 1897, People v. Mayne, 118 Cal. 516, 50 Pac. 654 (a mother identified an entry in a family Bible as hers, but the entry was excluded, with singular failure to notice the application of the present principle); 1919, Moore's Estate, 180 Cal. 570, 182 Pac. 285 (rejecting the unfounded contention that C. C. P. § 2047 expressly left the use of such a memorandum — here, a record of former testimony — optional with the trial court);

Connecticut: 1842, New Haven Bank v. Mitchell, 15 Conn. 224 (admitted);

Delaware: Declared admissible in Redden v. Spruce, 4 Harringt. 265 (1845); practically overruling Fitzgibbon's Adm'r v. Kinney, 3 Harringt. 319 (1841);

Georgia: 1849, Williams v. Kelsey, 6 Ga. 373 (sanctioned); Code 1910, § 5873, P. C. 1910, § 1046 ("A witness may refresh and assist his memory by the use of any written instrument or memorandum, provided he finally speaks from his recollection thus refreshed, or is willing to swear positively from the paper"); 1900, Atkins v. R. & B. Co., 111 Ga. 815, 35 S. E. 671;

Idaho: Comp. St. 1919, § 8033 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2047);

Indiana: 1853, Clark v. State, 4 Ind. 156 (rejected); 1866, Prather v. Pritchard, 26 Ind. 67 (accepted, not mentioning Clark's case); 1888, Johnson v. Culver, 116 Ind. 290, 19 N. E. 129 (sanctioned, with the qualification, "he cannot testify entirely from the writing, . . . but for . . . giving accuracy to his statements he may refer to it"); 1893, Bass v. State, 136 Ind. 165, 168, 36 N. E. 124 (stenographer may read his notes aloud, though not able to recollect without them); 1901, Higgins v. People, 157 Ind. 57, 60 N. E. 685 (shorthand notes of testimony used by the taker); 1905, Southern R. Co. v. State, 165 Ind. 613, 75 N. E. 272 (Johnson v. Culver approved; this is a virtual repudiation of the general doctrine, and is unsound);

Iowa: 1864, Morris v. Sargent, 18 Ia. 95 (sanctioned); 1870, McKivitt v. Cone, 30 Ia. 457; 1871, Borland v. Walrath, 33 Ia. 132; 1874, Moore v. Moore, 39 Ia. 461, 463 (stenographer referring to notes; obscure); 1875, Adae v. Zangs, 41 Ia. 536; 1896, State v. Smith, 99 Ia. 26, 68 N. W. 428 (shorthand notes, used by the maker); 1897, State Bank v. Brewer, 100 Ia. 576, 69 N. W. 1011 (apparently held improper to testify without actual refreshment; no authorities cited); 1897, O'Brien v. Stambach, 101 Ia. 40, 69 N. W. 1133 (a referee's notes of testimony taken before him);

Kansas: 1885, Solomon R. Co. v. Jones, 34 Kan. 444, 8 Pac. 730 (admitted); 1886, State v. Baldwin, 36 Kan. 15, 12 Pac. 318 (sanctioned); 1897, Wright v. Wright, 58 Kan. 525, 50 Pac. 444 (stenographic report of testimony);

Kentucky: 1815, Allen v. Trimble, 4 Bibb. 21 (accepted, from a subscribing witness); 1821, Calvert v. Fitzgerald, 1 Litt. Sel. Cas. 388 (rejected);

Louisiana: 1826, Bullard v. Wilson, 5 Mart. N. S. 196 (admitting the past recollection of a notary, in a record of a protest-notice);

Maine: 1835, Wheeler v. Hatch, 3 Fairf. 389 (subscribing witness, admitted); 1843, Welcome v. Batchelder, 23 Me. 85 (notes of testimony, admitted); 1847, Chamberlain v. Sands, 27 Me. 465 (admitted; apparently past recollection);

Minnesota: 1889, Hoffman v. R. Co., 40 Minn. 60, 41 N. W. 301 (sanctioned); 1897, Davis v. State, — Minn. —, 70 N. W. 984 (record of passing trains; allowed);

Missouri: 1874, Smith v. Beattie, 57 Mo. 281 (the hearsay exception for regular entries was apparently used to admit records of past recollection); 1887, Mathias v. O'Neill, 94 Mo.

§ 737. Other Principles applicable to certain Kinds of Memoranda, distinguished: (1) Notes of Testimony; (2) Regular Entries in the Course of Business; (3) Notary's Certificate; (4) Will-Witness' Attestation. There are four sorts of memoranda in which the applicability of the present principle was first seen and is still most commonly exemplified. But the scope of the present principle, in its relation to them, must be distinguished from other principles.

(1) When a stenographer's notes of former testimony are used, the present principle is simple. The stenographer cannot commonly revive an actual recollection, and will therefore read his notes as a memorandum of past recollection (ante, § 736); the only usual questions under the present principle will be whether the stenographic original must be used (post, § 749), and whether the witness himself, not the stenographer, may use it (post, §§ 748, 760). But other distinct principles may come into play. If the stenographer is not called to the stand, the question occurs whether the notes can none the less be read as a correct report, under an exception to the Hearsay rule (post, § 1669). Moreover, the witness whose testimony it is must be accounted for as deceased or otherwise unavailable (post, §§ 1401–1413); the parties and issues must be the same (post, §§ 1386–1388); and in criminal cases a special question of constitutionality arises (post, § 1398). Through the failure to note which of these principles is involved, many rulings are obscure and useless.

Washington: 1903, State v. Douette, 31 Wash. 6, 71 Pac. 556 (hotel register; principle recognized);
Wisconsin: 1883, Rounds v. State, 57 Wis. 52, 14 N. W. 865 (sanctioned); 1905, Manning v. School District, 124 Wis. 84, 102 N. W. 356 (sanctioned).

(2) When the memorandum is one of a series of regular entries in the course of business, it would be admissible without calling the entrant, if he were deceased or otherwise unavailable, under a settled exception to the Hearsay rule (post, §§ 1517–1561). But when the entrant himself comes with the entry to the stand, then the present principle alone (or that of present recollection) is involved. In this aspect, it is wholly immaterial that the entry was one of a regular series (post, § 747); neither that nor any other of the limitations to the Hearsay exception has here any application. Yet the tendency to confuse the two is inveterate.

(3) A notary's certificate may be admissible, without calling the notary to the stand, under an exception to the Hearsay rule (post, § 1675). But when the notary testifies in person, he uses his certificate under the principles of past or present recollection. Here the peculiar service of this class of memoranda has been to show that the habit of being consciously accurate is of itself a sufficient foundation for the witness' verification of his memorandum (post, § 747).

(4) An attesting witness commonly verifies his signature just as a notary does, i.e. from his confidence that he would not have signed if he had not verily seen what he attests (post, § 747). If the witness is not available in person, then his signature is proved, and his attestation becomes virtually a hearsay statement, admissible by a settled exception (post, § 1505).

b. Preference for a Present Recollection

§ 738. New York Doctrine: Present Recollection must first appear to be Lacking. The principle on which the use of a past recollection rests (as appears from the passages quoted ante, § 734) is clearly that of necessity. "To reject such a record would be to reject the best and frequently the only means of arriving at the truth"; such is the notion, in various phrasings, expressed in those opinions and in many others. But this necessity, on further analysis, is open to two interpretations, the less satisfactory of which has been adopted and emphasized in the modern New York rulings. Is the use of past recollection necessary (1) because in the case in hand there is not available a present actual recollection in the specific witness, or (2) because in the usual case a faithful record of a past recollection, if it exists, is more trustworthy and desirable than a present recollection of greater or less vividness? The latter view, it would seem, is more in harmony with general experience, as well as with the attitude of the judges who early vindicated the use of past recollection. A faithful memorandum is acceptable, not conditionally on the total or partial absence of a present remnant of actual recollection in the particular witness, but unconditionally; because, for every moment of time which elapses between the act of recording and the occasion of testifying, the actual recollection must be inferior in vividness to the recollection perpetuated in the record.

Nevertheless, the first of these differing interpretations of the principle was for a time established in New York. It was there required that the absence of a present recollection must first be expressly shown as a preliminary to the use of the past recollection. Whether this failure shall be total or partial, whether it shall affect merely the substance of the transaction or even details, — these are the additional questions which do not seem to have been settled, but they illustrate the practical unwieldiness and undue technicality of this doctrine:

1858, Russell v. R. Co., 17 N. Y. 134: "It is an indispensable preliminary to the introduction of such memoranda in evidence . . . that the witness is unable with the aid of the memorandum to speak from [present] memory as to the facts." [1]

This exceptional doctrine has been followed in the Federal Courts[2] and in a few States.[3] But it must be regarded as an inferior and local qualification, unknown to the orthodox doctrine and unapproved by good sense.

§ 739. Written Copies, as preferred to Oral Recollection. Parallel with the doctrine of the New York Court (ante, § 738), that a present recollection is preferred to a recorded past recollection, and yet looking in precisely the opposite direction, is a doctrine that for some purposes a recorded past recollection is preferred to a present recollection. This question is presented when a witness offers to testify orally to the contents of a document to be proved. Here his testimony is based solely on his present recollection of the document as he perused it at a prior time. But if, instead, he offers a copy examined by him with the original, he virtually offers a written record of his past recollection as it existed instantly upon the perusal of each word. The contrast is thus between his past recorded and his present recollection.

There can be no doubt that the former is a more trustworthy source of testimony for the contents of documents whose original is lost or otherwise unavailable. But shall there be a rule of preference, i.e. a rule requiring a written copy to be used, if it can be procured? This question is, by some Courts and for some classes of documents, answered in the affirmative; but the details can best be examined in considering the other rules affecting the use of copies (post, §§ 1265–1275).

§ 740. Reading a Prepared Report. The New York doctrine, i.e. of not permitting the use of a memorandum of past recollection until the lack of any present recollection was shown, would forbid the practice of permitting an expert witness to read, as the basis of his testimony, a report prepared beforehand, representing the results of an analysis or other investigation. Such a practice, however, is often highly desirable; to forbid it merely shows the misguided nature of the principle of § 738, ante.

That such a prepared report is a proper mode of narration is noticed more fully post, § 785.

c. Rules to secure Adequacy of Past Recollection and Correctness and Identity of Record

§ 744. Past Recollection must have been Written down; Exception for Former Oral Identification. It is commonly assumed, as a fundamental condition of using a past recollection, that the thing recollected must have been written down as recollected. The ensuing rules are all corollaries of this assumed postulate.[1]

§ 744. [1] Yet in theory this is not essential. The tenor of the fact recollected may conceivably be preserved without writing. In practice there is one situation which not only illustrates this theoretical possibility but also demonstrates the wisdom of recognizing it, as an exception to the general rule. That situation is the former oral identification of an utterance, now forgotten. The fact recollected being a simple one, it suffices if the witness now knows that he did once orally verify it, even if he did not then preserve in writing the circumstance: Accord: 1778, Captain Baillie's Base, 21 How. St. Tr. 319 ("I desire to know whether you heard any such words as those come out of my mouth? . . ." "I certainly did not; it is now a great while since, [so] that I should not depend upon my memory; but your lordship did call upon me at the next general court and then I said there were no such words"); 1826, Jackson v. Thompson, 6 Cow. 178, 179 (an aged will-witness, not able to see to read, could not identify the will in Court, but had formerly seen it elsewhere and "then read and recognized his signature as genuine").

Contra: 1915, Mallinger v. Sarbach, 94 Kan. 504, 146 Pac. 1148 (whether S. gave an authority to sign; M.'s testimony that if he told N. at a certain date that S. had given § 745. (1) Recollection must have been fairly Fresh when Recorded. In order that the past recollection may be one worth trusting, it must have been sufficiently fresh and vivid to be probably accurate. When a present recollection is used, it may be sufficient (as noticed ante, § 726) to admit an "impression", or a "belief"; the witness tries to give "the best of his recollection", and the tribunal may well take what it can get, and not exclude it for want of more that is unattainable. But where the witness goes back to a past recollection, which can less easily be tested by cross-examination, he may properly be asked for something more positive, — something of a quality satisfactory in itself and not merely the best available. This quality the law has attempted to define, and even to test by an arbitrary rule. There is found, first, a general principle that the recollection, when recorded, should have been fairly fresh, — each instance being dealt with on its own circumstances; and, secondly, there is, more commonly, an arbitrary test defining the recollection as one recorded at or near the time of the events.

(1) That the first is the preferable form for the law need hardly be argued; it exemplifies the excellent policy of leaving the law flexible and rational and not chilling it into rules more or less arbitrary:[1]

1795, L. J. CLERK (for the minority) in Kinlock's Case, 25 How. St. Tr. 937: "It is admitted . . that a witness may make use of notes taken at the time the fact happened. Now where is the difference though they are 'ex post facto', if he is ready to swear that he took them down with a good recollection?"

1880, ALLEN, J., in Chamberlin v. Ossipee, 60 N. H. 212 (admitting a memorandum "made at a time when the facts written down were fresh in the mind of the witness and known by him to be as recorded"): "The question of the sufficient accuracy of the memorandum, depending upon its nearness or remoteness in time to the date of the facts written here, was one of fact for the referees."

1881, ELBERT, J., in Lawson v. Glass, 6 Colo. 134: "Much must be left in such a case to the judgment of the 'nisi prius' Court, who sees the witness and hears him testify; and the witness having testified that he remembered the items of labor when he wrote them down, the lapse of time was [in this case] not such, considering the nature of the account, as to forbid the Court in the exercise of its discretion allowing the witness to use the account to refresh his memory."

(2) But the common, though less proper, rule is that the recollection recorded must have been "at or near the time" of the events in question. This such an authority, the statement was correct, but that he could not remember the conversation, and N.'s testimony that M. did so state to him, held not admissible).

Compare the doctrine of corroboration by similar statements (post, § 1130), which might sometimes be availed of in such a situation. Compare also § 751, post.

§ 745. [1] Accord: 1834, Burton v. Plummer, 2 A. & E. 341 (L. C. J. Denman phrased the test, "when the transaction could not but be fresh in his memory, so that he must have been able to verify the correctness of his entry"); 1906, Murray & Peppers v. Dickens, 149 Ala. 240, 42 So. 1031 ("No precise time is fixed by law"); Cal. phrasing has been generally used, even where it was not required for the decision of the case.[2] Two things must be noted, however, about this rule: (a) The recollection must in fact have been fresh (i.e. adequate), even though noted "near the time";[3] (b) the phrases "near the time" or "shortly afterwards" really furnish no accurate test, and in their application the probable freshness of the recollection must after all be the ultimate test. It may be added that in some rulings the language mentions both the first and the second tests in the alternative.[4] In most rulings, the decision turns upon the circumstances of the particular case.[5]

§ 746. (2) Correctness of Record; General Principle. It has already been noted (ante, § 734) that, so far as adequacy of Recollection is concerned, it is enough to require that at the time of making the record the Recollection should have been fresh, i.e. the event recent. But, having gained this assurance that the Recollection was adequate, it remains still for the law to make fairly sure of certain other things, which (in strictness) depend on the element of correct Narration or Communication (post, § 766). In the first place, it must make sure that this Recollection was correctly represented in the record or memorandum then made; here several situations present themselves for solution. Next, it must make sure that the statement now offered as testimony by the witness is in fact identical in tenor with the record or memorandum formerly made; here, again, several different situations arise. Finally, it has to consider the testimonial status of the record when thus used.

For the first of these steps — that of making sure that the record or memorandum, when made, represented the Recollection of the time with fair accuracy —, the requirements of principle may be summed up thus: (a) The witness must be able now to assert that the record correctly represented his knowledge and recollection at the time of making. (b) But, this testimonial guarantee of correctness being all that is needed, it will therefore be generally immaterial that the witness was not the person actually writing or printing the record, provided the witness can give this guarantee; (c) except that in particular instances the circumstance that another person had prepared the record may justify the Court in doubting the witness' guarantee and rejecting the record. These various details may now be examined.

§ 747. Same: (a) Witness must Guarantee Correctness. The witness must be able now to assert that the record accurately represented his knowledge and recollection at the time. The usual phrase requires the witness to affirm that he "knew it to be true at the time."[1] It is obvious that the witness' readiness to affirm this may rest on one of two reasons: (1) He may distinctly recollect his state of mind at the time of making or first seeing the record and may thus now remember that he then passed judgment upon and knew the record's correctness. Or (2) he may now actually recollect nothing of the occasion of making the record and of his then state of mind; nevertheless he may know, from his general practice in making such records, or

J., diss.); Vermont: 1884, Davis v. Field, 56 Vt. 426 ("able to swear that it is correct, . . . because of his confidence in the correctness of his memorandum").

These are merely illustrations of the differing phraseology; nearly every decision mentions the requirement.

For English cases, see infra, note 5.

The witness must of course have had personal knowledge of the facts: infra, note 8.

from other indications on the paper, that he must have passed judgment upon and known the correctness of the record; here he none the less knows that he did know the record to be correct. although he has no present recollection of the specific state of mind.

(1) As to the former of these two ways of verifying the record, no difficulty arises.[2] If the witness can say, "I distinctly remember that when I made or saw this memorandum, about the time of the events, I was then conscious of its correctness", his verification is satisfactory.

(2) But if he relies, not on a present recollection of his past state of mind, but on other indications, such as a habit, a course of business, a check-mark on the margin, or merely the genuineness of his handwriting, then the certainty is of a lower quality, though still satisfactory for most practical purposes. In general, it is conceded that when the witness' certainty rests on his usual habit or course of business in making memoranda or records, it is sufficient.[3] Other peculiar circumstances, such as handwriting, specially intended or calculated to indicate correctness, may be satisfactory.[4] Is it enough that the witness (as is usual with attesting witnesses to a document) merely recognizes his handwriting and knows that he would not have written or signed without believing the record to be correct? Here the witness is really calling to his aid, not his specific business custom, but his general moral attitude; but, as a rule, the indication should be and is treated as sufficient.[5]

It is possibly the rule in Massachusetts that only regular entries, not mere casual memoranda, can be used, — apparently on the notion that this regularity is the only satisfactory guarantee of correctness.[6] But this limitation is absolutely without ground, either of principle or of policy,[7] and is of course due to some confusion of thought about the Regular Entries exception to the Hearsay rule (post, § 1517).

It may be added that the witness must of course have had personal knowledge of the facts recorded (ante, § 657) in the first instance; he cannot guar-

Contra, 1860, Parsons v. Ins. Co., 16 Gray 463; but this is perhaps a result of the Massachusetts doctrine noticed infra.

For the doctrine that proof of an absent witness' signature is evidence of all the requisites of execution, see post, § 1511.

[6] The question was expressly reserved in Shove v. Wiley, 18 Pick. 558 (1836). It is sufficient to notice that this regularity was apparently treated as requisite in some cases: 1858, Perkins v. Ins. Co., 10 Gray 323; 1882, Costello v. Crowell, 133 Mass. 352; but in others as not requisite: 1838, Alvord v. Collin, 20 Pick. 418, 430; 1885, Smith v. Johns, 3 Gray 517; 1857, Crittenden v. Rogers, 8 Gray 452; 1860, Parsons v. Ins. Co., 191 Mass. 153, 77 N. E. 309 (here a medical man's writing of the answers to an insurance application was allowed to be used).

In Delaware a somewhat similar principle was laid down in Redden v. Spruce, 4 Harringt. 215 (1845), admitting the use of "inventories and schedules, precise dates, particular words, and other matters", but not beyond this.

[7] In Massachusetts the usage appeared historically as a development from the hearsay exception of regular entries (Shove v. Wiley, supra), — a peculiar local line of thought to which alone the above limitation, if it there exists, is due (see the history ante, § 736). The heresy was expressly repudiated in Guy v. Mead, 22 N. Y. 462 (1860), by Denio, J.; and it is unfortunate that in Vicksburg & M. R. Co. v. O'Brien, 119 U. S. 99, 7 Sup. 172 (1886), it should have been elevated to the dignity of a doubtful question; it has also been apparently followed in Masters v. Marsh, 19 Nebr. 458, 466, 27 N. W. 438 (1886; bastardy; to prove the date of delivery of wheat, a bookkeeper of V. was offered, who testified to an entry of a delivery as to which he had no present recollection; the testimony was excluded on the theory that party's account-books alone were admissible; no acquaintance with the present subject appears); and in Third Nat'l Bank v. Owen, 101 Mo. 585, 14 S. W. 632 (1890), and in First Nat'l Bank v. Yeoman, 14 Okl. 626, 78 Pac. 388 (1904), there is language looking towards the limitation in question as proper.

The following cases negative this heresy: 1899, Dunlap v. Hopkins, 37 C. C. A. 52, 95 Fed. 231 (letter to a friend); Mandeville v. Reynolds, 68 N. Y. 528, 537 (letters of an attorney stating the contents of a lost judgment roll, and known by him at the time to be correct, admissible).

antee the correctness of the paper as a record of facts which he himself never observed.[8]

§ 748. Same: (b) Witness need not himself be the Writer. But, this testimonial guarantee of correctness being all that is needed, it is generally immaterial whether the witness was or was not the person who actually wrote or printed the record. It may have been manually prepared by another; but from the moment when the witness saw it and passed judgment upon its correctness, it became for him a correct record. As the mere fact of his writing it would count for nothing in itself, so the mere fact of his not having been the writer is immaterial:[1]

Of course where a clerk of court produces depositions which witnesses have signed before him, and he proceeds to read them, this is not a case of using his past recollection for the facts of the testimony; the paper is the witness' statement, not the clerk's, and the clerk has merely authenticated it; he reads it just as counsel would read it, i.e. as A.'s statement in writing, and not as an adopted memorandum of his own; this the Court had to point out in Stephens v. People, 19 N. 1809, ELLENBOROUGH, L. C. J., in Burrough v. Martin, 2 Camp. 112 (the witness used log-book; he had not made the entries himself, but he had examined them while the events were recent and had found them accurate): "If the witness looked at the log-book from time to time, while the occurrences mentioned were recent, and fresh in his memory, it is as good as if he had written the whole with his own hand."

clerk who had not made either the sales or the entries went to the defendant and got his admission for each sale entered; the clerk was then allowed to use the book, in spite of defendant's objection that "the entries were not made by the witness himself"); 1834, Burton v. Plummer, 2 A. & E. 341 (the witness was allowed to use a copy, made by the plaintiff, of entries in a book kept by the witness, the copying having been done in the presence of the latter, who checked off the items at the time as correctly copied); 1844, Topham v. McGregor, 1 C. & K. 320 (the witness used a newspaper article, the original of which he had written); 1851, R. v. Philpotts, 5 Cox Cr. 329 (a solicitor, giving a deceased witness' testimony, used notes made by his counsel as the witness stood by and read over by him soon afterwards); 1852, Anderson v. Walley, 3 C. & K. 54 (like Burrough v. Martin, supra); 1876, R. v. Langton, L. R. 2 Q. B. D. 296 (the witness was pay-clerk and paid out wages according to days and amounts read off by L. from a book made up by a third person from L.'s report; the witness, having seen the entries at the time of L.'s reading off, was allowed to use them as representing the amounts paid out).

UNITED STATES: Federal: 1899, Pacific Coast S. Co. v. Bancroft-Whitney Co., 36 C. C. A. 135, 94 Fed. 180; 1915, The J. S. Warden, 3d C. C. A., 219 Fed. 517 (entries made by a ship captain's direction and afterwards inspected and verified by him, held admissible to "refresh memory");

Alabama: 1892, Thompson v. State, 99 Ala. 173, 175, 13 So. 753 (testimony before a grand jury); 1897, Torrey v. Burney, 113 Ala. 496, 21 So. 348 (a bill of exceptions, dictated partly by the witness, partly by his associate counsel, but all afterwards gone over by the witness, admitted); 1899, Anderson v. English, 121 Ala. 272, 25 So. 748 (memorandum of entries made by several persons, and known by each to be correct, used by each); 1917, Floyd v. Pugh, 201 Ala. 29, 77 So. 323 (copy of a contract);

California: C. C. P. 1872, § 2047 ("written by himself or under his direction"; this is too narrow, and is not always observed in the rulings); 1884, Paige v. Carter, 64 Cal. 489, 2 Pac. 260; 1896, McGowan v. McDonald, 111 Cal. 57, 43 Pac. 418 (a bank pass-book, with entries of deposits made by the teller and entries of drafts made by the bank bookkeeper; the customer allowed to use it because he had inspected the entries at the time and known that they were correct); 1898, Grant v. Dreyfus, — Cal. —, 52 Pac. 1074, semble (entries made under the witness' direction by his son, used); 1906, People v. Brown, 3 Cal. App. 178, 84 Pac. 670;

Connecticut: 1895, Curtis v. Bradley, 65 Conn. 99, 31 Atl. 591; 1906, Wood v. Holah, 79 Conn. 215, 64 Atl. 220 (Curtis v. Bradley applied; here excluding the memorandum);

Idaho: Comp. St. 1919, § 8033 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2047);

Kansas: 1885, Solomon R. Co. v. Jones, 34 Kan. 444, 8 Pac. 730; 1888, Phenix Ins. Co. v. Sullivan, 39 Kan. 451, 18 Pac. 528 (an attorney who heard the deceased witness' testimony and assisted in preparing the bill of exceptions, which embodied it);

Maine: 1847, Chamberlain v. Sands, 27 Me. 458, 465 (a paper drawn up by another person more than 20 days after the events, but then recognized by the witness, having a fresh recollection of the events, to be correct);

Maryland: 1860, Green v. Caulk, 16 Md. 556 (in effect overruling Lewis v. Kramer, 3 id. 287); 1887, Owens v. State, 67 Md. 307, 10 Atl. 210, 302 (C. kept the poll-book at an election, and checked off all voters; during his absence, F. and H. kept the book, H. checking and F. watching the process; C. and F., without H., were allowed to testify by the book); 1893, Billingslea v. Smith, 77 Md. 504, 514, 26 Atl. 1077; 1921, Myers v. State, 137 Md. 496, 113 Atl. 92 (larceny of an automobile; receipt for the car, signed by A., and compared by M. as to motor-number with the motor-number on the car, admitted as a part of M.'s testimony);

Michigan: 1899, Union Cent. L. I. Co. v. Smith, 119 Mich. 171, 77 N. W. 706 (insurance books);

Montana: Rev. C. 1921, § 10664 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2047);

Nebraska: 1896, Kearney v. Themanson, 48 Nebr. 74, 66 N. W. 996 (articles destroyed by a flood; the paper known at the time to be correct, though made by another);

New Hampshire: 1855, Webster v. Clark, 30 N. H. 254; 1856, Pillsbury v. Locke, 33 N. H. 96 (the witness noted amounts on a slate, and his wife or his daughter copied these into a book, which the witness examined and verified);

New York: 1837, Merrill v. R. Co., 16 Wend. 595, semble; 1900, Clark v. Bank, 164 N. Y. 498, 58 N. E. 659 (entries made by bookkeeper of items furnished by the witness, and seen two days later by the witness and then known to be correct, admitted); 1905, McCarthy v. Meaney, 183 N. Y. 190, 76 N. E. 36 (certain memoranda not made nor verified by T., not allowed to be received as his testimony);

North Carolina: 1883, State v. Lyon, 89 N. C. 568 (a newspaper copy of a libel);

Oregon: Laws 1920, § 859 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2047); 1899, Oyler v. Dantoff, 36 Or. 357, 59

1864, O'BRIEN, J., in Lord Talbot v. Cusack, 17 Ir. C. L. 213 (the witness was using a copy made by K., examined and found accurate by the witness): "[The use of memoranda made by the witness himself] has been extended to the case of entries which, though not in the witness' handwriting, were either made in his presence and read by him at the time of the transaction, or were read and examined by him shortly afterwards when the facts were fresh in his recollection and when he was enabled to ascertain that the facts stated in the entry were true."

1860, LE GRAND, C. J., in Green v. Caulk, 16 Md. 573: "What was supposed to be the ancient rule has been relaxed by more recent decisions; and now it is held not to be necessary that the memorandum should have been made by the witness, but . . . the witness having then seen it and recognized it as containing the truth, of which he is still convinced at the time of the trial, he may be examined in regard to it."

Nevertheless, in particular instances the circumstance that another person had prepared the record may justify the Court in doubting the witness' guarantee and rejecting the record. The very object of the rules is to secure the record's accuracy, and if, though ordinary tests are fulfilled, the Court in the particular circumstances finds the record untrustworthy, the rule should bend to the case:[2]

1845, BUTLER, J., in O'Neale v. Walton, 1 Rich. L. 234 (about two weeks after a conversation between plaintiff and defendant, plaintiff drew up a memorandum of its terms and had it signed by three persons who heard it; one of these, having forgotten the facts, proposed, but was not allowed, to read from the paper): "Here the memorandum was drawn up by one of the parties to the suit, and if not in view of 'lis mota', it was to perpetuate evidence obtained 'ex parte' and for his own benefit. It was obtained by a prepared and leading examination, the statement of a suspected witness. . . . The facts must be noted

Vermont: 1884, Davis v. Field, 56 Vt. 426 (assessors here used tax-lists not made in their own handwriting);
Virginia: 1853, Wormeley's Case, 10 Gratt. 665, 689, semble (a deposition read over to, corrected and signed by the witness); 1854, Harrison v. Middleton, 11 Va. 546 (a diagram of courses and distances, made by the plaintiff, but used by the witness and verified while making the survey);
Wisconsin: 1869, Riggs v. Weise, 24 Wis. 545 (made by the wife); 1896, Hazer v. Streich, 92 Wis. 505, 66 N. W. 720 (made by a clerk in his presence); 1901, Bourda v. Jones, 110 Wis. 52, 85 N. W. 671 (inventory of personalty);
Wyoming: 1913, Jenkins v. State, 22 Wyo. 34, 134 Pac. 260, 135 Pac. 749 (stenographic notes made by another person, but seen and verified by the witness freshly after the event; use allowed).

Contra: The requirement that the memorandum shall be made by the witness himself is usually a loose 'obiter dictum': 1900, Wellman v. Jones, 124 Ala. 580, 27 So. 416; 1879, Schmidt v. Wambacker, 62 Ga. 323; 1895, Orr v. F. A. W. & C. Co., 97 Ga. 241, 22 S. E. 938 (where the book was made up by H. from memoranda of L., the witness, who had afterwards checked off the entries as correct); 1898, Evans v. Murphy, 87 Md. 498, 40 Atl. 109; 1867, Morrison v. Chapin, 97 Mass. 72; 1879, Howard v. McDonough, 77 N. Y. 592.

The correct doctrine was stated in the following cases: 1853, Coffin v. Vincent, 12 Cush. 98; 1881, Com. v. Ford, 130 Mass. 66; but witnesses there actually refreshed recollection.

[2] Similar instances are: 1849, Alcock v. Royal Exchange Assurance, 13 Q. B. 292; 1898, Wager L. Co. v. Sullivan L. Co., 120 Ala. 558, 24 So. 949 (memorandum made by another, and not known to witness to be correct, excluded); 1892, Hematite M. Co. v. R. Co., 92 Ga. 268, 272, 18 S. E. 24 (memoranda of shipment made partly by another person and not known to witness to be true, excluded; and because the several entries were indistinguishable, all excluded); 1921, Hall v. Brown, 102 Or. 389, 202 Pac. 719 (loss of crops; memorandum of crops threshed, made by a person who threshed grain for the witness, and not verified by him, excluded); 1852, Ballard v. Ballard, 5 Rich. L. S. C. 495.

Compare also the cases cited ante, § 747, where personal knowledge was lacking.

at the time they are occurring, by a witness acting under the self-direction of his own mind and for the purpose of perpetuating evidence. . . . When third persons, and those who are interested, prepare the memorial, suspicion will assail and justice should repudiate it."

§ 749. (3) Original required, if Available. It remains to make sure that the record which the witness now puts forward as a record of his prior knowledge is in fact the genuine embodiment of his past recollection. While the witness' guarantee of its correctness may be accepted, the law may well insist on the production of his guaranteed paper, not merely as verifying the fact of its existence, but also as insuring the correctness of his story, as throwing additional light on his veracity, as affording a means of testing him, and as the best proof of what was really recorded. In short, the original record itself must be used in testifying, if it is procurable.

This rule (which merely applies the general principle of § 1179, post) is almost universally recognized; and, of course (as a part of the rule), if the original is lost or otherwise unavailable, a copy may then be used.[1] It is true that the use of a copy lacks certain advantages; but this defect is no greater than in the ordinary instance of a contract or a deed which cannot be produced; nor is the importance of using the original here any greater.

§ 749. [1] According to the ordinary rules of § 1179, post, a copy may be used where the original cannot be had: and this condition is usually understood as applying when the Courts demand an original. In the following citations the Courts either expressly affirm or imply this:

ENGLAND: 1756, Tanner v. Taylor, 3 T. R. 754; 1790, Doe v. Perkins, ib. 754 (must be produced "because of the great door which might otherwise be opened to fraud and concealment"); 1825, Jones v. Stroud, 2 C. & P. 196; 1834, R. v. St. Martin's, 2 A. & E. 210; 1839, Horne v. Mackenzie, 6 Cl. & F. 628 (the original was not produced because consisting of complicated calculations); 1844, Topham v. McGregor, 1 C. & K. 320 (the original was not produced because lost).

§ 750. Same: Copy made and Verified by Another Person. It is obvious that the process of guaranteeing the correctness of the record (ante, § 746) and that of identifying and producing the record are separable. Since in commercial practice there is constantly such a separation of these functions among different persons, there seems to be no reason why the law should not accept and sanction it. Thus, when a witness makes a memorandum and then guarantees on the stand that it was correct, the process of proving its terms by making and producing a copy of it may often be feasible only with the aid of another person, — as where the original is lost and the only copy was made, not by the original writer, but by another person. What difference can it make, if a copy is allowable at all, whether it is verified on the stand by the original maker and witness or by another person? If both take the stand, one guaranteeing the accuracy of the original, and the other verifying the correctness of the copy, this procedure seems entirely proper both on principle and of practical necessity.

This result the Courts have generally accepted:[1]

Massachusetts: 1836, Shove v. Wiley, 18 Pick. 563; 1881, Com. v. Ford, 130 Mass. 66, semble; Minnesota: 1899, Amor v. Stoeckele, 76 Minn. 180, 78 N. § 751. Same: Double Testimony: Bookkeeper's Entry of Salesman's Oral Statement; Stenographer's Report of Interpreted Testimony. If a copy by another person of a statement originally written is receivable, why is not a copy receivable of a statement originally oral? The situation is the same as in the preceding instance, except that the salesman, workman, or foreman, instead of handing the bookkeeper or clerk a written statement of the transaction, makes an oral statement, which is then and there copied as before. Here the salesman will on the stand testify that the statement made by him was an accurate embodiment of his recollection; while the bookkeeper will verify the correctness of his entry, — which is none the less in fact a copy, though it reproduces an oral statement. To receive the memorandum supported by the joint testimony of the two is in perfect accord with legal principle, and is certainly demanded by all considerations of mercantile convenience. This result has long been generally accepted:[1] user to be a correct copy); Illinois: 1901, Chicago & A. R. Co. v. American Strawboard Co., 190 Ill. 268, 60 N. E. 518 ("sheets" made from memoranda of weights of straw, admitted, the weighers verifying their memoranda and the transcribers of the memoranda verifying the correctness of their copying); 1903, Trainor v. German A. S. L. & B. Ass'n, 204 Ill. 616, 68 N. E. 650 (books kept by M., from entries of payments received by S., held not sufficiently verified by M. and S. on the facts); Louisiana: 1857, White v. Wilkinson, 12 La. An. 360 (purchasing-clerks and bookkeeper); Massachusetts: 1831, Smith v. Sanford, 12 Pick. 140 (party's books; one partner made memoranda of sales, the other entered; both testified); 1831, Holmes v. Marsden, 12 Pick. 171, semble (party's books; copies made by a second person, who testified); 1849, Morris v. Briggs, 3 Cush. 343 (party's books; workmen made memoranda, plaintiff entered); 1852, Barker v. Haskell, 9 Cush. 218 (party's books; slate entries by one partner, copied by the other); Missouri: 1902, Stephan v. Metzger, 95 Mo. App. 609, 69 S. W. 625 (plaintiff read off an account, and her daughter wrote it down; the original being destroyed, the copy was allowed to be used upon verification by their joint testimony).

The contrary doctrine is enforced in Peck v. Valentine, 94 N. Y. 569 (1884), where L. made memoranda of sums received and the plaintiff copied them; the originals being lost, the joint testimony of L. and the plaintiff was rejected. It is a sufficient criticism of this opinion to say (1) that the fundamental error pervades it that no copy at all could be received, and (2) that the Court which could go as far as it did in Mayor v. Second Ave. R. Co. (post, § 751) could not consistently repeat the ruling in Peck v. Valentine.

The following ruling is correct: 1883, Chicago R. Co. v. Provine, 61 Miss. 288, 292 (entries made by bookkeepers from reports made by other persons not having personal knowledge of the transactions or a duty to do them, excluded).

1857, DEWEY, J., in Harwood v. Mudry, 8 Gray 250 (one person delivered the goods and reported it, and the other made the charge in the books): "It is proper to introduce as witnesses all those persons who are thus connected with the transaction, and whose testimony is necessary to establish those facts which would be required to be proved by a single person."

1886, ANDREWS, J., in Mayor v. Second Ave. R. Co., 102 N. Y. 572, 7 N. E. 905 (a foreman W. made entries of oral reports by a sub-foreman M. of merchandise delivered; W. and M. both testified): "Business could not be carried on and accounts kept, in many cases, without great inconvenience, unless this method of keeping and proving accounts is sanctioned. . . . If the witnesses are to be believed, there can be but little moral doubt that the book is a true record of the actual fact."

Contra: 1901, Snow Hardware Co. v. Loveman, 131 Ala. 221, 31 So. 19 (memorandum by B., at L.'s dictation, of transaction by L., both testifying on the stand, excluded); 1892, Tupper v. International B. & T. Co., 24 N. Sc. 256 (book made by copying from tally boards of lumber delivered, one person making the former, and another the latter, excluded); 1852, Lewis v. Kramer, 3 Md. 286 (notary and clerk).

The same situation is presented where an interpreter's rendering of a deceased witness' testimony is presented by a stenographer's minutes. If both take the stand, the minutes should be received. This seems to be sanctioned in the following cases: 1871, Schearer v. Harbor, 36 Ind. 541; 1880, People v. Lee Fat, 54 Cal. 529; 1880, People v. Ah Yute, 56 Cal. 120.

So, too, for any report of words uttered: 1834, Green v. Cawthorn, 4 Dev. L. 409 (the issue being whether offensive words of the plaintiff had been communicated to the defendant, E. testified that he had told them to the defendant as reported to him by M. but now forgot the words, and M. testified what the words were as he heard them from the plaintiff and reported them to M.); 1903, People v. McFarlane, 138 Cal. 481, 71 Pac. 568 (witness at a former trial permitted to testify by reference to and reliance upon the official transcript of his testimony verified by the reporter).

Compare the cases cited ante, § 744 (oral identification of utterances).

sence, unattainable as a witness. In that case, may the person who copied the statement — the bookkeeper or shipping-clerk — by his testimony alone make the use of the record possible? Here it is clear that the original statement of the absent person comes as hearsay — i.e. untested by the production of the witness in court for cross-examination, and is therefore 'prima facie' unreceivable. It must come in, if at all, under the hearsay exception for Regular Entries. The rules for this situation are therefore best examined elsewhere (post, §§ 1530, 1555).

§ 753. (4) Record must be Shown to Opponent on Demand, for Inspection and Cross-examination. The fundamental purpose of the rule requiring the use of the original is to protect against error and to give the opponent an opportunity to verify the exact nature of the document and to ascertain its value (post, § 1179). Even where a copy is permitted, there is still a need in fairness for the opponent to see the document, in order to prepare to test the witness upon its contents (on the principle of § 1861, post). Thus it is a necessary implication that the document used, whether an original or a copy, when produced in court, shall be shown to the opponent, on his request, to inspect and to use in cross-examination:[1]

> 1834, PATTESON, J., in R. v. St. Martin's, 2 A. & E. 210: "If he could not recollect the facts independently of the writing, the original writing ought to have been in court in order that the other party might cross-examine; not that such writing is to be made evidence itself, but that the other party is to have the benefit of the witness refreshing his memory in every part."
> 1870, MULLIN, J., in Tibbets v. Sterberg, 66 Barb. 201: "If the witness cannot be compelled to produce it, he might use documents made for him by the party calling him, of the accuracy of which he knows nothing. . . . The right of a party to protection against the introduction against him of false, forged, or manufactured evidence, which he is not permitted to inspect, must not be invaded a hair's breadth."

The importance of this expedient is well illustrated in the following episode from a celebrated trial:

> 1888, Parnell Commission's Proceedings, 12th day, Times' Rep. pt. 3, pp. 182–184; the Irish Land League being charged with complicity in outrages and agrarian crime, it became necessary to prove the connection of certain individuals with the League; and the testimony of the constables, bailiffs, etc., was often open to the suspicion of being partisan and even manufactured; among these, one Honan, a magistrates' clerk, had produced a list of names said to have been taken down by him at the time, and the untrustworthiness of his list was exposed in the following way; on direct examination he had been asked: Q. "Have you watched the persons going in to the committee meetings?" A. "Yes." 2. "Are these the names of the members of the committee you have seen?" (holding up a paper). A. "Yes." . . . The witness was then cross-examined by Mr. Lockwood. Q. "When did you take this list of names?" A. "In March, 1884, or April." Q. "But it is written on a piece of paper which contains a communication to you or some other officer, and has the date July, 1885. Does that enable you to fix the date more accurately?" A. "I took it from the names I took in 1884." Q. "I understood you to say you took them down on that piece of paper?" Witness took the paper, looked at it, and said, "It is all right." Mr. Lockwood. "That is satisfactory, no doubt; but it will not do for me." . . . President HANNEN. "The paper bears the date July 6, 1885, and the words 'Prospect Hill.' That is in a different handwriting." Mr. Lockwood. "Did you or did you not write that down at the time you say you saw the persons attending the committee?" President HANNEN. "On that paper — that very paper?" A. "Yes, my Lord." . . . Mr. Lockwood. "Did you see the words on that paper, 'Complied with July, 1885'? Whose writing is it?" A. "The head constable's." Q. "Do you suggest the head constable wrote that after you wrote the names on the other side in March, 1884?" A. "That is a copy of the names I took down in 1884." Q. "You had forgotten that, had n't you? Now, I am very anxious to see the original document. Where is it?" A. "I have not got it. I knew the names of the committee." Q. "You wrote from your memory?" A. "Yes, I knew the names." Q. "When did you write it, last week?" A. "Oh, no, Sir." Q. "The week before?" A. "No, Sir." Q. "When? Some time in 1885? Some time after July?" A. "Yes." Q. "From memory?" A. "No. When they were going in." Q. "Was the document written by you from memory in July, 1885?" A. "It was written at the time I saw them going in." . . . Q. "You swore to me distinctly that you wrote that in March or April, 1884?" A. "That is a mistake of mine." Q. "Did you write that document at the time you saw the men going into the committee-room?" A. "No; I wrote in pencil and then copied in ink." Q. "Did not you swear to me just now that you wrote it in the street in pen and ink?" A. "It was a mistake of mine." Q. "Another mistake! Have you made any more mistakes in your evidence?" A. "No." Q. "You are sure of that?" A. "Yes."

§ 754. (5) Record goes as Testimony to the Jury. If by verifying and adopting the record of past recollection the witness makes it usable testimonially, and if by this verification alone can it become so usable, it follows that the record thus adopted becomes to that extent the embodiment of the witness' testimony. Thus, (a) the record, verified and adopted, becomes a present evidentiary statement of the witness; (b) and as such it may be handed or shown to the jury by the party offering it.

The first part of this proposition deals with the theoretical status of the memorandum; nevertheless, as the proper usage noted by the second part depends on the theory adopted, it is not a matter of mere words or phrases. The language of the Courts varies, but is clear as to the principle:[1]

§ 754. [1] In the following cases, some speak merely of the theoretical aspect; others expressly permit the handing to the jury; all accept in effect the general proposition above, except as otherwise noted:

ENGLAND: 1801, Jacob v. Lindsay, 1 East 460; 1826, Loyd v. Freshfield, 2 C. & P. 332; 1896, Birchall v. Bullough, 1 Q. B. 325 (a note used as a record of past recollection as to borrowing money; allowable, although itself inadmissible because unstamped).

1871, Per CURIAM, in Moots v. State, 21 Oh. St. 653: "The entry in the book and the oath of the witness supplement each other. The book was really a part of the oath, and therefore admissible with it in evidence."

1879, EARL, J., in Howard v. McDonough, 77 N. Y. 592: "After the witness has testified, the memorandum which he has used may be put in evidence, — not as proving anything of itself, but as a detailed statement of the items testified to by the witness. The manner in which the memorandum in such a case may be used is very much in the discretion of the trial judge."

UNITED STATES: Federal: Here the course of rulings has been disturbed by the unfortunate opinion in Bates v. Preble, Fed., which should be expunged from memory: 1869, Insurance Co. v. Weide, 9 Wall. 677 ("not evidence per se", but satisfactory when verified); 1871, Insurance Co. v. Weides, 14 Wall. 379; 1878, Ruch v. Rock Island, 97 U. S. 695 ("put in evidence"); 1893, Bates v. Preble, 151 U. S. 149, 155, 14 Sup. 277 (witness verified her memorandum-book, but did not use it for actual refreshment, and it was laid before the jury; Brown, J., making no distinction between past and present recollection, concedes that a party's own account-books may be "admitted in evidence", but doubts whether "memoranda made by a witness contemporaneously" are admissible, "elementary writers and courts being about equally divided upon the subject"; and declines to decide the question; it may be said, that if this refers to the subsidiary question whether the memoranda are a part of the witness' testimony, and thus evidence, the whole discussion is misleading; while if it is meant to say that Courts are equally divided as to the propriety of the use of past recollection, this is an error: in general, the opinion fails to consider any of the usual distinctions of the subject, and is without weight); 1898, Stewart v. Morris, 32 C. Co., 80 Ia. 435, doubted); 1897, State v. Brady, 95 Ia. 410, 69 N. 1886, SMITH, C. J., in Bryan v. Moring, 94 N. C. 687: "The memorandum thus supported and identified becomes part of the testimony of the witness, just as if without it the witness had orally repeated the words from memory."

A few decisions declare that the writing is not "independent evidence" or "in itself evidence";[2] but this is to be construed as meaning merely — what no one could deny — that without being verified and adopted (ante, § 747) it is without standing. A few others expressly refuse to allow it to be "read in evidence" or "given in evidence." But these must be regarded as unsound in principle.

§ 755. Judicial Discretion in applying the Foregoing Rules. It must be conceded that the foregoing detailed rules under the general principle have been too reverently regarded as inflexible dogmas. They have now, in their technical development, overshot their purpose. That purpose was to secure the best available memory of the witness, while guarding against imposition by false use of purporting memoranda. But when the logical details of the general principle are made ends in themselves, they tend to become vain quibbles, having no relation to probative value.

The truth is that these two grand rules — for memoranda of Past and of Present Recollection — being the only rules of the Law of Evidence on the subject — have assumed a size which is out of all proportion to the real risks and defects of testimonial memory. Modern psychology [1] exhibits the memory processes as highly complex and varied; its vagaries and tendencies are so intricate and so obscure that no one or two rules of precaution can secure testimonial trustworthiness. A rigid veneration for these two groups of rules, and these only, as the dependable safeguards of the law, is pedantic, in view of their limited scope and of the extensive field left untouched by them. They are wise enough in themselves, as rules of thumb based on the usual situations presented at trials. But they are mere provisional crudities, in the light of the complex actual processes of memory.

Courts should cease to treat them as anything but provisional and crude aids to truth. The trial Court's discretion should be allowed to control. There should be liberal interpretation and liberal exemption. And no ruling of admission should ever be deemed an error worth noticing on appeal.

III. PRESENT RECOLLECTION REVIVED

§ 758. General Principle: Any Writing may be used to Stimulate and Revive a Recollection. Since the Narration or Communication should represent actual Recollection (post, § 766), it becomes necessary to forbid the use of various artificial written aids capable of misuse so as to put into the witness' mouth a story which is in effect fictitious and corresponds to no actual Recollection.[1] Under pretext of stimulating the witness' recollection, if an actual present recollection results, of the quality sufficient for testimony (ante, § 726), the process and the result are legitimate. But these expedients for stimulating recollection may be so misused that the witness puts before the Court what purports to be but is not in fact his recollection and knowledge. Such a result cannot be accepted as testimony; and it is to prevent this misuse of expedients legitimate enough in themselves that some restriction may be necessary:

1827, Mr. Jeremy Bentham, Rationale of Judicial Evidence, b. III, c. XI (Bowring's ed., vol. VI, p. 446): "If on the part of the witness the testimony be the product of the imagination, instead of the memory, — incorrectness is, in so far, the quality given to it. If, for want of such helps which on the particular occasion may happen to be necessary, recollection fail to bring to view any such real facts as with these helps might and would have been brought to view, — incompleteness in the mass of the evidence is the result. But, by the same suggestions by which, in case of veracity, memory alone would be assisted and fertilized, it may also happen that invention (which, where testimony is in question, is synonymous with mendacity) shall also be set to work, and rendered productive. To administer assistance to recollection, to veracity — to administer, not assistance, but obstruction, to invention, to mendacity, — in these we see two opposite, and, to a first view, irreconcilable, pursuits. How then to reconcile them? or, at any rate, to do what is possible to be done towards it? In this question may be seen a problem, the solution of which is no less conspicuous for its difficulty than for its importance. The first point to be considered is the natural opposition between the two ends. In the instance of any arrangement by which recollection is assisted, how natural, if not necessary and unavoidable, it is, that mendacious invention should receive assistance likewise? In the instance of any arrangement by which mendacious invention is obstructed, how natural, if not necessary, it is, that recollection should be subjected to interruption likewise?" [2]

If such a verification is lacking, the paper of course cannot be handed in or used: 1893, Flint's Estate, 100 Cal. 391, 399, 34 Pac. 863; 1914, Du Perow v. Groomes, 42 D. C. App. 287 (excluded because not used to refresh memory); 1896, Imhoff v. Richards, 48 Nebr. 590, 67 N. W. 483 (excluded because not offered as a part of any one's testimony).

§ 755. [1] See the materials collected in the present writer's "Principles of Judicial Proof", cited ante, § 725.

§ 758. [1] Compare the other rules directed to the same end, against other false aids than writing (post, §§ 769, 786).

The purpose being to allow the legitimate use of written aids, while preventing their misuse, it would seem that no hard-and-fast rules can be laid down for invariable application. That which is suspicious and reprehensible in one instance may be entirely trustworthy in the next. No unerring marks of impropriety can be named absolutely.

It follows, therefore, that any writing whatever is eligible for use, while, on the other hand, any writing whatever may, in the circumstances, become improper.[3] This has been well put in the following passage:

1835, Sir G. A. Lewin, Note to Lawes v. Reed, 2 Lew. Cr. C. 152: "Where the object is to revive in the mind of the witness the recollection of the facts of which he once had knowledge, it is difficult to understand why any means should be excepted to whereby that object may be obtained. Whether in any particular case the witness' memory has been refreshed by the document referred to, or he speaks from what the document tells him, is a question of fact open to observation, more or less according to the circumstances. If in truth the memory has been refreshed, and he is enabled in consequence to speak to facts with which he was once familiar, but which afterwards escaped him, it cannot signify, in effect, in what manner or by what means these facts were recalled to his recollection. Common experience tells every man that a very slight circumstance, and one not in point to the existing inquiry, will sometimes revive the history of a transaction made up of many circumstances. . . . Why, then, if a man may refresh his memory by such means out of court, should he be precluded from doing so when he is under examination in court?"

It is worth while, therefore, to note that none of the rules just examined for past recorded recollection have any bearing on the present subject. The confounding of the two has led to many misguided rulings.

§ 759. Writing not made by Witness himself. That the paper was not written by the witness himself is therefore no fault in it. The witness may or may not, in a given instance, with propriety make use of it; but the aid may equally be a legitimate one even though another person prepared the writing:

> 1810, ELLENBOROUGH, L. C. J., in Henry v. Lee, 2 Chitty 124: "If upon looking at any document he can so far refresh his memory as to recollect a circumstance, it is sufficient; and it makes no difference that the memorandum is not written by himself, for it is not the memorandum that is the evidence but the recollection of the witness."

This concluding expression of Lord Ellenborough's concisely states the principle, and has become a classic phrase in judicial quotation.[1] Occasionally, the paper has been required at least to have been written under the witness' direction, or to be known by him to be correct;[2] but this is generally due to a confusion of this subject with the subject of past recollection (ante, § 748).

App. 308; we do not find this statement of the learned author and of the Court of Appeals to be borne out either by the cases which he cites to support it, or by the great weight of the authorities which we have examined"; the fact

But, though the witness' authorship is not essential to the use of the paper, it is obvious that papers prepared by others may, under circumstances specially dangerous, be excluded from use.[3] This was the case in one of the oldest precedents:

1753, L. C. HARDWICKE, in Motion of Noel, quoted in 3 T. R. 752 (the witness referred frequently to six sheets transcribed by her from a digest by her solicitor of notes furnished by her; the witness had made alterations in his manuscript, but its use was forbidden): "Whether there has been any tampering or not I know not; but I know there has been a great mistake. . . . Should the Court connive at such proceedings as these, depositions would really be no better than affidavits. . . . I might as well let the attorney draw an affidavit for her and use that instead of a deposition."

§ 760. Writing not Original, but a Copy. That the paper is a copy, not an original, is also no essential fault. The only question is whether in fact it is genuinely calculated to revive the witness' recollection; and for this purpose a copy may conceivably be entirely satisfactory.[1] The radical difference of is, however, that no authorities are cited in the Greenleaf passage in support of the above phrased statement; the passage reads: "That the paper was not written by the witness himself is no objection", and then a Note 1 cites twenty-one authorities in support of that statement; these authorities do support it, except that one is not verifiable, being miscited by volume or page, and is therefore out of question, and one is capable of being misunderstood; then the text continues, "and it is therefore incorrect (confusing this with the preceding subject) to require that the paper be one written by the witness or under his direction or known by him to be correct", and then a Note 2 cites four authorities as examples of a requirement indeed so made, but incorrectly so made; it is likely that a hasty perusal imagined that these authorities were cited as supporting the doctrine approved in the text); Mont. Rev. principle between this use and that of a copied record of past recollection (ante, § 749) is plain; there is here no necessity of accounting for the original in any way:

1843, SHIELDS, J., in Dunlop v. Berry, 5 Ill. 327 (the witness refreshed his memory as to the contents of a return by looking at the copy of it in the declaration): "It was competent for him to use the declaration or any other paper for the purpose of refreshing his memory upon the subject."

1852, JEWETT, J., in Huff v. Bennet, 6 N. Y. 337 (the witness used a newspaper report): "It is well settled that he is permitted to assist his memory by the use of any written instrument; and it is not necessary that such writing should have been made by himself, or that it should be an original writing, providing after inspecting it he can speak to the facts from his own recollection."

1877, COLE, J., in Folsom v. Log-driving Co., 41 Wis. 602 (the witness, testifying to the amount of damage, used a copy made recently by K. from a copy of original contemporary memoranda; the other papers having become defaced): "This kind of evidence is open to more or less suspicion, because . . . it may lead him to suppose he recalls facts when he really does not. But this affects the credibility rather than the competency of the testimony."

§ 761. Writing not made at the Time of the Event; Depositions and Former Testimony. That the paper was not drawn up about the time of the events is not a fault. The recollection may be equally refreshed by a recent note as by some contemporaneous record. It might, in fact, be argued that there was less danger of reliance upon the record itself and more probability of actual refreshment where the paper was one confessedly having no value as a contemporaneous record of past recollection.

There is adequate authority for the result thus required by principle.[1] Yet the greater number of decisions, and most of the 'obiter dicta', announce as a requirement that the memorandum used must have been made "contemporaneously or nearly so" with the events, "at or near the time," with the same varying phrases used in the rule for Past Recollection (ante, § 745). These authorities fall into two groups. (1) A very few declare on principle that no real revival of recollection can be had from a paper not made at the time.[2] Their reason seems amply discredited by every-day experience. (2) The greater number simply adopt the rule established for Past Recollection (ante, § 745), without observing the radical difference between the purposes of the two sorts of papers.[3] The confusing use of the phrase "refreshing the memory", for both classes of recollection, has contributed to this result; yet it is singular that the discrimination between the two should have been clearly perceived in the topics of the two preceding sections, and not in the present instance.[3]

The instance which is at once the plainest test of principle and the most common in practice is that of a deposition or report of prior testimony. Here the document was certainly not made at or near the time of the events observed; but orthodox practice has always conceded that the witness may refer to it to refresh his memory, either on direct examination or on cross-examination.[4] The rulings in which this has been refused have apparently been influenced more or less by the apprehension that thereby the counsel, when a cross-examiner, might evade the rule (post, § 1018) which forbids the witness' prior contradictory statements to be introduced as independent testimony, or that the counsel on a direct examination might evade the rule (post, § 902) against impeaching one's own witness by his contradictory statements.[5] But neither of these rules in themselves interpose any obstacle. If an evasion of them is really being attempted, with the refreshment of recollection as a mere pretext, then the judge may interpose. But it is a singular proposal to forbid a legitimate proceeding by a uniform rule, merely because of a possible evasion, which can be dealt with adequately whenever it is attempted.

§ 762. Writing must be Shown to the Opponent, on Demand, for Inspection and Cross-Examination; Memoranda used before Trial. On a general principle (post, § 1861), having in view the risk of imposition and false aids, against which the opponent is entitled to the means of protection, the writing must be shown to him on request. Furthermore, as by this opportunity of inspection the opponent is guarded against imposition clearly apparent, so by cross-examination based on the paper he may further detect circumstances not appearing on the surface, and may expose all that detracts from the weight of testimony:[1]

C. 377 (a witness' memory cannot be refreshed by re-stating his former oral testimony).

The Federal Supreme Court has unfortunately, in Putnam v. U. S. 687, 16 Sup. 923 (1896), complicated a very simple question and added the weight of its authority to the side that is wrong both in history and in principle, by ruling that this refreshment by such a reference to former testimony cannot be made, since the reference is based on a non-contemporaneous record. It ought to have been obvious that even if there were a rule against refreshing by non-contemporaneous papers, that rule could not apply where the refreshment was by oral questions of the counsel, and not by the witness' use of a paper. But the opinion in Putnam v. U. S. also proceeds on a radical misunderstanding of Melhuish v. Collier, post, § 902 (impeachment of one's own witness).

1827, R. v. Ramsden, 2 C. & P. 603; the witness gave a date as six months before; when the counsel put a paper in his hand, he then named the date as nine months before; the opposing counsel demanded to see it; Witness' counsel: "I submit my friend has no right to see it, unless he will read it in evidence." TENTERDEN, L. C. J.: "You put the paper into the witness' hands to refresh his memory. It is very usual for the opposite counsel to see it and examine upon it, and I think he has a right to see it."

1854, KINDERSLEY, V. C., in Lord v. Colvin, 2 Drewr. 205: "If a paper is put into the hands of a witness to refresh his memory, if after that nothing comes of it, if nothing more be done, then the other party has no right to look at it. But if anything further is done, if the witness is asked and answers questions about the document or the facts referred to in it, then at law the party on the other side has the right to see the document. . . . If I were to follow my own opinion as to what would be just and right, I should say every document whatever ought to be produced; . . . every document produced should, I think, be shown to both sides."

1876, COOLEY, C. J., in Duncan v. Seely, 34 Mich. 369: "The other party had a right to know what the memorandum was on which he relied, and whether it [2] had any legitimate tendency to bring the fact in controversy to mind. It would be a dangerous doctrine which would permit a witness to testify from secret memorandum in the way which was permitted here. . . . The defendant was entitled to see it at the time in order to test the candor and integrity of the witness."

Clear as the justice of this would seem to be, there are Courts which deny it, and others which seem to.[3] They are led away, in most instances, by perceiving the general distinction between a record of past recollection and a paper reviving present recollection, and by concluding that, because the rule about producing originals applies to the former (ante, § 749) but not to the latter (ante, § 760), therefore it is unnecessary to produce and show the paper to the opponent. These decisions, however, are in a small minority, and have no principle to support them. Just how much of the document may be examined by the opponent (for example, when it is a book of accounts) depends much on the circumstances of each case;[4] in general, the parts relative to the subject of testimony, not merely the parts used by the witness, may be seen.

The rule should apply, moreover, to a memorandum consulted for refreshment before trial and not brought by the witness into court; for, though there is no objection to a memory being thus stimulated, yet the risk of imposition and the need of safeguard is just as great.[5] It is simple and feasible enough for the Court to require that the paper be sent for and exhibited before the end of the trial.

§ 763. Writing used to Revive Recollection is not part of Testimony; yet the Jury may see it, to determine the Propriety of its Use. It follows from the nature of the purpose for which the paper is used (ante, § 758) that it is in no strict sense testimony. In this respect it differs from a record of past recollection, which is adopted by the witness as the embodiment of his testimony and, as thus adopted, becomes his present evidence and is presentable to the jury (ante, § 754). Nevertheless, though the witness' party may not present it as evidence, the same reason of precaution which allows the opponent to examine it (ante, § 762) allows the opponent to call the jury's attention to its features, and also allows the jurymen, if they please, to examine it for the same end. In short, the opponent, but not the offering party, has a right to have the jury see it:

1810, ELLENBOROUGH, L. C. J., in Henry v. Lee, 2 Chitty 124: "It is not the memorandum that is the evidence, but the recollection of the witness."

1833, GURNEY, B., in Gregory v. Tavernor, 6 C. & P. 281: "The memorandum itself is not evidence, and particular entries only are used by the witness to refresh his memory. . . . The defendant's counsel may cross-examine on the entries already referred to, and the jury may also see those entries if they wish to do so."

1882, ENDICOTT, J., in Com. v. Jeffs, 132 Mass. 5: "The opposite party is entitled to cross-examine the witness in regard to it; and it may be shown to the jury, not for the purpose of establishing the facts therein contained, but for the purpose of showing that it could not properly refresh the memory of the witness."

That the offering party has not the right to treat it as evidence, by reading it or showing it or handing it to the jury, is well established.[1] That the opponent may do this, or that the jury may of its own motion demand it, is equally conceded.[2]

§ 764. Cross-examiner's Use of Writing to Revive Recollection. Where the effort to refresh the witness' memory comes originally from the cross-examining party, several distinct questions may arise.

(1) Must the witness accede to the request and see if his memory is refreshed by the paper handed him? It seems entirely proper to require him, in the trial judge's discretion, to do this.[1]

(2) When this is done, the paper so used must in fairness be read aloud or shown to the jury.[2]

(3) A paper thus desired to be used will usually be one containing a prior inconsistent statement of the witness; in this case, the rules will apply that the inconsistent statement is not equivalent to independent testimony (post, § 1018), and that the paper containing it must (in the jurisdictions following The Queen's Case) first be shown to the witness before asking him upon its contents (post, § 1259).

(4) The propriety of thus refreshing a hostile witness' recollection by his deposition or former testimony, not being a contemporaneous paper, has already been noticed (ante, § 761).

§ 765. Judicial Discretion in applying the Foregoing Rules. The foregoing rules should not be treated as dogmas of inherent efficiency. They are merely crude rules-of-thumb, worthy of adoption for the general purpose. What is said in § 755, ante, as to over-strict enforcement of the other rules, applies equally to these. The trial Court's discretion should control.

In Bigelow v. Hall, 91 N. Y. 145 (1883), in an obscure opinion, it was ruled that the paper might be read out, yet not treated as evidence.

In Pease Piano Co. v. Cameron, 56 Nebr. 561, 76 N. W. 1053 (1898), the Court took the queer course of compelling books of accounts to be put in and then of refusing to let the witness refresh his memory from them because he would be giving "secondary evidence of the contents of the books."

SUB-TITLE I (continued): TESTIMONIAL QUALIFICATIONS

TOPIC VI: TESTIMONIAL NARRATION OR COMMUNICATION

CHAPTER XXVII.

§ 766. General Principle. The third element forming an essential part of all testimony (ante, § 478) is the process of laying before the tribunal the witness' results of his Observation (ante, § 650) and his Recollection (ante, § 725), i.e. the process of Narration or Communication. In this element, as in the other two, there are many opportunities for defects fatal to testimonial trustworthiness. As with the elements of Observation and of Recollection, so here also, experience has shown that certain dangers are to be looked for, and that certain restrictions should be imposed in order to prevent them. What these dangers and defects are depends upon the specific virtue which this element of Narration or Communication ought to possess.

Its office is to make intelligible to the tribunal the knowledge and recollection of the witness, whatever that may amount to, affirmative or negative, useful or trivial. Its prime and essential virtue, then, consists in correctly reproducing and intelligibly expressing the actual and sincere Recollection.[1] We may assume that the witness' Recollection fairly represents and corresponds to his Observation (ante, § 725); if, then, his Narration or Communication fairly represents and corresponds to his Recollection, and is intelligible by the tribunal, the indispensable elements of testimonal value are complete, and the statement presented to the tribunal is testimonially relevant. Most of the usual defects occur in the former respect, i.e. an absence, actual or probable, of this correspondence between the witness' uttered statement and his conscious recollection which he ought to be stating. In the other respect, i.e. intelligibility to the tribunal of the witness' utterance, comparatively few questions of law arise.[2]

It is, however, practically not feasible to examine the various problems directly with reference to the above two canons to be fulfilled. To satisfy them is always the underlying purpose of the specific rules. But these rules are more easily grouped according to the superficial features with which they are associated. For the purpose of grouping these various rules, it may be remembered that the simplest form of testimonial statement (from which others may be conceived of as deviations) is an (1) uninterrupted narrative (2) expressed in words (3) uttered orally (4) and intelligible directly by the tribunal. In any one of these features, there may be a variation from this simple and natural type; the inquiry therefore concerns the rules which become necessary when there is such a variance in one or another of the four respects.

That is to say, testimony may be:

§ 766. [1] 1824, Starkie, Evidence, 79 ("To render the communication of facts perfect, the witnesses must be both able and willing to speak or to write the truth. It is necessary that they should possess . . . in the second place, the power and the inclination to transmit them [the facts] faithfully").

[2] The rules of Evidence on this subject are not many. But they are only crude in comparison to the complex considerations which psychologically lurk beneath the process of Communication. From the point of view of logic and psychology as applicable to argument before the jury (not the rules of Admissibility) see the materials collected in the present author's "Principles of Judicial Proof, as given by Logic, Psychology, and General Experience, and illustrated in Judicial Trials" (1913), §§ 244–276.

(1) furnished upon systematic interrogations, and not as a continuous utterance; or

(2) it may be non-verbal, i.e. expressed dramatically, in conduct or gestures; or

(3) it may be furnished in writing, not orally; or, finally,

(4) it may require interpretation, before it becomes intelligible to the tribunal. Various rules will arise according as the deviation lies in one or another of these four features; and these rules may now be taken up under those four heads.

A. INTERROGATED TESTIMONY

§ 767. Continuous Narration without Questions. Deposition Interrogatories. May not the witness narrate his knowledge in continuous speech and without the interruption of questions?

It is obvious that this method, on the one hand, has often the advantage of preserving continuity and clearness of thought for the witness himself and of saving time for all parties concerned.

1880. Mr. Richard Harris, Hints on Advocacy (Amer. ed. 1892, p. 29): "One of the most important branches of advocacy is the examination of a witness in chief. . . . One fact should be remembered to start with, and it is this: the witness whom he has to examine has probably a plain, straightforward story to tell, and that upon the telling it depends the belief or disbelief of the jury, and their consequent verdict. If it were to be told amid a social circle of friends, it would be narrated with more or less circumlocution and considerable exactness. But all the facts would come out; and that is the first thing to insure, if the case be, as I must all along assume it to be, an honest one. I have often known half a story told, and that the worst half, too, the rest having to be got out by the leader in reëxamination if he have the opportunity. If the story were being told as I have suggested, in private, all the company would understand it, and if the narrator were known as a man of truth, all would believe him. It would require no advocate to elicit the facts or to confuse the dates; the events would flow pretty much in their natural order. Now change the audience; let the same man attempt to tell the same story in a court of justice. His first feeling is that he must not tell it in his own way. He is going to be examined upon it; he is to have it dragged out of him piecemeal, disjointedly, by a series of questions — in fact, he is to be interrupted at every point in a worse manner than if everybody in the room, one after another, had questioned him about what he was going to tell, instead of waiting till he had told it. It is not unlike a post mortem; only the witness is alive, and keenly sensitive to the painful operation. He knows that every word will be disputed, if not flatly contradicted. He has never had his veracity questioned, perhaps, but now it is very likely to be suggested that he is committing rank perjury. . . .

"Now the best thing the advocate can do under these circumstances is to remember, that the witness has something to tell, and that but for him, the advocate, would probably tell it very well, 'in his own way.' The fewer interruptions, therefore, the better; and the fewer questions, the less questions will be needed. Watching should be the chief work; specially to see that the story be not confused with extraneous and irrelevant matter."

1906, Mr. G. F. Arnold, Psychology of Legal Evidence, 105: "It has no doubt been frequently noticed that it is easier to recall events in the order in which they occurred, and that witnesses, if left to themselves, habitually narrate occurrences in chronological order. It has always struck the writer that the method usually adopted by public prosecutors of asking questions, though it may be useful in excluding irrelevant matter, is certainly calculated to hinder memory."

1910, Mr. G. M. Whipple, Manual of Mental and Physical Tests, p. 404: "Dependence on form of Report. All authorities agree that the use of the interrogatory, whether the complete or incomplete form, increases the range and decreases the accuracy of the report. Thus, in comparison with the narrative, the range of the interrogatory may be 50 per cent greater, while the inaccuracy (of the incomplete interrogatory) may be as much as 550 per cent greater. In general terms we may say that about one tenth of the narrative is inexact, but about one quarter of the interrogatory."[1]

On the other hand, continuous narration has the disadvantage of risking the witness' interjection of irrelevant and inadmissible matter (chiefly hearsay) without any opportunity for the opponent to know beforehand in time to object and to prevent it. The latter reason has prevailed, increasingly during the past century in the United States; so that the general if not the universal practice is for the witness to narrate, on the direct examination, only by giving answers to questions framed by counsel.

This practice is due largely to the increase of technicality in rulings of inadmissibility on the pettiest details of testimony. There is in the minds of courts and practitioners an obsession that the natural way of giving testimony is the dangerous way. The practice now goes to absurd excesses. A healthy view of the subject would banish the obsession, and would restore the natural method as the usual one, thus obtaining more reliable testimony and a notable economy of time in trials.

In point of law, it would seem that, so far as any rule of evidence is concerned, the discretion of the trial Court should be left to direct the proper mode for each witness:[2]

1682, Lord Grey's Trial, 9 How. St. Tr. 127, 176; Lady Henrietta Berkeley, apparently because of the hectoring of coarse tyrannical parents, had run away from home and hidden herself and secretly married a Mr. Turner; and the father preferred an indictment for her seduction and debauchery against Lord Grey, his son-in-law and her brother-in-law, who had concerned himself on her behalf; Lady Henrietta, whose character her mother had already blackened, took the stand for the defendant, and testified that she had left home alone and voluntarily, and was then told by the Court to sit down. L. Henrietta: "Will you not give me leave to tell the reason why I left my father's house?" Counsel for defendant: "We do not think fit to ask her any such question; she acquits us and that is enough." L. Henrietta: "But I desire to tell it myself; . . . will you not give me leave to speak for myself?" Mr. J. DOLBEN: "My lord, let her speak what she has a mind to the jury are gentlemen of discretion enough to regard it no more than they ought."

§ 767. [1] Compare the other passages quoted in the present author's "Principles of Judicial Proof", §§ 244–276, cited ante, § 766. So far as the mode of narration is a question of tact and judgment for the examining counsel, it lies without the present purview.

A. 380, 51 Fed. 562 (trial Court's discretion controls); 1896, Thresher v. Bank, 68 Conn. 201, 36 Atl. 38 (interrogation not needed where the party-witness is his own counsel; in this case, he was also a member of the bar); 1905, Horton v. State, 123 Ga. 145, 51 S. W. 675; 1909, Pumphrey v. State, 84 Nebr. 636, 122 N. W. 19 (trial Court's discretion).

Mr. J. JONES: "You are, madam, to answer only such questions as are asked you pertinent to the issue that the jury are to try; and if the counsel will ask you no questions, you are not to tell any story of yourself."

1835, Mr. Joseph Chitty, Practice of the Law, III, 894: "It is certainly the practice, when the time and place of the scene of action have once been fixed, to desire the witness to give his own account of the matter, directing him, when not a professional person, to omit as he proceeds any account of what he has only heard from others and not seen or heard himself, and which he is too apt to suppose is quite as material as that which he himself has seen. . . . If his attention be first drawn to the transaction by asking him when and where it happened, and he be told to describe it from the beginning, he will generally proceed in his own way to detail all the facts in the due order of time. In each particular case, however, it is in the discretion of the Court to regulate the mode in which a witness in chief shall be examined, in order best to answer a purpose of justice; and there is no fixed rule which binds counsel to a particular mode of examining him."

In a deposition it has always been customary to elicit the testimony by questions, and this is usually prescribed in the statutes authorizing the taking of depositions.[3] Where the deposition is taken by commission, the commissioner conducting the examination, and the parties' attorneys not being present, it is obvious that specific interrogatories, written out beforehand, are indispensable, because otherwise the opponent could not know accurately upon what facts he should cross-examine, and his cross-examination, being necessarily prepared before the despatch of the commission, would otherwise be perhaps futile. The necessity for specific interrogatories thus rests here on the right of adequate cross-examination and the rules for securing it (post, § 1392).

§ 768. Direct and Cross Examination, distinguished. When a witness' testimony is obtained by requiring answers after questions, instead of by permitting a continuous uninterrupted narrative, certain special opportunities for abuse may arise from adopting the former method of extraction. Some of these opportunities are peculiar to the direct examination (by the party calling the witness) and some to the cross-examination (by the opponent). What is to be noted at the outset is that we are concerned here only with the rules of law which aim to avoid the dangers of error that arise from the putting of questions, as contrasted with the process of extraction without questions.

There are several other principles which affect the use of both direct and cross-examination, but they have no concern with the present inquiry, namely, the defects and dangers peculiar to an interrogational method. These distinct principles are elsewhere considered in their proper place, and are as follows:

(a) The order of direct and cross-examination is a matter of the Order of Evidence in general (dealt with post, §§ 1882 ff.);

[3] E.g., Cal. C. C. P. 1872, § 2006 ("Depositions must be taken in the form of question and answer"). These statutes may be found from the citations collected post, §§ 1380 ff.

In a deposition taken by oral interrogatories, the witness may testify in narrative form; 1868, Pralus v. Pacific G. & S. M. Co., 35 Cal. 30.

(b) A cross-examination, being that of a hostile party, in marked contrast to the direct examination of the party calling the witness, has a special object and value; the art of cross-examination (post, § 1368) depends upon this object; the indispensable advantages of cross-examination mak. it a matter of absolute right, and the lack of cross-examination may be ground for excluding the testimony, under the Hearsay rule (dealt with post, §§ 1367–1393);

(c) The kind of facts that may be inquired into on cross-examination, though forbidden to be proved otherwise by the opponent, involves the admissibility of certain kinds of evidence, in particular, of character-evidence (dealt with post, §§ 878, 946, 977 ff.);

(d) One's own witness may not be impeached, and hence the inquiry may arise whether by cross-examining a witness he is made one's own so as to prevent impeachment (dealt with post, §§ 911–918).

All these are distinct principles, and have no concern with the present question, namely, the restrictions desirable for an interrogational system 'per se.'

In this inquiry, moreover, only rules of law are here to be examined. The rules and suggestions of tact and skill, which serve to guide the judgment of the examiner in obtaining the desired information, are a subject of the greatest consequence, and their study and practice is that of a fascinating pursuit, — involving as it does one of the highest forms of dialectic art, which has been chronicled in the experience of the most celebrated forensic leaders for two thousand years or more.[1] But the rules of law, and not the art of applying them, must here set the limits of investigation.

§ 769. Leading Questions; (1) General Principle. On the direct examination, i.e. by the counsel of the party in whose favor the witness is called, the most important peculiarity of the interrogational system is that it may be misused to supply a false memory for the witness, — that is, to suggest desired answers not in truth based upon a real recollection. The problem is to discriminate between the forms of questions which will too probably have that effect and those which will not. Questions may legitimately suggest to the witness the topic of the answer; they may be necessary for this purpose where the witness is not aware of the next answering topic to be testified about, or where he is aware of it but its terms remain dormant in his memory until by the mention of some detail the associated details are revived and independently remembered. Questions, on the other hand, which so suggest the specific tenor of the reply as desired by counsel that such a reply is likely to be given irrespective of an actual memory, are illegitimate.

§ 768. [1] In the following authors will be found some of the most celebrated and most useful passages of advice upon the proper method of examining witnesses on the stand: Quintilian, De Institutione Oratoria, lib. V, c. VII; 1835, Joseph Chitty, General Practice (or, Practice of the Law), III, 844; David Paul Brown, Golden Rules (reprinted in Chamberlayne's Best on Evidence (1893), Appendix); 1852, Edward Cox, The Advocate, cc. 32–35; 1885, John C. Reed, Conduct of a Lawsuit, cc. 9–11 (this, it may be suggested, is the most sensible and systematic modern book of its kind, and should be read and re-read by every aspiring young lawyer); 1892, Richard Harris, Hints on Advocacy, 9th ed., cc. 2–7, 12; 1894, Byron K. and W. F. Elliott, General Practice, cc. 23–27; 1900, Joseph F. Daly, Preparation for Trial (in "The Brief", vol. III, pp. 1 ff.); 1903, Francis Wellman, The Art of Cross-Examination; and other passages quoted in the present author's "Principles of Judicial Proof, etc." (1913), §§ 244–276.

The essential notion, then, of an improper (commonly called a leading [1]) question is that of a question which suggests the specific answer desired. It will be seen that a collusive or conscious intention of the witness to answer as desired is here not a necessary assumption. That is a frequent danger, but not the only one; for the known principles of human nature tell us that a witness may also unconsciously accept the suggestion of a question. It is therefore not necessary to attribute a corrupt intention either to witness or to counsel; since the danger has larger aspects than that.[2]

The essential test of a leading question as an improperly suggestive one is plainly expounded in the following passages:

1813, ELLENBOROUGH, L. C. J., in 25 Hans, Parl. Deb. 207: "I have always understood, after some little experience, that the meaning of a leading question was this, and this only: That the judge restrains an advocate who produces a witness on one particular side of a question, and who may be supposed to have a leaning to that side of the question, from putting such interrogatories as may operate as an instruction to that witness how he is to reply to favor the party for whom he is adduced."

1835, Mr. Joseph Chitty, Practice of the Law, III, 892: "The assigned reason in support of the rule is that a witness usually has a strong feeling in favor of the party who has subpœnaed him, and is disposed to swear anything that he thinks will serve that party, and that a leading question in effect suggests to the witness the answer that he is desired to give and invites misrepresentation. This reason imputes to the counsel an unworthy motive, and to every witness a supposition that he would be guilty of perjury; but perhaps the better and more comprehensive reason is that many witnesses, either from complaisance or indolence, are too much disposed to assent to the proposition of the counsel and answer as he may suggest, instead of reflecting and answering after an exertion of their own memory."

1840, MCLEAN, J., in U. S. v. Dickinson, 2 McLean 331: "A question shall not be so propounded to a witness as to indicate the answer desired."

1860, FOWLER, J., in Page v. Parker, 40 N. H. 63: "A question is leading which instructs the witness how to answer on material points, or puts into his mouth words to be echoed back, as was here done, or plainly suggests the answer which the party wishes to get from him."

1897, LIDDON, J., in Coogler v. Rhodes, 38 Fla. 240, 21 So. 109: "The proper signification of the expression is a suggestive question, — one which suggests or puts the desired answer into the mouth of the witness."

1860, Chief Justice APPLETON, Evidence, 227: "The end proposed in extracting testimony is the obtaining the actual recollection of the witness, not the allegations of another person suggested to and adopted by the witness and falsely delivered as his. . . . The real danger is that of collusion between the witness interrogated and the counsel interrogating, that the counsel will deliberately imply or suggest false facts with the expectation on his part and with an understanding on the part of the witness that he will assent to the truth of the false facts thus suggested."

§ 769. [1] This term goes far back in our annals: 1634, Coke, 4th Inst. 279 (interrogatories in depositions); 1684, Rosewell's Trial, 10 How. St. Tr. 147, 190.

1904, Sir HENRY HAWKINS, Baron BRAMPTON, Reminiscences, I, 30: "I went to the Old Bailey, a den of infamy in those times not conceivable now, and I verily believe that no future time will produce its like — at least, I hope not. . . . In all cases of gravity three judges sat together. . . . They sat till five o'clock right through, and then went to a sumptuous dinner provided by the Lord Mayor and Aldermen. They drank everybody's health but their own, thoroughly relieved their minds from the horrors of the court, and, having indulged in much festive wit, sometimes at the alderman's expense, and often at their own, returned into court in solemn procession, their gravity undisturbed by anything that had previously taken place, and looking the picture of contentment and virtue. Another dinner was provided by the Sheriffs. . . . The first thing that struck me in the after-dinner trials was the extreme rapidity with which the proceedings were conducted. As judges and counsel were exhilarated, the business was proportionately accelerated. But of all the men I had the pleasure of meeting on these occasions, the one who gave me the best idea of rapidity in an after-dinner case was Muirhouse. Let me illustrate it by a trial which I heard: Jones was the name of the prisoner. His offence was that of picking pockets, entailing of course, a punishment corresponding in severity with the barbarity of the times. It was not a plea of 'Guilty', when, perhaps, a little more inquiry might have been necessary; it was a case in which the prisoner solemnly declared he was 'Not Guilty', and therefore had a right to be tried. The accused having 'held up his hand', and the jury having solemnly sworn to hearken to the evidence, and 'to well and truly try, and true deliverance make', etc., the witness for the prosecution climbs into the box, which was like a pulpit, and before he has time to look round and see where the voice comes from, he is examined as follows by the prosecuting counsel:

"'I think you were walking up Ludgate Hill on Thursday 25th, about half-past two in the afternoon and suddenly felt a tug at your pocket and missed your handkerchief, which the constable now produces. Is that it?' 'Yes, sir.' 'I suppose you have nothing to ask him?' says the judge. 'Next witness.' Constable stands up. 'Were you following the prosecutor on the occasion when he was robbed on Ludgate Hill, and did you see the prisoner put his hand into the prosecutor's pocket and take this handkerchief out of it?' 'Yes, sir.' Judge to prisoner: 'Nothing to say, I suppose?' Then to the jury: 'Gentlemen, I suppose you have no doubt? I have none.' Jury: 'Guilty, my lord', as though to oblige his lordship. Judge to prisoner: 'Jones, we have met before — we shall not meet again for some time — seven years' transportation — next case.' Time: two minutes, fifty-three seconds.

"Perhaps this case was a high example of expedition, because it was not always that a learned counsel could put his questions so neatly; but it may be taken that these after-dinner trials did not occupy on the average more than four minutes each. — Of course, in those days there were judges of the utmost strictness as there are now, who insisted that the rules of evidence should be rigidly adhered to."

This being the broad nature of the evil to be avoided, and the end to be secured, there can be no invariable test for the impropriety, merely so far as the form is concerned. Any question may be or may not be suggestive. The form is immaterial.[3]

§ 770. Same: Discretion of the Trial Court. It follows, from the broad and flexible character of the controlling principle, that its application must rest largely, if not entirely, in the hands of the trial Court. So much depends on the circumstances of each case, the demeanor of each witness, and the tenor of the preceding questions, that it would be unwise, if not impossible, to attempt in an appellate tribunal to consider each instance adequately. Furthermore, the harm in a single instance is inconsiderable and more or less speculative, and the counsel's repetition of an impropriety can be so easily controlled by the trial Court, that no favor is shown in the appellate tribunals to objections based merely on the form of the question.[1]

[3] 1863, Steer v. Little, 44 N. H. 616. ("There is no form of question which may not be leading, the Court being constantly compelled to look beyond the form to the substance and effect of the inquiry"); 1878, Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Bair, 87 Pa. 127.

From the beginning, and continuously, it has been declared that the application of the principle is to be left to the discretion of the trial Court.[2] In

The entire regulation of the procedure, furthermore, is attended by no fixed rules. For example, when an improperly suggestive question has been put but ruled out, it may be allowed to be phrased in proper form and put again,[3] although presumably the harm has been irretrievably done; or, the witness in such a case may be prevented from answering at all on the subject of the question.[4] The proper consequence to be applied is peculiarly a matter for the trial Court's discretion.[5]

Nevertheless, there are certain canons of guidance which may be formulated for the trial Court as the general foundation for its discretionary rulings. They are none the less rules of law, even though their application may not be the subject of an appeal. They are of two sorts, answering the two questions, (a) When must questions be forbidden because of the danger of improper suggestion? and (b) When, though such danger exists, may the questions nevertheless be permitted by way of exception? This distinction is sometimes ignored; but it is a real one. When it is said, for example, that a hostile witness may be asked a leading question, this form of stating the rule is erroneous, because the determination really is that there is no danger of false suggestion, i.e. that the question is not leading at all. On the other hand, when a witness' memory is exhausted and he is therefore allowed to be led, the leading question is allowed, but by way of exception. There is a distinction, then, between holding a question to be allowable because it is not suggestive and holding it to be allowable though it is suggestive.

§ 771. Same: (2) Kinds of Leading Questions; Assuming a Controverted Fact. A question which in part assumes the truth of a controverted fact, and inserts the assumption as a part of a question on another fact, may lead a witness to reply without taking care to specify that his answer is based on that assumption, and may thus commit him to an assertion of the assumed fact, though in fact he may not desire or be able to do so. This is obviously a danger to be prevented:[1]

1863, BELL, C. J., in Steer v. Little, 44 N. H. 616: "[A question is leading] where the question assumes any fact which is in controversy, so that the answer may really or apparently admit that fact. Such are the forked questions habitually put by some counsel if unchecked; as, What was the plaintiff doing when the defendant struck him? the controversy being whether the defendant did strike. A dull or a forward witness may answer the first part of the question and neglect the last."

1890, BECKLEY, C. J., in Traveler's Ins. Co. v. Sheppard, 85 Ga. 751, 794 (the issue being whether the insured was really deceased or had fradulently pretended to be drowned, questions of the following sort were held improper: 'State what was the nature of the current at the point where Sheppard fell in'): "This sort of assumption is one of the most pernicious forms in which the vice of leading questions can make its appearance, its tendency being to induce the witness to adopt the theory of the facts propounded by the examiner, and shape his testimony in a way to lend support to that theory. Even an honest and well-meaning witness may sometimes be drawn by this device into coloring the letter if not the spirit of his evidence more highly than the exact truth, so far as his knowledge of it extends, would warrant."

§ 772. Same: Calling for Answer 'Yes' or 'No'; Alternative Questions. (1) A question admitting of being answered by a simple 'yes' or 'no' is regarded as generally a leading and improper one.[1] Nevertheless, so rigid a rule is unsound. Obviously such a question depends for its suggestion more in the tone of voice than in the form of words. The particle 'not' (as in, "Did you not say that you refused the offer?") does indeed convey in itself the suggestion that an affirmative answer is desired; but the opposite form ("Did you say that you refused the offer?") by no means betrays in form such a suggestion, and depends almost wholly upon the intonation for suggestion;[2] in other words, it may or may not be leading. This is peculiarly a case for the principle (ante, § 770) that the trial Court's determination controls:[3]

[2] In Latin, on the contrary, the particles 'nonne' and 'an' were both distinctively suggestive. An amusing illustration of the suggestive uses to which such questions in Latin could be put is related by Lord Brougham (12 Law Rev. 114, cited by the present writer in a note in 1 Harv. Law Rev. 297): "When I was attending lectures on the civil law in Edinburgh, they were all in Latin. A set of Latin questions were proposed after the lecture to the students. Very difficult indeed, some of them might be to answer, if a proper answer were required; but all we had to do was, if the question commenced with 'nonne', we said 'etiam', and if with 'an', we replied 'non.'"

[3] 1916, DeWitt v. Skinner, 8th C. C. A., 232 Fed. 443; 1920, Audibert v. Michaud, 119 Me. 295, 111 Atl. 305 (quoted supra); 1913, Ganow v. Ashton, 32 S. D. 458, 143 N. W. 383 (approving the above rule).

1920, CORNISH, C. J., in Audibert v. Michaud, 119 Me. 295, 111 Atl. 305: "A question is not necessarily leading because it can be answered by 'yes' or 'no.' The presiding justice, who has an unprejudiced view of the entire situation, is allowed a wide discretion in this respect. The legitimate object of all examination of witnesses is the eliciting of the truth; and the danger which arises from so-called leading questions is not that the truth may thereby be extracted in an untechnical manner, but that the untrue may be stated by a witness, who is either indifferent to his oath or overzealous in the cause and eager to adopt any suggestion made by the attorney although not in accordance with the fact. It is not the mere leading, but the leading into temptation, that is to be deprecated and avoided."

(2) The alternative form of question ("State whether or not you said that you refused", "Did you or did you not refuse?") is free from this defect of form, because both affirmative and negative answers are presented for the witness' choice. Nevertheless, such a question may become leading, in so far as it rehearses lengthy details which the witness might not otherwise have mentioned, and thus supplies him with full suggestions which he incorporates without any effort by the simple answer, "I did," or "I did not." Accordingly, the sound view is that such a question may or may not be improper, according to the amount of palpably suggestive detail which it embodies:

1891, GAINES, J., in Lott v. King, 79 Tex. 292, 299, 15 S. W. 231 (the question being 'state whether or not you ever sold and conveyed the headright certificate of John B. Bulrese for one league and one labor of land to said Barnes Parker'): "It does not properly admit of an answer 'yes' or 'no.' . . . Whether a question in that or a similar form be leading or not depends upon the determination of the inquiry whether it suggests any particular answer; and we think questions in that form which had been held leading are not such as inquire into a single fact, but such as enable the witness to state in two words, such as 'he did' or 'he did not' a series or group of facts. . . . As to the question now under consideration, we think it would puzzle the astutest lawyer who is uninformed as to the issues in the case to determine from the question alone whether the examiner desired to prove that the witness had or had not transferred the certificate."

Three attitudes are represented among the Courts: (a) Most Courts treat such a question as depending upon the circumstances, in the manner above stated;[4] (b) a few Courts seem to treat it as always proper;[5] (c) while a few seem to treat it as necessarily improper.[6]

An. 718; 1830, Marcy, J., in People v. Mather, 4 Wend. N. Y. 248.

The following passage exhibits a singular notion of a leading question: 1911, Steenie Morrison's Trial, p. 54 (Notable English Trials Series, 1922): Mr. Muir (re-examining to the story of a night's wanderings); "Did you have any conversation with any woman that night?" Mr. Abinger: "I object to that question; it is a leading question." Mr. J. Darling: "Yes, so it is. I do not think you should ask that, Mr. Muir."

§ 773. Same: Opponent's Witness under Cross-Examination. The typical situation in which the witness' presumable bias removes all danger of improper suggestion is that of an opponent's witness, under cross-examination. The purpose of the cross-examination is to sift his testimony and weaken its force, in short, to discredit the direct testimony; thus, not only the presumable bias of the witness for the opponent's cause, but also his sense of reluctance to become the instrument of his own discrediting, deprive him of any inclination to accept the cross-examiner's suggestions unless the truth forces him to. Accordingly, it is well settled that on cross-examination of an opponent's witness, ordinarily no question can be improper as leading:[1]

1820, Wilson's Trial, 2 Green (Sc.) 119; Mr. Murray: "I am surely entitled to lead in cross-examination?" Lord President: "No; I never heard that with us." Mr. Murray: "I remember hearing a judge in England, upon that being stated to him, saying, "Good God, what a country!"'

1874, APPLETON, C. J., in State v. Benner, 64 Me. 279: "Cross-examination of an opponent's witness [in leading form] is allowable. Why? Because, being called by him [the opponent], it has been imagined that there was some tie of sympathy or interest which would induce partiality on the part of the witness in favor of the party who called him."

Yet, where the reason ceases, the rule ceases also; thus, when an opponent's witness proves to be in fact biassed in favor of the cross-examiner, the danger of leading questions arises and they may be forbidden.[2]

(a) Distinguish the question whether a counsel may ask about the facts of his own case on cross-examination. The majority of Courts in this country, departing from the orthodox rule, refuse to allow it; a few of them, how-

Unnecessary doubt has sometimes been thrown on this subject by misunderstood passages. A cross-examination was objected to as using leading questions in the Seven Bishops' Trial, 12 How. St. Tr. 310 (1688), and the judge says: "You must answer any questions that are not ensnaring questions"; but the same objector afterwards gives as his reason that the questions were asked "only to enflame, and to possess people with foolish notions and strange conceits", i.e. the matter implied dishonorable conduct to the King and the prosecution wished to avoid the subject; but no further principle seems to have been brought out. The remarks in Hardy's Trial, 24 How. St. Tr. 659 (1794), in which Mr. Erskine was told by L. C. J. Eyre, "You are not to put the very words in his mouth, even on a cross-examination", were said of a witness manifestly favorable to the cross-examiner, and were not intended to be applied to the ordinary case of a hostile witness.

That leading questions are not usually to be asked on cross-examination is maintained by Mr. Joseph Chitty, in Practice of the Law, III, 892, because the reason above quoted from him in § 769 applied equally in this case; but he probably had in mind the sort of misleading questions noted infra, § 780.

In State v. Peirce, 178 Ia. 417 (1916), 159 N. W. 1050, the ruling is obscure and futile.

ever, allow it on the condition that leading questions be not asked. The two rules, however, have nothing in common, and ought not to be so connected; the distinction is dealt with elsewhere (post, §§ 915, 1891).[3]

(b) Distinguish also the misleading question on cross-examination (post, § 780); the form of question is sometimes identical, but the danger is opposite, — in the one instance, of colluding with a favorable witness, in the other, of tricking a hostile witness.

§ 774. Same: Witness Hostile, Biassed, or Unwilling. A similar situation arises where the witness, though called by the party examining, is in fact biassed against his cause and is thus indisposed to favor it by accepting suggestions of desired testimony. Here a question cannot be objectionable as leading:

1682, Mr. Williams, arguing, in Coningsmark's Trial, 9 How. St. Tr. 1, 37: "There is a great deal of difference, I find, where you examine a man with the hair and where you examine him against the hair. Where you find it difficult to make a man answer, you will pump him with questions and cross-interrogate him, to sift out the truth."

1806, Mr. W. D. Evans, Notes to Pothier, II, 228: "This unwillingness is commonly to be decided by the judge, according to his impression of the demeanour of the witness, upon the trial. The situation of the witness, and the inducements which he may have for withholding a fair account, are also very proper circumstances to be taken into account in forming this decision. A son will not be very forward in stating the misconduct of his father, of which he has been the only witness; a servant will not, in an action against his master, be very ready to acknowledge the negligence committed by himself."

1874, APPLETON, C. J., in State v. Benner, 64 Me. 279: "If the witness is from any cause adverse to the party calling him, the same reason which authorizes and sanctions cross-examination, more or less rigorous, equally requires it when the party finds that the witness whom the necessities of his case have compelled him to call is averse in feeling, is reluctant to disclose what he knows, is evasive or false. Important as interrogation may be, if the witness is friendly, to remove uncertainty and indistinctness and to give fullness and clearness, doubly important is it, if the witness be dishonest and adverse, to extract from reluctant lips facts concealed from sympathy, secreted from interest, or withheld from dishonesty. Cross-examination may be as necessary to elicit the truth from one's own as from one's opponent's witness."

This situation includes not only the case of witnesses hostile, biassed, or interested, by their sympathies with the opponent's ca[illegible] but also of witnesses unwilling for any other reason to tell all they may know;[2] though the two classes are not different in principle, nor always distinguished by the Courts.

§ 775. Same: Preliminary Undisputed Matters. When a witness is asked about matters preliminary to the main topics of controversy — matters essential to be brought out, and yet not themselves in controversy — such as the witness' name, age, residence, relationship to the parties, and the like, it is obvious that there is usually no danger of improper suggestion, simply because there is no motive for it:[1]

1806, Mr. W. D. Evans, Notes to Pothier, II, 226: "The good sense of the rule is perfectly manifest with respect to all cases where the question propounded involves an answer immediately bearing upon the merits of the cause, and indicating to the witness a representation which will best accord with the interests of the party. But where the questions are merely introductory, where the mere answer of yes or no will leave the point of the case precisely as it found it and can only be material as laying the foundation for a further inquiry, the reason of the objection does not occur, and the objection itself appears to be ill-founded; and the making it can only proceed from a captious and petulant disposition to interrupt the course of examination."

1830, MARCY, Sen., in People v. Mather, 4 Wend. 247: "If the question relate to introductory matter and be designed to lead the witness with more expedition to what is material to the issue, it is captious to object to it, even if it be leading."

§ 776. Same: (3) Exceptions allowed; Trial Court's Discretion. In spite of the danger of suggestion by questions, there arise situations in which these dangerous questions become a necessity, — situations in which the risk of losing useful testimony outweighs the risk of false suggestion. Whether such an exceptional situation exists on the facts is a question for the determination of the trial Court.[1] Nevertheless, there are one or two common classes of cases in which a canon of guidance (ante, § 770) has been laid down.

§ 777. Same: Witness' Recollection Exhausted. Where the witness is unable without extraneous aid to revive his memory on the desired point —

(one creditor of a bankrupt against another).

In one ruling the doctrine as a whole has been denied: 1825, Anon., 1 Lew. Cr. C. 322 ("Bayley, J., refused to allow an adverse witness to be led, although, as he said, he was aware some Judges differed from him in opinion. His reason was that it afforded an opportunity for collusion between the parties and their witnesses, and that a witness might be instructed to give certain answers in order to make him an adverse witness and thereby enable his counsel to put leading questions to him"). This fantastic reasoning proposes to handicap all honest counsel because a few may practise dishonestly; moreover, if a witness were as cunning as the one imagined by the learned judge, he would certainly be cunning enough to fulfil his plot without the aid of leading questions.

Nevertheless, in accordance with the general principle (ante, § 769), if such a matter — e.g. name or age — should be the subject of real controversy, a suggestive question would be improper.

§ 776. [1] The cases on this point are collected ante, § 770. It is common to say judicially that "leading questions are allowable in the trial Court's discretion", and it is often impossible to say whether this applies to the definition of such a question or to the exceptional allowance of it.

i.e. where he understands what he is desired to speak about, but cannot recollect what he knows —, here his recollection, being exhausted, may be aided by a question suggesting the answer. The trial Court's discretion must be relied upon to prevent imposition.[1]

1854, Per CURIAM, in State v. Jeandell, 5 Harringt. 475, 478 (the witness being asked as to the time of a fact): "The rule is plain; its application is not always evident. You are first to test the witness' own knowledge or recollection of the time by questions necessary for that; if his memory is at fault, you may suggest contemporaneous events, with a view to stimulate or fix his recollection."

§ 778. Same: Witness not Understanding; Children, Invalids, Illiterates, etc. Where there is as yet no exhaustion of memory, but the witness merely does not appreciate the tenor of the desired details and thus is unable to say anything about it, a question calling attention specifically to the details may be allowable, when other means have failed.[1] It may not be necessary to name all of the details; the mention of one or more of them may suffice by association to stimulate the recollection of the remainder.

The common situation of this sort, running perhaps throughout the person's entire testimony, is that of a child,[2] or of an illiterate or alien adult.[3] A related situation is that of a person too ill or too feeble of speech to be able to articulate sentences; here the sentences may be framed for him suggestively, leaving him as little as possible to articulate and yet avoiding the danger of a misunderstood signal of assent or dissent.[4]

§ 779. Same: Proving a Contradiction. Where a witness is called to prove the prior self-contradictory statement of another witness, the tenor of the words in question become important. Moreover, the utterance proved must be substantially the same as that upon which the other witness has already been questioned (post, § 1029). Hence, as it is often practically impossible to inform the witness of the subject of his testimony without suggesting the details of the statement, such a suggestion has been commonly allowed; [1] and so also for the impeached witness' explanation of his statements.[2]

§ 780. Misleading Questions by Cross-examiner. (a) A question which assumes a fact that may be in controversy is leading, when put on direct examination (as noted ante, § 771), because it affords the willing witness a suggestion of a fact which he might otherwise not have stated to the same effect. Conversely, such a question may become improper on cross-examination, because it may by implication put into the mouth of an unwilling witness, a statement which he never intended to make, and thus incorrectly attribute to him testimony which is not his: [1]

1835, Mr. Joseph Chitty, Practice of the Law, 2d ed., III, 901: "It is an established rule, as regards cross-examination, that a counsel has no right, even in order to detect or catch a witness in a falsity, falsely to assume or pretend that the witness had previously sworn or stated differently to the fact, or that a matter had previously been proved when it had not. Indeed, if such attempts were tolerated, the English Bar would soon be debased below the most inferior of society."

1794, Hardy's Trial, 24 How. St. Tr. 754; Mr. Erskine, cross-examining a witness to the proceedings of an alleged seditious meeting: "Then you were never at any of those meetings but in the character of a spy?" — "As you call it so, I will take it so." — "If you were not there as a spy, take any title you choose for yourself, and I will give you that." L. C. J. EYRE: "There should be no name given to a witness on his examination. He states what he went for, and in making observations on the evidence, you may give it any appellation you please." After a repetition of the practice, Mr. Gibbs: "I am sorry to interrupt you, but your questions ought not to be accompanied with those sort of comments; they are the proper subjects of observation when the defence is made. The business of a cross-examination is to ask to all sorts of acts, to probe a witness as closely as you can; but it is not the object of a cross-examination to introduce that kind of periphrasis as you have just done." Mr. Erskine: "But, on a cross-examination, counsel are not called upon to be so exact as in an original examination; you are permitted to lead a witness." L. C. J. EYRE: "I think it is so clear that the questions that are put are not to be loaded with all the observations that arise upon all the previous parts of the case; they tend so to distract the attention of everybody, they load us in point of time so much; and that that is not the time for observation upon the character and situation of a witness is so apparent that as a rule of evidence it ought never to be departed from."

§ 780. [1] The following anecdote neatly illustrates this trick of a "loaded" or "forked" question: "Sir Frank Lockwood was once engaged in a case in which Sir Charles Russell (the late Lord Chief Justice of England) was the opposing counsel. Sir Charles was trying to browbeat a witness into giving a direct answer, 'Yes', or 'No.' 'You can answer any question yes or no,' declared Sir Charles. 'Oh, can you?' retorted Lockwood. 'May I ask if you have left off beating your wife?' " (Green Bag, vol. XII, p. 671).

1888, Parnell Commission's Proceedings, 19th day, Times' Rep. pt. 5, p. 221; the "Times" having charged the Irish Land League with complicity in crime and outrage, a constable testifying to outrages was cross-examined by the opponents as to his partisan employment by the "Times" in procuring its evidence. Mr. Lockwood: "How long have you been engaged in getting up the case for the 'Times'?" Sir H. James: "What I object to is that Mr. Lockwood, without having any foundation for it, should ask the witness 'How long have you been engaged in getting up the case for "The Times"?'" Mr. Lockwood: "I will not argue with my learned friend as to the exact form of the question, but I submit that it is perfectly proper and regular. If the man has not been engaged in getting the case for 'The Times' he can say so." Sir H. James: "I submit that my learned friend has no right to put this question without foundation. Counsel has no right to say 'When did you murder A. B.?' unless there is some foundation for the question. In this same way he has no right to ask 'How long have you been engaged in getting up this case?' for it assumes the fact." . . . President HANNEN. "I do not consider that Mr. Lockwood was entitled to put the question in that form and to assume that the witness has been employed by 'The Times.'" [2]

(b) Another improper way in which, by insinuation, testimony may be incorrectly attributed to a witness is that of asking him to refresh his recollection by a paper and then say whether he still persists in his first statement; this has been already noticed (ante, § 764).

(c) So also the prohibition of impeaching questions as to prior misconduct is sometimes based (post, § 983) upon the opportunities which they offer for fraudulent insinuations of misdeeds which the counsel has in reality no reason to suppose were ever committed.

Distinguish (1) the rule that a cross-examiner need not state the purpose of his question (post, § 1871); the objection in such a case is not that the witness is deceived as to the ultimate purpose of the question, for it is immaterial whether or not he understands that, and it is enough if he is not deceived as to its actual tenor; the objection to a cross-examiner's not disclosing his purpose is that the relevancy of the facts inquired about may otherwise not appear, and the rule permitting such concealment is merely a necessary exception to the general rule requiring relevancy to appear at the time of asking; (2) the rule that a counsel may not state as a fact a matter upon which no evidence has been offered, nor discuss offered evidence in the jury's presence

[2] Accord: 1918, Marsh v. State, 16 Ala. App. 597, 80 So. 171; 1900, Hand v. Soodeletti, 128 Cal. 674, 61 Pac. 372; 1905, Briggs v. People, 219 Ill. 330, 76 N. E. 499 (rule illustrated); 1885, State v. Labuzan, 37 La. An. 489, 491 (question assuming that the witness had testified as he had not in fact, excluded; "such questions have a tendency to irritate, confuse, and mislead the witness, the parties, and their counsel, the jury and the presiding judge, and they embarrass the administration of justice"); 1903, State v. Williams, 111 La. 205, 35 So. 521 ("witnesses should not be cross-examined on the assumption that they have testified to facts touching which they have given no testimony"); 1905, State v. Boice, 114 La. 856, 38 So. 584.

(post, §§ 1806, 1808); this is merely an application of the general rule against hearsay; (3) the rule requiring a writing, proved merely as to its execution, to be shown to the opponent before the witness retires (post, § 1859) is a rule designed to prevent unfairness, but does not concern the present principle; (4) the rule that a cross-examination cannot go beyond the scope of the direct examination; this is sometimes trickily used by confining the direct examination to a few safe topics; the unsoundness of this rule (which involves a different principle) is considered elsewhere (post, § 1887).

§ 781. Intimidating and Annoying Questions by Cross-examiner. An intimidating manner in putting questions may so coerce or disconcert the witness that his answers do not represent his actual knowledge on the subject. So also questions which in form or subject cause embarrassment, shame or anger in the witness may unfairly lead him to such demeanor and utterance that the impression produced by his statements does not do justice to his real testimonial value. These are two of the notorious abuses of cross-examination, and always have been, both in the early period when it was still chiefly used by judges only, and also since the time of its mature elaboration, more than a century ago, as the greatest weapon of truth ever forged. In the following noted passages of fiction its inveterate abuse has been satirized:

1837, Mr. Charles Dickens, The Pickwick Club, c. XXIV: "'Nathaniel Winkle!' said Mr. Skimpin. 'Here!' replied a feeble voice. Mr. Winkle entered the witness-box, and having been duly sworn, bowed to the judge with considerable deference. 'Don't look at me, sir,' said the judge,[1] sharply, in acknowledgment of the salute; 'look at the jury.' Mr. Winkle obeyed the mandate, and looked at the place where he thought it most probable the jury might be; for seeing anything in his then state of intellectual complication was wholly out of the question. Mr. Winkle was then examined by Mr. Skimpin, who, being a promising young man of two or three and forty, was of course anxious to confuse a witness who was notoriously predisposed in favor of the other side, as much as he could. 'Now, sir,' said Mr. Skimpin, 'have the goodness to let his Lordship and the jury know what your name is, will you?' And Mr. Skimpin inclined his head on one side to listen with great sharpness to the answer, and glanced at the jury meanwhile, as if to imply that he rather expected Mr. Winkle's natural taste for perjury would induce him to give some name which did not belong to him. 'Winkle,' replied the witness. 'What's your Christian name, sir?' angrily inquired the little judge. 'Nathaniel, sir.' 'Daniel, — any other name?' 'Nathaniel, sir — my Lord, I mean.' 'Nathaniel Daniel, or Daniel Nathaniel?' 'No, my Lord, only Nathaniel — not Daniel at all.' 'What did you tell me it was Daniel for then, sir?' inquired the judge. 'I did n't, my Lord,' replied Mr. Winkle. 'You did, sir,' replied the judge, with a severe frown. 'How could I have got Daniel on my notes, unless you told me so, sir?' This argument was, of course, unanswerable. 'Mr. Winkle has rather a short memory, my Lord,' interposed Mr. Skimpin, with another glance at the jury. 'We shall find means to refresh it before we have quite done with him, I dare say.' 'You had better be careful, sir,' said the little judge, with a sinister look at the witness. Poor Mr. Winkle bowed, and endeavored to feign an easiness of manner, which, in his then state of confusion, gave him rather the air of a disconcerted pickpocket. 'Now, Mr. Winkle,' said Mr. Skimpin, 'attend to me, if you please, sir; and let me recommend you, for your own sake to bear in mind his Lordship's injunctions to be careful. I believe you are a particular friend of Pickwick, the defendant, are you not?' 'I have known Mr. Pickwick now, as well as I recollect at this moment, nearly' — 'Pray, Mr. Winkle, do not evade the question. Are you, or are you not, a particular friend of the defendant's?' 'I was just about to say, that' — 'Will you, or will you not, answer my question, sir?' 'If you don't answer the question, you'll be committed, sir,' interposed the little judge, looking over his note-book. 'Come, sir,' said Mr. Skimpin, 'yes or no, if you please.' 'Yes, I am.' 'Yes, you are. And why could n't you say that at once, sir? Perhaps you know the plaintiff too — eh, Mr. Winkle?' 'I don't know her; I 've seen her.' 'Oh, you don't know her, but you 've seen her? Now, have the goodness to tell the gentlemen of the jury what you mean by that, Mr. Winkle.' 'I mean that I am not intimate with her, but that I have seen her when I went to call on Mr. Pickwick, in Goswell Street.' 'How often have you seen her, sir?' 'How often?' 'Yes, Mr. Winkle, how often? I'll repeat the question for you a dozen times, if you require it, sir.' And the learned gentleman, with a firm and steady frown, placed his hands on his hips, and smiled suspiciously at the jury. On this question there arose the edifying brow-beating, customary on such points. First of all, Mr. Winkle said it was quite impossible for him to say how many times he had seen Mrs. Bardell. Then he was asked if he had seen her twenty times, to which he replied, 'Certainly, — more than that.' Then he was asked whether he had n't seen her a hundred times — whether he could n't swear that he had seen her more than fifty times — whether he didn't know that he had seen her at least seventy-five times — and so forth; the satisfactory conclusion which was arrived at, at last, being, that he had better take care of himself, and mind what he was about. The witness having been by these means reduced to the requisite ebb of nervous perplexity, the examination was continued. . . . Tracy Tupman and Augustus Snodgrass were severally called into the box; both corroborated the testimony of their unhappy friend; and each was driven to the verge of desperation by excessive badgering."

1857, Mr. Anthony Trollope, The Three Clerks, c. XL: "Mr. Chaffanbrass was one of an order by no means yet extinct, but of whom it may be said that their peculiarities are somewhat less often seen than they were when Mr. Chaffanbrass was in his prime. . . . Those who most dreaded Mr. Chaffanbrass, and who had most occasion to do so, were the witnesses. A rival lawyer could find a protection on the bench when his powers of endurance were tried too far; but a witness in a court of law has no protection. He comes there unfeed, without hope of guerdon, to give such assistance to the State in repressing crime and assisting justice as his knowledge in the particular case may enable him to afford; and justice, in order to ascertain whether his testimony be true, finds it necessary to subject him to torture. One would naturally imagine that an undisturbed thread of clear evidence would be best obtained from a man whose position was made easy and whose mind was not harassed; but this is not the fact; to turn a witness to good account, he must be badgered this way and that till he is nearly mad; he must be made a laughing-stock for the court; his very truths must be turned into falsehoods, so that he may be falsely shamed; he must be accused of all manner of villany, threatened with all manner of punishment; he must be made to feel that he has no friend near him, that the world is all against him; he must be confounded till he forget his right hand from his left, till his mind be turned into chaos, and his heart into water; and then let him give his evidence. What will fall from his lips when in this wretched collapse must be of special value, for the best talents of practised forensic heroes are daily used to bring it about; and no member of the Humane Society interferes to protect the wretch. Some sorts of torture are as it were tacitly allowed even among humane people. Eels are skinned alive, and witnesses are sacrificed, and no one's blood curdles at the sight, no soft heart is sickened at the cruelty. To apply the thumbscrew, the boot, and the rack to the victim before him was the work of Mr. Chaffanbrass's life. . . . On the whole, Mr. Chaffanbrass is popular at the Old Bailey. Men congregate to hear him turn a witness inside out, and chuckle with an inward pleasure at the success of his cruelty." [2]

The remedy for such an abuse is in the hands of the judges. The disgrace of these occurrences is even more theirs than that of the offending counsel; for the former have not the temptation of partisanship to sway them, and their duty to interfere is easier to fulfil than the counsel's duty to refrain. The slack sense of duty thus so often exhibited becomes the more blamable in contrast with the scrupulous sentimentality which will be exhibited in insisting on the tender quiddities of the law that favor guilty persons, — such as the rules for confessions and the privilege against self-crimination. For the probably guilty, when brought to book, there is often an abundance of protection, while for the unimplicated and innocent witness, coming to serve justice and truth, there is scanty assistance. The sport is of more interest than the victim. Such judges, as well as counsel, were justly pilloried by the great novelist; and his pen expressed only the widespread feeling of dread and disgust among the laity for the abuses of the witness-box.

Those abuses, it is true, are, as a whole, probably less to-day than they formerly were; but they are in many places still not uncommon. They are too frequent when they occur at all. The just denunciations of high-minded judges have sometimes stigmatized these practices as they deserve;[3] and there can be no doubt that the law sanctions the power and establishes the duty of the trial judge to use a proper discretion to prevent and rebuke them:[4]

[2] Mr. E. Manson's "Cross-examination — a Socratic Dialogue" (8 Law Quart. Rev. 160), is a neat satire, after the manner of the Platonic dialogue, on the abuses of cross-examination. There is good reading in the letter of rebuke written by Smollett to a counsel who had wantonly abused him (Foss' Memories of Westminster Hall, I, 235).

[3] "Mr. Baron Alderson once remarked to a counsel of this type, 'Mr. ——, you seem to think that the art of cross-examination is to examine crossly'" (Serjeant Ballantine's Experiences of a Barrister's Life, 105).

The following remarks were addressed to Dr. Mitchill, a celebrated and opinionated scientist, by Mr. William Sampson, New York's most learned and witty advocate in the early days, at the opening of his cross-examination of Dr. Mitchill, on the trial of Alex. Whistelo for bastardy (1808; 11 Amer. St. Tr. 528, 575); the scientist and the lawyer had already met in forensic skirmishes:

"Doctor, since your opinions were likely to be unfavorable to the side I am to advocate, I must avail myself of the privilege of cross-examination. It would be unnecessary with so learned a witness to say, that the adverb 'cross' was not to be taken in the vulgar acceptation. 'Cross' was in contra-distinction to 'direct'; and 'cross-examination' meant only an indirect examination. The ignorant, who take things in the wrong sense, often show ill-humor, and put themselves in an attitude to be cross, because they are to be cross-examined. With the candid and enlightened, it proves often an agreeable mode of discussion, and is particularly so to our profession, when it gives us occasion to extract from those of superior learning, knowledge which we might not otherwise have the means of acquiring."

[4] The principle, in one or another form, is recognized in the following statutes and cases; Ala. Code 1907, § 4016 ("It is the right of a witness to be protected from improper questions and from harsh or insulting demeanor"); Alaska: Comp. L. 1913, §§ 1494, 1508 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2044); Ark. Dig. 1919, § 4183, like Cal. C. C. P. § 2044); Cal. C. C. P. 1872, § 2044 ("The Court must exercise a reasonable control over the mode of interrogation, so as to make it as rapid, as distinct, as little annoying to the witness, and as effective for the extraction of truth, as may be; but, subject to this rule, the parties may put such pertinent and legal questions as they see fit"); § 2066 ("It is the right of the witness to be protected from irrelevant, improper, or insulting questions, and from harsh or insulting demeanor"); 1897, People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179, 48 Pac. 75 (after an answer, "Yes, I have seen him," the question, "That is, you imagine you have?" was held properly excluded); Ky. C. C. P. 1895, § 593 (like Cal.

1806, Mr. W. D. Evans, in his Notes to Pothier, II, 229: "The abuses to which this procedure is liable are the subject of very frequent complaint, but it would be absolutely impossible, by any but general rules, to apply a preventive to these abuses without destroying the liberty upon which the benefits above adverted to essentially depend; and all that can be effected by the interposition of the Court is a discouragement of any virulence towards the witnesses which is not justified by the nature of the cause, and a sedulous attention to remove from the minds of the jury the impressions which are rather to be imputed to the vehemence of the advocate than to the prevarication of the witness. Whatever can elicit the actual dispositions of the witness with respect to the event, — whatever can detect the operation of a concerted plan of testimony, or bring into light the incidental facts and circumstances that the witness may be supposed to have suppressed, — in short, whatever may be expected fairly to promote the real manifestation of the merits of the cause, is not only justifiable but meritorious. But I conceive that a client has no right to expect from his counsel an endeavour to assist his cause, or what is a more frequent object, to gratify his passions, by unmerited abuse, by embarrassing or intimidating witnesses of whose veracity he has no real suspicion, or by conveying an impression of discredit which he does not actually feel; and that where such expectations are intimated, there is an imperious duty upon the advocate, who, while the protector of private right, is also the minister of public justice, which requires them to be repelled. Considering the subject merely as a matter of discretion, the adoption of an unfair conduct in cross-examination has often an effect repugnant to the interests which it professes to promote. . . . But however unfavorably an injudicious asperity of cross-examination may be to the advancement of a cause, it, for the most part, is congenial to the wishes of the party; the neglect of it is regarded as an indifference to his interests and a dereliction of duty; and the practice of it is one of the surest harbingers of professional success."

1827, Mr. Jeremy Bentham, Rationale of Judicial Evidence, b. II, c. IX, b. III, c. V (Bowring's ed. vol. VI, pp. 338, 406): "Under the name of brow-beating (a mode of oppression of which witnesses in the station of respondents are the more immediate objects) a practice is designated, which has been the subject of a complaint too general to be likely to be altogether groundless Oppression in this form has a particular propensity to alight upon those witnesses who have been called upon that side of the cause (whichever it may be) that has the right on its side; because the more clearly a side is in the right, the less need has it for any such assistance as it is in the nature of any such dishonest arts to administer to it. . . . Brow-beating is that sort of offence which never can be committed by any advocate who has not the judge for his accomplice. . . . Rule 1. Every expression of reproach, as if for established mendacity: every such manifestation, however expressed — by language, gesture, countenance, tone of voice (especially at the outset of the examination) — ought to be abstained from by the examining advocate. If the tendency of such style of address were to promote the extraction of material truth, at the same time that the action of it could not be supplied to equal effect by any other plan of examination, — the vexation thus produced (how sharp soever) not being of any considerable duration, the liberty might be allowed, with preponderant advantage for the furtherance of justice. But, on a close investigation, no advantage, but rather a disadvantage, even in respect of furtherance of justice, seems to be the natural result of an assumption of this kind. . . . By reproachful and terrifying demeanour on the part of a person invested with, and acting under, an authority thus formidable, it seems full as natural that an honest witness should be confounded, and thus deprived of recollection and due utterance, and even (through confusion of mind) betrayed into self-contradiction and involuntary falsehood, as that a dishonest witness should be detected and exposed. The quiet mode above described is not in any degree susceptible of this sort of abuse: the outrageous mode seems more likely to terminate in the abuse than in the use. . . . Rule 2. Such unwarranted manifestations, if not abstained from by the advocates, ought to be checked, with marks of disapprobation, by the judge. In the presence of the judge, any misbehaviour, which, being witnessed at the time by the judge, is regarded by him without censure, becomes in effect the act, the misbehaviour, of the judge. On him more particularly should the reproach of it lie; because, for the connivance (which is in effect the authorization) of it, he cannot ever possess any of those excuses, which may ever and anon present themselves on the part of the advocate. The demand for the honest vigilance and occasional interference of the judge will appear the stronger, when due consideration is had of the strength of the temptation, to which, on this occasion, the probity of the advocate is exposed. Sinister interests in considerable variety concur in instigating him to this improper practice. . . . Rule 3. When, on the false supposition of a disposition to mendacity, an honest witness has been treated accordingly by the cross-examining advocate (the judge having suffered the examination to be conducted in that manner, for the sake of truth) — at the close of which examination all doubts respecting the probity of the witness have been dispelled, — it is a moral duty on the part of the judge to do what depends on him towards soothing the irritation sustained by the witness's mind; to wit, by expressing his own satisfaction respecting the probity of the witness, and the sympathy and regret excited by the irritation he has undergone. . . . Under the spur of the provocation, I remember now and then to have observed the witness turn upon the advocate in the way of retaliation. On an occasion of this sort, I have also now and then observed the judge to interpose, for the purpose of applying a check to the petulance of the witness. For one occasion in which, under the spur of the injury, the injured witness has presented himself to my conception as overstepping the limits of a just defence, — ten, twenty, or twice twenty, have occurred, in which the witness has been suffering, without resistance and without remedy, as well as without just cause, under the torture inflicted on him by the oppression and insolence of an adverse advocate. Scarce ever, I think, had I the satisfaction of observing the judge interpose to afford his protection to the witness, either at the commencement of the persecution, for the purpose of staying or alleviating the injury, or at the conclusion, for the purpose of affording satisfaction for it, — such inadequate satisfaction as the nature of the case admits of."

1843, Lord LANGDALE, M. R., in Johnston v. Todd, 5 Beav. 601: "Witnesses, and particularly illiterate witnesses, must always be liable to give imperfect or erroneous evidence, even when orally examined in open Court. The novelty of the situation, the agitation and hurry which accompanies it, the cajolery or intimidation to which the witness may be subjected, the want of questions calculated to excite those recollections which might clear up every difficulty, and the confusion occasioned by cross-examination, as it is too often conducted, may give rise to important errors and omissions."

1857, LOWRIE, J., in Eliott v. Boyles, 31 Pa. 66: "It is entirely natural that in the public trial of causes the earnestness of counsel should often become unduly intense; and it is not possible to prevent this without such an attribution and exercise of power as would be entirely inconsistent with that freedom of thought that is necessary to all thorough investigation. The remedy for it is to be found in inner rather than in outer discipline. Those who are zealously seeking the truth cannot always be watchful to measure their demeanor and expressions in accordance with the feelings or even with the rights of others. This zeal, even when inordinate, must be excused, because it is necessary in the search of truth; and generally it is not possible to condemn it as misguided or excessive until its fault has been proved by the discovery of the truth in the opposite direction; and possibly its very excess may have contributed to the discovery. When the presiding judge is respected and prudent, a hint kindly given is generally all that is needed to restrain such ardor, when it does not arise in any degree from habitual want of respect for the rights of others and for the order of public business. Witnesses often suffer very unjustly from this undue earnestness of counsel, and they are entitled to the watchful protection of the Court. In the court they stand as strangers, surrounded with unfamiliar circumstances, giving rise to an embarrassment known only to themselves; and in mere generosity and common humanity they are entitled to be treated, by those accustomed to such scenes, with great consideration, — at least until it becomes manifest that they are dispcsed to be disingenuous. The heart of the Court and jury, and all disinterested manliness, spontaneously recoil at a harsh and unfair treatment of them, and the cause that adopts such treatment is very apt to suffer by it. It is only where weakness sits in judgment that it can benefit any cause. Add to this that a mind rudely assailed naturally shuts itself against its assailant, and reluctantly communicates the truths that it possesses."

The following instance illustrates for orthodox practice the dividing line between propriety and impropriety:

1820, Ings' Trial, 33 How. St. Tr. 957, 999; Mr. Adolphus, cross-examining an alleged accomplice: "I think you told us some things then [Monday, at another trial for the same plot] that did not come to your recollection to-day?" A. "That may be. I will not pretend to say, that the next time I come up here I can communicate everything as I have done to-day." Q. "Certainly not; there are people that proverbially ought to have a good memory?" A. "Yes, certainly." Q. "You make your evidence a little longer or shorter, according as the occasion suits?" A. "Yes, I mention the circumstances as they come to my recollection." . . . Mr. Gurney: "That is observation, and not question." Mr. Adolphus: "I am asking him a question." . . . L. C. J. DALLAS: "You should not now observe on the evidence." Mr. Adolphus: "This about the digging entrenchments you did not state on Monday?" A. "No, I forgot that." Q. "The next time there will be a new story?" Mr. Gurney: "I must interpose, my lord." L. C. J. DALLAS: "All these observations are certainly incorrect." Mr. Adolphus: "He has said it himself; 'when next I come into the box, I shall recollect other things', and upon that I put the question, whether he would tell another story the next time he comes." L. C. J. DALLAS: "Ask him the question if you wish it." Mr. Adolphus: "Shall you tell us a new story the next time?" A. "No. If anything new occurs to my mind when I come to stand here, I will state it."

Resting upon the same principle that forbids intimidating questions is the rule excluding confessions made under menaces (post, §§ 831 ff.); and it is in part for a similar reason that a rule is enforced, in most jurisdictions (post, § 983), against cross-questioning a witness to an unnecessary extent upon his past misdeeds.

§ 782. Repetition of Questions. The repetition of a question or a topic may or may not be objectionable, according to its purpose.

(1) Repeating an unanswered question upon an inadmissible point, already ruled out by the Court, is of course an impertinence to the Court; and, while it may sometimes become desirable and allowable to renew an offer of testimony in approximately the same form, in order to secure its admission after obviating its original defects (ante, § 17), this attempt, made in good faith, is to be distinguished from a merely persistent effort to elude the vigilance of opponent and judge by repeating precisely the same forbidden offer, for this is at once useless, wasteful, and disrespectful.[1]

(2) Repeating an allowable question already once answered, or covering the same ground of facts in other questions, on the direct examination, is ordinarily superfluous and therefore improper. Nevertheless, circumstances may arise which make it desirable to emphasize certain facts anew; and the trial Court's discretion should control.[2] This situation, however, so far as the questions are repeated on a re-direct examination, concerns rather the repetition of the evidential facts than of the mere questions about them, and hence is governed by the principles as to Order of Evidence (post, §§ 1883 ff.).[3]

(3) Repeating the same testimonial matter of the direct examination, by questioning the witness anew on cross-examination, is a process which often becomes desirable (on the principle of § 995, post) in order to test the witness' capacity to recollect what he has just stated and to ascertain whether he falls easily into inconsistencies and thus betrays falsification. In spite of its frequent tedium and unskilful handling, this process often proves useful; and the discretion of the trial Court must suffice to fix its limits:[4]

[illegible] CHRISTIANCY, C. J., in O'Donnell v. Segar, 25 Mich. 367, 371: "The defendants had a right, on cross-examination of this witness, to put any question calculated, not only to test his credibility and the extent and means of his knowledge, but to draw out any fact which might tend either to contradict, weaken, or explain any one of the particular statements made by the witness or to weaken any inference from the whole or any part of his testimony in chief in support of either of the main facts essential to the plaintiff's case. And since, if a question on cross-examination relates to the subject to which the direct examination related, . . . the Court cannot usually say, before the question is answered, whether the answer will elicit anything tending to contradict, weaken, or explain any of the facts or the inference from any of the facts stated in the direct examination, or to test the credibility or the extent or means of knowledge of the witness, the only safe general rule upon cross-examination is to allow the party cross-examining to go over the whole subject or subjects to which the direct examination related, and to give him the chance to draw out as far as he may be able any fact which (within the principles and for the purposes above explained) he has the right to elicit on cross-examination. . . . examination is the great test of the knowledge as well as of the veracity of witnesses. The right to pursue it may sometimes be abused; and when it is sought to be abused, as when the counsel insists upon going over the same ground again and again, or when it is apparent that the witness has already fully answered without any appearance of evasion, and it is evident that the counsel is merely pushing the witness for sake of annoyance or for any illegitimate purpose, it is competent for the Court in its discretion to put an end to it. But we see no evidence of an attempt at such abuse in this case."

1891, CHAMPLIN, C. J., in Zucker v. Karpeles, 88 Mich. 424, 50 N. W. 373: "We know of no rule of practice that prohibits an attorney from requesting a witness to repeat what he has testified to upon a particular point in his direct examination. He has a right to have it repeated, for the purpose not only of testing the recollection of the witness, but of ascertaining whether he makes a statement at variance with what he testified to in chief. Of course it would not be permissible for an attorney to pass through the whole of the direct examination and ask the witness to repeat it; and such was not the case here. The attorney had not abused his privilege, nor, as it appears from the record, unnecessarily consumed the time of the court in a fruitless attempt at cross-examination."

(4) Repeating precisely the same allowable question on cross-examination, in order by sheer moral force to compel a witness to admit the truth, after an original false answer or refusal to answer, is a process which not only savors of intimidation and browbeating, but also tends to waste time. Accordingly, it is not doubtful that the trial Court has discretion to refuse or to allow this, as seems best under the circumstances.[5] Nevertheless, when used sparingly and against a witness who in the cross-examiner's belief is falsifying, there ought to be no judicial interference; for there is perhaps none of the lesser expedients (that is, ranking after Cross-examination and Sequestration) which has so keen and striking an efficacy, when employed by skilful hands, in extracting the truth and exposing a lie. Simple as this expedient seems, it rests on a deep moral basis; and the annals of our trials demonstrate its power. In the following passages, ranging over three centuries, some of the most notable illustrations will be found:

1682, Count Coningsmark's Trial, 9 How. St. Tr. 1, 55 (the Count, charged with murder, was said to have absconded in disguise; and a Swedish fellow-countryman of his, at whose house he had changed his clothes, was called): Q. "Pray, what did the Count say to you about his coming in disguise to your house?" A. "He said nothing, but that he

"You are an honest man, tell the truth." A. "He declared nothing to me." Q. "Did he desire you to let him have your clothes because he was in trouble?" A. "He desired a coat of me, and a pair of stockings to keep his legs warm." Q. "I do ask you, did he declare the reason why he would have those cloaths was because he would not be known?" A. "He said he was afraid of coming into trouble." Q. "Why were you unwilling to tell this?"

1768, Lord Baltimore's Trial, Gurney's Rep. 77 (abduction and rape of Sarah Woodcock; the testimony showed plainly that the case was in truth one of willing seduction, although the complainant testified flatly to the use of force and coercion; her evidence was suspiciously inconsistent, and, on her cross-examination by the accused himself, the following answers were elicited): Q. "How old are you?" A. "I am twenty-seven." Q. "Will you swear you are no older?" A. "I will swear I am twenty-eight." Q. "Will you swear you are no older?" A. "I will swear I am that." Q. "Will you swear you are no older?" A. "I do not know I need tell; I am twenty-nine, and that is my age; I cannot exactly tell." Q. "To the best of your belief, how old are you?" A. "I believe I am thirty next July; I cannot be sure of that, whether I am or no."

1784, Horton's Trial, Sel. Crim. Trials at Old Bailey, I, 456 (the accused, aged 11, was indicted for felonious larceny; and one Isaac Barney, a patrolman, swore to a confession by the boy when under arrest that he had watched while two men entered the house; the following comprised the entire cross-examination of this witness): Counsel: "You had frighted this poor child out of his senses?" Witness: "I do not think he was afraid." Counsel: "Do you know what reward there is for the conviction of this poor infant?" Witness: "Upon my oath I do not know." Counsel: "Do you mean to say that you, a patrol, do not know?" Witness: "I am sure it is a thing I never had." Counsel: "You shall not slip through my fingers so." Witness: "Upon my word and honor I do not know." Counsel: "Upon your oath, sir?" Witness: "I do not." Counsel: "Did you never hear that there was a reward of forty pounds upon the conviction of that child?" Witness: "I never knew any such thing." Counsel: "But you have heard it?" Witness: "I never heard any such thing." Counsel: "Come, come, sir, it is a fair question, and the jury see and hear you. Upon your oath, did you never hear that you would be entitled to forty pounds as the price of that poor infant's blood?" Witness: "Your honor, I cannot say." Counsel: "But you shall say before you leave that place." Witness: "I have heard other people talking about such things." Counsel: "So I thought; and with that answer I leave your testimony with the jury."

1820, Queen Caroline's Trial, Linn's Ed., I, 48, 78; in attempting to prove an act of adultery at Naples, between the Queen and her servant Bergami, one of the material facts alleged by the prosecution was that the Queen's sleeping-room adjoined Bergami's, with only a corridor and a cabinet intervening, and that there was no access from the Queen's room to Bergami's except by that passage; to this the servant Majocchi, who for a time slept in the cabinet mentioned, testified as follows, on being asked by Mr. Solicitor-General Copley (afterwards L. C. Lyndhurst) whether there was no other intervening passage: "There was nothing else. One was obliged to pass through the corridor, from the corridor to the cabinet, and from the cabinet into the room of Bergami. There was nothing else." Then, on his cross-examination, Mr. Brougham asked as follows: "Will you swear there was no passage by which her Royal Highness could enter Bergami's room, when he was confined with his illness, except going through the room [i.e. cabinet] where you slept?" Majocchi: "I have seen that passage; other passages I have not seen." Mr. Brougham: "Will you swear there was no other passage?" Majocchi: "There was a great saloon, after which there came the room of her Royal Highness, after which there was a little corridor, and so you passed into the cabinet. I have seen no other passage." Mr. Brougham: "Will you swear there was no other passage?" Majocchi: "I can not swear; I have seen no other but this; and I cannot say there was any other but this." Mr. Brougham: "Will you swear that there was no other way by which any person going into Bergami's room could go, except by passing through the cabinet?" Majocchi: "I cannot swear that there is another; I have seen but that; there might have been, but I have not seen any, and I cannot assert but that alone." Mr. Brougham: "Will you swear that if a person wished to go from the Princess' [i.e. Queen's] room to Bergami's room, he or she could not go any other way than through the cabinet in which you slept?" "Majocchi: "There was another passage to go into the room of Bergami." Mr. Brougham: "Without passing through the cabinet where you slept?" Majocchi: "Yes." [6]

1880, Parnell Commission's Proceedings, 26th day, Times' Rep. pt. 7, pp. 137, 147; the Irish Land League was charged with complicity in crime and agrarian outrage; the fact of crime and outrage it admitted, but denied any complicity, and placed the responsibility on certain lawless secret societies of local origin; the issue turned largely on the identity of these societies with the League; many witnesses testified to meetings of lawless societies, and the inference, expressed or implied, was that these were Land League branches; the murder of Lord Mountmorres was under inquiry, and one Michael Burke, a shifty witness, having a bad record, testified to the concocting of the murder at such a meeting held in one Pat Kearney's house. "I know Pat Kearney; he keeps a public house at Clonbur; he was secretary to the Land League, I believe. The Land League meetings were held in his house sometimes." Q. "Before Lord Mountmorres was murdered, was there a meeting held at Pat Kearney's house?" A. "There was a kind of a meeting held, sir." Q. "Just tell us what the talk was?" A. "It was spoken of that he [Lord Mountmorres] should be done away with." This was direct enough that the local Land League branch had at a meeting plotted Lord Mountmorres' murder; but on cross-examination, Sir Charles Russell, after bringing out the witness' bad record and involving him in several shifty answers, finally returned to the meat of the testimony, namely, whether the meeting was a Land League meeting at all; after getting the witness to admit that he was not sure whether the meetings were League meetings, the cross-examiner continued: Q. "Now, tell me, will you swear there was a Land League at all at Clonbur in 1880?" A. "I will not swear whether there was or not, but I was told there was by several people." Q. "Who told you?" A. "Several people." Q. "Who told you there was a Land League branch in Clonbur?" A. "I was told by several people, but I could not swear by whom." Q. "Will you swear there was any branch of the Land League at all in Clonbur before Lord Mountmorres' death?" A. "I was told there was." . . . Q. "Who told you there was a Land League in Clonbur?" A. "I can only —" Q. "Attend to me; who told you there was a Land League in Clonbur?" A. "Several people, Sir." Q. "Attend; who — if anybody — told you there was a Land League branch before Lord Mountmorres' murder?" A. "I can only —" Q. "Will you swear anybody told you?" A. "I could not swear what were the men's names, but I was told by several people." Q. "Attend to me; will you swear you were told by anyone before Lord Mountmorres was murdered that there was a Land League branch at Clonbur?" A. "There was some kind of branch; I could not swear what branch it was. I know there was a branch." Q. "Will you swear, on your oath, that anyone told you there was a branch of the Land League in Clonbur, before Lord Mountmorres was murdered?" A. "I was told, but I do not know the name of the man." . . . Q. "Attend to me, I will have an answer." A. "Not to that question, because I cannot answer it; I have said all I know." Q. "Attend to me." A. "I am attending as well as I can." Q. "Will you swear anyone told you before Lord Mountmorres was murdered that there was a Land League branch at Clonbur?" A. "I was told there was a branch, but I could not say what it was; I could not say whether it was a Land League branch or not." Q. "Why did you not tell me so before?" [7]

§ 783. Multiple Examiners; Length of Examination. (1) It has long been a tradition that but one counsel should question during a single stage in the examination (direct or cross or re-direct) of a single witness. This tradition rests on a wise policy of protecting the witness from undue and confusing interrogation, as well as of securing system and brevity by giving the control of the interrogation into a single hand:

1809, Doe v. Roe, 2 Camp. 280: "There was two counsel for the plaintiff: the junior having called a witness who seemed disposed to shuffle and prevaricate, the leader interposed, and was proceeding to examine him; the counsel on the opposite side contended that this was irregular, and that although, where there were several counsel on the same side, they might arrange among themselves by whom the witnesses should be examined, yet that when the examination of a witness was begun by one gentleman, the others had no right to put a question; they might privately suggest questions proper to be put, but could not address any directly to the witness; if this rule were not adhered to, a witness might be subject to the examination or cross-examination of as many barristers as were retained for the plaintiff or defendant, much time would be wasted, and great confusion would be introduced into proceedings at Nisi Prius. ELLENBOROUGH, L. C. J.: 'Convenience certainly requires that the examination of a witness should be carried on entirely by the gentleman who begins it; and several counsel clearly cannot be permitted to put questions to the same witness, one after another, in the manner apprehended. But I think the leading counsel has a right, in his discretion, to interpose, and to take the examination into his own hands. Very unpleasant consequences might follow if this were not allowed. If a gentleman, it being his first appearance in a court of justice, should be much embarrassed in the course of examining a witness, it would be hard if it were in the power of the opposite party to prevent his leader from stepping in to his relief. And other occasions may be imagined when it may be very important that the gentleman who conducts the cause should have the privilege of putting questions to a witness originally called by a co-adjutor. In the present state of the bar, there is no danger of this privilege being abused.'"

This rule has been recognized in judicial rulings generally, and also in a few statutes; [1] doubtless, also, in many local rules of court. It is of course sub-

[7] Another example is found in the same trial, 61st day, Times' Report, pt. 15, p. 149. An instance of the same expedient by that great cross-examiner, Daniel O'Connell, occurs in Kennedy's Trial, p. 6 (Mongan's Celebrated Trials in Ireland). Still another good example is R. v. Bernard, 8 St. Tr. N. S. 887, 958 (1858).

§ 783. [1] England: 1815, Chippendale v. Masson, 4 Camp. 174 (two defendants, relying on the same defence; Gibbs, C. J., said, "The interests of the defendants being the same, I can only hear one counsel; . . . the witnesses are to be examined by the counsel successively, in the same manner as if the defence were joint and not separate"); 1835, Mason v. Ditchbourne, 1 Moo. & Rob. 460, 462 (same ruling by Lord Abinger, C. B., as to addressing the jury); 1836, Chitty, General Practice, 2d ed., III, 891 a ("After one counsel has brought his examination to a close, no other counsel on the same side can put a question to the same witness"); Canada: 1882, Walker v. McMillan, 21 N. Br. 31, 44, 6 Can. Sup. 241, 245 (two defendants, pleading the same defence by the same attorney and counsel, allowed to cross-examine by one counsel only); United States: Ala. Code 1907, § 4017 ("The right of cross-examination, thorough and sifting, belongs to every party as to the witnesses called against him. If several parties to the same case have distinct interests, each may exercise this right"); 1915, Smith v. Bachus, 195 Ala. 8, 70 So. 261 (applying Circuit Court Rule 18); 1900, Kason's Est., 127 Cal. 496, 59 Pac. 950 (right of cross-examination exists for each party appearing and making claim or answer; here, cross-examination by one claimant as heir allowed to cover the same ground as that covered by another claimant; the trial Court's discretion to prevent useless repetition); Ga. Code 1910, § 6318 ("In all cases in which

ject to reasonable exceptions allowable in the trial Court's discretion;[2] moreover, it ought not to apply to the examination of another witness, nor of the same witness at another stage or by a separate party in the same stage,[3] nor to any process but that of putting the questions to the witness.[4]

(2) The length of time occupied in questioning may of course fitly be the subject of reasonable limits, fixed beforehand if possible;[5] and a mutual agreement as to time is often made.

§ 784. Questions by the Judge. The sporting theory of the common law (post, § 1845) in which litigation was a game of skill, to be conducted according to specific rules and to be decided by the combined effects of skill, strength, and luck, tended to place the judge primarily in the position of the umpire of a game, whose duty it was to interfere only so far as needed to decide whether the rules of the game had been violated. This tendency never dominated (so far as the judge's functions were concerned) in the orthodox English practice; the judge there has never ceased to perform an active and virile part as a director of the proceedings and as an administrator of justice. Nevertheless, in the United States the degenerate tendency has steadily been towards the domination of the function of umpire presiding over contestants in a game; not only has public opinion pressed towards this end, but the judiciary

M. & R. 415, 417 (cross-examinations by counsel for separate parties, allowable); 1874, State v. Bryant, 55 Mo. 75 (rule of Court forbidding more than one counsel on either side to examine; held ineffective to prevent counsel for one co-defendant from cross-examining in addition to counsel for the other co-defendant); 1881, Olive v. State, 11 Nebr. 1, 25, 7 N. W. 444 (the same attorney may be required to complete a single examination of the same witness, unless in exceptional cases; but no reasonable rule can require "the same attorney who took part in the examination in chief to conduct the cross-examination").

E. 731 (similar to Munro v. Stowe); 1919, Com. v. Russ, 232 Mass. 58, 122 N. E. 176 (cross-examination of a defendant lasting three hours, not improper); 1914, People v. Becker, 210 N. Y. 274, 104 N. E. 396 (murder; the principal witness for the prosecution was examined in chief from 10 A.M. till 2.30 P.M., the lunch period intervening, and was then cross-examined until 8.50 P.M., the day being Saturday of a week's trial; a refusal to adjourn the further cross-examination until Monday was held error on the facts, though later in the next week the cross-examiner declined further cross-examination of the witness when tendered for the purpose; this seems unsound; Werner, J., diss.). For the limitation of the number of witnesses, see post, § 1907.

as a whole has often not resisted, but rather abdicated. Several reasons, unnecessary to analyze here, have contributed to this; chief among the illustrations of the tendency is, perhaps, the ill-advised yet almost universal legislative prohibition (post, § 2551) against comments by the judge upon the evidence in his charge to the jury.

(1) One of the natural parts of the judicial function, in its orthodox and sound recognition, is the judge's power and duty to put to the witnesses such additional questions as seem to him desirable to elicit the truth more fully. This just exercise of his function was never doubted at common law; the judge could even call a new witness of his own motion (post, § 2484), and could seek evidence to inform himself judicially (post, § 2569); much more could he ask additional questions of a witness already called but imperfectly examined. Fortunately, in spite of the strong but subtle tendency to force the purely judicial function into the background, the tradition of the common law has never been lost; the right of the judge to interrogate as he thinks best has always been preserved in theory.[1] It has, however, been necessary more frequently to maintain and vindicate it and to resist encroachment upon it. The vicious effect of the rule (post, § 2551) against judicial comments upon the evidence has so undermined the healthy tradition of the common law that many Supreme Courts are found virtually forbidding the trial judge to put questions, unless in exceptional cases. And even in those Supreme Courts which maintain the trial judge's orthodox right, a note of faintheartedness can be heard in their defensive utterances of modern times:

1794, Mr. Edmund Burke, Report of Committee on Warren Hastings' Trial, 31 Parl. Hist. 348: "It is the duty of the Judge to receive every offer of evidence, apparently material, suggested to him, though the parties themselves through negligence, ignorance, or corrupt collusion, should not bring it forward. A judge is not placed in that high situation merely as a passive instrument of parties. He has a duty of his own, independent of them, and that duty is to investigate the truth. . . . Mr. (Assistant District Attorney) Arthur Train, in his book "The Prisoner at the Bar" (1906), pp. 181, 182, has some valuable comments.

Often the subject is expressly treated from the point of view of the statutory or constitutional provision (above noted) against charging the jury upon the effect of the evidence: 1889, People v. Bowers, 79 Cal. 415, 21 Pac. 752 (question held improper as expressing an opinion upon defendant's guilt); 1917, People v. Lurie, 276 Ill. 630, 115 N. E. 130 (a good illustration of the pernicious effect of the doctrine in gagging the trial judge); 1909, Flint v. Stockdale's Estate, 157 Mich. 593, 122 N. W. 279 (an example of improper treatment of the trial judge); 1902, Leo v. State, 63 Nebr. 723, 89 N. W. 303 (similar); 1898, Wilson v. R. Co., 52 S. C. 537, 30 S. E. 406 (judge's interrogation is not a violation of the constitutional prohibition).

Compare Bentham's comments: 1827, Bentham, Rationale of Judicial Evidence, b. II, c. IX (Bowring's ed. vol. VI, p. 343).

arraigns, to examine and cross-examine every witness who presents himself; and the judge is to see it done effectively, and to act his own part in it."

1855, LUMPKIN, J., in Epps v. State, 19 Ga. 118; "We know of no limit to the right which belongs to the Court of interrogating witnesses, either in civil or criminal cases, especially the latter. The life or death of a man may hang upon a full development of the truth. The presumption that this liberty will not be honorably and impartially exercised is not to be tolerated for a moment. When they see, therefore, that a material fact has been omitted which ought to be brought out, it is not only the right but the duty of the presiding judge to call the attention of the witness to it, whether it makes for or against the prosecution; his aim being neither to punish the innocent or screen the guilty, but to administer the law correctly."

1882, BICKWELL, C. C., in Huffman v. Cauble, 86 Ind. 591, 596: "A circuit judge presiding at a trial is not a mere moderator between contending parties; he is a sworn officer charged with grave public duties. In order to establish justice and maintain truth and prevent wrong, he has a large discretion in the application of rules of practice. . . . There is nothing wrong in the Court's asking the witness any question the answer to which would likely throw any light upon the testimony."

1898, HARRISON, C. J., in Bartley v. State, 55 Nebr. 294, 75 N. W. 832: "It is undoubtedly necessary that the judge who presided should acquire as full knowledge of the facts and circumstances of the case on trial as possible, in order that he may instruct the jury, and correctly, to the extent his duty demands, shape the determination of the litigated matters, that justice may not miscarry, but may prevail; and doubtless it is allowable at times, and under some circumstances, for the presiding judge to interrogate a witness. The exact extent or [times] when the exigencies may warrant an exercise of this right are matters which are not capable of very precise statement, but it may be said that the right here in question is one which should be very sparingly exercised, and, generally, counsel for the parties should be relied on and allowed to manage and bring out their own case. The actions of the judge in this respect should never be such as to warrant any assertion that they were with a view to assistance of the one or the other party to the cause."

To restore the pristine principle to full acceptance would be the best single measure that can save trial by jury from permanent inefficiency. Fortunately there are still some States in which Supreme Courts give ample support to the trial Court's exercise of power. The following passage of sturdy eloquence should serve as a lesson in many quarters:

1911, BURCH, J., in State v. Keehn, 85 Kan. 765, 784, 118 Pac. 851 (murder; on a motion for a new trial a witness for defendant made affidavit that the Court interposed and asked questions and assisted in conducting his cross-examination, until, in his confusion, he failed to apprehend the nature of the questions propounded by the court and the counsel for the state; . . . and that by reason of such examination of the court and counsel he was so confused, frightened, embarrassed, and intimidated that he failed to state all of the facts that were within his knowledge as he understood them; that his mind became a blank, and he became so bewildered he must have given the jury the impression that his testimony was not worthy of belief. . . .):

"As a matter of fact the witness was in deep water before the Court intervened at all in his cross-examination. He had contradicted previous statements he had made in the course of the same examination, and had contradicted the testimony he gave at the preliminary examination. After that the Court did make what appears from the record to be a patient and sincere effort to find out what contribution the witness could make to the truth of the matter under investigation. Many of the questions were obviously framed to give the witness poise before answering, and, if he were scared, embarrassed, and bewildered, and if the jury were not impressed by his testimony, the fault lay with him, and not with the court. There is no justification for inserting the word 'intimidated' in Hackenberger's affidavit.

"A very common notion of the function of a trial judge in respect to the examination of witnesses in a criminal case is expressed in the opinion in the case of Dunn v. People, 172 Ill. 582, 595: It is within the power of the court to propound pertinent and properly framed questions to a witness. The exercise of the power, if the questions propounded by the court are directed to crucial points of the case, is most likely to arouse the serious apprehension of the one or the other of the parties, and certainly places counsel in a situation of great embarrassment if they conceive a question asked by the court as leading and suggestive in form or improper for any cause. . . It is believed the instances are rare and the conditions exceptional in a high degree which will justify the presiding judge in entering upon and conducting an extended examination of a witness, and that the exercise of a sound discretion will seldom deem such action necessary or advisible.'

"From this it would appear that, while the judge has ample authority, it is seldom safe for him to undertake to exercise it. This Court entertains a different view. The purpose of a criminal trial is to ascertain the truth about the matters charged in the indictment or information, and it is part of the business of the judge to see that this end is attained. He is not a dumb and mask-faced moderator over a contest between sensitive and apprehensive, or perhaps wily and ingenious, counsel. He is a vital and integral factor in the discovery and elucidation of the facts. He must have a full and accurate comprehension of each and all of the facts in order to instruct the jury, to present the facts to the jury if he should choose to do so (Code Cr. Proc. § 236; Gen. Stat. 1909, § 6815), and to determine, finally, upon a motion for a new trial, whether justice has been done. Therefore, on his own account, he is not obliged to rest content with the modicum of evidence which counsel may dole out, or to accept as final their showing of knowledge, means of knowledge, and credibility on the part of witnesses. But beyond this it is the function of the judge to aid the jury in obtaining a comprehension of the facts equal to his own, in order that a just verdict may be reached. Therefore, whenever in his judgment the proceeding is not being conducted in a way to accomplish the purpose for which alone it is instituted, the full development of the truth, or whenever he can effect a better accomplishment of that purpose, he not only has the right, but it is his duty, to take part. Limitations upon this power appear from the statement of the purpose to be subserved, and are merely those which good sense and propriety suggest. The judge should not place himself in the attitude of helping or hurting either side, but, whenever it appears to him proper, he should fearlessly endeavor to develop the truth with all possible clearness and certainty, whichever side the truth may help or hurt. The judge will always have a personality of his own which he cannot disguise or conceal. But the only tact he need display is sincerity, and, so long as he is sincere, he need feel no timidity in the discharge of his public duty because of the possible tone or inflection of his voice or the play of his features. 'The presumption that this liberty will not be honorably and impartially exercised is not to be tolerated for a moment. Counsel in their zeal to acquit their clients seem to take it for granted that the only object of courts is to convict. Until called upon to discharge the solemn and responsible functions of a judge, they never can fully appreciate the high sense of obligation under which they act, to God and their fellow citizens. . . . Counsel seek only for their client's success; but the judge must watch that justice triumphs.' Epps v. State, 19 Ga. 102, 118, 119. It is natural that able and masterful attorneys should be intolerant and resentful of any participation by the judge in the examination and cross-examination of witnesses. Should the judge exercise his right, professional bias and zeal will always be able to make a strong showing of prejudice on appeal. The result is that too often in this country the lawyers have had their own way, and judges have been reduced to the level of impotent spectators of trials before them, much to the detriment of our criminal jurisprudence. There is nothing in the Constitution or statutes of this State which fetters the efficiency of trial judges as a part of the legal machinery for developing and establishing the facts in criminal cases, and in this case the trial judge did not abuse his power."

(2) It follows that a judge's questions may be leading in form, simply because the reason for the prohibition of leading questions (ante, § 769) has no application to the relation between judge and witness:[2]

1813, ELLENBOROUGH, L. C. J., in 25 Hansard Parl. Deb. 207 (answering criticisms on the procedure of a Commission inquiring into the charges against the Princess of Wales): "Folly, my lords, has said that in examining the witnesses we put leading questions. The accusation is ridiculous; it is almost too absurd to deserve notice. In the first place, admitting the fact, can it be objected to a judge that he put leading questions? Can it be objected to persons in the situation of the Commissioners that they put leading questions? I have always understood, after some little experience, that the meaning of a leading question was this, and this only: That the judge restrains an advocate who produces a witness on one particular side of a question, and who may be supposed to have a leaning to that side of the question, from putting such interrogatories as may operate as an instruction to that witness how he is to reply to favor the party for whom he is adduced. The counsel on the other side, however, may put what questions he pleases, and frame them as best suits his purpose, because then the rule is changed; for there is no danger that the witness will be too complying. But even in a case where evidence is brought forward to support a particular fact, if the witness is obviously adverse to the party calling him, then again the rule does not prevail, and the most leading interrogatories are allowed. But to say that the judge on the bench may not put what questions and in what form he pleases can only originate in that dullness and stupidity which is the curse of the age."

