By John H. Wigmore

A TREATISE ON THE ANGLO-AMERICAN SYSTEM OF EVIDENCE IN TRIALS AT COMMON LAW, including the Statutes and Judicial Decisions of All Jurisdictions of the United States and Canada. 5 VOLUMES, SECOND EDITION.

A POCKET CODE OF THE RULES OF EVIDENCE IN TRIALS AT LAW.

CASES ON THE LAW OF EVIDENCE, SECOND EDITION.

CASES ON THE LAW OF TORTS, WITH NOTES, AND A SUMMARY OF PRINCIPLES. 2 VOLUMES.

THE PRINCIPLES OF JUDICIAL PROOF AS GIVEN BY LOGIC, PSYCHOLOGY, AND GENERAL EXPERIENCE AND ILLUSTRATED IN JUDICIAL TRIALS.

A TREATISE

ON THE

ANGLO-AMERICAN SYSTEM OF

EVIDENCE

IN

TRIALS AT COMMON LAW

INCLUDING

THE STATUTES AND JUDICIAL DECISIONS OF ALL JURISDICTIONS OF
THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA

BY

JOHN HENRY WIGMORE

PROFESSOR OF THE LAW OF EVIDENCE IN THE LAW SCHOOL OF NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY

IN FIVE VOLUMES

VOLUME I

SECOND EDITION

BOSTON
LITTLE, BROWN, AND COMPANY
1923

PRINTED IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

TO THE MEMORY OF

THE PUBLIC SERVICES AND THE PRIVATE FRIENDSHIP

OF

TWO MASTERS IN THE LAW OF EVIDENCE

CHARLES DOE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

JUDGE AND REFORMER

AND

JAMES BRADLEY THAYER OF MASSACHUSETTS

HISTORIAN AND TEACHER

"Our Law, like all others, consists of two parts, viz., of body and soul. The letter of the Law is the body of the Law, and the sense and reason of it is the soul, 'quia ratio legis est anima legis.' And the Law may be resembled to a nut, which has a shell, and a kernel within; the letter of the Law represents the shell, and the sense of it the kernel. So you will receive no benefit by the Law if you rely only upon the letter." 1574, Serjeant Plowden, in Eyston v. Studd, Plowden's Reports 465.

"The Law does not consist in particular instances, though it is explained by particular instances and rules; but the Law consists of principles, which govern specific and individual cases as they happen to arise." 1783, Lord Chief Justice Mansfield, in R. v. Bembridge, Howell's State Trials, XXII, 155.

"We all confess, but few adequately perceive, why it is so difficult to recollect a dry rule of practice; and we incorrectly impute to a defect of memory what in reality is attributable to our never having adequately known the subject. The simple truth is that reason or principle is the appropriate food of the mind; and it follows that no position is received with adequate appetite unless it be associated with the reason upon which it is founded." 1835, Mr. Joseph Chitty, Practice of the Law, 2d edition, Preface to Part II.

"A body of law is more rational and more civilized when every rule it contains is referred articulately and definitely to an end which it subserves and when the grounds for desiring that end are stated or are ready to be stated in words." 1897, Mr. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, Address at Boston.

THE AUTHOR'S LETTER TO THE PUBLISHER

CONCERNING

THE SECOND EDITION

Northwestern University Law School
November 1, 1922.

Gentlemen:

I reply to your request for a statement from me as to the additions and other improvements made in the Second Edition (1923) of my Treatise on Evidence, now in press:

In general, the Second Edition will offer: A complete critical reëxamination of the text; numerous enlargements of it, to include new topics; revised citations for the entire body of statute-law, showing the new numberings of statutes in the latest current official editions; the inclusion of some 800 new citations of statutes and some 15,000 new citations of recent judicial decisions; together with numerous typographical improvements and other helps for the reader. All of this is the result of my own personal research and scrutiny, without other professional assistance.

On each of these points I will now offer further details:

1. TEXT. Every word of the text has been scrutinized. In almost every section some alteration has been made, with a view to improvement. In a few instances, changes of personal view have been noted; in many others, the new text is intended to reflect new trends of judicial and statutory law or new aspects of the "weight of authority." — The object has been to make the text speak as of to-day, and not of the day of first publication.

2. Numerous topics formerly treated in the footnotes have been given a place in the text, owing to enlarged importance given to them by the decisions or statutes of the interim.

3. Numerous new topics, called for by new applications of law which have come to the front since the date of the First Edition, have been added.

The following partial list will illustrate the scope of these additions to the text:

Rules of Evidence before Industrial Commissions, Public Utilities Commissions, and other Administrative Officials (§§ 4*a*–4*c*);
Rules of Evidence in Admiralty Courts, Military Courts, Juvenile Courts, Commercial Courts (§ 4*d*); Rules of Evidence before Arbitrators, Clubs, Fraternities, etc. (§ 4*e*);
Rules of Evidence in Social Case-Work (§ 4*g*); Altering the Rules of Evidence by Contract (§ 7*a*);
Tags, Signs, Number-Plates, as evidence of Identity of Automobiles, Railroad-Cars, etc. (§ 150*a*); Finger-Prints and Footmarks as evidence of Identity (§§ 151*a*, 414, 415);
Physiological Traits as evidence of Paternity (§ 165);
Convictions of Crime, used against an Accused under the English Act of 1898 (§ 194*a*);
Insane Belief, as shown by Facts told to the Party (§§ 262, 263);
Other Offences as evidence of Intent in Sale or Prescription of Drugs and Narcotics (§ 368);
Other Utterances as evidence of Intent in Treason, Sedition, or Conspiracy (§§ 369, 370, 465);
Method of securing Unbiassed Experts (§§ 563, 2484);
Wife's Testimony in Desertion Cases (§§ 617, 2239);
Adoptive Parent's Testimony to Adoptive Child's Age (§ 667);
Information obtained by Dictagraph (§ 669);
Expert Witness reading a Prepared Report (§§ 740, 787, 1385);
Moving-Picture Photographs in Evidence (§ 798);
Continuous Interrogation under Arrest ("Sweat-box", "Third Degree") (§ 851); Psychological Testimony to Deficiencies of Testimonial Capacity to Observe or Remember (§§ 935, 990); Producing the Original of a Registered Title (§§ 1225, 1647);
Records and Certificates of Vital Statistics (§§ 1336, 1644);
Records of Indian Tribal Blood in Land Titles (§ 1347);
Certificates of Chemical Analysis of Foods and Fertilizers (§§ 1352, 1674);
Interpreters for Alien Witnesses (§ 1393);
Reputation to evidence Recognition of Illegitimate Child (§ 1606); Reputation to evidence Keeping a Place for Illegal Sale of Liquor or Drugs (§ 1620); Certificates of Service in Army and Navy (§ 1675*a*);
Hospital Records (§ 1707);
Common Carrier's Records of Liquor Transported (§ 1708);
Discovery of Premises and Chattels in Criminal Cases, Exhumation of Corpse, etc. (§§ 1863, 2194, 2224);
Corroborating a Claimant of Prior Invention of a Patent (§ 2065*a*);
Producing Eye-Witnesses of a Personal Injury (§ 2081*a*);
Producing Medical Testimony in Malpractice Cases (§ 2090);
Evidence obtained by Illegal Search for Liquor, etc. (§ 2184);
Compelling Depositions for Use in Another State (§ 2195);
Witness' Exemption from Liability to Arrest (§ 2195);
Witness' Privilege not to Disclose Premises, Chattels, etc. (§ 2216); Privilege against Self-Crimination for Books and Reports (Motorists, Druggists, etc.) required by law to be made (§§ 2259*c*, 2259*d*);
Witness' Immunity from Self-Crimination (§ 2282);
Privilege for Communications to State Prosecutor (§ 2375);
Privilege for Communications to Judge, Conciliator, etc. (§ 2376);

Privilege for Business Reports (Taxes, Industrial Accidents, etc.) (§ 2377); Privilege for Physician's Certificate of Death (§ 2385*a*); Parol Evidence of Agreement to Treat Copy as Original (§ 2449); Burden of Proof of Ownership of Automobile (§ 2510*a*);

All of these additions have been made either by inserting new section-numbers or by expanding existing sections. In only a few minor instances is a section-number changed, and for these a list of Changes is prefixed to each volume. Thus all citations in judicial opinions to the original text are equally available for the Second Edition.

4. To facilitate the reader's use, long paragraphs of text in the original have been broken up into shorter ones, and important topical catchwords have been more frequently italicized.

5. The Topical Index has been completely revised.

6. A Tabular Analysis of the topical scheme of the book has been placed at the beginning of each volume, and another one in § 3 of Volume I.

7. For the convenience of practitioners using the author's Pocket Code of Evidence in trial practice, a Table of Cross-References from Treatise to Pocket Code, by sections, has been placed at the beginning of each volume. (The Pocket Code already contains, at the end of each section, a similar cross-reference from Code to Treatise.)

8. For convenience in studying the argumentative use of evidence in speeches to juries, frequent references have been made, in footnotes at appropriate points, to the corresponding places in the author's compilation of materials entitled "Principles of Judicial Proof, as given by Logic, Psychology, and General Experience, and illustrated in Judicial Trials" (1913).

II. Statute Law. Since the First Edition, all States and Territories (except two or three) have revised their Codes or Compilations, — in some instances, twice. For the Second Edition, this entire body of statute-law has been re-examined, page by page, in the latest official revisions. All the citations in the original edition (some 8000 in all) have been replaced by the citations from the latest current official revisions. Several hundred new statutes, not found in the search made for the first edition, have been added; the total number of citations approximating 15,000. The session-laws subsequent to the official Revisions, down to 1922 inclusive, have been searched. In the case of four States, where new official Revisions were just going through the press in 1922, the courtesy of the Commissioners supplied the author with proof-copies, from which the new citation-numbers of the statutes were obtained. Thus, the citations of statute-law have been brought thoroughly up to date, in form for ready reference.

The statute law of the Philippine Islands and Porto Rico has been included, for the first time, in this Edition.

The Federal statutes have been supplied with citations to the new United States Code, now pending in Congress.

III. Judicial Decisions. The First Edition contained some 40,000 citations of judicial decisions. The Supplement of 1914 contained over 7000 more. To these have now been added more than another 7000, covering the intervening period; making a total of some 15,000 citations added to the original 40,000.

The judicial decisions of the Philippine Islands, Porto Rico, Alaska, and the United States Court for China have been, for the first time, included in this Edition. Use has been made of the two invaluable series of trial reports recently added to our annals, — the Notable British Trials series and the American State Trials series.

The historical portions have been re-enforced by gleanings from new volumes of the Selden Society's publications, American Colonial annals, and other sources. Recent professional memoirs have supplied illustrative anecdotes.

The expository quotations from judicial opinions, in the text, now include some of the best utterances from the most recent opinions.

IV. Typography and Arrangement. The entire work has been reset in type, — text, footnotes, and indices. All the citations furnished in the Supplements of 1907 and 1914, together with the citations of new material accruing in the interval, have been consolidated with the original citations, placing the newer ones in proper chronological order within each jurisdiction, so as to read consecutively.

Important improvements in typography and citation have been introduced:

1. At the first footnote to a section, the number of the section is inserted, in bold-face type, so as to enable ready finding of the notes belonging to that section.

2. Wherever the citations include cases or statutes from several jurisdictions, the State name in italics (in full or abbreviated) precedes each group.

3. Wherever numerous jurisdictions are represented, each State is separately paragraphed, with the State name in italics or capitals at the left of the column, so as to enable ready reference to the jurisdiction sought.

4. Wherever a succeeding case is cited from the same reporter or State series as the preceding one, the name of the reporter or State is repeated (instead of using the abbreviation "id." as in the First Edition). This change affects many thousand citations.

5. Where a long footnote, giving authorities for the detailed treatment in the text, covers several pages, it is now placed at the beginning of the text (instead of at the end, as frequently happened in the original edition); so that in no case (unless unavoidable) do the footnotes to one section run over and appear under the text of a succeeding section.

6. An improvement calculated to assist all users of the book is the insertion of the State name for every report cited. Modern practitioners seem to be no longer so familiar with the early reporters' names as was the older generation; it has therefore been assumed by the author that the reader who desires to study in the original the judicial opinions here cited will be best served by furnishing always the means for direct resort to the report without consulting a Table of reporters' names. In this Edition, either the State name is inserted with each citation of a private reporter (thus, "Jones v. Smith, 2 All. Mass. 14"); or, when a series of citations from a single State occurs, the State name in italics precedes the series.

It is hoped that the foregoing summary of the effort spent upon the Second Edition indicates that it has been generally improved as well as brought down to date, and that it will satisfy the profession which has so kindly given its approval to the First Edition.

Sincerely yours,
JOHN H. WIGMORE

PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION

In the Ninth Book of the Analects of the Confucian Sage this saying is recorded: "The Master said: 'There are some persons with whom we may pursue our studies in common, yet we shall find them unable to progress to general principles. Or, if they attain to principles, we shall find them unable to accept a common understanding of them. Or, if they reach this common understanding, we find them unable to use the principles with us in their applications.'" This saying comes true, often enough, for our profession of the law. Certainly it is verified in the law of Evidence. There was a stage in the history of its thought (and not so long ago) when it was seldom perceived to involve a system of general principles. When this perception came, in time, hardly any two writers were found to agree on the analysis and grouping of the system; and, sometimes, not even on the statement of the same principle. And to-day, as always, the chief practical difficulty in the law of Evidence lies in the application of it, — in distinguishing the bearings of different principles upon the same evidential fact.

The particular aspiration of this Treatise is, first, to expound the Anglo-American law of Evidence as a system of reasoned principles and rules; secondly, to deal with the apparently warring mass of judicial precedents as the consistent product of these principles and rules; and, thirdly, to furnish all the materials for ascertaining the present state of the law in the half a hundred independent American jurisdictions.

The first of these aims ought not to be the most difficult, possessing as we do in our Reports a thesaurus of judicial expositions, profuse and lucid, of the reasons and policies of our rules of Evidence. And yet it is to the law of Evidence least of all that the profession has been used to look for reasons. Rather (in common opinion) does that law, like Falstaff, yield no man a reason upon compulsion, — though they be indeed plenty as blackberries. Perhaps, to be sure, this is merely a part of the general tendency, induced amid the hurry and pressure of the practitioner's calling, to rest upon a rule of thumb or the latest and nearest case. "The gentlemen of the bar," declared John Horne Tooke, with the hostile sarcasm of a layman, conducting his own celebrated defense against eminent counsel, "are very wise indeed in all the applications of the law — because from thence arise all their fees; but in regard to the cause of the law, they very rarely consider it, — for no gain can arise to them from so doing." And yet the rules of Evidence, over and above others, have come to bear, even within the profession itself, the stigma of technical arbitrariness and obstructive unreason. "My Evidence Bill," said a gentleman of legal attainments to Sir James Stephen, "would be a very short one; it would consist of one rule, to this effect: 'All rules of evidence are hereby abolished.'"

Nevertheless, when all is known and examined, the reproach is not merited. That distinguished legislator, Sir James Stephen himself (and the domination of his thought in our law of Evidence during the past generation has been rivalled only by that of Professor Thayer), was able, after a practical judicial experience second to no man's, to devote his greatest work "to prove the proposition that the English rules of Evidence are not a mere collection of arbitrary subtleties which shackle, instead of guiding, natural sagacity."

Nor can it be charged to the judges, or to their declared judgments, that they have failed to supply the materials for a right apprehension of the law's reasoning. "Let all people," said Lord Chancellor Parker, two centuries ago, "be at liberty to know what I found my judgment upon; that so, when I have given it in any cause, others may be at liberty to judge of me"; and it is in this spirit that they have acted throughout the modern development of the law of Evidence. Their reasonings are scattered copiously through the pages of the Reports. It is not that the judges have failed to supply them; it is we who have failed to consider them. When Hobbes' Philosopher reproaches the Lawyer, in their Dialogue on the Common Laws, that "the great masters of the mathematics do not so often err as the great professors of the law," the Lawyer's retort is a just and appropriate one: "If you had applied your reason to the law, perhaps you would have been of another mind."

The rules of Evidence, as recorded in our law, may be said to be essentially rational. The reason may not always be a good one, in point of policy. But there is always a reason.

If we are to save the law for a living future, if it is to remain manageable amidst the spawning mass of rulings and statutes which tend increasingly to clog its simplicity, we must rescue these reasonings from forgetfulness. A main attempt, therefore, in the following pages and in the preparation for them, has been to search out and to emphasize the accepted reasons for each rule. As an important aid to their exposition, the method has been employed of setting forth the most influential, the most lucid, and the most carefully reasoned passages anywhere recorded in judicial annals, — the best things that have been said upon the rules of Evidence. 'Multa ignoramus', Coke warns us, 'quæ non laterent, si veterum lectio nobis esset familiaris.' The encyclopedic method, compiling in concise form the barren summaries of voluminous originals, may become an inevitable one in our law. But (as a great historian once lamented, in describing the downfall of classical learning in the Middle Ages), such a method is "a usual concomitant of declining literature; for it supersedes the use of the great writers, and effects the oblivion of good models." One of the greatest services (but little mentioned) of Professor Langdell's modern system of case-study in schools of law has been to enlarge and perpetuate, for each new generation of the profession, this familiarity with good models of judicial reasoning. For the law of Evidence, the oblivion of the originals would have the worst consequences. But with these gleanings of the best passages, collated and preserved in form for convenient access, it may be hoped that the reasons of the law will not be buried from daily understanding and that the life of the rules will not be lost.