§ 785. Non-Responsive Answers. Where the witness, either in a deposition or on the stand, goes beyond the scope of the question, and makes an answer not responsive, there is here ~~nothing 'per se' wrong~~. If the answer includes irrelevant facts, they may be struck out, and the jury directed to ignore them (ante, § 18); if it furnishes relevant facts, then they are none the less admissible merely because they were not specifically asked for:[1]

1612, Peacock's Case, 9 Co. Rep. 70 b; Peacock, being examined on commission "would have declared the whole truth, which J. H. being a commissioner chosen by the plaintiff would not suffer him to do, but held him strictly to the interrogatories, so that the truth could not appear"; held a great misdemeanor, by the Lord Chancellor, the two Chief Justices, Chief Baron, and the whole Court of the Star-Chamber, "for it is the murdering of truth and right"; commissioners "are not strictly tied to the words of the interrogatories, but to everything also which necessarily ariseth thereupon for the manifestation of the whole truth concerning the matter in question. . . . If the truth should be by such means suppressed, and falsely certified in the examinations, so the innocent would be oftentimes punished to the guilty escape punishment, and justice and right would be utterly subverted; for as is commonly said, the suppression of truth is the oppression of the innocent."

1920, POWERS, J., in Underwood v. Cray, Cray v. Underwood, — Vt. —, 108 Atl. 513:

"It is not every irresponsive answer given by a party that will support an exception; not only must such an answer be improper in substance, but it must be apparent that the party intends to go beyond the question and to gain an advantage."

The only ground of complaint for non-responsive answers is that, in the case of a deposition (for the reason above noted), such an answer may entitle the opponent to additional cross-examination on the new matter, — a rule dealt with elsewhere (post, § 1392). Courts ought to cease repeating the novel and unwholesome assertion [2] that "where an answer is not responsive to the question put, it is the duty of the Court to strike it out, on motion."

This topic of responsiveness has somehow become in modern times beset with crude misunderstandings, that tend to suppress truth and turn the inquiry into a logomachy:

(1) Sometimes it is said that the party questioning may object on this ground, but not the opposing party.[3] But there should be no such distinction; if the answer gives an admissible fact, it is receivable, whether the question covered it or not. No party is owner of facts in his private right. No party can impose silence on the witness called by Justice.

(2) That a party waives objection to a responsive answer, by the very asking of the question, is noticed ante, § 18.

(3) That an opponent is entitled to the striking out of an answer which is non-responsive and inadmissible, is noticed ante, § 18; but this is merely a rule excusing him from not having objected before the answer.

§ 786. Improper Suggestion otherwise than by Questions. Upon the general principle controlling Testimonial Narration or Communication (ante, § 766), it should represent so far as possible the sincere expression of his Recollection and Observation. Any and all forms of suggestion or instruction, therefore, which appear in fact to deprive his statement of this fundamental quality, may be forbidden. "A good witness should say from his heart, 'Non sum doctus nec instructus.'" [1] The regulations which prevent an improper use of written memoranda to aid recollection (ante, §§ 734, 758) and of counsel's leading questions (ante, § 769), have already been examined. But there may be other ways in which the principle may be violated. Any method may be prevented, according as it does or does not, in the case in hand, seem to supply the witness with ready-made statements not being the genuine expression of his present belief.

§ 786. [1] 1629, Coke, Fourth Institute 279.

(1) Remaining in court during the other witnesses' testimony may teach a witness how to shape his own testimony falsely to the best advantage of his own party's case; this may be prevented by sequestering the witnesses, — an expedient examined elsewhere (post, §§ 1837–1842). So, also, remaining in court during a discussion of the admissibility of the witness' intended evidence may be equally availed of improperly; this may be prevented by a similar expedient.[2]

(2) A witness may, after listening to other testimony, desire to take the stand again to make a correction of his former testimony. Whether this is a sincere effort on his part to tell the exact truth as he believes it, or a false effort to shape his testimony in consistency with what he has heard, is often difficult to determine; and this consideration must enter into the Court's decision. But in form the question is whether a witness may be recalled after closing his testimony, and this is dealt with (post, §§ 1896 ff.) in considering the order of Evidence.[3]

(3) The mere fact that a witness has become aware beforehand of another witness' intended testimony is, of itself and apart from the above situations and expedients, no objection to his testimony;[4] any attempt to control testimony in such respects would be futile. At the same time, any communication, made to the witness within the court, may in a given case be improper and be treated as such.[5]

(4) In identifying persons or material objects, it is of course more effective if the thing to be identified is so placed with others that the witness' selection appears to be unaided.[6] Nevertheless, no rule has ever required this, —

[2] 1837, R. v. Murphy, 8 C. & P. 307 (Coleridge, J.: "It is almost a right for the opposite party to have a witness out of court while a discussion is going on as to his evidence"); 1839, R. v. Gaynor, 1 Cr. & D. 142, 145 (objection because the offered witness "was present in court when the questions were raised and partly discussed"; Torrens, J., "exercising a sound discretion" refused to allow his examination).

partly because of its frequent impracticability, partly because the lack of such a precaution plainly enough detracts from the value of the testimony, and partly because the witness has usually had so many prior opportunities of private verification that such a public test would often give a false appearance of spontaneous and unaided selection.

§ 787. Same: Prepared Deposition; Expert Reading a Prepared Report. (5) Since the witness' statement must correspond spontaneously to his actual recollection, it is plain that to permit him, as a practice, to commit to writing beforehand certain statements and then to read them or hand them in as his testimony would be to risk fabrication and coached testimony. This mode of furnishing testimony is universally prohibited.

It is of course to be distinguished from the use of writings which genuinely revive a present recollection (ante, § 758) or record a past recollection (ante, § 734). Indeed, the object of the restrictions placed upon those two uses of writing is chiefly to ensure that they are not writings of the prohibited and improper sort. The distinction is a clear one, namely, between writings which frankly purport to be used to aid memory (in which they are to be tested by the appropriate restrictions) and writings which do not purport to be so used; the latter falling within the present prohibition.

The present prohibition applies equally of course to oral testimony as well as written depositions. Nevertheless, its application has been more usual in the case of depositions, because there the temptation to use written preparations is greater, and the impropriety is less glaring; for, when testimony is about to be immediately written down and the witness' demeanor as observable by a jury plays no part, there is a natural inclination to facilitate progress by having precise written answers ready, and the contrast between the writing thus prepared and the writing ensuing from the officer's hand is less apparent. Nevertheless, the opportunity and the danger of fabrication are none the less real; and Courts unite in emphasizing the importance of freeing a deposition from the vice of being a mere copy of a prior concocted statement: [1]

1808, ELDON, L. C., in Shaw v. Lindsey, 15 Ves. Jr. 380, 381: "Upon general principles nothing is more clear than that a witness before commissioners cannot be examined in such a manner that the effect is, not his testimony given in answer to interrogatories, but (as it is termed) filing an affidavit. . . . All courts of justice are extremely anxious to secure the pure examination of witnesses by not permitting that mode of examination which could lead to infinite mischief. Many instances have occurred of a witness coming into court holding in his hand an answer which he has conscientiously framed as his answer to interrogatories, with the substance of which he may be acquainted, — the answer of an honest, conscientious man, and the value of his testimony perhaps not diminished by his anxiety to be correct. Yet courts of law and equity, with the view of excluding general mischief, concur in refusing to allow it. . . . The habitual practice of law, upon an examination 'viva voce', is not to permit any suggestion to the witness by the attorney, counsel, or any other person; the same strictness prevails in this court, where the extent of mischievous management that would ensue, if a witness should be permitted to go before commissioners with a prepared deposition, is obvious."

He should be free to answer the sifting interrogatories that are framed for the issue in that case, instead of merely filing an affidavit ready drawn."

W. 747 (deposition excluded where the officer taking it used to some extent in framing the answers a memorandum of desired testimony furnished by one of the parties).

For the impropriety of the officer who takes the deposition being an agent or kinsman of the party, see post, § 803.

Distinguish also the ordinary use of memoranda of a past recollection, ante, § 745, under which would come most memoranda by experts.

But the foregoing principles should be left flexible, to fit the facts of testimonial psychology. Sometimes a prepared statement has advantages, without risk of fabrication. In many cases, especially where an expert witness upon a subject of scientific knowledge has made an investigation or analysis and is called to testify, it makes for his own lucidity and accuracy, and for better comprehension and valuation of his testimony, if he first reads his written report stating in precise terms his observations and inferences. This practice should be freely permitted. It goes slightly beyond the technical rule for the use of memoranda of past recollection (ante, § 740); but that rule is a mere precautionary one. Here the policy of seeking the greatest light on the subject requires flexible liberty to use this method.[2]

§ 787*a*. Answer by Reference. (6) An analogous mode of narration, in which opportunity is furnished for fabrication by adopting a prior statement without resort to actual recollection of details, consists in questioning by reference to another person's statement and seeking what may be termed an "indorsing" answer verifying the other statement by adoption. Such a question is ordinarily to be disapproved;[1] for the answer may be merely a mechanical one:

1811, WASHINGTON, J., in Richardson v. Golden, 3 Wash. C. C. 109 (witnesses were asked if an 'ex parte' certificate of facts prepared by some of them "contained the truth"): "The mode pursued in this case is calculated to produce perjury. It is worse than leading questions, or telling the witness what to say, because he is here reminded of the necessity of swearing to what he has before stated or of suffering in his credit."

1860, FOWLER, J., in Eames v. Eames, 41 N. H. 177, 179 (the witness having been merely asked at the trial whether he agreed with or differed from the testimony of D. as to a transaction): "The credit of the witness before the jury, and the greater or less confidence he secures with them, often depend very much on the manner in which he relates the details of the transactions about which he testifies, the intelligence with which he groups the various circumstances surrounding them, the general capacity and information he exhibits in relation to the subject-matter of his testimony, and the accuracy with which he is able to remember and state minute and apparently trivial and unimportant incidents therewith. . . . If either party insists upon it, he is entitled to have the witness state fully all details of his testimony upon the stand."

On cross-examination, however, there being no danger of suggestion or mechanical indorsement, this form of question is allowable;[2] at least, the objection to it rests upon a totally different ground, namely, the Opinion rule;

[2] The authorities are noted post, § 1385 (right of cross-examination). The practice is also material in the reformed method of securing expert testimony (ante, § 563).

§ 787*a*. [1] Nevertheless, on direct examination, when the witness has once answered a question in detail, he may for a subsequent question covering the same ground refer back to his first answer: 1861, Black v. Black, 38 Ala. 112 (deposition); on cross-examination, however, the cross-examiner may oblige him to repeat his direct testimony in detail: supra, § 782, par. 3.

[2] 1888, Parnell Commission's Proceedings, 24th day, Times' Rep. pt. 7, p. 76 (asking A whether, if X has said so-and-so, it is incorrect, allowed; contra, semble, 31st day, pt. 8, p. 199): 1900, State v. Taylor, 56 S. C. 360, 34 S. E. 939 (witnesses may be told, "either correctly or incorrectly, what another witness on the same side has testified to, with a view to test the correctness of the memory or the honesty of the witness"; here the question was allowed, "If your husband says . . . is he telling the truth or a falsehood?").

for while this question may properly serve to emphasize a contradiction on a specific point between witnesses on the same side (post, § 1838) or to exhibit the witness' vacillation or uncertainty, it should not be used as a mode of improperly extracting one witness' opinion on the general credibility of another (post, §§ 1964, 1985).

§ 788. Same: Prior Conference with Attorney; Knowledge of Questions. (7) How far any attempt can be made judicially to prevent improper suggestion furnished out of court by mere conference with the attorney or by obtaining prior knowledge of the tenor of his questions, is a difficult problem, which has been solved by declining to lay down any rules. The absolute necessity of such a conference for legitimate purposes is conceded; no cautious attorney ought to put forward a witness whose testimony in at least its general tenor is unknown to him; and a personal conference is the best method of obtaining such information accurately. This right may be abused, and often is; but to prevent the abuse by any definite rule seems impracticable.

It would seem, therefore, that nothing short of an actual fraudulent conference for concoction of testimony could properly be taken notice of; there is no specific rule of behavior capable of being substituted for the proof of such facts.[1] The judicial attitude towards this problem may be gathered from the following passages:

1637, Lord Keeper COVENTRY, in Bishop of Lincoln's Trial, 3 How. St. Tr. 769, 802 (the Bishop being charged with tampering with witnesses): "Now it may be said, said he [the defendant], 'May not a man meddle nor question with a witness?' Yes; but with certain limitations, for else, if witnesses be made and corrupted, the jurors and judges both of them may be abused; and if that witnesses may be led and instructed by questions, or the like, it comes to all one as subornation. A solicitor may warn witnesses to come in, he may incite them, and enforce them, and one as well as the other. . . . But a solicitor must not instruct a witness, nor threaten him, nor carry letters to him, to induce him this way or that. Yet he may discourse with him, and ask him what he can say to this or that point, and so he may know whether he be fit to be used in the cause or no; by which means this Court is freed from the labor of asking many idle questions of the witnesses to no end, if they can say nothing to them and so spend good time to no end nor purpose. Yet he may not persuade him or threaten him to say more or less than he of himself was inclined unto and was by his conscience beforehand bound to deliver as truth."

§ 788. [1] Accord: 1835, Kelly v. French, Ll. & Goo. 166 (Ire.; L. C. Plunket; copies of interrogatories sent beforehand to deponent, who pencilled marginal notes as to his intended replies, not suppressed, because it was the solicitor's duty to ascertain beforehand from witnesses "the extent of their information"); 1911, State v. Papa, 32 R. I. 453, 80 Atl. 12 (the defendant's counsel has a right to interview witnesses already summoned by the State).

The following ruling is unsound: 1909, Eads v. State, 17 Wyo. 490, 101 Pac. 946 (questions seeking to clear away an inference of counsel's suggestion in conference with a witness, excluded).

Compare § 786, par. 3, 5, ante. The admissibility of expert testimony got by 'ex parte' consultation and investigation is not to be doubted on the present ground; its admissibility from another point of view is dealt with post, § 1385.

For the admissibility of statements of physical pain, made to an expert when qualifying himself for testimony, see post, § 1721.

For suggestion in general as a reason for excluding Hearsay statements post litem motam, see the various Hearsay exceptions.

For impeachment on the ground of bias through money or other favors furnished before trial, see post, §§ 949, 961.

1842, Lord LANGDALE, M. R., in Sayer v. Wagstaff, 5 Beav. 462, 467: "It is right for a solicitor to communicate with a witness to know what he can depose. That is a thing necessary to be done before the interrogatories can be prepared; and I do not mean to say that it is at all improper for a solicitor to take down from a witness what he can depose to, or that it is improper for both parties to see a witness to inquire what he can depose to. But what was done here? A witness had been examined and communicated with on behalf of the plaintiffs, not as to what he could say on the whole question, but as to what had been prepared for him to say on behalf of the plaintiffs; A. B., [nominated commissioner, but secretly also acting as defendant's solicitor,] goes to the solicitor of the plaintiffs, who shows him drafts of depositions ready for the witnesses to depose. I think this was not a right thing to do."

1867, MONCURE, J., in Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. 187, 223: "A witness ought not to write his deposition or his answers beforehand, nor ought they to be written for him beforehand by counsel or any other person; but he ought to answer the questions orally and from memory as they are propounded to him. Parties or their counsel may, orally or by writing, previous to his examination, direct his attention to the facts in regard to which he is intended to be examined, and he may refresh his memory in regard to such facts by examining books and papers, and make memoranda from them and otherwise, especially of dates and amounts."

1877, COLE, J., in Allen v. Seyfried, 43 Wis. 414, 418: "The practice of allowing a witness to read or to know, previous to examination, what questions will be asked him, is doubtless liable to abuse, and may sometimes almost destroy the value of a cross-examination. A hostile or dishonest witness, knowing in advance what questions were to be asked, would be put upon his guard, and might so prepare his answers as to suppress the truth, conceal his bias, or avoid self-contradiction. This is all very evident. But still, it is absolutely necessary, in certain cases where a witness is to be examined in reference to a transaction which was the subject of correspondence, or which involved numerous items or dates, that he should be informed beforehand of the nature and scope of the questions he will be called upon to answer, in order that he may be prepared for the examination; for it is obvious that without some previous preparation to refresh his memory in such cases, his testimony would be nearly or quite valueless. We think, therefore, to lay down a rule that it is sufficient ground for suppressing a deposition, if it appear that the witness was allowed to read and examine the direct and cross interrogatories before he gave his evidence, would be inconvenient and dangerous as a rule of practice."

B. NON-VERBAL[1] TESTIMONY

§ 789. Dramatic Communication (Gesture, Dumb-show, etc.). Man does not communicate by words alone; and it may occur that words become inferior to action as a mode of communicating a correct impression of a scene observed. Certainly, in an appropriate case, it is proper and customary for the trial Court in its discretion to sanction a departure from the ordinary or verbal medium and permit the witness to make clearer his own observed data by representing them in gesture, dumb-show, or other dramatic mode.[2] Whether it is

§ 789. [1] "Verbal" is here used to signify "expressed in words"; "oral", to signify "spoken, not written."

[2] 1897, Linehan v. State, 113 Ala. 70, 21 So. 497 (held improper for counsel to walk across the room and ask the witness if the deceased walked as fast as that in advancing on the defendant; this is clearly unsound); 1895, People v. Chin Hane, 108 Cal. 597, 41 Pac. 697 (illustrating on a wall or door in the court-room the location of a bullet-mark; left to Court's discretion); 1897, People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 175, 48 Pac. 75 (murder; draping the clothing of the murdered woman upon a dress-frame, for better identification, allowed); 1888, Tudor Iron Works v. Weber, 31 Ill. App. 312 (wearing more useful to do so must depend much on the circumstances of the case. The only general and disfavoring consideration to be noted is that the witness' dramatic expression may be calculated to give unfair emphasis and create improper emotional effects;[3] but this can rarely occur.

§ 790. Models, Maps, Diagrams, Photographs; General Principle. It would be folly to deny ourselves on the witness-stand those effective media of communication commonly employed at other times as a superior substitute for words. If a simple line-plan of a house is more satisfactory than a mass of alphabetical letters arranged in words, as a mode of communicating the relative position of the house-rooms as observed by us, then this method of communication is equally proper to be resorted to in a witness' communications to a jury.

There can be no dispute upon this point. No judicial elaboration of it would have been necessary, except for the peculiar danger and fallacy that lurks always in the use of writings and other materials of non-oral expression. This is considered more fully in another connection (post, § 2130); it is, briefly, that a material object, particularly a writing, when presented as purporting to be of a certain origin, always tends to impress the mind unconsciously, upon the bare sight of it, with the verity of its purport. Does it purport to

W. 52 ("Look out, below!" repeated by witness with loudness, to show the nature of a warning given); 1904, Clark v. Brooklyn H. R. Co., 177 N. Y. 357, 69 N. E. 647 (plaintiff-witness' illustration of his nervous affection caused by the injury, held doubtful, as being "under the sole control of the witness himself"; here not improper in discretion); 1892, State v. Ellwood, 17 R. I. 763, 769, 24 Atl. 782 (burglar's mask, etc., used to describe appearance of burglar); 1898, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Ray, 101 Tenn. 1, 46 S. W. 554 (articles placed in court-room to illustrate testimony).

In the trial of O'Connell, 5 St. Tr. N. S. 1, 248 (1843), is an amusing cross-examination of a witness who endeavored to represent the treasonable significance of one of the great orator's — pauses! There is certainly one great historical pause which could never again be reproduced in its effect: "Caesar had his Brutus — Charles the First, his Cromwell — and George the Third — ('Treason', cried the Speaker) — may profit by their example!"

The cases cited post, § 790 (models and diagrams), and post, § 1152 (autoptic proference, or "real evidence"), are sometimes difficult to distinguish from those falling under the present head. For additional and interesting instances of the present sort, occurring at 'nisi prius', see a series of articles by Mr. Irving Browne, in 5 Green Bag, passim.

The following statutes belong here: Can. Dom. R. S. 1906, c. 145, § 6 (quoted post, 811, n. 3); Alta. St. 1910, 2d sess., Evidence Act, c. 3, § 18 (quoted post, § 811, n. 3); Sask. R. S. 1920, c. 44, 538 (quoted post, § 811, n. 3).

Co. v. Rutledge, 142 Ala. 195, 39 So. 338 (personal injury; the plaintiff allowed to "walk the best he could before the jury"); 1904, Plunkett v. State, 72 Ark. 409, 82 S. W. 845 (rape under age; the prosecutrix testifying with the babe in her lap, held not erroneous); 1862, People v. Graham, 21 Cal. 261, 266 (the child, the alleged subject of a rape, burst into tears when testifying; "unless we can trust to the intelligence and integrity of juries to withstand such influences, we must dispense with the use of juries as a part of the machinery for the administration of justice"); 1904, Blanchard v. Holyoke St. R. Co., 186 Mass. 582, 72 N. E. 94 (a motion to permit the plaintiff in a personal injury suit to testify while reclining on a stretcher, held not improperly denied on the facts, in the trial Court's discretion); 1906, State v. Barrick, 60 W. Va. 576, 55 S. E. 652 (rape; that the prosecutrix testified while lying ill on a cot, held not improper); 1898, Selleck v. Janesville, 100 Wis. 157, 75 N. W. 975 (plaintiff's testimony taken as she lay ill on a lounge; not improper).

Compare the application of the same consideration to autoptic proference, or "real evidence" (post, §§ 1157, 1158; exhibition of injured limbs, etc.), and the principle forbidding indecent testimony (post, § 2180).

be a contract signed by A and B? We immediately assume it to be such; though it may be the merest forgery. Does it purport to be a picture of the place of a murder? We look at it with an interest based on the unconscious assumption that it is that house. In short, we unwittingly give the document the credit of speaking for itself; though no human being has yet spoken for it. Now this tendency has to be rigorously repressed; and as it is in the present relation that this tendency finds one of its most frequent manifestations, so it is here that the tendency has so frequently to be struck at by judicial rulings.

We are to remember, then, that a document purporting to be a map, picture, or diagram, is, for evidential purposes simply nothing, except so far as it has a human being's credit to support it. It is mere waste paper, — a testimonial nonenity. It speaks to us no more than a stock or a stone. It can of itself tell us no more as to the existence of the thing portrayed upon it than can a tree or an ox. We must somehow put a testimonial human being behind it (as it were) before it can be treated as having any testimonial standing in court. It is somebody's testimony, — or it is nothing.[1] It may, sometimes, to be sure, not be offered as a source of evidence, but only as a document whose existence and tenor are material in the substantive law applicable to the case, — as where, on a prosecution for stealing a map or in ejectment for land conveyed by deed containing a map, the map is to be used irrespective of the correctness of the drawing; here we do not believe anything because the map represents it.[2] But whenever such a document is offered as proving a thing to be as therein represented, then it is offered testimonially, and it must be associated with a testifier.

Two consequences plainly follow. On the one hand, the mere picture or map itself cannot be received except as a non-verbal expression of the testimony of some witness competent to speak to the facts represented. On the other hand, it is immaterial whose hand prepared the thing, provided it is presented to the tribunal by a competent witness as a representation of his knowledge.

These consequences remain to be more fully considered. It is sufficient to note at this point that, by universal judicial concession, a map, model, diagram, or photograph, takes an evidential place simply as a non-verbal mode of expressing a witness' testimony:

1864, WILLES, J., in R. v. Tolson, 4 F. & F. 103 (admitting a photograph to prove identity of person): "The photograph was admissible because it is only a visible representation of the image or impression made upon the minds of the witnesses by the sight of the person or the object it represents, and therefore is in reality only another species of the evidence which persons give of identity when they speak merely from memory."

1857, TENNEY, C. J., in State v. Knight, 43 Me. 132: "It would be very difficult for an expert of the most accurate and extensive observation to exhibit in language with precision, so as to be understood, those delicate appearances which are appreciable only by the sense of vision. Nothing short of an exact representation to the sight can give with certainty a perfectly correct idea to the mind."

1873, PETERS, C. J., in Shook v. Pate, 50 Ala. 92: "A diagram . . . is at best an approximation, and in this sense it is indifferent by whom it is made. . . . A witness may as well speak by a diagram and linear description, when the thing may be so described, as by words. . . . It is enough if it serves the purpose of the witness in the explanation of the lines and localities he is seeking to exhibit."

1881, FOLGER, C. J., in Cowley v. People, 83 N. Y. 478: "A witness who speaks to personal appearance or identity tells in more or less detail the minutiae thereof as taken in by his eye. What he says is a description thereof by one mode of signs, by words orally uttered. If his testimony be written instead of spoken and is offered as a deposition, it is a description in another mode of signs, by words written; and the value of that mode, the deposition, depends upon the accuracy with which his words uttered are put into words written. Now if he has before him a portrait or photograph of the person, and it shows to him a correct copy of that person, if it produce to his view a correct description, which he testifies is a likeness, why may not that be given to the jury as a description of the person by the witness in another mode of signs?"

1897, CLARK, J., in Hampton v. R. Co., 120 N. C. 534, 27 S. E. 963: "A map not made under the order of the Court is really only the declaration, so to speak, of the party making it. Its reliability depends entirely upon his accuracy and conscientiousness, and is therefore only admissible as his evidence, and because it may convey to the eyes of the jury somewhat more accurately the description which the witness was endeavoring to convey to their ears by his oral testimony."

1899, VALLIANT, J., in Baustian v. Young, 152 Mo. 317, 53 S. W. 921: "[Photographs] are of the same character of evidence as diagrams and pictures drawn by hand; not necessarily carrying the same degree of probative force, but still of the same character; not in themselves evidence at all, but representing to the eye what the witness declares was the real appearance of the things at the times he saw it. Diagrams, drawings, and photographs are resorted to only because the witness cannot, with language, as clearly convey to the minds of the Court and jury the scene as the light printed it on the retina of his own eye at the time of which he is testifying."

§ 791. Same; Instances of Maps, Models, and Diagrams. The use of maps, models, and diagrams, as modes of conveying a witness' knowledge, is illustrated in manifold rulings, as well as in the daily practice of trials.[1]

§ 791. [1] Maps, drawings, diagrams: ENGLAND: 1817, Watson's Trial, 32 How. St. Tr. 125 (Mr. Gurney: "I believe on the next day you made a sketch of the waggon [with the people standing in it]?" Mr. Wetherell: "I object to the description in writing; it is matter of verbal description"; Mr. Attorney-General: "My lord, I cannot conceive the objection"; Lord Ellenborough, to witness: "Go on, go on. Can there be any objection to the production of a drawing, or a model, as illustrative of evidence? Surely there is nothing in the objection"; the witness produced his drawing of the waggon, with a flag at each end and the banner in the centre; it was handed to the jury, and then to Mr. Wetherell).

Va. 58, 63, 17 S. E. 794 (diagram of distance); 1893, Poling v. R. Co., 38 W. Va. 645, 657, 18 S. E. 782 (scene of injury by railway mail-crane); 1899, King v. Jordon, 46 W. Va. 106, 32 S. E. 1022; Wisconsin: 1857, Vilas v. Reynolds, Wis. 214, 224 (plat).

(2) The map or diagram may be offered as a part of a constitutive document — such as a deed or contract, and not as testimony; or a party's admission may make the map receivable; with such uses the present principle is not concerned.

(3) When the map or diagram comes in as a part of testimony, it is evidence, like any other part of the witness' utterance.[2] Whether it should go to the jury-room with other documents depends upon the general rule applicable to that question (post, § 1913); perhaps not all written testimony may be taken to the jury-room, but the map is none the less written testimony.

(4) A map, model, or diagram, though made out of court, is nevertheless subject to cross-examination through the witness who verifies and uses it. Hence the objection based on the Hearsay rule, that it is prepared 'ex parte', is groundless (post, § 1385).

§ 792. Same: Instances of Photographs. A photograph, like a map or diagram, is a witness' pictured expression of the data observed by him and therein communicated to the tribunal more accurately than by words. Its use for this purpose is sanctioned beyond question.[1]

Models: 1895, Davis v. Power Co., 107 Cal. 563, 40 Pac. 953; 1898, People v. Searcy, 121 Cal. 1, 53 Pac. 359 (showing the jury boot-tracks artificially made in a box of sand, allowed); 1906, People v. Maughs, 149 Cal. 253, 86 Pac. 187 (murder; model of the part of the house, admitted); 1895, Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Kelly, 156 Ill. 9, 40 N. E. 938; 1905, Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Walker, 217 Ill. 605, 75 N. E. 520 (skeleton of a foot, used to explain an injury); 1916, Logan v. Empire D. El. Co., 99 Kan. 381, 161 Pac. 659 (injury by electric wires; model of poles and wires, admitted); 1895, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Berry, 96 Ky. 604, 29 S. W. 449; 1887, Earl v. Lafler, 10 N. Y. St. Rep. 807 (impression of a horse's mouth, in wax or plaster); 1902, Moran Bros. Co. v. Snoqualmie F. P. Co., 29 Wash. 292, 69 Pac. 759 (model of a regulator-box for a power-plant).

Many additional instances, never reaching an appellate tribunal, might be collected, — such as the use of manikin bodies in the Borden trial (Mass. 1893), of a church-model in miniature in the Durrant trial (Cal. 1897).

[2] This is sufficiently illustrated by the remarks quoted in some of the citations in the preceding note. There has, however, been here and there a tendency to confuse the subject, as illustrated in the following passage: 1853, Chilton, C. J., in Campbell v. State, 23 Ala. 44, 83: "The rule is that a witness may use a plat, diagram, or map, made in any way, to explain or make himself intelligible to a jury, though it cannot go to them as evidence; it amounted to no more than if the witness had written down his testimony to aid his memory on the examination, and no one would contend that such memorandum as a matter of right could be taken by the jury [into the jury-room]." Here the fallacy consists in treating the question whether written testimony may be taken to the jury-room (a question of trial procedure) with the question whether a duly verified map is written testimony; and also in invoking the false analogy of a paper reviving recollection, which is of course (ante, § 763) not testimony.

So also: 1911, Napier v. Little, 137 Ga. 242, 73 S. E. 3: "The map of a county surveyor, while not evidence, under the circumstances of this case, is admissible to go to the jury as a mere diagram to illustrate other testimony." Under this convenient but insidious term "illustrate", it is easy to re-classify almost any kind of evidence. Courts often fail to perceive that a diagram, map, or photograph is always somebody's say-so, and that therefore some explanation is always due of why that somebody is not in court to verify his graphic statement.

§ 792. [1] In the following cases photographs were declared admissible, except where otherwise noted: ENGLAND: 1862, R. v. United Kingdom El. T. Co., 3 F. & F. 73, 74 (electric-wire posts as highway-obstructions); 1864, R. v. Folson, 4 id. 103, 104 (personal features); 1874, R. v. Castro (Tichborne Case), charge of C. J. Cockburn, I, 640 (grotto), I, 672, II, 59 (personal features); 1876, Durst v. Masters, L. R. 1 P. D. 378 (premises).

UNITED STATES: Federal: 1896, Scott v. New Orleans, 21 C. C. A. 402, 75 Fed. 373 (a sidewalk-defect); 1896, Wilson v. U. S., 162 U. S. 613, 16 Sup. 895 (the deceased, on a charge of murder); 1900, Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Roller, 41 C. C. A. 22, 100 Fed. 738 (railroad accident); 1901, Considine v. U. S.,

Certain discriminations, however, which may affect its admissibility from other points of view, need to be made:

50 U. S. 272, 112 Fed. 342 (photographs taken over four years before, identified as being good likenesses at the time of the burglary in question); 1902, Southern P. Co. v. Huntsman, 55 U. S. 366, 118 Fed. 412 (train-wreck); 1905, Toledo Traction Co. v. Cameron, 137 Fed. 48, 66, 69 C. C. A. 28 (plaintiff's injured leg); 1906, Porter v. Buckley, 147 Fed. 140, C. C. A. (automobile accident; photographs of the locality, taken more than a year afterwards, excluded); 1915, Coronas v. American R. Co., 7 P. R. Fed. 429; 1916, De Diego v. Rovira, 9 P. R. Fed. 17 (location of a dam);
Alabama: 1875, Luke v. Calhoun Co., 52 Ala. 118 (personal features); 1889, Kansas City M. & B. R. Co. v. Smith, 90 Ala. 27, 8 So. 43 (train-wreck); 1905, Russell v. State, — Ala. —, 38 So. 291 (person of the defendants);
Arkansas: 1906, Kansas C. S. R. Co. v. Morris, 80 Ark. 528, 98 S. W. 363 (railroad injury); 1920, Young v. State, 144 Ark. 71, 221 S. W. 478 (carnal abuse of female under 16; the female being in court, a photograph taken some years before was excluded as needless);
California: 1889, Re Jessup, 81 Cal. 418, 21 Pac. 976, 22 Pac. 742 (personal features); 1897, People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179, 48 Pac. 75 (deceased while alive); 1899, People v. Phelan, 123 Cal. 551, 56 Pac. 424 (place of homicide); 1899, People v. Crandall, 125 Cal. 129, 57 Pac. 785 (scene of a crime); 1907, People v. Grill, 151 Cal. 592, 91 Pac. 515 (place of homicide); 1905, People v. Mahatch, 148 Cal. 200, 82 Pac. 779 (locality of homicide, showing the position of body, knife, hat, etc., as re-arranged by a witness who testified to the correct placing); 1906, People v. Maughs, 149 Cal. 253, 86 Pac. 187 (murder; photograph of a person in the supposed position of the deceased, excluded); 1920, People v. Northcott, — Cal. App. —, 189 Pac. 704 (murder by abortion, photograph of place of finding body, admitted);
Columbia (Dist.): 1904, Shaffer v. U. S., 24 D. C. App. 417, 424 (accused); Connecticut: 1889, Dyson v. R. Co., 57 Conn. 24, 17 Atl. 137 (railroad-crossing); 1899, McGar v. Bristol, 71 Conn. 652, 42 Atl. 1000 (premises); 1899, Cunningham v. R. Co., 72 Conn. 244, 43 Atl. 1047 (condition of rails; photograph not testified to as correct, excluded); 1900, Harris v. Ansonia, 73 Conn. 359, 47 Atl. 672 (highway and premises; held not improperly rejected in discretion); 1901, Wetherell v. Hollister, 73 Conn. 622, 48 Atl. 826 (weight of photographs as to correctness is for the jury); 1902, State v. Cook, 75 Conn. 267, 53 Atl. 589 (condition of horses as to flesh; admissible in discretion); 1913, Moffitt v. Connecticut Co., 86 Conn. 527, 86 Atl. 16 (street-car injury); the condition of a place or person at the time of taking the photograph is not evidence of the condition at the time in issue (ante, § 438);[2] or that the outward appearance of a person is not evidential of his inward condition (ante, §§ 226, 228, 229);[3] or that the features of a child are not evidence, by resemblance, of a particular person's paternity (ante, § 166).[4] These objections are seldom favorably considered by the Courts; but it is obvious that the decision in any case rests on principles of relevancy of the fact pictured, and does not affect the propriety of evidencing a relevant fact by a photograph.

(2) There may be an objection, not to the photographic testimony as such, but to the reproduction of a corporal injury or other object calculated unduly to excite sympathy for one party and unfair prejudice against the other;[5] this objection is identical with that considered (post, §§ 1157, 1158) for autoptic proference (or, real evidence), and a similar application of principle would be made.

(3) The objection that a photograph may be so made as to misrepresent the object is genuinely directed against its testimonial soundness; but it is of no validity. It is true that a photograph can be deliberately so taken as to convey the most false impression of the object.[6] But so also can any witness lie in his words. A photograph can falsify just as much and no more than the human being who takes it or verifies it. The fallacy of the objection occurs in assuming that the photograph can come in testimonially without a competent person's oath to support it (post, § 793). If a qualified observer is found to say, "This photograph represents the fact as I saw it", there is no more reason to exclude it than if he had said, "The following words represent the fact as I saw it", which is always in effect the tenor of a witness' oath. If no witness has thus attached his credit to the photograph, then it should not come in at all, any more than an anonymous letter should be received as testimony. There can be no middle ground between these two consequences. Occasionally a Court is found excluding a photograph as being misleading;[7] but this is a begging of the very question which the jury have to decide; it would be as anomalous as if the judge were to order a witness from the stand because he was believed by the judge to be lying. Perjury cannot be thus determined in advance by the judge, — not more for photographic than for verbal testimony.

[6] Striking illustrations of this may be found in an article by Mr. Fitzgerald, "Some Curiosities of Modern Photography", in the "Strand Magazine" for January and February, 1895, and in the "Curiosities" appendix and in the articles in the same magazine before and since that date; also in a quotation from the London "Tidbits", in an article by Mr. Irving Browne, 5 Green Bag 62; and in the magazines of photography since that date.

There is a Massachusetts doctrine[8] that the trial Court may in its discretion reject a photograph as being under the circumstances not sufficiently "instructive"; in other words, the Court rules that cumulative testimony, by superfluously adding a pictured description to a verbal description, is on the facts not needed. Such a rule may be justified as an application of the general principle (post, § 1907) permitting the rejection of cumulative testimony; but not otherwise. The judge may properly warn the jury as to the peculiar deceptive possibilities of photographs, just as he may remind them of the possibilities of perjury for interested witnesses and others; but this is all; and this sufficiently protects the opponent, since he has an equal if not a greater opportunity of exposing photographic perjury than of exposing other sorts.[9]

§ 793. Verification of Maps, Photographs, etc.; General Principle. The use of maps, models, diagrams, and photographs as testimony to the objects represented rests fundamentally (as already noted in § 790) on the theory that they are the pictorial communications of a qualified witness who uses this method of communication instead of or in addition to some other method. It follows, then, that the map or photograph must first. to be admissible, be made a part of some qualified person's testimony. Some one must stand forth as its testimonial sponsor; in other words (as commonly said), it must be verified. There is nothing anomalous or exceptional in this requirement of verification; it is simply the exaction of those testimonial qualities which are required equally for all witnesses; the application merely takes a different form. A witness must have had observation of the data in question (ante, § 650), must recollect his observations (ante, § 725), and must correctly express his observation and recollection (ante, § 766). Here, then, is a form of expression ready prepared pictorially; he must supply the missing elements;

[7] As in Ortiz v. State, Fla., supra.
[8] See the cases collected supra.
[9] For the objection to 'ex parte' photographs on the ground of lack of cross-examination, see post, § 1385.

in brief, it must appear that there is a witness who has competent knowledge, and that the picture is affirmed by him to represent it.

The latter element may be implied from his very oath;[1] the former must appear from his preliminary statements.

The deductions from this general principle may now be examined.

§ 794. Same: Anonymous Pictures; Personal Knowledge; Calling the Maker; Official Maps. (1) A map or photograph cannot be received anonymously; it must be "verified" by some witness.[1] So also specific additional marks or legends, borne on the document but not verified in particular, must similarly be sponsored.[2] Where the map is offered as an official one, without calling the officer (post, § 1665), the official authentication of it amounts of course to a verification.

(2) The witness thus standing sponsor must be qualified by observation (ante, §§ 650, 657) to speak of the matters represented in the picture.[3] Whether this requirement is properly fulfilled should be left to the determination of the trial Court.[4]

§ 793. [1] The practical rule laid down in the following case ought to be extended to all these modes of testimony: 1856, Green, C. J., in State v. Fox, 25 N. J. L. 602: "A model is a copy or imitation of the thing intended to be represented; and when the witness states that he exhibits a model, it is to be inferred, in the absence of all proof to the contrary, that the model is [sworn to be] correct."

§ 794. [1] This requirement is made, expressly or impliedly, in nearly every one of the rulings cited ante, §§ 791, 792, and no repetition of them is needed.

[2] For example: 1891, Adams v. State, 28 Fla. 511, 538, 10 So. 106 (a map bearing the marks "I. S.'s route", etc., was handed in after I. S. had testified, counsel having made the marks; this was declared improper). In a radical ruling in New Hampshire (Ordway v. Haynes, 50 N. H. 159) it was said that when an illustration is offered in a medical book, even through a witness on the stand, "that makes it at once improper as evidence, because that gives it an undue importance with the jury; the jury should not know that it was in a medical book or a law book, or what the book was that contained it." The notion here is that the chart really thus receives a testimonial verification from some one, the book-author, not on the stand. But this seems an over-cautious and unpractical ruling.

(3) The witness thus using the map or photograph as representing his knowledge need not be the maker of it.[5] He affirms it to represent his observation; and this is the essential element. Even the maker could not use it without such a guarantee; and it may equally represent others' observation as well as his own. Indeed, if it is a correct representation, it will naturally be equally representative for all observers.

(4) A map or survey need not be an official one.[6] The hearsay statement of an officer is admissible only as an exception to the Hearsay rule (post, § 1665), and is therefore, if anything, the inferior sort of testimony. Moreover, there are in general no preferred classes of testimony (post, § 1286), and in particular there is no preference for official certificates or reports (post, § 1335); so that no principle can justify the demand for an official map or survey in preference to one verified by a qualified witness on the stand. It is only when a government map has by adoption in a deed become a constitutive document that it is required; and here the same result would ensue for any map so adopted.

§ 795. Same: Personal Knowledge exceptionally dispensed with; Magnifying Lens; Vacuum-rays, X-rays; etc. It is obvious that, in using certain mechanical instruments based upon the science of physics, we obtain a representation of things not perceivable by the ordinary senses; for example, in looking through a magnifying lens, we are presented with details which are invisible to the naked eye. Upon the principles, then, of testimonial Knowledge (ante, §§ 657, 665), can it be said that we have personal knowledge? Our impression is not received by the unaided senses, but depends for its verity upon the correctness of the intermediate instrument or process. It would seem plain, however, that the situation is the same as if our senses had been abnormally enlarged in scope or capacity, and that we may here also claim to have knowledge, in the ordinary sense, provided only that the instrument or process is known to be a trustworthy one. That trustworthiness may be based upon general experience as to the class of instrument in question, together with a knowledge of the mechanism of the particular instrument as one constructed according to the trustworthy type.

What is needed, then, in order to justify testimony based on such instruments, is merely preliminary professional testimony to the trustworthiness of the process or instrument in general (when not otherwise settled by judicial notice), and to the correctness of the particular instrument; such testimony being usually available from one and the same person. Any process or instrument, furnishing abnormal aid to the senses, may thus be employed as a source of testimonial knowledge.

It will be seen that, after all, the real question is one of the proper sources of a witness' Knowledge (under the principle of §§ 657, 665, ante), and not of his mode of communicating it, under the present principle; because, if the source of knowledge is a proper one, the mode of communicating it is the usual one of words. It is true that in a single instance — namely, that of the vacuum or X-rays — the process of observation may be united with the process of communication, i.e. the rays may at the same time make visible the otherwise invisible and also by photograph register the impression. But this is not an essential union, — any more than the astronomer's automatic photography by telescope is necessarily united with the process of telescopic observation; in either case a special additional apparatus of photography is used, and in either case the situation is virtually as if the observer had first looked through the telescope or the vacuum-machine, had seen the details with his own eyes, and then had verified the photograph as representing what he had seen with this artificial assistance. The process or instrument of observation, then, being duly testified to as trustworthy, it follows that a photograph of its images would always be receivable like any other photograph.

What kinds of abnormal processes or instruments are there, by which such artificial aids to the senses may be obtained and trusted? It may be premised that though, on the principle above noted, any such process or instrument must be preliminarily found to be a trustworthy one, yet if the appropriate science or art has advanced to a certain degree of general recognition, this trustworthiness may be judicially noticed (post, § 2581) as too notorious to need evidence. The various processes that have been from time to time employed and sanctioned are chiefly processes aiding the sense of vision:

(1) The magnifying lens (whether as microscope or telescope) is no doubt an available instrument. Its general trustworthiness would be judicially noticed, though the quality and power of the particular instrument should in strictness be testified to.[2]

(2) The refracting lens, in the special form of the spectroscope, revealing chemical constituents by color-bands, should equally be sanctioned, and is in fact constantly used by professional investigators as the source of their testimony.[3]

(3) The cathode-ray (vacuum-ray, X-ray, Roentgen-ray, radiograph, skiagraph) is also an available process; and its general trustworthiness ought to be judicially noticed.[4]

[2] In only one instance (Frank v. Bank) does the present principle seem to have been carried out by a witness' use of the instrument; but the principle is not different where the tribunal itself uses the instrument: 1912, Alexander v. Blackburn, 178 Ind. 66, 98 N. E. 711 (magnifying glass for signatures); 1885, Barker v. Perry, 67 Ia. 148, 25 N. W. 100 (jury using magnifying glasses); 1857, State v. Knight, 43 Me. 131 (diagram used of blood as seen through microscope); 1879, Frank v. Bank, 13 Jones & Sp. N. Y. 459 (an expert testified that a magnifying glass was correct and gave the multiple of its power, and the referee then examined the alleged erasures, etc., with it); 1872, Kannon v. Galloway, 2 Baxt. Tenn. 232 (microscope used by jury).

§ 796. Producing the Original of a Photograph; in General. By the general principle elsewhere examined (post, § 1177), the original of a thing must be produced 'in specie' to the tribunal, instead of receiving testimonial evidence about it. But this rule is usually regarded (post, §§ 1181–1183) as not applicable to any objects but writings or at least to chattels not bearing a written inscription. So far, then, as concerns objects not writings, a photographic representation could be used without accounting for the original.[1] Nevertheless, where the object photographed is some place of land, a view might be had (post, § 1162), and Courts have occasionally intimated that a view ought to be had in preference to testimony by photograph;[2] yet there seems no reason why such a rule, if valid at all, would not be equally proper for testimony in words.

§ 797. Same: Handwriting. Whether a photograph of handwriting may be used depends chiefly upon the principle requiring production of the original of a writing (post, § 1177); but it is more convenient to consider together the practical effect of that principle and the present one.[1]

(a) In the first place, the question arises whether, for the purpose of studying and identifying handwriting, photographic copies may be used at all. The argument against their use has been thus expressed:

1871, HUTCHINGS, Sur., in Taylor's Will, 10 Abb. Pr. N. S. 318: "When we reflect that by placing the original to be copied obliquely to the sensitive plate, the portion nearest to the plate may be distorted by being enlarged, and that the portion furthest from the plate must be correspondingly decreased, while the slightest bulging of the paper upon which the signature is printed may make a part blurred and not sharply defined, we can form some idea of the fallacies to which this subject is liable. . . . The refractive power of the lens, the angle at which the original to be copied was inclined to the sensitive plate, the accuracy of the focussing, and the skill of the operator, would have to be investigated to insure the evidence as certain. The Court would be obliged to suspend its examination as to the question of the genuineness of the signature . . . and in fact to inquire into the whole science of photography."

1880, FOLGER, C. J., in Hynes v. McDermott, 82 N. Y. 51: "Somewhat, for exact likeness, will depend upon the adjustment of the machinery, upon the atmospheric conditions, and the skill of the manipulator. And in so delicate a matter as the reaching of judicial results by the comparison of writings through the testimony of experts, it ought to be required that the witness should exercise his acumen upon the thing itself which is to be the basis of his judgment. . . . The certainty of expert testimony in these cases

§ 796. [1] But where the photograph is not used as testimony to an original but as the thing itself in issue (ante, § 790, note 1), the rule of production might apply to the photograph as itself the original (1884, People v. Muller, 32 Hun N. Y. 210); though this result would be still open to doubt on the principle of § 1181, post, cited above.

[2] 1894, Bedell v. Berkey, 76 Mich. 440, 43 N. W. 308 (suggesting that a view may often be better, where premises are concerned); 1893, Omaha R. Co. v. Beeson, 36 Nebr. 364, 54 N. W. 557 (photograph of premises, admissible where a view of them would be impracticable).

§ 797. [1] The rules in general as to the use of specimens to evidence the type of handwriting (post, §§ 2003 ff.) and of testimonial qualifications for handwriting (ante, §§ 569, 693 ff.) have of course equal application here.

On this whole subject, consult here as always the elaborate and scientific treatment in Mr. Albert S. Osborn's Questioned Documents (1910), and The Problem of Proof (1922).

is not so well assured that we can afford to let in the hazard of errors or differences in copying, though it be done by howsoever a scientific process."

But this argument is nothing more than which may be urged (as already noted in § 792, par. 3) against photographs in general, namely, their capability of falsifying; and the answer to it is the same, namely, that a photograph represents what a witness affirms to be a correct reproduction, and therefore that provisional credit must be given to the witness' affirmation, unless we are prepared to go the length of maintaining that exact reproduction of handwriting in photography is in the nature of things impossible. No doubt especial care should be taken to secure positive testimony to the accuracy of reproduction; just as, upon another principle (post, § 2097), precise verbal accuracy is sometimes required for testimony to a person's words orally uttered. But this is no more than may be deduced from the general principle (ante, § 790), and falls far short of declaring such accuracy unattainable.

The state of the modern photographic art has long outlawed the judicial doubts above quoted. All that can be said is that a photograph of a writing may be made to falsify, like other photographs and like other kinds of testimony, and that a qualified witness' affirmation of its exactness suffices to remove this danger, — as much as any such testimonial danger can be removed. Accordingly, it is generally conceded that a photographic copy of handwriting may be used instead of the original, so far as the accuracy of the medium is concerned.[2]

(b) Assuming, then, that testimony by photographic copy is in itself a proper mode, the application remains to be considered of the general principle (post, § 1177), requiring production of the original.

(1) If the original is obtainable but has not been produced, then the general rule applies and there is no excuse for resorting to copies of any sort; a photograph is therefore inadmissible.[3]

(2) If the original is not obtainable, then a copy may be used; hence, a photograph is admissible. Under what conditions the original may be said to be not obtainable depends upon the general principle and the specific rule for all documents (post, §§ 1152 ff.). In the present application a liberal construction is commonly given to them; especially in the principal instance, viz. on the probate of a will, the testimony of a subscribing witness out of the

W. 370 (forgery of deed; photographs of the deeds in the case refused to be produced by defendant after notice, admitted).

As to the necessity of having the original placed before an absent witness deposing to execution, see post, § 1185.

(post, § 1192), in the sense of being tangibly beyond procurement. Nevertheless, there are still lacking and unproduced to instantaneous perception the minute resemblances and differences which appear upon close juxtaposition and fade from memory in the operation of passing from one document to the others. Hence, the photographic juxtaposition does, in strict sense, "produce" these otherwise unavailable minutiæ, and such a grouping is therefore allowable without even any deviation from technical principle.[5]

(4) So also, the original being produced, or accounted for, a photographic enlargement, through a magnifying lens, may properly be employed.[6] The minute features of the writing — particularly those which indicate an erasure or a tracing — are in their fullest detail invisible to the naked eye, and hence are unavailable in the liberal sense of the term; the case is in effect the same as that of an illegible document, which it is conceded (post, § 1229) may be proved by copy.[7]

§ 798. Photographs of Artificial Settings; Moving-Pictures. Conceding the verisimilitude of any particular photograph's reproduction of the object photographed, there remains always the assumption that the object photographed is identical with the object in issue. This assumption underlies, of course, all use of photographs, as it does that of all other forms of testimony. It represents the element elsewhere referred to as involving the principle of Authentication, applied to chattels (post, § 2130).

[7] This expedient has sometimes been brought into service by writers of fiction, as in Mr. J. G. Holland's "Sevenoaks."

(a) Now ordinarily the evidence to support this assumption will be supplied incidentally and as a matter of course; e.g. the witness will say, "The front gate represented in this photograph, taken by me, is the same front gate referred to by Witness X as the place where the wagon drove in" (or, "the survey line started").

But it will often be desirable to establish 'prima facie' this assumption by more explicit or more ample evidence. This will be so where the original conditions have concededly changed or disappeared and where there has been an attempted reconstruction of them, by artificial means, for the purposes of the photograph.

Common examples of this are found in still photographs purporting to represent the relative location of freight cars, gates, and vehicles, at the place of a crossing collision; or of the alignment of machines, windows, materials, and operatives in a factory-room at the time of an injury. In such a case, there is always the possibility that the bias of the party or agent preparing the scene and taking the photograph has given to the reconstructed scene a misleading alteration, or has been content with a reconstruction which was only as close as is feasible to the original scene, but is put forward by him as actually identical with it.[1] Here the trial judge may require sufficient evidence of a substantial identity of conditions before admitting the photograph. But instead, if any serious doubt exists on this point, the judge may well cause additional photographs to be taken of a scene reconstructed as the opponent's testimony alleges, if that is feasible.

The foregoing element of weakness may reach its maximum in a moving-picture. In so far as such a picture has any value beyond a still picture, this value depends on the correctness of the artificial reconstruction of a complex series of movements and erections, usually involving several actors, each of them the paid agent of the party and acting under his direction. Hence its reliability, as identical with the original scene, is decreased and may be minimized to the point of worthlessness.

Where this possibility is serious, what should be done? Theoretically, of course, the moving-picture can never be assumed to represent the actual occurrence; what is seen in it is merely what certain witnesses say was the thing that happened. And, moreover, the party's hired agents may so construct it as to go considerably further in his favor than the witnesses' testimony has gone. And yet, any moving-picture is apt to cause forgetfulness of this and to impress the jury with the convincing impartiality of Nature herself. In view of these inherent risks of misleading, the trial judge may well deem a picture unsafe and inadmissible when the introductory evidence has not convinced him that the risk is negligible.[2] reconstructed, in which the moving-picture would have a special risk of misleading.

No general rule can be laid down as to the kinds of occurrences, artificially

§ 798. [1] A few rulings of this sort will be found in the citations ante, § 792, n. 1.

[2] 1920, People v. —, Calif., Colusa Co. Superior Court (reported in Moving Picture World, as quoted in N. Y. Times, Feb. 22, 1920, homicide; Weyand, J., excluded a moving-picture of a reconstructed scene of the parties' conduct).

(b) But where the moving-picture is taken without artificial reconstruction, i.e. at the time and place of the original event (a possibility not infrequent), it lacks the above element of weakness and is entitled to be admitted on the same principles as still photographs. The only circumstance then to be considered is that in a few matters, such as speed and direction of human movement, or relative size in the focus, the multiple nature of the films requires special allowances of error to be made; but these allowances are no different in kind from the elements of error inherent under certain conditions in still photographs.[3]

C. Written Testimony

§ 799. Oral and Written Testimony, in general. In the common-law court the traditional method of delivering testimony is to utter it orally, not in writing; in the chancery court, on the other hand, the traditional mode is the written one.

There can hardly be any doubt as to the superiority of the former over the latter method, and for two reasons: First of all, the latter method leads naturally to the taking of testimony out of the presence of the tribunal of decision, and the whole benefit of the demeanor of the witness as affecting his credibility (post, §§ 947, 1395) is lost. Secondly, the tedious process of recording the words as uttered tends to discourage full and thorough questioning and almost emasculates cross-examination. The oral method has no doubt some disadvantages, particularly in the facilities which it affords for intimidation by cross-examination (ante, § 781), as well as in the dependence of the tribunal upon mere recollection for a deliberate survey of all the testimony in a complicated case; but in the latter respect the modern practice of reporting the testimony in shorthand has partly eliminated this drawback. On the other hand, the rigor of the chancery rule has been almost everywhere modified by statutes permitting ' viva voce ' delivery of testimony in discretion:

1922, Mr. Wallace R. Lane, "The Federal Equity Rules, 1912" (Harvard Law Rev. XXXV, 278): "The [new] rule requiring equity causes to be tried in 'open court' and requiring the Court to pass upon the admissibility of all evidence (Rule 46) is generally conceded to be most beneficial, and seems to meet with wide approval by the Courts. Presiding Circuit Judge Baker in a recent unreported decision (Computing Scale Co. v. Toledo Computing Scale Co.) involving a patent on computing scales, speaking for the Court of Appeals of the Seventh Circuit, expresses in a striking way his approval of the trial of equity cases in open court, which summarizes and epitomizes the statements of many judges concerning the practice, and emphasizes the importance of the change from deposition proofs to the open court trials. 'Under the old rules, the Court in reaching the permanent injunction was helpless to control the proofs. Depositions were loaded with hearsay, with immeasurable masses of irrelevant matter, with controversies of counsel, with counsel's directions to witnesses not to answer, with experts' analyses of hundreds of prior patents when six would have been more than enough, with experts' interlarding of their opinions of facts with their opinions of the law of the case, etc., etc. We conjecture that in our clerk's vaults there are tons of paper which were pure waste. We leave it at conjecture because we have no computing scales on which to weigh the more important matters, the clients' exhaustion of patience and resources, the lawyers' mutual infliction of unnecessary labors, and the efforts of the courts to find the three grains of wheat in the bushel of chaff. But those evils are gone. Under the new rules, when the Chancellor hears a patent suit as he does other injunction suits in open court, he can and does control the proofs, exclude hearsay and irrelevancies, restrain counsel, compel witnesses to answer proper questions, limit the number of prior patents, and bridle the experts. Records on appeals now show the gratifying difference.'"[1]

So far as expediency and effectiveness are concerned, the modified practice of the common-law courts is to-day on the whole as satisfactory as can be in any system. Nevertheless, in theory the common-law principle remains, namely, that all testimony is delivered orally to the jury; so that, even where a part of the testimony is in fact contained in writing, it is formally put in by an oral reading aloud on the part of witness, clerk, or counsel.[2] This technicality, however, may be here disregarded, and, looking at the actual medium of the testimony, we may inquire what special rules arise in consequence of the testimony, or a part of it, being virtually in writing.

For this purpose, the various uses of writing fall into four sorts:

(1) records of a past recollection;

(2) copies of writings;

(3) depositions;

(4) absent witnesses' testimony admitted 'ad hoc';

(5) official certificates, reports, and registers, and private writings, received under exceptions to the Hearsay rule or as opponent's admissions.

§ 800. Records of Past Recollection. When a witness uses in his testimony a record or memorandum of his past recollection, he virtually adopts it as part of his present deliverance; it becomes a written statement of his present assertion, and as such it may be read and shown to the jury (ante, § 754.). The requirements which must first exist for these memoranda have already been considered (ante, §§ 745 ff.). On the other hand, when a paper is used merely to revive a present recollection, the oral utterance prompted § 799. [1] See also an article expressing similar views: Geo. P. Dike, "The Trial of Patent Accountings in Open Court" (Harvard L. Rev. XXXVI, 33; 1922).

The Continental lawyers concede the inferiority of their traditional practice of taking testimony, in civil cases, in writing by a referee-judge before trial: De la Grasserie, "De la preuve au civil et au criminel" (1912), vol. II, pp. 494–497.

[2] 1915, Martin's Estate, 170 Cal. 657, 151 Pac. 138; 1851, Withers, J., in Kuhlman v. Brown, 4 Rich. L. S. C. 479, 486 ("The idea that testimony by deposition is a written document, that should go before the jury as such, seems to present no difficulty; for in ordinary cases a deposition in English is read to the jury and reaches them through the ear only, as all evidence derived from the mouth of a witness does"); 1862, People v. Dyckman, 24 How. Pr. N. Y. 222, 226 (a witness producing a document may be compelled to read it aloud; good opinion).

by the revived recollection is alone the testimony; the writing becomes no part of the testimony and therefore cannot be put in or read as such (ante, § 763), though the opponent or the jury may obtain inspection of it as a safeguard against fabrication (ante, § 762).

§ 801. Copies of Writings. So far as recollection is concerned, a copy is in effect the commonest variety of a record of past recollection (ante, § 745); so far as mode of communication is concerned, it is a merely anonymous piece of paper until it has been adopted and verified by some qualified witness, precisely as a map or photograph must be (ante, §§ 790, 793). The application of these principles to copies is however more conveniently treated in connection with the rule requiring Production of the Original Writing, and the rules are there examined (post, §§ 1277–1281).

There are also certain rules of Preference applicable to the choice of one kind of copy rather than another, and these are considered in the same place (post, §§ 1264 ff.). The principle of Completeness also prescribes rules, applicable to written copies, for the degree of fulness with which the original must be reproduced (post, §§ 2094 ff.). Copies authorized to be made by public officers may be used without calling the copyist to the stand; but this involves an exception to the Hearsay rule (post, §§ 1677 ff.).

§ 802. Depositions, in general. The term "deposition", which formerly was applied to include testimony orally delivered, is now confined in meaning exclusively to testimony delivered in writing, i.e. testimony which in legal contemplation does not exist apart from a writing made or adopted by the witness. It is virtually of two sorts, namely, testimony which is never of any legal significance until it is completed in writing — as, the ordinary deposition 'de bene' taken by a commissioner, — and (in occasional use of the term) testimony which may first sufficiently exist orally, but upon being reduced to writing is regarded as exclusively or 'prima facie' contained in the writing, — as, the oral examination taken before a magistrate on a preliminary criminal trial. What difference there is in the legal conclusiveness of the writing is noticed later (post, § 805).

So far as the present principle is concerned, the question is, What special rules arise for securing accuracy of narration because of the departure from the oral form and the reduction into writing? If the witness himself wrote out the statement entire, no special question would arise. But in practice he usually does not, since the written form is that peculiar to testimony delivered out of court before a commissioner authorized by the court to receive and transmit it, and this commissioner is legally authorized to act and usually does act as the transcriber of the oral utterance; so that it is an intermediary who makes the writing which becomes the testimony, and thus it becomes specially necessary to secure that this writing shall represent precisely the statement for which the witness stands sponsor.[1] § 802. [1] "An artful or careless scribe may make a witness speak what he never meant, by dressing up his depositions in his own forms and language": 1768, Blackstone, Comm. III, 373.

The special elements of the situation which may thus be a source of error and must be guarded by special rules are three, namely, the personality of the official writer, the verbal accuracy of his transcription of the witness' utterance, and the witness' deliberate and knowing indorsement of the transcription as completed. These three may be considered in order.

§ 803. Same: Officer not to be Party's Agent or Kinsman. The writing becomes the testimony; the writer is to be trusted to reproduce exactly the witness' oral utterances; the parties are often not present by attorney, to watch for errors; and the opportunities for serious mispresentation, by deliberate fraud or unconscious effort, are too great to allow the writing to be made by a person open to plain suspicion of bias or interest for one or the other of the parties.

Accordingly, it has always been the rule that the commissioner, or other officer taking the deposition, shall not be a person united to either party by near kinship or important pecuniary interest:

1824, HOSMER, C. J., in Allen v. Rand, 5 Conn. 322, 324: "The law will not trust an agent to draw up a deposition for his principal, as by the insertion of a word the meaning of which is not correctly understood, or by the omission of a fact that ought to be inserted, the testimony thus garbled and discolored will be false and deceptive. Nor is there a possible argument in favor of such a proceeding. The deponent may write the deposition, or procure it to be written by a disinterested person, or it may be drawn up by the magistrate who takes it, or the parties may agree on a fit person for this purpose. . . . As the witness ought to be disinterested, so must the evidence be impartial, comprising the whole truth and nothing but the truth; and this can never rationally be expected when a deposition is drawn up by an attorney or agent, or, what is little less exceptionable, by the party himself. Sickness constitutes no reason for the relaxation of this rule, as it produces no actual necessity; and if it did, it would make no difference, as no such exception to the general rule is admissible. It is much preferable that in particular instances the party should even be deprived of testimony than that a principle leading to widespread mischief should be adopted; as private disadvantage is a less evil than general inconvenience."

1825, TILGHMAN, C. J., in Summers v. M'Kim, 12 S. & R. 405, 410: "The counsel of the party producing the witness is the last person who should be permitted to draw the deposition, because he will naturally be disposed to favor his client; and it is very easy for an artful man to make use of such expressions as may give a turn to the testimony very different from what the witness intended. I know that depositions are sometimes taken in this manner by consent of parties; and when the counsel on both sides are present, the danger is not great; but in the present case there was no consent nor was the counsel of the plaintiffs present. The rule of court is that the deposition shall be taken 'before a justice.' It ought therefore to be reduced to writing from the mouth of the witness in the presence of the justice, though it need not be drawn by him; and in case of difference of opinion in taking down the words of the witness the justice should decide."

1840, GILCHRIST, J., in Whicher v. Whicher, 11 N. H. 348, 353: "The duty of a magistrate in taking a deposition is essentially judicial in its character. He has other duties to perform than that of administering an oath to the deponent. He has a discretion to exercise in regard to the treatment of a witness, that he may not be induced by leading questions to state facts more broadly than the truth will warrant, and that he should not be brow-beaten nor terrified into the suppression of facts within his knowledge. . . . And he is to exercise such a general supervision over the examination, as will tend to elicit the truth, in a legal and proper manner, which, particularly in the case of timid or illiterate witnesses, is one of the most delicate and difficult parts of judicial duty. These duties are, in practice, too often overlooked by a careless or inefficient magistrate, or wilfully disregarded by a prejudiced one. A party elects his own magistrate, and, having this power of selection, he is naturally more anxious to seek a friendly, than a hostile, or even an impartial tribunal. Under such auspices, the examination proceeds as might be anticipated. The opposing party, not unreasonably distrustful of the magistrate selected by his antagonist, is often dissatisfied with the course of the examination; and the instances are numerous, where, rather than submit to the injustice of hearing what he believes a partial statement of facts read to the jury, he incurs the expense of summoning the witness to attend the trial, that the deposition may not be used. . . . Now to hold that a magistrate, invested with such varied powers, and whose improper conduct may lead to such evil results, should not be as impartial as the lot of humanity will admit, is to apply to him a rule which never obtains in any other case, where men are appointed to decide upon the rights of others."

This general rule, more or less indefinite in its application, originated in early chancery practice,[1] but has also been adopted, in one form or another, in most of the statutes authorizing depositions to be taken by courts of common law.[2] It does not, of course, prevent the officer from having the manual act

§ 804. Same: Transcription in Witness' Words. No Court seems ever to have insisted on a perfectly literal reproduction of the witness' very words. Perhaps no writer not a stenographer could give an exactly verbatim rendering, and the failure would be evidentially immaterial unless it were of serious extent. Nor can accuracy be regarded as a quality necessary to be expressly shown by other testimony, since the officer certifies that he has accurately transcribed, and faith must 'prima facie' be given to his statement. Nevertheless the danger exists to be guarded against; there is ever an inherent possibility of error, no matter how impartial or careful the officer:

1843, Lord LANGDALE, M. R., in Johnston v. Todd, 5 Beav. 601: "When the witness is illiterate and ignorant, the language [of an affidavit] presented to the Court is not his; it is and must be the language of the person who prepares the affidavit; and it may be, and too often is, the expression of that person's erroneous inference as to the meaning of the language used by the witness himself; and, however carefully the affidavit may be read over to the witness, he may not understand what is said in language so different from that which he is accustomed to use. . . . [Thus] testimony not intended by him is brought into the Court as his."

For affidavits, the officer taking the acknowledgment is subject to the same rule: 1907, Malcom Sav. Bank v. Cronin, 80 Nebr. 228, 114 N. W. 158 (noting the effect of statutes).

Code 1906); Man. 1911, R. v. Bond, 21 Man. 366; W. Va. St. 1909, c. 44, p. 382, Code 1914, § 4890 (provision for stenographer's transcription and for certification of the transcript without signature of witness); and other statutes cited supra, n. 2.

The following statute seems hardly necessary: N. Y. St. 1912, c. 390, p. 746 (inserting § 222 b in C. Cr. P.; examination before magistrate may be taken by stenographer and certified by magistrate).

Whether such an officer may delegate his function of presiding at the taking is a different question — one of judicial powers — which is without the present purview.

[4] Some of the improprieties noted in the following cases are hardly to be distinguished from the impropriety of a prepared deposition (ante, § 787); the statutes on the present point have been placed in note 3, supra: England: 1687, Newton v. Foot, 2 Dick. 793 (clerk of party's solicitor, held improper); 1819, Cooke v. Wilson, 4 Madd. 380 (same); United States: 1844, Steele v. Dart, 6 Ala. 798 (deposition in party's handwriting, rejected); 1849, Bryant v. Ingraham, 16 id. 116, 119 (deposition in party's brother's handwriting, suppressed); 1824, Allen v. Rand, 5 Conn. 322 (deponent being too ill to write, a person requested by the defendant wrote it out for her at her house and it was afterwards sworn to before the magistrate; excluded); 1875, Snyder v. Snyder, 50 Ind. 492, 493 (party's attorney may write questions, but not answers); 1866, Hurst v. Larpin, 21 Ia. 484 (party's attorney as scrivener, held improper); 1813, Logan v. Steele, 3 Bibb Ky. 230 (deposition in the handwriting of a nephew of the party, written in the absence of the magistrate, excluded); 1831, Donoho v. Petit, Walker Miss. 440 (party's attorney as scrivener, not 'ipso facto' improper); 1864, Cushman v. Wooster, 45 N. H. 410, 413 (under a statute requiring the magistrate to write the answers, an indifferent person may act as clerk under the magistrate's control; but the practice "should not be encouraged"); 1804, Mosely v. Mosely, N. C. Confer. 522 (deposition taken by plaintiff's attorney "under the view and control of the commissioner in the presence of the defendant", excluded); 1849, Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank v. Woods, 11 Pa. 99 (party's attorney

The solution reached by the Courts seems to be, properly enough, that the deposition will not be rejected on this ground unless on its face (and perhaps together with circumstances otherwise shown) it appears clearly to be in language which the witness could not have used.[1] It is on this principle that a prepared deposition is rejected (ante, § 787).

The act of writing should of course be done immediately, not afterwards from recollection.[2] The use of stenography in taking depositions, the translation being made afterwards, removes the substance of this danger; but it would seem that the translation into longhand ought to be made before the consummation of the taking, since otherwise there would be no check upon possible errors.[3]

§ 805. Same: Reading Over and Signing. (1) Since the writing is to stand as the witness' own words, and since there is always an indefinable coefficient of error in transcription, there should be given a final opportunity for correction by the reading over to or by the witness, of the writing as completed. It has been customary in statutes to make special provisions for this.[1]

(2) The witness' signature may be regarded either as necessary to constitute the writing his by adoption, or as symbolically equivalent to a knowing assent to its tenor (thus dispensing with the reading over), or as an additional means of identifying the person of the witness. Whatever the legal theory, it is usually treated as a technical requirement indispensable under the statutes.

writing the deposition, allowable when consented to); 1853, Wertz v. May, 21 Pa. 274, 279 (deposition taken down by the defendant's counsel, the plaintiff's counsel present and consenting, admitted).

§ 804. [1] The following rulings deal with affidavits, but the principle is the same: 1811, Fowler v. State, 5 Day Conn. 82 (a complaint, signed by the prosecuting witness, and praying for inquiry by the grand jury; excluded, because drawn up by a justice of the peace in legal language, and therefore not fairly representing the witness' own statements); 1877, State v. Elliott, 45 Ia. 486 (deponent made affidavit before a justice of the peace; but, as two-thirds of it appeared to be in the language of the justice and it was not read over to the deponent before he signed it, the Court rejected it).

[2] 1822, R. v. Sexton, Chetwynd's Suppl. to Burn's Justice, quoted in Joy, Confessions, 19 (confession not taken down by the officer from the lips of the accused, but written out afterwards from recollection; excluded).

[3] 1899, Kyle v. Craig, 125 Cal. 107, 57 Pac. 791 (notary's having the deposition taken in shorthand and then written out in longhand before signing, held proper).

§ 805. [1] These statutes depend so much on detailed provisions that it is impracticable to reproduce them here; a guide to their place in the statute-books will be found in the citations post, §§ 1380–1383. For the same reason, the rulings upon them, depending on local wordings, cannot profitably be examined here; the following cases illustrate their method: 1893, Moller v. U. S., 13 U. S. App. 472, 479, 6 C. C. A. 459, 57 Fed. 490 (same); 1902, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Carter, — Ky. —, 66 S. W. 508 (press-copy of unsigned deposition taken in another case, verified by the notary, excluded: here improperly, because the deposition was offered only as an admission, under the principle of § 1075, post); 1836, People v. Moore, 15 Wend. N. Y. 419, 421 (the statute does not require a reading over to a witness, because it must be signed by him, and hence the failure to read over merely discredits, and does not exclude such a deposition; but the statute requires a reading over to an accused, because it need not be signed by him, and hence a reading over must be shown); 1921, McNally, Inc. v. Chapin, Sup. App. Div., 189 N. Y. Suppl. 441 (deposition not read over or subscribed, inadmissible); 1898, Zehner v. Lehigh C. & N. Co., 187 Pa. 487, 490, 41 Atl. 464 (longhand translation must be read over and signed by the witness); 1908, Slaughter Co. v. King Lumber Co., 79 S. C. 338, 60 S. E. 705 (deposition taken directly by typewriting, without shorthand transcription, need not be read over, under 23 Stats. at L. p. 1072); 1899, Shepherd v. Snodgrass, 47 W. Va. 79, 34 S. E. 879 (similar).

(3) Supposing that the technical requirements of a reading over and signing are not fulfilled, a difference then arises between a deposition in the strict sense (i.e. testimony taken 'de bene' before a mere commissioner for later use in a trial) and testimony before a committing magistrate in criminal cases. In the former instance the testimony is exclusively to be found in the writing, because a deposition is the creature of the statute or order granting the judicial officer's authority, and thus, if the writing fails in the above requirements, it never becomes testimony, and there is no testimony of that witness (post, § 1331). In the latter instance, on the other hand, the oral utterance was already testimony in that stage; it might become written testimony if a writing of the required sort was consummated; but, if not, then at least it remained oral testimony. Hence, it could be proved as such, by any ordinary and proper evidence. This might be done by calling a person who heard it (post, § 1330), or by accepting (under the exception to the Hearsay rule) the magistrate's official report of the testimony (post, §§ 1326 ff., § 1667), or by accepting the stenographer's testimony, either speaking on the stand with the notes as a record of recollection (ante, § 736) or certifying officially to it under an exception to the Hearsay rule (post, § 1669). Moreover, even a deposition, imperfectly taken as such, may by the party's adoption of it become his own admission (post, § 1075).

§ 806. Same: Other Principles discriminated. (1) For depositions, the rules as to leading questions are in general the same as for oral testimony (ante, §§ 769 ff.).

(2) Whether the interrogatories must be specific and the answers responsive involves the question of adequacy of opportunity for cross-examination (post, §§ 1393, 1394).

(3) The prohibition of a prepared draft of answers has been already considered in dealing with the general rule against improper suggestion (ante, § 787).

(4) The authority of the officer and the technical formalities of caption, certificate, and the like involve questions of procedure, beyond the present purview; they are briefly noted under the Hearsay rule (post, §§ 1376, 1676).

(5) The authentication of the deposition also involves statutory details of trial procedure not within the present purview; but so far as the evidential principle of authentication is concerned, its rules are dealt with elsewhere (post, §§ 2129 ff.).

(6) The requirement of cross-examination, or notice and opportunity thereof, as indispensable to the use of a deposition, is a question of the Hearsay rule (post, §§ 1377 ff.).

(7) The necessity of showing the deponent deceased, absent, or otherwise unavailable, in order to resort to his deposition, involves the rule of Confrontation (post, §§ 1401 ff.).

(8) The treatment of a deposition as an admission by the party using it at a former trial involves the doctrine of Admissions (post, § 1075).

(9) The time of making objections to testimony in a deposition depends upon the general rule for Objections (ante, § 18).

§ 807. Absent Witness' Testimony admitted. The testimony of an absent witness may be admitted by the opponent's consent in order to prevent a postponement on behalf of the party desiring to call him. The admission may be either that the alleged testimony is true, or merely that it would have been delivered as alleged; the statutes differing in their provisions. The alleged testimony, forming the subject of the Admission, is of course usually presented in written form, either as an affidavit of the witness himself or as a stipulation agreed to by counsel. It appears in the cause solely by virtue of the opponent's judicial admission; no question of the present principle therefore arises; and the subject is dealt with under the head of Judicial Admissions (post, § 2595).

§ 808. Official Statements and Private Writings, under Hearsay Exceptions; Opponent's Admissions. Under the various Exceptions to the Hearsay rule, statements in writing are often admissible. So far as any questions under the present principle arise, they can be more conveniently examined under the respective Exceptions to that rule (post, §§ 1420–1797).

An opponent's extrajudicial admissions are frequently in written form; such questions as arise for them under the present principle are dealt with under Admissions (post, §§ 1070–1075).

D. INTERPRETED TESTIMONY

§ 811. Deaf-mutes, Aliens, Inaudible Witnesses; Interpreters and Translations. The mode of communication will usually be in words or other symbols directly intelligible to the tribunal. If the witness cannot employ a mode thus directly intelligible, some intermediary may and must be sought who can interpret the witness' mode into the ordinary one:

1851, WITHERS, J., in Kuhlman v. Brown, 4 Rich. L. 479, 485 (admitting a translated deposition): "Upon general principles it is contended that our law exacts the English tongue as its only language. This is true as to the pleadings, and it is also true that it speaks that language to the jury. But is it true that it hears no other? Every day experience testifies the contrary. Any language is heard in court where a foreign witness must be used there. And what is the office that the law performs? It requires that means shall be furnished by the actor on that occasion, or in some manner provided, to convert the testimony, clothed and adduced in a foreign tongue, into that which the jury who are to estimate it comprehend. . . . It is enough to remark that every expedient should be favorably regarded, and that most favorably, the tendency of which gives the strongest promise of an intelligible transmission of the evidence to the jury through a medium capable, unbiassed, faithful."

It is clear that testimony must not be allowed to fail if some process of interpretation is available. The conditions under which it is to be resorted to are the simple dictates of cautious common sense:

(1) Interpretation is proper to be resorted to whenever a necessity exists, but not till then:[1]

1858, O'BRIEN, J., in R. v. Burke, 8 Cox Cr. 45, 47: "The value of this test [cross-examination] is very much lessened in the case of a witness, having a sufficient knowledge of the English language to understand the questions put by counsel, pretending ignorance of it, and gaining time to consider his answers while the interpreter is going through the useless task of interpreting the question which the witness already understands."

1908, Mr. Arthur Train, The Prisoner at the Bar, 239: "Where the witness speaks a foreign language, the task of discovering exactly what he knows, or even what he actually says, is herculean. In the first place, interpreters, as a rule, give the substance — as they understand it — of the witness' testimony rather than his exact words. It is also practically impossible to cross-examine through an interpreter, for the whole psychological significance of the answer is destroyed, ample opportunity being given for the witness to collect his wits and carefully to frame his reply. One could cross-examine a deaf-mute by means of the finger alphabet about as effectively as an Italian through a court interpreter, who probably speaks (defectively) seventeen languages."

Whenever the witness' natural and adequate mode of expression is not intelligible to the tribunal, interpretation is necessary. Whether the need exists is to be determined by the trial Court.[2]

§ 811. [1] The following anecdote illustrates the need of caution: O'Regan's Memoirs of John Philpott Curran, 29: "An Irish witness, Mr. Curran said, was called on the table to give evidence, and having a preference for his own language (first, as that in which he could best express himself, next, as being a poor Celt he loved it for its antiquity, but above all other reasons, that he could better escape cross-examination by it), and wishing to appear mean and poor and therefore a mere 'Irish', he was observed on coming into court to take the buckles [tongues] cunningly out of his shoes. The reason of this was asked by counsel, and one of the country people, his opponent in the suit, cried out, 'The reason, my lord, is that the fellow does not like to appear to be master of two tongues!'"

Accord: England: 1786, Ruston's Case, 1 Leach Cr. L., 4th ed., 408; 1827, Morrison v. Lennard, 3 C. & P. 127, Best, C. J.; Canada: Dom. R. S. 1906, c. 145, Evid. St. 1920, c. 44, § 38 (like Alta. St. 1910, c. 3, § 18), and the other Canadian statutes quoted ante, § 488; United States: 1906, Dobbins v. Little Rock R. & E. Co., 79 Ark. 85, 95 S. W. 794 (deaf-mute's testimony taken by a sign-interpreter, instead of through written questions and answers); 1830, State v. DeWolf, 8 Conn. 98; 1840, Snyder v. Nations, 5 Blackf. Ind. 295; 1817, Com. v. Hill, 14 Mass. 207; Minn. Gen. St. 1913, § 7469 (a deaf or dumb person charged with insanity is entitled to an interpreter "as a matter of absolute right"); 1893, State v. Howard, 118 Mo. 127, 144, 24 S. W. 41; 1845, People v. McGee, 1 Denio N. Y. 21; Wis. Stats. 1919, § 4205*m* (interpreter shall be used for deaf-mute, as accused or witness).

So also for one made mute by physical violence: 1899, Roberson v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 49 S. W. 398 (witness injured by violence, and able to testify only by nods or shakes of the head or by writing; allowed); and the cases cited post, § 1445, under Dying Declarations. The difference in these cases is that, while the witness uses an abnormal mode of communication, yet it does not need a special interpreter.

It is said in Morrison v. Lennard, supra, that the deaf-mute, if he can, should by preference write, instead of using signs. This does not seem sound, and is denied in State v. DeWolf, State v. Howard, supra; he should be permitted the most fluent and natural mode.

For the testimonial capacity of a deaf-mute, see ante, § 498.

[4] Whether the witness is sufficiently fluent in the language of the tribunal is a question for the trial Court: cases cited in note 2, supra.

For an anecdote of Lord Eldon's, illustrating the results that may befall from allowing question and answer in any but the orthodox language, see Twiss' Life of Eldon, I, 175.

When the jury is taken 'de medietate diffidence or illness, to speak loud enough for the tribunal to hear distinctly.[5]

(2) If interpretation is necessary, and no adequate means of securing it is practicable, the testimony is lost, for without adequate communication (ante, § 766) there can be no testimony.[6]

(3) What sort of a person is a proper one to be interpreter, is a question depending much on the circumstances,[7] and should be determined by the trial judge.

linguæ', it would seem that a necessity exists for interpreting all the testimony, because one or the other set of jurymen will not understand some of the witnesses. In Chief Justice Martin's History of Louisiana (p. 345) is described a situation, in early times in that State, which nearly amounted to a disregard of this principle, and illustrates the possibilities of novel questions in a region of mixed races. Courts of justice were furnished with interpreters versed in the French, Spanish, and English languages; and these translated the evidence and the Court's charge, but not the arguments of counsel. The case was often opened in the English language, and those of the jury not familiar with it were allowed to retire to the gallery. The defence being in French, a similar privilege was then allowed to those jurymen who did not understand that language. The jury then retired, and, each contending that the argument he had heard was conclusive, a verdict was finally reached as best they could.

[5] 1691, Lord Mohun's Trial, 12 How. St. Tr. 990 (a boy-witness could not speak loud enough; and the defendant requested that "one of the officers of the court may come down to the bar, and repeat from his mouth to the Court what he saith", which was done); 1716, Earl of Wintoun's Trial, 15 How. St. Tr. 804, 861 (the accused speaking very low and inaudibly, a person was sworn and stood by him repeating his words, but the accused was directed to speak loud enough for the prosecuting counsel to hear); 1857, Spollen's Trial, Ire., pamphl. p. 47 (similar, for a child speaking low); 1858, Conner v. State, 25 Ga. 521 (words of a witness too ill to speak above a whisper may be communicated to Court and jury by another person sworn for the purpose).

[6] 1660, Peters' Trial, 5 How. St. Tr. 1116, 1128 (Dr. Mortimer sworn: "Me Lar, me ha serd de king etc."; Court: "We cannot understand a word"; Counsel: "He is a Frenchman, my lord"; Court: "Pray let there be an interpreter"; one Mr. Young was sworn to interpret truly his evidence; but it being afterwards found difficult and troublesome, the counsel waived his evidence, and prayed another witness might be called; Dr. Mortimer: "Me Lar, me can peak Englis —"; Counsel: "No, no, pray sit down"). In R. v. Whitehead, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 33 (1886), is an example of failure of testimony mainly through inability to communicate. The traditional anecdote of the Irish judge addressing the inaudible witness ("Witness, for the sake of God and your expenses, speak up!") hints also that incomprehensibility is equivalent to incompetency.

Courts in the metropolitan cities do not exercise sufficient care to provide a staff of honest and competent interpreters. They become callous to the grist of petty criminal cases; and they tend to forget that one of the cruelest injustices is to place at the bar a person of alien tongue and then fail to provide him with the means of defending himself by intelligible testimony. Many Courts are open here to severest censure.

(4) The form of interpretation will ordinarily be oral. Even for letters or other documents offered to the jury, it may be oral,[8] on the principle of § 799, ante; though a written translation is customarily employed.

For depositions, however, which in the modern legal theory exist only in writing (ante, § 802), the translation must equally be in writing; and statutes sometimes prescribe this. The time of translation must for ordinary oral testimony to the jury be immediate; but for depositions it would seem that this is not essential, at least where (as is usual) the Commissioner taking it understands the witness' language and the translation is needed only for the trial-tribunal.[9]

§ 812. Same: Other Principles discriminated. (1) By the Hearsay rule, every witness must be subject to the opportunity of cross-examination; an interpreter is a witness to the other witness' words; hence, the interpreter's report of the other witness' testimony cannot be used at another trial without calling or accounting for the interpreter (post, § 1810). Whether a party is entitled to the interpretation of the testimony against him involves also the right of cross-examination (post, § 1393).

(2) By an exception to the Hearsay rule, official statements lawfully authorized may be used without calling the officer; under this principle, an official interpreter's translation may sometimes be used without calling him (post, § 1669).

Co. v. Bryan, 18 Ariz. 106, 157 Pac. 376 (deposition by one not speaking English need not show who was interpreter or whether sworn); 1851, Kuhlman v. Brown, 4 Rich. L. S. C. 479, 485 (deposition need not be translated by interpreter before the commission nor accompanied by a translation: but may be orally translated when used; best opinion); 1870, Cavasos v. Gonzales, 33 Tex. 133 (deposition need not be written in their domestic language, but may be translated on offering it). Rules are sometimes prescribed by statute; e.g. Ont. Rules of Court 1913 § 283.

The following ruling is sound: 1898, Meyer v. Rothe, 13 D. C. App. 97, 102 (a notary taking down a deposition, and skilled enough in the witness' language to translate as he writes down, need not be sworn as an interpreter; good opinion by Morris, J.).

Ordinarily, therefore, the third person's words cannot be proved by any one except the interpreter himself (ante, § 668).

(4) A party may make an interpreter his agent to communicate; when this has been the case, the interpreter's statements are virtually the extra-judicial admissions of the party's agent, and thus are receivable, from any one who heard them, without calling the interpreter (ante, § 1078, post, § 1810).

TOPIC VI (continued): TESTIMONIAL COMMUNICATION

CONFESSIONS OF AN ACCUSED PERSON

CHAPTER XXVIII.

§ 815. Rule applicable to Confessions of an Accused only, not of a Witness or a Civil Party. Among the circumstances that may be fatal to the trustworthiness of a testimonial narration is the fact that it is uttered under the direct and palpable pressure of an inducement to substitute something else than the truth. The statement thus presented may appear so likely to be the result of such an influence that it will be rejected as testimony (on the general principle of § 766, ante). The influence which might thus affect it would be some advantage directly conditional on the substitution of a fictitious for the truthful statement. This advantage will be, in general, either the definite acquisition by the witness of some valuable advantage (as compared with his remaining without this advantage), or his escape from a disadvantage now threatening; though these two (as will be seen) are in effect reducible to one. The situation of a person charged with crime is obviously peculiar with reference to the circumstances under which these advantages will be presented, as well as to their nature and force; and thus, in history and in principle, statements in the nature of confessions of guilt by an accused person stand somewhat apart and call for a separate treatment in the law of Evidence.

(1) The development of the principle of confessions has been largely due (as may be later noticed) to the spirit of consideration for accused persons, which grew up during the latter half of the 1700s and the first part of the 1800s, and was generated as a natural reaction from the harshness and unjust severity prevailing in penal administration up to that time. We should consequently not expect to find the principle recognized outside the scope of criminal prosecutions. The policy and the history of the rule alike dictate its limitations; so that in civil cases no rule would be looked for which excluded the opposing party's acknowledgment of a debt or other claim because of its extortion by duress.[1] Since admissions are never conclusive, but may always be explained away and discredited by their maker as due to his inadvertence or mistake (post, § 1085), there is no necessity for an exclusionary rule based on theory of duress. All analogies suggest that the party's admission be received, subject to his proof of the threats or other circumstances of duress which may have extorted it. It would follow, then, that in a civil case the admissions of an opponent, when offered, are not to be tested or excluded by any rules of confession applicable to the accused in a criminal case.

(2) For duress of a witness, not being a party, the same considerations would prescribe that there be no exclusion on the ground of extrajudicial threats or other form of coercion; and this is in practice universally assumed to be the law;[2] for, in the first place, the facts could be brought out on examination (post, § 949) and given due weight; in the next place, the judicial power must be assumed sufficient to protect the witness from any serious apprehension of physical harm; and, finally, the existence of any rule of exclusion on this ground would conflict with the laudable tendency of the past two generations to admit testimony as freely as possible and trust to the examination to disclose its weaknesses. As for that form of duress which arises from the intimidating manner and words of the examining counsel, its effective prohibition is within the control of the judge; and it is of course more properly dealt with by the prevention of the act of coercion when it

§ 815. [1] The authority, oddly enough, is scanty: England: 1814, Stockfleth v. De Tastet, 4 Camp. 10 (improper examination before bankrupt commissioners; held admissible, irrespective of the mode of obtaining it, though "he will not be bound by it" if obtained by duress or imposition); 1917, Hurst v. Evans, 1 K. B. 352, 358 (Lush, J.: "A confession to a police officer is always excluded if the confession was induced by a promise or threat; but in a civil case, if a witness had made a statement to the police implicating himself, it would be impossible to exclude it"); United States: 1859, Fidler v. McKinley, 21 Ill. 308, 309, 316, 318 (breach of promise of marriage; the defendant's admissions of a promise of marriage, made while under arrest on a charge of bastardy, to the woman's father who was angry and held a weapon, admitted; Breese, J., diss.); 1854, Newhall v. Jenkins, 2 Gray Mass. 562 ("The rule excluding confessions made under undue influence applies only to the confessions of a person on trial in a criminal case"; here admitting testimony of convicts, given under inducements by the prison warden); 1896, McCahan v. Crawford, 47 S. C. 566, 25 S. E. 123 (by consent in a deposition 'de bene', admissible; semble, also, even if under compulsion; McIver, C. J., diss.); 1855, Birchard v. Booth, 4 Wis. 67, 72 (plea of guilty in a criminal prosecution, admitted in a civil action for the same battery); 1916, Campbell v. Germania Fire Ins. Co., 163 Wis. 329, 158 N. W. 63 (arson, as a defence to a claim on an insurance policy; the plaintiff's confession admitted, semble without imposing the rule for criminal cases).

Contra: 1898, Hamersley, J., in State v. Willis, 71 Conn. 293, 41 Atl. 820 ("The proposition that confessions obtained under compulsion are inadmissible expresses a well-established principle of evidence. It applies to admissions as well as to contracts, or to any act whose probative force depends on intent or assent"); Ga. Code 1910, § 5781 (admissions, if obtained 'by constraint, or by fraud, or by drunkenness induced for the purpose", are inadmissible).

[2] The following rulings also bear on this question; 1905, Rawlins v. State, 124 Ga. 31, 52 S. E. 1 (a confession of an accomplice having been obtained by officers through fear, but not being admitted, the jury were allowed, in weighing the accomplice's testimony on the stand, to consider evidence that he had been put in fear "and still labored under this fear"); 1854, Newhall v. Jenkins, 2 Gray Mass. 562 (cited supra); 1899, State v. Geddes, 22 Mont. 68, 55 Pac. 919 (threats to accomplice, no ground for excluding his testimony for the State); 1912, State v. Miller, 68 Wash. 239, 122 Pac. 1066 (accomplice; the opinion collects recent precedents).

is attempted (ante, § 781) than by any general rule of exclusion for the testimony.

§ 816. Admissions, Confessions, and Hearsay Statements against Interest, distinguished. Confessions are merely one species of admissions, namely, that species which consists in a direct acknowledgment of guilt in a criminal charge (post, § 821). For that particular sort the danger of untrustworthiness exists, and a special rule, based on the general testimonial principle of trustworthiness of narration (ante, § 766), becomes applicable. That rule satisfied, the confession occupies the status of an ordinary admission; its relation to other rules of Evidence is therefore determined by its quality as an admission. For example, as an extrajudicial statement, it would ordinarily be obnoxious to the Hearsay rule; but admissions are either not within the prohibition of that rule, or are an exception to it; this being the ground for receiving admissions in general (post, § 1048), it suffices also for confessions.[1] Again, vicarious admissions, i.e. those of agents and other persons, are often receivable (post, §§ 1069–1087); and here the principles which determine what persons' admissions are receivable — e.g. agents, co-conspirators, co-defendants, and the like — are equally applicable to confessions (post, §§ 1076–1079). Again, some sorts of admissions, being usually weak in probative value, are deemed to require corroboration before final acceptance by the jury; and hence certain rules of corroboration, applicable to a few other sorts of admissions as well as to confessions, are by some Courts recognized (post, §§ 2067, 2070, 2086).

What we are here concerned with, therefore, is a special and restrictive testimonial principle in its application to a particular species of admissions called confessions; in all other aspects, confessions are included under the generic title of admissions and the other principles applicable thereto. Those principles are dealt with under Admissions (post, §§ 1048–1087).

1. History of the Rule

§ 817. Different Stages of the Doctrine. There may be noted four distinct stages in the history of the law's use of confessions. In the earliest stage (going for present purposes no further back than the times of the Tudors and the Stuarts) there is no restriction at all upon their reception. In the next stage, comprising the second half of the 1700s, the matter begins to be considered, and it is recognized that some confessions should be rejected as untrustworthy. In the third stage, comprising the 1800s, the principle of exclusion is developed, under certain influences, to an abnormal extent, and exclusion becomes the rule, admission the exception. In the last phase a reaction sets in here and there, but it represents a future rather than a present movement, and little is accomplished in the way of changing the law or the practice.

§ 816. [1] It is true that confessions could also have entered under the Hearsay exception for statements of facts against interest (post, § 1457), the accused not being a qualified witness, and could to-day be so regarded, where the accused, not being compellable, fails to take the stand. But this theory is not necessary to lean upon, although it has in judicial thought often been suggested (post, § 866). Moreover, it failed to be applied when tested for confessions of a third person; for these, not being receivable as a party's admissions (post, § 1076), were also not received under the Hearsay exception (post, § 1476).

For confessions used as self-contradictions to impeach on accused taking the stand, see post, § 821, n. 2.

In the early days of American jurisdiction in Porto Rico, the Supreme Court found it difficult to convince the lawyers, newly introduced to American common law rules of Evidence, that "confessions are not hearsay": cases cited post, § 1049.

The rulings of the courts of the United States reflect the last two stages only, and involve no special development. These several stages we may now notice; for here, as in other instances, some of the confusion and uncertainty has arisen from a failure to perceive the differing values which the historical perspective confers upon different precedents.

§ 818. Confessions in the 1500s and 1600s. What we notice in the first period is that there is no doctrine about excluding "confessions" in the modern sense; that is, all narratives avowing guilt are accepted in evidence without discrimination, and particularly without question as to their proceeding from hope of promises or from fear of threats, even of torture. It is true that the term "confession" appears, and that there is a doctrine about it; but in the one case the term is used in a different sense, and in the other the doctrine relates to the conclusiveness, not the admissibility, of the evidence. Perhaps the simplest method of explaining the state of the law is to describe first these two doctrines, and then to indicate the absence of any other and exclusionary rule.

(1) "Confession" as a plea of guilty. The technical sense of "confession", then, in the earlier usage, is a plea of guilty. It was affected by a rule of practice of not receiving or recording such a plea under certain circumstances; but it was not understood as including extrajudicial narrative avowals of guilt offered as evidence, and the rule about it did not affect such statements; in short, it dealt with a matter of criminal pleading, not a matter of evidence. This will be plain enough from the following passages in the earliest treatises on criminal law:

1607, Staundford, Pleas of the Crown, b. 2, c. 51: "If one is indicted or appealed of felony, and on his arraignment he confesses it, this is the best and surest answer that can be in our law for quieting the conscience of the judge and for making it a good and firm condemnation; provided, however, that the said confession did not proceed from fear, menace, or duress; which if it was the case, and the judge has become aware of it, he ought not to receive or record this confession, but cause him to plead not guilty and take an inquest to try the matter."

1680, Hale, Pleas of the Crown, Emlyn's ed., 225: "Concerning the plea of the prisoner upon his arraignment, and first of his confession of the fact charged and approving others. When the prisoner is arraigned, and demanded what he saith to the arraignment, either he confesseth the indictment, or pleads to it, or stands mute and will not answer. The confession is either simple, or relative in order to the attainment of some other advantage. That which I call a simple confession is where the defendant, upon hearing of his indictment, without any other respect confesseth it; this is a conviction; but it is usual for the court, especially if it be out of clergy, to advise the party to plead and put himself upon his trial, and not presently to record his confession but to admit him to plead. If it be but an extrajudicial confession, tho' it be in Court — as where the prisoner freely tells the fact and demands the opinion of the Court whether it be a felony, — tho' upon the fact thus shown it appear to be felony, the Court will not record his confession but admit him to plead to the felony 'not guilty.' A confession in order to some other advantage is either where the prisoner confesseth the felony in order to his clergy, or where he confesseth the offence and appealeth others thereof, thereby to become an approver, and thereupon to obtain his pardon if he convict them." [1]

Notice here, first, that a "confession" in the language of Lord Hale, "is a conviction", or, in Serjeant Hawkins' phrase, "the highest conviction that can be made." There is no question of evidence; it is matter of recording a man as guilty, because he has pleaded it, and no resort to evidence (no "trial") is needed. Notice, next, that the unwillingness to make the record of such a plea is a general and indiscriminate one, according to Hale ("it is usual for the Court"); but according to the others, the circumstance causing hesitation is that accused is overpowered by "fear, menace, or duress", or by "fear, menace, or duress, or from weakness or ignorance." This test is one wholly appropriate to the situation, and not at all coincident with the modern one; and yet these authorities have undoubtedly served in part for precedents in the later stages.

(2) "Confession" as dispensing with the two overt-act witnesses in treason. The same notion of "confession" as a plea of "guilty", and in itself a "conviction", reappears in the statutes of the 1500s and 1600s, requiring two witnesses to an overt act of treason. It is obvious that when a requirement was established (post, § 2036) as to the quantity of evidence (two witnesses), the requirement would naturally not apply in a case where no resort at all to evidence was needed, i.e. where the accused pleaded guilty, that is, "confessed." This was evidently the notion in the statutes of Edward VI, dispensing with the requirement in such a case:

1547, St. 1 Ed. VI, c. 12, s. 22: "No person . . . [shall be indicted or convicted of treason, unless he] be accused by two lawful and sufficient witnesses, or shall willingly and without violence confess the same."

1554, St. 5 & 6 Ed. VI, c. 11, s. 8: the same, "unless the said party arraigned shall willingly without violence confess the same." [2]

Now the statute was construed to give this dispensatory effect to confessions other than those made upon arraignment at bar. Thus:

1664, Tong's Case, Kelyng 18: "The judges all agreed that if a conspirator be examined before a privy counsellor or a justice of the peace, and upon his examination without torture confess the treason, if after at his trial he deny it, and two witnesses to prove that

§ 818. [1] So also (1716) Hawkins, Pl. Cr., b. II, c. 31, §§ 1–3.

[2] These statutes were, by some judges, believed or claimed to have been repealed, as to trials, by 1 & 2 P. & M. c. 10 (1554), which enacted that all trials of treason should from thenceforth be held "according to the due order and course of the common law"; see e.g. Tong's Case, Kelyng 18, 49 (1664); and this contention practically prevailed during the Stuart period (post, §§ 1364, 2036). But the question of its interpretation in the present connection was still a living one.

confession, are good evidence against him that made that confession at his examination aforesaid; and in that case there needs no witness to prove him guilty of the treason, for that confession puts it out of the statute, which requires two witnesses to prove the treason unless the party shall without torture confess the same; and the confession there spoken of is not meant a confession before the judge at his trial, but a confession upon his examination." [3]

It was apparently to remedy the effect of this forced construction and restore to the statute its intended restrictions that the act of 7 Wm. III changed the phraseology of the dispensing clause:

1695, St. 7 Wm. III, c. 3: No indictment or trial for high treason shall be had except on the testimony of two lawful witnesses, "unless the party indicted and arraigned or tried shall willingly without violence in open court confess the same, or shall stand mute, etc."

This phrasing, it would seem, should have settled the matter. But, such was the pressure to use summary methods towards treasonable efforts, that even this statute permitted a difference of opinion to arise as to the dispensatory effect of a confession made out of court.[4] The pretext of those who gave it such an effect seems to have been that such a confession was itself an overt act, and therefore was enough if proved by two witnesses. The doubts were still unsettled in 1793; and the following passage shows how distinct the question was from that of the mere admissibility of confessions:

1793, Anon., Discourse on High Treason, 145 (printed in Kelyng's Rep., ed. 1874): "As to the confession, there have been doubts whether the statute requires a confession upon the arraignment of the party, or a confession taken out of court by a person authorized to take such examination. Evidence of a confession proved upon the trial by two witnesses has been held insufficient to convict without farther proof of the overt acts (MS. 1746). This point is, however, not clearly settled. But such confession out of court is evidence admissible, proper to be left to a jury, and will go in corroboration of other evidence to the overt acts." [5]

(3) Confessions in general as admissible. These, then, were the only doctrines about "confessions" up to the middle of the 1700s. They both involved the notion of "confession" as a plea of guilty and therefore as dispensing with the necessity of evidence; and they dealt with the conditions under which the effect of immediate conviction was to follow such a confession.

That, apart from these doctrines, there were no others as to confessions, appears not merely from the general lack of record of such doctrines, but

[3] Coke had advanced the same opinion a century before, in Ralston's Case, 3 Inst. 25; so, also, Anon., 2 Anderson 66.

[4] This broader effect was upheld in Francia's Case (1716), as reported in East Pl. Cr. I, 133, and Foster, Discourse on High Treason, c. III, § 8 (Foster Cr. C. 241); and in Berwick's Case (1746), Foster Cr. C. 10. On the other hand in Willis' Trial (1710), 15 How. St. Tr. 623, it was conceded that the confession, to be sufficient of itself, should be "in a court of record." Mr. J. Foster, in his Discourse (241), approved the latter doctrine, and thought that the former cases should not be extended beyond their facts, i.e. the case of an examination before a magistrate. Chief Baron Gilbert, in his Treatise on Evidence (p. 137; ante, 1726) had taken the view of Willis' Case.

[5] In 1803 we find Mr. East (Pl. Cr. I, 132) combating Mr. J. Foster's opinion, and agreeing with the view of the Francia case. Yet he seems at times to confuse the mere admission of a confession and its sufficiency to convict.

from several other circumstances. In the first place, the reports of trials, down to the middle of the 1600s at least, show the tribunal questioning the accused, and proceeding, without let or hindrance, upon whatever they could get from him by way of confession.[6] In the next place, we find that, up to the middle of the 1600s at least, the use of torture to extract confessions was common, and that confessions so obtained were employed evidentially without scruple;[7] and it is clear that such a practice is inconsistent with the slightest recognition of the modern doctrine about the admissibility of confessions. In the third place, the doctrine of receiving approvers' confessions against themselves was nominally in full force during all this period, and was not in effect abolished until Rudd's Case,[8] in 1775. This doctrine, too, could not possibly co-exist with any semblance of the modern doctrine about confessions; for it used as evidence (and evidence sufficient in itself) a confession obtained by a promise of pardon, more or less contingent, to be sure, but still definite and probable enough to be fatal to the modern use of the confession.[9] In the fourth place, there are many recorded trials in which

[6] Cases cited post, § 2250 (history of the privilege against self-crimination).

[7] 1836, Jardine, Use of Torture in the Criminal Law of England, 58 ff. Mr. Jardine says, further: "The last instance of torture in England, of which I can find any trace, occurred in the year 1640"; and this result seems to be adopted in the acute and interesting articles on the subject by Mr. A. Lawrence Lowell, "Judicial Use of Torture", 11 Harv. L. Rev. 293. Yet in 1664, in Tong's Trial, 6 How. St. Tr. 259, the defendant is found saying, "I confess I did confess it in the Tower, being threatened with the rack." In The Athenian Mercury, a periodical printed between 1690 and 1697 (edited in selections as "The Athenian Oracle", by J. Underhill, Camelot Series, 1892), a correspondent asks whether torture to a suspected criminal is unlawful, and the editor replies (p. 196) that "'tis neither political nor reasonable; but were it both of these, we very much doubt the lawfulness of it; Christianity and the laws of nature seem to forbid it"; thus the law of the land had as yet not shown a plain attitude to the editor.

In Scotland, it was applied even much later: 1676, Mitchel's Trial, 6 How. St. Tr. 1207, 1232; 1680, Gordon's Trial, 11 How. St. Tr. 51; 1684, Semple's Trial, 11 How. St. Tr. 985; 1684, Carstair's Trial, 10 How. St. Tr. 687; 1688, Standsfield's Trial, 11 How. St. Tr. 1371, 1387; 1689, Renwick's Trial, 12 How. St. Tr. 569, 576; 1690, Paine's Trial, 10 How. St. Tr. 754. Sir Walter Scott, in "Old Mortality" describing, as of 1679, the examination of torture of the Cameronian preacher Macbriar (ch. 38), confessedly relies in part for his authority on this very trial of Mitchel, supra.

In the Colonies, it was known at as late a time as Mr Jardine mentions: 1642, Bradford's History of Plymouth Plantation, 473; 1641 and 1660, Mass. Body of Liberties, c. 45 (quoted post, § 2280).

[9] The theory and process is clearly set forth by Lord Hale (1680), Pleas of the Crown, 225: "Before any man shall be admitted to be an approver, he must confess the indictment in open court, and pray a coroner to be assigned him. . . . Upon confessing the felony and praying a coroner to be assigned, the court doth these things: 1. They assign him a coroner to take his appeal; . . . 3. He shall be removed out of the strait custody, and make his appeal before the coroner, that he may not have any just pretence to say it was by duress or constraint, and, therefore, if upon the coming back of the approver into court he will waive his appeal, as being made by duress and against his will, the coroner shall be examined touching it upon oath, and if he affirm it was made 'de bon grée', the appeal shall stand, but the approver shall be hanged. . . . If the approver be vanquished and kild upon the place in the battle, or if the appellee be acquitted by verdict, yet a judgment must be entred upon his [the approver's] confession; for his bare confession of the felony is a conviction, it is true, but not an attainder til judgment given 'quod suspendatur per collum', which is not presently entred upon his becoming approver, but when either by trial or for any other cause before shewn, the court thinks not fit to spare his execution. . . . If the appellee be convict by verdict or battle, or such opportunities were offered that, if there had been any doctrine limiting the admissibility of confessions, it must have been mentioned by judges or by counsel; yet it was not.[10] Finally, in the treatises of Hale [11] and Buller,[12] where the doctrine would naturally be mentioned, there is in the original edition no such mention; while Hawkins [13] expressly declares the admissibility of confessions without limitation; and the passage of Gilbert,[14] which has a limitation, was apparently intended to apply only to "confessions" in the old pleading-sense already described.[15]

§ 819. Confessions in the Second Half of the 1700s. During the time after the Restoration of 1660, and in the course of the gradual, though slow and timid, improvement in the methods of criminal trials, there must have been some extension, in the minds of bar and bench, to the usage for extrajudicial confessions, of the phrases and notions originally peculiar to confessions at bar upon arraignment.[1] slain upon the field, . . . in that case, altho' the life of the approver is saved, yet he shall be banished unless he obtain the king's pardon; lord Coke saith he shall have a pardon 'ex debito justiæ.'"

[10] E.g.: 1664, Tong's Case, Kelyng 18 (the judges differed as to admitting against one defendant the testimony of another given under promise of pardon; "but they all advised that no such promise should be made, nor any threatenings used to them in case they did not give full evidence"); 1710, Willis' Trial, 15 How. St. Tr. 623 (a peculiar but absurd point was raised under the St. 7 Wm. III, supra, that it excluded all extrajudicial confessions, and during the discussion the judges made such remarks as the following: Tracy, J.: "I never knew it disputed but a man's confession might be given in evidence"; Lord Chief Baron: "To say it shall not be given in evidence, there is no ground for it"); 1716, Francia's Trial, ib. 920 (a promise by the Secretary of State not to use the confession was alleged to have been broken; no argument of the modern sort was advanced); 1722, Woodburne's Trial, 16 How. St. Tr. 62; Layer's Trial, 16 How. St. Tr. 21; 1736, Bacon, Abridgment, tit. "Evidence" (I), p. 313 ("The confession of the defendant himself, whether taken on examination . . . or spoken in private discourse, has always been allowed to be given in evidence against the party").

[14] Ante 1726.

[15] Two instances will illustrate how the texts of the 1700s have by editorial interpolation been made to bear testimony in modern times to law which the authors would hardly have recognized. In Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown, b. II, c. 46, § 33, 8th ed., there is a passage: "A confession being the strongest proof of guilt, requires the highest authority"; this, in earlier editions, was a note, with the addition: "and this confession must be without menace or undue terror"; the passage did not appear at all in the original edition; and it applies merely to the old sense of confession, i.e. pleas of guilty. Again, the following sentimental rhetoric: "As the human mind under the pressure of calamity is easily seduced and liable, in the alarm of danger, to acknowledge indiscriminately a falsehood or a truth, as different agitations may prevail, a confession, whether made upon an official examination or in discourse with private persons, which is obtained from a defendant either by the flattery of hope or by the impressions of fear, however slightly the emotions may be implanted, is not admissible, for the law will not suffer a prisoner to be made the deluded instrument of his own conviction", after being interpolated by editors into Gilbert's and Hawkins' treatises, was widely copied (in Swift's treatise, of 1810, for example, p. 132), and has helped largely as an authority to support one of the modern heresies. Mr. Joy thinks it the work of Gilbert's editor, Lofft; but there are circumstances which point strongly to Leach, the reporter of Crown Cases, and a leading counsel in criminal practice in the late 1700s.

§ 819. [1] It seems, however, to have been the custom, from the time of the trials of the 1500s, in offering the depositions of accomplices (and perhaps of accusers not strictly accomplices or co-principals), to state, in favor of their credit, that the deposition was given voluntarily without torture or compulsion: 1551, Duke of Somerset's Trial, 1 How. St. Tr. 515, 520; 1571, Duke of Norfolk's Trial, ib. 958, 978, 1009, 1020; 1586, Babington's Trial,

It has left few direct traces in the reports;[2] but by 1775–1785 we find its results coming to the surface. In 1775 in Rudd's Case,[3] where the accused has applied for release in consequence of having confessed under an assurance of pardon to be received as an accomplice testifying for the Crown, Lord Mansfield, in discussing the practice of using approver's confessions, seemed to see nothing unlawful in it. But at the same time he made the first judicial utterance limiting the admissibility of ordinary confessions: "The instance has frequently happened of persons having made confessions under threats or promises; the consequence as frequently has been that such examinations and confessions have not been made use of against them on their trial." He was here, clearly, thinking only of persons "being drawn by promises and assurances to answer to an examination and to swear to it on oath", and not of confessions in general; moreover he does not intimate that anything more than a common practice (not a rule) existed. But in 1783, in Warickshall's Case,[4] before Nares, J., and Eyre, B., the modern rule received a full and clear expression, and confessions not entitled to credit because of the promises or the threats by which they had been obtained were declared inadmissible in evidence. From this time on, the history of the doctrine is merely a matter of the narrowness or broadness of the exclusionary rule.

At this stage, then, the doctrine is a perfectly rational one. Confessions apparently untrustworthy as affirmation of guilt are excluded. Under this principle very few were in fact excluded. Doubts about situations which subsequently become questionable were never heard of. Confessions were thought of in general as "the highest evidence of guilt"; and there was no general sentiment against them,—no 'prima facie' doubt of their propriety.

§ 820. Confessions in the 1800s. By the beginning of the 1800s, the whole attitude of the judges had changed, through influences which we may attempt later to estimate (post, § 865). There was a general suspicion of all confessions, a prejudice against them as such, and an inclination to repudiate them upon the slightest pretext. This attitude continued for half a century, when an effort to harmonize the accumulated and inconsistent precedents, and the improvements that had taken place in criminal procedure, brought clearly before the profession some of the absurdities of the results reached. That a confession should be excluded because it was made upon a promise to give a glass of gin; because the prosecutor said, "If the prisoner would only give him his money, he might go to the devil if he pleased"; because a handbill, offering a few pounds reward for evidence, was posted in the magistrate's office; because the prisoner was told that "what he said would be used against him"; — that such results, chronicled in the reports of the first half of the 1800s, could be reached in the name of the investigation of truth seems almost incredible, until we understand the explanatory circumstances. This explanation, lying as it does in collateral conditions indirectly affecting the attitude of the judges, may be here postponed (post, § 865). In the meantime, the foregoing history will enable us to examine the orthodox principle of exclusion and the details of the rules laid down in the precedents.

[2] The following case seems to have the earliest direct indication of such a doctrine: 1741, White's Trial, 17 How. St. Tr. 1085 (the accused's examination before a magistrate being offered, the clerk was asked whether it was voluntarily given; Mr. Recorder, presiding: "That is an improper question; unless the prisoner had insisted and made it part of his case that his confession was extorted by threats or drawn from him by promises; in that case, indeed, it would have been proper for us to inquire by what means the confession was procured"). In this case and Goodere's Trial, ib. 1054, it appears to have become the custom to entitle the report of the accused's examination as "the voluntary examination of A. B."

2. Principle of the Exclusion of Confessions

§ 821. What is a Confession? Denials, Guilty Conduct, and Self-Contradictions, distinguished. A confession is an acknowledgment in expr[illegible]ds, by the accused in a criminal case, of the truth of the guilty fact [illegible] or of some essential part of it. It is to this class of statements on[illegible] the present principle of exclusion applies.

In this sense, therefore, there are in particular three things which fall without the meaning of the term "confession", and are thus not affected in any way by the present rules, namely, (1) guilty conduct, (2) exculpatory statements, and (3) acknowledgments of subordinate facts colorless with reference to actual guilt.

(1) The conduct of an accused person falls clearly without the present principle, which rests on the theory that the trustworthiness of the accused's verbal utterances is destroyed or weakened by circumstances supplying a motive for false assertion (post, § 822). That which is not an assertion, in some form or another, can therefore not be within the scope of such a principle; its probative use is not testimonial but circumstantial; and the frequency of its employment, free from the present rules, may be seen by perusing the numerous rules of circumstantial evidence (ante, §§ 272–284) which apply to such evidence.

The accused's conduct, therefore, consisting in fleeing from arrest, concealing the traces of crime, fabricating evidence, suppressing testimony, and other behavior indicative of a guilty consciousness, falls without the present rules:[1] § 821. [1] The authorities dealing with this class of evidence (ante, §§ 272–284) sufficiently show that it is admitted without regard to the confession-rules.

In the courts of Texas alone, it would seem, the heresy prevails that conduct may be treated as a confession (but note that in that State a peculiar statutory rule — post, § 831 — has affected the general doctrine): 1883, Nolen v. State, 14 Tex. App. 474, 479 (but here the gesture was virtually a statement in answer to a question): 1887, Carter v. State, 23 Tex. App. 508, 5 S. W. 128 (refusal to tell his name); 1890, Fulcher v. State, 28 Tex. App. 465, 472, 13 S. W. 750 (defendant's agitation and paleness when arrested; prior cases explained). Nevertheless, even this extension of the term is not made to include conduct and utterances used as evidence on the issue of sanity: 1895, Adams v. State, 34 Tex. Cr. 470, 31 S. W. 372; 1897, Hurst v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 40 S. W. 264 (but otherwise if the words are in form a direct confession); 1897, Burt v. State, 38 Tex. Cr. 397, 40 S. W. 1000, 43 S. W. 344; 1898, Barth v. State, 39 Tex. Cr. 381, 46 S. W. 228. Compare the Texas citations under par. (2), infra. Compelling an accused, out of court, to submit to a measurement of his foot, is not a confession, within the Texas statute: 1903, Thompson v. State, 45 Tex. Cr. 190, 74 S. W. 914.

1895, BEAN, J., in State v. Reinhart, 26 Or. 466, 38 Pac. 825: "The defendant contends that, inasmuch as the only evidence tending to show the embezzlement is the false entries in the books of the firm kept by himself in the course of his employment, such entries are extrajudicial statements in the nature of a confession, and not sufficient to convict him unless corroborated by other evidence. But we cannot concur in this position. A 'confession' in a legal sense is restricted to an acknowledgment of guilt made by a person after an offence has been committed, and does not apply to a mere statement or declaration of an independent fact from which such guilt may be inferred. The entries of the defendant in the books of account which he was required to keep are not confessions or admissions of guilt, but are perfectly innocent in themselves; and it is only because they are shown to be false and fraudulent that the inference is irresistible, from the manner in which they were made, that they were intended to cover up his misappropriation."

(2) Exculpatory statements, denying guilt, cannot be confessions. This ought to be plain enough, if legal terms are to have any meaning and if the spirit of the general principle is to be obeyed:

1846, RUFFIN, C. J., in State v. Broughton, 7 Ired. 101: "It is altogether a mistake to call this 'evidence of a confession by a prisoner.' It has nothing of that character. It was not an admission of his own guilt, but on the contrary an accusation of another person. That it was preferred on oath in no way detracts from the inference that may be drawn from it unfavorably to the prisoner, as being a false accusation against another and thus furnishing with other things an argument of his own guilt."

1862, RICE, J., in State v. Gilman, 51 Me. 225: "The declarations of accused persons are not necessarily confessions, but generally, on the other hand, they are denials of guilt, and consist in attempts to explain circumstances calculated to excite suspicion."

1895, DEWITT, J., in State v. Cadotte, 17 Mont. 315, 42 Pac. 857 (the accused took the stand to explain how in self-defence he killed the deceased; the State offered various previous explanations of his, showing self-contradictions): "The other objection was that a portion of this testimony was a confession by the defendant, and it was not shown that such confession was made freely. . . . We are satisfied that the statements of the defendant sought to be proved were not confessions at all. Instead of being confessions of guilt, they were statements of his self-defence, statements in which he admitted the killing, and endeavored to show that he was obliged to kill to save his own life. They were admissions, to be sure, of the killing, but self-defending statements as to the same. And this was precisely the position he occupied upon the trial. He relying on self-defence for acquittal, it was competent to attack his credibility by proving statements made out of court as to the self-defence, contrary to those which he made as a witness on the trial."

1899, GRANGER, J., in State v. Novak, 109 Ia. 717, 79 N. W. 465: "Inaccurate use of such words as 'confessions', 'admissions', and 'declarations' has led to some confusion in the cases; but, on authority and reason, there is a clear distinction between a confession and an admission or declaration, unless the admission or declaration has within it the scope and purpose of a confession, in which its distinctive feature, as an admission or declaration, is lost in the broader term 'confession.' A confession is a voluntary admission or declaration by a person of his agency or participation in a crime. . . . To make an admission or declaration a confession, it must in some way be an acknowledgment of guilt. . . . The manifest purpose of [the defendant's] statements was to show himself innocent, and, if his statements are true, he is innocent of the crime charged; so that by no possibility could he have been induced, because of the promise of secrecy, to relate what was untrue, to his prejudice."

This necessary meaning for the term "confession" is generally conceded.[2] Nevertheless, it is in practice not always strictly obeyed; and in some of the cases noted in the ensuing sections no attention was paid to this limitation.

UNITED STATES: Federal: Here this doctrine has been ignored: 1896, Wilson v. U. S., 162 U. S. 613, 621, 16 Sup. 895 (here exculpatory assertions were admitted, yet after a discussion of the principles of confession); 1897, Bram v. U. But later cases, cited post, passim, have discredited the Bram Case in general.

Texas: Here the sound doctrine, originally accepted, seems to have been ignored later, under the influence of the peculiar local statute (quoted post, § 831): 1891, Quintana v. State, 29 Tex. App. 401, 407, 16 S. W. 258 (exculpatory explanation, held not a confession); 1892, Ferguson v. State, 31 Tex. App. 93, 100, 19 S. A due enforcement of it would help materially to remove some of the absurdities in the present practice, especially in the treatment of confessions made under oath (post, §§ 842–852).

It will be noticed that the exculpatory statements thus admitted are employed usually either (by showing them to be fabricated) as circumstantial evidence of guilty consciousness (under the principle of § 278, ante) or as self-contradictions impeaching the credit of the accused as a witness when he took the stand (under the principle of § 1018, post). But when the accused's statement is really a confession, i.e. an acknowledgment of guilt, it cannot be used in the latter manner, if it is by the confession-rule inadmissible as such; for the confession-rule must always be applied to confessions, even when it is desired to use them merely in testimonial impeachment of the accused, and even though (post, § 891) the accused as a witness may be impeached like other witnesses.[3]

(3) An acknowledgment of a subordinate fact, not directly involving guilt, or, in other words, not essential to the crime charged, is not a confession; because the supposed ground of untrustworthiness of confessions (post, § 822) is that a strong motive impels the accused to expose and declare his guilt as the price of purchasing immunity from present pain or subsequent punishment; and thus, by hypothesis, there must be some quality of guilt in the fact acknowledged. Confessions are thus only one species of admissions; and all other admissions than those which directly touch the fact of

According to the rules of evidence, what a prisoner has said respecting a particular fact is admissible evidence, not in the nature of a confession, but as evidence of the particular fact."

1866, CURREY, C. J., in People v. Strong, 30 Cal. 157: "The word 'confessions' is not the mere equivalent of the words 'statement' or 'declarations.' The defendant made statements to several of the witnesses, as they testified, respecting the departure of Holmes [the murdered man] for San Francisco, and of their appointment to meet at that place, etc.; but it is nowhere to be found in the testimony of the witnesses that he admitted or confessed to any participation in the homicide."

1897, WOLVERTON, J., in State v. Porter, 32 Or. 135, 49 Pac. 964: "We take it that the admission of a fact, or of a bundle of facts, from which guilt is directly deducible, or which within and of themselves import guilt, may be denominated a confession, but not so with the admission of a particular act or acts or circumstances which may or may not involve guilt, and which is dependent for such result upon other facts or circumstances to be established. It is not necessary that there be a declaration of an intent to admit guilt; it is sufficient that the facts admitted involve a crime, and these import guilt, or, as put by Mr. Wharton, '"I am guilty of this"; and this imports the admission of all the acts constituting guilt.' It is necessary, however, that the accused should speak with an 'animus confitendi', or an intention to speak the truth touching the specific charge of guilt; and when he, with such intention, narrates facts constituting a crime, the guilt becomes matter of inference, a resultant feature of the narration without an explicit declaration to that effect. So that we conclude that whenever the statements or declarations of the accused, voluntarily made, are of such facts as involve necessarily the commission of a crime, or in themselves constitute a crime, then the facts admitted import guilt, and such admissions may properly be denominated confessions."

1919, HOLLOWAY, J., in State v. Guie, 56 Mont. 485, 186 Pac. 329: "The distinction between a confession and an admission, as applied in criminal law, is not a technical refinement, but based upon the substantive differences of the character of the evidence deduced from each. A confession is a direct acknowledgment of guilt on the part of the accused, and, by the very force of the definition, excludes an admission, which, of itself, as applied in criminal law, is a statement by the accused, direct or implied, of facts pertinent to the issue, and tending, in connection with proof of other facts, to prove his guilt, but of itself is insufficient to authorize a conviction."

(4) Of course the present rules of exclusion have no application to a confession made in open court before judge and jury on the trial of the issue.[5]

§ 822. Principle of Exclusion is the Untrustworthiness of the Testimony under certain conditions. The principle upon which a confession is treated as sometimes inadmissible is that under certain conditions it becomes untrustworthy as testimony. The principle is the same as that upon which statements based on memoranda, or testimony given while intoxicated, or testimony given upon the suggestion of a leading question, are treated as here, "that suitcase is my property", was held a confession, on a trial for burglary); Utah: 1909, State v. Moore, 36 Utah 521, 105 Pac. 293 (adultery by the defendant, being wife of C. H. M., with A. J. [5] In Garner v. State, 97 Ark. 63, 1910, 132 S. W. 1010, is an extraordinary instance of the improper exclusion of such a confession, on the ground that defendant's counsel was not present.

dubitable and may under circumstances be excluded. In criminal charges, the higher degree of caution always exercised by the law in favor of the accused prompts to a greater strictness in excluding suspicious testimony, and the degree of likelihood of its incorrectness need be much less than in other instances; yet the principle is the same.

The ground of distrust of confessions made in certain situations is, in a rough and indefinite way, experience. There has been no careful collection of statistics of untrue confessions, nor has any great number of instances been even loosely reported;[1] but enough have been verified to fortify the conclusion, based on ordinary observation of human conduct, that under certain stresses a person, especially one of defective mentality or peculiar temperament, may falsely acknowledge guilt. This possibility arises wherever the innocent person is placed in such a situation that the untrue acknowledgment of guilt is at the time the more promising of two alternatives between which he is obliged to choose; that is, he chooses any risk that may be in falsely acknowledging guilt, in preference to some worse alternative associated with silence.

What are the circumstances which may make such an acknowledgment preferable? The law cannot attempt to weigh testimony before even listening to it. But it can take note of certain objective circumstances as leading with high probability to falsities. The circumstances which thus call for the rejection of a confession are usually described as involving either a promise or a threat. Thus a promise of certain pardon, when attached to a confession, may conceivably make a confession, irrespective of its truth, seem more desirable than silence with its contingencies; or a threat of instant hanging by a mob, unless a confession is forthcoming, may conceivably make the contingencies of a confession more desirable than the certain consequences of silence.

The principle, then, upon which a confession may be excluded is that it is, under certain conditions, testimonially untrustworthy. What circumstances may make it so, and what degree of untrustworthiness is sufficient, are further questions; but the essential feature is that the principle of exclusion is a testimonial one, analogous to the other principles which exclude narrations as untrustworthy (ante, §§ 768–788). This theory, while developing different and inconsistent practical tests at the hands of various Courts, seems to have been generally accepted as the underlying and fundamental principle since the first introduction of any doctrine about the inadmissibility of confessions:

Ante 1726, Chief Baron GILBERT, Evidence, 137: "This confession must be voluntary and without compulsion; . . . pain and force may compel men to confess what is not the truth of facts and consequently such extorted confessions are not to be depended on."

1783, NARES, J., and EYRE, B., in Warickshall's Case, 1 Leach Cr. C., 3d ed., 298: "It is a mistaken notion that the evidence of confessions and facts which have been obtained from prisoners by promises or threats is to be rejected from a regard to public faith. No such rule ever prevailed. . . . Confessions are received in evidence or rejected as inadmissible under a consideration whether they are or are not entitled to credit. A free and voluntary confession is deserving of the highest credit, because it is presumed to flow from the strongest sense of guilt, and therefore it is admitted as proof of the crime to which it refers. But a confession forced from the mind by the flattery of hope or by the torture of fear comes in so questionable a shape when it is to be considered as evidence of guilt that no credit ought to be given to it, and therefore it is rejected." [2]

1834, Editors' Note, 6 Carrington & Payne, 353: "The principle upon which all this class of cases is founded is that by an inducement being held out to the prisoner, he may be led to suppose that he will be more mercifully dealt with if he confesses, and that he may therefore be induced to confess himself guilty of an offence he never committed (of which instances we believe have occurred)."

1856, CAMPBELL, L. C. J., in Scott's Case, 1 D. & B. 58: "It is a trite maxim that the confession of a crime, to be admissible against the party confessing, must be voluntary; but this only means that it shall not be induced by improper threats or promises, because under such circumstances the party may have been influenced to say that which is not true, and the supposed confession cannot be safely acted on."

1881, WILLIAMS, J., in R. v. Mansfield, 14 Cox Cr. 639: "It is not because the law is afraid of having truth elicited that these confessions are excluded, but because the law is jealous of not having the truth."

1886, WILSON, C. J., in R. v. Doyle, 12 Ont. 354: "The reason the confession in such a case is not admissible is that in law it cannot be depended upon as true; for one in such a case may say, and is likely to say, that which is not the truth if he thinks it to his advantage to do so."

1792, MCKEAN, C. J., in Com. v. Dillon, 4 Dall. 116: "If such declarations are voluntarily made, all the world will agree that they furnish the strongest evidence of imputed guilt. . . . The true point of consideration, therefore, is whether the prisoner has falsely declared himself guilty of a capital offence."

1852, WITHERS, J., in State v. Vaigneur, 5 Rich. L. 400: "The foundation of all rules upon this subject rests upon an anxiety to exclude confessions that are probably not true; and therefore to exclude those that are not voluntary because such are probably untrue."

1854, SHAW, C. J., in Com. v. Morey, 1 Gray 462: "The ground on which confessions made by a party accused, under promises of favor or threats of injury, are excluded as incompetent is, not because any wrong is done to the accused in using them, but because he may be induced, by the pressure of hope or fear, to admit facts unfavorable to him without regard to their truth, in order to obtain the promised relief or avoid the threatened danger, and therefore admissions so obtained have no just and legitimate tendency to prove the facts admitted."

1883, COOLEY, J., in People v. Wolcott, 51 Mich. 615, 17 N. W. 78: "No reliance can be placed upon admissions of guilt so obtained [by promises of favor on confessing], for the very obvious reason that they are not made because they are true, but because, whether true or false, the accused is led to believe it is for his interest to make them."

1893, MORTON, J., in Com. v. Myers, 160 Mass. 530, 532, 36 N. E. 481: "Confessions are . . . [excluded] only where the circumstances are such, under which they are made, that a reasonable presumption arises that they may have been induced by a promise or threat from one in authority, and consequently are open to the objection that they may not be true."

1899, GRANGER, J., in State v. Norak, 109 Ia. 717, 79 N. W. 465: "The reason for the rule excluding involuntary confession is not based on the thought that truth thus obtained would not be acceptable; but because confessions thus obtained are unreliable. The rule is in the interest of safe and reliable evidence. . . . The essence of the rule is that when the confessions are made the conditions as to hope or fear are such as to make then unsafe as evidence."

[2] See another report of this leading opinion in Sel. Crim. Trials at Old Bailey, I, App. 23, 24.

1917, GEORGE, J., in Wilson v. State, 19 Ga. App. 759, 92 S. E. 309: "Practically all the authorities agree that the only proper question is whether the inducement held out to the prisoner tended to make his confession an untrue one. The exclusion of confession evidence rests on the connection with the inducement; the inducement and the confession stand to each other in the relation of cause and effect. The object of every legal investigation is to ascertain the truth. Testimonial worthlessness is the underlying and fundamental principle on which confession evidence is, under certain circumstances, rejected. If the court could know in a given case that a confession was true, it is clear that the evidence thereof should not be rejected. The wrong done, however reprehensible, in inducing the accused to make a confession, could never, rightly considered, require a rejection of the confession if the court could know as a fact that the confession was the truth of the case. The underlying principle is that the only confession that can be excluded is the false confession."

1922, LATTIMORE, J., in Barker v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 238 S. W. 943: "It is needless to discuss confessions. They are held to be statements of the accused in criminal cases hostile to his own interests, but which must be shown to have been made in accordance with certain precautionary rules, before they will be held admissible. These rules are deemed wise and needful in order to prevent the use against the accused of his statements made under duress, fear, intimidation, coercion, or hope of favor, etc. The rules are based on the general hypothesis that the truth of statements made under the circumstances referred to is too often questionable. The only object sought in the entire matter is truth."[3]

§ 823. Other Theories not sanctioned; Self-Crimination Privilege, distinguished. This principle of testimonial untrustworthiness being the foundation of exclusion, it follows that the exclusion is not rightly rested on certain other possible and occasionally plausible theories.

(a) A confession is not excluded because of any breach of confidence or of good faith which may thereby be involved. This has been accepted from the beginning:

1783, Warickshall's Case, 1 Leach Cr. L., 3d ed., 298; a confession was obtained by a promise of favor; "it was contended by her counsel that as the fact of finding the stolen property in her custody had been obtained through the means of an inadmissible confession, the proof of that fact ought also to be rejected; for otherwise the faith which the prosecutor had pledged could be violated, and the prisoner made the deluded instrument of her own conviction." NARES, J., and EYRE, B.: "It is a mistaken notion that the evidence of confessions and facts which have been obtained from prisoners by promises or threats is to be rejected from a regard to public faith; no such rule ever prevailed. The idea is novel in theory, and would be as dangerous in practice as it is repugnant to the general principles of criminal law. Confessions are received in evidence, or rejected as inadmissible, under a consideration whether they are or are not entitled to credit."

1842, Mr. Joy, Confessions, 50: "This does not make the confession admissible [i.e. an oath or promise of secrecy], although a confidence is thus created in the mind of the prisoner and he is thrown off his guard. The true question seems to be, Does such confidence render it probable that the prisoner should be thus induced untruly to confess himself guilty of a crime of which he was innocent?"

[3] So, too, the following opinions, among others: 1852, R. v. Baldry, 2 Den. Cr. C. 432, 446; 1874, Peyton, C. J., in Garrard v. State, 50 Miss. 151; 1892, Bleckley, C. J., in Cornwall v. State, 91 Ga. 277, 283, 18 S. E. 154 ("The reason why confessions made under the influence of hope are excluded is the danger of their being false"); 1900, Depue, C. J., in Bullock v. State, 65 N. J. L. 557, 47 Atl. 62; 1911, People v. Flores, 17 P. R. 166, 176. So, too, the following writers: 1824, Starkie, Evidence, I, 52; 1842, Joy, Confessions, 51; 1860, Appleton, Evidence, c. XI, p. 174.

Thus, so far as a promise, whether of secrecy, of favor, or of other action, or a misrepresentation of facts, has been the means of obtaining the confession, the exclusion that might ensue would in no way rest on the mere fact that a promise has been broken, a confidence violated, or a deception deliberately planned and carried out.[1]

(b) A confession is not excluded because of any illegality in the method of obtaining it or in the speaker's situation at the time of making it.[2] The general principle — that the illegality of the source of evidence is no bar to its reception — is well established (post, § 2183), and it is not for any such reason that confessions are rejected.[3] Occasion seldom arises, however, for the illustration of the principle as applied to confessions.

(c) Finally, a confession is not rejected because of any connection with the privilege against self-crimination. The circumstances that this privilege protects against a disclosure which is compulsory, and that one of the tests for a confession is whether it is voluntary or not, have naturally led to the occasional use of both arguments at once by counsel in opposing the use of such a confession; but the Courts have properly kept the two principles distinctly apart. Thus, where a compulsory disclosure is offered, it may be admissible so far as the privilege against self-incrimination is concerned, and yet the question of its propriety as a confession may be raised;[4] while it may be inadmissible on both grounds.[5] Moreover, where the privilege has been violated, there is no need of resorting to confessional principles to exclude it, since the theory of the privilege itself suffices to prevent the use of evidence obtained in consequence of such a violation.[6] Finally, that the theory of confessions has no connection with the theory of this privilege is shown by the prevailing doctrine that testimony obtained by the violation of the privilege cannot be objected to as such unless it is being used against the person thus disclosing.[7] The sum and substance of the difference is that the confession-rule aims to exclude self-criminating statements which are false, while the privilege-rule gives the option of excluding those which are true. The two are complementary to each other, in that respect, and therefore cannot be coincident. Their separateness has more than once been judicially pointed out:

1854, SELDEN, J., in Hendrickson v. People, 10 N. Y. 33: "If by 'voluntary' is meant 'uninfluenced by the disturbing fear of punishment or by flattering hopes of favor' the expression may be accurate. But it is liable to mislead, because it suggests the idea that § 823. [1] This has been emphasized in repeated decisions, cited post, § 841.

[2] A seeming exception is found in the exclusion of confessions by an accused on oath contrary to the statutes for the examination of accused persons; but this can be otherwise explained (post, § 849).

[3] 1857, Selden, J., in People v. McMahon, 15 N. Y. 386 ("It is because it [a sort of confession] is in its nature unreliable, and not on account of any impropriety in the manner of obtaining it, that the evidence is excluded"); 1880, Andrews, J., in Balbo v. People, 80 N. Y. 499 ("The fact that the arrest was illegal has no relevancy, if the confession was voluntary").

the rejection of what are termed involuntary confessions flows from that principle of the common law which is supposed mercifully to exempt persons from all obligations to criminate themselves, and which is expressed by the maxim 'nemo tenetur prodere seipsum.' It might, I think, be shown . . . that the principle embodied in it has its foundation in the uncertain and dangerous nature of all evidence of guilt drawn from the statements of a party conscious of being suspected of crime. But, however this may be, it is certain that the statements of an accused person made under oath are never excluded on account of any supposed violation of the immunity of the party from self-crimination." [8]

§ 824. Practical Tests resulting from the above Principle: (a) Was the Inducement sufficient, by possibility, to elicit an untrue Confession of Guilt? While no one seems to have questioned the fundamental principle of the exclusion of confessions, there has been a decided difference of practice in the kind of test used in applying the principle. First may be considered that test which is orthodox in the sense that it is correct on principle, though not in the sense that it is adopted by the majority of Courts.

(1) It has been seen that the reason for distrusting a confession arises when the person is placed in such a situation that an untrue confession of guilt (more correctly, a confession of guilt irrespective of its truth or falsity) has become the more desirable of two alternatives between which the person was obliged to choose. Thus, the essential features of the situation are, first, the fact that the alternative is presented between present silence (or assertion of innocence) and some other prospect held out by and associated indispensably with the confession of guilt; and, secondly, the relative advantage of this confession, with its consequences certain or contingent, over silence, with its consequences certain or contingent. The exact situation is perhaps apt to be obscured by the ordinary phrase designating "a promise of benefit or a threat of harm" as the circumstances availing to exclude. The truth is that this duplicate form of statement is not essential; it indicates merely superficial features; and the situation is always reducible to the single form above stated. Thus, where a promise (for example, of pardon) is the inducement for a confession, its effect is to make the certain freedom which will accom-

[8] So, also, the same judge's longer exposition in People v. McMahon (1857), 15 N. Y. 386; and that of Hamersley, J., in State v. Willis (1898), 71 Conn. 293, 41 Atl. 820. Compare Thompson v. State, Tex., cited ante, § 821, note 1.

That the two rules should be supposed to have something of a common principle or spirit is a not unnatural error. But that history should be rashly tampered with by asserting any common origin is inexcusable. The following passage, by reason of its exalted source, must be specially repudiated: 1897, White, J., in Bram v. U. S., 168 U. S. 532, 18 Sup. 182: "In criminal trials, in the courts of the United States, wherever a question arises whether a confession is incompetent because not voluntary, the issue is controlled by that portion of the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States commanding that no person 'shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself.' . . . A brief consideration of the reasons which gave rise to the adoption of the fifth amendment, of the wrongs which it was intended to prevent, and of the safeguards which it was its purpose unalterably to secure, will make it clear that the generic language of the amendment was but a crystallization of the doctrine as to confessions, well settled when the amendment was adopted." Of this it must suffice to say that no assertions could be more unfounded. The history of the two rules, as set forth ante, § 818, post, § 2250, shows that there never was any connection or association between the constitutional clause and the confession-doctrine. As to the difference in principle and rule, it is further pointed out in § 2266, post.

pany false confession more attractive at the moment than the mere possibilities of freedom, coupled with temporary restraint, which attend silence. Again, where a mob's threat of hanging has induced a confession, the alternative of present certain and future possible safety proves naturally more attractive than present certain death. Thus in both cases — a promise and a threat — the confession is untrustworthy because it has been associated with an attraction too strong to resist. The form of statement "a promise or a threat" is misleading because the two terms are not really correlative; i.e. a promise is always attached to the confession-alternative, while a threat is always attached to the silence-alternative; thus in the one case the person is measuring the net advantage of the promise, minus the general undesirability of a false confession, as against the present unsatisfactory situation; while in the other case he is measuring the net advantage of the present satisfactory situation, minus the general undesirability of confession, against the threatened harm. The measurements and the balances may be very different in the two instances, and the coupling of the terms "a promise or a threat" is thus improper in the same way that it would be improper to compare the opposite terms of two equations. Modern usage therefore generalizes by employing the term "inducement" to cover all modes of influence.

The term "a promise or a threat", as well as the term "voluntary", are also misleading in another way; for they obscure the fact that (even when threats are used) the situation is always one of choice between two alternatives, — either one disagreeable, to be sure, but still subject to a choice. As between the rack and a false confession, the latter would usually be considered the less disagreeable; but it is none the less voluntarily chosen. The term "voluntary", then, as describing the absence of the vicious element which excludes a confession, is, in ultimate exactness, unsound. All conscious verbal utterances are and must be voluntary; and that which may impel us to distrust one is not the circumstance that it is involuntary, but the circumstance that the choice of false confession is a natural one under the conditions. The choice of false confession is voluntary, but the false confession is associated with a prospect (namely, of escape from present harm) so tempting that it is not in human nature to resist it.

In general, then, the position of the confessing person which causes our distrust is that of being compelled to choose between two alternatives, one of which involves a confession of guilt irrespective of its truth or falsity. Each instance presented may be thus stated: What were the prospects attending confession (irrespective of its truth) to be weighed by him against the prospects of non-confession? The test of exclusion thus would be: Human nature being what it is, were the prospects attending confession (involving the equalization or averaging of the benefit of realizing the promise or the benefit of escaping from the threat, against the drawbacks moral and legal of furnishing damaging evidence), as weighed at the time against the prospects attending non-confession (involving a similar averaging), such as to have created, in any considerable degree, a risk that a false confession would be made? Putting it more briefly and roughly, Was the inducement such that there was any fair risk of a false confession?

It is this test which must be taken as on principle the orthodox one. It is not the test most commonly applied; but, in one phrasing or another, it has from time to time received the support of eminent judges so frequently that it may fairly be put forward as having claims as satisfactory on precedent as on principle:

1836, LITTLEDALE, J., in R. v. Court, 7 C. & P. 486: "The object of the rule relating to the exclusion of confessions is to exclude all confessions which may have been procured by the prisoner being led to suppose that it will be better for him to admit himself to be guilty of an offence which he really never committed."

1836, COLERIDGE, J., in R. v. Thomas, 7 C. & P. 346: "The only proper question is, whether the inducement held out to the prisoner was calculated to make his confession an untrue one."

1843, R. v. Holmes, 1 C. & K. 248; the magistrate told the accused to be sure and tell the truth, or it would be used against him. Mr. Greaves, for the prosecution: "The only proper question is, whether the words said to the prisoner had any tendency to induce him to make a false statement. . . . The case of R. v. Court is expressly in point." ROLFE, B.: "I am glad to find that there is such an authority; there are some previous cases the other way."

1843, COLERIDGE, J., in R. v. Hornbrook, 1 Cox Cr. 54: "Before any such evidence is received, it must be seen that his mind is entirely free from every false hope or fear that would be likely to operate upon his mind and induce him to say that which is not true. That is the principle upon which all these cases are decided. Has anything been said to the party to induce him to state that which is not true, under a hope that he shall thereby benefit himself? . . . [Whatever is said must] leave his mind in an unprejudiced state to tell only the truth."

1848, ERLE, J., in R. v. Garner, 1 Den. Cr. C. 331: "I think in every case it is for the Judge to decide whether the words were used in such a manner and under such circumstances as to induce the prisoner to make a confession of guilt whether such confession were true or no."

1847, WITHERS, J., in State v. Kirby, 1 Strobh. 387: "[It is erroneous] to construe the rule to be irrespective of the reason upon which all rules upon this whole subject are based. . . . The object of the rule is to exclude any admission that may have been procured by the prisoner's being led to suppose that it would be better for him to confess himself guilty of an offence of which he is innocent, — whether the inducement held out to him be calculated to make his confession untrue."

1857, LEWIS, C. J., in Fife v. Com., 29 Pa. 437: "It is impossible to reconcile the decisions on this branch of the law; and the reason seems to be that reporters and elementary law writers do not always bear in mind the true test on which the admission or exclusion of such evidence depends. In 1792, when Chief Justice McKean was presiding, the Supreme Court of this State declared that 'the true point for consideration is whether the prisoner has falsely declared himself guilty of a capital crime.' In deciding this point, the chief question is whether the inducement held out was calculated to make the confession an untrue one."

1881, HAMMOND, J., in U. S. v. Stone, 8 Fed. R. 232, 241, 256: "The real question is whether there has been any threat or promise of such a nature that the prisoner would be likely to tell an untruth from fear of the threat or hope of profit from the promise."

1893, HARALSON, J., in Beckham v. State, 100 Ala. 15, 17, 14 So. 859: "The controlling inquiry is whether there had been any threat of such a nature that from fear of it the prisoner was likely to have told an untruth. If so, the confession should not be admitted. Its exclusion rests on its connection with the inducement; they stand to each other in the relation of cause and effect. If it is apparent that no such connection exists, there is no reason for the exclusion of the evidence." [1]

§ 825. Same: (b) Was the Confession induced by a Threat or a Promise, by Fear or Hope? Not all questions involving confessions would necessarily bring into prominence the accurate test just described; and naturally enough many Courts fell into the habit of describing the excluding circumstance more briefly, though less accurately, as "a threat or a promise", or (the same thing in effect) as "fear or hope." In this form the test lacks any modification as to the measure of the force which the threat or the promise, the fear or the hope, might have in causing falsity of confession. It is based, to be sure, upon the general principle, already examined (§ 822), that confessions are excluded when untrustworthy; but it is not an accurate deduction therefrom. Nevertheless, it is constantly employed as a rule of thumb, without referring back to the living principle on which it depends.

By the middle of the 1800s the phrase had come to be regarded, by the greater number of judges, as in and for itself sufficient; and the rule was frequently laid down that any threat or promise, any fear or hope, would exclude a confession made in consequence of it, — that is, would exclude the confession irrespective of any attempt to measure its influence to cause a false confession:

1822, R. v. Gibney, Jebb Cr. C. 15, by all the Judges: "If hope has been excited or threats or intimidation held out, it shall not be received."

1824, Mr. Thomas Starkie, Evidence, II, 36: "A confession can never be received in evidence where the defendant has been influenced by any threat or promise." [1]

1852, PARKE, B. (for eight Judges), in R. v. Moore, 2 Den. Cr. C. 525: "Perhaps it would have been better to have held that in all cases the Judge was to decide that point upon his § 824. [1] The same principle has been more or less definitely expressed in the following rulings: 1878, U. S. v. Graff, 14 Blatch. 387; 1883, Hopt v. Utah, 110 U. S. 585, 4 Sup. 202; 1852, R. v. Baldry, 2 Den. Cr. C. 430, 444, per Campbell, L. C. § 825. [1] So also: 1814, Phillipps, Evidence, 11. The broad statements of these treatise-writers helped greatly to popularize this form of the test, especially in the United States; but their statements exaggerate the extent to which it had at that time become accepted, and in that aspect were incorrect. Mr. Starkie's statement, for example, was made on the authority of Warickshall's Case (quoted ante, § 822), which, instead of sustaining it, is quite consistent with the orthodox test. The only early case taking his extreme view was apparently R. v. Cass, 1 Leach Cr. L., 4th ed., 293, note (1784).

view of all the circumstances, including the nature of the threat or inducement and the character of the person holding it out together. But a rule has been laid down in different precedents, by which we are bound, and that is, that if the threat or inducement is held out actually or constructively by a person in authority, it cannot be received, however slight the threat or inducement."

1797, State v. Long, Haywood 455: "Its admissibility is made to depend on its being free of the suspicion that it was obtained by any threats of severity or promises of favour, and of any influence, even the minutest."

1876, STONE, J., in Bonner v. State, 55 Ala. 245: "Any inducement of profit, benefit, or melioration held out; any threat of violence, injury, increased rigor of confinement; or any other menace which can inspire alarm, dread, or the slightest fear, is enough to exclude the confession as not voluntarily made." [2]

Another phrase generalized the above terms, and declares that "any inducement" is sufficient to exclude the confession.[3] Occasionally an effort was made to apply this test with reference to the living principle, — that is, to ask whether the fear or the hope, the threat or the promise, was strong enough to produce a false confession;[4] but these efforts were casual; and sometimes there appears deliberate breaking with the original and fundamental principle, and the rule of thumb is applied in plain disregard of the question whether the confession is possibly untrue.[5]

§ 826. Same: (c) Was the Confession Voluntary? Probably as early in historical usage and more common in modern judicial opinions, is the phrase "voluntary", as indicating that quality in a confession which sanctions its reception.[1] Here, again, though the test rests ultimately for its validity upon the fundamental principle already examined (ante, § 822), yet it has come to be employed in judicial parlance as sufficient in itself, independent of the living principle beneath it. But, unlike the preceding test, it is not so serviceable as a rule of thumb, for its significance is so indefinite and loose that it does not of itself supply a solution for the various situations with their

[5] 1893, R. v. Thompson, 2 Q. B. 12, 17 ("A simple test, . . . Was it preceded by any inducement to make a statement, held out by a person in authority?": that the inducements were "calculated to elicit the truth" is "entirely immaterial"); 1905, R. v. Ryan, 9 Ont. L. R. 137 (confession of a letter-carrier to a post-office inspector, admitted on the facts; R. v. Thompson followed); 1856, Jordan v. State, 32 Miss. 386 ("It is no answer to say that the confession was true; the question and the only question, which can be considered is whether the confession was voluntary, extorted by threats or violence, or induced by the hope of reward or immunity from punishment").

§ 826. [1] Ante 1726, Gilbert, Evidence, 137 ("This confession must be voluntary and without compulsion, . . . pain and force may compel men to confess what is not the truth of facts, and consequently such extorted confessions are not to be depended on"). It had been the custom, long before this, in offering the deposition of an accomplice or accuser, to state that it was "voluntary and without torture or compulsion": ante, § 818.

graduated differences; hence it is often, perhaps usually, found in combination with the preceding test in one form or another, the latter serving to explain and make it more specific; thus:

1801, Mr. Peake, Evidence, 14: "The confession of a felon voluntarily made is evidence against him on his trial; but if any threats or promises have been made to induce him to confess, no evidence of such confession is admitted."

1881, COLERIDGE, L. C. J., in R. v. Fennell, L. R. 7 Q. B. D. 150: "A confession, in order to be admissible, must be free and voluntary; that is, must not be extracted by any sort of threats or violence, nor obtained by any direct or implied promises, however slight, nor by the exertion of any improper influence."

1893, CAVE, J., in R. v. Thompson, 2 Q. B. 17: "A simple test, . . . Is it proved affirmatively that the confession was free and voluntary; that is, Was it preceded by any inducement to make a statement held out by a person in authority?" [2]

In the case of the present test, however, it is employed usually — oftener than the preceding one — in a purely subsidiary way, i.e. as merely a rough test for determining the trustworthiness of the confession; the living principle being oftener kept in mind; thus:

1874, PEARSON, C. J., in State v. Whitfield, 70 N. C. 356: "No confession of guilt shall be heard in evidence unless made voluntarily; for if made under the influence of either hope or fear, there is no test of its truthfulness." [3]

3. "Person in Authority"

§ 827. Introductory. After thus considering the various theories and tests by which confessions are governed, it is now feasible to examine the different specific situations and the state of the rulings thereon. Since the inadmissibility of a confession depends on the relative strength of the inducement to confess falsely, as measured against the prospects attached to non-confession, it is obvious that the various situations can best be grouped ac-

[2] Examples of this test in American opinions are as follows: (1) Using "threat or promise" as the secondary test: 1839, U. S. v. Nott, 1 McL. 501; 1873, Nicholson v. State, 38 Md. 153; 1874, State v. Jones, 54 Mo. 479; 1871, Barnes v. State, 36 Tex. 362; 1839, State v. Phelps, 11 Vt. 121. (2) Using "hope or fear" as the secondary test: 1870, State v. Brockman, 46 Mo. 568; 1827, State v. Roberts, 1 Dev. N. C. 259; 1874, Rufer v. State, 25 Oh. St. 469.

Other sundry examples of this test are the following: 1896, Wilson v. U. S., 162 U. S. 613, 16 Sup. 895 (Fuller, C. J.: "the true test of admissibility is that the confession is made freely, voluntarily, and without compulsion or inducement of any sort"); 1900, Jackson v. U. S., 42 C. C. A. 452, 102 Fed. 473; 1897, Newell v. State, 115 Ala. 54, 22 So. 572; 1897, Holland v. State, 39 Fla. 178, 22 So. 298; 1898, Gantling v. State, 40 Fla. 237, 23 So. 857; 1898, Hecox v. State, 105 Ga. 625, 31 S. [3] Other examples of this sort are as follows: 1875, Sampson v. State, 54 Ala. 243; 1875, Levison v. State, 54 Ala. 524; 1877, Johnson v. State, 59 Ala. 39; 1881, Young v. State, 68 Ala. 575; 1881, Redd v. State, 69 Ala. 259; 1846, State v. Potter, 18 Conn. 177; 1871, Young v. Com., 8 Bush 370; 1857, Com. v. Tuckerman, 10 Gray Mass. 190; 1856, Brown v. State, 32 Miss. 450; 1847, State v. Cowan, 7 Ired. N. C. 244.

cording to the nature of the inducement. But as the strength of the inducement must depend more or less upon the power of the person offering it, the rule of law must first specify the kinds of persons from whose mouths the inducements may be regarded as having any value. Most of the inducements being favors offered or disadvantages threatened in the way of legal proceedings, the question is usually one of the legal authority of the person promising the favor or threatening the harm. The general topic may properly be described by the phrase, "Person in Authority."

§ 828. Threats or Promises in general. Unless the person attempting to obtain a confession has the power (apparently to the confessor) to carry out the threat or the promise, there is no reason for treating the inducement as likely to produce an untrue confession. It is in such a case not due to the inducement, but to the confessor's own discretion; for he has no real alternative.

The simple cases of this sort are those of threats of physical violence. Thus, a master threatening to beat or otherwise ill-treat a slave is clearly a person having such power; so, too, a mob having possession of the accused and threatening to hang or to beat him has such power.[1] § 829. Threats or Promises connected with Legal Immunity or Relief. Here there has been more or less uncertainty and difference of practice. The situation is that in which the confessor has been promised, if he confesses, a release from arrest, a cessation of prosecution, non-action towards prosecution, or the like.

On principle, such a promise should be of no consequence unless the promisor was one having (apparently) the power to arrest or prosecute. But for some time in England there was more or less uncertainty in the practice at Nisi Prius. This came about, probably in part, because the class of persons commonly accused before the judges came largely from a population which was accustomed to comport itself with submission before those of a "superior" class, and was inapt to discriminate about the authority of such persons to employ threats or promises. Most of the exclusions can be supported upon even the narrowest definition of "person in authority"; but during the first half of the 1800s no agreement had been reached as to the propriety of that test.[1] The older and more usual view was that the inducement, to exclude, § 828. [1] No decisions expressly involving the question seem to have been made; but in the rulings in § 833, post, will be found situations illustrating the application of the principle.

§ 829. [1] 1811, R. v. Hardwick, 1 C. & P. 98, note (the constable's wife; excluded); 1823, R. v. Gibbons, ib. 97 (a bystander; admitted); 1823, R. v. Tyler, ib. 129 (a bystander; admitted); 1834, R. v. Shaw, 6 id. 372 (a fellow-prisoner; admitted); 1834, R. v. Simpson, 1 Moody Cr. C. 410 (the mother of the prosecutor's wife, in the latter's presence; excluded); 1836, R. v. Upchurch, ib. 465, by ten Judges (the prosecutor's wife, who helped manage the business; excluded); 1836, R. v. Pountney, 7 C. & P. 302, Alderson, B. (the landlord of the inn to which the accused was taken in custody, a constable being present; held doubtful); 1839, R. v. Taylor, 8 id. 734 (the wife of the prosecutor and mistress of the accused, held "a person in authority over the prisoner"); 1846, R. v. Croydon, 2 Cox Cr. C. 67 (an attorney endeavoring to find evidence for a prosecution; excluded); 1848, R. v. Garner, 1 Den. Cr. C. 331 (a medical man in the presence of prosecutrix and accused's husband; excluded); 1848, R. v. Millen, 3 Cox Cr. C. 507 (a fellow-must have been held out by a person having a legal interest or authority in the arrest and prosecution;[2] but the view also obtained currency that an inducement by any person whatever would exclude.[3] The case of an inducement by a master or a mistress to a servant was the troublesome one, for there no legal interest in the prosecution might exist, and yet the relation involved in one sense an "authority", i.e. an actual control which might affect by its pressure the mind of the servant. Finally, in 1852, the earlier view was confirmed, and the existence of a legal interest in the prosecution was taken as the test, -- not the mere existence of actual control or influence growing out of the social or commercial relations of the persons:

1852, R. v. Moore, 2 Den. Cr. C. 522; Mr. Creasy, for the accused: "We must not look at the case as lawyers, but consider what would be the natural result of an inducement by such a person. The test is not, it is submitted, Who is the party to set justice in motion? but, Who is most likely to have influence? Who is most natural that the prisoner should look to?" PARKE, B., for the eight judges: "Perhaps it would have been better to have held (when it was determined that the judge was to decide whether the confession was voluntary) that in all cases he was to decide that point upon his own view of all the circumstances, including the nature of the threat or inducement, and the character of the person holding it out, together; not necessarily excluding the confession on account of the character of the person holding out the inducement or threat. But a rule has been laid down in different precedents by which we are bound, and that is, if the threat or inducement is held out, actually or constructively, by a person in authority, it cannot be received, however slight the threat or inducement. And the prosecutor, magistrate, or constable, is such a person; and so the master or mistress may be. If not held out by one in authority, they are clearly admissible. . . . But it is only where the offence concerns the master or mistress that their holding out the threat or the promise renders the confession inadmissible. . . . In the present case, the offence of the prisoner, in killing her child or concealing its dead body, was in no way an offence against the mistress of the house; she was not the prosecutrix then, and there was no probability of herself or the husband being the prosecutor of an indictment for that offence."

Thus the prosecutor or the prosecutrix (or a person likely to be such), or a person so employed about such a one's affairs as to be able to exercise his authority for him, or a person acting under his express or implied sanction, would be one whose inducements involving benefits connected with the legal proceedings might exclude the confession; but no other person's inducements (of prisoner in the presence of the arresting constable; excluded); 1851, R. v. Warringham, 2 Den. Cr. C. 447 (the wife of one of the prosecutors, concerned in the management of their business; excluded).

[2] 1809, R. v. Row, R. & R. 153, by nine Judges (advice by bystanders having nothing to do with the arrest; admitted, "because the advice to confess was not given or sanctioned by any person who had any concern in the business"); 1836, R. v. Gibbons, 1 C. & P. 97, Park, J., and Hullock, B. ("any person having any office or authority, as the prosecutor, constable, etc."); 1839, R. v. Taylor, 8 C. & P. 734, Patteson, J., speaking of his opinion as representing the judges; 1839, Lewin, note to 2 Lew. Cr. C. 125 ("The cases seem to establish the principle that where a confession is obtained through the medium of a suggestion made by a person from whom the prisoner can have nothing to hope or to fear, it ought to be received").

[3] 1831, R. v. Dunn, R. v. Slaughter, 4 C. & P. 543, Bosanquet, J. ("any person telling a prisoner that it will be better for him to confess will always exclude any confession made to that person"; here a fellow-workman, and a person to whom the stolen article was offered for sale); 1837, R. v. Spencer, 7 C. & P. 776, Parke, B. (held doubtful, because the judges were divided in opinion).

that character) could do so.[4] It must be added that a constable or other police officer, or a magistrate, has always been regarded as a person in authority with reference to inducements involving release from arrest or cessation of prosecution, irrespective of the technical limits of such a person's legal powers in the premises.[5]

§ 830. Same: United States Doctrine. The course of the law in the United States has tended towards the denial of the foregoing strict distinction, by reason of two circumstances. First, in the learned treatise of Professor Greenleaf, published several years before the decision in R. v. Moore (above quoted), it was intimated that the current of authority was against that doctrine, and his own weighty opinion favored that result;[1] and this opinion was widely circulated. Secondly, and chiefly, our system of public prosecution does not admit of such a sharp and easily handled distinction. In England, at common law the person injured by the crime may and (at least in its primary stages) usually must himself institute and manage the prosecution.[2] But in the United States he has no such power; the official prosecutor alone has it. Confessions made to such officials are in this country the commoner class. At the same time, the injured person may practically be in a position (by a failure to testify) which gives him actual power to affect the result favorably to the accused. To draw the line absolutely, therefore, at those who alone had legal control over the prosecution would be to omit many who might conceivably under certain conditions hold out inducements or a palpable

App. 12 (a hope of pardon originating in the accused's own mind, and not due to the statement of any person in authority, does not exclude); Canada: 1901, R. v. Todd, 13 Man. 364 (detectives obtaining a confession by trick, held not persons in authority); 1905, R. v. Ryan, 9 Ont. L. R. 137 (a post-office inspector questioning a letter-carrier; not decided); 1914, R. v. Anderson, 16 D. L. R. 203, Alta. (a doctor examining for mental condition, held not a person in authority); 1915, R. v. De Mesquito, 26 D. L. R. 464, B. C. (master with a police constable in attendance held a person in authority); 1920, R. v. Trenholme, 61 D. L. R. 316, Que. (charge against a medical man of "defiling a young girl by false pretences"; the father of the girl, held a person in authority).

§ 830. [1] 1842, Greenleaf, Evidence, § 223.

[2] 1883, Stephen, Hist. of Crim. Law, I. 493 ("In England, and, so far as I know, in England and some English colonies alone, the prosecution of offences is left entirely to private persons, or to public officers who act in their capacity of private persons and who have hardly any legal powers beyond those which belong to private persons. . . . [When there is a private prosecutor], he can and does manage the whole matter as he might manage any other action at law; he employs a solicitor, who may or may not instruct counsel, and who takes the proofs of witnesses, brings them before the committing magistrate and the grand jury, instructs counsel at the trial, and, in a word, manages the whole of the proceedings just as he would in a civil cause. . . . Every private person has exactly the same right to institute any criminal prosecution as the Attorney-General or any one else").

But since the institution in England of a Director of Public Prosecutions, the common law status of the injured party has of course changed. On the new prosecuting method, see the Report of Edwin R. Keedy and John D. Lawson to the American Institute of Criminal Law and Criminology (Journal of the Institute, 1911, vol. I, pp. 595, 748).

strength. It thus happens that three distinct rules are found applied in the jurisdictions of the United States:

(1) The English rule, that the injured individual (i.e. in the United States the prosecuting witness merely) is to be deemed a "person in authority", has occasionally been recognized.[3]

(2) The opposite extreme — ignoring the inducements of all persons except those having official authority — has also received sanction:

1881, HAMMOND, J., in U. S. v. Stone, 8 Fed. 260 (admitting a confession to a private detective employed by the owner of stolen goods): "At common law, some person, generally the party injured, though it might be another person, must be named as prosecutor, except in special cases; and without this there could be no prosecution. . . . It is through this semi-official relation to the prosecution that a private prosecutor becomes a person in authority in this matter of evidence of confessions. But under our federal practice from the earliest times, and by force of the statute, the district attorney is the only prosecutor known to our law, and as a matter of fact, in this court at least, no private prosecutor has ever been recognized. . . . It is impossible therefore for any one to occupy the place of a private prosecutor in this court, or make any promises of immunity that will avail the accused in that capacity. It was otherwise at common law; for generally if the party injured refused to prosecute, there could be no prosecution. With us the district attorney alone can give such assurances. . . . [Thus], the determination of the question of authority depends upon the relation of the person to the criminal prosecution for the act done by the accused. . . . The person must have some authority over the prosecution of that particular offence, whether he be an officer of the law or not. The mere fact that he is an officer does not answer the purpose; he must be connected with the prosecution and have authority through that connection over the prisoner."

(3) A middle way is that which most Courts seem to have adopted. The injured person, or the master of a servant, is not regarded as necessarily having a control sufficient to vitiate confessions made by his inducement; nor is he regarded as entirely incapable of holding them out. Each case is decided upon its own circumstances, and the actual state of the relation between him and the confessor is inquired into with reference to the probable strength of the inducement. This seems the wisest rule, and it is in accordance with the recommendation of Professor Greenleaf, often quoted by the judges:

1842, Professor Simon Greenleaf, Evidence, § 224: "Promises and threats by private persons, not being found so uniform in their operation [as those by persons in official authority] perhaps may with more propriety be treated as mixed questions of law and fact; the principle of law that the confessions must be voluntary being strictly adhered to, and the question whether the promises or threats of the private individuals who employed them were sufficient to overcome the mind of the prisoner, being left to the discretion of the judge under all the circumstances of the case."

1854, SHAW, C. J., in Com. v. Morey, 1 Gray 463: "Of course such inducement must be held out to the accused by some one who has, or is supposed by the accused to have, some power or authority to assure to him the promised good or cause or influence the threatened injury."

[3] 1899, Sullivan v. State, 66 Ark. 506, 51 S. W. 828 (owner of stolen property, held a person in authority); 1870, State v. Brockman, 46 Mo. 570.

1879, BRICKELL, C. J., in Murphy v. State, 63 Ala. 3: "[The improper inducement may come from] any one connected with the accused who may, considering his relations and condition, be fairly supposed by him to have the power to secure him what ever of benefit is promised or to influence the threatened injury."

The precedents illustrate the flexibility (or perhaps the looseness) of this rule.[4] It may be added that some of them seem to indicate that a modification has also been made in the English rule for police-officers; so that such a person would not necessarily be a "person in authority."

4. Nature of the Inducement

§ 831. Competing Rules; Statutory Definitions. "There is no branch of the law of Evidence," said Chief Justice Sherwood, a generation ago,[1] "in such inextricable confusion as that relative to confessions." This confusion is due chiefly to the competition of the different tests and the judicial fluctuations between them.

The current rules or tests, for determining what kind of inducement suffices to exclude, are three (ante, §§ 824–826): (1) The first is, Was the inducement of a nature calculated under the circumstances to induce a confession irrespective of its truth or falsity? (2) Another is, Was there a threat or a promise, a fear or a hope? (3) The third test, Was the confession voluntary? is practically colorless and unserviceable when the nature of the inducement is in question, and is almost always translated secondarily, before application, into terms of one of the other two tests.

It has been seen (ante, § 824) that the first test is, upon principle, the only rational and correct one. It will now be found that the varying and inconsistent results reached for similar situations are mainly explainable by the difference of the tests applied by the different Courts. It is particularly to be remembered that the hopeless inconsistency of the earlier English rulings is due chiefly to the fact that the rulings were virtually in different jurisdictions, — that is, by single judges sitting in different circuits and living in different generations, and therefore not necessarily harmonious with the rulings of their colleagues or their predecessors.

In several American jurisdictions, the Legislature has dealt with the subject of confessions by adopting some definition of the inducement which is to exclude them.[2] But these statutes seldom do more than accept some com-

P. 1881, § 395 (confession, "whether in the course of judicial proceedings or to a private person", is admissible, "unless made under the influence of fear produced by threats or unless made upon a stipulation of the district attorney that he shall not be prosecuted therefor"); 1908, People v. Rogers, 192 N. Y. 331, 85 N. E. 165 (Code Cr. P., 1881, § 395; the words "private person" include a police officer or any other person not conducting a judicial proceeding); the New York Code's rule seems nowadays to be applied with more care, i.e. so as to render inapplicable all the quibbles dealt with in the ensuing sections; Oregon: Laws 1920, § 1537 ("A confession of a defendant, whether in the course of judicial proceedings or to a private person, cannot be given in evidence against him, when made under the influence of fear produced by threats"); Philippine Islands: Act 619, §§ 2, 3 (Insular police force; physical violence or torture by a member to extort a confession is made a penal offence); § 4 ("no confession of any person charged with crime shall be received as evidence against him in any court of justice unless it be first shown to the satisfaction of the Court that it was freely and voluntarily made and not the result of violence, intimidation, threat, menace, or of promises or offers of rewards or leniency"); Texas: Rev. mon-law rule, and cannot be said on the whole to have effected any change, much less any improvement; except that in Hawaii, Indiana, and Washington the radical step of desirable reform (post, § 867) has been taken, and the traditional rules are practically abolished; and that in Texas the rule of exclusion is made even stricter than before.

§ 832. Advice that "It would be better to tell the truth", or its equivalent. On principle, the advice by any person whatever that it would be better to tell the truth cannot possibly vitiate the confession, since by hypothesis the worst that it can evoke is the truth, and there is thus no risk of accepting a false confession (ante, § 822). The confessor is not obliged to choose between silence and a false confession having powerful advantages; the advantages are attached to the utterance of the truth; and, however tempting we may suppose them to be, there is nothing in the nature of the temptation to make the statement untrustworthy; for if it has availed at all, it has availed to bring out the truth.

Nevertheless, judges have been found with such extraordinary scrupulosity as to exclude confessions following such advice.[1] The practical result under

I said: "Your position is rather an awkward one. I have had Brown in this office, and he made a statement that he saw you do the murder." He said: "He could not have seen me. Where was he?" I said: "He states he was at the wheel." "Well," he said, "he could not see me from there." I said: "Now, look here, Bram, I am satisfied that you killed the captain from all I have heard from Mr. Brown. But," I said, "some of us here think you could not have done all that crime alone. If you had an accomplice, you should say so, and not have the blame of this horrible crime on your own shoulders." He said: "Well, I think, and many others on board the such rulings is a false and artificial interpretation, justly reproved by Mr. Justice Willes:[2] "It seems to have been supposed at one time that saying 'tell the truth' meant in effect 'tell a lie.'" Sound opinion refuses to exclude a confession induced by such exhortation; and the weight of authority in this country, though not in England, repudiates such an exclusion:

1836, LITTLEDALE, J., in R. v. Court, 7 C. & P. 486 (the magistrate had told the prisoner to be sure to tell the truth): "It can hardly be said that telling a man to be sure to tell the truth is advising him to confess what he is really not guilty of."

1867, JUDGE, J., in King v. State, 40 Ala. 321: "The admonition to say he was innocent, if such was the truth, was just as strong as to say he was guilty, if that was true. . . . Confessions, as already stated, which may have been procured by the prisoner's being led to suppose that it will be better for him to admit himself to be guilty of an offence which he really never committed, should be excluded. But it can hardly be said that telling a man to speak the truth is advising him to confess that of which he is not guilty."[3] ship think, that Brown is the murderer; but I don't know anything about it" ' "; in a labored opinion, this was held improperly admitted; it is enough to say that the ruling takes its place among those which have reached the highest pitch of irrationality in this subject, and have done most to reduce the law of evidence to a mass of mediæval scholasticism and to put it in a condition to favor criminals; Brewer, J., with Fuller, C. J., and Brown, J., dissent, saying "To support this contention involves a refinement of analysis which, while it may show marvellous metaphysical ability, is of little weight in practical affairs"); 1919, Purpura v. U. Compare the citations post, § 838 ("You had better confess").

The advice "you had better tell the truth" may under the circumstances be interpreted as advice to avow guilt, and in such a case the confession should be excluded, if in that jurisdiction the advice "you had better confess" (post, § 838) is regarded as vitiating the confession. This has been pointed out by Pierpoint, J., in State v. Walker, 34 Vt. 302: "But it is said that these were only inducements to tell the truth, and had no tendency to induce a confes-

In coming now to the inducements which may on principle be properly repudiated, it is best to take them up approximately in the order of their strength;[4] and first, therefore, of a § 833. Threat of Corporal Violence (Rack, Whip, Lynching, "Sweat-box"). A threat of corporal violence is the clearest case of an inducement that excludes the confession. To escape the disagreeable consequences of silence — whip, gallows, or rack — the threatened person naturally prefers to utter what his tormentors desire to hear, — a confession. He trusts to chance to enable him to repudiate his untrue avowal and vindicate his innocence; or perhaps, under the violent pain of the rack, he thinks of nothing but the present relief from agony which his confession will gain him. Not every threat of violence, to be sure, is necessarily sufficient to cause distrust of the confession which follows it; "I shall put you out of my house unless you confess yourself guilty of this murder" has obviously no tendency to cause a false confession. But the typical cases of such violence in legal annals — the rack of the inquisitor, the whip of the slave-owner, and the slip-noose of the jail-breaking mob — serve as the clearest and least questionable instances of an inducement which vitiates a confession for evidential purposes.

That a confession obtained by the rack, or a threat of the rack, is inadmissible was apparently never judicially decided;[1] that it would be inadmissible is of course unquestioned to-day. Confessions obtained from slaves under the whip, or a threat of the whip, have usually been excluded, upon the circumstances of the case presented.[2] Confessions made in fear of a mob are usually made under circumstances calculated to educe a false confession; and in almost all the instances brought before the Courts they have been excluded, usually with propriety upon the facts of the case.[3]

sion that was not true. This is true to the ear of the respondent, but it is not so to his understanding. . . . The prisoner understands that, whether he is innocent or not, it will in some way better his condition to tell a different story." Many of the excluding decisions above noted are perhaps to be explained on this theory.

[4] Mr. Best's classification (Evidence, §§ 561–572) is based on the kind of the motive; but this is more useful psychologically than legally; the probable strength of the inducement is the important element.

§ 833. [1] Ante, § 818.

[2] In all the following cases, except as noted, the confession was excluded: 1847, State v. Clarissa, 11 Ala. 257 (under a whipping and threats of whipping, a slave was asked to confess guilt); 1850, Spence v. State, 17 Ala. 197 (here a slave was merely tied; the usage of the master to tie before whipping might indicate the fear of whipping as the controlling influence); 1854, Wyatt v. State, 25 Ala. 12 (intimation to a slave by a master that a confession of guilt would make the matter better); 1855, Brister v. State, 26 Ala. 107, 129 (whipping of a slave to make him confess); 1863, Joe v. State, 38 Ala. 422 (intimation to a slave, by a master who had tied him to a log and was about to whip him, that his punishment would be lighter if he would confess); 1852, Van Buren v. State, 24 Miss. 512 (here after two whippings a slave finally confessed); 1861, Frank v. State, 39 Miss. 710 (here another slave was whipped, for some unspecified cause, near the accused at the time of confession; admitted); 1829, Hector v. State, 2 Mo. 166 (here a slave was lashed all night and then confessed in the morning).

[3] The confession was excluded, except as otherwise noted; Alabama: 1881, Young v. State, 68 Ala. 576 (a crowd of men took the accused from the jail and to the scene of killing, where they confessed but not under any express threats); 1881, Redd v. State, 69 Ala. 258 (the sheriff, after a mob coming to lynch the accused had been dispersed, told him that in such cases it was sometimes best to plead guilty, and he confessed); 1903, Hunt v. State, 135 Ala. 1, 33 So. 329 (an officer's promise to protect the accused from the violence of persons desiring revenge, held not an improper inducement);

Other instances of violence or physical intimidation seem to be rare.[4]

The "sweat-box" of the police, so far as it may signify direct physical intimidation, by starvation or otherwise, would invalidate a confession; but the term is often exaggeratedly applied to any form of solitary confinement and does not then signify such intimidation as would necessarily exclude a confession.[5] So far as the term has acquired a secondary meaning of continuous interrogation by the police of an accused under arrest (also termed

W. 473 (reply to an officer arresting the accused, "Don't kill me, I was there", admitted; "the weapon was not leveled at the defendant to induce him to confess, but to compel surrender"); 1895, State v. Brittain, 117 N. C. 783, 23 S. E. 433 (husband threatening to abandon wife, to make her confess incest with her father; excluded); 1902, U. S. v. Balayut, 1 P. I. 451 (confession excluded on the facts); 1904, U. S. Lozada, 4 P. I. 226 (confession obtained in violation of Act 619, § 3, quoted ante, § 831, excluded); 1904, State v. Middleton, 69 S. C. 72, 48 S. Cr. 176, 163 Pac. 131 (confession made to a police-officer, who called defendant a vile name and caught him by the arm and "gave him a half nelson", excluded); 1897, State v. McCullum, 18 Wash. 394, 51 Pac. 1044 (the defendant was put in a dark cell in order to make him confess; excluded).

That the mere state of being arrested or confined in jail does not exclude, see post, §§ 847, 851.

"third degree"), it does not fall under the present principle, and is considered post, § 851.

§ 834. Promise of Pardon. A promise of pardon is usually made directly conditional upon the furnishing of evidence for the Crown or the State. Whether the confessing person fulfils his engagement or not, it is obvious that such a confession, made as it is on the faith of a complete immunity from everything but the moral and social consequences of acknowledged guilt, may well be treated as untrustworthy. The stronger the apparent case against the accused, the greater the temptation, even to the innocent, to accept a sure legal immunity (weighted though it may be with unpleasant consequences of an indefinite sort), in order to escape probable legal condemnation.

Yet it was only by the 1800s that the doctrine can be said to have been fully established. It has already been seen [1] that the doctrine of using approvers' confessions against themselves was sanctioned as late as Lord Mansfield's time; and in Francia's Trial, in 1716,[2] a confession obtained apparently by a direct promise of favor was allowed to be used, the accused having failed, it was said, to disclose all that he promised. Moreover in Rudd's Case, in 1775,[3] although Lord Mansfield declared that the confession even of an accomplice who had not revealed the whole truth would "be of no prejudice to her on the trial", and although there are two other reported instances in the same century of the exclusion of accomplices' confessions thus induced,[4] this doctrine does not seem to have become established for some time —, at least, for accomplices who broke their faith by failing to furnish the promised disclosures; for Mr. Starkie, on the authority of a case otherwise unreported [5] was able to state the practice of 1824 as receiving such a confession.[6] Undoubtedly, however, though no subsequent English decision exists, any confession obtained by a promise of pardon would there to-day be excluded; and the principle has been well expounded in an Irish decision:

1866, O'Hagan, J., in R. v. Gillis, 11 Cox Cr. 69: "I think the question must be put thus: Was the prisoner induced by a person in authority to make the informations criminating himself by the hope of obtaining the immunity of an approver? I think he was. . . . He became a Crown witness in the reasonable expectation that he would escape punishment as a return for his accepted services in bringing other offenders to justice." [7]

[4] 1783, R. v. Warickshall, 1 Leach, 3d ed., 298 (an accessory's confession obtained "by promise of favor"; excluded); 1790, R. v. Hall, 2 id. 636, note (where the witness to the confession had been asked by the defendant to ask the justice to admit him as Crown's evidence).

[5] 1818, Burley's Case (where after confession the accused had declined to testify against the other person).

[6] 1824, Starkie, Evidence, I, 13 ("The admission of the party as a witness amounts to a promise of recommendation to mercy, upon condition of his making a full and fair disclosure of all the circumstances of the crime. . . . By a breach of the condition, the accomplice forfeits his claim to favor, and is liable to be tried and convicted upon his confession").

[7] Three of the nine judges here dissented on the facts of the case; Burley's Case was treated as not involving this point. There is another Irish ruling: 1841, Berigan's Case, 1 Ir. Circ. R. 177 (the accused had been confined with another, who had turned Queen's evidence, and the accused, in confessing, had this in mind, but was cautioned against hoping; Crampton, J., admitted the confession, because, whatever the expectations might have been, they had not been induced by any one in authority).

In the United States such promises have always been regarded as vitiating the confession.[8] But it must be remembered that neither this nor any other inducement can on principle exclude a confession where the agreement is merely to tell the truth (and not necessarily to avow guilt).[9]

Here may be noted the absurd inconsistency of receiving against another person the testimony of an accomplice who on a promise of immunity turns State's evidence (ante, § 580) while rejecting the accomplice's confession when offered against himself. The promise of pardon is held to vitiate the story so far as it affects himself, but not so far as it affects others; although the natural instinct against false self-incrimination furnishes as good a guarantee of the truth of the former as the natural readiness to sacrifice others furnishes reason for distrusting the latter. That Courts accept the latter sort of testimony against the person charged demonstrates the hollowness of the sentimentalism on which the rejection of the former is based.

Leaving these genuinely untrustworthy inducements, we come now to a class of promises and threats which on principle can be supposed to vitiate a confession by only a severe stretch of the most sentimental imagination; and yet they are constantly treated by the Courts as effecting an exclusion of the confession; and first, of § 835. Inducements involving a Lighter Punishment, Milder Treatment in Prison, or a Reward of Money. It is scarcely conceivable (except in a case of extraordinary circumstances producing the blackest and most hopeless case against the accused) that an innocent man would confess falsely upon the inducement of a mere diminution of punishment. But a few Courts have reached that result, and it would in all probability everywhere be followed.[1] Equally inconceivable is it that a mere difference in treatment while confined could be an effective temptation to false confession.[2] Nor can we

E. 190 ("it would be lighter on him"); 1893, State v. Jordan, 87 Ia. 86, 91, 54 N. W. 63 (defendant offered to "hand back the stuff", if the owner "made it easy for him"; admitted); 1902, State v. Jay, 116 Ia. 264, 89 N. W. 1070 (that "it would go easier for him if he would tell about it"); 1867, Com. v. Curtis, 97 Mass. 577 (hope of a lighter sentence); 1895, State v. Green, 6 C. & P. 655, Bosanquet and Talfourd, JJ., semble (when first apprehended, the accused said, "If the hand-cuffs are taken off, I will tell"); 1792, Com. v. Dillon, 4 Dall. 116 (various intimations of harsher treatment while confined for trial on a capital charge); 1878, imagine that liberty or life would be voluntarily bartered by an innocent person for the money reward to be obtained by giving evidence; yet this result has sometimes been reached.[3] It is of course true that the lesser offences are often committed by persons lacking food and shelter, in order to be housed and fed for a time in the jail; and doubtless instances of the false confession of such offences for such a purpose have occurred. But that is no reason for assuming that ordinarily, or in even an appreciable proportion of cases, there is such force in the offer of a loaf of bread or of a sum of money as to cause us to distrust and to reject absolutely a confession so induced. Where the circumstances of a case show that a false confession was probably thus induced, let it be excluded. But to erect a fixed and unvarying rule on the basis of so unusual a contingency is to eliminate rationality from the law of Evidence.

§ 836. Promises of other Favorable Legal Action (Cessation of Prosecution, Release from Arrest, Abstention from Arrest). Coming under the same principle as the preceding class are those promises of other favorable legal action which stop short of promising complete immunity in the shape of pardon, but offer hopes or assurances, definite or indefinite, implying a cessation of prosecution, a recommendation to mercy, or the like.

(1) A promise in any way implying a cessation of prosecution or a release from arrest has usually been held to exclude the confession thus induced.[1]

R. 648, Que. (embezzlement by a postal clerk; statement made to his superior, who had said he "would try to assist him as much as possible" admitted).

UNITED STATES: Ala. 1858, Bob v. State, 32 Ala. 566 (promise to a slave that he would be sold away and not hung); 1860, Mose v. State, 36 Ala. 211, 226 (promise by a master to get the slave out of the State if he confessed to a killing); 1876, Porter v. State, 55 Ala. 101 (the accused was told that there was proof enough to hang him anyhow, and he would be saved if he would confess the crime); 1873, Ward v. State, 50 Ala. 120 ("whether the confession was true or false, he was to be turned loose"); 1895, Gregg v. State, 106 Ala. 44, 17 So. 321 (promise to end the prosecution); Ark. 1901, White v. State, 70 Ark. 24, 65 S. W.

If many of these rulings do not commend themselves to common sense, it is not so much because the advantage held out may not conceivably be in a given case a sufficient temptation to false confession, as because the manner of offering it is so indefinite, the assurance so slight and halting, that it cannot be considered as exciting that certain faith in the confessing person which alone could induce him to violate natural instincts and incur sure risk in confessing that of which he is innocent. These are just the inducements which might educe an avowal from a guilty one, but they are too slight to overpower innocence, however weak and ignorant it may be. If, to be sure, the law adopts Mr. Justice Gould's test,[2] that "the slightest hopes of mercy" suffice to exclude, the result is unimpeachable. But that is not a rational nor a practical test.

(2) A threat to arrest, or a promise not to arrest, is perhaps sometimes equivalent to the promise of a general release from legal proceedings, i.e. practical immunity. Taken strictly, however, it could not be an inducement of any consequence; for the benefit of merely temporary liberty can hardly be so great as to induce a false confession with all its ultimate risks. Nevertheless such a threat or promise has usually been assimilated to the preceding more weighty ones, and has availed to exclude the confession.[3]

[an accomplice] should get the start of you [in confessing], it may go hard with you").

In the above citations, some of the inducements are perhaps specific enough to bring the cases under one of the two foregoing sections. But no hard-and-fast classifications can be made; for the situations and the inducements shade too closely into one another. Nor would it be of service. The chief things to be noted are (1) that the clear tendency of the Courts is to assimilate slight and indefinite inducements to strong and specific ones, and to exclude all alike; (2) that some of these rulings are less open to dispute than others.

Of course the form of the inducement is immaterial; i.e. whether the assurance is, "If you confess, you may get off more easily", or "if you do not confess, it may go hard with you"; for in each case the situation is that of an advantage being attached to confession.

A promise to set free if a certain crime is confessed would not exclude a confession of a different crime: 1876, State v. Fortner, 43 Ia. 495.

§ 837. Assurance that "What you say will be used for you", or "used against you." (1) The policy of wholesale exclusion, "however slight the inducement", had gone to such an extent in England, in the first half of the 1800s, that the advice of one in authority, promising that "what you say will be used for you" was regarded by a number of judges as excluding an ensuing confession.[1] But in 1852 the question was fully argued before the Court for Crown Cases, and these rulings were repudiated,[2] and some check was thus put to the extravagant policy of exclusion.

(2) The same earlier tendency to excessive caution had produced a ruling (based on the Drew case) that even "what you say will be used against you" would exclude the confession;[3] but this remarkable result was also overturned by the Baldry decision.[4]

"unless you give me a more satisfactory account, I shall take you before a magistrate"); 1831, R. v. Parratt, 4 C. & P. 570 (by the master of ship, accused being a sailor); 1832, R. v. Richards, 5 id. 318 (by a mistress of the accused, her servant, charged with poisoning her); 1853, R. v. Luckhurst, 6 Cox Cr. 243 (that he would be given in charge if he did not tell what he was doing in a certain stable); 1915, R. v. DeMesquito, 26 D. L. R. 464, B. C. ("You will be arrested if you do not say where the goods are"; excluded); 1873, Beery v. U. S., 2 Colo. 189, 203 (a threat to arrest unless he confessed, and promise to release if he confessed).

§ 837. [1] 1837, R. v. Drew, 8 C. & P. 140 (Coleridge, J.: "I cannot conceive a more direct inducement to a man to make a confession than telling him that what he says may be used in his favour at the trial"); 1838, R. v. Arnold, ib. 622, Denman, L. C. J., semble; 1843, R. v. Morton, 2 Moo. & Rob. 514, also reported as R. v. Hornbrook, 1 Cox Cr. 55 (Coleridge, J.: "Upon reflection, I approve of my decision in Drew's Case. . . . [The principle is,] has anything been said to the party to induce him to state that which is not true, under a hope that he shall thereby benefit himself? . . . Now in Drew's case the man is told that what he says will be used for him; is this not raising a hope that if he told his story, whether true or false, it might benefit him?"); 1827, State v. Roberts, 1 Dev. 259 (statement that a confession could not be used against him; excluded).

[2] 1852, R. v. Baldry, 2 Den. Cr. C. 430 (Lord Campbell, C. J., Pollock, C. B., Parke, B., Erle and Williams, JJ., disapproving the Drew and Morton cases. Pollock, C. B., distinguished in one passage between "what you say" and "whatever you say"; but he subsequently abandoned the distinction, and it has no significance whatever).

This decision has always been regarded as representing the sanest policy reached in treating confessions; and it contains some of the best utterances on the subject. But its significance is diminished by the fact that in the very same year the same Court, speaking through Parke, B., in R. v. Moore (quoted ante, § 829) maintained that "however slight the threat or inducement", it would exclude a confession. The vacillation and want of coherence that mark the rulings on this entire subject are nowhere better illustrated than by the inconsistency between this proposition and the ruling in R. v. Baldry, supra, that "what you say will be used for you" does not exclude a confession.

[3] 1843, R. v. Furley, 1 Cox Cr. 76, Maule, J. (where the caution was that what she said "would be used against her at the trial", and the curious result reached that this guaranteed the use of it, and therefore the use for as well as against the accused); 1844, R. v. Harris, 1 Cox Cr. 106, Maule, J. (to the same effect).

[4] 1852, R. v. Baldry, 2 Den. Cr. C. 430 (Lord Campbell, C. J., Pollock, C. B., Parke, B., Erle and Williams, JJ., disapproving the Furley case). Single rulings to the same effect had preceded the Baldry decision: 1843, R. v. Holmes, 1 C. & K. 248 (by a magistrate, "be sure you say nothing but the truth, or it will be taken against you"); 1851, R. v. Attwood, 5 Cox Cr. 322, Erle, J.

The Furley ruling has been once followed in this country: 1873, Self v. State, 6 Baxt. Tenn. 249 (an extravagant decision, in which a defendant under arrest and confronted with proofs of guilt was told "nothing you can say will do you any good", and an ensuing confession was rejected).

But the Baldry case would presumably be now accepted as sound: 1901, Com. v. Storti, 117 Mass. 339, 58 N. E. 102 (telling him that it will be used for him, if favorable, or against him, if unfavorable, does not exclude); 1898, Roesel v. State, 62 N. J. L. 216, 41 Atl. 408 ("whatever you say may be used for you or against you"; admitted); 1915, State v. Murphy, 87 N. J. L. 515, 94 Atl. 640 (Roesel v. State followed).

§ 838. Assurance that "You had better confess." Is it conceivable that the indefinite and elusive assurance of advantage contained in the phrase "you had better confess" is in any degree calculated to induce a false confession? What tangible attraction is there in it? It is an exhortation, to be sure, which might turn the balance, in the breast of a guilty person, between silence and confession; but, with an innocent man, that is too extraordinary a supposition to justify any evidentiary rule of exclusion. Nevertheless, this has always been held (under circumstances of greater or less unreason) to be a vitiating inducement [1] — upon the rule, of course (ante, § 825), that "any inducement, however slight", is sufficient to exclude. In a given case the exclusion may occasionally not be improper under all the circumstances;[2] but that such a phrase, or its equivalent, should in itself and as a rule operate to vitiate the confession is wholly bad on principle and in common sense.

(by a surgeon attending deceased); 1833, R. v. Walkley, 6 id. 175, Gurney, B. (by a person not specified); 1834, R. v. Simpson, 1 Moody Cr. UNITED STATES: Ala. 1887, Banks v. State, 84 Ala. 430, 4 So. 382 (by an officer, "it would be best for him to tell all about it"); Ga. 1891, Green v. State, 88 Ga. 516, 15 S. E. 10 (by a sheriff, "if you know anything, it may be best for you to tell it", and with the accused's repeated professions that his story was voluntary); 1901, Dixon v. State, 113 Ga. 1039, 39 S. E. 846 (confession upon an officer's advice that "if she knew anything she had better tell it", these two rulings perhaps should be classed under § 832, ante); La. 1848, State v. Nelson, 3 La. An. 499 ("it would be better to tell what he had done"); 1903, State v. Alexander, 109 La. 557, 33 So. 600 (by a police officer, "If you have got anything to say, you had better say it now"); Mass. 1883, Com. v. Nott, 135 Mass. 269 (by an officer); 1879, Flagg v. People, 40 Mich. 706 (the urging was repeated and the prisoner was in irons and was furnished with liquor, and an intention to force a confession had been expressed by the officer); Miss. 1898, Mitchell v. State, — Miss. —, 24 So. 312; 1914, Johnson v. State, 107 Miss. 196, 65 So. 218 (Smith, C. J., diss.); Mo. 1870, State v. Brockman, 46 Mo. 569 ("it would be better for him to own up", with an express refusal to promise immunity); N. Y. 1836, People v. Ward, 15 Wend. 231; *N. E. 198 (by an arresting officer, "he had as well tell all about it"); Va. 1867, Vaughan's Case, 17 Gratt. 580 ("you had better tell all about it"; the court erroneously taking Shifflet's Case, 14 Gratt. 661, as authority for exclusion).

All the rulings (cited ante, § 832) excluding the inducement "you had better tell the truth" are also authorities for exclusion in the present instance.

The only rulings sanctioning a confession produced by the present sort of inducement seem to be the following: 1857, Com. v. Tuckerman, 10 Gray Mass. 192 (where such a phrase was shown not to involve any promise of favor); 1893, Willis v. State, 93 Ga. 208, 19 S. E. 43 (by an officer, that it was best for the accused to give himself up).

[2] In the foregoing note, R. v. Simpson and Flagg v. People are instances in which the accompanying circumstances give to such and result at least a plausibility. On the other hand, the rulings in R. v. Croydon and State v. Brockman expose the doctrine in all its naked absurdity.

§ 839. Sundry Phrases and Inducements. A number of phrases and inducements, not falling into any of the foregoing commoner classes, have from time to time been judicially passed upon. It is settled that a question merely involving an assumption of guilt does not, as such, exclude the answer;[1] and the mere expression of a wish, by the prosecutor or any other person, has never been held to exclude.[2]

Other rulings, of more or less propriety, upon sundry assurances or threats, give rise to no general rule.[3]

§ 840. Influence of a Religious or a Moral Nature. Owing to the ruling in R. v. Radford,[1] in 1823 the question was able to be raised whether the use of exhortations invoking the terrors of punishment predicated by theological beliefs could be regarded as vitiating a confession. It is obvious that, in their ordinary aspect, the influence of religious considerations makes en-

§ 839. The following inconsistent rulings deal with a situation very similar to the foregoing: 1830, Wright's Case, 1 Lew. Cr. C. 48 (by a magistrate, that "his wife had already confessed, and there was quite case enough against him to send a bill before a grand jury"; admitted); 1833, R. v. Mill, 6 C. & P. 146, Gurney, B. (by a constable, "it is no use to deny it, for there are two who will swear they saw you do it"; excluded).

[3] Threats: 1839, Cain's Case, 1 Cr. & D. 37 (indictment for concealing the birth of a child; the medical witness threatened to examine the accused, if she did not answer, and she then confessed; admitted; the constable, upon the prisoner's denial at her house, said, "I shall search for the child, so you had better tell me where it is"; she then told; this confession was excluded); 1872, R. v. Reason, 12 Cox Cr. 228 (by a constable, "I must know more about it"; admitted); 1895, People v. Clarke, 105 Mich. 169, 62 N. W. 1117 (a threat that, unless a confession was made before twelve o'clock, it would not be received; excluded).

Promises: England: 1822, R. v. Sexton, in Chetwynd's Suppl. to Burn's Justice, quoted in Joy, Confessions, 17 (the accused said to the constable: "If you will give me a glass of gin, I will tell you all about it"; and he was given two; the confession was excluded; Mr. Joy's comment is: "It seems a violent presumption that two glasses of gin would induce a prisoner untruly to charge himself with a capital felony"); 1834, R. v. Lloyd, 6 C. & P. 393 ("if you will tell, you shall see your wife"; admitted).

Canada: 1884, Re Stambro, 1 Manit. 263, 268 (certain inducements as to resuming employment, held not to exclude); 1917, R. v. Benjamin, 41 D. L. R. 388, Que. (by a justice of the peace, at the request of the high constable, to "try to make him tell where he put the shirt"; excluded).

United States: 1903, Meadows v. State, 136 Ala. 67, 34 So. 183 (promise not to prosecute if he would pay for damage done; confession admitted); 1899, State v. Novak, 109 Ia. 717, 79 N. W. 465 (agreement by arresting officer not to disclose confession until a certain time; admitted); 1890, Com. v. Flood, 152 Mass. 529, 25 N. E. 971 (an offer by a physician to assist in procuring an abortion upon a woman with whom accused had lived in adultery, the offer conditioned on the latter's telling the facts; admitted); 1912, State v. Kwiatkowski, 83 N. J. L. 650, 85 Atl. 209 (by an interpreter, that he would help him if he could; admitted); 1868, State v. Mitchell, Phillips N. C. 448 (confession made in asking advice of a fellow-prisoner; admitted); 1920, People v. Rodriguez, 28 P. R. 464 (violation of excise law).

§ 840. [1] R. v. Radford, 1 Mood. Cr. C. 197 (where the clergyman had "dwelt on the heinousness of the crime charged and the denunciations of the Scripture against it", Best, C. J., thinking "it would be dangerous, after the confidence thus created, which would throw the prisoner off his guard, and the impression thus produced", to receive the confession). But it does not appear how far the argument of a clergyman's privilege (the existence of which was then and is still a mooted point; post, § 2394) entered into the result.

tirely for truth in a confession, and not against it. Mr. Joy's exposition of this point cannot be improved upon:

1842, Mr. Joy, Confessions, 51: "It seems difficult to imagine that a man under spiritual convictions and the influence of religious impressions would therefore confess himself guilty of a crime of which he was not guilty; or that a man under a strong sense of his spiritual relations with God could hope to please God by a falsehood; that a 'confidence created' between him and his pastor, or the 'being thrown off his guard' by this confidence, should induce him, not to confess (that it might naturally do if he were guilty), but induce him to confess falsely. Such spiritual convictions, or spiritual exhortations, seem from the nature of religion, the most likely of all motives to produce truth. They are therefore of a class entirely different from those that exclude confessions. A confession is excluded because the motive which induces it is calculated to produce untruth, because it is likely to lead to falsehood. If temporal hopes exist, they may lead to falsehood. Spiritual hopes can lead to nothing but truth."

A case might be presented, however, in which the use of such exhortations approached so near the line of intimidation that some plausibility might be given to the argument that the confession was not voluntary. Such was R. v. Gilham, in which as strong a case as possible for such an argument existed; but the argument was once and for all repudiated:

1828, R. v. Gilham, 1 Mood. Cr. C. 186, before all the judges except one absent; Mr. Moody, for the accused: "The case states a continuous series of religious terrors impressed on the prisoner's mind, with a view to obtain a confession —, in the first instance by the gaoler, in placing before him religious books with that subject put prominently before him; and in the second instance by the chaplain, whose whole language and exhortation unceasingly dwelt on the duty of confession as a condition of forgiveness with God, and accompanied with the terrors of God's vengeance put forward, not only with the force expressed in the commination service, but with all the additional effect which the personal authority and manner of the chaplain would of necessity produce. . . . Looking therefore to the whole tenor of the chaplain's conversation, and to the state of mind produced, the necessary conclusion is that this confession was made under duress." Mr. Follett, for the Crown: "Unless it is believed that a confession given under religious impressions is not entitled to credit, but springs from motives that are likely to lead to falsehood, these confessions were properly received. But who can possibly suppose that a man under the influence of a deep sense of religion, as it is admitted the prisoner was, would confess an atrocious murder of which he was not guilty, and that he could hope to please God by a falsehood?" "The judges present were unanimously of opinion that the confessions were properly received."

No exhortations, then, of a moral or a spiritual nature, have ever (since R. v. Radford) been regarded as vitiating a confession,[2] — a result commended alike by principle and by common sense.

[2] ENGLAND: 1822, R. v. Gibney, Jebb Cr. C. 15, by all the Irish Judges (where the constable and others said "What a terrible thing to murder your own child!"; admitted, on the principle that "the fear to be produced must be of a temporal nature, and in this case there was no such threat or intimidation, nor any fear of a temporal nature produced; any terror that might have been excited was as to what might happen in the next world"); Ante 1828, R. v. Hodgson, cited in 1 Mood. Cr. C. 203 (by the accused's mistress, that the former "would never be easy in her mind till she had confessed"); 1835, R. v. Wild, 1 Mood. Cr. C. 452 (the accused was fourteen years old; a person in charge, "said 'Now you kneel down by the side of me and tell me the truth'; . . . I hoped he would tell me the truth in the presence of the Almighty"; the Judges (eight present) "were unanimous that the confession was strictly admissible, but they much disapproved of the mode in which it was ob-

§ 841. Confession induced by Trick or Fraud; Confession While Intoxicated. (1) Since the exclusion of confessions is not due to any principle of public faith or of private pledge of secrecy (ante, § 823), it follows that the use of a trick or fraud (however reprehensible in itself) does not of itself exclude a confession induced by means of it.[1] So far as the trick involved a promise which would tend to produce an untrue confession, it would operate to exclude, — not, however, because it was a trick (i.e. because the representations were false) but because even if true its tenor would have stimulated a confession irrespective of guilt. This principle is and always has been universally conceded.

There is one possible case in which a moral consideration might under circumstances properly vitiate a confession, namely, where it appears to have been made in the spirit of self-sacrifice for the purpose and with the certainty of shielding or saving one in whose life or liberty the confessor is deeply interested; but in the only ruling on the subject the confession was received: 1858, Shifflet's Case, 14 Gratt. (2) A confession made while intoxicated is governed by the general principle of testimonial capacity, and is therefore usually held admissible (ante, § 499); it is only where the intoxication is produced by a person desirous of obtaining a confession that its trustworthiness becomes really doubtful.[2]

5. Nature of the Inducement (continued): Confessions on Examination before a Magistrate or in other Legal Proceedings

§ 842. Orthodox Principle. The question is here presented: Is there anything in the fact of arrest, as such, or in the fact of presence before a magistrate, as such, or of examination on oath, as such, which tends to produce an untrue confession of guilt?

We now assume the absence of any of the other kinds of inducements anywhere deemed fatal; we assume that no threats, promises, assurances, urgings, or other inducements sufficient in themselves to exclude, have been held out; we are to consider merely the effect of the above facts in themselves. Remembering this, and applying the test already indicated as the orthodox one (ante, §§ 822, 824), "Was the inducement such that there was any fair risk of a false confession?" there can be on principle but one answer, namely, no such risk exists, and the confession is admissible. For the circumstances of arrest and of presence before a magistrate, no argument can be necessary; and even for the extreme case of an answer under oath, it must be obvious that so far as any answer at all is thereby compellable, it is, according to the terms of the oath, to be a true answer; that is all that is demanded or compelled.[1] There is on principle not the vestige of an argument for excluding a confession merely because of such a circumstance; and, as a matter of history, such an exclusion was not thought of until the novel judicial attitude of the 1800s gave it a partial sanction and opened the way for that misuse that an alleged accomplice had confessed); Pennsylvania: 1857, Fife v. Com., 29 Pa. 435 (the accused was falsely told that accomplices had confessed); 1898, Com. v. Goodwin, 186 Pa. 218, 40 Atl. 412 (confession to a woman, the interview being ostensibly in secret, according to the sheriff's promise, but eavesdroppers being stationed near by; letter given to the sheriff on a promise to deliver it, but retained by him; admitted); 1899, Com. v. Cressinger, 193 Pa. 326, 44 Atl. 433 (confession obtained by pretending that murderer's knife was discovered; "the object of evidence is to get at the truth, and a trick which has no tendency to produce a confession, except in accordance with the truth, is always admissible"); Porto Rico: 1912, People v. Almestico, 18 P. R. 314 (confession obtained by false statements, admissible).

Compare the cases cited post, § 2183 (illegality of means, as no ground of exclusion of evidence), § 2286 (confidence in general, as not privileged), and § 2302 (communications to a pretended attorney).

Distinguish the following: 1908, R. v. Choney, 17 Man. 467 (a purporting agent of defendant's attorney falsely told the defendant while in jail that the attorney had telephoned him "to tell him everything about the case"; excluded).

§ 842. [1] 1838, Morton, J., in Faunce v. Gray, 21 Pick. Mass. 245 ("The fact that it was made under oath cannot diminish its force or render its competency questionable. If it contain a true narrative of facts, justice requires that they should be admitted. And no man will be likely to make false admissions against himself, because he has been sworn to tell the truth"); Smith, C. J., in Wood v. Weld, Smith N. H. 367, referring to a similar examination on oath ("What hardship is it to be obliged to tell the truth? No means [were] used to produce anything but the truth"); and see R. v. Scott, post, § 843; and U. S. v. Kirkwood, Utah, post, § 852.

of precedents by which extreme results have been reached in a few jurisdictions.

But we find also in use, and competing for recognition, certain other tests, which are all derived from the phrase "voluntary", but as applied and worked out for the situations now in hand have a meaning and effect very different from the ordinary one as already expounded (ante, § 826).

§ 843. Principle of Voluntariness: (1) Common Form. The common form, in the present application, consists in taking the phrase "voluntary", considering it without any reference to promises or threats, and erecting it into an absolute and final test, — in short, in translating it as "spontaneous." The notion is a broad one, and is in effect: Was the situation such that the person had to speak, felt obliged to speak, or was it a matter of pure choice with him to speak or not?

The radical difference here, it will be observed, is that we no longer care whether his speaking involves a false avowal of guilt; the thing is that a speaking not voluntary cannot be received, and hence the speaking is excluded irrespective of the danger of falsity. If, then, we take the phrase "voluntary" and treat it as the final and self-sufficient test, and if thus we discard the fundamental theory of confessions (ante, § 822) — that our object is to exclude those which may be false — and conceive our purpose as that of excluding confessions as such (even though true) unless they are "voluntary", we thus have good reason to consider how far under such a canon the fact of arrest or of presence before a magistrate or of examination on oath may prevent the confession from being in the above sense "voluntary"; for it may at least be argued that either of these circumstances may in a given case make the confession practically compulsory.

Now this is the form of principle which was unsuccessfully championed by many English judges during the first half of the 1800s, and thus was introduced into our rulings; and it is under this form that the questions we are now to consider have been able to be raised. It is not the best principle; but it is at least superior to those we have later to examine, which to-day also compete for recognition. Different Courts apply the doctrine in differing spirits of strictness or liberality; the difference often practically shows itself in the circumstance whether the giving of a caution (or notice not to answer except voluntarily) is deemed to admit the answer; a Court of narrow tendencies will not even then admit it, since (it is said) the moral compulsion remains; but with most Courts a caution removes the reason for exclusion.

Types of the foregoing form of test and the arguments expounding it are found in the following passages:

1852, POLLOCK, C. B., in R. v. Baldry, 2 Den. Cr. C. 441: "The true distinction between the present case and a case of that kind ['you had better tell the truth'] is that [here] it is left to the prisoner a matter of perfect indifference whether he should open his mouth or not."

1864, HAYES, J., dissenting, in R. v. Johnston, 15 Ir. C. L. 60, 83: "All that the common law requires is that the confession 'in pais' [meaning other than in court or before a magistrate] be voluntary. Upon this principle it is that . . . a confession will be rejected if it appears to have been extracted by the presumed pressure and obligation of an oath, or by pestering interrogatories, or if it had been made by the party to rid himself of importunity, or if, by subtle and ensnaring questions, as those which are framed so as to conceal their drift or object, he has been taken at a disadvantage and thus entrapped into a statement which, if left to himself, and in the full freedom of volition he would not have made. . . . I am not aware of any law which declares, as an abstract proposition, that a confession is undeserving of that character [of voluntariness] if it has been made in answer to questions fairly put, while the party has been left at full liberty to answer or not, as he may think right. These principles will apply to the confession 'in pais', whether it has been made by a person at liberty or under arrest. But it is manifest to every one's experience that from the moment a person feels himself in custody on a criminal charge, his mental condition undergoes a very remarkable change, and he naturally becomes much more accessible to every influence that addresses itself either to his hopes or fears. . . . [To counteract this influence a caution is customary; yet the presence or absence of a caution is not in itself decisive; it is merely a circumstance for the judge. But from the moment of arrest, the person must be assumed to be acting under pressure.] On the whole of the case now before us, I am of opinion that the statement to the constable, having been made at a time when the party neither was a prisoner not felt or supposed herself to be a prisoner, and not appearing to have been obtained by any threat or promise or other undue or unfair means, was properly receivable in evidence. But on the other hand, I am of opinion that if the defendant had at the time of that conversation felt herself to be in custody on the criminal charge, then her statements in answer to the questions would not have been receivable, unless prefaced by a caution."

1862, RICE, J., in State v. Gilman, 51 Me. 223: "Does it follow that because a statement is made upon oath in a proceeding where the circumstances of the commission of the crime are being investigated, and the person making such statements is a suspected or accused person, that it must necessarily be involuntarily made? . . . The argument is that the impressiveness of obligation and the solemnity of the occasion would have a tendency to wring from the party thus situated facts and circumstances which he is not bound to disclose, and therefore can in no just sense be said to be voluntary. As a general proposition this may be true, especially if the party is uninformed with regard to his rights. But when he is fully apprised of his rights and informed that he is under no legal obligation to disclose any facts prejudicial to himself, or to give evidence against himself, and then deliberately makes statements under oath, no good reason is perceived why such statements should not be given in evidence against him. . . . If it be said that, though a party in such a situation may be under no legal constraint, he may nevertheless feel under a degree of moral compulsion, and from that cause feel impelled to make self-incriminative statements, the answer is that this moral pressure bears with no greater force upon him when on the stand voluntarily than in other situations. A party who finds himself surrounded with circumstances calculated to cast suspicion on him will undoubtedly feel the necessity of making explanations. But such considerations have never been deemed good cause for excluding declarations which he may choose voluntarily to make."

1879, CHALMERS, J., in Jackson v. State, 59 Miss. 312, rejecting an examination as witness after a caution: "The principle is that no statement made upon oath in a judicial investigation of a crime can ever be used against the party making it, in a prosecution of himself for the same crime; because the fact that he is under oath of itself operates as a compulsion upon him to tell the truth and the whole truth, and his statement, therefore, cannot be regarded as free and voluntary."

The first answer to this test is of course (1) that the fundamental question for confessions is whether there is any danger that they may be untrue (ante, § 822) and that there is nothing in the mere circumstance of compulsion to speak in general, or of the use of oath-compulsion in particular, which creates any risk of untruth.[1] (2) Another answer is that the privilege against self-crimination assumes that if the person chooses to give such testimony on the stand or in custody, it will be received, and there would have been no need for such a privilege if this rule had existed for confessions; that privilege assumes in its very existence that statements made without using it are admissible, and answers all the purposes which the above doctrine is aiming at.[2] (3) There is, however, a third way of dealing with this doctrine; and that is to accept its principle — i.e. that a statement not voluntary is to be excluded, irrespective of its truth or falsity, — but to deny that there can be any compulsion in the mere facts of custody or of examination upon oath, because the person is always at liberty to refuse to speak. This answer may still leave open to dispute the question whether at least a "caution" (or notification to the person of his privilege) is not essential; but the theory that the person must be supposed to know that he need not answer (as applied in State v. Vaigneur, infra) would practically repudiate such a requirement.[3]

§ 844. Same: (2) Modern English Form. In the last half of the 1800s there appeared a tendency on the part of English judges to revive this test in an altered form, for a certain class of cases at least. The notion is fundamentally the same, i.e. Was the situation such that the person had to speak? But it proceeds by a different test, namely, Was the speaking obtained by asking questions of a person while in custody? In other § 843. [1] This answer is well set forth in the opinion of Lord Campbell, C. J., for four judges (Coleridge, J., dissenting on another ground), in R. v. Scott, 1 D. & B. 47 (1856): "We will consider the several grounds on which the defendant's counsel has argued that it [the examination] is not admissible. The first is that the examination of the defendant was taken after making a declaration tantamount to an oath, and that if on oath it would have been inadmissible. But in the case referred to in support of this objection [R. v. Britton, supra], the oath had been improperly administered without authority; and if the examination is taken under an oath administered by proper authority, there is no reason for saying that it is less likely to be true than if it had been without an oath or any similar solemnity. The next objection is that the examination was compulsory. It is a trite maxim that the confession of a crime, to be admissible against the party confessing, must be voluntary; but this only means that it shall not be induced by improper threats or promises, because under such circumstances the party may have been influenced to say what is not true, and the supposed confession cannot be safely acted on. Such an objection cannot apply to . . . a lawful examination in the course of a judicial proceeding." See also the epigrammatic passages from Morton, J., in Faunce v. Gray, and Smith, C. J., in Wood v. Weld, quoted ante, § 842.

[2] This argument is suggested in the following passage: 1878, Benedict, J., in U. S. v. Graff, 14 Blatchf. 386: "The reason why a sworn witness is permitted to decline answering is because his answers under oath can be used as evidence against him."

Compare also § 823, ante, § 2266, post.

[3] 1852, Withers, J., in State v. Vaigneur, 5 Rich. L. S. C. 403 (after dealing with other objections): "There remains nothing but the supposed duress of an oath, administered by a power capable (as is said) of applying a sanction that shall exact an answer. Now in reality there is no power, in any tribunal known to the common law, to exact an answer that may implicate a witness in or tend to expose him to a criminal charge. . . . Mr. Joy . . . [assigns the reason] that one in his capacity of witness might refuse to answer a question that has a tendency to expose him to a criminal charge; hence an answer to such becomes a voluntary statement, since he might refuse to make any. This appears to be a sound legal theory. It cannot be met by the circumstance of a particular case that a witness may not know the extent of his personal security under the law, for ignorance of the law excuses no one."

words, statements are deemed not voluntary and therefore inadmissible when they have been made in answer to questions put while in custody. Moreover, it thus becomes immaterial whether the answers amount to a confession or not. The attitude is illustrated by the following passages:

1885, A. L. SMITH, J., in R. v. Gavin, 15 Cox Cr. C. 656: "When a prisoner is in custody, the police have no right to ask him questions. Reading a statement over, and then saying to him, 'What have you to say?' is cross-examining the prisoner, and therefore I shut it out. A prisoner's mouth is closed after he is once given in charge, and he ought not to be asked anything."

1864, LEFROY, L. C. J., dissenting, in R. v. Johnston, 15 Ir. C. L. 66: "The law of England, since the time of Judge Jeffreys, is against any kind of extraction of evidence from a prisoner, not only by torture, but by anything that could be calculated to excite the prisoner to confess; any answer given under such circumstances is not admissible. . . . Ought we not to say that the law of England does not allow evidence to be obtained by questioning a prisoner, except in the particular way prescribed by the statute? . . . There appears to have been a new current of opinion setting in after the passing of 14 & 15 Vict."

This attitude was doubtlessly partly due to an impression that the statute of 1850 (considered later) should be treated as in spirit excluding all evidence from accused persons in custody not obtained by the statute-sanctioned method. Partly, also, it was due, as the preceding form is, to a confusion of confession-law with the privilege against self-crimination; the privilege, of course, does not affect statements not made on the stand but made while in custody (post, § 2263); and in applying the law of confessions to the latter situation, the judges have modified it by an infusion of the spirit of the above privilege; so that we find presented under the head of confession-law a notion excluding statements made merely in answer to questions by a custodian,[1] — a result which would be natural enough as an extension of the privilege against self-crimination, but is quite anomalous in the law of confessions.

§ 845. Same: (3) Selden's Principle of Mental Agitation. Another form of test derived from the phrase "voluntary" is still broader in its excluding effect, and differs radically in one point from the preceding two. Like them, (1) it takes "voluntariness" as a final standard; but (2) it does not discard, but retains, the fundamental notion of confession-law that a probable untruth is that which we are seeking to reject; and furthermore (3) it includes, as the second does, under "confession" anything and everything said by the person, whether an avowal of guilt or an assertion intended to exculpate and to demonstrate innocence.[1]

Its peculiar different result arises from applying the idea (2) to the statements included in (3). Thus, it argues: Persons suspected wrongly of a § 844. [1] 1867, Kelly, C. B., in 10 Cox Cr. C. 576 ("I have always felt that we ought to watch jealously any encroachment on the principle that no man is bound to criminate himself, and that we ought to see that no one is induced either by a threat or a promise to say anything of a criminatory character against himself"; an utter confusion of two things distinct in history and in principle).

crime, especially when officially charged with it and questioned about it, are apt, particularly when the circumstances are strongly inculpatory and demand explanation, to make the first explanation that occurs to them, to deny incriminating facts, and, in short, to assert and try to prove their innocence by inventing false stories, which if true would show their innocence; hence, statements so made cannot fairly be trusted, and should be rejected. The chief representative statements of this theory are found in the following passages:

1854, SELDEN, J., dissenting, in Hendrickson v. People, 10 N. Y. 33: "The mental disturbance produced by a direct accusation, or even a consciousness of being suspected of crime, is always great, and in many cases incalculable. The foundation of all reliance upon human testimony is that moral sentiment which universally leads men, when not under some strong counteracting influence, to tell the truth. This sentiment is sufficiently powerful to resist a trifling motive, but will not withstand the fear of conviction for crime. Hence, the moment that fear seizes the mind, the basis of all reliance upon its manifestations is gone. . . . The mind, confused and agitated by the apprehension of danger, cannot reason with coolness, and it resorts to falsehood when truth would be safer, and is hurried into acknowledgments which the facts do not warrant. Neither false statements nor confessions, therefore, afford any certain evidence of guilt when made under the excitement of an impending prosecution for crime."

1864, PIGOT, C. B., dissenting, with LEFROY, C. J., and O'BRIEN, J., in R. v. Johnston, 15 Ir. C. L. 60, 121: "It must be shown to the satisfaction of the judge that the statements have been purely voluntary statements of the prisoner. . . . The danger to be guarded against is not, in the far greatest number of cases, that an innocent man will fabricate a statement of his own guilt, although instances of this have occurred, too well attested to be doubted. The danger is that an innocent person, suddenly arrested, and questioned by one having the power to detain or set free, will (when subjected to interrogatories, which may be administered in the mildest or may be administered in the harshest way, and to persons of the strongest and boldest or of the most feeble and nervous natures) make statements not consistent with truth, in order to escape from the pressure of the moment. . . . The process of questioning impresses on the greater part of mankind the belief that silence will be taken as an assent to what the questions imply. The very necessity which that impression suggests, of answering the question in some way, deprives the prisoner of his free agency, and impels him to answer from the fear of the consequences of declining to do so. Daily experience shows that witnesses, having deposed the strict truth, become on a severe or artful cross-examination involved in contradictions and excuses destructive of their credit and of their direct testimony. A prisoner is still more liable to make statements of that character under the pressure of interrogatories urged by the person who holds him in custody; and thus truth, the object of the evidence of admissions so elicited, is defeated by the very method ostensibly used to attain it. This relative position of the parties does not, therefore, tend to truth as the result of the inquiry."

Now, (a) conceding this argument to be good so far as it goes, what it shows is that statements professing innocence, and calculated to prove it, are not trustworthy; it does not show that a plain avowal of guilt is untrustworthy; on the contrary, the whole underlying notion is that an innocent person will lie to prove his innocence and explain away apparent guilt. Therefore, when we find him confessing guilt, it is obvious that it cannot be under the influence of any such motive as the above, and is totally inconsistent with the presence of that motive.[2] Thus, by the Courts adopting this principle, a reason which applies exclusively to assertions of innocence is made to support a rule excluding confessions of guilt. That is the first fallacy; and it must be clearly appreciated, because its insidious error is concealed in a triple process, namely, first, taking a principle fundamentally appropriate to the confession-rules (that they are excluded because of the risk of falsity), secondly, working out its reason for a totally different class of statements (assertions intended to show innocence),[3] and thirdly, going back to confessions, and testing them according to the rule thus borrowed.

(b) The further answer to this principle is found in the denial that the principle has any validity even for the class of statements, namely, assertions of facts showing innocence, as to which it is worked out. In that department of Evidence such a principle is without precedent, and is in conflict with all analogies. The conduct of a suspected person, in concealing or destroying incriminating evidence or in fleeing from justice, has always been admitted, subject to any innocent explanation that can be made (ante, §§ 273–276), and his false assertions of an alibi and other false explanations of conduct have always been admitted (ante, §§ 277–278); yet if the above principle were good, it would necessarily exclude all conduct and statements while under suspicion, and not merely while in custody or on the stand. Thus the principle is without precedent or analogy, and is unworkable in practice.[4]

§ 846. Present Status of the above Principles. The first of the above three principles is less recognized to-day.

The second is that which prevails in most jurisdictions, though it is not uniformly nor consistently applied.

The third can hardly be said to prevail completely in any jurisdiction, its chief function having been to throw precedents and principles into confusion,

[2] This answer is represented in the following passage: 1878, Benedict, J., in U. S. v. Graff, 14 Blatchf. 387 ("To say that the administering of an oath to one under suspicion of crime will of necessity cause a mental disturbance that must render unreliable the sworn admission of the crime and raise the legal presumption that the statement is untrue, is going further than I can go, unless compelled by authority. I know of no authority binding upon the Courts of the United States, which compels the holding that an arrest, or a charge of crime, or being sworn, or all three combined, are sufficient to exclude a confession that otherwise appears to have been freely made, without the influence of threat or promise").

[3] Ante, § 821, "What is a Confession?"

[4] This answer is represented in the following passage: 1869, Woodruff, J., in Teachout v. People, 41 N. Y. 11 ("If the declarations made under consciousness of suspicion are for that reason unreliable, they must be unreliable whenever and wherever made . . . and equally when the suspected party encounters that suspicion while fully at large among third parties, as when called as a witness to state if he sees fit what he knows of the cause of the death. And if consciousness of suspicion renders proof of his declarations unreliable, so also should it render proof of his acts unreliable, and they should be equally excluded. And yet it has not, I think, been doubted that proof of the acts of the party under the very pressure of suspicion is competent. . . . [Flight, concealment, etc.] may be proved as some indication of conscious guilt, and yet it is consistent with innocence, and may be the mere result of fear, and the pressure of circumstances may lead the innocent man to resort to this as a measure of safety. This is quite as true as that suspicion will lead a man to false statements for the same purpose. There must be some limit to the rule excluding declarations, short of the test that they be made when he is under no consciousness that he is under suspicion: else the whole conduct of the party, from the moment he is apprised that he is suspected, must be declared to be too unreliable to be made the subject of any inference whatever").

to unsettle the course of decision, and to suggest confusing arguments while not commanding complete adherence. It was first judicially advanced by the eminent Mr. J. Selden,[1] in 1854, in the Teachout Case in New York, at nearly the same time that it was being repudiated by the English judges, in 1856, in Scott's Case; it was subsequently championed by the dissenting judges in the Irish case of R. v. Johnston, in 1864; but it did not obtain any further footing in England or Ireland; and it had vogue as a determining doctrine in only a few American jurisdictions. Apart from its lack of precedent, the false basis of supposed principle by which it is reached, and its conflict with analogies, it is workable simply and consistently up to a certain point only, i.e. quite as far as Mr. J. Selden and the Irish judges wished to carry it. But this is radically different from and opposed to the other principles; and the unfortunate thing has been, for many Courts, that they have not seen this. They have thought to recognize it partially, but not wholly and in connection with other principles, — an unfortunate thing, because this test is not reconcilable in any degree with either of the other tests (except in part the last preceding one) and cannot coexist with them in the same body of law. The result of this laudable endeavor to carry water on both shoulders is that neither vessel maintains its equilibrium, to the confusion of the Courts and the law. The best interests of the law of Confessions would be served by a clear recognition on the part of the Courts that one of those three principles must be selected and logically carried out and the other two be repudiated; thus we should have at least consistency, instead of a tangle of rulings guided now by one principle, now by another, and leaving the law in a state of desperate uncertainty.

Owing to the state of the decisions, it is necessary to consider them by jurisdictions; for this alone will furnish an opportunity for examining the state of the law with reference to the various competing principles; and the English precedents, as furnishing the original distinctions and illustrating the history of the theories, must first be taken by themselves.

In applying each of the principles, there are four kinds of situations, involving distinctions about which the controversy within each principle has chiefly turned. These four are: 1. Under arrest as accused; 2. Examined before a magistrate as accused, without oath; 3. Examined before a magistrate or on trial as accused, under oath; 4. Testifying on oath as a witness. Confessions made in these four different situations may be differently treated even under the same principle, and the course of the law must be examined separately for each.

§ 847. English Practice: (1) Confessions while under Arrest; Police Interrogations. It was for a long time the clear and unquestioned law in England that the mere circumstance of arrest, even when combined with the circumstance that the confession was made in answer to questions put by the custodian, did not exclude the confession. This was taken for granted and expressly asserted as unquestioned by Mr. J. Grose, in 1791, delivering the opinion of the twelve judges in Lambe's Case.[1] The next two landmarks of the rule are Thornton's [2] and Gilham's [3] Cases, also decisions 'in banc.' These were followed, in the next ten years, by other rulings,[4] among which Wild's Case, a decision 'in banc', became the leading one. Such was the law at this period that Mr. Joy was able correctly to say, in 1842:[5]

§ 846. [1] It had already been advanced, however, by counsel, Mr. Dundas, in 1838, in Wheater's Case, post; and Mr. J. Selden probably found it there. But a spurious passage, much quoted, in Gilbert's Evidence and Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown also served as a source; this passage is examined ante, § 818.

"It may be proper that the police authorities should forbid the practice of questioning a prisoner by a constable, and it might reasonably induce caution, and perhaps suspicion, and a scrutinizing jealousy in jurors, in investigating the credit of a witness who obtains a confession through such means. But the cases before the twelve judges, both in England and Ireland, already cited, seem to establish that statements made in answer to questions put, without any caution and by a person who has no authority to question the prisoner, are admissible in evidence. . . . Such confession, if voluntary and free, is admissible, although it appears that he was not cautioned."

It is to be noticed (1) that from the point of view of the "threat or promise" test (ante, § 825) the result was a necessary one, because by hypothesis no threat or promise was employed; (2) that in the absence of a threat or a promise, the test of "voluntariness" was regarded as satisfied; (3) that no caution was required; and (4) that the rule was repeatedly affirmed 'in banc.'

In the meantime, in Ireland, the same result had been reached in Gibney's Case, by all the judges.[6] But some twenty years afterwards came a series of Irish rulings by individual judges excluding such confessions;[7] the reasons

St. Tr. 62 (to police-officer); 1746, Berwick's Case, Foster's Cr. C. 10 (officers of a rebel garrison after capture, giving their rank to the official inspectors while in prison).

[2] 1824, R. v. Thornton, 1 Moody Cr. C. 27, 1 Lew. Cr. C. 49, by seven judges against two (the accused, fourteen years old, was in custody and severely questioned by the police; held admissible, because "no threat or promise had been used").

[6] 1822, R. v. Gibney, Jebb Cr. C. 15, by all the Irish judges (statements in answer to questions by a constable, while under arrest on the way to jail, with a crowd about him asking questions; no caution given; "they held the rule to be well established that a voluntary confession shall be received in evidence, but if hope has been excited, or threats or intimidation held out, it shall not", and admitted it here). This was followed in 1842: R. v. Hughes, quoted in Joy, Confessions, 39 (a statement had been made while in custody, in answer to a constable's questions; Crompton, J., "had frequently had occasion to decide this question, and all these [cases cited] had been before him. The confession of a man, to be admitted, is not to be extorted by fear nor educed by flattery; but where a prisoner voluntarily gives it, it may be received, whether the questions be put to him by an authorized or unauthorized person. Wherever the declaration is voluntary, he would receive it, and the doctrine in Wild's Case was the true one").

[7] 1839, R. v. Hughes, 1 Cr. & D. 13, Doherty, C. J. (an authorized person visiting the accused in jail, and questioning him; excluded, on the ground that no caution was given, and that on magistrates' examinations a caution is always given); 1840, R. v. Doyle, 1 Cr. & D. 396, Bushe, C. J. (a constable visiting the accused in jail, and questioning her, after a caution); 1841, R. v. Devlin, 2 Cr. & D. 151, Bur-being variously given. The uncertainty of practice thus introduced was finally settled in 1864 by the great case of R. v. Johnston,[8] wherein the original and orthodox view was maintained by the majority, that confessions made under such circumstances were not in themselves inadmissible, and were to be tested, like other confessions, according to the presence or absence of some other and specific inducement in the way of a threat or a promise.

Meantime, in 1849, a statute (post, § 848) had prescribed a new method of examining accused persons for commitment, and in the opinion of Lefroy, C. J., its spirit had contributed to the opposing result reached by him in this case. The supposed spirit of the statute had not affected the English judges, who continued to rule as before.[9] But about the same time as R. v. Johnston, the other form of rule (described ante, § 844), made its appearance in England; i.e. any answers obtained by questions put by an officer to a person in custody were excluded; this rule was by most judges enforced from that time onwards.[10] ton, J., and Brady, C. B. (a police-inspector questioning the accused in jail; excluded); 1856, R. v. Toole, 7 Cox Cr. C. 244; Pigot, C. B., and Richards, B. (statement in answer to a police-inspector while under arrest, after caution; excluded, the current difference of opinion among the judges being noted); 1861, R. v. Hassett, 8 Cox Cr. 511, Christian, J. (similar facts; evidence requested to be withdrawn as doubtful); 1863, R. v. Bodkin, 8 Ir. Jur. N. s. 340, Pigot, C. B. (statement in answer to a question by a constable while under arrest, after caution; excluded, because constables "ought to abstain from asking questions").

[8] 1864, R. v. Johnston, 15 Ir. C. L. 60, before eleven Irish judges (the accused made statements in answer to the police, just after notice of the charge, but before arrest, no caution being given; Deasy, B., with whom concurred Hughes and Fitzgerald, BB., Monahan, C. J., and Fitzgerald, Ball, and Keogh, JJ., held the statement admissible because of the absence of threat or inducement; Ball, J. (109): "the general result of the foregoing cases appears to be that from the year 1822 down to the present time — that is, for a period of upwards of forty years — it has been recognized as the law of the land, both in England and Ireland, that admissions or statements obtained from prisoners through the instrumentality of questions from police constables, without any previous caution, are admissible in evidence against them; provided that such admissions or statements be the voluntary acts of the prisoners, not induced by either hope or threat operating upon their minds"). The views of Hayes, J., and Lefroy, C. J., dissenting, represented the test of § 844, ante; the view of Pigot, C. B., and O'Brien, J., dissenting, represented the test of § 845, ante; see the quotations in those sections.

[9] 1853, R. v. Sleeman, 6 Cox Cr. 245 (in custody in a private house; admitted); 1862, R. v. Cheverton, 2 F. & F. 833, Erle, C. J., and Wightman, J. (statement to a police-superintendent, while under arrest, in answer to questions, without caution; admitted).

[10] England: 1863, R. v. Mick, 3 F. & F. 822, Mellor, J. (statements to the police, under arrest, answering a question, but after a caution; admitted, but the method disapproved); 1885, A. L. Smith, J., in R. v. Gavin, 15 Cox Cr. C. 656 (quoted ante, § 844). No doubt such a decision is apt to be reached through the influence of other considerations; as where Cave, J., in 1893, R. v. Thompson, 2 Q. B. 18, frankly expresses doubts as to the credibility of police-officers producing alleged confessions in doubtful cases.

Subsequent rulings were as follows: 1893, R. v. Male & Cooper, 17 Cox Cr. 689 ("The prisoner should be previously cautioned"); 1895, R. v. Miller, 18 Cox Cr. 54 (answers to questions by an inspector without caution, admitted; "it is impossible to discover the facts of a crime without asking questions"); 1898, Rogers v. Hawken, 19 Cox Cr. 122 (R. v. Male & Cooper not followed; there is "no such rule" that a statement made in answer to an officer's question, without caution but without inducement, is inadmissible; good opinion by Russell, L. C. J.); 1898, R. v. Histen, 19 Cox Cr. 16 ("When a prisoner is once taken into custody, a policeman should ask no questions at all without administering the usual caution"); 1905, R. v. Knight & Thayre, 20 Cox Cr. 711 ("When a police-officer has taken anyone into custody, and also before doing so when he has already decided to make the charge, he ought not to question the prisoner. . . . I am not aware of any distinct rule of evidence that if such improper questions are asked the answers to them are inadmissible, but . . . in my

These rulings, and the statute, resulted in a change of police tradition, or at any rate, in the dominance of a tendency, long undercurrent, to apply to this situation the dictates of that sporting instinct (post, §§ 1845, 2251, ante, § 194) which has done so much in other parts of English law to establish the principles of fair and considerate treatment of the accused.

The modern spirit of the English practice is well portrayed in the following passage: [11]

1916, Mr. Frank Froest. The Maelstrom, c. XXXIV (the man Ling, strongly suspected of the cruel assassination of an old man, has been arrested. He is a known professional criminal. Conversation then ensues between Heldon Foyle, superintendent of the Criminal Investigation Department, New Scotland Yard, and Weir Menzies, chief detective inspector of the same):

"It happened after you had gone and they 've just had me on the 'phone. You know they put a constable in the cell with him? Ling offered the man one hundred pounds to smuggle him out."

"That 's interesting. Looks as if he does n't fancy his chance overmuch." The detail did not appear to greatly stir Menzies.

"Yes, but listen to this. The blame fool constable, after refusing it, seems to have got him into conversation with Ling and asked him if he really did shoot Greye-Stratton."

Some sign of consternation flickered over Menzies' face. "You don't say," he exclaimed. "The cabbage-headed idiot! . . ." Words failed him.

There is one unforgivable blunder in the Metropolitan Police, the hideousness of which no layman can adequately plumb. To question a prisoner, to coax or bully him into an admission of guilt is one of those things that no zeal, no temptation can excuse. It is not merely that it is against the law. It is not playing the game. The slightest suggestion that such a course has been pursued has before now secured a guilty man's acquittal.

opinion that is the right course to pursue"); 1909, James' Case, 2 Cr. App. 319 (to a police-officer, while under arrest; he said, "You must tell me. . . . Any statement will be given in evidence against you at your trial"; no caution; admitted, citing R. v. Thomas and R. v. Reason); 1909, Best's Case, 1 K. B. 692 (answers given to a constable's questions after a caution, admitted; L. C. J. Alverstone: "In our opinion R. v. Gavin, 15 Cox Cr. C. 656, is not a good decision; . . . it is too wide and requires qualification"); 1910, Unsworth's Case, 4 Cr. App. 1 (confession while in jail to a constable; no warning, no inducement; admitted).

Canada: 1904, R. v. Kay, 11 Br. C. 157 (answers to police officer, without a caution, and under arrest, excluded; "the arrest and charge are in themselves a challenge to the accused to speak, — an inducement within the rule"; a caution of the purpose and consequences must be given); 1913, U. S. v. Wrenn, N. Sc., 10 D. L. R. 452 ("the practice of detectives interrogating a prisoner when in jail, and when no one else is present at the interview, should be discouraged"); 1890, R. v. Day, 20 Ont. 209 ("Although we reprehend the practice of questioning prisoners, we cannot come to the conclusion that evidence obtained by such questioning is inadmissible"); 1899, R. v. Elliott, 31 Ont. 14 ("R. v. Day is the case settling the law in this Province"); 1909, R. v. Steffoff, 20 Ont. L. R. 103 (made to the police under arrest after caution, admitted); 1912, R. v. Cummings, 5 D. L. R. 86, Que. (confession to an officer after caution, admitted); 1912, The King v. Hoo Sam, 1 D. L. R. 569, Sask. (if the officer puts questions, there must be a caution; prior cases examined); 1917, R. v. Spain, 36 D. L. R. 522, Man (murder; statements made to a police-officer while under arrest, admitted; per Perdue, J. A., "Every case as to the admissibility of a statement made by an accused person while under arrest must be decided according to its own circumstances"); 1918, R. v. Rodney, 43 D. L. R. 404, Ont. (larceny; statements when being searched by detectives, while under detention but not formal arrest, without caution, admitted); 1921, R. v. Read, 62 D. L. R. 363, Alta. ("every officer . . . should be familiar with the principles clearly enunciated in The Queen v. Thompson, 1893, 2 Q. B. 12").

[11] Apparently the modern Canadian practice with arrested persons is even more cautious than the English practice: 1910, Crippen's Trial (ed. Filson Young, 1920, Notable English Trials Series, p. 92).

Foyle kicked the coals again, and the action seemed to afford him some relief. "And Ling admitted it! The constable chap was so proud of what he 'd done that he took a note of the conversation."

"I don't see what we can do," said Menzies slowly. "We can't put the constable in the box. The only thing to do is to let it slide. If we don't use it, the defence won't make a point of it."

"What I 'm wondering about," said the superintendent, "is if your evidence is water-tight as it stands. You see, even if Ling should make a voluntary admission now, it 's tainted. He 's been seeing that shyster Lexton, and I would n't wonder if all this was n't a carefully put-up trap."

Weir Menzies drew his brows together and began eating his moustache. "There might be something in that," he agreed. "Lexton 's a good lawyer, and it 's like him."

"See." Foyle demonstrated with a forefinger. "If we could be tempted into putting an officer in the box to say that Ling had confessed, he 'd have us by the short hair. We 'd have to admit that at least one of our men had questioned him and" — he snapped his fingers — "there you are! The whole police evidence tainted. We 're so anxious for a conviction that we 've applied third-degree methods in England. Why, he 'd be acquitted if he 'd committed as many murders as Herod."

"I quite understand, sir." Menzies was a little peevish at having the i's dotted. "If he makes a thousand confessions, we won't use them."

"I only wanted to put you wise," said Foyle, almost apologetically. "You 've got to rely on a straightforward case. Got it mapped out?"

"I think so. . . ."

§ 848. English Practice: (2) Confessions as Accused without Oath on Examination before a Magistrate. The examination of an accused person before a magistrate, for preliminary investigation and for commitment if necessary, was at common law taken without putting the accused upon oath, because as accused he was not competent to testify (post, § 2250, ante, § 575). Furthermore, the proceeding was for some three centuries regulated by a statute (widely copied in the United States) the material provisions of which are as follows:

1554, St. 1 & 2 P. & M. c. 13, § 4: "Justices of the peace . . . shall before any bailment or mainprise take the examination of the said prisoner and the information of them that bring him, . . . and the same, or as much as may be material thereof to prove the felony, shall be put in writing before they make the bailment; which said examination, together with the said bailment, the said justices shall certify at the next general gaol-delivery. . . ." St. 2 & 3 P. & M. c. 10: "The said justice, or justices, before he or they shall commit or send such prisoner to ward, shall take the like examination of the prisoner and the information of those who bring him, and shall put the same in writing within two days after the said examination, and the same shall certify ", etc.

Now the propriety of receiving confessions made at such a time, never questioned (from the present point of view) until the end of the 1700s,[1] was then settled, both as a common-law question and under the statute, in a decision so clear and emphatic that its exposition must be quoted:

1791, Lambe's Case, 2 Leach Cr. L., 3d ed., 625; the accused was arrested and examined before a magistrate, and on having the written examination read over to him for signing, he said: "It is all true enough," but would not sign it. Whether it was admissible apart from the statute, was the first question. GROSE, J., for the twelve judges: "The general rule respecting this species of testimony is that a free and voluntary confession, made by a person accused of an offence, is receivable in evidence against him, whether such confession be made at the moment he is apprehended, while those who have him in custody are conducting him to the magistrate's, or even after he has entered the house of the magistrate for the purpose of undergoing his examination. But in the present case the confession of the prisoner was made not only in the presence of the magistrate, but while he was undergoing a judicial examination. . . . First, then, to consider this question as it is governed by the rules and principles of the common law. Confessions of guilt made by a prisoner, to any person, at any moment of time, and at any place, subsequent to the perpetration of the crime and previous to his examination before the magistrate, are at common law received in evidence as the highest and most satisfactory proof of guilt, because it is fairly presumed that no man would make such a confession against himself if the facts confessed were not true. It may, however, be said [in opposition] that this rule only applies to confessions by parol, and not to confession (as in the present case) reduced into writing and afterwards admitted by parol to be true. But surely if what a man says, though not reduced into writing, may be given in evidence against him, 'a fortiori' what he says when reduced into writing is admissible, for the fact confessed being rendered less doubtful by being reduced into writing, it is of course entitled to greater credit, and it would be absurd to say that an instrument is invalidated by a circumstance from which it derives additional strength and authenticity. And for this reason it is clear that the present confession having been taken by a magistrate under a judicial examination can be no objection to receiving it in evidence, for it gains still greater credit in proportion to the solemnity under which it was made. . . . [He then points out that the statute methods were not intended to replace all others by exclusion, but merely to add a new and acceptable form, thus leaving all other proper ones still admissible, even though the statutory form could not be availed of.] [The examination] is more authentic on account of the deliberate manner in which it is taken, and, when it contains a confession, is admitted, not by force of the statutes, but by the common law, as strong evidence of that fact; . . . and it is clear that what a prisoner confessed before a justice of the peace, previous to the reign of Philip and Mary, if not induced by hope or extorted by fear, whether reduced into writing or not, or if reduced into writing, whether signed or not, if admitted by the prisoner to be true, was and is as good evidence as if made in the adjoining room previous to his having been carried into the presence of the justice, or after he had left him, or in the same room before the magistrate comes, or after he quits it."

This ruling was emphasized in an opinion delivered a few years later:

1794, R. v. Thomas, 2 Leach Cr. L., 3d ed., 727; GROSE, J. (the facts being similar to those of Lambe's Case, supra): "There can be no doubt but that these minutes may be read in evidence. . . . In Lambe's Case, which in its circumstances was precisely like the present, the judges were of opinion that if such written examination were to be adjudged not admissible, this monstrous proposition would follow, that whatever a prisoner says when not before a magistrate would be admissible, though depending on the faculty of memory; but that the moment a prisoner gets before a magistrate it would not be admissible, though taken down in writing under circumstances of the greatest solemnity."

It will thus be seen that confessions so made were declared to be equally admissible (1) at common law, (2) under the statute, and (3) when intended to be taken under the statute, but not successfully so taken. Furthermore, it will be observed, there is no intimation that it is of any consequence (a) whether the accused was cautioned or not, or (b) whether his statements were made spontaneously, or in answer to a general inquiry as to what he had to say, or in answer to repeated specific questions. Finally, it is clear that confessions made in such a situation were treated on exactly the same footing as any others, i.e. the only question would be as to the influence of some positive threat or promise; the mere situation did not affect the result or constitute an inducement.

The admissibility of such a confession was subsequently reiterated in a series of rulings extending through the next half-century;[2] and Mr. Joy adds his authority as to the practice at the end of that time.[3] In the meantime, only one contrary ruling, R. v. Wilson, had appeared;[4] but it served to keep alive the possibility of controversy. It will be noted that, in the cases confirming the orthodox doctrine (of which R. v. Ellis and R. v. Gilham are most frequently cited), some of the confessions received were given under a caution and some were made without questions preceding; but neither of these circumstances seems to have been treated as essential to their reception. The doctrine of R. v. Wilson, however, came to the surface once again in 1850.[5] But in the preceding year a statute had entirely revised the method of con-

There were also other rulings indicating clearly, though indirectly, an acceptance of this practice: 1833, R. v. Tubby, 5 C. & P. 530, Vaughan, B., semble; 1835, R. v. Rivers, 7 C. & P. 177, Park, J., semble; 1838, R. v. Wheeley, 8 C. & P. 250, Alderson, B., semble.

[4] 1817, R. v. Wilson, Holt N. P. 597, Richards, C. B. (a statement as accused on examination before a magistrate, without threats or promises, but without caution and upon questions; "an examination of itself imposes an obligation to speak the truth; if a prisoner will confess, let him do so voluntarily"). There is another and earlier, sometimes quoted to the same effect; but it has no bearing: 1793, R. v. Bennett, 2 Leach Cr. L., 3d ed., 627 (where the accused had refused to sign the examination before the magistrate, though acknowledging his guilt; this acknowledgment the Court rejected, because the prisoner had the right "to retract what he had said, and to say that it was false"; yet here the accused did not say that it was false; he admitted his guilt).

[5] 1850, R. v. Pettit, 4 Cox Cr. 164, Wilde, C. J. (examination as accused before magistrates, upon questioning; excluded, the decision being independent of the statute: "I reject it upon the general ground that magistrates have no right to put [such] questions to a prisoner. . . . The law is so extremely cautious in guarding against anything like torture that it extends a similar principle to every case where a man is not a free agent in meeting an inquiry; . . . the accused might think himself bound to answer for fear of being sent to gaol").

ducting such examinations;[6] the effect of which was to raise the question whether its methods were to exclude entirely and to forbid the common-law methods, and thus to leave an opportunity still to inquire judicially what methods were receivable at common law.[7]

Of the various questions which have arisen in applying this statute,[8] three only need here concern us. (1) Did it exclude a confession before admissible at common law? That it does not, has been decided in England;[9] and very properly, since in the face of the language of its last clause any other interpretation would have left it impossible to believe that words can mean anything. (2) Was a caution necessary at common law? This also has been settled in the negative, and the orthodox doctrine already described has been affirmed and perpetuated.[10] (3) Finally, does it matter that the statement was called forth by specific questions put by the magistrate about the offence? This has not been authoritatively answered since the passing of the statute. It had already been settled at common law, as we have seen, that the [6] 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, § 18; enacted for Ireland in 12 & 13 Vict. c. 69, § 18, and again in 14 & 15 Vict. c. 93, § 14. The statute of Philip and Mary had already been revised without materially affecting the portions concerned with the present question, in 7 G. IV (1826), c. 64, §§ 2 and 3 (for Ireland in 9 G. IV, c. 54, §§ 2 and 3).

[7] The statute's peculiar features were: (1) It required two cautions to be given; and (2) it apparently sanctioned all confessions previously admissible: 1849, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, § 18 ("After the examination of all witnesses on the part of the prosecution, . . . the justice . . . shall say to the accused these words or words to the like effect: 'Having heard the evidence, do you wish to say anything in answer to the charge? You are not obliged to say anything unless you desire to do so, but whatever you say will be taken down in writing and may be given in evidence against you upon your trial'; . . . Provided always, that the said justice or justices, before such accused person shall make any statement, shall state to him and give him clearly to understand that he has nothing to hope from any promise of favor and nothing to fear from any threat which may have been holden out to him to induce him to make any admission or confession of his guilt, but that whatever he shall then say may be given in evidence against him upon his trial, notwithstanding such promise or threat; provided, nevertheless, that nothing herein enacted or contained shall prevent the prosecution in any case from giving in evidence any admission or confession or other statement of the person accused or charged made at any time, which by law would be admissible as evidence against such person").

Canada: Crim. Code 1892, §§ 591, 689, R. S. 1906, c. 146, §§ 684, 1001 (the accused's statement made before the magistrate may "if necessary" be introduced against him).

[8] That the statute has presented some difficulties will hardly serve as a moral against statutory revision and codification; for, whether owing to the statute or to other reasons, it is certain that the proportion of rulings upon confession-law in that field after and before the statute is as one to ten.

[9] The statute is not exclusive; all confessions formerly admitted are still admissible: 1850, R. v. Sansome, 4 Cox Cr. 207, before five judges; disposing of the doubts of Coleridge and Cresswell, JJ., in R. v. Kimber, 3 Cox Cr. 223, and approving the ruling of Erle, J., in R. v. Steel, 13 Just. P. 606. A similar opinion was expressed by a majority in the Irish case of 1864, R. v. Johnston, 15 Ir. C. L. 82, 89, per Deasy, Hughes, Fitzgerald, BB., Fitzgerald and Keogh, JJ., against Hayes, O'Brien, and Ball, JJ.

[10] The question arises, it will be seen, when the statutory caution has been omitted, and thus the confession is not receivable under the statute; this was the case in R. v. Sansome, supra, the decision being as above; the same opinion was expressed by the majority in R. v. Johnston, supra; a subsequent English ruling confirms the result; 1865, R. v. Stripp, 7 Cox Cr. 97 (interpolated remarks, made before evidence ended).

It may be added that under the statute it has been held that the omission of the second caution does not exclude the confession: Eng. 1850, R. v. Sansome, 4 Cox Cr. 207; 1850, R. v. Bond, 4 Cox Cr. 231, 241, Alderson, B.; Can. 1867, R. v. Kalabeen, 1 Br. C. pt. I, 1; 1878, R. v. Souci, 17 N. Br. 611 (statement before the magistrate, admitted, though no caution was given; R. v. Sansome followed).

putting of questions was immaterial; but some individual rulings since the statute [11] excluded statements so obtained, on the principle already described (in § 844, ante), that the very putting of questions is improper and involves a compulsion. It is apparent how little this view is sanctioned by precedent; and it is difficult to see how the argument of Lefroy, C. J., that "questioning is not allowed, except in the way prescribed by the statute", can be accepted, unless we believe (as he does) that the statute introduces an exclusive method; but this view is expressly repudiated, as we have seen, by the Sansome decision; and the deduction of such a view from the mere spirit of the statute amounts to nothing less than an overturning of the common law without any express authority.

§ 849. English Practice: (3) Confessions as Accused, under Oath, on Examination before a Magistrate. Under the statutory provisions of the 1500s, the examinations of the witnesses, but not of the accused, were to be upon oath. This was construed (and not improperly) as a practical prohibition against putting an oath to the accused.[1] It might well follow that, if an oath was put, his examination under it should not be received; and as a matter of practice such an examination was always rejected.[2] But the reason was, not that there was anything fatal in the oath as such (as will be seen in the next section), but simply that the statute forbade the administration of the oath, and by implication prevented the admission of statements obtained in the way thus specifically forbidden. It was thus not the oath, but the specific statutory illegality of its application, that prevented the admission; for there was no method of enforcing the prohibition except by rejecting the statement so obtained.[3] This it is essential to keep in mind; for in the [11] 1854, R. v. Berriman, 6 Cox Cr. 388, Erle, J.; 1863, R. v. Mick, 3 F. & R. 822, Mellor, J., semble. In the Irish case this view was repudiated by the majority: 1864, R. v. Johnston, 15 Ir. C. L. 82, per Deasy, Hughes, and Fitzgerald, BB., and Fitzgerald and Keogh, JJ., against Lefroy, C. J., Pigot, C. B., O'Brien and Ball, JJ.

§ 849. [1] 1767, Buller, Trials at Nisi Prius, 242: "But the examination of the prisoner shall be without oath, and of the others upon oath." This passage is often cited for the statement that an examination of the accused on oath is inadmissible; but that is not its purport.

[2] England: 1817, R. v. Wilson, Holt N. P. 597, Richards, C. B. (statement on oath as accused before a magistrate); 1830, R. v. Haworth, 4 C. & P. 256, Parke, J., semble (examination on oath as accused before magistrate); 1831, R. v. Webb, 4 C. & P. 564, Garrow, B. (examination on oath as accused before magistrate, excluded); 1833, R. v. Tubby, 5 C. & P. 530, Vaughan, B. (same); 1833, R. v. Lewis, 6 C. & P. 162, Gurney, B., semble (same); 1835, R. v. Rivers, 7 C. & P. 177, Park, J. (same); 1838, R. v. Wheeler, 8 C. & P. 250, Alderson, B. (same); 1838, R. v. Wheater, 2 Moody Cr. C. 45, 2 Lew. Cr. C. 157, semble (same); 1842, Joy, Confessions, 62; Canada: 1921, R. v. Sileski, 63 D. L. R. 146, Que. (statements on oath under arrest to a magistrate without warning, excluded; inadequate opinion). There are few decisions, simply because the inadmissibility was conceded.

[3] That this was the reason is clearly shown by the language of Lord Campbell, C. J., delivering the judgment of the Court (Coleridge, J., dissenting on another ground) in R. v. Scott, 1 D. & B. 47 (1856): "The first [objection] is that the examination of the defendant was taken after making a declaration tantamount to an oath, and that if on oath it would have been inadmissible. But in the case referred to in support of this objection the oath had been improperly administered without authority; and if the examination is taken under an oath administered by proper authority, there is no reason for saying that it is less likely to be true than if it had been without an oath or any similar solemnity." This is the explanation accepted in the following ruling, and in other American cases post, § 852:

controversy (dealt with in the next section) which arose as to the use of a mere witness' statements on oath, the fact that the statements of an accused person before a magistrate were admissible, if mere unsworn statements of the ordinary sort (as noted in § 848), but inadmissible if sworn, seemed to many to furnish a strong analogy, and led them to the deduction that it was the oath as such which produced the difference of results.[4] It was not, in truth; but this misleading circumstance undoubtedly helped to create the opinion (i.e. adverse to receiving witness' statements) which for a time threatened to prevail.

§ 850. English Practice: (4) Confessions by a Witness upon Oath. This case presents the most difficult situation of the four, because it involves not only the effect of the oath as involving compulsion, but also the necessity of distinguishing the different bearings of compulsion as disapproved by confession-law and of compulsion as opprobrious to the privilege against self-crimination. That conflicting and confused views were from time to time put forth is not unnatural.

Remembering the results already reached — that, at common law (practically unquestioned until the 1800s and repeatedly maintained during the first half of the 1800s), neither the fact of custody nor the fact of magisterial examination in custody and without caution excluded a confession, and that the exclusion of a sworn examination was due solely to the statutory prohibition, — it is natural enough to find the judges, at the opening of this century, treating the confessions of a witness upon oath as not in themselves objectionable. Down to 1816 we find no exclusion. Between that time and 1840 occurs a long and tangled series of rulings, representing conflicting views and furnishing a fruitful source of later misunderstanding.[1] Certain things, 1878, Benedict, J., in U. S. v. Graff, 14 Blatchf. 387: "I am aware that statements taken under oath, by committing magistrates of this State, are not admitted in evidence. But the statute of the State forbids the taking of statements under oath by committing magistrates, and by implication the use of such illegal statements as evidence is forbidden." In Wheater's Case, Lord Abinger had gone even further, and thought even such a statement admissible on principle; but his language at least adds to the proof that it was the illegality, and not the oath, which excluded: 1838, R. v. Wheater, 2 Moody Cr. C. 45, 2 Lew. Cr. C. 157, before all the judges, except Park, J., and Gurney, B.; Mr. Starkie, for the prosecution, conceded that "a prisoner's examination taken on oath is inadmissible"; and Lord Abinger, C. B., said: "I understand, if a prisoner's examination be on oath it shall not be received in evidence, without reference to a duress or threat: I see no reason for it; in principle, the answer may be quite voluntary"; the other judges expressed no opinion.

[4] Mr. Starkie's language may serve as a specimen of the misunderstanding which grew up about this rule: 1824, Starkie, Evid. II, 38; "The prisoner is not to be examined upon oath, for this would be a species of duress, and a violation of the maxim that no one is bound to criminate himself."

§ 850. [1] 1803, Collett v. Lord Keith, 4 Esp. 212, Le Blanc, J. (defendant a witness in a former cause; objected to as not voluntary; admitted); 1806, R. v. Walker, 6 C. & P. 162, Lord Ellenborough, C. J. (affidavit in Ecclesiastical Court; admitted); 1807, Smith v. Beadnall, 1 Camp. 30, Lord Ellenborough, C. J. (examination as witness before bankruptcy commissioners, upon questions, without caution or counsel, but without objection by him; admitted; he "is like any other witness called to give evidence by virtue of a subpœna; he speaks at the peril of the examination being turned against himself"); here the privilege of self-crimination did not exclude the use of the answer, because no claim was made for it); 1814, Stockfleth v. De Tastet, 4 Camp. 10, Lord Ellenborough, C. J. (examination as witness before bankruptcy commissioners: "if he was imposed upon when he signed it, or was under duress, he will not however, appear definitely enough, upon a careful examination in chronological order.

(1) In a great number of the excluding rulings, i.e. those cases where the witness had been examined before a coroner while in custody or under suspicion, the simple reason for the exclusion was that the witness' position was thought to be assimilated to that of an accused person, and thus the case came within the statutory prohibition (treated in the preceding section) against examinations of accused persons taken under oath.[2] It was not the oath, but the statutory prohibition, that excluded them. These rulings were the supposed foundation of the Selden theory of mental agitation (described ante, § 845); but it will easily be seen, in the light of the law of the times, how far these judges were from proceeding upon any such far-fetched and unprecedented theory. It has no foundation whatever in these rulings; be bound by it", or if the examination was not lawful; but here it was assumed to be lawfully taken); 1816, R. v. Smith, 1 Stark. N. P. 242, Le Blank, J. (examination on oath as witness before magistrate: rejected because on oath); 1818, R. v. Merceron, 2 Stark. N. P. 366, Abbott, J. (examination as witness before Commons Committee; objected to as therefore not voluntary, but admitted; afterwards said by Abbott, J., in 1 Moo. Cr. C. 203, not to have been taken on oath, and to have been admitted for that reason only; the Commons afterward disapproved of the ruling in a Resolution quoted in 2 C. & K. 483, note); 1828, Tucker v. Barrow, 7 B. & C. 624, Littledale, J. (examination as witness before bankruptcy commissioners; "I am disposed to say that an admission obtained under compulsory examination is not evidence of an account stated"); 1828, Robson v. Alexander, 1 Moo. & P. 448, Common Pleas (examination as witness before bankruptcy commissioners, without caution; claimed to have been taken in excess of authority; admitted; Lord Ellenborough's language in Stockfleth v. De Tastet, adopted); 1830, R. v. Haworth, 4 C. & P. 255, Parke, J. (examination as witness for prosecution before magistrate; admitted; "he might as a witness have objected to answer any questions which might have a tendency to expose him to a criminal charge, and not having done so, his deposition is evidence against him"); ante 1830, Anon., ex rel. reporter, ib., note, Parke, J. (examination as witness, before suspicion, by coroner; rejected); 1833, R. v. Tubby, 5 C. & P. 530, Vaughan, B. (statement upon oath as witness, not suspected; admitted, "as no suspicion attached to the party at the time; the question is, Is it the statement of a prisoner upon oath? Clearly it is not, for he was not a prisoner at the time when he made it"); 1833, R. v. Lewis, 6 C. & P. 161, Gurney, B. (examination as witness by magistrate, before suspicion, but witness committed at end of examination; Tubby's Case approved, but, this being taken "at the same time as all the other depositions on which she was committed, and on the very same day on which she was committed, I think it is not receivable; I do not think this examination was perfectly voluntary"); 1833, R. v. Davis, 6 C. & P. 178, Gurney, B. (examination as witness before magistrate; excluded; "if, after having been a witness, you make her a prisoner, nothing of what was then said can be admitted as evidence"); 1833, R. v. Britton, 1 Moo. & R. 297, Patteson and Alderson, JJ. (balance-sheet of bankrupt in civil proceedings offered to prove the petitioning creditor's debt on an indictment for concealing effects, etc.; objected to as having been made on oath; excluded for other reasons, Patteson, J., explaining in 1 Moo. Cr. C. 51, that the above objection was not approved by him); 1838, R. v. Wheeley, 8 C. & P. 250, Alderson, B. (examination before coroner, as a witness, but under arrest; excluded); 1839, R. v. Owen, 9 C. & P. 84, Williams, J. (examination as witness before coroner, but under arrest; on Wheeley's Case being cited, "since that, there has been a reaction in opinion, if I may be allowed the expression"; admitted); 1840, same case, postponed, 9 C. & P. 238, before Gurney, B. ("I am not aware of any instance in which an examination on oath before a coroner or a magistrate has been admitted as evidence by the person making it; I have known depositions before magistrates, made by prisoners on oath, and they have been uniformly rejected';' after the 'nisi prius' ruling in Wheater's Case, post, he admitted its conflict, but still excluded the evidence).

[2] Such is the explanation of the following cases: Lewis', Davis', Wheeley's, and perhaps Owen's before Gurney, B. In Tubby's Case and Owen's Case before Williams, J., the admission amounted to saying that the prohibition applied strictly to persons then charged as accused, and to no others.

and the circumstance of suspicion or of custody was material in their minds merely as bringing the person within the statutory prohibition, and not as producing mental disturbance; as is also seen from the fact that these same judges were accepting at the same time the confessions of persons in custody or on examination without oath before a magistrate (ante, §§ 847, 848). The Selden theory, then (the third of the spurious forms, described ante, § 845), has no support in the extremest rulings of this period.

(2) It is clear, secondly, that the second spurious form of theory (described ante, § 844) had not then appeared at all; it is distinctly a modern notion, and is applied peculiarly to the case of an accused person questioned in custody.

(3) It appears, thirdly, that the first spurious form of test (described ante, § 843, as the "common form") had made its appearance and gained some headway. The theory of this test — so far as any was offered — was that the oath involved a compulsion, and a compulsory disclosure was inadmissible. Now (a) this theory, in its broadest and most sweeping form, regards the oath as necessarily involving a compulsion, and ignores the choice which the witness has to use his privilege and decline to answer; but this theory, the mere fact of the administration of the oath, in spite of the giving of a caution, excludes his statements.[3] But (b) in this form it was disowned by the greater number of judges in these rulings;[4] for, as was pointed out, the witness had a choice between disclosing and keeping silent; in the words of Parke, J., "he might as a witness have objected to answer any questions which might have a tendency to expose him to a criminal charge; and not having done so", there was no compulsion. But the significance of this answer (b) is that it accepts the principle of (a), but denies the propriety of its application; i.e. it concedes that an answer actually compelled from the witness would be inadmissible, but it denies that there is in truth any compulsion in such cases.

Thus, of course, this theory (more liberal though it is than the first) contains within itself the germ of a further difference of opinion; i.e. (b') one attitude prefers, as the test of compulsion, to ask whether there was 'de facto' in the specific case a feeling of compulsion, — in other words, to take the subjective standard of the witness; while (b'') the other prefers, as its test, to ask whether the law actually used compulsion, — in other words, to take an objective or external standard. The practical effect of the former attitude is seen in rulings which hold that unless the witness appears clearly to have known of his privilege he must be supposed to have thought himself compelled to answer;[5] while the practical effect of the latter attitude is seen

[3] Such seems to be the notion in the following cases of the preceding list: Smith's (introducing the doctrine), Mercerон's, Tucker v. Barrow, Anon., and perhaps Owen's before Gurney, B.; see its theory fully stated in the quotation from Jackson v. State, ante, § 843.

[4] Such were the following cases: Collett v. Keith, Walker's, Smith v. Beadnall, Stockfleth v. De Tastet, Robson v. Alexander, Haworth's, Tubby's, Britton's, and Owen's before Williams, J.

[5] This again offers further opportunity for distinctions; for some Courts are satisfied with nothing short of a caution from the judge.

in rulings which hold that his answer will be supposed to be voluntary unless it clearly appears that he was compelled to answer after a refusal under claim of privilege.[6] Now, reverting to the English rulings of Parke, J., and others just mentioned, it is clear that, so far as any of them go upon this principle (b) at all, they adopt the more liberal form just described as (b''). Thus, in none of them does it appear that a caution was given or that the witness was otherwise informed of his rights, while in Smith v. Beadnall, Stockfleth v. De Tastet, and R. v. Hawarth it clearly appears that the Court thought that he should have expressly claimed and been refused his right in order to make the answer really compulsory.[7]

(4) The majority of these rulings, then, in this period, at least repudiate the principle (a) and adopt the more liberal one (b''). But a little reflection will show that they were not impossibly proceeding upon a still more liberal principle, which may be designated as (c), — in short, the orthodox one, already described (ante, § 842). This principle is that a compelled confession is not necessarily and 'ipso facto' a false one, and that therefore, in the absence of any threat or promise tending to produce an untruth, the mere fact that the answer was compelled — i.e. in spite of his express refusal and wish not to answer — does not exclude it. Now it is impossible to tell, in these cases just dealt with (Stockfleth v. De Tastet, Britton's, Haworth's, and the others in that list), whether they proceed on this principle (c) or on the preceding one (b''); and the reason for this ambiguity is an important one; it is that, though it was conceded that answers ordered in spite of a claim of privilege against self-crimination would have been inadmissible, the violation of the privilege would be a sufficient ground for their rejection. An answer ordered in spite of a legitimate claim of privilege is rejected because that is the significance of the privilege, which otherwise would amount to nothing;[8] and this would amply suffice to justify such an exclusion without any reference to the law about confessions.

It is thus obvious that, when we are trying to discover the principle on which the judges acted in such cases, there is just one situation which will inevitably disclose it, — one situation in which no lawful privilege against self-crimination is violated, and in which, therefore, if a confession is ordered while others are satisfied if the witness was warned or presumably warned by counsel, — a distinction illustrated in the American cases post.

[6] In other words, the witness' ignorance of his choice either will not be assumed or will be treated as his own loss, — an attitude illustrated in State v. Vaigneur, quoted ante, § 843, note.

[7] This was treated by Mr. Joy as the better and prevailing principle of his time: 1842, Joy, Confessions, 62: "A statement, not compulsory, made by a party not at the time a prisoner under a criminal charge, is admissible in evidence against him, although it is made upon oath. There are conflicting opinions of judges at 'nisi prius' on this point, but the proposition appears to be established by high authority. The principle seems to be that the party in his capacity as witness might refuse to answer any question that has a tendency to expose him to a criminal charge; any statement, therefore, which he makes is a free and voluntary statement and is receivable in evidence."

[8] 1856, R. v. Scott, 1 D. & B. 47, before Campbell, L. C. J., and four others ("Where evidence is unlawfully obtained, and the witness objects, no doubt it cannot be admitted"); 1873, R. v. Coote, 12 Cox Cr. 557, 563 ("this exception depends upon the principle 'nemo tenetur seipsum accusare'"); post, § 2270.

after an expressed desire not to answer, the exclusion of that answer must mean the adoption of the confession-principle (b) above, while the admission of the answer must mean the rejection of that confession-principle and the adoption of the principle (c). That situation occurs when the privilege against self-crimination is abolished by the Legislature (as it may be in England) for a certain class of cases, and a witness is thus no longer entitled to refuse to answer; if then he is ordered, after protest, to answer a question involving an avowal of guilt, and that answer is offered against him in a subsequent case, a question is squarely presented which necessarily involves the adoption of either one or the other of the above principles for such confessions. But that peculiar situation had not at this time presented itself; and that is the significance of this period and this series of rulings; some things had apparently been settled — for instance, that principle (b) would prevail against principle (a); but the important question whether principle (c) — i.e. the orthodox theory of confessions — should prevail over both the others had not been answered.

Nor did a clear answer come for nearly twenty years. The first opportunity had presented itself in 1838, in Wheater's Case;[9] here the argument of counsel presented the question squarely enough; but, as no opinion was published, the exact principle of the decision remained undisclosed. One thing is clear from it, that the Selden theory of mental agitation (ante, § 845; here advanced by the counsel Dundas) was again and permanently repudiated for England; but, though we may well infer that the principle (c), supra, was the controlling reason, yet principle (b'') would suffice on the facts to account for the admission, since the specific answers accepted had not been objected to on the score of privilege, i.e. as the witness had not chosen to refuse when he might have done so, the answers must be taken to have been voluntary. The next opportunity offered in 1847, in Garbett's Case;[10] but [9] 1838, R. v. Wheater, 2 Moo. Cr. C. 45, 2 Lew. Cr. C. 157, before all the judges except Park, J., and Gurney, B. (an examination before bankruptcy commissioners as to certain bills of exchange, after the committing magistrate had refused to hold him on a charge of forging them; the counsel had informed him of his privilege, and where he claimed it, an answer was not forced; other objections were overruled, and he was compelled to answer in those cases; Dundas, for the accused: "The evidence was inadmissible, inasmuch as it was a compulsory answer upon oath. . . . When therefore it is recollected that the prisoner himself considered that he was compelled to answer, and that his objections, however erroneous they might have been, had been overruled, can it be said that his examination was voluntary? It is submitted that he was under duress, his mind disturbed by the extraordinary situation in which he found himself placed, and called on in the midst of these trying circumstances to weigh and consider the nature of each question and the consequences of his answers; and if so, the law cannot estimate the exact degree of influence of the duress upon the human mind. . . . I submit, therefore, on these grounds, — first, that the examination was in its nature compulsory, and likely to operate so as to disturb the mind of the prisoner; and, secondly, that it was an examination upon oath, — that the evidence was inadmissible." "The judges present were all of opinion that the evidence was properly received, and the conviction was good, except Lord Abinger, C. B., and Littledale, J.").

[10] 1847, R. v. Garbett, 2 C. & K. 474, 1 Den. Cr. C. 262, 2 Cox Cr. 448, before the fifteen judges (examination as witness in a civil suit, the Court having told him, after his declining to answer, that he must answer: Chambers, for the defence, argued that "in the present case, the impression on the mind of the witness was that he must answer, and that after trying to evade the questions and to ex-here the answer was obtained by an unlawful violation of privilege, and that alone would suffice to exclude it, and seems to have been the reason for exclusion; the only indication to the contrary being the use of the ambiguous word "compulsion" in the reporter's brief statement of the opinion. A third opportunity seemed to present itself in R. v. Sloggett, in 1856,[11] but here, too, the important question was not settled, since the witness (it was held) might have refused to answer, and, since he did not, was treated as acting voluntarily. But the ruling at least enforces the principle (b'') in its most liberal extent.

Meantime, in the same year, but by different judges (except one), the important question was being decided. In R. v. Scott,[12] there was the fullest acceptance [13] of the principle (c) as the controlling and orthodox principle. It is true that as no claim of privilege was in fact made by the witness, the decision might have been reached without this; but if we are looking for the reasons regarded by judges as indicating the law and actually controlling their rulings, a full and deliberate expression of those reasons must be the highest evidence, even though the ruling might by possibility be reached without such an expression.[14] The language is direct and clear:[15] ert his privilege, and finding both hopeless, he made the confession" under compulsion; Martin, for the prosecution, was asked by Parke, B.: "If a judge was clearly wrong, — as, if he said to a witness, 'Did you commit that murder?' and added, 'I will commit you if you do not answer', and the witness then confessed it, — would that confession be afterwards receivable?" and answered: "I should say it would. . . . I submit that if the witness does answer, there is no rule to exclude what he says from being evidence afterwards"; nine of the judges were for excluding the evidence on the ground that, where a witness is obliged to answer, notwithstanding a lawful claim of privilege, "what he says must be considered to have been obtained by compulsion"; and six were for receiving it, on various grounds unspecified). Two other individual rulings had intervened between this and Wheater's Case; but these are explainable also on principle (b'') and are not conclusive for principle (c): 1841, R. v. Sandys, C. & Mar. 345, Erskine, J. (examination as witness before coroner; received, and question reserved, but never decided); 1844, R. v. Goldshede, 1 C. & K. 657, Lord Denman, C. J. (answer in Chancery on oath as defendant; objected to as compulsory and upon oath; both arguments rejected and the answer received).

[11] 1856, R. v. Sloggett, 7 Cox Cr. 139, before Jervis, C. J., Coleridge, J., Cresswell and Erle, JJ., and Martin, B. (examination as bankrupt on oath before bankruptcy commissioners, without claim of privilege against incrimination; at a certain stage he was told to consider himself in custody, and the examination up to that point was offered; whether the privilege was destroyed by the Bankruptcy Act, and compulsion to answer would therefore have been lawful in any case, was disputed by counsel; the judges unanimously held that the matters were covered by the privilege and hence his answers made without claim of privilege were voluntary and admissible; but whether, if the matters had not been privileged and he had been lawfully compelled after objection to answer, the answers would be inadmissible as not voluntary, was left undetermined, and was the question in the ensuing case of R. v. Scott).

[12] 1856, R. v. Scott, 1 D. & B. 47, before Lord Campbell, C. J., Alderson, Coleridge, Willes, and Bramwell, JJ. (examination as bankrupt before Bankruptcy Court; the magistrate secured answers by threatening to commit (as he had a right to do under the Bankruptcy Act) for failing to answer completely; but no claim of privilege was made; the Act had abrogated the privilege for bankrupt's examinations; admitted).

[13] It is true that Coleridge, J., dissented, but this was on the ground (denied by the others) that the Bankruptcy Act had not abrogated the privilege against self-incrimination, and hence the answers were obtained by a violation of the privilege. On the other question, his well-known views leave us no reason to doubt that he agreed with his colleagues.

[14] The case is strengthened by the circumstance (above noted) that the magistrate had threatened to commit the witness (as he might lawfully) if he persisted in his refusal; this was properly explained by Lord Campbell as "merely an explanation of the enactment of the legislature upon the subject."

[15] Quoted more fully ante, § 843.

CAMPBELL, L. C. J. (after declaring that, as for the oath in itself, "there is no reason for saying that it [the answer] is less likely to be true than if it had been without an oath or any similar solemnity"): "The next objection is that the examination was compulsory. It is a trite maxim that the confession of a crime, to be admissible against the party confessing, must be voluntary; but this only means that it shall not be induced by improper threats or promises, because under such circumstances the party may have been influenced to say what is not true, and the supposed confession cannot be safely acted on. Such an objection cannot apply to . . . a lawful examination in the course of a judicial proceeding."

In short, mere compulsion in itself is nothing, so far as any confession-principle is concerned; for that is taken care of by the rule against being compelled to criminate one's self; an objection on that score alone must invoke that privilege, and the question then arises whether that privilege covers the case in hand, — a question which in the opinion above the judges next addressed themselves to, and which they treated as entirely distinct from any confession-question. For a correct understanding of the total separation between the two, and an antidote to the confusing expressions of a few modern English judges,[16] a perusal of this opinion may be recommended.

The result, then, of Scott's and Wheater's Cases in England was: (1) that the Dundas-Selden theory of mental agitation was entirely repudiated; (2) that as between the theories (a) and (b), ante, the former was equally repudiated, and the liberal form of (b'') was the only one that could by possibility be maintainable; (3) while by Scott's Case the orthodox theory (c) was given the deliberate sanction of at least one English Court.

Since that time (1856) Scott's Case has been repeatedly treated as law in England and in Canada.[17]

[17] England: 1859, Skeen's Case, Bell Cr. C. 97, 127, 129 (R. v. Scott treated by the minority of the judges as perhaps not unimpeachable); 1867, R. v. Robinson, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 80, 10 Cox Cr. 467 (examination as witness before bankruptcy commissioners; no caution and no claim of privilege; the answers were compellable and without privilege; three judges declared R. v. Scott to be the law, and two decided upon other grounds); 1872, R. v. Widdup, L. R. 2 C. C. R. 3, 12 Cox Cr. 557 (same; R. v. Scott followed by all five judges, though the reasons of Kelly, C. B., were perhaps peculiar); 1873, R. v. Coote, 12 Cox Cr. 557 (Privy Council; answers as witness before fire-marshal without caution and without objection, admitted; R. v. Scott followed); 1896, R. v. Erdheim, 2 Q. B. 260, 267 (bankrupt's examination on oath, admissible; following R. v. Scott); 1898, R. v. Bird, 19 Cox Cr. 180 (the accused testified before the magistrate and signed the written report; then, on being asked whether he had anything to say in answer to the charge, replied, "What I have already said is true"; the Court of Crown Cases Reserved held (1) that this answer made the written report admissible, (2) that, even without the answer, the written report was admissible, following R. v. Erdheim); 1902, R. v. Pike, 1 K. B. 553, 18 Cox Cr. 35 (bankrupt's compulsory "statement of affairs" on oath, held admissible in a prosecution for unlawful appropriation); 1916, R. v. Colpus and Boorman, 1 K. B. 575 (conspiracy to defraud military authorities; at a military court of inquiry, the accused were invited to attend and make statements, which they did, without other inducement and voluntarily; the statements held admissible).

The indications of its sanction in Ireland are doubtful; 1857, R. v. McHugh, 7 Cox Cr. 483 (information on oath as witness, while under arrest as a joint accused; the magistrate thought that the informant was to turn Crown witness; excluded, partly because the informant was not cautioned as an accused); 1866, R. v. Gillis, 11 Cox Cr. 69 (statement as witness to magistrate; O'Hagan, J., all the judges agreeing or not dissenting: "I do not consider the fact of their being made on oath would render the information inadmissible, provided they were made voluntarily and spontaneously").

In Canada, the following authorities are found: Dom. St. 1893, c. 31, § 5, R. S. 1906, c. 145, § 5 (quoted post, § 2252); 1896, R. v. Douglas, 11 Manit. 401 (deposition of the ac-

The lessons to be drawn as to our own use of the English precedents are three: (1) that it is impossible to use them indiscriminately and measure them by mere numbers; they mean little apart from the principle controlling the Court or the judge that makes them; (2) that whatever principle is selected should be logically and consistently carried out; and (3) that all the doubts and confusion are of comparatively recent creation, and that the orthodox and settled practice of the early 1800s entertained no doubts upon any of the four classes of situations which we have been considering, and treated them as amenable to exactly the same tests as confessions of any other sort, except that a statement on oath as accused before a magistrate was excluded because of the implied statutory prohibition.

R. 176, 179 (one answering on oath as a witness, without claim of privilege; his answers received; prior cases, before Can. St. 1893, c. 31 as amended, now superseded); 1877, R. v. McLean, 17 N. Br. 377, 384 (statements of an insolvent on examination at a creditors' meeting, admitted); 1904, R. v. Golden, 11 Br. C. 349 (forgery; after the statutory caution, the accused declined to say anything, but on request of the magistrate signed his name to the written statement; the signature was admitted to compare with the alleged forgery); 1906, R. v. Van Metre, 7 N. W. Terr. 297 (statements on oath, made in a deposition taken on examination for discovery in aid of execution, held admissible, the answers being voluntary); 1915, R. v. Graham, 21 D. L. R. 513, Alta. (obtaining credit by false pretences; the prosecution offered an assignment in insolvency and the accused's examination on oath taken pursuant thereto; held, admissible, the accused not having claimed privilege when examined); 1920, R. v. Peel, No. 1, 60 D. on the once settled principles of the authorities above cited. Yet recent years have seen signs of backsliding in some Courts.

This new phase of reaction is due to the misguided application of the terms "sweat-box" and "third degree" to such a process. Those terms originally and properly signified the use of some form of violence; in that sense, a confession so obtained was and is inadmissible (ante, § 833). But journalistic exaggeration has in common usage misapplied the terms to any process of simple interrogation of the arrested person, while in seclusion, by an official other than the judge.

The question of fact should therefore first be cleared up. If physical violence is used, the principle of § 833, ante, applies, and the confession is plainly inadmissible. But if no physical violence, or threat of it, is used, both the moral and the legal question become quite different. What is the actual practice of the police, at a given place and time, as between these two meanings of the term "third degree", is a question of fact. But here, at the outset, it should be understood that the present question concerns only the situation where, without violence, a continuous interrogation by the police was employed to obtain the confession; and that this meaning of the term probably represents in fact the general usage, to which the instances of actual violence are exceptions.[2]

The following comments from experienced observers are worth keeping in mind at this point:

1910, International Association of Chiefs of Police, 17th Annual Meeting, Proceedings, p. 54; Major Sylvester, of Washington (President of the Association): "We have heard of the other vulgarity, 'Third Degree.' Some of us have taken the genuine article. In police and criminal procedure and practice the officer of the law administers the 'First Degree', so called, when he makes the arrest. When taken to the place of confinement, there is the 'Second Degree.' When the prisoner is taken into private quarters and there interrogated as to his goings and comings, or asked to explain what he may be doing with Mr. Brown's broken and dismantled jewelry in his possession, to take off a rubber-heeled shoe he may be wearing in order to compare it with a footprint in a burglarized premises, or even to explain the blood stains on his hands and clothing, that, hypothetically, illustrates what would be called the 'Third Degree.' The prisoner is cautioned by the reputable officer to-day that he need not incriminate himself, and, in some places, the authorities have blank forms in use stipulating that what a prisoner states is of his own volition and without coercion. In the pursuit of their investigations, there is no law to prevent the officers of the law questioning any person who, in their opinion, may be able to give information which may enable them to discover the perpetrator of a crime. It becomes the bounden duty of the police to locate the violator. There is no justification for personal violence, inhuman or unfair conduct, in order to extort confessions. The officer who understands his position will offer admissions obtained from prisoners in no other manner than that which is sanctioned by the law. If a confession, preceded by the customary caution, obtained through remorse or a desire to make reparation for a crime, is advanced by a prisoner, it surely should not be regarded as unfair. . . . Volunteer confessions and admissions made after a prisoner has been cautioned that what he states may be used against him, are all there is to the so-called 'Third Degree.'" . . . .

[2] The "sweat-box" and "third degree" practices, in their legitimate scope, are well explained by Mr. Thomas Byrnes, former chief of detectives in New York City, in the Sunday Magazine, Oct. 9, 1905; with which is to be compared the long-established and highly-developed French method, as illustrated in the citations of § 2251, n. 12, post (notably Gaboriau's novel, Monsieur Lecocq). Further accounts by experienced persons are the following: Allan Pinkerton, Bank Robbers and Detectives (1882), p. 231; International Association of Chiefs of Police, Proceedings, passim; Arthur Train, Courts, Criminals and the Camorra (quoted supra).

Chief Corriston, of Minneapolis. . . . "The 'third degree' as understood by the public is a very different thing from the 'third degree' as known by a police official. . . . This body of men should by every means in their power refute the sensational idea the public has of the so-called 'third degree.' . . . In making an investigation as to who is responsible for committing an offence, it is often necessary to have several talks with the persons suspected, and their statements as to their whereabouts and conduct at the time in question are important links in unraveling a mystery. These investigations by the police have no doubt cleared the record of many an innocent suspect. The object is to ascertain the truth, not, as the public seem to think, fasten the commission of a crime upon some one — whether guilty or innocent. . . . There may have been individual cases where police officials have used improper and unfair methods to obtain results, but the 'Third Degree' is and always should be simply a battle of wits, the only object being to get at the truth. There can be no set rules for gaining information from a person suspected, but brute force to accomplish the result should never be resorted to, and any police official should be promptly dismissed who employs harsh measures to obtain statements. The methods of acquiring information depend upon the circumstances of each case and the disposition and mental faculties of the person under suspicion. . . . A crime has been committed. It is reported to the police; facts may come slowly or quickly. On the spur of the moment the head of the detective bureau must evolve a theory — what was the motive for the crime — who may have had an object in committing it? Some one is suspected, brought in and questioned. The one object is to get the truth. A searching examination is made, call it the 'third degree' or whatever you may; a great deal depends upon it. It may send out from police headquarters a suspect with his reputation good before the world; it may be the means of bringing a felon to justice. If the suspect is innocent, his story can generally be quickly checked up and proved, and the 'third degree' is then the means of working to the advantage of the suspect and society."

1912, Mr. Arthur Train (former Assistant District Attorney in New York City), Courts, Criminals, and the Camorra, p. 21: "When it comes to the more important cases, the accused is usually put through some sort of an inquisitorial process by the captain at the station-house. If he is not very successful at getting anything out of the prisoner, the latter is turned over to the sergeant and a couple of officers who can use methods of a more urgent character. If the prisoner is arrested by headquarters detectives, various efficient devices to compel him to 'give up what he knows' may be used — such as depriving him of food and sleep, placing him in a cell with a 'stool-pigeon' who will try to worm a confession out of him, and the usual moral suasion of a heart-to-heart (!) talk in the back room with the inspector.

"This is the darker side of the picture of practical government. It is needless to say that the police do not usually suggest the various safeguards and privileges which the law accords to defendants thus arrested. But the writer is free to confess that, save in exceptional cases, he believes the rigors of the so-called third degree to be greatly exaggerated. Frequently, in dealing with rough men, rough methods are used. But considering the multitude of offenders, and the thousands of police officers, none of whom have been trained in a school of gentleness, it is surprising that severer treatment is not met with on the part of those who run foul of the criminal law. The ordinary 'cop' tries to do his duty as effectively as he can. With the average citizen gruffness and roughness go a long way in the assertion of authority. Policemen cannot have the manners of dancing-masters. The writer is not quarrelling with the conduct of police officers. On the contrary, the point he is trying to make is that in the task of policing a big city, the rights of the individual must indubitably suffer to a certain extent if the rights of the multitude are to be properly protected. We can make too much of small injustices and petty incivilities. Police business is not gentle business. The officers are trying to prevent you and me from being knocked on the head some dark night or from being chloroformed in our beds. Ten thousand men are trying to do a thirty-thousand-man job."

Miscalling a thing by a bad name does not make it any worse than it is. Let us therefore ask whether there is any reason why the traditional process of lengthy continuous interrogations in seclusion, immediately after arrest, calls for exclusion of a confession thus made.

(1) In the first place, an innocent person is always helped by an early opportunity to tell his whole story; hundreds of suspected persons every day are set free because their story thus told bears the marks of truth. Moreover, and more important, every guilty person is almost always ready and desirous to confess, as soon as he is detected and arrested. This psychological truth, well known to all criminal trial judges, seems to be ignored by some Supreme Courts. The nervous pressure of guilt is enormous; the load of the deed done is heavy; the fear of detection fills the consciousness; and when detection comes, the pressure is relieved; and the deep sense of relief makes confession a satisfaction.[3] At that moment, he will tell all, and tell it truly. To forbid soliciting him, to seek to prevent this relief, is to fly in the face of human nature. It is natural, and should be lawful, to take his confession at that moment — the best one. And this expedient, if sanctioned, saves the State a delay and expense in convicting him after he has reacted from his first sensations, has yielded to his friends' solicitations, and comes under the sway of the natural human instinct to struggle to save himself by the aid of all technicalities.

(2) In the case of professional criminals, who usually work in groups, there is often no hope of getting at the group until one of them has "peached", and given the clues to the police. The police know this, and have known it for generations in every country. The only ones who apparently do not know it are some of the Supreme Court judges. A thorough questioning of the first suspected person who is caught makes possible the pursuit of the right trail for the others. To forbid this is to tie the hands of the police. The attitude of some judges towards these necessary police methods is lamentable; one would think that the police, not the criminals, were the enemies of society. To disable the detective police from the very function they are set to fulfil is no less than absurd. Let the judges who sit in judgment on crime look a little into the facts. Let them not sit up aloft and dictate a rule which ignores the well-known facts of criminal life and hampers the needful methods of justice.

[3] Read Balzac's description of this in "Lucien de Rubempré", c. XV, and "The Last Incarnation of Vautrin", c. II; also Daniel Webster's speech at the Knapp-Crowninshield Trial (quoted in full in the present writer's Principles of Judicial Proof, § 393). Psychologists report that their studies have not yet taken up this phenomenon. But so well established a fact should be supplied with its scientific explanation. That explanation seems to be that the long-continued nervous inhibition of all utterance, in fear of revealing clues to guilt, imposes a terrific strain, like that of a tightened steel spring; that the arrest shows the guilty person that this strain of repression is futile and is no longer needed; and that hence, in the sudden release of the inhibition, it is a genuine relief to be able to tell freely the whole story. After this sense of nervous relief has passed, the inclination to tell disappears; and most confessions are in fact made within a short time after arrest.

But, it is argued, there are abuses by the police. Very true, — here and there, at least. It does not follow, however, that a stricter rule of exclusion for confessions is the proper remedy. It is still a misguided remedy. The true one is to provide a means of speedy confession which shall be less susceptible to abuses, while still taking advantage of the inherent psychological situation. In short, let an authorized skilled magistrate take the confession. Let every accused person be required to be taken before a magistrate within a day after arrest, for private examination; let the magistrate warn him of his right to keep silence; and then let his statement be taken if he is willing to make one.

Such is the expedient employed in other civilized countries. Such is the method long ago adopted in England.[4] We need not go so far as to introduce the French "juge d'instruction" into our system; but we may at least accept English experience of two generations. The examination before a magistrate meets a real need of the situation, both psychologic and detective. To attempt to get along without it is virtually to force the police to practice its equivalent. For the pursuit of crime needs and justifies it; and as long as our legislators and judges are shortsighted enough to fail to provide it with proper safeguards, it must and will be practised without them.

From what is above said, it follows that the attempts, legislative and judicial, to exclude confessions obtained by police-questioning of persons arrested and in seclusion represent simply a misguided solution of the problem.[5]

Y., 228 Fed. 220, 232 (the now accused had gone voluntarily before a grand jury, expressly waived his privilege, and testified; afterwards he was by another grand jury indicted with others, and testified for himself and the others; held, that his original testimony before the grand jury could be used in impeachment).

Alabama: 1852. Arkansas: 1920, Ellis v. State, 144 Ark. 504, 222 S. W. 1058 (statements voluntarily made as a witness to examining magistrate, admitted).

California: 1873, People v. Kelley, 47 Cal. 125 (examination under oath before magistrate as accused; admitted, as voluntary; distinguishing People v. Gibbons, 43 Cal. 551 (1872), because under the statute at that time (since changed) such examinations upon oath were unlawful; "if his voluntary, unsworn statement may be proved against him as a confession, his voluntary testimony under oath, given in a proceeding in which he elects and is authorized to testify, ought to stand upon at least as favorable a footing"); 1881, People v. Taylor, 59 Cal. 650 (examination as accused before coroner, apparently on oath; admitted, since "T. could not have been compelled to testify; . . . the statement having been voluntary, the evidence was admissible, whether made in a judicial proceeding or any other"); 1893, People v. Weiger, 100 Cal. 352, 357, 34 Pac. 826 (defendant's examination on oath, when cited in his own voluntary proceedings in insolvency, admitted); 1901, People v. Sexton, 132 Cal. 37, 64 Pac. 107 (accused's testimony as witness before grand jury, admitted; but here not a confession); 1901, People v. Chrisman, 135 Cal. 282, 67 Pac. 136 (defendant's testimony at the preliminary examination, admitted); 1913, People v. O'Bryan, 165 Cal. 55, 130 Pac. 1042 (under arrest, on oath, before the grand jury, without warning, held inadmissible, following People v. Molineux, N. Y.; but the opinion sanctions the exploded error that such an examination violated the privilege against self-crimination; of course, as noted ante, § 850, par. (3), there is no compulsion in such cases, hence no violation of that privilege).

Colorado: 1894, Torris v. People, 19 Colo. 438, 36 Pac. 153 (affidavits to procure witnesses, voluntarily made by defendant, received); 1905, Tuttle v. People, 33 Colo. 243, 79 Pac. 1035 (testimony on oath as witness subpœnaed before the coroner, knowing that he was under suspicion, and without warning, excluded; the Court thus takes this opportunity to ally itself with the old-fashioned and absurd quibbles, which, in a State not hampered with a past record on this subject, an enlightened judiciary could have afforded to repudiate; the ruling is the more inexcusable in that the statements offered were conceded to be not confessions in the proper sense — ante, § 821 — but statements of "their whereabouts"; the Court in a defensive manner remarks that "Crime should be punished", etc., but fails to explain how it can be punished so long as Courts maintain an obstructive anachronistic attitude on such questions); 1911, Reagan v. People, 49 Colo. 316, 112 Pac. 785 (on oath, under arrest, before the coroner, after a warning, admitted).

Florida: 1892, Ortiz v. State, 30 Fla. 256, 283, 11 So. 611 (examination as accused on oath at trial by his own offer, admissible); 1895, Jenkins v. State, 35 Fla. 737, 18 So. 182 (before grand jury; the caution had been given as to his privilege, but he was told he was under suspicion; admitted); 1898, Green v. State, 40 Fla. 474, 24 So. 537 (plea of guilty before magistrate, after warning, admitted); 1903, McNish v. State, 45 Fla. 83, 34 So. 219 (plea of guilty before the committing magistrate, without caution, excluded); 1903, Ferrell v. State, 45 Fla. 26, 34 So. 220 (bigamy; defendant's sworn testimony in a suit by him against the first wife for divorce, admitted); 1909, Daniels v. State, 57 Fla. 1, 48 So. 747 (statements made under arrest before the coroner, even though not strictly confessions, are not admissible unless the person is "fully advised of his rights" and then voluntarily makes the statement); 1915, Crawford v. State, 70 Fla. 323, 70 So. 374 (murder; statement made under arrest and upon oath before coroner held inadmissible for lack of warning).

Georgia: 1875, Cicero v. State, 54 Ga. 156 (examination as accused before magistrate; excluded, because the magistrate put questions to get contradictory statements); 1889, Woolfolk v. State, 81 Ga. 564, 8 S. E. 724 (under arrest as accused before the coroner, but without oath; admitted); 1895, Henderson v. State, 95 Ga. 326, 22 S. E. 537 (testimony given as a witness without compulsion is admissible); 1905, Davis v. State, 122 Ga. 564, 50 S. E. 376 (statements to the grand jury as witness, after a caution, admitted; no authority cited); 1905, Green v. State, 124 Ga. 343, 52 S. E. 431 (defendant's testimony, under arrest, at the coroner's inquest, admitted); 1907, Adams v. State, 129 Ga. 248, 58 S. E. 822 (examination on oath before the coroner, under arrest, and without warning; excluded); 1919, Standifer v. State, 24 Ga. App. 329, 100 S. E. 775 (accused's testimony as witness before the coroner, on oath but not warned, excluded).

Hawaii: Rev. Laws 1915, § 2624 ("nor shall any confession which is tendered in evidence on any trial be rejected on the ground that it purports to have been made on oath, if proof can be given to the Judge or other presiding officer, that in fact it was not so made"); 1867, R. v. Paakaula, 3 Haw. 30, 37 (plea of guilty before the magistrate, admitted).

Illinois: 1869, Austine v. People, 51 Ill. 236, 239 (admission made at time of pleading as accused before a magistrate, excluded; but on the ground of being induced by a promise to drop the prosecution).

Indiana: 1866, Anderson v. State, 26 Ind. 89 (examination as witness in another cause; admitted as voluntary); 1893, Davidson v. State, 135 Ind. 254, 260, 34 N. E. 972 (statements "voluntarily" made and assigned at inquest as witness, admitted); 1903, Ginn v. State, 161 Ind. 292, 68 N. E. 294 (confession, when taken before a justice, to one not in authority, admitted); 1920, Batchelor v. State, 189 Ind. 69, 125 N. E. 773 (accused's answers to judge's interrogatories, after plea of guilty and before sentence imposed, and without counsel (excluded under the circumstances).

Iowa: 1886, State v. Briggs, 68 Ia. 416, 424, 27 N. W. 358 (plea of guilty on preliminary examination; admitted, even though not told by magistrate of his right to counsel); 1892, State v. Carroll, 85 Ia. 1, 51 N. W. 1159 (testifying before grand jury as witness, while under arrest on the charge; caution by foreman; admitted); 1892, State v. Clifford, 86 Ia. 550, 553, 53 N. W. 209 (statute requiring disclosure of testimony before grand jury does not admit an otherwise inadmissible confession there made); 1897, State v. Van Tassel, 103 Ia. 6, 72 N. W. 497 (voluntary appearance at the inquest, admitted).

Kansas: 1893, State v. Sortor, 52 Kan. 531, 539, 34 Pac. 1036 (preliminary examination as defendant on oath, received); 1887, State v. Taylor, 36 Kan. 329, 13 Pac. 550 (testimony at the inquest, without subpœna or questioning, admitted); 1905, State v. Finch, 71 Kan. 793, 81 Pac. 494 (testimony as witness subpœnaed at the inquest, not in custody nor under suspicion, admitted); 1918, State v. King, 102 Kan. 155, 169 Pac. 557 (robbery; defendant's testimony at the former trial, admitted against him).

Kentucky: C. Cr. P. 1895, § 64 (witness' statement before committing magistrate not "of itself" to be "evidence for any purpose"); 1903, Tines v. Com., — Ky. —, 77 S. W. 363 (affidavit made to the district attorney, excluded; no precedents cited); 1904, Seaborn v. Com., — Ky. —, 80 S. W. 233 ("voluntary testimony" before committing magistrate, admitted); 1904, Bess v. Com., 118 Ky. 858, 82 S. W. 576 (defendant's voluntary testimony on his former trial, admitted); 1920, Riley v. Wallace, 188 Ky. 471, 222 S. W. 1085 (trial Judge held not entitled to take judicial notice of the falsity of certain testimony so as to punish the witnesses for contempt in testifying falsely).

Louisiana: 1873, State v. Garvey, 25 La. An. 191 (examination as witness before coroner while under arrest on a charge of the crime, but made at his own request; excluded, because made as an accused); 1900, State v. Robinson, 52 La. An. 616, 27 So. 124 (before coroner as witness; not decided).

Maine: 1862, State v. Gilman, 51 Me. 206 (examination as witness on oath before coroner, after knowledge of suspicion, but a caution given; admitted, because the statements were voluntary, "the manifestation of his own free will"; quoted ante, § 843); 1873, State v. Bowe, 61 Me. 174 (plea of guilty before the lower Court; admitted, as not appearing to have been obtained "by threats or promises").

Massachusetts: 1838, Faunce v. Gray, 21 Pick. 245 (admissions by an administrator in a civil examination on oath, admitted; the fact that it was made on oath, held immaterial; quoted ante, § 842); 1855, Judd v. Gibbs, 3 Gray 539, 543 (examination of an insolvent before commissioners, admitted; but his oath taken not as a part of the examination, excluded, apparently because it could not be used as against the present parties); 1857, Com. v. King, 8 Gray 503 (examination as witness at fire inquest; no caution; admitted: whether caution was essential, was expressly not decided); 1866, Com. v. Lannan, 13 All. 563, 569

(special plea in bar, held bad by the Court below; not admitted, chiefly because drawn by the attorney, and thus inadmissible by statute); 1877, Com. v. Reynolds, 122 Mass. 455, 458 (examination as defendant at a former trial of the same charge; admitted, because "they were voluntary . . . and it is immaterial when or where they were made"); 1896, Com. v. Wesley, 140 Mass. 248, 252 (testimony of the defendant at an inquest, sworn, but not summoned, and warned; admitted, as "appearing to have been made voluntarily, and not under threat or duress or in consequence of an inducement"); 1897, Com. v. Hunton, 168 Mass. 130, 46 N. E. 404 (testimony before an investigating committee at the City Hall, admitted); 1912, Com. v. Mackenzie, 211 Mass. 578, 98 N. E. 598 (on oath before the grand jury, voluntarily and after warning, admissible).

Michigan: 1890, People v. Lauder, 82 Mich. 109, 46 N. W. 956 (testimony on oath before a grand jury cannot be afterwards used); 1908, People v. Owen, 154 Mich. 571, 118 N. W. 590 (on oath under arrest, before a chief detective and a notary; admitted); 1919, People v. Maloy, 204 Mich. 524, 170 N. W. 690 (co-respondent in a divorce case, testifying under subpœna and oath, without claim or privilege, excluded on his own trial for adultery, because it was not shown "that he was advised of what his constitutional rights were or that he had knowledge of what they were"; absurd); 1920, People v. Sharac, 209 Mich. 249, 176 N. W. 431 (statement before a justice, while under arrest, voluntarily but without warning, admitted).

Mississippi: 1860, Josephine v. State, 39 Miss. 626, 650 (examination as witness on the trial of another person for the same charge; excluded); 1879, Jackson v. State, 56 Miss. 312 (examination as witness on the trial of another person jointly indicted for the same offence, after a caution; excluded, because the oath itself involves a compulsion); 1883, Farkas v. State, 60 Miss. 847 (on oath as a witness before the coroner, but under arrest on suspicion; excluded); 1897, Ford v. State, 75 Miss. 101, 21 So. 524 (a thirteen-year old negro boy, sworn as defendant on a preliminary examination, without caution; excluded); 1898, Powell v. State, — Miss. —, 23 So. 266 (testimony for the State on a prior trial of a co-defendant, excluded; but testimony on preliminary examination before the magistrate in the present proceedings, semble, admissible); 1899, Steele v. State, 76 Miss. 387, 24 So. 910 (one voluntarily offering himself as witness before the coroner and before a committing magistrate; his testimony admitted because given voluntarily; whether otherwise for one examined as an accused, not decided); 1903, Mackmasters v. State, 83 Miss. 1, 35 So. 302 (voluntary testimony as accused at the first trial, admitted); 1906, Cooper v. State, 89 Miss. 429, 42 So. 601 (testimony under oath before the grand jury, while in custody as accused, excluded; Steele v. State distinguished).

Missouri: 1859, State v. Lamb, 28 Mo. 218, 228 (examination as accused before magistrate, after caution; admitted); 1893, State v. Young, 119 Mo. 495, 507, 517, 24 S. W. 1038 (ignorant German boy, under suspicion, summoned as witness before coroner, and examined on oath without warning; excluded); 1894, State v. Wisdom, 119 Mo. 539, 546, 551, 24 S. W. 1047 (accused under arrest, on oath, before the coroner, but of his own motion; admitted; the fact of oath is immaterial; the test is whether the statement was voluntary); 1895, State v. David, 131 Mo. 380, 33 S. W. 28 (the witness attended the inquest voluntarily and testified without subpœna; admitted); 1896, State v. Punshon, 133 Mo. 44, 34 S. W. 25 (accused before the coroner on oath, after caution, but under a promise that the statements would not be used against him; admitted); 1901, State v. Hagan, 164 Mo. 654, 65 S. W. 249 (testimony before a coroner as witness, apparently held inadmissible); 1903, State v. Jones, 171 Mo. 401, 71 S. W. 680 (confession under oath at the preliminary trial of another person jointly charged, after warning, admitted); 1890, State v. Mullins, 101 Mo. 514, 14 S. W. 625 (murder; voluntary testimony at the inquest, admitted, the accused being "well known" to be the killer); 1904, State v. Woodward, 182 Mo. 391, 81 S. W. 857 (statement to a judge in chambers, not on oath and voluntary, admitted; not one of the foregoing cases, except State v. Mullins, is cited); 1911, State v. Marion, 235 Mo. 359, 138 S. W. 491 (deposition of a party in a civil suit, admitted); 1920, State v. Smith, — Mo. —, 222 S. W. 455 (statement on oath, while in custody, at the inquest, excluded); 1921, State v. Allen, — Mo. —, 234 S. W. 837 (statement of wife made voluntarily on examination by coroner on oath, after caution, admissible, here as self-contradiction).

Montana: 1896, State v. O'Brien, 18 Mont. 1, 43 Pac. 1091, 44 Pac. 399 (testimony before coroner, in what capacity does not appear, but without caution; excluded).

Nebraska: 1878, Clough v. State, 7 Nebr. 320, 340 (on oath as a witness before the coroner, and not accused; admitted).

New Hampshire: 1814, Wood v. Weld, Smith N. H. 367 (answers on oath by the defendant to interrogatories put by an administrator in a Court of Probate on a complaint for concealing the intestate's goods, received in an action between the same parties for money had and received, covering the same concealment of goods; notes of Smith, C. J.: "What hardship is it to be obliged to tell the truth? No means used to produce anything but the truth"); 1863, Carr v. Griffin, 44 N. H. 510 (deposition irregularly taken; not inadmissible as involuntary).

New Jersey: 1906, State v. Banusik, — N. J. L. —, 64 Atl. 994 (confession not under oath, to a police magistrate, in jail, after warning, admitted).

New Mexico: 1916, State v. Ascarate, 21 N. M. 191, 153 Pac. 1036 (murder; accused's statements on oath under arrest before the coroner, admitted; careful opinion by Hanna, J.).

New York: 1854, Hendrickson v. People, 10 N. Y. 13 (examination as witness before coroner, not under suspicion or charge, but not cautioned; admitted; Parker, J.: "I do not see how, upon principle, the evidence of a witness, not in custody and not charged with crime, taken either on a coroner's inquest or before a committing magistrate, could be rejected. It ought not to be excluded on the ground that it was taken upon oath. The evidence is certainly none the less reliable because taken under the solemnity of an oath. . . . Nor can the exclusion of the evidence depend on the question whether there was any suspicion of the guilt of the witness lurking in the heart of any person at the time the testimony was taken; that would be the most dangerous of all tests, as well because of the readiness with which proof of such suspicion might be secured, as of the impossibility of refuting it. . . . The witness may refuse to answer, and his answers are to be deemed voluntary unless he is compelled to answer after having declined to do so; in the latter case only will they be deemed compulsory and excluded"; Selden, J. (language already quoted, ante, § 845) dissented solely on the ground that the testimony was given under suspicion; Gardiner, C. J., thought that on the facts the examination had been purely in the character of a witness, but would have excluded his oath as unlawful, had he been substantially an accused person; the majority conceded that an examination on oath as accused before a magistrate would have been inadmissible, because the putting an oath to the accused was forbidden by the statute); 1857, People v. McMahon, 15 N.Y. 384 (the Court's membership having almost entirely changed; examination as witness before coroner, but in custody without warrant, charged as the offender, rejected; Selden, J.: "[The word 'voluntary' in judicial examinations means] proceeding from the spontaneous suggestion of the party's own mind, free from the influence of any disturbing cause. . . . It is considered that a judicial oath, administered when the mind is disturbed and agitated by a criminal charge, may have the effect [of preventing free and voluntary mental action], and hence the exclusion. . . . [Hence, such an examination under oath is not to be rejected] unless that oath was administered in the course of some judicial inquiry in regard to the crime itself for which the prisoner is on trial: . . . [while it is also necessarily admissible] if at the time it was made the prisoner was not himself resting under any charge or suspicion of having committed the crime"; as for examinations of accused persons on oath, Selden, J., for the Court, adopts the theory "that the evidence is too uncertain to be safely relied upon", and rejects the theory that "a mere arbitrary rule, which prohibits magistrates from taking the examination of prisoners charged with crime upon oath, has been violated"); 1869, Teachout v. People, 41 N. Y. 7 (examination as witness before coroner, while under suspicion and after notice of probable arrest; a caution being given by the coroner, held by the majority, per Woodruff, J., that the single fact that the witness was under suspicion was not sufficient to exclude the testimony, expressly repudiating the reasoning of McMahon's Case and the dictum therein as to the effect of suspicion language quoted ante, § 845), but holding that "declarations made under the influence of a charge of guilt, under actual arrest or under examination with such a charge impending, should be excluded, except where a careful obedience to the statutory precautions is observed"; thus adopting the English theory of statutory prohibition as the basis of that exclusion, though taking a liberal view of the cases coming within its application, like the rulings ante, in § 850; Grover and Lott, JJ., dissenting, following McMahon's Case and its theory); 1878, Abbott v. People, 75 N. Y. 602 (schedules put in by the debtor in bankruptcy proceedings; admitted); C. Cr. P. 1881, § 395 (quoted ante, § 831); 1883, People v. McGloin, 9 N. Y. 242 (examination under oath before a coroner while under arrest charged with the crime in question, the coroner having been summoned to the police station and not acting officially; the conflicting theories of the preceding rulings were mentioned, and it was held (1) that the fact of the oath having been administered was not illegal so as to exclude, since only examinations taken under the statute could be so objected to, and this was not under it; and (2) that the examination was not compulsory, the theory of McMahon's Case being thus impliedly repudiated; (3) that under the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1881, § 395, "a confession of a defendant, whether in the course of judicial proceedings or to a private person, can be given in evidence against him, unless made under the influence of fear produced by threats, or unless made upon a stipulation of the district attorney that he shall not be prosecuted therefore", the confession was equally admissible); 1886, People v. Mondon, 103 N. Y. 213, 8 N. E. 496 (examination on oath before coroner, under arrest without a warrant, on suspicion of the crime in question, without counsel, not cautioned; excluded on the authority of McMahon's Case, and the Code provision supra held (overturning McGloin's Case) "not to apply to any but voluntary confessions, nor to change the statutory rules relating to the examination of prisoners charged with crime"; "the mere fact that at the time of his examination he was aware that a crime was suspected, and that he was suspected of being the criminal, will not prevent his being regarded as a mere witness", and his testimony may be used; but "if he is in custody as the supposed criminal, he is not regarded merely as a witness, but as a party accused", and the examination is excluded, unless in conformity with the statute as to preliminary examinations); 1890, People v. Chapleau, 121 N. Y. 266, 24 N. E. 469 (examination at his own request, while in custody, before the coroner, after a caution; the preceding cases were reviewed and treated as harmonious (!), and the examination admitted as being "in all respects and however viewed, the voluntary and uninfluenced statements of the individual"; no solution of the difficulties being offered, except, perhaps, that the voluntariness of the confession, in view of "their nature and the circumstances under which made", is to be the final test in each case); 1892, People v. Wright, 136 N. Y. 625, 632, 32 N. E. 629 (examination before coroner, received; following the Chapleau Case); 1901, People v. Molineux, 168 N. Y. 264, 61 N. E. 286 (testimony given at an inquest as witness under subpœna, by one suspected but not arrested or charged, held admissible; People v. Chapleau approved).