The second aim of this Treatise — the alignment of the mass of precedents as a consistent product of these principles and rules — would by some be thought to need nothing short of the forcible methods of a Procrustes. The mere mass of these precedents is bewildering. The pronouncements of independent Courts are in constant contrast. The inherent working of the rules of Evidence is to admit or exclude a fact according to the nature of the particular objection brought against it, and thus the very same fact may be found excluded and admitted with seeming inconsistency. These influences have brought the professional use of precedents to a singular pass. A recent President of the American Bar Association has criticized the present conditions in radical language: "A judge may decide almost any question any way, and still be supported by an array of cases. Cases are our counters, and there are no coins. Our legal arguments are for the most part a mere casino-like matching and unmatching of cases, involving little or no intellectual effort. The law is ceasing to be a question of principles, and is becoming a mere question of patterns." What the remedy is, for the profession and for the law at large, is another matter. But for the expounder of the law it is certainly a knotty problem how to exhibit in a treatise such consistency as may be found to exist amidst the mass of precedents. In the following pages, the effort has been made in several ways to emphasize those features which reduce the apparent inconsistencies. For one thing, the independence of the different Courts has been recognized, by arranging the rulings in the alphabetical order of jurisdictions, in chronological sequence within each jurisdiction, and by separating each group (where numerous rulings occur on the same point) by the italicized title of the State or Territory. The fact that there are half a hundred practically independent jurisdictions must be conceded and faced. What is the law? is a question which cannot be answered except as with fifty tongues speaking at once. What the law is in Illinois may well be not the law in Massachusetts or in California. It is time for the profession to discard the amiable pretence that precedents can be cited interchangeably. The treatise, on the one hand, is not to represent that the rule is unsettled because there are inconsistent rulings; for opposition is not inconsistency, and independence of jurisdiction leads naturally to opposition of rules. The practitioner, on the other hand, can often expect not much more of the treatise than to furnish the materials for ascertaining what is the rule in a particular jurisdiction. If this independence of jurisdiction be steadily recollected, three-quarters of the reproach of uncertainty disappears. Still further, much can be done to remove the remaining inconsistency, for the law of Evidence in particular, by the use of copious cross-references. The chameleon-like application of the rules demands this. When Doe's statement, for example, regarding his tenancy of an estate, is offered in evidence, it is perfectly proper to admit it as a hearsay statement against interest, if he is shown to be deceased, or to receive it as a party's admission, if Doe is an opponent or predecessor in title, or to admit it as a possessor's verbal act, if Doe was a possessor; and it may be excluded in one ruling, from one of these points of view, and admitted in another, and excluded in a third, from another of these points of view; and yet there is no real inconsistency, nor any uncertainty, — except for those who do not know the character of their law of Evidence. For those, then, who realize these inherent possibilities in the law of Evidence (and none others should ever attempt to work with it), there is ample succor, through the mist of apparent uncertainties, if constant beacons of multiple reference be placed at every possible cross-roads. In the lack of a uniform nomenclature and of accepted catch-words for every rule, no one can anticipate all the turns of thought that may occur to each practitioner. But a great deal can by this means be done to direct the intelligent searcher to the various plausible aspects of the particular evidential fact which he desires to offer or to oppose.

The third aim of this Treatise — to furnish all the materials for ascertaining the present state of the law in each of the American jurisdictions — is something which has been undertaken, not because it is believed to be feasible in accurate completeness, but merely because it needs to be done, and therefore ought at least to be attempted. Of the particular features of the present attempt, only two of the most important need here be noted. First, under each rule (excepting those now wholly abolished, such as the general disqualification by interest), the early as well as the recent cases have been included. The judicial oblivion of many of the former has done more than anything else to create whatever there is of real uncertainty in the law. For example, in a Court on the Great Lakes, having fifty years of history, and some fourteen precedents under a certain rule, a recent opinion is found to cite two of these only, and yet to invoke needlessly half a dozen from other Courts, ignoring the round dozen of its own, — fortunately without happening to upset them. In an older Court, on the Atlantic, at about the same period, a new limitation of another rule is started, in unconscious disregard of its own prior rulings, and this modern novelty, soon followed elsewhere upon the solid authority of that Court, is set going into several other jurisdictions, and now breeds new controversy and annual uncertainty in a topic where settled peace had once reigned. The cases, then, and all the cases, should be the ultimate aim of one who would bear witness to the present state of the law.

Yet not the cases only; for a second and to-day equally vital part of the material lies in the statutes. How much our judicial law of Evidence has been overlaid and intertwined with statutes is almost incredible, until we come to take deliberate reckoning. In mere numbers, the citations of statutes in the following pages are nearly one-fourth as many as the rulings.

In practical significance, the proportion is scarcely less. Blackstone divided statutes into two classes, declaratory and remedial. The American statutes upon the law of Evidence may be included in three classes, — those which were necessary to remedy the common law, those which the legislators erroneously thought were necessary, and those which they knew were unnecessary. The first class includes those in which the common law was changed (and, beyond doubt, in most instances, with good cause); they number something more than a third of all. The second class embraces those which tried to remedy a supposed need, but did no more than the common law could have done without them, — had the legislators but known it. The third includes those codified enactments which were intended merely to declare what every one knew to be and wished to preserve in the law; some of these shafts, by missing the mark, have dealt dole to good law; many others, blunt and harmless, have been quietly pocketed by the judges, whose principles have continued to date from the original precedents. It is fortunate that no Court has ever conceded to any Code a monopoly of the extant rules. The law of to-day, in any jurisdiction, is a blended mass. Statutes and rulings, old and new, must alike be scanned; and the time for a real Code has not yet come.

But a word of disclaimer must here be entered against any expectation of absolute completeness of citation in the following pages. Much is missing, — in part by necessity, in part by a choice based on what was feasible. All the material of the substantive law, often miscalled "evidence", is without the present purview, — such as the "evidence" necessary and admissible in burglary, in debt, and the like.[1] For a few rules, wholly created by statute, the judicial interpretations, where unmanageable in bulk and purely local in significance, and attainable in the ordinary annotations to statutory compilations, have been left aside. Certain groups of statutes, merely appurtenant to a statute of substantive law and certain to be discovered by any one having to do with the latter (such as the statutes defining the unlawful killing of game and then declaring possession of the game to be evidence of the killing), have had to be omitted. At the region where the rules of Evidence fade into the rules of procedure (for example, the procedure of taking depositions), or into the rules of substantive law (for example, the officers authorized to take acknowledgments of deeds), all doubts had to be solved against including such materials. In particular, in the last part of the work, where the functions of judge and jury, and kindred border topics, are dealt with, no more than a general survey of the rules, with a portion of the precedents, is attempted. Finally, there lurks, no doubt, at various points a residuum of undiscovered precedents. The excuse of Hallam may herein pardonably be invoked, that "an author who waits till all the requisite materials are accumulated to his hands is but watching the stream that will run on forever; and though I am fully sensible that I could have much improved what is now offered to the public by keeping it back for a longer time, I should but then have had to lament the impossibility of exhausting my subject." To those who reflect upon the difficulties of such a task, it is not necessary to make other apology for the imperfections that may be discovered, or to point out the palliating circumstances.

[1] This is the material covered in Volumes II and III of Greenleaf on Evidence and Starkie on Evidence; in § 2, in the present work, an explanation of reasons is given.

Perhaps a closing word should be said for those pages given to the criticism of the existing law and to the history of its past. Something of each of these has a proper place. Sir James Stephen once laid down this canon: "A complete account of any branch of the law ought to consist of three parts, corresponding to its past, present, and future condition respectively; these parts are: Its history; A statement of it as an existing system; A critical discussion of its component parts, with a view to its improvement." That our law of Evidence can be improved upon, no one doubts. That the improvement must be gradual, yet unremitting, is equally certain, — at least if we believe, with Carlyle, that "all Law is but a tamed Furrow-field, slowly worked out and rendered arable from the waste Jungle." That the profession is interested, and that all practicable proposals for progress will have to come from or through the profession itself, must be conceded. Lord Ellenborough once disposed (to his own satisfaction) of a mild measure of reform by the argument that, if the rule of law were changed, "a lawyer who was well stored with these rules would be no better than any other man that is without them." No doubt the profession is to-day beyond the power of such a motive. It has shown again and again that its sympathies are rather with the noble sentiment of Erskine: "No precedents can sanction injustice; if they could, every human right would long ago have been extinct upon the earth." To those sympathies is addressed whatever of criticism has been ventured in the ensuing pages. 'Valeat quantum valere potest.'

As for the history of this law, it need hardly be said that a great deal has remained hitherto undescribed, — if not unexplored. Its one master, now passed away, James Bradley Thayer, set the example and marked the lines for all subsequent research in this part of the subject. As rules directly appurtenant to jury trial, he made clear their development down to the 1600s, when the common-law system definitely obtained the upper hand of its rival, the canon-law system; and some of the rules he brought down to the present day. It was a part of the aim in this work to fill out the missing places, accepting the results already reached by him. Portions of this remaining history, as here set forth, had been seen and accepted by him; but a chief and irremediable disappointment has been that the portions later completed (which represented, indeed, a broader survey of the materials) lost the good fortune of his friendly perusal and possible concurrence.

J. H. W.

NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY LAW SCHOOL,
CHICAGO, September 16, 1904.

CONTENTS

CONTENTS

CONTENTS

CONTENTS

CHAPTER XII

Topic VII. — Other Offenses or Similar Acts, as Evidence of Knowledge, Design, or Intent

1. General Principles

CONTENTS

CONTENTS

CHAPTER XIV

TOPIC IX. — EVIDENCE TO PROVE EMOTION (MOTIVE, FEELING, PASSION)

CHAPTER XV

TOPIC X. — EVIDENCE TO PROVE IDENTITY

CHAPTER XVI

SUB-TITLE III. — EVIDENCE TO PROVE FACTS OF EXTERNAL INANIMATE NATURE (EVENTS, CONDITIONS, TENDENCIES, CAUSES, QUALITIES, AND EFFECTS, OF THINGS AND PLACES)

CONTENTS

CONTENTS

CHAPTER XXIII

TOPIC III. — EMOTIONAL CAPACITY

SUB-TOPIC A. — INTEREST AS A TESTIMONIAL DISQUALIFICATION

CHAPTER XXIV

SUB-TOPIC B. — MARITAL RELATIONSHIP AS A TESTIMONIAL DISQUALIFICATION

CHAPTER XXV

TOPIC IV. — TESTIMONIAL KNOWLEDGE

A. GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF KNOWLEDGE

CONTENTS

VOLUME TWO

CHAPTER XXVI

Topic V. — Testimonial Recollection

CONTENTS

CHAPTER XXVII

TOPIC VI. — TESTIMONIAL NARRATION OR COMMUNICATION

CHAPTER XXVIII

TOPIC VI (continued). — CONFESSIONS OF AN ACCUSED PERSON

CHAPTER XXX

Topic I. — Character, Mental Defects, Bias, etc., used as General Qualities to Discredit

A. Moral Character

B. Insanity, Intoxication, and other Organic Incapacity

CONTENTS

CHAPTER XXXIII

TOPIC IV. — SPECIFIC ERROR (CONTRADICTION)

CHAPTER XXXIV

TOPIC V. — SELF-CONTRADICTION

1. General Principle

2. Collateral Matters Excluded

3. Preliminary Warning Necessary

4. What amounts to a Self-Contradiction or Inconsistency

5. Explaining away the Inconsistency

CONTENTS

CHAPTER XXXV

TOPIC VI. —ADMISSIONS

CONTENTS

CHAPTER XXXVI

SUB-TITLE III. — TESTIMONIAL REHABILITATION

CHAPTER XXXVII

TITLE III. — AUTOPTIC PROFERENCE (REAL EVIDENCE)

CONTENTS

CONTENTS

CHAPTER XLI

Sub-Topic B. — Preferred Reports of Prior Testimony

Sub-Topic C. — Sundry Preferred Witnesses

CONTENTS

VOLUME THREE

CONTENTS

CONTENTS

CONTENTS

CHAPTER XLIX

Topic III. — Declarations about Family History (Pedigree)

CHAPTER L

Topic IV. — Attestation of a Subscribing Witness

CHAPTER LI

Topic V. — Regular Entries

CONTENTS

CHAPTER LV

Topic IX. — Learned Treatises

CONTENTS

CHAPTER LVI

TOPIC XIII. — DECLARATIONS OF A MENTAL OR PHYSICAL CONDITION

CONTENTS

CHAPTER LVII

TOPIC XIV. — SPONTANEOUS EXCLAMATIONS

CHAPTER LVIII

SUB-TITLE III. — HEARSAY RULE NOT APPLICABLE (VERBAL ACTS, RES GESTÆ, ETC.)

CONTENTS

CONTENTS

CHAPTER LXII

SUB-TITLE V. — PRIOR NOTICE, OR DISCOVERY, OF EVIDENCE TO THE OPPONENT

VOLUME FOUR

CHAPTER LXIII

TITLE IV. — SIMPLIFICATIVE RULES

SUB-TITLE I. — ORDER OF PRESENTING EVIDENCE

CONTENTS

CHAPTER LXVI

TOPIC II. — OPINION RULE APPLIED TO SUNDRY TOPICS

CONTENTS

CHAPTER LXVII

TOPIC III. — OPINION RULE, APPLIED TO TESTIMONY TO MORAL CHARACTER AND PROFESSIONAL SKILL

CHAPTER LXVIII

TOPIC IV. — OPINION RULE, AS APPLIED TO HANDWRITING-EVIDENCE

CONTENTS

CHAPTER LXIX

TITLE V. — SYNTHETIC (OR QUANTITATIVE) RULES

SUB-TITLE I. — NUMBER OF WITNESSES REQUIRED; CORROBORATION REQUIRED

Topic I. — Rules Depending on the Kind of Issue

1. Criminal Cases

2. Civil Cases

Topic II. — Rules Depending on the Kind of Witness

CHAPTER LXX

SUB-TITLE II. — KINDS OF WITNESSES REQUIRED

CONTENTS

CHAPTER LXXI

SUB-TITLE III. — VERBAL COMPLETENESS

CONTENTS

CHAPTER LXXII

SUB-TITLE IV. — AUTHENTICATION OF DOCUMENTS

CHAPTER LXXIII

PART III. — RULES OF EXTRINSIC POLICY

TITLE I. — RULES OF ABSOLUTE EXCLUSION

CONTENTS

CONTENTS

CHAPTER LXXVIII

Sub-Topic III. — Privilege for Self-Criminating Facts

CONTENTS

VOLUME FIVE

TOPIC B. — PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS

CHAPTER LXXIX

SUB-TOPIC I. — CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS IN GENERAL

CHAPTER LXXX

SUB-TOPIC II. — COMMUNICATIONS BETWEEN ATTORNEY AND CLIENT

CONTENTS

CHAPTER LXXXI

Sub-Topic III. — Communications between Husband and Wife

CHAPTER LXXXII

Sub-Topic IV. — Communications by and to Jurors

CHAPTER LXXXIII

Sub-Topic V. — State Secrets and Official Documents

CONTENTS

CHAPTER LXXXIV

Sub-Topic VI. — Communications between Physician and Patient

CHAPTER LXXXV

Sub-Topic VII. — Communications between Priest and Penitent

CHAPTER LXXXVI

PART IV.—PAROL EVIDENCE RULE (CONSTITUTION OF JURAL ACTS)

Introduction

A. Creation of Jural Acts (Voidness and Voidableness)

1. Subject, Terms, Delivery, in General

2. Intent and Mistake, as Affecting Subject, Terms, and Delivery, of an Act

3. Voidable Acts

CONTENTS

CONTENTS

CHAPTER LXXXVII

BOOK II. — BY WHOM EVIDENCE MUST BE PRESENTED (BURDEN OF PROOF; PRESUMPTION)

TITLE I. — GENERAL THEORY

CHAPTER LXXXVIII

TITLE II. — BURDENS AND PRESUMPTIONS IN SPECIFIC ISSUES

CONTENTS

LIST OF LATEST SOURCES EXAMINED

THE following Tables show the dates of latest sources examined, and the editions of legislative sources used.

TABLE I

Table I shows in Col. 2 the code or compilation of legislation used.

Col. 3 shows the latest year-laws (session laws) examined.

Col. 4 shows the latest official report of judicial decisions cited. For England and Ireland, only the official reports were examined. For Canada, only the unofficial reports (Dominion Law Reports) were examined; as no table of parallel citations is available, the official reports are not cited in this book for cases reported since 1912 (the date of beginning of the D. L. R.); hence, the official report here shown in Col. 4 is merely the latest volume that had appeared at the time of going to press; indicating that the citations of cases in this work will include at least the cases down to those official numbers of volumes, as well as a few later ones. For the United States, only the unofficial reports (National Reporter System) were examined; except for Alaska, Hawaii, Philippine Islands, and Porto Rico, and for District of Columbia down to 1919, — these not being included in the National Reporter System. Parallel citations of the official reports are invariably given, so far as these had appeared at the date of going to press. The official report shown in Col. 4 is merely the latest volume cited; the cases examined come down to a later date in the unofficial citations (Table II).

Col. 5 shows, by jurisdictions, the latest unofficial report examined and cited, — for Canada, the Dominion Law Reports; for the United States, the National Reporter System.

The decisions of the Appellate (intermediate) Courts which exist in some States have been cited only on interesting matters for which there is scanty authority; partly because their rulings are not final (except in Texas and in Oklahoma, for criminal cases), and partly because in some jurisdictions they are expressly made not binding as precedents. The rulings of Federal District Courts have also been left unnoticed to a similar extent.

LIST OF LATEST SOURCES EXAMINED

TABLE I. JUDICIAL AND LEGISLATIVE SOURCES USED

Jurisdiction	Statutes		Reported Decisions
	Revision or Code Edition Used	Latest Annual Laws Examined	Latest Official Report Cited	Latest Unofficial Report Examined
England:	Rules of Court, ed. 1922	1921	1922 K. B. 1 1922 Ch. 1 1922 P. to June 1 1922 A. C. to June 1
Ireland:		1921	1921 L. R. Ire.
Canada:
Dominion	Revised Statutes of C. 1906	1921	62 Can. Sup.	65 D. L. R.
Alberta	[see Northwest Territories] Rules of Court 1914	1921	16 Alta.	65 D. L. R.
British Columbia	Revised Statutes 1911 Supreme Court Rules 1912	1921	28 B. C.	65 D. L. R.
Manitoba	Revised Statutes 1913 Rules of Court 1913	1921	30 Man.	65 D. L. R.
New Brunswick	Consolidated Statutes 1903 Rules of Court 1909	1921	47 N. B.	65 D. L. R.
Newfoundland	Consolidated Statutes 1916	1921	9 Newf.
Northwest Terr.[1]	Consolidated Ordinances 1898	1904	7 N. W. Terr.
Nova Scotia	Revised Statutes 1900 Rules of the Supreme Court 1919	1921	53 N. S.	65 D. L. R.
Ontario	Revised Statutes 1914 Rules of Practice and Procedure 1913	1921	49 Ont.	65 D. L. R.
Prince Edward Island[2]		1920	2 P. E. I.	65 D. L. R.
Saskatchewan	Revised Statutes 1920	1921-2	14 Sask.	65 D. L. R.
Yukon	Consolidated Ordinances 1914	1920		65 D. L. R.
United States:
Federal	Revised Statutes 1878 U. S. Code 1919[3]	1922 to June 1	258 U. S.	42 Sup. 279 Fed. 10 Porto Rico Fed. 1 Extra-terr. Cas.
Alabama	Code 1907	1919	206 Ala. 17 Ala. App.	91 So. 91 So.

[1] The legislation and decisions of this region are now continued by those of Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Yukon.

[2] There being no Compilation here, and the Evidence Act of 1889 having codified most of the rules, no search was made for statutes prior to 1889, except that those of 1873 and 1887, dealing with Evidence, were collated.

[3] At the time of going to press, still pending in the Senate; passed in the House of Representatives, May 16, 1921.

TABLE I. JUDICIAL AND LEGISLATIVE SOURCES USED—Continued

Jurisdiction	Statutes		Reported Decisions
	Revision or Code Edition Used	Latest Annual Laws Examined	Latest Official Report Cited	Latest Unofficial Report Examined
Alaska	Compiled Laws 1913	1921	4 Alaska	279 Fed.
Arizona	Revised Statutes 1913	1921	22 Ariz.	206 Pac.
Arkansas	Digest of the Statutes 1919	1921	150 Ark.	240 S. W.
California	Codes 1872		187 Cal.	206 Pac.
	General Laws ed. 1915	1921	45 Cal. App.	206 Pac.
Colorado	Compiled Laws 1921	1921	70 Colo.	206 Pac.
Columbia (Dist.)	Code of Law 1919	1921	50 D. C. App.	279 Fed.
Connecticut	General Statutes, Revision of 1918	1921	96 Conn.	116 Atl.
Delaware	Revised Statutes 1915	1921	11 Del. Ch.	116 Atl.
			7 Boyce	116 Atl.
Florida	Revised General Statutes 1919	1921	82 Fla.	91 So.
Georgia	Code 1910	1921	152 Ga.	111 S. E.
	Park's Annotated Code ed. 1918		27 Ga. App.	111 S. E.
Hawaii	Revised Laws 1915	1921	25 Haw.
Idaho	Compiled Statutes 1919	1921	34 Ida.	206 Pac.
Illinois	Revised Statutes 1874	1921	303 Ill.	135 N. E.
Indiana	Burns' Annotated Statutes 1914	1921	189 Ind.	135 N. E.
			125 Ind. App.	135 N. E.
Iowa	Code 1897	1921	192 Ia.	187 N. W.
	Compiled Code 1919
Kansas	General Statutes 1915	1921	110 Kan.	206 Pac.
Kentucky	Civil and Criminal Codes, Carroll's 3d ed., 1900	1922	194 Ky.	240 S. W.
	Kentucky Statutes, Carroll's 5th ed., 1915, 1918
Louisiana	Revised Civil Code, ed. Marr, 1920	1922	150 La.	91 So.
	Code of Practice, ed. Garland and Wolff, 1900
	Annotated Revision of the Statutes, ed. Marr, 1915
Maine	Revised Statutes 1916	1921	120 Me.	116 Atl.
Maryland	Annotated Code of Public Civil Laws, ed. Bagby, 1911, 1914	1922	139 Md.	116 Atl.
Massachusetts	General Laws 1921	1921	237 Mass.	135 N. E.
Michigan	Compiled Laws 1915	1921	216 Mich.	187 N. W.
Minnesota	General Statutes 1913	1921	150 Minn.	187 N. W.
Mississippi	Annotated Code 1906, ed. Hemingway, 1917	1920	126 Miss.	91 So.
Missouri	Revised Statutes 1919	1921	288 Mo.	240 S. W.
			207 Mo. App.	240 S. W.
Montana	Revised Codes 1921	1921	60 Mont.	206 Pac.
Nebraska	Revised Statutes 1921	1921	106 Nebr.	187 N. W.
Nevada	Revised Laws 1912	1921	44 Nev.	206 Pac.
New Hampshire	Public Statutes 1901	1921	79 N. H.	116 Atl.
New Jersey	Compiled Statutes 1910	1921	95 N. J. L.	116 Atl.
			92 N. J. Eq.	116 Atl.

LIST OF LATEST SOURCES EXAMINED

TABLE I. JUDICIAL AND LEGISLATIVE SOURCES USED—Continued

Jurisdiction	Statutes		Reported Decisions
	Revision or Code Edition Used	Latest Annual Laws Examined	Latest Official Report Cited	Latest Unofficial Report Examined
New Mexico	N. M. Statutes Annotated 1915	1921	26 N. M.	206 Pac.
New York	Consolidated Laws 1909	1922	233 N. Y.	135 N. E.
	Code of Criminal Procedure 1881		196 App. Div.	194 N. Y. Suppl.
	Civil Practice Act 1920
	Surrogate Court Act 1920
	Justice Court Act 1920
	City Court Act 1920
	Court of Claims Act 1920
	N. Y. City Municipal Court Code 1920
North Carolina	Consolidated Statutes 1919	1921	182 N. C.	111 S. E.
North Dakota	Compiled Laws 1913	1921	45 N. D.	187 N. W.
Ohio	General Code Annotated 1921	1921	100 Oh.	135 N. E.
Oklahoma	Compiled Statutes 1921	1921	82 Okl.	206 Pac.
			16 Okl. Cr.	206 Pac.
Oregon	Or. Laws 1920	1921	102 Or.	206 Pac.
Pennsylvania	Digest of Statute Law 1920	1921	272 Pa.	116 Atl.
Philippine Isl.	Code of Civil Procedure, ed. 1920	1920 to Apr. 6 No. 2931 vol. 15	40 P. I.
	Administrative Code 1917
	Civil Code, ed. 1918
	Penal Code, Penal Laws, and General Order 58, ed. 1911
Porto Rico	Revised Statutes and Codes 1911	1921	28 P. R.
Rhode Island	General Laws, Revision of 1909	1921	43 R. I.	116 Atl.
South Carolina	Code of Laws 1922	1921	116 S. C.	111 S. E.
South Dakota	Revised Code 1919	1921	44 S. D.	187 N. W.
Tennessee	Shannon's Code 1917	1921	145 Tenn.	240 S. W.
Texas	Revised Civil Statutes 1911	1921	110 Tex.	240 S. W.
	Revised Criminal Statutes 1911, Vernon ed. 1919		90 Tex. Cr.	240 S. W.
Utah	Compiled Laws 1917	1921	57 Utah	206 Pac.
Vermont	General Laws 1917	1921	93 Vt.	116 Atl.
Virginia	Code 1919	1922	130 Va.	111 S. E.
Washington	Remington & Ballinger's Annotated Codes and Statutes 1909	1921	117 Wash.	206 Pac.
West Virginia	Hogg's W. Va. Code Annotated 1914	1921	89 W. Va.	111 S. E.
Wisconsin	Statutes 1919	1921	174 Wis.	187 N. W.
Wyoming	Compiled Statutes Annotated 1920	1921	27 Wyo.	206 Pac.

TABLE II

The printing of this treatise began in August, 1922, and occupied many months; it was therefore desirable to set a definite point of time for the ending of citations (instead of inserting current late cases in the latter portions of the book only), in order that those who use the book may know where to begin in examining later sources appearing since its publication. The point of stoppage taken was therefore that volume of the several National Reporters which ended nearest to July 1, 1922; this ranged (dating by the weekly issues) between May, 1922, and August, 1922. The latest volumes of Reporters consulted were as follows:

TABLE II. LATEST NATIONAL REPORTERS EXAMINED

	VOLUME
Atlantic Reporter	116
Federal Reporter	279
New York Supplement[1]	194
Northeastern Reporter	135
Northwestern Reporter	187
Pacific Reporter	206
Southern Reporter	91
Southeastern Reporter	111
Southwestern Reporter	240
Supreme Court Reporter	42

[1] This Series was not examined prior to Vol. 178.

LIST OF CHANGED SECTION NUMBERS IN THIS EDITION

(Where the number given for the Second Edition is the same as that for the First, but is followed by others or by italic letters, the material in the original section has been expanded into several sections.)

1st Ed.	2d Ed.	1st Ed.	2d Ed.	1st Ed.	2d Ed.
6	6, 6 a, 6 b	936	937	1856	1856, 1856 a–e
68	68, 68 a	938	939	1859	1859, 1859 a–g
150	150, 150 a	990	989	1862	1862, 1863
164	163	1031	1032	1863	1864
165	164	1032	1033	2090	2091
208	208, 208 a	1056	1057	2091	2093
318	309	1057	1058	2129	2128
321	320	1058	1059	2130	2129
367	367–370	1232	1233	2183	2183, 2184
370	371	1345	1344	2184	2185
371	372	1346	1345	2213	2212
372	373	1347	1346, 1347	2214	2213
414	416	1354	1354, 1355, 1356	2215	2214
415	417			2259	2259, 2259 a–d
416	418	1633	1633, 1633 a	2281 a	2282
464	464, 465	1662	1662, 1663	2282	2283
562	562, 563	1676	1676, 1676 a, 1676 b	2374	2376
617	618			2375	2378
785	785, 767	1768	1766	2376	2379
787	787, 787 a	1795	1767	2461	2466
875	874	1796	1768	2462	2461, 2462
934	934, 938	1797	1769	2511	2511, 2511 a
935	936	1855	1855, 1855 a

TABLE OF CROSS-REFERENCES TO THE POCKET CODE OF EVIDENCE

Treatise §	Code §
1	1
3	2
2	3
4	8–11
5	17–20
6	27–30
6 a	21–22
7	31–34
9	35
10	36
11	37
12	38–41
13	42–44
14	45
15	46–48
16	49–53
17	55–70
18	71–93
19	94
20	97–101
21	102–103
24	105–114
26	115–116
30–36	117
38	118, 119
39	120
40	121
41	122
42	123
43	124
51	125
52–54	126–130
55	130
56	136
57–58	137
59	131–133
60	135
61	134
62	138–140
63	140–145
64	146–147
65	148
66	149
67	150
68	151
68 a	152
70–76	154–158
77	160
78	163–164
79	165
80	161
83	167
84–88	168
89	169
92	170
93–99	171
102–104	177
105–109	178–181
110–111	182
112	184
113	183
117	185–186
118	187
130–132	188–190
133	191
135	192
136	192 *a
137	193
139–142	194
143–144	195
148	196
149	197
150–150 a	198
151	199
152–153	200
154–155	201
156	202
157	203
158–160	205
163	207
164	208
165, 168	206
166	209
167	210
172–176	211
177	212
191	215
192–194	218–219
195	224
196–197	216, 222, 223
198	226–227
199	228
200	229
201	230
202	231
203	232
204	233
205	234
206	235
207	236
208	238
208 a	237
209–213	239
215	219
216	220
218	221
219	240
220	241
221	242
222	245
223	246–249

TABLE OF CROSS-REFERENCES TO POCKET CODE

Treatise §	Code §
224	243
225	250
227	251
228	252–253, 256–258
229	254–255
230	259
231	261–262
232	263
233	264
235	265
237	266
238	267
239	268
240	269
241	270
242	271–275
244	276
245	277
246	278
247	279
248	280
249	281
250	282
251	283
252	284
253	285
254	286
255	287
256	285
257	285
258	288
259	286
260	289
265–266	290
267	291–292
268–272	293
273	650
274	651
276	652
277–279	654
280	655–656
281	664
282	647–648, 653
283	649
284	657
285–290	658–661, 664
291	662–663
293	294, 665
300	297
301	298
302–303	299
304	300
305	220
309–317	302
321	303
324–327	304
329–331	305
333–338	306
340–344	307
346–349	308
351–352	309
354	310
357–360	311
363–365	312
367	314
368	313
369–370	314
371–373	315
375–376	316
377	317
378	318
379	319
382	320
383	321
385–387	322
389–391	324
392	326
394	327
395	328
396–397	329
398–402	330
402–406	331
410–417	333–334
418	336
431–432	337
434	338
435–436	339
437	340–341
438–440	342
441–449	344–349
451–456	350–351
457–458	352–353
459–465	354–357
475–480	360–361
483	362
484	363
485	364
486	365
487	366
492–496	367
497	368–369
498–500	367
505–506	370
507	371
508	372
515	373
516–518	374
519–524	375
525–531	376
555–556	378
557–559	379
560	380
561	381
564–566	383
567	386
568–569	384
570	385
571	387
576–577	388
578	390
579–580	389
581	392
583–587	393
600	395
601–620	396
608	397
650–653	400
654	401
655	402
657	405–412
658	403
659–663	404
664	413
665	406–408
666	410
667	411
669	412
672–674	414, 1416
675	1417
677	1418
679	1419

TABLE OF CROSS-REFERENCES TO POCKET CODE

Treatise §	Code §
681	1420
682	1421–1423
687	408
688	409
689	416
690	403
691–692	417
693	418
694–697	419
699–707	420
709	420 bis
711–713	422
714	423
715	424
716	425
725	427
726–729	428
730	429
734	431
738–739	442
744	431, 443
745	432
746	433
747	434
748	435
749	436
750	437
751	438
752	439
753	440
754	441
758	444
759	446
760	447
761	448
762	449
763	450
764	451
766	454
767	461, 475
769–770	462
771–772	463
773	464
774	465
775	465
776	462
777–779	466

Treatise §	Code §
780	467
781	468
782	467–472
783	473
784	474
785	475
786–788	455–459
789	479
790–792	480
793	481
794	482
795	483
796–797	484
799	488
800–801	489
802	490
803	491
804	492
805	494–495
811	496–497
815	700
821	701
822	702
824	703
825	704
826	705
827–830	706
832	707
833	708
834	709
835–836	710
837	711
838	712
840	713
841	714, 715
842–852	716–720
853–855	721
856–859	722
860	723
861	724–727
862	728
874–881	500
884–888	501
889–892	502
894	503
896–899	504
900	505

Treatise §	Code §
901	506
902–907	507
907–908	508
909–913	509–511
914–915	512
916	513–514
917–918	515
920–921	518
922–926	519–520
927–929	521
930	522
931	523
932	524
933	525
934	526
935	527
936–937	528
939–940	529
943	532
944	533
946	534
948	535
949	536
950–952	537–538
953	539
956	540
957–959	541
960–962	542–543
963	544
964	545
966	546
967	547
968	546
969	548
977–978	549
979	550
980	551, 555
981	552
982	553, 556
983	554
984	554
986–987	550–556
988	557
989	558
990	555
991–996	561–564
1000–1002	567

TABLE OF CROSS-REFERENCES TO POCKET CODE

Treatise §	Code §
1003	568
1004	569
1005	570
1006	572
1007	571
1008–1015	573
1017–1019	574
1020	575
1021	576
1022	577
1023	578
1025–1028	579
1029	581
1030–1034	582
1035	583
1036	584, 591
1037	585
1038	578
1040	586
1041	587
1042	588
1043	589–590
1044–1045	591
1048	630
1049	631–632
1051	633
1053	634
1055	640
1057	636
1058	637
1059	638
1060	641
1061–1062	642–645
1063	680
1064	681
1065	682
1066	683
1067	684
1069–1070	667
1071	666, 668
1072	668, 670
1073	671, 673
1074	675, 676
1075	677
1076	686
1077–1079	687
1080	688
1081	689–691
1082	692–693
1083	694
1084	695
1085	696
1086	697–698
1100	595
1104	596
1105	597
1106	598
1107	599–600
1108	601
1109	602
1111	604–605
1112	606, 607
1116	608
1117	609
1119	611
1122–1124	612
1125	613
1126	615
1127	616
1128	617
1129	618
1130	619
1131	443, 614
1134	622
1135	623–624
1136	623
1137–1138	625
1139	625
1141	626
1142	627
1144	628
1150–1156	730
1157–1158	731
1159	732
1162	734
1163	735–736
1164	737
1165	738
1168	739
1171–1172	745
1173	746
1178	747
1181	748
1182	749
1183	750
1185	751–753
1186	754
1187	757
1189	758
1190	755
1191	757
1192	756
1193	759
1194	760
1195	761
1196–1197	762
1198	763
1199	764
1200	765
1201	766
1202–1203	767
1204	770
1205	768
1206–1207	771
1208	769
1209	772
1210	773
1211	774
1212	775
1213	776
1214	777
1215–1217	778
1218–1221	779
1223	780
1224–1227	781
1230	782
1232	783
1233	784–785
1234	786–789
1235	790
1236–1240	791
1241	792
1242	793
1243	794–795
1244	796–797
1245	798
1246–1247	799
1248	800
1249–1250	801
1252–1254	806
1255–1257	807–810

TABLE OF CROSS-REFERENCES TO POCKET CODE

Treatise §	Code §
1258	811
1259–1263	812–818
1265	820, 825
1267	821, 825
1268	822, 826
1269	827
1270	828
1271	829
1273	831
1274–1275	832–835
1277–1280	823
1281	824
1285	850
1289	851
1290	852
1291	855
1292	853
1293	854
1294	857
1295	858
1296	859
1297	860
1298	861
1299	862–863
1300	864
1301	865
1302	866
1303	866
1304	868
1305	867
1306	884
1308–1310	839
1311	870–871
1312	872
1313	873
1314	874
1315	875–876
1316	877
1317	878
1318	879
1319	880
1320	881
1321	885
1326–1329	890–892
1330	893
1331	894
1335–1338	896
1339	897
1344	900
1345–1346	901
1348	900
1349	902
1350	903
1351	904
1352	905
1353–1355	906
1356	907
1360–1362	910, 912
1365	911
1371	913
1373–1376	914–915
1378–1382	916
1383	917
1384	918
1386–1388	919–920
1389	921
1390	922–923
1391	924
1392	925–926
1393–1394	927
1395	928
1396–1398	929
1402	930, 939
1403	931
1404	932
1405	933–934
1406	935
1407	936–937
1408–1410	938
1414	940
1415	941
1416	942–944
1417	945
1420	950
1424	950
1431–1433	952
1434	953
1435	952
1438–1441	954
1442	956
1443	955
1445	957–959
1446	960
1447	961
1448	962
1450	963
1451	964
1455	966
1456	967
1457	966, 968
1458–1459	969
1460	970
1461	972
1463–1465	973–974
1466	975
1469	977
1471	976
1472	978
1476	971
1480	980
1481	981–982
1482	980
1483–1484	983
1485	984
1486	984–985
1487	987
1488	1069
1489	988
1490	991
1491	989
1492	990
1493	994
1495	992
1496–1497	997
1500–1502	995
1503	996
1505	1000
1511–1512	886
1513	887
1514	1001
1517	1002
1521	1003
1523	1005
1524	1006
1525	1007
1526	1008
1528	1011
1530	1012–1015
1531	1009
1532	1016
1536–1537	1018