As a result of this series of decisions it may be said: (1) that the theory of statutory prohibition as the reason for excluding the examination of accused persons on oath was clearly recognized in all the cases except McMahon's; (2) that apart from this nothing was clearly settled; (3) that by the Mondon decision a coach and four was driven through the Penal Code, which had been intended to settle the controversy and was so taken in the McGloin Case, and which (if naturally interpreted) accepts fully the orthodox principle of Scott's Case in England; (4) that the Court changed its principles often, and in the later cases ignored the irreconcilable conflict in the precedents and treated them as harmonious. After the Molineux Case a new phase is entered:

1915, People v. Ferola, 215 N. Y. 285, 109 N. E. 500 (the accused, in custody on a charge of homicide, testified on oath before the coroner, who warned her of her privilege, though not exactly as prescribed by the statute; "she frankly admitted that she committed the homicide"; held a violation of her "constitutional rights", per Miller, J., using this phrase improperly to designate the judicial law in the confession cases; but whether under C. Cr. P. § 395 "her statements were voluntary and admissible . . . or it was an error of law to admit her subsequent statement in evidence, is a different question: . . . a majority of us are of the opinion that if error was committed it was harmless"; per Seabury, J., that "we should declare the McMahon and Mondon decisions overruled, and accept . . . the principle asserted in the Hendrickson, Teachout, McGloin and Chapleau cases", approving the above text; per Collin, J., held inadmissible; to the simple-minded reader, the odd thing is the entire futility of the legislator's effort to make law in C. Cr. P. § 395; listen to these words: "A confession of a defendant, whether in the course of judicial proceedings, or to a private person, can be given in evidence against him, unless made under the influence of fear produced by threats"); 1915, People v. Roach, 215 N. Y. 592, 599, 109 N. E. 618 (confession on oath before the coroner, after stating that he was willing to confess, admitted, following People v. Ferola).

North Carolina: 1846, State v. Broughton, 7 Ired. 96 (examination as witness before grand jury; held inadmissible, if it had involved a confession, as within the spirit of the statute against imposing oaths on accused persons, "because the statute intended to have the party free to admit or deny his guilt, and the oath deprives him of that freedom"); 1847, State v. Cowan, 7 Ired. 239 (examination as accused before a magistrate, without oath, after a caution; admitted, as "free and voluntary", though the magistrate warned him that he would be committed unless he accounted for his possession of the stolen property); 1873, State v. Patterson, 68 N. C. 292 (examination as accused before magistrate, without oath, but after caution, the caution not being as full as the statute prescribed; admitted); 1893, State v. Rogers, 112 N. C. 874, 876, 17 S. E. 297 (accused on oath at preliminary examination, after warning, admitted; warning need not be in words of statute; shackling of the accused not in itself fatal); 1893, State v. De Graff, 113 N. C. 688, 693, 18 S. E. 507 (accused on oath before magistrate, after warning, admitted); 1897, State v. Melton, 120 N. C. 591, 26 S. E. 933 (accused at preliminary examination, after asking to testify and being cautioned; admitted); 1903, State v. Parker, 132 N. C. 1014, 43 S. E. 830 (examination as accused before the magistrate, under oath contrary to the statute, excluded); 1903, State v. Simpson, 133 N. C. 676, 45 S. E. 567 (examination of a prosecutor on oath as a witness in another trial, after a caution, admitted; examination as accused, having counsel, on his own behalf before the magistrate, after specific caution, admitted).

Ohio: 1883, Jackson v. State, 39 Oh. St. 37, 39 (as a witness for himself before the magistrate on the charge in question, after being cautioned but insisting on his right to testify; admitted).

Oregon: Laws 1920, § 1786 (the statement of a defendant before a committing magistrate, made according to statute after caution, etc., "is competent testimony to be laid before the grand jury, and may be given in evidence against the defendant on the trial"); 1896, State v. Hatcher, 29 Or. 309, 44 Pac. 584 (defendant before magistrate, without caution; excluded because by statute, § 1598, the caution is required); 1897, State v. Robinson, 32

Or. 43, 48 Pac. 357 (before the grand jury, in what capacity not stated, but voluntary; admitted); 1899, State v. Andrews, 35 Or. 388, 58 Pac. 765 (statements by an Indian at examination as accused before magistrate without caution, excluded); 1912, State v. Humphrey, 63 Or. 540, 128 Pac. 824 (on examination before a grand jury, after warning, admitted).

Pennsylvania: 1846, Com. v. Harman, 4 Pa. St. 269 (examination upon oath as accused before magistrate, without caution, and under threats and promises; excluded, as "a gross outrage upon the accused"); 1857, Williams v. Com., 29 Pa. 102, 105 (examination as witness before coroner, not suspected nor charged; admitted, because "he might have declined to testify", and it thus "was a voluntary statement"); 1890, Com. v. Clark, 130 Pa. 641, 650, 18 Atl. 988 (examination on oath before magistrate, but not under the statute, after a caution, while under arrest on the charge; the accused said "he was making it of his own free will"; admitted, as a voluntary statement; the fact of the oath being improperly administered was held immaterial).

Philippine Islands: 1912, U. S. v. Ching Po, 23 P. I. 578 (opium offence; defendant's former voluntary testimony at the trial of another charge based on the same transaction, admitted); 1919, U. S. v. Agatea, 40 P. I. 596 (confession on oath before a justice, without warning, held admissible).

Porto Rico: 1909, People v. Martinez, 15 P. R. 725 (confessions made under oath to a magistrate, without warning, said obiter to be inadmissible).

South Carolina: 1852, State v. Vaigneur, 5 Rich. L. 395, 402 (examination as witness before coroner, not arrested nor suspected, and not cautioned, but arrested after his testimony; admitted, because he might have refused to answer; quoted ante, § 843); 1879, State v. Branham, 13 S. C. 389 (examination before magistrate as accused, without caution; admitted); 1890, State v. Senn, 32 S. C. 392, 11 S. E. 292 (on oath as a witness before the coroner, not charged with the crime; excluded by two judges to one); 1891, State v. Merriman, 34 S. C. 38, 12 S. E. 619, semble (preceding case approved); 1911, State v. Barwick, 89 S. C. 153, 71 S. E. 838 (defendant allowed to be cross-examined to statements made by him under oath in the mayor's court; State v. Senn distinguished); 1916, State v. Tapp, 104 S. C. 576, 89 S. E. 394 (witness sworn at a coroner's inquest, though not charged or suspected; excluded); 1916, State v. Perry, 106 S. C. 289, 91 S. E. 300 (following State v. Tapp, supra).

Tennessee: 1875, Beggarly v. State, 8 Baxt. 521, 525 (examination before magistrate, after caution; admitted, because he was "not so intimidated as to prevent his acting freely").

Texas: C. Cr. P. 1911, § 810 (see quotation ante, § 831); 1874, Alston v. State, 41 Tex. 40 (examination before magistrate on a charge against another person, not arrested and not cautioned, but knowing herself to be suspected; because voluntary upon the facts); 1894, Bell v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. 163 (former testimony in a civil case, admitted); 1901, Wisdom v. State, 42 Tex. Cr. 579, 61 S. W. 926 ("before the grand jury, after being warned"; admitted; Henderson, J., diss. on another ground); 1902, Grimsinger v. State, 44 Tex. Cr. 1, 69 S. W. 583 (testimony before the grand jury, while under arrest, held admissible, following Wisdom v. State); 1903, Twiggs v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 75 S. W. 531 (rule of warning, applied); 1906, Miller v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 91 S. W. 582 (testimony as witness before the examining magistrate, admitted); 1913, Rogers v. State, 71 Tex. Cr. 149, 159 S. W. 40 (testimony before grand jury before arrest, reduced to writing and sworn to, admitted, as not being within the statute).

Utah: 1886, U. S. v. Kirkwood, 5 Utah 124, 127, 13 Pac. 234 (examination as witness before grand jury investigating the charge against him; his appearance was voluntary, and he was cautioned; admitted; "if of his own choice, after being warned, he takes an oath which the law provides that he may take, and makes a confession, we are unable to understand why such a confession is not as voluntary as if made not under oath; it certainly is as reliable, for the obligations of an oath are usually an incentive to speak the truth").

Vermont: 1840, Smith v. Crane, 12 Vt. 491, 493, per Redfield, J. (witness' statement under oath, admissible); 1904, State v. Blay, 77 Vt. 56, 58 Atl. 794 (larceny; plea of guilty before a justice of the peace, without counsel or warning, admitted).

Virginia: 1830, Moore v. Com., 2 Leigh 702, 704 (examination as accused before magistrate; admitted, because no threats or promises were made); Code 1919, § 4781 (in criminal prosecution, except for perjury or action on penal statute, a statement made "as witness upon a legal examination", unless made when examined as witness in his own behalf, is not admissible against the maker as accused); 1898, Hite v. Com., 96 Va. 489, 31 S. E. 89 (voluntary statement to justice, admitted); 1916, Hansel v. Com., 118 Va. 803, 88 S. E. 166 (forgery; former testimony of H. in a suit by R. against G. where H. had a joint interest with R., admitted under Code § 3901); 1922, Thaniel v. Com., — Va. —, 111 S. E. 259 (accused's testimony as a witness before the coroner, not charged nor under arrest, held not a "witness in his own behalf", under Code 1919, § 4781; following Mullins v. Com., 113 Va. 787, and distinguishing Kirby v. Com., 77 Va. 681; but here admitting the statement on the principle of § 2276, post).

Washington: 1895, State v. Hopkins, 13 Wash. 5, 42 Pac. 627 (testimony at a civil trial as then defendant, admitted); 1903, State v. Carpenter, 32 Wash. 254, 73 Pac. 357 (statements at the close of the preliminary examina-

No attempt is worth while to label in detail the exact variety of principle which a given ruling represents, because a comparison of it with the preceding discussion of the English cases will show where it stands (so far as that may be ascertainable). It will be noticed that, through the influence of the Selden theory, mere exculpative statements are often improperly treated as confessions; this fallacy has been already examined (ante, § 821).

The rulings in New York are of first importance, because the comparatively early promulgation there of the Selden theory in the Hendrickson and McMahon Cases, and its repudiation in the Teachout Case, greatly influenced the discussion in the other jurisdictions, in most of which the controversy is comparatively recent, — a further testimony, perhaps, to the unnaturalness and heterodoxy (shown also by the early English practice) of any controversy at all.

6. Existence of the Inducement (Subsequent Ending, etc.)

§ 853. General Principle. The exclusion of a confession necessarily assumes (1) that the inducement, if it operated at all, was likely to produce a false confession, and (2) that it did in fact operate upon the mind of the person. The question arising under the first of these elements — the nature of the inducement — having been examined, it remains to notice those arising under the second, — the existence and operation of the inducement. Where an inducement sufficient to exclude any confession obtained by it has been offered, the question often arises whether a confession subsequent in time to the inducement was in fact influenced by it.

tion as accused, admitted); 1904, State v. Washing, 38 Wash. 465, 78 Pac. 1019 (statement of defendant, an Indian, made before a magistrate on arraignment, without oath but without warning, admitted; compare the statute in this State, quoted ante, § 831; it does not seem to have produced its intended effect, in preventing further discussion of questions like the present one; this is seen also in the cases cited ante, § 851).

West Virginia: Code 1914, c. 152, § 20 (in criminal prosecution, except for perjury, evidence shall not be given against accused of "any statement made by him as a witness upon a legal examination"); 1893, State v. Hobbs, 37 W. Va. 812, 818, 17 S. E. 380 (statements to coroner before swearing witnesses, admitted); 1907, State v. May, 62 W. Va. 129, 57 S. E. 366 (under Code 1906, c. 152, § 20, a statement under oath made at a preliminary examination by a person charged but not under arrest is not admissible); 1911, State v. Cook, 69 W. Va. 717, 72 S. E. 1025 (Code 1906, c. 152, § 20, forbidding the use of an accused's statement made under examination, does not forbid cross-examination to such self-contradictory former statement of an accused taking the stand).

Wisconsin: 1854, Schoeffler v. State, 3 Wis. 823, 839 (examination before coroner as witness, while under suspicion, and without caution; admitted because voluntary; (1) the oath not excluding, (2) the suspicion not excluding, (3) the absence of a caution not excluding, because "ignorance of the law is no excuse"; (4) a possible exception reserved for a witness so circumstanced that his position was "equivalent to an actual arrest"; (5) examination on oath as accused before magistrate, conceded to be inadmissible); 1879, Dickerson v. State, 48 Wis. 288, 4 N. W. 321 (examination as witness before magistrate on a charge against another person, but while under arrest on suspicion of complicity; admitted, as voluntary); 1880, State v. Glass, 50 Wis. 218, 221, 6 N. W. 500 (voluntary examination on oath as accused before the magistrate; the privilege to refuse "removes from the testimony so given all element of compulsion"; good opinion by Lyon, J.); 1907, Anderson v. State, 133 Wis. 601, 114 N. W. 112 (on oath and under arrest before the coroner, without specific warning as to his privilege, admitted).

Wyoming: 1911, Maki v. State, 18 Wyo. 481, 112 Pac. 334 (under arrest on oath before the coroner, without warning, excluded).

It must be remembered that no attempt is ever made to investigate the actual motives of the person confessing, or the part played by the inducement among other motives. The whole theory of inducements rests on the probable effect, not the actual effect, upon the person. If while that inducement is held out a confession is made, no inquiry is ever made into the exact share of influence which the inducement had in evoking confession. Nevertheless, though there is no inquiry into the actuality of the operation of the inducement, and though it is assumed that if it was there it operated, we may often have to inquire whether in fact it was there at all, i.e. present to the mind of the person confessing.

There are two kinds of cases in which the question may be raised. In the one kind, the inquiry is: Did the inducement, for the person in hand, ever come into existence at all? In the other kind, the inquiry is: Was the inducement, for the person in hand, brought to an end before the confession was made?

§ 854. Did the Inducement come into Existence at all? Very few cases of the first sort are presented for decision. The inducement is almost always addressed to the person in question, and thus becomes known to him as a promise or a threat directly bearing on his situation. It was intended to be accepted by him, and no doubt arises as to its existence for him as an inducement. But where the inducement was not directly addressed to the person, but mediately through another person, how are we to determine whether it was in fact present as an inducement? This will of course be a pure question of fact for the judge, and no ruling can serve as a precedent; the conduct and language of the person will show whether he had the inducement in mind.

The important thing to note, however, is that unless the inducement was held out, directly or indirectly, to the person in question, it cannot exclude the confession; in such a case that person has himself chosen to allow it to affect him, and to hope that it will be applied to him by the promisor, and thus he is himself responsible by free choice for its effect, and not the promising person, who cannot be said to have held out any inducement to him.[1]

§ 854. [1] The case is that of a person who hears of a fellow-prisoner being offered an inducement and conceives the hope that it will be applied to him also; this would not exclude the confession; 1849, R. v. Jacobs, 4 Cox Cr. 54. So also a promise to set free if a certain crime is confessed would not exclude the ensuing confession of a different crime: 1876, State v. Fortner, 43 Ia. 495.

It is obvious that this is an artificial limitation, for if an inducement really calculated to educe a false confession had operated, the confession would be untrustworthy, and it would be unreasonable to trust it simply because the person was not justified in assuming that he would benefit by it. For example, in Shifflet's Case (ante, § 840), if the accused really thought to save his mother's life by a false confession, it ought to be immaterial whether the authorities promised it or whether he conceived the hope of his own motion. Nevertheless, so absurd are most of the rulings about improper inducements that any limitation, however artificial and unreasoning, is welcome. But the doctrine has never been applied to those inducements which employ threats of immediate violence to procure a confession, — as where a mob has hung a fellow-prisoner and the confession is made in the fear of similar treatment, or where a fellow-slave has been whipped and similar treatment seems impending; see the cases ante, § 833.

§ 855. Was the Inducement brought to an End? Here five questions may arise. (1) Must it be shown clearly that an improper inducement, once offered, was brought to an end? (2) Are there any situations in which this showing will be regarded as impossible, and thus the inducement, once made, vitiates any future confession of that person? (3) Can the same person who has offered the inducement possibly put an end to it so as to make admissible a confession afterwards made to himself? (4) Are confessions made subsequently, but to a person different from the one offering the inducement, to be treated as not made under the inducement, or must it be shown to have been negatived by the second person? (5) What suffices, in general, to end an inducement?[1]

§ 855. [1] The following cases include those under all five heads. The way in which the circumstances of each case affect the answers to the last two questions is illustrated in the English rulings that follow; a brief outline of their facts has been given, as they are so frequently cited. But it would be unprofitable and it has not been attempted here even to summarize the facts in the American rulings; they illustrate chiefly the last two questions:

ENGLAND: 1797, Carty's Trial (Ire.), 26 How. St. Tr. 889 (confession to one person after an inducement by another; held a question of fact, on the circumstances, whether it has operated); 1800, R. v. Bell, McNally Evidence, 43 (made to one magistrate, after menaces and promises by another; excluded); 1823, R. v. Tyler, 1 C. & P. 129 (hopes by an unauthorized bystander; subsequent confession to a constable; admitted); 1830, R. v. Clewes, 4 C. & P. 223 (caution by a coroner after hopes held out by a magistrate; admitted); 1832, R. v. Richards, 5 C. & P. 318 (a promise not to arrest; after arrest, the inducement held to have been destroyed by necessary implication; admitted); 1833, R. v. Cooper, 5 C. & P. 535 (a magistrate used improper inducements and next day a confession was made to the turnkey, who had given no caution; excluded); 1834, R. v. Howes, 6 C. & P. 404 (a constable promised acquittal, but the magistrate afterwards warned him a confession would do him no good; admitted); 1834, R. v. Bryan, Jebb Cr. C. 157 (magistrate's caution sufficient on the facts); 1838, R. v. Sherrington, 2 Lew. Cr. C. 123 (inducement by master; constable's caution not sufficient on the facts); 1841, Berigan's Case, 1 Ir. Circ. R. 177, 182 (caution by magistrate deemed sufficient in fact to dispel previous hopes); 1842, R. v. Hewett, C. & M. 534 (inducement by prosecutrix, not removed by constable at interview two days later); 1843, R. v. Hornbrook, 1 Cox Cr. 54; 1846, R. v. Horner, ib. 364 (inducement by a constable, removed by magistrate's caution); 1848, R. v. Collier, 3 Cox Cr. 57 (to the same person, but after a caution intervening; admitted); 1862, R. v. Cheverton, 2 F. & F. 833 (admitted on the facts; made to one police officer after improper inducement by another).

It should be added that, under the statute of 11 & 12 Vict. (quoted ante, § 849), the second caution there provided for is properly treated as in itself and invariably sufficient to end any previous improper inducement and render it immaterial to affect the confession thereafter made to the magistrate: R. v. Sansome, 4 Cox Cr. 206, Alderson, B.; 1850, R. v. Bond, 4 Cox Cr. 235, 238, Alderson, B.; 1871, R. v. Bate, 11 Cox Cr. 686, Smith, J.

CANADA: 1901, R. v. Lai Ping, 11 Br. C. 102 (confession in jail; the caution by the magistrate, held to remove a prior inducement); 1905, R. v. Young, 38 N. Sc. 427 (elaborate opinions, analyzing the precedents).

UNITED STATES: Alabama: 1854, Wyatt v. State, 25 Ala. 12 (slave); 1858, Bole v. State, 32 Ala. 566 (slave); 1850, Mose v. State, 36 Ala. 311, 226 (slave); 1875, Levison v. State, 54 Ala. 525; 1876, Porter v. State, 55 Ala. 101; 1881, Redd v. State, 69 Ala. 260; 1920, Kinsey v. State, 204 Ala. 180, 85 So. 519 (confession excluded, where a threat of violence by S. applied at the time of confessing to R.); 1920, Andrews v. State, 17 Ala. App. 456, 85 So. 840 (inducements here done away with); 1920, Carr v. State, 17 Ala. App. 539, 85 So. 852 (subsequent proof of corpus delicti here curing the error); Arkansas: 1901, Williams v. State, 69 Ark. 599, 65 S. W. 103; Colorado: 1873, Beery v. U. S., 2 Colo. 203; 1905, Andrews v. People, 33 Colo. 193, 79 Pac. 1031 (Beery v. U. S. not cited); Connecticut: 1846, State v. Potter, 18 Conn. 177; 1898, State v. Willis, 71 Conn. 293, 41 Atl. 820 (confession to second officer unconditionally, after inducement by first, admitted); Georgia: 1905, Griner v. State, 121 Ga. 614, 49 S. E. 700; 1905, Milner v. State, 124 Ga. 86, 52 S. E. 302; Illinois: 1895, Dunne v. Park Com'rs, 159 Ill. 60, 42 N. E. 375 (a written confession of the district attorney under promise of release was not satisfactory to him, and the accused subsequently made another oral one to him; excluded); Iowa: 1907, State v.

(1) The first of these questions has always been answered affirmatively; the general principle is universally conceded that the subsequent ending of an improper inducement must be shown; i.e. it is assumed to have continued until the contrary is shown.

(2) There is nothing permanently irrevocable in an improper inducement; whether it has been brought to an end is, as all concede, always open to inquiry.

(3) Yet it seems never to have been decided specifically whether the same person may thus put an end to an inducement of his own creating. There is no reason why he cannot.

(4) There is on principle no reason for assuming that a promise or a threat made by one person will be treated by the accused as equally to be attributed to some other person who has had no share in the other's conduct and shows no power or inclination to corroborate his promise or threat. Nevertheless, the inducement may on the facts prove to be in effect the second person's as much as the first one's. It should thus be a question to be determined in each case; no general rule can be laid down.

(5) The circumstances which make it clear that the inducement had been entirely negatived must of course vary with the facts of each case. It is, in the words of an English judge "merely a question of degree." It is impossible to lay down a general rule, and it is useless to employ individual rulings as precedents.

7. Confirmation by Subsequent Facts, as Curing the Defect

§ 856. General Principle. It has already been noticed (ante, § 822) that the fundamental theory upon which confessions become inadmissible is that when made under certain conditions they are untrustworthy as testimonial utterances. A very slight probability of untruth, to be sure, is sufficient to exclude (a probability much less than that which supports other testimonial exclusions), and the tests worked out are often more or less artificial; but this principle underlies the whole body of rules. If now a circumstance appears which indicates that the law's fear of untrustworthiness is unfounded, and counteracts the significance of the improper inducement by demonstrating that after all it exercised no sinister influence, the confession should be adopted.

This is the theory of Confirmation by Subsequent Facts, which has been in vogue ever since there has been any doctrine about excluding confessions. That theory is that where, in consequence of a confession otherwise inadmissible, search is made and facts are discovered which confirm it in material points, the possible influence which through caution had been attributed to the improper inducement is seen to have been nil, and the confession may be accepted without hesitation.[1]

This theory has always been accepted, at least in the abstract:

1780, Mr. Leach, Crown Law, 3d ed., I, 301, note: "But it should seem, that so much of the confession as relates strictly to the fact discovered by it may be given in evidence; for the reason of rejecting extorted confessions is the apprehension that the prisoner may have been thereby induced to say what is false; but the fact discovered shows that so much of the confession as immediately relates to it is true."

1803, Serjeant East, Pleas of the Crown, II, 657: "This [finding of the stolen goods as described], it is said, does away the reason upon which the general rule that confessions so improperly obtained cannot be received in evidence is founded; because the reason being to guard against the possibility of an innocent person being from weakness seduced to accuse himself in hopes of obtaining thereby more favour or for fear of meeting with worse punishment, that reason is done away if such confession be substantiated by an actual finding of the goods accordingly in the place described, which could not probably be known to the party if he were not privy to the felony."

1847, R. v. Garbett, 2 C. & K. 490; Mr. Martin, for the prosecution: "Even in those cases [of improper confessions] the confession of a theft is received if the property be found in consequence." DENMAN, L. C. J.: "Because it leads to the inference that the party was not accusing himself falsely."

1852, WITHERS, J., in State v. Vaigneur, 5 Rich. L. 404: "So much of such confession as relates strictly to the fact may be received in evidence, and this is on the principle that so much of the confession is established to be true; and the foundation of the whole doctrine is that the jury ought to hear whatever is true, and are entitled to look for truth through any and every medium that may be calculated to reveal it."

§ 856. [1] A subsequent confirmation by the accused's own acknowledgment of the correctness of the confession should also relieve from any inquiry into the influence of the inducement, or into the voluntariness in general of the confession: 1906, State v. Johnny, 29 Nev. 203, 87 Pac. 3; 1922, Parker v. State, —Tex. Cr. —, 238 S. W. 943 (citing the above text with approval, per Lattimore, J.).

§ 857. Admission of the Part Confirmed, or of the Whole? It will be observed that, in Mr. Leach's phrase, "so much of the confession as relates strictly to the fact discovered by it" is to be received; in other words, the confirmation admits the part confirmed, and that only. Now this falls something short of the logic of the case; for a confirmation on material points produces ample persuasion of the trustworthiness of the whole. It can hardly be supposed that at certain parts the possible fiction stopped and the truth began, and that by a marvellous coincidence the truthful parts are exactly those which a subsequent search (more or less controlled by chance) happened to confirm. Such a differentiation is purely artificial, and corresponds to no actual mental processes, either of the confessor or of the hearer. If we are to cease distrusting any part, we should cease distrusting all.

This logical and common-sense result is accepted by a few Courts, though it is not clear how far they would carry it in a given case.[1]

Other Courts follow Mr. Leach's limitation and admit that part only to which the confirming facts directly relate;[2] but as in most of these instances the inquiry relates to a larceny, there is little practical difference in the result, since the admission of that part relating to the stealing is the admission of the substantial part of the confession.

§ 858. Prevailing Doctrine; No Part of the Confession received, but only the fact of Discovery in consequence of Accused's Information. But the sound result more or less fully accepted by the foregoing Courts (representing a majority in this country) was not that of the English courts. The original practice (while able to produce such clear expositions of the theory as Mr. Leach's and Serjeant East's) stopped short of allowing any part of the confession, as such, to be received. The confession, i.e. the expressed avowal of the accused's acts, was entirely excluded;[1] and only this much effect was given indirectly to the underlying principle, namely, it could be shown that certain facts had been discovered by a search made in consequence of a statement made (or "something said" or "information given") by the accused. No principle appears ever to have been offered to justify or to explain this distinction; but it became the settled law of England, and was followed without question in some of our own jurisdictions.[2]

There is however apparently an explanation for it. In the case of a confession of stealing goods and their subsequent discovery as described (almost the only situation over which this question arises), there is just one hypothesis on which the jury may stop short of believing the confession after this confirmation, namely, the accused may know of the stealing and of the place of hiding, but he may still not be the thief. Now we may determine to ignore the improbability of the latter consequence, but we cannot ignore the former. That his confession of stealing is true may be hard to avoid, but that he knew where the stolen goods were (and must have been in some way "privy to the felony", in Serjeant East's phrase) is impossible to avoid. We shall admit, then, what as rational beings we are obliged to admit, but we shall stubbornly draw the line there; that seems to be the rationale of the above distinction. The result is, that so far as the discovery shows that the person knew where the stolen goods were, we are to hear about it; but we are to hear nothing more.

Now, in thus accepting whatever bears on his knowledge, the line becomes hard to draw. There may be several places to draw it. (1) The law may admit merely the fact that the discovery was made, and that it was made in consequence of a statement by that person.[3] Or (2) it may go further and admit the details of the accused's conduct in that he went to the place and pointed out the goods, etc.[4] Or (3) it may go still further and admit the words of his statement describing the property and the place, exhibiting as they do a detailed knowledge on his part, and yet falling short of a confession of the stealing.[5] All these show knowledge and only knowledge.

The distinction, then, while it is artificial and against common sense, has at least a certain intelligibility beneath it. But its weakness is well exposed in the following opinion:

1873, WELLS, J., in Beery v. U. S., 2 Colo. 211: "If the exclusion of the confession rests altogether upon the probability that the confession is untrue, as we have seen, then, if the prosecution produce evidence tending to show and sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that it is true, it ought to be received, for in such case the reason of the exclusion is done away. All the Courts recognize the propriety of this reasoning, but illogically decline to pursue it to its legitimate results. If one accused of larceny, being put to torture, confess the crime and produce the goods from his own possession or disclose the place of their concealment, and they are afterward found in the place indicated, you may, it is agreed, give in evidence the fact of the finding of the goods conformably to information given by the prisoner; but you may not in the same case, according to the received doctrine, give in evidence the prisoner's statement that he deposited the goods in the place where they were found, or that he stole them. . . . But, I assert, in the case supposed the finding of the goods at the place indicated not only tends to corroborate the declaration of the prisoner that they will be found there, but also his declaration that he stole them and concealed them at that place, if he make this statement. . . . In other words, the received doctrine involves this absurdity, that while, in passing upon the primary question whether the evidence shall be received, the Court notwithstanding the corroborating circumstances shall find the confession probably untrue and therefore exclude it, the jury, considering the same evidence [that the place of concealment was disclosed by him], may find the very fact confessed to be absolutely true."

§ 859. Discovered Facts themselves always admissible. It was once contended that the impropriety of the inducement to the confession tainted the facts discovered in consequence of it, and that they also, as well as the confession, should remain inadmissible. Such a doctrine needs only to be stated to expose its equal lack of logic, principle, and expediency. It was fortunately repudiated at the outset in an opinion which leaves nothing to be said:[1]

1783, Warickshall's Case, 1 Leach Cr. L., 3d ed., 298; a confession of stealing had been made, and in consequence of it the property was found concealed in the lodgings of the accused; but the confession itself was otherwise inadmissible; "it was contended by her counsel that as the fact of finding the stolen property in her custody had been obtained through the means of an inadmissible confession, the proof of that fact ought also to be rejected", as obtained by a breach of faith; the Court, NARES, J., and EYRE, B. (after the passage quoted ante, § 823): "This principle respecting confessions has no application whatever as to the admission or rejection of facts, whether the knowledge of them be obtained in consequence of an extorted confession or whether it arises from any other source; for a fact, if it exist at all, must exist invariably in the same manner, whether the confession from which it is derived be in other respects true or false. Facts thus obtained, however, must be fully and satisfactorily proved without calling in the aid of any part of the confession from which they may have been derived; and the impossibility of admitting any part of the confession as a proof of the fact clearly shows that the fact may be admitted on other evidence; for as no part of an improper confession can be heard, it can never be legally known whether the fact was derived through the means of such confession or not."

8. Other Principles applied to Confessions

§ 860. Burden of Proof; Must the Prosecution show that no Improper Inducement existed? Looking at the general principles of Admissibility (ante, § 484) and the comparative rarity of untrustworthy confessions, as well as the contingent nature of the dangers supposed to flow from improper inducements, the more practical rule would be to receive confessions without question, unless they are shown to have been improperly induced, — especially since a contrary rule may involve the difficulty of proving a negative. On this question five distinguishable attitudes are found represented in the rulings.

(1) The original English rule was that the prosecution (offering the confession) must show that it was made voluntarily, i.e. without any improper inducement from the person receiving the confession; and this rule is accepted in most American jurisdictions.[1]

But in any case the trial Court may properly be presumed to have found the necessary preliminary facts until the opposite is shown in the record: 1905, Whatley v. State, 144 Ala. 68, 39 So. 1014.

(2) The English judges occasionally went still further, with a rule that where the accused had been in charge of a person in authority other than the one to whom the confession was made, the prosecution must show the absence of an inducement from the former as well as from the latter.[2]

(3) The view has also found representatives that the prosecution must, not merely in the above circumstances, but in all cases, show the absence of an inducement from any one else and not merely from the person receiving the confession.[3] This is an absurd extreme.

(4) A few jurisdictions regard the confession as 'prima facie' admissible, and require the defendant to show that the alleged improper inducement existed.[4] This is the practical and natural rule; for if there is any reason to object to the confession, no one can know it better than the defendant.—Of course, he should be admitted to testify to this question of fact preliminary to the Court's ruling, without waiving his privilege.

(5) A modern English ruling takes a middle path, and seems to receive the confession unless attacked by evidence of an improper inducement, and then in case of doubt leaves upon the prosecution the burden of convincing the Court of the admissibility.[5]

§ 861. Judge and Jury; Whether the Confession is Voluntary, is a question for the Judge. The admissibility of the confession, as affected by the foregoing rules, is a question for the judge, on elementary principles defining the functions of judge and jury:[1]

1881, HAMMOND, J., in U. S. v. Stone, 8 Fed. R. 256 (naming, as the excluding facts, the nature of the threat or promise, and the authority of the person confessed to): "The elements entering into the preliminary inquiry by the judge are [the foregoing]. Both these questions being answered in the affirmative, the evidence is excluded as a matter of law, the judge trying the facts as in other cases of mixed questions of law or fact; but either being answered in the negative, the evidence goes to the jury, and thereupon they try this as they do all the other facts of the case, giving such weight to the confession as they see fit. All evidence of confessions does not pass through this ordeal of trial by the judge, except to determine whether it belongs to the one class or the other."

1895, COLEMAN, J., in Burton v. State, 107 Ala. 108, 18 So. 285: "Whether voluntarily made or not, we hold, is a question of law, to be determined by the Court from the facts, as a condition precedent to their admission. Having been declared competent and admissible, they are before the jury for consideration. The jury have no authority to reject them as incompetent. But the jury are the sole judges of the truth and weight to be given confessions, as they are of any other fact. In weighing the confessions, the jury must take into consideration all the circumstances surrounding them, and under which they were made, including those under which the Court declared, as matter of law, they were voluntary. In weighing confessions, the jury necessarily consider those facts upon which their admissibility, as having been voluntarily made, depends. While there is no power in the jury to reject the confessions, as being incompetent, there is no power in the Court to control the jury in the weight to be given to facts. The jury may, therefore, in the exercise of their authority, and within their province, determine that the confessions are untrue, or not entitled to any weight, upon the grounds that they were not voluntarily made. The Court passes upon the facts merely for the purpose of determining their competency and admissibility. The jury pass upon the same facts, and in connection with other facts, if there are other facts, in determining whether the confessions are true, and entitled to any, and how much weight. The Court and jury each have a well-defined and separate province. It follows that, although the jury may come to the conclusion that the confessions were not voluntary, yet if, from extrinsic evidence, or from their character and the circumstances, the jury are satisfied that they are true, the jury should act upon them. The statement in the opinion of the case of Goodwin v. State, that it is the 'duty' of the jury to discard and reject the confessions altogether, if they are of opinion that the confessions were not voluntarily made, although they may believe them to be true, is herein modified in so far as it conflicts with the opinion in the present case. Charge 67 requested by defendant is not full enough. The jury consider whether confessions were voluntary, in passing upon their weight, but the jury is not authorized to determine their admissibility. The charge was calculated to mislead. Charge 68 was properly refused, as invading the province of the jury. It required the jury to reject the confessions absolutely, if, in their opinion, they were not voluntarily made. It was their duty to consider them, and their province to give them such weight as they saw proper."

This orthodox principle is well recognized in the majority of jurisdictions.[2]

But in comparatively recent times the heresy of leaving the question to the jury has made rapid strides. To say that it is a question for the jury may mean one of two things. It may mean that the confession goes in any case to the jury to accept or to reject or to give such weight as the jury chooses; this practically abolishes all the foregoing limitations, and would be in this aspect a desirable rule. But it may and commonly does mean that the jury may be allowed to measure it by the foregoing legal tests, and to reject it as a judge would if the tests are not fulfilled. This is decidedly improper; first, because it makes abject surrender of the fixed principle (ante, § 12, post, §§ 487, 2550) that all questions of admissibility are questions of law for the judge only; secondly, because, in particular, the confession-rules are artificial, based on average probabilities or possibilities only, and do not attempt to measure the ultimate value of a given confession, and the tribunal which is to weigh all evidence finally ought not to be artificially hampered by them; thirdly, because the jury is not familiar enough with them to attempt to employ them. Nevertheless, many Courts to-day hold that, after the judge has applied the rules and admitted the confession, the jury are to apply them again, and by that test may reject it.[3] This unpractical heresy fails to appreciate the elementary canon of admissibility, and in that aspect its judicial extension has been a discouraging circumstance.

In determining admissibility:

(1) The judge must hear the defendant's evidence (including evidence from cross-examination of the prosecution's witnesses) upon the issue of voluntariness;[4] although under the heterodox rule this could logically be dispensed with;[5]

(2) The jury, during the hearing of this evidence, may be withdrawn,[6] as is proper during all proof and arguments upon questions of admissibility (post, § 1808);

(3) But, when a confession is ruled to be admissible, the same evidence and all other circumstances affecting the weight of the confession may be introduced for the jury's ultimate consideration.[7]

§ 862. Discretion of the Trial Judge. No plain tendency has appeared, in this department of the law, to leave anything to the final determination of the trial judge (ante, § 16). Although that policy is worthy to be favored, in a few instances only have the Courts of appeal really carried out their nominal adherence to it by refusing to review the trial Court's determination.[1]

But, as with all evidential material, other principles not peculiar to confessions occasionally come into play:

(1) How far all parts of the confession may be or must be used involves the general principle of Completeness (post, §§ 2097, 2115).

(2) How far mere silence when charged, or other conduct not employing words, amounts to a confession, involves a general principle of Admissions (post, § 1071).

(3) When a confession is reduced to writing before a magistrate, the question arises whether the written report of the magistrate is to be the exclusive testimonial proof of the confession (post, §§ 1326, 1349).

(4) In the same situation, the proof of the execution of the writing is often provided for by a statutory method, as in the case of many other writings, and involves the principles of Authentication (post, §§ 1667, 2164).

(5) Why the confession of a third person is not admissible as a Declaration

9. Status of the Doctrine of Confessions

§ 865. Explanation of Sentimental Excesses in the Law of Confessions. That absurdities have disfigured the law of the admissibility of confessions, that the excessive caution in listening to them has given an appearance of sentimental irrationality to the law and has obstructed the administration of justice, cannot be denied, and has often been conceded by judges. "I confess," said Baron Parke,[1] "that I cannot look at the decisions without some shame when I consider what objections have prevailed to prevent the reception of confessions in evidence; and I agree with the observation of Mr. Pitt Taylor, that the rule has been extended quite too far, and that justice and common sense have been too frequently sacrificed at the shrine of mercy"; and Mr. J. Erle added: "I am much inclined to agree with Mr. Pitt Taylor; and, according to my judgment, in many cases where confessions have been excluded, justice and common sense have been sacrificed, not at the shrine of mercy, but at the shrine of guilt."

In the middle of the 1800s the perversion of normal reasoning had gone so far that counsel were able to advance seriously the argument that "the law assumes that a man may falsely accuse himself upon the slightest inducement."[2] No limits were fixed to the apparent influence of this attitude; and it even came to be urged that an accused person should be dissuaded from confessing, so that this notion had to be rebuked from the bench.[3] The spirit that thus tended to prevail in the law has been properly described "as a weak sentimentalism towards criminals",[4] and it assuredly had un-

[3] Gurney, B., in R. v. Green, 5 C. & P. 312 (1832): "He ought not to be dissuaded from making a perfectly voluntary confession, because that is shutting up one of the sources of justice."

The artificiality developed under this judicial attitude is illustrated by the instance of a British constable, who when asked at the trial whether the prisoner had not made a statement, replied, "No; he was beginning to do so; but I knew my duty better, and I prevented him" (Forsyth, Hortensius the Advocate, 3d ed., 292). See the quotation and the rulings ante, § 847.

fortunate results. But no policy and no institution is without its reasons and its explanation; and before we can understand how to deal with this spirit in our law and what to expect of it in the future, we must ask what the explanation of its existence was.

(1) A first reason certainly was the character of person usually brought before the judges on charges of crime. In all countries having the social cleavages and the feudal survivals of England in the 1700s and early 1800s, the offenders against the criminal law come in the far greater proportion from what are known as the "lower classes." This was especially the case (down to the era of the Reform Bill, when nearly two hundred capital crimes were swept from the statute-book) at the time when the great multitude of grave offences involved merely those petty forms of property-crime which may be the natural result of only hopeless poverty and not necessarily of an abandoned life or a professional profligacy. Furthermore, the same social cleavage is also accompanied, in all countries, with a subordination, a submission, half-respectful and half-stupid, on the part of the "lower classes" towards those in authority, — an attitude especially marked, though not solely found, among the peasantry and towards the squires and other landed superiors on whose will hangs the tenant's fortune. The situation of such a peasant charged by his landlord with poaching and urged to confess, the situation of the maid urged and threatened by her mistress to confess a petty theft, involves a mental condition to which we may well hesitate to apply the test of a rational principle. We may believe that rationally a false confession is not to be apprehended from the normal person under certain paltry inducements or meaningless threats; but we have here perhaps a person not to be tested by a normal or rational standard.[5] It is useless to attempt to measure 'a priori' what allowance should be made; and we do not find that the law ever did make any exact allowance explicitly based on such a consideration. But if we put ourselves in the place of those judges (at the end of the 1700s, when a motive of decency and humanity in the criminal law began to be felt), we may easily understand that, as they found before them in the ordinary case persons of the above sort, one of the first suggestions of these new notions would be to refuse great weight to the utterances of such persons made under the influence of their social superiors.

This, then, was certainly one of the reasons why, in one way or another, on principle or without principle, many judges came to set themselves against the use of confessions, and to exclude them on pretexts which were in themselves trifling and irrational but in fact represented a fixed judicial sentiment. It is not easy for us, to-day, and in most parts of this country, to realize this attitude; but it had a very real influence.

(2) Another reason is found in the absence at that time of the right of appeal in criminal cases, and the practical creation of the law of confessions by isolated judges at Nisi Prius without consultation and on independent responsibility. In order to solve any doubts which might arise in his mind, the Nisi Prius judge was obliged to consult casually-accessible colleagues or to reserve the question for a meeting of all the judges; and the natural disinclination to such a delay, to becoming the source of trouble to his professional associates, and to bringing perhaps upon himself the reflection of having had unnecessary doubts, made this course always a disagreeable one and a last resort.[6] The result was that the judges commonly preferred to eliminate the questionable evidence altogether, to try the case on whatever other evidence could be mustered, and to solve all questions that were even arguable (whether the judge himself had doubts or not) in favor of the accused.[7] As the exact distinction was not always preserved between rejecting a confession because it was clearly inadmissible and rejecting it merely because a possible objection existed, the law of confessions came to be built up out of rulings which were strictly not precedents at all, but merely expressions of the cautious attitude of a careful Nisi Prius judge, and not fitted to be taken as precedents. That this was their true place may be seen by a comparison of the Nisi Prius rulings with the full-bench decisions; for the leading judgments of the full bench — in such cases as Gibney's, Moore's, Wheater's, Scott's, Baldry's — are precisely those in which rational principles are most clearly supported and the narrow hesitation of the Nisi Prius rulings repudiated and their tendency from time to time checked. To the natural influence, then, of the badly-constructed system of judicial organization we must attribute much of the apparent irrationality that disfigured the law of confessions.

(3) A third reason, and one amply sufficient in itself to account for the narrowness of confession rulings, and for much besides, was the extraordinary handicap placed upon the accused at common law in the shape of his inability either to testify for himself or to have counsel to defend him. The right to have the aid of counsel was not granted as a general one until 1836;[8] and although as early as 1750 it had become customary to allow counsel to cross-examine for the accused and to do everything but address the jury,[9] this custom was by no means unbroken and fell far short in efficiency of being equivalent to a right. The competency to testify on his own behalf was for long withheld from the accused person;[10] and the unsworn address to the jury, which he was allowed to make, was very different from the right to testify in his own behalf, and was probably not of great consequence as furnishing testimonial material.[11] In view of the apparent unfairness of a system which practically told the accused person, "You cannot be trusted to speak here or elsewhere in your own behalf, but we shall use against you whatever you may have said", it was entirely natural that the judges should employ the only makeweight which existed for mitigating this unfairness and restoring the balance, namely, the doctrine of confessions.

[6] There are twenty reported Nisi Prius rulings on confessions for every full-bench decision. Nor did the creation of the Court for Crown Cases (in 1865) much improve matters, for it contained less than half (five) of all the judges (so that its authority was not representative), and the reservations of questions for it do not seem to have been more frequent.

[7] Said Baron Parke, in 1852, commenting on the state of the law, in R. v. Baldry (2 Den. Cr. C. 436): "We all know how it occurred. Every judge decided by himself upon the admissibility of the confession, and he did not like to press against the prisoner, and took the merciful view of it."

They tried to restore the balance by excluding confessions upon every available pretext. There was a definite doctrine which legitimately applied to confessions and might rationally exclude them in certain rare cases, and on this doctrine the judges inclined to lay violent hands, and to use it as a weapon for that general exclusion which commended itself to their sense of fairness. In itself, however, it had very narrow limits, utterly insufficient to accomplish the purposes which fairness dictated; and the result was that, while the purpose was a good one, it overbore the principle, which was thus wrested beyond its legitimate use. Hence an irreconcilable conflict between the normal and accepted theory or principle for excluding confessions, and the abnormal use practically made of it for ulterior purposes. Damage was done to legal principle; but fortunately not damage so serious that it cannot be cured, now that the conditions leading to it have in part at least disappeared.

In view of these considerations, it is easy to see why the law of Confessions came to develop what seem to us, in another community and in other times, absurd and dangerous sentimentalities, and why there is no necessity whatever for our retention of the distortions and irrational excrescences which, as handed down to us in the English rulings of the early 1800s, have served to obscure the correct and entirely rational principle of exclusion applicable to confessions.

No one of these three considerations above pointed out applies to our conditions. The spirit of the community, whether we choose to call it by the name of Liberty or by the name of Anarchy (and it has certainly the evil as well as the good savor), is a spirit of fearlessness of superior social and political power; of restiveness and struggling against bonds, not of orderly submission; of bold (if superficial) readiness to claim "rights", not of ignorant surrender to demands; and, in general, of keen appreciation of the possibilities of evading justice, rather than of cowed obedience to any authority however oppressive. Furthermore, the power of revision of confession-law on appeal to the higher tribunal is universal. Finally, the accused person may everywhere testify for himself, and has the fullest assistance of a bar not remarkable for its scrupulousness in criminal cases. All those circumstances are thus wanting which explain and excuse the unnatural development of the law of confessions in the hands of the English judges of a past generation. There is for us no such explanation and no such excuse. The perpetuation today of the Nisi Prius doctrines of the first part of the [11] Compare § 579, ante.

1800s is now nothing but sentimentalism, a false tenderness to guilty ones, and an unnecessary deviation from principle.[12]

The orthodox principle, that a confession may be excluded when the inducement was such as probably to produce an untrue confession, is amply fair and cautious, and should be applied in its original and pure form.

§ 866. Value of Confessions; Explanation of Conflicting Opinions. But, it may be asked, even after eliminating all these explanatory considerations of an extrinsic nature, are there not, after all, inherent weaknesses in confessions, even under the most favorable social and legal conditions, which should induce their exclusion on grounds of caution? If not, how do we account for the repeated utterances of the best authorities pointing out the dangerousness of accepting confessions and urging great caution? Does not this opinion count for something?

It is true that there exists a decided conflict of opinion, at first sight inexplicable, as to the evidential value of confessions. On the one hand, we find writers and judges of wide experience affirming the slender value of confessions and urging the greatest caution in their use;[1] some of these declarations, however, being merely the reproduction of a classical predecessor's language.[2] On the other hand, we find persons of equal authority offering, in equally positive and unqualified language, that confessions are the highest kind of evidence.[3] There must be some key to this conflict. How plausible each side of the controversy is, and how forcible the impression its influence may produce for the moment, appears when we see the same judge — Sir William Scott (Lord Stowell) — in almost the same year expressing opinions diametrically opposed.[4] [12] The most notable example, of course, of this unreasonable perpetuation, in modern times of these inappropriate doctrines, is the Federal case of Bram v. U. S., 168 U. S. 532, 18 Sup. 183.

§ 866. [1] E.g. Foster, High Treason, c. III, sect. 8 ("Hasty confessions, made to persons having no authority to examine, are the weakest and most suspicious of all evidence"); Burn, Justice of the Peace, I, 566, quoted in Joy, Confessions ("Magistrates cannot be too cautious in receiving confessions, as they very rarely flow from a conscientious desire to offer reparation for the injury committed, but are generally made either under an implied or express promise of favour, if not extorted by threat or through fear"; Chetwynd, Supplement to above: "This kind of evidence I have always found, in the words of that truly learned judge, Sir Michael Foster, to be the most suspicious of all testimony"); Sir William Scott, in Williams v. Williams, 1 Hagg. Cons. 304 ("The court must remember that confession is a species of evidence which, though not inadmissible, is regarded with great distrust. There is a canon particularly pointed against them, which says, 'Nec partium confessioni fides habeatur'").

Cons. 315 ("I need not observe that confession generally ranks high, or I should say, highest in the scale of evidence. 'Habemus confitentem reum' is demonstration; unless indirect motives can be assigned to it"); Starkie, Evidence, I, 52 ("One of the surest proofs of guilt"); Nott, J., in Columbia v. Harrison, 2 Mills Const. 215 ("A voluntary confession is in most cases the highest evidence that can be given"); Swift, Evidence, 133 ("the most conclusive evidence"); so, also, Harlan, J., in Hopt v. Utah, 110 U. S. 584, 4 Sup. 202; Putnam, J., in 9 Pick. Mass. 507; Rothrock, C. J., in 48 Ia. 384.

[4] In Johnson v. People, 197 Ill. 48, 64 N. E. 286 (1902), is an example of the confusion which arises from an indiscriminate mingling of these two generalities in instructions to a jury.

Of course a partial explanation is — as Mr. Joy has observed [5] — that confessions vary in value according to the circumstances in which they are made. Some are clearly trustworthy; others are worthless. Much depends upon the mental and emotional traits of the accused; and the many grades of defectiveness would bear upon the confessions value. This will account for the hasty indignation or the favorable comment which a judge might express in general terms when he had in mind only the concrete instance of weak or strong evidence that happened to be before him. But it hardly explains the constant use of general terms of satisfaction or disapproval by the representatives of both views.

The real explanation lies in the mixture of good and bad qualities likely to be present in all attempts to use confessions. We must separate (1) the confession as a proved fact, from (2) the process of proving an alleged confession.

(1) Now, assuming the making of a confession to be a completely proved fact — its authenticity beyond question and conceded, — then it is certainly true that we have before us the highest sort of evidence. The confession of a crime is usually as much against a man's permanent interests as anything well can be; and, in Mr. Starkie's phrase, no innocent man can be supposed ordinarily to be willing to risk life, liberty, or property by a false confession. Assuming the confession as an undoubted fact, it carries a persuasion which nothing else does, because a fundamental instinct of human nature teaches each one of us its significance.

(2) But how do we get to believe in the fact of a confession having been made? Always and necessarily by somebody's testimony. And what is our experience of that sort of testimony on which we are asked to believe that a confession was made? A varying and sometimes discouraging experience. Paid informers, treacherous associates, angry victims, and overzealous officers of the law, — these are the persons through whom an alleged confession is oftenest presented; and it is at this stage that our suspicions are aroused and our caution stimulated. Suppose a judge is offered from the lips of a single witness a detailed and complete avowal of guilt, attributed to the accused, and suppose the accused denies absolutely the fact of confession; suppose the judge now to think to himself, "Here is a confession which, if authentic, would make this man's guilt clear beyond doubt. But do you expect us to take it as authentic, against his denial, on the word of this man alone, who has such and such strong motives for inventing it or for misinterpreting what was said? Must we not listen to him with the greatest doubt and suspicion?" Then, would it not be natural for the judge, in commenting on such evidence to the jury, to say: "What you have heard here from this man about a supposed confession is to be taken with caution;

[5] Joy, Confessions, 109: "It appears inaccurate to give all kinds of confessions the same confidence or to treat them alike with distrust. Like all other kinds of admissions, they admit of all shades of certainty and probability, from a solemn estoppel by matter of record to the slightest presumption arising from the most casual, suspicious, or doubtful expressions."

for that is the weakest and most suspicious kind of evidence." This is a natural and proper attitude, and it is precisely that of the authorities above quoted. They were thinking, not of the confession as evidence of the act, but of the testimony to the alleged confession. Take, for instance, the phrase above of Mr. Justice Foster's, which has been quoted again and again (with and without acknowledgment) in the records of the profession for a century and a half, in the mangled and misleading form that "confessions are the weakest and most suspicious of all evidence." Why did he so regard them? Not because of their own evidential weakness; but for the following reasons:

> "Proof may be too easily procured; words are often misreported — whether through ignorance, inattention, or malice, it mattereth not to the defendant, he is equally affected in either case; and they are extremely liable to misconstruction; and withal, this evidence is not in the ordinary course of things to be disproved by that sort of negative evidence by which the proof of plain facts may be and often is confronted."

In other words, the suspicion that he has found it necessary to entertain is directed entirely to the work of proving an alleged confession.

This is the reason above suggested as the real cause of the distrust; we are ready enough to trust the confession if there really was one, but we are going to doubt and suspect for a long time before we accept it as a fact.[6] Mr. J. Erle touched the kernel of the subject when he said:[7] "I am of opinion that when a confession is well proved, it is the best evidence that can be produced." Furthermore, it is precisely because the confession, if a fact, is so weighty and produces such a close approach to complete persuasion, that we are inclined to hesitate and demand the most satisfactory testimony before we accept that as a fact which, if believed, will practically render other evidence superfluous.

This seems to be the simple explanation of the apparently contradictory views; if we distinguish the confession as evidence from the evidence of the confession, we find that few have ever really doubted that the first is in itself of the highest value, while the second is always to be suspected.

The moral is that the proper course lies, not in distorting the legitimate principles of confession law, but in exacting more, in the way of quantity and quality, of the testimony by which alleged confessions are presented.[8]

§ 867. Future of the Doctrine. In conclusion, two considerations not often kept in mind must be emphasized.

In the first place, the only real danger and weakness in a confession — the danger of a false statement — is of a slender character, and the cases of that sort are of the rarest occurrence. No trustworthy figures of authenticated

[8] Whether an instruction should be given on the value of confessions is considered in the following cases: 1904, People v. Buckley, 143 Cal. 375, 77 Pac. 169; 1905, Griner v. State, 121 Ga. 614, 49 S. instances exist; but they are concededly few.[1] Now if it were a question of receiving the confession as conclusive, i.e. as equivalent to a plea of guilty, we might well prefer to be extremely cautious (as under the early traditional practice already described), and let the trial take its ordinary course. But as it is a mere matter of giving or not giving one more piece of evidence to the jury, as it is impossible to determine beforehand the real weight of any confession, and as the accused has ample opportunity of offering any facts affecting the weight of the confession, it is entirely unnecessary to bar out all confessions whatever by broad and artificial tests, merely on account of this slender and rare risk of falsity. To employ an anomalous occurrence as the basis of indiscriminate exclusion is not reasonable.[2] It is simply, in the language of

§ 867. [1] The following are the most notable in English and American annals:

England: 1660, Perry's Case, 14 How. St. Tr. 1312 (one of two brothers confessed that he, his brother, and his mother had murdered his master; they were executed, but two years afterward, the master returned home, and explained that he had been kidnapped and sold to the Turks; it was never understood why Perry falsely confessed); 1666, Hubert's Trial, 6 How. St. Tr. 807, 821 (Hubert voluntarily confessed that he had set the great fire in London Sept. 2, 1666, "yet neither the judges nor any present at the trial did believe him guilty, but that he was a poor distracted wretch weary of his life and chose to part with it in this way"); 1810 (?), Wood's Case, Life of Sir S. Romilly, ed. 1840, II, 188, 3d ed., II, 42 (court-martial for mutiny; here the accused "had applied to another man to write a defence for him, and he had read it, thinking it calculated to excite compassion"; the man was executed before the falsity was discovered); 1833, Sharpe's Case, Annual Register, Chronicle, p. 74 (murder in Chelsea; one Sharpe gave himself up for it, confessing his complicity; shortly afterwards he retracted it: "I made my confession through jealousy; some time ago three of my children died, and it preyed on my mind; and one night I gave myself up for murdering them, when it was all false; and on another occasion I gave myself up for a robbery"; this was confirmed; and as no other evidence of his connection with the murder was discovered, he was discharged from custody).

United States: 1819, Boorn's Case, Vt., Greenleaf, Evid., 15th ed., § 214 note, 10 North Amer. Review 418, 12 Amer. Crim. Rep. 221, and 15 id. 223, 6 Amer. St. Tr. 73 (confession of murder, made at the advice of friends, in the face of damaging evidence, and in the hope of a recommendation to mercy); 1846, Trailor's Case, 4 West. L. J. 25, Chicago, Daily Law Bull. Dec. 14, 1904; 1909, State v. Fanning, Shawnee Co., Kansas, Topeka "Capital", Nov. 16, 1909 (death of Mrs. Short by supposed poisoning; one Fanning confessed repeatedly to having poisoned her by arsenic, but the medical and chemical testimony showed this to be impossible, and indicated heart disease as the cause of death); 1914, Shellenberger v. State, 97 Nebr. 498, 150 N. W. 643 (a mania to confess heinous crimes).

For additional instances, mostly from foreign annals, see the citations of the following writers: Chitty, Criminal Law, I, 85; Wharton, Criminal Law, 315; Best, Evidence, §§ 559–572; Monck, "Confessions of the Innocent" (not accessible at this writing). Mr. J. F. Geeting has a note carefully collating the cases in his edition of American Criminal Reports, vol. 12, p. 213. Professor Hans Gross has a valuable chapter in his Criminal Psychology, § 8, p. 31 (transl. Kallen, in the Modern Criminal Science Series). Mr. W. M. Best's chapter, in his Principles of the Law of Evidence, §§ 560–573 (3d Amer. ed.), collects interesting data. The following titles also give purporting instances: E. B. [2] 1847, Ruffin, C. J., in State v. Cowan, 7 Ired. 246: "It is not sufficient to impugn the principle established by these cases that there have been instances in which men have charged themselves with offences which they did not commit or which had never been perpetrated; for that argument would destroy all confidence in evidence, circumstantial or direct, since by each human tribunals have been or may be misled. But the administration of justice cannot depend upon such nice possibilities. It may safely, and indeed must necessarily, proceed upon the common experience of men's motives of action and of the tests of truth. Now few things happen seldomer than that one in the possession of his understanding should of his own accord make a confession against himself which is not true. Innocence or weakness is Chief Justice Paxson already quoted, an exhibition of sentimentalism toward the guilty.

Again, the notion that confessions should be guarded against and discouraged is not a benefit to the innocent, but a detriment. A full statement of the accused person's explanations, made at the earliest moment, is often the best means for him of securing a speedy vindication.[3] The circumstances of suspicion may often be disposed of by a simple explanation, so clear and convincing that immediate release follows as a matter of course; while the clues which the innocent accused may be able to furnish will be equally serviceable in securing that evidence against the real culprit which a delay may frequently render unavailable. When the officers of justice find confessions indiscriminately discouraged and rebuked by the judge, the effect of an enforced silence on the part of accused persons is likely on the whole to be to the disadvantage of the innocent.

The policy of the future, then, should be to receive all well-proved confessions in evidence, and to leave them to the jury, subject to all discrediting circumstances, to receive such weight as may seem proper. The advent of a fourth stage in the history of confession-law may be thought to be indicated in the repeated protests, already quoted, against the excesses of the bygone practice.[4] therefore sufficiently guarded by the rule which excludes a confession unduly obtained by hope or fear." So also Scott, J., in State v. Lamb, 28 Mo. 231; Story, J., in U. S. v. Gibert, 2 Sumn. 19, 28.

[4] Lord Campbell, C. J., in R. v. Baldry, 2 Den. Cr. C. 457 (1852): "If the matter were 'res integra', I should perhaps have doubted whether it might not have been advisable to allow the confession [in general] to be given in evidence, and let the jury give what weight to it they pleased."

This attitude, based on the above considerations, has expressly been taken, since the above passage was first printed, by Emery, J., in State v. Grover (1902), 96 Me. 363, 52 Atl. 757.

TITLE II (continued): TESTIMONIAL EVIDENCE

SUB-TITLE II: TESTIMONIAL IMPEACHMENT

CHAPTER XXIX.

A. GENERAL THEORY OF IMPEACHMENT

B. PERSONS IMPEACHABLE

1. Impeachment of Hearsay Testimony

2. Impeachment of Defendant as Witness

3. Impeachment of an Impeaching Witness

4. Impeachment of One's Own Witness

A. General Theory of Impeachment

§ 874. Analysis of the Process of Impeachment. A testimonial assertion comes, as evidence, in the same logical form as a circumstantial evidential fact (ante, § 475); i.e., the form of proposed inference is: A asserts the existence of fact X; therefore, fact X exists. Hence, the problem of the cogency of this inference involves (as all other judicial inferences do) the question how many and what other hypotheses there are which explain away the evidential fact of A's assertion as due to some other cause than the existence of fact X (ante, No. 2). The evidential fact is simply that A makes the assertion; the problem is, Can it be explained away, so that we need not accept fact X as the conclusion? In short, the whole process of Impeachment or Discrediting of a witness, as known to practitioners, is nothing but the general logical process of Explanation (ante, § 34). So, too, the process of corroboration or support of a witness is the logical process of closing up the possible avenues of Explanation, and thus making the proposed inference more and more necessary and unavoidable.

What, then, is the distinction, if any, between Explanation for Circumstantial evidence and Explanation for Testimonial evidence? Practically the distinction is a real one, — is in fact the chief basis for the time-honored division of all evidence into these two classes. Circumstantial evidence is heterogeneous and multifarious in its varieties; testimonial evidence is homogeneous. Circumstantial evidence has no single common feature, and few features partly in common; testimonial evidence has one great feature in common, and numerous large classes having common features. E.g. the finding of an old coat in an empty baker's wagon on a back lot in Halsted street, Cook county, — the presence of a broken oil can in a grain car on a sidetrack near Onondaga, New York, — the lack of one ten-dollar bill in a roll of ten-dollar bills in a Louisville bank on Monday, January 4, — these are unique, isolated facts which have never happened before in precisely the same way; hence there are no generic truths or laws involved in our inference from them; it is purely empiric. But A's assertion that a street lamp was lighted at a given time or place is generically of a piece with hundreds of thousands of former evidential data, viz. it is a human assertion, resting for credit on human qualities. The human element in this testimony is an element in common, running through the vast mass of prior human testimonies. And even though human beings differ, yet their differences also are generic, each on a vast scale. Moral character, bias, experience, powers of perception in light and dark, powers of memory after a lapse of time, susceptibility to falsify under torture, — these and other qualities have been under observation in so many thousands of instances under varying conditions that we have built up generalizations (more or less correct or uniform), which pass for general truths (or at least, as working guides) on those subjects. In short, we possess a fund of general principles, applicable to specific instances of this class of evidence, and almost totally lacking for specific circumstantial evidence. It does not here matter whether those general principles are all sound or not; the point is that we believe them to be, and that we are always disposed to use them in our reasoning upon the probative value of specific human assertions.

How does this bear upon the process of Impeachment or Explanation? In this way: Through this more or less explicit appeal to such general principles, most of our reasoning upon the credit of witnesses is put into the Deductive form; in which form these general principles or truths come out into the open as the avowed basis of our inference (ante, § 30). Thus they can and must be tested for their validity; and thus, if well founded, they may serve as aids to the valuing of other testimony. These aids are generally lacking for circumstantial evidence; their possession is a great advantage in valuing testimonial evidence, and is its prime feature for practical purposes.

1. Classification of Impeaching Evidence. Since, then, the process of Impeachment or Explanation (i.e. the valuation of the discount to be made from the credit of a testimonial assertion) rests usually on a more or less explicit deduction from some generalized truth, and since the force of the Explanation will depend much on the number, nature, and correctness of the general principles thus involved, it would seem that the classification of the data should attempt an answer to these questions: What data are virtually Deductive? What data are virtually Empiric? Under the former head, we should further classify according to the number of general principles or deductions involved. Under the latter head, we should endeavor to analyze the possible general principles latent, and thus to learn the force of the explanations.

a. Deductive Impeachment. The generic human qualities affecting testimony, and the state of knowledge on the subject, have already been considered (ante, § 478). The tripartite elements of the testimonial process — perception, memory, narration — have also been examined (ante, § 478). But the latter do not form separate steps in the inference; they are merely modes in which the deduction operates; hence they do not need to figure separately in the inference. E.g. in estimating the witnesses' credit for an assertion as to a midnight explosion, the facts are offered that one witness has no special experience in explosion sounds, and that another is afflicted with insane delusions; the forms of the inferences are: (1) Persons not experienced in explosion sounds are apt to obtain erroneous impressions of direction and intensity; this witness lacks such experience; therefore he is possibly in error as to the fact perceived; (2) Persons of insane delusions are apt to imagine non-existent facts; this witness is insane on a certain subject; therefore he is likely to be in error either by his original perception or by the subsequent operation of his memory. Now the former discrediting fact affects only the element of perception, in the testimonial process; the latter affects either or both perception and recollection. Whichever of such elements may be the one affected, it enters as a term of the truth used deductively, and not as a separate step of deduction. Hence, we may ignore those three elements in classifying the separate steps.

Proceeding to the impeaching facts, then, we premise further that they may be first grouped (merely for convenience) as comprising external and internal conditions. External conditions include general truths as to the effect of light, distance, temperature, position, time, etc., on the functions of perception, memory, and narration. E.g. that an object in a strong light may give misleading impressions as to color; that events observed ten years ago cannot be as well remembered as more recent ones; that a threat of violence usually deters from telling the exact truth, — these (if there are such truths) may roughly be grouped as external conditions. Internal conditions include general truths as to moral disposition, emotions, sex, experience, etc.; e.g. that a strong emotion disturbs the powers of correct perception and correct memory; that moral unscrupulousness makes correct narration less likely, and so on.

All the foregoing generalities form the first class of data, i.e. data of Immediate deduction. There is a single step of inference from them to the supposed discrediting conclusion. The formal statement would be: Persons affected by a strong emotion of revenge are apt to distort the facts; this witness has such an emotion; hence, his assertion may not represent the facts as they are. Notice that here we have but one (supposed) general truth to deal with, — the major premise; the minor premise is a concrete fact, viz. this man's specific emotion.

The next class is formed by the data of Mediate deduction. Here the above minor premise comes under analysis. Do we get it from a simple concrete fact, interpreted empirically, or do we get it by the aid of another general truth coupled with another concrete fact as a minor premise? If by the latter way, we must note and test that second general truth also. In this particular instance, either way may be available. E.g. the witness's language of hostility, on or off the stand, may be the simple concrete fact from which the emotion may be inferred; or, the witness may be an accomplice or a policeman (concrete fact), to which we may couple some supposed general truth about accomplices or policemen having generically an emotion of hostility. In the latter case, we thus have a second general truth, upon whose correctness or force our ultimate conclusion will depend. There are scores of such supposed general truths current in the books and in tradition. They are drawn from the more or less extensive experience of life, accumulated and compared and condensed. Sometimes these partial experiences are puzzlingly contradictory, e.g. the views as to the bias of experts and of policemen. Sometimes they are relics of former experience now practically discarded, e.g. the rooted distrust of a convict's testimony.

It is at this point that we meet most of the doubtful general truths affecting testimonial evidence. The data of immediate deduction are seldom formulated; their generality is obviously so broad and loose (at least, for what are above called internal conditions) that they seldom do harm by receiving an exact phrasing; and so far as they have fallen within the range of the scientific psychologist (e.g. the effect of light on color) there are as yet established few general laws having any exact tenor. But the supposed general truths falling within the mediate class, which have mostly grown up empirically in judicial practice, are apt to need special caution, by reason of their plausible verities.

By insisting on the foregoing two processes — those of stating explicitly the immediate data and the mediate data, with one or both of their general truths — we shall have forced out into the open the real basis of our proposed inference. We may verify our concrete fact or facts (i.e. we may settle whether this man is a policeman or an accomplice or a convict or has uttered hostile language, by asking him or by calling another witness); and we may then lay aside our general truth or truths for reflection and testing. This process we could seldom use for circumstantial evidence; but we can and must use it most of the time for testimonial evidence.

Such is the practical application of the logical process of Explanation in making use of the data for the valuation of testimonial evidence. Thus, when the process of analysis has been completed for a given witness, we shall have passed in review all the possible immediate data affecting the topics of his testimony, noting the supposed general truths, if any, on which they rest, — all the concrete mediate data which complement the former as minor premises, — all the further general truths therein involved, — and all the further concrete data which complete the supposed inference. After the appropriate rejections and acceptances, we are ready to estimate the probability that the witness's assertion is due rather to some other cause than to the actuality of the fact asserted by him.

b. Empiric Impeachment. The common varieties of empiric impeachment are few. Most of them are illustrated post, §§ 977, 1000, 1017, — specific circumstances forming a defect in basis of perception, specific instances of lack of recollection, specific errors involved in contradiction and self-contradiction, usually in some detail "collateral" to the main issue. Now the ordinary use of these data is purely empiric or inductive in form; e.g. "A erroneously asserted that the defendant wore a black hat, instead of a light one; therefore A's main assertion that the defendant struck first is erroneous." Occasionally, when the arguer is questioned as to the soundness of the inference (for, as Professor Sidgwick says, "the whole cogency of inductive proof depends upon the extent to which the principle, hitherto out of sight, is rendered definite"), he will offer some general truth which fortifies the inference by giving it a deductive form, e.g. "falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus." But such general truths, when then examined, usually are found to be either inapplicable or too loose to be forceful. Hence, until we arrive at a more accurate knowledge of the general truths applicable in this field, we must class these inferences as essentially empiric.

This is not saying that they are not strong. At times, none can be stronger. Indeed, in the ordinary course of trials none are more sought after or more relied upon than this class of data; which at least shows how highly their force is valued by practitioners. All we are concerned for here is that their distinct nature shall be understood, and that their weaknesses shall not be ignored.

So far as they are sometimes intangible and sometimes supportable by various general truths, these proposed inferences are sufficiently analyzed under the various rules involved. In charting them for a given witness, it is prudent to assume some undetermined general truth or quality as the immediate datum, add the specific instance, etc., as the mediate datum, and then, after reflection, fill in tentatively the description of the immediate datum.

2. Corroborating Evidence. Corroborating evidence has several aspects. Some data usually spoken of as corroborating are not such, in a strict sense. Corroboration, applied to testimonial evidence, is merely the complement of Explanation (Impeachment). The logical process of accepting an inference as to a fact in issue has only two results, — belief (in some degree) or non-belief. Non-belief consists in regarding some other hypothesis (than the fact alleged) as equally or more probable; the process of showing those other hypotheses and their probability, and thus of preventing belief, is that of Explanation (ante, § 34). This the opposing party will usually undertake to do. But even if he does not, the tribunal may see for itself that some such other hypotheses are possible. Hence the first party (whether or not the opponent suggests these explanatory hypotheses) may well strengthen his case by certain data which demonstrate those hypotheses to be not available. Thus he stops up possible exits for non-belief, and makes it more unavoidable to believe his own alleged conclusion. And this process of stopping up exits is Corroboration.

As applied to testimonial evidence, Corroboration consists in establishing data which refute possible discrediting circumstances. And (as above noted) this may properly be done even though the opponent has made no attempt to establish any of the impeaching hypotheses; for the mere possibility of them may cause the tribunal to hesitate, and the Corroboration will remove these grounds of hesitation. The mere fact of the witness's making an assertion does not require us to believe the matter asserted; our knowledge of human nature forbids this. Hence the tribunal, in view of possible discrediting hypotheses, may cautiously be disinclined to believe until those hypotheses have been shown groundless. For example, a witness Smith, whose name and face signify nothing to the tribunal and whose moral character may or may not be trustworthy, may receive instantly more credit when it appears that he is the well-known citizen Smith. This class of data may appear on the 'voir dire' of the direct examination, quite as well as on the case in rebuttal after an attempted impeachment, and on the witness's own examination as well as from the testimony of others. Thus the rule of practice which forbids most sorts of so-called corroboration until after an attempted impeachment is a rule of orderly convenience only, and its distinction has no correspondence to any logical feature of Corroboration.

Every fact, then, which closes up an exit of possible distrust of the testimony, i.e. which prevents or refutes a possible discrediting hypothesis, is a Corroborative fact. Hence the varieties of corroboration are as numerous as the varieties of impeachment.

There is, however, little occasion for the use of new or different general truths by way of deduction. The general truths, so far as used, would be the same as those used in impeachment, with a reverse application. E.g. in a street-car collision, the testimony of a bystander waiting on the corner is strengthened by the fact that he was a cool spectator; i.e. the general truth that persons excited by a catastrophe are not likely to observe correctly is negatived as a possible impeachment of him, and thus one possible source of distrust is removed.

As to empiric data, only a very few types are common. The prior consistent narration of a witness's story is one of these. For such data the same cautions apply as for empiric impeaching data.

§ 875. Distinction between Scientific Analysis of Testimony and Controversial Procedure in Judicial Trials. The feature of bi-partisan presentation of evidence in a judicial trial, as traditionally handed down to us, has radically affected the law of Evidence in many aspects (post, § 2483).

(1) Notably here, it gives rise to the antiphonal division of the procedure of analyzing a witness' credit into three stages, viz. Examination in Chief, Impeachment, and Rehabilitation (or, Corroboration). The scientist would in one continuous process analyze and weigh all the elements affecting the credit of a specific testimonial assertion. But in a judicial trial, the allotment of the task of producing evidence to the contending parties results in the division of the evidential material into three groups, corresponding to the above three stages; the first group falling to the share of the proponent of the witness, the second to the opponent, and the third to the proponent again.

Hence, the share of evidential material allotted to the opponent is affected by a special group of rules, applicable peculiarly to this process of Impeachment. The probative value of the evidence would be the same, whether for the scientist or the advocate. But these rules limit the processes of the advocate. Hence in this field the processes of science and of judicial inquiry part from each other. We cannot expect that the inferences of the man of science can expect to be given the same free scope of consideration in judicial trials.

(2) Nevertheless, within the limitations of these special judicial rules, judicial practice is entitled and bound to resort to all truths of human nature established by science, and to employ all methods recognized by scientists for applying those truths in the analysis of testimonial credit. Already, in long tradition, judicial practice is based on the implicit recognition (ante, § 874) of a number of principles of testimonial psychology, empirically discovered and accepted. In so far as science from time to time revises them, or adds new ones, the law can and should recognize them. Indeed, it may be asserted that the Courts are ready to learn and to use, whenever the psychologists produce it, any method which the latter themselves are agreed is sound, accurate, and practical. If there is any reproach, it does not belong to the Courts or the law. A legal practice which has admitted the evidential use of the telephone, the phonograph, the dictograph, and the vacuum-ray, within the past decades, cannot be charged with lagging behind science. But where are these practical psychological tests, which will detect specifically the memory-failure and the lie on the witness-stand? There must first be proof of general scientific recognition that they are valid and feasible. The vacuum-ray photographic method, for example, was accepted by scientists the world over, within a few months after its promulgation. If there is ever devised a psychological test for the valuation of witnesses, the law will run to meet it. Both law and practice permit the calling of any expert scientist whose method is acknowledged in his science to be a sound and trustworthy one. Whenever the Psychologist is really ready for the Courts, the Courts are ready for him.[1]

§ 875. [1] In a series of articles by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Professor of Psychology in Harvard University, in the Times Magazine (N. Y.) for January and March, 1907, the assertion was made (p. 427) that within the past few years "a new special science has grown up", by means of which a witness could be accurately tested directly "with regard to his memory and his power of perception, his attention and his [mental] associations, his volition and his suggestibility, with methods which are in accord with the exact work of experimental psychology"; and the reproach was made that Courts are "still unaware" of this; that they "proceed as if experimental psychology, with its efforts to analyze the mental faculties, still stood where it stood two thousand years ago"; that Courts are "completely satisfied with the most unscientific and haphazard methods of common prejudice and ignorance when a mental product, especially the memory report of a witness, is to be examined"; and that "the Courts will have to learn sooner or later" that these tests should be employed. Professor Münsterberg's claims were further expounded by him in a volume entitled "On the Witness Stand" in 1908. The controversy was taken up by Mr. C. C. Moore in Law Notes, and articles by him and Professor Münsterberg appeared in the numbers for October and November, 1907, and January, 1908. Another article by the learned psychologist appeared in McClure's Magazine for October, 1907 (XXIX, 614).

The voluminous Continental literature on the subject was carefully examined by the present writer, and a bibliography of it was published by him in the Illinois Law Review for February, 1909 (III, 399), with a summary of the criticisms tenable against the proposed methods. The general conclusion was that they were as yet of no practical service in the judicial investigation of facts. Passages from that article and from Professor Münsterberg's book are reprinted in the present writer's Principles of Judicial Proof, as given in Logic, Psychology, and General Experience, and illustrated in Judicial Trials (Boston, 1913).

But the scientific study of testimonial psychology is undoubtedly much needed by lawyers and judges, and the "Principles etc.", above cited, attempts to serve this need. The legal profession should be grateful to Professor Münsterberg for having stimulated popular interest in the subject.

The Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology (Northwestern University) contains notes and articles from time to time on this subject;

Modern psychology has already made progress in various directions towards adding to our available knowledge in this field. Its possibilities are noted under the several impeachment processes involved (post, §§ 995 et passim).

§ 876. Distinction between proving Incorrectness of Testimony from Defective Qualifications, and proving the Defective Qualifications by other Circumstances. (1) It has been seen, in dealing with Testimonial Evidence, that an assertion may be admitted as the basis of inference only when it is attended by certain minimum qualifications in the person making it, i.e. first, the Capacity to Observe, Recollect, and Narrate — either Organic, Experiential, or Emotional — and, secondly, Actual Observation, Recollection, and Relation (ante, §§ 475–478). Now, although the witness whose assertion has been thus admitted may possess in the minimum requisite degree these qualifications, nevertheless above this minimum degree there is a countless variety in the possible extent and strength of these qualifications, and the greater or less extent of them may throw light on the probability of his assertion's correctness. Thus, he may possess the minimum degree of Sanity required to make the assertion admissible, or the minimum degree of Opportunity of Observation; and yet he may fall so far short of possessing such sanity or such opportunity of observation as he might well have had, and this fact, if shown, will detract from the probability of his assertion's correctness.

In the first place, then, wherever a quality or condition is so important that its possession in a minimum degree is essential to the use of his assertion at all, it is obvious that its possession in a degree somewhat greater, but still less than perfect, may be used to argue against the probable correctness of his assertion; and thus a defect in any of the above testimonial qualifications may be employed in discrediting.

But, in the second place, there are a few other qualities which, though not required as essential prerequisites to the use of the assertion at all, nevertheless may be used to cast doubt on its correctness when admitted. These are two, Moral Character and Emotional Prejudice. These, at a former stage of the law, were indeed in some respects regarded as prerequisites; i.e. a person totally lacking in moral character (as indicated by Infamy, or conviction of a crime), and a person not in an emotional attitude of non-partisanship (as indicated by Interest in the cause), was excluded absoand a bibliography of the articles in foreign languages, on the psychology of testimony, from time to time has appeared in the Psychological Bulletin and in the Journal of Experimental Psychology.

The methods of Dr. Wm. M. Marston, of the American University, Washington, D. C., which are promising, can be studied in the following articles: Marston: Journal of Exp. Psych., II, 117 (April, 1917); ib. III, 72 (Feb. 1920); Journal of Abnormal Psychology, XV, 319 (1921); Journal of Criminal Law & Criminology, XI, 551 (Feb. 1921); Larson: Journal of Crim. L., etc. XII, 390 (Nov. 1921).

Other works and articles are as follows: Wm. and Mary T. Healy, Pathological Lying, Accusation and Swindling (Boston, 1915; Criminal Science Monograph Series, No. 1); Bernard Glueck, Studies in Forensic Psychiatry (Chap. III, "The Forensic Phase of Litigious Paranoia"; Chap. IV, "The Malingerer"; 1916); Collie, Malingering and Feigned Sickness, 1917, 2d ed., passim.

lutely (ante, §§ 519, 576). To-day the lack of these qualities is not regarded of such consequence as to exclude the assertion; but they still are regarded as having probative force against the correctness of the assertion. Thus, in discrediting an assertion, we may appeal, in searching for a basis of inference, not only to defects in specified qualities whose minimum existence is required for admitting the assertion, but also to the qualities of moral character and of emotional prejudice.

(2) These, then, are the starting-points of inference. We may argue that the witness' assertion may not be correct because the assertor has some defect either in Capacity — Organic or Experiential — to observe, recollect, or narrate, or in Opportunity of Actual Observation, Recollection, or Narration; and, additionally, we may argue from his moral character — a species of Organic Incapacity — and from his Emotional Incapacity. Now if we could adequately present these defects, or defective qualities, to the tribunal directly and abstractly, nothing further would be done or needed; we should ask the tribunal to infer from these defective qualities the probability of the assertion's incorrectness, and the only questions that would arise would involve the conditions under which this single inference would be allowed in the case of each quality. But it is obvious that in most cases it will be either impossible, or difficult, or insufficient, to present this defective quality to the tribunal directly or abstractly. In other words, the defective quality may in its turn need to be evidenced by other circumstances. Thus, instead of a single inference — from the defective quality to the assertion's incorrectness — we shall resort to two inferences (ante, § 874), i.e. from some other circumstance to the existence of the defective quality, and from that to our original objective, the assertion's incorrectness. For example, if it is desired to argue from the witness' emotional prejudice or hostility to the opponent, it will rarely be possible to present that quality abstractly and directly; we must resort to another inference in order to evidence that very hostility; for example, it will be shown that a pecuniary loss to the witness will attend the victory of the opponent, or that he has quarrelled with the opponent, or that he is nearly related to the party he testifies for. Again, while it is commonly possible to present his defective moral character to the tribunal directly and abstractly — i.e. by reputation of that character, or by personal knowledge —, yet this is not the only or the sufficient way of getting at the character; a resort to a circumstantial inference may be desirable, — for example, the inference from his specific misconduct to his bad character; and then a second inference is required from the character to the assertion's incorrectness.

Now the practical basis of these two classes of inferences is wholly distinct, as it has already been seen to be (ante, § 53) in dealing with Character as evidence of an Act done, and Conduct as evidence of the Character. The questions of Relevancy — i.e. the propriety of the inference — being here different, the rules prescribing the admission of the two sorts of inference must be separately treated. This is one of the fundamental distinctions affecting the arrangement of the subject, and is observed in the separation of Topics II and III (§§ 945–994, post) from Topic I (§§ 920–942).

§ 877. Distinction between Relevancy and Auxiliary Policy. It has already been seen (ante, § 42), that the exclusion of circumstantial evidence may be expressed by a single rule of thumb, and yet the rule may rest, not merely on some principle of Relevancy (of Probative Value), but also or solely on some principle other than Relevancy, i.e. on Auxiliary Policy. Thus, the occurrence of a similar injury to another person may be excluded because it does not satisfy a principle of Relevancy, i.e. the conditions of the injury are not substantially similar; while, again, the same evidence, though satisfying this principle of Relevancy, may still be excluded on the ground of surprise and confusion of issues, i.e. Auxiliary Policy (ante, § 443). Again, a person's bad character is concededly admissible, so far as Relevancy is concerned, to indicate his probable doing of a bad act, and yet, where the person is a defendant in a criminal case, an auxiliary policy of avoiding undue prejudice prevents the prosecution from resorting to it except in rebuttal; while, where this policy does not apply — as in the case of the prosecutrix on a rape charge, or of a deceased person alleged to be the aggressor in an affray — the evidence is admitted when it satisfies the requirements of Relevancy alone (ante, §§ 55–68). In short, while the principles of Relevancy form a homogeneous and independent body of doctrine, and the principles of Auxiliary Policy form a wholly separate body of doctrine (post, §§ 1845, 1863), they may still have to be applied to the same piece of evidence in such a way that a single rule of thumb is often created as the net resultant of both principles; in the exposition of the subject it is practically impossible to separate the treatment of the double principle lying behind the concrete rule. But this practical necessity, arising from convenience of treatment, need not mislead us to forget the distinctness of the two sets of principles; for, without a full understanding of the principles, the rules themselves can never be understood.

In the present subject, then, there occurs this same doubleness of principle. Each bit of circumstantial evidence offered to discredit a witness must first pass the gauntlet of the Relevancy principles; but it may also be obnoxious to some principle of Auxiliary Policy which may after all exclude it. In dealing with a given sort of discrediting evidence, the principle of its Relevancy has always first to be considered; and then the bearing must be examined of any principle of Auxiliary Policy which may apply. The evidence may satisfy the test of the first, but not of the second; or it may satisfy both; or there may be none of the second sort that is applicable.

A few instances will serve to illustrate concretely in advance the workings of the two sorts of doctrines. (1) The witness' Character, as indicating incorrectness of assertion, is relevant (on the general principle of § 59, ante), when it involves the trait connected with the sort of act to be proved; a question of Relevancy here, then, is whether character for truthfulness only, or general character, may be used. This being determined, the matter of Auxiliary Policy presents itself; and the judges are found pointing out that the reason of this sort that effects exclusion of character as against a defendant in a criminal case does not apply here at all, i.e. the reason of unfair prejudice, because the witness is not on trial and cannot be condemned; while on the other hand a new principle of Auxiliary Policy here comes into play, i.e. the principle that one cannot attack the character of his own witness. (2) Again, in attempting to evidence this Character by circumstantial evidence, it has already been seen (ante, § 194), that evidence of specific acts of misconduct, while it is relevant enough, is excluded as against a defendant in a criminal case because of two reasons, — first, the undue prejudice which might condemn him for past acts though innocent of the one charged; secondly, the unfair surprise and the impossibility of being prepared to disprove the misconduct alleged. Now, for witnesses, the first of these has no application, because the witness is not on trial; the second does apply, yet it may be obviated if we merely forbid the use of extrinsic testimony and confine the opponent to proving it by evidence extracted from the witness himself, i.e. by cross-examination. This being settled, certain questions of Relevancy still remain open for evidence thus extracted; for example, whether the mere arrest of a witness on a specific charge is relevant to show bad character. This, the net result of the rules for showing bad character by particular acts of misconduct depends on the combined influence of certain principles of Relevancy and certain principles of Auxiliary Policy taken together. (3) Again, to show the witness' Capacity for Mistake we may offer as relevant a prior contradictory statement of his. If it is really contradictory it is relevant. But it must also pass the tests of Auxiliary Policy; in the first place, to avoid multiplicity of issues, such evidence must be excluded if it deals with a collateral matter; in the next place, to avoid surprise and furnish a fair opportunity for explanation or denial, the witness must first be asked whether he made such a statement. These tests being satisfied and the relevancy appearing, the evidence may be used. (4) Again, to show Bias, we offer the expressions of the witness indicating a hostile feeling; by the Relevancy principle of Counter-explanation (ante, § 34), he may offer facts which explain away his expression and destroy its force as indicating hostility; here a question of relevancy may arise, — for example, whether the justness of his cause of anger is in any sense an explanation, as of course it may not be; or a question of Auxiliary Policy may arise, — for example, whether it is profitable to take up much time by such explanations, or whether the details of the quarrel, though truly explanatory, may not cause unfair prejudice to the opposing side.

Thus, throughout the whole subject, here as well as for Circumstantial Evidence at large (Title I), the principles of Relevancy and the principles of Auxiliary Policy, while wholly distinct in their nature, are yet so inextricably united in the concrete rules of exclusion that they must be expounded together in connection with each sort of evidence.

§ 878. Distinction between Cross-examination and Extrinsic Testimony. The particular principles of Auxiliary Policy that most commonly find use in the present class of evidence are those which seek to avoid Unfair Surprise, Undue Prejudice, and Confusion of Issues (post, §§ 1845, 1863), and these purposes are usually attainable by the simple expedient of cutting off extrinsic testimony, i.e. the calling of additional witnesses. The effect, therefore, of the constant applicability of this expedient is to produce a sharp distinction, in the use of discrediting evidence, between the extraction of this evidence by cross-examination and the presentation of it by extrinsic testimony. The defective general qualities — such as Moral Character, Insanity, and the like — can usually not be got at through the witness himself, and here the above distinction plays little part. But, in evidencing these qualities by specific acts of conduct, the witness himself is often equally as satisfactory for the purpose as additional witnesses would be, and hence the restriction of the impeacher to the extraction of the evidence by cross-examination may be no real hardship to him, while it may satisfy the doctrines of Auxiliary Policy. Hence, in that field, we find much of the evidence subject constantly to such a restriction; and the concrete shape of the rule of thumb then becomes this, that such-and-such impeaching evidence may be offered through the medium of cross-examination, i.e. from the mouth of the witness himself, but not by the production of other witnesses. It is thus worth while practically to group some of the kinds of evidence according as they are ineligible, partly or wholly, to be offered through extrinsic testimony. Topics I and II (post, §§ 920–969) are thus separated from the ensuing Topics.

Two things must be kept in mind about such rules. (1) The question of Relevancy is not touched by them. The restriction is based wholly on some doctrine of Auxiliary Policy. It prescribes that such-and-such evidence, if relevant, is to come only from a specific source. Its relevancy is still open to question. For example, in evidencing bad character, we may not call a new witness to impeach the former one by testifying to some misconduct of his; we are restricted to the questioning of the original witness; but, while conducting such questionings, we are still confined to facts which are relevant for the purpose, and we may at any moment be told that a given fact about which we are cross-examining — for example, former arrest on some heinous charge — is not relevant.

(2) Thus there is no virtue in the cross-examination as such with reference to the admissibility of the alleged fact. The notion is not that because we are cross-examining, therefore we may get admission for this or that fact; for the fact cannot go in if it is not relevant; but the notion is that because we are not using extrinsic testimony, the fact if relevant may go in.

It is important to observe this, because the ordinary discussion of the rule of thumb leads often to a notion (for which the judges indeed are not responsible) that cross-examination has some mysterious virtue of its own which imparts merit to facts otherwise worthless. A loose belief doubtless obtains in some minds that almost anything may go in on cross-examination (saving the discretion of the Court). Conceptions of this sort should be radically abandoned. Cross-examination is no universal solvent for reducing everything to admissibility. The notion is not only unsound, but misleading; for several sorts of evidence — for example, facts evidencing Bias — are equally presentable through extrinsic testimony and through cross-examination, and a given fact may thus be in either way admissible.

The real significance of the rules that involve a distinction between cross-examination and extrinsic testimony is seen if we note that the rules come about, not by enlarging the use of the former, but by cutting off the use of the latter. It is not that the law of impeachment loves cross-examination more; but that it loves extrinsic testimony less. Conceive the relevant facts as carried before the tribunal like chattels, in two kinds of vehicles, and understand the law to forbid the use of one of the kinds of vehicles for certain sorts of facts; the result being that the other kind of vehicle has thereby a far greater vogue, but simply because the use of the first kind is forbidden; and the tenor of the prohibition does not tell us what classes of facts may be carried at all, but merely what kinds of vehicles may not be used for carrying certain classes of facts.

(3) It must be added that while these facts have usually to be carried to the tribunal (to continue the metaphor) in one or the other of these two kinds of vehicles, yet occasionally the facts do not have to be carried there in either, but are already (so to speak) found awaiting us there. That is to say, the demeanor of the witness on the stand is a third source of obtaining these facts. Incoherence of statement, hesitating manner, guilty appearance, evasive replies, and the like, contain within themselves many of the salient facts affecting the witness' credibility (post, § 947). These stand outside of the broad distinction between cross-examination and extrinsic testimony, and are not affected by this principle of Auxiliary Policy.

§ 879. Distinction between Circumstances having Definite Relevancy and Circumstances having Indefinite Relevancy. The preceding distinction between the limited use of extrinsic testimony and the free use of cross-examination is intimately connected in application with another distinction involving the probative effect of circumstances offered in evidence. For instance, we find that circumstances of relationship, quarrels, or pecuniary interest, may be offered equally by extrinsic testimony as by cross-examination (post, § 948); yet the discrediting circumstance of an erroneous assertion or a lie may be offered through extrinsic testimony on one condition only, namely, that the subject of the error or the lie be material to the case, and not "collateral" (post, §§ 1001–1003).

That the principle of Auxiliary Policy excludes extrinsic testimony in the latter case and not in the former seems to depend partly on a difference in the probative nature of the evidence. In the former case, the probative force is definite and specific; in the latter case it is indefinite and ambiguous, although positive. In the former case, from the circumstance of (for example) relationship to a party, the inference is, definitely and solely, that a hostile feeling exists towards the opponent. In the latter case, the inference is that in some way or other the witness possesses a capacity or an inclination to an incorrect assertion. Yet, while the plain effect of the evidence is to indicate a defective testimonial quality of some sort, there is no definite indication of the specific quality that is defective. The mind recognizes and accepts the force of the inference that, because he was mistaken on one point, he may be mistaken on another; but it does not definitely infer a specific defective quality.

This being so, it is easy to see why the principle of Auxiliary Policy should be applied with greater readiness and more strictness to evidence of such indefinite and ambiguous effect and such prolific scope. We cut off relevant evidence, — evidence that is useful enough if we can get at it economically; but, comparing the quantity of it that might be offered, if there were no limit, with the indefiniteness of its objective point when received, we find that it would be obtained at a cost by no means economical, and that it is only worth receiving when it comes through the simple and limited source of cross-examination or when it deals with a fact which could have been shown in any case, i.e. is not collateral.

The result of this rough distinction between circumstances having a definite and strong probative meaning, and circumstances having an indefinite or a weak probative meaning, is that, when we are attempting to prove these defective qualities by circumstantial evidence, we find again the convenience of the grouping already noticed, namely, on the one hand, evidence that can be offered equally through extrinsic testimony and through cross-examination, and, on the other hand, evidence that cannot be offered at all through extrinsic testimony or can be offered only to a limited extent, according to the applicability of the above reasons. Such a grouping would be based on the essential features of the evidence and the policy applicable to it, and is represented by the separation of Topics IV and V (post, §§ 1000–1046) from the preceding Topics I and II.

§ 880. Distinction between Impeaching Evidence and Rehabilitating or Supporting Evidence. It has already been seen (ante, § 874) that, in the very nature of the process of Inductive reasoning, while the proponent of evidence offers it as leading to a desired conclusion, it is always open to the opponent to show that the inference desired to be drawn is not the correct or more probable one, and that some other inference than the one desired is equally or more probable, i.e. to show that some other explanation exists and thus to explain away the force of the evidential circumstance. This counter-process of Explanation, inherent in the very nature of reasonings, is equally applicable, so far as Relevancy is concerned, in explaining away circumstantial evidence offered to discredit a witness. Thus, in jurisdictions which allow general bad moral character to be used to indicate the probability of the witness' speaking untruthfully, the party offering the witness is usually allowed, on cross-examining the impeaching witness, to show that the other has kept his character for truth-telling, i.e. to explain away the desired inference. Again, in the single case in which by extrinsic testimony particular misconduct may be offered to show bad character, namely, conviction of a crime, the question arises whether it may be shown in explanation that the witness was really innocent; though here the resulting rule will be affected by the principle of Auxiliary Policy directed at preventing multiplicity of issues. Again, when a prior contradictory statement is offered to discredit, an explanation may be attempted by showing that the witness has at other times made statements precisely similar to that made on the stand, and the interesting question arises whether such evidence is relevant as affording any real explanation or destroying the force of the impeaching evidence; the generally accepted solution in modern times being that such similar statements do not accomplish any real explaining-away of a prior contradictory statement, but that they do on certain conditions help to explain away any evidence tending to show corruption, bias, or interest.

Under each class of discrediting evidence, then, there may be available ways of explaining away by other evidence the force of the discrediting circumstance. But for convenience' sake these various methods of Rehabilitation must be considered together (post, §§ 1100–1144).

§ 881. Order of Topics. The foregoing considerations necessarily affect the order of topics; for the rules must be so treated as best to distinguish the principles behind them. Few of the rules are difficult to comprehend or obscure in their bearing; but much latitude of opinion is possible as to the most satisfactory order of treatment. The following order is most practicable:[1]

First, as preliminary to the whole subject of impeachment, must be considered What Persons as witnesses are to be Impeachable. In the process of discrediting a witness, the first inference (ante, § 876) must always be from some defective testimonial quality to the assertion's incorrectness; the different possible testimonial qualities are thus to be passed in review (Topic I), — Moral Character, Mental Capacity (Insanity, Intoxication), Emotional Capacity (Bias, Interest, Corruption), and Experiential Capacity. These discrediting deficiencies become in their turn the object of circumstantial proof, — first (Topic II), such sorts of evidence as are not forbidden to be offered by extrinsic testimony, i.e. circumstances indicating Interest, Bias, and Corruption; following these, all such evidence as is more or less liable to the rule excluding extrinsic testimony — (Topic III) Particular Instances of Conduct to show Character — the principles here involved having an influence over the whole group; next, similar facts to show Experiential Defects and the like; then (Topic IV) Specific Errors of assertion, used indefinitely to show some general capacity for mistake or misstatement; (Topic V) Prior Self-Contradictions, used indefinitely for a similar purpose; and, finally, (Topic VI) Admissions, i.e. prior self-contradictions of parties.

§ 881. [1] Compare the following summary of topics: Cal. C. C. P. 1872, § 1847 ("A witness is presumed to speak the truth. This presumption, however, may be repelled by the manner in which he testifies, by the character of his testimony, or by evidence affecting his character for truth, honesty, or integrity, or his motives, or by contradictory evidence: and the jury are the exclusive judges of his credibility").

B. PERSONS IMPEACHABLE

1. Impeachment of Hearsay Testimony

§ 884. General Principle. When the statement of a person not in court is offered as evidence of the fact stated, the real ground of objection is that it has not been subjected to the test of trustworthiness which the law regards as desirable before listening to any testimonial evidence, namely, the test of cross-examination. This is the Hearsay rule (post, § 1362). Yet under certain conditions such statements may exceptionally be received. Now the statement, if thus received, stands testimonially as the equivalent of a statement made on the stand and subject to cross-examination; i.e. in both cases there is received the statement (for example) of A that B struck him with a knife, — in the one case, A being on the stand and untested when the statement is made, and in the other case, A being not on the stand and not tested when the statement is made. In both cases the statement is nothing more nor less than testimonial evidence, the two being precisely equivalent in respect to their nature as testimony. This being so, the untested statement — i.e. the hearsay statement — must come from a person qualified to speak on the matter in question, precisely as ordinary testimony must; the rules of Testimonial Qualifications (as noted post, § 1424) have constant application to such testimonial statements admitted under the Hearsay exceptions.

Now, in the same way, the statements being testimonial in their nature, it is right to subject them, when admitted, to impeachment in the appropriate ways, as it was to require the usual testimonial qualifications in advance; and that is what we find the law doing. For reasons of convenience in exposition, however, the rules of testimonial qualifications and of testimonial impeachment are better considered in connection with the various kinds of hearsay statements admitted under the exceptions to the Hearsay rule. It is enough here to note the general features of the process.

§ 885. Dying Declarations. Here the commonest methods of impeachment are those arising from the circumstances of the occasion, when the mental powers are not in a condition to promise the best results in the way of Testimonial Observation, Recollection, and Narration; these modes of impeachment are proper (post, § 1446). The use of Prior Self-Contradictions, however, depends so intimately on the general principle of that subject that it is here dealt with under that head (post, § 1033).

§ 886. Attesting Will-Witness. The proof of an attesting will-witness' signature involves virtually the use of his testimony according to the tenor of the attestation-clause (post, § 1505); and the modern tendency to ignore this truth has led sometimes to an ignoring of its corollary, namely, that a deceased attesting will-witness is open to impeachment like any other hearsay witness. The application of the impeachment rules to this sort of testimony is dealt with under that exception, (post, § 1514).[1]

Whether an attesting witness who is one's own witness may be impeached is dealt with post, § 908.

§ 887. Statements of Facts against Interest, and other Hearsay Statements. The other kinds of statements admissible under exceptions to the Hearsay rule are less commonly subjected to impeachment, but the principle is recognized as equally applicable. Accordingly, it is permissible to impeach statements of facts against interest (post, § 1471), statements of facts of family history (post, § 1496), regular entries in the course of business (post, § 1554), and other kinds of statements; though the attempt thus to apply the principle is rarely made.[1]

§ 888. Absent Witness' Testimony, admitted to avoid Continuance. By statute in almost every jurisdiction the authority is given to deny a motion for a continuance (or postponement of the trial), when requested on the ground of an expected witness' absence, provided the opposing party consents to admit the testimony as if the witness were present, or (as is more usual in criminal cases) to admit the truth of the facts that would be testified to by the witness. When a witness' testimony is admitted in this manner, may it be impeached? On principle, it may be, if the assent was of the first sort mentioned; but not if the assent was to the truth of the facts testified to. Since the testimony is received by virtue of a Judicial Admission, the application of the present principle can best be considered under that head (post, § 2595).

2. Impeachment of Defendant as Witness

§ 889. Distinction between Becoming a Witness and Waiving a Witness' Privilege. When, under the modern statutes removing common-law disqualifications, a defendant in a criminal case takes the stand in his own behalf, two entirely distinct questions arise, to one of which the answer is clear and unanimous, to the other doubtful and inharmonious.

§ 886. [1] In a practice where an auditor's or master's report of findings of fact is admitted to be read to the jury, no impeachment of the character of a witness who testified to the auditor but not the trial jury is allowable: 1917, Jackson & N. Co. v. Fuller, 226 Mass. 441, 115 N. E. 766.

§ 887. [1] 1921, State v. Segar, 96 Conn. 428, 114 Atl. 389 (forgery of check in C.'s name; a written statement by C. denying authority to sign his name was already in evidence without objection, but C. himself had not testified; C.'s extra-judicial statements to S. that he had given authority to defendant, admitted, on the present principle).

(1) Is his position as a witness so distinct from his position as defendant that that which would be usable to impeach him as a witness, but not usable against him as a defendant, may now be used? In particular, may his bad moral character be shown, — may this character be evidenced by particular acts, — may his testimony be tested by the sundry other methods applicable to witnesses?

The argument for the negative is that a fact usable against him as a witness — for example, former conviction of felony — will not be restricted by the jury to its legitimate effect, i.e. the effect upon his credibility, but may also, mainly or subsidiarily, be applied by them for a forbidden purpose, i.e. to infer his bad character and thus his guilt as a defendant. The argument for the affirmative is that he is in fact a witness as much as he is in fact a defendant, that as a witness he may or may not be credible, and that the State has an overriding interest in ascertaining this; that, as the defendant has voluntarily chosen to offer his testimony, it is not unfair to require him to submit to the incidental tests of testimony ordinarily applied, and that any other rule would practically give immunity to defendants to offer false testimony to the jury. The question involved is thus the simple one whether the requirements of his position as a witness are to be maintained in their integrity, or whether their incidental infringement on his position as a defendant is to cause them to be sacrificed; and the appeal is to the general principle (ante, § 13) that evidence admissible for one purpose is not to be excluded because it would be inadmissible for another purpose.

(2) The second question does not care how the first is settled, i.e. does not care whether his position as a witness may or may not be treated as wholly distinct from his position as a defendant for the purpose of offering any evidence that would be admissible against him as a witness. The second question rests on a different matter of policy, namely, of Privilege. Since a witness has the privilege of declining to answer questions tending to criminate him, and since this privilege may be waived by a witness, either expressly or by implication, is the principle determining the existence of a waiver the same for an ordinary witness and for a defendant-witness, or is there anything in the position of the latter which demands a different test for the existence of a waiver? It will be seen that the question here involved is wholly different from the preceding one, and is distinctly a question of the nature of Privilege and of its Waiver; while practically it covers a peculiar kind of evidence, i.e. facts tending to show guilt, and not facts affecting credibility.

There is, however, one circumstance, superficial only, which has tended to loose thinking on the subject, namely, the circumstance that much of the evidence of both sorts (i.e. to impeach credibility and to show guilt) is asked for on cross-examination; and thus we sometimes find the question "May a defendant on the witness-stand be cross-examined like any other witness?" put and discussed as though only one question, instead of two wholly distinct ones, were involved. No correct solution can ever be reached in that way.

Whether facts impeaching credibility may be offered, either extrinsically or through cross-examination, is one question; whether a criminating fact, otherwise privileged, may be asked and compelled from the defendant himself, is the other and wholly distinct question. In the first case, the sole object is to impeach credibility, and the incidental effect on the defendant's position as such is undesired and forbidden; in the second case, the sole object is usually to prove guilt, and to affect the defendant as such. The answer to either question might be in the affirmative or in the negative without affecting the answer to the other.

The first question alone concerns us here. The second is dealt with under the subject of Privilege (post, § 2276).

§ 890. Defendant impeachable as an Ordinary Witness. Of the arguments on the first question, there is no hesitation in accepting those of the affirmative. The law is that a defendant taking the stand as a witness may as a witness be impeached precisely like any other witness.[1]

The rule is enunciated more or less broadly, and with more or less variation of phrasing, in the different jurisdictions; but the principle is universally conceded:

1867, Com. v. Bonner, 97 Mass. 587; the witness having been asked whether he had been in the House of Correction for any crime, Mr. Hudson argued, "that it is a subtlety beyond the capacity of jurors to discriminate between regarding evidence of a defendant's previous conviction of crime as affecting only his credibility as a witness, and regarding it as affecting his character generally, and that therefore such testimony should be excluded altogether"; but the Court held that in becoming a witness he must put up with such risks.

1874, BUSKIRK, C. J., in Fletcher v. State, 49 Ind. 130: "A defendant who elects to testify occupies the position of both defendant and witness, and thus he combines in his person the rights and privileges of both. But while this is true, we do not think it should result in any change in the law or rules of practice. In his capacity as a witness he is entitled to the same rights, and is subject to the same rules, as any other witness. In his character of defendant, he has the same rights, and is entitled to the same protection as were possessed and enjoyed by defendants before the passage of the act in question [enabling defendants to testify]. When we are considering the rights of the appellant in his character of defendant, we lose sight of the fact that he has the right to testify as a witness; and when his privileges as a witness are called in question, they should be decided without reference to the fact that he is a defendant also."

1893, BREAUX, J., in State v. Murphy, 45 La. An. 958, 959, 13 So. 229: "The defendant, in availing himself of the privilege of testifying in his own behalf, was subject to all the rules that apply to other witnesses. The accused was not compelled to testify; the statute declares that the failure to testify shall not create a presumption against a defendant. Having offered himself as a witness, and having testified, he was called upon to submit to the same tests which are legally applied to other witnesses. The witness can decline to answer any question which may tend to charge him as criminal; moreover, the Court has the power to protect him against unreasonable or oppressive cross-examination. These modes of guarding against the abuse possible under the statute are not in question. . . . The defendant appeared before the Court in the dual capacity of an accused and that of a witness. As an accused, his character was not subject to attack unless he opened the question. As a witness, his position was different; his credibility was subject to attack. . . . As a defendant, his character could not be impeached, that issue not having been opened by him. As a witness, it could be impeached, as the character of any witness may be subjected to that test. In other words, he may be unworthy of belief, but this unworthiness is not to be considered in determining whether or not he is guilty; while the attack upon the character of an accused is for the purpose of establishing that his plea is not supported by his attempt at proving character and that he is guilty."

§ 891. Same: Application of the Rule. The general principle is not questioned. But it requires in certain situations to be discriminated, in its consequences, from other rules:

(1) The prosecution in a criminal case may not offer the accused's bad moral character except to rebut his offer of good character (ante, § 58), but it may impeach his witness-character without this restriction. The witness-character will involve in most jurisdictions the trait of veracity, while the accused-character will involve the trait appropriate to the crime charged. Hence (in most jurisdictions) a difference in the kind of character offerable by the prosecution.[1]

(2) The accused may at any time offer his own good moral character, for the trait in question, as evidence that he did not commit the crime (ante, § 56). But he may not as witness offer his good character until it has been attempted to be impeached by the prosecution (post, § 1104). Hence (except in those jurisdictions where general bad character is allowed in impeachment) a difference as to the time when the accused may offer his character in his support as a witness.[2]

(3) In evidencing the accused's bad moral character as a witness, the usual kinds of evidence are equally available, — conviction of crime, specific instances of misconduct (on cross-examination), and the like. But when these involve a crime and are attempted to be proved on cross-examination, the question arises whether the accused is compellable to answer, i.e. whether he has waived his privilege against self-crimination.[3] Furthermore, it may be noted, the doctrine has been advanced, in New York and elsewhere, that, while a defendant as a witness is in general impeachable as a witness, yet, in offering through cross-examination to impeach his credibility by specific acts of misconduct, the prosecution would have too wide a latitude in employing these discreditable facts unless some limits were set in order to prevent unfair prejudice to the defendant as such; and hence the scope of that particular sort of evidence should be narrower for a defendant-witness than for others. Such a doctrine, however, would involve no abandonment of the general principle that the defendant as a witness may be impeached as such in the other

§ 891. [1] The authorities are collected post, § 924.

Since the defendant would never take the stand till after the prosecution had closed its case in chief, the prosecution would never be authorized to offer his character of either sort until rebuttal; it is therefore never a question of the time of the prosecution's offer, but of the kind of character offered.

usual ways. Nevertheless, the limitation laid down by these New York rulings is not to be commended; it has been several times refused approval in other jurisdictions having these rulings before them.[4]

§ 892. Defendant not Testifying, but making a "Statement." In the course of the transition from the unenlightened common-law disqualification of an accused person to his complete eligibility as a witness, several jurisdictions took a half-way step (ante, § 579) of allowing the accused person to make a "statement" — a grudging concession to the demands of justice. Being in itself anomalous, it raised several anomalous questions. One of these was whether this "statement" rendered its maker open to impeachment like an ordinary witness. But this question is no longer of consequence.[1]

3. Impeachment of an Impeaching Witness

§ 894. Limitation in the Trial Court's Discretion. No question arises here except as to the use of character-evidence. When B is brought forward to impeach A, and C to impeach B, it is obvious that not only might there be no end to this process, but the real issues of the case might be wholly lost sight of in a mass of testimony amounting to not much more than mutual vilification. The general rule as to limiting the number of witnesses upon a given point (post, § 1907) does not in strictness apply.

Three courses are open to pursue: first, to exclude absolutely the impeachment of the character of an impeaching witness; [1] secondly, to admit the impeachment of an impeaching witness, but no more; [2] thirdly, to admit it only

[4] The authorities are collected post, § 987.

§ 892. [1] Except in Georgia and Wyoming; some authorities are cited ante, § 579.

§ 894. [1] Contra: 1869, State v. Cherry, 63 N. C. 495 (Pearson, C. J.: "We are told that this supposed rule of law is acted upon in that circuit, and is based on the ground of avoiding the inconvenience of an endless process. If the impeaching witness can be impeached, the last witness may also be impeached and so on 'ad infinitum.' This inconvenience cannot occur very often or be very serious, for the general practice is to call only the most respectable men in the community as to character, and the instance of calling a witness of doubtful character to prove character is exceptional. Let it be understood that an impeaching witness cannot be impeached, and the exception will soon be the general rule. But be this as it may, truth should not be excluded to avoid inconvenience"); 1846, Rector v. Rector, 8 Ill. 105, 117 (generally not allowable, but here treated as proper).

[2] 1851, Wayne, J. (the others not touching the point), in Gaines v. Relf, 12 How. 555. This was the rule of the civil and the canon law of the Continent: Corp. Jur. Canon., Decretal. II, 20, de testibus, c. 49; 1738, Oughton, Ordo Judiciorum, tit. 102, § VI ("In testem testes, et in hos, sed non datur ultra"); and this was followed in Chancery: 1680, Earl of Stafford's Trial, 7 How. St. Tr. 1293, 1484 (Sir W. Jones, for the prosecution: "If his new witnesses are only to the reputation of our witnesses, then perhaps one must have some other witnesses brought to discredit his; and we, not knowing who these new witnesses of his would be, may need perhaps another day to bring testimony against them; so that I know not when the matter can have an end"; L. H. S. Finch: "It is true, in the practice of Chancery we do examine to the credit of witnesses, and to their credit, but no more; but what my lords will do in this case I know not till they are withdrawn"; and the matter went off by consent).

In the following jurisdictions the rule has been allowed to go this far, without saying that it shall go no farther: 1862, State v. Brant, 14 Ia. 182 (left undecided); 1868, State v. Moore, 25 Ia. 137 (not excluded here; but no general rule laid down); 1905, Dunn v. Com., 119 Ky. 457, 84 S. W. 321; 1914, Gabbard v. Com., 159 Ky. 624, 167 S. W. 942 (rule of Dunn v. Com., 119 Ky. 461, of the second sort above, cited without express approval); 1847, Starks v. People, 5 Den. N. Y. 106, 109; 1903, Brink v. Stratton, 176 N. Y. 150, 68 N. E. 148.

to such an extent as the discretion of the trial Court deems best. The first two of these rules are represented in different jurisdictions. In such a case, however, any mere rule of thumb is undesirable; the preferable rule is the third.

4. Impeachment of One's Own Witness

§ 896. History of the Rule. In the first and the second of the foregoing topics, the question presented was whether the person could properly be treated as a witness at all; for, if so, there was no objection to the process of impeachment in itself. But in the third and the present topics the person is clearly a witness, and the question is whether any principle of auxiliary policy should exclude the process of impeachment normally applicable.

In the present topic, the rule has been long established, and is in its general validity never to-day questioned, that the party on whose behalf a witness appears cannot himself impeach that witness in certain ways.

The history of it is singularly obscure, considering its practical frequency and importance. But the following stages of its development are fairly clear:

(1) In the primitive modes of trial, persons who attended on behalf of the parties were not witnesses, in the modern sense of the word. They were "oath-helpers", by whose mere oath, taken by the prescribed number of persons and in the proper form, the issue of the cause was determined. They were chosen, naturally and usually, from among the relatives and adherents of either party. They went up to the court literally to "swear him off", and the two sets of oath-takers were marshalled in opposing bands. This traditional notion of a witness, that of a person 'ex officio' a partisan pure and simple, persisted as a tradition long past the time when their function had ceased to be that of a mere oath-taker and had become that of a testifier to facts. So long as such a notion persisted, it was inconceivable that a party should gainsay his own witness; he had been told to bring a certain number of persons to swear for him; if one or more did not do so, that was merely his loss; he should have chosen better ones for his purpose. This notion that a party must stand or fall by what his partisan affirms was long in disappearing.[1] It was a natural consequence of this notion that the party should not be allowed to dispute what his own chosen witness says. Such (presumably) was the instinctive thought all through the earlier periods of our recorded trials, and long after the time when witnesses in the modern sense had taken the place of compurgators. But for a considerable period there is no trace of a positive rule upon the subject. There must have been the feeling; perhaps no opposition to it was attempted.

(2) Meanwhile, in the civil and the canon law the rule was well known that one who used a witness for himself could not afterwards object to his

incompetency (by interest or otherwise) when called by the opponent.[2] This rested on the general and natural notion of a waiver of the objection (ante, § 18), and was apparently a rule of equally unquestioned acceptance in our own law.[3]

(3) But the further conception, that a party calling a witness must not even discredit him, was not enforced as a rule of law until a comparatively late period. Its beginnings are seen at the end of the 1600s, in criminal trials. Until that time, the accused had no legal right to summon witnesses (ante, § 575), and apparently the prosecution was not before then hampered by any rule against impeachment. In that period a rule begins to be hinted at, as against the accused's witnesses, though the prosecution is still exempt.[4]

(4) By the beginnings of the 1700s a general rule makes a casual appearance, and is applied in civil cases equally.[5] But it had not yet received common acceptance; for it is not mentioned in any of the early editions of the treatises on trial practice.

(5) By the end of the 1700s, however, it is notorious and unquestioned. Its enforcement in the trial of Warren Hastings, in 1788,[6] seems to have been the immediate cause of its general currency; for thereafter it receives mention in the treatises.[7] Whatever its merits, then, its prestige is comparatively modern.

Sed si liquidis probationibus datione vel promissione pecuniarum eos corruptos esse ostenderit, etiam eam allegationem integram ei servari præcipimus"; A. St. Tr. 549, 636 (defendant calls a witness to impeach another, and then, on his refusal, tries by a cross-examination to show him biassed; L. C. J. The learned opinion of Mr. J. Blume, in Crags v. State (1922), — Wyo. —, 202 Pac. 1099, summarizes the history of the rule.

In considering its right to existence, the first question naturally is, By what reason of policy is this impeachment prohibited?; for upon the answer to this depends the next question, To what extent is such impeachment forbidden? To the first question we find in judicial annals more than one answer; and it is of prime importance to determine at the outset which of these is the correct one.

§ 897. First Reason: The Party is Bound by his Witness' Statements. The primitive notion, that a party is morally bound by the statements of his witnesses, no longer finds defenders, although its disappearance is by no means very far in the past. In the early 1800s the judges were still engaged in repudiating this false notion of the basis of the rule against impeaching one's own witness:

1811, ELLENBOROUGH, L. C. J., in Alexander v. Gibson, 2 Camp. 555: "If a witness is called on the part of the plaintiff, who swears what is palpably false, it would be extremely hard if the plaintiff's case should for that reason be sacrificed; but I know of no rule of law by which the truth is on such an occasion to be shut out and justice is to be perverted."

1831, TINDAL, C. J., in Bradley v. Ricardo, 8 Bing. 58: "The object of all the laws of evidence is to bring the whole truth of a case before the jury; . . . [but if this contradicting evidence were excluded] that would no longer be the just ground on which the principles of evidence would proceed, but we should compel the plaintiff to take singly all the chances of the tables and to be bound by the statements of a witness whom he might call without knowing he was adverse, who might labor under a defect of memory, or be otherwise unable to make a statement on which complete reliance might be placed."

1826, 1834, PUTNAM, J., in Brown v. Bellows, 4 Pick. 187, 194, and Whitaker v. Salisbury, 15 id. 545: "A party is not obliged to receive as unimpeached truth everything which a witness called by him may swear to. If his witness has been false or mistaken in his testimony, he may prove the truth by others." . . . "It would evidently be a rule that would operate with great injustice, that a party calling a witness should be bound by the fact which was sworn to. No one would contend for a rule so inexpedient."

§ 898. Second Reason: The Party Guarantees his Witness' General Credibility. The modern rule as to impeaching the character of one's own witness is historically merely the last remnant of the broad primitive notion that a party must stand or fall by the utterances of his witness. This primitive notion, resting on no reason whatever, but upon mere tradition, and irrationally forbidding any attempt to question the utterances of one's own witness, was obliged to yield its ground before reason and common sense; and, as each encroachment upon its territory took place, it sought to justify by stating some plausible reason which would support the remainder of the rule. Such a reason was, and is still, frequently advanced in this form, that a party guarantees his witness' credibility. This has become the popular and canting reason:

1834, PUTNAM, J., in Whitaker v. Salisbury, 15 Pick. 545: "When a party calls a witness whose general character for truth is bad, he is attempting to obtain his cause by testimony not worthy of credit; it is to some extent an imposition upon the court and jury. The law will not suppose that a party will do any such thing, but will rather hold the party calling the witness to have adopted and considered him as credible."

1877, FOLGER, J., in Pollock v. Pollock, 71 N. Y. 152: "It is fair to judge a party by his own witness. If a party puts upon the stand a witness who is for any reason assailable, that party asserts or admits the credibility of that witness."

1866, Professor Simon Greenleaf, Evidence, § 442: "When a party offers a witness in proof of his cause, he thereby, in general, represents him as worthy of belief; he is presumed to know the character of the witnesses he adduces; and having thus presented them to the court, the law will not permit the party afterwards to impeach their general reputation for truth."

One answer to this argument would be that the supposed guarantee ought not in fairness to be allowed to burden a party when he has discovered the witness' untrustworthiness after putting him on the stand. Another and more satisfactory answer would be that the ends of truth are not to be subserved by binding the parties with guarantees and vouchings, and that it is the business of a court of justice, in mere self-respect, to seek all sources of correct information, whatever foolish guarantees a party may or may not have chosen to make.

But there are three other answers, not merely in the nature of counter-arguments, that effectually dispose of the above reason: (1) The first is that, in point of fact, looking at the actual conduct of trials, neither party does know, and much less does he guarantee, the character and trustworthiness of the witnesses called by him:

1876, MAY, C. J., in "Some Rules of Evidence", 11 American Law Review 264: "But does common experience show that, from the given fact that a witness is brought into court by a party, it is to be inferred that he not only knows his character, but also that that character is such that 'in general' he is worthy of belief? . . . Witnesses are not made to order, — at least, not by honest people. The only witnesses who can properly be called are those who happen to have knowledge of relevant facts; and who these may be is predetermined by the history and course of the events which are to come under examination. . . . The witnesses to the material facts in dispute are such persons as happen to have been cognizant of the facts, and are not such as the parties have selected at their pleasure. In point of fact, it is substantially true that parties call particular persons as witnesses simply because they are obliged to and can call no others. If a lawsuit was a manufacture, and the party bringing it could select his materials — facts and witnesses —, there might be some propriety in holding him responsible for the character of these materials; but, as both are beyond his control, his responsibility for their character is out of the question. He comes into the court with the best materials he can get to make out his case."

(2) The second answer is that this theory of guaranteeing credibility is not true in law, i.e. is not practically enforced by any Court, and therefore is a mere empty phrase;[1] for the permission to-day universally accorded (post, § 907) to discredit one's witness by showing the facts to be contrary to his assertion, is wholly inconsistent with any guarantee of credibility. If there were such a guarantee, the party could not fly in the face of it by proving that his witness is not to be believed on that point. A Court which allows the party to disprove what his witness has said, and at the same time speaks of a guarantee of credibility as the reason for some other part of the rule, refutes itself, and the phrase about a guarantee of credibility becomes devoid of reality.

(3) The further logical inconsistency of this reason was long ago pointed out in another respect:

1827, Mr. Jeremy Bentham, Rationale of Judicial Evidence, b. III, c. IV (Bowring's ed., vol. VI, p. 401): "Two arguments, in some measure distinct, may be collected from the books: . . . 1. By calling for his testimony, you have admitted him to be a person of credit, acknowledged his trustworthiness; to seek to discredit him would be an inconsistency; and the success of your endeavours would be fatal to your cause; for, if his testimony be not to be believed, and you have none but his, then is your side of the cause without evidence. . . . [This argument rests upon] a false axiom of psychology. . . . The false axiom is this:—'All men belong to one or other of two classes—the trustworthy and the untrustworthy. The trustworthy never say anything but what is true: by them you never can be deceived. The untrustworthy never say anything but what is false: so sure as you believe them, so sure are you deceived.' . . . No man is so habitually mendacious as not to speak true a hundred times, for once that he speaks false; no man speaks falsehood for its own sake; no man departs from simple verity without a motive. . . . Exhibit in the strongest possible colours the untrustworthiness of your witness—his partiality to your adversary's side, and his improbity of character—, you discredit so much of his testimony as makes in favour of your adversary, but in the very same proportion you increase the trustworthiness of all that portion which makes in favour of yourself. . . . Among the means which the nature of things affords you for extracting the truth from this or any other unwilling bosom, is interrogation,—counter-interrogation, it may in one sense be called, in respect of its contrariety to the current of his wishes. 'No,' says one of the rules, 'this shall not be permitted to you.' 'Why?' says justice. 'Because,' adds the rule, 'this witness, this enemy of yours, is your witness.' . . . In the grammatical expression, 'your witness', howsoever applicable to him, what is there that should prevent your having permission to paint his disposition, any more than the disposition of any other person, in its real colours? . . . The tendency of this your counter-evidence is to place the value of your witness's testimony in its true light. 'No,' say the lawyers: 'we will not have it placed in its true light: the situation, the moral situation, in which the witness is placed—the sinister interests to the action of which he is exposed—shall not be presented to view.' 'Oh, but what you contend for is an inconsistency: you want the same man to be regarded as credible and incredible—as speaking true, and speaking false.' Not the smallest inconsistency: what we want to have thought true of this man, is no more than what is true of every man."

§ 899. Third Reason: The Party ought not to have the means to Coerce his Witness. The truth is that the Courts affecting the foregoing reasons have sought too much in the realm of objective arguments. They have thought of visiting punishment on the head of offending parties, or of leaving them to suffer the consequences of their mistakes. This is not a high-minded nor a practical attitude for a tribunal seeking truth, nor is it in harmony with the policy of other rules of Evidence. This whole attitude must be abandoned. What we are to ask is, Is there anything in the process of impeaching one's own witness which tends to restrict or impair the sources of evidence, to make competent evidence less plentiful or less trustworthy?

We should ask, not what the conduct of the party is, but what the effect is upon the witness.

Taking this subjective point of view, we find that there is something of a reason, — a reason easy to grasp, founded on reality, not on cant, legitimate in its policy, orthodox in its history, though narrow in its scope, — the reason that the party ought not to have the means to coerce his witnesses. It was laid down by Mr. Justice Buller, a century and a half ago, in terms which have been frequently quoted — more often quoted than acknowledged (as Serjeant Evans once said of his own writings):[1]

Ante 1767, BULLER, J., Trials at Nisi Prius, 297: "A party never shall be permitted to produce general evidence to discredit his own witness, for that would be to enable him to destroy the witness if he spoke against him, and to make him a good witness if he spoke for him, with the means in his hands of destroying his credit if he spoke against him."

1834, PUTNAM, J., in Whitaker v. Salisbury, 15 Pick. 545: "If this were not so, it would be in the power of any party merely by putting a witness upon the stand, to blacken and defame his general character for truth whenever the evidence should fall short of what was wanted."

The true foundation of policy (so far as there is any) is here manifest. If it were permissible, and therefore common, to impeach the character of one's witness whose testimony had been disappointing, no witness would care to risk the abuse of his character which might then be launched at him by the disappointed party. This fear of the possible consequences would operate subjectively to prevent a repentant witness from recanting a previously falsified story, and would more or less affect every witness who knew that the party calling him expected him to tell a particular story. Of this sort of abuse from the opposite side the witness is even now sufficiently afraid; were he liable to it from either side indiscriminately, the terrors of the witness-box would be doubled. Speculative as this danger may be, it furnishes the only shred of reason on which the rule may be supported. Moreover, it is the only reason which allows the details of the rule to be worked out consistently. What is this fear which we desire to save the witness? It must be a fear that would operate upon the ordinary witness honestly inclined. The fear that his character will be abused, — this is certainly a tangible and sufficient consideration. On the other hand, the fear that he will be shown to be affected by bias or interest, — this involves nothing disgraceful or derogatory to character, and is hardly worth considering. Thus this reason tests efficiently the various details of the rule.

But, after all, it is a reason of trifling practical weight. It cannot appreciably affect an honest and reputable witness. The only person whom it could really concern is the disreputable and shifty witness; and what good reason is there why he should not be exposed? That he would adhere to false testimony solely for fear of exposure by the party calling him is unlikely; because his reputation would in that case equally be used against him by the opponent. It therefore becomes merely a question which of the two parties may properly expose him. Is there any reason of moral fairness which forbids this to the party calling him? The rational answer must be in the negative. There is no substantial reason for preserving this rule, — the remnant of a primitive notion:

1876, MAY, C. J., in "Some Rules of Evidence", 11 American Law Review 267: "Courts are not established to give that party his case who behaves best in court. If they were, it seems to us that the plaintiff stands quite as well in such a case, on the score of fairness, as the defendant, who lies in wait for the profits of treachery. . . . [It is improper that] an untruthful or incredible or unreliable witness by reason of moral infirmity may not be unmasked by any party in interest. . . . What more absurd than to ask a jury to find the truth upon the testimony of a witness notorious for not speaking the truth, all the while concealing from them the fact that he is or may be a false witness? And how can it be of importance to the main purpose of the trial how or by whom the fact that the witness is not to be relied upon is made known? . . . If he betrays the party who calls him, and falsifies in every statement which he makes, the opposite party will of course accept the treason, say nothing of impeachment, and leave the jury no alternative but to find an unjust verdict upon evidence which both the parties know to be the rankest perjury. Certainly a rule which may produce such a result ought to be at once discarded, unless it can be shown to be of some special use in the general purposes of legal controversy. That a court of justice should permit such a miscarriage on the merits, because it sees, or fancies it sees, a shadow of unfairness in one of the parties in a matter collateral to the suit and in no way touching the justice of the case, is a reproach which ought to be done away. Nobody can profit by the rule but the witness and the antagonist of the party who calls him, and they only by the defeat of the ends of justice." [2]

Assuming the rule to rest upon the third reason above noted, it remains to ascertain the effect of this principle upon the various kinds of impeaching evidence.

§ 900. Bad Character. It has never been doubted that one effect of the rule is to exclude evidence of the witness' moral character; this much is clearly forbidden, whatever policy we accept as the support of the rule.[1] Upon the

§ 901. Bias, Interest, or Corruption. There is no reason whatever, upon correct policy, why this sort of evidence should be excluded; for neither interest nor bias are disgraces, the fear of which could be used to coerce a witness; and as for corruption by subornation or the like, it ought never to be left unmasked. Courts have, however, usually treated all these matters as included within the prohibition against impeachment, and excluded such evidence.[1]

N. Y. 166, 200); 1829, Fulton Bank v. Stafford, 2 Wend. 483, 485 (same).

Corruption; the practice has differed: 1838, Dunn v. Aslett, 2 M. & Rob. 122, Lord Denman, D. J. ("a party calling a witness may examine him as to any fact tending to show he has been induced to betray that party"; here, a recent intimacy with the opponent); 1905, State v. Moon, 71 Kan. 349, 80 Pac. 597 (a witness had before trial told the prosecution of the defendant's conversations planning the larceny; on the stand, the witness denied all these things; on cross-examination, the prosecution was allowed to ask about them; after adjournment, he was arrested for perjury; he then sent for the prosecuting attorney, and retracted, and next day on the stand retold his story with all details as to the defendant's subornation; held proper, in a good opinion by Burch, J.; this opinion is a brilliant example of what a Court can and should do in repudiating the artificial trammels of the present rule); 1874, State v. Shonhausen, 26 La. An. 421, 423 (excluding questions as to attempts to suborn witnesses).

§ 902. Prior Self-Contradictions: (1) Theory. The evidential nature of a contradictory statement made by the same person at another time is examined elsewhere (post, § 1018) in dealing with the various kinds of discrediting evidence. It is sufficient to note here that, in effect and primarily, it neutralizes the statement on the stand, by showing that the witness cannot be correct in both statements and is as likely to be wrong in the latter as in the former, and, furthermore, that his certain error in this one respect indicates a possibility of error upon other points. But what is not to be necessarily implied from this error is any reflection upon the witness' character, nor indeed upon any specific testimonial quality. The implication is merely that in some respect his testimonial capacity is capable of error, — perhaps in his observation, perhaps in his memory, perhaps through bias or corruption, perhaps through a dishonest disposition, but not definitely in any one of these qualities. Does, then, the principle of the rule forbidding the impeachment of one's own witness extend its prohibition to this sort of evidence?

Upon the second theory (ante, § 898), the cant theory, this evidence should logically be forbidden. If the party is to be taken as guaranteeing the witness' credibility, clearly he is prohibited from exposing, by any means whatever, an error of that witness, and especially an error which carries with it an implication of other errors, from whatever source.

But the correct theory of the rule (ante, § 899) by no means prevents an exposure of error through the present means. The policy of protecting the witness, subjectively, against the fear of being abused and held up to disgrace, in case he should disappoint the expectations of the party calling him, obviously cannot regard the exposure of a self-contradiction as a legitimate reason for such apprehension on the part of the witness. There is no necessary implication of bad character, no smirching of reputation, no exposure of misdeeds on cross-examination, nothing that could fairly operate to coerce either an honest or a dishonest witness to persist in an incorrect story through fear of the party calling him. An honest witness could readily explain how he came to make the former statement; a dishonest one would not be deterred from returning to truth by such a trifling obstacle. On correct principles, Bias and Hostility; this has been allowed to be shown: 1899, Consol. Coal Co. v. Seniger, 179 Ill. 370, 53 N. E. 733 (cross-examination of a hostile witness to discredit memory, allowed); 1910, People v. Jacobs, 243 Ill. 580, 90 N. E. 1092 (cross-examination of a physician as to a letter by grand jurors criticizing him, held improper); 1918, Avery v. Howell, 102 Kan. 527, 171 Pac. 628, semble (left to the trial Court's discretion); 1921, State v. Sanborn, — Me. —, 113 Atl. 54 (the State, on a charge of assault, called J. to the stand, "without previous interview"; held, that the State could by another witness show that Jones "by bias or by interest . . . was partial to the respondent's side"; the above text approved); 1860, Carr v. Moore, 41 N. H. 131, 134 (allowed after cross-examination by the opponent).

Contra: 1919, McLaughlin v. Los Angeles R. Co., 180 Cal. 527, 182 Pac. 44 (cross-examination of one's own expert witness "merely for the purpose of showing bias" in favor of the opponent, held improper; this prohibitive rule obstructs the truth, and is really only a rule making the game more complex and therefore more difficult to play correctly, therefore one in which success depends not so much on the party's facts and merits as on his ability to select a skilful trial lawyer; we should not permit ourselves any longer to maintain rules of that kind).

then, the use of self-contradictory statements is not forbidden. But the case is even stronger; for the indirect effect of a self-contradiction, as reflecting on general credibility (post, § 1018), is not resorted to when such statements are used against one's own witness; for the effort is merely to nullify and remove the adverse and unexpected assertion, and the party neither expects nor wishes to discredit the remainder of the testimony, which satisfies him well enough.

Thus, on the theory that the rule merely forbids an attack on general credibility, there is no breach of the rule in using evidence of self-contradictions. It may be said, therefore, that even upon the common theory — at least, its looser form (ante, § 898) — the use of self-contradictions is in truth not improper.

§ 903. Same: (2) Practical Reasons Pro and Con. But such has been the difference of opinion over this sort of evidence that the question of general principle has not always been regarded as controlling, and the controversy has rested on such reasons of practical convenience, peculiar to this sort of evidence, as could be advanced on either side. These arguments are represented in the following passages:

1834, DENMAN, L. C. J., in Wright v. Beckett, 1 Moo. & Rob. 418, 425: "The word 'credit' appears to me manifestly to be employed in the sense of 'general character': and, thus understood, the rule and the reason go well together, and are perfectly consonant to common sense; 'You shall not prove that man to be infamous whom you endeavored to pass off to the jury as respectable.' But how can this prevent me from showing that he states an untruth on a particular subject by producing the contrary statement previously made by him, which gave me just cause to expect the repetition of it now? If his character is injured, it is not directly but consequentially. But perhaps no injury may arise; there may be a defect of memory; there may be means of perfect explanation. If not, if the witness professing to be mine has been bribed by my adversary to deceive me, if, having taught me to expect the truth from him, he is induced by malice or corruption to turn round upon me with a newly invented falsehood, which defeats my just right and throws discredit on all my other witnesses, must I be prevented [from] showing the jury facts like these? . . . Can any reason, then, be assigned why, when equally deceived by his denying to-day what he asserted yesterday, you should be excluded from showing the contradiction into which (from whatever motive) he had fallen? It is clear that in civil cases the exclusion might produce great injustice, and in criminal cases improper acquittals and fraudulent convictions. . . . Indeed, the case of Ewer v. Ambrose presents a 'reductio ad absurdum' which can hardly be surpassed; for if the answer could not have been received at all, the same man might defeat on the same day a suit in Chancery and an action at law by swearing in the former to the affirmative and in the latter to the negative of the same proposition. . . . The inconvenience of procluding the proof tendered strikes my mind as infinitely greater than that of admitting it. For it is impossible to conceive a more frightful iniquity than the triumph of falsehood and treachery in a witness who pledges himself to depose the truth when brought into Court, and in the meantime is persuaded to swear, when he appears, to a completely inconsistent story. The dangers on the other hand, though doubtless very fit subjects of precaution in the progress of a trial, exist at present in equal degree with reference to modes of proceeding which have never yet been questioned. The most obvious and striking danger is that of collusion. An attorney may induce a man to make a false statement without oath for the mere purpose of contradicting by that statement the truth, which when sworn as a witness he must reveal. The two parties concerned in this imagined collusion must be utterly lost to every sense of shame as well as honesty; but there is another mode by which their wicked conspiracy could be just as easily effected. The statement might be made and then the witness might tender himself to the opposite party, for whom he might be set up, and afterwards prostrated by his former statement; this far more effectual stratagem could be prevented by no rule of law. The other danger is that the statement, which is admissible only to contradict the witness, may be taken as substantive proof in the cause. But this danger arises equally from the contradiction of an adverse witness; it is met by the Judge pointing out the distinction to the jury and warning them not to be misled; it is not so abstruse but that Judges may explain it and juries perceive its reasonableness; and it is probable that they most commonly discard entirely the evidence of him, who has stated falsehoods, whether sworn or unsworn."

1824, Mr. Thomas Starkie, Evidence, 217: "The resolution of this doubt depends, as it seems, on the considerations [1] whether in the abstract such evidence is essential to justice; and if so, then whether the party is to be excluded from such evidence either by reason of [2] any objection in the nature of an estoppel, or [3] of any collateral inconvenience which might result. [1] As a general proposition, it is essential to justice that in a case where the testimony of two witnesses upon a question of fact is contradictory, every aid should be afforded to enable the jury to decide which of them is better entitled to credit. . . . [2] If, as an abstract position, it be essential to the end of truth that such evidence should be submitted to a jury, it remains to consider in the first place whether the party having called the witness is, as it were, to be estopped from afterwards so impeaching his credit. It is difficult to come to this conclusion. A party who is prepared with general evidence to show that a witness whom he calls is wholly incompetent acts unfairly and inconsistently; for, knowing his witness to be undeserving of credit, he offers him to the jury as the witness of truth, and attempts to take an unfair advantage by concealing or disclosing the real character of his witness as best suits his purpose; but a party may impeach his own business in the mode without incurring any such blame; he may have been purposely deceived by the witness, or, though not under a legal necessity to call him, may be constrained by paucity of evidence under the particular circumstances. . . . [3] Considering the admission of such evidence in its tendency to occasion collateral inconvenience, the argument that a party ought not to be allowed to discredit his own witness by general evidence seems to have little weight; the contradiction proposed being plainly distinguishable. . . . A party may with perfect propriety and consistency insist on the general competency of his witness, although he alleges that his testimony as to one particular fact is erroneous."

1853, Common Law Practice Commissioners, Second Report, 16; Jervis (later C. J.), Martin (later B.), Walton, Bramwell (later B. and L. J.), Willes (later J.), and Cockburn (later L. C. J.) (after declaring that "the weight of reason and argument appears to us to be decidedly in favor of the affirmative" for admission, they proceed): "For the admissibility of the proposed evidence, it is said that this course is necessary as a security against the contrivance of an artful witness who otherwise might recommend himself to the party by the promise of favorable evidence (being really in the interest of the opposite party), and afterwards by hostile evidence ruin his cause; . . . that such a power is necessary for the purpose of placing the witness fairly and completely before the Court, and for enabling the jury to ascertain how far he deserves to be believed; that the ends of justice are best attained by allowing the fullest power for scrutinizing and correcting evidence, and that the exclusion of the proof of contrary statements might be attended with the worst consequences. The chief objection to the proposed evidence appears to be that a party, after calling a witness as a witness of credit, ought not to be allowed to discredit him. The objection proceeds upon the supposition that the party first acts on one principle, and afterwards, being disappointed by the witness, turns around and acts upon another, thus imputing to the party something of double dealing or dishonest practice.

But it is evident that this does not apply to the case where a party, having given credit to a witness, is deceived by him and first discovers the deceit at the trial of the cause. To reject the proposed evidence in such a case, and repress the truth, would be to allow the witness to deceive both jury and party."

1870, Mr. J. H. BENTON, Jr., 'arguendo', in Hurlbert v. Bellows, 50 N. H. 112: "We submit that a party does not, by calling a witness, upon one point, vouch for him as entitled to credit upon every point to which he may be called in the case by anybody. He may know very little of the witness. He may even believe his character to be doubtful, and still properly believe that his statements upon the point to which he calls him are true. In such a case there is no reason for saying that the party or his attorney are practising a fraud upon the Court, or asking the jury to give the witness any more credit than he is entitled to. The party calls the witness in good faith, relying upon his previous statements, believing that he will state the truth, and asking for his testimony the exact credit to which it is entitled. Now if the witness has deceived him, and testifies contrary to those statements, ought not the party to be allowed to show the deception, that the contradiction may be made manifest and the testimony weighed in the scales of truth? Suppose the contradiction does discredit the witness; if his testimony is unworthy of belief, ought not the jury to know it? . . . [By the opposite rule] a party who has been entrapped and deceived by a dishonest and lying witness is compelled to practice an unwilling, but none the less dangerous fraud upon the Court; and thus, not only his interests, but what is of infinitely more importance than the interests of any party, the cause of justice itself, is sacrificed to an unreasonable construction of the law."

1922, BLUME, J., in Crago v. State, — Wyo. —, 202 Pac. 1099: "The legal situation on this subject in the courts of the United States about the middle of the last century was that no party was permitted to discredit his own witness by showing that the latter had made statements out of court inconsistent with the statements made at the trial, unless the witness was one whom the party was compelled to call, as, for instance, a witness to a will; but a party was, in some instances, permitted to examine his witnesses in regard to such inconsistent statements for the purpose of refreshing his recollection. Further than that the courts would not go. Then came the era of legislation, where laws were enacted in some of the states similar to § 5809 of our statute; and, perhaps mainly under the influence of such legislation, Courts came to modify their views, permitting generally examination of the witness for the purpose of refreshing his recollection, and also permitting, under certain conditions and with certain limitations, proof or previous statements made out of court. We have twice held that a party's own witness could be examined, calling his attention to former statements made, for the purpose of refreshing his recollection: but we have not heretofore been called upon to decide whether the additional step could be taken of proving such former statements by other evidence. That is the question in this case. To this we now turn our attention.

"The purpose of impeaching one's own witness is to neutralize his testimony on the witness stand. But neither Courts nor Legislatures have permitted this to be done by attacking the general character of a witness. This character is, generally at least, known to a party just as well before as during a trial, and courts will not tolerate that he, vouching for the good character of a witness when producing him, should play fast and loose, get the advantage of the testimony if favorable, but repudiate it if unfavorable. Section 5809 of our statute recognizes this principle. But there are times when a party may be imposed upon; he may be deceived and surprised by a witness; the witness may be allured away from him, and from the path of truth. It would be harsh and unjust that a party should be put at the mercy of such witness or of an unscrupulous adversary tampering with him. But the Courts prior to the second half of the last century did not deem these facts of sufficient importance so as to lay aside the old established rule; and to meet this situation, and remedy the evils pointed out, the character of legislation mentioned was passed."

There ought to be no hesitation upon the propriety of this evidence. It is receivable on three distinct considerations: 1. The principle of the rule is directed against Character evidence, and fails entirely to touch the present sort; 2. The dangers supposed to accompany its use are too speculative and trifling to merit consideration; 3. The exclusion of the evidence would be unjust (1) in depriving the party of the opportunity of exhibiting the truth and (2) in leaving him the prey of a hostile witness. The only real danger that is to be apprehended is that the contradictory statement may be taken by the jury as substantive testimony in the place of the statement on the stand; but this, though involving the Hearsay Rule (post, § 1018), is not a serious enough disadvantage to outweigh the above considerations, and can always be guarded against by proper instructions.

§ 904. Same: (3) Various Forms of Rule adopted by Different Courts. The rulings, however, exhibit more than two attitudes taken towards the use of this evidence. There are, of course,

(1) Courts which admit the evidence freely in any shape; [1] and

(2) Courts which reject the evidence absolutely in every shape.[2] But there are also several attitudes of compromise and modification, the theories which need to be examined before noting the rulings.

(3) There is the view which admits the evidence after a showing that the party has been surprised (or "entrapped", "misled") by his witness, or, as it is sometimes put, that the witness unexpectedly proves adverse:[3]

1909, FURMAN, P. J., in Sturgis v. State, 2 Okl. Cr. 362, 102 Pac. 57: "The great weight of modern authority is that a party, upon grounds of surprise at and injury from the testimony so given may, in the discretion of the trial Court, offer in evidence previous statements of such witness which contradict the injurious portion of his testimony. This rule is necessary for the protection of litigants against the contrivance of artful and designing witnesses. If a witness had deceived the party calling him (to the injury of such party), it would be manifestly unjust to hold the party to be bound by such deception and to prevent him from relieving himself of such injury. This is the philosophy of the law, upon which parties are permitted to offer contradictory statements made by their witnesses, for the purpose of impeaching them. But this rule is subject to certain conditions: First, The party must be surprised at the testimony of the witness sought to be so impeached, and this surprise must exist as a matter of fact; that is, it must be based upon such facts as would give the party reasonable ground to believe that the witness would testify favorably to such party. If the facts were such that the party had no reasonable ground to believe, when he placed such witness on the stand, that the witness would so testify, then no surprise could exist

§ 904. [1] E.g. in most of the statutes, post. In England by statute the discretion of the trial judge controls; in Kansas, the Court has followed this form.

[2] In many of the earlier rulings, before the distinction as to refreshing recollection was taken.

The learned opinion of Mr. J. Blume in Crago v. State (1922), — Wyo. —, 202 Pac. 1099, summarizes the early history of the rule in the several State Courts.

[3] E.g. in Missouri, Dunn v. Dunnaker (if "entrapped"); in New Hampshire, Hurlburt v. Bellows (in case of surprise by an adverse witness, provided the party acts in good faith); in Mississippi, Dunlap v. Richardson ("deceived or misled", etc.); and in probably the majority of jurisdictions. Some Courts carelessly speak of the evidence as admissible "to show surprise." But the surprise is not the thing to be shown by the evidence; it is the surprise that allows the evidence to be received.

at the failure of the witness to give such testimony, and statements previously made by the witness, contradicting the testimony given, would not be admissible. Second, It is not enough that the witness failed to testify favorably to the party calling him, in order that previous contradictory statements made by such witness may be introduced in evidence, but the witness must have testified to facts injurious to the party calling him before he can be so impeached. . . .

"The restrictions, above stated, upon the right of a party to impeach his own witness by showing contradictory statements made by such witness, are supported by the soundest reasons, and are based upon the highest considerations of public policy. If the State has the right, upon the plea of impeaching its own witness, to introduce statements made by such witness contradictory of his testimony given in court, and thus get hearsay before the jury, as original substantive evidence against a defendant, then in all fairness and justice we would be compelled to hold that the defendant had the same right. The far-reaching and ruinous consequences of such a rule are manifest. A defendant could place a witness upon the stand and, after asking him a few general questions, could then ask the witness if he had not made a statement (giving the statement in full) to the defendant, and other persons, which would constitute a complete defense. Upon the denial of the witness that he had made such a statement, the defendant could then place the parties named upon the witness stand and prove that the first witness had made such statements. If a defendant could do as was permitted to be done by the State in this case, it would be impossible to secure a single conviction, and no one would be subject to the pains and penalties of perjury. There are already too many loopholes for the escape of the guilty. This Court will not add to or enlarge these avenues of escape; on the contrary, it is our purpose to close them up as far as possible."

This rule does not practically often exclude, since the party is in most cases the victim of such a surprise. But there are two objections to this limitation: (a) Even if the party does know beforehand (by a letter from the witness, for example), that the witness will not adhere to his original story, there is no harm done by allowing him, if he sees fit to call a witness against himself, to show the contradiction; for that is exactly what he could have done if he had left it to the other party to call the witness; he has in fact on the whole profited less than if the latter course had been pursued. (b) In most cases, the contradiction will deal with only one item in the whole story of the witness; and there is no reason why the party should not get the benefit of the witness' testimony on the remaining points and yet show him mistaken in this one item; such a course is in no way dishonest, and to forbid it is to impose a captious and purposeless restriction and to suppress a portion of the truth.

(4) Another typical attitude is to exclude the self-contradiction if offered by extrinsic testimony, but to allow it if brought out by a question to the witness himself.[4] This compromise course, too, has nothing in its favor. If a contradiction may be shown, there is no good reason why the party should be restricted to a particular method of showing it. The doctrine of confusion of issues by outside testimony (post, § 1019) cannot apply, for it ex-

[4] E.g. in Alabama, Campbell v. State; but these rulings usually simply reserve for the future the question of admitting outside testimony, and do not definitely reject it.

A sub-variety occurs in North Dakota (George v. Triplett), where there must be surprise by a hostile witness.

cludes only contradictions on collateral points; these could not be used even against an opponent's witness, and it may be conceded that the offered contradiction must deal with a material point.

(5) Another type of rule is to exclude all use of self-contradictory statements as such, i.e. as discrediting the witness' statement on the stand, whether offered by extrinsic testimony or brought out by questions to the witness; but to allow the witness himself to be questioned about the former statement purely for the purpose of stimulating his recollection and inducing him to make a correction. This form is second in popularity:

1850, COLERIDGE, J., in Melhuish v. Collier, 19 L. J. Q. B. 493: "A witness from flurry or forgetfulness may omit facts, and on being reminded may carry his recollection back so as to be able to give his evidence fully and correctly, and a question for that purpose may properly be put. . . . It is objected that the object of the question put here was to contradict and not to remind the witness, and that therefore it could not be put. It is certainly very difficult to draw the line in practice, and I am not now disposed to do it."

1889, ELLIOTT, J., in Babcock v. People, 13 Colo. 519, 22 Pac. 817: "The tendency of recent legislation, as well of modern decisions, has been to relax somewhat the rules of evidence, so as to afford better opportunity for the development of truth. Modern experience has also shown that a party may sometimes be deceived in the character and animus of a witness whom he has called, as well as in the testimony he is expected to give; and he learns, after the witness begins to testify — a very inopportune time — that he has to encounter bitter and unscrupulous opposition where he had expected to receive only fair and honorable treatment. This may be evinced by reluctance or evasion on the part of the witness in answering questions, or by too great readiness in making or volunteering damaging statements contrary to his previous version of the matter. Under such circumstances, . . . in extreme cases, where it is apparent that a witness is giving testimony contrary to the reasonable expectation of the party calling him, such party should be allowed to cross-examine such witness, for the purpose of refreshing his recollection, with the view of modifying his testimony or of revealing his animus in the case, . . . and to ask him if he has not theretofore made other or different statements from those he has just given in evidence."

This form of the rule has the merit of being consistent with itself, and of recognizing that, however improper it may be thought to be to impeach by self-contradictions, nevertheless this doctrine should in no way prevent the always legitimate effort of the party to stimulate his witness' memory and obviate the effect of temporary forgetfulness.[5] Some Courts allow the question only on condition that the witness is hostile, — a limitation without precedent or justification.[6] One or two Courts refuse to allow at all this method of refreshing recollection; but this involves the question what methods of refreshing recollection are legitimate, and has already been dealt with (ante, § 761).

(6) Another attitude is a kind of compromise between the last two; excluding outside evidence, it allows only the question to be put, primarily

[5] Examples of this may be seen in Iowa, Hall v. R. Co.; in Louisiana, State v. Vickers; in Michigan, Dillon v. Pinch; in South Carolina, State v. Johnson.

[6] E.g. in Minnesota, State v. Tall; in Ohio, Hurley v. State, with a flavor also of the next form.

to stimulate recollection, but does not object to the incidental discrediting which may ensue:[7]

1873, RAPALLO, J., in Bullard v. Pearsall, 53 N. Y. 231: "Such questions may be asked of the witness for the purpose of probing his recollection, recalling to his mind the statements he has previously made, and drawing out an explanation of the apparent inconsistency. This course of examination may result in satisfying the witness that he has fallen into error and that his original statements were correct; and it is calculated to elicit the truth. It is also proper for the purpose of showing the circumstances which induced the party to call him. Though the answers of the witness may involve him in contradictions calculated to impair his credibility, that is not a sufficient reason for excluding the inquiry; . . . inquiries calculated to elicit the facts, or to show to the witness that he is mistaken, and to induce him to correct his evidence, should not be excluded simply because they may result unfavorably to his credibility."