TABLE OF CROSS-REFERENCES TO POCKET CODE

Treatise §	Code §
1538	1019
1539	1020
1540–1543	1021
1547	1022
1548	1023
1550	1024
1551	1025
1552	1026
1554	1029–1030
1555	1028
1556	1027
1557	1031
1558	1032
1564	1035
1565	1036
1566–1567	1037
1568	1038
1570	1039
1573	1040–1043
1576	1045–1047
1580	1050
1582	1053
1584	1060
1585	1056
1586–1587	1054
1588	1055, 1058
1591	1059
1592	1060
1597	1062–1063
1598	1064
1599	1065
1602	1066
1603	1067–1068
1605	1069
1610	1071
1612	1072
1614	1073
1615	1074
1616	1075
1617	1076
1618	1077
1620	1078–1080
1621	1081–1083
1623	1085
1624	1086
1625	1087
1631–1632	1090
1633	1092–1096
1633 a	1094
1635	1097
1637	1098
1639	1100
1640	1101
1641	1102
1642–1644	1103–1105
1645	1106
1647	1107
1648–1651	1110
1652	1111
1653	1112–1115
1655	1116
1657	1117
1658	1118
1659	1119
1660	1120
1661	1121–1123
1662	1124–1125
1664	1130–1132
1665	1133
1666	1136
1667	1137
1668	1138
1669	1139
1670	1130
1671	1141–1142
1674	1144–1145
1675	1146
1676	1148
1676 a	1147
1676 b	1149
1677	1152–1154
1678	1155–1156
1679	1158
1680	1145, 1152
1681	1145, 1152, 1160
1682	1161–1162
1683	1163
1684	1164, 1181
1690	1170
1694	1171
1697	1173
1698	1174
1699	1175
1700	1177
1702	1180
1703	1181
1704	1182
1705	1183
1706	1180
1709	1186
1710	1187–1191
1712–1713	1195–1198
1714	1200
1718	1201
1719–1720	1202
1721	1205
1722	1203–1204
1725–1726	1207–1208
1727	1209
1728	1210
1729	1211
1730	1212
1732	1213–1217
1734	1218
1735	1219
1736	1220
1737	1221
1738	1222–1223
1740	1224
1747–1749	1230–1232
1750	1233–1235
1751	1236
1755	1237
1760–1761	1238
1762	1239
1768	1240
1770	1242–1244
1772–1776	1245
1777	1246
1778	1248
1779	1249
1781	1250
1782	1251
1783	1252
1784	1254
1786	1260
1788	1255
1789	1256
1790	1257
1791	1258
1792	1259

TABLE OF CROSS-REFERENCES TO POCKET CODE

Treatise §	Code §
1800	1266
1801	1267
1802	1268
1803	1269
1805	1270
1806	1271–1272
1807	1273–1275
1808	1277–1278
1810	1280–1282
1816	1286
1817	1286–1288
1818	1295–1297
1819	1298–1301
1820	1291–1293
1821	1289, 1294
1822	1290
1824	1285
1827–1828	1302–1307
1831	1310
1832	1311
1834–1836	1312
1837–1838	1314
1839	1315
1840	1316–1317
1841	1318–1320
1842	1321
1845–1847	1325
1849	1326
1850–1851	1327–1329
1852–1853	1330
1854	1328–1330
1855	1330
1856–1856 e	1332–1334
1856 d	1341
1859–1859 e	1335–1336
1859 f	1342
1861	1345
1862	1339
1863	1344
1866	1352
1867	1350–1351
1869–1870	1353–1358
1871	1360
1872	1362–1364
1873	1361
1874–1875	1366
1876–1877	1367
1878–1880	1367
1882	1369–1371
1883	1372, 1375
1884	1373–1374
1885–1890	1376
1892–1894	1378
1896	1379
1897	1380
1898–1900	1381
1904	1383–1384, 1390–1391
1906	1400
1907	1401
1908	1401–1403
1909	1404
1910	1405
1911	1406
1918	1410
1923	1413–1415
1924	1411–1412
1929	1424–1425
1934–1938	1430–1434
1940–1944	1435–1438
1946–1947	1440–1443
1949–1951	1445
1952	1446
1953	1447–1449
1954	1450
1955	1451
1956	1452
1957	1453
1958	1454
1959–1960	1455
1962	1457
1963–1968	1458
1969–1972	1459
1974	1461
1975	1462
1976	1463
1977	1464
1983	1468–1469
1984	1470
1985	1471
1997–2000	1475–1480
2004	1479
2006	1476–1477
2007	1478
2008	1480
2009	1484
2010	1485
2011	1482
2012	1481
2013	1483
2014–2015	1487
2016	1488–1490
2018	1484
2019	1485
2020	1483
2021	1483
2023–2027	1491
2034	1500
2037–2039	1503
2041–2043	1504–1505
2044	1506
2046	1528
2047	1507
2048	1509
2050	1510
2051	1511–1512
2052	1513
2054	1514
2056–2060	1516
2061–2062	1520
2063	1521, 398
2065	1522
2066	1523–1525
2067–2069	1529
2070–2071	1530
2072	1531
2073	1532–1533
2078	1534
2079	1535
2081	1536
2082–2084	1537
2085	1538–1541
2086	1542
2088	1543
2089	1544
2093	1545
2094	1547
2097	1549–1550, 1552
2098	1551
2099–2100	1553–1559
2102	1561–1562
2103	1563

TABLE OF CROSS-REFERENCES TO POCKET CODE

Treatise §	Code §
2104	1565
2105–2107	1566
2108	1568
2109	1569–1570
2110	1571–1573
2113	1575
2115	1576
2116	1578
2117	1579
2118	1581
2119	1580
2120	1582
2121–2123	1583–1586
2124	1587–1588
2125	1589
2128	1591
2129	1592
2130	1595
2131	1596
2132–2133	1597–1603, 1605
2135	1604
2137	1608
2138	1609–1610
2139	1611
2140	1612
2141	1613
2143	1614–1616
2144	1617
2145	1618
2148	1620
2150	1620–1621
2151	1622–1623
2152	1624
2153	1625
2154	1626
2155	1594
2156	1627
2158–2159	1630–1631
2161	1633–1634
2163	1638
2164	1639
2165	1640
2166	1641
2167	1642
2168	1635–1637
2169	1643
2175	1650
2180	1652
2182	1654
2183–2184	1656
2185	1656
2191	1670
2192	1660
2193–2194	1662
2195	1671
2196	1673–1675
2197	1672
2199	1663–1666
2200	1667–1669
2201	1680
2202	1681
2203	1682
2204	1685
2205	1686
2206	1688–1691
2207	1692
2210	1694
2211	1695
2212	1696–1697
2213	1699
2214	1700
2215	1701
2217–2218	1702
2219	1703
2220	1704
2221	1705
2223	1707
2228	1710
2230–2231	1711
2232–2233	1713–1714
2234	1715
2235	1716
2236	1717
2237	1712
2239	1723
2240	1721–1722
2241	1724
2242	1725
2243	1726
2245	1719–1720
2251	1730
2252	1731
2254–2257	1732
2258	1733
2259	1734
2259 a	1735
2260–2261	1736
2263	1737
2264	1738
2265	1739
2268	1740–1741
2269	1742
2270	1743–1744
2271	1745
2272	1746–1747
2273	1748
2275	1750
2276–2277	1751–1752
2279–2280	1753
2281	1754
2282	1755
2283	1754
2285	1760
2286	1762
2287	1763
2292	1765
2294	1767
2296	1768–1769
2297	1770
2298	1771
2300	1774
2301	1775
2302	1776
2303	1777
2304	1778
2306	1780
2307	1781
2308	1782, 1784–1785
2309	1783
2310	1786
2311	1787–1789
2312	1790–1792
2313	1793
2314	1794
2315	1795
2317	1796
2318–2319	1785, 1797
2321	1799–1800
2322	1801
2323	1802
2324	1803

TABLE OF CROSS-REFERENCES TO POCKET CODE

Treatise §	Code §
2325	1804–1806
2326	1804
2327	1805, 1808
2328–2329	1807
2334	1812
2336	1813–1815
2337	1816
2338	1817
2339	1819
2340	1822–1823
2341	1820–1821
2346	1825, 1947
2348–2356	1947
2361	1830, 1832
2362–2363	1834–1836
2368–2373	1850
2374	1833
2375	1837–1840
2378–2379	1842–1849
2380	1855
2381	1856
2382	1857
2383	1858
2384	1859
2385	1860
2386	1861–1862
2387	1863
2388	1864–1865
2389–2390	1866
2391	1867
2395	1870
2400–2401	1871–1874
2404	1877
2406	1878–1881
2407	1882
2408–2409	1883–1892
2410	1893
2411	1894
2413	1895
2414	1896
2415	1897–1898
2416	1899–1905
2417–2418	1906
2419	1907
2420	1908–1910
2421	1911–1912
2423	1913
2425	1915
2427	1917
2430	1921
2431	1922–1925
2432	1927–1928
2433	1929
2434	1930
2435	1931
2436	1932
2437	1933
2438	1934
2439	1936
2440	1937
2441	1938
2442	1935
2443–2445	1934 a
2446	1939
2447	1941
2450	1946
2451–2452	1944–1955
2454–2456	1950
2458	1953–1954
2459	1955
2460	1958–1960
2461–2463	1961
2464	1962–1965
2465	1966–1969
2466–2467	1970–1972, 1977
2470	1975
2471	1976
2472	1978
2473	1979–1980
2474	1981
2475	1982
2476–2477	1983–1984
2483–2484	1990–1992
2485–2487	1994–1998
2486	2035
2488–2494	1999–2003
2490	2012–2013
2493	2014
2495	2006–2009
2496	2010, 2015–2019
2497	2022–2026
2498	2027–2031
2500	2041–2043
2501	2045
2502	2046
2503	2047
2504	2048–2054
2505	2055–2058
2506	2059
2507	2060
2508	2061
2509	2062
2510	2063
2511	2064
2512–2513	2066
2514	2065
2515–2516	2067
2517–2518	2068
2519–2525	2069–2079
2527	2080
2528	2081
2529	2082
2530	2083
2531–2532	2084–2086
2533	2087
2534	2088
2535	2089
2536	2091–2092
2537	2093
2538	2094
2539	2095
2549	2100
2550	2101–2103
2552	2104–2106
2553–2554	2107–2109
2556	2110–2112
2557	2113–2114
2558	2115
2559	2116
2565	2120, 2130
2567	2121–2123
2568	2124
2569	2125–2126
2570	2127
2571	2130
2572	2131
2573	2132
2574–2577	2133
2578–2579	2134
2580–2582	2135
2588–2589	2140
2590	2141, 2145
2591	2143
2592	2144
2593	2146
2594	2148–2150
2596	1599

1. TABULAR ANALYSIS OF TOPICS

BOOK I. ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

INTRODUCTORY: THEORY AND PROCEDURE.
I. RULES OF RELEVANCY.
II. RULES OF AUXILIARY PROBATIVE POLICY.
III. RULES OF EXTRINSIC POLICY.
IV. PAROL EVIDENCE RULES.

[See Table 2, for further analysis.]

BOOK II. BY WHOM EVIDENCE IS PRESENTED.

I. BURDEN OF PROOF, AND PRESUMPTIONS.
GENERAL PRINCIPLES.
II. BURDENS AND PRESUMPTIONS IN SPECIFIC ISSUES.

BOOK III. TO WHOM EVIDENCE IS PRESENTED.

I. JUDGE.
II. JURY.

BOOK IV. PROPOSITIONS NEEDING NO EVIDENCE.

I. JUDICIAL NOTICE.
II. JUDICIAL ADMISSIONS.

2. TABULAR ANALYSIS OF BOOK I (ADMISSIBILITY)

PART I. RULES OF RELEVANCY

I. Circumstantial Evidence

- I. of Human Act
- II. of Human Quality, etc.
- III. of Inanimate Fact

[See Table 3]

II. Testimonial Evidence

- I. Qualifications
- II. Impeachment
- III. Rehabilitation
- IV. Admissions

[See Table 4]

III. Autoptic Proference

PART II. RULES OF AUXILIARY PROBATIVE POLICY

I. Preferential

- I. Documentary Originals
- II. Attesting Witness, etc.

II. Analytic

Hearsay

1. Cross-Examination
2. Confrontation

III. Prophylactic

- I. Oath
- II. Perjury-Penalty
- III. Publicity
- IV. Sequestration
- V. Discovery

IV. Simplificative

- I. Order of Evidence
- II. Sundries
- III. Opinion

V. Synthetic

- I. No. of Witnesses
- II. Kind of Witness
- III. Verbal Completeness
- IV. Authentication

PART III. RULES OF EXTRINSIC POLICY

I. Absolute Exclusion

II. Optional Exclusion (Privilege)

I. Testimonial Duty

II. Privileges of Non-Attendance

III. Privileges of Silence

A. Topics

1. Sundry
2. Anti-Marital
3. Self-Criminating

B. Communications

1. Sundries
2. Attorney
3. Marital
4. Jurors
5. Informers: Officials
6. Physician
7. Priest

PART IV. PAROL EVIDENCE RULES

I. Enaction

II. Integration

III. Formalities

IV. Interpretation

3. TABULAR ANALYSIS OF BOOK I, PART I, TITLE I

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE

I. Evidencing a Human Act

I. Prospectant Evidence
- A. Moral Character
- B. Capacity, Skill, etc.
- C. Habit, Custom
- D. Design, Plan
- E. Emotion, Motive

II. Concomitant Evidence
- A. Opportunity
- B. Impossibility

III. Retrospectant Evidence
- A. Traces Mechanical
- B. Traces Organic
- C. Traces Mental

II. Evidencing a Human Quality, etc.

Facts to be proved
- I. Moral Character
- II. Physical Capacity
- III. Mental Capacity
- IV. Design, Plan
- V. Intent
- VI. Knowledge, Belief
- VII. Habit, Custom
- VIII. Emotion, Motive
- IX. Identity

May be evidenced by
- Conduct exhibiting
- Circumstances causing
- Prior or subsequent condition
- [Repute; see Hearsay Rule]
- [Personal Opinion; see Opinion Rule]

III. Evidencing a Fact of Inanimate Nature

Facts to be proved
- I. Identity
- II. Occurrence
- III. Existence, Persistence
- IV. Tendency, Quality, Cause, Effect

May be evidenced by
- Similar Instances
- Sundries

4. TABULAR ANALYSIS OF BOOK I, PART I, TITLE II

TESTIMONIAL EVIDENCE

I. Testimonial Qualifications

Specific Qualifications

General Capacity

I. Organic Capacity
- A. Mental Derangement
- B. Mental Immaturity
- C. Moral Depravity

II. Experiential Capacity
- A. General Experience
- B. Special Experience

III. Partisan Capacity
- A. Pecuniary Interest
- B. Marital Relationship

IV. Observation
- A. Knowledge in general
- B. Specific Knowledge

V. Recollection
- A. Past (Recorded)
- B. Present (Refreshed)

VI. Narration
- A. Interrogated
- B. Dramatic, Pictorial
- C. Written
- D. Interpreted

II. Testimonial Impeachment

I. Persons Impeachable
- A. Defendant
- B. Own Witness

II. Impeaching Traits
- A. Moral Character
- B. Mental Incapacity
- C. Inexpertness
- D. Bias, Interest, etc.

III. Evidencing the Impeaching Traits
- A. Bias, Corruption, Interest
- B. Moral Character
- C. Inexpertness, Memory, etc.

evidenced by
- Conduct exhibiting
- Circumstances causing
- [Repute; see Hearsay Rule]
- [Personal Opinion; see Opinion Rule]

introduced through
- Extrinsic Testimony
- Cross-Examination

IV. Contradiction and Self-Contradiction introduced by
- Extrinsic Testimony
- Cross-Examination

III. Testimonial Rehabilitation

- A. Moral Character
- B. Consistent Statements

IV. Parties' Admissions

- A. Implied Admissions
- B. Admissions in Pleadings
- C. Admissions by Third Parties

EVIDENCE

IN

TRIALS AT COMMON LAW

INTRODUCTION

SCOPE OF THE SUBJECT, AND PRELIMINARY DISTINCTIONS

CHAPTER I.

§ 1. Definition of Evidence; Distinctions between Law and Fact; between Argument and Evidence. In considering the precise scope to be assigned to the subject of Evidence or Proof, it is to be noticed that the general process of vindicating or enforcing legal rights and duties, both public and private, falls naturally into five stages: 1. The procurement of the parties' appearance before the tribunal, i.e. Process, in the narrow sense; 2. The ascertainment of the subject of the dispute, i.e. Pleading; 3. The attempt at demonstration by the parties of their respective positions, i.e. Trial; 4. The determination of the dispute by the tribunal, i.e. Verdict and judgment; and 5. The enforcement of the tribunal's determination, i.e. Execution, and the like. Clearly the present subject lies somewhere in the third stage. At that point (taking for example's sake a civil suit at common law) the parties have arrived at an issue, and it becomes the plaintiff's interest to demonstrate to the tribunal the existence of the legal relation (a right, as to him; a liability, as to the defendant) which he asserts, and the defendant's interest to show its non-existence.

(a) Law and Fact, distinguished. The material on which this claim of the plaintiff rests, if successful, is composite. Given certain facts or groups of facts, and the State predicates a legal relation between A and B, i.e. is ready to lend its force towards a more or less direct realization of that relation. The establishment of a given claim, then, involves the demonstration (1) that certain facts or groups of facts exist, (2) that to the contingency of their existence the State attaches the legal consequence now asserted by the claimant. He has thus to satisfy the tribunal in two respects, (1) as to these facts, (2) as to the legal consequence asserted to be attached. In one sense, both these matters are "facts", — in the sense that everything in the cosmos is a fact or phenomenon. But the popular distinction between "fact" and "law" is here as accurate as the situation requires. The requirement is for phrases which shall set off in one class the generality that the State sanctions and will habitually enforce a legal relation of a specific content, and in another class the specific occurrence constituting the contingency in which the State predicates this relation. In the former class we are dealing with the abstract formulated body of legal principles; in the latter, with all concrete phenomena, designated in the terms of the law.

That many phenomena (events, or facts) may not at first sight be simple to classify, or easy to deal with, does not affect the reality of the distinction. For instance, the circumstance that John Doe owns the farm Blackacre, upon analysis, resolves itself as follows: The legal relation of ownership exists as between John Doe and all others, because (a) John Doe's father, owner of Blackacre, died without a will leaving John Doe his only legitimate child, and (b) under such circumstances the above legal relation attaches as between John Doe and all others. Here (b) is clearly a fact of legal rule, while (a) is for practical purposes an ordinary fact, but (a) may be in turn resolved into facts of legal rule (ownership, legitimacy, and the like) in composition with ordinary facts. In judicial practice, and not in theory only, the distinction will be maintained, for the judge will instruct the jury upon the legal rules necessary for them to know and obey in reaching their ultimate determination. Thus, though such a question as ownership may be handed over for determination to the part of the tribunal usually dealing with ordinary facts alone, the distinction is none the less preserved between legal principles and the other phenomena which we ordinarily call "facts."

No closer distinction is here necessary. It is apparent that the claimant has here two classes of material very different for the purposes of his demonstration. To persuade the tribunal of the existence of the asserted rule of law is a process having its own separate rules, not here involved. To persuade the tribunal of the existence of the required state of facts is the process with which the rules of Evidence, or Proof, so called, are for the most part concerned.

(b) Argument and Evidence, distinguished. Within this line, however, must be distinguished two separate processes employing different classes of expedients. The claimant may conceivably offer to the tribunal the very phenomenon in its entirety which is to be the basis of the legal rule asserted ; but an instance could hardly occur in practice. Ordinarily, the demonstration can be accomplished only by the use of a number of facts, the final logical result being the establishment of the total fact. The process would consist in the presentation of these elemental facts and in the piecing of them together so as to reach the conclusion. This process of presentation is a different one from the process of piecing together. The latter is Argumentation. The legitimate quality of Argumentation is the invocation, by counsel, of ordinary rules of logic and rhetoric in the combination of assumed facts. The rules governing this sub-process in the general process of judicial proof form a separate subject of law. It is sufficient here to note that Argument is to be distinguished from the presentation of Evidence.[1]

(c) Definition of Evidence. It is of little practical consequence to construct a formula defining what is to be understood as Evidence. Nevertheless, its content is capable of being stated. What we are concerned with is the process of presenting evidence for the purpose of demonstrating an asserted fact. In this process, then, the term Evidence represents :

Any knowable fact or group of facts, not a legal or a logical principle, considered with a view to its being offered before a legal tribunal for the purpose of producing a persuasion, positive or negative, on the part of the tribunal, as to the truth of a proposition, not of law or of logic, on which the determination of the tribunal is to be asked.[2]

Of the definitions of legal evidence that have been proposed from time to time, some have been framed merely in view of emphasizing partial aspects of the subject, others have been intended to embody some theory or classification or the relation between certain parts of the law of evidence; and a comparison of them can hardly be made upon a common basis. Nevertheless, a collation of the classical definitions is interesting, if only for the singular variety of phrasing exhibited upon a subject apparently so simple and so exempt from practical controversy:

§ 1. [1] The distinction between argument and evidence is more precisely examined post, § 1806.

[2] A brief comment on some of these phrases and terms is worth while: (1) "Knowable"; this must be noted, because it is certain that no Court would listen to an attempted presentation of that which it considered not knowable. (2) "Event", "fact", "phenomenon"; it is difficult to choose between these terms; none of them is adequate; "fact" seems on the whole the least unsatisfactory. (3) "Considered with a view", etc.; this must be noted, because, for example, the situation of the counsel who is discussing the testimony of the witnesses with his associate in the office is equally a dealing with Evidence as when he is putting the witness on the stand. (4) "Persuasion, positive or negative"; it will be seen, in discussing the Burden of Proof, that the process of proof and disproof may be conceived of either as the establishment by both proponent and opponent of their own assertions, one of a given content, the other of a content exactly negative; or as the establishment by the proponent of conviction as to a given assertion and the destruction by the opponent of any conviction as to that assertion. It is not intended here to choose between those views, but merely to cover the case of both the proponent and opponent in the litigation. (5) "Truth of a proposition"; in judicial proceedings we must assume for practical purposes that the subjective phenomena of existence have an objective reality. With reference to the State's force, which the Court will put in motion, the Court's determination upon a question of fact makes that fact for practical purposes a reality. For the purposes of legal procedure, then, the "truth of a proposition" is the result of the Court's determination.

1768, Mr. Justice BLACKSTONE, Commentaries, III, 367: "Evidence signifies that which makes clear or ascertains the truth of the very fact or point in issue, either on the one side or the other."

1824, Mr. Thomas Starkie, Evidence, I, 9: "That which is legally offered by the litigant parties to induce a jury to decide for or against the party alleging such facts, as contradistinguished from all comment and argument on the subject, falls within the description of evidence."

1827, Mr. Jeremy Bentham, Rationale of Judicial Evidence, b. I, c. I (Bowring's ed. vol. VI, p. 208): "By the term 'evidence' considered according to the most extended application that is ever given to it, may be, and seems in general to be, understood, any matter of fact, the effect, tendency, or design of which, when presented to the mind, is to produce a persuasion concerning the existence of some other matter of fact — a persuasion either affirmative or disaffirmative of its existence. . . . Taking the word in this sense, questions of evidence are continually presenting themselves to every human being, every day, and almost every waking hour of his life. . . . Hereafter, the only sense in which the word is used, is that in which the application of it is confined to juridical, or say legal, evidence. Under this limitation, then, evidence is a general name given to any fact, in contemplation of its being presented to the cognizance of a judge, in the view of its producing in his mind a persuasion concerning the existence of some other fact — of some fact by which, supposing the existence of it established, a decision to a certain effect would be called for at his hands."

1838, Mr. W. Wills, Circumstantial Evidence, 1: "Every conclusion of the judgment, whatever may be its subject, is the result of evidence, — a word which . . . is applied to denote the means by which any alleged matter of fact, the truth of which is submitted to investigation, is established or disproved."

1842, Mr. John Bouvier, editor, in Bacon's Abridgment, 1st Amer. ed., III, 242, tit. Evidence: "Evidence is that which demonstrates, makes clear, or ascertains the truth of the very fact or point in issue; or, it is that which is legally submitted to a court and jury, or to either of them, to enable them to decide upon the questions in dispute or issue, as pointed out by the pleadings, and distinguished from all comments or arguments."

1849, Mr. W. M. Best, Evidence, §§ 11, 33: "Evidence, thus understood, has been well defined, — any matter of fact, the effect, tendency, or design of which is to produce in the mind a persuasion, affirmative or disaffirmative, of the existence of some other matter of fact. 'Judicial evidence' may be defined [as] the evidence received by courts of justice in proof or disproof of facts the existence of which comes in question before them. By facts must here be understood the 'res gestæ' of some suit or other matter to which when ascertained the law is to be applied; for although, in logical accuracy the existence or non-existence of a law is a question of fact, it is rarely spoken of as such either by jurists or practitioners."

1876, Mr. Justice STEPHEN, Digest of Evidence, Art. 1: "'Evidence' means — (1) Statements made by witnesses in court under a legal sanction, in relation to matters of fact under inquiry; . . . (2) Documents produced for the inspection of the Court or judge."

1823, Mr. Justice Edward LIVINGSTON, Draft Code, Book of Definitions (Works, ed. 1872, II, 646): "Evidence is that which brings to the mind a just conviction of the truth or falsehood of any substantive proposition which is asserted or denied. Illustrations and developments of the different parts of this definition: I. A conviction produced by evidence which ought not according to the rules of true reason to have that effect is not a just conviction; the law therefore declares what effect different species of evidence ought to have in producing such conviction, and that evidence in its different degrees is called 'legal evidence.' . . . II. The word 'substantive,' in the definition is intended to exclude all such abstract propositions as can be demonstrated to be true or false by the reasoning power, without having recourse to the establishment of other facts. The propositions intended by the definition are either of fact or of law."

1842, Professor Simon Greenleaf, Evidence, § 1: "The word 'evidence', in legal acceptation, includes all the means by which any alleged matter of fact, the truth of which is submitted to investigation, is established or disproved."

1889, Professor James Bradley Thayer, "Presumptions and the Law of Evidence", 3 Harvard L. Rev. 142: "What is our law of evidence? It is a set of rules which has to do with judicial investigations into questions of fact. . . . These rules relate to the mode of ascertaining an unknown, and generally a disputed, matter of fact. But they do not regulate the process of reasoning and argument. . . . When one offers 'evidence', in the sense of the word which is now under consideration, he offers to prove, otherwise than by mere reasoning from what is already known, a matter of fact to be used as a basis of inference to another matter of fact. . . . In giving evidence we are furnishing to a tribunal a new basis for reasoning. This is not saying that we do not have to reason in order to ascertain this basis; it is merely saying that reasoning alone will not, or at least does not, supply it. The new element which is added is what we call the evidence. Evidence, then, is any matter of fact which is furnished to a legal tribunal — otherwise than by reasoning or a reference to what is noticed without proof — as the basis of inference in ascertaining some other matter of fact."[3]

§ 2. Distinctions between 'Factum Probandum' and 'Factum Probans'; between Rules of Substantive Law and Pleading and of Evidence; between Materiality and Admissibility; between Facts not in Issue and Facts not Admissible. When A is sitting in his office, pondering over an apparent shortage in the cashier's books, and B approaches him with an earnest proffer of documents and ore-specimens from a Colorado mine which he desires to prove to be a good investment for A's money, A will doubtless reply, "But I cannot listen to your evidence of the richness of the mine, for I am not at this moment considering any proposal to invest in that mine, or in any other asset. What I am now desirous of establishing is whether my clerk is dishonest or has merely made a blunder; and your proposition about the mine being not before me now, your evidence of it is beside the point." Just such a situation is daily presented in every court. Evidence is rejected, not because of any defect in the evidence, but because the proposition to which it is directed is not before the Court. The distinction thus becomes important between 'factum probandum' and 'factum probans.'

(1) Evidence is always a relative term. It signifies a relation between two facts, the 'factum probandum', or proposition to be established, and the 'factum probans', or material evidencing the proposition. The former is necessarily to be conceived of as hypothetical; it is that which the one party affirms and the other denies, the tribunal being as yet not committed in either direction. The latter is conceived of for practical purposes as existent, and is offered as such for the consideration of the tribunal. The latter is brought forward as a reality for the purpose of convincing the tribunal that the former is also a reality.

[3] The same author repeats substantially this definition in his Preliminary Treatise, 263, published in 1898.

No correct and sure comprehension of the nature of any evidential question can ever be had unless this double or relative aspect of it is distinctly pictured. On each occasion the questions must be asked, What is the Proposition desired to be proved? What is the Evidentiary Fact offered to prove it?

(2) Each Evidentiary Fact may in turn become a Proposition to be proved, until finally some ultimate Evidentiary Fact is reached. For example, to prove the Proposition that a murder was committed by John Doe, the Evidentiary Fact may be offered that John Doe left the victim's house shortly after the murder ; to prove this in turn, as a Proposition, the Evidentiary Fact may be offered that John Doe's shoes fit the track left near the house by the murderer ; and this again, as a Proposition, may be evidenced by the statement of a witness on the stand who has placed the shoe in the tracks. Here each evidentiary fact in its turn becomes a proposition requiring the marshalling of new evidentiary facts, more or fewer according to its complexity. Any specific matter may be Proposition or Evidentiary Fact, according to the point of view. This is important, in that the significance of a ruling upon an offer of evidence may be otherwise misconceived, — as when (according to our loose and inaccurate use of words), it is said that " evidence of " a person's age is offered; for here it cannot be told by the phrasing whether the age is the Evidentiary Fact or the Proposition.

(3) Permitting a Fact to become a Proposition, i.e. open to be evidenced, is not an evidentiary process. A ruling of substantive law or of pleading is often discussed as if it were a ruling upon a question of evidence. For example, on an action of battery, upon a plea of not guilty, the defendant offers evidence to prove that the plaintiff used insulting words to the defendant before the attack, and this is rejected; here the ruling is in truth that insults constitute no excuse or no ground for mitigation of damages, — a ruling of substantive law ; or, perhaps, that such a defence is not available upon a plea traversing the battery, — a ruling of pleading. It is certainly not a ruling upon a question of evidence; it is a ruling that the proposition desired to be proved is either not tenable, by the substantive law, or not issuable, by the law of pleading.

This contrast is indicated by the terms Materiality and Admissibility, the former defining the status of the Proposition in the case at large, and the latter defining the relation of an Evidentiary Fact to some Proposition. The two problems are wholly distinct, and yet the inaccuracy of our usage tends constantly to confuse them. Although in some legal treatises the confusion has been perpetuated, yet the most careful modern writers have repeatedly called attention to the impropriety and the harmfulness of this inveterate error :

1827, Mr. Jeremy Bentham, Rationale of Judicial Evidence, b. IX, pt. VI, c. V (Bowring's ed. vol. VII, p. 560: "The question, on what facts the decision turns, is a question, not of evidence, but of the substantive branch of the law: it respects the 'probandum', not the 'probans': it does not belong to the inquiry, by what sort of evidence the facts of the case may be proved; it belongs to the inquiry, what are the facts of which the law has determined that proof shall be required, in order to establish the plaintiff's claim. This circumstance, obvious as it is, might easily be overlooked by one who had studied the subject only in the compilations of the English institutional writers; who, not content with directing that the evidence be confined to the points in issue, have farther proceeded, under the guise of laying down rules of evidence, to declare, on each occasion, what the points in issue are. One whole volume out of two which compose Mr. Phillipps's treatise on the Law of Evidence, — with a corresponding portion of the other treatises extant concerning that branch of the law, — is occupied in laying down rules concerning the sort of evidence which should be required in different sorts of actions or suits at law. But why should different forms of action require different sorts of evidence? The securities by which the trustworthiness of evidence is provided for, and the rules by which its probative force is estimated, if for every sort of cause they are what they ought to be, must be the same for one sort of cause as for another. The difference is not in the nature of the proof; it is in the nature of the facts required to be proved. There is no difference as between different forms of action, in reason, or even in English law, in respect of the rules relating to the competency of witnesses; nor, in general, to the admissibility or the proof of written documents; nor in respect of any other of the general rules of evidence. What Mr. Phillipps (I mention him only as a representative of the rest) professes, under each of the different forms of action, to tell you, is, what facts, in order to support an action in that form, it is necessary that you should prove. . . . But, to enumerate the facts which confer or take away rights, is the main business of what is called the civil branch of the law; to enumerate the acts by which rights are violated — in other words, to define offences — is the main business of the penal branch. What, therefore, the lawyers give us, under the appellation 'law of evidence', is really, in a great part of it, civil and penal law. . . . Under the title Burglary, Mr. Starkie begins by saying, that on an indictment for burglary, it is essential to prove, 1st, A felonious breaking and entering; 2dly, of the dwelling-house; 3dly, in the night time; 4thly, with intent to commit a felony. He then proceeds to inform us, that there must be evidence of an actual or constructive breaking; for if the entry was obtained through an open door or window, it is no burglary. . . . Who does not see that all this is an attempt — a lame one, it must be confessed (which is not the fault of the compiler), but still an attempt — to supply that definition of the offence of burglary which the substantive law has failed to afford?"

1881, Mr. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, The Common Law, 120: "The principles of substantive law which have been established by the courts are believed to have been somewhat obscured by having presented themselves oftenest in the form of rulings upon the sufficiency of evidence. When a judge rules that there is no evidence of negligence, he does something more than is embraced in an ordinary ruling that there is no evidence of a fact. He rules that the acts or omissions proved or in question do not constitute a ground of legal liability, and in this way the law is gradually enriching itself from daily life, as it should. Thus, in Crafton v. Metropolitan Railway Co., the plaintiff slipped on the defendant's stairs and was severely hurt. The cause of his slipping was that the brass nosing of the stairs had been worn smooth by travel over it, and a builder testified that in his opinion the staircase was unsafe by reason of this circumstance and the absence of a handrail. There was nothing to contradict this except that great numbers of persons had passed over the stairs and that no accident had happened there, and the plaintiff had a verdict. The Court set the verdict aside, and ordered a nonsuit. The ruling was in form that there was no evidence of negligence to go to the jury; but this was obviously equivalent to saying, and did in fact mean, that the railroad company had done all that it was bound to do in maintaining such a staircase as was proved by the plaintiff. A hundred other equally concrete instances will be found in the text-books. On the other hand, if the Court should rule that certain acts or omissions coupled with damage were conclusive evidence of negligence unless explained, it would, in substance and in truth, rule that such acts or omissions were a ground of liability or prevented a recovery, as the case might be. Thus, it is said to be actionable negligence to let a house for a dwelling knowing it to be so infected with small-pox as to be dangerous to health, and concealing the knowledge."

1898, Professor James Bradley Thayer, Preliminary Treatise on Evidence, 511–514: "A great portion of these rules [of Evidence], as laid down by the Courts and by our text writers, are working a sort of intellectual fraud by purporting to be what they are not. To the utter confusion of all orderly thinking, a Court is frequently represented as passing on questions of evidence when in reality it is dealing with some other branch, either of substantive law or procedure. . . . What is the result of this? Utter confusion of thought, and frequent injustice in decision. Of course when in reality men are discussing a question in the law of partnership, agency, or bankruptcy; or the ground and scope of equity jurisdiction in dealing with fraud, mistake, trusts, or the reforming of documents; or the rules for the construction and interpretation of language; and yet, out of an imagination that they are dealing with rules of evidence, go on to clothe their ideas in the phraseology of that subject; although a right result may be reached, it is not rightly reached, and bewilderment attends the process. . . . This error is deeply ingrained in our cases; and it is a subtle one. But you cannot possibly deal thoroughly and scientifically with this part of our law until the error is cast out, until it is purged of that mass of substantive law, and of mere rules of procedure, and reason, and logic which overloads it. There was a time when all that was said or read to the jury was spoken of as said 'en evidence al jury.' The contrast in mind, when this was said, was between saying something to the Court, in pleading (in the days of oral pleading), and saying it to the jury. But now, for two or three centuries, we have been discussing the admissibility of what is offered in evidence, under a new branch of law, called the rules of evidence; as contrasted with its admissibility under the law of pleading and practice, and the substantive law. . . . It is then fundamental that not all determinations admitting or excluding evidence are referable to the law of evidence. Far the larger part of them are not. An innumerable company of questions, of the sort just alluded to, very often — more often than not, nay, much oftener than not — are dealt with in our text-books and cases as belonging to the law of evidence, when in real truth they ought to be carried to the border line of this subject and respectfully deposited on the other side."