1895, CORLISS, J., in George v. Triplett, 5 N. D. 50, 63 N. W. 891: "This may be done . . . for the purpose of refreshing the recollections of the witness. . . . If the witness is in fact testifying falsely, it may bring him to the truth to probe his conscience, or to call to his mind the danger of punishment for perjury, in view of the fact that he has, by statements out of court inconsistent with his testimony, furnished evidence for his conviction. Moreover, a lawyer of strong personality, burning with indignation at the witness' deceit, may cow and break down a corrupt witness who has told him or his client a different story."

(7) Still another hybrid form of the rule allows the question to be put to the witness, primarily to refresh recollection (as in one preceding form) or frankly to discredit (as in another); but it allows outside testimony to be offered in case the witness proves hostile.[8]

(8) Besides these various forms of the rule, there is found, among many of the Courts that freely admit the self-contradictory statements, a doctrine which excludes a certain class of such statements because they are not in any true sense contradictory, and merely serve to introduce flagrant hearsay. Thus, if A testifies that he knows nothing of the affray in question, this doctrine would forbid the admission of his former statement describing the affair in detail. Now the theory that this is not a self-contradiction[9] seems unsound; for he is clearly false in one or the other of his statements, since one of them in effect asserts that he knows about the affair and the other asserts that he does not. But the additional argument[10] that the admission of such statements would practically allow a party to re-enforce by pure hearsay statements the gaps in his witness' statement is a more plausible reason for the prohibition; for it appeals to the well-established though un-

[7] Other examples may be found in Alabama, Hemingway v. Garth; in Wyoming, Arnold v. State, with a peculiar limitation.

[10] 1890, Thayer, C. J., in Langford v. Jones, 18 Or. 307, 327, 22 Pac. 1064 ("If it were proper [to offer such evidence], a case could be made out many times by proof of what third persons had said; it would only be necessary to call the persons as witnesses and attempt to show by them the substance of the matter embraced in the statements, and, having failed in that, then to prove what such persons had said at another time and place, when they were not under oath, and obtain the benefit of that as direct evidence of the fact. Such a construction would enable parties to employ as a sword what was intended as a shield").

sound rule (post, §§ 1018, 1043) that a prior self-contradictory statement is obnoxious to the Hearsay rule, and assumes that this illegitimate effect of the statement would practically usurp entirely its function as a mere contradiction. It may be noted that the Courts enforcing this doctrine differ as to details. Some seem to exclude such statements in whatever form offered;[11] others allow them to be brought out by question to the witness.[12] Moreover, some Courts, instead of holding that the defect of the evidence consists in a lack of self-contradiction, phrase it that the witness is not "adverse", meaning that he has merely failed to help the party offering him.[13]

§ 905. Same: (4) State of the Law in the Various Jurisdictions. The foregoing forms of the rule have not always been consistently enforced even within the same jurisdiction.

In England, in particular, the rule has had a checkered course. Up to the middle of the 1800s the admissibility of this sort of evidence had not been generally conceded, and there were rulings looking in various directions.[1]

Hist. 369 (a question being asked as to former contradictory testimony, it was disallowed by the Judges, apparently on the principle of § 1043, post, and not as generally incompetent; such questions seem often to have been allowed elsewhere on this trial, e.g. 1788, May 7 and 28; part of the ruling is quoted in Starkie, Evidence, 220, and in Phillipps, Evidence, 5th Amer. ed., 310); 1803, R. v. Oldroyd, R. & R. 88 (the judge ordered a person named as witness for the prosecution to be examined, though the prosecutor strongly suspected her to be an accomplice and did not wish to examine her; her testimony favored the accused; and the judge ordered her deposition before the coroner to be read to show material discrepancies; held proper by all the Judges, as having been ordered by the judge; and Ellenborough, L. The majority of the Judges are of opinion that such a course ought not to be allowed; but some judges have continued until the end of their career to think that justice required that such evidence should be admitted"); 1850, The Lochlibo, 14 Jur. 792, Dr. Lushington (not deciding, but expressing a preference for the

At this time, as a result of the recommendation of the Commission on Procedure (quoted ante, § 903), a statute was enacted:

1854, St. 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, § 22: "[1] A party producing a witness shall not be allowed to impeach his credit by general evidence of bad character; [2] but he may, in case the witness shall in the opinion of the judge prove adverse, [3] contradict him by other evidence, [4] or by leave of the judge prove that he has made at other times a statement inconsistent with his present testimony."

It is easy to imagine the confusion caused by this misconceived paragraph; for the showing of an error by ordinary contradiction, provided for in clause [3], was already freely permissible without interference by the judge and whether or not the witness was adverse; the proviso contained in clause [2] was probably intended for clause [4] as an alternative suggestion, and when the Commission chose the phrase "by leave of the judge" and rejected the other, it was by some draughtsman's mistake transposed to clause [2] instead of being struck out. [As the statute stands, the present class of evidence, self-contradiction, is admissible only by leave of the judge and in case of a witness deemed adverse by the judge.] In Canada, the English statute has usually been adopted,—sometimes in a corrected form.[2] opinion of Bolland, B.; treating prior self-contradictions as a means "absolutely to discredit the witness", and indirectly equivalent to discrediting him by "general evidence"; also making the argument of policy, that "I have yet to learn that a witness is to be tied and pruned down by his signature before: I think it is for the interests of justice, and the only way to get at the truth, that a witness should go before the examiner to give his evidence not tied down or coerced by any statement previously made to any solicitor or proctor in the cause"; the learned Judge was probably moved by Scotch traditions); 1853, R. v. Williams, 8 Cox Cr. 343, Williams, J. (allowing a witness who has given an unexpected answer to be shown his deposition and then asked once more, and afterwards to be questioned in leading form from the deposition).

[2] The principal question of interpretation in the ensuing rulings is as to the meaning of "adverse": ENGLAND: 1858, Greenough v. Eccles, 5 C. B. N. S. 786, 28 L. J. C. P. 160 ("adverse" is interpreted as "hostile", in distinction from merely "unfavorable"; so that the conditions for use are (1) that the judge shall consider him hostile, and (2) that the judge shall also give leave, which he need not do even though the witness is hostile; Cockburn, C. J., not "altogether assenting"); 1858, Reed v. King, 30 L. T. R. 190 (a prior conversation with the offering party's attorney; excluded on obscure grounds); 1858, Faulkner v. Brine, 1 F. & F. 254, Lord Campbell, C. J. (permitting the question, but not clearly specifying the conditions); 1859, Dear v. Knight, 1 F. & F. 433, Erle, J. (same); Martin v. Ins. Co., 1 F. & F. 505, Wrightman, J. (same); but the practice in all three cases seems to be to treat any unfavorable statement on a material point as "adverse", thus negativing the interpretation of "hostile" accepted in Greenough v. Eccles; 1861, Jackson v. Thomason, 1 B. & S. 745 (allowing the use of a series of letters; Cockburn, C. J., intimating that a compulsory witness may still be attacked as at common law); 1863, Ryberg v. Smith, 32 L. J. P. M. & A. 112 (a useless precedent, since the Judge Ordinary excluded the evidence in entire forgetfulness of § 22); 1864, Cresswell v. Jackson, 4 F. & F. 3, Cockburn, C. J.; 1865, Pound v. Wilson, 4 F. & F. 301, Erle, C. J. (both apparently construing "adverse" as merely "different and unfavorable"); 1866, Coles v. Brown, L. R. 1 P. & D. 70, Sir J. P. Wilde, semble (adopting the distinction of Greenough v. Eccles); 1867, Amstell v. Alexander, 16 L. T. R. N. S. 830, Bramwell, B. (referring to the interpretation in Greenough v. Eccles, but apparently disapproving it and treating "adverse" as meaning "unfavorable"); 1883, R. v. Little, 15 Cox Cr. 319, Day, J. (the trial judge must find the witness to be "adverse", before admitting the self-contradiction; applying Can. Evid. Act § 9; and in so finding he cannot consider as evidence the self-contradictory statement itself; Irving, J. A., diss.); (like Eng. St. 1854, c. 125, § 22); N. Br. Cons. St. 1903, c. 127, § 15 (like Eng. St. 1854, c. 125, § 22); 1862, Davidson v. Arseneau, 5 All. N. Br. 289, semble (Melhuish v. Collier approved); Newf. Cons. St. 1916, c. 91, § 7 (like Eng. St. 1854, c. 125, § 22); N. Sc. Rev. St. 1900, c. 163, § 43 (like Eng. St. 1854, c. 125, § 22); Ont. Rev. St. 1897, c. 73, § 20 (like Eng. St. 1854, c. 125, § 22); 1881, Dunbar v. Meek, 32 U. C. Q. B. 195, 213 (statute applied); St. 1909, c. 43, § 20, R. S. 1914, c. 76, § 20 (like R. S. 1897, c. 73, § 20, but correcting the phrasing as in P. E. I. St. 1889, c. 9); P. E. I. St. 1889, c. 9, § 15 ("he may contradict him by other evidence, or, by leave of the judge in case the witness shall in the opinion of the judge prove adverse, prove that he has made at other times", etc., as in Eng. St. 1854, c. 125, § 22; this corrects the anomalous wording of the English statute); Sask. R. S. 1920, c. 44, Evidence Act, § 27 (like Eng. St. 1854, c. 125, § 22); Yukon: Consol. Ord. 1914, c. 30, § 40 (like Eng. St. 1854, c. 125, § 22).

Federal: 1884, The Charles Morgan, 115 U. S. 69, 77, 5 Sup. 1172; 1893, Hickory v. U. S., 151 U. S. 303, 309, 14 Sup. 334 (questioning allowed to refresh recollection and induce a correction; outside evidence intimated to be allowable in the discretion of the trial Court where the witness unexpectedly proves hostile; for other Federal decisions see ante, § 761); 1893, St. Clair v. U. S., 154 U. S. 134, 150, 14 Sup. 1002 ("The rule is correctly indicated by Greenleaf, when he says [§ 444], . . . [The party may] show that the evidence has taken him by surprise and is contrary to the examination of the witness preparatory to the trial"); 1899, Swift v. Short, 34 C. C. A. 545, 92 Fed. 567 ("under some circumstances . . . the party so deceived may impeach the witness to the extent of showing" prior contradictory statements); 1900, Clary v. Hardeeville Brick Co., 100 Fed. 915 (allowed, where the opponent's witness has not been allowed in chief to be cross-examined to self-contradictory statements under the rule of § 1885, post, and therefore is allowed to be recalled by the cross-examiner during his own case for that purpose); 1900, Hays v. Tacoma R. & P. Co., 106 Fed. 48 (allowed, in case of surprise); 1901, Tacoma R. & P. Co. v. Hays, 49 C. C. A. 115, 110 Fed. 496 (trial Court's discretion conceded; following Hickory v. U. S.); 1896, Putnam v. U. S., 162 U. S. 687, 16 Sup. 923 (cited ante, § 761, n. 5; this case confuses several principles, and should have no weight); 1918, Rosenthal v. U. S., 8th C. C. A., 248 Fed. 684 (reading of the whole of prior testimony, held improper on the facts);

Alabama: 1829, Winston v. Moseley, 2 Stew. 137, semble (excluded); 1853, Campbell v. State, 23 Ala. 44, 76 (after examining the authorities, admits the question to the witness, to discredit; but leaves undecided the admissibility of outside evidence); 1874, Hemingway v. Garth, 51 Ala. 530 ("It is not an objection to such evidence that it has a tendency to impeach the witness"; admitting a question to the witness); 1892, Thompson v. State, 99 Ala. 173, 175, 13 So. 753 (refreshing memory by calling attention to report of former testimony, allowed); 1892, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hurt, 101 Ala. 34, 43, 13 So. 130 (questions as to former testimony, allowed to refresh memory); 1896, Feibelman v. Assur. Co., 108 Ala. 180, 19 So. 540 (admitting the question to stimulate recollection, after unfavorable testimony); 1898, Thomas v. State, 117 Ala. 178, 23 So. 665 (allowed on cross-examination "to show surprise", in spite of incidental discrediting; Coleman, J., diss.); 1900, Schieffelin v. Schieffelin, 127 Ala. 14, 28 So. 687 (allowable in case of surprise or to refresh memory); 1921, Thomas v. State, 206 Ala. 416, 90 So. 295 (homicide; self-contradiction, admitted);

Alaska: Comp. L. 1913, § 1499 (like Or. Laws 1921, § 861);

Arkansas: Dig. 1919, § 4186 (may show "that he has made statements different from his present testimony"); 1884, Ward v. Young, 42 Ark. 543, 553 (statute applied); 1914, Jonesboro L. C. & E. R. Co. v. Gainer, 112 Ark. 477, 481, 166 S. W. 571 (contradiction, proved by other witnesses, allowable "where a party is taken by surprise"); 1914, Williams v. Cantwell, 114 Ark. 542, 170 S. W. 250 (similar ruling; foregoing case not cited); 1915, Shands v. State, 118 Ark. 458, 177 S. W. 18 (similar ruling, citing Williams v. Cantwell); 1920, Doran v. State, 141 Ark. 442, 217 S. W. 485 (self-contradiction as to defendant's admission, not allowed, no surprise being shown; this Court has now virtually read away the express provisions of the statute); 1921, Garrison v. State, 148 Ark. 370, 230 S. W. 4 (cross-examination to contrary statement, allowed in case of surprise);

California: C. C. P. 1872, § 2049 ("The party producing a witness . . . may also show that he has made at other times statements inconsistent with his present testimony"); 1874, People v. Jacobs, 49 Cal. 384 (the testimony not being hostile, but merely falling short of what was expected, questions as to former statements were allowed, but outside evidence was excluded; intimating that for a witness unexpectedly hostile the evidence would be received); 1889, People v. Bushton, 80 Cal. 161, 22 Pac. 127, 549 (former testimony at a coroner's inquest read over to the witness, and then, on his denial, allowed to be proved; no cases cited); 1891, People v. Wallace, 89 Cal. 158, 163, 26 Pac. 650 (same as People v. Jacobs in facts; outside evidence of prior declarations excluded, since they would "enable the party to get the naked declarations of the witness before the jury as independent evidence"); 1892, People v. Mitchell, 94 Cal. 550, 556, 29 Pac. 1106 (same as People v. Jacobs, in facts; but even the question was not allowed, by a misunderstanding of the Jacobs ruling); 1893, People v. Kruger, 100 Cal. 523, 35 Pac. 88 (rule of surprise applied); 1894, Re Kennedy, 104 Cal. 429, 431, 38 Pac. 93 (like People v. Wallace); 1895, Hyde v. Buckner, 108 Cal. 522, 41 Pac. 416 (admitting outside testimony in case of surprise); 1896, People v. Crespi, 115 Cal. 50, 46 Pac. 863 (excluded, because offered as a substitute for testimony and not merely to show surprise); 1897, People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179, 48 Pac. 75 (reading from former testimony, allowed); 1897, Thiele v. Newman, 116 Cal. 571, 48 Pac. 713 (outside testimony, allowed, in case of surprise); 1904, People v. Creeks, 141 Cal. 532, 75 Pac. 101 (like People v. Crespi, supra); 1905, People v. Cook, 148 Cal. 334, 83 Pac. 43 (cross-examination by the prosecution to several contrary statements, allowed on the facts); 1908, Zipperlen v. Southern Pac. Co., 7 Cal. App. 206, 93 Pac. 1049 (allowable in case of adverse testimony surprising the attorney); 1908, Dolbeer's Estate, 153 Cal. 652, 96 Pac. 266 (declarations excluded, where there was no surprise);

Colorado: 1889, Babcock v. People, 13 Colo. 519, 22 Pac. 813 (excluding outside testimony, but admitting the question to stimulate recollection; see quotation ante, § 904);

Columbia (Dist.): Code 1901, § 1073 a (when a party producing a witness has been "taken by surprise by the testimony of such witness", the Court may in discretion allow the party to prove "for the purpose only of affecting the credibility of the witness, that the witness has made to such party or to his attorney statements substantially variant from his sworn testimony about material facts in the cause", upon due warning as to the "circumstances of the supposed statement" and an opportunity to explain); 1894, Weaver v. B. & O. R. Co., 3 D. C. App. 436, 448 (prior testimony, not allowed to be asked for on cross-examination; partly on the ground of the trial Court's discretion, partly on other mixed grounds; general principle of surprise conceded, at least so as to permit cross-examination to such matters); 1895, Stearman v. R. Co., 6 D. C. App. 46, 51 (refreshing his recollection by reading aloud to him, in the jury's presence, his former affidavit, held properly refused);

Connecticut: 1896, Wheeler v. Thomas, 67, Conn. 577, 35 Atl. 499 (excluded); 1902, Carpenter's Appeal, 74 Conn. 431, 51 Atl. 126 (allowable in the discretion of the trial Court, where the party is surprised);

Delaware: 1899, State v. Wright, 2 Pen. 228, 45 Atl. 395 (may "contradict his own witness when taken by surprise"); 1899, State v. Quinn, 2 Pen. 339, 45 Atl. 544 (admissible where surprise is suggested);

Florida: Rev. G. S. 1919, § 2710 (a party "may, in case the witness prove adverse, contradict him by other evidence, or prove that he has made at other times a statement inconsistent with his present testimony"); 1899, Mercer v. State, 41 Fla. 279, 26 So. 317 (witness to immaterial matter cannot be "adverse"); 1903, Bryan v. State, 45 Fla. 8, 34 So. 243 (statute applied; whether a witness is "adverse", is much in the trial Court's discretion); 1903, Sylvester v. State, 46 Fla. 166, 35 So. 142 (prior statements of a witness not appearing hostile, not admitted to impeach; semble, admissible to refresh memory);

Georgia: Rev. C. 1910, § 5879, P. C. § 1050 (impeachment, in general, allowable "where he can show to the Court that he has been entrapped by the witness by a previous contradictory statement"); statute applied in the following rulings: 1874, McDaniel v. State, 53 Ga. 253; 1878, Garrett v. Sparks, 60 Ga. 582, 586; 1881, Cox v. Prater, 67 Ga. 588, 593; 1891, Dixon v. State, 86 Ga. 754, 13 S. E. 87; 1919, Booth v. State, 24 Ga. App. 275, 100 S. E. 723 (self-contradictions, not allowed, unless the witness has entrapped the party by previous statements);

Hawaii: Rev. L. 1915, § 2618 ("in case the witness shall in the opinion of the Court . . . prove adverse", the party producing him "may by leave of such Court or person prove that he has made at other times a statement inconsistent with his present testimony"); 1898, Kwong Lee Wai v. Ching Sai, 11 Haw. 444, 448 (in case of surprise, the witness may be asked about a prior inconsistent statement, and extrinsic proof of it may be made);

Idaho: Comp. St. 1919, § 8036 (like Cal. C. C.

P. § 2049); 1900, State v. Corcoran, 7 Ida. 220, 61 Pac. 1034 (statute applied); 1910, State v. Marren, 17 Ida. 766, 107 Pac. 993 (witness allowed to refresh his memory from report of his former testimony);

Illinois: 1906, Chicago C. R. Co. v. Gregory, 221 Ill. 591, 77 N. E. 1112 (contradiction of a medical witness by his memorandum given beforehand to the party, not allowed, for impeaching him); 1909, People v. Lukoszno, 242 Ill. 101, 89 N. E. 749 (cross-examination allowed: "he had a right either to refresh the memory of the witness if he was forgetful, or to probe his conscience and move him to relent and speak the truth if he was wilfully erring"); 1911, People v. Cotton, 250 Ill. 338, 95 N. E. 283 (allowing refreshment of recollection, for a forgetful witness, by reference to his former testimony; here the forgetfulness was "intentional"); 1915, People v. O'Gara, 271 Ill. 138, 110 N. E. 828 (rule applied); 1921, People v. Scott, 296 Ill. 268, 129 N. E. 798 (former testimony at the inquest identifying the defendant, not allowed to be used except to refresh memory and impeach credibility);

Indiana: Burns' Ann. St. 1914, § 531 (party may "in all cases contradict him . . . by showing that he has made statements different from his present testimony"); the original Civil Code section contained a similar provision: 1861, Judy v. Johnson, 16 Ind. 371; 1862, Hill v. Goode, 18 Ind. 207, 209; but the Criminal Code at that time lacked such a provision: 1860, Quinn v. State, 14 Ind. 589 (applying the rule of exclusion to criminal cases); 1870, Howard v. State, 32 Ind. 478 (cross-examination only, allowed, to "refresh the memory of the witness and give him the opportunity to set the matter right"); this lack, in criminal cases, was supplied by Rev. St. 1881, § 1796; and the statutory rule has since been applied as follows: 1883, Hull v. State, 98 Ind. 128, 132 (excluded, where the witness simply fails to make the desired assertion); 1888, Conway v. State, 118 Ind. 482, 488, 21 N. E. 285 ("the only limitation is that . . . he has given testimony prejudicial to the party"); 1890, Miller v. Cook, 124 Ind. 101, 104, 24 N. E. 577 (like Hull v. State); 1889, Crocker v. Agenbroad, 122 Ind. 585, 24 N. E. 169; 1895, Blough v. Parry, 144 Ind. 463, 40 N. E. 70 (like Hull v. State); 1901, Adams v. State, 156 Ind. 596, 59 N. E. 24; (statute applied); 1905, Walker v. State, 165 Ind. 94, 74 N. E. 604 (statute applied, in a bastardy case, to impeach the third person called by the defendant and said to be the father of the child);

Iowa. 1886, Humble v. Shoemaker, 70 Ia. 223, 226, 30 N. W. 492 (question allowed, to refresh recollection and induce correction); 1888, State v. Cummins, 76 Ia. 133, 135, 40 N. W. 124 (question allowed, to refresh recollection); 1892, Hall v. R. Co., 84 Ia. 311, 315, 51 N. W. 150 (question allowed, to refresh his recollection, to allow him to make a correction, and "to show that it has surprised the party who called him"; but no outside testimony allowable); 1896, Spaulding v. R. Co., 98 Ia. 205, 67 N. W. 227 (question as to testimony at a former trial, admitted "to test and quicken his recollection, and give him an opportunity to correct his testimony"); 1896, Hall v. Manson, 99 Ia. 698, 68 N. W. 922 (apparently allowing the witness to be questioned, but rejecting outside testimony); 1894, Smith v. Dawley, 92 Ia. 312, 60 N. W. 625 (excluding outside testimony);

Kansas: 1882, Johnson v. Leggett, 28 Kan. 590, 605 (the trial Court "may, when it thinks the interests of justice require, permit a party to show that he is unexpectedly mistaken in the testimony of any witness, that he had good reason to expect other testimony, and what such other testimony would be"); 1886, St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Weaver, 35 Kan. 412, 431 (admitted, in discretion, by outside testimony); 1892, State v. Sorter, 52 Kan. 531, 34 Pac. 1036 (admitted); 1894, State v. Keefe, 54 Kan. 197, 201, 38 Pac. 302 (Johnson v. Leggett followed); 1905, State v. Moon, 71 Kan. 349, 80 Pac. 597 (Johnson v. Leggett followed; see the citation ante, § 901); 1916, Nuzum v. Springer, 97 Kan. 744, 156 Pac. 704 (bank-transaction; an inconsistent affidavit, held usable in the trial Court's discretion); 1916, State v. Terry, 98 Kan. 796; 161 Pac. 905 (rape under age; the female allowed to be examined by the prosecution as to her change of testimony);

Kentucky: C. C. P. 1895, § 596 (allowed unconditionally); applied in the following cases. 1859, Champ v. Com., 2 Metc. 17, 23 (here the statement was excluded, because the witness had simply failed to allude to the matter on the stand); 1876, Blackburn v. Com., 12 Bush 181, 184; 1892, Wren v. R. Co., — Ky. —, 20 S. W. 215 (admitted); 1896, Pittsburg C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Lewis, — Ky. —, 38 S. W. 482, semble (admitted, to refresh recollection); 1901, Feltner v. Com., — Ky. —, 64 S. W. 959 (prior statements excluded; opinion obscure); 1903, Mosley v. Com., — Ky. —, 72 S. W. 344 (prior statements held admissible, under C. C. P. § 596, but not as substantive evidence); 1904, Com. v. Bavarian B. Co., — Ky. —, 80 S. W. 772 (use of former testimony as evidence under the guise of refreshing memory is not allowable); 1906, Garrison v. Com., 122 Ky. 882, 93 S. W. 594 (prosecution allowed to prove by other witnesses the witness' contrary assertions); 1907, Dukes v. Davis, 125 Ky. 313, 101 S. W. 390 (rule of C. C. P. § 596 applied); 1914, Rutland v. Com., 160 Ky. 77, 169 S. W. 584 (rule of C. C. P. § 596 applied);

Louisiana: 1876, State v. Thomas, 28 La. An. 827 (excluded); 1885, State v. Simon, 37 La. An. 569 (admitted, where it was incidental and the party was taken by surprise); 1886, State v. Boyd, 38 La. An. 105 (admissible, where the witness is unwilling, semble: none of the three cases consider the rule carefully); 1895, State

v. Johnson, 47 La. An. 1225, 17 So. 789 (admissible, in case of surprise); 1895, State v. Vickers, 47 La. An. 1574, 18 So. 639 (cross-question only admissible, in case of surprise and to stimulate recollection); 1900, State v. Robinson, 52 La. An. 616, 27 So. 124 (question as to former testimony, excluded on the facts; principle obscure); 1903, State v. Williams, 111 La. 179, 35 So. 505 (cross-examination allowed, in case of surprise, to stimulate recollection); 1906, State v. Stephens, 116 La. 36, 40 So. 523 (witness for the State; cross-examination allowable if the purpose is to stimulate recollection, but not "if the sole purpose . . . is to discredit him, . . . unless the party offering it has been entrapped into the calling a hostile witness", and even then only when the witness affirmatively testifies against him); 1913, State v. Robertson, 133 La. 806, 63 So. 363 (re-examination to a self-contradiction, held not improper on the facts; following State v. Williams); 1914, State v. Garner, 135 La. 746, 66 So. 181 (following State v. Williams); 1919, State v. Walters, 145 La. 209, 82 So. 197 (reading over former testimony to a witness now professing to have been drunk at the time of the homicide and to remember nothing, not allowed);

Maine: 1840, Dennett v. Dow, 17 Me. 19, 22 (excluded); 1847, Chamberlain v. Sands, 27 Me. 458, 466 (same);

Maryland: 1807, De Sobry v. De Laistre, 2 H. & J. 219 (a deposition abroad 'de bene' taken by defendant, allowed to be contradicted by defendant by letters to him from the opponent); 1821, Queen v. State, 5 H. & J. 232 (admitted); 1839, Franklin Bank v. Navig. Co., 11 G. & J. 36 (excluded); 1877, Sewell v. Gardner, 48 Md. 178, 183 (where the party was misled, he may "contradict the witness' statement by his own or other testimony"; here he was not misled);

Massachusetts: The common-law rulings were here inclined to a radical exclusion: 1852, Com. v. Starkweather, 10 Cush. 59 (exclusion of both question and outside evidence); 1855, Com. v. Welsh, 4 Gray 535, semble (same); 1858, Com. v. Hudson, 11 Gray 64 (same, even where the question was asked on cross-examination after the opponent had made the witness his own); 1867, Adams v. Wheeler, 13 Gray 67 (excluding statements which "can have no effect but to impair the credit of the witness with the jury"; reversing the question of admissibility to refresh recollection or in case of surprise by a hostile witness). But in 1869, by statute (Gen. L. 1920, c. 233, § 23 like Cal. C. C. P. § 2049, using "prove" instead of "show"), the use of the evidence was freely permitted; applied in the following rulings: 1869, Ryerson v. Abington, 102 Mass. 531; 1873, Brannon v. Hursell, 112 Mass. 63, 70; 1875, Day v. Cooley, 118 Mass. 524, 526; 1877, Force v. Martin, 122 Mass. 5; 1877, Brooks v. Weeks, 121 Mass. 433 (pointing out that the party need not show surprise); 1882, Com. v. Donahoe, 133 Mass. 407; 1899, Knight v. Rothschild, 172 Mass. 546, 52 N. E. 1062; 1916, Conklin v. John Howard Industrial Home, 224 Mass. 222, 112 N. E. 606 ("cross-examination", whatever that may mean, said to be in discretion of trial Court unless bias or prejudice is shown);

Michigan: 1895, People v. Case, 105 Mich. 92, 62 N. W. 1017 (opinion obscure; cross-examination to contrary statements in a deposition read to the witness, allowed); 1895, People v. O'Neill, 107 Mich. 556, 65 N. W. 540 (calling the attention of hostile witnesses to their testimony before the grand jury to refresh their memories, allowed); 1896, Dillon v. Pinch, 110 Mich. 149, 67 N. W. 1113 (the question may be put, in the trial Court's discretion); 1897, People v. Gillespie, 111 Mich. 241, 69 N. W. 490 (question as to a former contradictory affidavit allowed, to "induce the witness to state what she knew"); 1898, Gilbert v. R. Co., 116 Mich. 610, 74 N. W. 1010 (in discretion, the question may be put to refresh recollection); 1899, McGee v. Baumgartner, 121 Mich. 287, 80 N. W. 21 (inconsistent affidavit admitted, and witness' explanation that it was obtained by threats contradicted by the testimony of the drawer of the affidavit); 1902, People v. Payne, 131 Mich. 474, 91 N. W. 739 (cross-examination to the contrary statement, allowed, "not as substantive proof, but as explaining why he had called him"); 1903, Westphal v. R. Co., 134 Mich. 239, 96 N. W. 19 ("a party will not be permitted to impeach his own witness by showing contradictory statements"; none of the foregoing cases cited);

Minnesota: 1867, State v. Johnson, 12 Minn. 476, 486 (question allowable "either to lead the witness to correct her testimony, or to save the party calling her from being sacrificed by the witness"); 1890, State v. Tall, 43 Minn. 273, 275, 45 N. W. 449 (question admissible "not for the purpose of discrediting the witness, but as a proper means of inducing him to tell the truth", provided he is hostile); 1893, Selover v. Bryant, 54 Minn. 434, 56 N. W. 58 (prior self-contradiction, admissible, in case of surprise, in the trial Court's discretion; Gilfillan, C. J., diss.); 1906, Lindquist v. Dickson, 98 Minn. 369, 107 N. W. 958 (proof of former self-contradiction, by extrinsic testimony, admitted in the trial Court's discretion, in a case of surprise); 1906, State v. Sederstrom, 99 Minn. 234, 109 N. W. 113 (prior inconsistent statements of the witness to the State's attorney, allowed to be shown); 1922, State v. Jensen, — Minn. —, 186 N. W. 581 (carnal knowledge under age; contradictory statements by the girl, not admitted on the facts);

Mississippi: 1881, Moore v. R. Co., 59 Miss. 243, 248 (admissible, where it appears that the party was surprised; here the record indicated the contrary, and nothing was shown to remove this indication); 1886, Dunlap v.

Richardson, 63 Miss. 447, 449 (admissible where "deceived or misled by fraud or artifice practised on him by the witness"); 1893, Chism v. State, 70 Miss. 742, 12 So. 852 (approving the preceding two); 1898, Bacot v. Lumber Co., — Miss. —, 23 So. 481 (allowed, where there was hostility on cross-examination and also surprise); nevertheless, under the doctrine of (8), § 904, ante, these statements may be excluded: 1881, Moore v. R. Co., 59 Miss. 243, 248 (failure to testify to certain injuries; former assertions of the injuries excluded, as there was nothing to impeach; whether such assertions could be referred to to refresh the memory, undecided); 1893, Chism v. State, 70 Miss. 742, 12 So. 852 (the witness professed to know nothing of the killing; former assertions about it excluded, because "the first and essential thing is that the testimony of the witness must be adverse"); 1904, Dunk v. State, 84 Miss. 454, 36 So. 609 (self-contradiction of a witness for the prosecution, where the State's attorney had been "neither misled nor entrapped by the witness", excluded; but the ruling is erroneously put also on the ground of the immateriality of the assertion, misunderstanding Williams v. State, post, § 1038); 1906, Dodd v. State, 88 Miss. 50, 40 So. 545 (Dunk v. State followed; rule of discretion applied);

Missouri: 1885, Dunn v. Dunnaker, 87 Mo. 597, 600 (admissible only where "the party is entrapped" into offering a witness who disappoints him); 1896, State v. Burks, 132 Mo. 363, 34 S. W. 48 (not admissible "unless the party is entrapped into offering" a witness who proves faithless; shortly termed, "a surprise"); 1899, Feary v. O'Neill, 149 Mo. 467, 50 S. W. 918 (not allowed where there was no surprise or misleading); 1903, State v. Coats, 174, Mo. 396, 74 S. W. 864 (defendant's witness' memory allowed to be refreshed by reading her prior contradictory testimony); 1905, Clancy v. St. Louis T. Co., 192 Mo. 615, 91 S. W. 509 (rule of State v. Burks, supra, applied); 1906, Beier v. St. Louis T. Co., 197 Mo. 215, 94 S. W. 876 (a witness who had been subpœnaed by both parties, but introduced by the defendant only, and whose memory failed on various points covered by a written statement made by him two years before; the written statement not allowed to be put in evidence, no entrapment being shown); 1914, State v. Patton, 255 Mo. 245, 164 S. W. 223 (method of refreshment of memory of State's witness as to his own former testimony, where the prosecutor is now surprised, carefully prescribed, so as to prevent a substitution of the former testimony instead of a mere refreshment); 1917, Bingaman v. Hannah, 270 Mo. 611, 194 S. W. 276 (will contest; self-contradictions of unwilling attesting-witnesses, admitted; the opinion seems to ignore the present point); 1921, State v. Depriest, 288 Mo. 459, 232 S. W. 83 (prosecution's witness; memory refreshed from his testimony before grand jury);

Montana: Rev. C. 1921, § 10666 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2049); 1898, State v. Bloor, 20 Mont. 574, 52 Pac. 611 (statute applied; the suggestion of the defendant's counsel that the statute violated the constitutional guarantee of due process of law was of course repudiated);

Nebraska: 1908, First National Bank v. State, 80 Nebr. 597, 114 N. W. 772 (allowable to "elicit the truth from a confused or unwilling witness"); 1910, Masourides v. State, 86 Nebr. 105, 125 N. W. 132 (allowing the whole former statement to be read to the jury, held improper);

New Hampshire: 1870, Hurlburt v. Bellows, 50 N. H. 105, 116 (admissible in case of surprise and absence of collusion or bad faith, if the witness is adverse); 1885, Whitman v. Morey, 63 N. H. 448, 456, 2 Atl. 899 (same);

New Jersey: 1840, Brewer v. Porch, 17 N. J. L. 377, 379 (excluded); 1897, Kohl v. State, 59 N. J. L. 445, 36 Atl. 931, 37 Atl. 73 (excluded); 1913, State v. D'Ahame, 84 N. J. L. 386, 86 Atl. 414 ("where the specific testimony comes as a surprise, such an attack is admissible"); 1913, State v. Kysilka, 84 N. J. L. 6, 87 Atl. 79 (similar); 1906, State v. Johnson, 73 N. J. L. 199, 63 Atl. 12 (prior self-contradiction, allowed to be shown on cross-examination, on the ground of surprise; 1914, State v. MacRoric, 86 N. J. L. 401, 92 Atl. 578 (rule of surprise, applied, with certain attenuated and futile distinctions);

New Mexico: Ann. St. 1915, § 2180 ("In case the witness, in the opinion of the judge, proves adverse, such party may prove that the witness made at other times a statement inconsistent with his present testimony"); 1906, Terr. v. Livingston, 13 N. M. 318, 84 Pac. 1021 (rule in Hickory v. U. S.; why did not the Court cite and follow the rule of its own statute, which is broader?);

New York: 1830, Lawrence v. Barker, 5 Wend. 301, 305 (Savage, C. J., allowing "great latitude of examination" in certain cases, but not specifying the use of self-contradictory statements); 1847, People v. Safford, 5 Den. 112, 116 (excluded, on the theory that to contradict by showing error "does by no means involve the witness in the crime of perjury, but may be reconcilable with the most perfect integrity and good faith", while a prior self-contradiction necessarily involves an "impeachment"); 1850, Thompson v. Blanchard, 4 N. Y. 303, 311 (excluded); 1873, Bullard v. Pearsall, 53 N. Y. 230 (excluded, "when the sole object of such proof is to discredit the witness"; thus extrinsic proof is absolutely excluded, while cross-examination is possible for the purpose of refreshing recollection and obtaining explanation or correction; allowable, therefore, on cross-examination only; but the ruling on the facts is confused: the form of question intended to be sanctioned being apparently, "whether he had not made a prior statement to such-and-such an effect"); 1874, Coulter v. Express Co., 56 N. Y. 585, 588 (excluded, "when it is only material as it bears upon credibility"; but conceding an exception "on the ground of surprise, as contrary to" just expectations, or of deceit of the opponent; citing Melhuish v. Collier, but misunderstanding it); 1887, Becker v. Koch, 104 N. Y. 394, 402, 10 N. E. 701 (prior self-contradictory statements absolutely inadmissible to impeach; as matter of law, "not open to discussion"; though, as a policy, apparently questioned; yet, in this very case, curiously enough, the witness' self-contradictory statements on the direct examination were allowed to be employed, and the right conceded "to show that a portion of the evidence of your own witness is untrue, by comparing it with another portion of the evidence of the same witness and with the other facts in the case"); 1888, Cross v. Cross, 108 N. Y. 628, 15 N. E. 333 (following Becker v. Koch, and allowing a husband, called by the wife in a suit for divorce based on abandonment, to be discredited, as to his denials of intent to abandon, by "the facts and circumstances of his conduct, his letters and declarations", i.e. allowing freely the use of prior self-contradictions, but putting it on the ground of the witness being really hostile and interested; erroneously fathering this view upon the case of Becker v. Koch); 1889, People v. Kelly, 113 N. Y. 647, 651, 21 N. E. 122 (former testimony; Bullard v. Pearsall approved; yet here the former statement was not contradictory, but merely supplied an omission); 1890, De Meli v. De Meli, 120 N. Y. 485, 490, 24 N. E. 996 (approving Becker v. Koch); 1897, People v. Burgess, 153 N. Y. 561, 47 N. E. 889, semble (excluded); 1914, People v. De Martini, 213 N. Y. 203, 107 N. E. 501 (identification of the accused; witnesses L. C. and others, for the prosecution, having "refused to identify the defendant at all, or retracted his identification after it was made", the prosecuting attorney called R. to testify to these witnesses having identified the defendant at the police station upon his arrest; held inadmissible; "there is much to be said in support of Prof. W.'s argument [that the rule is no longer to be tolerated as an impediment to truth], but the case at bar is not one in which we should make a new departure, for a human life is at stake"; of course this case illustrates the lack of rationality in the rule); 1920, Miller v. Greenwald Petticoat Co., Sup. App. Div., 183 N. Y. Suppl. 97 (goods sold; plaintiffs called and examined R., their agent, who had been discharged; a self-contradicting affidavit of R., not admitted for plaintiff to impeach R.; unsound);

North Carolina: 1796, State v. Norris, 1 Hayw. 429, 437 (excluding the evidence in civil cases, but admitting it in criminal cases, because of the possibility of imposing on the State's attorney); 1806, Sawrey v. Murrell, 2 Hayw. 397, semble (same); 1849, Neil v. Childs, 10 Ired. 195, 197, semble, contra (left undecided); 1851, Hice v. Cox, 12 Ired. 315, semble (same); 1883, State v. Taylor, 88 N. C. 696 (outside testimony excluded);

North Dakota: 1895, George v. Triplett, 5 N. D. 50, 63 N. W. 891 (question allowable, where surprised by a hostile witness; as to outside testimony, point reserved);

Oklahoma: 1900, Drury v. Terr., 9 Okl. 398, 60 Pac. 101, semble (inadmissible); 1909, Sturgis v. State, 2 Okl. Cr. App. 362, 102 Pac. 57 (prosecution is allowed to cross-examine the witness and to prove by others the self-contradictions, where the witness had surprised the attorney by altering his expected testimony; but here surprise was negatived; leading opinion by Furman, P. J.);

Ohio: 1889, Hurley v. State, 46 Oh. 320, 322, 21 N. E. 645 (admissible only on cross-examination; not "merely to impeach the witness" but "for the purpose of refreshing his recollection and inducing him to correct his testimony or explain his apparent inconsistency", provided the party is surprised by "unexpected adverse testimony"; the precedents are carefully examined);

Oregon: Laws 1920, § 861 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2049); 1890, Langford v. Jones, 18 Or. 307, 325, 22 Pac. 1064 (the witness professed ignorance of the subject; former assertions excluded, when offered by outside evidence, because there was no testimony to contradict; but the witness may be asked about such statements, to refresh his memory); 1896, State v. Steeves, 29 Or. 85, 43 Pac. 947, semble (here the witness merely failed to prove what was expected; opinion obscure); 1898, State v. Bartmess, 33 Or. 110, 54 Pac. 167 (witness hostile; self-contradictions allowed to be shown by others; in any case, refreshment of memory by cross-examination after unexpected testimony is allowed); 1901, State v. McDaniel, 39 Or. 161, 65 Pac. 520 (admissible under C. § 838); 1906, State v. Jennings, 48 Or. 483, 87 Pac. 524 (proof by other testimony, allowed); 1918, State v. Mello, 92 Or. 678, 173 Pac. 317 (murder; Lord's Or. L. § 864 applied to allow refreshment of recollection as to prior statements of a witness for the State); 1918; Weygandt v. Bartle, 88 Or. 310, 171 Pac. 5873 1919, State v. Merlo, 92 Or. 678, 182 Pac. 151 (careful opinion, by Harris, J., analyzing the law in this State; statements here excluded because the original testimony was not "affirmatively prejudicial to the State", but merely "not as strong as was expected");

Pennsylvania: 1781, Rapp v. Le Blanc, 1 Dall. 63, semble (excluded); 1825, Cowden v. Reynolds, 12 S. & R. 281, 283 (admitted); 1835, Craig v. Craig, 5 Rawle 91, 95, semble (same); 1838, Stockton v. Demuth, 7 Watts 39, 41 (excluded, not citing this case); 1838, Smith v. Price, 8 Watts 447 (same); 1843, Bank of N. Liberties v. Davis, 6 W. & S.

285, 288 (admitted, citing the first case only); 1848, Harden v. Hays, 9 Pa. St. 151, 159 (admitted); 1866, Stearns v. Bank, 53 Pa. 490 (excluded, two judges dissenting); 1892, Fisher v. Hart, 149 Pa. 232, 24 Atl. 225 (cross-examination to prior contradictory statements, excluded, apparently because the witness had shown no hostile bias); 1892, McNerney v. Reading, 150 Pa. 611, 615, 25 Atl. 57 (the witness being unwilling and his testimony a surprise, cross-examination to contradictory statements was held allowable in discretion); 1898, Morris v. Guffey, 188 Pa. 534, 41 Atl. 731 (allowed, on the facts); 1908, Com. v. Deitrick, 221 Pa. 7, 70 Atl. 275 (admitted, without restriction); 1918, Com. v. Delfino, 259 Pa. 272, 102 Atl. 949 (murder; examination of prosecution's witness by the district attorney to prior variant statements "is a matter largely in the discretion of the trial judge");

Philippine Isl. C. C. P. 1901, § 340 ("the party producing a witness, . . . in the discretion of the Court, in order to show that the witness has misled him into calling him to the stand, may also show that he has made at other times statements inconsistent with his present testimony");

Porto Rico: Rev. St. & C. 1911, §§ 1524, 6275 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2049); 1910, People v. Rojas, 16 P. R. 239 (rape; self-contradiction of the woman by the prosecution, not admissible where no surprise);

Rhode Island: 1913, Barker v. Rhode Island Co., 35 R. I. 406, 87 Atl. 174 (interrogation allowed in case of surprise; in the trial Court's discretion);

South Carolina: 1884, Bauskett v. Keith, 22 S. C. 187, 199 (excluded); 1895, State v. Johnson, 43 S. C. 123, 20 S. E. 988 (adhering to the precedent, but allowing the question to be asked to induce correction);

South Dakota: 1904, State v. Callahan, 18 S. D. 145, 99 N. W. 1099 (cross-examination to prior testimony, forbidden; rule obscure);

Tennessee: 1848, Story v. Saunders, 8 Humph. 663, 666 excluded);

Texas: Rev. C. Cr. P. 1911, § 815 (allowed; see quotation ante, § 900); 1894, Erwin v. State, 32 Tex. Cr. 519, 24 S. W. 904 (excluded, where on the stand the witness failed to affirm a decided fact); 1898, Ross v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 45 S. W. 808 (prior self-contradiction apparently allowable in case of surprise); 1900, Spangler v. State, 41 Tex. Cr. 424, 55 S. W. 326 (former testimony containing a prior self-contradictory statement, held inadmissible, where it merely affirms what the witness has failed to testify to on the stand; but the witness may be shown the prior testimony so as to recall the fact to his mind, if possible); 1900, Brown v. State, 42 Tex. Cr. 176, 58 S. W. 131 (former testimony held to be improperly used on the facts; Spangler's Case approved); 1903, Barnard v. State, 45 Tex. Cr. 67, 73 S. W. 957 (statute applied; surprise is not required); 1905, Dallas C. E. St. R. Co. v. McAllister, 41 Tex. Civ. App. 131, 90 S. W. 933; 1907, Skeen v. State, 51 Tex. Cr. 39, 100 S. W. 770 (rape; after the prosecuting witness' denial of the intercourse charged, the prosecution was not allowed to prove her prior affirmation of it); 1918, Anderson v. State, 83 Tex. Cr. 261, 202 S. W. 944 (homicide; cross-examination by the prosecution of its own witness to a former statement, held improper on the facts);

Utah: 1914, State v. Inlow, 44 Utah 485, 141 Pac. 530 (in case of surprise, recollection may be refreshed); 1920, State v. Scott, 55 Utah 553, 188 Pac. 860 (not allowed, on the facts);

Vermont: 1862, Fairchild v. Bascomb, 35 Vt. 398, 405, 417 (excluded); 1883, Cox v. Eayres, 55 Vt. 24, 27, 35 (excluded; there being no discretion for the trial Court); rule changed by St. 1886, c. 49, now Stats. 1894, § 1247 (allowable "by leave of Court", "when in the opinion of the Court a witness produced by a party is adverse"); applied in the following cases: 1890, Hurlburt v. Hurlburt's Estate, 63 Vt. 667, 670, 22 Atl. 850; 1891, Good v. Knox, 64 Vt. 97, 99, 23 Atl. 520; 1897, State v. Slack, 69 Vt. 486, 38 Atl. 311; 1901, Davis v. Buchanan, 73 Vt. 67, 50 Atl. 545; (State v. Slack followed); 1901, McGovern v. Smith, 73 Vt. 52, 50 Atl. 549 (similar); 1916, Cross v. Passumpsic F. L. Co., 90 Vt. 397, 98 Atl. 1010 (statute applied);

Virginia: Code 1919, § 6215 (a party may "in case the witness shall in the opinion of the Court prove adverse, contradict him by other evidence, or by leave of the Court prove that he has made at other times a statement inconsistent with his present testimony. . . . In every such case the Court, if requested by either party, shall instruct the jury not to consider the evidence of such inconsistent statements, except for the purpose of contradicting the witness"); 1902, Gordon v. Funkhouser, 100 Va. 675, 42 S. E. 677 (statute applied); 1904, Portsmouth St. R. Co. v. Peed's Adm'r, 102 Va. 662, 47 S. E. 850 (allowable to refresh but not to contradict; statute not cited); 1905, McCue v. Com., 103 Va. 870, 49 S. E. 623 (statute held applicable to criminal cases);

Washington: 1909, State v. Montgomery, 56 Wash. 443, 105 Pac. 1035 (prosecuting attorney's treatment of a rape-witness who testified contrary to her original story to him, held improper on the facts); 1917, Blystone v. Walla Walla Valley R. Co., 97 Wash. 46, 165 Pac. 1049 (personal injury; rule applied); 1920, State v. Sills, 113 Wash. 497, 194 Pac. 580 (witness may be questioned to probe his recollection and permit explanations);

West Virginia: 1900, State v. Hatfield, 48 W. Va. 561, 37 S. E. 626 (admitted to show the good faith of the party offering); tions and the indiscriminate citation of rulings from other Courts, together with the indecision of the earlier English precedents, has tended to produce confusion in our law, even within the rulings of the same jurisdiction. The sound and simple remedy would be by statute to abolish all limitation on this kind of evidence; and this step has in some States already been taken.

Wisconsin: 1892, Richards v. State, 32 Wis. 172, 180, 51 N. W. 652 (excluded; "this rule is

§ 906. Same: (5) Rules for Prior Warning to the Witness, etc.; Rule for Party's Admission. (1) So far as impeachment by prior self-contradiction is permitted, under any of the foregoing doctrines, the ordinary rules for that mode of impeachment become applicable (post, §§ 1017–1046). In particular, the witness must be asked, before extrinsic testimony is adduced, whether he made the statement;[1] and the statement, however proved, has only an impeaching effect and is not independent testimony.[2]

(2) So far as impeachment by prior self-contradiction is under any of the foregoing doctrines prohibited, the prohibition does not apply to a party's admission, which is receivable as such, even though it be also a self-contradiction of himself as witness.[3]

§ 907. Contradiction by Other Witnesses, not forbidden. The process of contradiction by other witnesses (post, § 1000) has for its object (1) to demonstrate an error of the first witness, and (2) to argue that the commission of this error shows him capable of making other errors. The second step of the argument is one that would not usually be resorted to against one's own witness, though such occasions may arise; but in both aspects the permission, to employ such opposing evidence is now fully accorded; and this permission, even to the extent of only the first step in the argument, signifies the overthrow of the earlier notion that a party is bound by his witness' statement or guarantees his credibility.

In England, that notion, as already observed (ante, § 896), is found surviving as late as the 1700s;[1] but by the end of that century the doctrine was elementary"); 1898, Sutton v. R. Co., 98 Wis. 157, 73 N. W. 993, semble (allowable in discretion, for an adverse witness); 1898, Collins v. Hoehle, 99 Wis. 639, 75 N. W. 416 (self-contradictions excluded, both on cross-examination and by others);

Wyoming: 1895, Arnold v. State, 5 Wyo. 439, 40 Pac. 967 (question admissible, for a hostile witness, to stimulate recollection, even if discredit incidentally follows); Comp. St. 1920, § 5809 (a party may, as to his own witness, show "that he has made at other times statements inconsistent with his present testimony, and this rule should apply to both civil and criminal cases"); 1903, Horn v. State, 12 Wyo. 80, 73 Pac. 705 (statute applied); 1922, Crago v. State, — Wyo. —, 202 Pac. 1099 (general comments on Comp. St. 1920, § 5809, in a learned and enlightened opinion by Blume, J.).

Compare also the cases post, §§ 1020–1043 (self-contradiction in general).

§ 906. [1] Post, § 1028. The statutes cited ante, § 905, provide usually (but superfluously) for this.

[2] 1825, Ewer v. Ambrose, 3 B. & C. 746 (where a prior deposition was offered, and the trial judge left it to the jury whether they would "give credit to S. B.'s answer in Chancery or to his testimony given in Court"; Holroyd, J., pointed out that the contradictory statement could not be used "to prove substantively" its allegation); 1877, Brooks v. Weeks, 121 Mass. 433; 1847, People v. Safford, 5 Den. 112, 117; and cases cited post, § 1018.

[3] Post, § 916 and § 1057.

§ 907. [1] The earlier cases usually speak in general terms of a prohibition against discrediting one's own witness; but it seems likely that this included a prohibition even against proving his error by other witnesses: 1700, Adams v. Arnold, 12 Mod. 375 ("And here Holt [C. J.] would not suffer the plaintiff to discredit a witness of his own calling, he swearing against him"); 1722, Eyre, J., cited in Vin. Abr. XII, 48, tit. Evidence ("The party clearly laid down that one's own witness could always be contradicted by others and his error shown;[2] and this became established law (though not without an occasional trace of the older notion [3]) by the first half of the 1800s.[4] In 1854, however, came the statute (quoted ante, § 905) in which the anomalous condition was inserted that the witness should be deemed adverse by the judge. The limitation thus blunderingly put upon the right to contradict has however been practically read out of the statute.[5] who produceth a witness cannot examine to the discredit of such witness"); the turning-point seems to be the following case: 1738, Rice v. Oatfield, 2 Stra. 1095 ("It was argued on behalf of the defendant that the plaintiff could not be allowed to contradict his former evidence", but it was answered that "if there was any contradiction, it is no objection"; citing Pike v. Badmering, in L. C. J. Pratt's time, unreported; and the Court unanimously received the evidence).

[2] Ante 1767, Buller, Trials at Nisi Prius, 297 ("But if a witness prove facts in a cause which make against the party who called him, yet the party may call other witnesses to prove that those facts were otherwise; for such facts are evidence in the cause, and the other witnesses are not called directly to discredit the first witness, but the impeachment of his credit is incidental and consequental only"; 1762, Lowe v. Jolliffe, 1 W. Bl. 365 (Mansfield, L. C. J., and others; error shown against a testamentary witness to sanity; no discussion and no ruling).

[3] 1818, Richardson v. Allan, 2 Stark. 334, Ellenborough, L. C. J. (witness to the genuineness of an indorsement; a second witness not allowed, except the alleged indorser himself).

[4] 1825, Ewer v. Ambrose, 3 B. & C. 746 ("the party is at liberty afterwards to make out his own case by other witnesses"); 1831, Bradley v. Ricardo, 8 Bing. 57; 1832, Friedlander v. Assur. J., says: "Perhaps the better way is to consider the second branch of the section as altogether superfluous"; while the majority of the Court, Williams and Willes, JJ., seem to reach the same result by defining "adverse" as "hostile", in distinction from "unfavorable", and then treating it as not impliedly forbidding the greater by permitting the less, and thus allowing contradiction on relevant matters as something "he may still do, if the witness is unfavorable." The statute, however, seems later to have been not so clearly construed; 1866, Coles v. Brown, L. R. 1 P. & D. 70, Sir J. P. § 908. Same: Contradiction as involving Impeachment. It has been noted (ante, § 897) that a chief reason for the victory of the newer notion was the perception that without it one could not prove the facts of his case if the first witness called were to testify untruly. From this point of view the discrediting of the witness is regarded as incidental only (because inevitable) to this other and necessary right. Nevertheless, the discrediting of the witness is also a legitimate use to be made of the evidence, if desired. A demonstrated error on one point may be used to infer error by the same witness upon other points.[1] It follows, too, from the permission to discredit a witness by other witnesses, that counsel, with or without offering other witnesses, may argue that his own witness is in error.[2] It is occasionally said that he may not;[3] but it is obvious that such a doctrine would simply bring us back to the exploded notion that one is bound by the statements of his own witness.

§ 909. Who is One's Own Witness; General Principle. Since the rule forbids certain modes of impeaching one's own witness, the question constantly arises whether a given witness falls within that category.

It is surprising to find in modern times such a remark as the following: "The defendant having been called by the plaintiff as an adverse witness under the statute, the plaintiff was not bound by his testimony, and so the jury could accept the facts testified to by him [the defendant] and disbelieve the explanations"; 1909, Anderson v. Middlebrook, 202 Mass. 506, 89 N. E. 157. Even if the witness had not been the adverse party, the plaintiff would not be "bound" by his testimony and the jury need not believe any more of it than they saw fit.

sarily in common with the test for the prohibition of leading questions. Occasionally a tendency is found to confuse the two tests. But the latter rests purely on the presumed mental condition of the witness. The object of the rule is to prevent the supplying of suggestions of false testimony to a witness who is disposed to take advantage of them (ante, § 769). He is assumed to be friendly to the party putting him on the stand; but this is only a provisional assumption; and, accordingly, if he turns out to be hostile to that party, the prohibition ceases (ante, § 774), and, conversely, if on cross-examination by the other party, to whom he has been assumed to be hostile, he turns out to be a friendly partisan, the prohibition applies equally on cross-examination (ante, § 773). Thus the test for the prohibition of leading questions is ultimately and essentially independent of the superficial circumstance whether originally one party or the other put him on the stand.

The present rule, on the other hand, must depend, to some extent at least, upon that circumstance. The controlling consideration is not the temper of the witness as being friendly or hostile, but the conduct of the party as having dealt with the witness so as to make the witness his own. How to determine what dealings have this effect is by no means easy. The general rule itself (against impeaching one's own witness) is so fraught with irrationality that to apply it with rational deduction is almost impossible. A rule which rests upon a fiction is apt to lead to mere quibbles when a detailed and consistent development is attempted. The quiddities and meaningless distinctions which occur in the present application serve more than anything else to exhibit the arbitrary absurdity of the rule at large.

In attempting to apply it in the present connection, the test may be sought either in the superficial features of the rule or in the supposed underlying reason of it:

(a) Superficially, the rule applies to a witness who has been put forward by the party and used to supply testimony. By this test, if A calls the witness and obtains testimony, and B afterwards calls him, the rule applies alike to both, and both are therefore prevented from impeaching him in the forbidden ways.

(b) The conventional reason for the rule is that the calling party guarantees the witness' credibility (ante, § 898). Taking this as a test, it is clear that if A calls the witness, A cannot thereafter impeach him, even when B has subsequently called him. As to B, it would seem that from the outset he must be assumed as disputing A's whole case, and therefore, by implication, of denying the credibility of A's witnesses; hence, when he afterwards calls a witness of A, this denial can hardly be said to be abandoned, for B is still denying the facts testified to for A; thus, when B puts A's witness on the stand, he is merely availing himself hypothetically of A's guarantee, and says in effect, "A has guaranteed this man's credibility, and has thus claimed that what he will say is true; taking that claim for what it purports to be worth, A has thus virtually admitted in advance that what the witness is now about to say in my favor is true, and I put forward the witness merely by virtue of A's admission; I claim nothing myself in that respect." This may be artificial reasoning, but the whole reason of the rule begins as artificial, and a just deduction from its fictitious premises seems to lead to the above conclusion.

It is true that A's original guarantee may be said (as some Courts prefer to say) to extend merely to the testimony which A will obtain in his own favor, and not to the testimony which B may later obtain, so that thus A would be prevented from impeaching as to the former statements (and those only), while B could not impeach as to the latter statements (and those only); the result thus coinciding in part with that of (a) supra. But this is fundamentally fallacious. The guarantee of credibility (if there is one at all) must relate to the witness' general personal trustworthiness of disposition and emotion, not to the correctness of specific statements of fact; since the latter, as is universally conceded (ante, § 907), may always be shown to be untrue. The guarantee is of the continuing, single quality of trustworthiness, and is therefore inseparable; it either is made or is not made, and it cannot be construed as existing for some statements and not for others. Hence, upon this theory, it should follow that the party first calling the witness cannot thereafter impeach him, while the other party, though afterwards calling him, may still impeach him. Besides, by any other solution, the practically absurd result is reached of allowing B, in his case in reply, first to impeach A's witness as a confirmed liar, and then to call the same witness under a supposed guarantee of credibility without withdrawing his impeachment. Finally, it may be said [1] that, under the orthodox rule for the order of evidence (post, § 1885), B might have obtained all the witness' knowledge as to his own case on cross-examination, so that by not doing so and by calling him later, he has waived his option to treat him throughout as A's witness, and thus has made him his own. It is true that there was such an option as to putting in his own case on cross-examination. But it does not follow that there was an option between treating him as A's witness throughout and treating him as his own by calling him later; for this begs the question by assuming it already determined that to call the witness later would be to make him his own; that, indeed, is the very question sought to be determined. Under the Federal rule, forbidding putting in one's own case on cross-examination (post, § 1885), even this argument disappears, for under that rule there is no semblance of such an option.

§ 909. [1] As in the following passage: 1824, Starkie, Evidence, 3d ed., 187: "It has been said that, where a witness has been examined by one party, he may afterwards be cross-examined as an adverse witness [by the adversary] when he is called by the adversary as one of his own witnesses. Yet, if a party omit from prudential motives to examine his adversary's witness, [when first called,] as to any branch of his own case, there seems to be no reason why, when he afterwards adopts him as his own witness, he should not be so considered to all purposes. . . . The same witness may know distinct parts of the transaction, one branch of which makes for the plaintiff and the other for the defendant; and if each party call him as his own witness, there seems to be no reason why each should not be in turn bound by the same principle."

(c) The only tenable reason for maintaining the general rule at all is the danger that a party calling a witness might coerce him into falsities by threatening to blacken his character if he fails to testify favorably (ante, § 899). This reason might seem to apply equally to both parties where both call the witness. Yet if A first calls him, B is then entitled to impeach his character in reply, and thus it is practically vain to forbid him to do so after calling the witness on his own side, if he has taken the precaution to do so before calling him. So far, then, as this reason amounts to anything (ante, § 899), it leads to the same conclusion as the theory (b) supra, namely, that the prohibition extends throughout to A, the party originally calling, but not to B, the party subsequently calling. Moreover, if it be said that this reason would not prohibit A from impeaching character after B's call, the answer is that the same supposed abuse is possible, in that A might threaten to blacken the witness' character in rebuttal if when called later by B he testified favorably to B.

Such seem to be the general considerations that may be invoked in solving the specific situations now to be dealt with. No doubt it may all seem to be a matter of fine distinctions, of petty quibblings, and of artificial imaginings. But if we are building a rule upon fiction there is nothing else to be done but to carry out the assumed requirements of the fiction. It is all a ridiculous structure in the air of legal fancy; but so long as the rule exists, it is to be applied with at least a pretence of rationality. Concede the falsity of the foundation, and then the entire structure may be abandoned. Until then, it remains to apply the rule to concrete situations as best we can.

§ 910. Same: (1) A calls a Witness; may A impeach? Subpœna, Oath, and Interrogation. At the outset it is necessary to determine at what point of time, in the simplest case, the witness becomes one's own. Where A makes a witness his own, and B later does the same, complicated questions arise as to the incidence of the rule. But in these it is always assumed that A had originally done something to make the witness his own, i.e. that there is some act — such as summoning by subpœna, administering the oath, or the like by which A had originally set the rule in operation. The question thus arises, What is this original act by which the rule is at least 'prima facie' set in operation against the party doing it? Or, in other words, what constitutes "calling" a witness, for the purposes of this rule? Is it the mere summoning into court by subpœna? Or is it the administration of an oath? Or is it nothing short of asking questions and obtaining answers?

1. For a witness summoned under the ordinary subpœna, it is clear that neither the summons, nor the oath, nor the questioning are sufficient; there must be an answer furnishing relevant evidence; for until that point is reached, the party has not obtained any testimony from that witness and it would thus be erroneous to suppose that he had guaranteed the credit of a non-existent and merely potential testimony. The principle is the same as that which determines whether the opponent has the right to cross-examine to his own case.[1]

2. For a witness summoned under a subpœna duces tecum to produce a document, the line is crossed when the witness, being questioned, has given a relevant answer respecting the identity or execution of the document. The reason is not essentially different from that just mentioned.[2]

3. For a deposition taken but not used, it would seem that the taker has not made the witness his own. But since a Court holding the contrary view is always obliged further to consider whether the subsequent use of the deposition by the opponent relieves the taking party from the rule, and since it is seldom possible to discern upon which ground the decision is reached, the state of the law may better be examined under the other head (post, § 913 (b)).

4. Where the witness is called by the judge, and not by a party, either party may impeach him.[3]

§ 911. Same: (2) A calls a Witness, then B calls him; may B impeach? (a) 'viva voce' Testimony. Where A first calls the witness, and then B calls him, it seems to follow (for the reasons noted in § 909, ante) that B may nevertheless impeach him, whether by questions in the nature of cross-examination or otherwise.[1] Some Courts, however, take the contrary view and forbid impeachment by B;[2] and this occasionally goes to the extent of forbidding even proof by contradiction,[3] an extreme error, because the rule itself (as universally conceded) does not prohibit this mode of impeachment (ante, § 907). But, even in such Courts, the case should be distinguished of impeachment on a recall by B for further cross-examination (allowable in the trial Court's discretion; post, § 1897), for this is merely a continuation of cross-examination and not a calling of the witness as B's own;[4] and the same distinction applies to a 'viva voce' cross-examination (substituted for the cross-interrogatories in writing) of a witness whose direct examination has been taken and used by deposition for the first party.[5]

§ 912. Same: (b) Depositions. It is generally conceded that where a deposition is taken at A's instance, B having notice and opportunity to cross-examine, A's failure to read the deposition as evidence leaves B nevertheless entitled to use it (post, § 1389), on condition that he put in the whole, both the direct and the cross examination (post, § 1893, and § 2103). If A had read the deposition, in whole or in part, he would clearly have made the witness his own, and B's subsequent use of it would (on the principle of the preceding section) not prevent B from impeaching the deponent.[1] But the difficulty is, where A, the taker, has made no use of the depositions, that he can hardly be said to have made the witness his own (ante, § 910 (3)); indeed, his failure to use them is generally due to the discovery that the witness' testimony is unfavorable, and is practically a repudiation of it; his taking the deposition was thus a mere unsuccessful voyage of discovery, and the first and only person to utilize the deposition as testimony is B; the witness therefore is B's; and this must be so, whether the evidence he especially desires occurs in the answers to the direct or to the cross examination; accordingly, B may not impeach him.[2]

§ 913. Same: (3) A calls a Witness, then B calls him; may A impeach? (a) 'viva voce' Testimony; (b) Depositions. (a) Where A has first called the witness, and then B has called him, does the rule cease to operate as to A, so as to allow him to impeach the witness? For the reasons already noted (ante, § 909), it would seem that the rule still prohibits impeachment by A; and this result is accepted by the majority of Courts dealing with the question.[1]

It may be noted that these rulings often dealt at the same time with the question of § 1892, post, namely, whether B could cross-examine on his own case; because B, in order to avoid the objection now involved, which would arise if he called the witness for himself, was thus driven to cross-examine upon his own case if allowable.

called there the Federal rule) that the opponent, upon cross-examination, may not apply his questions to the material of his own case-in-reply, but must confine the subject of his questions to the matter of the first party's case as presented through his witnesses; thus the opponent, in order to obtain from the witness such facts as he can contribute to the opponent's own case, must wait his turn and then call the witness on his own behalf. That rule concerns merely the Order of Evidence, and is supposed (though erroneously) to prevent confusion and obscurity. But it is sometimes wrested from its original purpose, and joined with the rule against impeaching one's own witness, so as to produce a singular effect. This effect is produced by declaring that if the cross-examining party does ask about his own case (in violation of the first rule), he thereby makes the witness his own, and is thus prohibited from impeaching the witness on the subject of such questions. This consequence is enforced in many of the Courts adopting the above Federal rule;[1] and even occasionally (but without the slightest justification) in Courts following the orthodox rule (post, § 1885), which does not prohibit asking about one's own case on cross-examination.[2] A further logical consequence of the doctrine is that the original party may impeach on the matters thus brought out on cross-examination.[3]

But this doctrine rests merely on a confusion of ideas, and has no legitimate foundation. The two rules, one concerning the order of evidence (post, § 1885), the other concerning the scope of impeachment (ante, § 896), have nothing to do with each other in policy or in principle. It is true that, as a mere accident, the application of one results in the other going into force, and the exemption from one would remit the other; so that, where the latter is burdensome, the opponent struggles to evade the former as a means of escaping the latter. For example, one might desire to sue a corporation in the Federal Court, and to this end might join the corporation and its negligent employee as joint tortfeasors of different jurisdictions, and thus the defendant would strive to oppose the application of the doctrine of joint tortfeasors; and yet the constitutional rule as to Federal jurisdiction and the common-law doctrine as to joint tortfeasors have nothing whatever in common as to origin or policy. In the present situation, then, if the opponent had called the witness as his own, the prohibition as to impeachment would have come into force; yet, for not doing so, the Court imposes a penalty (namely, the prohibition of impeachment) which has no connection with the rule violated (namely, as to order of evidence). The fact that such would have been a consequence, if he had called the witness, is a mere accident, and is not a necessary and appropriate penalty for failure to follow the rule about the order of evidence; as is easily apparent from the fact that under the orthodox rule (which allows cross-examining to one's own case) there is no prohibition against impeachment. In short, the prohibition against impeachment turns upon the act of calling and thus indorsing the witness (ante, § 909), and not upon the topics of the questions put to the witness.

The result is, by the singular rule now under consideration, that the opponent is in effect told by the Court: "If you had called the witness as your own, we should have punished you by prohibiting his impeachment; but, though you have not done so, we shall nevertheless punish you for not doing it, in the same way as if you had done it." The particular injustice of this vagary lies in the further circumstance that it is usually applied by a Court to an opponent who has cross-examined to his own case without objection, and is later prohibited from impeachment; the only impropriety in his examination consisted in anticipating the usual order of his evidence, and if it was desired to correct this impropriety, the appropriate method was to stop the cross-examination on that subject, after objection made; but, if no objection is made, and no ruling had, the consequence should be that the first party has waived the impropriety of introducing the evidence too soon, and the whole incident is closed; there remains no evidential crime to be atoned for later by the inappropriate punishment of prohibiting impeachment; to impose any penalty at all is to revive a fault already annulled by waiver.

This form of error has as yet not gone too far to be cured. The notion of a connection in principle between the two rules about the order of evidence and the limits of impeachment is a specious and simple one, and its fallacy deserves to be exposed and checked. Both of the rules in question are impolitic and unjust (ante, §§ 896–899; post, §§ 1887–1888), and their combination in the present form results in quibbles of particular absurdity. Its worst tendency is to convert the rules of evidence into mere conjuring wands, — to aid unscrupulous counsel in entrapping opponents into an immaterial error which provides a weapon for the assassination of a true and just verdict.

§ 915. Same: (b) Leading Questions. The peculiar rule dealt with in the preceding section — i.e. that cross-examining on one's own case makes the witness one's own — is also by some Courts applied for still another purpose, namely, to forbid leading questions as to such topics. The process of argument is that since the cross-examination to such topics makes the witness one's own, and since leading questions to one's own witness are forbidden, they are therefore on such topics improper on cross-examination:

1881, FINCH, J., in People v. Court of Oyer & Terminer, 83 N. Y. 436, 459 (forbidding leading questions on cross-examination "while seeking to elicit new matter constituting an element of the intended defence"): "A different rule would enable a party to develop his defence untrammelled by the rules which govern a direct examination, and give him an advantage for which we can see no just reason. As to the new matter the witness becomes his own, and in substance and effect the cross-examination ceases. That is properly such only while it is directed to the evidence given in behalf of the adversary; when it passes beyond that, it becomes the direct and affirmative evidence of the party, and should be subjected to appropriate restraints. There is no reason in the nature of the case why a direct examination should be guarded against the evil and danger resulting from leading questions, which does not apply to an effort upon cross-examination to introduce a new and affirmative defence."

1874, DUNNE, C. J., in Rush v. French, 1 Ariz. 99, 130, 25 Pac. 816: "There is a general impression that the right to cross-examine implies the right to put leading questions; but the very point of Harrison v. Rowan [cited infra] is that the judge there was of opinion that such is not always the case; that you may cross-examine and lead while you keep within the limits of the plaintiff's [opponent's] case; but that when you strike new matter, though you may still cross-examine, you must not in that part of the cross-examination put leading questions; and though this seems a fine distinction, it may often be broad enough to secure valuable results."[1]

That such reasoning could be advanced in support of such a result seems incredible; for it rests on a misconception of one of the simplest and most established doctrines of Evidence. (1) That doctrine is (ante, § 767) that the prohibition of leading questions rests upon the supposed partisan bias of the witness, rendering him willing to accept suggestions, that therefore (ante, § 774) a leading question is allowable even on a direct examination where the witness appears to be biassed against the examiner, and that (ante, § 773) it is always allowable on a cross-examination unless the witness appears biassed in favor of the cross-examiner. In other words, the policy of the prohibition turns solely upon the emotional attitude of the witness to the party in general, i.e. to one side or the other, regarded as antagonists, and has nothing to do with the subject of the specific questions. If a witness is biassed for A, the bias applies to all questions which B may ask on cross-examinations. To suppose the witness to be dominated in A's favor by partisan rancor and stubbornness when one question is asked, so as to justify B's leading question, but the next moment to be possessed of equal § 915. [1] Accord: Fed. 1820, Harrison v. Rowan, 3 Wash. C. C. 580, 582 ("If the cross-examination respects new matter, leading questions cannot be asked"); *N. Y. 436, 459 (leading questions not allowed, in asking to one's own case on cross-examination; quoted supra); Pa. 1827, Ellmaker v. Buckley, 16 S. & R. 72, 77 ("no bias is to be presumed after the witness has been called by both parties"): 1843, Floyd v. Bovard, 16 W. & S. 75, semble; Vt. 1877, State v. Hopkins, 50 Vt. 316, 331.

It would follow that the original calling party may ask leading questions on the same fervor against A and in favor of B, so as to forbid B's next question to be in leading form, and to fancy the strong tide of partisan emotion thus swinging back and forth in the witness' mind from question to question, is merely to contrive a fantastic fiction. (2) Furthermore, the doctrine of the present chapter — the rule against impeaching one's own witness — has no concern with the rule against leading questions. Leading questions do not impeach. The subject-matter may impeach; but the form of the question cannot convert a non-impeaching fact into an impeaching fact. Conceding, then, that a cross-examination to one's own case makes the witness one's own and forbids impeachment (as in the cases of the preceding section), still this does not forbid leading questions; for the fact asked in the leading questions may not impeach the witness at all, and indeed their subject is by hypothesis merely a substantive fact bearing on the cross-examiner's own case. So that the propriety of leading questions still remains to be determined by the principle appropriate to them, namely (as above explained) by the witness' partisan attitude towards the parties in general.

It is well settled that leading questions (for the reasons above stated) may be asked on cross-examination, unless the witness appears biassed for the cross-examiner (ante, § 773); and it may be supposed that the few Courts adopting the present rule have sometimes done so in momentary forgetfulness of the doctrine on that subject, and that the effort to establish an exception of the present sort was due merely to the confusing and unfortunate influence of the Federal rule (post, § 1885) against putting in one's own case on cross-examination, — a rule which only arose long after the principles affecting leading questions had been firmly established:

1835, SHAW, C. J., in Moody v. Rowell, 17 Pick. 490, 499: "The general rule admitted on all hands is that on a cross-examination leading questions may be put, and the Court are of opinion that it would not be useful to engraft upon it a distinction not in general necessary to attain the purposes of justice in the investigation of the truth of facts, that it would be often difficult of application, and that all the practical good expected from it may be as effectually attained by the exercise of the discretionary power of the Court."[2]

§ 916. Same: (5) Calling the Other Party as a Witness; Co-defendants. (1) If there is any situation in which any semblance of reason disappears for the application of the rule against impeaching one's own witness, it is when the opposing party is himself called by the first party, and is sought to be compelled to disclose under oath that truth which he knows but is naturally unwilling to make known. To say that the first party guarantees the opponent's credibility (ante, § 898) is to mock him with a false formula; he hopes that the opponent will speak truly, but he equally perceives the possibilities of the contrary, and he no more guarantees the other's credibility than

Mass. 490, 499 (see quotation supra); 1854, Beal v. Nichols, 2 Gray Mass. 262 (similar; here also refusing to allow the original calling party to put leading questions as a matter of right); 1853, Legg v. Drake, 1 Oh. St. 286, 291 (in discretion).

he guarantees the truth of the other's case and the falsity of his own. To say, furthermore, that the first party, if he could impeach at will, holds the means of improperly coercing the other (ante, § 899) is to proceed upon a singular interpretation of human nature and experience, and to attribute a power which the former may perhaps wish that he had but certainly cannot be clothed with by this or any other rule. There is therefore no reason why the rule should apply at all.[1]

The state of the law is confused.[2] In some jurisdictions by judicial deci-

§ 916. [1] One peculiar practical absurdity of the opposite result may be noted. Since impeachment by prior self-contradiction would be excluded, the opponent could tell his story as favorably for himself as he pleased, and no prior inconsistent statements could be used in impeachment; so that unless one took the risk of abiding by what the opponent should choose to say, it would be preferable not to call him at all; thus the main purpose of the enabling statute making him compellable is defeated or encumbered. The prior statements, to be sure, could sometimes be used as admissions, but even this was ignored in Strudwick v. Brodnax, infra.

[2] For the right to cross-examine on one's own case, dealt with in some of the statutes infra, see further §§ 1891, 1892, post; and for the right to cross-examine to character on interrogatories of discovery before trial, see post, § 1856.

The phrase "rule applicable" in the following notes means the rule against impeaching one's own witness:

sion the rule is held to be inapplicable; in others, to be applicable. In many jurisdictions the statutes making the opponent compellable to testify have attempted to declare something on the present point, but usually with the sole result of increasing the uncertainty and introducing arbitrary suggestions. Of these statutes the most that can be said (apart from express judicial interpretations) is, first, that a statute authorizing the opponent's examination subject to the "ordinary rules of cross-examination" must be supposed to imply a general exemption from the present rule of impeachment; secondly, that a statute making the opponent examinable "like any other witness" may be supposed to refer to all such rules as benefit the calling party and not necessarily to include, as binding him, the rule against impeaching one's own witness; and, thirdly, that statutes which declare the calling party "not concluded" by the testimony and allow him to rebut it "by adverse testimony" were apparently contrived in a singular legislative ignorance or forgetfulness of the common law, which for more than a century has clearly conceded that exception to the general rule (ante, § 907), so that the effect of these statutes (as ordinarily worded) on the general rule for other kinds of impeachment remains indeterminate.

(2) Where a co-party is called against his co-party, for the opponent, it seems clear that the co-party against whom he testifies may impeach him.[3]

(3) Where a co-defendant in a criminal prosecution testifies for himself, the other co-defendant may impeach him, because their interests, as between each other, are distinct, and because the witness has been called by himself and not by the impeacher; and the same consequence follows for witnesses called by one co-defendant.[4]

W. 605 (a nominal co-defendant may be examined as an adverse party by his co-defendant, under Stats. 1898, § 4068); 1921, Lamberson v. Lamberson, — Wis. —, 184 N. W. 708 (title to land; defendant's use on plaintiff's cross-examination of portion of plaintiff's deposition taken adversely, held to allow plaintiff to testify to remainder of transaction; the logical kinks and quibbles involved in the working out of this very subtle question in the Court's opinion reveal the extent of vain scholastic cobwebbery which still obscures our law in this region; the ruling one way or the other on the question of law as presented could not have had the slightest relation to the ascertainment of the truth of the case).

Whichever rule be adopted, it is at least clear that the opponent thus called could not be allowed to impeach himself!: 1853, Legg v. Drake, 1 Oh. St. 286, 289 (it "would be incompatible with his situation as both party and witness; for the reason that he could not allege his own want of credibility").

(4) Where a co-party in a civil case testifies for himself at his own instance, the same result would seem sound; because the other party has not called him, and therefore (ante, § 909) has not made the witness his own.

(5) Where a party, called for himself, is cross-examined by the opponent to his own case, the opponent may impeach by self-contradictions, which are here the party's admissions.[5]

§ 917. Same: (6) Necessary Witnesses; (a) Attesting Will-Witness. On the correct theory (ante, § 899) there is no reason why the legal necessity of calling a particular witness should exempt from the rule the party calling him; for the subjective immunity of the witness from fear of character-abuse is just as important and just as liable to be induced in this kind of witness as in any other. Nevertheless, acting upon the cant theory of a party's guarantee of his witness' credibility (ante, § 898), and pressed by a desire to restrict the operations of so unruly and extensive a principle, the Courts have commonly refused to apply the rule to a necessary witness, i.e. one called by compulsion of law.[1]

(a) The attesting witnesses to a will are required by law to be produced or accounted for (post, § 1288); hence it has always been conceded that no rule prevents their impeachment by the proponent of the will.[2] The precedents deal usually with impeachment by contradiction or self-contradiction, and it would not be safe to assume that the same Courts would take the logical step of permitting impeachment of character.[3]

C. 291 (subscribing witness to a mortgage to which the impeacher was not a party); 1869, Alexander v. Beadle, 7 Coldw. Tenn. 126, 128.

[3] The few precedents are not harmonious: 1892, Diffenderfer v. Scott, 5 Ind. App. 243, 32 N. E. 87 (witness required by law, which was here not the case; character may be impeached); 1840, Dennett v. Dow, 17 Me. 19, 22, supra (semble, contra); 1866, Thornton's Ex'rs v. Thornton's Heirs, 39 Vt. 122,

Distinguish the question which arises under the preferred-witness rule, namely, whether the testimony of the subscribing witnesses is conclusive upon the proponent of the will; this question, once much controverted (post, § 1302), was unanimously answered in the negative; but it is obvious that if answered in the affirmative, it would have had the same practical effect that the present rule would have if applicable; and the two have not always been kept distinct.

§ 918. Same: (b) Prosecution's Witness in Criminal Case; Witness called by the Judge. Does the rule against impeaching one's own witness apply to limit the State in a criminal prosecution? The answer depends on two considerations.

(1) If there is in the jurisdiction a rule of Evidence requiring the State to produce all known eye-witnesses of the crime, then such witnesses are compulsory witnesses, and on the principle just examined (ante, § 917) the prohibition against impeachment plainly does not apply. But such a rule of compulsion exists in one or two jurisdictions only, and is elsewhere repudiated (post, §§ 1339, 2079).

(2) Elsewhere, then, the answer must depend upon where there is anything peculiar in the position of the State which distinguishes it from the ordinary civil party. Superficially there may be; actually there is not. The person who is run over by a street-car is just as much restricted to the eye-witnesses whom chance has made passengers or passers-by, as is the State to the eye-witnesses of an affray. Even the defendant in a criminal case cannot select beforehand the persons who will be able to vindicate his innocence. The truth is that circumstances, not the parties, mark out the circle of eligible witnesses. As soon as we begin to reason on these lines, we are forced back to the irrationality of the entire rule (ante, § 898). If it is to go, it must go 'in toto'; there is nothing reasonable in exempting the State more than any other party. To be sure, if it is to go piecemeal, the exemption for the State is the more plausible to begin with; and such seems in effect the attitude taken in that Court which is as yet the chief supporter of this exemption:

1897, POWELL, J., in State v. Slack, 69 Vt. 486, 38 Atl. 311 (applying the exemption to all witnesses called by the State on a criminal charge, since the State is bound to call all persons who may have any knowledge): "We are the more satisfied with the conclusion here reached because we think the State ought not to be hampered by such a rule. Prosecutions are carried on by the government, through the agency of sworn officers elected for that purpose, who have no private interests to serve nor petty spites to gratify, but whose sole and only duty is to faithfully execute their trust, and do equal right and justice to the State and accused. The course of public justice, thus directed, ought not to be obstructed by a rule without a reason. The ascertainment of the truth, which is the object of the prosecution, is of more consequence than the instrumentality by which it is sought to be ascertained;

155 (impeachment allowable "to the extent of proving his former declarations on the subject"; whether character-impeachment could be used is left undecided).

If the attesting witness is called by the contestant, he is not the proponent's witness in any respect: 1834, Solly v. Hind, 6 C. & P. 316.

and when an instrumentality becomes an obstruction to the source of justice the State should be at liberty to remove it, and by trampling upon it if necessary."

Of such an exemption as this there are a few traces in the earlier English practice.[1] In the United States it is thus far little recognized outside of the jurisdictions which (under the principle of § 2079, post) acknowledge the compulsory rule for the State's witnesses.[2] It is worth noting, however, that by invoking the conceded exemption for witnesses called by the judge (ante, § 910), the same result may be effected.[3] § 918. W. 1017 (witness, "whom the prosecutor was obliged by law to call", allowed to be cross-examined to contrary statements in a deposition); 1902, People v. Elco, 131 Mich. 519, 91 N. W. 755; 94 N. The reason of the rule does not fail in part and stand in part, — fail as to one mode of impeachment, and stand as to another mode. It is indivisible, and stands or falls as a whole"); Wash.: 1920, State v. Sills, 113 Wash. 497, 194, Pac. 580 ("The State is not to be prejudiced by the character of the witnesses it calls").

[3] 1902, Carle v. People, 200 Ill. 494, 66 N. E. 32 (State's attorney allowed to state that he did not wish to call a certain eye-witness, and to request the Court to call him, and then to cross-examine him, the defendant also cross-examining); 1912, People v. Baskin, 254 Ill. 509, 98 N. E. 957 (rule in Carle v. People approved); 1912, People v. Rardin, 255 Ill. 9, 99 N. E. 59 (similar); 1921, People v. Cardinelli, 297 Ill. 116, 130 N. E. 355 (if State's attorney, doubting the veracity of a witness, fails to call him, "in such case the Court may call the witness and leave him open for cross-examination by either side"); 1921, Pendleton v. Com., — Va. —, 109 S. E. 201 (homicide for attentions paid to a woman; the woman "having refused to talk to any one before the trial", the prosecuting attorney requested the Court to summon her, and was then allowed to cross-examine her as hostile).

But even this expedient is subjected to too much restriction, as the cases there cited show. It is time that we abandoned the absurd rigor of the rule against impeachment.

SUB-TITLE II (continued): TESTIMONIAL IMPEACHMENT

TOPIC I: CHARACTER, MENTAL DEFECTS, BIAS, ETC., USED AS GENERAL QUALITIES TO DISCREDIT

CHAPTER XXX

A. MORAL CHARACTER

B. INSANITY, AND OTHER ORGANIC INCAPACITY

C. EXPERIENTIAL INCAPACITY

D. EMOTIONAL INCAPACITY (BIAS, INTEREST, AND CORRUPTION)

A. MORAL CHARACTER

§ 920. Actual Disposition, as distinguished from Reputation and other modes of evidencing Disposition. That which induces us to believe that a witness is or is not likely to be speaking truthfully is usually some circumstance of his actual personality. Just as his knowledge and his recollection, his sanity and his maturity of age, as bearing on his qualifications for admission, are actual qualities somewhere existent in or attributable to him, so also the moral character, the bias, or the corruption, which tend to discredit him and affect the probability of his truthfulness, are actual qualities, having probative force because conceived of as existent in or attributed to him. It may be necessary, in establishing one or more of these qualities, to resort to reputation or other evidence; but the reputation is not the immediate basis of our inference as to his probable truth-telling. Reputation is not resorted to at all for the purpose of discovering his bias, his knowledge, his recollection, and the like; and the fact that it is resorted to for ascertaining his moral disposition must not be allowed to obscure the important truth that the thing immediately and fundamentally important is the actual disposition, and not the reputation (ante, § 52, post, § 1608).

Reputation, then, is merely evidence of disposition or character, and, moreover, only one of three kinds of such evidence. First, there may be particular instances of conduct, good or bad, from which is inferrible the permanent disposition that has inspired them; questions of Circumstantial Evidence thus arise which are treated later (post, §§ 977–988). Secondly, there may be the personal knowledge of one who has observed the man, i.e. Testimonial Evidence, such as would be given of the qualities of a horse, the strength of an iron beam, or the circumstances of a death, by one who has personally observed the data; there ought in reason to be no evidential objection to this kind of testimony to character; yet the Opinion rule has here been invoked, and the admissibility of such testimony is generally denied (post, § 1980). Thirdly, there may be reputation, i.e. the net expression of a multitude of personal opinions of the preceding sort, based more or less on personal intercourse. This should at least stand on no better footing than the preceding class, though it does in fact; but it has to pass the gauntlet of the Hearsay rule, and its admissibility as an exception to that rule is there discussed (post, § 1608–1621).

All these three varieties are merely kinds of evidence for proving Character. But it is for the present purpose immaterial whether the intention is to evidence that Character by means of reputation or otherwise. What we are now concerned with is the inference from Character to Conduct, i.e. to the witness' act of speaking correctly or incorrectly when on the stand.

§ 921. Relevancy and Auxiliary Policy; their different bearings. In arguing from a witness' character to his probable truth-telling, questions of relevancy are of course the primary ones,—questions as to the kind of character, the time at which it is predicated, and the like. But, as with all circumstantial evidence (ante, § 42), questions of auxiliary policy may be raised. It has already been seen, in dealing with a defendant's character (ante, § 57), that considerations of this sort are controlling; i.e. that which is relevant enough (the defendant's bad moral character for the quality in question) is not allowed to be used by the prosecution because of the undue prejudice to the case of the defendant on its merits; and that in civil cases (ante, § 64) the character of the parties, relevant though it may be, is for other reasons not usable. Are there here any such controlling reasons of auxiliary policy?

It is usually assumed that there are not. The reason for exclusion in the case of a criminal defendant is that he may be found guilty on the present charge, not because he is believed to be guilty, but because his bad character may be thought by the jury to deserve punishment or to deprive an erroneous verdict of its moral injustice. But this reason obviously is totally lacking in the case of a witness, because he is not on trial and can be found guilty of nothing. The reason for exclusion in the case of civil parties is that, even where some moral turpitude is involved (and where character would therefore be relevant), the possibilities of protracting the trial, confusing the issues, and turning the proceeding into a contest of mere numbers of witnesses, are strong enough to outweigh the advantage of having evidence of such slight value; and these reasons and motives are again supposed to be inapplicable to evidence of witnesses' character. The law, then, as now universally accepted, attributes no controlling influence to any of these considerations, and therefore allows the character of witnesses to be offered freely in evidence; subject only, of course, to the general discretionary power of the trial Court to limit the number of witnesses on this as on any other point (post, § 1907).

But it is a proper assumption that none of the above considerations apply to the use of witness' character? It is true that the witness cannot be found guilty by the jury upon any charge; but the assaults upon his character may bring it to public notice in such a way that, without any charge and without any trial, he may be condemned by public opinion and disgraced before the community. While we may not choose to regard with compunction the mere feelings of the witness, we may well hesitate if we find that the prospect of this ordeal of public disgrace threatens to make the witness-box a place of dread to its innocent occupant, and to deprive justice of the fullest opportunity to obtain useful testimony. Again, the reasons applicable to the use of parties' character in civil cases do also unquestionably in some degree apply to the use of witness' character; for no long experience at trials is needed to convince one that the danger of the protraction of the proceedings, the confusion of the issues, and the degeneracy of the trial into a contest between neighborhood factions is equally attendant upon such evidence. Judges have often protested against the abuses of this kind of evidence (post, § 1610). They concede the comparative triviality of its value. The modern tendency is to abandon the old notion (a mark of a primitive stage of opinion) that a usually bad man will usually lie and a usually good man will usually tell the truth. It would seem desirable to consider the expediency of restricting the resort to this feeble and petty class of evidence. Another and more advanced generation will possibly persuade itself to this decision:

1860, WARDLAW, J., in Chapman v. Cooley, 12 Rich. 660: "The consumption of the limited time which can be appropriated to the administration of justice, and of the money of parties and witnesses, required by the trial of collateral issues as to character, is a great and growing mischief. In this very case, involving in pecuniary interest the value of a cotton-screw and seven bags of cotton, the judge reports that three days of a former session were occupied, with no other fruit than mistrial by cessation of the term, and that at the trial which resulted in a verdict, notwithstanding his rulings to exclude such evidence as to the principal witness of the plaintiff, fifty-six witnesses were examined as to character. Great delay, expense, and exasperation necessarily follow such a course. Instead of trying the issue in the action, the procedure in many cases is a trial of the witnesses; and every witness is expected to bring in his train a host of compurgators who will swear to their faith in him when he contradicts himself or is contradicted by others. These collateral issues as to character are practically and sometimes justly applied, not only to the witnesses as to the facts in controversy, but also to the witnesses as to character themselves, and really are unlimited and illimitable. In a large majority of cases, these collateral investigations are altogether sterile, either because the testimony of the witness assailed is immaterial, or because the number is nearly equal of those attacking and those defending his character. It is frequently a mere contest as to the number of the compurgators and the vilifiers, and in the muster the vicinage is canvassed and disquieted."

1900, Hon. J. F. DALY, in "The Brief", III, 15: "In my experience and that of many judges there has been no successful impeachment of a witness by proof of bad reputation. There is something distasteful to the average juryman in the 'swearing away a man's character'; and the general feeling in that regard is evidenced by the reluctance, on the one hand, of witnesses to come forward and testify that they would not believe a witness under oath, and the readiness, on the other hand, with which all a man's acquaintances hasten to his support. . . . The advice to clients should be: Do not attempt to impeach the character of an adversary or a witness unless you are absolutely certain there is no character to impeach." [1]

§ 922. Kind of Character; Veracity as the Fundamental Quality. From the point of view of modern psychology, the moral disposition which tends for or against falsehood is an elusive quality. Its intermittent operation in connection with other tendencies, and the difficulty of ascertaining its quality and force, make it by no means a feature peculiarly reliable in the diagnosis of testimonial credit.[1] Hence, to the psychologist, the common law's reliance on character as an index of falsehood is crude and childish.

Nevertheless, Psychology itself has thus far discovered no feasible substitute. The crude belief of the common law must therefore hold its place until science provides a better method.

In determining the relevancy of Character as affecting the credit to be given to a witness, the first question is, What kind of character is relevant? Since the argument is to be against or for the probability of his now telling the truth upon the stand, it is obvious that the quality or tendency which will here aid is his quality or tendency as to truth-telling in general, i.e. his veracity, or, as more commonly and more loosely put, his character for truth. This must be, and is universally conceded to be, the immediate basis of inference. Character for truth is always and everywhere admissible.

Moreover, any other trait or quality, or combination of them, is relevant only so far as involving, necessarily or probably, the presence or absence of this quality as to truth-telling. This leads us to the chief topic of controversy in this department, namely, whether bad moral character in general, or some other specific bad quality in particular, is admissible.

§ 921. [1] 1893, Simkins, J., in Carroll v. State, 32 Tex. Cr. 431, 24 S. W. 100 ("Experience clearly demonstrates that, in most efforts to swear away the character of a witness, animosity or revenge is the incentive or cause of the most positive impeaching testimony").

§ 922. [1] From the point of view of logic and psychology as applicable to argument before the jury (not the rules of Admissibility), see the materials collected in the present author's "Principles of Judicial Proof, as given by Logic, Psychology, and General Experience, and illustrated in Judicial Trials" (1913), §§ 196–202, especially Duprat's essay on "The Lie." See also the essays on pathological lies, etc., cited ante, § 875.

The argument for the use of bad general character to discredit a witness is, in brief, that it necessarily involves an impairment of the truth-telling capacity, that to show general moral degeneration is to show an inevitable degeneration in veracity, and that the former is often more easily betrayed to observation than is the latter. The following passages illustrate the various phrasings of the argument:

1656, Bushnell's Trial, 5 How. St. Tr. 633, 701, Bushnell, arguing against a witness whose many infamies he had related: "But may some say 'that all this, however true, makes him no more than a thief or a robber of both God and man, or a plunderer, or a parricide, a profaner, or a drunkard, or the like; but now this doth not wholly disenable his testimony; but could I make it appear that he had formerly foresworn himself, then, I had something to the purpose.' To this I shall answer . . . that we cannot prove it that those who bore false witness against Naboth did ever bear false witness against any before, but this it was that rendered them suspicious (and with just judges should have been cause enough to abhor them), because they were sons of Belial, wicked, mischievous, lawless men, men of so much known infamy that they would not stick at anything which was put upon them, be it either to speak or to do, but in the general were ready for any wicked employment."

1829, TOOMER, J., in State v. Boswell, 2 Dev. 210: "Should a witness whose general character is proverbially bad as to licentiousness and lewdness, who is in his habits regardless of the precepts of religion and reckless of the consequences of vice be entitled to the same credit as another whose character is without stain, and whose whole life has been marked by piety, virtue, and truth? . . . An unprincipled man, although grovelling in other vices which he has long practised, may for selfish purposes artfully conceal the weakness of his character on the score of veracity. Should not such habits lessen the weight and impair the credit of a witness, although he may have established no general character bad as to truth?"

1837, MARCY, Sen., in Bakeman v. Rose, 18 Wend. 146, 151: "That the credibility of a witness should be sought through his general moral character I have no doubt. . . . If the inquiry be confined to the general reputation of the witness in point of truth among his neighbors, it will happen in some cases that a witness whose general moral character is deservedly infamous is allowed to impress his testimony on the jury with unqualified weight, simply because mendacity may have been relatively too insignificant an item, in the catalogue of his vices, to have attracted the attention or elicited the remark of his acquaintance. Or it may happen that, though generally of so depraved or corrupt a life that no one would doubt the facility with which he might be suborned to swear falsely, yet from caution or calculation he may have observed that general veracity in his common intercourse, or from taciturnity a 'wilful stillness entertained', which would render his reputation impregnable natural to this form of inquiry. . . . One of the great benefits of jury trial was supposed to exist in the circumstance that the jury, being from the vicinage of the parties and the witnesses, were better able to judge of their relative honesty and credibility. It would seem, therefore, in accordance with this principle, that under the modern forms of impanelling juries, which do not in many cases afford to jurors the means of judging, from personal knowledge of the character of witnesses, the measure of credit to be given to them, that as liberal a course for supplying this deficiency of knowledge should be allowed as would be compatible with the rights of the witnesses."

The arguments made in answer to this are chiefly three: (1) that, as a matter of human nature, a bad general disposition does not necessarily or commonly involve a lack of veracity, and that therefore the former is of little or no bearing probatively; (2) that the estimate of an ordinary witness as to another's bad general character is apt to be formed loosely from uncertain data and to rest in large part on personal prejudice and on mere differences of opinion on points of belief or conduct, — a chance of error which is relatively small in the specific inquiry as to the other's notorious untruthfulness; and (3) that the incidental unpleasant features of the witness-box are largely increased when the way is opened to this broad and loose method of abusing those who are called as witnesses. The following passages represent the various aspects of the argument:

1814, BOYLE, C. J., in Noel v. Dickey, 3 Bibb 269: "It is an observation not less true than trite, that no one is entirely virtuous or entirely vicious. Such, indeed, is in general the preponderance of the virtue or vice of individuals as to entitle them to the general character of good or of bad; but we cannot, merely from knowing what the general character is, say with certainty what vice or virtue enters into its composition. If, therefore, we would form a correct judgment of a man with regard to any particular vice or virtue, it is necessary we should be informed of his character in that particular respect. . . . A person, therefore, whose general character is bad, may notwithstanding possess such a degree of veracity as to entitle him to credit upon oath; and whether he does so or not can only be ascertained by inquiry into his character for truth."

1848, GREENE, J., in Carter v. Carenaugh, 1 Greene Ia. 173: "The method of questioning as to general character alone appears to us not only vague but subject to great abuse and injustice. Clannish witnesses, whose intercourse and business are always limited to a particular class of kindred spirits, who may constitute a majority of the neighborhood, often entertain peculiar and contracted views of general character, when applied to those who may not agree with them in social, religious, or political tenets. And thus, by a decided majority of one neighborhood, a man might be represented as possessing an excellent general character; while in an adjoining neighborhood, where he is equally well known, he might be described as a man of great moral turpitude. . . . The requisites of a good character, and the components of a bad one, are so variously viewed by different and even adjacent communities that they never can become a safe and uniform test of veracity, without confining the inquiry particularly to character for truth. In some communities an ultra-Mason, in others a proscriptive anti-Mason, in this neighborhood an abolitionist, in the adjoining one an anti-abolitionist, would be regarded and styled a bad character; and thus, in many communities, he who plays cards, or engages in horse-racing, or frequents groceries, or works on the Sabbath-day, is looked upon and called a bad character; and yet such men — either the advocates of unpopular sentiments, or those addicted to objectionable habits — may have a most commendable regard for veracity. . . . Thus, by opening this boundless field of inquiry as to 'bad character,' in its multitudinous phases, the most truth-abiding man might often be impeached."

1856, ELLSWORTH, J., in State v. Randolph, 24 Conn. 363, 367: "The more general enquiry in England is adopted to learn the witness' character for truth; ours is adopted for the same purpose, but is more simple and direct. In our courts the enquiry put is, 'Is the character for truth on a par with that of mankind in general?' The English rule has this advantage, that it brings the general character of the witness before the triers, which is important where the witness has not acquired a specific character on the subject of truth; and hence it is urged with some force that in such a case the general inquiry is essential, for no other will reach the case. . . . General bad character is undoubtedly a serious blemish in a witness, and might justly detract from the weight of his testimony, and so might the character of a witness for the specific blemish of licentiousness, especially in the female sex. But where shall we stop the enquiries? Witnesses, who can have no opportunity to exculpate themselves or give explanations of their acts, ought not to be exposed to unjust obloquy, nor should the trial be complicated and prolonged by trying collateral issues. If it were wise and just to enquire for one's reputation for virtue, why not for gambling, horse-racing, drunkenness, sabbath-breaking, etc.?"

1869, ZABRISKIE, Ch., in Atwood v. Impson, 20 N. J. Eq. 157: "With many, telling the truth is a habit and a principle which they adhere to always, though they may indulge in drinking, swearing, gambling, roystering, or making close bargains. With others, lying is the habit or principle, and if elevated to be senators or legislators, or made church-members or deacons, it does not always reform them. The object of the law is to show the character of the witness as to telling the truth."

There can be little doubt that the latter class of arguments represent the better side. Attacking a witness' character is often but a feeble and ineffective contribution to the proof of the issue; and its drawbacks appear in their most emphasized form where the broader method of attack is allowed. The modern spirit tends to confine this mode of attack to its narrowest limits; and in the minority of jurisdictions which permit the broader method, the annals of trials give the reader an unedifying impression of the unprofitable nature of such evidence.

§ 923. Same: the Rule in the various Jurisdictions. Historically, the use of bad general character appears as originally allowable, — fitting, as it does, a more primitive notion of human nature. In England, it was used without question down to the latter part of the 1700s (whence its appearance by transplantation in some of our earliest Courts). But about that time, in some obscure way, an opposition set in, and the propriety of using character for truth only was advocated. By the first part of the 1800s, a compromise had been reached; and, while character for truth only was taken as the fundamental requirement, the estimate was allowed to be based on the witness' knowledge of the other's general character; so that the inquiry in form became a compromise (post, § 1982), i.e. "Knowing his general character, would you believe him on oath?" In England, then, and in those States which allow that form of question, a slight concession is made (post, §§ 1982, 1985) by allowing the witness, in giving his personal opinion as to veracity, to consider in his own mind the other's general qualities; but it is to be observed that the witness does not state to the tribunal what that general character is. In other words, for the purposes of proving by repute, general character is excluded, and character for veracity only is stated. This is the modern rule in England.

In the United States, only veracity-character is admissible, in the great majority of jurisdictions.[1] Here the use of the witness' personal belief as to the character of the other has always stood on a precarious footing (post, § 1985);

23 How. 2, 13 (expressly left undecided); Alabama: Here general character was held admissible, except as otherwise noted: 1839, McCutchen's Adm'rs v. McCutchen, 9 Port. 650, 655; 1846, Sorrelle v. Craig, 9 Ala. 540 (left undecided); 1850, Nugent v. State, 18 Ala. 526 (denied); 1856, Ward v. State, 28 Ala. 53, 60, 64 (affirmed by two to one); 1871, Boles v. State, 46 Ala. 206 (approving the preceding case); 1872, De Kalb Co. v. Smith, 47 Ala. 412 (same); 1875, Holland v. Barnes, 53 id. 86 (excluding a woman's chastity); 1885, Motes v. Bates, 80 Ala. 382, 385; 1888, Davenport v. State, 85 Ala. 336, 338, 5 So. 152 (excluding character for honesty); 1889, McInerny v. Irvin, 90 Ala. 275, 277, 7 So. 84 (excluding a woman's character for chastity); Birmingham U. R. Co. v. Hale, 90 Ala. 8, 11, 8 So. 142 (same); 1894, Rhea v. State, 100 Ala. 119, 14 So. 853 (same); 1891, Mitchell v. State, 94 Ala. 68, 73, 10 So. 518; 1895, Byers v. State, 105 Ala. 31, 16 So. 716; 1895, Yarbrough v. State, 105 Ala. 43, 16 So. 758; 1896, McCutchen v. State, 109 Ala. 465, 19 So. 810 (same as Davenport v. State); 1896, Crawford v. State, 112 Ala. 1, 21 So. 214 (admitting bad general character, but not character for chastity); 1897, White v. State, 114 Ala. 10, 22 So. 111; 1904, Ross v. State, 139 Ala. 144, 36 So. 718 (general character, but not character for turbulence, allowed); 1917, Terry v. State, 15 Ala. App. 665, 74 So. 756 (moral character; the language of the opinion is obscure); 1919, Johnson v. State, 203 Ala. 30, 81 So. 820 (general bad character, admissible);

Alaska: Comp. L. 1913, § 1501 (like Or. Laws 1920, § 863);

Arkansas: 1855, Pleasant v. State, 15 Ark. 624, 651, semble (truth only); Code, § 654, now Dig. 1919, § 4187 ("A witness may be impeached . . . by evidence that his general reputation, for truth or morality, renders him unworthy of belief"); 1874, Majors v. State, 29 Ark. 112 (character for "immorality" admitted); 1890, Hollingsworth v. State, 53 Ark. 387, 394, 14 S. W. 41 (character for truth only, improper);

California: C. C. P. 1872, § 2051 ("general reputation for truth, honesty, or integrity", admissible); § 1847 ("evidence affecting his character for truth, honesty, or integrity" is admissible); 1865, People v. Yslas, 27 Cal. 630, 633 (excluding chastity-character; Currey, J., diss.); 1883, People v. Markham, 64 Cal. 157, 163, 30 Pac. 620 (pointing out that the last two qualities named in the Code are additions to the common-law rule of the State); 1895, People v. Johnson, 106 Cal. 289, 39 Pac. 622 (woman's character for chastity, excluded); 1895, People v. Chin Hane, 108 Cal. 597, 41 Pac. 697 (excluding character as a prostitute);

Connecticut: 1810, Swift, Evidence, 143 (character for truth only; quoted post, § 1985); 1877, State v. Shields, 45 Conn. 256, 257, 260, 263 (rape; former prostitution of the prosecutrix admitted, but the principle not specified); Florida: 1878, Robinson v. State, 16 Fla. 835, 839, semble (veracity only); Rev. G. S. 1919, § 2706 ("general reputation" allowed); 1898, Mercer v. State, 40 Fla. 216, 24 So. 154 (veracity only); 1906, Maloy v. State, 52 Fla. 101, 41 So. 791 (manslaughter; accused's character for veracity, admitted);

Georgia: Rev. C. 1910, § 5882, P. C. § 1053 ("general bad character", admissible); 1855, Stokes v. State, 18 Ga. 17, 37 (general character, followed by opinion as to belief on oath); 1858, Smithwick v. Evans, 24 Ga. 463 (general character); 1860, Weathers v. Barkdale, 30 id. 889 (same; the former of these two excludes, the latter admits, a woman's character for chastity); 1873, Wood v. State, 48 Ga. 192, 292, semble (excluding female character for chastity; here a habit of illegal intercourse with a particular person was considered);

Idaho: Comp. St. 1919, § 7935 ("truth, honesty, or integrity"); § 8038 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2051);

Illinois: Here character for veracity only is admissible: 1849, Frye v. Bank, 11 Ill. 367, 378; 1859, Crabtree v. Kile, 21 Ill. 183 ("general character" spoken of, perhaps carelessly); 1860, Cook v. Hunt, 24 Ill. 535, 545, 550; 1876, Dimick v. Downs, 82 Ill. 570, 573; 1884, Tedens v. Schumers, 112 Ill. 263, 266; 1887, Spies v. People, 122 Ill. 1, 208, 12 N. E. 865, 17 N. E. 898;

Indiana: The Civil Code provided (R. S. 1838, p. 275; Civ. Code, § 242) that in civil cases general moral character should be admissible; and this has been construed as also admitting specific moral traits: 1841, Walker v. State, 6 Blackf. 3; 1873, Indianapolis P. & C. R. Co. v. Anthony, 43 Ind. 183, 193 (chastity of female witness, admitted); 1877, Rawles v. State, 56 Ind. 439 (bastardy proceedings; here the complainant's specific character for chastity was also received); 1879, Smock v. Pierson, 68 Ind. 405 (general moral character; bastardy proceedings). But this section was treated as not applicable in criminal cases: 1874, Fletcher v. State, 49 Ind. 131 (interpreting the common law; and therefore not extending to criminal cases the rule of Civ. C. § 242); 1877, Farley v. State, 57 Ind. 334; 1879, State v. Bloom, 68 Ind. 55; State v. Beal, 68 Ind. 346. In 1881, however (R. S. 1881, § 1803), the rule for civil cases was extended to criminal cases: 1884, Wachstetter v. State, 99 Ind. 298; 1885, Anderson v. State, 104 Ind. 471, 4 N. E. 363, 5 N. E. 711 (a woman's character for chastity, admitted); 1892, Randall v. State, 132 Ind. 543, 32 N. E. 305 (defendant's moral character); and the statute now reads: Burns' Ann. St. 1914, § 529, 2116 ("In all questions affecting the credibility of a witness, his general moral character may be given in evidence");

Iowa: at first character for truth only was admitted: 1848, Carter v. Cavenaugh, 1 Greene 171; 1859, State v. Sater, 8 Ia. 420, 424; then by statute (infra) general moral character was made admissible: 1867, Kilburn v. Mullen, 22 Ia. 502 (excluding character for chastity, i.e. "a specific vice"); 1868, State v. Vincent, 24 Ia. 570, 574; 1882, State v. Egan, 59 Ia. 637, 13 N. W. 730; 1884, State v. Kirkpatrick, 63 Ia. 559, 19 N. W. 660; Code 1897, § 4614, Comp. C. § 7321 ("general moral character", admissible); 1899, State v. Seevers, 108 Ia. 738, 78 N. W. 705; 1904, State v. Haupt, 126 Ia. 152, 101 N. W. 739 (prosecutrix in seduction); 1913, Hunt v. Waterloo C. F. & N. R. Co., 160 Ia. 722, 141 N. W. 334 (veracity-character admissible; Code §§ 4613, 4614, admitting general character, is not exclusive);

Kansas: 1866, Craft v. State, 3 Kan. 450, 480, semble (woman's character for chastity excluded); 1891, Coates v. Sulan, 21 Kan. 341 (no ruling; yet the practice seems to sanction character for truth only); 1920, State ex rel. Zawada v. Lyons, 107 Kan. 312, 191 Pac. 281 ("An early decision by this Court, frequently quoted in former years, was to the effect that loss of virtue does not imply lack of truthfulness"; such evidence here held not improperly rejected);

Kentucky: 1914, Noel v. Dickey, 3 Bibb 268, semble (truth only); 1819, Mobley v. Hamit, 1 A. K. Marsh 591 (general character admissible, if followed by the witness' inference as to credibility upon oath); 1821, Hume v. Scott, 3 A. K. Marsh 261 (general character admissible, without limitation; expressly overruling the preceding case); 1857, Thurman v. Virgin, 18 B. Monr. 792 (general character admissible); 1869, Young v. Com., 6 Bush 316, semble; 1895, Com. v. Wilson, — Ky. —, 32 S. W. 166 (either character for truth or general moral character); C. C. P. 1895, § 597 ("evidence that his general reputation for untruthfulness or immorality renders him unworthy of belief", allowable); 1913, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Scalf, 155 Ky. 273, 159 S. W. 804 (same); 1904, Helm v. Com., — Ky. —, 81 S. W. 270 (general moral character, admitted); 1905, Newman v. Com., — Ky. —, 88 S. W. 1089 (character for peace and quiet of a defendant taking the stand, excluded; "his character for truthfulness, or his general moral character", might have been shown); 1917, Day v. Com., 173 Ky. 269, 191 S. W. 105 (husband-murder by poisoning; the accused's bad reputation for "morality and truthfulness", admitted against her as a witness but not a party; the trial Court need not instruct the jury on the difference, unless requested); 1921, Hill v. Com., 191 Ky. 477, 230 S. W. 910 (murder; defendant impeached by "general reputation for morality");

Louisiana: general character is admissible; the controversy is as to other specific qualities than veracity: 1852, State v. Parker, 7 La. An. 83, 87 (semble, "infamous" character admitted, but character for extortion, cheating, and dissoluteness, not admitted by the majority); 1892, State v. Jackson, 44 La. An. 160, 162, 10 So. 600 (general character "of that kind which will show such moral turpitude" as to make him incredible, admissible; semble, "infamous" character, admissible, for violence, inadmissible); 1893, State v. Taylor, 45 La. An. 605, 609, 12 So. 927 (character for honesty, as well as truth; here a defendant on trial for larceny); 1901, State v. Guy, 106 La. 8, 30 So. 268 (general moral character admissible, but not character for honesty or other specific traits than veracity; Breaux, J., diss.); 1906, State v. Baudoin, 115 La. 837, 40 So. 239 (assault with intent to kill; prosecuting witness' character for chastity, excluded); 1906, State v. Romero, 117 La. 1003, 42 So. 482 (a woman's character for unchastity, not admissible);

Maine: character for truth only is admissible: 1841, Phillips v. Kingfield, 19 Me. 375, 377; 1844, State v. Bruce, 24 id. 71 ("infamous" character, excluded); 1849, Thayer v. Boyle, 30 Me. 475, 481 (intemperate habits, excluded); 1856, Shaw v. Emery, 42 Me. 59, 64; 1875, Sidelinger v. Bucklin, 64 Me. 371 (bastardy; complainant's reputation as a prostitute, excluded); 1877, State v. Morse, 67 Me. 428 (prosecutrix in rape complaint);

Maryland: 1795, Hutchings v. Cavalier, 3 H. &. McH. 389 (general character, admissible); 1890, Brown v. State, 72 Md. 468, 475, 20 Atl. 186 (truth only; not a woman's chastity); Brown v. State, 72 Md. 477, 480, 20 Atl. 140 (not general bad character); 1901, Hoffman v. State, 93 Md. 388, 49 Atl. 658 (truth only);

Massachusetts: 1817, Com. v. Murphy, 14 Mass. 387 (Per Curiam: "A common prostitute must necessarily have greatly corrupted, if not totally lost, the moral principle, and of course her respect for truth and her regard for the sacredness of an oath"); 1846, Com. v. Churchill, 11 Metc. 539 (overruling the preceding case); 1858, Quinsigamond Bank v. Hobbs, 11 Gray 257 (veracity only; not integrity); 1859, Pierce v. Newton, 13 Gray 528 (veracity only; allowing other questions in order to make it plain that the veracity-reputation was not confined to a failure to pay debts);

Michigan: 1856, Webber v. Hanke, 4 Mich. 198, 203 (truth only); 1874, Hamilton v. People, 29 Mich. 173, 185 (same); 1899, Calkins v. Ann Arbor R. Co., 119 Mich. 312, 78 N. W. 129 (character for honesty, excluded); 1900, People v. O'Hare, 124 Mich. 515, 83 N. W. 279 (woman's character for chastity, excluded); 1893, People v. Mills, 94 Mich. 630, 54 N. W. 488 ("lack of chastity cannot be used to impeach the credibility of a female witness"), 1904, People v. Wilson, 136 Mich.

298, 99 N. W. 6 (bastardy; the woman's character for unchastity, excluded);
Minnesota: 1872, Rudsdill v. Slingerland, 18 Minn. 380 (truth only); 1876, Moreland v. Lawrence, 23 Minn. 84, 88 (same);
Mississippi: 1850, Newman v. Mackin, 13 Sm. & M. 383, 387 (truth only); 1870, Head v. State, 44 Miss. 731, 735, 751 (allowing proof of a female witness' prostitution); 1881, Smith v. State, 58 Miss. 867, 873 (veracity only; woman's character as a prostitute excluded; Head v. State repudiated); 1885, French v. Sale, 63 Miss. 386, 393 (truth only); 1896, Tucker v. Tucker, 74 Miss. 93, 19 So. 955 ("probably unchaste character" of a woman, excluded; Whitfield, J., reserving his opinion); 1913, Alabama & V. R. Co. v. Thornhill, 106 Miss. 387, 63 So. 674 (Smith v. State followed);
Missouri: here it has always been conceded that general moral character is admissible: 1850, State v. Shields, 13 Mo. 236 ("bad moral character generally"); Day v. State, ib. 422, 426, semble ("general bad character"); 1874, State v. Hamilton, 55 Mo. 520, 522 ("moral character generally"); 1875, State v. Breeden, 58 Mo. 507 ("general moral character"); 1878, State v. Clinton, 67 Mo. 380, 390 ("general character" for "honesty and morality"); 1880, State v. Miller, 71 Mo. 591 ("general character for morality"); 1883, State v. Grant, 79 Mo. 133 (also, general reputation as a common drunkard, as showing a "deterioration of that general moral character"); 1886, State v. Rider, 90 Mo. 54, 63, 1 S. W. 825 ("morality"); 1888, s. c., 95 Mo. 474, 486, 8 S. W. 723 ("morality"); 1889, State v. Taylor, 98 Mo. 240, 245, 11 S. W. 570; 1891, State v. Shroyer, 104 Mo. 441, 446, 16 S. W. 286 (approving State v. Grant); 1894, State v. Smith, 125 Mo. 2, 6, 28 S. W. 181; 1896, State v. Weeden, 133 Mo. 70, 34 S. W. 473; 1897, State v. May, 142 Mo. 135, 43 S. W. 637; but an unedifying controversy (dealing much dole to the doctrine of 'stare decisis') long went on concerning the admissibility of a man's character for unchastity; it is perhaps not yet finally decided; 1850, State v. Shields, 13 Mo. 236 (woman; "general character for chastity" allowed, as "to some extent shaking the credibility"); 1878, State v. Clinton, 67 Mo. 380, 382, 390 (forgery; defendant as a witness; character for chastity admitted); 1883, State v. Grant, 79 Mo. 133 (admissible, for a female witness; semble, also, allowable to show that she was reputed a prostitute); 1886, State v. Rider, 90 Mo. 54, 63 (a man; chastity admitted); 1888, s. c., 95 Mo. 474, 486 (same); 1891, State v. Shroyer, 104 Mo. 441, 447, 16 S. W. 287 (rape; the defendant being a witness, his character for chastity was admitted); 1895, State v. Duffey, 128 Mo. 549, 31 S. W. 98 (chastity of a woman, admitted); 1895, State v. Sibley, 131 Mo. 519, 31 S. W. 1033 (by Div. 2; not admitting unchastity against male witnesses, especially against a defendant in a seduction charge, as here; going on the supposed authority of State v. Grant; Gantt, P. J., diss.); 1895, s. c., 132 Mo. 102, 33 S. W. 167 (by the Court in banc; affirming the preceding ruling; Brace, C. J., Macfarlane, Gantt, and Barclay, JJ., diss.); 1897, State v. Dyer, 139 Mo. 199, 40 S. W. 768 ("chastity and virtue", against a man, admitted; Burgess and Sherwood, JJ., undecided); 1898, State v. Summar, 143 Mo. 220, 45 S. W. 254 (woman's chastity, admitted); 1903, State v. Pollard, 174 Mo. 607, 74 S. W. 969 (rape: defendant's reputation for "chastity and morality", admitted to impeach him; Fox, J., writing the opinion, but in effect dissenting); 1900, State v. Evans, 158 Mo. 609, 59 S. W. 994 (defendant's general moral character, admissible); 1905, State v. Woodward, 191 Mo. 617, 90 S. W. (similar); 1906, State v. Beckner, 194 Mo. 281, 91 S. W. 893 (murder; defendant's character for violence, excluded; only general bad moral character can be used; prior decisions reviewed); 1906, State v. Richardson, 194 Mo. 326, 92 S. W. 649 (State v. Beckner followed; but the defendant's character for turbulence may be used, on the principle of § 58, ante, if he has first offered his character for peaceableness); 1906, York v. Everton, 121 Mo. App. 640, 97 S. W. 604 (reputation for unchastity, admitted; here, against a woman, though the rule is laid down for "both male and female witnesses"; but why should the Court rest this on State v. Sibley, supra?); 1908, State v. Oliphant, 128 Mo. App. 252, 107 S. W. 32 (illegal liquor sales; defendant's repute as a violator of the liquor law, admitted against him as a witness following State v. Beckner; Johnson, J., expressing dissatisfaction with the rule; but might not the learned judge push his skepticism a little further, and ask whether the character rule itself is so sacred? And should not an habitual offender's character always be admissible?); 1908, Imboden's Estate, 128 Mo. App. 555, 107 S. W. 400 (only character for truth and veracity admitted; purporting to follow State v. Pollard, and ignoring State v. Beckner); 1908, State v. Baker, 209 Mo. 444, 108 S. W. 6 ("truth and veracity as an average negro", held proper in subject but not in form, — whatever that may mean); 1908, State v. Priest, 215 Mo. 1, 114 S. W. 949 (general moral character, admissible); 1913, State v. Wellman, 253 Mo. 302, 161 S. W. 795 (crime against nature; that the defendant, who had testified, had the repute of committing crimes of the sort; excluded, distinguishing State v. Beckner and State v. Pollard); 1915, State v. Shuster, 263 Mo. 600, 173 S. W. 1049 (murder; prosecution's inquiries as to defendant's reputation as a peaceable law-abiding citizen, defendant having testified but offered no character-evidence, excluded, following State v. Beckner); 1920, State v. Edmundson, — Mo. —, 218 S. W. 864 (rape; defendant's general bad reputation, admitted to impeach him as witness); 1921, State v. Baird, 288 Mo. 62, 231 S. W. 625 (murder; defendant's bad character for turbulence, not admissible to discredit him);

Montana: Rev. C. 1921, §§ 10508, 10668 (like Cal. C. C. P. §§ 1847, 2051);
Nevada: 1874, State v. Ferguson, 9 Nev. 106, 120 (truth only); 1876, State v. Larkin, 11 Nev. 314, 330 (truth only; "though there perhaps are exceptional cases" in which "utter depravity of moral character" might be shown; here excluding the unchastity of a woman);
New Hampshire: character for truth only is admissible; 1838, State v. Howard, 9 N. H. 486, semble; 1850, Hoitt v. Moulton, 21 N. H. 592; 1861, State v. Forschner, 43 id. 89;
New Jersey: 1795, State v. Mairs, 1 N. J. L. 456 (not allowed to prove quarrelsome character; "a man may be a boxer or a bully and yet speak the truth upon oath"); 1869, Atwood v. Impson, 20 N. J. Eq. 150, 157 (truth only); King v. Ruckman, 20 N. J. Eq. 316, 357 (truth only);
New Mexico: Annot. St. 1915, § 2180 ("general evidence of bad moral character not restricted to his reputation for truth and veracity", admissible); 1895, Territory v. De Guzman, 8 N. M. 92, 42 Pac. 68, semble (general immorality, admissible); 1915, State v. Perkins, 21 N. M. 135, 153 Pac. 258 (Code 1915, § 2180 applied); 1918, State v. Anderson, 24 N. M. 360, 174 Pac. 215 (woman's character for chastity; not decided);
New York: 1817, Jackson v. Lewis, 13 Johns. 505 (veracity only); 1818, Troup v. Sherwood, 3 Johns. Ch. 558, 566, Kent, C. (veracity-character assumed to be the only proper one); 1837, Bakeman v. Rose, 18 Wend. 146 (general character, admitted, but not specific traits such as unchastity; quoted supra); 1838, People v. Abbot, 19 Wend. 198 (general character; the opinion of Cowen, J., for the Supreme Court, so far as it may have allowed the specific trait of unchastity, was in effect overruled by the decision of the Court of Errors and Appeals in Bakeman v. Rose, supra, delivered shortly afterwards); 1838, People v. Rector, 19 Wend. 579, semble (general character, admitted; if not so intended, the language was no longer law after Bakeman v. Rose, supra); 1842, Johnson v. People, 3 Hill 178 (bad character); 1859, People v. Blakeley, 4 Park. Cr. 182 (same); 1895, Carlson v. Winterson, 147 N. Y. 652, 723, 42 N. E. 347, semble (bad general character);

the inquiry is commonly confined to reputation as the mode of proof, and the question is thus more directly and clearly phrased for the contrast between general character and veracity-character. The positive opinion in favor of the latter in Chief Justice Swift's treatise, in 1810, had wide currency; and in one way or another, the great majority of jurisdictions finally gave adherence to that opinion. Those that withstand it are chiefly in the South and the Southwest.

§ 924. Same: Character as to Specific Traits (Chastity, etc.) other than Veracity. Where the principle is strictly maintained that veracity only is to be the subject of inquiry, no question can arise as to admitting character for any other trait. But in jurisdictions where bad general character may be used, the question must also arise whether some other specific vice or group of vices is not as significant as bad general character in indicating a degeneration of the truth-telling capacity. One of the objections, indeed, urged against the use of bad general character[1] is that it necessarily brings in its train a number of consequential difficulties such as this. The better opinion, and the one usually reached, is that in spite of logic's demands, policy requires that the line be drawn at bad general character, and that no specific quality other than that of veracity be considered:

1837, WALWORTH, C., in Bakeman v. Rose, 18 Wend. 146: "It is perfectly well settled, both in this State and in England, that the general character of the witness alone can be inquired into for the purpose of impeaching his credibility; — that is, what is his general character for truth and veracity, or whether his general character is such that he is not entitled to credit. But you cannot prove . . . that he has the reputation of being guilty of any particular class of crimes. You cannot therefore inquire whether the witness has the general reputation of being a thief, prostitute, murderer, forger, adulterer, gambler, swindler, or the like; although each and every of such offences, to a greater or less degree, impairs the moral character of the witness and tends to impeach his or her veracity"; TRACY, Sen.: "It has been pressed upon us with earnestness and eloquence that the condition of a public prostitute, being the most debased and demoralized state of human being that can be imagined, necessarily presupposes the absence of all moral principle, and especially that of regard for truth; and it is therefore contended that a common reputa-

Vermont: 1832, Morse v. Pineo, 4 Vt. 281 (truth only; excluding character as prostitute); 1835, State v. Smith, 7 Vt. 141 (same); 1843, Spears v. Forrest, 15 Vt. 435 (same); 1846, Crane v. Thayer, 18 Vt. 168 (veracity only); 1896, State v. Fournier, 68 Vt. 262, 35 Atl. 178 (same); 1905, State v. Stimpson, 78 Vt. 124, 62 Atl. 14 (rape under age; the woman's character as a prostitute excluded);
Virginia: 1816, Ligon v. Ford, 5 Munf. 10, 16 (general bad character, admissible); 1849, Uhl v. Com., 6 Gratt. 706, 708 (truth only; yet the witness, in saying whether he would believe on oath, may "take into consideration the whole moral character");
Washington: 1915, State v. Jackson, 83 Wash. 514, 145 Pac. 470 (subornation; "general reputation for immorality" of a woman witness, held admissible; following State v. Coella) 3 Wash. 99);
West Virginia: 1870, Lemons v. State, 4 W. Va. 755, semble (veracity only);
Wisconsin: 1858, Ketchingman v. State, 6 Wis. 426, 431 (truth only "commonly"); 1906, State v. Detwiler, 60 W. Va. 583, 55 S. E. 654 (rape; prosecutrix' character for chastity, not admitted to impeach credibility).

For the use of the woman's character for chastity, in rape and bastardy, compare §§ 62, 68, ante, and § 987, post.

§ 924. [1] As urged by Ellsworth, J., in the passage quoted ante, § 922.

tion of public prostitution necessarily includes a common reputation for falsehood. . . . If Courts had the power [to change rules of evidence], it might not be a very discreet exercise of it to attempt to gauge crimes and graduate a standard of vices and immoralities. Loathsome, deplorable, and even detestable as is a condition of public prostitution, it is not the only vice of a great kindred; theft, forgery, swindling, drunkenness, gambling, adultery, are also well allied; and if we undertake to determine that the reputation of one vice necessarily includes the reputation of another, it would be difficult to say when or where we could stop. But . . . [after noting the rule of the Roman and other laws] the common law in this respect certainly is founded on juster notions of human nature; for while it so far recognizes the affinity of vice as not to regard the testimony of a witness of bad moral character as above all exception, it rejects the conclusion that a person guilty of one immoral habit is necessarily disposed to practise all others. And seeing that the absolute exclusion of an immoral witness may operate more to the prejudice than to the advancement of justice, it recognizes that dictate of common sense which no theory can refute, that the natural love of truth, when combined with the fear of temporal punishment, is some restraint, even upon the most depraved, against the commission of gratuitous falsehood."

But a few Courts, restrained by no such considerations of policy, allow the use, not only of bad general character, but also of bad character for a specific trait, such as chastity. One result of this is the recurrence of speculative discussions upon such questions as whether a man's, or only a woman's, character for unchastity is relevant.[2] Another is that an attack on the personal character of the witness is available as a mere instrument of revenge for his opposing attitude, or as a threat for coercing the suppression of important opposing testimony. The trial is thus given indirectly a flavor of filth and rancor which is at once unnecessary and harmful to justice.

Logically, almost any specific trait might be invoked for the purpose of this attack; practically, the usage is confined to a few of the more disagreeable ones.[3]

[2] 1895, State v. Sibley, 131 Mo. 519, 33 S. W. 167 (Burgess, J., pro: "It is a matter of common knowledge that the bad character of a man for chastity does not even in the remotest degree affect his character for truth, when based upon that alone, while it does that of a woman. It is no compliment to a woman to measure her character for truth by the same standard that you do that of a man's, predicated upon character for chastity. What destroys the standing of the one in all the walks of life has no effect whatever on the standing for truth of the other. Thus in Bank v. Stryker, 3 Wheeler Cr. Cas. 332, it is said: 'Adultery has been committed openly by distinguished and otherwise honorable members [of the bar] as well in Great Britain as in our own country, yet the offending party has not been supposed to destroy the force of the obligation which they feel from the oath of office.' Dr. Johnson said, in discussing the difference of turpitude between lewdness in a man and in a woman, 'that he would not receive back a daughter because her husband, in the mere wantonness of appetite, had gone into the servant girl.' And so Macaulay said, respecting the weakness of Lord Byron for sexual pleasure, 'that it was an infirmity he shared with many great and noble men, — Lord Somers, Charles James Fox, and others.'" Gantt, J., contra: "It is important to get at the reason underlying the decision, and the Massachusetts Court put it upon the ground of the loss of moral principle. This testimony is admitted upon the ground that the prostitute, by her life of vice, has so impaired her moral sense that the obligation to speak the truth is no longer binding, or has become more or less lax. If this be true of the female, why not true of her habitual companions, and why, though there be degrees in the vice, may not a man's disregard of the laws of chastity, which compel his association with the prostitute, be shown as tending to prove a disposition to lightly regard the obligations of his oath. The rule only admits the evidence when it has ripened into a general reputation for the vice. For my part, I think it rests upon the same foundation whether the witness be male or female").

[3] The rulings are collected, for convenience, ante, § 923.

§ 925. Same: Accused's Bad Character as Witness and as Party, distinguished. The prosecution in a criminal case may not use the accused's bad character as evidence that he probably did the act charged, if the accused has not himself first attempted to use his good character in his exoneration (ante, §§ 57, 58). Moreover, even when that condition is fulfilled, both the defence and the prosecution may use only the character for the trait appropriate to the crime charged (ante, § 59). On the other hand, if the accused has taken the stand as a witness, the prosecution may impeach him as a witness (ante, § 890).

From these principles it follows that the prosecution, when thus impeaching the accused as a witness, may introduce his character for veracity only, except in those jurisdictions where impeachment is allowed to include general bad character or a specific bad trait; but that it may do this regardless of whether the accused has attempted to use his good character as relevant to his innocence.[1]

This distinction also becomes important where the accused by taking the stand has waived his privilege (post, § 2277).

§ 926. Same: Use of Prior Convictions and other Instances of Misconduct. In those jurisdictions in which veracity-character alone is allowed to be used to impeach, it would logically follow that when particular instances of misconduct are allowed to be used as throwing light on credibility — that is to say, conviction of crime, when shown by extrinsic evidence, and other misconduct, when brought out on cross-examination (post, §§ 980, 981), — only such instances should be used as are relevant to show a lack of truthfulness of disposition, — for example, forgery, cheating, and the like.

§ 925. [1] Ala. 1886, Dolan v. State, 81 Ala. 11, 18, 1 So. 707 (general character admissible, but "only to the extent it affected his credibility", and thus not character for turbulence); 1891, Mitchell v. State, 94 Ala. 68, 73, 10 So. 518 ("inquiry into his general character", not restricted to veracity, is proper); 1891, Jones v. State, 96 Ala. 102, 105, 11 So. 399 (similar); Ark. 1913, Paxton v. State, 157 Ark. 396, 157 S. W. 396 ("general reputation" admitted); Cal. 1896, People v. Hickman, 113 Cal. 80, 45 Pac. 175 (allowing against a defendant an inquiry as to the statutory qualities); 1898, People v. Prather, 120 Cal. 660, 53 Pac. 259 (same); 1898, People v. Silva, 121 Cal. 668, 54 Pac. 146 (same); Colo. 1900, Herren v. People, 28 Colo. 23, 62 Pac. 833 (character as witness only, allowable); Fla. 1907, Clinton v. State, 53 Fla. 98, 43 So. 312; Ind. 1889, Keyes v. State, 122 Ind. 527, 531, 23 N. E. 1097 (general bad character allowed); Ky. 1888, Lockard v. Com., 87 Ky. 201, 204, 8 S. W. 266 (similar); 1895, Barton v. Com., — Ky. —, 32 S. W. 172 (similar); 1901, Calhoon v. Com., — Ky. —, 64 S. W. 965 (character as witness only, allowed; compare the Kentucky rule ante, § 923); La. 1903, State v. Casey, 110 La. 712, 34 So. 746; Mich. 1904, People v. Albers, 137 Mich. 678, 100 N. W. 908 (perjury, an offer of defendant's character for veracity, held improperly excluded, though the defendant had not taken the stand, because it was relevant to the charge of perjury; although the offering counsel did not specify that it was for the latter purpose); N. Y. 1908, People v. Hinksman, 192 N. Y. 421, 85 N. E. 676 (rule applied to exclude testimony of bad reputation in rebuttal, after the defendant had admitted a prior conviction and protested that he had "been a good boy ever since"); N. C. 1897, State v. Traylor, 121 N. C. 674, 28 S. E. 493 (general character, allowed); 1908, State v. Cloninger, 149 N. C. 567, 63 S. E. 154 (rule applied to specific acts brought out on cross-examination), 1921, State v. Pearson, 181 N. C. 588, 107 S. E. 305 (liquor offence; defendant having testified, witnesses to his character for truth and veracity were not admitted, the State not having impeached his character as a witness, explaining State v. Foster, 130 N. C. 675).

For the use of particular instances of misconduct on cross-examination, see post, § 2277.

For the accused's use of his good character as witness before impeachment, see post, § 1104.

Entire consistency, however, is not shown in thus carrying out the strict principle. In the first place, conviction of crime is everywhere allowed to be used as affecting credibility of character, and while distinctions are sometimes made as to the grade of the crime, little effort is made to employ those crimes only which directly involve lack of honesty (post, § 980). In the second place, a few Courts, in dealing with the use of specific misconduct on cross-examination, permit the use of such misconduct only as directly bears on credibility, i.e. truthfulness; but most Courts make no attempt to do this, although logic and policy alike require such a restriction (post, § 982).

§ 927. Time of Character; Theory. No real dispute as to principle or policy is here to be found; the differences of ruling that occur are due almost entirely either to an erroneous application of admitted principles or to a confusion of other and unrelated principles with the matter in hand.

On analyzing the nature of the argument from witness' character, we find it to be really this: "The moral qualities of the person who is now speaking to us from the stand can throw some light on the probability of his truthfulness, because as he speaks they will influence him to be sincere or the reverse; let us therefore inquire into his quality in that respect." Obviously, our argument, because it believes in the present influence of the testifier's disposition upon his testimony, expects and requires us to exhibit to the tribunal his present character. This much seems indisputable. But it is equally obvious that the nature of the witness' character at the precise moment of his utterance is practically not ascertainable directly. We may have to go back only an hour or a day or a week, but we are at least going back some space of time when we call for either personal knowledge (of another witness) or reputation, which cannot possibly carry the proof down to the precise moment of utterance; and, besides this, the character of a former period, more or less distant, always enters into every estimate (reputed or individual) of character, even though it may be expressly predicated as of the present moment. Nevertheless, there is nothing improper in thus resorting, in part or entirely, to the character of a prior time. We are simply adding another step to the argument; for while first using present character to throw light on the probability of speaking the truth, we then have this present character to prove in its turn, and we argue from prior character to the probability of its persistence at the time of utterance. This second step of argument is an entirely legitimate one; it is merely the ordinary argument (ante, §§ 225, 233) from a past condition, having features of permanency, to the continuance of the condition at a later time.

The logical analysis, then, is: (1) Present character, at the time of speaking, is evidence upon the probability of sincere speaking; and (2) character at some prior time, more or less distant, is evidence to prove the premise (i.e. present character) of the first inference. Thus the source of possible confusion appears. For if we were to insist upon a categorical answer to the question, "May character at a prior time be used to show that the witness is probably not speaking the truth?", the answer must be a paradox. Prior character is not usable as showing directly that the witness is now speaking truthfully or the reverse; yet prior character is admissible to show present character, and the latter to show the proposition desired. Confronted by such a paradox, many Courts, not seeing the explanation, have thought themselves obliged to accept one or the other answer unqualifiedly; and the result has naturally been some confusion and error of principle.

§ 928. Same: the Competing Rules as to Prior Character. What, then, should be the rule as to the use of character at a prior time? Three different rules find vogue:[1]

§ 928. [1] The following citations include also the rulings upon an accused's prior character (ante, § 60), which rest upon precisely the same principle;
Federal: 1859, Teese v. Huntington, 23 How. 2, 14 (prior character admissible; but the time must not be "so remote from the transaction involved in the controversy as thereby to become entirely unsatisfactory and immaterial"); Alabama: 1854, Martin v. Martin, 25 Ala. 210 (in another place, whence the person had shortly before removed, admitted); 1878, Kelly v. State, 60 Ala. 19 (character in a different place, three years before, admitted); 1895, Yarborough v. State, 105 Ala. 43, 16 So. 758 (character years before, in a different town, admitted); 1895, Prater v. State, 107 Ala. 26, 18 So. 239 (character in a town six miles away where the witness formerly lived; admitted); 1919, Johnson v. State, 203 Ala. 30, 81 So. 820 (accused's general bad character may be shown up to the time of the alleged offence, but his veracity character up to the time of trial);
Arkansas: 1874, Snow v. Grace, 29 Ark. 131, 136 (within the discretion of the trial Court as to surprise and remoteness; here character seven years before in another place was received); 1877, Lawson v. State, 32 Ark. 220, 222 (same; character two years before in another place, held improperly rejected);
California: 1904, People v. Nunley, 142 Cal. 441, 76 Pac. 45 (reputation in a place twelve miles away, two years before, where he had lived, admitted in rebuttal); 1920, Akers' Guardianship, 184 Cal. 514, 194 Pac. 706 (reputation of the mother in another place and at a remote time, admissible in trial Court's discretion);
Connecticut: 1846, Caldwell v. State, 17 Conn. 467, 472 (bawdy-house; character at a prior time, admitted);
Florida: 1904, Alford v. State, 47 Fla. 1, 36 So. 436 (character some years before, admitted on the facts);
Georgia: 1888, Watkins v. State, 82 Ga. 231, 8 S. E. 875 (former character admissible subject to discretion; here a character eight years before in Georgia, the witness having been since absent, admitted);
Idaho: 1916, Boeck v. Boeck, 29 Ida. 639, 161 Pac. 576 (trial held in July 1914, and deposition of K. taken in February 1914; questions as to the reputation of H. for veracity, H. being a witness called later at the trial, excluded, as improperly "impeaching in anticipation"; the ruling is groundlessly wrong, and no authority is cited; an index of the weight of this ruling is seen in the opinion's naive statement that "the right to impeach a witness and the methods of impeachment are statutory"! Shades of Scarlett and O'Connell! who tanned the testimonial hides for a long lifetime without the aid of any statute);
Illinois: 1855, Holmes v. Stateler, 17 Ill. 453 (character in another State than his present residence, for a period of ten years, ending eight years before the trial, admitted; "if the witness did so reform, it was quite as easy for the plaintiff to prove that fact as for the defendant to prove that his character still continued bad"); 1877, Blackburn v. Mann, 85 Ill. 222 (preceding case approved); 1897, Kirkham v. People, 170 Ill. 9, 48 N. E. 465 (reputation at a place left by the witness four years before, admissible); 1910, Kennedy v. Modern Woodmen, 243 Ill. 560, 90 N. E. 1084 (character ten years before the trial in another town, admitted); Indiana: citations from this jurisdiction on this point may be ignored by other Courts; during more than sixty years the rulings vacillated: 1841, Walker v. State, 6 Blackf. 3 (at time of trial only); 1850, King v. Hersey, 2 Ind. 403 (good character before suit begun, proved in rebuttal of bad character after suit begun); 1851, Rucker v. Beaty, 3 Ind. 71 (former bad character not admissible, except to corroborate a bad one at time of trial); 1862, Rogers v. Lewis, 19 Ind. 405 (same as Walker's Case); 1863, Aurora v. Cobb, 21 Ind. 510 (same); 1866, Abshire v. Mather, 27 Ind. 381, 384 (at time of trial only, though there may be exceptions, the need of which the impeacher must show; here character five years before was excluded); 1870, Chance v. R. Co., 32 Ind. 475 (like Walker's Case); 1873, Indianapolis P. & C. R. Co. v. Anthony, 43 Ind. 192, semble (same); 1874, Stratton v. State, 45 Ind. 468, 472 ("it has never been held that the testimony must have reference to that exact time [of his testimony]"; so that evidence is to be received "of his character within a reasonable time before the trial", as pointing forward to his character at the time of testifying, which is the objective point; here admitting character two years before in another region); 1877, Rawles v. State, 56 Ind. 439 (such evidence "should have reference to . . . the time he testified"; hence a question not so specifying the time was held improper); 1879, Louisville N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Richardson, 66 Ind. 50 (admitting character six weeks before the trial, the witness having then removed elsewhere); 1879, Smock v. Pierson, 68 Ind. 405 ("must relate to the time the witness is testifying"); 1882, Memphis & O. R. P. Co. v. McCool, 83 Ind. 392 (where bad reputation at the time of the trial in E. had been shown, further evidence of bad reputation two or three years before in another town was admitted; the preceding conflict in rulings being noted); 1888, Pape v. Wright, 116 Ind. 509, 19 N. E. 459 ("a time reasonably near the time of the examination"; here reputation two months before was admitted); 1890, Sage v. State, 127 Ind. 15, 27, 26 N. E. 667 (admitting character seven years before, the witness having been in the meantime in jail at another place; yet the general principle is treated as doubtful and unsettled); 1897, Hank v. State, 148 Ind. 238, 46 N. E. 127, 47 N. E. 465 (after evidencing present character, character at another place, fifteen months before, was admitted; the rule allowing character at the time of the trial "or somewhere reasonably near"); 1902, Lake Lighting Co. v. Lewis, 29 Ind. App. 164, 64 N. E. 35 (character "within a reasonable time before the trial" is admissible, the trial Court to determine); 1918, Bills v. State, 187 Ind. 721, 119 N. E. 465 (seduction; the woman's repute 12 years before trial, excluded);

Iowa: 1887, Hanners v. McClelland, 74 Ia. 318, 322, 37 N. W. 389 (reputation in another place a few miles away, before and after the time in question, admitted); 1889, State v. Potts, 78 Ia. 659, 43 N. W. 534 (reputation in another place five years before, excluded, the witness having resided continuously for that period at the place of trial, and his bad character there being also offered; semble, that character at a former time and other place is admissible only where the residence at the time of trial has been brief); 1898, Schoep v. Ins. Co., 104 Ia. 356, 73 N. W. 825 (in the absence of permanent residence, reputation at a place lived in a year before for eight months, received); 1900, McGuire v. Kenefick, 111 Ia. 147, 82 N. W. 485 (reputation in another town seven years before, not admitted; otherwise if he had only recently acquired residence at his present place); 1902, State v. Prins, 117 Ia. 505, 91 N. W. 758 (reputation in another city several years before, admitted on the facts); 1909, Brown's Will, 143 Ia. 649, 120 N. W. 667 (reputation in another town five years before admitted);

Kansas: 1878, Fisher v. Conway, 21 Kan. 18, 25, semble (character at the time of trial only); 1891, Coates v. Sulan, 46 Kan. 341, 343, 26 Pac. 720 (character at C., whence he had removed to his present place less than a year before, admitted; "there is no arbitrary iron-clad rule in relation to such evidence; sometimes it may be sought some distance away both in point of time and space"); 1906, State v. Simmons, 74 Kan. 799, 88 Pac. 57 ("No hard and fast rule" can be laid down);

Kentucky: 1869, Young v. Com., 6 Bush 317 (character six years before, in another county, excluded; the time of testifying being the true standpoint); 1874, Marion v. Lambert, 10 Bush 295 (no limitation to character at the time of the trial); 1879, Mitchell v. Com., 78 Ky. 219 (anterior bad character elsewhere, admitted only when present character at the place is unavailable or is 'prima facie' shown bad); 1895, Turner v. King, 98 Ky. 253, 32 S. W. 941 (must not be too long before; reputation for chastity sixteen years before, excluded); 1905, Craft v. Barron, 121 Ky. 129, 88 S. W. 1099 (character in Kentucky, ten years before, and in California at the time of trial, admitted in the Court's discretion); 1921, Steele v. Com., 192 Ky. 223, 232 S. W. 646 (homicide committed 14 years before; reputation 14 years before of certain women witnesses, also involved in defendant's conduct, held improperly admitted; unsound);

Louisiana: 1893, State v. Taylor, 45 La. An. 605, 609, 12 So. 927 (character twelve miles away, five years before, excluded);

Maine: 1912, State v. Albanes, 109 Me. 199, 83 Atl. 548 (accused's character in a town 10 years ago, held not improperly excluded in discretion, character in the town of residence for the 10 years preceding the homicide having been admitted);

Massachusetts: 1863, Parkhurst v. Ketchum, 6 All. 408 (general bad character, ten years before, admitted); 1867, Com. v. Billings, 97 Mass. 405 (admitting character a year and a half previous);

Michigan: 1856, Webber v. Hanke, 4 Mich. 198, 204 (usually character in his present residence must be asked; the discretion of the trial Court may relax this general rule; here the character five years before in Europe was held improperly received, the witness having lived continuously in this country since that time); 1874, Hamilton v. People, 29 Mich. 173, 188 (where domicil has changed, reputation in both places within a reasonable time is admissible; other possibilities obscurely mentioned); 1875, Keator v. People, 32 Mich. 485 (character at another place four years before the trial, admitted on the circumstances, the witness having led a roving life); 1907, People v. Mix, 149 Mich. 260, 112 N. W. 907 (reputation in two near-by towns for a period more than two years prior, admitted, approving the text above, and distinguishing Webber v. Hanke);

Minnesota: 1905, State v. Bryant, 97 Minn. 8, 105 N. W. 974 (reputation not allowed to be proved, in the trial Court's discretion, by one who had known the witness since youth, but had not heard his reputation mentioned for four years);
Mississippi: 1894, Norwood & B. Co. v. Andrews, 71 Miss. 641, 16 So. 262 (bad character in a neighborhood whence the witness had removed two years before, admitted; see quotation supra);
Missouri: 1881, Wood v. Matthews, 73 Mo. (character at the time of trial only; following the early Indiana rulings; here excluding character three years before); 1887, Waddingham v. Hulett, 92 Mo. 533, 5 S. W. 27, semble (same principle); 1893, State v. Pettit, 119 Mo. 410, 414 (character of the deceased more than ten years before, excluded); 1898, State v. Summar, 143 Mo. 220, 45 S. W. 254 (character at the time of trial is the material thing; though it may be stated as ranging back before that time; here, more than three years before was held too remote on the facts); 1900, State v. Miller, 156 Mo. 76, 56 S. W. 907 (not to be confined "to the immediate present"); 1905, State v. Shouse, 188 Mo. 473, 87 S. W. 480 (excluding the accused's character in Tennessee seven or eight years before); 1909, Lindsay v. Bates, 223 Mo. 294, 122 S. W. 682 (character in a place where witness had always lived up to three years before trial, admitted); 1920, Ulrich v. Chicago B. & Q. R. Co., 281 Mo. 697, 220 S. W. 682 (reputation in an adjacent place where witness formerly lived, admitted);
Nebraska: 1896, Davison v. Cruse, 47 Nebr. 829, 66 N. W. 823 (bastardy proceedings; chastity before probable period of gestation excluded); 1901, Faulkner v. Gilbert, 61 Nebr. 602, 85 N. W. 843 (reputation in another county several years before, excluded);
New Hampshire. 1861, State v. Forschner, 43 N. H. 89 (it was conceded that a witness' character before trial could be received as indicating character at the time of trial, since "a state of facts proved to have once existed is presumed to continue"; but the character for chastity of the prosecutrix in a rape charge must be her character at the time of the alleged rape, and not any later, since "the bad character a person may have now is not assumed to have always existed"; but it is not clear whether the Court, in promulgating this illogical doctrine, rest solely on the above principle; for they also invoke the doctrine that a reputation formed 'post litem motam' is untrustworthy; post, § 1618);
New Jersey: 1898, Shuster v. State, 62 N. J. L. 521, 41 Atl. 701 (reputation in another place eighteen years before; excluded in trial Court's discretion); 1914, State v. Quinlan, 86 N. J. L. 120, 91 Atl. 111 (accused's character in another city two to four years ago, held not improperly excluded);
New Mexico: 1915, State v. Perkins, 21 N. M. 135, 153 Pac. 258 (witness' character two years before in another place, admitted);
New York: 1838, People v. Abbot, 19 Wend. 200 (prior character admissible; see quotation supra); 1842, Losee v. Losee, 2 Hill 613 (merely holds that the time of testifying is to be the starting-point, and does not declare that the character at that time cannot be shown by the character at a former time); 1847, Sleeper v. Van Middlesworth, 4 Den. 429 (prior character admissible; see quotetion supra); 1865, Graham v. Chrystal, 2 Abb. App. 265 (admitting character eight or ten years before); 1907, People v. Van Gaasbeck, 189 N. Y. 408, 82 N. E. 718 (Sleeper v. Van Middlesworth, supra, followed);
North Carolina: 1878, State v. Lanier, 79 N. C. 622 (character two or three years before, in another town, admitted);
Ohio: 1877, Hamilton v. State, 34 Oh. St. 82 (character two years before, the witness having ever since been in prison, admitted);
Pennsylvania: 1850, Morss v. Palmer, 15 Pa. St. 51, 56 (character more than ten years before, in another county, admitted in rebuttal); 1897, Smith v. Hine, 179 Pa. 203, 36 Atl. 222, semble (character at the time of trial only, and not prior to that time); 1898, Miller v. Miller, 187 Pa. 572, 41 Atl. 277 (character four years before, excluded); 1916, Hopkins v. Tate, 255 Pa. 56, 99 Atl. 210 (libel on the character of an alleged political candidate; his bad repute for honesty in another place 11 years before, without evidence of his repute at the time of publication, excluded);
Rhode Island: 1896, Vaughn v. Clarkson, — R. I. —, 34 Atl. 989 (character five years before, in England, excluded);
Tennessee: 1896, Fry v. State, 96 Tenn. 467, 35 S. W. 883 (character in another State six years before, held not too remote, as tending to show character at the time of the alleged offence);
Texas: 1864, Ayres v. Duprey, 27 Tex. 593, 599 (left undecided); 1879, Johnson v. Brown, 51 Tex. 65, 75 (a charge referring the witness' credibility to the time of the act spoken of, not the time of trial, held properly refused); 1886, Mynatt v. Hudson, 66 Tex. 66, 17 S. W. 396 (admitting bad reputation in a different county four years before where he was a permanent resident); 1896, Brown v. Perez, 89 Tex. 282, 34 S. W. 725 (see quotation supra);
Vermont: 1858, Willard v. Goodenough, 30 Vt. 397 (see quotation supra); 1882, Amidon v. Hosley, 54 Vt. 25 (same rule);
Wisconsin: 1902, State v. Chittenden, — Wis. —, 88 N. W. 588 (under a statute providing for licenses to graduates of a "reputable" dental college, the reputation of a college one year before the applicant's graduation may be sufficient); 1903, State v. Knight, 118 Wis. 473, 95 N. W. 390 (reputation at another town two years before, admitted; good opinion by Dodge, J.).

(1) On principle, the correct solution seems to be that prior character at any time may be admitted, as being relevant to show present character, and therefore, indirectly, to show the probability as to truth-speaking. The only limitation to be applied would be that applicable to all use of a former condition to show a present one (ante, §§ 43, 233), i.e. that the character must not be so distant in time as to be void of real probative value in showing present character; this limitation to be applied in the discretion of the trial Court:

1838, COWEN, J., in People v. Abbot, 19 Wend. 200: "It was proposed to follow that out [the impeachment of character] by showing that it was also bad several years before. The inquiry is not in its nature limited as to time. The character of the habitual liar or perjurer seven years since would go at least to fortify the testimony which should now fix the same character to the same person. Witnesses must speak on this subject in the past tense. Character cannot be brought into court and shown to them at the moment of trial. A long-established character for good or for evil is always more striking and more to be relied on than that of a day, a month, or a year."