(4) The question, therefore, "Of what Propositions may Evidence be offered?" is not answered by the law of Evidence, except in a subordinate way. The answer to it is made in four parts. Evidence may be offered of such Propositions of fact as

(a) Are material by the substantive law to any right or duty, claim or defence;

(b) Are issuable in the case at bar by the terms of the pleadings under the rules of pleading;

(c) Are effective to relieve a party from the establishment of one of the preceding propositions;

(d) Are admissible by the law of Evidence as evidentiary facts, and thus may become in turn Propositions to be proved.

The first and the second of these classes clearly do not involve the law of Evidence. The third class is concerned with judicial admission and their congeners; such are really equivalent to a pleading, because they formally waive proof; they are therefore no part of the law of Evidence except for the necessity of distinguishing them from other things miscalled admissions. The fourth class alone concerns intrinsically the law of Evidence. It rests on the self-evident corollary that, since any Evidentiary Fact may in its turn become a Proposition (supra, par. (1)), evidence to prove it may then be offered.

Thus the law of Evidence is legitimately concerned solely with the relation between Evidentiary Facts and Propositions; how a given Proposition comes to be eligible for proof is not a part of the law of Evidence.

§ 3. Topical Analysis of the System of Evidence. The Propositions of which evidence may be offered being thus given by the rules of substantive law and of pleading, and the law of evidence concerning itself solely with the relation between Evidentiary Facts and such Propositions, the settlement of that relation involves obviously four distinct questions :

I. What Facts may be presented as Evidence? This is the question of Admissibility.

II. By Whom must Evidence be presented? This is the question of Burden of Proof, and, incidentally, of Presumptions.

III. To Whom must Evidence be presented? This involves the relation of function between Judge and Jury, as respectively deciding upon Law and Fact.

IV. Of What Propositions in issue need no Evidence be presented? This includes the topics ordinarily termed Judicial Notice and Judicial Admissions. The former (as will be seen) is in essence nothing more than a rule of burden of proof. The latter (as already noted in § 2) is in effect equivalent to a rule of pleading.

All of the last three topics represent the border line of what is in strictness the law of Evidence. They involve and rest upon certain larger aspects of procedure which are independent of the evidential material. The question who has the burden of proof, for example, is of a piece with the questions who shall open and close the argument and whether certain allegations require an affirmative or negative pleading. They form a part of a treatise on Evidence merely because their material is chiefly evidential material, and because their problems have constantly to be discriminated from the strictly evidential problems.

There are, indeed, still other topics which, because their material is partly or chiefly evidential, might by a broad treatment be included in a system of evidence.

For example, the rules of procedure in preparation for trial may raise the question whether an expected witness may be detained or bonded before trial begun, or whether testimony can be preserved by deposition taken before trial, or whether documents needed for evidence can be prevented from being carried out of the jurisdiction. So far as any of these rules of procedure affect the subsequent admissibility of the evidence, they plainly belong here ; but as rules of procedure — i.e. telling whether a thing can or cannot be done before trial — they are in strictness not rules of Evidence.

Again, the deliberations of the jury are governed by certain rules, prescribing the place of retirement, the behavior during retirement, the form of the verdict, and the like. Among these rules may be some which prescribe what effect of persuasion is to be attached to different sorts of evidence, and how the total strength or sufficiency of the jurors' persuasion is to be measured. All these rules belong together, and it is only incidentally that some of them concern evidential material.

Still again, a verdict and judgment may on appeal be set aside for various errors and defects ; some of these errors may involve the circumstance that improper evidence has been considered. But only as a part of the general system of appeal and revision can such rules be satisfactorily dealt with. They are a part of that system and not of the system of Evidence.

In these several ways, then, evidential material may be involved incidentally in various other parts of the system of procedure as a whole ; but the admissibility of evidence — that is, the relation between Evidentiary Facts and given Propositions — is in strictness the boundary of the system of Evidence intrinsically considered.

The ensuing schedule of topics will serve to show in compact form the general scheme of the rules and their relation to each other:

BOOK I

ADMISSIBILITY (WHAT FACTS MAY BE PRESENTED AS EVIDENCE)

A. RELEVANCY

I. CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE

HUMAN ACT, EVIDENCE TO PROVE

Prospectant Evidence

MORAL CHARACTER; PHYSICAL CAPACITY; HABIT; DESIGN; EMOTION

Concomitant Evidence

OPPORTUNITY; ALIBI

Retrospectant Evidence

MECHANICAL, ORGANIC, MENTAL TRACES

HUMAN QUALITY OR CONDITION, EVIDENCE TO PROVE

Moral Character; Physical Capacity; Mental Capacity; Design; Intent; Knowledge; Habit; Emotion; Identity

EXTERNAL INANIMATE NATURE (CONDITIONS, CAUSES, ETC.), EVIDENCE TO PROVE

Identity; Occurrence of Event; Existence in Time; Tendency, Cause, etc.

II. TESTIMONIAL EVIDENCE

TESTIMONIAL QUALIFICATIONS

Organic Capacity

MENTAL DEFECT OR DERANGEMENT; MENTAL IMMATURITY; MORAL DEPRAVITY

Experiential Capacity

Emotional Capacity

INTEREST; MARITAL RELATIONSHIP

Testimonial Observation

GENERAL PRINCIPLES; HEARSAY KNOWLEDGE; HYPOTHETICAL QUESTIONS

SPECIAL SUBJECTS

Medical Matters; Foreign Law; Reputation; Handwriting; Value

Testimonial Recollection

IN GENERAL; PAST RECOLLECTION RECORDED; PRESENT RECOLLECTION REVIVED

Testimonial Narration

INTERROGATION; NON-VERBAL TESTIMONY; WRITTEN TESTIMONY; INTERPRETED TESTIMONY; CONFESSIONS

TESTIMONIAL IMPEACHMENT

Introductory

GENERAL THEORY; PERSONS IMPEACHABLE

General Qualities

MORAL CHARACTER; MENTAL DEFECTS, ETC.

Evidencing Bias, etc. by Particular Instances

Evidencing Moral Character, etc. by Particular Instances

Specific Error (Contradiction)

Self-Contradiction

Admissions

TESTIMONIAL REHABILITATION

III. AUTOPTIC PROFERENCE (REAL EVIDENCE)

B. RULES OF AUXILIARY PROBATIVE POLICY

I. PREFERENTIAL RULES

PREFERENCE FOR DOCUMENTARY ORIGINALS

Rule Itself; Exceptions; Rules about Secondary Evidence

PREFERRED TESTIMONY

Provisional Testimonial Preferences

ATTESTING WITNESS; SUNDRY PREFERENCES

Conclusive Testimonial Preferences

II. ANALYTIC RULES (HEARSAY RULE)

HEARSAY RULE SATISFIED

By Cross-examination; By Confrontation

EXCEPTIONS TO THE RULE

Dying Declarations; Statements of Facts against Interest; Declarations about Family History; Attesting Witness; Regular Entries; Sundry Deceased Persons; Reputation; Official Statements; Learned Treatises; Professional Lists; Affidavits; Voters' Statements; Mental Condition; Spontaneous Exclamations

HEARSAY RULE NOT APPLICABLE (VERBAL ACTS)

APPLICATION TO COURT OFFICERS

III. PROPHYLACTIC RULES

OATH

PERJURY PENALTY

PUBLICITY

SEQUESTRATION

PRIOR NOTICE (Discovery)

IV. SIMPLIFICATIVE RULES

ORDER OF PRESENTING EVIDENCE

SUNDRY RULES

OPINION RULE

General Principle; Insanity; Value; Insurance Risk; Conduct; Law; State of Mind; Character; Handwriting

V. QUANTITATIVE RULES

NUMBER OF WITNESSES REQUIRED (Corroboration)

Rules depending on the Kind of Issue

TREASON; PERJURY; WILLS; ETC.

Rules depending on the Kind of Witness

ACCOMPLICE; SURVIVOR; WOMAN COMPLAINANT; ETC.

KINDS OF WITNESSES REQUIRED

Eye-witness to Crime, Marriage, etc.

VERBAL COMPLETENESS

COMPULSORY; OPTIONAL

AUTHENTICATION OF DOCUMENTS

AGE; CONTENTS; CUSTODY; SEAL.

C. RULES OF EXTRINSIC POLICY

I. RULES OF ABSOLUTE EXCLUSION

ILLEGALITY IN OBTAINING EVIDENCE

II. RULES OF OPTIONAL EXCLUSION

PRIVILEGE IN GENERAL

VIATORIAL PRIVILEGE

TESTIMONIAL PRIVILEGE

Privileged Topics

SUNDRIES; ANTI-MARITAL FACTS; SELF-CRIMINATING FACTS

Privileged Communications

CONFIDENCES: ATTORNEY AND CLIENT; HUSBAND AND WIFE; JURORS; OFFICIAL SECRETS; PHYSICIAN AND PATIENT; PRIEST AND PENITENT

D. PAROL EVIDENCE RULES

CREATION OF JURAL ACTS

INTEGRATION OF JURAL ACTS

SOLEMNIZATION OF JURAL ACTS

INTERPRETATION OF JURAL ACTS

BOOK II

BY WHOM EVIDENCE MUST BE PRESENTED

BURDEN OF PROOF

SPECIFIC PRESUMPTIONS

BOOK III

TO WHOM EVIDENCE MUST BE PRESENTED

JUDGE; JURY

BOOK IV

OF WHAT PROPOSITIONS NO EVIDENCE NEED BE PRESENTED

JUDICIAL NOTICE

JUDICIAL ADMISSIONS

§ 4. Rules of Evidence in Chancery; in Criminal Trials; in Ex Parte Proceedings; in Interlocutory Proceedings; in Grand Jury Inquiries; in Extradition Proceedings. (1) Chancery. The system of evidence in the Chancellor's court would form of itself a subject of broad scope. As a historical system it is independent of that of the common law in jury trials. It was built upon the ecclesiastical or canon law, and thus involves the whole story of Continental systems of proof.[1] Down to the middle of the 1700s, the relation between the chancery and the common law systems seems not to have been questioned, — not so much because their independence was conceded, as because the common law until that time was hardly conscious of possessing a system. With the appearance of Chief Baron Gilbert's treatise on Evidence — the first of its kind — about 1726, that consciousness becomes more apparent, and the question of the relations of the two begins to arise. But it seems to have been conceded or professed from the first by the court of chancery (according tc its maxim that Equity follows the Law) that it accepted the rules of the common law as to the admissibility of evidence.[2] Its own methods of taking evidence continued, as of course; but it recognized the bindingness of the common law rules, and professed to apply them except so far as the method of written deposition made modification necessary. There was in truth comparatively little field for controversy, partly because the rules of Evidence at common law were then not yet numerous, and partly because criminal cases and many civil issues which might raise common questions of evidence were wholly withdrawn from the cognizance of chancery. The orthodox and broad proposition, then, always was and has continued to be that the rules of Evidence at common law trials obtained also in chancery.[3]

But a comprehensive and accurate statement of the practice of chancery would show important qualifications of this. The variances in chancery practice may be classed under four heads. (a) The required mode of taking testimony in writing, instead of orally, was of course in itself a totally contrary rule. Further, it led to several effects upon other rules, — in particular, as to the mode of taking objections to evidence (by motion to strike out an answer to an interrogatory), as to the rule of impeachment (by forbidding it after publication of the depositions), and as to the mode of cross-examination (by requiring the cross-interrogatories to be framed before the answers to the direct interrogatories, or even the interrogatories themselves, were known, — thus emasculating the cross-examination). (b) The chancery court enforced the tradition of the canon law requiring two witnesses to every material allegation; and this not only gave rise to the general rule about overcoming the defendant's oath, but also led to a few specific rules for characteristic chancery issues, such as divorce bills and wills of personalty. So, too, it perpetuated the canon law rule concerning confessions in divorce suits. (c) The court of chancery radically parted from the common law courts in granting discovery before and during trial, i.e. in denying the common law privilege of a party-opponent to refuse to testify personally or (substantially) to disclose any of his evidence at any time. In this important rule lay the chief characteristic contribution of Chancery to our law of evidence. In a few minor respects also it adopted a concededly different rule, — as when it required the summoning of all the attesting witnesses to a will of land, or when it occasionally admitted a deposition without cross-examination. (d) Finally, there were a few variant rules, often spoken of as rules of evidence, but really rules of procedure or of substantive law, — as when in chancery parol evidence was admitted to reform a deed.

§ 4. [1] A masterly analysis and contrast of the Canon Law and Chancery methods is given in Professor Langdell's Equity Pleading, §§ 1–56. The historical relation between the Chancery methods and the system of the Canon or ecclesiastical courts (which gave form to the entire Continental system) can be seen by comparing Professor Langdell's exposition with the following works: A. Engelmann, History of Continental Civil Procedure (translated by Robert W. Millar, 1923); A. Esmein, History of Continental Criminal Procedure (translated by John Simpson, 1913); both of these in the Continental Legal History Series.

[2] 1740, Henly v. Phillips, 2 Atk. 43 (said of witnesses).

[3] 1817, Grant, M. R., in Wood v. Strickland, 2 Meriv. 461, 464 (said to be in general the same; here slightly different as to notice to produce a document, because the depositions had already showed its need); circa 1846, Mr. C. P. Cooper, Notes to Reports of Lord Cottenham's Cases in Chancery, I. 509 ("Conclusions drawn by the author from the various authorities in the books: Conclusion 1. That what is evidence in a court of law is evidence in a court of equity, and that evidence which is admissible in a court of law is admissible in a court of equity. Conclusion 2. That when it is said in some of the cases that the Court rejected evidence or held evidence to be inadmissible which would have been received or would have been held admissible at common law, it must not be understood that such evidence was absolutely rejected or was held entirely inadmissible, but only that it was laid aside, that it was put out of consideration, as regarded any decree or order binding the interest of the party against whom it was adduced"); Tenn. Shannon's Code 1916, § 6271.

The rules of evidence in Chancery, then, as a part of a system of procedure, are without the present purview. But it will be necessary from time to time to notice those rules, first, in so far as they may contradict a particular common law practice, secondly, in so far as the transfer of ecclesiastical and chancery jurisdiction has added to our system rules peculiar to their classes of litigation, and thirdly, in so far as statutes have improved the common law system by adopting for it the chancery rules.

(2) Criminal Trials. The rules of admissibility are in general the same for the trial of civil and of criminal causes. Not only in practice, but in principle and in spirit, there is no occasion for a distinction. The relation between an Evidentiary Fact and a particular Proposition is always the same, without regard to the kind of litigation in which that proposition becomes material to be proved.

It is true that certain rules of admissibility are applicable in criminal cases only, — such as the rule of corroboration in perjury ; but this is because the issues thereby evidenced arise in criminal cases only. It is also true that certain rules are modified or created for certain kinds of criminal issues, — such as the rules for admitting and corroborating an accused's confession, the rule for ' corpus delicti ', the rule for bigamous marriage, and the rule for a party's character; but these are few in number, and are due to special considerations affecting a particular issue or a particular sort of evidence, rather than to general policy involved necessarily or usually in criminal cases. Still further, it is true that in the related branches of procedure concerned chiefly with evidence, particularly the burden of proof and the measure of the jury's persuasion, a different policy obtains for criminal cases in general ; but this does not affect the rules of admissibility.

There are, then, by no means two systems of rules, distinct in history and in method, as was the case with the chancery practice.[4] There is but one system of rules for criminal and for civil trials. This is the more worth emphasizing, because the occasional appearance, in works on the law, of the title 'Criminal Evidence' has tended to foster the fallacy that there is some separate group of rules or some large number of modifications. On the contrary, much is lost in utility by attempting a separate treatment; for most of the large principles of Evidence are equally illustrated in both kinds of trials, and cannot be adequately followed, either in theory or in authority, if the precedents in either class of cases are ignored.

The fallacy, however, is an inveterate one, and has had repeatedly to be repudiated by judicial utterances :

1806, Lord Melville's Trial, 29 How. St. Tr. 746. Prosecution for the misapplication of public funds as Treasurer of the Navy; certificates were offered, signed by the paymaster, the defendant's subordinate, acknowledging the receipt of £45,000 from the Exchequer; these were objected to as not competent in a criminal case to affect the defendant with responsibility. Mr. Serjeant Best, for their reception : "We must first prove that the money

[4] Accord: ENGLAND: 1788, Eyre, C. B., in Att'y-Gen'l v. LeMerchant, 2 T. R. 201, 202 (documentary evidence); 1796, Lawrence, J., in Stone's Trial, 25 How. St. Tr. 1314; 1817, Abbott, J., in R. v. Watson, 32 How. St. Tr. 492, 2 Stark. 116, 155; 1820, Best, J., in Queen Caroline's Trial, Linn's ed. I. 490; 1828, Best, C. J., in Strother v. Barr, 5 Bing. 136, 155; 1837, Coleridge, J., in R. v. Murphy, 8 C. & P. 306; 1839, Parke, B., in Leach v. Simpson, 5 M. & W. 309, 312; 7 Dowl. Pr. 513, 515; 1860, Lefroy, C. J., in R. v. Towey, 8 Cox Cr. 331; 1878, Grove, J., in Blake v. Assur. Soc., 14 Cox Cr. 252.