1847, BEARDSLEY, J., in Sleeper v. Van Middlesworth, 4 Den. 429 (upon an offer of the character of the witness four years before, when living elsewhere): "In speaking to the question of character, witnesses are never restricted to the precise time when their testimony is given. The nature of the inquiry precludes this, for the evidence must necessarily refer to reports and reputation of which a knowledge had been acquired before the witness came to the stand. To what period of time shall the inquiry be restricted? Shall it be to a day, a week, or a month? All will agree that either would be too short, and that the inquiry may be pushed further. . . . It might be too much to say that a character, when once formed, is presumed to remain unchanged for life. Still, the law, founded on a full knowledge and just appreciation of the general course of human affairs, indulges a strong presumption against any sudden change in the moral as well as the mental and social condition of man. . . . It is not, looking to common experience in human conduct, generally found to be true that a thorough change from a bad to a good character is wrought within four years. It may and, it is hoped, often does occur; but such is not the common course in life. . . . No certain limit, in point of duration, can be laid down for inquiries like this."

1894, CAMPBELL, C. J., in Norwood & B. Co. v. Andrews, 71 Miss. 641, 16 So. 262 (admitting bad character in another place two years before): "To hold otherwise would be to preclude the possibility of impeaching the character of one who had changed his residence, in many cases. The rule must work both ways; and, under the rule we condemn, one who had maintained an unblemished reputation through a long life, in case of removal, and had occasion in his new home to prove his good character where he had spent his life, would be denied the right to call witnesses who had known him at his former residence, because not acquainted with his reputation at his new place of abode; and one who had not lived long enough at a place to become known there would not be able to prove reputation at all."

(2) Another solution is that prior character should not be resorted to unless for some reason present character cannot be directly shown, either by the witness on the stand or by any witness at all. This solution is not an incorrect one on principle, i.e. it recognizes the relevancy of prior character; but it is objectionable in policy, because it imposes conditions not always kept in mind in the hurry of a trial, and because it complicates the proof by unnecessary restrictions. Moreover, these conditions for admitting such evidence vary in different jurisdictions and are never systematically laid down in advance so as to be easy of application:

1858, BARRETT, J., in Willard v. Goodenough, 30 Vt. 397: "It is well settled that the question should be 'What is the general character or reputation for truth?' . . . It may be proper under some circumstances — as in case an impeaching witness should answer the question thus put, that he does not know what the present character is, or that he has not heard it talked about recently, or in some other way implying his knowledge of former bad character — to inquire of him as to his knowledge of it at former periods. But we think this should be done only as following upon such a kind of answer to the questions above indicated. The present character is the point in issue. What the characters had formerly been is relevant only as it blends with the continuous web of life and tinges its present texture."

1896, BROWN, J., in Brown v. Perez, 89 Tex. 282, 34 S. W. 725 (leaving it largely to the discretion of the trial Court): "It may safely be said that where the evidence of a witness is such that it fairly raises the issue of his veracity, or where the testimony of other witnesses relating to his character at or near the time of the trial tends to impeach his character for truth and veracity, or in case the person whose character is in issue has removed beyond the jurisdiction of the court, or has been transient, so that he has no fixed and known residence for a time sufficient to make a reputation for truthfulness, resort may be had to evidence of the reputation of such witness at the place of his former residence, and at a time remote from the time of trial. No definite rule can be stated which will apply to all cases."

(3) A third solution altogether excludes prior character. This is wholly incorrect on principle, because it is founded on a fallacious analysis of the problem. It is objectionable in policy, because it excludes a class of evidence often meritorious in itself and sometimes the sole kind that is available:

1878, BREWER, J., in Fisher v. Conway, 21 Kan. 25: "Impeaching testimony is for the purpose of discrediting the witness by showing that the community in which he lives do not believe what he says, — that he is such a notorious liar that he is generally disbelieved. It is his present credibility that is to be attacked. Is he now to be believed? What do neighbors think and say of him at the present time? not, What did they think and say months or years ago? . . . Surely a man's reputation may have changed very much in that length of time [two years and a half]. If it were bad, he may have reformed; if it were good, he may become a moral wreck."

Of these three competing rules, each finds a following in some jurisdictions; but the last is little favored, and the first is tending to predominate.

§ 929. Same: Character 'post litem motam'; Effects of Hearsay Rule. So far as the foregoing theory is concerned, it is immaterial whether the inference is from prior or subsequent character; that inference, like its general type, the argument from prior or subsequent condition (ante, §§ 225, 233, 241), stands on precisely the same footing in both cases. If character in 1875 indicates probatively the future character in 1877, then by the same token character in 1877 indicates the past character in 1875. Moreover, witness-character must always, except in one case, involve the argument from prior character exclusively, i.e. prior to the time of his testifying; the excepted case being that in which the impeaching witness predicates the character as subsequent to the moment of the other's testimony, and this practically can only be where the impeached testimony was given by deposition before trial begun. The fact that the character offered in evidence is in this single instance a subsequent character does not affect its relevancy at all. Thus, the mere circumstance that the character offered is character after trial begun does not affect its admissibility; first, because it will usually still be prior character (i.e. prior to the time of testimony), and, next, because in the single case when it is really subsequent, its relevancy is the same.

But when the emphasis is upon the modes of evidencing character, a different question may arise. If reputation is the kind of evidence chosen, and if the reputation is offered as of a time after trial begun, this evidence must face the Hearsay rule and its cardinal principle that the hearsay offered must have been uttered under impartial conditions. Whether a reputation formed 'post litem motam' is trustworthy, from that point of view, may be a matter for hesitation; and we thus find some Courts declining to admit reputation-evidence of character when the reputation is stated as of a time after trial begun or controversy aroused. But this is distinctly and solely a question of the Hearsay rule, and has nothing to do with the present principle; it is treated post, § 1618, under that head. Nevertheless the two have sometimes been confused, and character after trial begun has been excluded as if a rule of Relevancy, and not of Hearsay, led to this.

§ 930. Place of Character. A similar confusion is apt to occur in rulings as to the place where the character is predicated. From the point of view of Relevancy, place or locality has no bearing on the present principle. The actual qualities of the man himself must be the same in whatever place he is. Whether we take his character at Millville or at Sierra is in itself immaterial.

Difference of place, however, does enter the question from two other points of view. (1) First, character in another place must of course always be character at another time; and hence, if at the present (and therefore primarily important) time he is at Millville, his character when he was at Sierra immediately raises the question whether character at a prior time is admissible. But it is here the priority of time, and not the difference of place, that raises the question of relevancy; the difference of place is merely an immaterial incident. Wherever prior character at another place is offered, the circumstance of priority of time is the material one; this has been examined ante, § 928. (2) From the point of view of the Hearsay rule and its exception for Reputation, the place becomes important. If A lives at Millville, and has never been in Sierra, one hundred miles away, it is difficult to see how a trustworthy reputation about his character can arise in the latter place; for reputation must arise in the community of residence, where he moves and exhibits his conduct. Hence, under the Hearsay exception for Reputation as to Character, various questions arise as to the place from which an admissible reputation must be offered (post, §§ 1615, 1616). These, however, have nothing to do with the present principle, namely, the conditions under which actual character is relevant to show the probability of truth-telling, but with an entirely different one, namely, in proving this actual character, by reputation, the conditions under which such hearsay will be admitted.

B. Insanity, and Other Organic Incapacity

§ 931. In general. We have already seen that the general organic capacity to observe, recollect, and narrate, must exist to a certain minimum degree in order that the witness may be admitted at all. Insanity, idiocy, and the like, if existing to such a degree as practically to destroy the mental capacities, render the witness incompetent to that extent (ante, §§ 492–500). But the defect may not exist to such a degree, and yet the capacity may by no means be of the normal sort; and this may therefore be made to appear for the purpose of discrediting the witness. The modern tendency, as already noted (ante, § 492), is to avoid treating any such mental condition as a cause of total incompetency, except in extreme cases, and to admit the person as a witness, leaving the defect in question to have whatever weight it deserves as discrediting the witness' powers of observation, recollection, or communication. This tendency enlarges and emphasizes the application of the present principle.

The exact bearing of such evidence is sometimes misunderstood, by confusion with the principle (post, § 979) that a witness' character cannot be attacked by extrinsic testimony of particular acts of misconduct. But the difference between the two can be easily appreciated. (1) Evidence that a witness was drunk at the time of an affray to which he testifies discredits him by involving a greater or less inability on his part to get correct impressions of what he saw or might have seen; the drunkenness means, and might be translated, "derangement of the nervous system caused by alcoholic stimulation", i.e. the impeacher, by alleging intoxication, implies in the very word an affection (more or less extensive) of the power of observation, precisely as he does in asserting insanity. But (2) the circumstance that the witness was drunk a month before the affair has obviously no such significance, and in itself in no way affects testimonial capacity at the time of the affray; it can be relevant only as tending to show a dissolute character, and in that aspect it is of course obnoxious to the rule above referred to. That rule, which in truth has no bearing whatever on matters involving a defective organic capacity, is probably the motive of some of the rulings which erroneously exclude the present sort of evidence. They must be regarded as unsound; for there is no recognized principle or rule to exclude such evidence except so far as is contained in the principle now to be dealt with.

Since the theory of this evidence is that any defect of capacity, insufficient to exclude, and yet involving less than the normal testimonial capacity, should legitimately discredit the witness, carrying whatever weight it may have in a given case, the only proper limit upon such evidence would seem to be as follows: Any trait importing in itself a defective power of observation (at the time of the matter testified to), or of recollection, or of communication, is admissible, provided the power is substantially defective as judged by the average standard of faculties.

What specific defects, then, may be shown for this purpose?[1] It must be remembered (as noted ante, § 478) that the faculties of Observation (Knowledge), Recollection, and Communication are all called into play in every piece of testimony; and hence a defect affecting any one of these three faculties at the time it is required would be relevant.

§ 932. Insanity. The existence of a derangement of the sort termed insanity is admissible to discredit, provided that it affected the witness at the time of the affair testified to (i.e. his power of Observation), or while on the stand (i.e. his power of Recollection or Narration), or in the meantime (so as to cripple his powers of Recollection).[1]

§ 933. Intoxication. Intoxication, if it is of such a degree as to deserve the name, involves a numbing of the faculties so as to affect the capacity to observe, to recollect, or to communicate; and is therefore admissible to impeach:[1]

§ 931. [1] From the point of view of logic and psychology as applicable to argument before the jury (not the rules of Admissibility), see the materials collected in the present author's "Principles of Judicial Proof, as given by Logic, Psychology, and General Experience, and illustrated in Judicial Trials" (1913), §§ 163–243.

§ 932. [1] Eng. The rulings are few, but the principle is unquestioned: 1692, Duke of Norfolk's Divorce, 12 How. St. Tr. 912 (insanity); 1775, Fowke's Trial, 20 How. St. Tr. 1175 ("he is not a sensible man, and yet not quite an ideot"); U. S. Ala. 1877, Allen v. State, 60 Ala. 19 (that a weak-witted negro-witness entertained certain superstitions was held not to bear on his powers of observation); Ark. 1918, Mell v. State, 133 Ark. 197, 202 S. H. 219, 225 (cross-examination of the plaintiff as to whether the spirit of Daniel Webster was present aiding him in the trial, held allowable or not, in discretion); N. Y. 1921, Ellarson v. Ellarson, Sup. App. Div., 190 N. Y. Suppl. 6 (questions as to being in an insane hospital, etc., allowed); 1921, Jamison v. Corn Exchange Bank, Sup. App. T., 191 N. Y. Suppl. 297 (action for a balance of $227, in a savings account, defendant disputing the amount only; to discredit the plaintiff's testimony, defendant read the record of her commitment to the Manhattan State Hospital for the insane, containing the following sentence: "The form of insanity from which she suffered is one from which recovery of the individual may be expected, but it is impossible to prevent recurrence of the disease. The disease occurs in those who are unstable mentally, and one typical attack like this woman had indicates that others are to be repeated in the future under stress or strain, but even without any apparent reason another attack may be brought about"; held, improper; the ruling is unsound); Vt. 1862, Fairchild v. Bascomb, 35 Vt. 417 (a disease of the brain some time before the trial, affecting Observation and Recollection).

Contra: 1912, People v. Enright, 256 Ill. 221, 99 N. E. 936 (an astonishing decision).

Ancestral or collateral insanity is admissible only on the conditions noted ante, § 232: 1896, State v. Hayward, 62 Minn. 474, 65 N. W. 63 (ancestors' insanity, plus evidence of temporary and different prior illusions, was held, even taken together, to be inadmissible to impeach a witness unless direct testimony of his own insanity nearer the time of the events was offered).

For the mode of evidencing insanity, see ante, §§ 227–233, post, §§ 993, 1671.

J., in Com. v. Fitzgerald, 2 All. 297: "It was certainly competent for the defendant to show that the witness had been drinking to such excess as to impair his ability to see and understand what was passing before him at the time and to recollect it afterwards so as to testify intelligibly and with accuracy."

1895, WINSLOW, J., in Mace v. Reed, 89 Wis. 440, 62 N. W. 186: "It would certainly have been competent to show that the witness was not in fact present, or that, although present, he was blind or asleep or in a condition of stupefaction, so that he could not apprehend what was going on about him. The proof that he was intoxicated is of the same general character. It is not strictly impeaching, but it tends to show that his faculties of observation were either entirely gone or much impaired."

But a general habit of intemperance tells us nothing of the witness' testimonial incapacity except as it indicates actual intoxication at the time of the event observed or the time of testifying; and hence, since in its bearing upon moral character it does not involve the veracity-trait (ante, § 923), it will usually not be admissible.[2]

§ 934. Disease, Morphine Habit, and sundry Mental Derangements or Defects. Any diseased impairment of the testimonial powers, arising from whatever source, ought also to be considered:

1879, BECK, C. J., in Alleman v. Stepp, 52 Ia. 627, 3 N. W. 636: "Mental defects in the witness, or loss or impairment of memory, will according to the observation of all men detract from the credibility otherwise due a witness, just as surely as do moral defects. It is not reasonable to hold that the law will permit impeachment of a witness by showing the moral defects of his character, and will not permit impeachment by proof of defects of memory caused by diseases of the body or mind. . . . It is proper to say that the rule we recognize extends no farther than to permit the impeachment of a witness by showing an abnormal condition of the mind caused by disease or habits which impair the memory. . . . The law can devise no standard of measurement or test of mind in its normal condition."

§ 935. Individual Grades of Capacity to Observe or Remember, as discoverable by Psychologic Science. Ordinary experience in human nature has not furnished us hitherto with generalizations upon any of these features of testimonial capacity except the abnormal ones. The variations in normal persons have not been detectible by ordinary methods of observation available to the lay witness. The fact, for example, that a person testifying is endowed with a less retentive memory than other persons falls within that range of average variations which constitutes normality. Its presence has been left to the cross-examiner to detect, in judicial practice hitherto. No doubt the line may be sometimes hard to draw, but the distinction of principle is clear between that general variation of all powers which would be found in any given number of healthy persons, and that specific impairment which, when associated with disease or with other extensive mental derangement, marks the person as abnormal:[1]

1864, DAY, J., in Bell v. Rinner, 16 Oh. St. 46: "The question presented by the record is whether the credibility of a competent witness may be impeached by general evidence that the witness is not possessed of ordinary intelligence or powers of mind. It would not only be novel in practice, but would be entirely impracticable, to permit the parties on the trial of a case to go into general proof as to the strength of the mental capacity of the several witnesses. It might lead to as many collateral issues as there are witnesses, and thus divert the minds of the triers from the substantial issues of the case. Moreover, if it be conceded that the credibility of a witness is to be graded in proportion to his strength of intellect, the tribunal before which he testifies can better estimate his capacity and the weight to which his testimony is entitled by his manner and by his statements on cross-examination, than can ordinarily be done by the testimony and conflicting opinions of other witnesses as to the extent of his mental powers or the degree of his intelligence. . . . The degree of credit to which he is entitled in the testimony given cannot be practically better ascertained than by the usual tests, without resort to other proof of his capacity."

But this reluctance in judicial practice hitherto has been due merely to the lack of accredited knowledge and skill to detect with precision such types of mental variation. Modern psychology is steadily progressing towards definite generalizations in that field, and towards practical skill in applying precise tests. Whenever such principles and tests can be shown to be accepted in the field of science, expert testimony should and will be freely admitted to demonstrate and apply them.[2]

S. E. 283, semble (that defendant had occasionally hypnotized his wife, now testifying for him, allowed on cross-examination).

§ 935. [1] 1896, Ah Tong v. Fruit Co., 112 Bal. 679, 45 Pac. 7 (weakness of memory, excluded, unless involving mental derangement); 1856, Goodwyn v. Goodwyn, 20 Ga. 620 (Lumpkin, J.: "It would be attended with great inconvenience and hinder and delay the progress of business, by turning aside to form these collateral issues"); 1879, Alleman v. Stepp, 52 Ia. 627, 3 N. W. 636 (quoted ante, § 934); 1922, People v. Joyce, 233 N. Y. 61, 134 N. E. 836 (confession by an alleged moron; cited more fully ante, § 861);

Contra, and yet reasonable: 1862, Com. v. Cooper, 5 All. 497 (admitting a tendency of the witness to mistake the identity of persons); 1821, Mechanics' & F. Bank v. Smith, 19 Johns. 123 (question allowed "whether he was in the constant habit of making mistakes", to show that a particular entry by a teller was erroneous). Compare the other modes of exposing a defective memory: post, § 995.

[2] From the point of view of psychology as applicable to argument before the jury

§ 936. Religious Belief. (1) On principle, the fact of a cacotheistic belief (to use Bentham's word [1]) should be admissible to cast doubt on the witness' sense of duty to tell the truth; and, at a time when it was supposed that the believers in a certain form of religion universally subscribed to and practised such a tenet (i.e. that it may be righteous to lie upon the stand) such evidence was no doubt sometimes considered:

1679, L. C. J. SCROGGS, in Langhorn's Trial, 7 How. St. Tr. 481 (to the jury, commenting on the testimony of certain young Roman Catholic students who came over from Flanders to testify for the defendant): "They came here to defend all the Roman Catholics, whom we would hang here for a plot. . . . Did not the principles of their religion so teach and make us to know that they will not stick at any wickedness to propagate it? Did not the best and chiefest of the doctors of their church preach and print it? Did not they teach and practise all sorts of equivocations, and that a lie does good service, if it be for the propagation of the faith? . . . The way they take to come off from all vows, oaths, and sacraments, by dispensations beforehand or indulgence and pardons afterwards, is a thing still so much worse that they are really unfit for human society. . . . [These doctrines are] such that it does take away a great part of the faith that should be given to these witnesses. Nevertheless, we must be fair and should hear them, if we could not answer what they allege by evidence to the contrary." [2]

But in modern times, whether because no religion is credited with possessing such a tenet, or because religious disputes less affect men's feelings, such evidence would probably not be listened to anywhere.[3]

(2) Much less, in these days, should evidence be admitted, not of cacotheism, but of mere disbelief in a personal Deity, i.e. atheism, — a belief quite consistent with the strictest sense of moral obligation to speak the truth. Some statutes, however, preserve a permission to use such evidence, — a sop of mediævalism left to satisfy those who would otherwise not have consented to abolish theological qualifications for the oath.[4] But some Courts

But the prior practice had been clear: 1678, Ireland's Trial, 7 How. St. Tr. 79, 100 (L. C. J. Scroggs: "But if you have a religion that can give a dispensation for oaths, sacraments, protestations, and falsehoods that are in the world, how can you expect we should believe you?"); 1679, Whietbread's Trial, 7 How. and Constitutions justly reject even this much use of theologic heterodoxy.[5]

§ 937. Race. The racial disqualifications (of the Negro and of the Chinese) that once existed in some States have been abolished (ante, § 516); and it may be assumed as law that, where no express enactment provides, nativity in a specific race is in no way to be treated as involving a general tendency to avoid the truth.[1] A broader acquaintance with the various types of human nature in the world is beginning to convince us that the virtues and the failings are found in all, and with little racial difference. Any attempt to attribute a rooted lack of veracity to any one branch of the human family is based on a self-conceited assumption or a narrow experience:

1902, RAY, J., in U. S. v. Lee Huen, 118 Fed. 442, 463: "This Court cannot assent to the proposition that in one of these [deportation] cases a witness for the person sought to be deported is interested merely because he is a Chinese person. . . . There is no rule of law that justifies the assumption that a Chinese person is more interested in his countrymen than is a person of some other nationality in his. A Yankee may testify for a Yankee, but he is not therefore interested. An Irishman may testify for an Irishman, an Englishman for an Englishman, a German for a German; but such witnesses are not, in the eye of the law, interested. No discredit can legally attach to the testimony of a person because he gives his evidence in behalf of a party belonging to his own nationality. A Chinese witness in one of these cases, if engaged in securing the entrance of Chinese persons into the United States, is open to suspicion; and if he is engaged in aiding the entrance of such a person, and gives evidence in that behalf, he is interested, and such fact legitimately tends to discredit his testimony. We are all brothers in the family of Adam, — all brothers in the national family to which by birth or adoption we belong; but these ties of race or color do not make us interested witnesses when we testify in court, within the rule that permits interest to be used as a discrediting circumstance. If it affirmatively appears that a witness has a bias in favor of persons of his own nationality, in whose behalf he is testifying, or against the other party to the litigation, or a bias in favor of persons of his own nationality generally, or against those of another nationality, such fact may be used to discredit his testimony."

§ 938. Age and Sex in General. Age and Sex do not constitute defects or abnormalities, but merely varieties in the normal mental organization. Nevertheless, those variations undoubtedly have some bearing on testimonial tendencies. If those specific tendencies could be known with any definiteness, and used with fair accuracy in concrete diagnosis, there is no reason why judicial practice should not make use of that knowledge and skill.

Modern psychology pursues gradually the path of revelation in this field. Already something is known, though it is scarcely usable in judicial practice.[1] The progress of science will in time enlarge the methods available for judicial trials.

C. EXPERIENTIAL INCAPACITY

§ 939. General Principle. For testimony upon some subjects an Experiential Capacity is necessary (ante, § 555), and must be shown 'prima facie' before the witness may speak. By way of impeachment, then, the lack of this capacity, in a greater or less degree, is relevant. How it is to be evidenced by specific instances is another question (post, § 991). It is enough here to note that the general quality of such incapacity may be offered to discredit.[1] No questions seem to have arisen of the sort already noticed as to Character.[2] It may be assumed in general that the discrediting quality offered must be in kind the same as that required in advance to show competency; and that incapacity at a former time may be used as the basis of the argument in the same way that character at a former time may be used.

D. EMOTIONAL INCAPACITY (BIAS, INTEREST, AND CORRUPTION)

§ 940. General Principle. Impartiality of Feeling (Emotional Capacity) is no longer regarded as an essential preliminary to testimony (ante, § 576), except in a few instances. But the force of a hostile emotion, as influencing the probability of truth-telling, is still recognized as important; and a partiality of mind is therefore always relevant as discrediting the witness and affecting the weight of his testimony.

§ 938. [1] From the point of view of logic and psychology as applicable to argument before the jury (not the rules of Admissibility), see the materials collected in the present author's "Principles of Judicial Proof, as given by Logic, Psychology, and General Experience, and illustrated in Judicial Trials" (1913), §§ 172–178 (age), §§ 179–190 (sex).

§ 939. [1] 1844, Washington v. Cole, 6 Ala. 214 (that a pretended medical witness was not a physician, allowed).

From the point of view of psychology as applicable to argument before the jury (not the rules of Admissibility), see the materials collected in the present author's "Principles of Judicial Proof, as given by Logic, Psychology, and General Experience, and illustrated in Judicial Trials" (1913), §§ 220–231.

[2] As with Character, so here, a question has been raised under the Opinion rule whether one person may testify directly to another's lack of Experiential Capacity; the authorities are dealt with post, § 1984.

Compare also §§ 67, 87, 208, ante.

But it is practically of rare occurrence that we attempt directly to prove this partiality of mind; we are usually able to get at it only by inference from some specific circumstance; for example, we infer partiality from the circumstance that the witness is a party in the cause, or is a brother of a party, or has on some occasion expressed hostility to the opponent, or has received money for his testimony. In such cases we are concerned with another question, i.e. how to evidence this partiality of mind; and this falls properly under other principles (post, §§ 948–968). Where it is thought worth while, however, there is no objection to a direct question, "Are you not anxious to have the defendant convicted?"[1]

As in the case of Character (ante, § 927), a partiality of mind at some former time may be used as the basis of an argument to the same state at the time of testifying;[2] though the ultimate object is to establish partiality at the time of testifying.[3]

§ 940. [1] As with Character and Experiential Capacity, the Opinion rule has here also been rashly invoked to exclude such testimony, the absurdity of the suggestion being here more pronounced; the rulings are collected post, § 1963.

The modern emasculation in this country of the judicial function has raised some questions entirely novel in the history of the common law. The principle that the judge is not to charge the jury upon matters of fact, as distinguished from matters of law, has led, among other things, to doubting whether the judge may tell the jury that bias or interest affects the weight of testimony. This doubt, however (an instance of which may be found in Hess v. Lowrey, 122 Ind. 234, and People v. Shattuck, 109 Cal. 673, 42 Pac. 315), has nothing to do with our present subject; compare § 968, post.

From the point of view of psychology as applicable to argument before the jury (not the rules of Admissibility), see the materials collected in the present author's "Principles of Judicial Proof, as given by Logic, Psychology, and General Experience, and illustrated in Judicial Trials" (1913), §§ 203–216.

SUB-TITLE II (continued): TESTIMONIAL IMPEACHMENT

TOPIC II: EVIDENCING BIAS, INTEREST, AND CORRUPTION (BY CONDUCT AND CIRCUMSTANCES)

CHAPTER XXXI

INTRODUCTORY

§ 943. General Principle; No Prohibition against Extrinsic Testimony. The various qualities available for impeachment having been surveyed, and their limitations marked out (Topic I), the next topic (ante, § 876) concerns the allowable modes of evidencing those qualities.

These sources of evidence will be chiefly either the conduct of the witness or external circumstances. The evidence will thus consist most commonly of particular acts of behavior or particular events. Thus the distinction already noted (ante, § 878), between extracting the impeaching facts on cross-examination and presenting them by other witnesses, becomes now of vital importance. It is convenient to notice first (Topic II) those qualities for the evidencing of which this prohibition of extrinsic testimony does not apply, namely, the qualities of Bias, Corruption, and Interest, — all being merely varieties of the single quality of emotional partiality (ante, § 940). Cross-examination will here be an important but not the exclusive mode of presentation; the chief inquiries will concern the relevancy of the various kinds of conduct and circumstances, and the occasional bearing of considerations of auxiliary policy (ante, § 42). Under Topic III may afterwards be considered the evidencing of Moral Character and other qualities, to which the prohibition of proof by extrinsic testimony commonly applies.

In general, then, there is for the present class of qualities no such prohibition:

1858, RICE, C. J., in McHugh v. State, 31 Ala. 320: "In considering the various modes by which the credit of a witness may be assailed, Courts must observe the distinction between an attack upon his general credit, and an attack upon his credit in the particular case. Particular facts cannot be given in evidence to impeach his general [i.e. moral character] credit only, but may be to affect his particular credit, that is, his credit [due to bias or interest] in the particular cause. Thus, the general credit of a witness for the prosecution may be unassailable; he may be hostile to the prisoner, and on cross-examination may deny that he is so; in such case, who can doubt the right of the prisoner to prove the hostility?"

§ 944. Cross-examination; Broadness of Scope. But even in this first class of evidence we find the influence of a part of this above principle, — a species of corollary, which provides that in extracting evidence by cross-examination the largest possible scope shall be given to evidence attempted to be procured in that way; the scope in a given instance being left chiefly to the discretion of the trial Court. This principle strictly grows out of the doctrine that extrinsic testimony should be excluded, and is intended somewhat as an offset to that exclusionary rule; it has therefore no essential application to such evidence as does not come within that exclusionary rule. Yet it is commonly spoken of as not so restricted, but as applying to all sorts of discrediting evidence.

(1) Throughout all the ensuing sorts of evidence, then, there is to be understood a general canon that on cross-examination the range of evidence that may be elicited for any purpose of discrediting is to be very liberal:[1]

§ 944. [1] It is unnecessary here to collect all the cases in which this doctrine has been uttered, first, because it is an unquestioned truism, and secondly, because like most commonplaces it is too indefinite to be of service as a rule, for it always yields when it comes in conflict with any definite rule; some of the more definite rules that are applicable to cross-examination will be found ante, §§ 768–785 (leading questions, etc.), post, §§ 981–983 (conduct affecting character), §§ 992–994 (testing the memory, etc.), §§ 1004, 1022 (collateral contradiction, etc.), and §§ 1871, 1885 (disclosing the purpose, order of putting in the case).

In the following cases two things are usually emphasized, first, that this broad scope of the examination is especially allowable in issues involving fraud, and secondly, that its limits are left to the determination of the trial Court: Fed. 1861, Johnston v. Jones, 1 Black 216, 226; 1873, Rea v. Missouri, 17 Wall. 542; 1876, Storm v. U. S., 94 U. S. 84 (further declining to interfere with that discretion simply because the answer might have furnished other witnesses who could have disproved the opponent's case); 1892, Eames v. Kaiser, 142 U. S. 488, 12 Sup. 302; 1894, Blitz v. U. S., 153 U. S. 308, 312; 1899, Davis v. Coblens, 174 U. S. 719, 19 Sup. 832; Ala. 1857, Stoudenmeier v. Wilson, 29 Ala. 564; 1859, Seale v. Chambliss, 35 Ala. 21; 1895, Long v. Booe, 106 Ala. 570, 17 So. 716; 1896, Rhodes Furn. Cl. v. Weedon, 108 Ala. 252, 19 So. 319; 1897, Nelms v.

1840, REDFIELD, J., in Stevens v. Beach, 12 Vt. 587: "It is no doubt competent for the party to put almost any question, upon cross-examination, which he may consider important to test the accuracy or veracity of the witness."

1842, HUBBARD, J., in Perkins v. Adams, 5 Metc. 48: "A witness may always be subjected to a strict cross-examination as a test of his accuracy, his understanding, his integrity, his biases, and his means of judging."

1843, SHAW, C. J., in Hathaway v. Crocker, 7 Metc. 266: "In cross-examination, an adverse party is usually allowed great latitude of inquiry, limited only by the sound discretion of the Court, with a view to test the memory, the purity of principle, the skill, accuracy, and judgment of the witness, the consistency of his answers with each other and with his present testimony, his life and habits, his feelings towards the parties respectively, and the like; to enable the jury to judge of the degree of confidence they may safely place in his testimony."

1885, DANFORTH, J., in Langley v. Wadsworth, 99 N. Y. 63, 1 N. E. 106: "So far as the cross-examination of a witness relates either to facts in issue or relevant facts, it may be pursued by counsel as matter of right; but when its object is to ascertain the accuracy or credibility of a witness, its method and duration are subject to the discretion of the trial judge, and unless abused, its exercise is not the subject of review."

It may be doubted whether in practical effect this canon enlarges the rules of relevancy. Probably it merely leaves the trial Court to pass upon the matter of relevancy without revision from above. Moreover, in many sorts of evidence even this effect is not given, for strict rules of relevancy are required to be followed. While it must be kept in mind, then, as representing a broad underlying tendency, it can hardly be trusted as a general guide and never as overriding any other concrete rule.

(2) But the foregoing doctrine concerns at most the subject and scope of facts that may be covered. It does not concern the peculiar virtues of cross-examination as a mode of extraction distinguished from direct examination. The contrast here is between cross-examining a witness already called, and calling new witnesses, — not between the cross-examination and the direct examination of the same witness. In the latter aspect, cross-examination is a right, because of its efficacy in securing more than could have been expected from a direct examination by a friendly examiner. The peculiar virtues which thus elevate cross-examination into a right are to be considered under another head (post, § 1368).

Topic II: Bias, Interest, and Corruption, evidenced by Conduct and Circumstances § 945. Kinds of Evidence. Three different kinds of emotion constituting untrustworthy Partiality may be broadly distinguished, — Bias, Interest, and Corruption. Bias, in common acceptance, covers all varieties of hostility or prejudice against the opponent personally or of favor to the proponent personally. Interest signifies the specific inclination which is apt to be produced by the relation between the witness and the cause at issue in the litigation. Corruption is here to be understood as the conscious false intent which is inferrible from giving or taking a bribe or from expressions of a general unscrupulousness for the case in hand.

The kinds of evidence available are two, (a) the circumstances of the witness' situation, making it 'a priori' probable that he has some partiality of mind for one party's cause; (b) the conduct of the witness himself, indicating the presence of such partiality, the inference here being from the expression of the feeling to the feeling itself. These two sorts correspond to two of the three generic sorts of all circumstantial evidence (ante, § 43), — Prospectant and Retrospectant.

§ 946. Same: Demeanor of the Witness, as evidence. The conduct of the witness is formally offered in evidence, when it has occurred outside of the court-room. But it is no less admissible when exhibited in the court-room and on the stand, even though no formal offer of it is then required. The demeanor of the witness on the stand may always be considered by the jury in their estimation of his credibility.[1]

Compare the rule for an accused's demeanor during trial (ante, § 274).

So important has this form of evidence been deemed in our system of procedure that by a fixed rule of Confrontation (post, § 1395) the witness is required to be present before the tribunal while delivering his testimony. The main feature of contrast between the civil-law and the common-law systems of taking evidence was the difference between 'viva voce' testimony and written depositions. Only when the former cannot be procured is the latter allowed to be employed. The witness' demeanor, then, without any definite rules as to its significance, is always assumed to be in evidence.[2]

A. BIAS

§ 948. General Principle; Particular Circumstances always admissible. The doctrine of excluding facts offered by extrinsic testimony (post, § 979) has never been applied to this subject.[1] No explanation for this seems ever to have been clearly expressed. The reason, however, is probably this, that particular conduct and circumstances form the only means practically available for effectively demonstrating the existence of bias. Another witness' individual knowledge of the witness' bias is seldom asked for,[2] and would not be trusted without a specification of the grounds for the belief; and reputation is out of the question; so that the conduct of the witness and the circumstances of his situation become practically the sole available material. This class of facts, then, may be offered either by extrinsic testimony or by cross-examination, without discrimination against the former.[3]

Distinguish here the application of the Opinion rule, to exclude testimony to another person's state of mind (post, § 1962).

§ 949. Relationship and other External Facts as Evidence of Bias. The range of external circumstances (ante, § 945) from which probably bias may be inferred is infinite. Too much refinement in analyzing their probable effect is out of place. Accurate concrete rules are almost impossible to formulate, and where possible are usually undesirable. In general, these circumstances should have some clearly apparent force, as tested by experi-

[2] See post, § 1395, for passages expounding the value of an opportunity to observe the witness' demeanor.

§ 948. [1] This has seldom been even questioned: 1858, McHugh v. State, 31 Ala. 320 (quoted, ante, § 943); 1917, Eppison v. State, 82 Tex. Cr. 364, 198 S. W. 948 (pandering); 1833, Rixey v. Bayse, 4 Leigh 331.

[2] Whether it is admissible under the Opinion rule is noticed post, § 1964. Compare also § 661, ante.

[3] It has been said that where the witness in general admits the existence of bias, no further inquiry into circumstances will be allowed, either on cross-examination or otherwise; the notion being that it is a waste of time to allow a further attempt to prove a thing already conceded: 1879, State v. Glynn, 51 Vt. 580 ("the witness in this case admitted that she had unfriendly feelings against the prisoner, and such inquiry is so collateral to the issue that a court will never permit detail, but only the general inquiry whether the witness is friendly or otherwise"; here the question asked was, "Have you ever told S. that you would get the old man [the defendant] into State prison if you could?"). But this view is unsound; because a general admission of the existence of bias can never be so vivid and forceful as the inference from his situation or his utterances. The doctrine has no support elsewhere; 1869, Blake v. Damon, 103 Mass. 207, 209 (repudiating the argument that "the witness should first be asked if he has bias, and to what extent; if he concedes bias, then it is wholly collateral to inquire into the circumstances showing it"); and cases cited ante, § 940.

ence of human nature, or, as it is usually put, they should not be too remote.[1]

Among the commoner sorts of circumstances are all those involving some intimate family relationship to one of the parties by blood or marriage or illicit intercourse,[2] or some such relationship to a person, other than a party, who is involved on one or the other side of the litigation,[3] or is otherwise § 949. [1] 1869, State v. Dee, 14 Minn. 35; 1882, Langhorne v. Com., 76 Va. 1016 (limiting this mode of showing bias to circumstances strongly significant). Whether, without resorting to this evidence, the witness may be asked directly whether he is biassed, has been already considered ante, §§ 940, 948.

W. 1061 (illicit relations: excluded, wrongly).

It should be understood that relationship is merely a circumstance which may be invoked by counsel as discrediting the witness; but it does not follow that the jury must so use it. The confusion of the first with the second result serves in part to explain the conflict of rulings.

[3] Here the circumstance has usually been excluded; but the rulings are too finical; a complete exposure of the relations is better: Ala. 1899, Lodge v. State, 122 Ala. 97, 26 So. 210 (that the father of a child-witness was hostile to the opponent, admitted); 1903, Stall v. State, — Ala. —, 34 So. 680 (that the witness was the husband of the deceased's washerwoman, excluded); Cal. 1875, People v. Parton, 49 Cal. 637 (mere marital relationship of witnesses to person claimed to have conspired to prosecute falsely the defendant, excluded); Fla. 1904, Adkinson v. State, 48 Fla. 1, 37 So. 522 (questions as to the witness' daughter's illicit relations with the defendant's brother, excluded); Ill. 1911, People v. Goodrich, 251 Ill. 558, 96 N. intimate, rejected as too remote to show probable jealousy and bias); Mo. 1859, State v. Montgomery, 28 Mo. 594 (bias to third persons, excluded, "no matter in what relation, however else they may stand to the party"; here bias against the defendant's husband); N. D. 1904, Hogen v. Klabo, 13 N. D. 319, 100 N. W. 847 (pecuniary relations of plaintiff and his principal witness, admitted); N. M. 1919, Henderson v. Dreyfus, — N. M. —, 184 Pac. 819 (libel of a political opponent; witnesses' political affiliations, admitted); Okl. 1911, Henry v. State, 6 Okl. Cr. 430, 119 Pac. 278, (murder; that the witness for the State, wife of defendant, was living apart from him, as paramour of the deceased, admitted); 1920, Felice v. State, — Okl. Cr. —, 190 Pac. 898 (membership in the same fraternal organization as the defendant; allowed); Or. 1898, State v. Welch, 33 Or. 33, 54 Pac. 213 (whether he had any trouble with the defendant's brother or mother, not proper); 1901, State v. Ogden, 39 Or. 195, 65 Pac. 449 (witness' sons' quarrel with defendant, excluded); W. Va. 1880, State v. Conkle, 16 W. Va. 736, 742, 757, 764 (attempt to kill; a witness for the State lived in the house with the defendant and his wife; a question as to his intercourse with the latter was excluded, in an obscure opinion).

[4] It is obvious that where the employment is a present one, the effect is to suggest an interest (under § 969, post) rather than a personal bias; but the rulings can most conveniently be collected here in one place: Federal: 1898, Tennessee C. I. & R. Co. v. Haley, 29 C. C. A. 328, 85 Fed. 534 (wages of employee-witness, as affecting credit, admissible); 1903, Wabash S. D. Co. v. Black, 126 Fed. 721, 726, 61 C. C. A. 639 (physician); Alabama: 1895, Long v. Booe, 106 Ala. 570, 17 So. 716 (former employment of witness' father by the party, admitted); 1897, Postal Tel. Cable Co. v. Hulsey, 115 Ala. 193, 22 So. 854 (whether a witness' employment depended on the issue of his employer's case, and why the witness was interested, allowed); 1899, Preferred Acc. Ins. Co. v. Gray, 123 Ala. 482, 26 So. 517 (that the physician-witness was employed by the corporation insured by the defendant, allowed); 1900, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Tegnor, 125 Ala. 593, 28 So. 510 (that a witness was a large shipper over defendant's road, allowed; Tyson, J., diss.); 1901, Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Johnston, 128 Ala. 283, 29 So. 771 (that the witness had free transportation on defendant's road, admissible); 1919, Jones v. Tennessee Coal, Iron, & R. Co., 202 Ala. 381, 80 So. 463 (pollution of a stream; to an expert, "if you have not been a witness and in every case used on the question of a nuisance in this creek for the last 3 years for the T. Co.?", allowed); California: 1905, People v. Cowan, 1 Cal. App. 411, 82 Pac. 339 (membership in the same miners' union); 1920, People v. Burch, — Cal. App. —, 189 Pac. 716 (injunction under the red-light abatement law; amount and contingency of compensation due to witnesses who were agents of a law enforcement league, admitted); Illinois: 1898, Donley v. Dougherty, 174 Ill. 582, 51 N. E. 714 (employment by a party, admissible); 1903, Chicago C. R. Co. v. Carroll, 206 Ill. 318, 68 N. E. 1087 (similar); 1909, McMahon v. Chicago City R. Co., 239 Ill. 334, 88 N. W. 364 (larceny of railroad property; whether the witness had not testified for defendant in a number of cases, allowed); Massachusetts: 1875, Wallace v. R. Co., 119 Mass. 93 (that a witness for defendant corporation was also employed by another corporation among whose stockholders were officers of the former, excluded in discretion); 1900, Koplan v. Gaslight Co., 177 Mass. 15, 58 N. E. 183 ("the fact that one has been discharged 'for cause' from the service of another against whom he testifies would not ordinarily be an independent ground of impeachment, but here allowed in discretion); Michigan: 1904, Gregory v. Detroit U. R. Co., 138 Mich. 369, 101 N. W. 546 (here the Court commits the error of ruling that "there must be something in the testimony itself or in the manner of the witness to justify the conclusion" of bias; yet the Court has no right to control the jury's inferences of bias by some rule of law; the simple fact that the witness is the father or husband or society or employee of a party may be given just as much or as little weight as the jury please in affecting their trust of the testimony; this opinion exhibits a radical misapprehension of the common-law theory of testimony on a jury-trial; instructions of any sort to the jury on such subjects are out of place); Montana: 1895, Wastl v. R. Co., 17 Mont. 213, 42 Pac. 772 (that a witness against a railroad company is an employee of one; an obscure and illogical treatment of the subject, apparently forbidding the consideration of such a fact); Missouri: 1903, Koenig v. Union D. R. Co., 173 Mo. 698, 73 S. W. 637 (that he was an attorney testifying for his client, allowed); New Hampshire: 1910, Genest v. Odell Mfg. Co., 74 N. The pendency of civil litigation between the witness and the opponent is usually relevant, not only as a circumstance tending to create feeling,[5] but also as involving conduct expressive of feeling (post, § 950); and while the mere fact of litigation upon a disconnected matter may not necessarily show bias, still it is useless to attempt to distinguish and refine for the purpose of exclusion.[6]

That the witness is or has been under indictment may have several bearings; (1) if the indictment, present or past, was had by the opponent's procurement or for an injury to him, it is relevant as having tended to excite in the witness a hostile feeling to him;[7] (2) if the indictment was procured by the opponent against another party to the cause, it is relevant as an expression

L. 312, 45 Atl. 593 (whether the defendant's employee charged as culpable was not afraid of losing his position if the verdict was against the defendant, allowed); North Carolina: 1913, Johnson v. Seaboard A. L. R. Co., 163 N. C. 431, 79 S. E. 690 (that the witness, an employee of defendant, had come to trial on a free pass given by the defendant, allowed); Oregon: 1915, Walling v. Portland G. & C. Co., 75 Or. 495, 147 Pac. 399 (that the physician-witness for the defendant was employed by the company insuring the defendant, admitted); South Dakota: 1902, Hedlun v. Holy Terror Min. Co., 16 S. D. 261, 92 N. W. 31 (that the witness was agent of the company insuring the defendant, admitted); Texas: 1899, Missouri K. & T. R. Co. v. St. Clair, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 345, 51 S. W. 666 (that a witness was the opponent's discharged employee, excluded); Vermont: 1916, Raymond v. Rutland R. L. & P. Co., 90 Vt. 373, 98 Atl. 909 (defendant's liability insurance, admitted on the facts, as affecting the credibility of an attorney testifying); Wisconsin: 1897, Klatt v. Lumber Co., 97 Wis. 641, 73 N. W. 563 (employment by a party, admissible).

For the admissibility of the fact of accident insurance and of employment as a detective, as affecting interest, see also post, § 969.

[5] 1897, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hill, 115 Ala. 334, 22 So. 169 (the pendency of a suit for a similar claim, admitted).

[6] 1906, Glass v. State, 147 Ala. 50, 41 So. 727 (quarrel over a former indictment, admitted); 1888, Hitchcock v. Moore, 70 Mich. 115, 37 N. W. 914 (that the plaintiff in an action for slander against his wife's father had been compelled in a divorce suit to pay out money to his wife; admitted); 1881, Olive v. State, 11 Nebr. 1, 23, 7 N. W. 444 (that he was an attorney for the prosecution, that he was interested in a suit against the defendant, admitted on cross-examination); 1897, Lane v. Harlan Co., 51 Nebr. 641, 71 N. W. 302 (damages for the taking of land by a county; a county-supervisor who had helped fix the line and estimate the damages; these facts considered as affecting bias); 1837, Pierce v. Gilson, 9 Vt. 222 ("that a lawsuit has existed, calculated to excite personal dislike", admitted); 1882, Langhorne v. Com., 76 Va. 1024 (excluding the fact that a bill charging the State's witness with infamous conduct had been filed by the accused, because knowledge of the charge had not come to the witness before testifying; and also holding that the mere fact of litigation on a disconnected matter is not admissible).

Compare the doctrine of § 951, post.

[7] 1904, Smith v. State, 48 Fla. 307, 37 So. 573 (murder; indictment against defendant for stealing the deceased's cattle, admitted); 1903, Purdee v. State, 118 Ga. 798, 45 S. E. 606 (indictments for offences by the witness against the defendant, admitted); 1869, R. v. Brown, 3 Haw. 114, 116 (defendant's testimony before the magistrate, charging B., an accomplice, admitted, to show B.'s motive and credibility in incriminating the defendant by his testimony); 1909, Dotterer v. State, 172 Ind. 357, 88 N. E. 689 (assault and battery; an alleged accomplice was allowed to be impeached as to bias by a judgment of conviction for his part in the battery, and to discredit his denial that he was not present at the battery); 1921, Sparks v. Com., 193 Ky. 180, 235 S. W. 767 (cited more fully post, § 987); 1885, State v. Henderson, 29 W. Va. 147, 159, 1 S. E. 225 (that certain witnesses for the prosecution were indebted to the prosecuting witness, not allowed even on cross-examination; unsound).

Contra: 1875, Tilton v. Beecher, Abbott's Rep. I, 517 (that the principal witness for the plaintiff, Mr. Moulton, had been indicted for libel on Mr. Beecher's complaint, excluded; Mr. Evarts, for defendant: "Does your Honor say that to show that the party against whom he is testifying here has pursued him is not evidence that he does not stand impartial?"; Judge Neilson: "It is very clear that if A claims an immense estate against B, and B can pursue the principal witness and indict him in many indictments, that he don't ruin the witness whose testimony may be brought in support of the case against him").

of hostile feeling, usable against the opponent as a witness (post, §§ 950, 951); (3) if it is now pending over a witness for the prosecution or for the accused in a criminal case, it is relevant to show the witness' interest in testifying favorably for that side (post, § 967).

Beyond these common varieties of circumstances, no generalization can be attempted.[8] New circumstances will constantly be presented, as suggestive of personal prejudice; and the decision should be left entirely in the hands of the trial judge.

§ 950. Expressions and Conduct as Evidence of Bias. The line between external circumstances and a witness' expressions or conduct (ante, § 945) is sometimes hard to draw; but for the purposes of relevancy it is of little more than theoretical consequence, the relevancy being usually in such cases clear enough. The argument in the present sort of evidence is from conduct or language to the feelings inspiring it;[1] the only question is whether from the conduct or language a palpable and more or less fixed hostility (to one party) or sympathy (for the other) is inferable.[2] Such questions should be left largely to the discretion of the trial Court.[3] The variety of the evidence is infinite. Among the commonest sorts are the witness' expressions of a desire to have the opponent defeated in the present proceeding,[4] and of [8] 1922, Fuller v. State, — Ariz. —, 205 Pac. 324 (family pressure upon rape-prosecutrix to make complaint); 1892, Fox v. Lead Works, 92 Mich. 249, 52 N. W. 623 (that a person was a total abstainer, who testified to the plaintiff's discharge for drunkenness, excluded); 1877, Gutterson v. Morse, 58 N. H. 165 (taking part as a grantee from the defendant in a conveyance fraudulently made to defeat the collection of the claim in suit, admitted); 1920, Henderson v. Dreyfus, 26 N. M. 262, 541, 191 Pac. 442, 453 (libel for stating that the plaintiff, a political henchman of one B., spat upon the American flag; the political affiliations of witnesses, admitted); 1896, State v. Mace, 118 N. C. 1244, 24 S. E. 798 (murder; that the witness for the prosecution had "been drunk with the deceased many times", excluded); 1895, Fenstermaker v. Pub. Co., 12 Utah 439, 43 Pac. 112 (plaintiff had been charged, with others of his family, with cruelty to a child; questions to his wife as to her cruelty to others of the children were held inadmissible to show bias); 1921, State v. Smith, 115 Wash. 405, 197 Pac. 770 (that a witness for the prosecution had been "acting under fear produced by threats" when making two confessions not offered in evidence, excluded on the facts).

§ 950. [1] A direct assertion, "I am biassed", or "I am ready to lie against him", is seldom made; in such an instance we are of course strictly not dealing with a circumstantial inference (ante, § 394), but with a hearsay assertion, admissible under the Exception for Declarations of a Mental Condition (post, § 1730). But in practice no such distinction is drawn, and all is treated as circumstantial evidence. For the admissibility of such a general answer on the stand, see ante, §§ 940, 948.

[2] In New York the principle is phrased in apparently a stricter form; the evidence must there be "direct and positive", — whatever that means: 1879, Gale v. R. Co., 76 N. Y. 595; 1882, Schultz v. R. Co., 89 id. 248.

[3] This statement, when made by the Courts, is usually said of extraction on cross-examination, and is thus merely an instance of the general principle already spoken of (ante, § 944); but there is no reason for any limitation of the doctrine to cross-examination: 1861, Floyd v. Wallace, 31 Ga. 690, 692; 1857, Mayhew v. Taylor, 8 Gray 172; 1892, Consaul v. Sheldon, 35 Nebr. 254, 52 N. W. 1104; 1892, People v. Brooks, 131 N. Y. 326, 30 N. E. 189; 1893, Garnsey v. Rhodes, 138 N. Y. 467, 34 N. E. 199.

[4] England: 1679, Lewis' Trial, 7 How. St. Tr. 249, 254 (Defendant: "Dorothy James' . . . evidence is grounded upon plain malice"; Witness: "Dorothy James said to several persons . . . that she would wash her hands in Mr. Lewis' blood, and that she would have his head to make pottage of as of a sheep's head"). 1681, Colledge's Trial, 8 How. St. Tr. 549, 640 (Oates testifies that Smith, the informer, a chief witness, had said of the defendant: "God damn that Colledge, I will have his blood", and on Oates reproving him that "these words do not become a minister of the Gospel", Smith replied, "God damn the Gospel"); 1752, Blandy's Trial, 18 How. St. Tr. 1164 (the defendant was charged with poisoning her father; her female servant, who had been discharged, had been the chief witness against conduct indicating a partisan feeling either in the present or in other legal proceedings.[5]

No generalization of the different sorts of evidence is of any utility; there is merely a greater or less degree of significance according to the circumstances and the personality of the witness.[6] her; testimony as to the servant's bias: "I have heard her curse Miss Blandy, and damn her for a bitch, and said she would not stay. Since this affair happened I heard her say, 'Damn her for a black bitch, I shall be glad to see her go up the ladder and swing' "); 1888, R. v. Shaw, 16 Cox Cr. 503 (a statement two years before, after a quarrel: "It is in my power to do him a good one, and when I do it, it will be a good one").

United States: 1894, People v. Anderson, 105 Cal. 32, 38 Pac. 513 (that she would hang the defendant if her evidence would do so), 1889, State v. McFarlain, 41 La. An. 687, 6 So. 728 (that the witness had proposed, just after the shooting, to lynch the accused); 1892, Consaul v. Sheldon, 35 Nebr. 253, 52 N. W. 1104 ("There goes a man I will do up, by God"); 1853, Drew v. Wood, 26 N. H. 363 ("If the D. family come over that hill, they shall not go home alive"); 1896, State v. Ellsworth, 30 Or. 145, 47 Pac. 199 (that the defendant ought to be hung).

[5] The following rulings admitted the evidence, except where otherwise noted: Ala. 1889, Burger v. State, 83 Ala. 38 (concealing knowledge from an officer, to show bias for the accused); 1897, Scott v. State, 113 id. 64, 21 So. 425 (keeping a witness away); 1909, Grayson v. State, 162 Ala. 83, 50 So. 349 (carrying concealed weapon; that the prosecuting witness had once before caused the defendant to be searched for a weapon, admitted); Cal. 1885, People v. Lee Ah Chuck, 66 Cal. 667, 6 Pac. 859 (that the prosecuting witness had already caused the defendant's arrest for the same matter on another charge); 1899, People v. Bird, 124 Cal. 32, 56 Pac. 639 (trying to persuade defendant's bail-bondsman to withdraw); Fla. 1894, Jacksonville T. & K. W. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 33 Fla. 573, 578, 15 So. 327 (whether he has not testified against the same opponent in a dozen suits in fifteen months, excluded); Ind. 1881, Johnson v. Wiley, 74 Ind. 238 (the witness testified she had been threatened with suit on a note by heirs unless she testified against the will); 1884, Stone v. Huffine, 97 Ind. 346, semble (in an action to require a bond to keep the peace, that the relator had instituted a prosecution for attempt to provoke an assault); Mass. 1859, Com. v. Byron, 14 Gray 31 (activity in procuring an indictment, semble, admissible); Mich. 1860, Crippen v. People, 8 Mich. 128 (that the witness had with others arranged to procure the indictment as a speedy way of attaining the end for which they had brought civil suits); 1915, Foster v. Krause, 187 Mich. 630, 153 N. W. 1066 (battery; that the defendant had said that a co-defendant had "offered to pay his fine if he would help lick the plaintiff", admitted); N. Y. 1848, Lohman v. People, 1 N. Y. 386 (taking part in instigating a prosecution); 1868, Nation v. People, 6 Park. Cr. C. 259 (declaration that the witness would withhold his evidence if the defendant would restore the money lost; excluded); Pa. 1865, Gaines v. Com., 50 Pa. 328 (a witness for defendant, asking what could be proved against defendant); 1896, Philadelphia v. Reeder, 173 Pa. 281, 34 Atl. 17 (that the defendant's witness had charged corrupt conduct against one concerned with the plaintiff in the public work about which the suit was brought); Tenn. 1905, Creeping Bear v. State, 113 Tenn. 332, 87 S. W. 653 (soliciting against a pardon for defendant); Va. 1900, Wadley v. Com., 98 Va. 803, 835 S. E. 452 (whether he worked for an indictment of the defendant in order to compel the payment of a debt by defendant).

[6] The following rulings admitted the evidence, except where otherwise noted: Ala. 1904, Hanners v. State, 147 Ala. 27, 41 So. 973 (threats); Ark. 1899, Magness v. State, 67 Ark. 594, 50 S. W. 554, 59 S. W. 529 (expressions of hatred to Africans, the defendant being a negro); Cal. 1886, Hartman v. Rogers, 69 Cal. 646, 11 Pac. 581 (sundry conduct); 1891, People v. Thomson, 92 Cal. 509, 28 Pac. 589 (that the witness on hearing of the shooting went out to kill the defendant); 1896, Lange v. Schoettler, 115 Cal. 37[illegible], 47 Pac. 139 (threat to kill the opponent); Conn. 1830, Daggett v. Tallman, 8 Conn. 17[illegible] (refusing to leave the State to give a deposition for one party, but doing it for the other); Fla. 1903, Fields v. State, 46 Fla. 84, 35 So. 185 (quarrels); 1906, Vaughn v. State, 52 Fla. 122, 41 So. 881 (threats to kill); 1908, Telfair v. State, 56 Fla. 104, 47 So. 863 (expressions of hostility); 1909, Stewart v. State, 58 Fla. 97, 50 So. 642 (threats against defendant by a witness for the prosecution); Ga. 1888, Gardner v. State, 81 Ga. 144, 147, 7 S. E. 144 (adultery: letter showing that defendant's witness, with whom the adultery was charged, had conspired with defendant to blackmail a third person on a charge of criminal intercourse, excluded); 1897, Daniel v. State, 103 Ga. 202, 29 S. E. 767 (that he was "very intimate and friendly with the deceased and was his 'partner' "); Ind. 1900, Whitney v. State, 154 Ind. 573, 57 N. E. 398 (stoning the house of defendant's brother, where defendant was staying, held not evidence of bias); Ia. 1916, State v. Gardner, 174 Ia.

§ 951. Details of a Quarrel on Cross-examination. It is obvious that, in ascertaining the state of feeling from the fact of a quarrel or other circumstances, the mere fact alone has little significance; without a knowledge of the details, we cannot well know the extent of the ill-feeling and the allowance to be made against the testimony. This necessity for ascertaining details is recognized by some Courts without limitation:[1]

1851, PERLEY, J., in Titus v. Ash, 24 N. H. 323, 331 (a quarrel between the plaintiff's witnesses and defendant having been shown, the Court admitted details as to the throwing of stones, etc., during the quarrel): "The quarrel in such case is not the substantial fact; it is no more than a circumstance tending to show prejudice and ill-will on the witness. . . . The degree of violence in the quarrel is manifestly material to the point in question. Was it a slight and accidental difference on some trifling subject, such as would be likely to leave behind no trace of ill-will or prejudice? Or a serious and inveterate feud, such as would perpetuate a grudge in the mind of the witness against the party?"

But in two ways inconvenience may ensue: (1) the detailed inquiries, the denials, and the explanations, are liable to lead to multifariousness and a

W. 624; Md. 1909, Stockham v. Malcolm, 111 Md. 615, 74 Atl. 569 (that the plaintiff-witness would "spend $50,000 to whip the defendant in court", admitted); Mass. 1842, Perkins v. Adams, 5 Metc. 44 (defendant, a town clerk, was sued for not recording a mortgage; the mortgagor testified that the defendant had lost it; a letter from the mortgagor to a creditor threatening him with trouble if he sold on execution was admitted); 1852, Long v. Lamkin, 9 Cush. 365 (whether a witness had had a quarrel with the witness whom his testimony was discrediting); 1857, Starks v. Sikes, 8 Gray 609, 612 (hostility in another transaction, excluded); 1860, Chapman v. Coffin, 14 Gray 454 (a statement that the witness, having testified for the defendant, would if called again testify for the plaintiff); 1863, O'Neill v. Lowell, 6 All. 110 (declaration that the plaintiff "ought to get a good pile of money out of the [defendant] city"); 1867, Day v. Stickney, 14 All. 257 ("I mean to get the money on this bond of old F., so as to get back the rent I paid him for the M. House"); 1868, Clement v. Kimball, 98 Mass. 537 (reputation for unchastity of a man or woman associating with a woman or man, admissible, if known to the latter, to show the latter's disposition towards the former; because it involves in effect conduct significant of disposition or feeling); 1869, Blake v. Damon, 103 Mass. 209 (sundry conduct); 1873, Com. v. Kelley, 112 Mass. 452 (that a constable testifying to liquor found had made oath in the search-warrant that he believed the defendant had large quantities there; excluded in discretion); 1878, Com. v. Gallagher, 126 Mass. 55 (offering a third person money to go bail for the defendant); 1887, Com. v. Trider, 143 Mass. 180, 9 N. confusion of issues; (2) the detailed facts of the dispute may involve a prejudice to the character of the witness, or of his opponent, which it would be desirable to keep out of the case. From this point of view, some line of limitation must be drawn, and an effort made to avoid these two drawbacks:

1869, STEELE, J., in Ellsworth v. Potter, 41 Vt. 689 (the plaintiff testified that the ill-feeling between herself and the witness was such that she had turned the witness out of her house): "The plaintiff was at liberty . . . under the direction of the Court to state enough to indicate the extent or degree of the difficulty and consequent ill-feeling. . . . This testimony was not intended or calculated to show which party was in fault, but only the degree of estrangement between them. It is impracticable by any general rule to fix a precise limit which should govern the admission of such evidence, and necessarily it must be left to a considerable extent to the discretion of the 'nisi prius' Court."

Accordingly, it is commonly held that the details of the quarrel or other conduct may be excluded, in the trial Court's discretion.[2]

§ 952. Same; Explaining away the Expressions or Circumstances; Details on Re-examination. On the general principle of explaining away circumstantial evidence (ante, § 34), any circumstance of conduct or expression, or of the external situation, of the witness may be explained away as due to some other cause than the emotion desired to be shown by it, or as not indicating a deep-seated hostility:[1]

1746, Chadwick's Trial, 18 How. St. Tr. 362; Prisoner's Counsel (to the chief prosecuting witness): "Had not you and the prisoner a quarrel at Carlisle?" Witness: "That I confess, and I will tell you what it was about; it was about a very foolish affair. Provisions being a little scarce at Carlisle [where both were in the Pretender's army], I had some sausages, and the prisoner would have them from me, and I not caring to part from them caused a quarrel, and we fought together. . . . I would not swear any man's life away for a sausage."

1871, WOODRUFF, J., in U. S. v. 18 Barrels, etc., 8 Blatchf. 478: "When cross-examining counsel see fit to call out from the witness collateral facts which tend to create distrust of his integrity, fidelity, or truth, it is entirely competent for the adverse party to ask of the witness an explanation which may show that the facts thus elicited were in truth wholly consistent with his integrity, fidelity, and truth, although they thereby prove circumstances foreign to the principal issue, and which, but for such previous cross-examination, they would not be permitted to prove."

But there are limitations to the use of this evidence: (1) In the first place, the general principle (post, § 2113) that allows the whole of a conversation to be shown in order to explain the true sense of the fragment first offered must not be allowed to introduce purely irrelevant matter;[2] the object is to explain, and no more should be listened to than is strictly necessary for that purpose:

1820, ABBOTT, C. J., in The Queen's Case, 2 B. & B. 294 (a witness for the plaintiff on cross-examination stated that he had mentioned that he was to be a witness against the defendant; it was proposed to ask him about the whole conversation): "The counsel has a right upon re-examination to ask all questions which may be proper to draw forth the sense and meaning of the expressions used by the witness on cross-examination, and also of the motive by which the witness was induced to use those expressions; but I think he has no right to go further and to introduce matter new in itself and not suited to the purpose of explaining either the expressions or the motives of the witness. . . . [The conversation] becomes evidence only as it may affect the character and credit of the witness, which may be affected by his antecedent declarations and by the motive under which he made them; but when once all which had constituted the motive and inducement and all which may show the meaning of the words and declarations has been laid before the Court, the Court becomes possessed of all which can affect the character or credit of the witness, and all beyond this is in my opinion irrelevant and incompetent."

(2) When to a witness is imputed hostility to the opponent, the true process of explanation consists in showing that the facts offered do not really indicate the conclusion suggested, i.e. the hostility. Thus, when the counter-evidence does not attempt to do this, but admits the hostility and desires to show that it was justifiable by the opponent's conduct, the offer is improper in two ways, first, because it does not at all explain away, but concedes that hostility exists, and, secondly, because it tends to prejudice unfairly the cause of the opponent by showing him to be an unjust man; and for these reasons such evidence may be excluded:[3]

1852, JOHNSON, C. J., in Cornelius v. State, 12 Ark. 801: "A long and tedious detail by the witness of the numerous charges which he has heard against the accused could not aid the jury in the least possible degree in their deliberations, as they could not thereby ascertain the extent of his prejudice. . . . The question for the jury to determine is not what it is that constitutes the basis or foundation of the feeling or prejudice that may be entertained by the witness towards the accused; but, on the contrary, it is as to the existence of such prejudice. . . . In this case the effect of the re-examination was to disclose the defendant's general character, and that too by particular acts."

§ 953. Preliminary Inquiry to Witness. On the principle of fairness and of the avoidance of surprise, the settled rule obtains (post, § 1025), in offering evidence of prior self-contradictory statements, that the witness must first be asked, while on the stand, whether he made the statements which it is intended to prove against him. Does the same rule apply to the use of evidence of former utterances of the witness indicating Bias? Must the witness first be asked whether he made them?

[3] Accord: but usually laying down the rule too strictly: Ariz. 1919, McCann v. State, 20 Ariz. 489, 182 Pac. 96 (witness' expression of opinion as to accused's guilt, held improper); Ark. 1852, Cornelius v. State, 12 Ark. 787, 800 (rumors of previous similar crimes by the defendant, stated by the witness in detail on re-examination as the ground of his prejudice; excluded); 1879, Butler v. State, 34 Ark. 484 (details of charges reported to witness by H. as having been made against her by defendant, and causing ill-feeling on her part; excluded on cross-examination); Fla. 1886, Selph v. State, 22 Fla. 537, 541 ("It is permissible to prove that witness and prisoner had a controversy, from which hostility was engendered; it is of no consequence which was in the right in such controversy"); La. 1881, State v. Gregory, 33 La. An. 743 (details of reasons for animosity, excluded); 1902, State v. Frank, 109 La. 131, 33 So. 110 (details excluded); Minn. 1908, State v. Kight, 106 Minn. 371, 119 N. W. 56; N. Y. 1900, People v. Zigouras, 163 N. Y. 250, 57 N. E. 465 (admitted, subject to discretion of trial Court; three judges dissenting); Or. 1902, State v. Warren, 41 Or. 348, 69 Pac. 679 (admissible in the trial Court's discretion); S. Dak. 1902, State v. Stevens, 16 S. D. 309, 92 N. W. 420 (reasons for hostility, excluded); Tex. 1917, Eppison v. State, 82 Tex. Cr. 364, 198 S. W. 948 (pandering); Vt. 1900, Hyde v. Swanton, 72 Vt. 242, 47 Atl. 790 (details of a quarrel, excluded).

This rule was apparently not recognized in England, though the following ruling may perhaps be otherwise explained: 1840, R. v. St. George, 9 C. & P. 488 (where a witness who testified to an altercation with his father was asked on cross-examination about hostile language formerly used by him against his father, and was then allowed to explain it by his father's prior misconduct).

Distinguish the application of the rule for details of employment creating interest (post, § 696), as in State v. Bean, 77 Vt. 384, 60 Atl. 807 (1905).

He must, as a matter of principle; for the same reasons of fairness that require a witness to be given an opportunity of denying or explaining away a supposed self-contradictory utterance (post, § 1025) require him also to have a similar opportunity to deny or explain away a supposed utterance indicating bias. Should force be given to this principle, in spite of the absence of fixed common-law precedent? Under ordinary circumstances, it should be. But the rule requiring such an inquiry before proving a prior self-contradiction has been pushed so far, and applied so stiffly and arbitrarily, that on the whole it now does quite as much harm as good. To import it in its present shape into any subject where it does not strictly belong by precedent seems unwise. Were the rule properly administered, no doubt it should have a place here also.

Moved perhaps by these conflicting considerations, the different jurisdictions are found ranged on opposite sides in the present question.[1] § 953. [1] ENGLAND: here the inquiry seems to have been regarded as necessary: 1820, The Queen's Case, 2 B. & B. 313 (the broad rule is laid down that "the legitimate object of the proposed proof is to discredit the witness", "to bring the credit of the witness into question by anything he may have said or declared touching the cause", and hence in every such case the asking should be required); 1840, Patteson, J., in Carpenter v. Wall, 11 A. & E. 804 ("I like the broad rule that, when you mean to give evidence of a witness' declarations for any purpose, you should ask him whether he ever used such expressions"); 1847, Alderson, B., in Attorney-General v. Hitchcock, 1 Exch. 102 ("it is only just and reasonable that the question should be put", though implying that it is not necessary).

But the rule, in any case, applies only to utterances, not to conduct or circumstances such as an assault or an employment.

B. Corruption

§ 956. General Principle. The theoretical place of this sort of impeachment is not easy to determine. It is related in one aspect to Interest, in another to Bias, in still another to Character (i.e. involving a lack of moral integrity). It suffices to point out that the essential discrediting element is a willingness to obstruct the discovery of the truth by manufacturing or suppressing testimony.

Distinguish, however, the use of subornation or other corrupt expedients by the party himself (or his friends or relatives); this amounts to an admission by conduct (ante, § 278), and may raise the question how far inferences may be drawn against the party by reason of the acts of third persons done on his behalf (ante, § 280). But in the present place we are concerned only with the witness as such, and the question is, what sorts of conduct on his part admit of inferences against the witness a willingness to falsify. The testimony of one who exhibits such a willingness must suffer the same doubts as that of one who is prejudiced.

There are several distinct situations: (1) A prior expression by the witness of a general willingness to lie upon the stand; (2) an offer to give false testimony for money or other reward; (3) a statement, after testifying, that he has lied; (4) an attempt to bribe another witness; (5) the receipt of money for his testimony; (6) the rejection of money offered for his testimony; (7) habitual falsities, and sundry dishonorable conduct.

§ 957. Willingness to Swear Falsely. This, beyond any question, is admissible as negativing the presence of that sense of moral duty to speak truly which is at the foundation of the theory of testimonial evidence:[1] ing the same rule [as for self-contradiction] to mere proof of ill-feeling which has only been evinced by unkind or threatening remarks about a party"); 1879, State v. Glynn, 51 Vt. 579 (holding that the witness' attention must be called, but not referring to Ellsworth v. Potter, supra); 1905, State v. Bardelli, 78 Vt. 102, 62 Atl. 44 (same); Wis. 1858, Martin v. Barnes, 7 Wis. 242, semble (not necessary).

§ 957. [1] 1781, De la Motte's Trial, 21 How. St. Tr. 791 (the witness had said "I swear anything", speaking of the trial in hand; admitted); 1793, Newhall v. Adams, 1 Root Conn. 504 ("he would swear to anything, if he could get 6s. by it", admitted); 1885, State v. Allen, 37 La. An. 685, 687 (trial Court allowed in discretion to exclude such questions as "Would you in order to save your own life swear to a falsehood?"); 1907, State v. Caron, 118 La. 349, 42 So. 960 (whether he had said that he would swear to anything that would help his brother, held allowable); Halley v. Webster, 21 Me. 461, 464 (statements "that he had lost his devotion; that he intended now to serve the devil as long as he had served the Lord", etc., excluded); 1854, Harrington v. Lincoln, 2 Gray Mass. 133 (that the witness had said he would lie on the stand; inadmissible, semble); 1864, Beaubien v. Cicotte, 12 Mich. 484 ("he played good Lord and good devil, because he did not know into whose hand he might fall", admitted); 1918, Caffery v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co., 261 Pa. 251, 104 Atl. 569 ("if they did not settle the case, he would go into court and lie them out of it", admitted); 1898, Sweet v. Gilmore, 52 S. C. 530, 30 S. E. 395 (willingness to lie, admissible).

1833, O'NEALL, J., in Anon., 1 Hill S. C. 258: "It was proved that Nimrod Mitchell had said that 'if he heard any man say he would not swear a lie, he would not believe him, for on some particular occasions he would, for he thought any man would.' The substance of this declaration was that he would not, on some occasions, feel himself bound to declare the truth on oath. . . . The man who believes that he is under no legal or moral obligation at all times and under all circumstances to tell the truth under the sanction of an oath has destroyed the only test by which he can claim credit at the hands of men. Such evidence is not establishing a bad character from particular facts."

§ 958. Offer to Testify Corruptly. An offer to testify corruptly should stand on the same footing; it is only a little less broad in its bearings than the preceding evidence, but it indicates a similar untrustworthiness.[1]

§ 959. Confession that Testimony was False. This is evidentially of the same value as the preceding conduct.[1] The difficulty is that it is apparently not circumstantial evidence at all, but testimonial (i.e. is to be taken as the assertion of a past fact), and therefore obnoxious to the Hearsay rule. If this were correct, it could be used only under the Hearsay Exception for Declarations against Interest, and yet it is barred there by the arbitrary § 958. [1] Admitted: 1861, Jackson v. Thomason, 8 Jur. N. S. 134 (admitting letters apparently implying a willingness to withhold for a bribe what he knew); 1887, Barkly v. Copeland, 74 Cal. 1, 5, 15 Pac. 307 (statements of a convict that he intended to testify falsely for C. in order to get the assistance of C.'s influence for a pardon, admitted); 1892, Roberts v. Com., — Ky. —, 20 S. W. 267 (an offer to swear for the opponent if he would help to clear the witness from a criminal charge, admitted); 1895, Alward v. Oakes, 63 Minn. 190, 65 N. W. 270 (letters "evincing a corrupt disposition to make his testimony in this case depend upon the pecuniary or other valuable consideration", etc., admitted); 1905, Hathaway v. Goslant, 77 Vt. 199, 59 Atl. 835 (question as to an offer for money to leave the State, when a witness in another suit, allowed in discretion).

Excluded, but very singular rulings: New York: 1833, People v. Genung, 11 Wend. 18 (a charge of obtaining a note by false pretences; an offer by the defrauded witness not to testify if the defendant would make a settlement, excluded); 1847, People v. Austin, 1 Park. Cr. C. 157 (an offer to refrain for money from testifying, by a father who had a claim under the statute for the loss of services of the son whose death was the subject of the charge, excluded).

§ 959. [1] Admitted: England: 1675 (?) Woodford's Case, Vin. Abr. XII, 40 (the confession of one who had falsely accused another of piracy and had deposed against him, held inadmissible only because of the former's subsequent attainder); 1855, Romilly, M. R., in Greenslade v. Dare, 20 Beav. 284, 290 (admitted testimony of a witness' admission of perjury, but declared that he paid no attention to it unless corroborated); California: 1898, People v. Prather, 120 Cal. 660, 53, Pac. 259 (previous confessions of falsehoods as to the matter in hand, allowed to be asked for on cross-examination); Connecticut: 1875, McGinnis v. Grant, 42 Conn. 77 (affidavit by the witness that his testimony had been falsely given for hire, admitted); Georgia: 1896, Georgia R. & B. Co. v. Lybrend, 99 Ga. 421, 27 S. E. 794 (admission that he had made a false affidavit in connection with the trial, admitted); Indiana: 1853, Perkins v. State, 4 Ind. 222 (statements of a prosecuting witness that he had falsely made the charge, admitted); New York: 1836, Savage, C. J., in People v. Moore, 15 Wend. 419, 424 ("If a witness, the moment he leaves the stand, should declare that his whole testimony was a fabrication", it would destroy his credit; admitting such a statement, made in jail after leaving the stand); 1856, Stacy v. Graham, 14 N. Y. 492, 498 (confession that the testimony was false, and that he regretted having so testified; assumed as admissible).

Excluded: 1898, People v. Arrighini, 122 Cal. 121, 54 Pac. 591 (questions to a defendant eliciting testimony that he had wilfully lied at the coroner's inquest, excluded; clearly unsound); 1883, Craft v. Com., 81 Ky. 253 (confession of perjury); 1905, State v. Wells, 33 Mont. 291, 83 Pac. 476 (cross-examining a witness who has identified his former testimony, "Is that testimony true or false?" not allowed; unsound; the pedantic error of such rulings can be seen by comparing the marvellously successful use of such a cross-examination by Sir Charles Russell with Pigott in the Parnell Case, quoted post, § 1260):

Compare the cases cited ante, § 527 (invalidating one's own former testimony), post, § 1040 (self-contradictory conduct), and post, § 1476 (statements against interest).

exclusion of confessions of a crime (here, perjury) by a third person (post, § 1476). That arbitrary limitation ought to be ignored, here as in other cases; but it is not necessary to resort to that expedient, for the evidence in question need not be treated as a hearsay assertion. It is in effect a self-contradictory statement (i.e. "I now say that the facts are just the opposite of what I formerly asserted"), and may therefore be used by virtue of the principle which admits them (post, § 1040). Such is the solution usually reached.

§ 960. Attempt to Suborn another Witness. The witness' attempt to bribe another witness to speak falsely to or abscond indicates for the case in hand a corrupt intention on the first witness' part, and thus affects his trustworthiness.[1]

Distinguish the use of such evidence against a party, not a witness (ante, §§ 278, 280); in that aspect, it is necessary to show the party's authority or connivance with the corruption, while in the present aspect the party's authority or connivance is immaterial.

§ 961. Receipt of Money for Testimony; Payment of Witness' Expenses. The witness' receipt of money for testimony may indicate corruption in two ways: first, from the conduct in receiving it, may be inferred a willingness to speak falsely; secondly, from the fact of its having been received or promised, may be inferred an interest in favor of the cause of the giver, just as any fact of pecuniary interest makes probable such a partiality.

E. 918 (attempted subornation admissible "to show his bias and affect his credibility"); Mich. 1884, People v. White, 53 Mich. 537, 540, 19 N. W. 174 (bastardy; questions allowed to the prosecutrix whether she had not said that she was going to get a prostitute to swear a case against the defendant); Minn. 1896, Matthews v. Lumber Co., 65 Minn. 372, 67 N. W. 1008 (attempt to corrupt a witness, admissible in discretion); Mo. 1883, State v. Stein, 79 Mo. 330 (offer for money to furnish testimony, admitted); 1893, State v. Hack, 118 Mo. 92, 23 S. Y.* 1882, Schultz v. R. Co., 89 N. Y. 248 (attempt to get another witness to testify falsely, admitted); Or. 1919, State v. Rader, 94 Or. 432, 186 Pac. 79, 81, 91 (murder; letter by defendant's sister offering money to a desired witness, held admissible, by a majority, "as evidence affecting the interest of the witness" if it had concerned the present case, but excluded because it was not shown to concern this case; the minority held it inadmissible without evidence of authorization by the defendant; the minority opinion treats the question as involving the principle of § 280, ante, and ignores the current of authorities cited above); Pa. 1898, Beck v. Hood, 185 Pa. 32, 39 Atl. 842 (attempt to corrupt a juror on the preceding trial of the same case, admitted, on cross-examination); Tex. 1913, Burnaman v. State, 70 Tex. Cr. 361, 159 S. W. 244 (here the special controversy was whether the rule applied to admit a corrupt attempt by the accused's brother who was a witness; properly held admissible; Davidson, P. J., diss. on the ground that the dominant purpose of the evidence was that purpose forbidden by § 280, ante).

It is important to distinguish the two kinds of inference, for the former inference can only legitimately be drawn where the money or other reward has been taken consciously with a view to false testimony; where such an understanding attends the bargain, the witness' conduct raises a clear inference of his willingness to speak falsely.[1]

But the second inference is not only of a different sort, but is much weaker; it is not from the witness' own conduct, but from the mere external circumstance that money has come or will come to him for his testimony; i.e. the element of knowing false testimony is lacking, and the inference may merely be that the money is likely to have some biassing effect of the same general sort that is attributable to all pecuniary interest (post, § 966). This second inference is ordinarily the only allowable one in the usual case where it is made to appear that a witness' expenses are paid by his party or that as expert he is to receive an extra fee from that party.[2] These facts may legitimately be

E. 945 (agreement to give witness a share in proceeds of judgment if recovered, admissible); 1918, Nicely v. Nicely, 81 W. Va. 269, 94 S. E. 749 (employment in a divorce case to obtain evidence by entrapping the wife, admitted); 1858, Martin v. Barnes, 7 Wis. 242 (a bargain by which a medical witness was to testify to imaginary injuries, admitted).

E. 377 (to an engineer, whether he had been promised "considerable money" if the proceedings "went through", allowed); 1915, O'Day v. Crabb, 269 Ill. 123, 109 N. E. 724 (that a medical witness received $100 per day from the party calling him, admitted); Kentucky: 1896, Jackson v. Com., — Ky. —, 37 S. W. 847 (whether she was paid anything for coming from an adjoining county to testify, allowed); Minnesota: 1879, State v. Tosney, 26 Minn. 262, 3 N. W. 345 (liquor-selling; receipt of money by witness as detective for such offences, admitted); 1895, State v. Hayward, 62 Minn. 474, 65 N. brought out, but they are not to be understood as involving necessarily a corrupt intention.

Whether a contract to pay more than the legal fees is invalid on grounds of public policy is a different question (post, § 2203).

§ 962. Mere Rejection of Offer of a Bribe. Where the witness in question has merely been offered a bribe, no inference of any sort as to the witness' testimony can be drawn; the rejection of the bribe deprives the offer of all its force in that respect.[1] From the point of view of the party offering it, of course, such an attempt at corruption is admissible against him, as showing his consciousness of a bad cause (ante, §§ 278, 280); but this involves the necessity of proving the identity of the offerer with the party, — a matter not always feasible.

§ 963. Habitual False Charges, and Sundry Corrupt Conduct. In various ways a witness may indicate a state of mind which partakes of the nature of corruption and of bias, and is not easily to be exactly labelled; the nature and strength of the inference will vary in different circumstances.[1]

The only difficult question is presented by conduct indicating a disposition or habit or general scheme to make false charges or claims. On this point there is much difference of opinion.[2] The only distinction that is here legitimate is

A question whether the witness had been offered a bribe in the name of the opponent was permitted in Com. v. Sacket, 22 Pick. 395 (1839), on the ground that an affirmative answer might be followed up by further questions leading to the fact of the acceptance of the bribe.

St. Tr. 343 (an offer to suppress an inquiry, admitted); 1858, Winship v. Neale, 10 Gray 382 (whether certain proceedings in the case had not been taken really with a view to hampering the opponent's case; admitted in discretion); 1888, Hitchcock v. Moore, 70 Mich. 116, 37 N. W. 914 (an attempt to have the opponent made drunk at the time of trial; admissible, semble); 1905, Finlen v. Heinze, 32 Mont. 354, 80 Pac. 918 (that the witness employed a person to negotiate with a judge for a corrupt decision in a prior stage of the cause, allowed); 1869, People v. Thompson, 41 N. between conduct indicating a corrupt moral character in general and conduct indicating a specific corrupt intention for the case in hand. Facts offered for the latter purpose could be proved by either mode (ante, § 943). There ought to be no doubt that such facts could be freely inquired into, whichever the purpose be; and even the character-rule does not forbid them on cross-examination (post, § 981).

It is time that the Courts took warning here, and became more liberal. They know, and all know, that the court-room has its quota of false claimants and pretended victims of wrongs; some are children, some eccentrics, some hysterics, some insane, some conscious blackmailers.[3] It is hard enough, at last, to detect and expose them. To hamper this exposure with the shibboleth 'res inter alios acta' is unpractical. And the injustice of the situation is often intensified by this maddening prohibition of the very evidence to which a common-sense tribunal would most quickly resort.

[3] Any judge who has not heard of some of the instances in which such a complete investigation soon clears up the whole atmosphere should read Dr. Bernhard Glueck's article on "The Forensic Phase of Litigious Paranoia", in the Journal of the American Institute of Criminal Law and Criminology, V, 371 (Sep-

The double barrier erected by our strict precedents in this field may be instanced by the case nowadays common in our courts, a charge against an oldish man of indecencies with a young girl or child in his shop or house. Usually the facts are either that the man is a sexual pervert, or that the female is a sexual hysteric or a precocious little reprobate. If the former case, the prosecution tries to show that the man has a habit of treating little girls in that way. But, NO, that cannot be done; the character-rule forbids. If the latter case, the defence tries to show that the girl has been falsely charging other men with similar offenses. But, NO, that cannot be done; the witness-rule forbids. And so, whichever the truth may be, the Court ties up the case in these intellectual ropes, and lets the parties struggle away with the fragments of evidence that are permitted to be used. And yet we assume that this process is a skilled and worthy effort to establish the truth!

§ 964. Preliminary Inquiry of the Witness. Whatever rule is adopted as to the necessity of a preliminary inquiry to the witness about former expressions of Bias (ante, § 953) obtains also for proof of former expressions indicating corrupt intention; the two kinds of evidence are treated as standing practically on the same footing in this respect.[1]

C. Interest

§ 966. General Principle; Parties and Witnesses in a Civil Case. The abolition of disqualification by reason of Interest (ante, § 576) was merely a removal of the absolute bar to testimony, and left untouched the relevancy of all facts which bear on the probable partiality of the witness by reason of his pecuniary interest in the result of the suit. Rulings under the old disqualification are practically no longer precedents; the scope of the circumstances of interest that may be used to discredit witnesses is indefinite and is not the subject of frequent rulings. Statutes provide in some States that every fact which would formerly have served to disqualify may still be used to discredit; but the body of precedents under the modern régime is comparatively small, as it ought to be. There is no doubt that the interest of a party or of a witness in the event of the cause is a circumstance available to impeach him:[1]

1895, BROWN, J., in Trinity Co. Lumber Co. v. Denham, 88 Tex. 203, 30 S. W. 856: "If it be admitted, however, that Borden had parted with his interest in the suit before he first gave his testimony, still we think it was permissible to show that he had been interested in the case, the extended character of that interest, and the time and circumstances under which he parted with his interest, all of which would go to his credibility. At common law a witness was rendered incompetent to testify by reason of his interest in the result of the suit. A release would restore his competency, but it is by no means certain that it would remove from his mind the bias, if any, that such interest would occasion; and every fact of circumstance which would tend to show to the jury his relation to the case or the parties was admissible in order that they might determine what weight they ought to give to his evidence."

§ 967. Accomplices and Co-indictees in a Criminal Case. It bears against a witness' credibility that he is an accomplice in the crime charged and testifies for the prosecution;[1] and the pendency of any indictment against the witness indicates indirectly a similar possibility of his currying favor by testifying for the State;[2] so, too, the existence of a

The few judicial rulings concern instructions in which counsel has attempted improperly either to control the jury's freedom of judgment or to juggle with words for the purpose of securing a judicial error; for example: 1905, Denver C. T. Co. v. Norton, 141 Fed. 599, 608, C. C. A. (party-opponent; an instruction may be demanded); 1900, North Chicago St. R. Co. v. Dudgeon, 184 Ill. 477, 56 N. E. 796 (whether an instruction is required); 1908, Helbig v. Citizens' Ins. Co., 234 Ill. 251, 84 N. E. 897; 1904, Steebin v. Lavengood, 163 Ind. 478, 71 N. E. 494 (form of instruction, considered); 1895, Rucker v. State, — Miss. —, 18 So. 121 (it is error to tell the jury that they should disregard the testimony of interested persons); 1898, Boice v. Palmer, 55 Nebr. 389, 75 N. W. 849 (interest is to be considered; but there is no doctrine that such a one "will not be as honest" as others); 1914, Ferebee v. Norfolk Southern R. Co., 167 N. C. 290, 83 S. E. 360, per Walker, J.

§ 967. [1] This is unquestioned; compare the authorities cited ante, §§ 526, 580 (accomplice not disqualified), and post, § 2056 (accomplice requires corroboration).

[2] Ala. 1919, Bigham v. State, 203 Ala. 162, 82 So. 192 (murder; "You haven't been charged with being down at the still when Mr. W. came down there to arrest these fellows?", excluded, for reasons not stated); 1916, Patton v. State, 197 Ala. 180, 72 So. 401 (murder: "you have been accused of this killing yourself?" excluded; unsound); Cal. 1868, People v. Robles, 34 Cal. 591, 593; 1895, People v. Dillwood, 106 Cal. 129, 39 Pac. 439 (that other charges are pending against the witness, admitted); Colo. 1910, Tollifson v. People, 49 Colo. 219, 112 Pac. 794 (burglary; the witness was under a charge of assault, held not improperly excluded in discretion); Ga. 1906, Hayes v. State, 126 Ga. 95, 54 S. E. 809; Haw. 1905, Terr. v. Boyd, 16 How. 660 (indictment for the same offence, admitted); Kan. 1866, Craft v. State, 3 Kan. 450, 478; Mass. 1858, Quinsigamond Bank v. Hobbs, 11 Gray 250 (existence of promise or just expectation of pardon for his share as accomplice in the crime charged.[3]

When the co-indictee testifies for the accused, his situation here also may be considered as tempting him to exonerate the other accused and thus help towards his own freedom.[4]

§ 968. Accused in a Criminal Case. The fact of being a party in the cause (ante, § 966) and in particular a defendant in a criminal cause, may be considered as affecting the witness' credibility. The only question that arises in this connection is whether the judge, under the unfortunate modern a criminal prosecution against a witness on the charge of doing that which he now denies he did, admitted): Mo. 1880, State v. Reavis, 71 Mo. 419 (to rebut the intimation that an accomplice was testifying for the prosecution as the price of freedom, two other pending indictments against him were offered, but were excluded because the fact of the defendant being joined in them might prejudice him); N. J. 1904, State v. Rosa, 71 N. J. L. 316, 58 Atl. 1010 (that the witness was arrested on the same charge, admitted on cross-examination); N. Y. 1880, Ryan v. People, 79 N. Y. 600 (a witness asked whether he had been indicted; held proper); Okl. 1909, De Graff v. State, 2 Okl. Cr. 519, 103 Pac. 538 (liquor-offence); Tex. 1912, O'Neal v. State, 66 Tex. E. 50 (former indictments pending against a "defendant, not admissible to show his interest as a witness).

Compare the use of the same evidence to show bad moral character (post, §§ 982, 987), and to show bias (ante, § 949).

[3] 1905, Stevens v. People, 215 Ill. 593, 74 N. E. 786 ("Do you expect to be no further prosecuted in this matter?" allowed, whether or not his expectation was justified by any binding promise); 1915, People v. McKinney, 267 Ill. 454, 108 N. E. 652 (inducements to an accomplice to plead guilty and testify for the State, made by the police, though not sanctioned by the Court, may be inquired into); 1920, People v. Andrew, 295 Ill. 445, 129 N. E. 178 (certain questions as to promise of immunity, held proper); 1898, State v. Nelson, 59 Kan. 776, 52 Pac. 868 (questions as to agreement not to prosecute a witness turning State's evidence, held properly rejected on the facts); 1921, State v. Ritter, 288 Mo. 381, 231 S. W. 606 (arson; T. having turned State's evidence, a question as to her "hope and expectation that you would not be prosecuted?", held too vague; this is absurd); 1896, Territory v. Chavez, 8 N. M. 528, 45 Pac. 1107 (a hope of pardon, without an express promise, is relevant); 1895, State v. Kent, 4 N. D. 577, 62 N. W. 631 (here the fact that the accomplice was after some time still unprosecuted was used as indicating that he was under some hope of release); 1859, Allen v. State, 10 Oh. St. 288, 306 ("If A. is convicted, do you expect to be prosecuted?" allowed); 1879, Kilrow v. Com., 89 Pa. 480, 485, semble (promise of pardon); 1916, State v. Barretta, 47 Utah 479, 155 Pac. 343 (whether the witness-accomplice "understood" that his case was to be dismissed, etc., allowed).

On the principle of Explanation (ante, §§ 34, 952), the fact may be shown by the prosecution, even before express impeachment (because his relation to the cause is an implied impeachment), that no such promise has been made: Contra: 1903, Owens v. State, 82 Miss. 18, 33 So. 718 (a co-conspirator, already convicted of the murder charged against the defendant, testified for the State; the fact that he had been offered no inducement by the authorities to testify was excluded; an astonishing ruling, as also that of Madden v. State, 65 Miss. 176, 3 So. 328, followed as the authority).

[4] 1898, Titus v. State, 117 Ala. 16, 23 So. 77 (indictment of defendant's witness for same murder, admitted); 1904, Wilkerson v. State, 140 Ala. 165, 37 So. 265 (indictment for the same illegal sale of liquor; admitted); 1897, Shaw v. State, 102 Ga. 660, 29 S. E. 477 (train-wrecking; indictment of defendant's witness for robbing the cars of the same railroad, admitted); 1910, McCray v. State, 134 Ga. 416, 68 S. E. 62 (murder of W.; indictment against defendant and McK., a witness for defendant, for an assault on B., as a part of the same affair, admitted to show bias of McK.); 1841, Com. v. Turner, 3 Metc. Mass. 25 (that the witness' father was under indictment for being concerned in the same crime with the defendant in whose favor she was testifying, admitted); 1910, Gray v. State, 4 Okl. Cr. 292, 111 Pac. 825.

Contra: 1897, Lewis v. Com., — Ky. —, 42 S. W. 1127 (indictment of defendant's witness as accomplice, excluded on the theory that it involved character-impeachment; present principle ignored); 1920, People v. Weber, App. Div., 181 N. Y. Suppl. 774 (rape while riding in an automobile; indictment of witness called by defendant for rape upon another woman in the same party at the same time, excluded; unsound).

rule forbidding a charge to the jury upon the facts or upon the credibility of specific witnesses, is violating that rule in mentioning this proposition to the jury in a criminal case, — a question which has to do with the law of Trials, not of Evidence.[1]

§ 969. Bonds, Rewards, Detective-Employment, Insurance, etc., as affecting Interest. The circumstances which give to a witness an interest in the event of the cause and may therefore be suggestive of testimonial doubt or detraction have usually a significance so apparent that it is either idle to dispute or useless to maintain their admissibility. For the law to attempt to measure judicially the weight of a circumstance which the jury can equally well estimate by the unwritten and unconscious canons of experience is to encumber the law with needless rules. The abolition of the rules for interest-disqualification has left this subject practically untrammelled. Only a few situations have called for rulings, and these are plain enough in their reasoning.

(1) One who as a spy obtains information of a crime is not necessarily open to discredit thereby; [1] but one who for that purpose has employed trickery, or who has worked for hire in his investigations, or who by his function as a police or prosecuting officer has committed himself in a partisan manner, may under the circumstances be open to the suspicion of bias or interest.[2]

though it may otherwise have a bearing,—for example, in disqualifying a juror who is interested for or against an insured party, or in discrediting an interested witness.[6]

(5) That a witness, not a party, is the injured person in a prosecution for a crime may indicate a bias for the cause.[7]

These and such other instances as daily present themselves in trials are solvable without difficulty by the ordinary judgments of experience. Commonly, a ruling of exclusion is unnecessary, because the circumstance, if really worthless, would do no harm if admitted.

SUB-TITLE II (continued): TESTIMONIAL IMPEACHMENT

TOPIC III: EVIDENCING MORAL CHARACTER, SKILL, MEMORY, KNOWLEDGE, ETC. (BY PARTICULAR INSTANCES OF CONDUCT)

CHAPTER XXXII

A. MORAL CHARACTER, AS EVIDENCED BY PARTICULAR ACTS

§ 977. General Principle. In the foregoing sections have been examined the modes of evidencing Bias, Interest, and Corruption, — a class of evidence for which there is no discrimination against extrinsic testimony as the channel of proof. In the ensuing topics, namely, the mode of evidencing Moral Character and other general qualities, is found the starting-point and peculiar hold of that discrimination against extrinsic testimony which is a feature of such great practical importance and serves to divide discrediting evidence into two contrasted classes (ante, § 878).

The significance of this general expedient is that, while saying nothing as to the Relevancy of the facts offered, it prohibits them, on grounds of Auxiliary Policy, from being offered through other witnesses, and leaves them to be got at solely by the cross-examination of the witness himself who is desired to be discredited thereby. This feature of our law, in its consequences, gives it in this respect a character peculiarly its own and different from that of the Continental system of evidence. On the one hand, it practically cuts off a great part of that method of investigating and discrediting the whole life of the witness which, in the latter system, impresses us as so unfair and so liable to abuse. On the other hand, it elevates into prominence the expedient of cross-examination, already so much more common and useful an expedient in our practice than in theirs, and it thus contributes additionally to the emphasis and the potency of that instrument on our system of trials.

The influence of the present doctrine, while essentially and peculiarly applicable to evidence to particular conduct as evidencing Moral Character, extends itself naturally to the use of particular facts to prove other defective qualities, such as Skill, Memory, Knowledge, and the like. The reasons, in these other kinds of evidence, differ in some respects, and accordingly also the resulting rules; but the considerations of policy and the object in view are in general not different. A common treatment is therefore necessary for the various classes of evidence which thus share in common their subjection to this general exclusionary doctrine. Its scope is so broad that, wherever the line is difficult to draw, it is always possible to assume the applicability of the doctrine. On this account, the reasons that support it deserve to be examined with especial care, in order that its true scope may not be misunderstood.

§ 978. Same: Relevancy and Auxiliary Policy, distinguished. The exclusionary doctrine in question is purely one of Auxiliary Policy (post, §§ 1849, 1863), i.e. it excludes certain relevant facts, when offered by outside testimony, because of the objections of policy to that mode of presentation. Furthermore, there are in some jurisdictions similar objections, of a narrower scope, even to the extraction of such evidence on cross-examination.

In the class of evidence, then, questions of Relevancy, or logical probative value (ante, § 42), can arise in only two ways: (1) where by exception (e.g. for prior convictions of felony) the use of extrinsic testimony to the fact is allowed; (2) where the fact is obtained by cross-examination. The convenient order of treatment will be to examine at the outset the underlying principles, — first, those of Auxiliary Policy which exclude extrinsic testimony to particular acts, then those of Relevancy which affect particular acts exceptionally thus admitted, then the principles of both sorts which affect facts admissible on cross-examination; and, finally, to examine in detail the state of the decisions and statutes, in the separate jurisdictions, on all of the foregoing doctrines.

§ 979. Particular Acts of Misconduct, not provable by Extrinsic Testimony. Down to the 1700s no settled principle or rule of this sort was recognized; the witness' character might always be attacked by the testimony of others detailing the events of his past life and misconduct.[1] It must be remembered that under the orthodox rule, then prevailing, as to proof of general character by opinion (post, § 1982), the witness could give his personal judgment of the impeached witness' character, based on the former's acquaintance and dealings with him; it was thus an easy concession to allow the impeaching witness to describe among his reasons such specific conduct, good or bad, as might have become known to him. For example, a sustaining witness would say, "I have had J. S. in my employ for ten years, and he is as honest a man as ever lived; I have trusted him with large sums of money, and he has never betrayed my trust";[2] while an impeaching witness would say, "I have had many dealings with J. S., and I know him to be corrupt and lying; he stole a sum of money from me when he was my servant, and he is known in the neighborhood as a false swearer and a cheat." It was natural enough to make no discrimination in such testimony.[3]

But the production of such evidence by witnesses who spoke merely to specific acts of misconduct led gradually to a canvassing of the objections against such a mode of proof. Towards the end of the 1600s appears a tendency to exclude it. Though the rule of exclusion did not become settled until the first half of the next century, and though there are instances enough of its being ignored down to that time, nevertheless, it was always treated, from the beginning of the 1700s, as a rule that might be invoked. The reasons that were then advanced and accepted in its support have ever since been maintained and conceded as the correct and valid ones.

These reasons, in their varying phrasings, are illustrated by the following passages:

1696, Rookwood's Trial, 13 How. St. Tr. 209; Sir B. Shower (for the defendant): "We will call some other witnesses to Mr. Porter's [the chief witness for the Crown] reputation and behavior; we think they will prove things as bad as an attainder." . . . L. C. J. Holt: "You must tell us what you call them to." Sir B. Shower: "Why, then, my lord, if robbing upon the highway, if clipping, if conversing with clippers, if fornication, if buggery, if any of these irregularities will take off the credit of a man, I have instructions in my brief of evidence of crimes of this nature and to this purpose against Mr. Porter; and we hope that by law a prisoner standing for his life is at liberty to give an account of the actions and behavior of the witnesses against him. I know the objection that Mr. Attorney [-General] makes, — that a witness does not come prepared to vindicate and give an account of every action of his life, and it is not commonly allowed to give evidence of particular actions. But if those actions be repeated, and a man lives in the practice of them, and this practice is continued for several years, and this be made out by evidence, we hope that no jury that have any conscience will upon their oaths give any credit to the

[2] See the examples quoted post, § 1982.

[3] The effect of this tradition was long in disappearing; but the law to-day will not allow particular acts to be given even as grounds for an opinion of character; and the last sentence in the following passage is therefore not law: 1817, Sharp v. Scoging, Holt N. P. 541 (question whether the witness had been tried for perjury; Gibbs, C. J.: "You cannot ask them as to particular acts of criminality or parts of conduct, because the question is as to general credit. . . . But as no man is to be permitted to destroy a witness' character without having grounds to state why he thinks him unworthy of belief, you may ask him his means of knowledge and his reasons of disbelief"). Sir J. Stephen says (1883, Hist. of the Criminal Law, I, 436), referring to a trial of the late 1700s: "Most of the witnesses . . . gave their reasons on cross-examination. This is the modern practice." But this probably does not mean a practice of the sort above stated.

evidence of a person against whom such a testimony is given." . . . Mr. Attorney-General Trevor: "My lord, they themselves know that this sort of evidence never was admitted in any case, nor can be, for it must tend to the overthrow of all justice and legal proceedings, for, instead of trying the prisoner at the bar, they would try Mr. Porter. It has been always denied, where it comes to a particular crime that a man may be prosecuted for; and this, it seems, is not one crime or two, but so many and so long continued, as they say, and so often practised, that here are the whole actions of a man's life to be ripped up; which can never show any precedent when it was permitted, because a man has no opportunity to defend himself. Any man in the world may by this means be wounded in his reputation, and crimes laid to his charge that he never thought of, and he can have no opportunity of giving an answer to it, because he never imagined there would be any such objection. It is killing a man in his good name by a side-wound, against which he has no protection or defence. My lord, this must tend to the preventing all manner of justice; it is against all common sense or reason; and it never was offered at by any lawyer before, as I believe, — at least, never so openly; and therefore I wonder that these gentlemen should do it, who acknowledge — at least one of them did — that as often as it has been now offered it has been overruled; and I know not for what end it is offered but to make a noise in the Court." . . . Sir B. Shower: "My lord, . . . we conceive, with submission, we may be admitted in this case to offer what we have offered. Suppose a man be a common, lewd, disorderly fellow, one that frequently swears to falsehood for his life. We know it is a common rule in point of evidence that against a witness you shall only give an account of his character at large, of his general conversation. But that general conversation arises from particular actions; and if the witnesses give you an account of such disorderly actions repeated, we hope that will go to his discredit; which is that we are now laboring for." L. C. J. HOLT: "Look ye, you may bring witnesses to give an account of the general tenor of his conversation; but you do not think sure that we will try now at this time whether he be guilty of robbery or buggery."

1722, Layer's Trial, 16 How. St. Tr. 246, 256; Mr. Hungerford: "If my brief be true, the whole Ten Commandments have been broken by him." L. C. J. PRATT: "Very well, and so you charge him with the breach of the Ten Commandments, and he must let it go for fact, because he cannot have an opportunity of defending himself! . . . [Later, forbidding a similar offer] you have been so often admonished by the Court, but it signifies nothing. You are charging Mrs. Mason with being a bawd, when you ought only to inquire as to her general character. . . . At this rate the most innocent persons may be branded as the most infamous villains, and it is impossible for them to defend themselves."

1817, R. v. Watson, 2 Stark. 149; evidence of bigamy was offered against the prosecuting witnesses. Wetherell and Copley, for defendant, argued "that a man might be able to prove that a witness was not to be believed upon oath, by showing that he had been guilty of a number of criminal acts, although he could not produce a single record of conviction; that since it might be proved indirectly that the witness is not credible upon oath, it was too strong a proposition to say that the same conclusion might not be proved directly by actual proof of accumulated crimes which demonstrated the infamy of the witness; . . . that the consequences would be enormous and alarming to the administration of justice, if such evidence were to be shut out; a witness who had committed a multitude of crimes, but who had not been convicted of one, would stand as a fair and credible witness in a court of justice." ELLENBOROUGH, L. C. J.: "This is so clear a point and so entirely without a precedent that it would be a waste of time to call for a reply. . . . The Court does not sit for the purpose of examining into collateral crimes. It would be unjust to permit it, for it would be impossible that the party should be ready to exculpate himself by bringing forward evidence in answer to the charge; there would be no possibility of a fair and competent trial upon the subject, and therefore it is never done." BAYLEY, J.: "If this evidence were admissible, it would be impossible to proceed in the administration of justice, because on every trial the Court would have to try one hundred different issues, and juries, instead of having one issue to try, would have their attention withdrawn from one single point to look into an indefinite number of crimes. The rule is that a party against whom a witness is called may examine witnesses as to his general character, but he is not allowed to prove particular facts in order to discredit him, . . . for although every man may be supposed to be capable of defending his general character, he cannot come prepared to defend himself against particular charges without notice. . . . If the witness were apprised of the charges, he might come prepared with evidence to show that, although there was 'prima facie' evidence against him, they were in reality unfounded."

1847, ALDERSON, B., in Attorney-General v. Hitchcock, 1 Exch. 103: "Perhaps it ought to be received, but for the inconvenience that would arise from the witness' being called upon to answer particular acts of his life, which he might have been able to explain if he had had reasonable notice to do so, and to have shown that all the acts of his life had been perfectly correct and pure although other witnesses were called to prove the contrary. The reason why the party is obliged to take the answer of a witness is that if he were permitted to go into it, it is only justice to allow the witness to call other evidence in support of the testimony he has given, and as those witnesses might be cross-examined as to their conduct, such a course would be productive of endless collateral issues. Suppose for instance witness A is accused of having committed some offence; witness B is called to prove it, when on B's cross-examination he is asked whether he has not made some statement, to prove which witness C is called; so that it would be necessary to try all those issues before one step could be obtained towards the adjudication of the particular case before the court. On the contrary, if the answer be taken as given, if the witness speaks falsely he may be indicted for perjury."

1830, HENDERSON, C. J., in Barton v. Morphes, 2 Dev. 520: "Two reasons are given for the rule, either of which, I think, is sufficient to sustain it. The first is, the number of issues such evidence is calculated to create, thereby consuming the time of the Court and abstracting the mind from the main issue. The other is that both the party and witness would almost always be wholly unprepared to meet and repel the charges."

1857, STRONG, J., in People v. Jackson, 3 Park. Cr. 395: "Generally the conduct of a witness in matters disconnected from the subject of the trial, being irrelevant, cannot be given in evidence. The objections to admitting such evidence are that it raises collateral issues, and that the party against whom it may be offered would generally be taken by surprise and not be prepared to meet it. It is very desirable that the inquiries upon a trial should be confined to the issues actually joined between the parties. They attend to try those only; the attention of the jury is or should be exclusively directed to them, and not diverted to other and irrelevant matters which have a tendency to confuse their minds, and an investigation into collateral matters would protract issues into inconvenient and intolerable length. . . . There can be no doubt but that, in ordinary cases, an inquiry, addressed to any but the assailed witness, as to any particular act derogatory to his character or as to any specific blemish in his reputation, should be excluded. . . . [However, a fact derogatory to a witness' character] may be proved provided it does not raise or tender a collateral issue. . . . A witness may be asked if he has not perpetuated some offence, or been guilty of some moral obliquity, which would if true impair the weight of his evidence. . . . That would not, however, raise any issue for trial, as, whatsoever his answer might be, the party asking the question could not controvert it."

1896, LEWIS, J., in Oxier v. U. S., 1 Ind. T. 85, 38 S. W. 331: "There is a clear distinction, recognized by the authorities cited above, between impeaching a witness by proof of facts which discredit him, made independently of his examination, and by proof of the same facts elicited in his cross-examination. Proof of particular facts tending to impair his credibility, made independently of his own examination, is excluded for the reason that its admission would engender a multiplicity of collateral issues, and would frequently surprise a witness with matter which he could not be prepared to disprove. But these reasons do not apply to his cross-examination as to the same facts, because the witness, better than any one else, can explain the impeaching matter, and protect himself to the extent that explanation will protect him; the cross-examining party being bound by his replies."

(1) These reasons of auxiliary policy are, upon analysis, reducible to two. (a) The reason of Confusion of Issues (post, §§ 1863, 1904). This involves several considerations usually operating together and attending the production of additional testimony upon minor points. There are two chief considerations; first, each additional witness introduces the entire group of questions as to his qualifications and his impeachment, and the amount of new evidence thus made possible may increase in far greater than geometrical proportion to the number of new witnesses, so that the trial may become in length extremely protracted, and with relatively little profit; secondly, this additional mass of testimony on minor points tends to overwhelm the material issues of the case and to confuse the tribunal in its efforts to disentangle the truth upon those material points. (b) The reason of Unfair Surprise (post, §§ 1845, 1849). Surprise, in itself, is ordinarily no ground of objection to any kind of evidence. But the novelty of evidence may become unfair when there is no possible way of anticipating the nature of false evidence which could be refuted. This unfairness here lies in the fact that the opponent who desired by other witnesses to impeach by particular instances of misconduct might allege them as of any time and place that he pleased, and that, in spite of the utter falsity of the allegations, it would be practically impossible for the witness to have ready at the trial competent persons who would demonstrate the falsity of allegations that might range over the whole scope of his life. For example, the witness may have lived in three towns, Millville, Riverside, and Sierra Madre; in order to be perfectly prepared it would be necessary for him to come to trial with persons who had known him at every stage of his life in all three towns and could instantly prove the falsity of charges of any kind of misconduct, which might be alleged as of any time and place, — conduct, events, times, and places, entirely impossible to divine beforehand, because known only to the opposing false witness himself; indeed, this body of witnesses would perhaps have to come, in strictness, from every known habitable part of the globe, because the opponent might falsely place the misconduct in Kamchatka, and it would then be desirable to show that the witness had never even been in Kamchatka. This possibility of unfair surprise makes it necessary to concede the propriety of the rule based upon it.

(2) It must be noticed that a judicial opinion sometimes misleadingly states the latter reason in this form, that the witness "cannot be expected to come prepared to defend every act of his past life", i.e. it implies that the charges are true, though not to be anticipated. Now on this assumption, obviously, there would be no reason for excluding the impeaching testimony; for, if the charges were true, there would be nothing more to be said, and all the defensive testimony conceivable could not alter this fact and would therefore be useless. But, on the contrary, the real notion behind the reason is that the charges are false, and that there is no practicable way of showing their falsity. Instead of the form, "A witness cannot be expected to be prepared to defend every act of his life", the accurate statement is, "A witness cannot be expected to be prepared to disprove every alleged act of his life."

(3) From the reasons unanimously conceded as the rule's foundation, it is plain that no consideration of Relevancy is the source of the exclusion. The reasons are solely of Auxiliary Policy (ante, § 42). Questions of Relevancy do not arise, in so far as the reasons of Auxiliary Policy exclude the offered facts at the very threshold.[4]

(4) When these reasons cease, the rule ceases. If there are situations in which the above reasons have no force, then the prohibition ceases to apply. There are two such situations: Proof of a Particular Crime, by Record of Conviction, and Proof of Particular Instances of Misconduct in general, by Cross-examination of the witness himself. These have now to be considered, in so far as they are further limited by principles of Relevancy.

§ 980. Record of Judgment of Conviction for Crime. (1) When the extrinsic testimony is in the shape of a record of a judgment of conviction for crime, both the above reasons cease to operate. (a) There is no risk of Confusion of Issues, first, because the number of acts of misconduct provable in this way is practically small, and, next, because the judgment cannot be reopened and no new issues (other than the occasional ones occurring in the process of authentication of the record) are raised thereby; (b) there is no danger of Unfair Surprise — not, however, because (as is sometimes said) the witness well knows whether he was ever convicted; this assumes the very thing in controversy, namely, that he is guilty; but because the judgment is conclusive and cannot be attacked, and therefore the witness could not use his supporting witnesses to prove his innocence, even if he had them in court.[1]

It has therefore been universally acknowledged that proof of a crime by record of a judgment of conviction may be made, not because an exception is carved out of the rule, but because the reason of the rule does not apply:

1857, STRONG, J., in People v. Jackson, 3 Park. Cr. 396: "[Conduct derogatory to the witness' character] may be proved provided it does not raise or tender a collateral issue. Thus, it may be proved that a proposed witness has been convicted of an infamous offence, by producing the record. That raises no collateral issue of fact, as the record is conclusive, and there can be no further inquiry. But it is not competent to prove that

[4] 1838, Cowen, J., in People v. Rector, 19 Wend. 569, 586 ("Counsel misconceive the reason for the cases going against an inquiry to [particular] facts. It is not because they do not impeach character, but because the inquiry in a particular form might unjustly ruin the character of any witness past redemption. The evil is held not to exist when his own account is appealed to, and received as conclusive if in his favor").

§ 980. [1] Some courts go so far, to be sure, as to allow the witness himself to allege and explain his innocence; but in general even this much of an issue is not allowed to be made; see post, § 1116, under Rehabilitation of Witnesses.

the witness has in fact committed a crime, if he has not been convicted, although the actual perpetration of the crime is what renders him unworthy of belief. That, if permitted, might raise a collateral issue for trial."

(2) The reasons of Auxiliary Policy not barring out such evidence, the question of Relevancy may properly be raised.

What crimes are relevant to indicate bad character as to credibility? There are here three answers possible on principle: (a) Whatever offences were formerly treated as disqualifying one entirely as a witness (ante, § 520) shall now be treated as available for impeachment. This is the commonest solution, and has come about usually by express proviso in the statutory abolition of the former disqualification. (b) If in a given jurisdiction general bad character is allowable for impeachment (ante, § 923), then any offence will serve to indicate such bad character. (c) If character for veracity only is allowable for impeachment (ante, § 923), then only such specific offences may be used as indicate a lack of veracity-character.[2] The following passages illustrate this long-standing difference of views:

1680, SCROGGS, L. C. J., in Lord Castlemaine's Trial, 7 How. St. Tr. 1067, 1084: "You may give in the evidence of every record of the conviction of any sort of crimes he has been guilty of, and they shall be read. They said last day there were sixteen; if there were a hundred, they should be read against him, and they shall go all to invalidate any credit that is to be given to anything he may swear."

1699, HOLT, L. C. J., in R. v. Warden of the Fleet, 12 Mod. 337, 341: "In respect to a person who had been burnt in the hand, if it were for manslaughter, and afterwards pardoned, it were no objection to his credit; for it was an accident which did not denote an ill habit of mind; but 'secus' if it were for stealing, for that would be a great objection to his credit, even after pardon."

(3) A pardon does not remove the admissibility of the original judgment for the purposes of impeachment; for (unless otherwise expressly declared therein) a pardon does not imply a finding of the innocence of the person convicted:[3]

1695, Mr. Winnington (arguing) in Crosby's Trial, 12 How. St. Tr. 1296: "Though the offence was taken away by the pardon, yet the credit of the party must be diminished thereby, and no pardon nor oblivion can so far take away the consequences of a crime (though it may pardon the punishment) as to make a man a new creature; as long as the old lump and the presumption of the old malicious spirit still remains."

1870, DOE, J., in Curtis v. Cochran, 50 N. H. 242: "A pardon is not presumed to be granted on the ground of innocence or total reformation. It removes the disability, but does not change the common-law principle that the conviction of an infamous offence is evidence of bad character for truth. The general character of a person for truth, bad enough to destroy his competency as a witness, must be bad enough to affect his credibility when his competency is restored by the executive or legislative branch of the government."

[2] The extent to which these different rules prevail may be seen in examining the state of the law in the various jurisdictions (post, § 987).

[3] The authorities are collected under the various jurisdictions (post, § 987). Compare the same question arising from convictions disqualifying a witness (ante, § 523).

(4) A judgment of conviction in another jurisdiction ought equally to be admissible; for it equally evidences guilt of the crime, and the crime is the discrediting fact, wherever it may have been committed.[4]

(5) On cross-examination of the witness to be impeached, may not the judgment of conviction be inquired about and answered orally instead of producing a copy of the record of the judgment? This involves a different principle, namely, the mode of evidencing the contents of the judicial record. At common law, it was generally held that a written copy, and not oral recollection, was the only proper mode; but this has almost everywhere been altered by statute.[5]

(6) An arrest or indictment stands of course on a wholly different footing from a judgment of conviction.[6]

(7) Whether to the record of conviction must be added some evidence of identity of the person convicted and the witness, involves the presumption of identity of person from identity of name (post, § 2529).

§ 981. Cross-examination not Forbidden. The reasons already examined (ante, § 979) appear plainly to have no effect in forbidding the extraction of the facts of misconduct from the witness himself upon cross-examination. (a) There is no danger of Confusion of Issues, because the matter stops with question and answer; (b) There is no danger of Unfair Surprise, because the impeached witness is not obliged to be ready with other witnesses to answer the extrinsic testimony of the opponent, for there is none to be answered, and because, so far as the witness himself is concerned, he may not unfairly be expected to be ready to know and to answer as to his own deeds.[1] Thus, neither of the reasons has any application, and hence, so far as they are concerned, the opponent is at liberty to bring out the desired facts by cross-examination and answer of the witness himself to be impeached.

One or two not uncommon inaccuracies in expressing this result, must be noticed. (1) It is sometimes said that the above objection of Confusion of Issues is obviated because the witness' answer, if in the negative, "must be taken for true", or "is conclusive in his favor." This is obviously not correct. The jury are not obliged to take any witness' word as true; and they may or may not choose to believe this witness on this point. All that can be said, and all that it means, is that the opponent cannot proceed to prove the

[5] The authorities are collected under the appropriate principle, post, § 1270.

Of course the rule about asking the witness before proving a self-contradiction (post, § 1025) has no application here.

[6] Post, § 982.

For the question whether a witness' self-confessed crime, without a conviction for it, disqualifies him, on the principle of 'nemo turpitudinem suam', see ante, § 526.

§ 981. [1] See the passage quoted ante, § 979; and the following: 1862, Allen, J., in Newcomb v. Griswold, 24 N. Y. 299 (after mentioning the reasons of unfair surprise and confusion of issues: "These reasons are not controlling when the inquiry is made of the witness [himself] as to his own acts or offences, which he may well be supposed able to explain at any time, and when his answers are conclusive and preclude further inquiry, as is the case as to all collateral matters affecting his general credit, so that side issues cannot be made to embarrass the trial of his principal issue").

alleged fact by extrinsic testimony, and that, if he chooses to ask for testimony on this point from the witness himself, he must accept the chances of the jury believing a negative answer.

(2) It is sometimes said that a witness cannot be contradicted (i.e. shown to be in error) on facts affecting his character, because they are collateral. This is merely a confusion of the present rule with the rule forbidding a Contradiction on Collateral Matters (post, § 1003). This fact of Character-Conduct, to be sure, happens to be a collateral one, and therefore a contradiction on this point would not be allowable by that rule; but to invoke that rule in the present case, simply confuses separate principles, having a separate purpose and history.

That it has no essential bearing can easily be demonstrated. Suppose that rule (forbidding Contradiction on Collateral Matters) were abolished; it would still be unlawful to impeach a witness' character by extrinsic testimony of particular misconduct, for the reasons already explained, which would still be in force. Again suppose that the witness is not asked beforehand whether he did this act, so that the proof of it by extrinsic testimony does not involve a contradiction of him and is therefore not obnoxious to that rule; nevertheless, the testimony would be excluded, because it is extrinsic testimony of particular misconduct impeaching character. Historically, the rule forbidding impeachment of character by extrinsic testimony of particular misconduct existed a century before the rule forbidding contradiction on collateral matters was settled; so that in tradition as well as in principle they are entirely independent. It is thus clear that the invocation of the latter rule in the present connection is not only unsound but useless. Moreover, it is misleading. The confusion is apparent in some of the 'nisi prius' rulings of the last century (post, § 1005), when the rule as to Contradiction was in the process of settlement; but there is no longer any excuse for the perpetuation of the confusion.[2]

§ 982. Same: Relevancy of Acts, on Cross-examination; Kinds of Misconduct; Arrest and Indictment. Since the reasons of Confusion of Issues and of Unfair Surprise do not operate to forbid cross-examination, questions of Relevancy immediately arise. Now there is no doubt that conduct is relevant to indicate character (ante, § 193). An assault is relevant to indicate a violent character; a fraud is relevant to indicate a dishonest character. This is conceded with reference to proof of a defendant's character from his acts; it is universally accepted with reference to a witness' character:

1853, Common Law Practice Commission (Jervis, Cockburn, Martin, Walton, Bramwell, and Willes), Second Report, 21: "Another test of the veracity of the witness is to be found in his general character. If he has been guilty of offences which imply turpitude and want of probity, and more especially absence of veracity — as, for instance, perjury, forgery, obtaining money or goods under false pretences, and the like —, there can be no doubt that this is matter very proper to be taken into consideration in forming a due estimate of the value of his evidence, particularly if such evidence should be in conflict with that of another witness of unquestioned integrity."

1874, COCKBURN, C. J., in R. v. Castro (Tichborne), Charge to the Jury, II, 720, 722: "Lord B. has committed a wofully sad sin; . . . another man's wife left her husband and joined him, and they have lived together; . . . [Counsel] asks you deliberately to come to the conclusion that because of this offence Lord B. is not to be believed upon his oath, — nay, more, that you must assume him to be perjured. Is that, do you think, a view that you can properly adopt? Is it because a man has committed a breach of morality, however flagrant, that those to whom his testimony may be important in a court of justice are to be deprived of it? . . . There are crimes and offences which savor so much of falsehood and fraud that they go legitimately to the credit of witnesses. There are offences of a different character, and grievous offences if you will, but which do not touch that particular part of a man's moral organization — if I may use the phrase — which involves truth; and there is an essential distinction between this species of fault and those things which go to the very root of honesty, integrity, and truth, and so do unfortunately disentitle witnesses to belief."

1916, SCHALLER, J., in State v. Price, 135 Minn. 159, 160 N. W. 677, 681: "The character and the personality of every person testifying on a trial are incidentally involved. A witness brings his character to the stand with him. The law may suppress it, keep the knowledge from the jury, and sternly ignore it; but the witness who has spent his life in evil doing carries the effluvium of his wickedness and immorality into the courtroom with him, whether he be merely a witness or a defendant in a criminal prosecution. His immoral past accompanies him, and in spite of all rules of evidence the stench of a wicked life taints the moral atmosphere, and in some measure affects his credibility. It is one of the penalties which must be paid by a wrongdoer. 'As a man sows, so shall he reap'; and if, in a proper case, the cross-examination develops matters pertinent to the inquiry and tending to affect the credibility of the witness, the mere fact that the witness or a party to the action is prejudiced does not argue that error has been committed."

But in determining the limitations of Relevancy, two distinct attitudes are found on the part of the Courts:

(1) One is that any kind of misconduct, as indicating bad general character, is admissible; thus, a robbery or an assault or an adultery may be used, although none of these directly indicates an impairment of the trait of veracity. This is conceded even by many Courts which, when admitting character in the abstract, confine it to the quality of veracity (ante, § 922). In such Courts, the use of these facts can have no justification whatever. In those Courts, however, which allow the use of general bad character (ante, § 923) there is an apparent logical propriety; yet it is apparent only, for a robbery or a seduction may show a lack respectively of peaceableness or of chastity, but may not show that totally abandoned disposition which is understood to be involved in general bad character.

(2) The other attitude is entirely logical, and admits only such misconduct as indicates a lack of veracity, — fraud, forgery, perjury, and the like. A minority of Courts are inclined to observe this limitation, — at least now and then.

(3) In Courts adopting either of the above attitudes, attention is sometimes given to distinguish misconduct itself from a mere accusation of mis- conduct. Where this is done, it follows that a mere arrest or indictment will not be allowed to be inquired after; since the fact of arrest or indictment is quite consistent with innocence, and since the reception of such evidence is merely the reception of somebody's hearsay assertion as to the witness' guilt. To admit this would involve a violation both of the Hearsay rule and of the rule forbidding extrinsic testimony of misconduct. The only possible ground for allowing the extraction of such facts is that the merely having been arrested or charged is a disgraceful situation which indicates something lacking in the witness' respectability of character. Such a notion is quite consonant with social ideas in England, at least in a former generation;[1] accordingly we find the fact of arrest on indictment is there treated (and indeed assumed without question) as relevant, in the rulings of the early 1800s. But this notion has no sound justification, and it carries the injustice of subjecting the witness to suspicion without giving him an opportunity to clear it away. It should be understood by all Courts that the only relevant circumstance is actual conduct — i.e. the fact, not the charge, of having misbehaved. If it is improper to prove this by extrinsic testimony on the stand, it is doubly improper to attempt to prove it by hearsay, and trebly improper when accompanied by a prohibition of any rebuttal of the hearsay by the witness or by others on his behalf:[2]

1898, DOSTER, C. J., in State v. Greenburg, 59 Kan. 404, 53 Pac. 61: "An arrest is nothing more than an accusation of crime or other act of turpitude. That it is made in the form of a forcible restraint of the person, based upon a sworn complaint, makes it, for purposes of disgrace or discredit, no stronger evidence of the truth of the accusation than an oral statement by the accuser would be. No one would contend that a witness could be asked whether another person had not orally accused him of crime. Why should the rule be different when the accusation has been written out and sworn to? It is but an accusation in each case. Why should it be different when the sworn accusation is followed by an arrest? The arrest is but a reassertion of the accusation in another form. It is quite different, however, when the accusation has been proved. When the proceeding has passed from accusation to conviction, evidence of the turpitude of the witness exists, — not what somebody said of him, but what the judicial tribunals sitting in judgment upon the accusation have found against him."

Such are the questions of Relevancy that arise in asking on cross-examination for particular acts of misconduct.

(4) It must be added that some of the Courts that adopt the rule of discretion (described in the next section) virtually thereby ignore all questions of Relevancy. In leaving the whole scope of cross-examination on this § 982. [1] This was accepted by one of the most liberal thinkers of his time: Life of Sir S. Romilly, 3d ed., II, 85 (1808; "to have been tried is, in general, alone sufficient to destroy a man's character; . . . that a man comes out of jail is a fact which is plain and notorious"). See also (in Campbell's Life, II, 83) the Letter of Lord Melbourne to Mr. Attorney-General Campbell, June 19, 1836, relating to Melbourne's trial for crim. con.

[2] A judgment of conviction is of course on a different footing from an arrest or indictment: ante, § 980.

Distinguish proof of an indictment (by cross-examination or extrinsic testimony) as evidence of bias or interest for or against one of the parties: ante, §§ 949, 967.

subject to the discretion of the trial Court, they in effect leave it to rule as it pleases upon Relevancy, or to ignore Relevancy entirely. This may not be their clear intention, but it is the apparent result. Occasionally, however, a Court is found[3] insisting that while the trial Court's discretion is to control upon the considerations of fairness and policy, yet that discretion will not be allowed to admit a fact (for example, an arrest) which is clearly irrelevant.

§ 983. Same: Relevant Questions excluded on grounds of Policy; Three Types of Rule; Cross-examination of an Accused Party. Suppose that the questions on cross-examination deal with acts of misconduct that are relevant (by whichever of the above tests) to indicate bad character; may there be any other objection to them on the score of Auxiliary Policy?

Most Courts recognize that the allowance of a course of examination into particular misconduct places in the hands of cross-examining counsel an instrument which he may use not wisely but too well. Among the many circumstances that contribute to form that general complex of impressions which we choose to call a verdict upon the issue, experience shows that the moral obliquity of a witness tends abundantly to smirch the cause for which he testifies. Too many counsel give to this canon of experience so much weight that they devote themselves excessively (and sometimes with no great profit to their cause) to this process of besmirching the opposing witnesses. With unscrupulous counsel, the traditional direction (in paraphrased form) is observed, "No case; abuse the opponent's witnesses." It is possibly not the most important duty of the counsel to remember that (in the words of a considerate Court) "witnesses have rights as well as parties; it is too often the case that they are set up as marks to be shot at." But it certainly is the duty of the law and of the judges to see that due regard is paid to these rights, and that the witness-box does not unnecessarily become, in the words of an old Southern judge, "the slaughterhouse of reputations." There are two sufficient reasons for such restrictions:

The first reason, to be sure, is purely one of sentiment. The ordinary instincts of decency, not to say courtesy, are violated by such examinations, and every new instance makes us more sodden to the spectacle and tends to bring us towards the same level of degradation. It is the difference between the hunt and the slaughterhouse. One may well enough find sport in stalking the lion in the desert or beating the bush for the tiger, because there is a risk for the hunter which dignifies his sport, and there is a rapacity and a destructiveness in the hunted which leaves no room for sympathy; but the process of cutting the throat or knocking the head of a sheep or an ox penned in the shambles is both safe and brutal, and is to be justified only on the ground of its absolute necessity. The hunting down of a fleeing desperado, or the ensnaring of a chief of counterfeiters by the craft of detectives, is a process which does not violate instincts of fairness or principles of justice.

[3] As in some of the New York rulings.

But the ruthless flaying of personal character in the witness-box is not only cowardly — because there is no escape for the victim — and brutal — because it inflicts the pain of public exposure of misdeeds to idle bystanders —, but it has often not the slightest justification of necessity. Severe limits must be put to such conduct. As Lord Ellenborough said, "I will put it to your own feelings, your own good sense." Some weight must be allowed to the instincts of manly fairness and good sense.[1]

The second reason is a politic one, i.e. that, with the prospect of such an examination as a possibility, the public is certain to dread the witness-box. From time to time those whose knowledge would have been valuable will seek to evade disclosing it; the ascertainment of the truth will be hampered and perhaps prevented. That such a feeling exists to-day, in a greater or less degree, can hardly be doubted.

These reasons seem to demand some limitation for the scope of examination. The Courts are found taking three different attitudes:

(1) By one extreme type of rule, no limitations at all are put upon the examination from the present point of view: Whatever is relevant to character may be asked about. This was and is the orthodox rule in England. It is exemplified and defended in the following passages:

1794, Thomas Hardy's Trial (34 How. St. Tr. 710; indictment for treason, by a conspiracy to subvert the government by force: the witness here examined was supposed by the defense to be a paid informer who joined the society to obtain proof of its criminal conduct). Edward Gosling sworn. Examined by Mr. Garrow. . . . Cross-examined by Mr. Erskine: What is your Christian name? Edward. — Edward Gosling? Yes. — Are your father and mother living? Yes. — What are you by employment or trade? At present I am employed by Mr. Wickham. . . . — Have you always gone by the name of Gosling? I have not . . . and am willing to explain why I went by another name; as I find every advantage is wished to be taken of me, I trust the mercy of the Court will not suffer any improper question to be put to me. — Lord Chief Justice EYRE: As to any question which tends to accuse you of any crime, not immediately connected with this matter, I will protect you; but at the same time keep your temper, attend to the question, and give a direct answer. — Mr. Erskine: I have treated you with civility, I am sure. Did you ever go by the name of Douglas? I did. — When did you first assume the name of Douglas? I believe as much as ten years since. — How long did you continue the name of Douglas? I would wish to relate the circumstances under which I took that name. — Lord Chief Justice EYRE: You had better answer the question. — Gosling: I carried on the business of a hairdresser in that name, for I believe pretty near seven years. — . . . Mr. Erskine: Had you any particular reason for changing your name? I will state my reason. . . . As for taking the name of Douglas, I took it from a play bill. — I have no objection to a decent pride; you took a very good name. Pray how long did you play this part of Douglas? I continued near seven years in that name. — . . . Do you know a Mrs. Coleman? I do not. — Look across to the jury. I do not know a Mrs. Coleman, now. — Did you ever know a Mrs. Coleman? I did. — Had you any dealings of any sort with her? Certainly, she rented a shop of me. — Had you no dealings of any other sort? I am not putting a question of any immoral nature? Certainly, I had business; she rented a shop of me. — Is that all? She died at my house, and I buried her. — Did she leave any will? Yes. — Whom did she leave her property to? Her property was partly left to one Burroughs, and partly to one James Leech. — Who made the will? I wrote it. — . . . There was no complaint made against you of any sort? There was no just cause of complaint. — Do not understand me to be doing so improper a thing as to be imputing any crime to you and to ask you to reveal it; far from it. I only ask whether anybody was wicked enough to make any complaint of your conduct in that case? I do not know that there was any complaint. — Will you swear there was none? Upon your oath, was there no complaint made against you upon the subject of this will? I cannot tell what complaint may have been made. — Upon your oath, was there not a complaint made against you, to your knowledge, for fabricating this will? Never, that I know of. — Will you swear that? I will swear I never heard any such thing. — . . . Who was that James Leech to whom this woman left this money? A son of my wife's. — Who was Burroughs, who was that other person? A cousin of hers, or some such thing. — Am I to take you that you mean to swear now, that no complaint was made against you as having forged that will? I swear, that to the best of my knowledge or recollection, I never heard such a thing. — Will you swear positively, you never have been charged with it; a man that is charged with a capital felony cannot forget it? I do not recollect that ever I was. — Good God! Do you mean to swear that you do not remember whether you were charged with a capital felony or not? I do not know that I ever was. — Will you swear positively that no such charge was brought against you? I can swear no farther than that to the best of my knowledge, it never was. — . . . Will you not go to the length of swearing that nobody ever did so? I can only speak to the best of my recollection and knowledge. — Mr. Garrow: I submit to your lordship that is the only answer a witness can make to such a question. — Lord Chief Justice Eyre: There is no occasion for your interrupting the examination; probably it is an answer; but he may be pressed to see whether he can answer farther or not. — Mr. Erskine: Whether anybody ever charged you with it in your presence? I never recollect that any person ever did. — . . . Were you a dealer in naval stores? What kind of stores? — Mr. Erskine: Naval stores; ship stores? I have purchased old cordage, bad sacking, and such kind of things; but those I do not consider to come under the denomination of naval stores. — . . . Then, perhaps, you have never said to anybody the direct contrary of what you are saying now to me? I did say the direct contrary; I was asked by Mr. Worship, when I went to buy a print, what I was? and what my address was? As I conceived he would not let me have the print if I told him I was with a magistrate, I told him I dealt in naval stores. — Did you ever say to anybody that you dealt in naval stores, and that you should think no more of cheating the king than of guillotining him? Never to my knowledge; I will swear positively, I never mentioned the word guillotining the king. — Did you never say to anybody, upon your oath, that you lived by smuggling, and cheating the king in his stores? Never upon my oath. — . . . But did you tell Mr. Worship that the way you dealt in stores was by feeing the storekeepers to condemn them? No, I did not tell him that. — When you were reproved for that, did you not justify your conduct, and say that you had followed the practice for years, and thought it no crime to cheat the king? Never. . . . — Lord Chief Justice Eyre (in summing up the evidence for the jury): . . . Gentlemen, I stated to you before, that this witness has given very important evidence. . . . All they rely upon to shake his credit is what turns out upon his cross-examination — the account he gives of himself, of his having told a man that he dealt in naval stores, for a vile purpose — having borne the name of Douglas — having acted about in that sort of way, and going there for the purpose of giving information to government. Gentlemen, it is your province to judge what degree of credit you think fit to give to this man's evidence.

1870, Charles Darnáy's Trial (Charles Dickens, A Tale of Two Cities, Book II, c. III); trial at the Old Bailey for treason, in furnishing the French enemy with lists of the British forces and their disposition. The chief witness, John Barsad, was a former friend of young Darnay, and had become suspicious of Darnay's conduct in crossing the Channel frequently and showing certain lists to French gentlemen. The witness was a patriot, but, "in an evil hour detecting his friend's infamy, had resolved to immolate the traitor he could no longer cherish in his bosom, on the sacred altar of his country." Having released his noble bosom of its burden, he would have modestly withdrawn himself but that the wigged gentleman with the papers before him begged to ask him a few questions.

Mr. Styrer (counsel for the prisoner): "Had he ever been a spy himself? No, he scorned the base insinuation." — "What did he live upon? His property." — "Where was his property? He did n't precisely remember where it was." — "What was it? No business of anybody's." — "Had he inherited it? Yes, he had." — "From whom? Distant relation." — "Very distant? Rather." — "Ever been in prison? Certainly not." — "Never in a debtors' prison? Did n't see what that had to do with it." — "Never in a debtors' prison? Come, once again, never? Yes." — "How many times? Two or three times." — "Not five or six? Perhaps." — "Of what profession? Gentleman." — "Ever been kicked? Might have been." — "Frequently? No." — "Ever kicked down-stairs? Decidedly not; once received a kick on the top of a staircase, and fell down-stairs of his own accord." — "Kicked on that occasion for cheating at dice? Something to that effect was said by the intoxicated liar who committed the assault, but it was not true." — "Swear it was not true? Positively." — "Ever live by cheating at play? Never." — "Ever live by play? Not more than other gentlemen do." — "Ever borrow money of the prisoner? Yes." — "Ever pay him? No." — "Was not this intimacy with the prisoner, in reality a very slight one, forced upon the prisoner in coaches, inns, and packets? No." — "Sure he saw the prisoner with these lists? Certain." — "Knew no more about the lists? No." — "Had not procured them himself, for instance? No." — "Expect to get anything by this evidence? No." — "Not in regular government pay and employment to lay traps? Oh dear no." — "Or to do anything? Oh dear no." — "Swear that? Over and over again." — "No motives but motives of sheer patriotism? None whatever."

1831, Mr. Daniel O'Connell, in R. v. Kennedy (Kilkenny; Mongan's Celebrated Trials in Ireland, pp. 28): cross-examining a witness for the prosecution; the witness was a police-constable, and the charge was murder during a riot: "Have you a brother in the police?" "I have." . . . "You had an uncle in the police?" "I have not." "I said you had an uncle in the police?" "I had." "What is become of him?" "He is transported." "To Botany Bay?" "I dare say." "Can you even guess where he went to?" "I cannot." "By virtue of your oath, can you guess where your own dear uncle the policeman went to?" "I cannot." "You swear to that? Have you not sworn that you cannot guess?" "I can guess." "Now where do you guess he was transported to?" "I cannot tell what part he was transported to." "Where did you grow?" "In the Queen's County." "Are you anything to those Harveys that they said had a cave for stolen sheep?" "Yes." "What relation are you to the sheep-stealers?" "Brother." "Was it not in your own house that the stolen mutton was found?" "No." "Was it in your father's house that the key was found, that made them suspect it was in your father's house?" "I believe it was." "Was it for his good behavior that your uncle was transported?" "I cannot say." "For heaven's sake, who got your family into the police?" "A gentleman." "Has he a name?" "Yes." "What is his name?" "Mr. Steele. There were George and William Steele." "Where do they live?" "I cannot say."

1873, R. v. Castro (Tichborne), 32d day, Kenealy's ed., I, 396: Lord B., who had testified to the tattoo-marks on Roger Tichborne, was cross-examined: Dr. Kenealy, for defendant: "Did you play a practical joke [on Captain H.]?" . . . L. C. J. Cockburn: "It may be a practical joke of such a nature that the jury would disbelieve the evidence on his oath, on its being made known to them. We must leave that to the discretion of Dr. Kenealy." . . . Dr. Kenealy: "It was not a practical joke. Did you take away his wife?" Lord B.: "I cannot answer that question." . . . Dr. Kenealy: "Did you seduce his wife and make her elope from her husband? . . . I am sorry to have to ask my lord to tell you you must answer it." L. C. J. COCKBURN: "I certainly shall not." Dr. Kenealy: "Indeed you must, my lord! It goes to the witness' credit. I must have it answered, my lord." . . . L. C. J. COCKBURN: "I am afraid, if the question is pressed, you [the witness] must answer it. It is one of the consequences of being brought into a court of justice as a witness that whatever he has done may be brought up against him."

1873, BLACKBURN, J., in Stocks v. Ellis, L. R. 8 Q. B. 454, 457 (excluding cross-interrogatories, to a deponent in America, as to his desertion of his family and elopement with another man's wife): "It is clearly laid down that questions going to the credit of a witness, the answers to which will reasonably lead the tribunal to say, 'When the witness has admitted these facts, we distrust his testimony', may be asked of him. The limit to this kind of questioning is in practice that the presiding judge appeals, 'ad verecundiam', to the counsel to regard the pain caused to the witness and not to annoy him unnecessarily. And that prevents any great abuse of the freedom of cross-examination. . . . I do not think we can positively say that these interrogatories would be inadmissible questions, because the answers thereto would go more or less to the credit of the witness. . . . [But for interrogatories in a proposed deposition] the Court has power to exercise control over the matter and to see that no interrogatories shall be asked which the Court at the trial might refuse to allow to be put to the witness."

1883, Sir James Stephen, History of the Criminal Law, I, 433: "The most difficult point as to cross-examination is the question how far a witness may be cross-examined to his credit by being asked about transactions irrelevant to the matter at issue, except so far as they tend to show that the witness is not to be believed upon his oath. No doubt such questions may be oppressive and odious. They may constitute a means of gratifying personal malice of the basest kind, and of deterring witnesses from coming forward to discharge a duty to the public. At the same time it is impossible to devise any rule for restricting the latitude which at present exists upon the subject, without doing cruel injustice. I have frequently known cases in which evidence of decisive importance was procured by asking people of apparent respectability questions which, when first put, appeared to be offensive and insulting in the highest degree. I remember a case in which a solicitor's clerk was indicted for embezzlement. His defence was that his employer had brought a false charge against him to conceal (I think) forgery committed by himself. The employer seemed so respectable and the prisoner so discreditable that the prisoner's counsel returned his brief rather than ask the questions suggested by his client. The prisoner thereupon asked the questions himself, in a very few minutes satisfied every person in court that what he had suggested was true. . . . It is also to be remembered that cross-examination to credit may be conducted in very different ways. It is one thing to throw an insulting question coarsely and roughly in the face of a witness. It is quite another thing to follow up a point by questions justified by the circumstances. . . . The most difficult cases of all are those in which the imputation is well founded, but is so slightly connected with the matter in issue that its truth ought not to affect the credibility of the witness in reference to the matter on which he testifies. The fact that a woman had an illegitimate child at eighteen is hardly a reason for not believing her at forty, when she swears that she locked up her house safely when she went to bed at night, and found the kitchen window broken open and her husband's boots gone when she got up in the morning. Cases, however, may be imagined in which a real connection may be traced between acts of profligacy and a man's credibility on matters in no apparent way connected with them. Seduction and adultery usually involve as gross a breach of faith as perjury, and if a man claimed credit on any subject of importance, the fact that he had been convicted of perjury would tend to discredit him. No general rule can be laid down in the matters of this sort. All that can be said is that whilst the power of cross-examining to a witness's credit is essential to the administration of justice, it is of the highest importance that both judges and counsel should bear in mind the abuse to which it is liable, and should do their best not to ask, or permit to be asked, questions conveying reproaches upon character, except in cases in which there is a reasonable ground to believe that they are necessary." [2]

(2) By the rule obtaining in most jurisdictions of the United States, the repression of possible abuses is left in the discretion of the trial judge; questions upon facts relevant to character may still be forbidden by him where he believes that under the circumstances it is unnecessary and undesirable. The grounds for this restriction have never been more correctly or more eloquently set forth than in the following noteworthy opinion:

1865, PORTER, J., in Third Great Western Turnpike Co. v. Loomis, 32 N. Y. 127, 132 (the trial Court had excluded, as immaterial to the main issue, questions attacking the witness' character, no privilege having been claimed; the question of law was whether this could be done "in the sound discretion" of that Court; on intermediate appeal the answer was negative, but the trial Court's ruling was on further appeal sustained): "If the judgment of the Court below be upheld by the sanction of this tribunal, it will embody in our system of jurisprudence a rule fraught with infinite mischief. It will subject every witness who, in obedience to the mandate of the law, enters a court of justice to testify on an issue in which he has no concern, to irresponsible accusation and inquisition in respect to every transaction of his life affecting his honor as a man or his character as a citizen. It has heretofore been understood that the range of irrelevant inquiry for the purpose of degrading a witness was subject to the control of the presiding judge, who was bound to permit such inquiry when it seemed to him in the exercise of a sound discretion that it would promote the ends of justice, and to exclude it when it seemed unjust to the witness and uncalled for by the circumstances of the case. The judgment now under review was rendered on the assumption that it is the absolute legal right of a litigant to assail the character of every adverse witness, to subject him to degrading inquiries, to make inquisition into his life, and drive him to take shelter under his privilege or to self-vindication from unworthy imputations wholly foreign to the issue on which he is called to testify. The practical effect of such a rule would be to make every witness dependent on the forbearance of adverse counsel for that protection from personal indignity which has been hitherto secured from our courts, unless the circumstances of the particular case made collateral inquiries inappropriate. This rule . . . would perhaps operate most oppressively in trials before inferior magistrates, where the parties appear in person, or are represented by those who are free from a sense of personal responsibility. . . . The practice which has heretofore prevailed in this respect has been satisfactory to the community, the bench, and the bar. Questions of this nature can be determined nowhere more safely or more justly than in the tribunal before which the examination is conducted. Justice to the witness demands that the Court to which he appeals for present protection shall have the power to shield him from indignity, unless the circumstances are such that he cannot fairly invoke that protection. . . . [The opposite view] ignores the indignity of a degrading imputation when there is nothing in the circumstances of the case to justify it. It ignores, too, the humiliation of public arraignment by an irresponsible accuser, misled by an angry client, and shielded by professional privilege. Few men of character or women of honor could suppress, even on the witness-stand, the spirit of just resentment which such an examination, on points alien to the case, would naturally tend to arouse. The indignation with which sudden and unworthy imputations are repelled often leads to injurious misconstruction. A question which it is alike degrading to answer or to decline to answer should never be put, unless in the judgment of the Court it is likely to promote the ends of justice. A rule which would license indiscriminate assaults on private character, under the forms of law, would contribute little to the development of truth and still less to the furtherance of justice. . . . Unless there be a plain abuse of discretion, decisions of this nature are not subject to review on appeal."

The discretion here predicated limits the process of probing even into misconduct strictly relevant to veracity-character. But this rule of discretion may conceivably cover both the relevancy of such misconduct and the policy of its use though relevant; or it may cover only the former subject, and in effect not the latter, or 'vice versa' (i.e. the trial Court's discretion will be accepted either as to the relevancy, or as to the policy, but not as to both). Courts do not always carefully state which of these three ranges they intend to allow to the discretion of the trial Court; they usually predicate the discretion, without discriminating between relevancy and policy. The following passages illustrate the various types of modern opinion which lay down this rule:

1896, BANTZ, J., in Territory v. Chavez, 8 N. M. 528, 45 Pac. 1107: "The extent to which cross-examination will be permitted is no doubt, in a large measure, in the discretion of the trial Court; and it is difficult to draw the line as to where the legal discretion as to the admission or the exclusion of such testimony commences, and where it ends. The truth is the thing to be sought. Assaults upon a witness by cross-examination into collateral matters cannot be allowed to gratify the caprice or the displeasure of those against whom he testifies; and intrusions into private affairs, which are calculated merely to wound the feelings, humiliate, or embarrass the witness, will not be permitted. . . . But a clear distinction is to be taken between those matters called for on cross-examination which merely excite prejudice against the witness, or tend to humiliate him or wound his feelings, and those matters, on the other hand, which are calculated, in an important and material respect, to influence the credit to be given to his testimony. As to the latter class, the witness cannot be shielded from disclosing his own character on cross-examination, and for the purpose he may be interrogated upon specific acts and transactions of his past life; and if they are not too remote in time, and clearly relate to the credit of the witness, in an important and material respect, it would be error to exclude them. How far justice may require such examinations to go, how much time should be spent upon them, what should be excluded for remoteness of time, and what for being trivial or unimportant, must depend in some measure upon the circumstance of each case; and these are questions addressed primarily to the discretion of the trial Court; but the discretion should be liberally exercised."

1899, HOOKER, J., in People v. McArron, 121 Mich. 1, 79 N. W. 944: "Counsel complain that they were not permitted to show, by the cross-examination of M. C., that she was a woman of low character and habits, and that they had a right to interrogate the daughter in relation to her father and mother. This cross-examination was merciless; and it is impossible to read it without regretting that the exigencies of modern trials may be thought to justify such, and wondering that counsel cannot see that they are fraught with more danger to the accused than possible benefit. Witnesses have rights as well as the accused; and, while the Courts allow an investigation of the character of a witness through cross-examination, there is a broad discretion lodged in the trial Court in such matters."

1899, MARSHALL, J., in Buel v. State, 104 Wis. 132, 80 N. W. 78 (excluding questions to a defendant charged with murder of one Nelson, as to killing another man in Nebraska, burning a house to get the insurance-money, etc.): "There is no rule by which the exercise of that discretionary power of the Court can be guarded with exactness. The range is necessarily broad in order to fit the facts of particular cases, but there is a limit beyond which it cannot go. That limit is clearly reached and passed when questions are asked, manifestly, for the mere purpose of creating prejudice in the minds of the jurors, or the examination is carried on to such an extent and in such a manner as to become oppressive, and is not warranted by anything in the case. Questions as to previous convictions of criminal offences, or serving terms in prison or in jail from which convictions will be presumed, are uniformly permitted when the instances are not too remote, upon the theory that a person of that character will not be as likely to testify truthfully as a man whose life has not been thus blackened. . . . Questions relating to mere criminal charges, or acts which might be the foundation for criminal prosecutions, are usually rejected. They should not be permitted unless there are circumstances in the case suggesting that justice will or may be promoted thereby. It would be a clear abuse of judicial discretion to permit such questions where the indications are plain that the purpose is not to bring out the truth in regard to the witness' life and character, and to thereby discredit his testimony, but for the purpose of discrediting the witness, regardless of whether there is any warrant for the questions or not, and if he be a party, in that way to influence the minds of the jurors into a verdict against him. . . . A reading of the questions under consideration leads to the irresistible conclusion that no idea was entertained by the cross-examiner that proof would be elicited of the matters implied by them. We say 'implied' because the asking of the direct questions, in the manner in which they were asked, implied to some degree that the examiner was possessed of information upon which the questions were based, and although the answers were in the negative, the bad effect of the insinuations thrown out by the questions, was not and could not have been removed entirely from the minds of the jurors.[3] . . . The trouble here is that the cross-examination was allowed to be carried on manifestly without any reason except to create prejudice against the accused in the minds of the jurors."

1902, BRANNON, J., in State v. Hill, 52 W. Va. 296, 43 S. E. 160: "It may be a question merely intended to embarrass the witness, worry the witness, exposing indecent things in court, tending to corrupt morals, and answering no fairly useful purpose on the trial. It almost invariably wounds the feelings of the witness and his family. It removes the mantle of oblivion and forgiveness, by reopening the pages of years past, and exposing acts done in the infirmity of human nature, amid the temptations that beset life. If this door is open wide, the witness stand will be a terror; men will suppress evidence from fear of it, to the injury of public justice; and it will threaten both the worthy and unworthy witness, and be a cross upon which attorneys too zealous in their cause will crucify witnesses to suit their own ends. It would tend to disorder in courts. Rarely, very rarely, should it be tolerated."

(3) The third type of rule prohibits entirely such a cross-examination. If the discretion allowed by the preceding rule were properly exercised; if there existed at the American Bar in general that skill and professional self-restraint in cross-examination which is traditional at the English Bar; if there existed among the Judiciary the desire and the courage to check excesses of cross-examination and to err if at all on the side of repression; and if the Judiciary were accustomed to exercise their powers fully and freely, there could be no better solution than to vest the control in that discretion. But the judiciary to-day are not always inclined to show to the abuses of cross-examination the disfavor which those abuses deserve. The typical tendency of the modern American Judiciary is to abdicate that power of control over the trial which tradition and the due course of justice demand that they shall have, and to become mere umpires, who rule upon errors and make no attempt otherwise to check the misconduct of counsel.[4] For this reason, as well as because of the usual unprofitableness of cross-examination to Character, there is something to be said in favor of the rule that now obtains in several jurisdictions,[5] by which such misconduct is forbidden to be inquired into at all.

[3] For the impropriety of insinuating by question a fact which the cross-examiner does not believe to be true or capable of proof, see ante, § 780, and the citations post, § 1910. For passages from various sources discussing this subject from the point of view of professional ethics, see Costigan's Cases on Legal Ethics, 1917, p. 444.

In some of these jurisdictions, to be sure, this rule has come about by a statutory enactment forbidding the proof into "particular acts"; the statute being probably framed on a misunderstanding of the rule against extrinsic testimony (ante, § 979) without perceiving that only extrinsic testimony was by that rule at common law intended to be excluded. But, whatever the accident of origin of those laws, the rule of total prohibition of cross-examination, as well as of extrinsic testimony, on these matters, has thus received sanction, and is perhaps the one most consonant with the needs of the time:

1857, LOWRIE, J., in Elliott v. Boyles, 31 Pa. 67 (excluding the question whether the witness had not committed perjury on a certain trial): "The question is entirely illegitimate as a mode of attacking the credibility of a witness. If a man is received among his neighbors as fully entitled to credit for veracity, a Court and jury can have no grounds for discrediting him, except such as may arise from his want of intelligence or candor, from his contradictions or partisanship in testifying before them. The fact that those who are well acquainted with his home reputation know it to be now undoubted is not set aside by any single crime, or even many of them, that he may long ago have committed. If his reputation still rises above that, he is credible still, for the taint of criminality is not entirely indelible. Hence the most proper test of character, before human tribunals, is reputation, and not single acts. . . . It would be absolutely intolerable that a man, by being brought into court as a witness, should be bound to submit all the acts of his life to the exposure of malice, under the pretence of testing his credibility. If such were the test, courts would often present, in language and temper, scenes of unmitigated ruffianism, and the means of enforcing law and order in society would be denounced as scenes of corruption and disorder."

(4) Rarely a Court is found to discriminate, on the present principle solely, between the cross-examination of an ordinary witness and that of an accused party. The latter may well be in a different position respecting the extent to which he has waived his privilege against self-crimination, by voluntarily taking the stand; and upon this point there is much diversity of opinion. But even assuming the privilege to be waived or not claimed, it is still possible to discriminate in his favor from the present point of view, in order to prevent that unfair prejudice which might accrue against him as the accused, by means of a cross-examination to misconduct which would be legitimate enough for an ordinary witness. This discrimination, however, as independent of the question of privilege, is rarely taken.[6]

[4] Ante, § 21.