UNITED STATES: Fed. 1840, McLean, J., in U. S. v. Winchester, 2 McLean U. S. 135, 138; Ariz. Rev. St. 1913, P. C. § 1042, 1225; Cal. P. C. 1872, §§ 1102, 1321; Colo. Comp. St. 1921, § 7099; Del. 1873, Gilpin, C. J., in State v. Carter, 1 Houst. Cr. C. 402, 411; Fla. Rev. G. S. 1919, § 6018; Ida. Comp. St. 1919, §§ 8950, 9129; Ind. Burns Ann. St. 1914, § 2110 (quoted post, § 488); Ia. Code 1919, § 9470; Mich. St. 1917, No. 208, May 10 (rules of Evidence in the Judicature Act 1915, being c. 234 of Comp. L. 1915, to govern criminal and quasi-criminal proceedings "insofar as the same are applicable"); Mont. Rev. C. 1921, § 11977, 12175; Nev. Rev. L. 1912, §§ 7451, 7454; N. J. 1849, Green, C. J., in West v. State, 22 N. J. L. 212, 242; N. D. Comp. L. 1913, § 10838; Oh. 1856, Bartley, C. J., in Summons v. State, 5 Oh. St. 325, 352; Or. Laws 1920, § 1533; Pa. 1875, Agnew, C. J., in Brown v. Schock, 77 Pa. 477; S. C. 1820, Nott, J., in State v. Rawls, 2 Nott & McC. 331, 333; S. D. Rev. C. 1919, § 4880; Tenn. Shannon's Code 1916, § 7354; Tex. Rev. C. Cr. P. 1911, §784; Utah: Comp. L. 1917, §§ 9275, 9276 (like Cal. P. C. §§ 1321, 1102); Vt. 1879, Barritt, J., in State v. Potter, 52 Vt. 33, 38 (documentary evidence); Va. 1817, White, J., in Warner v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 95, 105; 1878, Staples, J., in Trogdon's Case, 31 Gratt., 862, 874; Wash. R. & B. Code 1909, §§ 2147, 2152; Wyo. Comp. St. 1920, § 7511.

A good illustration of an apparent, but only accidental difference, resulting from a combination of rules, is found in Vaughton v. R. Co., 12 Cox Cr. 580 (1874), where a statute exempted carriers from liability conditionally, except for felonious acts of their servants; in an action for damages, the case turning on whether the articles had been feloniously taken by the carrier's servants, the defendant failed to offer any testimony, even that of the suspected servants; and in deciding whether there had been any evidence for the jury, the Court pointed out (Kelly, C. B., 587) that in a criminal charge against the servants no inference could have been drawn from their failure to testify, while in a civil case the carrier's failure to offer testimony was highly significant, on the principle of § 285, post.

has been received, and after we have satisfactorily proved that, then comes the evidence to prove what has been its application after it has been received. . . . The learned counsel have endeavored to distinguish between civil and criminal cases. . . . There is a considerable distinction between civil and criminal cases, but that distinction consists rather in the number of facts to be proved than in the manner of proving any of them. It is necessary that more facts should be proved, for the purpose of showing that a man has money in his possession or has had money come into his possession, than to make him civilly responsible; but though more facts should be proven in one case than is necessary to be proved in the other, each particular fact is to be proved by precisely the same evidence." Mr. Plumer, on the opposite side: "I desire it may be distinctly understood that I do not dispute that the rules of evidence are the same in both. . . . What is the distinction, then? . . . It is not that the rules of evidence are at all altered, but that when you are looking at the individual who stands in a civil relation, and are pursuing it with that view, there is an identity of persons between the agent and principal, and all that one has done or said is done or said by the other; . . . [but otherwise for criminal responsibility]. We are not contending that the rules of law are different in the two cases, but that the ultimate result of the inquiry makes that which is competent, legal, and proper in one case not so in the other." Lord Chancellor ERSKINE took the view that the certificate was admissible to show the authorized reception of the monies by the agent, but not that the money actually reached the defendant; and proceeded: "This first step in the proof must advance by evidence applicable alike to civil as to criminal cases; for a fact must be established by the same evidence, whether it is to be followed by a criminal or a civil consequence. But it is a totally different question, in the consideration of criminal as distinguished from civil justice, how the noble person now on trial may be affected by the fact when so established. The receipt by the paymaster would in itself involve him civilly, but could by no possibility convict him of a crime."

1820, BEST, J., in R. v. Burdett, 4 B. & Ald. 95, 122: "It has been solemnly decided that there is no difference between the rules of evidence in civil and criminal cases. If the rules of evidence prescribe the best course to get at truth, they must be and are the same in all cases, and in all civilized countries. There is scarcely a criminal case, from the highest down to the lowest, in which courts of evidence do not act upon this principle."

1884, GROVE, J., in R. v. Mallory, 15 Cox Cr. 460: "I never heard that there was any difference [between civil and criminal cases] in the rules of evidence as to the admissibility of evidence; though there may be a difference in their application; and it may be that a piece of evidence, admissible in either class of cases, may not be sufficient in a criminal case [for conviction], that is, without further evidence; but the evidence is not the less admissible."

1883, Sir JAMES FITZJAMES STEPHEN, History of the Criminal Law, 1, 437: "The rules as to the relevancy of the facts and as to the proof of relevant facts are, speaking generally, the same in relation to criminal as in relation to civil proceedings; for the manner in which a fact is to be proved has no necessary connection with the use to which it is to be applied when it has been proved. If it is necessary to show that a man is dead, the fact must be proved in the same way, whether it is proved in a criminal trial for murder or on the trial of a civil action for the recovery of an estate. Moreover the principles which determine whether or no a given fact is either in issue, or is or is not relevant to the issue, are the same whatever may be the nature of the case. Some of the more detailed rules of evidence, however, apply exclusively, and others most frequently, to criminal cases"; and he then names the presumption of innocence, the defendant's disqualification, confessions, dying declarations, and the defendant's character.

1853, RYLAND, J., in State v. Hays, 23 Mo. 314: "There is no difference; what may be received in the one case may be received in the other, and what is rejected in one ought to be rejected in the other; a fact may be established by the same evidence, whether it is to be followed by a criminal or civil consequence."

1896, BRICKELL, C. J., in Crawford v. State, 112 Ala. 1, 21 So. 214: "While there is a broad distinction" as to burden of proof, "the general rules and tests as to the admissibility and relevancy of evidence are the same in each class of cases."

(3) Proceedings Ex Parte. Evidence is constantly being offered to a judge in establishing the grounds of a motion made and heard 'ex parte' only. In such cases the usual system of rules of Evidence is not applied, partly because there is no opponent to invoke them, partly because the judge's determination is usually discretionary, and partly because it is seldom final. Occasionally the analogy of the ordinary rules is followed, but no regular practice seems to have developed except as prescribed by the local rules of court:

1841, R. v. Ryle, 9 M. & W. 227; commission issued under St. 33 H. VIII, c. 39, and long usage, to find whether a debt was due from the defendant to the crown, with a view to levy execution for the debt. The only evidence before the jury was an affidavit of Capt. Hill that the money had been deposited with defendant for the regiment and was due. The Commissioner stated that it had been "the invariable practice from the most ancient period" to use affidavits when the witness' attendance to give evidence 'viva voce' could not conveniently be had. On objection, it was pointed out that "the debt is not conclusively found by the inquiry before the jury under the commission, but the party is at liberty to traverse the debt in the proceedings which subsequently take place." It was argued to the contrary that there cannot be "one species of evidence for the crown and another for the subject." Lord ABINGER, C. B., discharging the rule: "The notion of legal evidence on trials before juries, in our law, is the effect of long practice . . . and a very important part of the law of the land. But where is the analogy that binds us to apply that practice to 'ex parte' proceedings on inquests for particular purposes, which are mere matter of form? There is no case that decides that, on inquests to be taken under provisions of this nature, there shall be none but 'viva voce' evidence, or none but that which, in common law trials before juries, may be considered as legal evidence." PARKE, B.: "I agree with my Lord Chief Baron that the rules of Evidence, as applicable to trials between party and party and criminal trials, have been the result of practice established, not by the law of the land; but the judges, seeing that the species of evidence given in cases between party and party, and between prosecutor and the accused, was much more lax than in the present day, have prescribed certain rules which have been adhered to. But the question is, whether the practice has laid down any such rule with regard to inquests of this description, which are not final in their nature, but are only preliminary, and may be [later] traversed by any person whose rights are affected thereby. . . . I apprehend that it would be difficult to produce any authority to show that, in a proceeding which was not finally binding upon the rights of parties, juries have been tied down to hear only such evidence as would be received in cases binding between party and party. That being so, according to established usage, I apprehend this affidavit would be admissible in evidence."

1807, Shortz v. Quigley, 1 Binn. Pa. 222 (motion to open a judgment entered on a bond; after evidence as to the liability, counsel for the obligor offered to prove facts showing the obligation void; the judge refusing "to hear this evidence or to open the judgment," the issue on appeal was whether "the Court was bound to receive the same evidence that would be competent upon a trial by jury"); TILGHMAN, C. J.: "In hearing these motions, Courts are not tied down to those strict rules of evidence which govern them in trials by jury; because it is presumed that their knowledge of the law prevents their being carried away by the weight of testimony not strictly legal. I never heard it supposed that a bill of exceptions lies to the Court's opinion in receiving or rejecting testimony upon motions for summary relief. . . . If it did, the delay of justice would be infinite. . . . I consider the point too well settled to need discussion."

The most notable deviation, in 'ex parte' proceedings, from the ordinary rules of Evidence is seen in the use of affidavits, the cross-examination being dispensed with; and the proceeding of habeas corpus is that in which the question assumes the greatest importance.[5]

(4) Interlocutory Proceedings. So too, in all interlocutory proceedings, even when responsory and not 'ex parte', the usual system of rules is ignored, again partly because of the subsidiary and provisional nature of the inquiry, but chiefly because there is no jury, and the rules of Evidence are, as rules, traditionally associated with a trial by jury.[6]

(5) Grand Jury. Proceedings before a grand jury are both 'ex parte' and interlocutory; moreover, the grand jury only seeks for a "probable cause"; hence, on all principles, the jury-trial rules of Evidence should not apply. Moreover, in point of policy, no rules should hamper their inquiries, nor need a presentment amounting only to probable cause be based on a system of rigid sifting of evidence.

In point of principle, the common law, oddly enough, seems not to have arrived at a state of equilibrium.[7] But the vigorous development in the [5] The authorities are scanty, and local unrecorded practice doubtless varies; for affidavits expressly admissible by statutes, see post, § 1710:

Minnesota: 1906, Kipp v. Clinger, 97 Minn. 135, 106 N. W. 108 (affidavit on motion to open a judgment; rule of personal knowledge applied); Montana: 1897, Liter's Estate, 19 Mont. 474, 48 Pac. 753; New Hampshire: 1906, Goodwin v. Blanchard, 73 N. H. 550, 64 Atl. 22 (the trial judge has discretion to refuse oral examination of jurors who have made affidavits, on a motion for a new trial); New Jersey: 1789, State v. Lyon, Coxe N. J. 403 (habeas corpus for a negro alleging free status; some 'viva voce' testimony being offered, it was objected that affidavits were necessary; Smith, J. (overruling the objection); "The general principle in the admission of evidence is not that Courts are restricted by narrower rules in receiving testimony than juries are, but that they, being able to discriminate between that which ought to be listened to and that which should be disregarded, are not prohibited from hearing any evidence which they may think calculated to illustrate the subject before them"); 1795, State v. McDonald & Armstrong, Coxe N. J. 332 (habeas corpus for a negro alleging free status; hearsay testimony of the deceased owner being objected to, it was admitted, the case not being before a jury), 1916, Bull v. International Power Co., 87 N. J. Eq. 1, 99 Atl. 111 (discharge of a receiver; said that "the same rules, as far as may be, apply to 'ex parte' testimony as to that in litigated matters"); 1916, Re McCraven, 87 N. J. Eq. 28, 99 Atl. 619 (application for order to take deposition; "the rules of evidence . . . apply as well to 'ex parte' cases as to ligitated ones"; Pennsylvania: 1807, Shortz v. Quigley, 1 Binn. 222 (quoted supra).

[6] 1841, Parke, B., in R. v. Ryle, quoted supra; 1917, Semidey v. Izquierdo, 10 P. R. 114, 129 ("Even hearsay evidence may be received upon application for preliminary injunction").

[7] England: 1795, R. v. Willet, 6 T. R. 294 (affidavit based on hearsay, not received as a ground for an information; "the Court refused to grant the rule, because the affidavit on which it was prayed for was not legal evidence; they said that in these cases they were placed in the room of a grand jury", and this affidavit would not be legal evidence before a grand jury); 1819, R. v. Dickinson, R. & R. 401 ("witnesses had attended before the grand jury without having been sworn"; whether an objection after conviction was too late, not decided, by all the Judges; but a pardon was recommended); 1842, R. v. Russell, Car. & M. 247 (witnesses not properly sworn before the grand jury; two judges, citing also a third, held that this would not "vitiate the indictment, as the grand jury were at liberty to find a bill upon their own knowledge merely, and were anciently in the habit of doing so"); 1872, R. v. Bullard, 12 Cox Cr. 353 (the grand jury asked for the deposition of an absent witness; "Byles, J., granted the application, and stated that the grand jury were not bound by any rules of evidence; they were a secret tribunal, and might lay by the heels in jail the most powerful man in the country by finding a bill against him; and for that purpose might even read a paragraph from a newspaper"); United States: 1852, U. S. v. Redy, 5 McLean 358, Fed. Cas. 16, 134 (objection that affidavits were used before the United States of the institution of public prosecutor (unknown to the common law) seems to have developed a technique which led to abuses ; and the Legislatures of many States, moved by experiences and motives of public policy not easy to detect, have limited the grand jury to the use of "legal evidence"; this being of course, in effect, a handicap on the public prosecutor.[8]

(6) Extradition. For the same reasons of principle, extradition proceedings are not governed in strictness by the jury-trial rules of Evidence ; moreover, here the additional reason obtains that the evidence is brought from outside the jurisdiction, and the procurement of evidence is thus likely to be hampered by the lack of power or practicability, as well as by the possible differences of law in another system.[9]

§ 4*a*. Jury-Trial Rules of Evidence as Applicable to Administrative Tribunals ; (I) Theory of the Question. Is the system of rules of Evidence, by law in force for trials by jury in the ordinary judiciary system, also legally applicable as such to inquiries of fact determinable by administrative tribunals or officers?

The answer is, speaking generally, that the system is not applicable, either by historical precedent, or by sound practical policy ; but that it has been declared or assumed, in several jurisdictions, to be applicable to some types of grand jury, the affiants being personally present; Nelson, J., ruled that "the mode of conducting the examination of witnesses who are before the grand jury" would not be revised; also ruled that "evidence before a grand jury must be competent legal evidence, such as is legitimate and proper before a petit jury"; also that, on grounds of policy, there would be no revision "of the grand jury upon the evidence, for the purpose of determining whether the finding was founded upon sufficient proof," or whether there was "any evidence as to any particular point"); 1920, U. S. v. Silverthorne, D. C. W. D. N. Y., 265 Fed. 853 (new trial; motion to quash indictment because of hearsay received, "merely hearsay or incompetent evidence tantamount to insufficiency of proof of material matters" would justify quashing); 1916, State v. Fox, 122 Ky. 197, 182 S. W. 906; 1890, People v. Lander, 82 Mich. 109, 46 N. W. 956; 1865, State v. Logan, 1 Nev. 509; 1850, State v. Dayton, 23 N. J. L. 49; 1881, Hope v. People, 83 N. Y. 418.

1717, Sir John Hawkins, Pleas of the Crown, b. II, c. 25, § 145; 1826, Joseph Chitty, Criminal Law, 20 ed. I, 318; 1918, Wharton, Criminal Procedure, 10th ed., § 1291.

[8] Ariz. Rev. St. 1913, P. C. § 918 (grand jury may hear only evidence of "witnesses produced and sworn before them, or furnished by legal documentary evidence", or depositions); Ark. Dig. 1919, § 2988 (only "legal evidence"); Cal. P. C. 1872, § 919 ("The grand jury can receive no other evidence than such as is given by witnesses produced and sworn before them, or furnished by legal documentary evidence, or the deposition of a witness in the cases mentioned in the third subdivision of section six hundred and eighty-six. The grand jury can receive none but legal evidence, and the best evidence in degree, to the exclusion of hearsay, or secondary evidence"); Ida. Comp. St. 1919, § 8793 (substantially like Cal. P. C. § 919); Ky. C. Cr. P. 1895, § 107 (only "legal evidence"); Mont. Rev. C. 1921, § 11823 (like Cal. P. C. § 919); Nev. Rev. L. 1912, § 7024: N. Mex. Annot. St. 1915, § 3129 ("can receive none but legal evidence, and the best evidence in degree, to the exclusion of hearsay or secondary evidence"); N. D. Comp. L. 1913, §§ 10659, 10660 (like Cal. P. C. § 919, omitting "or the deposition, etc."); S. D. Rev. C. 1919, §§ 4681, 4682 (like Cal. P. C. 1915, § 919, omitting the clause for depositions).

[9] 1922, Collins v. Loisel, — U. S. —, 42 Sup. 469 (extradition; "the phrase 'such evidence of criminality', as used in the treaty, refers to the scope of the evidence or its sufficiency to block out those elements essential to a conviction; it does not refer to the character of specific instruments of evidence or to the rules governing admissibility; . . . it is clear that the mere wrongful exclusion of specific pieces of evidence, however important, does not render the detention illegal").

administrative tribunals, while in other jurisdictions or for other kinds of tribunals the orthodox attitude has been maintained.

It will be convenient (I) first, to define the precise question, by noticing the constitutional relation of the regular courts to administrative tribunals, and then (II) to examine the bearings of history and practical policy, and finally (III) to note the state of the law in the several jurisdictions and for the different kinds of tribunals.

(I) At the outset it is necessary to define the precise question, and for that purpose to discriminate other principles related in practice but distinct in law. That question is, whether the jury-trial rules of evidence are by law applicable to control the proceedings of administrative officers in inquiries of fact falling within their jurisdiction to be determined? But two other and broader questions must have been answered before that question arises; viz. (a) Whether an administrative official's determination is reviewable on the facts by the regular Courts? (b) Whether an administrative official's determination, under the constitutional requirement of due process of law, must be based on certain fundamentals of fair and adequate procedure? An affirmative answer to both these questions signifies that the Courts may set aside administrative findings on one or the other ground; but does not signify necessarily that the jury-trial rules of evidence are applicable by law in administrative tribunals.