[5] In Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, California, and the States following the California Code.

[6] Perhaps in New York only. The rulings which expressly and intelligibly take it are noted post, § 987, under each jurisdiction. But the great mass of the rulings, which consider only the question of waiver of privilege, are collected under that head, post, § 2276.

§ 984. Privilege against Answers involving Disgrace or Crime. Supposing that the questions deal with facts of character relevant to be admitted, and not obnoxious to exclusion because of the foregoing principle, the witness may still be able to invoke a privilege of not disclosing the desired fact. The privilege usually available under these circumstances is the privilege against Self-crimination (post, §§ 2250–2284). But is there no other?

A privilege against disclosing facts of mere Disgrace — not Criminality — was up to the last century also available for the witness, and is in some jurisdictions still maintained. Its treatment should not belong here, and so far as it is necessary to distinguish it clearly from the Self-crimination privilege, the two must be again compared (post, §§ 2216, 2255). But historically it is difficult to separate the English precedents which deal with this subject and that of the Scope of Cross-examination (ante, § 983). In those rulings, the evidence being excluded, it is often impossible to determine whether it is because the fact was regarded as irrelevant to credit, or because, though it was relevant and admissible, yet there was a privilege not to answer. The nature of the discussion, however, was usually indicated by the mode of stating the question at issue. If the fact itself was discussed as either irrelevant or undesirable to ask, the inquiry would be, "May the question be put?"; but if the existence of the privilege was debated, the inquiry would be, "Must the question be answered, if put?" The general view of the profession, towards the middle of the 1800s, was expressed in the conclusion that "the question may be put, but need not be answered."

Now it is obvious that the mere discussion assumes that, upon the subject of the preceding section, either the first or the second of those attitudes has already been taken, i.e. facts of misconduct may be asked after by counsel, either without limitation, or subject to the discretion of the trial Court in a given case (and in England the second of these had prevailed up to that time). Then, and then only, the present problem arises, i.e. whether it is desirable to extend to the witness at least so much protection as to allow him to refuse to disclose the truth. Thus, it will be seen, the considerations of policy that apply to the matter are much the same as those that apply in the preceding section (Scope of Cross-examination); the main difference lies in the expedient adopted. In the one case, the policy that disapproved such an examination operated by forbidding the questions entirely, while in the present case the same policy, without resorting to such stern measures, allows the question but permits the refusal to answer.

The practice in England, down to the middle of the 1800s, had definitely taken the view (on the subject of § 983, ante) that misconduct was relevant to character and that questions upon such matters could be put (ante, § 983; post, § 987). But it had also, down to the 1800s, given a moderate operation to the above considerations of policy by allowing the witness not to answer as to disgracing (or "infamous") matters. Even this much allowance, however, came to be disputed; and a strong opinion arose that advocated the abolition of this privilege. The best statement of this view is that of Mr. Starkie, and, of the opposing view (defending the privilege), that of the Commissioners of 1853:

1814, Mr. Thomas Starkie, Evidence, I. 193: "The question whether a witness may be asked questions which tend to disgrace him is, like many other difficult questions on the subject of evidence, one of policy and convenience. On the one hand, it is highly desirable that the jury should thoroughly understand the character of the person on whose credit they are to decide upon the property and lives of others; and neither life nor property ought to be placed in competition with a doubtful and contingent injury to the feelings of individual witnesses. On the other hand, it may be said that it is hard that a witness should be obliged upon oath to accuse himself of a crime, or even to disgrace himself in the eyes of the public; that it is a harsh alternative to compel a man to destroy his own character or to commit perjury; and that it must operate as a great discouragement to witnesses to oblige them to give account of the most secret transactions of their lives before a public tribunal; that a collateral fact tending merely to disgrace the witness is not one which is properly relevant to the issue, since it could not be proved by any other witness; and that there would be perhaps some inconsistency in protecting a witness against any question the answer to which would subject him to a pecuniary penalty, and yet leave his character exposed. . . . [After examining the rulings,] The great question, therefore, whether a witness is bound to answer a question to his own disgrace has not yet undergone any direct and solemn decision, and appears to be still open for consideration. The truth or falsehood of testimony frequently cannot be ascertained by mere analysis of the evidence itself; the investigation requires collateral and extrinsic aids, the principal of which consists in a knowledge of the source or depositary from which such testimony is derived. The whole question resolves itself into one of policy and convenience, — that is, Whether it would be a greater evil that an important test of truth should be sacrificed, or that, by subjecting witnesses to the operation of this test, their feelings should be wounded and their attendance for the purposes of justice discouraged? The latter point seems to deserve the more serious consideration, since the mere offence to the private feelings of a witness who has misconducted himself cannot well be put in competition with the mischief which might otherwise result to the liberties and lives of others. No great injustice is done to any individual, upon whose oath the property or personal security of others is to depend, in exhibiting him to the jury such as he is. As to the other consideration, it does not seem to be very clear that by permitting such examinations any serious evil would result; the law possesses ample means for compelling the attendance of witnesses, however unwilling they may be. The evil on this side of the question is at all events doubtful and contingent; on the other side it is plain and certain. The principle on which such evidence is admissible is clear and obvious; the reason for excluding it is extrinsic and artificial."

1853, Common Law Practice Commission, Jervis (later C. J.), Cockburn (later C. J.), Martin (later B.), Walton, Bramwell (later B.), and Willes (later J.), Second Report, 22: "With regard to questions which do not tend to expose the witness to prosecution or punishment, but which tend to degrade his character by imputing to him misconduct not amounting to legal criminality or the having been convicted of a crime the punishment of which has been undergone, the law of England, according to the better authorities, in like manner protects the witness from answering, unless the misconduct imputed, has reference to the cause itself. Should this rule be maintained? On the one hand, the witness may have been recently convicted of perjury or some other form of the 'crimen falsi'; he may have become infamous by his offences against the law or against society; he may have, to his own knowledge, acquired a bad repute for habitual mendacity; and it may be highly important that the jury who are to weigh his testimony should be made aware of the drawbacks which thus attach to it. On the other hand, it cannot be denied that it would be an extreme grievance to a witness to be obliged to disclose past transactions of life which may have been long forgotten, and to expose his character afresh to evil report and obloquy when by subsequent conduct he may have recovered the good opinion of the world. As the law now stands, the question may be put, but the witness is not bound to answer; but if he does answer and denies the imputation, his denial is conclusive and cannot be controverted. It has been proposed to take away the privilege of the witness and to compel him to answer. We cannot bring ourselves entirely to concur in this view. We have already pointed out the effect which the dread of an inquiry of this nature may have in deterring a witness from appearing in court. To this may be added that, while under the present system the refusal to answer has practically the effect of an admission, the consequence of compelling the witness to answer would not improbably be to induce him to give an absolute denial, which would not be open to contradiction. On the balance, then, of these opposing considerations, we recommend that the existing law should be maintained, except that where the question relates to the conviction of the witness of perjury or any other form of the 'crimen falsi' and the witness either denies the fact or refuses to answer, the conviction should be allowed to be proved." [1]

As to the propriety of recognizing this privilege, two things may be said: (1) It is a compromise. From the point of view, therefore, of those who believe in the propriety of a total prohibition, this privilege is not adequate; but it is to be welcomed as entirely desirable and indispensable, in the absence of such prohibition. (2) It is much less effective than in theory it seems to be. Witnesses are seldom in a position to repudiate these questions with such dignity of manner and sincerity of principle as to convince the hearer that they are merely vindicating their rights and not evading a direct confession of the disgraceful fact. In practically every case the witness' refusal to reply answers all the purposes of the inquiring counsel, and is as good as an affirmative in effecting the desired discredit. It is mere hypocrisy to defend such a privilege on the ground that it gives the witness any real protection against the disclosure of his disgrace; he does not form the words of self-betrayal with his lips, to be sure, but he is saved from nothing more. Indeed, there have been some who have frankly accepted this as the inevitable result,[2] and have deprecated any attempt to abolish the privilege, on the ground that the failure to answer attained practically all that the abolition of the privilege could effect. It should better be abandoned altogether.[3] We may be content with the simple rule (ante, § 983) that the scope of cross-examination shall be allowed to include such questions and answers as the trial Court may in discretion permit and compel. In point of practice and tendency, the privilege against disgracing answers has, in the last generation or two, been more and more repudiated or ignored.[4]

Self-crimination privilege (post, § 2250) and the rule for Copies of Records of Conviction (post, § 1270), to group the statutes and rulings under four separate heads; in each of them is sought the answer to a separate inquiry, the principles of which have now been examined:

1. Extrinsic Testimony (ante, § 979): May particular acts of misconduct be shown by extrinsic testimony?

2. Scope of Cross-examination (ante, §§ 982, 983): What limits are set, if any, by the principles of Relevancy, to the use of particular acts of misconduct on cross-examination? What other limits are set, if any, by considerations of policy, to such use?

3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers (ante, § 984): Where such cross-examination is allowed at all, how far is recognized a privilege not to answer?

4. Prior Conviction of Crime (ante, § 980): Where, by record-copy of judgment or by cross-examination, the conviction of a crime is allowed to be used, what kinds of offences and judgments are treated as admissible?

§ 986. Same: History and State of the Law in England and Canada. (1) Extrinsic Testimony. The rule excluding proof by extrinsic testimony was not fairly announced as settled until the opening of the 1700s, although it had been forecasted and occasionally invoked in the practice of the latter part of the prior century.[1] The turning-point seems to have been marked by the trial of Rookwood, in 1696; and within a generation thereafter the rule was accepted, beyond any question, in common-law trials.[2] It has never since been doubted; although under the modern statute permitting the accused to testify (ante, § 194*a*) it suffers virtually an exception in certain cases.

But in Chancery practice the rule was from the outset deliberately rejected. One of the reasons given by Lord Hardwicke was this:[3]

"Though at law you can examine only to the general credit, yet it is otherwise in equity; for at law the witness cannot be prepared to defend every particular action of his life, as he does not at all know to what they intend to examine him; but upon an examination in this court he may be able to answer any particular charge, as he has time enough to recollect it."

This reason, however, was erroneously understood by the learned Chancellor; for the unfair surprise that was feared did not consist in the difficulty of the witness' own recollection, but in the difficulty of having other witnesses ready. Another reason[4] was that as the examination by deposition, customary in Chancery, had to be prepared beforehand in the form of questions, it was practically difficult to cross-examine as to character in that way, and therefore extrinsic testimony was the sole practicable method.[5] But the real reason probably was merely that the common-law practice had received a development of its own, at the time when cross-examination was becoming a powerful instrument,[6] and that the rule had never happened to obtain a footing on the Chancery side.[7] The Chancery rule, then, as varying from the common-law rule (yet even this was doubted, to be sure, by the learned reporter Atkyns), was thus administered down into the 1800s, though its wisdom was questioned by such eminent Chancellors as Eldon and Kent.[8]

(2) Scope of Cross-examination. It has been maintained by Sir J. Stephen that in the earlier practice no cross-examination to misconduct was allowed.[9]

[7] The Chancery rule, it may be added, after publication of the depositions, did not allow examination to particular misconduct where it was also relevant to the main issue, because, after the depositions in the cause were once published, no further examination on material points was usually allowable: 1803, Wood v. Hammerton, 9 Ves. Jr. 145; 1812, White v. Fussell, 1 Ves. & B. 152 ("facts affecting credit and character only"); 1837, Gass v. Stinson, 2 Sumner 609, Story, J. ("such particular facts only as are not material to what is already in issue in the cause, . . . which case seems allowed only to impugn the witness' statements as to collateral facts").

[8] 1814, Anon., 3 Ves. & B. 93 (an affidavit discrediting a petitioner stated that "he had been discharged from his employment by one attorney for fraud, and by another for communicating a brief to the hostile solicitor"; Eldon, L. C., ordered it taken off the file: "You may ask, whether the witness is to be believed upon his oath; which is the course at law, not going to particular facts. If the proceedings in this court are open to the defect that has been mentioned [i.e. no cross-examination to discredit], that does not make it fit to introduce all the scandal"); 1818, Troup v. Sherwood, 3 Johns. Ch. 558, 562, Kent, C. (regretting that the rule was not the same as at law).

[9] 1883, History of the Criminal Law, I, 436. Perhaps the learned historian had in mind the rulings on the privilege against disgracing answers (post). At any rate, the only plain authority seems to be the following: 1642, Onbie's Case, March, pl. 136 ("in examining of a witness, counsel cannot question the whole life of the witness, as that he is a whoremaster, etc., but if he hath done such a notorious fact which is a just exception against him, then they may except against him. That was Onbie's case, of Gray's Inn; and by all the judges it was agreed as before").

If this were so, it was natural enough in criminal cases, where (until the end of the 1600s) no witnesses were sworn for the accused, and the Crown's witnesses were favored by various protections. But by the 1700s, with cross-examination fully developed, this could not last; and during that century it is plain that the exploiting of the witness' life and associations, however discreditable, was freely allowed. The orthodox rule came to be that "any question tending to discredit" might be asked; and only rarely was there any interference from the Court.[10] Occasionally there was an intimation that the misconduct should have some relevance to the trait of veracity; and occasionally there was an exercise of discretion on grounds of policy. But it seems to have been thought that the witness' privilege against disgracing answers was the only protection needed. Whatever judicial interference took place was usually by way of an appeal to the counsel's own discretion and sense of propriety, and not to any settled rule of law:

1817, Watson's Trial, 32 How. St. Tr. 295, 297; that his friends were felons; that he was a bigamist; that he had been employed in a house of ill-fame, etc., were allowed to be the subjects of questioning. But limits were drawn; Mr. Wetherell, cross-examining: "Did you [being married] ever make proposals of marriage to any person within these three or four years?" L. C. J. ELLENBOROUGH: "How can that question be asked? I will put it to your own feelings, your good sense." Mr. Wetherell: "I will not carry it further." Another witness admitted one Dickens to have been his companion. Mr. Wetherell, cross-examining: "Do you not know that it is the same Dickens that was discharged at the Old Bailey as the associate of a man of the name of Vaughan in hatching up those conspiracies?" A. "I do not know." L. C. J. ELLENBOROUGH: "How can he know this?" Mr. Wetherell: "My object is, to show that this man's associates are all felons or the most base of mankind." L. C. J. ELLENBOROUGH: "This is really very irregular. . . . It is really corrupting all justice when such prejudices are introduced. The Court are of opinion that the question should not be put."

The modern practice has maintained this practically unlimited license of cross-examination, even after the middle of the 1800s, when the privilege Hardwicke: "The other party is at liberty to cross-examine him either to the matter of fact concerning which he has been examined, or any other matter whatsoever that shall tend to impeach his credit or weaken his testimony; provided the questions that are asked him are such as the law allows"); 1780, Maskall's Trial, 21 How. St. Tr. 667 (cross-examination to being on bad terms with his wife was stopped by the Court); 1794, Rowan's Trial, 22 How. St. Tr. 1115 (on cross-examination, that the witness had attested a bond alleged to have been forged, that he had taken a note from an alleged insane person, etc., allowed); 1798, O'Coigly's Trial, 26 How. St. Tr. 1351, semble (that the witness was a common informer, allowed); 1795–1799, McNally, Evidence, 258 (citing several cases of cross-examination to arrests and accusations); 1820, R. v. Hunt, 1 State Tr. N. S. 171, 220, 234 (whether he had been discharged from his regiment, allowed; that he had been dismissed from a situation for taking his employer's money, allowed). The cases in par. 3, infra, also illustrate this free use of such questions; but these rulings must be only cautiously used as precedents; the main question in most of them was that of privilege against disgracing answers; moreover, most rulings are upon questions to the prosecutrix on a rape charge, and pains were then seldom taken to distinguish mere misconduct as affecting credibility from former intercourse as affecting the likelihood of present consent (ante, § 200); the latter inference was probably chiefly in the minds of the judges, though the true discrimination seems not to have been finally made until 1843, in R. v. Martin, 2 M. & Rob. 512, by Coleridge and Erskine, JJ. There can not be any doubt, however, that throughout all the period of these cases the free use of inquiries into misconduct on cross-examination was generally recognized.

against disgracing answers was no longer recognized, and even after the Rules of 1883, which in terms recognized the judge's power to forbid merely "vexatious" questions.[11]

(breach of marriage-promise; the plaintiff relied on a long series of letters; the defendant denied their genuineness and claimed that the plaintiff had written them herself; a chief witness to the handwriting for the plaintiff was a Reverend Mr. Arden, formerly chaplain to the defendant; his cross-examination, by Sir F. Thesiger, Attorney-General, was a masterly piece of work, and is one of the best illustrations of the accepted English method of discrediting a witness by the freest and fullest exposure of a discreditable past, significant as a whole if trivial in detail); 1848, R. v. Duffey, 7 State Tr. N. S. 795, 892 (question put as to having been charged with embezzlement); 1862, Henman v. Lester, 12 C. B. N. Law Times 346, quoted from Australian Law Times (opposes the unlicensed extreme); 1883, Rules of Court, Ord. 36, Rule 38 ("The judge may in all cases disallow any question put in the cross-examination of any party or other witness, which may appear to him to be vexatious and not relevant to any matter proper to be inquired into in the cause or matter"); 1891, Nov. and Dec., Russell v. Russell (divorce), Osborne v. Hargreaves (theft of jewels), London (here the cross-examination was so unlicensed as to lead to much public correspondence, by barristers and others, as to the law and its propriety; see Law Times, vol. 92, pp. 89, 104, 138; Law Journal, vol. 26, pp. 767, 768, 783, vol. 27, pp. 15, 56; Lord Bramwell, "Cross-examination", Nineteenth Century, Feb. 1892; letters in the London Times, Jan. 4–9, 1892, and before that date); 1920, R. v. Biggin, 1 K. B. 213 (murder; cross-examination of the accused to prior irrelevant criminal conduct, merely to test credibility, held improper, under St. 1898, 61–2 Vict., c. 38, § 1, quoted ante, § 488). Compare the cases cited ante, § 194 a, construing the Criminal Evidence Act of 1898, making the accused competent; the accused's character is specially treated in that provision.

In modern English practice this license seems to be carried so far as to verge even on permitting proof by contradiction (ante, § 979) of a witness who denies the discreditable facts asked about on cross-examination; i.e. the cross-examiner, having named persons who could testify to the misconduct, is permitted to bring them into court and confront them with the witness, though without putting them on the stand; see a remarkable example in 1911, in Steinie Morrison's Trial, pp. 56, 67, 77 (Notable British Trials Series, 1922).

J., that the question might be put, but the witness could decline to answer; by Ritchie, J., and Strong, J., that the trial Court had discretion to compel an answer; the three remaining judges not expressing an opinion); 1909, Brownell v. Brownell, 42 Can. Sup. 368 (divorce; plaintiff's counsel was examining the defendant as to a bigamous marriage which the defendant admitted; on being asked the name of the woman, the defendant refused to say, and the trial Court declined to compel the answer; by a majority the ruling was sustained; the opinions are excellent illustrations of the opposite points of view); Alberta: Rules of Court 1914, No. 199 (like Eng. Ord. 1914, c. 48, Rule 270 (like Eng. Ord. 36, supra).

the early 1700s, at a time when the limits of the privilege against Self-crimination (post, § 2250) had not become clearly fixed:

1696, L. C. J. Treby, in Cook's Trial, 13 How. St. Tr. 334: "That you can ask a juror or a witness every question that will not make him criminous, — that is too large. Men have been asked whether they have been convicted and pardoned for felony, or whether they have been whipped for petit larceny; but they have not been obliged to answer; for though their answer in the affirmative will not make them criminal or subject them to a punishment, yet they are matters of infamy; and if it be an infamous thing, that is enough to preserve a man from being bound to answer. A pardoned man is not guilty, his crime is purged; but merely for the reproach of it, it shall not be put upon him to answer a question whereon he will be forced to forswear or disgrace himself. . . . The like has been observed in other cases of odious and infamous matters which were not crimes indictable."

But, in some obscure way, the privilege fell into disuse;[12] and its exercise was not revived again till the beginning of the 1800s. During the first half of the century numerous conflicting rulings were made.[13]

[12] Mr. Peake, writing in 1801 (Evidence, 2d ed., p. 130 ff.), speaks of the non-recognition of such a privilege as having "so long continued without objection that no one at the bar thought of questioning the legality of it"; it was "the established and invariable practice for a considerable space of time"; and the questioning of his own day was merely a novelty of "some of the judges."

[13] Of the following rulings, those which exclude the evidence do not always make it clear whether they go upon the ground of privilege or upon some other rule: 1791, R. v. Edwards, 4 T. R. 440 (whether he had not stood in the pillory for perjury, allowed); 1797, Franco v. Bolton, 3 Ves. Jr. 368 (discovery against a woman suing on a bond; defence, that plaintiff lived in adultery with defendant; discovery refused, as involving "not only the reproach, but the consequence" of adultery); 1802, McNally, Evidence, 258 (privilege applies to answers involving "his own turpitude or infamy"); 1803, R. v. Lewis, 4 Esp. 225 ("Whether he had not been in the House of Correction?", privileged; L. C. J. Ellenborough: "It would be an injury to the administration of justice if persons who came to do their duty to the public might be subjected to improper investigation", i.e. "the object of which was to degrade or to render infamous"; referring to it as a settled rule); 1803, Macbride v. Macbride, 4 Esp. 242 ("Whether the witness lived in a state of concubinage with the plaintiff?", privileged; Lord Alvanley: "I will not say that a witness shall not be asked to what may tend to disparage him; . . . I think those questions only should not be asked which have a direct and immediate effect to disgrace or disparage the witness"); 1803, Millman v. Tucker, Peake Add. Cas. 222, L. C. J. Ellenborough (whether he had been imprisoned on conviction of forgery, privileged); 1809, R. v. Teal, 11 East 311, L. C. J. Ellenborough (a woman-witness; bastardy; criminal intimacy with several other persons, admitted, without objection on this ground); 1811, Yewin's Case, 2 Camp. 638, Lawrence, J. (whether he had been charged with robbing his master, privileged); 1812, R. v. Hodgson, R. & R. 211, all the Judges except four being present (rape; whether the prosecutrix had before had connection with any one or with a named person, privileged, because not bound "to criminate and disgrace herself"); 1814, Dodd v. Norris, 3 Camp. 519 (seduction; whether the daughter, testifying, had been criminally intimate with others, privileged; all the Judges approved); 1817, R. v. Clarke, 2 Stark. 241, 243, Holroyd, J. (rape; cross-examination of the prosecutrix as to committal to the House of Correction, allowed; also as to her past conduct with reference to chastity); 1823, R. v. Pitcher, 1 C. & P. 85, Hullock, B. (larceny by a woman; whether the prosecutor had behaved improperly with her at the time, privileged); 1823, R. v. Barnard, ibid., note, Hullock, B. (whether he had ever been charged with felony, etc., allowed); 1823, R. v. James, ibid., Bosanquet, Serj. (whether he had been turned out of office as constable for misconduct, privileged); 1823, Bate v. Hill, 1 C. & P. 100, Park, J. (seduction; whether the daughter, testifying, had kept improper company, allowed); 1829, R. v. Barker, 3 C. & P. 589 (rape; that the prosecutrix, testifying, had on one occasion acted the prostitute, excluded at first by Park, J., on authority of R. v. Hodgson, "though you may certainly give evidence of general lightness of character, and general evidence of her being a street-walker"; but on conferring with Parke, J., the question was allowed); 1827, Cundell v. Pratt, Moo. & M. 108 (Best, C. J.: "I do not forbid the question on the ground that it

So far, however, as the privilege was conceded at all, it had always two limitations: (1) It applied only to collateral facts, i.e. to facts not material to the issue in the case, — in short, only to facts affecting character, bias, corruption, and the like; (2) it applied only to facts directly involving disgrace, and not to facts merely tending to disgrace indirectly.

The Common Law Procedure Commission, in their report of 1853, treated the privilege as still a part of the law "by the better authorities", and recommended its preservation.[14] But the Act of 1854 provided nothing about the privilege, except to authorize questions about former convictions.[15] Since that time, however, the general understanding of the profession has been that it no longer exists.[16]

(4) Prior Conviction of Crime. This was of course used chiefly, up to the middle of the 1800s, to affect the witness with incompetency, and exclude him altogether. But if for any reason it was unavailable for that purpose it could still be used in discredit.[17] When in the 1800s the disqualification was abolished, the statute sanctioned the use of convictions for all kinds of crimes by way of impeachment.[18] The subsequent statute, however, which tends to degrade. I for one will never go that length; until I am told by the House of Lords that I am wrong, the rule I shall always act on is to protect witnesses from questions the answers to which may expose them to punishment. If they are protected beyond this, from questions that tend to degrade them, many an innocent man would suffer"); 1830, R. v. Jenkin, 1 Lew. Cr. C. 326, Parke, J. (whether his house was a gambling-house, privileged); 1834, R. v. Martin, 6 C. & P. 562, Williams, J. (evidence as in R. v. Hodgson, thought admissible); 1844, R. v. Parker, 1 Cox Cr. 76 (whether the witness had served a two-years' sentence in prison: Cresswell, J., recognized the right to put the question and the privilege to decline to answer it, because "of infamous nature", adding: "Some uniform rule of practice should be laid down by the Judges on this point, since there are so many contradictory dicta respecting it").

A., 260 Fed. 142 (illegal sale of liquor to military forces; cross-examination of defendant's wife as to her marriage, divorce, and children, held to be "carried too far"); 1920, Miller v. Continental Shipbuilding Co., 2d C. C. A. 265 Fed. 158 (action for money had and received; on cross-examination, the plaintiff was made to disclose that he came from Leipsic and Hamburg, being a native of Germany; the trial took place in November, 1918; held that no rule of evidence was violated; counsel on appeal had contended that in popular belief "Germans apparently had no regard for the truth"). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1827, U. S. v. Craig, 4 Wash. C. C. 732 (recognized); 1840, U. S. v. Vansickle, 2 McLean 325, 329, semble (same; a question showing "her character to be infamous", excluded); Rev. St. 1878, § 103, Code 1919, § 142 ("No witness is privileged to refuse to testify to any fact or to produce any paper, respecting which he shall be examined by either House of Congress or by any committee of either House, upon the ground that his testimony to such fact or his production of such paper may tend to disgrace him or otherwise render him infamous"); Code 1919, § 3114 (privilege declared for naval courts); U. S. St. 1901, c. 809, Mar. 2, 31 Stat. L. 950 (civilians before a court-martial; privilege recognized); St. 1916, Aug. 29, c. 418, § 3, 39 Stats., amending Rev. St. § 1342 (articles of War; Art. 24 gives a privilege for "questions which may tend to . . . degrade him"); St. 1920, June 4, 41 Stats. 787 (Articles of War; amends Art. 24 so as to read, "any question not material to the issue when such question might tend to degrade him"). 4. Conviction of Crime: 1893, Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Rambo, 8 C. C. A. 6, 59 Fed. 75 (conviction of crime — here, burglary — held admissible in civil as well as criminal cases; here applying the rule in spite of the silence of the Ohio statute as to civil cases); 1920, MacKnight v. U. S., 1st C. C. A., 263 Fed. 832, 840 (defendant's conviction of crime may be shown, even though it contradicts defendant's denial on cross-examination).

ALABAMA. 1. Extrinsic Testimony is excluded; 1846, Sorrele v. Craig, 9 Ala. 539; 1850, Nugent v. State, 18 Ala. 521, 526 (acts of unchastity); 1880, Moore v. State, 68 Ala. 362 (whether he had fled from a charge of burglary); 1896, Feibelman v. Assur. Co., 108 Ala. 180, 19 So. 540 (witness for a policy-holder; evidence of two or three fires on his premises in one year, excluded); 1896, Crawford v. State, 112 Ala. 1, 21 So. 214 (illicit relations); 1897, Lord v. Mobile, 113 Ala. 360, 21 So. 366 (immorality). 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1871, Boles v. State, 46 Ala. 206 ("whether she was of such ill-fame as to be excluded from society"; excluded, for though an ill-fame "such as impeaches her veracity" could be asked about, it did not appear what kind of ill-fame was here meant); 1901, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Bizzell, 131 Ala. 429, 30 So. 777 (cross-examination to habits of profanity and drinking, allowed); 1904, Ross v. State, 139 Ala. 144, 36 So. 718 (concealed weapon; cross-examination to other misconduct, allowed); 1909, Smith v. State, 161 Ala. 94, 49 So. 1029 (cross-examination to illegal sale of liquor, excluded); 1909, Lowman v. State, 161 Ala. 47, 50 So. 43 (cross-examination as to being "charged with running after other men's wives", not allowed). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1871, Boles v. State, supra (whether the witness was of ill-fame; privilege repudiated). 4. Conviction of Crime: Code 1907, § 4008, as amended in 1907 (quoted ante, § 488); 1853, Campbell v. State, 23 Ala. 44, 73 (conviction for libel, excluded, as not affecting veracity); 1892, Prior v. State, 99 Ala. 196, 13 So. 681 (petit larceny, admitted); 1901, Smith v. State, 129 Ala. 89, 29 So. 699 (under C. § 1795, an "infamous crime" retains its common-law definition; conviction for carrying a concealed weapon, excluded); 1901, Bodine v. State, 129 Ala. 106, 29 So. 926 (the judgment must be in a court having jurisdiction); 1902, Wells v. State, 131 Ala. 48, 31 So. 572 (theft, admitted), 1903, Castleberry v. State, 135 Ala. 24, 33 So. 431 (conviction for some crimes, but not of any crime, is admissible); 1903, Viberg v. State, 138 Ala. 100, 35 So. 53 (petit larceny, admitted; suspension of a judgment's execution pending an appeal does not prevent its use to impeach); 1904, Ross v. State, 139 Ala. 144, 36 So. 718 (indictment for assault to murder, excluded); 1904, Gordon v. State, 140 Ala. 29, 36 So. 1009 (conviction for throwing stones into a railroad train, excluded, under Code 1896, § 1795; the statute was not intended to include crimes not disqualifying at common law); 1904, Wilkerson v. State, 140 Ala. 165, 37 So. 265 (indictment for public drunkenness, excluded); 1906, Williams v. State, 144 Ala. 14, 40 So. 405 (only infamous crimes are admissible; hence, "Were you ever convicted of a crime?" is too general); 1906, Fuller v. State, 147 Ala. 35, 41 So. 774 (conviction for a statutory felony is admissible to impeach; distinguishing prior rulings as to misdemeanors, and admitting that they contain "expressions calculated to mislead"); 1907, Mitchell v. State, 148 Ala. 618, 42 So. 1014 (conviction for gaming, not admitted); 1915, Moore v. State, 67 Ala. App. 789, 67 So. 789 (conviction and sentence to penitentiary, admitted, under Code 1907, §§ 4008, 4009); 1915, Moton v. State, 13 Ala. 43, 69 So. 235 (cross-examination of defendant to conviction for forgery, allowed); 1919, United States Lumber & C. Co. v. Cole, 202 Ala. 688, 81 So. 664 (conviction of trespass, not admitted); 1921, Latikos v. State, 17 Ala. App. 655, 88 So. 47 (cross-examination to former conviction held proper, even though appeal was pending at the time and though subsequently the judgment was reversed); 1921, Lakey v. State, 206 Ala. 180, 89 So. 605 (murder; cross-examination to a conviction for distilling liquor, held inadmissible, as not involving "moral turpitude").

ALASKA: 1. Extrinsic Testimony: Comp. L. 1913, § 1501 (like Or. Laws § 1920, § 863). 2. Scope of Cross-examination. 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: Comp. L. 1913, § 1507 (like Or. Laws 1920, § 870). 4. Conviction of Crime. Comp. L. 1913, § 1507 (like Or. Laws 1920, § 863); § 1865 (like ib. § 731); 1906, Ball v. U. S., 147 Fed. 32, 38, C. C. A. (under C. C. P. 1900, § 669, the conviction may be of a misdemeanor, and may be of a court in another jurisdiction).

ARIZONA: 4. Conviction of Crime: Rev. St. 1913, P. C. § 1226 (quoted ante, § 488); 1921, Sage v. State, 22 Ariz. 151, 195 Pac. 534 (statutory rape; cross-examination to former acts of unchastity, etc., not allowed "as bearing upon the credibility of her testimony").

ARKANSAS: 1. Extrinsic Testimony: Dig. 1919, § 4145 (conviction of any crime, admissible; quoted ante, § 488); § 4187 (a witness may not be impeached "by evidence of particular wrongful acts, except that it may be shown by the examination of a witness or record of a judgment that he has been convicted of a felony"); 1879, Anderson v. State, 34 Ark. 257 (indictment for larceny, excluded); 1890, Hollingsworth v. State, 53 id. 387, 390, 393, 14 S. W. 41 (outside testimony to specific acts, inadmissible); 1904, Plunkett v. State, 72 Ark. 409, 82 S. W. 845 (rape under age; acts of intercourse of prosecutrix with other men, excluded); 1910, Adams v. State, 93 Ark. 260, 124 S. W. 766 (seduction; woman's intercourse with another man, admitted, but only on the principle of § 1007, post); 1910, Belford v. State, 96 Ark. 274, 131 S. W. 953 (bastardy; woman's intercourse with others, admitted, but only on the principle of § 133, ante); 1911, McAlister v. State, 99 Ark. 604, 139 S. W. 684; 1922, Bogue v. State, — Ark. —, 238 S. W. 64 (contradiction of accused's denial of immoral conduct, held improper). 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1853, Pleasant v. State, 13 Ark. 360, 377 (the trial Court's discretion predicated; here, a question as to compounding the prosecution, allowed); 1855, Pleasant v. State, 15 Ark. 624, 649 (compounding a felony; admissible, though covered by privilege; the trial Court apparently given some discretion); 1884, Carr v. State, 43 Ark. 99, 102 (whether he had been under indictment for the same murder, excluded); 1890, Hollingsworth v. State, supra (declining to lay down specific limits, but admitting answers disclosing gaming, fighting, and unlawful cohabitation, brought out by the ordinary questions as to residence and occupation; the preceding cases not cited); 1894, Holder v. State, 58 Ark. 478, 25 S. W. 279 (whether he had left other places because he had committed certain crimes, held improper; but the ruling is useless, because it confuses the privilege rule with the present one); 1895, Bates v. State, 60 Ark. 450, 30 S. W. 890 (question as to a prior indictment, excluded; "it raises no legal presumption of guilt"); 1899, Lee v. State, 66 Ark. 286, 50 S. W. 516 (whether a witness was not the mother of certain criminals, excluded); 1902, Stanley v. Ins. Co., 70 Ark. 107, 66 S. W. 432 (fire-insurance policy; cross-examination of the plaintiff to a former burning of an insured house, held improper, as not affecting credibility; so also questions as to being under indictment for the burning in issue); 1902, Bergstrand v. Townsend, 70 Ark. 600, 70 S. W. 307 (questions as to witness' occupation at a remote prior time, held properly excluded in the trial Court's discretion; 1905, Little Rock V. & I. Co. v. Robinson, 75 Ark. 548, 87 S. W. 1029 (questions as to immoral conduct, held not improperly excluded in the trial Court's discretion); 1906, Benton v. State, 78 Ark. 284, 94 S. W. 688 (certain questions as to past domestic life; some held proper, others not); 1911, McAlister v. State, 99 Ark. 604, 139 S. W. 684 (murder; cross-examination to the witness' former act of assassination, allowed). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1853, Pleasant v. State, supra (question as to attempt to stifle prosecution; refusal merely because of tendency to degrade, improper); 1855, Pleasant v. State, supra (recognizing it for questions to the prosecutrix in rape as to intercourse with third persons, but not as to intercourse with the defendant); 1883, Polk v. State, 40 Ark. 482, 487 (complainant in seduction; whether she had had intercourse with other men; privilege recognized); 1890, Hollingsworth v. State, supra (apparently ignoring any privilege). 4. Conviction of Crime: Dig. 1919, § 4187 (quoted supra); 1905, Smith v. State, 74 Ark. 397, 85 S. W. 1123 (conviction of petit larceny, admitted, against a defendant-witness); 1920, Jordan v. State, 141 Ark. 504, 217 S. W. 788 (murder; cross-examination of a defendant to conviction for desertion by court-martial, allowed); 1920, Kyles v. State, 143 Ark. 419, 220 S. W. 458 (illegal sale of liquor; question to defendant on cross-examination as to conviction for shooting craps with negroes, held allowable; but defendant is entitled, on request, to an instruction limiting the use of such facts to affect credibility only); 1922, Turner v. State, — Ark. —, 239 S. W. 373 (unlawful gaming; cross-examination of defendant to conviction for felony, allowed).

CALIFORNIA: 1. Extrinsic Testimony: 1867, People v. Jones, 31 Cal. 565, 571 (excluded, in the principle of non-contradiction on collateral matters); 1872, Code Civ. Pr. § 2051 (a witness is not impeachable "by evidence of particular wrongful acts, except that it may be shown by the examination of the witness, or the record of the judgment, that he has been convicted of a felony"); applied in the following cases: 1875, People v. Amanacus, 50 Cal. 233, 235; 1885, People v. Hamblin, 68 Cal. 101, 103, 8 Pac. 687; 1889, Sharon v. Sharon, 79 Cal. 637, 673, 22 Pac. 26, 131; 1890, Davis v. Powder Works, 84 Cal. 617, 627, 24 Pac. 387; Jones v. Duchow, 87 Cal. 109, 114, 23 Pac. 371, 25 Pac. 256; 1899, James' Estate, 124 Cal. 653, 57 Pac. 579, 1008; 1901, Steen v. Santa Clara V. M. & L. Co., 134 Cal. 355, 66 Pac. 321. 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1868, Clark v. Reese, 35 Cal. 89, 96 (personal liberties with the plaintiff, in a breach of promise suit, semble, allowable); 1872, People v. Snellie, cited 48 Cal. 338 (whether he had been arrested for vagrancy, allowed); 1872, Code Civ. Pr. § 2051 (quoted supra); 1873, Reed v. Clark, 47 Cal. 194, 201 (trial Court's discretion sanctioned; but here character of the witness as party was in issue); 1874, People v. Manning, 48 Cal. 335, 338 (whether he had ever been arrested for vagrancy; not decided); 1880, Hinkle v. R. Co., 55 Cal. 627, 628, 632 (excluding inquires as to particular acts, without distinguishing between cross-examination and outside testimony; here, whether the witness had taken a bribe in another matter); 1885, People v. Hamblin, 68 Cal. 101, 103, 8 Pac. 687 (whether he had been arrested; excluded, because an arrest alone does not show guilt; whether he had been doorkeeper at a gambling house, knowing it to be an unlawful business, excluded, on the particular-act doctrine); 1886, People v. Carolan, 71 Cal. 195, 12 Pac. 52 ("whether he had been arrested" and convicted; excluded, not noticing the arrest-question), 1888, Cockrill v. Hall, 76 Cal. 192, 196, 13 Pac. 18 (whether he had not been impeached at another trial, excluded); 1889, Sharon v. Sharon, 79 Cal. 633, 673, 22 Pac. 26, 131 (whether she had lunched, with other men than her husband, at a disreputable house; whether she had falsely asserted the sanity of her husband as testator; excluded, on the particular-act doctrine); 1890, Davis v. Powder Works, 84 Cal. 617, 627, 24 Pac. 387 (fraudulent official acts, excluded, on the same doctrine); People v. Tiley, 84 Cal. 651, 652, 24 Pac. 290 (whether a married man spent the night at a house of ill-fame, excluded); Jones v. Duchow, 87 Cal. 109, 114, 23 Pac. 371, 25 Pac. 256 (whether he had been arrested and had pleaded guilty, on a charge of beating a prostitute, excluded); 1893, People v. Wells, 100 Cal. 459, 462, 34 Pac. 1078 (questions as to forgery, marital improprieties, etc., excluded), 1895, People v. Un Dong, 106 Cal. 88, 39 Pac. 12 (whether he lived in a house of ill-fame, and whether he was connected with a gambling-house, excluded); 1895, People v. Chin Hane, 108 Cal. 597, 41 Pac. 697 (that she had been a prostitute, excluded); 1896, People v. Ross, 115 Cal. 233, 46 Pac. 1059 (of a woman-witness, as to prostitution, admitted); 1898, People v. Silva, 121 Cal. 668, 54 Pac. 146 (that he had been in prison charged with stealing, excluded); 1898, Pyle v. Piercy, 122 Cal. 383, 55 Pac. 141 (that she had lived with her husband before marriage, not allowed); 1899, James' Estate, 124 Cal. 653, 57 Pac. 579, 1008 (the writing of a "highly immoral" book, or unlawful intercourse, not admissible, even on cross-examination); 1899, People v. Crandall, 125 Cal. 129, 57 Pac. 785 (questions as to witness' prostitution, etc., not allowed; Temple, J., diss., and holding that the trial Court has discretion); 1900, Kasson's Est., 127 Cal. 496, 59 Pac. 950 ("whether the house you were keeping in M. was a house of prostitution?", excluded); 1900, People v. Clarke, 130 Cal. 642, 63 Pac. 138 (cross-examination to misconduct, excluded); 1901, People v. Owens, 132 Cal. 469, 64 Pac. 770 (same); 1901, People v. Harlan, 133 Cal. 16, 65 Pac. 9 (same); 1901, People v. Warren, 134 Cal. 202, 66 Pac. 212 (cross-examination to being indicted, excluded); 1903, People v. Derbert, 138 Cal. 467, 71 Pac. 564 (questions to a defendant as to various aliases, held improper); 1907, People v. Fong Chung, 5 Cal. App. 587, 91 Pac. 105; 1910, Gird's Estate, 157 Cal. 534, 108 Pac. 99 (cross-examination to a woman claimant's unchastity, not allowed); 1919, Broderick v. Broderick, 40 Cal. App. 550, 181 Pac. 402 (separate maintenance; cross-examination to an operation for abortion, admitted as being otherwise relevant). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1857, Ex parte Rowe, 7 Cal. 184 (privilege applies "when the answer is not to any matter pertinent to the issue and the answer would disgrace him"); 1868, Clark v. Reese, 35 Cal. 89, 96 (personal liberties with a woman; undecided); 1870, People v. Reinhart, 39 Cal. 449 (former conviction, excluded); C. C. P. 1872, § 2065 (privilege not to give "an answer which will have a direct tendency to degrade his character, unless it be to the very fact in issue, or to a fact from which the fact in issue would be presumed. But a witness must answer as to the fact of his previous conviction for felony"; this last clause was added to the section as adopted from the prior Practice Act, § 408, and apparently annulled People v. Reinhart, supra); § 2066 ("It is the right of the witness to be protected from irrelevant, improper, or insulting questions, and from harsh or insulting demeanor"); P. C. § 89 (privilege denied for witness on a charge of obtaining money to influence legislative vote); Pol. C. § 304 (same for witness before legislature or its committee). 4. Conviction of Crime: C. C. P. 1872, § 2051 (quoted supra); 1870, People v. Reinhart, supra (admitted); 1875, People v. Amanacus, 50 Cal. 233, 235 (admitted); 1886, People v. Carolan, 71 Cal. 195, 12 Pac. 52 (misdemeanor, excluded; unless, semble, involving "moral turpitude and infamy"); 1895, People v. Chin Hane, 108 Cal. 597, 607, 41 Pac. 697 (kind of felony may be stated); 1900, People v. Putnam, 129 Cal. 258, 61 Pac. 961 (same); 1901, People v. Ward, 134 Cal. 301, 66 Pac. 372 (verdict, lacking sentence, suffices); 1904, People v. White, 142 Cal. 292, 75 Pac. 828 (the conviction must be for a felony, not a misdemeanor); 1905, People v. Kelly, 146 Cal. 119, 79 Pac. 846 (conviction of five different felonies shown); 1906, People v. Gray, 148 Cal. 507, 83 Pac. 707 (arrest for drunkenness, excluded); 1906, People v. Soeder, 150 Cal. 12, 87 Pac. 1016 (felony; here against a defendant).

COLORADO: 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1910, Tollifson v. State, 49 Colo. 219, 112 Pac. 794 (cross-examination to arrest or information, generally improper, but in trial Court's discretion). 4. Conviction of Crime: Comp. St. 1921, § 6555 (quoted ante, § 488); 1918, Dennison v. People, 65 Colo. 15, 174 Pac. 595 (Rev. St. 1908, § 7266, applied to allow cross-examination to conviction for a felony, etc.).

COLUMBIA (District): 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1881, Guiteau's Trial, I, 743 (medical man allowed to be asked whether he was dismissed from a post in an asylum); 1892, U. S. v. Cross, 20 D. C. 373 (a question as to place of residence was disallowed, in discretion, because it was directed merely to obtain clues to further evidence). 4. Conviction of Crime: 1880, U. S. v. Neverson, 1 Mackie 152, 172 (larceny, admitted); Code 1919, § 1067 (quoted ante, § 488).

CONNECTICUT: 1. Extrinsic Testimony is excluded: 1856, State v. Randolph, 24 Conn. 363, 366; 1877, State v. Shields, 45 Conn. 256, 257, 260, 263 (specific instances of intoxication excluded, but former prostitution admitted, apparently only as against the prosecutrix in a rape case, according to § 62, ante); 1899, Spiro v. Nitkin, 72 Conn. 202, 44 Atl. 13 (that the witness swore falsely at another trial); 1918, Rich v. Johnston, 92 Conn. 599, 103 Atl. 1003 (services as gardener; competency of employees in issue; witness-employee allowed to be contradicted as to discharge for dishonesty, distinguishing proof of dishonest acts merely to impeach the witness' credit; Shailer v. Bullock infra, distinguished). 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1881, State v. Ward, 49 Conn. 433, 442 (whether he lived with a woman who kept a house of ill-fame, allowed); 1898, State v. Ferguson, 71 Conn. 227, 41 Atl. 769 (whether he had committed adultery; discretion of the trial Court to control); 1902, Dore v. Babcock, 74 Conn. 425, 50 Atl. 1016 (questions as to divorce for desertion, held improper, the subject not tending to "affect the veracity of a witness"); 1903, State v. Nussenholtz, 76 Conn. 92, 55 Atl. 589 (question to an accused as to his prior arrest, excluded); 1905, Shailer v. Bullock, 78 Conn. 65, 61 Atl. 65 (bastardy; questions to the defendant, a clergyman, as to prior charges of immorality, dismissal from employment, etc., in other communities, held to be allowable in the trial Court's discretion; yet "most of the foregoing questions . . . should have been properly excluded, because, if proved or admitted, they had no legitimate tendency to affect his character for truthfulness"); 1909, State v. Rivers, 82 Conn. 454, 74 Atl. 757 (particular acts of immorality and unchastity, either before or after the date of the alleged assault, admissible on cross-examination of the complainant, on a charge of rape under age); 1915, State v. Sleeper, 89 Conn. 417, 94 Atl. 363 (manslaughter by abortion; the accused, a doctor, had stated on direct examination, that he had "never been prosecuted or arrested"; on cross-examination it was held improper to ask him whether he was "prosecuted in the Medical Society" and expelled therefrom for abortion; erroneous; the opinion goes on the narrow ground that the Medical Society proceeding was not a prosecution, therefore his direct testimony was not self-contradicted; but in honor and honesty there was a contradiction, for the counsel had tried on the direct examination to give his client a clean status; secondly, the cross-examination was admissible, as affecting character, irrespective of the contradiction; thirdly, when a medical man tried for abortion testifies as a witness, the jury ought to be allowed to place him as a reputable regular practitioner or as an abortionist, rules or no rules of evidence; this decision shows just where the law is far away from life and good sense). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1827, Northrop v. Hatch, 6 Conn. 361, 365 (the privilege does not the less apply because the crime asked about has been pardoned); 1881, State v. Ward, 49 Conn. 433, 442, semble (whether he lived with a woman who kept a house of ill-fame, privilege recognized); Gen. St. 1918, § 49 (no privilege shall be recognized, in legislative investigations, for facts which "may tend to disgrace him or otherwise render him infamous"); § 6635 (election bribery; no person to be excused because "his evidence may tend to disgrace" him); § 6475 (similar, for illegal gaming). 4. Conviction of Crime: 1856, State v. Randolph, 24 Conn. 363, 365 (such crimes are provable as disqualified at common law); Gen. St. 1918, § 5705 (quoted ante, § 488); 1920, Drazen v. New Haven Taxicab Co., 95 Conn. 500, 111 Atl. 860 (conviction for statutory burglary, admissible; the whole subject of kinds of crime elaborately examined; a sad waste of time, in these days of appreciation of the psychological arbitrariness of the common-law doctrine).

DELAWARE: 1. Extrinsic Testimony: 1851, Robinson v. Burton, 5 Harringt. 335, 339 ("particular acts", excluded). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: Const. 1897, Art. V, § 7 (electoral offenses; no privilege on the ground that testimony would "subject him to public infamy"). 4. Conviction of Crime: Rev. St. 1915, § 4215 (quoted ante, § 488); 1899, State v. Burton, 2 Marv. 446, 43 Atl. 254 (pointing a pistol; cross-examination of defendant as to conviction for a similar act excluded, as not relevant to credibility); 1905, State v. Powell, 5 Pen. Del. 24, 61 Atl. 966 (conviction for carrying a concealed weapon, excluded).

FLORIDA: 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1898, Roberson v. State, 40 Fla. 509, 24 So. 474 (that the witness at a trial for assault had claimed to be feeble-minded, etc., excluded); 1899, Wallace v. State, 41 Fla. 547, 26 So. 713 (question as to "criminal charges pending against you", left to trial Court's discretion; so also other questions relating to "past life and history", etc.: but matters which do not affect credit should not be brought in); 1906, Baker v. State, 51 Fla. 1, 40 So. 673 (murder; a witness for the State, not allowed to be cross-examined as to being the mother of bastards; conviction of crime and character for veracity are alone available); 1908, Clinton v. Goodrich, 56 Fla. 57, 47 So. 389 (cross-examination to illegal fishing, held improper); 1920, Brown v. State, 80 Fla. 741, 86 So. 574 (burglary; question to defendant whether he had ever been convicted of a criminal offense, allowed). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1899, Wallace v. State, 41 Fla. 547, 26 So. 713 (privilege not recognized). 4. Conviction of Crime: Rev. G. S. 1919, § 2706 (conviction of "any crime except perjury" is not to disqualify; but "such conviction may be given to affect the credibility of the said witness"); 1920, Robinson v. State, 80 Fla. 736, 87 So. 61 (murder; conviction for disorderly conduct, allowed).

GEORGIA: 1. Extrinsic Testimony is excluded: 1860, Weathers v. Barkdale, 30 Ga. 888 (that the witness had borne a bastard child); 1878, Johnson v. State, 61 Ga. 305, 307 (adultery); 1886, Pulliam v. Cantrell, 77 id. 563, 565, 3 S. E. 280; 1887, Ratteree v. Chapman, 79 Ga. 577, 4 S. E. 684 (adultery); 1896, Killian v. R. Co., 97 Ga. 727, 25 S. E. 384 (that he had been charged with selling liquor illegally); 1904, Black v. State, 119 Ga. 746, 47 S. E. 370 (rape; extrinsic testimony to the woman-witness' acts of lewdness with third persons, excluded). 2. Scope of Cross-examination: Rev. C. 1910, § 5882, P. C. 1910, § 1053 ("particular transactions . . . cannot be inquired of on either side", except in testing the knowledge of an impeaching witness, on the principle of § 989, post); 1906, Allred v. State, 126 Ga. 537, 55 S. E. 178 (to a defendant, on cross-examination, whether he "had ever bought any spurious money", not allowed, under Code 1895, § 1027). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: Rev. C. 1910, § 4554, § 5877 (privilege covers matters "which shall tend to bring infamy or disgrace or public contempt upon himself or any member of his family"). 4. Conviction of Crime: 1884, Georgia R. Co. v. Homer, 73 Ga. 251 (larceny, admitted, as a 'crimen falsi'); 1888, Doggett v. Simms, 79 Ga. 257, 4 S. E. 909 (same); 1893, Ford v. State, 92 Ga. 459, 17 S. E. 667 (an unspecified "crime involving moral turpitude", held admissible); 1894, Coleman v. State, 94 Ga. 85, 21 S. E. 124 (larceny, admitted); 1896, Killian v. R. Co., 97 Ga. 727, 25 S. E. 384, semble (illegally selling liquor, admitted); 1897, Shaw v. State, 102 Ga. 660, 29 S. E. 477 (conviction, for the same crime, of a joint indictee, testifying for the defendant, received); 1903, Andrews v. State, 118 Ga. 1, 43 S. E. 852 (misdemeanor not involving moral turpitude, excluded).

HAWAII: 1. Extrinsic Testimony: 1901, Lyman v. Hilo Tribune P. Co., 13 Haw. 453, 457 (extrinsic testimony to specific acts, excluded). 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1894, Republic v. Tokuji, 9 Haw. 548, 552 (whether he lived under another name elsewhere, held properly excluded); 1897, Colburn v. Spitz, 11 Haw. 104 (cross-examination to "particular acts of misconduct", — here, fraudulent bankruptcy —, not allowed); 1898, Republic v. Luning, 11 Haw. 390 (questions as to habitual thievery and other crimes, held proper; "he may be questioned as to specific acts"; "the Court has large discretion"; preceding case not cited); 1900, Merricourt v. Norwalk F. L. Co., 13 Haw. 218, 220 (trial Court has large discretion); 1919, Terr. v. Goo Wan Hoy, 24 Haw. 721, 726, 741 (subject considered; defendant may be examined like any other witness). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: Rev. L. 1915, § 2616 (no claim of privilege against a question which is "relevant and material to the matter in issue" on the ground that the answer may "disgrace or criminate himself" shall be allowed unless the Court is of opinion that the answer "will tend to subject such witness to punishment for treason, felony, or misdemeanor"). 4. Conviction of Crime: Rev. L. 1915, § 2617 (conviction of "any indictable or other offence" may be proved); 1894, Govt. v. Aloiau, 9 Haw. 399 ("any offence" allowable).

IDAHO: 1. Extrinsic Testimony: Comp. St. 1919, § 8038 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2051); 1904, State v. Harness, 10 Ida. 18, 76 Pac. 788 (statute not applicable to misconduct affecting the witness' animus against the defendant). 2. Scope of Cross-examination: Comp. St. 1919, § 8038 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2051); 1899, State v. Anthony, 6 Ida. 383, 55 Pac. 884 (statute applied); 1903, State v. Irwin, 9 Ida. 35, 71, Pac. 608 (questions to an accused, held improper on the facts); 1916, State v. Fong Loon, 29 Ida. 248, 158 Pac. 233 (whether witness lived in a gambling house, allowed). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: Comp. St. 1919, § 8044 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2065); § 103 (privilege denied for testimony before Legislature or committee thereof). 4. Conviction of Crime: Comp. St. 1919, § 8038 ("felony", admissible); § 1010 (like S. D. Rev. C. § 9972).

ILLINOIS: 1. Extrinsic Testimony is excluded: 1858, Sheahan v. Collins, 20 Ill. 329; 1876, Dimick v. Downs, 82 Ill. 573 (adultery, illegal sale of liquor); 1898, Rippetoe v. People, 172 Ill. 173, 50 N. E. 166. 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1896, Goon Bow v. People, 160 Ill. 438, 43 N. E. 593, semble (question whether the witness kept an opium joint, allowed); 1904, Chicago City R. Co. v. Uhter, 212 Ill. 174, 72 N. E. 195 (personal injuries; cross-examination as to domestic misconduct, excluded, as not concerning "the truth or falsity of his testimony"); 1910, People v. Bissett, 246 Ill. 516, 92 N. E. 949 (murder; defendant cross-examined as to having been a gambler and used aliases; said to be "prejudicial", but not passed upon); 1912, People v. Brown, 254 Ill. 260, 98 N. E. 535 (perjury; cross-examination of a woman-witness to chastity, held properly excluded, as abusive and unnecessary); 1913, People v. Newman, 261 Ill. 11, 103 N. E. 589 (former arrest, excluded); 1914, People v. Warfield, 261 Ill. 293, 103 N. E. 979 (confidence game by de luxe book-contracts; cross-examination of defendant to an alias, and of defendant's witnesses, book-dealers, to dishonest trade methods, not allowed; unsound; no authority cited); 1914, People v. Duncan, 261 Ill. 339, 103 N. E. 1043 (rape under age; cross-examination of defendant's wife to lewd conduct, excluded; unsound); 1920, People v. Miller, 292 Ill. 318, 127 N. E. 58 (receiving a stolen automobile; "This is n't the first stolen property you've bought?", held improper). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: Rev. St. 1874, c. 38, § 6 (privilege not to obtain for witness testifying before Legislature or a committee thereof); 1899, Halloway v. People, 181 Ill. 544, 54 N. E. 1030, semble (privilege not recognized). 4. Conviction of Crime: Rev. St. 1874, c. 38, § 426, c. 51, § 1 (quoted ante, § 488); 1882, Bartholomew v. People, 104 Ill. 601, 607 ("infamous offence" is provable; the same rule as at common law for disqualification); 1902, Matzenbaugh v. People, 194 Ill. 108, 62 N. E. 546 (the crimes are to be defined by the common-law rule as to incompetency; here a conviction for fraud in scheduling property for taxation was held not to be "of the class of offences denominated 'crimen falsi' "; of this ruling it may be said, first, that the Courts should be the last ones to minimize the civic evil of such a form of lying, and, secondly, that in the present case, where the assessor sought to charge the appellant with taxes, it was absurd to hold that he could not be discredited by a conviction for falsifying in just such a transaction); 1904, McKevitt v. People, 208 Ill. 460, 70 N. E. 693 (Rev. St. 1874, c. 38, § 279, as amended in 1899 to exempt from the civil consequences of infamy a person sentenced to the State Reformatory, does not affect the admissibility of a conviction under ib. § 426, where the sentence on such conviction is to the Reformatory); 1908, Clifford v. Pioneer Fireproofing Co., 232 Ill. 150, 83 N. E. 448 (conviction for an infamous crime, admissible; here, rape); 1913, People v. Green, 292 Ill. 318, 127 N. E. 50 ("You knew G. at Pontiac, did n't you?", Pontiac being the location of a penal institution, held improper); 1915, People v. Hamilton, 269 Ill. 390, 109 N. E. 329 (rape; cross-examination of accused as to being "locked up in Aurora for being drunk on the Fourth", excluded; no authority cited); 1914, People v. Fryer, 266 Ill. 216, 107 N. E. 134 (larceny; cross-examination of defendant, "Did you ever buy any stolen property?" "When you lived in M. were you ever arrested?" "Were you ever convicted of any misdemeanor or crime while you lived in M.?", held "all incompetent"); 1916, People v. Simmons, 274 Ill. 528, 113 N. E. 887 (cross-examination to a conviction for carrying a revolver, not allowed; 1917, People v. Schultz-Knighten, 277 Ill. 238, 115 N. E. 140 (a witness having stated on direct examination that she had never been convicted of crime, a question on cross-examination whether the Supreme Court had not reversed such a conviction was held improper; an extraordinary ruling, sanctioning the witness' evasion); 1919, People v. Reed, 287 Ill. 606, 122 N. E. 806 (pandering; cross-examination of defendant to conviction of larceny of an automobile, held improper, wholly ignoring the present principle); 1920, People v. Green, 292 Ill. 318, 127 N. E. 50 (conviction of assault with intent to commit robbery held not admissible to impeach, following Matzenbaugh v. People; "whether the crime is infamous, depends, not upon the common law, nor the Court's view of its moral aspects, but upon the statute"; true, but the anomaly remains of not being able to exhibit the witness' bad record of moral delinquency; and the error dates back to Bartholomew v. People, which should never have adopted a definition so arbitrary and inflexible; the passages quoted ante, § 520, show that the rule as now administered in Illinois is entirely out of harmony with the original principle or with any living principle; consult Professor Henry Schofield's trenchant article, "Petty Larceny; Infamous Crime and Infamous Punishments", Illinois Law Review, III, 108); 1920, People v. Andrae, 295 Ill. 445, 129 N. E. 178 (conviction followed by release on probation without sentence may nevertheless be used to impeach).

INDIANA: 1. Extrinsic Testimony: The principle has been always recognized, except in an early case; 1853, Hill v. State, 4 Ind. 112 (bastardy, other intercourse before gestation-time, allowed); but the distinction between conduct impeaching character and conduct showing consent in rape and bastardy cases (ante, §§ 200, 399), and conduct showing other parentage in bastardy cases (ante, § 133), has not always been observed: 1841, Walker v. State, 6 Blackf. 4 (falsehood); 1859, Townsend v. State, 13 Blackf. 358, semble (bastardy; other intercourse before gestation-time, excluded); 1859, Shattuck v. Myers, 13 Blackf. 50, semble (unchaste conduct of the daughter in a seduction case); Bersch v. State, 13 Blackf. 436 (passing a counterfeit bill); 1860, Long v. Morrison, 14 Ind. 599 ("a single act of immorality"); 1861, Wilson v. State, 16 Ind. 393 (rape; the prosecutrix' credibility as a witness not allowed to be impeached by "a particular act of immorality"); 1879, Cunningham v. State, 65 Ind. 379, 381 (unchaste conduct); Meyncke v. State, 68 Ind. 403, semble (unchaste conduct); 1884, South Bend v. Hardy, 98 Ind. 580 (in general); 1888, Bedgood v. State, 115 Ind. 275, 281, 17 N. E. 621 (rape; intercourse with a third person admitted; reasoning obscure); 1895, Griffith v. State, 140 Ind. 163, 39 N. E. 440 (excluded); 1904, Dunn v. State, 162 Ind. 174, 70 N. E. 521 (murder; testimony to an act of adultery with another person, eight years before, contradicting the defendant's denial of it on his cross-examination, held improper); 1905, Walker v. State, 165 Ind. 94, 74 N. E. 614 (excluded). 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1841, Walker v. State, 6 Blackf. 3, semble (bastardy; intercourse of the complainant with others, excluded as "irrelevant"); 1853, Hill v. State, 4 Ind. 112 (bastardy; other intercourse before gestation-time allowed); 1859, Townsend v. State, 13 Ind. 358 (like Walker's case); 1859, Bersch v.

State, 13 Ind. 436 (passing a counterfeit bill, excluded, as a "particular act"); 1877, Farley v. State, 57 Ind. 331, 333 (excluding even on cross-examination a question as to "an isolated act"); 1884, South Bend v. Hardy, 98 Ind. 579, 584 (the trial Court has discretion to permit, "if by affecting the credibility of the witness, it will subserve justice"; matters of sexual incontinence, semble, do not so affect credibility; here a former fraud of the plaintiff was held not improperly excluded); 1884, Bessette v. State, 101 Ind. 85, 88 ("It is proper, within the bounds of propriety, to be controlled by the trial Court, that the character and antecedents of a witness may be subjected to a test on cross-examination"; here, a rape on a minor; the prosecutrix' indecent conduct with her stepfather allowed to be inquired into); 1886, Spencer v. Robbins, 106 Ind. 580, 586, 5 N. E. 726 (action for partition of estate; cross-examination to adulterous pregnancy, held properly excluded; "it may be proper, however, under extraordinary circumstances", to ask as to character and antecedents, but "this is a matter within the sound discretion of the nisi prius Court"); 1888, Bedgood v. State, 115 Ind. 279, 17 N. E. 621 (rape; intercourse with a third person admitted; reasoning obscure); 1894, Parker v. State, 136 Ind. 284, 35 N. E. 1105 (of a defendant-witness, whether he had not been arrested and prosecuted, held proper in discretion); 1895, Blough v. Parry, 144 Ind. 463, 481, 40 N. E. 70, 43 id. 560 (cross-examination to particular misconduct, allowable in trial Court's discretion); 1897, Shears v. State, 147 Ind. 51, 46 N. E. 331 (like Blough v. Parry; here, questions as to former larceny); 1898, Miller v. Dill, 149 Ind. 326, 49 N. E. 272, semble (cross-examination of a female witness as to acts of dishonesty or immorality, not improperly allowed in trial Court's discretion); 1898, Vanleave v. State, 150 Ind. 273, 49 N. E. 1060 (whether a defendant-witness had been convicted of larceny and was under indictment for robbery, allowed); 1898, Ellis v. State, 152 Ind. 326, 52 N. E. 82 (questions "as to certain prosecutions against him for criminal offences," allowed); 1900, Whitney v. State, 154 Ind. 573, 57 N. E. 398 (whether the witness, with a "gang", committed frequent assaults, excluded); 1910, Heath v. State, 173 Ind. 296, 90 N. E. 310 (rape under age; complainant witness' character, not evidenced by acts of intercourse with others); 1920, Bush v. State, 189 Ind. 467, 128 N. E. 443 (assault); 1921, Denny v. State, — Ind. —, 129 N. E. 308 (larceny of automobile tires; cross-examination of accused as to indictment for violation of liquor law, held allowable in trial Court's discretion). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1841, Walker v. State, 6 Blackf. 1 (obscure); 1853, Hill v. State, 4 Ind. 112 (bastardy; other intercourse by the complainant, privilege repudiated); 1859, Townsend v. State, 13 Ind. 358 (same evidence; obscure ruling); 1859, Shattuck v. Myers, 13 Ind. 50 (unchaste conduct by the daughter in a seduction case; privilege recognized); 1880, Smith v. Yaryan, 69 Ind. 447 (same; but allowing the question for determining paternity, and thus apparently abandoning the privilege ground); 1884, South Bend v. Hardy, 98 Ind. 583 (privilege repudiated for all matters relevant to the issue or affecting credibility); 1888, Bedgood v. State, 115 Ind. 275, 280, 17 N. E. 621, semble (rape; question as to intercourse with others; privilege not recognized). 4. Conviction of Crime: Burns' Ann. St. 1914, § 530 (any fact formerly rendering incompetent may be shown to affect credibility); 1909, Dotterer v. State, 172 Ind. 357, 88 N. E. 689 (conviction for assault and battery, admitted; opinion not clear; applying Rev. St. 1897, § 519, being Burns' Annot. St. 1908, § 530); 1915, Rock v. State, 185 Ind. 51, 110 N. E. 212 (keeping a blind tiger; on cross-examination, questions as to having been arrested for illegal sale of liquor and pleading guilty were excluded; this is an astonishing decision, ignoring the distinction as to a conviction; Dotterer v. State is not cited; the cases cited are not cases of a judgment of conviction); 1919, Pierson v. State, 188 Ind. 239, 123 N. E. 118 (conspiracy to commit arson; cross-examination of defendant as to conviction for fornication, held admissible but only under instructions to restrict it to credibility).

INDIAN TERRITORY: 1. Extrinsic Testimony: 1896, Oxier v. U. S., 1 Ind. T. 93, 38 S. W. 331 (excluded, under the Arkansas statute quoted supra). 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1896, Oxier v. U. S., 1 Ind. T. 93, 38 S. W. 331 (pointing out that the Arkansas statute supra is to be treated as excluding extrinsic testimony only; allowing such a cross-examination as will disclose "something of their character, antecedents, and credibility"; subject to the trial Court's power to prevent "an unreasonable or abusive cross-examination"; here admitting a question as to an arrest for larceny); 1897, Oats v. U. S., 1 Ind. T. 52, 38 S. W. 673 (same); 1902, Williams v. U. S., 4 Ind. T. 269, 69 S. W. 871 (Oxier v. U. S., approved); 1906, McCoy v. U. S., 6 Ind. Terr. 415, 98 S. W. 144 (to the defendant, "How many larceny cases have there been here against you?" allowed; Oxier v. U. S. followed, but the various rules are not carefully discriminated). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1896, Oxier v. U. S., 1 Ind. T. 93, 38 S. W. 331 (recognized; here for a question as to former arrest).

IOWA: 1. Extrinsic Testimony is excluded: 1848, Carter v. Cavenaugh, 1 Greene, 171, 175 (in general); 1859, State v. Sater, 8 Ia. 420, 424 (reputation and arrest as a horse-thief). 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1879, Madden v. Koester, 52 Ia. 693 (fraudulent transactions, semble, in this case excluded because used as a mere pretence for attacking character of the defendant, not the witness); 1888, State v. Pugsley, 75 Ia. 743, 38 N. W. 498 (question as to being in jail at the time; held proper, since "it is competent to ask a witness what is his occupation and where he resides"; this is a quibble; here the witness was only under indictment and not yet tried); 1895, State v. Osborne, 96 Ia. 281, 65 N. W. 159 (the witness' occupation, admitted); 1897, State v. Watson, 102 Ia. 651, 72 N. W. 283 (to a defendant, as to using an assumed name, etc., allowed in discretion); 1898, State v. Chingren, 105 Ia 169, 74 N. W. 946 (questions as to occupation allowed, in trial Court's discretion); 1899, State v. Abley, 109 Ia. 61, 80 N. W. 225 (question as to some unspecified crime, held improper); 1900, Myers' Estate, 111 Ia. 584, 82 N. W. 961 (whether the witness had not "stolen" his own buggy, held improper); 1902, State v. Hogan, 115 Ia. 455, 88 N. W. 1074 (whether he had ever been in a reform school, not allowed); 1903, Germinder v. Machinery M. I. Ass'n, 120 Ia. 614, 94 N. W. 1108 (whether he had been accused of burning a barn, excluded); 1903, Livingston and Schaller v. Heck, 122 Ia. 74, 94 N. W. 1098 (mortgage claim; whether the witness had not been arrested on the charge of selling the mortgaged property in controversy "might properly have been received as affecting his credibility"); 1917, State v. Brooks, 181 Ia. 874, 165 N. W. 194 (statutory rape; cross-examination of complainant to unchaste conduct, allowed); 1920, Jones v. Spencer, 188 Ia. 94, 175 N. W. 855. 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1874, Brown v. Kingsley, 38 Ia. 220, 221 (seduction; illicit intercourse with other men, held privileged under the statute); 1888, Mahanke v. Cleland, 76 Ia. 405, 41 N. W. 53 (question as to fraud in a deed, held not to appear privileged on the facts; "no rule applicable to all cases is possible"); Code 1897, §§ 4612, 4613, Comp. Code §§ 7319, 7320 (answer tending "to expose him to public ignominy", privileged, except as to conviction for felony and specified offences, and in prosecutions for gaming and liquor offences); 4. Conviction of Crime: Code 1897, § 4602, Comp. Code § 7309 (quoted ante, § 488; facts formerly disqualifying may now be used to discredit); § 4613, Comp. C. § 7320 (witness may be asked as to "conviction of a felony" and specified offences as above); 1887, Hanners v. McClelland, 74 Ia. 318, 322, 37 N. W. 389 (not of any crime); 1890, State v. O'Brien, 81 Ia. 96, 46 N. W. 752 (felony in general); 1901, Palmer v. R. Co., 113 Ia. 442, 85 N. W. 756 (under Code 1897 § 4602, a conviction for selling liquor without paying the Federal tax was excluded, as not receivable at common law; in general, a Federal conviction is not admissible under § 4602, whether under § 4613, not decided); 1903, State v. Carter, 121 Ia. 135, 96 N. W. 710 (cheating by false pretences, a felony; admitted); 1913, Thorman's Estate, 162 Ia. 237, 144 N. W. 7 (cross-examination to disbarment, allowed); 1914, State v. Foxton, 166 Ia. 181, 147 N. W. 347 (false pretences; conviction of a similar offence in another State, admitted); 1919, State v. Gilliland, 187 Ia. 794, 174 N. W. 496 (weight to be given to conviction for felony).

KANSAS: 1. Extrinsic Testimony is excluded: 1888, State v. Johnson, 40 Kan. 266, 269, 19 Pac. 749. 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1886, State v. Pfefferle, 36 Kan. 90, 92, 12 Pac. 406 (the limits held rest largely in the trial Court's discretion; here admitting questions as to former convictions for illegal liquor-selling); 1890, State v. Romain, 44 Kan. 719, 25 Pac. 225 (questions to an accused as to other crimes, held not in excess of discretion, or at any rate not prejudicial error); 1894, State v. Reed, 53 Kan. 767, 37 Pac. 174 (questions as to previous adultery, etc., held improperly allowed on the facts); 1894, State v. Wells, 54 Kan. 161, 37 Pac. 1005 (questions to an accused as to prior acts of violence, held properly allowed in discretion); 1898, State v. Greenburg, 59 Kan. 404, 53 Pac. 61 (questions as to previous civil arrests, allowed; the trial Court to prevent unreasonable use of such cross-examination to specific facts; Doster, C. J., diss., because a mere arrest does not involve the fact of guilt); 1902, State v. Abbott, 65 Kan. 139, 69 Pac. 160 (rape; questions as to the prior conduct of the chief witness of the prosecution, held proper); 1907, State v. Pugh, 75 Kan. 702, 90 Pac. 242 (trial Court's discretion); 1913, State v. Sexton, 91 Kan. 171, 136 Pac. 901 (illegal sale of liquor; cross-examination of the State's witness to sales by him, with a view to contradicting him if he denied, held improper; unsound; cross-examination is not objectionable because of the "outside issues brought in"; it brings in no issues; but if on cross-examination he had denied, then of course other witnesses cannot be called to contradict him; if, on the other hand, he had on cross-examination admitted the sales, the fact is thus quickly in the case, and the only question can be whether a man who himself sells liquor illegally is any the less credible thereby when he testifies against another alleged liquor-seller; the records of experience for centuries are that such persons are somewhat open to suspicion; is there not a fable of Æsop on the point?); 1915, State v. Killion, 95 Kan. 241, 148 Pac. 643 (murder; questions to the accused as to former fights, allowed, as affecting credibility only, in the trial Court's discretion); 1921, Zeigler v. Oil C. S. M. Co., 108 Kan. 589, 196 Pac. 603 (personal injury; cross-examination of a medical witness as to his practice of advertising and therefore of being ineligible to the local medical society, held improper, and the local code of medical ethics excluded; unsound); 1921, State v. Bowers, Davis' Appeal, 108 Kan. 161, 194 Pac. 650 (questions as to former arrest or indictment; trial Court's discretion controls; State v. Pfefferle followed; defendant as witness may be examined as to former convictions unrelated to present charge). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1886, State v. Pfefferle, supra (not recognized). 4. Conviction of Crime: Gen. St. 1915, § 7219 (quoted ante, § 488); § 8134 (criminal cases; "conviction of a crime may be shown to affect credibility"); 1886, State v. Pfefferle (cited supra); 1891, State v. Frobasco, 46 Kan. 310, 26 Pac. 749 (larceny, admitted); 1896, State v. Park, 57 Kan. 431, 46 Pac. 713 (larceny, held admissible); 1904, State v. Coover, 69 Kan. 382, 76 Pac. 845 (questions to defendant as to prior arrest and sentence to the reform school, allowed); 1915, State v. Marshall, 95 Kan. 628, 148 Pac. 675 (a person convicted of perjury but paroled is not disqualified by the mere conviction; here St. 1915, removing disqualification by conviction of crime was also held applicable).

KENTUCKY: 1. Extrinsic Testimony is excluded: C. C. P. 1895, § 597 (impeachment "by evidence of particular wrongful acts", except conviction of felony, is to be excluded); 1821, Hume v. Scott, 3 A. K. Marsh. 261 (in general); 1857, Thurman v. Virgin, 18 B. Monr. 792 (hog-stealer; prostitute); 1859, Henderson v. Haynes, 2 Metc. 348, semble (in general); 1868, Taylor v. Com., 3 Bush 511 (membership in a clique "banded to swear out negroes"); 1869, Young v. Com., 6 Bush 315 (hog-stealer); 1880, Campbell v. Bannister, 79 Ky. 205, 208; 1901, Welch v. Com., — Ky. —, 60 S. W. 185, 948, 1118 (sheriff's testimony to a pending warrant for arrest of witness, excluded); 1901, Roberts v. Johnson, — Ky. —, 64 S. W. 526; 1908, Leach v. Com., 129 Ky. 497, 112 S. W. 595 (murder; immoral intimacy between deceased and chief witness for the State, admitted, as evidencing bias; distinguishing the inadmissible use to evidence moral character). 2, 3, 4. Scope of Cross-examination, Privilege against Disgracing Answers, and Conviction of Crime; these three topics have in the last few decades become hopelessly confused and uncertain in the decisions of this State; nothing but a new expunging statute, recurring to first principles, can avail to clarify the law; one of the sources of confusion has been the injudicious practice of excluding certain formal opinions from official publication: C. C. P. 1895, § 597 (cited supra; compare the interpretation of the similar California statute supra); 1831, Bullock v. McGee, 5 J. J. Marsh. 424 (privilege applied to a fact "reflecting on his character, unless it be pertinent to the issue independently of its tendency to affect character"; here a question as to playing cards with a negro before or during the affray was held to embrace facts partly material and partly immaterial and therefore objectionable); 1870, [illegible] v. [illegible], [illegible] Bush [illegible] (whether the witness had had intercourse with the [illegible] daughter, held privileged); 1890, Mitchell v. Com., — Ky. —, 14 S. W. 489 (whether he had been in a State prison, held not privileged; questions which "only tend to disgrace a witness, he may be compelled to answer"; no authority cited); 1892, Burdette v. Com., 93 Ky. 77, 18 S. W. 1011 (questions whether he had been convicted of stealing or sent to the workhouse for breaking and stealing; admitted, such test to be applied "in a proper and pertinent manner and under control of the Court"; privilege as to disgracing answers, recognized); 1892, Roberts v. Com., — Ky. —, 20 S. W. 267 (allowing questions as to indictments for robbery, for conspiracy, etc.; the opinion erroneously assuming this question to have been settled in Burdette v. Com.); 1895, Saylor v. Com., 97 Ky. 190, 30 S. W. 390 (question to an accused as to other crimes; present question not raised); 1895, Com. v. Wilson, — Ky. —, 32 S. W. 166 (detaining a woman for carnal knowledge; questions to the prosecutrix as to her adultery excluded, because "particular instances of moral turpitude" are inadmissible, reputation alone being admissible; no citations); 1896, Warren v. Com., 99 Ky. 370, 35 S. W. 1028 (whether the defendant-witness had recently been at work, whether a witness had not made it a business to bleed election-candidates, how often he had been in jail, etc.; admitted as within the trial Court's discretion; though "we are not to be understood as holding that counsel are to be allowed unrestricted liberty in cross-examination of this character, or that a witness is to be compelled to submit to an exploration of the most remote passages of his past life, by means of fishing questions in regard to scandalous or discreditable acts"); 1897, Leslie v. Com., — Ky. —, 42 S. W. 1095 (whether he was not a gambler, frequented a house of ill-fame, etc., allowed; but not whether he had not been arrested for certain offences); 1898, McCampbell v. McCampbell, 103 Ky. 745, 46 S. W. 18 (privilege applies to collateral matters only); 1899, Baker v. Com., 106 Ky. 212, 50 S. W. 54 (inquiry as to indictments, etc., at a time long previous, held improper on the facts); 1899, Williams v. Com., — Ky. —, 50 S. W. 240 (that defendant had just come from the penitentiary, held inadmissible, until defendant himself testifies); 1900, Parker v. Com., — Ky. —, 51 S. W. 573 (questions as to indictments for acts of violence, excluded as involving "particular wrongful acts" under the statute); Pennington v. Com., — Ky. —, [illegible] S. W. [illegible] (same); 1901, Welch v. Com., 110 Ky. 105, 60 S. W. 948, 1118, 1121 (defendant as witness is privileged not to answer as to having been "accused of any crime, indicted for any crime, or convicted of any misdemeanor"; declaring Burdette v. Com., Roberts v. Com., and Mitchell v. Com. overruled in this respect; the opinion [illegible] examining to such acts (supra, § 981), and claiming a privilege not to answer (supra, § 984), and is useless; Paynter, C. J., Hobson and White, JJ., diss.; the opinion of Hobson, J., points out this confusion, and justly complains of the reasoning of the majority opinion); 1901, Asheraft v. Com., — Ky. —, 60 S. W. 931 (questions to an accused as to other indictments against him, held improper; approving the preceding case); 1901, Howard v. Com., 61 Ky. 756, 61 S. W. 756 (similar; the same judges dissenting); 1901, Johnson v. Com., — Ky. —, 61 S. W. 1005 (question as to an indictment for perjury on a former trial, excluded; following Asheraft v. Com.); 1901, Welch v. Com., — Ky. —, 63 S. W. 984 (construing C. C. P. § 597; reviewing the preceding cases, approving those of Leslie, Baker, Parker, and Pennington, and disapproving those of Burdette and Roberts as decided without considering the statute; now pointing out (1) that questions as to specific wrongful acts not proved by a judgment of conviction are improper as seeking evidence of character, although questions as to "his life and his associates" are proper, and questions as to wrongful acts relevant to the cause are proper; (2) that questions as to mere indictments or accusations are improper, exc so far as they indicate bias, according to § 949, ante; (3) that an accused as a witness is in no less favorable a position than an ordinary witness; Paynter, C. J., and Hobson, J., diss.); 1902, Traboe v. Com., — Ky. —, 66 S. W. 718 (question as to whom the witness lived with, held proper); 1902, Asheraft v. Com., — Ky. —, 68 S. W. 847 (question as to a prior arrest, excluded); 1903, Hensley v. Com., — Ky. —, 74 S. W. 677 (questions as to prior indictments, excluded); 1904, Mullins v. Com., — Ky. —, 79 S. W. 258 (prior arrest, excluded; no authority cited); 1904, Sanborn v. Com., — Ky. —, 80 S. W. 223 (obscure); 1906, Henderson v. Com., 122 Ky. 200, 91 S. W. 1141 (conviction for forgery, admitted), 1906, Hutton v. Com., 123 Ky. 411, 96 S. W. 560 (murder, cross-examination of the accused as to killing a man in Virginia and being indicted for it, excluded, on the ground that it is "not competent to show any particular wrongful act that the witness has been guilty of or that he has been indicted for any offense"; [illegible] S. W. 624 (Ochsner v. Com., applied); 1921, Sparks v. Com., 193 Ky. 180, 235 S. W. 707 (murder of one who had sought to "break up a moonshine still" of defendant; the following cross-examination of witness for defendant was held proper, on the principle of § 949, ante, distinguishing prior cases on the present principle: "Q. Where do you live? A. On Wallow Hole, Elliott county. Q. What do you do for a living? A. Farm. Q. Is it not a fact that your chief occupation for the last two years has been moonshining? A. No, sir. Q. Are you not indicted in the Elliott circuit court in eight cases? Q. Were you not convicted and served a term in prison? A. Never was in Elliott county"); 1922, Posey v. Com., 194 Ky. 483, 240 S. W. 91 (conviction of a misdemeanor, not admissible).

Louisiana: 1. Extrinsic Testimony: 1843, Stanton v. Parker, 5 Rob. 108, 109, semble (general principle); 1852, State v. Parker, 7 La. An. 83, 85 (excluding "particular acts or charges", and regarding as not thereby excluded testimony that the witness had the character of defrauding, extorting, and cheating, and that he was idle and dissolute and had lewd associations); 1892, State v. Jackson, 44 La. An. 159, 161, 10 So. 600 ("collateral facts, and particular inquiries as to any particular act or any particular associates", excluded; here, the witness' lewd and criminal associations); 1893, State v. Taylor, 45 La. An. 605, 608, 12 So. 927 (general principle); 1898, State v. Wiggins, 50 La. An. 330, 23 So. 334. 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1893, State v. Murphy, 45 La. An. 958, 960, 961, 13 So. 229 ("Have you ever been arrested for stealing?" allowed; the trial Court's discretion controlling to prevent "unreasonable or oppressive cross-examination"; yet on re-hearing the Court shows ignorance of the distinction between cross-examination and outside testimony, and leaves the rule uncertain); 1895, State v. Dudousat, 47 La. An. 977, 17 So. 495 (assumption of false name by prosecuting witness, excluded), 1899, State v. Southern, 48 La. An. 628, 19 So. 605 (a defendant testifying for himself, question whether he was then charged with another offense, admitted), 1901, State v. Hauk, 105 La. 240, 30 So. 726 (trial Court's discretion controlling; 1903 State v. Gillan, 109 [illegible]

State v. Leblea, 137 La. 1007, 69 So. 808 (trial Court's discretion). 4. Conviction of Crime: 1906, State v. Griggsby, 117 La. 1046, 42 So. 497 (conviction in a city court, admitted, here against a defendant-witness); 1913, State v. Manual, 133 La. 571, 63 So. 174 (murder; cross-examination of accused to a conviction for fence-cutting, allowed: the rule is not restricted to felonies).

Maine: 1. Extrinsic Testimony is excluded: 1841, Phillips v. Kingfield, 19 Me. 375, 378 ("no particular acts of immorality or crime can be stated"); 1842, Halley v. Webster, 21 Me. 461, 464 (language indicating an abandoned character); 1877, State v. Morse, 67 Me. 428. 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1876, State v. Carson, 66 Me. 116 (whether he assaulted F. while drunk, excluded; impeachment by other crimes is not permissible on cross-examination; Holbrook v. Dow, Mass., infra, followed). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1831, Tillson v. Bowley, 8 Me. 163 (bastardy; the complainant's intercourse with another privileged, because here criminal); 1841, Low v. Mitchell, 18 Me. 372, 374 (same). 4. Conviction of Crime: Rev. St. 1916, c. 87, § 124 (quoted ante, § 488); 1873, State v. Watson, 63 Me. 128 (any criminal offence); 1876, State v. Watson, 65 Me. 79; 1892, State v. Farmer, 84 Me. 440, 24 Atl. 985 (a conviction twenty-seven years before, admitted; "time may soften the effect of such a record, but cannot destroy its applicability"; here, for illegal liquor-selling).

Maryland: 1. Extrinsic Testimony: 1906, Richardson v. State, 103 Md. 112, 63 Atl. 317 (woman witness in bigamy). 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1885, Smith v. State, 64 Md. 25 ("anything which will tend to throw light upon his character" as to credibility is allowable, subject to the discretion of the trial Court to some extent; here a question as to having been in jail was allowed); 1902, Bonaparte v. Thayer, 95 Md. 548, 52 Atl. 496 (indictment excluded, "that fact alone is not always equivalent to guilt"); 1913, Avery v. State, 121 Md. 229, 88 Atl. 148 (abortion; question to the accused's wife whether she had ever taken the girl to a house of ill fame, excluded, apparently accepting the rule of total exclusion of questions to chastity character); 1920, Annarina v. Boland, 136 Md. 365, 111 Atl. 84 (alienation of affections; to a witness for plaintiff whether he had not lived with his wife before marriage, not allowed); 1922, Brennan v. [illegible], 1[illegible] Md. [illegible], 116 Atl. 049 (cross-examination to an indictment held improper). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1885, Smith v. State, supra [illegible]. 4. Conviction of Crime: Ann. Code 1914, Art. 35, § [illegible] (conviction of an infamous crime admissible); 1894, [illegible] v. [illegible], [illegible] Md. [illegible], [illegible] Atl. [illegible] (whether one has been in jail, the penitentiary, or the State prison, or any other place that would tend to impair his credibility, admitted); 1915, Simond v. State, 127 Md. 29, 95 Atl. 1073 (conspiracy; whether witness had ever been fined for drunkenness in 1905, held not improperly excluded); 1920, Annarina v. Boland, 136 Md. 365, 111 Atl. 84 ("Have you ever been convicted of any crime?" held allowable).

Massachusetts: 1. Extrinsic Testimony has always been excluded: 1825, Com. v. Moore, 3 Pick. 194, 196, semble (bastardy; intercourse of the prosecutrix with others, not received to impeach credit); 1857, Gardner v. Way, 8 Gray 189 ("particular acts of misconduct" not admissible; here, false accounts); 1859, Holbrook v. Dow, 12 Gray 358 (quoted infra); 1870, Com. v. Regan, 105 Mass. 593, semble (rape; former declarations of pregnancy, etc., excluded); 1872, Com. v. McDonald, 110 Mass. 406, semble; 1885, Jennings v. Machine Co., 138 Mass. 594, 598 (here, commercial dishonesty; "independent evidence of particular acts of misconduct" inadmissible). 2. Scope of Cross-examination: the state of the law in Massachusetts has been marked by some wavering between the two types of rules described as (2) and (3) ante, in § 983, — i.e. between the rule leaving the examination to the discretion of the trial Judge, and the rule excluding entirely an examination as to facts reflecting on character. In 1843, in Hathaway v. Crocker, 7 Metc. 266, in the well-known passage already quoted ante, § 944, Chief Justice Shaw laid down the general doctrine of the latitude of cross-examination; in which he leaves to "the sound discretion of the Court" such questions as aim "to test the purity of principle" of the witness, "his life and habits", "and the like", "for the purpose of exhibiting the witness in his true light to the jury". The confusion seems then to have started with the opinion in Com. v. Shaw, 4 Cush. 593 (1849), where questions put to a witness for the prosecution, asking whether he had not secretly opened letters of the defendant, and having for their express object "to test the moral sense of the witness", were held properly excluded. Dewey, J., for the Court, justified this on two grounds, first, that these circumstances, as detracting from the moral credit of the witness, were not competent, and secondly, that the general discretion of the trial Court as to cross-examination (ante, § 944) would suffice to support the exclusion. Then in Com. v. [illegible], 10 Cush. [illegible], [illegible] (1852) and Com. v. Hills, 4 Cush. [illegible], questions excluded below as to the sexual immorality of a witness for the prosecution on a charge of receiving stolen goods were held to have been within this same discretion of the trial Court, that discretion covering new and entirely collateral matters. Yet in 1861, in Smith v. [illegible], [illegible] Gray [illegible], 112, questions to a witness allowed below as to having been expelled from the bar for perjury, were held improper: the trial Court's discretion was conceded, but here it was [illegible] ried too far", i.e. in going beyond "his ordinary pursuits in life, and the like", and allowing inquiry into "certain charges of misconduct." In Com. v. Quin, 5 Gray 479, 480 (1855), a question why the witness had changed his name was held rightly excluded as "immaterial." In Gardner v. Way, 8 Gray 189 (1857) the plaintiff, relying on his account-books as proof of goods sold, was not allowed to be impeached by outside evidence of former dishonest charges; and without any distinction as to extrinsic testimony, it was said that "nothing is more clear than that the character of a witness for truth and veracity is not to be impeached by proof of any particular act of misconduct" irrelevant to the case. In 1859, in Holbrook v. Dow, 12 Gray 357, a cross-examination on facts of a similar sort, allowed below, "under the latitude of a cross-examination and to test the credibility", was held erroneously allowed; and the strict rule (3) of total exclusion was clearly laid down, by Merrick, J.: "It is a fixed and established rule in the law of evidence that it is not competent, for the purpose of creating a distrust of the witness' integrity and of thus disparaging his testimony, to prove particular acts of alleged misbehavior and dishonesty in relation to matters foreign to all questions which are involved in the trial." The next case, however, reverts to the discretion rule: 1865, Prescott v. Ward, 10 All. 204, 209 (promissory note; questions, excluded below, as to sexual misconduct and attempted blackmail, held to be within the discretion of the trial Court so far as they tended "to disparage her character"; no authorities cited). The next ruling declares a question, excluded below, to have been inadmissible, saying nothing about discretion. 1870, Com. v. Regan, 105 Mass. 593 (rape; former intercourse, and admissions of intercourse, by the prosecutrix; no authorities cited). In Com. v. Mason, 105 Mass. 163, 168, however, questions as to a former attempt to suborn a witness and as to a forgery were held to be within the discretion of the trial Court to exclude as "collateral and irrelevant." Then, in 1872, Com. v. McDonald, 110 Mass. 405 (rape; questions to the prosecutrix as to having been a common seller of liquor illegally; the discretion of the trial Court in excluding was sanctioned; the matters here

ing for the defence on a charge of milk-adulteration was asked to identify a letter from him as official assayer making a corrupt offer to one whose vinegar has been found deficient; the question and the introduction of the letter were held improper: "We are aware that in England and in some of the United States this latitude of cross-examination has sometimes been allowed, though not without protests that the practice ought to be restricted. In Massachusetts the rule has been that a witness cannot be asked on cross-examination, in order to affect his credibility, about his part in transactions irrelevant to the issue on trial. . . . We are satisfied that both witnesses and parties ought to be protected from being obliged to encounter such collateral charges." But in the same volume the discretion rule was reverted to: 1888, Sullivan v. O'Leary, 146 Mass. 322, 15 N. E. 775 (slander; cross-examination of the plaintiff to complaints of slander and foul language against the plaintiff by other persons, held improperly allowed in excess of the trial Court's discretion; Com. v. Schaffner not cited); and it is hard to say what the fixed rule is to be. Since the foregoing cases no settlement has been reached: 1902, Com. v. Foster, 182 Mass. 270, 65 N. E. 391 (trial Court's discretion in general controls); 1906, Taylor v. Schofield, 191 Mass. 1, 77 N. E. 652 (trial Court's discretion controls); 1920, Com. v. Homer, 235 Mass. 520, 127 N. E. 517 (robbery; cross-examination of defendant to a supposed bankruptcy, etc., held unfair, because unconscientious in offering nothing later to contradict his denial); 1921, Com. v. Kaplan, — Mass. —, 130 N. E. 485 (arson of insured property; cross-examination of defendant to being "constantly in the company of firemakers", and as to having a previous fire in another shop; the latter held not improper in the trial Court's discretion, the former not passed upon). 3 Privilege against Disgraceful Answers. 1841, Dewey, J., in Com. v. Turner, 3 Metc. 19 (privilege recognized); 1862, Com. v. Savory, 10 Cush. 545, 557 (left undecided). 4 Conviction of Crime. 1867, Com. v. Bonner, 97 Mass. 587 (larceny, breaking and entering, arresting a prisoner, admitted); 1868, Com. v. Chatham, 99 Mass. 420 presidential certificate of commutation, releasing after part service of sentence a person convicted of fraudulent concealment of assets from a trustee in bankruptcy, does not prevent the conviction from being used to discredit); 1922, Attorney-General v. Pelletier, 240 Mass. 264, 134 N. E. 406 (conviction if crime in a Federal court in New York [illegible] mitted). By St. 1913, c. 81, amended [illegible] further statutes in 1914, 1919, and 1920, the following bizarre production has become the law: Gen. L. 1920, c. 233, § 21: "The conviction of a witness of crime may be shown to affect his credibility, except as follows: First, the record of his conviction of a misdemeanor shall not be shown" after 5 years, "unless he has subsequently been convicted of a crime within 5 years of the time of his testifying; Second, the record of his conviction of a felony" not sentenced to penitentiary shall not be shown after 10 years, unless convicted again within 10 years, etc.; "Third, the record of his conviction of a felony" with penitentiary sentence shall not be shown after 10 years from expiration of minimum sentence, unless convicted again within 10 years, etc.; this intricately patterned rule, as a guide to grades of credibility, must have been revealed to the legislators by some seer of superhuman insight; certainly neither scientific nor legal annals record anything like it.

MICHIGAN: 1. Extrinsic Testimony is excluded: 1867, Wilbur v. Flood, 16 Mich. 44 (in general); 1870, People v. Knapp, 42 Mich. 267, 3 N. W. 927 (sexual improprieties); 1880, People v. Whitson, 43 Mich. 423, 5 N. W. 454 (prostitution; decided on another point); 1881, Hamilton v. People, 46 Mich. 188, 9 N. W. 230 (drunkenness, etc.). 2 Scope of Cross-examination. The satisfactory rule of Wilbur v. Flood has been adhered to with fair consistency, except in People v. Mills, a curious aberration which ought never to have occurred, 1867, Wilbur v. Flood 16 Mich. 43 ("such collateral matters as may enable the jury to appreciate them [the witness'] fairness and reliability"; "a large latitude is given, where circumstances seemed to justify it, in allowing a full inquiry into the history of witnesses and into many other things tending to illustrate their true character", so that within the trial Court's discretion, the cross-exam may cover "all antecedents which are really significant" and which will explain [illegible] credibility" [illegible] the fact of former conviction must in the State [illegible] was held within [illegible] 1871 Arnold's Sup. 91 Mich. 600, 52 N. W. [illegible] ought to be left to the discretion of the circuit judge [illegible] may in any case have [illegible] cording to circumstances, arbitrary rules of admission and exclusion . . . should not generally be allowed"; here the witness' character was being rehabilitated); 1872, Gale v. People, 26 Mich. 157 (questions as to former arrests, etc., excluded, merely because the defendant, by making a statement, did not become an ordinary witness); 1873, Beebe v. Knapp, 28 Mich. 53, 72 (discretion-rule applied, here to admit questions as to sexual misconduct, in an action for deceit); 1874, Hamilton v. People, 29 Mich. 183 (whether he had been charged with crime, or had deserted from the army, allowed); 1875, Bissell v. Starr, 32 Mich. 297 (examination into past life and character, held to be largely in the trial Court's discretion); 1878, Saunders v. People, 38 Mich. 218 (former rascality of an informer, in dealing with the defendant, inquired into to test credibility); 1879, People v. Knapp, 42 Mich. 267, 3 N. W. 927 (witness to adultery, allowed to be asked as to sexual improprieties with other persons); 1880, People v. Whitson, 43 Mich. 420, 5 N. W. 454 (questions as to prostitution, allowed); 1880, People v. Niles, 44 Mich. 608, 7 N. W. 192 (former charge of theft, admitted, semble); 1881, Marx v. Hilsendegen, 46 Mich. 337, 9 N. W. 439 (arrest for pension-fraud; trial Court's exclusion in discretion, affirmed); 1881, Hamilton v. People, 46 Mich. 188, 9 N. W. 247, semble (bastardy; questions as to illicit intercourse by the complainant beyond the period of gestation, admissible); 1882, Driscoll v. People, 47 Mich. 417, 11 N. W. 221 (arrest for robbery, admitted); 1890, Hedwig v. Lascowski, 82 Mich. 621, 46 N. W. 1033 (arrest and conviction; excluding discretion affirmed); 1892, People v. Harrison, 93 Mich. 596, 53 N. W. 725 (woman's unchastity; cumulative questions rightly excluded in trial Court's discretion); 1892, People v. Foote, 93 Mich. 38, 52 N. W. 1036 (that he had been arrested for another crime, allowed); 1892, People v. Kahler, 93 Mich. 625, 630, 53 N. W. 826 (whether he was in the habit of drinking, excluded); 1893 People v. Mills, 94 Mich. 630, 637, 54 N. W. 488 (cross-examination to chastity, "lack of chastity cannot be used to impeach the credibility of a female witness", nothing said about the trial Court's discretion, seven decisions cited from other jurisdictions, none from Michigan); 1896, People v. Butler land, 104 Mich. 676, 62 N. W. 1010 (how much time he had been drunk since the affair occurred, but whether he had been arrested for being drunk semble admissible, 1897, King [illegible] 112 Mich. 40, 70 N. W. 316, 74 N. W. 230 (as to "what his past life had been and what company he had kept in the past" allowed here, as to drunkenness, keeping a low saloon, etc.); 1897, People v. Brown, 112 Mich. 397, 70 N. W. 1011 (a thorough examination into his past life", held proper); 1898, People v. McAvoy, 117 Mich. [illegible] N. W. 1011 (ruling in the discretion of the trial Court see quotation supra, § 983); 1900, People v. Gotshall, 123 Mich. 474, 82 N. W. 274 (questions as to witness' attempt at suicide, wife-beating, arson, etc., excluded, where the cross-examiner had no expectation that the facts would be admitted and the attempt was merely to raise suspicion); 1900, People v. Turney, 124 Mich. 542, 83 N. W. 273 (questions as to proposals to steal cattle, allowed); 1901, Lange v. Wiegand, 125 Mich. 647, 85 N. W. 109 (how many times the witness' husband had been arrested, etc., excluded); 1901, People v. Higgins, 127 Mich. 291, [illegible] N. W. 812 (certain cross-examinations to character, held proper); 1901, Travis v. Stevens, 127 Mich. 687, 87 N. W. 85 (cross-examination to illicit relations, excluded, citing People v. Mills); 1904, People v. Dowell 136 Mich. 306, 99 N. W. 23 (People v. Gotshall, supra, followed); 1912, Yanelli v. Littlejohn, 172 Mich. 91, 137 N. W. 723 (false representations in selling land; cross-examination of defendant to other false methods, allowed); 1913, Lunde v. Detroit United R. Co., 177 Mich. 374, 143 N. W. 45 (personal injuries; cross-examination of the woman to her past unchaste life, held allowable in the trial Court's discretion; reviewing prior cases); 1917, People v. Cutler, 197 Mich. 6, 163 N. W. 493 (wife's murder of husband; cross-examination of defendant to acts of unchastity, held allowable, as affecting credibility, in the trial Court's discretion; People v. Mills repudiated; Lunde v. D. U. R. Co. approved); 1918, Forsyth v. Nostrand, 201 Mich. 558, 167 N. W. 1002 (fraud in real estate sales-commissions; cross-examination of plaintiff held too broad). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers is not recognized; 1867, Wilbur v. Flood, 16 Mich. 43, semble; 1869, Clemens v. Conrad, 19 Mich. 174, semble; 1871, Strang v. People, 24 Mich. 1, 7 (rape prosecutrix); 1879, People v. Knapp, 42 Mich. 267, 3 N. W. 927 (witness to adultery); 1880, People v. Whitson, 43 Mich. 620, 5 N. W. 454 (prostitution); 1885, People v. McLean, 71 Mich. 309, 38 N. W. 917, semble (rape prosecutrix). 4. Conviction of Crime Comp. L. 1915, § 12551 (quoted ante, § 488), convictions were declared admissible in the following cases: 1867, Wilbur v. Flood, 16 Mich. 41 ("infamous crimes"); 1869, Clemens v. Conrad, 19 Mich. 174, semble; 1870, Dickinson v. Dunton, 21 Mich. 564 (disbarment of an attorney); 1882, People v. Driscoll, 47 Mich. 413, 11 N. W. 221 (misdemeanor, theft); People v. Montgomery, 49 Mich. 65, 21, 20 N. W. 707 (misdemeanor, theft); Hebert v. Lacrosse, 52 Mich. 624, 18 N. W. 394 (action allowed); 1888, Lansing v. Michigan [illegible] 71 Mich. 55, 38 N. W. 592 (disbarment of an attorney for criminal conduct); Hopkins v. Hopkins, 71 Mich. 348, 39 N. W. 472; People v. Hamilton, 121 Mich. 695, 80 N. W. 717; 1899, People v. Buckminster, 121 Mich. 690, 80 N. W. 803 (murder; cross-examination of defendant to conviction of various felonies, allowed); 1921, Niedzinski v. Coryell, 215 Mich. 498, 184 N. W. 476 (automobile collision; cross-examination of defendant to three former convictions of crime, allowed).

MINNESOTA: 1. Extrinsic Testimony: 1921, State v. Nelson, 148 Minn. 285, 181 N. W. 850 (murder). 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1871, McArdle v. McArdle, 12 Minn. 98, 101, 107 (discretion of the trial Court; here, "Have you more than one wife living?", admitted); 1871, State v. McCartey, 17 Minn. 76, 84, 86 (discretion of the trial Court controls; here, "Did you not steal a gun since these cases have arisen?", admitted); 1901, State v. Renswick; 85 Minn. 19, 88 N. W. 22 (whether the witness had been arrested, excluded); 1903, State v. King, 88 Minn. 175, 92 N. W. 965 (trial Court's discretion); 1905, Malone v. Stephenson, 94 Minn. 222, 102 N. W. 372 (civil arson; questions as to domestic morals, etc., held improperly allowed in the trial Court's discretion); 1905, State v. Bryant, 97 Minn. 8, 105 N. W. 974 (liquor sale; cross-examination of the prosecuting witness as to a recent forgery, flight, and arrest, held properly excluded; foregoing cases not cited); 1906, State v. Peterson, 98 Minn. 210, 108 N. W. 6 (liquor-selling; trial Court's discretion confirmed); 1907, State v. Quirk, 101 Minn. 334, 112 N. W. 409 (murder; cross-examination of the defendant to his gambling career, held not improper in discretion); 1909, State v. Fournier, 108 Minn. 402, 122 N. W. 329 (cross-examination held improper on the facts); 1920, State v. Taylor, 144 Minn. 377, 175 N. W. 615 (indecent liberties; cross-examination of defendant to other similar conduct, held improper on the facts; Hallam, J., diss.); 1920, Wolf v. Mapson, 146 Minn. 174, 178 N. W. 318 (action for necessaries furnished to defendant's wife; cross-examination to indictment for incest not allowed); 1921, State v. Nelson, 148 Minn. 285, 181 N. W. 850 (murder; trial Court's discretion held to control, as to instances of former misconduct by defendant). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1880, State v. Blunsky, 3 Minn. 246, 257 (recognizing a possible privilege for questions tending to "degrade or disgrace", repudiating any fixed distinction between collateral and material matters, adopting the rule that the privilege does not cover matters merely tending to show infamy, but within these limits leaving the whole matter to the sound discretion of the trial Court, here the question tended to show [illegible]); 4. Conviction of Crime (Gen. St. 1913, § 8604 (quoted ante, § 488); 1891, State v. Baker, 47 Minn. 280, 49 N. W. 775 ("crimes" is not restricted to those which at common law disqualified, because the common law on the subject did not prevail in Minnesota; "crimes" includes misdemeanors involving moral turpitude); State v. Adamson, 49 Minn. 281, 51 N. W. 1052 (same) any unspecified "crime" sufficient); 1899, Harding v. R. Co., 77 Minn. 417, 80 N. W. 358 (personal injuries; question to plaintiff as to conviction for drunkenness, allowable; Sauer case approved); 1915, Brennan v. Minnesota D. & W. R. Co., 130 Minn. 314, 153 N. W. 611 (a mere indictment is not admissible); 1915, Thompson v. Bankers' M. C. Ins. Co., 128 Minn. 474, 151 N. W. 180 (under Minn. Gen. St. 1913, § 8504, conviction of a misdemeanor may be shown, and on cross-examination the nature of the offence; here, an attempt to kiss a married woman, as an assault); 1916, State v. Price, 135 Minn. 159, 160 N. W. 677 (murder; cross-examination of defendant to details of former crimes of which he admitted conviction, allowed).

MISSISSIPPI: 2. Scope of Cross-examination: Code 1906, § 1923, Hem. § 1583 (quoted infra); 1859, Anon., 37 Miss. 54, 58 (bastardy a question to the complainant, as to former intercourse generally, excluded, as exceeding the "latitude of inquiry" necessary "to inform the jury of the character of the witness"); 1870, Head v. State, 44 Miss. 731, 735, 751 (allowing a question to a woman as to being a prostitute); 1896, Tucker v. Tucker, 74 Miss. 93, 19 So. 955 (that a female witness was in a brothel when arrested, excluded, unchastity being irrelevant); 1902, McMasters v. State, 81 Miss. 374, 33 So. 2 (murder; cross-examination of defendant's wife as to having bastard children, held improper); 1904, Ivy v. State, 84 Miss. 264, 36 So. 265 (murder; cross-examination of the defendant's mistress as to her children by other fathers, held improper); 1907, Starling v. State, 89 Miss. 328, 42 So. 798 (to a defendant, whether he had been charged with any other offence, excluded). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1870, Head v. State, supra (privilege recognized for questions tending to "bring them into disgrace or reproach"; here said of questions as to a woman's prostitution); Code 1906, § 3017, Hem. § 5405 (privilege not to obtain for witness before Legislature); § 1923, Hem. § 1583 (quoted infra). 4 Conviction of Crime: Code 1906, § 1923, Hem. § 1583 ("any witness may be examined touching his interest in the cause or his conviction of any crime, and his answers may be contradicted, and his interest or his conviction of a crime established by other evidence; and a witness shall not be excused from answering any question, material and relevant, unless the answer would expose him to criminal prosecution or penalty"); 1905, Cook (Dan) v. State, 85 Miss. 738, 38 So. 111 (the preponderous ruling is made that convictions of crime to discredit cannot be used "unless the witness had at first denied it", no authority is or could be cited for this ruling); 1906, Cook (Dan) v. State, 87 Miss. 738, 40 So. 111 (similar to the preceding).

MISSOURI: 1. Extrinsic Testimony is excluded: 1861, State v. King, 70 Mo. 111 (not allowing the facts of prostitution and intemperance to be shown as traits of general character, on the principle of §§ 923, 924, ante); 1889, State v. Taylor, 98 Mo. 240, 245, 11 S. W. 570; 1895, State v. Sibley, — Mo. —, 31 S. W. 1033 (unchastity of a woman); 1899, State v. Vandiver, 149 Mo. 502, 50 S. W. 892; 1905, Wright v. Kansas City, 187 Mo. 678, 86 S. W. 452. 2. Scope of Cross-examination: in this State must also be compared, on this subject, the citations post, § 1885 (cross-examining to one's own case) and §§ 2276, 2277 (waiver of privilege): 1878, State v. Clinton, 67 Mo. 380, 390 (declaring the same freedom of cross-examination for a defendant as for any other witness); 1880, Muller v. Hospital Assoc., 73 id. 242 (affirming the opinion in 5 Mo. App. 401; admitting any facts tending to shake credibility by injuring the character; here a question to a Catholic priest whether he had broken his vows by marriage since ordination was allowed); 1890, State v. Miller, 100 Mo. 606, 621, 13 S. W. 832, 1051 (whether he had been in the penitentiary, admitted); 1892, State v. Houx, 109 Mo. 65, 19 S. W. 35 (questions as to "specific acts of alleged immorality commencing at a period twenty years previous, etc.," held improper); 1893, State v. Hack, 118 Mo. 92, 23 S. W. 1089 (questions whether she had "kept girls for the purpose of prostitution", held proper); 1894, State v. Gesell, 124 Mo. 531, 27 S. W. 1101 (the rule said (1) to exclude "specific past delinquencies", here adultery of a woman, but not "facts which go to show what the general moral character or reputation therefor are, and what the general moral character or reputation for truth"; but this seems inconsistent; (2) to prevent "raking in the ashes of long forgotten scandals", and a number of other processes of rhetorical indefiniteness); 1894, State v. Martin, 124 Mo. 514, 28 S. W. 12 (question as to how many times he had been in jail, allowed); 1895, Goins v. Moberly, 127 Mo. 116, 29 S. W. 985 (discretion of the trial Court); 1897, Hancock v. Blackwell; 139 Mo. 440, 41 S. W. 205 (an inquiry into domestic troubles, excluded); 1898, State v. Grant, 144 Mo. 56, 45 S. W. 1103 (custom as to taking whiskey home with him, excluded); 1900, State v. Hale, 156 Mo. 102, 56 S. W. 881 (a defendant taking the stand cannot be cross-examined to other offences not throwing light on the one charged; compare § 2276, post); 1903, State v. Boyd, 178 Mo. 2, 76 S. W. 979 (cross-examination to a female witness having an illegitimate child, held allowable in discretion); 1907, State v. Long, 201 Mo. 664, 100 S. W. 587 (cross-examination to the fact of a detestable crime, allowed in the trial Court's discretion); 1912, State v. Bobbitt, 242 Mo. 273, 146 S. W. 709 (cross-examination to improper conduct, held not improperly excluded in the trial Court's discretion); 1913, Wendling v. Bowden, 252 Mo. 647, 161 S. W. 774 (not clear); 1920, State v. Hildebrand, 285 Mo. 200, 225 S. W. 1000 (murder; cross-examination of defendant to other crimes, not admitted); 1922, State v. Lasson, — Mo. —, 238 S. W. 101 (robbery; cross-examination of defendant as to shooting craps, bootlegging, etc., held improper). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1851, Clementine v. State, 14 Mo. 115 (recognized; but only for matters not "forming any part of the issue to be tried"; here presence in a bawdy-house was held not covered by the privilege); 1880, Muller v. Hospital Assoc., 73 Mo. 242, affirming 5 Mo. App. 401 (repudiating the privilege); 1881, State v. Talbott, 73 Mo. 359 (assuming that the privilege applies where infamy is directly involved); Rev. St. 1919, § 5439 (witness examined as to conviction for crime "must answer any question relevant to that inquiry"); § 5040 (corrupt electoral practices; no privilege for degrading answers). 4. Conviction of Crime: 1878, State v. Rugan, 68 Mo. 215, semble (admissible); 1887, State v. Loehr, 93 Mo. 103, 5 S. W. 696 (larceny, admitted); 1889, State v. Taylor, 98 Mo. 240, 244, 11 S. W. 570 (a mere misdemeanor or violation of local ordinance, excluded; here, frequenting a bawdy-house); 1890, State v. Miller, 100 Mo. 622, 13 S. W. 832, 1051 (of any crime, admissible; here, that he had been "in the penitentiary"); 1893, State v. Taylor, 118 Mo. 153, 24 S. W. 449 (that he had been in jail for larceny, allowed); 1894, State v. Pratt, 121 Mo. 566, 26 S. W. 556 (similar); 1894, State v. Smith, 125 Mo. 2, 28 S. W. 181 (of a felony; but "not a mere misdemeanor"); Rev. St. 1919, § 5439, Laws 1895, p. 284 (quoted ante, § 488; admitting conviction of a "criminal offence"); 1895, State v. Donnelly, 130 Mo. 642, 32 S. W. 1124 (restricted to infamous crimes; excluding a conviction for gambling); 1896, Gardner v. R. Co., 135 Mo. 90, 36 S. W. 214 (an "infamous crime", but not a misdemeanor; here, excluding a conviction, for disturbing the peace, and another unspecified); 1897, State v. Dyer, 139 Mo. 199, 212, 40 S. W. 768 (petit larceny, admitted); 1898, State v. Grant, 144 Mo. 56, 45 S. W. 1103 (selling liquor illegally, excluded); 1901, State v. Prendible, 165 Mo. 329, 65 S. W. 559 ("conviction of anything less than a felony does not impeach a witness"); 1903, State v. Blitz, 171 Mo. 530, 71 S. W. 1027 (under Rev. St. 1899, § 4680, Laws 1895, supra, the conviction may be of any criminal offence, including misdemeanors, for impeaching either the accused or any other witness; prior decisions repudiated; the statute held to have changed the law); 1903, Chouteau L. & L. Co. v. Chrisman, 172 Mo. 610, 72 S. W. 1062 (following State v. Blitz, supra); 1903, State v. Thornhill, 174 Mo. 364, 74 S. W. 832 (conviction for gambling, a misdemeanor, admitted; 1905, State v. Heusack, 189 Mo. 295, 88 S. W. 21 (statute applied to allow questions as to a misdemeanor); 1905, State v. Spivey, 191 Mo. 87, 90 S. W. 81 (but the question should ask directly for the conviction, and not as to being in the penitentiary, etc.); 1905, State v. Woodward, 191 Mo. 617, 90 S. W. 90 (compare the rule of § 1270, post); 1907, State v. Brooks, 202 Mo. 106, 100 S. W. 416 (conviction for manslaughter, admitted against defendant as witness); 1907, State v. Arnold, 206 Mo. 589, 105 S. W. 641 (conviction for misdemeanor, admissible); 1917, State v. Willard, — Mo. —, 192 S. W. 437 (murder; cross-examination of defendant's character-witnesses to his conviction for counterfeiting in Washington in 1901, held improper; the prior misconduct must be "so linked together in point of time as to leave no sufficient time or place for repentance"; this is unsound; in the first place, the ruling applies it to a case falling under the principle of § 988, post, not a genuine one under the present principle; secondly, the theory is totally unsound, for what counts is not repentance, but change of character, — many repent, but few change; thirdly, the situation calls for an actual change, not a mere possibility of change; fourthly, in practice, no such line could be drawn by trial Courts, without a theologian's or psychologist's advice); 1922, Page v. Payne, — Mo. —, 240 S. W. 156 (judgment of plaintiff's divorces, not admitted to discredit him, the defendant not having been a party).

MONTANA: 1. Extrinsic Testimony is excluded: Rev. C. 1921, § 10668 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2051). 2. Scope of Cross-examination: Rev. C. 1921, § 10668, supra; 1895, State v. Gleim, 17 Mont. 17, 41 Pac. 998 (excluding a series of questions involving all kinds of degrading matters); 1899, State v. Yellow Hair, 22 Mont. 339, 55 Pac. 1026 (reasons for discharge from army, excluded); 1899, State v. Shadwell, 22 Mont. 559, 57 Pac. 281 (to whom he paid rent, allowed on the facts); 1904, State v. Howard, 30 Mont. 518, 77 Pac. 50 (cross-examination as to being under arrest, allowed on the facts); 1904, State v. Rogers, 31 Mont. 1, 77 Pac. 293 (questions as to a plan to commit another crime, excluded); 1909, State v. Crowe, 39 Mont. 174, 102 Pac. 579 (cross-examination to the witness' prior misdeeds, excluded); 1912, State v. Biggs, 45 Mont. 400, 123 Pac. 410 (cross-examination held properly limited). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: Rev. C. 1921, § 10674 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2065); § 83 (privilege abolished for testimony before legislative committee); § 10846 (privilege abolished on trial for promising legislative bribery); § 1393 (privilege declared for witness before military court); 1895, State v. Black, 15 Mont. 143, 38 Pac. 674 (privilege recognized; here, a conviction of felony). 4. Conviction of Crime: Rev. C. 1921, § 10674 (conviction of "felony", admissible); Rev. C. 1921, § 11603 ("a person convicted of any offence" is competent, but "the conviction may be proved" to impeach him); 1895, State v. Black, supra (felony, admitted); 1921, State v. Stein, 60

Mont. 441, 199 Pac. 278 (illegal sale of liquor; under Rev. C. § 8024, cross-examination to conviction of a misdemeanor is not allowable).

NEBRASKA: 1. 1910, Wilson v. State, 87 Nebr. 638, 128 N. W. 38 (defendant's desertion from the army); 1914, Koepke v. Delfs, 95 Nebr. 619, 146 N. W. 962 (bastardy; extrinsic testimony to plaintiff's intercourse with others, excluded). 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1894, Hill v. State, 42 Nebr. 503, 60 N. W. 916 (the discretion of the trial Court shall control, quoting Real v. People, N. Y.; here admitting questions as to former arrests for vagrancy, etc.); 1897, Myers v. State, 51 Nebr. 517, 71 N. W. 33 (rape; repeated insinuations of unchaste conduct of the complainant, semble, improper); 1905, Razee v. State, 73 Nebr. 732, 103 N. W. 438 (criminal libel; cross-examination of the accused as to domestic relations, etc., held improper; no authority cited); 1917, Goemaun v. State, 100 Nebr. 772, 161 N. W. 421 (former arrest, excluded). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1894, Hill v. State, supra (intimating that such a privilege exists); Rev. St. 1922, §§ 8844, 8848 (answer which would tend "to expose him to public ignominy," not compellable, except for conviction of felony). 4. Conviction of Crime: Rev. St. 1922, § 10139 (quoted ante, § 488); 1900, Young Men's Ch. Ass'n v. Rawlings, 60 Nebr. 377, 83 N. W. 175 (conviction for offences below felony, inadmissible under statute).

NEVADA: 1. Extrinsic Testimony: 1876, State v. Larkin, 11 Nev. 314, 330 ("specific acts of immorality", excluded). 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1876, State v. Huff, 11 Nev. 17, 26 (former arrests and convictions for battery, excluded; the questions must "legitimately affect his credit for veracity; . . . no legitimate inference of the untruthfulness of a witness can be drawn from the fact that he has been convicted of frequent assaults and batteries"). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1876, State v. Huff, supra (privilege recognized); Rev. L. 1912, § 5437 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2065). 4. Conviction of Crime: Rev. L. 1912, §§ 5419, 5420 (quoted ante, § 488); State v. Huff (cited supra); 1905, State v. Roberts, 28 Nev. 350, 82 Pac. 100 (conviction must be of felony); 1905, State v. Lawrence, 28 Nev. 440, 82 Pac. 614 (cross-examination of a defendant as to convictions of felonies, allowed).

NEW HAMPSHIRE: 1. Extrinsic Testimony is excluded: 1850, Hoitt v. Moulton, 21 N. H. 586, 592 (frequent intoxication). 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1842, Clement v. Brooks, 13 N. H. 92, 99 (left undecided); 1866, State v. Staples, 47 N. H. 113, 117 (questions as to having falsely charged innocent persons with crime; the discretion of the trial Court said to control; the rule not distinguished from that about privilege); 1877, Gutterson v. Morse, 58 N. H. 165 ("necessarily regulated by a sound judicial discretion"; "a question of fact to be determined at the trial, in view of the appearance of the witness and all the circumstances of the case"); 1879, Merrill v. Perkins, 59 N. H. 343 (trespass and injury to health by being expelled from a house; whether he had not been expelled by legal force from every house he occupied within ten years, held not improperly excluded; "how far justice required the cross-examination to go in that direction was a question of fact to be determined at the trial term"); 1895, Lesser v. New Hampshire F. Co., 68 N. H. 343, 44 Atl. 490 (discretion of trial Court; here, in an action for price of goods, questions as to defendant's financial career allowed); 1901, Challis v. Lake, 71 N. H. 90, 51 Atl. 260 (malpractice; that he did not possess a physician's license as required by law, allowed on cross-examination of the defendant). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1842, Clement v. Brooks, 13 N. H. 92, 98, semble (privilege recognized); 1866, State v. Staples (cited supra). 4. Conviction of Crime: 1838, Chase v. Blodgett, 10 N. H. 22, 24 (held altogether inadmissible, on a misunderstanding of the principle of § 979, ante; probably the only case of its kind in our law, except in New York); 1842, Clement v. Brooks, supra (left undecided); 1850, Hoitt v. Moulton, 21 N. H. 592 (approving Chase v. Blodgett); this error was corrected by statute: St. July 13, 1871, now Pub. St. 1891, c. 224, § 26 (quoted ante, § 488); 1909, Genest v. Odell Mfg. Co., 75 N. H. 365, 74 Atl. 593 (conviction for drunkenness, excluded).

NEW JERSEY: 1. Extrinsic Testimony was once admitted: 1830, Fries v. Brugler, 12 N. J. L. 79, semble (seduction; the daughter's unchaste conduct with third persons); but this would not be followed; compare § 210, ante; 1903, State v. Hendrick, 70 N. J. L. 41, 56 Atl. 247. 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1830, Fries v. Brugler, 12 N. J. L. 79 (seduction; whether the daughter had not said that a third person was the father of the child, allowed, as discrediting her); 1883, Paul v. Paul, 37 N. J. Eq. 25 (question as to being keepers of brothels, admitted); 1896, Roop v. State, 58 N. J. L. 479, 34 Atl. 749 (mere indictment, excluded); 1902, State v. Barker, 68 N. J. L. 19, 52 Atl. 284 (assault with intent to kill; questions to the defendant on cross-examination as to prior acts of violence, held improper); 1905, State v. Mount, 72 N. J. L. 365, 61 Atl. 259 (assault and battery; cross-examination of the defendant to prior convictions for assault, allowed). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1807, State v. Bailly, 2 N. J. L. 396 (whether he had been convicted and punished for petit larceny; not to be answered, as a matter "which tends directly to dishonor and disgrace him"; the contrary rulings said to be "modern decisions" not in harmony with the "ancient law", 1811, Vaughn v. Perrine, 2 N. J. L. 534 (seduction; whether the daughter had had criminal connection with others, and whether another witness had had connection with her or had sat up late with her; privileged, as tending to "disgrace", "infamy", "stigmatize or dishonor"; "the doctrine laid down by Mr. Swift is not law; the distinction between what is connected with the issue, and what is not, is without foundation"); 1830, Fries v. Brugle supra (seduction; whether the daughter had not said to a third person that he was the father of the child; privileged, as tending to "disgrace", serving to "disparage, disgrace, or discredit"); 1896, Roop v. State, supra (privilege repudiated); Comp. St. 1910, Crimes §§ 27*f*, 27*k*, 27*n* (privilege abolished for bribery and other offences). 4. Conviction of Crime: Comp. St. 1910, "Evidence", § 1 (quoted ante, § 488); 1896, Roop v. State, supra (keeping a disorderly house, admitted); 1901, State v. Henson, 66 N. J. L. 601, 50 Atl. 468, 616 (the crime may be of any kind under § 1, Gen. St., Vol. II., p. 1397; neither the list of crimes formerly disqualifying, nor the indefinite common-law list, was intended to limit the kind of crimes available); 1906, State v. Mount, 73 N. J. L. 582, 64 Atl. 124 (the accused, on a charge of assault, having admitted a prior conviction for assault, further inquiries as to the aggravated nature of the prior assault, and rebuttal testimony contradicting his version of it, held improper); 1909, Hill v. Maxwell, 77 N. J. L. 766, 73 Atl. 501 (State v. Henson followed; here on a civil trial for battery the defendant was asked as to having pleaded nolo contendere to an indictment for the battery).

New Mexico: 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1895, Terr. v. De Gutman, 8 N. M. 92, 42 Pac. 68 (adultery of a woman, admitted); 1896, Terr. v. Chavez, 8 N. M. 528, 45 Pac. 1107 (quoted ante, § 983; here an inquiry into various acts of ruffianism and outlawry, and indictments therefor, was allowed); 1896, Borrego v. Terr., 8 N. M. 446, 46 Pac. 349 (discretion of trial Court; here admitting questions as to murders committed); 1915, State v. Perkins, 21 N. M. 135, 153 Pac. 258 (cross-examination to misconduct is in the trial Court's discretion). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1894, Terr. v. De Gutman, supra, 68 (not recognized); 1896, Terr. v. Chavez, supra (same); 1896, Borrego v. Terr. supra (same). 4. Conviction of Crime: Annot. St. 1915, § 2165 (quoted ante, § 488; all facts formerly disqualifying may be shown to discredit); § 2179 (conviction for "any felony or misdemeanor" is admissible); 1896, Terr. v. Chavez, supra (felony, admitted; a pardon for the crime does not exclude the conviction).

New York: 1. Extrinsic Testimony. The doctrine of exclusion has been rigidly enforced since the first ruling. It is worth while to note, however, that though the reasons already set forth (ante, § 979) were correctly understood by the Courts as affecting, not particular acts in themselves, but only extrinsic testimony thereof, yet the prohibition absolutely of "particular acts" in the California Code and similar legislation seems to have been partly due to a misreading of the New York cases, and to a failure to appreciate that it was only the extrinsic testimony that is meant by them to be excluded: 1816, Jackson v. Lewis, 13 Johns. 504 (that the witness was or had been a public prostitute, excluded; "the inquiry as to any particular immoral conduct is not admissible against a witness"); 1827, Root v. King, 7 Cow. 635, per Savage, C. J. ("never allowed"); 1829, Jackson v. Osborn, 2 Wend. 558 (that the witness had been indicted for perjury and forgery, excluded; "the credibility of a witness is not to be impeached by proof of a particular offence, but by evidence of general bad character"); 1835, Bakeman v. Rose, 14 Wend. 105, 110, 18 id. 147 (same ruling as Jackson v. Lewis; "particular immoral conduct" excluded); 1838, People v. Abbot, 19 Wend. 198, per Cowen, J.; People v. Rector, 19 Wend. 580, per Cowen, J.; 1847, Howard v. Ins. Co., 4 Den. 502, 506; 1851, Corning v. Corning, 6 N. Y. 104; 1851, People v. Gay, 1 Park. Cr. 315; 1857, People v. Jackson, 3 Park. Cr. 395; 1859, People v. Blakeley, 4 Park. Cr. 183; 1859, Stephens v. People, 19 N. Y. 570 ("particular acts not directly involved in the issue"); 1862, Newcomb v. Griswold, 24 N. Y. 298; 1864, Wehrkamp v. Willet, 4 Abb. App. 556; 1866, LaBeau v. People, 34 N. Y. 230; 1878, People v. Brown, 72 N. Y. 573; 1881, Conley v. Meeker, 85 N. Y. 618; 1904, People v. De Garmo, 179 N. Y. 130, 71 N. E. 736; 1910, Potter v. Browne, 197 N. Y. 288, 90 N. E. 812 (witness plaintiff not allowed to state his expressed reasons for discharging C., on the pretext of explaining the bias of C. as a witness). 2. Scope of Cross-examination: There is in the following series of rulings a feature of irregular variegation which has made it almost impossible to say what the law will be after the next decision, and is due in the past chiefly to a habit of ignoring previous individual rulings. Three questions in particular call for mention. (1) The doctrine of the trial Court's discretion; this was clearly expounded in the cases of Turnpike Co. v. Loomis and LaBeau; was then more or less limited in the cases of Real, Stokes, Ryan, and others; and seems to have been more or less adhered to. (2) The doctrine that a mere arrest, etc., is irrelevant and never admissible; this was first clearly settled in Gay's case, and seems to have been consistently adhered to, after Brown's case; though it has had to be re-argued and re-explained several times since. (3) The doctrine that questions may be put to an ordinary witness that may not be put to a testifying accused person; this was started in the Brown and Crapo cases, though apparently ignored in the Clark and Giblin cases; the present fate of the doctrine seems to be uncertain; compare § 2276, post. The cases are as follows:

1838, People v. Rector, 19 Wend. 573, 581, 582 (whether he was living in adultery and frequenting drinking-houses at night, allowed); 1842, Carter v. People, 2 Hill 317, semble (whether he had been complained of and bound over on the charge of passing counterfeit money admitted); 1847, Howard v. Ins. Co., 4 Den. 504, 506 (false representations by the witness as to the business of the store that had been burned, question allowed); 1848, Lohman v. People, 1 N. Y. 385, semble (whether he had committed fornication, or had the venereal disease, allowed); 1852, People v. Gay, 1 Park. Cr. 312, 7 N. Y. 378, semble (whether he had been committed for trial on a charge of perjury; admitted below, but apparently disapproved on appeal, and Carter v. People similarly criticised, because the fact of a charge being made shows nothing as to guilt; but it is impossible to say whether these opinions mean merely that such answers do not sufficiently impeach character to allow good character to be shown in rebuttal, or that the questions themselves on cross-examination would have been excluded if objected to, evidently the practice at this time was to ask such questions without objection); 1862, Newcomb v. Griswold, 24 N. Y. 299 (permitting questions "tending to discredit and disgrace", "if the answer relate to the conduct of the witness and legitimately affect his credit for veracity"; but "the boundary and limit of such examination is not well defined, and the cases may not be in harmony touching the principle upon which whatever of rule there may be rests, or the extent to which the rule should be carried in permitting a cross-examination as to independent collateral acts of the witness affecting his moral character or as to specific acts of criminality or crime"); 1865, Third Great Western Turnpike Co. v. Loomis, 32 N. Y. 127, 132, 138 (quoted ante, § 983; questions affecting the witness' credit, if on matters not "bearing directly on the issue", are left entirely to the discretion of the trial Court, and may be excluded by him irrespective of whether the witness claims a privilege); 1865, Lipe v. Eisenlerd, 32 N. Y. 238 (whether he was under indictment for murder; excluded, on the authority of People v. Gay, as irrelevant to impeach credit; Turnpike Co. v. Loomis ignored); 1866, LaBeau v. People, 34 N. Y. 230 (questions excluded below as to sexual immorality; Turnpike Co. v. Loomis followed; "inquiries on irrelevant topics to discredit the witness, and to what extent a course of irrelevant inquiry may be pursued, are matters committed to the sound discretion of the trial Court"); 1867, Shepard v. Parker, 36 id. 517 (promissory note; defence, that it was given in settlement for a rape by A. on P.; P. being a witness, the question was allowed whether she had not secretly signalled A. to come to her house; this was held proper, within the trial Court's discretion); 1870, Brandon v. People, 42 N. Y. 265, 268 (whether she had been arrested for theft; held proper, only one judge noting that it was a matter of judicial discretion); 1870, Real v. People, 42 N. Y. 280 (whether he had ever been in the penitentiary, and how long, "or in any other place that would tend to impair his credibility", held proper; the extent of such cross-examination being "somewhat" in the trial Court's discretion); 1872, Connors v. People, 50 N. Y. 240 ("How many times have you been arrested?"; allowed, as within the discretion of the trial Court); 1873, Stokes v. People, 53 N. Y. 176 (whether she had not left her employer without consent or knowledge and taken things not belonging to her; held proper); 1874, Southworth v. Bennett, 58 N. Y. 659 (whether he was under indictment for usury; allowed, as within the discretion of the Court); 1878, People v. Casey, 72 N. Y. 393, 398 (questions as to other quarrels and other assaults; allowed, the matter to rest largely in the trial Court's discretion, and the general scope admissible covering answers "disclosing his past life and conduct and thus impairing his credibility"); 1878, People v. Brown, 72 N. Y. 571 ("How many times have you been arrested?"; departure made from former rulings; whether the question was proper for an ordinary witness, left undecided; but for an accused taking the stand, held improper; not because irrelevant to discredit, for it must "legitimately tend to impair the credit of the witness for veracity, either directly, or by its tendency to establish a bad moral character", but because of its unfair effect, since "every immorality, vice, or crime . . . is brought out ostensibly to affect credibility, but is practically used to produce a conviction for an offence for which the accused is being tried, upon evidence which otherwise would be deemed insufficient"; but the Court does not carefully distinguish between the present rule and the privilege against degrading questions); 1879, People v. Crapo, 76 N. Y. 288 ("Were you arrested on a charge of bigamy in 1869?", held erroneously allowed against an accused, not merely on the ground of the preceding case, but as totally irrelevant to discredit, and therefore inadmissible even against an ordinary witness, since such questions "should at least be of a character which clearly go to impeach his general moral character and his credibility as witness", and the above question, dealing with a mere charge of crime, did not do this); 1880, Ryan v. People, 79 N. Y. 597 (whether an ordinary witness had been indicted for an assault; held, 'obiter', improper, accepting the dictum in the preceding case, as irrelevant to affect credibility; the relation of this ruling to the doctrine of the trial Court's discretion pointed out; "a witness may be asked in the discretion of the Court as to transactions which affect his character, either for truth or veracity, or his moral character: but not as to such as do not have that effect"; two judges dissent, leaving all to the trial Court's discretion); 1881, People v. Court, 83 N. Y. 436, 460 (questions of varied range; held admissible within the trial court's discretion, under the limitations of Ryan v. People); 1881, Nolan v. R. Co., 87 N. Y. 63, 68 (whether he had been expelled from the fire department; held improper, as irrelevant to discredit under the preceding rule); 1883, People v. Noelke, 94 N. Y. 137, 143 (whether he had been engaged in the lottery business held relevant, under the preceding rule); 1884, People v. Irving, 95 N. Y. 541 (questions as to an assault upon W.; held properly admitted within the trial Court's discretion, as relevant to impair the credit of the witness by its tendency to establish a bad moral character"; the doctrine of Ryan v. People and People v. Crapo affirmed, that "mere charges or accusations or even indictments may not so be inquired into, since they are consistent with innocence and may exist without moral delinquency"); 1886, People v. Clark, 102 N. Y. 736, 8 N. E. 38 (whether the accused had been charged with anything criminal or disgraceful, improper; up to those limits, the discretion of the trial Court prevails; no authorities cited); 1889, People v. Giblin, 115 N. Y. 196, 199, 21 N. E. 1062 (murder; question to the defendant, whether he had been in possession of counterfeiting dies and plates; held proper, as impeaching his credibility by "connecting him with a nefarious occupation" and the doctrine of People v. Brown and People v. Crapo ignored); 1891, Van Bokkelen v. Berdell, 130 N. Y. 141, 145, 29 N. E. 254 (to a defendant, whether he had been indicted for perjury, excluded, citing the cases of Crapo, Ryan, Noelke, and Irving only); 1892, People v. Tice, 131 N. Y. 651, 657, 30 N. E. 494 (trial Court's discretion to control, provided only that it relates to relevant matters or matters affecting credibility; the trial judge may properly restrict the cross-examination of accused persons within narrower limits than in ordinary cases, but the latitude allowed is a matter for the trial judge); 1892, People v. McCormick, 135 N. Y. 663, 32 N. E. 26 (to a defendant, as to a former act of violence, allowed); 1893, People v. Webster, 139 N. Y. 73, 84, 34 N. E. 730 ("It is now an elementary rule that a witness may be specially interrogated, upon cross-examination, in regard to any vicious or criminal act of his life"; the extent being "discretionary with the trial Court"; here, questions to a defendant as to his immoral relations with a woman were allowed); 1898, People v. Dorthy, 156 N. Y. 237, 50 N. E. 800 (whether he had been expelled by his church, not allowed; whether he had been removed from the bar, allowed, but not the details of the grounds therefor); 1899, People v. Braun, 158 N. Y. 558, 53 N. E. 529 (inquiries as to past career, family history, held to be within the trial Court's discretion); 1904, People v. DeGarmo, 179 N. Y. 130, 71 N. E. 736 (defendant allowed to be cross-examined, on a charge of manslaughter by beating, to other acts of violence); 1906, People v. Cascone, 185 N. Y. 317, 78 N. E. 287 (People v. Crapo approved, and the rule applied to an accused); 1909, People v. Morrison, 195 N. Y. 116, 86 N. E. 1120, 88 N. E. 21 ("the defendant in an action either civil or criminal cannot be asked on cross-examination whether he has been indicted"; and this rule applied equally to a witness not a party; following People v. Cascone); 1918, People v. Richardson, 222 N. Y. 103, 118 N. E. 514 (keeping a disorderly house; cross-examination of the housekeeper, a witness for defendant, as to having worked for defendant at other hotels which had been abated as disorderly houses, held improper; two judges diss.; the majority opinion is a good instance of applying the character rule, ante, § 194, in such a way as needlessly to obstruct the investigation of the truth; the very opinion itself, with its quotations of testimony, makes it plain that justice was ludicrously blind).

3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: The privilege seems to be fully recognized as a part of the common law, though not always accurately distinguished from the question of the scope of cross-examination; the leading cases being those of Mather and Rector; but in latter years the partial statutory abolition of the privilege for criminal cases seems to have cast a doubt upon its validity in civil cases: 1816, People v. Herrick, 13 Johns. 82 (whether the witness had been convicted of petit larceny; excluded, partly as provable only by the record of conviction, partly as a fact which, producing infamy and thus disqualifying the witness, he is privileged from answering); 1826, Southard v. Rexford, 6 Cow. 254 (having fornication with the unmarried plaintiff; privilege allowed, but treated apparently as a matter of self-crimination); 1830, People v. Mather, 4 Wend. 237, 250 (whether the witness had been present at a certain house, objected to as involving disgrace, namely, a share in the abduction of William Morgan, the Mason; the privilege against answering a question of disgrace or infamy assumed by the Court without doubt to exist); 1838, People v. Rector, 19 Wend. 569 (allowed per Cowen, J., at 574, 586, Bronson, J., at 600, Nelson, C. J., at 610, the witness having been asked as to living in adultery, frequenting drinking-places, etc.); 1848, Lohman v. People, 1 N. Y. 379 (fornication by an unmarried woman, venereal disease; excluded; the privilege not applying to facts material to the issue); 1855, People v. Christie, 2 Park Cr. 581 ("whether he had a bias against Roman Catholics", excluded); 1857, Strong, J., in People v. Jackson, 3 Park. Cr. 398 (privilege recognized for "any act disconnected with the main transaction which would have a tendency to degrade him"); 1859, People v. Blakeley, 4 Park Cr. 181 (having a venereal disease since marriage; privilege allowed); 1862, Newcomb

v. Griswold, 24 N. Y. 299 ("tending to discredit and disgrace", used to define the privilege); 1865, Third G. W. Turnpike Co. v. Loomis, 32 N. Y. 127, 137 ("questions tending to disgrace", may be objected to, unless "bearing directly on the issue"; as to those not "relevant to the issue", the trial Court is apparently allowed a discretion to admit them and the privilege is subject to this discretion); 1866, La Beau v. People, 34 N. Y. 230 (preceding case affirmed); 1866, Shepard v. Parker, 36 id. 517 (privilege recognized); 1870, Brandon v. People, 42 N. Y. 269 (privilege recognized); 1878, People v. Brown, 72 N. Y. 573 (privilege recognized for the accused as a witness, and as to matters not relevant to the issue, no discretion permitted in admitting them; as the witness is also a party, his counsel is allowed to make objection for him); 1879, People v. Crapo, 76 N. Y. 290 (similar facts; but though the counsel here also made the objection, the Court intimate that that will not raise the question, and therefore decide the case on the ground of relevancy, not of privilege). So far as concerns conviction for crime, the privilege has been abolished: 1881, Penal Code, § 714: "[The conviction may be proved] . . . by his cross-examination, upon which he must answer any proper question relevant to that inquiry"; applied as follows: 1883, People v. Noelke, 94 N. Y. 144; 1889, Spiegel v. Hays, 118 N. Y. 661, 22 N. E. 1105; 1922, Gould v. Gould, Sup. App. Div., 194 N. Y. Suppl. 742 (action by wife against husband for necessaries; plea, conviction for adultery; the plaintiff held not privileged to decline answering as to the conviction on the ground of disgrace; the facts being "relevant to the issue"). 4. Conviction of Crime. The cases above cited in par. 1 show clearly that on principle a record of conviction was regarded as admissible; and this has been distinctly laid down a number of times: 1843, Carpenter v. Nixon, 5 Hill 260 (petit larceny, admitted); 1862, Newcomb v. Griswold, 24 N. Y. 298 (in general, admissible); 1877, West v. Lynch, 7 Daly 246 (admitted). The following rulings, excluding such evidence in civil cases, can hardly have been law; 1863, Gardner v. Bartholomew, 40 Barb. 327; 1878, Sims v. Sims, 75 N. Y. 472 (distinguishing on the erroneous theory that it "contravenes the rule that proof of particular acts or offences, except from the mouth of the witness himself", is improper). The admissibility is now settled by C. P. A. 1920, § 350, Con. L. 1909, Penal § 2444 (quoted ante, § 488; admitting conviction of "a crime or misdemeanor"); applied as follows: 1883, People v. Noelke, 94 N. Y. 137, 144; 1889, Spiegel v. Hays, 118 N. Y. 660, 22 N. E. 1105; 1922, People v. Joyce, 233 N. Y. 61, 134 N. E. 836 (murder; cross-examination of defendant, an ex-soldier, as to conviction for unspecified military offences, held improper; no authority cited).

NORTH CAROLINA: 1. Extrinsic Testimony is excluded: 1834, Downey v. Murphey, 1 Dev. & B. 84 (affirming the principle); 1830, Barton v. Morphes, 2 Dev. 520 (whether he had been charged with stealing); 1886, State v. Garland, 95 N. C. 672 (intoxication on one occasion); 1888, State v. Bullard, 100 N. C. 488, 6 S. E. 191 (affirming the principle); 1890, Nixon v. McKinney, 105 N. C. 27, 28, 11 S. E. 154 (that the witness had forged a deed); 1899, State v. Warren, 124 N. C. 807, 32 S. E. 552 (complainant in bastardy). 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1842, State v. Patterson, 2 Ired. 346, 358 (questions having a tendency to disparage or disgrace may be asked); 1853, State v. Garrett, Busbee 358 (allowing a question as to being indicted, convicted, and whipped, for stealing); 1854, State v. March, 1 Jones L. 526 (whether he had committed perjury in another State, allowed); 1868, State v. Cherry, 63 N. C. 32 (allowing questions whether she had not been delivered of a bastard child; whether she had not had unlawful intercourse; here the witness was prosecutrix for an alleged rape; for the exclusion of similar facts, not asked from the point of view of credibility, by the same Court, see § 200, ante); 1920, State v. Bailey, 179 N. C. 724, 102 S. E. 406 (cross-examination of accused to character, allowed); 1922, State v. Winder, — N. C. —, 111 S. E. 530 (unspecified questions held proper). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1842, State v. Patterson, supra, semble (recognized); 1853, State v. Garrett, supra (same); Con. St. 1919, § 6096 (in election contests, no witness shall be excused from discovering his qualification to vote, "except as to his conviction for an offence which would disqualify him").

NORTH DAKOTA: 1. Extrinsic Testimony is excluded: 1896, State v. Pancoast, 5 N. D. 516, 67 N. W. 1052. 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1890, Terr. v. O'Hare, 1 N. D. 30, 44, 44 N. W. 1003 (cross-examination to character is "within the limits of a sound judicial discretion"); 1896, State v. Pancoast, supra ("if such other facts tend to weaken his credibility"; repudiating the rule of the Crapo Case, N. Y. that the fact of the witness being also the defendant makes any difference in the scope of questioning; excluding questions as to the finding of an indictment, the making of accusations, and other circumstances not involving actual guilt; also excluding crimes committed many years before); 1899, State v. Rozum, 8 N. D. 548, 80 N. W. 480 (keeping a liquor nuisance; question as to arrest for a similar offence and resistance to an officer, allowed); 1899, State v. Ekanger, 8 N. D. 559, 80 N. W. 482 (same; question as to being a professional gambler, allowed); 1909, State v. Nyhus, 19 N. D. 326, 124 N. W. 71 (cited more fully post, § 2276, n. 5); 1914, State v. Oien, 26 N. D. 552, 145 N. W. 424 (cross-examination to an arrest, not allowed); 1920, State v. Stepp, 45 N. D. 516, 178 N. W.

951 (statutory rape; questions to accused as to indecent exposure of person to complainant's mother, allowed). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: Comp. L. 1913, § 245 (witness before State board of control may not claim to refuse evidence tending to "expose him to public ignoring"); § 9296 (corrupt political practices; no person to be excused on the ground that the testimony would "tend to degrade him"). 4. Conviction of Crime: 1919, Engstrom v. Nelson, 41 N. D. 530, 171 N. W. 90 (battery; conviction of crime, admissible).

OHIO: 1. Extrinsic Testimony is excluded: 1876, Webb v. State, 29 Oh. St. 351, 358. 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1870, Wroe v. State, 20 Oh. St. 460, 469 (largely in the trial Court's discretion; to be excluded "when a disparaging course of examination seems unjust to the witness and uncalled for by the circumstances of the case"; here admitting questions as to being discharged from the police force, being under indictment for murder); 1871, Lee v. State, 21 Oh. St. 151 (the cross-examination of an accomplice held on the facts to have been unreasonably restricted); 1876, Coble v. State, 31 Oh. St. 102 ("How many times have you been arrested?" admissible); 1877, Hamilton v. State, 34 Oh. St. 86 (Wroe's Case approved; a question as to former indictment, excluded only because it included the defendant also, who had not testified); 1877, Bank v. Slemmons, 34 Oh. St. 142, 147 (Wroe's Case followed; the Court's discretion not disturbed in excluding a question as to a violation of the banking law); 1881, Hanoff v. State, 37 Oh. St. 180 (Wroe's Case approved; the trial Court's discretion given great range; examination "for the purpose merely of disgracing a witness, which neither relates to the issue nor seems to test the credibility", discountenanced; no other rule for an accused person than for an ordinary witness, the N. Y. doctrine of Crapo's Case not being accepted as a rule of evidence; here admitting questions as to previous arrests and indictments for assault and battery, etc.; Okey, J., dissenting). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1870, Wroe v. State, supra (ignored); 1876, Coble v. State, supra (apparently recognized). 4. Conviction of Crime: 1876, Coble v. State, supra (violation of a city ordinance, excluded); Gen. Code Ann. 1921, § 13659 (quoted ante, § 488).

OKLAHOMA: 1. Extrinsic Testimony: 1912, Hooper v. State, 7 Okl. Cr. 43, 121 Pac. 1087 (illegal sale of liquor; information charging another sale, held inadmissible). 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1904, Flohr v. Terr., 14 Okl. 477, 78 Pac. 565 (larceny; cross-examination of witnesses to adultery, excluded); 1905, Hill v. Terr., 15 Okl. 212, 79 Pac. 757 (discretion of the trial Court controls); 1908, Slater v. U. S., 1 Okl. Cr. 275, 98 Pac. 110 (whether he had ever been arrested, and for what, not allowed; forceful opinion, by Furman, P. J.); 1908, Price v. State, 1 Okl. Cr. 358, 98 Pac. 447 (cross-examination as to marrying a woman with whom he had committed adultery, not allowed); 1909, Cannon v. Terr., 1 Okl. Cr. 600, 99 Pac. 622 (cross-examination of defendant's wife as to prostitution, etc., allowed); 1909, Caples v. State, — Okl. —, 104 Pac. 493 (defendant's prosecution for statutory rape of his wife before marriage, admitted as relevant to disprove his alleged motive for killing; but the Court in referring to Price v. State and Slater v. U. S., supra, leave the precise rule for witness unstated); 1912, McKinnon v. Lively, 30 Okl. 433, 122 Pac. 124 (cross-examination to lawsuits and indictments, held improper); 1912, Watson v. State, 7 Okl. Cr. 590, 124 Pac. 1101 (murder; cross-examination of the accused to former killings, held improper on the facts); 1914, Castleberry v. State, 10 Okl. Cr. 504, 139 Pac. 132 (rape under age; woman-witness for defendant, allowed to be cross-examined to immodest conduct with him); 1914, Cobb v. Oklahoma Pub. Co., 42 Okl. 314, 140 Pac. 1079 (cross-examination of plaintiff, in a suit for libel charging the plaintiff with fraud; inquiry into other similar transactions, allowed in discretion); 1917, Sights v. State, 13 Okl. Cr. 627, 166 Pac. 458 (assault with intent to kill; cross-examination of the prosecuting witness as to being an associate of prostitutes and bootleggers, etc., held improper on the facts; explaining Slater v. U. S., and Price v. Terr., supra, and paring them down; this Court should be cautious about repudiating any stand taken by so wise a judge as Furman, P. J.); 1918, Smith v. State, 14 Okl. Cr. 348, 171 Pac. 341 (theft of mules; cross-examination of defendant to dissolute behavior with women, held improper); 1918, Byars v. State, 15 Okl. Cr. 308, 176 Pac. 253 (selling whisky to a minor; cross-examination of defendant, "You have been charged with bootlegging?" held improper; only a conviction, not a charge, can be asked about); § 1920, Wisdom v. State, — Okl. Cr. —, 193 Pac. 1003 (larceny of an automobile; cross-examination of defendant to illegal acts of transporting whisky not allowed); 1920, Winfield v. State, — Okl. Cr. —, 191 Pac. 609 (whether witness has been charged or arrested, not allowed; whether witness "knowingly associates with ex-convicts", allowed). 4. Conviction of Crime: Comp. St. 1921, § 585 (quoted ante, § 488); 1909, Keys v. U. S., 2 Okl. Cr. App. 647, 103 Pac. 874 (whether he had been in jail, not allowed); 1912, State v. Elliott, — Okl. Cr. —, 124 Pac. 86 (conviction for "bootlegging", admissible); 1913, Busby v. State, 10 Okl. Cr. 343, 136 Pac. 598 (conviction 17 years before, admitted); 1920, Winfield v. State, — Okl. Cr. —, 191 Pac. 609 (the crime must involve moral turpitude; assault and battery does not; "tarring and feathering" is not a known crime).

OREGON: 1. Extrinsic Testimony is excluded: Laws 1920, § 863 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2051, substituting "crime" for "felony"); 1879, Steeples v. Newton, 7 Or. 110, 114, semble. 2. Scope of Cross-examination: Laws 1920, § 863, supra; 1879, Steeples v. Newton, supra (conduct not available through extrinsic testimony, but called out by the impeached witness' party on cross-examination, admitted); 1886, State v. Bacon, 13 Or. 143, 147, 155, 9 Pac. 393 (cross-examination to prior misdeeds is "within the sound discretion of the Court"; but "a sound discretion will never sanction inquiries the sole purpose of which is to disgrace the witness and not to test his credibility"; here a question as to prior arrest was allowed); 1886, State v. Saunders, 14 Or. 300, 309, 313, 12 Pac. 441 (approving the preceding case; but restricting the cross-examination of accused persons, by implication of statute, to facts involved in the issue, and excluding questions about prior misconduct as evidence of character); 1900, State v. Savage, 36 Or. 191, 60 Pac. 610, 61 Pac. 1128 (questions excluded on the facts); 1915, Gerlinger v. Frank, 74 Or. 517, 145 Pac. 1069 (breach of marriage-promise; cross-examination of the plaintiff to illicit intercourse with others, allowed). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: Laws 1920, § 870 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2065). 4. Conviction of Crime: Laws 1920, § 731 (quoted ante, § 488); § 863, supra; 1917, State v. Newlin, 84 Or. 323, 165 Pac. 225 (illegal sale of liquor; five prior convictions for the same kind of offence, held admissible).

PENNSYLVANIA: 1. Extrinsic Testimony is excluded: 1798, Stout v. Rassel, 2 Yeates 334, 338 (whether he had not been arrested as an accomplice of a fraudulent schemer for whom the defendant had gone surety; excluded, as "charges of particular offences of which he has not been convicted" were improper for impeaching); 1857, Elliott v. Boyles, 31 Pa. 65 (on the present ground and also on that of collateral contradiction; here said of the former commission of perjury). 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1857, Elliott v. Boyles, supra (excluded entirely; here, the former commission of perjury; quoted ante, § 983); 1904, Com. v. Williams, 209 Pa. 529, 58 Atl. 922 ("Were n't you running a sporting-house?" to a woman, excluded; ignoring Elliott v. Boyles, supra, and erroneously treating it on the principle of § 924, ante); 1921, Marshall v. Carr, 271 Pa. 271, 114 Atl. 500 (ejectment, plaintiff claiming as son, and defendant as widower, of C. M.; defendant's marriage was placed in 1911; cross-examination of defendant as to living with a prostitute E. at another town in 1892, excluded, but cross-examination as to his improper relations with C. M. before marriage, allowed). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1802, Respublica v. Gibbs, 4 Dall. 253, 3 Yeates 429, 437 (privilege recognized as applying to one pardoned for treason; compare § 2555 post, as to the theory of this case); 1803, Galbreath v. Eichelberger, 4 Dall. 515 (declining to compel an answer to a question whether a deed had been executed in fraud of creditors); 1811, Rush, Pres., in Bell's Case, 1 Browne 376 ("where the answer to a question would cover the witness with infamy or shame, I have refused to compel him to answer it"); 1857, Elliott v. Boyles, 31 Pa. 67 (privilege affirmed); St. 1901, June 4, Pub. L. 404, § 15, Dig. 1920, § 737 (privilege ceases for examination in insolvency proceedings by receiver). 4. Conviction of Crime: 1909, Com. v. Racco, 225 Pa. 113, 73 Atl. 1067 (murder; defendant allowed in discretion to be asked whether he had been convicted of larceny, battery, etc.); St. 1911, Mar. 15, § 1, Dig. 1920, § 8174, Crim. Procedure (cross-examination of accused; quoted post, § 2276, n. 5).

PHILIPPINE ISLANDS: 1, 2, Extrinsic Testimony, and Scope of Cross-examination: C. C. P. 1901, § 342 (like Col. C. C. P. § 2051). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: P. C. 1911, Gen. Order 58 of 1900, § 56 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2065). 4. Conviction of Crime: C. C. P. 1901, § 342 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2051); P. C. 1911, Gen. Order 58 of 1900, § 56 ("a witness must answer to the fact of his previous conviction for felony"); 1913, U. S. v. Mercado, 26 P. I. 271 (assault in aid of S.; prior conviction of S. himself for assaults, admissible).

PORTO RICO: 1. Extrinsic Testimony: 1912, People v. Almestico, 18 P. R. 314, 329 (proof of particular acts of misconduct, excluded); Rev. St. & C. 1911, §§ 1526, 6276 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2051); 2. Scope of Cross-examination: Rev. St. & C. 1911, §§ 1526, 6276 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2051); 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: Rev. St. & C. 1911, § 1532 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2065); 4. Conviction of Crime: Rev. St. & C. 1911, §§ 1526, 6276 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2051).

RHODE ISLAND: 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1901, Kolb v. R. Co., 23 R. I. 72, 49 Atl. 392 (question as to witness' having an illegitimate child, excluded). 4. Conviction of Crime: Gen. L. 1909, C. 292, § 43 (quoted ante, § 488); 1903, State v. Babcock, 25 R. I. 224, 55 Atl. 685 (question to a defendant as to prior conviction of the same offence of keeping a disorderly house, admitted); 1920, Wilmot v. Bartlett, — R. I. —, 110 Atl. 411 (trespass for assault; conviction for felonious threat to kill, admitted).

SOUTH CAROLINA: 1. Extrinsic Testimony is excluded: 1833, Anon., 1 Hill 257; 1890, State v. Wyse, 33 S. C. 592, 12 S. E. 556 (confusing the principle with that of correcting collateral errors); 1898, Sweet v. Gilmore, 52 S. C. 530, 30 S. E. 395. 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1903, State v. Williamson, 65 S. C. 242, 43 S. E. 671 (question as to an indictment; point not decided); 1904, Kennington v. Catoe, 68 S. C. 470, 47 S. E. 719 (questions to an unmarried woman as to her children, etc., held properly excluded in the trial Court's discretion); 1906, State v. Stukes, 73 S. C. 386, 53 S. E. 643 (murder; cross-examination to the defendant's relations with a woman connected with the case, allowed); 1908, State v. Mills, 79 S. C. 187, 60 S. E. 664 (murder; cross-examination of a defendant to prior "difficulties", allowable only so far as they affect credibility); 1920, State v. Gibbs, 113 S. C. 256, 102 S. E. 333 (murder; cross-examination of deceased's widow as to marrying him while still married to another husband, held properly excluded). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1806, Miller v. Crayon, 2 Brev. 108 (privilege recognized for "any fact which might lead to expose him to infamy"); 1820, Torre v. Summers, 2 Nott & M. 269, 271, semble (recognized). 4. Conviction of Crime: 1833, Anon., supra (admitting "felony for the crimen falsi" only); 1890, State v. Wyse, supra (admitting conviction for petit larceny).

South Dakota: 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1901, Ausland v. Parker, 14 S. D. 273, 85 N. W. 193 (questions needlessly insinuating personal vice, held improper); 1904, State v. Smith, 18 S. D. 341, 100 N. W. 740 (rape under age; cross-examination of the prosecutrix to prostitution, etc., excluded); 1913, State v. Sysinger, 25 S. D. 110, 125 N. W. 879 (questions as to living under assumed name, allowed); 1911, Richardson v. Gage, 28 S. D. 390, 133 N. W. 692 (question as to an arrest for stealing, held improper).

Tennessee: 1. Extrinsic Testimony: 1879, Merriman v. State, 3 Lea 393, 395 ("particular facts", excluded; here, that a woman-witness had had bastard children); 1896, Zanone v. State, 97 Tenn. 101, 36 S. W. 711 (extrinsic testimony, excluded); 1896, Ryan v. State, 97 Tenn. 206, 36 S. W. 930 (admitting indictments for other felonies and misdemeanors, except that if the record shows an acquittal or a 'nolle pros.' the indictment should be disregarded; no reference to the opinion in Zanone v. State, dated a month before, but written by another judge). 2. Scope of Cross-examination: to the earlier cases cited infra, under par. 3, add the following: 1892, Hill v. State, 91 Tenn. 521, 523, 19 S. W. 674 (whether he had not been charged with stealing; allowable, if it involves an indictment for an infamous crime, but not as implying "mere personal imputations"); 1896, Zanone v. State, supra (questions as to number of husbands living, domestic difficulties, etc., allowed; the following is a type: "Have you not recently torn the clothes off your husband, drawn a butcher-knife on him, called him a ———, and said you were going to kill him?"; the principle being that any question may be asked "throwing light on his or her moral character, provided they involve moral turpitude, whether they relate to domestic relations or other habits, if the tendency is to show that the witness is guilty of wanton, habitual violation and disregard of the most sacred marital relations, or of the law, or of the rules of decent society, involving the witness in moral turpitude", though semble the misdeeds must be of fairly recent date); 1896, Ryan v. State, supra (whether he had not been indicted for felonies and misdemeanors, allowed); 1912, Hughes v. State, 126 Tenn. 40, 148 S. W. 534 (murder; cross-examination of defendant to former murders, held proper). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1858, Reed v. Williams, 5 Sneed 580, 582 (question as to fornication; undecided); 1860, Lea v. Henderson, 1 Cold. 146, 149 (same as next case); 1873, Love v. Masoner, 6 Baxt. 24, 33 (fornication; privilege allowed because fornication was a crime); 1874, Titus v. State, 7 Baxt. 134 (privilege repudiated entirely, settling the doubt formerly expressed); 1896, Zanone v. State, supra (privilege not recognized); 1896, Ryan v. State, supra (same).

Texas: 1. Extrinsic Testimony is excluded: 1859, Boon v. Weathered, 23 Tex. 675, 678; 1879, Johnson v. Brown, 51 Tex. 65, 76; 1892, Gulf C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnson, 83 Tex. 628, 633, 19 S. W. 151 (approving Boon v. Weathered); 1898, Red v. State, 39 Tex. Cr. 414, 46 S. W. 408; 1898, Fields v. State, 39 Tex. Cr. 488, 46 S. W. 814; 1898, Kellogg v. McCabe, 92 Tex. 199, 47 S. W. 520 (that he had been elected mayor by carpet-baggers and scalawags, excluded); 1921, Hays v. State, 90 Tex. Cr. 355, 234 S. W. 898 (murder in quarrel over woman; the woman's specific immoral acts, not admitted against her as a witness). 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1884, Evansich v. R. Co., 61 Tex. 24, 28 (admitting questions about "relevant facts"; and "any fact which bears upon the credit of the witness would be a relevant fact"; but the opinion confounds the present question with that, § 1885, post, as to cross-examining on one's own case); 1893, Carroll v. State, 32 Tex. Cr. 431, 24 S. W. 100 (question as to indictment for theft, allowed; but such cross-examination "must be kept within bounds by the Court", and allowed only "where the ends of justice clearly require it and the inquiry relates to transactions comparatively recent", etc.); 1894, Exon v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. 461, 26 S. W. 1088 (of a woman, whether she had lived as mistress with her husband before marriage, allowed); 1899, Crockett v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. 173, 49 S. W. 392 (whether he had not been indicted for assault with intent to murder, allowed); 1899, Smith v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 50 S. W. 362 (inquiry of defendant as to indictment for another crime, allowable); 1899, Barkman v. State, 41 Tex. Cr. 105, 52 S. W. 73 (questions to the defendant as to a previous killing, excluded); 1899, Preston v. State, 41 Tex. Cr. 300, 53 S. W. 127, 881 (that he had sworn to a false account in a former trial of same defendant, excluded); 1900, Dickey v. State, —

Tex. Cr. —, 56 S. W. 627 (illegal liquor sales; defendant allowed to be cross-examined as to other illegal sales); 1902, De Lucenay v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 68 S. W. 796 (bigamy; questions to the alleged second wife, as to her prior incest, apparently held admissible); 1902, Bowers v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 71 S. W. 284 (cross-examination to a charge of murder 18 years before, excluded, as too remote); 1903, Carter v. State, 45 Tex. Cr. 430, 76 S. W. 437 (cross-examination of a rape-complainant as to her occupation in a disreputable wine-room, excluded on the facts; yet "a witness may be asked as to her or his vocation, environments, or associations"; "this matter is in the sound discretion of the Court"); 1911, Campbell v. State, 62 Tex. Cr. 561, 138 S. W. 607 (rape; cross-examination to libertinous conduct, held improper); 1911, Wright v. State, 63 Tex. Cr. 429, 140 S. W. 1105 (cross-examination to a former indictment allowable, but not to a former arrest on complaint merely); 1916, Sapp v. State, 80 Tex. Cr. 363, 190 S. W. 489 (cross-examination of an accused to crimes as to which "sufficient time has elapsed thereafter to show that the grand jury has had an opportunity to investigate and act upon it and have not found a bill of indictment", not allowed; this is a strange precaution to embody in the rule, for the witness is being asked whether he himself admits the crime, and if he does, the grand jury's failure to indict means nothing); 1921, Shamblin v. State, 88 Tex. Cr. 589, 228 S. W. 241 (cross-examination to arrest for forgery, held improper); 1921, Criner v. State, 89 Tex. Cr. 226, 229 S. W. 860 (forgery; cross-examination of defendant as to indictment or information for prior theft, held proper, but not as to mere arrest); 1921, Campbell v. State, 89 Tex. Cr. 243, 230 Pac. 695 (a woman may be cross-examined as to being a common prostitute); 1921, Rodrignez v. State, 89 Tex. Cr. 373, 232 S. W. 512 (assault; cross-examination of accused as to having been indicted for incest, allowed); 1921, Mobley v. State, 89 Tex. Cr. 646, 232 S. W. 531 (homicide; woman testifying for accused, allowed to be cross-examined as to her being unmarried though having children). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1873, Morris v. State, 38 Tex. 603 (privilege recognized; charge of keeping a house of ill-fame); 1893, Carroll v. State, 32 Tex. Cr. 431, 24 S. W. 100 (privilege denied; good opinion by Simkins, J.); 1899, Crockett v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. 173, 49 S. W. 392 (privilege denied). 4. Conviction of Crime: 1893, Goode v. State, 32 Tex. Cr. 505, 508, 24 S. W. 102 (fine in City Court; excluded; the crime must involve "moral and legal turpitude"); 1893, Carroll v. State, 32 Tex. Cr. 431, 24 S. W. 100 (cross-examination to being in jail or the penitentiary, allowable); 1903, Lee v. State, 45 Tex. Cr. 51, 73 S. W. 407 (indictments admissible; Henderson, J., diss.); 1907, Fannin v. State, 51 Tex. Cr. 41, 100 S. W. 916 (rule of Lee v. State recognized, that prior indictments could be used to impeach); 1907, Cecil v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 100 S. W. 390 (former indictment for felony against defendant as witness, admissible); 1912, Moore v. State, 65 Tex. Cr. 453, 144 S. W. 598 (discussing the question how far instructions should limit the use of such evidence); 1913, Vick v. State, 71 Tex. Cr. 50, 159 S. W. 50 (conviction of felony 13 years before, held inadmissible on the facts; the opinions differ as to the precise rule of law; in the opinion of Prendergast, J., the prior cases are collected); 1915, Leach v. State, 78 Tex. Cr. 55, 180 S. W. 122 (fraudulent use of another's railroad pass; defendant's conviction for cattle-larceny 12 years before, at the age of 15, held too remote to affect credibility); 1920, Rosa v. State, 86 Tex. Cr. App. 646, 218 S. W. 1056 (cross-examination to former convictions, etc., without having evidence to refute denials, held here improper); 1921, Lasater v. State, 88 Tex. Cr. 452, 227 S. W. 949 (murder; proof of a prior arrest for felony, here not allowed; whether anything short of conviction would suffice, does not appear); 1922, McIntosh v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 239 S. W. 622 (statutory rape; question to a woman witness for the State as to conviction for prostitution, allowed; prior cases to the contrary overruled).

UTAH: 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1875, Conway v. Clinton, 1 Utah, 215, 220 ("The Court in its discretion may permit disparaging questions to be asked"); 1909, State v. Williams, 36 Utah 273, 103 Pac. 250 (rape under age; cross-examination of accused to similar conduct with other little girls, excluded); 1911, State v. Thorne, 39 Utah 208, 117 Pac. 58 (a witness may not be asked as to "mere specific acts or conduct of a wrongful, culpable, or even incriminating character not amounting to the commission of a crime", this being the "prevailing rule" in the United States; no authority cited; this is the first time that the anomalous rule of the California Code has been described as the "prevailing rule"; it is the rule of a very small minority of States; Conway v. Clinton, supra, not cited); 1913, State v. Reese, 43 Utah 447, 135 Pac. 270 (bastardy; questions to a witness as to having himself embraced the prosecutrix' sister on the evening of the alleged act of intercourse, during a ride taken by all four, excluded, purporting to follow the quotation ante, § 983 from Third Gt. Western Turnpike Co. v. Loomis, N. Y., and to prohibit all questions as to chastity; the opinion fails to observe any distinction between the question and the privilege not to answer, though quoting Comp. L. 1917, § 3431, now Comp. L. 1917, § 7141; the opinion's concession that "a few sporadic cases hold such questions proper" is a cheerful way of treating the general rule in England and America; and its citation of State v. Shockley, 29 Utah 25, 80 Pac. 865, as supporting this ruling, gives too much weight to a lamentable decision which ought rather to have been repudiated). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: Comp. L. 1917, § 7141 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2065); § 7950 (bribery, etc.; like Cal. P. C. § 89); 1875, Conway v. Clinton, 1 Utah 215, 220 (privilege conceded for facts not material to the issue; here, a conviction for crime). 4. Conviction of Crime: Comp. L. 1917, § 7141 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2065); 1922, State v. Crawford, — Utah —, 206 Pac. 717 (the particular crime may be shown; the fact that an appeal is pending from a former conviction does not exclude it).

VERMONT: 1. Extrinsic Testimony is excluded: 1846, Crane v. Thayer, 18 Vt. 162 (that the witness was a notorious counterfeiter). 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1896, State v. Fournier, 68 Vt. 262, 35 Atl. 178 (discretion of the trial Court); 1897, State v. Slack, 69 Vt. 486, 38 Atl. 311 (allowing the trial Court some discretion, particularly to exclude matters not affecting credibility); 1905, State v. Stimpson, 78 Vt. 124, 62 Atl. 14 (rape under age; cross-examination of prosecutrix as to prior prostitution, not admitted to affect credit); 1915, State v. Hodgdon, 89 Vt. 148, 94 Atl. 301 (burglary; cross-examination of defendant as to other arrests, held improper); 1922, State v. Long, — Vt. —, 115 Atl. 734 (improper relations with a woman, etc.; cross-examination held not improperly excluded in the trial Court's discretion). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: left undecided: 1856, State v. Johnson, 28 Vt. 515 (whether the prosecutrix had had illicit intercourse). 4. Conviction of Crime: Gen. St. 1917, § 1897 (quoted ante, § 488); 1901, State v. Shaw, 73 Vt. 149, 50 Atl. 863 (murder, cross-examination of the defendant, as to a plea of guilty to a charge of assault, allowed); 1902, McGovern v. Hayes and Smith, 75 Vt. 104, 53 Atl. 326 (personal injuries; plaintiff allowed to be cross-examined as to conviction for illegal liquor-selling; but such proof of "an offence not involving moral turpitude" is in the trial Court's discretion); 1917, State v. Guyer, 91 Vt. 290, 100 Atl. 113 (conviction for stealing, etc., admitted).

VIRGINIA: 1. Extrinsic Testimony is excluded: 1811, Fall v. Overseers, 3 Mumf. 495, 505 (per Roane, J.; acts of unchastity by a woman); 1833, Rixey v. Bayse, 4 Leigh 332. 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1906, Southern R. Co. v. Blanford's Adm'x, 105 Va. 373, 54 S. E. 1 (whether a collision was caused by a wrong setting of a switch; the switchman having testified that it was properly set, a cross-examination as to having made a similar mistake shortly before, was allowed "to test his accuracy, veracity, or credibility", on the principle of § 979, ante; but testimony from another witness would have been excluded); 1917, Allen v. Com., 122 Va. 834, 94 S. E. 783 (larceny of a check; question about another fraudulent mercantile transaction, excluded). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1848, Howel v. Com., 5 Gratt. 664, 666 (questions to female witnesses as to their unchaste conduct, possession of stolen goods, etc., held privileged). 4. Conviction of Crime: Code 1919, § 4779 (conviction of "felony or perjury"; quoted ante, § 488); 1882, Langhorne v. Com., 76 Va. 1016 (must be of a crime affecting credibility); Anglea v. Com., 10 Gratt. 696 (under the Code, conviction of felony is admissible, even after a pardon); 1910, Davidson v. Watts, 111 Va. 394, 69 S. E. 328 (conviction for larceny may be shown, though the sentence has been served); 1921, Harris v. Com., 129 Va. 751, 105 S. E. 541 (robbery; defendant, having testified in chief to his whereabouts in former years, was allowed to be cross-examined to a sojourn in prison for part of the period, for an unspecified offense; Langhorne v. Com., distinguished).

WASHINGTON: 1. Extrinsic Testimony is excluded: 1913, State v. Shaw, 75 Wash. 581, 135 Pac. 20 (murder; the accused having admitted on cross-examination that he had been discharged from the army for bad conduct, a military certificate to the same effect was excluded, on the ground of the inadmissibility of a certificate; ignoring the present and better ground); 1921, State v. Demas, 114 Wash. 596, 195 Pac. 1001 (particular immoral acts, excluded); 1922, State v. Dale, — Wash. —, 206 Pac. 369 (proof of a former arrest denied on cross-examination, held improper). 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1903, State v. Ripley, 32 Wash. 182, 72 Pac. 1036 (question as to arrest is "probably" not proper); 1904, State v. Eder, 36 Wash. 482, 78 Pac. 1023 (cross-examination of the defendant's wife to show that he had been confined in the penitentiary, held improper); 1905, State v. Mann, 39 Wash. 144, 81 Pac. 561 (question as to having been tarred and feathered, held properly excluded); 1906, State v. Belknap, 44 Wash. 605, 87 Pac. 934 (seduction; cross-examination of witnesses testifying to other intercourse with the prosecutrix was held to exceed the trial Court's discretion; unsound on the facts); 1910, State v. Katon, 47 Wash. 1, 91 Pac. 250 (trial Court's discretion controls); 1910, State v. Cottrell, 56 Wash. 543, 106 Pac. 179 (forgery; cross-examination to other frauds, held improper on the facts). 4. Conviction of Crime: R. & B. Code 1909, § 1212 (quoted ante, § 488); 1893, State v. Payne, 6 Wash. 563, 569, 34 Pac. 317 (petit larceny, excluded, as not infamous); 1903, State v. Ripley, supra (conviction of a felony, admissible; here, robbery); 1903, State v. Champoux, 33 Wash. 339, 74 Pac. 557 (conviction for murder, appealed from and pending, admitted); St. 1909, R. & B. Code 1909, § 2290 (quoted ante, § 488); 1912, State v. Overland, 68 Wash. 566, 123 Pac. 1011 (under Crim. Code 1909, § 38, Rem. & Ball.

(not as often judicially appreciated as it ought to be) that there are half a hundred independent jurisdictions within our boundaries, and that it is impossible to make use of all the rulings as though they were valid precedents for every jurisdiction. The shuttlecock citation of decisions, backward and forward, in and out of their proper jurisdictions, has done much to unsettle and to confuse the law. The greatest judicial service that can be rendered to-day is to keep the line of precedents clear and inflexible in each jurisdiction.

¶ In general, the state of the various laws on the foregoing topics may be thus summarized:

(1) Extrinsic testimony to particular acts is universally conceded to be Code, § 2290, any crime may be shown, even a misdemeanor).

WEST VIRGINIA: 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1880, State v. Conkle, 16 W. Va. 736, 742, 757, 764 (attempt to kill; a witness for the State lived in the house with the defendant and his wife; a question as to his intercourse with the latter was excluded; the reason being unascertainable from the lengthy but obscure opinion); 1902, State v. Hill, 52 W. Va. 296, 43 S. E. 160 (trial Court has discretion in allowing questions to facts affecting moral character; preceding cases examined and reconciled); 1902, State v. Prater, 52 W. Va. 132, 43 S. E. 230 (similar). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1902, State v. Hill, supra (orthodox English rule applied); 1902, State v. Prater, supra (similar).

WISCONSIN: 1. Extrinsic Testimony is excluded: 1903, Paulson v. State, 118 Wis. 89, 94 N. W. 771. 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1858, Ketchingman v. State, 6 Wis. 426, 430 (question to the woman with whom the defendant's adultery was charged to have been committed, whether an abortion had been produced upon her, not admitted to test credibility; no rule laid down: Smith, J., dissenting); 1859, Kirschner v. State, 9 Wis. 140, 143 (the witness' residence and associates, and the fact that he had assumed an alias, allowed as casting suspicion upon his character; whether he had been convicted of a crime, excluded on grounds of privilege and of proof by record); 1879, Ingalls v. State, 48 Wis. 647, 654, 4 N. W. 785 (conviction of a crime, excluded for the same reasons); 1881, McKesson v. Sherman, 51 Wis. 303, 311, 8 N. W. 200 ("A charge of crime is not in itself impeaching evidence", excluding a question as to a former arrest; also apparently opposing the preceding ruling); 1899, Buel v. State, 104 Wis. 132, 80 N. W. 78 (questions "Did you kill a man at Ord, Nebraska?", "Did the insurance company give you any reason for not giving you the insurance money?", held beyond the proper scope, for a defendant charged with murder and testifying for himself; see quotation ante, § 983); 1900, Murphy v. State, 108 Wis. 111, 83 N. W. 1112 (questions as to "past life" of a defendant testifying, held not improper on the facts); 1902, Goodwin v. State, 114 Wis. 318, 90 N. W. 170 (questions to a woman, as to a bastard child, held improper); 1903, Meehan v. State, 119 Wis. 621, 97 N. W. 173 (assault, question to the prosecuting witness, "whether he ran a sporting-house", excluded); 1905, State v. Nergaard, 124 Wis. 414, 102 N. W. 899 (violation of game law; questions to defendant as to prior arrest for a similar offence, held not prejudicial error, as he admitted his conviction therefor; questions as to being under police surveillance, held allowable in discretion); 1908, Dungan v. State, 135 Wis. 151, 115 N. W. 350 (assault with intent to rape; questions as to the accused's occupation with prostitutes, held allowable in the trial Court's discretion; good opinion by Dodge, J.); 1909, Farrell v. Phillips, 140 Wis. 611, 123 N. W. 117 (a single act of contempt of court many years before, held improperly admitted). 3. Privilege against Disgracing Answers: 1859, Kirschner v. State, supra (conviction for larceny; privileged because it "tended to degrade"); 1879, Ingalls v. State, supra (same); 1881, McKesson v. Sherman, supra, semble (same); 1899, Emery v. State, 101 Wis. 627, 78 N. W. 145 (privilege recognized); 1899, Crawford v. Christian, 102 Wis. 51, 78 N. W. 406 (same); Stats. 1919, § 13.29 (privilege repudiated for testimony before Legislature or a committee). 4. Conviction of Crime: Cases cited supra; Stats. 1919, § 4073 (quoted ante, § 488); 1906, Koch v. State, 126 Wis. 470, 106 N. W. 531 (arrest and conviction for being drunk and disorderly; question allowed; the statute held to include misdemeanors, but not violations of a city ordinance); 1909, Farrell v. Phillips, 140 Wis. 611, 123 N. W. 117 (contempt of court is not a conviction of crime; and the details of the offence cannot be read); 1921, Bruno v. Hickman, 174 Wis. 63, 182 N. W. 356 (assault; cross-examination of defendant to former conviction for assault, allowed).

WYOMING: 2. Scope of Cross-examination: 1909, Eads v. State, 17 Wyo. 490, 101 Pac. 946 (cross-examination to an arrest for shooting in a house of prostitution, held not improperly excluded in the trial Court's discretion).

inadmissible. Sporadic rulings of admission have usually been due to some other principle misapplied;

(2) For cross-examination, the rule of the trial Court's discretion is (in name, at least) the most widely adopted. The discretion, however, is in practice very often interfered with, to the detriment of the law's certainty. The contrast, nevertheless, is clear between this and the rule of absolute prohibition, on the one hand (which obtains in perhaps half a dozen jurisdictions) and the rule of absolute license, on the other hand (which is in this country nowhere conceded);

(3) The privilege against disgracing answers has in all but one or two jurisdictions disappeared. Its service, so far as it was useful, is better rendered by the rule of judicial discretion;

(4) Convictions of crime are everywhere conceded to be admissible. The tendency is to a simplicity of the rule defining the kinds of crime (i.e. either all crimes, or felonies only), instead of the common-law subtleties.

§ 988. Rumors of Particular Misconduct, on Cross-examination of a Witness to Good Character, distinguished. The settled rule against impeachment by extrinsic testimony of particular acts of misconduct (ante, § 979) is to be distinguished in its application from a kind of questioning which rests upon the principle that the witness' grounds of knowledge (ante, § 655) may always be inquired into. When witness A is called to support the character of B (either a witness or an accused), by testifying to his good reputation, that reputation must signify the general and unqualified consensus of opinion in the community (post, §§ 1610–1614). Such a witness virtually asserts either (a) that the testifier has never heard any ill spoken of the other or (b) that the sum of the expressed opinion of him is favorable. Now if it appears that this sustaining witness knows of bad rumors against the other, then, in the first instance, his assertion is entirely discredited; while, in the second instance, his assertion is deficient in good grounds, according to the greater or less prevalence of the rumors. On this principle, then, it is proper to probe the asserted reputation by learning whether such rumors have come to the witness' knowledge; for if they have, it is apparent that the alleged reputation is more or less a fabrication of his own mind.

It is to be noted that the inquiry is always directed to the witness' hearing of the disparaging rumor as negativing the reputation. There must be no question as to the fact of the misconduct, or the rule against particular facts would be violated; and it is this distinction that the Courts are constantly obliged to enforce:

1841, PARKE, B., in R. v. Wood, 5 Jur. 225 (the witness had testified that he had never heard anything against the defendant, and was on cross-examination asked whether he had not heard of the defendant being suspected of a certain robbery in the neighborhood; on objection): "The question is not whether the prisoner was guilty of that robbery, but whether he was suspected of having been implicated in it. A man's character is made up of a number of small circumstances, of which his being suspected of misconduct is one."

1888, MCCLELLAN, J., in Moulton v. State, 88 Ala. 119, 6 So. 758: "Opinions, therefore, and rumors, and reports, concerning the conduct of particular acts of the party under inquiry, are the source from which in most instances the witness derives whatever knowledge he may have on the subject of general reputation; and, as a test of his information, accuracy, and credibility, but not for the purpose of proving particular acts or facts, he may always be asked on cross-examination as to the opinions he has heard expressed by members of the community, and even by himself as one of them, touching the character of the defendant or deceased as the case may be, and whether he has not heard one or more persons of the neighborhood impute particular acts or the commission of particular crimes to the party under investigation, or reports and rumors to that effect."

1921, SANFORD, J., in Kelley v. State, 17 Ala. App. 577, 88 So. 180 (prosecution for homicide): "There were numerous witnesses offered by the defendant, who testified to his good character, and, on cross-examination by counsel for the State, these witnesses testified that they had not heard about his shooting Alto Baxter; or about his knocking Den McLain in the head with a shotgun; nor his cutting John Dillara with a knife; or running into Willie Shipman with a razor; or about his interfering with Mr. Teal when he was about to arrest his (defendant's) sister. When these questions are asked, in good faith, they are permissible, to test the witness as to what he considers good character. Nothing appearing to show to the Court that the questions were not asked in good faith, the Court properly overruled the defendant's objections. In each case the witness answered that he had not, until the day of the trial, around the courthouse, heard of the incidents inquired about and embraced in the questions propounded by counsel for the state. . . . Upon redirect examination of each of these witnesses, defendant's counsel asked this question: 'If these things had happened you would have heard about them, would n't you?'

"The method of cross-examination allowed in the examination of character witnesses places in the hands of trial lawyers and courts a grave responsibility for perfect good faith on the part of counsel propounding the question, the right of full and free explanation in argument by counsel for both sides, and a clear and emphatic charge of the Court to the jury, confining the evidence thus obtained to the purposes for which such interrogatories and answers are legally permissible. To inquire if a witness has not heard that the defendant was guilty of a certain criminal offense, is calculated to carry with it the imputation of guilt, to his great prejudice, unless the court is careful to make clear to the jury the purpose of the question. Certainly defendant's counsel, while making his argument, should be allowed to aid in impressing the jury as to the import and meaning of the examination touching character, so long as he confines himself to statements of law applicable to the case."

On this principle such inquiries are almost universally admitted.[1] But § 988. [1] England: 1836, R. v. Hodgkiss, 7 C. & P. 298 (some definite charge against the supported witness, said to be usually the sole subject of examination); 1846, R. v. Rogan, 1 Cox Cr. 291 (circumstances of suspicion against the accused on the same night as the alleged robbery, excluded);

Federal: 1855, U. S. v. Whitaker, 6 McLean 342, 344 (whether he had not been charged with passing counterfeit money, admitted);
Alabama: rule acknowledged in the following cases: 1866, Bullard v. Lambert, 40 Ala. 204; 1880, Ingram v. State, 67 Ala. 72; 1882, DeArman v. State, 71 Ala. 361; 1884, Tesney v. State, 77 Ala. 38; 1885, Jackson v. State, 78 Ala. 472 (whether the witness had not said that the deceased was a bad man); 1889, Holmes v. State, 88 Ala. 29, 7 So. 193 (whether the accused had "worn stripes"); 1889, Moulton v. State, 88 Ala. 116, 120, 6 So. 758 (here excluded because the witness was asked "whether he did n't know" of the specific misconduct); 1893, Thompson v. State, 100 Ala. 70, 71, 14 So. 878; 1896, Evans v. State, 109 Ala. 11, 19 So. 535 (like the next case); 1896, White v. State, 111 Ala. 92, 21 So. 330 (excluding a question as to the witness' knowledge of such facts); 1898, Terry v. State, 118 Ala. 79, 23 So. 776; 1899, Jones v. State, 120 Ala. 303, 25 So. 204 (without going into the particulars); 1905, Harrison v. State, — Ala. —, 40 So. 57 (defendant's character); 1906, Williams v. the serious objection to them is that practically the above distinction — between rumors of such conduct, as affecting reputation, and the fact of it as violating the rule against particular facts — cannot be maintained before 155 Ala. 52, 46 So. 273 (like Moulton v. State); 1909, Andrews v. State, 159 Ala. 14, 48 So. 858 (murder; "how many fights do you recall that he has had?" allowed); 1909, Lowman v. State, 161 Ala. 47, 50 So. 43 (cross-examination to charges of illegal liquor-selling, allowed); 1912, Ragland v. State, 178 Ala. 59, 59 So. 637 (the rumors cross-examined about must have been heard before the time of the alleged offence); 1913, Watts v. State, 8 Ala. App. 264, 63 So. 15 (wife-murder; re-direct examination of a witness to rumors of the accused having killed a prior wife, not admitted here; the witness having been first called for the State and having then on cross-examination testified only to a qualified good character of the accused); 1915, Hill v. State, 194 Ala. 11, 69 So. 941 (murder); 1916, Stout v. State, 15 Ala. App. 206, 72 So. 762 (keeping liquor illegally; cross-examination to having heard of defendant as a bootlegger, allowed); 1918, Vaughan v. State, 201 Ala. 472, 78 So. 378; 1921, Kelly v. State, 17 Ala. App. 577, 88 So. 180 (general principle stated; defendant's counsel may point out to the jury the limited purpose of the inquiry); 1920, Vaughn v. State, 17 Ala. App. 383, 84 So. 879 (murder; witnesses to a witness' good character, not allowed to be impeached by cross-examination as to hearing that the witness "had drank whisky, been drunk, or had played cards");

Arizona: 1921, Smith v. State, 22 Ariz. 229, 196 Pac. 420 (larceny); cross-examination to rumors of defendant's misconduct, admitted);

Arkansas: 1904, Long v. State, 72 Ark. 427, 81 S. W. 387, semble; 1920, Woodard v. State, — Ark. —, 220 S. W. 671 (allowed); 1920, Woodard v. State, 143 Ark. 404, 226 S. W. 124 (seduction; cross-examination of witnesses to defendant's reputation, allowed); 1921, Carr v. State, 147 Ark. 524, 227 S. W. 776 (murder; cross-examination of defendant's reputation-witness to notorious instances of violence, allowed);

California: 1896, People v. Mayes, 113 Cal. 618, 45 Pac. 860 (rule applied); 1898, People v. Burns, 121 Cal. 529, 53 Pac. 1096 (question not improper on the facts); 1894, People v. Gordon, 103 Cal. 573, 37 Pac. 535 (rule stated); 1904, People v. Perry, 144 Cal. 748, 78 Pac. 284 (rule applied); 1906, People v. Weber, 149 Cal. 325, 86 Pac. 671 (cross-examination as to being told of misconduct, allowed); 1912, People v. Burke, 18 Cal. App. 72, 122 Pac. 435;

Connecticut: 1917, Verdi v. Donahue, 91 Conn. 448, 99 Atl. 1041 (malicious prosecution; cross-examination of defendant's witness to peaceable repute, asking whether he had heard of an assault by defendant, here excluded);

Florida: 1915, Fine v. State, 70 Fla. 412, 70 So. 379 (murder; cross-examination of good-character witnesses to hearing of specific violence, allowed; as to Nelson v. State, 32 Fla. 244, "in so far as it announces the rule . . . to be different from that expressed in this case, it is overruled");

Georgia: Rev. C. 1910, § 5882, P. C. § 1053 ("particular transactions" can only be asked about "upon cross-examination in seeking for the extent and foundation of the witness' knowledge"); 1886, Pulliam v. Cantrell, 77 Ga. 563, 565, 3 S. E. 280 (the principle admitted; but the question held improper because it represented a crime as a fact, not as a rumor affecting reputation); 1909, Hunter v. State, 133 Ga. 78, 65 S. E. 154 (allowed); 1911, Dotson v. State, 136 Ga. 243, 71 S. E. 164 (murder; cross-examination of witness to defendant's good character, as to having seen defendant in a fight, allowed); 1914, Frank v. State, 141 Ga. 243, 80 S. E. 1016;

Illinois: 1899, Aiken v. People, 183 Ill. 215, 55 N. E. 695 (excluding such inquiries, misconceiving the nature of the problem and citing none of the cases pertinent; Cartwright, C. W. 588 (larceny; cross-examination of witnesses to defendant's good character, as to rumors of other larcenies, held improper in the circumstances);

Kansas: 1896, State v. McDonald, 57 Kan. 537, 46 Pac. 967 (rule applied); 1915, State v. Killion, 95 Kan. 371, 148 Pac. 643 (murder; witnesses to defendant's good repute, allowed to be cross-examined to hearing of his prior violent acts);

Kentucky: 1914, McCreary v. Com., 158 Ky. 612, 165 S. W. 981 (rule applied); 1919, Turner v. Com., 185 Ky. 382, 215 S. W. 76 (rule applied; the Court on request must instruct the jury of the limited use of the answer);

Louisiana: 1893, State v. Donelon, 45 La. An. 744, 754, 12 So. 922 (the doctrine implied, but obscurely stated; here the cross-examination was as to the general bad reputation of the defendant's associates); 1896, State v. Pain, 48 La. An. 311, 19 So. 138 (whether he had not heard that the accused had whipped a woman, and had drawn a pistol on another person, admitted; 1903, Cook v. State, 111 La., 35 So. 665 (murder; cross-examination to the witness' hearing of acts of misconduct bearing on general character, allowed, the accused's witness not having been limited to character for peaceableness); 1906, State v. LeBlanc, 116 La. 822, 41 So. 105; 1911, State v. Green, 127 La. 830, 54 So. 45 (liquor-selling);

Massachusetts: 1876, Com. v. O'Brien, 119 Mass. 346 ("Particular facts may be called to the witness' attention, and he may be asked if he ever heard of them; but this is allowed, not for the purpose of establishing the truth of those facts, but to test the credibility of the witness, and to ascertain what weight or value is to be given to his testimony");

Michigan: 1874, Hamilton v. People, 29 Mich. 173, 188, semble (rule applied); 1913, People v. Huff, 173 Mich. 625, 139 N. W. 1033 (cross-examination of a good character witness to the defendant's conduct after the date of the act charged, excluded);

Mississippi: 1890, Kearney v. State, 68 Miss. 233, 236, 8 So. 292 (a question referring to misconduct as a fact and not as a rumor, excluded; but the principle not alluded to); 1920, Herring v. State, 122 Miss. 647, 84 So. 699 (murder; cross-examination to hearing of a prior assault, excluded without noting the present principle);

Missouri: 1899, State v. McLaughlin, 149 Mo. 19, 50 S. W. 315 (rule applied); 1903, State v. Parker, 172 Mo. 191, 72 S. W. 650 (same); 1903, State v. Boyd, 178 Mo. 2, 76 S. W. 28 (allowable in the trial Court's discretion); 1915, State v. Loesch, — Mo. —, 180 S. W. 875 (obtaining property by false pretences); 1916, State v. Dixon, — Mo. —, 190 S. W. 290; 1917, State v. Willard, — Mo. —, 192 S. W. 437 (murder; cross-examination of defendant's character-witnesses to a conviction for counterfeiting in Washington in 1905; held improper, on the ground of remoteness of time; "there ought to be allowed, not only 'locus penitentiæ,' but 'tempus penitentiae'"; unsound; the limitation in question belongs, if anywhere, under the principle of § 987 ante, but has no place under the present principle); 1919, State v. Steele, 280 Mo. 63, 217 S. W. 80 (abortion; cross-examination to repute as to defendant's having taken the whiskey-cure as a drunkard, allowed); 1920, State v. Seay, 282 Mo. 672, 222 S. W. 427 ("If you had heard that this defendant was charged with etc. etc., would you then say his reputation was good?" held an improper use of the present principle); 1920, State v. Wicker, — Mo. —, 222 S. W. 1014 (assault with intent to kill; defendant's witness to good character for peaceableness, allowed to be examined as to hearing of defendant's former conviction for assault with intent to rape); 1921, State v. McDonald, — Mo. —, 231 S. W. 927 (manslaughter; an objection to such inquiries merely on the allegation that they were "not asked in good faith", held properly overruled; unsound; the Court might have sent out the jury and required the prosecuting attorney to state whether he had credible evidence to justify him in asking the questions); 1922, State v. Affronti, — Mo. —, 238 S. Montana: 1914, State v. Jones, 48 Mont. 505, 139 Pac. 441 (enforcing the distinction stated above in the text);

Nebraska: 1881, Olive v. State, 11 Nebr. 1, 27, 7 N. W. 444 (witness to peaceable character, whether he had not heard of the defendant's drawing a revolver upon some one, excluded, on the erroneous notion that this was lates the fundamental rule of fairness (ante, § 979) that prohibits the use of such facts, (2) it gets at them by hearsay only, and not by trustworthy testimony, and (3) it leaves the other person no means of defending himself by denial or explanation, such as he would otherwise have had if the rule had allowed that conduct to be made the subject of an issue.[2] Moreover, these are not occurrences of possibility, but of daily practice. This method of inquiry or cross-examination is frequently resorted to by counsel for the very purpose of injuring by indirection a character which they are forbidden directly to attack in that way; they rely upon the mere putting of the question (not caring that it is answered negatively) to convey their covert insinuation. The value of the inquiry for testing purposes is often so small and the oppor-

W. 811 (whether the witness, testifying to defendant's character for peaceableness, had heard of a specific instance of his violence, allowed, in the trial Court's discretion, distinguishing and explaining Olive v. State and Patterson v. State);
Nevada: 1917, State v. Sella, 41 Nev. 113, 168 Pac. 278 (deceased in homicide);
New York: 1900, People v. Elliott, 163 N. Y. 11, 57 N. E. 103 (question as to a supporting witness' opinion of reputation if it should be proved that a judgment of divorce on specific grounds had been rendered, etc., excluded); 1908, People v. Laudiero, 192 N. Y. 304, 85 N. E. 132;
New Mexico: 1919, State v. Hawkins, — N. M. —, 184 Pac. 977 (principle applied);
North Carolina: 1830, Barton v. Morphes, 2 Dev. 520 (rule repudiated; first, "this would be doing that indirectly which the law forbids to be done directly, viz., impeaching the character of the witness in chief by specific charges", and, secondly, "if the witness in chief sustains a good general character from common reputation, the supporting witness said nothing untrue in attributing it to him"); 1861, Luther v. Skeen, 8 Jones L. 356 (rule applied); 1888, State v. Bullard, 100 N. C. 486, 6 S. E. 191 (Barton v. Morphes followed); 1896, State v. Ussery, 118 N. C. 1177, 24 S. E. 414 (rule apparently violated; confused opinion); 1898, Marcom v. Adams, 122 N. C. 222, 29 S. E. 333 (whether the witness had not "heard that defendant had committed forgery", excluded); 1905, Coxe v. Singleton, 139 N. C. 361, 51 S. E. 1019 (Barton v. Morphes, approved); 1912, State v. Wilson, 158 N. C. 599, 73 S. E. 812 (murder; cross-examination to repute of defendant as prostitute, allowed, but not repute of particular acts);
Ohio: 1907, State v. Dickerson, 77 Oh. 34, 82 N. E. 969 (cross-examination to rumored misconduct of the accused, here held improper, because the witnesses cross-examined had not testified to the accused's reputation, but to their personal opinion of his character, as allowed in this State);
Oklahoma: 1920, Russell v. State, — Okl. Cr. —, 186 Pac. 490 (rule applied); 1920, Jones v. State, — Okl. Cr. —, 190 Pac. 887 (murder; cross-examination to rumors, allowed);
Oregon: 1901, State v. Ogden, 39 Or. 195, 65 Pac. 449 (admissible; but the opinion states the principle confusedly); 1908, State v. Doris, 51 Or. 136, 94 Pac. 44 (allowed, but a defendant-witness may explain the rumors; the further details to be in the trial Court's discretion); 1919, State v. Bateham, 94 Or. 524, 186 Pac. 5 (indecent liberties; rule of trial Court's discretion applied); 1920, State v. Holbrook, 98 Or. 43, 192 Pac. 640 (rule applied to witness to defendant's "law-abiding" character, on a charge of murder);
Pennsylvania: 1911, Com. v. Colandro, 231 Pa. 343, 80 Atl. 571 (excluded; ignoring the present principle);
South Carolina: 1897, State v. Dill, 48 S. C. 249, 26 S. E. 567 (character for peace and good order; cross-examination to rumors as to illegal whiskey-making, allowed);
Texas: 1903, Holloway v. State, 45 Tex. Cr. 303, 77 S. W. 14 (here erroneously allowing proof of the acts, not merely the rumors); 1921, Lasater v. State, 88 Tex. Cr. 452, 227 S. W. 949 (murder; cross-examination of defendant's reputation-witness, allowed);
Virginia: 1880, Davis v. Franke, 33 Gratt. 426 (whether he had not heard certain people say the character was bad; here excluded, while conceding the principle, because not genuinely a test of accuracy, but a subterfuge to bring in hearsay);
Washington: 1919, State v. Presta, 108 Wash. 256, 183 Pac. 112 (arson; a good character witness not allowed to be asked whether he had heard "about the appellant having had a fire which destroyed the house in which he lived", though a question whether he had heard "that the appellant had been accused of burning his own house", would have been allowed).

tunities of its abuse by underhanded ways are so great that the practice may amount to little more than a mere subterfuge, and should be strictly supervised by forbidding it to counsel who do not use it in good faith.[3]

B. DEFECTS OF SKILL, MEMORY, KNOWLEDGE, ETC., AS EVIDENCED BY PARTICULAR FACTS

§ 989. General Principles; Proof by Extrinsic Testimony. Besides the qualities of Moral Character for veracity, of Bias, Interest, and Corruption, already examined, there are others which may discredit a witness. Their nature is indicated by the requirements for testimonial disqualifications (ante, § 478). If a witness is required to have a minimum of experience in order to testify (ante, § 555), then his degree of experience of and expert capacity will affect the weight of his testimony. If he is required to have certain opportunities for observing the facts in question (ante, § 650), and to be able to recollect them (ante, § 725), and to narrate them intelligibly (ante, § 766), then the degree of his capacities in those respects will affect the weight of his testimony.

But these qualities, as detracting from credit, can seldom be directly testified to as general and abstract qualities (ante, §§ 876, 939). The demonstration of these qualities must usually be made by particular circumstances, sometimes consisting in particular acts of conduct. The question thus arises whether they may be established by extrinsic testimony (from other witnesses), or only by cross-examination of the witness himself.

On this question, shall the analogy be followed of the rule for evidencing moral character (ante, § 979) or of the rule for evidencing bias and interest (ante, § 943)? This is here the chief, if not the only, question of controversy. In general, the rule may be said to be that extrinsic testimony is forbidden for evidencing specific acts of misconduct of the witness himself, but is allowed for evidencing other circumstances; for example, it would be forbidden for showing that a medical expert had blundered in a certain prior operation, but it would be allowed for showing that he had not used the proper instruments in making the experiments to which he testifies. The line of distinction is so indefinite that no settled rule or definition can anywhere be surely predicated. But the practice of exclusion is, on the whole, stricter than it ought to be.

The problem is complicated by the circumstance that the rule against contradiction on "collateral" matters (post, § 1000) is almost always equally applicable, and thus the scope of the present principle seldom comes to be defined. The witness is cross-examined to the desired fact, and then, on his denial, the subsequent proof of it is adjudged according to the rule for contradiction and not the present rule. Hence the doctrine upon the present

[3] For the rule that an impeaching witness may be cross-examined to the names of persons who have spoken disparagingly, see post, § 1111.

For the general rule forbidding counsel to testify indirectly by asking questions, see post, § 1808.

rule remains obscure. Nevertheless, so far as proof by cross-examination is concerned, the logical use of particular instances to evidence incapacity and to lessen thereby the weight of testimony is amply illustrated in the precedents.

§ 990. Scientific Experimental Tests by Psychologists. As the science of psychology progresses, broadening its scope and enlarging its discoveries of precise truths and methods, it will make copious contributions in this particular field of knowledge.[1] Judicial practice should liberally make use of such methods. All that should be required as a condition is the preliminary testimony of a scientist that the proposed test is an accepted one in his profession and that it has a reasonable measure of precision in its indications. Notice to the opponent, in season to attend, if the observations or experiments are made upon the witness out of court beforehand, would ordinarily be a fair requirement also (ante, § 1385).

The distinction between extrinsic testimony and cross-examination here has no significance. The usual objection (ante, § 990) to proof by extrinsic testimony should not be allowed to put any obstacle in the way of using expert testimony from psychologists. The main thing is for Courts to remember that those principles are merely means to an end. If Courts will open their minds to the realization that science can be applied to the judgment of testimonial credit, regardless of rules arising before the days of modern science, they will readily follow a liberal practice.

§ 991. Evidencing Testimonial Incapacity by Particular Errors (Reading, Writing, Valuation, Experimentation, etc.). Wherever a special qualification is required for testimony to a certain fact, the lack of that qualification is ascertainable logically by particular instances of the witness' failure to possess or to exercise it.

(1) On cross-examination there is no doubt that these particular instances may be brought out by questions to the witness himself, — subject to the trial Court's discretion in restricting an examination too trivial or too lengthy.[1] Questions relating to prior instances out of court are possibly less likely to be favorably treated, — for example, an inquiry to a medical witness to the presence of poison, whether he had not on two prior occasions made analyses which turned out to be erroneous; though there can be no sound objection to this frequently valuable method of exposing the possibility of error. But questions exhibiting, by the very course of examination itself, the witness' lack of capacity to understand the subject are common and indubitably orthodox. They are, naturally, most available on subjects requiring a certain skill which is really expertness, though not commonly so termed (ante, § 556) — for example, reading, writing, and the like. The method is illustrated in the following passages:

§ 990. [1] For references to scientific articles and books touching these methods, see the citation ante, § 875.

1754, Canning's Trial, 19 How. St. Tr. 577: The case turned chiefly on the whereabouts of a gypsy on certain days; Hannah Fensham testified to seeing her in the town on the 16th of January, her reason being that "there was a snow on the 15th at night, and the 16th it was wet; . . . my neighbors said, 'This snow is come in the right season, yesterday was the 15th': then I said, 'This must be the 16th', and not only that but I went to the almanack and looked that very day." The cross-examination followed: "Did you look directly to the almanack?" "No, sir, not till the 16th at night." — "Are you very well skilled in almanacks?" "Why not? I can read and write a little." — "Do you know which day of the week it is by the almanack?" "I can; I think so; my head is good enough for that." — "Look in this almanack, and tell me what day of the week it is." (She takes it in her hand; it was a common sheet-almanack, folded up into a book.) "I can't see by this, it is so small." — "Look at it again and take your time." "I cannot see without my spectacles" (she puts them on); "you shall not fool me so." — "Tell me by this the day of the week for the 14th of December." "This is not such an almanack as I look in; I look in a sheet almanack; I cannot tell by this." — "Give it me again, if you cannot tell; . . . now you have shown your skill in almanacks." Her own counsel then gives her the almanack and asks her to point out Sunday in the month of January. "She tells down from the 1st to the 7th day, and said that was Sunday which happened to be Tuesday."

1888, Parnell Commission's Proceedings, 48th day, Times' Rep. pt. 13, p. 102; in support of the charge, against Mr. Parnell and others, of using the Land League to commit crime and intimidation, the speeches to the public and the doings at the League meetings were often proved by Government constables, spies, or other prejudiced persons, and the reports were apt to be partial and misleading; every such witness was accordingly tested with reference to the correctness of his report; this testing turned out for one of them as follows: A. "Some months before Lyden's murder I was at a meeting at Mrs. Walsh's house. There were several persons assembled there. Varilly took the chair." Q. "Was anything proposed or said about any person's cattle?" A. "Yes. . . . A resolution was come to about the killing of these cattle. Some of those present left the room for the purpose of killing them." . . . On cross-examination: Q. "My learned friend has put several rather big words to you about some gentleman taking the chair. Was there a chair to take at Walsh's?" A. "I cannot understand you." Q. "Well; but you know you said that Mr. Varilly took the chair?" A. "He did." Q. "What do you mean?" A. "He was the chairman." Q. "What did he do?" A. "To attend the meetings." Q. "What did he do?" A. "He told them that there should be cattle drowned." Q. "You have been asked by my learned friend whether a resolution was passed. What is a resolution?" A. "I could not tell you." Q. "You have told us there was a resolution. Do you know what that meant?" A. "No." Q. "Was there a secretary?" A. "Yes." Q. "What is it?" A. "Not to tell anybody." Q. "Were you secretary?" A. "I was not." Q. "Was there a secretary?" A. "I do not know whether there was or not."

Circa 1875, Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Steamer New South, U. S. Distr. Ct., So. Distr. Ill.;[2] an action was brought by one steamboat company on the lower Mississippi against another for injuries sustained in the sinking of one of its vessels in a collision caused by the careless backing out of the Cairo harbor of a boat of the defendant company. Because of the harbor and pilot regulations, it was essential to the plaintiff's case to show that the collision had taken place in the middle of the river, and not two-thirds of the way across, as the defendant contended. Several colored deckhands of the defendant had sworn that the collision took place two-thirds of the way across. One in particular was vehement in his declarations that he knew it was two-thirds across, as he had noticed it definitely at the time. The counsel for the plaintiff, Mr. W. B. Gilbert, on the cross-examination, took a sheet of paper, folded it once at the centre, and said: "Now, that's half, is n't it?" "Yes, suh." Folding it over in halves again, he said, "Now, that's a third, is n't it?" "Yes, suh!" (promptly). Then opening out the sheet, thus creased, into four divisions, the lawyer said, pointing to the first, "John, here's one-third?" "Yes, suh." To the second, "Here's two-thirds." "Yes, suh." To the third, "That's three thirds." "Yes, suh." "John, we've got four thirds. What are we going to do?" "Dunno, suh; throw away the fourth one, I reckon. But I know, suh, that the two boats struck right there at the end of the second third!"

(2) Proof of such particular instances of error by other witnesses is generally regarded as inadmissible, and for reasons analogous to those of the character-rule (ante, § 979), namely, confusion of issues, by the introduction of numerous subordinate controversies involving comparatively trivial matters, and unfair surprise, by leaving the impeached witness unable to surmise the tenor or the time of supposed conduct which might be attributed to him by false testimony. Nevertheless, such instances may often be most effective evidentially, and the possible disadvantages may not always be present. The trial Court should therefore have the discretion to permit this mode of proof when it seems useful.[3]

Whether extrinsic testimony is admissible to prove other circumstances detracting from the witness' qualification is doubtful, as a matter of precedent, though not of principle. That a mining engineer's experience has been gained in a locality of a different sort from that of the case in hand, that a Leighton, Mr. Thornycroft, and Mr. Millais, of the Royal Academy, testified that the latter bust, compared with the former, "had no artistic merit"; the plaintiff then proved the genuineness of the former by a person who had seen him working on it; "this rebutting evidence of course smashed entirely the mere hypothetical evidence of experts"); also more briefly mentioned in Lord Alverstone's Recollections of Bar and Bench, 105; U. S. Fed. 1814, Story, J., in Odiorne v. Winkley, 2 Gallis. 52 (in a suit for infringement of patent, priority of invention being pleaded, a witness to the identity of the two machines was shown a similar machine invented by a third person and was interrogated as to the points of identity and difference, in order to show by other testimony the witness' ignorance of mechanics, and thus his general incorrectness; the questions were rejected); Ind. 1885, Louisville N. Miss. 609, 631 (notary's certificate impeachable by evidence of his custom to certify improperly; distinction noted between such impeachment and facts affecting character); *N. E. 579 (an expert witness' error in declaring genuine certain spurious signatures, not otherwise in issue, but shown to him as a test, held not collateral, and therefore allowed to be established by other testimony; prior inconsistent cases repudiated; "the competency of a witness to express an opinion . . . is incidental to the main issue, because it attacks the foundation of the evidence"); 1906, People v. Pekarz, 185 N. Y. 470, 78 N. E. 294 (cross-examination of an alienist; Hoag v. Wright, supra, approved).

medical witness' experience has been brief and insufficient, that an interpreter has lived in a part of the country using a different dialect, — circumstances like these would not be obnoxious to any rule against extrinsic testimony.[4] But all this should be left to the trial Court's discretion.

§ 992. Same: Grounds of an Expert Opinion. (1) The data on which an expert rests his specific opinion (as distinguished from the facts which make him skillful to form one at all) may of course be fully inquired into upon cross-examination.[1] Without them, the value of the opinion cannot be estimated.

(2) But may the incorrectness or insufficiency of such data be established by calling other witnesses? This is permissible and common, without doubt, so far as it involves merely the questioning of other expert witnesses upon their opinion of the validity of the first witness' grounds; for they are usually called primarily for the sake of their own opinion in the cause, and their discrediting of the first witness' grounds of opinion may incidentally be inquired into without encumbering the issues,[2] — for example, when a medical witness, testifying to the cause of death as drowning, states as a ground the presence of froth on the lungs, and then other medical witnesses, testifying to the cause of death, deny that froth on the lungs indicates death by drowning. But where the confuting of the data given requires the calling of witnesses who would not otherwise be in the cause, the propriety of this is open to doubt. Nevertheless, it may often become highly important for exposing error; and the trial Court should have discretion to permit it.[3] The following passages illustrate its possibilities:

1723, Bishop Atterbury's Trial, 16 How. St. Tr. 494, 672; treasonable letters had been attributed to the defendant; but when the Crown experts who claimed to have been able to decipher them were asked by him to produce the key on which they founded their translation, the request was refused on grounds of the public necessity of keeping the methods of such skilled persons a secret (post, § 2378). The Duke of Wharton thus attacked the ruling:

Compare the cases cited post, § 1004, § 2015.

"The person who is the decipherer is not to be confuted, and what he says must be taken for granted, because the key cannot be produced with safety to the public!, and consequently (if his conjectures be admitted to be evidence) our lives and fortunes must depend on the skill and honesty of decipherers, who may with safety impose on the Legislature when there are not means of contradicting them for want of seeing their key. . . . The greatest certainty human reason knows is a mathematical demonstration; and were I brought to your lordships' bar, to be tried upon a proposition of Sir Isaac Newton's, which he upon oath would swear to be true, I would appeal to your lordships whether I should not be unjustly condemned, unless he produced his demonstration that I might have the liberty of enquiring into the truth of it from men of equal skill."

1915, Lord ALVERSTONE, Recollections of Bar and Bench, p. 116: "In the course of the case I had a striking example of how essential it is to test expert testimony, and how frequently experts generalize from insufficient data, and confidently give evidence which is not based on actual knowledge and does not therefore justify the conclusions at which they arrive. The matter arose in this way. A medical expert, a chemist of very great experience and high reputation, was called for the plaintiff, and described the periods of infection, and at what stage the infection was most likely to be propagated; he agreed with the evidence upon which I was instructed, that the most dangerous period was when the skin began to dry, and the dust, or small particles of skin, were given off from the body. So far his view was in entire accordance with that of my witnesses, but on instructions I asked him whether it was not a fact that in smallpox cases the air-passages of the lungs and the interior of the body developed spots of the same character as those on the skin, and that it was the particles from these internal spots exhaled by the breath that were among the main causes of infection. He said that he believed that there was one case to be found in the books in which spots had been found in the interior passages of the lungs of a smallpox patient. I heard a groan behind me. I turned round, and one of my experts, a man of great practical experience, who had had charge of one of the large smallpox hospitals in the North of England, whispered to me: 'And this man calls himself an expert! I have made over a thousand post-mortem examinations of smallpox patients who had died from the disease, and I have never found any case in which the spots on the interior passages of the body were not present.'"

§ 993. Knowledge; Testing the Witness' Capacity to Observe. It is not doubtful that on cross-examination, so far as feasible by mere questions, the witness' physical capacity to observe (by sight, hearing, or the like) may be tested.[1] On the other hand, it is hardly less doubtful that extrinsic testimony to particular instances of his incapacity in those respects would not be permissible. But mere questions on cross-examination can seldom effect much; the useful thing is usually something of a mixed nature, i.e. experiments made in court to test the witness' powers. These should be freely allowed, subject to the discretion of the trial Court.[2]

St. Tr. 294 ("I desire that the prisoner may be brought forward to the front seat and some persons, as nearly of his own condition in appearance as may be, should be placed there along with him"; this was done); 1894, Heath v. State, 93 Ga. 446, 21 S. E. 77 (testing a witness' power of vision by sending him to the window, etc., held not improperly refused in discretion).

For other instances of experiments to test sight and hearing, see ante, § 460. Compare the cases cited ante, § 944, post, §§ 1004, 1368.

§ 994. Same: Grounds of Knowledge and Opportunity to Observe. Every witness must have had some fair opportunity to observe the matters to which he testifies (ante, § 650). The circumstances, therefore, which indicate that his opportunities of acquiring knowledge were less full and adequate than they might have been are always relevant to diminish the weight of his testimony:

Ante 1726, Chief Baron GILBERT, Evidence, 148: "Another thing that would render his testimony doubtful is the not giving the reasons and causes of his knowledge; for if a man could give the reasons and causes of his knowledge, and doth not, he is forsworn, . . . and that a man should know anything and not [be able to] tell how he comes to know it, is incredible."

1853, CHILTON, J., in Campbell v. State, 23 Ala. 78: "In order to ascertain the credit due to the testimony of a witness, the jury should be informed of his opportunity for observation, the accuracy with which that observation has been conducted, the fidelity of memory with which it is related, the witness' habits, pursuits, his conduct, disposition, situation in life, relation to the parties, etc."

(1) That these inquiries may be made on cross-examination is undoubted:[1]

1744, Heath's Trial, 18 How. St. Tr. 65; Mrs. Cole had testified to the presence of Mrs. Heath, another witness, on an important occasion; cross-examined: "Madam, do you remember that Mrs. Heath come to awaken your mother?" "I do remember that she came." — "Was there a light in the room?" "There was not." — "Had Mrs. Heath a light with her?" "She might have had a candle in her hand." — "Was there light or not?" "There was not; I believe there might be a fire." — "Had she a candle in her hand?" "Indeed, I cannot tell." . . . — "The reason of the question is this; look at that woman; will you swear positively that that is the woman that came into the room to call your mother?" "Mrs. Heath was the person, and I believe that is the same." — "How can you tell it was her when there was no light?" "I knew her voice."

(2) The circumstances thus detracting from the witness' opportunities of knowledge may also be established by extrinsic testimony, on the same principle (ante, §§ 948, 966) as the circumstances indicating bias and interest. Any other rule would frequently make a false witness' testimony impregnable:[2]

1857, Armstrong's Trial (John T. Richards, Lincoln the Lawyer-Statesman, 1916, p. 45): "On the evening of August 29, 1857, Duff Armstrong had become embroiled with one of his companions named Metzker, on the outskirts of a grove where a camp-meeting was being held in Mason County. On the same evening Metzker was struck on the back of the head with some hard instrument by a man named Norris, who had been drinking heavily. Within three days thereafter Metzker died, and Duff Armstrong and Norris were jointly indicted on the charge of murder. Armstrong claimed that he had struck Metzker only with his fist, while the marks found upon the body showed plainly that at least two blows, either of which might have caused death, had been struck with some heavy instrument, and it was charged that one of them had been struck by Armstrong with a slung-shot. . . . The principal witness against him was one Allen, who testified that at about eleven o'clock on the evening of August 29, 1857, he saw the accused strike Metzker with a slung-shot. Lincoln conducted the cross-examination of the witness, Allen, and in the course of it he asked him how near he was to Metzker at the time the blow was struck, and other questions, the answers to which indicated that Allen was a considerable distance away at the time — tradition fixes the distance at about 150 feet.

"Lincoln then inquired of the witness how at that distance he was able to see the blow struck at that hour of the night. Allen repiied that he saw it by the light of the moon. Lincoln caused the witness to repeat this answer several times, so that there could be no doubt in the mind of any one as to the statement of the witness. Allen also testified very positively that the moon was shining brightly at the hour named.

"Among other evidence on behalf of the accused, Mr. Lincoln introduced an almanac, by means of which he showed that on the night in question the moon had just completed its first quarter, that it set before midnight, and that at the hour named by Allen it was so dim, because so near the western horizon, as to render it impossible that Allen could have seen, by its iight, a blow struck by Armstrong. The result was that the jury disregarded the testimony of Allen and returned a verdict of not guilty."[3]

§ 995. Memory; Testing the Capacity and the Grounds of Recollection.

(1) Subject to the general principle (ante, § 944) that the trial Court's discretion controls the testing of a witness' capacity of recollection, by cross-examination upon other circumstances, even unconnected with the case in hand, is a recognized and common method of measuring the weight of his testimony.[1] Repeated instances of inability to recollect give the right to doubt

[2] 1881, Albert v. R. Co., 98 Pa. 316, 318, 321 (a witness had testified to seeing a field fire; outside testimony that his view was obstructed by an embankment, admitted). The cases involve usually also the question of contradicting on a collateral point, and are therefore collected post, § 1004.

[3] This incident of the Armstrong Trial was made use of by Mr. Eggleston, in the trial scene of "The Graysons" (ch. 27).

It may be noted that the slander, afterwards started, and chiefly given currency by Lamon's Life, that Lincoln had used a spurious almanac, was long ago amply refuted by a competent witness (Mr. James L. King, ex rel. Judge Bergen, in North American Review, 1898, vol. 166, p. 186); the evidence is fully collected and examined in Mr. John T. Richards' authoritative work, cited above.

§ 995. [1] On the principle of § 944, ante, the trial Court's discretion is usually conceded to control. 1890, Davis v. Cal. Powder Works, 84 Cal. 629, 24 Pac. 387; 1868, Kelsey v. Ins. Co., 35 Conn. 225, 233 (policy on the first wife's life; question as to the date of marriage with the second wife, admissible in discretion); 1885, Sewall v. Robbins, 139 Mass. 165, 29 N. E. 650 (the witness' inability to remember the number of days he attended the former trial; allowed in discretion); 1921, State v. Ford, 286 Mo. 624, 228 S. W. 480 (uttering a forged note, bearing S.'s signature as surety; S. denied the signature; evidence that S. had "signed many notes for the defendant", held admissible, as tending to show error of memory in S.); 1899, Willard v. Sullivan, 69 N. H. 491, 45 Atl. 400 (rests in trial Court's discretion); 1895, Cunningham v. R. Co., 88 Tex.

the correctness of an alleged recollection of a material fact; the force of the instances depending on the greater or less probability that the one thing could be forgotten while the other is remembered. Some of the most effective exposures of false testimony in the history of trials have been achieved by this method. All the great cross-examiners have relied upon it; though in ordinary hands it is often over-used:

1679, Langhorn's Trial, 7 How. St. Tr. 417, 452; Oates, the informer, had testified that the Popish Plotters met in London on April 24, and that he had come over to the meeting from the Jesuit College at St. Omer in France with Sir John Warner; one of the Jesuit attendants was put on by the defence to prove that Warner had not left the College at that time: Witness: "He lived there all that while." Mr. J. PEMBERTON: "Was Sir John Warner there all June?" Witness: "My lord, I cannot tell that; I only speak to April and May." L. C. J. SCROGGS: "Where was Sir John Warner in June and July?" Witness: "I cannot tell." L. C. J.: "You were gardener there then?" Witness: "Yes, I was." L. C. J.: "Why cannot you as well tell me, then, where he was in June and July, as in April and May?" Witness: "I cannot be certain." L. C. J.: "Why not so certain for those two months as you are for the other?" Witness: "Because I did not take so much notice." L. C. J.: "How came you to take more notice of the one than the other?" "Because the question that I came for, my lord, did not fall upon that time." L. C. J.: "That, without all question, is a plain and honest answer." Mr. J. DOLBEN: "Indeed, he hath forgot his lesson; you should have given him better instructions." L. C. J.: "Now that does shake all that was said before, and looks as if he came on purpose and prepared for those months."

1794, Mr. Thomas Erskine, cross-examining in Hardy's Trial, 24 How. St. Tr. 647 (the witness had testified to the instances at a seditious meeting): "Where did you live before you lived with this Mr. Kellerby?" "At Mr. Faulder's." — "Where before that?" "In Cheapside, with Mr. Smith." — "How long is that ago?" "That is between four and five years ago."—"What did you leave Smith for?" "We had some words." — "Had some words; what might the words be, think you?" — "I do not know, I am sure, exactly now; we had some words and upon that account we parted." — "You have an amazing good memory; you have repeated a whole speech a man made at a meeting, but you cannot remember the few words that passed between you and your master. Now try; I will sit down and give you time." . . . L. C. J. EYRE: "Why do you not give an answer?" "I cannot recollect the words, it is so long ago."

Mr. Brougham: "Where did the maids sleep?" Majocchi: "I do not know." Mr. Brougham: "Where did Captain Flynn sleep?" Majocchi: "I do not know." Mr. Brougham: "Did you not, when you were ill during the voyage, sleep below [in the hold] under the deck?" Majocchi: "Under the deck." Mr. Brougham: "Did those excellent sailors always remain below in the hold with you?" Majocchi: "This I cannot remember if they slept in the hold during the night-time or went up." Mr. Brougham: "Who slept in the place where you used to sleep down below in the hold?" Majocchi: "I know very well that I slept there, but I do not remember who else." Mr. Brougham: "Where did the livery servants of the suite sleep?" Majocchi: "This I do not remember." Mr. Brougham: "Were you not yourself a livery servant?" Majocchi: "Yes." Mr. Brougham: "Where did the Padroni of the vessel sleep?" Majocchi: "I do not know." Mr. Brougham: "When her Royal Highness was going by sea on her voyage [at another time] from Sicily to Tunis, where did she sleep?" Majocchi: "This I cannot remember." Mr. Brougham: "When she was afterwards going from Tunis to Constantinople on board the ship, where did her Royal Highness sleep?" Majocchi: "This I do not remember." Mr. Brougham: "When she was going from Constantinople to the Holy Land on board the ship, where did she sleep then?" Majocchi: "I do not remember." Mr. Brougham: "Where did Bergami sleep on those three voyages of which you have just been speaking?" Majocchi: "This I do not know."[3]

1900, Hon. J. F. Daly, in "The Brief", III, 10: "One of the neatest effects ever witnessed was produced by a single question put by one of the young leaders at our bar in the course of an inquiry on 'habeas corpus' as to the sanity of an interested party. A medical expert had testified to his mental unsoundness, and had detailed with great clearness the tests he applied to his case, and the results which established to his satisfaction an advanced stage of paresis. He finished his direct examination one afternoon, and next day was cross-examined for the purpose of eliciting that many of the conditions he described could be found in every sane person. After being questioned as to the first indication of mental feebleness he had specified, he was then asked what was the second feature of the cases he had mentioned as indicating paresis. The witness was unable to recall which he had mentioned second. 'What, Doctor, you can't recall the second indication of progressive mental decay which you spoke of yesterday?' 'No, I cannot, I confess.' 'Well, that's funny. Your second indication was "loss of memory of recent events"!' The doctor admitted cheerfully that he had the symptoms himself in a marked degree."

1892, TILLINGHAST, J., in State v. Ellwood, 17 R. I. 767, 24 Atl. 782 (indictment for burglary and stealing a chain): "The witness M., a manufacturing jeweller, was asked in cross-examination to give the amount, approximately, of the business of his firm in the course of the year. It appeared in evidence that the chain in question was sold to H. by the witness seven or eight years ago, and this question was asked for the purpose of showing what recollection the witness would be likely to have of a transaction which took place so long ago. We do not think that this was a proper way to test the recollection of the witness. The extent of his business was his own private affair, and the defendant had no right to inquire into it in this way. Moreover, it appears by the subsequent examination of the witness by the defendant, that the extent of his business in the manufacture of chains similar to the one in question was inquired into, together with the size, style, weight, and price thereof. This was all that was pertinent to the inquiry which was then being made. And while considerable latitude is allowed in the cross-examination of a witness for the purpose of testing his recollection, yet this is no reason for permitting the cross-examiner to pry into the private affairs of the witness in regard to matters wholly foreign to the investigation."

[2] These questions were not all put in direct sequence; a few intervening questions are here omitted.

[3] In his opening address for the defence (II, 33), Mr. Brougham made forcible use of these significant answers of Majocchi, prophesying that "as long as the words 'I don't remember' were known to the English language, the image of Majocchi, without the man being named, would forthwith arise to the imagination"; and his iteration of that betraying phrase 'non mi ricordo' has indeed become an indelible episode of forensic history. In McDermott's Estate, 148 Cal. 43, 82 Pac. 842 (1905) is found the record of a witness whose testimony exhibited Majocchi's striking trait.

(2) In proving the falsity of such a test-instance erroneously recollected,[4] or the falsity of a circumstance given as the ground of recollection,[5] it is more common to exclude extrinsic testimony. Nevertheless, in simple cases, where the effect might be important, this ought to be admitted. There is no propriety in a hard-and-fast rule; and the trial Court should be conceded a discretion.

§ 996. Narration; Discrediting the Form of Testimony. The trustworthiness of the form in which testimony is delivered (ante, § 766) is usually sufficiently ascertainable by the demeanor of the witness on the stand (ante, § 946).[1] But when the testimony is given in writing by deposition, or is a hearsay statement received by exception, it may be necessary to show by extrinsic testimony such circumstances as detract from the trustworthiness of the form of utterance.[2] There is here usually no means of obtaining these See further the authorities collected post, § 1004.

[5] The authorities are collected post, § 1004, because the rule about contradiction is also always involved; the following case shows the sort of evidence involved: 1899, Jefferson v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 49 S. W. 88 (perjury; a witness having testified to the defendant's being sworn and to remembering it because that trial preceded certain others, proof that the prior trial was a different one was allowed).

§ 996. [1] But the following ruling is sound: 1889, Graham v. McReynolds, 88 Tenn. 247, 12 S. W. 547 (that a third party had threatened the witness "if she did not swear plaintiff's child to the defendant he would send her to hell in a minute", admitted).

in the handwriting of an interested person, admitted); 1836, People v. Moore, 15 Wend. 421 (showing that a deposition taken by a magistrate and signed by the witness, but not required by law to have been read over to him, was in fact not read over to him; admitted); 1857, Cook v. Brown, 34 N. H. 463, 471 (the witness said that the defendant had written out her deposition and she was going to sit up that night and learn it; admitted). The circumstances thus admissible in discredit are further ascertainable from the cases collected ante, §§ 786–788, 803–805 (deposition), §§ 753, 764 (memoranda to aid recollection), post, § 446 (dying declarations), § 1556 (regular entries).

SUB-TITLE II (continued): TESTIMONIAL IMPEACHMENT

TOPIC IV: SPECIFIC ERROR (CONTRADICTION)

CHAPTER XXXIII.

§ 1000. Theory. If an eye-witness to a homicide swears that the murderer bore a scar upon his cheek, and the accused is perceived by the jury to have no such scar, it is plain that on that particular point the witness is wholly in error. If the same witness should testify, among other circumstances, that the killing was done at night, by the light of the full moon, and a reference to an almanac should show that the moon did not appear in that place on that night, in a similar way his error on that point would be apparent. If his testimony should assert, among other things, that the assailant wore a white hat, and on the other side five unimpeachable eye-witnesses should attest that the assailant wore a black hat, then the same result would follow, provided the testimony of the opposing witnesses were believed. Suppose, again, that he makes the same assertion as to a white hat, and five unimpeachable witnesses swear that the accused never owned or possessed a white hat, the same result would follow, provided, first, that the testimony of the opposing witnesses were believed, and, secondly, that the impossibility also be accepted of the accused having been able to obtain temporarily a white hat.

Now in all four of these instances the probative effect is the same, namely, the witness is perceived by the tribunal to be in error on a particular point; the difference between the instances consists merely in the method of making the error clear to the tribunal. In the first instance, the senses of the tribunal itself determine by inspection and without ordinary evidence; in the second instance, the error appears by means of hearsay testimony of an ordinarily incontrovertible sort; in the third instance it is necessary that faith be given to the opposing testimony before the error can be accepted; in the fourth instance, it is necessary, not only that the opposing testimony be believed, but also that certain circumstantial facts additionally be accepted as existing and as probative before the error can be accepted. Whatever the method of proving the contrary of the witness' asserted fact, the ultimate result aimed at is the same, namely, to persuade the tribunal that the witness has completely erred on that particular point.

Now the commonest instances in practice are the third and the fourth, i.e., the marshalling of one or more witnesses (with or without other circumstantial evidence) who deny the fact asserted by the first witness and maintain the opposite to be the truth. Thus, the dramatic feature of the attempt to prove the error is a contradiction of the first witness by one or more in opposition. Yet this contradiction in itself does nothing probatively, not unless the contradicting witness or witnesses are believed in preference to the first one, i.e. unless his error is established. It is not the contradiction, but the truth of the contradicting assertion as opposed to the first one, that constitutes the probative end. Nevertheless, the contradiction, being the usual and prominent feature of the process by which that end is aimed at, has served as the common name to designate the probative end itself. This is not wrong, provided it be clearly understood what that end is.

Such being the real probative end which the contradiction is intended to serve, what is the exact nature of that probative effect? Assume that the end is accomplished, and that the tribunal accepts as a fact that the witness is completely in error on that particular point, what is the place of this fact in the general system of discrediting or impeaching evidence?

The peculiar feature of this probative fact of Error on a particular point is its deficiency with respect to definiteness and its wide range with respect to possible significance. Looking back over the various kinds of defects of testimonial qualifications already considered, it will be seen that the evidence was aimed clearly and specifically at a particular defect; it showed either that or nothing. Former perjury would indicate probably a deficient sense of moral duty to speak truth; relationship to the party, a probable inclination to distort the facts, consciously or unconsciously; misjudgment of a test-specimen of handwriting, a probable lack of skill in judging of writings; and so on. Now the present sort of fact is not offered as definitely showing any specific defect of any of these kinds, and yet it may justify an inference of the existence of any one or more of them. We know simply that an erroneous statement has been made on one point, and we infer that the witness is capable of making an erroneous statement on other points. We are not asked, and we do not attempt to specify, the particular defect which was the source of the proved error and which might therefore be the source of another error. The source might be a mental defect as to powers of observation or recollection; it might be a lack of veracity-character; it might be bias or corruption; it might be lack of experiential capacity; it might be lack of opportunity of knowledge. As to all this, nothing can be specified. The inference is only that since, for this proved error, there was some unspecified defect which became a source of error, the same defect may equally exist as the source of some other error, otherwise not apparent. No doubt the repetition of instances affects the strength of the inference; i.e. if a witness has testified to ten separate points, and if his assertions are proved to be incorrect not merely upon one but upon six of these points, one is more inclined to believe that the underlying defective quality, whatever it may be, is radical and complete, and to assume easily that it applies to and annuls his assertions on all the remaining points. But it is still true that the error in itself does not definitely indicate any one specific defect; that there is no attempt consciously to analyze its bearings in that respect; and that the typical probative process is that of inferring a general defective trustworthiness on other points from proved defective trustworthiness on one point.[1]

It will thus be seen, as above suggested, that the strength and usefulness of this sort of evidence consists in the wide range of defective qualities which it opens to our inference; and that its weakness consists in the indefiniteness of its inference.

In view of this source of its weakness, there is no difficulty in appreciating the logical basis for a limitation that is well established in the law; and this is now to be considered:

§ 1001. Error on Collateral Matters cannot be Shown; (1) Logical Basis. In so far as the point on which the proved error exists is removed in conditions and circumstances from the point as to which the inference of other error is desired to be drawn, the possible explanations (in the way of defective qualities) multiply which may be accepted without necessarily accepting one which applies to the desired point; conversely, in so far as the conditions and circumstances are the same, then the explanations tend to become identical, i.e. so that the defective quality, whatever it was, that caused the proved error, must have operated, more or less certainly, to cause error also on the point at issue, so clearly connected with it in conditions and circumstances. For example, suppose a witness to testify that the accused struck the first blow in an affray; and suppose it to appear that this witness, four years ago, incorrectly asserted that a street-car conductor had not returned him the right amount of change after payment of fare; or that two years ago he incorrectly asserted that Yankton was the capital of South Dakota;

§ 1000. [1] See the opinion of Holmes, J., in Gertz v. Fitchburg R. Co., 137 Mass. 77, quoted post, § 1109.

From the point of view of logic and psychology as applicable to argument before the jury (not the rules of Admissibility), see the materials collected in the present author's "Principles of Judicial Proof, as given by Logic, Psychology, and General Experience, and illustrated in Judicial Trials" (1913), §§ 335–355.

or that one year ago he incorrectly asserted that his brother was in California; or that one month ago he incorrectly stated the day of the month; in all these instances the significance of the error is felt logically to be trifling, because the defect which was the source of any one of those errors may not be operating with respect to his assertion now in question, and the probability of its operating is so indefinite as not to be worth considering. But suppose it to appear that another assertion of this witness, that the deceased had no weapon in his hand when struck, is incorrect; now we may begin to attach significance to this error, because the source of it, while it need not be also operating as to the main assertion in question, is much more likely to be operating. Or, if the error consist in asserting that the deceased was knocked down by the accused's blow (when in truth he remained standing), the error is vital, because the defective source of that assertion must almost necessarily have operated also for the assertion that the accused struck first; and, if the former assertion appears to be untrustworthy, the latter must fall with it (so far as this witness' testimony is concerned).[1]

Thus, an error upon a distant and distinct matter is logically and psychologically much inferior in value to an error upon a closely connected matter, in its bearing upon the trustworthiness of the assertion in question. This seems to be the logical foundation for the readiness of our law to draw a distinction, in allowing proof of such errors, between matters "collateral" and other matters.

§ 1002. Same: (2) Reason of Auxiliary Policy. But it remains true that "collateral" errors, though only remotely probative, are still probative, i.e. relevant; and the controlling reason for exclusion is the reason of Auxiliary Policy (ante, § 42). This is the one emphasized by the Courts, with varying phrases and arguments:

1679, Whitebread's Trial, 7 How. St. Tr. 311, 374; the defendant offered to prove that Oates had made a false statement as to his companions, in his testimony at a prior trial for the Popish Plot. L. C. J. NORTH: "That is nothing to the purpose. If you can contradict him in anything that hath been sworn here, do." Defendant: "If we can prove him a perjured man at any time, we do our business." L. C. J.: "How can we prove one cause in another? . . . Can he come prepared to make good everything that he hath said in his life?" Another defendant: "All that I say is this, If he be not honest, he can be witness in no case." L. C. J.: "But how will you prove that? Come on, I will teach you a little logic. If you will come to contradict a witness, you ought to do it in a matter which is the present debate here; for if you would convict him of anything that he said in Ireland's trial, we must try Ireland's cause over again."

1680, Earl of Castlemaine's Trial, 7 id. 1067, 1081, 1107; on an offer to contradict on a collateral matter; Attorney-General: "If he may ask questions about such foreign matters as this, no man can justify himself; . . . any man may be catched thus." Defendant: "How can a man be catched in the truth?" L. C. J. SCROGGS: "We are not to hearken to it. The reason is this, first: You must have him perjured, and we are not now to try whether that thing sworn in another place be true or false; because that is the way to accuse whom you please, and that may make a man a liar that cannot imagine this will be put to him; and so no man's testimony that comes to be a witness shall leave himself safe."

§ 1001. [1] See the remarks of Story, J., in Santissima Trinidad, 7 Wheat. 283, 338.

1847, ALDERSON, B., in Attorney-General v. Hitchcock, 1 Exch. 104: "When the question is not relevant, strictly speaking, to the issue, but tending to contradict the witness, his answer must be taken (although it tends to show that he in that particular instance speaks falsely, and although it is [thus] not altogether immaterial to the issue) for the sake of the general public convenience; for great inconvenience would follow from a continual course of those sorts of cross-examinations which would be let in in the case of a witness being called for the purpose of contradiction." ROLFE, B.: "The laws of evidence on this subject, as to what ought and what ought not to be received, must be considered as founded on a sort of comparative consideration of the time to be occupied in examinations of this nature and the time which it is practicable to bestow upon them. If we lived for a thousand years, instead of about sixty or seventy, and every case were of sufficient importance, it might be possible and perhaps proper to throw a light on matters in which every possible question might be suggested, for the purpose of seeing by such means whether the whole was unfounded, or what portion of it was not, and to raise every possible inquiry as to the truth of the statements made. But I do not see how that could be; in fact, mankind find it to be impossible. Therefore some line must be drawn."

1861, ROBINSON, C. J., in R. v. Brown, 21 U. C. Q. B. 334: ["These controversies] arise when a counsel, in cross-examination of a witness, uses a license which the practice allows him of asking a variety of questions having no apparent connection with the matter to be tried, in the hope of involving the witness in some contradiction. He is not in such cases obliged to explain the object of his questions, because that might often defeat his object; but he must be content to take the answers which the witness gives to any question that is irrelevant, and is not allowed to call witnesses to disprove the statements he makes in reply, because that would lead to the trial of innumerable issues irrelevant to the case, and would distract the attention of the jury. And besides, which is even a better reason, it would be unsafe and would be unjust towards the witness to infer, from any contradiction that might be given by another witness, that the one who has been cross-examined has sworn falsely and is unworthy of belief; since he could not have contemplated that he would be questioned upon points unconnected with the facts to be tried, and could therefore not be expected to be able on the sudden to support his testimony by the evidence of other persons, though it might be perfectly true in itself, notwithstanding the contradiction."

1847, ALLEN, J., in Charlton v. Unis, 4 Gratt. 62: "Any other rule would tend to divert the attention of the jury from the real enquiry before them, whether the witness was entitled to credit in the evidence he had given, to the enquiry whether he had told the truth upon some collateral question; and the danger is encountered that, upon this collateral issue raised on the trial, evidence may become proper, and so be let in, which would be illegal upon the trial of the issue between the real parties to the cause; and such illegal testimony may make an improper impression upon the minds of the jury, notwithstanding any instruction of the Court as to the proper bearing thereof."

1854, REDFIELD, C. J., in Powers v. Leach, 26 Vt. 277: "The issue attempted to be raised in regard to P.'s testimony was altogether collateral to the main issue in the case, and the Court might have rejected the testimony altogether and it would not have been error. We may suppose that such collateral issues might spring up in regard to the testimony of every witness upon the stand, and thus a single issue branch out into an indefinite number of subordinate and collateral ones, and these again into many more upon each point, so that it would become literally impossible ever to finish the trial of a single case. This rule, therefore, that one cannot be allowed to contradict a witness upon a matter wholly collateral to the main issue, becomes of infinite importance in the trial of cases before the jury. A judge may no doubt in his discretion allow a departure from the rule, but is not obliged to do so." [1]

§ 1002. [1] So also: 1896, Brickell, C. J., in Crawford v. State, 112 Ala. 1, 21 So. 214; 1897, Wallin, J., in State v. Haynes, 7 N. D. 70, 72 N. W. 923 (careful statement of the principle); 1900, Chase, J., in Cooper v. Hopkins, 70 N. H. 271, 48 Atl. 100.

It is here important to observe how far these reasons of policy coincide with the reasons which exclude extrinsic testimony of particular acts of misconduct to show bad moral character (ante, § 979). (1) There is a reason of Unfair Surprise (post, § 1849); one might contrive and charge upon the witness an error of any kind, time, or place; and it would obviously be unfair to expect him to be prepared to refute it, except so far as it bears directly upon the matter in litigation. This reason, then, is in general the same as in the other rule. (2) There is a reason of Confusion of Issues (post, § 1904); for the necessity of investigating each error alleged would add to the trial so much consumption of time and confusion of issues as to be intolerable. But here the reason points out a peculiar limitation; for while, in an issue of the witness' misconduct as relevant to show bad moral character, we are distinctly adding a mass of testimony otherwise irrelevant and out of place, yet this is not necessarily so with testimony directed to show the witness to be in error, since the point of the error may very well be a point already relevant in the case, and thus the testimony upon that point is no additional testimony, but is testimony which could have been in any case offered and must have been admitted if offered; on such a point, then, the proof of the witness' error is not an addition to the issues of the trial, and therefore is in no way obnoxious to the reason for exclusion.

§ 1003. Test of Collateralness. The reason above examined suggests immediately the limitation to the rule of exclusion. It is not the proof of every error that is obnoxious to the rule. The common term for designating the line of exclusion is "collateral"; no contradiction, we are told, shall be permitted on "collateral" matters.[1]

But this term furnishes no real test. If it be asked what "collateral" means, we are obliged either to define it further — in which case it is a mere epithet, not a legal test — or to illustrate by specific examples — in which case we are left to the idiosyncrasies of individual opinion upon each instance. The test that is dictated by the principle above explained, and the only test in vogue that has the qualities of a true test — definiteness, concreteness, and ease of application — is that laid down in Attorney-General v. Hitchcock: Could the fact, as to which error is predicated, have been shown in evidence for any purpose independently of the contradiction? This test was laid down in connection with the Self-contradiction doctrine, and is examined in further detail under that principle (post, § 1021). That the test is identical for both doctrines is perhaps not a necessary consequence of principle, though it may be (post, § 1019); but it is always accepted by the Courts as identical.

The test of Attorney-General v. Hitchcock (as explained post, § 1021) is as yet explicitly accepted by only a few Courts in this country for the doctrine

§ 1003. [1] 1824, Starkie, Evidence, I, 190 ("If a question as to a collateral fact be put to a witness for the purpose of discrediting his testimony, his answer must be taken as conclusive, and no evidence can be afterwards admitted to contradict it. This rule does not exclude the contradiction of the witness as to any facts immediately connected with the subject of inquiry)."

of Self-contradiction; but the same Courts apply it also to the present doctrine.[2] Other Courts are content to invoke simply the term "collateral", and to decide according to the circumstances of each case.[3]

[2] 1877, People v. Chin Mook Sow, 51 Cal. 597 ("When the question asked on cross-examination calls for a response in respect to a matter which the party asking the question would have a right to prove as an independent fact, the rule [as to collateralness] does not apply"; here a former conviction was admitted); 1882, Langhorne v. Com., 76 Va. 1019, semble. The term "immaterial" ought on principle to be equivalent to this, and is employed in some cases: 1834, Com. v. Buzzell, 16 Pick. 158 ("an immaterial fact"). In Chancery, it must be noted, a rule of special bearing arises as to questioning for the purpose of collateral contradiction, i.e. whether new interrogatories can be filed for that purpose after publication of the depositions; here collateral contradiction is allowed; see Purcell v. M'Namara, 8 Ves. Jr. 324 (1803), and note; Carlos v. Brook, 10 Ves. Jr. 49 (1804).

[3] In the following cases the rule was acknowledged and applied, but no specific test or useful illustration is furnished by them; in the ensuing sections (§§ 1004–1006) will be found those rulings which are concerned with some question of principle; the following list is not exhaustive, but the general rule is everywhere fully conceded, and a citation of every case in which it has been invoked is unnecessary: ENGLAND: 1805, R. v. Rudge, Peake Add. Cas. 232; 1806, Spenceley v. Wilmot, 7 East 108 (usury; the terms of other contracts with other persons of the same circle about the same time, not allowed to be contradicted); 1852, Palmer v. Trower, 8 Exch. 247 (the fact of a statement by a third party, inadmissible in itself; excluded); 1852, R. v. Dean, 6 Cox Cr. 23 (an irrelevant statement of the prosecutrix at a former time; excluded); 1860, Tolman v. Johnstone, 2 F. & F. 66; 1898, Re Haggenmacher's Patents, 2 Ch. 280.

The sound rule would be to leave the application of the rule entirely in the control of the trial Court;[4] but there is as yet little sign of such a practice.

§ 1004. Two Classes of Facts not Collateral; (1) Facts relevant to the Issue. In applying the test of Attorney-General v. Hitchcock, it is obvious that there are two different groups of facts of which evidence would have been admissible independently of the contradiction: (1) facts relevant to some issue in the case, and (2) facts relevant to the discrediting of a witness.

(1) Facts relevant to some issue in the case. The test in question usually causes here no difficulty in its application; the issues in the case indicate what facts would be relevant:

1834, Com. v. Buzzell, 16 Pick. 158; indictment for entering and burning, as members of a mob, an Ursuline convent; an exciting cause to the action of the mob was a rumor that one of the nuns was confined there against her will, and testimony to her insanity had been offered by the prosecution; the defendant then offered evidence of her sanity. PER CURIAM: "The question is whether the statement of an immaterial fact can be contradicted, if it comes out on the examination of a witness in chief. Now neither party can be allowed to show the internal condition of this institution, by way of excuse, justification, or apology for the attack made upon it; so upon an indictment for setting fire to a house of ill-fame, the bad character of the house is no ground of defence. . . . Now here the evidence as to the insanity of the nun was immaterial, . . . and the other party cannot call witnesses to contradict it."

1921, Felstiner v. Widelitz, — Sup. App. T. —, 191 N. Y. Suppl. 296; action to dispossess; landlord and tenant disputed as to the terms of the written lease, which was lost, and this was the only issue. The tenant, in a conversation with the landlord who was asking for an increase of rent and threatening expulsion, had said: "I got a wife and eight children to support. Now, after I put so much money in the building, why don't you leave me alone, and give me a chance to live? I pay always my rent on time; why bother me? I got a straight lease from the beginning. I got a straight lease for five years now. After five years, then you get the building. You got enough."

Co., 241 Pa. 458, 88 Atl. 703 (but why should the opinion quote six prior opinions and write five hundred lines, on a point settled for two hundred years past?); 1921, Com. v. Loomis, 270 Pa. 254, 113 Atl. 428 (murder); South Carolina: 1890, State v. Wyse, 33 S. C. 591, 12 S. E. 556; 1897, State v. Adams, 49 S. C. 414, 27 S. E. 451; 1898, State v. Sanders, 52 S. C. 580, 30 S. E. 616; 1921, State v. Thompson, — S. C. —, 110 S. W. 862; 1903, Connell v. State, 45 Tex. Cr. 142, 75 S. W. 512; Vermont: 1840, Stevens v. Beach, 12 Vt. 587; 1858, State v. Thibeau, 30 Vt. 101, 104; 1881, Smith v. Royalton, 53 Vt. 609; 1911, Comstock's Adm'r v. Jacobs, 84 Vt. 277, 78 Atl. 1017; Virginia: 1811, Fall v. Overseers, 3 Mumf. 495, 506; 1847, Charlton v. Unis, 4 Gratt. 61; 1873, Murphy v. Com., 23 Gratt. 965; Washington: 1903, State v. Carpenter, 32 Wash. 254, 73 Pac. 357; 1910, Wharton v. Tacoma F. D. Co., 58 Wash. 124, 107 Pac. 1057; 1912, State v. Stone, 66 Wash. 625, 120 Pac. 76; 1918, State v. Hood, 103 Wash. 489, 175 Pac. 27 (murder); West Virginia: 1901, State v. Sheppard, 49 W. Va. 582, 39 S. E. 676.

The following corollary seems sensible: 1910, People v. Leonardo, 199 N. Y. 432, 92 N. E. 1060 (murder; identity of defendant's mother's cameo ring; the prosecution allowed to contradict the defendant's assertions as to the ring, made on cross-examination, because the defendant, by calling the mother to corroborate the defendant, had "voluntarily assumed to make the collateral issue a material one").

[4] 1893, Spaulding v. Merrimack, 67 N. H. 382, 36 Atl. 253; Baldwin v. Wentworth, 67 N. H. 408, 36 Atl. 365; 1897, Perkins v. Roberge, 69 N. H. 171, 39 Atl. 583.

Contra: 1900, Cooper v. Hopkins, 70 N. H. 271, 48 Atl. 100.

The landlord's attorney did not move to strike out this testimony; but on cross-examination asked the tenant how many leases he had and how many houses he owned, and, on the tenant's counsel objecting to this as immaterial, argued, "This man had volunteered the information — and he did not do it of his own accord — that he was a man with a family of eight children, a poor man with eight children to support. My purpose is to show that this man is a man that has any number of houses that he owns in fee and dozens of houses on lease, and is a very rich man"; the objection was held valid. This ruling is unsound, because the offered fact was under the circumstances not collateral to the motive for agreeing to certain terms.

§ 1005. Same: (2) Facts discrediting the Witness in respect to Bias, Corruption, Skill, Knowledge, etc. Since, by the rule in Attorney-General v. Hitchcock, any fact which would be independently admissible may be made the subject of a contradiction, a second class of facts includes those which could otherwise be receivable for the purpose of impeaching some specific testimonial quality. The range of such modes of impeachment has already been considered (ante, §§ 943–996); and they must now be reviewed in the application of the present rule:

(a) Moral character. Particular acts of misconduct are not provable by extrinsic testimony to impeach moral character (ante, § 979); they are therefore also not provable merely in contradiction of the witness' statements on the stand;[1] except a judgment of conviction of crime, which, so far as it is § 1005. [1] ENGLAND: 1871, R. v. Holmes, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 334 (rape; intercourse of the prosecutrix with a third person); UNITED STATES: Massachusetts: 1880, Com. v. Dunan, 128 Mass. 422 (the witness' residence); Michigan: 1881, Hamilton v. People, 46 Mich. 186, 9 N. W. 247; 1882, Driscoll v. People, 47 Mich. 416, 11 N. W. 221; 1883, People v. Wolcott, 51 Mich. 617, 17 N. W. 78; 1909, People v. Connelly, 157 Mich. 260, 122 N. W. 80 (husband-murder; the wife's chastity before marriage, not allowed to be contradicted; Hooker, J., diss., on the facts; neither of the opinions cites any of the foregoing rulings in this jurisdiction); New Hampshire: 1863, State v. Knapp, 45 N. H. 154 (rape, intercourse with the prosecutrix); New Jersey: 1887, Pullen v. Pullen, 43 N. J. Eq. 136, 6 Atl. 887 (whether the witness had committed larceny); 1900, Bullock v. State, 65 N. J. L. 557, 47 Atl. 62; New York: 1862, Newcomb v. Griswold, 24 N. Y. 299; 1873, Stokes v. People, 53 id. 175 (a witness denied having "taken things"; error not allowed to be shown); 1881, Conley v. Meeker, 85 id. 618 (a witness answered evidence of his conviction for crime by declaring that he had since reformed; evidence of his having, since discharge, conducted gambling-houses, was rejected as collateral); 1888, People v. Greenwall, 108 id. 296, 300, 15 N. E. 404 (that the defendant, a witness, had committed a burglary, denied by him, excluded); North Dakota: 1909, Schnase v. Goetz, 18 N. D. 594, 120 N. W. 553; Vermont: 1922, State v. Long, — Vt. —, 115 Atl. 734 (murder; witness' immoral conduct held collateral); Wisconsin: 1891, Humphry v. State, 78 Wis. 571, 47 N. W. 386 (mere reflections on the complainant's character in a bastardy case, but not actual opportunities of intercourse with other men about the time in question, excluded).

In some of these cases, this prohibition of extrinsic testimony of misconduct is put on the sole ground of Collateral Contradiction; e.g. 1871, R. v. Holmes, L. R. 1 Cr. C. R. 334 (attempt at rape; the prosecutrix denied having had intercourse with one S., and a contradiction was refused). But this error is a fundamental one, for it ignores the vital distinction, of history as well as of principle, between the present rule and the rule against extrinsic testimony of particular misconduct. The distinction has been already pointed out ante, § 979. It is enough here to note that there is a double exclusion of such evidence, i.e. (1) it cannot enter for the purpose of showing Character, for reasons affecting that purpose of proof; and (2) it cannot enter as a Contradiction, for reasons already here explained. Compare Alderson, B., in Attorney-General v. Hitchcock (1847), 1 Exch. 103 ("the inadmissibility of such a contradiction [as to his personal character and as to his having committed any particular crime] depends, indeed, upon another principle altogether").

provable by extrinsic testimony to impeach character (ante, §§ 980, 987), is therefore also thus provable in contradiction.[2]

(b) Bias. Particular circumstances and expressions indicating bias are provable by extrinsic testimony (ante, §§ 948–950); they are therefore also provable in contradiction:[3]

1836, COLERIDGE, J., in Thomas v. David, 7 C. & P. 350 (assumpsit on a promissory note; the plaintiff's female servant had attested the signature; being asked, on cross-examination, "whether she did not constantly sleep in the same bed with her master, the plaintiff", and denying it, she was allowed to be contradicted): "If the question had been whether the witness had walked the streets as a common prostitute, I think that that would have been collateral to the issue, and that, had the witness denied such a charge. she could not have been contradicted. But here, the question is whether the witness had contracted such a relation with the plaintiff as might induce her the more readily to conspire with him to support a forgery, just in the same way as if she had been asked if she was the sister or daughter of the plaintiff and had denied that."

(c) Corruption. For the same reason as the preceding, a contradiction is permissible upon facts which tend to show (ante, §§ 956–963) the witness' corrupt testimonial intent for the case in hand.[4]

Contra: 1879, Haley v. State, 63 Ala. 86, semble; 1882, Langhorne v. Com., 76 Va. 1019 (refusing to allow evidence of incorrectness in matters not admissible in chief to show bias, since the rule on the latter subject is strict in this State; see ante, § 950).

[4] 1850, Melhuish v. Collier, 19 L. J. Q. B. 493 (an attempt by a party to suborn testimony; admitted); 1889, Alexander v. Vye, 16 Can. Sup. 501, 502, 521 (that the defendant, denying the genuineness of a document, could be asked whether he had not changed his style of signature since action begun, and his denial refuted by documents bearing his signature, allowed; two judges diss. on the latter point); 1917, Johnson v. Samuels, 186 Ind. 56, 114 N. E. 977 (that a witness to testator S.'s insanity had gone to a person and said "If your mother will swear that S. was of unsound mind, I will see that she gets $25 out of it", held inadmissible, on the ground that it was a self-contradiction not on a "material matter in issue"; this ruling indicates an incredible confusion of the rules of evidence); 1897, State v. McKinistry, 100 Ia. 82, 69 N. W. 267 (an attempt to bribe); 1901, Powers v. Com., 110 Ky. 386, 63 S. W. 976 (bribery); 1899, Richardson v. State, 90 Md. 109, 44 Atl. 999 (attempt to bribe another witness); 1871, Strang v. People, 24 Mich. 7 (facts tending to show a corrupt agreement between the witness and his party).

Contra: 1811, Harris v. Tippett, 2 Camp. 637 (whether the witness had attempted to dissuade opponent's witness from attending; contradiction excluded, because "collateral", "irrelevant to the issue"; but this ruling has been universally treated as erroneous; see the exposition post, § 1023, under Self-contradiction).

(d) Skill. Particular instances of error indicating lack of expertness are usually not provable by extrinsic testimony, while circumstances other than these, diminishing the witness' qualifications, may perhaps be thus proved (ante, §§ 991, 992). Such facts, therefore, may or may not be provable in contradiction.[5] The trial Court should have discretion:

1908, Arthur Train, in the "Sunday Magazine" (Nov. 7, 1908): "Most cases turn on an unconsidered point. A prosecutor once lost what seemed to him the clearest sort of a case. When it was all over, and the defendant had passed out of the courtroom rejoicing, he turned to the foreman and asked the reason for the verdict. 'Did you hear your chief witness say he was a carpenter?' inquired the foreman. 'Why, certainly,' answered the district attorney. 'Did you hear me ask him what he paid for that ready-made pine door he claimed to be working on when he saw the assault?' The prosecutor recalled the incident and nodded. 'Well, he said ten dollars — and I knew he was a liar. A door like that don't cost but four-fifty!' It is, perhaps, too much to require a knowledge of carpentry on the part of a lawyer trying an assault case. Yet the juror was undoubtedly right in his deduction."

(e) Intoxication, and Illness. The facts of intoxication and of illness, at the time of the events observed or of giving testimony, are admissible to discredit the witness' testimonial powers (ante, §§ 933, 934). This class of facts is therefore also provable in contradiction.[6]

(f) Opportunity of observing the events. A necessary qualification in a witness is personal knowledge, i.e. an opportunity, as to place, time, proximity, and the like, to observe the event or act in question (ante, § 650), and the deficiency of such opportunity may be shown to discredit (ante, § 994).

The following case is peculiar: 1916, R. v. Baugh, 31 D. L. R. 6, Ont. (malicious conspiracy to prosecute S.; as a part of proving the purport of the prior prosecution and the defendant's conduct of it, the Crown here on cross-examination read the former judge's findings, including his expression of opinion as to the now defendant's lack of veracity in his then testimony; held improper, one judge dissenting).

[4] 1867, Whitney v. Boston, 98 Mass. 316 (error as to the dimensions of a shop, illustrating the witness' acquaintance with land valued by him; admitted); 1895, Kennett v. Engle, 105 Mich. 693, 63 N. W. 1009 (a physician was asked a test question unconnected with the case, and he was not allowed to be contradicted); 1918, Brosius & Co. v. First Nat'l Bank, — Okl. —, 174 Pac. 269 (action for a bank deposit; the bank officers having testified from their books, "this is not the first error that has occurred in your bank?", allowed);

[5] Federal: 1896, Ludtke v. Hertzog, 18 C. C. A. 487, 72 Fed. 142 (dates of occurrences being material, extrinsic testimony was admitted as to a gross error of date made by an aged witness on a point otherwise wholly immaterial); Indiana: 1908, Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. O'Conner, 171 Ind. 686, 85 N. E. 969 (intoxication); New Hampshire: 1900, Cooper v. Hopkins, 70 N. H. 271, 48 Atl. 100 (trespass to an alleged shop-lifter; clerk testifying for defendant allowed to be contradicted as to her excitement at the time, because this affected her ability "to correctly observe what took place"; but not as to her statements that the trespassing clerk "had done the same thing before"); New York: 1893, People v. Webster, 139 N. Y. 73, 86, 34 N. E. 730 (that she was under the influence of opium at the time, allowed, since "the value of her testimony depended largely on the accuracy of her actions"), North Carolina: 1893, State v. Rollins, 113 N. C. 722, 732, 18 S. E. 394 (intoxication at the time of the events; because it did not affect his character, but "his capacity to know and remember with accuracy what took place", contradiction was allowed); Wisconsin: 1898, Kuenster v. Woodhouse, 101 Wis. 216, 77 N. W. 165 (contradiction allowed as to intoxication at and about the time of the events).

Hence, all facts which bear upon the position, distance, and surroundings, the bystanders and their conduct, the time and the place, the things attracting his attention, and similar circumstances, said by the witness to have been observed by him at the time of observing the main event testified to by him, are material to his credit in so far as they purport to have formed a part of the whole scene to his observation; thus, if an error is demonstrated in one of the parts observed, the inference (more or less strong) is that his observation was erroneous (or his narration manufactured) on other and more important parts also.

This source of discredit is of vast importance in the overthrow of false or careless testimony; and its permission must be provided for in any definition of the term "collateral":[7]

[7] The following cases illustrate this mode of contradiction:

England: 1679, Harcourt's Trial, 7 How. St. Tr. 311, 387 (Oates, the mainstay of the prosecution, had testified that one Ireland, another conspirator, not on trial, had in his presence parted from the defendant at London, between Aug. 8 and 12; it was proposed to show that this was false, Ireland being in the country at the time; L. C. J. Scroggs: "They [defendants] must have right, though there be never so much time lost, and patience spent. Say they, 'We must prove and contradict men by such matters as we can; people may swear downright things, and it is impossible to contradict them; but we will call witnesses to prove those particulars that can be proved'"; and it was by just such minor falsities as this that the whole monstrous fabric of Oates' perjury was later discovered and his punishment obtained); 1831, R. v. Campbell, Cr. & Dix Abr. 581 (contradiction as to the presence at the riot of one C., jointly indicted, but not on trial; admitted); 1838, R. v. McKenna, Cr. & Dix Abr. 580 (contradiction as to the presence at the murder of one M., jointly indicted with defendants, but now at large; admitted); 1842, R. v. Overton, 2 Moo. Cr. C. 263 (perjury; on a charge against H. of coursing with a dog without a license, the now defendant testified that the dog was his, and in giving the date of the receipt for his purchase from H. swore falsely; yet either date if correct would have exonerated H.; evidence of the incorrectness of the assertion admitted by all the Judges present); 1862, R. v. Dennis, 3 F. & F. 502 (eye-witness of a crime; present statement that she was not acquainted with the man; the contrary offered; admitted).

United States: Colorado: 1902, Barry v. People, 29 Colo. 395, 68 Pac. 274; Georgia: 1893, East Tennessee R. Co. v. Daniel, 91 Ga. 768, 18 S. E. 22 (contradiction allowed, against an alleged eye-witness, of his statement that immediately before arriving at the place he made a purchase at a store; "it contradicts the witness as to the train of events which led him to be present, and thus tends to discredit him as to the fact of his presence"); 1900, Tiller v. State, 111 Ga. 840, 36 S. E. 201 (four persons being defendants, testimony to the presence of all four at a place was allowed to be shown erroneous, as to one of the four, by another of the four); Maryland: 1834, Goodhand v. Benton, 6 G. & J. 481, 488 (title to a slave; whether the possession by B. was in the year 1816 or 1817 was material; a witness who testified that, on going to pay rent to B. in 1817 he saw the slave in B.'s possession, and that the final settlement occurred two years later, was allowed to be contradicted by evidence that the final settlement occurred in 1818, so that he was in error in one or the other statements); New York: 1859, Stephens v. People, 19 N. Y. 572 (charge of murder by arsenic; testimony for defence that the arsenic purchased by defendant was used for rats in the cellar where provisions were eaten by them; contradiction, that no provisions were kept in the cellar, allowed); 1904, Smith v. Lehigh Valley R. Co., 177 N. Y. 379, 69 N. E. 729 (plaintiff not allowed to contradict the defendant's engineer, who testified on cross-examination that the bell had been automatically ringing for several miles, by showing that it did not ring at certain points within that distance; the opinion by Parker, C. J., confuses the issue; Cullen, J., diss.).

Excluded, but erroneously: 1897, Chicago City R. Co. v. Allen, 169 Ill. 287, 48 N. E. 414 (contradiction of a witness explaining presence at a place as going there to vote, by showing that it was not his lawful voting place, excluded).

See the cases cited post, § 1006, for cross-examination only.

Knowles in his own garret; Knowles did not know that any Hall deeds affected the defendant's title, and he was questioned as to how he had known in his pretended search that this deed would be material. L. C. J. JEFFREYS: "Look you, then, we ask you how you came to know it was a deed belonging to Stepkins?" Witness: "I read the backside, and put my hand to it." L. C. J.: "How came you to put your hand to this deed as belonging to Stepkins, when you never looked into the deed [as you have already sworn]?" Witness: "When I found this deed to have written upon it 'Marcellus Hall', I did believe it was something that concerned the Stepkins'." L. C. J.: "Let us see the deed now. You say that was the reason, upon your oath?" Witness: "Yes, it was"; L. C. J.: "Give Mr. Sutton [the defendant's attorney] his oath. Look on the outside of that deed, and tell us whose handwriting that is"; Sutton: "All but the word 'Lect.' is my handwriting." L. C. J.: "Then how couldst thou, [Knowles,] know this to belong to the Stepkins' by the words 'Marcellus Hall' when you first discovered this deed in September, 1682, and you found it by yourself and put your hand to it, and yet that 'Marcellus Hall' be written by Mr. Sutton, which must be after that time?" Counsel for defendant: "Here are multitudes of deeds, and a man looks on the inside of some and the outside of others; is it possible for a man to speak positively as to all the particular deeds, without being liable to mistake?" L. C. J.: "Mr. Solicitor, you say well. If he had said, 'I looked upon the outside of some and the inside of others, and wherever I saw either on the outside or in the inside the name of Stepkins or Marcellus Hall, I laid them by and thought they might concern my lady Ivy', that had been something. But when he comes to be asked about this particular deed, and he upon his oath shall declare that to be the reason why he thought it belonged to Stepkins, [namely], because of the name of 'Marcellus Hall' on the outside and never read any part of the inside, when Sutton swears 'Marcellus Hall' was [later] written by him, what would you have a man say? . . . And you shall never argue me into a belief that it is impossible for a man to give a true reason, if he have one, for his remembrance of a thing"; and before long the defendant's counsel were obliged to withdraw the witness as a clear liar; the defendant was afterwards indicted for forging the deeds.

1861, ROBINSON, C. J., in R. v. Brown, 21 U. C. Q. B. 330, 336 (indictment for murder: M. testified that she saw the defendant and S. throw the deceased off a bridge, giving a detailed description of S.; the defendant offered a witness D. to show that S. was 50 miles away at that time; the judge insisted that S. himself should be called, and if contradicted, then D.; held, that D. also should have been called, the point of contradiction being material): "It appears to me that any fact so closely connected with the alleged offence as to be in fact a party of what was transacted or said to be transacted at the very moment cannot be treated as irrelevant in investigating the truth of the charge. If, for instance, the witness for the Crown, knowing a particular watch or some remarkable article of dress that the deceased usually wore, had sworn that she saw Brown take the article from his person before throwing him into the river, it would have been a material circumstance to be shown on the part of the prisoner, if it could have been, that the deceased had left the watch or the article of dress at home when he went out that evening, and if they could be produced to the jury on the trial. So if the Crown witness had sworn the offence was committed in some obscure hovel in the woods or in the town, which she pretended to describe with certainty and which she had known well, it could not have been irrelevant to the case to prove that that house or hovel had been totally destroyed by fire some weeks before the time spoken of, so that the murder could not have been committed in it. Yet in all these cases it must be admitted that if the crime of murder were committed by the prisoner, he would not the less be guilty of that crime because the deceased had not been robbed as well as murdered, or because he had not been killed in the place described by the witness; nor would the prisoner be less guilty of murder if he committed the deed alone, or without being assisted by Sherrick as the witness described."

1903, Hon. A. C. Plowden, Grain or Chaff; the Autobiography of a Police Magistrate, p. 154: "In the Tichborne Case, by a curious coincidence, at a sudden turn in the fortunes of the case, I was enabled to volunteer a piece of evidence which was considered sufficiently important to require my being called as a witness for the Crown. A witness had been called for the defence, Jean Luie; he was afterwards convicted of perjury, but at the moment his evidence was damaging, and unless it could be controverted there was no chance of a conviction. It was one of the sensational episodes of the trial. Among other lies, he swore that he came to London from New York, by a steamer called the 'Circassian', arriving on a certain day in May. As it happened, I had landed at Liverpool that same day, [returning from my American tour,] and my steamer was the 'Circassian', — only it had sailed from Quebec, not from New York. The coincidence was so striking that I immediately whispered it to Mr. Hawkins, Q. C., who was conducting the case for the Crown, and behind whom I was seated. He at once asked leave of the Court to interpose me as a witness, and I was examined where I stood, in my wig and gown."

1911, Steinie Morrison's Trial (Notable English Trials Series, 1922, p. 224); the accused was charged with a murder committed on the night of Dec. 31, 1910; the deceased had been seen at a restaurant with the accused on that evening, and the accused had a long wrapped package said to look like a bar of iron; but he testified that it was a flute which he had just bought. The prosecution now attempted to discredit this story. Mr. Muir — "The accused said that on Saturday morning, 31st December, he had bought a flute at a stall in the market. I propose to call evidence as to what the state of the market was on that morning." Stephen Dart, examined by Mr. Muir — "I am a police constable, and I was on traffic duty at the top of Leman Street in the High Street, Whitechapel, between eight in the morning and twelve noon on Saturday, 31st December last. The plan (exhibit 76) shows where the stalls stand in that part. In the morning there is a hay market in the middle of the street, and no stalls are allowed to come any further towards Leman Street from the entrance to Aldgate Street Chambers." Mr. Abinger — "My lord, my learned friend cross-examined the prisoner upon certain matters on a certain issue, and he is now proceeding to call evidence to controvert the oath of the defendant. I submit that he can only do so where the matter that he is cross-examining about is relevant to the issue, and if it is not relevant to the issue he is bound by the defendant's answer." Mr. J. DARLING — "But why is this not relevant to the issue?" Mr. Abinger — "The issue in this Court is ay or no, did the prisoner murder Mr. Bernon?" Mr. J. DARLING — "But there are many other issues besides that; that is one issue." Mr. Abinger — "My lord, that is the issue." Mr. J. DARLING — "That is one issue, that is the main issue; but there are many other issues leading up to that. This is not merely as the general proof of the guilt of the prisoner. Mr. Abinger — "It is contradicting him." Mr. J. DARLING — "It is not merely as to his guilt." Mr. Abinger — "I have never heard it ruled yet that where a prisoner had been cross-examined and counsel for the Crown had closed the case he might call evidence to contradict the prisoner's oath on by-issues." Mr. J. DARLING — "You will find practically all the modern law on the subject in the judgment in The King v. Crippen which is reported." Mr. Abinger — "In the case of The King v. Crippen it was a different point altogether. In The King v. Crippen the question arose in this way — speaking from memory — whether a shirt which was found in the cellar was purchased a long time before the murder or after the murder, or about the time of the murder. The prisoner was cross-examined, and swore to a date when he purchased the shirt, which date made it impossible that he could have had the shirt when he committed the murder, because that particular shirt had only been manufactured afterwards. I submit that there is no analogy between the two cases. Your lordship sees how this question arises. The dispute here is this. The Crown allege that on the night of the murder the prisoner took away from Snelwar's restaurant a parcel containing a bar of iron. On the other hand, the prisoner says on the night of the murder, 'I took away a parcel which contained a flute.' That is strictly relevant to the issue. Now, my learned friend is trying to prove that the prisoner when in the box swearing that he bought that flute on that day was not telling the truth — that he bought it at some other date. That is not the issue.

The issue is, was this a bar of iron or a flute that the prisoner purchased? 'Non constat' that if he had bought it on some date — not that date — it might have been that parcel." Mr. J. DARLING — "I will give you the benefit of the doubt that you felt, and exclude the evidence."

A peculiar example of the operation of this principle is seen (in the cases cited ante, § 228, n. 6, § 231, n. 1, and § 263, especially the last) where a witness has testified to a rumor or repute as causing a party's alleged belief or deranged mental state, and then the opponent offers to disprove the fact thus alleged to have been rumored or reported; its non-existence makes less probable the alleged report of it, and thus discredits the witness; from the point of view of the present rule, there ought to be no obstacle.

(g) Recollection. When the memory is tested by asking for the witness' recollection of facts not otherwise material, his errors of recollection cannot be shown by extrinsic testimony (ante, § 995). But circumstances which form the alleged grounds of his recollection of material facts testified to by him should be subject to contradiction, for the same reason as in the preceding topic.[8]

(h) Narration. Circumstances affecting the witness' ability to narrate his story intelligently and correctly are material to his credit, and should be subject to contradiction.[9]

(i) Prior consistent statements of the witness are usually not provable to corroborate him (post, § 1124); hence, his error in affirming that he has made them is not provable by other witnesses, except in those situations in which those statements would have been admissible for him.[10]

In general, the exclusionary rule is too strictly enforced. "Everything," said Lord Denman, "is material that affects the credit of the witness." The discretion of the trial Court should be left to control. It is a mistake to lay down any fixed rule which will prevent him from permitting such testi-

[8] 1854, Com. v. Hunt, 4 Gray Mass. 422 (that a memorandum, said by the witness to have been written by him, and serving as a record of his past recollection, was in fact not in his writing; admitted); compare the cases cited ante, § 995.

[9] Cases cited ante, § 996, and the following case: 1906, State v. Goodson, 116 La. 388, 40 So. 771 (a Syrian witness having insisted that he could not speak English, and having testified through an interpreter, the fact of his ability to speak and understand it was allowed to be shown to discredit him; sensible opinion by Porter, J., trial judge).

The following case was erroneously decided by the majority; compare with it O'Connell's story, cited ante, § 811: 1858, R. v. Burke, Ire., 8 Cox Cr. 45 (witness who stated that he could not speak English and was therefore examined in Irish through an interpreter; not allowed to be contradicted as to having spoken in English within a few days; three judges diss.).

[10] 1861, M'Kewan v. Thornton, 2 F. & F. 599 (denial of the fact of a former complaint; correction allowed because the complaint would thus appear not to have been an afterthought, as claimed; this illustrates the principle, for the former statement would here have been admissible independently in corroboration); 1843, Whiteford v. Burckmyer, 1 Gill Md. 140 (the cross-examining party's own declarations in his favor, excluded); 1889, Morris v. R. Co., 116 N. Y. 556, 22 N. E. 1097 (a showing of error as to whether he had said what he now says, excluded).

But the following exceptional case "proves the rule"; 1906, Gulf C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Matthews, 100 Tex. 63, 93 S. W. 1068 (a witness to the whereabouts of the deceased testified that he had told W. about the deceased M., soon after the death; W. was allowed to contradict this, because on the facts if the witness had not mentioned to anybody, on hearing of M.'s death, what he knew about M., it indicated that his testimony was fabricated; good opinion by Williams, J.).

mony as may expose a false witness. History has shown, and every day's trials illustrate, that not infrequently it is in minor details alone that the false witness is vulnerable and his exposure is feasible.[11]

§ 1006. Same: Collateral Questions on Cross-Examination. (1) The essential feature of this mode of impeachment is the demonstration of the witness' error (ante, § 1000). This not only can be but often is accomplished by cross-examination alone — and not only (as a matter of course) through the witness' own confession of error, but through an instant comparison of the witness' statement with truths of common knowledge (judicially noticeable) or with tangible objects already in the case.[1] The following anecdotes illustrate the possibilities of this mode:

Anon., Green Bag, 1898, X, 53: "My poor old confessor, Father Grady," said O'Connell, "who resided with my uncle when I was a boy, was tried in Tralee on the charge of being a Papish priest, but the judge defeated Grady's prosecutors by distorting the law in his favor. There was a flippant scoundrel who came forward to depose to Father Grady's having said mass. 'Pray, sir,' said the judge, 'how do you know he said mass?' 'Because I heard him say it, my Lord.' 'Did he say it in Latin?' asked the judge. 'Yes, my Lord.' 'Then you understand Latin?' 'A little.' 'What words did you hear him say?' 'Ave Maria.' 'That is the Lord's Prayer, is it not?' asked the judge. 'Yes, my Lord,' was the fellow's answer. 'Here is a pretty witness to convict the prisoner,' cried the judge. 'He swears Ave Maria is Latin for the Lord's Prayer.' The judge charged the jury for the prisoner, so my poor old friend Father Grady was acquitted."

Anon., Green Bag, 1892, IV, 319: "One of the witnesses to the will was the deceased man's valet, who swore that after signing his name at the bidding of his master, he then, also acting under instructions, carefully sealed the document by means of the taper by the bedside. The witness was induced to describe every minute detail of the whole process, the exact time, the position of the taper, the size and quality of the sealing-wax, 'which', said the counsel, glancing at the document in his hand, 'was of the ordinary red description?' 'Red sealing-wax, certainly,' answered the witness. 'My Lord,' said the counsel, handing the paper to the judge, 'you will please observe that it was fastened with a wafer.'"

[11] The following celebrated instance of perjury illustrates this: 1681, Colledge's Trial, 8 How. St. Tr. 549, 641 (Dugdale the informer, who had for three years helped send to the gallows many persons accused of the supposed Popish Plot, was in this case discredited by the charge that he had given out that the Papists had poisoned him, though in fact his disease was the French pox; whereon Dugdale on the stand said: "If any doctor will come forth and say he cured me of the clap or any such thing, I will stand guilty of all that is imputed to me"; whereon, later, "Dr. Lower, the most noted physician then in London, proved it at the Council board, both by his bills and by the apothecary, that he had been under cure in his hands for that disease; which was such a slur upon Dugdale's credit that he was never used as a witness more").

§ 1006. [1] Accord: 1726, Gilbert, Evidence, 147 ("Now that which sets aside credit and overthrows his testimony is the incredibility of the fact . . . ; for if the fact be contrary to all manner of experience and observation, it is too much to receive it upon the oath of one witness"); 1887, Becker v. Koch, 104 N. Y. 394, 401, 10 N. E. 701 (the witness testified to an assignment in which apparently fictitious debts were included; on further explanation, however, he testified that the debts were not fictitious; the trial Court ruled that as no extrinsic contradiction of the testimony had been offered, the explanation must be accepted as true; held however, that the explanation could be shown false "by its own absolute and inherent improbability"; practically overruling Fordham v. Smith, 46 id. 683). Contra, but erroneous: 1887, People v. Ching Hing Chang, 74 Cal. 390, 16 Pac. 201.

For other good examples of this kind of demonstration, see a South Carolina cross-examination (1899, Marshall Brown, Wit and Humor of the Bench and Bar, 8); O'Connell's cross-examination (ib. 370).

1904, James W. Osborne, Esq., former Assistant District Attorney of New York City, in the "Sunday Magazine", Nov. 27: "The rule in the case of bias is the familiar one of 'give the witness rope.' In other words, give his bias full swing, and he will reveal it so unmistakably that the truth will come out. In an amusing instance of this kind in Brooklyn the late Charles Patterson revealed the quickness of his perceptions and his salient possession of that ingenuity which every lawyer needs in order to be a good cross-examiner. The case was one for damages, a peddler's cart having been run over by a train and the peddler having been killed. The point at issue was that which has been laid down by the Courts as 'look and listen.' The question was as to whether the peddler, in driving across the track, looked and listened and exercised proper care. A highly respectable farmer testified that he saw the wagon drive upon the track; that he did not see the peddler, who was thus presumably lying back in the cart, asleep or dozing, and that he distinctly and unmistakably heard the engine blow its whistle and ring its bell. He insisted upon this, and although it did not appear to Mr. Patterson that the blowing whistle and ringing bell were true, the evidence could not be shaken. He accordingly asked: 'You came to town with the engineer and fireman of the train, did n't you?' 'Yes.' 'Good fellows, are n't they?' 'Yes.' 'Good friends of yours?' 'Yes.' 'What did they do for you, while in town? Did they take you around?' 'Yes.' 'Where did they take you?' 'To the Eden Musée.' 'You saw all there was to see at the Eden Musée?' 'Yes.' 'Are you sure?' 'Yes.' 'Saw the Chamber of Horrors?' 'Yes.' 'All the curiosities?' 'Yes.' 'Saw the little toy locomotive going around on the track?' 'Yes.' 'Hear its little whistle blow in the darkness?' 'Yes.' 'Hear it ring its little bell?' 'Yes.' 'Plainly?' 'Yes.' 'Now, sir,' said Mr. Patterson, 'there is no little locomotive at the Eden Musée; it never blew its whistle, and it never rang its bell. You explain to the jury how you can swear to such statements.' The bias of the witness who, Mr. Patterson said, could 'hear bells and whistles anywhere, at any time', had led him entirely astray, and his testimony, which was strongly biased, was completely discredited."

(2) Since the only object of the excluding rule to is prevent confusion of issues and unfair surprise by extrinsic testimony (ante, § 1002), it follows that the cross-examiner may at least question upon even collateral points, subject always to the general discretion of the trial Court (ante, § 944) to limit cross-examination.[2]

(3) The rule for prior inconsistent statements, requiring that the witness be asked, before the extrinsic testimony be produced (post, § 1025) has of course no application here.[3]

(4) The two expedients of Confrontation of Witnesses (post, § 1395) and Sequestration of Witnesses (post, § 1838), which have a probative operation similar to that of the present mode of impeachment, are not obnoxious to the present rule. By the former expedient, in its earlier form, the contradictory

[2] 1861, R. v. Brown, 21 U. C. Q. B. 334 (quoted ante, § 1005); 1871, R. v. Holmes, 12 Cox Cr. 143, per Kelly, C. B., semble. The contrary ruling, in Spenceley v. Wilmot, 7 East 108 (1806), has often been cited obiter, and sometimes followed: 1903, State v. Caudle, 174 Mo. 388, 74 S. W. 621; 1909, R. v. Butterfield, 18 Ont. L. R. 347 (cross-examination of a witness for the prosecution, on a charge of illegal liquor-selling, as to their knowledge of other sales on the same day, for which also a charge was pending against the same defendant, held refusable in the trial Court's discretion; following Spenceley v. Wilmot); 1920, Norfolk Southern R. Co. v. Fentress, 127 Va. 87, 102 S. E. 588.

But it is obviously inconsistent with the general right of the cross-examiner to test memory on all points (ante, § 995), and to refrain from stating the purpose of his questions (post, § 1871).

[3] 1903, Younger v. State, 12 Wyo. 24, 73 Pac. 551. Contra: 1905, Cook (Dan) v. State, 85 Miss. 738, 38 So. 110 (conviction of crime); 1861, Wright v. Compsty, 41 Pa. 110 (whether the witness had been indicted).

witnesses of opposing sides were confronted with each other and made to repeat their stories, in the expectation that the untruthful one would break down; but it was assumed that the contradiction was on a material point. By the latter expedient, the inconsistencies of narration in witnesses called on the same side were brought to light, and here the telling inconsistencies might involve only minor details, — as in Susannah's classical case. But no extrinsic testimony was involved; for the witnesses were by supposition in the case for other purposes, and a cross-examination would be all that was needed.

§ 1007. Contradicting Answers on the Direct Examination; Supporting the Contradicted Witness. Since the main object underlying the rule is to avoid Unfair Surprise and Confusion of Issues (ante, § 1002), the obvious expedient for this purpose is to cut off testimony which would not have been already proper for other purposes. But occasionally are found misapprehensions of the fundamental purpose of the rule.

(1) Occasionally, before the theory had been completely worked out by the Courts, the argument of Unfair Surprise was treated as the only objection, and it was thought that where the assertion desired to be contradicted had been made on the direct examination — i.e. had been "volunteered", as the phrase went, — the witness had himself only to blame if he was not prepared to support every statement thus volunteered; in short, that all assertions made on the direct examination could be contradicted and shown erroneous, and that the same freedom applied to assertions volunteered on the cross-examination; upon which, it was thought, there could not be any unfair surprise. This form of the rule still crops up occasionally.[1]

But this form of rule ignores the other coöperating reason for the rule, i.e. Confusion of Issues. Even if one conceded that this form sufficiently obviates the reason of Unfair Surprise, the other reason would still remain, and would be equally fatal, even when the assertion on the collateral matter was made on the direct examination. The following passage satisfactorily disposes of the error in question:[2]

§ 1007. [1] Federal: 1893, Union P. R. Co. v. Reese, 5 C. C. A. 510, 56 Fed. 291; Arkansas: 1910, Adams v. State, 93 Ark. 260, 124 S. 1859, R. W. WALKER, J., in Blakey's Heirs v. Blakey's Executrix, 33 Ala. 619: "In Dozier v. Joyce [3] it seems to have been considered that the main reason for the rule which prevents a cross-examination upon immaterial matters for the mere purpose of contradicting the witness, is that he cannot be presumed to come prepared to defend himself on such collateral questions; and, as this reason fails when the testimony is voluntarily given, the rule itself does not in that case apply. The reason referred to is doubtless one of those on which the rule was founded, but it is not the only or even the chief one. The principal reasons of this rule are, undoubtedly, that but for its enforcement the issues in a cause would be multiplied indefinitely, the real merits of the controversy would be lost sight of in the mass of testimony to immaterial points, the minds of jurors would thus be perplexed and confused, and their attention wearied and distracted, the costs of litigation would be enormously increased, and judicial investigations would become almost interminable. An additional reason is found in the fact that, the evidence not being to points material in the case, witnesses guilty of false swearing could not be punished for perjury. These reasons apply equally whether the evidence on such collateral matters is brought out on the examination in chief or upon cross-examination, and whether the witness gives it voluntarily or in response to questions calling for it."

(2) If the opposing party has succeeded in introducing, without objection by the other, testimony to contradict on a collateral point, this does not justify the other in proceeding to join issue and adduce new testimony in support of the original witness' statement.[4] The general rule that one irrelevancy does not justify another (ante, § 15) is not here controlling, for the collateral error may be relevant to discredit, and is objectionable for reasons of policy rather than of irrelevancy. It is the same reason of policy (i.e. Confusion of Issues) that here operates to stop the controversy from being carried any further; and there is no Unfairness, because the original party has only himself to thank for not preventing the introduction of the contradicting testimony. The argument that the cross-examiner has no right to object to the answering testimony because he himself began the contradicton [5] is beside the point; for it is not a question of rights, but of the discovery of truth, and in the interest of truth the confusion of issues by immaterial controversies is to be prevented.

§ 1008. 'Falsus in Uno, Falsus in Omnibus'; In general. The maxim, "He who speaks falsely on one point will speak falsely upon all", is in strictness concerned, not with the admissibility, but with the weight of evidence. The jury are told by it what force to give to a falsity after the evidence has shown its existence. But the maxim occurs so often in connection with the use of Contradictions and of Self-Contradictions (post, § 1018) and throws so much light on their nature, that it is desirable to analyze the bearings of the maxim as applied by the Courts.[1]

It may be said, once for all, that the maxim is in itself worthless, first, in point of validity, because in one form it merely contains in loose fashion a kernel of truth which no one needs to be told, and in the others it is absolutely false as a maxim of life; [2] and secondly, in point of utility, because it merely tells the jury what they may do in any event, not what they must do or must not do, and therefore it is a superfluous form of words. It is also in practice pernicious, first, because there is frequently a misunderstanding of its proper force, and secondly, because it has become in the hands of many counsel a mere instrument for obtaining new trials upon points wholly unimportant in themselves.[3]

§ 1009. Same: (1) First Form of Rule: The Entire Testimony must be Rejected. The notion which was originally associated with this maxim was that the testimony of one detected in a lie was wholly worthless and must of necessity be rejected.[1] This notion was quite consistent with the artificial philosophy of testimony (post, § 2032) which prevailed as late as the 1700s, and was only abolished from the law (long after it had practically lost its social acceptance) as a result of Bentham's pungent criticisms. The philosophy of character which weighed testimony by numerical units and absolutely disqualified one who had been guilty of perjury would readily reject the testimony of one detected in a single lie. Its attitude is represented in the following passage:[2]

§ 1008. [1] The following statutes are the basis of some of the ensuing rulings: Alaska: Comp. L. 1913, § 1505 (like Or. Laws 1920, § 868, par. 3); Cal. C. C. P. 1872, § 2061 (3) ("a witness false in one part of his testimony is to be distrusted in others"); P. C. § 1102; Ga. Code 1910, § 5884 (if "wilfully and knowingly falsely", "ought to be disregarded entirely, unless corroborated by circumstances or other unimpeached evidence"); Mont. Rev. C. 1921, § 10672, par. 3 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2061); Or. Laws 1920, § 868, par. 3 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2061); P. R. Rev. St. & C. 1911, § 1530 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2061).

Compare also the now obsolete principle 'nemo turpitudinem suam allegans audiendus' (ante, § 525), which has certain relations with the present principle.

Distinguish the general charge that a witness' testimony may be rejected if the jury believe that he has not sworn truthfully in general: 1910, Waldrop v. State, 98 Miss. 567, 54 So. 66.

The doctrine of 'falsus in uno' is to be distinguished from the principle, of which our law is at present much enamored, that the judge may not express an opinion upon the weight of the testimony; in stating the maxim as applicable to a particular witness, this latter principle is often violated. With this question of trial procedure we have here nothing to do; see an example in Bunce v. McMahon, 6 Wyo. 24, 42 Pac. 23 (1895).

Whether an instruction on this principle of 'falsus in uno' may be demanded, is considered in Pumorlo v. Merrill, 125 Wis. 102, 103 N. W. 464 (1905).

[2] For materials exhibiting the fallacy of the maxim from the point of view of psychology, see the present writer's "Principles of Judicial Proof, as given in Logic, Psychology, and General Experience, and illustrated in Judicial Trials" (1913), §§ 234–276, et passim.

[3] In Turner v. State, 95 Miss. 879, 50 So. 629 (1909), Smith, J., diss., approves the above views.

§ 1009. [1] 1743, Craig v. Earl of Anglesea, 17 How. St. Tr. 1421, per Bowes, C. B. The following case seems to be the earliest instance of its appearance in our law; 1684, Hampden's Trial, 9 How. St. Tr. 1053, 1101 (quoted by Mr. Williams, for the defence).

[2] The doctrine has been occasionally repeated: Federal, 1822, The Santissima Trinidad, 7 Wheat. 339, semble; Ga. 1853, Day v. Crawford, 13 Ga. 512; 1874, Pierce v. State, 53 Ga. 368; Kan. 1866, Campbell v. State, 3 Kan. 488, 496; 1871, Hale v. Rawallie, 8 Kan. 136, 142, semble (but this was overruled later: 1875, Shellabarger v. Nafus, 15 id. 547, 554); *N. 1824, Mr. Thomas Starkie, Evidence, I, 583: "A witness who gives false testimony as to one particular cannot be credited as to any, according to the legal maxim 'falsum in uno, falsum in omnibus.' The presumption that the witness will declare the truth ceases as soon as it manifestly appears that he is capable of perjury. Faith in a witness' testimony cannot be partial or fractional; where any material fact rests on his testimony, the degree of credit due to him must be ascertained, and according to the result his testimony is to be credited or rejected."

1828, HENDERSON, J., in State v. Jim, 1 Dev. 510: "The jury's belief must be founded on that which is regarded in law as testimony. . . . I can see no difference in principle — and if so, there should be none in practice — between a person heretofore convicted and one who stands convicted before the jury in the case they are trying. Hence the maxim 'falsum in uno, falsum in omnibus.' Were it otherwise, the law would be untrue to itself."

1864, RANNEY, J., in Stoffer v. State, 15 Oh. St. 47, 56: "But it is said that he may still speak the truth upon other points, although perjured as to one or more. This is very true; very few men are so utterly false as not to be compelled, from the exigencies of their being, to utter more truth than falsehood. But it must also be admitted that the motive which has prompted him to commit perjury in one part of his testimony may and is very likely to lead him to make it effective by falsifying other material points. At least it is left entirely uncertain whether he has uttered truth or falsehood; and it is not consistent with that moral certainty of the existence of facts which the law requires before men are affected in their lives, liberty, or property, to act upon what may be true or false, or to use such corrupt and deceptive instrumentalities in the pursuit of truth."

§ 1010. Same: (2) Second Form of Rule: The Entire Testimony may be Rejected. But in spite of the careless perpetuation of this artificial notion by a few authorities, it had ceased to be the law of England by the beginning of the 1800s.[1] There are on principle two reasons which exhibit its unsoundness as a rule of law. (1) It is untrue to human nature. It is not correct that a person who tells a single lie is therefore necessarily lying throughout his testimony, not that there is any strong probability that he is so lying. The probability is to the contrary. (2) The jury are the part of the tribunal charged with forming a conclusion as to the truth of the testimony offered. They are absolutely free to believe or not to believe a given witness. Once the witness is determined by the judge to be qualified to speak, the belief of the jury in his utterances rests solely with themselves. Hence the judge cannot legally require them to believe or to disbelieve any portion of testimony.

Therefore there cannot be, for the jury, a "must" in this matter, but only a "may":

1855, PEARSON, J., in State v. Williams, 2 Jones L. 269: "When the credit of a witness is to be passed upon, each juror is called upon to say whether he believes him or not. This belief is personal, individual, and depends upon an infinite variety of circumstances. Any form, the judge drawing inferences as a jury would); Nebr. 1880, Dell v. Oppenheimer, 9 Nebr. 456, 4 N. W. 51; Oh. 1864, Stoffer v. State, 15 Oh. St. 54; Pa. 1849, Miller v. Stem, 12 Pa. 390, semble.

§ 1010. [1] 1809, R. v. Teal, 11 East 309, per L. C. J. Ellenborough ("It may be a good reason for the jury, if satisfied that he had sworn falsely on the particular point, to discredit his evidence altogether. But still that would not warrant the rejection of the evidence by the judge. . . . It goes only to the credit of the witness, on which the jury are to decide").

attempt to regulate or control it by a fixed rule is impracticable, worse than useless, inconsistent and repugnant to the nature of a trial by jury."

1856, APPLETON, J., in Parsons v. Huff, 41 Me. 411: "The truth or falsehood of testimony depends upon the motives, or the balance of motives, acting upon the witness at the time of its utterance. The motives which influence the human mind are as various as the feelings and desires of man. . . . There is no motive the action of which upon testimony is uniform. The same motive may lead to truth or to falsehood. . . . The witness may be exposed to the action of a different class of motives as to the several facts to which his testimony may relate. It is obvious therefore that, of the testimony of the same witness, part may be true and reliable and part false and mendacious. A rule of law which requires a jury to infer from one false assertion that all facts uttered by the witness are false statements is manifestly erroneous. . . . It is the determination of the trustworthiness or untrustworthiness of testimony in advance of its utterance, and in utter and hopeless ignorance of all facts essential to a correct decision."

1867, CAMPBELL, J., in Knowles v. People, 15 Mich. 412: "There has never been any positive rule of law which excluded evidence from consideration entirely, on account of the wilful falsehood of a witness as to some portions of his testimony. Such disregard of his oath is enough to justify the belief that the witness is capable of any amount of falsification, and to make it no more than prudent to regard all that he says with strong suspicion, and to place no reliance on his mere statements. But when testimony is once before the jury, the weight and credibility of every portion of it is for them, and not for the Court to determine."

The correct principle, therefore, can go no farther than to say that the jury may disregard the testimony, not that they must disregard it; and this is the form of the rule as laid down in the great majority of jurisdictions.[2] The

[2] Only those cases are noted in which there has been controversy or confusion; those in which "may" is the regular and unquestioned term, used obiter, are not here enumerated; where otherwise not specified the orthodox form, that the jury "may" reject, is approved: California: 1879, People v. Sprague, 53 Cal. 493 (C. propriety of giving such an instruction is questionable; for it merely informs the jury of a truth of character which common experience has taught all of them long before they become jurymen.[3]

§ 1011. Same: (3) Third Form of Rule: The Entire Testimony must be Rejected, unless Corroborated. This is merely a variant of the first form of rule. It removes the injunction to treat the entire testimony as worthless, on condition that there is corroboration of the other portions by circumstances or by other testimony. This form of the rule is equally unsound and is rarely advanced.[1]

§ 1012. Same: (4) Fourth Form of Rule: The Entire Testimony may be Rejected, unless Corroborated. This form is an erroneous variant of the second. The objection to it is not only that it fetters the jury's action by attaching a condition to their discretion, but that this condition involves logically an impossible and wrong consequence, namely, that if there is such corroboration, the jury may not reject the testimony but must give it credit:[1]

1877, HENRY, J., in Brown v. R. Co., 66 Mo. 588, 599: "Is the jury not at liberty to Forsyth v. Clark, 3 Wend. 643; 1836, People v. Davis, 15 Wend. 607); then in People v. Evans, 40 N. Y. 5 (1869), the mandatory form was prescribed, apparently in ignorance of Dunn v. People; the rule of the latter case was reëstablished in the following series: 1874, White v. McLean, 57 N. Y. 672; 1875, Pease v. Smith 61 N. Y. 483. But in 1878, Deering v. Metcalf, 74 N. Y. 507, the Court is found saying (apparently without any real appreciation of the question involved) that when one has sworn "corruptly false", the jury "ought to disregard" his testimony; then follow: 1881, Moett v. People, 85 N. Y. 377 (a charge that "it is sometimes the duty of the jury to reject the whole" is approved, as not injurious to a defendant in a criminal case, but Deering v. Metcalf was expressly affirmed); 1898, People v. Van Tassel, 156 N. In Troxdale v. State, 9 Humph. 423 (1848), it is uncertain whether the Court is dealing with this rule. A practically equivalent form is that the jury may believe, in spite of the falsity, if the witness is corroborated: 1896, Duncan v. State, 97 Ga. 180, 25 S. E. 182; 1902, West Chicago S. R. [1] The following cases also reject this fallacy: Fla. 1898, Gantling v. State, 40 Fla. 237, 23 So. 857; 1903, Sumpter v. State, 45 Fla. 106, 33 So. 981; Ga. 1906, Chandler v. State, 124 Ga. 821, 53 S. disregard the testimony of one who has committed perjury in their presence, as to some fact testified to by him, because as to that or some other fact testified to by him he is corroborated? . . . That is not the law; the jury may or may not believe him; that is a matter for their determination, . . . notwithstanding he may have been corroborated as to that or any other fact to which he testified."

The Courts that have employed this form have spoken usually under a misconception of the permissive form (ante, § 1010); for they treat "may" as if it were "must", and then argue that it would be unfair to require a rejection in spite of corroboration; in short, they mean to lay down in effect the third rule above. But whether judged by their intention or by their expressed phrasing, they offer a test wholly unsound. Only occasionally is this form of rule found.[2]

§ 1013. Same: There must be a Conscious Falsehood. The notion behind the maxim is that, though a person may err in memory or observation or skill upon one point and yet be competent upon others, yet a person who once deliberately mis-states, one who goes contrary to his own knowledge or belief, is equally likely to do the same thing repeatedly and is not to be reckoned with at all. Hence it is essential to the application of the maxim that there should have been a conscious falsehood:

1743, BOWES, C. B., in Annesley v. Anglesea, 17 How. St. Tr. 1139, 1421: "You will permit me to observe that there is a great difference between not recollecting circumstances, and a witness swearing to those that are false. The not recollecting may consist with integrity; the swearing to a falsehood never can."

1841, HARRINGTON, J., in Kinney v. Hosea, 3 Harringt. 401: "But the disbelief of what any witness has testified to does not necessarily impute to him falsehood and perjury. This would compel the jury in every case of contradictory testimony to disbelieve that one or the other witness, or perhaps one set of witnesses or the other, must be wilfully perjured.

[2] Some of these Courts (e.g. in Illinois) are to be found also, in other rulings, employing the first or the second form above; there is too little effort at consistency: Alabama: 1905, Little v. State, 145 Ala. 662, 39 So. 674; Arizona: 1903, Trimble v. Terr., 8 Ariz. 273, 71 Pac. 932; Georgia: 1857, Richardson v. Roberts, 23 Ga. 218; Smith v. State, 23 Ga. 304 (but held to have been improperly applied); Ivey v. State, 23 Ga. 581; 1874, Pierce v. State, 53 Ga. 369; Idaho: 1905, State v. Waln, 14 Ida. 1, 80 Pac. 221; Illinois: 1864, Meixsell v. Williamson, 35 Ill. 531; 1865, Blanchard v. Pratt, 37 Ill. 246; 1867, Howard v. McDonald, 46 Ill. 124; 1866, Yundt v. Hartrumft, 41 Ill. 16 (where the phrases are used with full understanding); Chittenden v. Evans, 41 Ill. 254 (where the Court merely says that rejection "would not necessarily follow"); 1870, Martin v. People, 54 Ill. 226; Huddle v. Martin, 54 Ill. 260; 1872, Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Buttolf, 66 Ill. 348 (where rejection is distinctly forbidden); 1904, Chicago & Alton R. Co. v. Kelley, 210 Ill. 449, 71 N. E. 355 (but the corroborating evidence need not be believed by the jury, in order to make the rule applicable; this is a good instance of the jargon of futile intricacies to which this rule gives rise); 1904, Weston v. Teufel, 213 Ill. 291, 72 N. E. 908 (the corroboration must be by "credible", not merely "competent" witnesses; a vain quibble); 1906, United Breweries Co. v. O'Donnell, 221 Ill. 334, 77 N. E. 547; Indiana: 1895, White v. R. Co., 142 Ind. 648, 42 N. E. 456; 1897, Hank v. State, 148 Ind. 238, 46 N. E. 127, 47 N. E. 465; 1921, Finch v. McClellan, — Ind. —, 130 N. E. 13; Michigan: 1893, Cole v. R. Co., 95 Mich. 77, 80, 54 N. W. 638; 1897, Heddle v. R. Co., 112 Mich. 547, 70 N. W. 1096, semble; Montana: 1906, State v. Fuller, 34 Mont. 12, 85 Pac. 369; Oklahoma: 1921, Cole v. State, — Okl. Cr. —, 195 Pac. 901 (correcting the supposedly contrary effect of Rea v. State, supra, n. 1); Wisconsin: 1894, Allen v. Murray, 87 Wis. 41, 51 N. W. 979; 1897, Dohmen Co. v. Ins. Co., 96 Wis. 38, 71 N. W. 69 (by circumstances or by testimony); 1900, Miller v. State, 106 Wis. 156, 81 N. W. 1020; 1904, Suckow v. State, 122 Wis. 156, 99 N. W. 440; 1909, Miller v. State, 139 Wis. 57, 119 N. W. 850 (this seems to be now the settled form in this State).

Nothing is further from the truth than such a conclusion. A thousand innocent mistakes are committed in courts of justice, for one intentional and corrupt falsehood; and it is the commonest duty of a jury to distinguish between conflicting testimony arising from the mistakes of witnesses."

This requirement is variously phrased by different Courts, and even by the same Court.[1] Occasionally, however, a Court is found declaring, through carelessness, that proof of a material error (contradiction) or self-contradiction will justify the application of the maxim.[2] There is no ground of logic or of precedent for such a conclusion; and it has frequently been repudiated when advanced.[3]

§ 1014. Same: Falsehood must be on a Material Point. It is commonly said that the falsehood must be upon a material point.[1] No doubt the Courts

For a discussion on the related scholastic quibble whether a witness who has been "impeached" can be believed, see Smith v. State, 109 Ga. 479, 35 S. E. 59 (1900); and compare §§ 2033, 2498, post.

Of course it is improper to charge that self-contradiction may 'per se' create a reasonable doubt of guilt in a criminal case: 1904, Brown v. State, 142 Ala. 287, 38 So. 268.

Co. v. Allen, 169 Ill. 187, 48 N. E. 414 (mere exaggeration not sufficient; falsity necessary); 1903, Beedle v. People, 204 Ill. 197, 68 N. E. 434; 1904, Chicago City R. have here been led away by the inapt analogy of the limitations upon the criminal law of perjury. In the nature of character, a person who would lie upon a collateral point is perhaps likely to be a more determined liar than one who dares it only upon a material point; at any rate, there is no less a call to distrust the former than the latter.[2] But Courts have not seen fit to accept this consequence.

§ 1015. Same: Time of the Falsehood. Perhaps it is not logical to say that only lies told within a specific time shall create this distrust of the witness' entire testimony; but the Courts which affect this maxim insist on fixing some such limitations to the operation of the jury's belief. They commonly hold that the lie, to have any derogatory operation, may appear to have been told at any stage of the proceedings,—not necessarily while on the stand at the present time, but at any former stage of the same proceedings.[1]

N. D. 280, 90 N. W. 436; 1915, Remington v. Geiszler, 30 N. D. 346, 152 N. W. 661; Wash. 1896, State v. Carter, 15 Wash. 121, 45 Pac. 745; Wis. 1903, Richardson v. Babcock, 119 Wis. 141, 96 N. W. 554.

It is not necessary that the lie should be "palpable" to the jury: 1906, Chicago C. R. Co. v. Shaw, 220 Ill. 532, 77 N. E. 139; this is another example of the wretched and wasteful sophistry to which the rule leads.

[2] 1884, Elliott, C. J., in Seller v. Jenkins, 97 Ind. 436: "A witness who tells a falsehood concerning a matter incidentally connected with the subject of the action is as likely to testify untruly as if the falsehood had directly affected the issue." For illustrations of this, see the cross-examinations quoted ante, §§ 1005, 1006.

§ 1015. [1] 1809, R. v. Teal, 11 East 309 (former testimony, now confessed to have been perjured; present prosecution being for the conspiracy to charge falsely); 1825, Dunlop v. Patterson, 5 Cow. 23; 1864, Dunn v. People, 29 N. Y. 529; 1828, State v. Jim, 1 Dev. 509 (former trial); 1855, State v. Williams, 2 Jones L. 260 (grand jury); State v. Woodly, 2 Jones L. 259, 279 (committing magistrate). In Lavenburg v. Harper, 27 Miss. 301 (1854), an instruction was declared erroneous because it did not confine the jury to the evidence before the Court as their basis of belief, and because it was under the circumstances hardly applicable.

SUB-TITLE II (continued): TESTIMONIAL IMPEACHMENT

TOPIC V: SELF-CONTRADICTION

CHAPTER XXXIV.

1. General Principle

§ 1017. Theory of Relevancy. The end aimed at by the present sort of impeaching evidence is the same as that of the preceding sort, namely, to show the witness to be in general capable of making errors in his testimony (ante, § 1000); for upon perceiving that the witness has made an erroneous statement upon one point, we are ready to infer that he is capable of making an error upon other points. But the method of showing this is here slightly different; for, instead of invoking the assertions of other witnesses to prove his specific error, we resort simply to the witness' own prior statements, in which he has given a contrary version. We place his contradictory statements side by side, and, as both cannot be correct, we realize that in at least one of the two he must have spoken erroneously. Thus, we have detected him in one specific error, from which may be inferred a capacity to make other errors. Two important features of this method of proof are to be noticed.

(1) The general end attained is the same indefinite end attained by the preceding method (ante, § 1000), i.e. some undefined capacity to err; it may be a moral disposition to lie, it may be partisan bias, it may be faulty observation, it may be defective recollection, or any other quality. No specific defect is indicated; but each and all are hinted at. It has been often said that a Prior Self-Contradiction shows "a defect either in the memory or in the honesty" of the witness:[1]

1852, SHAW, C. J., in Com. v. Starkweather, 10 Cush. 60: "It is founded on the obvious consideration that both accounts cannot be true, and tends to prove a defect of intelligence or memory on the subject testified of, or, what is worse, a want of moral honesty and regard to truth; and so, in either case, that the witness is less worthy of belief."

1870, COLE, J., in Knox v. Johnson, 26 Wis. 43: "This circumstance is well calculated to throw suspicion on her accuracy and credibility. It shows that her memory is exceedingly unreliable and treacherous in reference to the times of payment of moneys by her, or that she does not realize the importance of adhering to actual facts when making statements under oath."