Speaking generally, the affirmative answer has everywhere been given to the above two questions. The peculiar traditions of Anglo-American justice and politics look upon the supremacy of the Courts as a necessary safeguard of civic liberties. Nevertheless, no part of our law is more incoherent and confused, both in theory and in terminology. It has grown up by rulings delivered under various headings of the law; and the largest part of it is disguised under procedural rulings about certiorari, mandamus, and other unrelated remedies, applied without consistency of principles to numerous administrative officials of the most varied types of independence and authority. Meanwhile, the last few decades have seen a great multiplication of adminisrative offices by legislative creation; and the Courts have had to solve this new and vast extension of problems without any equipment of systematic theory ready in our law for the purpose. Hence a tangled mass of inconsistent rules representing a transitional stage of development; and this must endure for a long period without hope of clarification.[1] § 4a. [1] Amidst the voluminous materials dealing with the tendencies and problems of administrative subjection to judicial review, the following are notable: F. J. Goodnow, "The Growth of Executive Discretion" (1905; American Political Science Ass'n. Proceedings, II, 29); E. M. Parker, "Executive Judgments and Executive Legislation" (1906; Harvard Law Rev., XX, 116); T. R. Powell, "Conclusiveness of Administrative Determinations in the Federal Government" (1907; American Political Science Review, I, 583); "Judicial Review of Administrative Action in Immigration Proceedings" (1909; Harvard Law Rev., XXII, 360); "Administrative Exercise of the Police Power" (1911; Harvard Law Rev. XXIV, 268, 333, 441); Roscoe Pound, "Executive Justice" (1907; American Law Register, O. S., LV, 137); Nathan Isaacs, "Judicial Review of Administrative Findings" (1921; Yale Law J., XXX, 781); E. F. Albertsworth, "Judicial Review of Administrative Action by the Federal Supreme Court" (1921; Harvard Law Review, XXXV, 127).

This much needs to be brought to mind here, in order to discriminate (as the Courts sometimes forget to do) between these two general and fundamental questions above noted, viz. the extent of the control of the Courts over the due process and the finality of findings of administrative tribunals, and the precise question of the law of Evidence, viz. whether the jury-trial rules are by law applicable to inquiries by administrative tribunals. The control may and does exist, without requiring an affirmative answer to the latter question.[2]

§ 4*b*. Same: (II) History and Policy. The history and the policy of treating the jury-trial rules of Evidence as applicable to inquiries by administrative officials deserve careful reflection.

(A) Historically, the distinction is fundamental, i.e. the common-law rules of Evidence grew up exclusively in jury trial, and do not apply 'ex stricto jure' in any tribunal but a jury-court. This was long ago pointed out by the master of the history of jury-trial:

1898, Professor James Bradley Thayer, A Preliminary Treatise on Evidence at the Common Law, cc. IV–VI, pp. 180, 266, 270, 509: "The rejection on one or another practical ground of what is really probative is the characteristic thing in the law of Evidence; stamping it as the child of the jury system. . . . In the shape it has taken, it is not at all a necessary development of the rational method of proof; so that, where people did not have the jury, or having once had it did not keep it (as on the continent of Europe although they, no less than we, worked out a rational system), they developed under the head of Evidence no separate and systematized branch of the law. . . . The greatest and most remarkable offshoot of the jury was that body of excluding rules which chiefly constitute the English 'Law of Evidence.' . . . This judicial oversight and control of the process of introducing evidence to the jury was what gave our system birth; and he who would understand it must keep this fact constantly in mind. . . Our Law of Evidence . . . is concerned with the operations of courts of justice, and not with ordinary inquiries 'in pais.' . . . It is a term of

[2] Merely as illustrations of the distinctness of the questions of finality and due process, the following judicial opinions are noted:

Due Process principle, in general: 1889, Chicago M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. S. 418, 457, 10 Sup. 462 (railroad commission).

Finality, in general: 1911, Borgnis v. Falk Co., 147 Wis. 327, 364, 133 N. W. 209 (industrial commission).

U. S. Treasury Department: 1893, Passavant v. U. S., 148 U. S. 214, 13 Sup. 1016 (board of general appraisers); 1855, Murray's Lessee v. Hoboken Land & I. Co., 18 How. 272 (Treasury officer's warrant); Geo. S. Brown, "Judicial Review in Customs Taxation" (The Forum, July, 1918).

U. S. Postmaster-General: 1902, American School of Magnetic Healing v. McAnnulty, 187 U. S. 94; 1921, U. S. ex rel. Milwaukee Social Dem. Pub. Co. v. Burleson, 255 U. S. 407, 41 Sup. 352; 1922, Leach v. Carlile, 258 U. S. 138, 42 Sup. 227 ("fraud order" excluding matter from the mails; the finding of the Postmaster-General is conclusive, "where it is fairly arrived at and has substantial evidence to support it").

U. S. Land Office: 1896, Burfenning v. Chicago St. P. M. & O. R. Co., 163 U. S. 321; 1901, Gardner v. Bonestell, 180 U. S. 362.

U. S. Treasury, Immigration Bureau: 1892, Nishimura Ekiu v. U. S., 142 U. S. 651, 12 Sup. 336; 1893, Fong Yue Ting v. U. S., 149 U. S. 698, 713, 742; 1903, Japanese Immigrant Case, 189 U. S. 86, 23 Sup. 611; 1905, U. S. v. Ju Toy, 198 U. S. 753, 25 Sup. 645; 1912, Zakonaite v. Wolf, 226 U. S. 272, 33 Sup. 31.

State Industrial Accident Commission: 1917, Northern Pacific S. S. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Com., 174 Cal. 500, 163 Pac. 910; 1918, Ind. Com. v. Johnson, 64 Colo. 461, 172 Pac. 422; 1918, Peterson v. Ind. Board, 281 Ill. 326, 117 N. E. 1033; 1918, Phil Hollenbach Co. v. Hollenbach, 181 Ky. 262, 284, 204 S. W. 152; 1915, Milwaukee v. Ind. Com., 160 Wis. 238, 151 N. W. 247.

State Public Utilities Commission: 1920, Ohio Valley Water Co. v. Ben Avon Borough, 253 U. S. 287, 40 Sup. 527.

State School Board: 1920, Hopkins v. Buckport, 119 Me. 437, 111 Atl. 734.

forensic procedure, and imports something put forward in a court of justice. . . . Our Law of Evidence is a piece of illogical, but by no means irrational, patchwork, — not at all to be admired, nor easily to be found intelligible, except as a product of the jury system." [1]

It is true, to be sure, that in the course of English administrative development in the 1800s, a few administrative subjects were committed to the judges as reviewing tribunals, for example, taxation and electoral controversies; and the members of the bar, in practicing in those fields, naturally invoked, or at least observed in the main, the rules of Evidence. Thus, here and there, the modern English law can be found using the rules of Evidence in administrative inquiries. How far this practice extended cannot be said with certainty, — not far enough, however, to constitute any general change of spirit or method.[2] Standing off at a distance to analyze general features, § 4b. [1] In Edmund Burke's speech protesting against the House of Lords' rulings upon evidence in the trial of Warren Hastings will be found a similar allusion to the peculiar needs of the jury as the reason for rules of Evidence (Cobbett's Parliamentary Hist., XXXI, 347–358).

[2] The following notes of English practice represent the result of a partial search among a variety of sources selected at random:

Taxing Bodies: Assessed Taxes, Cases determined on Appeal (two volumes, 1823–1834, covering 1016 cases; only twice is a rule of Evidence invoked, viz. in Cases 974, 1016, where the Crown representative offered hearsay evidence of the assessee's having pursued game, and argued that the burden was on the assessee to disprove the fact; this contention was overruled; virtually only a question of burden of proof was involved, and not a question of admissibility); Board of Inland Revenue, Tax Cases, 1875–1915, 6 vols. (no title Evidence in the Index): 1892, R. v. Marsham, 2 Q. B. 371 (apportionment of paying expense by local board of works; the magistrate, in an action by the board for payment, declined to allow cross-examination of the board's clerk as to the disbursement of the moneys; Lord Halsbury, L. C., allowing mandamus: "No doubt a magistrate may improperly reject evidence, and the Court may be unable to set him right, and the question is whether this case comes within that category; I think that it does not; the act of the magistrate was not a mere rejection of evidence, but amounted to a declining to enter upon an inquiry which he was bound to enter: he has not merely rejected evidence, but has declined jurisdiction"; Lord Esher, M. R. agreed that here the magistrate had virtually ruled "that whether the evidence would prove the subject-matter or not, the subject-matter was one into which he had no jurisdiction to inquire"; Pauper Settlement (Justices of the Peace): Burrow's Settlement Cases 1732–1776 (only two cases on Evidence in the Index); Industrial Inventions: Cutler's Reports of Patent, Design, and Trademark Cases, 1884 + (a few rulings on Evidence); Liquor Licenses: 1898, R. v. Sharman, 1 Q. B. 578 (licensing Justices may "determine what course of procedure they will adopt" as to swearing witnesses, etc.); Railway Rates: Neville and others' Railway and Canal Traffic Cases, 1856 + (no rulings on Evidence); Parliamentary Committee on Private Bills: Clifford and Rickards' Locus Standi Cases, 1873–1884 (virtually no evidence rulings); Election Contests (Revising Barristers): Welsh's Registry Cases, Dublin, 1841 (no Evidence rulings); Smith's Registration Cases: 1909, Storey v. Town Clerk, Smith's Registration Cases, II, 179 (evidence of canvassers not based on personal knowledge; the revising Barrister's ruling was affirmed at first, in the King's Bench Division, on the ground that the practice in election inquiries had been not to insist on the "strictest rules of evidence", per Alverstone, L. C. J., Channell, J., and Coleridge, L. J.; but in the Court of Appeal, the appeal was allowed, on the ground among others that the language of the Act implied that the revising Barrister must act on "legal evidence" only, per Vaughan Williams, L. J., and semble, Buckley, L. J., and Kennedy, L. J.); Summary Magistrate: 1910, The King v. Mahony, 2 Ir. R. 695 (conviction of a betting offence by a divisional magistrate acting summarily, but reviewable on certiorari; the evidence was insufficient; held that though "the essentials of justice must be observed", including the opportunity to make defence, etc., yet "mere want of evidence sufficient to warrant conviction" did not amount to want of jurisdiction; the opinions exhaustively consider all prior rulings in England and Ireland, and justify the remark of L. C. J. O'Brien that "never in the history of the law, at least so far as relates to this country, did a case receive more careful, more exhaustive consideration, than the one with which we are dealing"); Executive Commissions in general: 1922, Wilson v. Esquimalt &

we find it still true (in Professor Thayer's words) that, 'Our Law of Evidence is concerned with the operations of courts of justice; it is not at all to be admired, nor easily to be found intelligible, except as a product of the jury system.'

Historically, also, we have the advantage of a critical judgment upon it from a comparative point of view, — the judgment of an enlightened English jurist who was fully aware of its peculiar origin and had observed the futility of an attempt to transplant it amidst unsuitable conditions :

1873, Sir Henry Sumner Maine, The Theory of Evidence (in "Village Communities in the East and West"; being a review of Sir James Stephen's "Indian Evidence Act"): "It must always be recollected that the affirmative or positive method of arrangement followed in the Indian Evidence Act does not represent the historical growth of the English law of Evidence. So far as it consisted of express rules, it was in its origin a pure system of exclusion, and the great bulk of its present rules were gradually developed as exceptions to rules of the widest application, which prevented large classes of testimony from being submitted to the jury. The chief of these were founded on general propositions of which the approximation to truth was but remote. Thus the assumptions were made that the statements of litigants as to the matter in dispute were not to be believed; that witnesses interested in the subject-matter of the suit were not credible; and that no trustworthy inference can be drawn from assertions which a man makes merely on the information of other men. . . . A complete account of it cannot in fact be given, unless the mode of its development be kept in view. . . .

"Another important reason, too, for remembering that our law of Evidence is historically a system of exclusion, is that we cannot in any other way account for its occasional miscarriages. The conditions under which it was originally developed must still be referred to, in explanation of the difficulty of applying it in certain cases, or of the ill success which attends the attempt to apply it. The mechanism of judicial administration which once

Nanaimo R. Co., A. C. 202 (on appeal from British Columbia; in an action to establish the railroad's title to mineral lands, the validity of a grant to G. was in issue; by B. C. St. 1904, 3 & 4 Edw. VII, c. 54, § 3, a grant would issue from the Lieutenant-Governor in council to a settler upon application "accompanied by reasonable proof of such occupation", etc.; here the Lieutenant-Governor had held a hearing with full opportunity of cross-examination, etc., but the railroad company contended that there still was not "reasonable proof" made by G.; Duff, J., speaking for the Privy Council, held that "whether or not the proof advanced was 'reasonable proof' was a question of fact for the designated tribunal", viz. the Lieutenant-Governor, and proceeded, referring to the British Columbian Supreme Court: "But the Chief Justice . . . proceeded largely upon the view that generally the deponents seem to speak without personal knowledge of the facts to which they depose, and such statements he seems to put aside entirely as valueless if not altogether incompetent. Their Lordships think that the Lieutenant-Governor in Council was not bound by the technical rules of British Columbia law touching the reception of hearsay evidence, and they think there was nothing necessarily incompatible with the judicial character of the inquiry in the fact that such evidence was received"); Court-Martial: 1921, The King v. Murphy, 2 Ir. R. 190, 226 (the accused called for the proceedings of a court of inquiry, so as to cross-examine a witness for the prosecution to his former testimony therein, but this was refused, on the ground of privilege for such proceedings; the refusal being erroneous, held that the Court's error could not be availed of; Molony, C. J., "When the Court has jurisdiction to decide a matter, its jurisdiction is not ousted because it happens to give an erroneous decision; and it certainly cannot be deemed to exceed or abuse its jurisdiction merely because it incidentally misconstrues a statute, or admits illegal evidence, or rejects legal evidence: . . . up to the present no text-writer on court-martial law has suggested that this Court could set aside a decision of a court-martial on account of an incidental mistake in applying the law of evidence; however desirable it might be to be able to invoke the authority of this Court in dealing with cases of such gravity as that before us, in the period of over two centuries that courts-martial have existed, there has been no instance of any such exercise of jurisdiction"; examining the authorities).

extended over a great part of Europe, and in which the functions of the judge were distributed between persons or bodies representing distinct sources of authority — the King and the country, or the Lord and his tenants — in England gradually assumed the shape under which we are all familiar with it in criminal trials and at Nisi Prius. A body of men, whose award on questions of fact is in the last resort conclusive, are instructed and guided to a decision by a dignitary, sitting in their presence, who is assumed to have an eminent acquaintance with the principles of human conduct, whether embodied or not in technical rules, and who is sole judge of points of law, and of the admissibility of evidence. The system of technical rules, which this procedure carries with it, fails then, in the first place, whenever the arbiter of facts — the person who has to draw inferences from or about them — has special qualifications for deciding on them, supplied to him by experience, study, or the peculiarities of his own character, which are of more value to him than could be any general direction from book or person. For this reason, a policeman guiding himself by the strict rules of Evidence would be chargeable with incapacity; and a general would be guilty of a military crime.

"Again, the blending of the duties of the judge of law and of the judge of fact deprives the system of much, though not necessarily of all, of its utility. An Equity judge, an Admiralty judge, a Common Law judge trying an election petition, an historian, may employ the English rules of Evidence, particularly when stated affirmatively, to steady and sober his judgment. But he cannot give general directions to his own mind without running much risk of entangling or enfeebling it, and under the existing conditions of thought he cannot really prevent from influencing his decision any evidence which has been actually submitted to him, provided that he believes it. Englishmen are extremely prone to do injustice to foreign systems of judicial administration, from forgetting the inherent difficulty of applying the English law of Evidence when the same authority decides both on law and on fact, as is mostly the case in other countries. . . .

"When India came under British rule, there were many branches of law in which the political officers of the British Government could find few positive rules of any sort; or, if any could be discovered, they were the special observances of limited classes or castes. Thus there was no law of Evidence, in the proper sense of the words; hardly any law of Contract; scarcely any of Civil Wrong. . . . Whole provinces of law became exclusively, or nearly exclusively, English. The law of Evidence became wholly English; so did the law of Contract substantially; so did the law of Tort. . . . It is quite possible to hold a respectful opinion of many parts of English law, and yet to affirm strongly that its introduction by courts of justice into India has amounted to a grievous wrong. . . . No branch of law had become more thoroughly English at the time when it was first comprehensively dealt with by the Indian Legislature than the law of Evidence; and the practical evils which hence arose were even greater than those which ordinarily result from the adoption of an exotic system of legal rules, collected with difficulty from isolated decisions reported in a foreign language. The theory of judicial evidence is constantly misstated or misconceived even in this country. The English law on the subject is too often described as being that which it is its chief distinction not to be — that is, as an Organon, as a sort of contrivance for the discovery of truth which English lawyers have patented. In India, several special causes have contributed to disguise its true character. There is much probability that our English law of Evidence would never have come into existence if we had not continued much longer than other western societies the separation of the province of the judge from the province of the jury; and, in fact, the English rules of Evidence are never very scrupulously attended to by tribunals which, like the Court of Chancery, adjudicate both on law and on fact, through the same organs and the same procedure. Now, an Indian functionary, when he acts as a civil judge, and for the most part when he acts as a criminal judge, decides both on law and on fact. He it is who applies the rules of Evidence to himself, and not to a body distinct from himself; and he has often to perform the delicate achievement of preventing his decision from being affected by sources of information which in reality have been opened to him. . . .

"The effects of their peculiar experience on many distinguished Indian functionaries may be seen to be of two kinds. In some minds there is complete scepticism as to the value of the rules of Evidence; and though the man who for the time being is a judge may attempt to apply them, he is intimately persuaded that he has gone into bondage to a foolish technical system under compulsion from the Court of Appeal above him. With others, the consequences are of a different sort, but practically much more serious. They accept from the lawyers the doctrine that the law of Evidence is of the extremest importance, and unconsciously allow this belief to influence them, not only in their judicial, but in their executive and administrative duties. It is often said in India that the servile reliance upon the English law of Evidence, which nowadays characterizes many of the servants of Government, is producing a paralysis of administration; and though the assertion may be exaggerated, it is far from impossible that it may have a basis of truth."

These sagacious observations of Sir Henry Maine may serve to warn us that any attempt to apply the jury-trial rules of Evidence to an administrative tribunal acting without a jury is an historical anomaly, predestined to probable futility and failure.

(B) Policy. In considering the practical policy of applying the jury-trial system of rules in administrative tribunals, two extreme and antipodal opinions are found current.

1. One view — the popular view, it may be called — is that the jury-trial rules have had their day in our system of justice; that their obstructive and irrational technicalities have made the system nauseous and futile in its native habitat; and that to transplant it to new fields would be an error amounting to a folly. The adherents of this view point to the effective manner in which other tribunals of great responsibility have already managed to conduct their inquiries without the aid of the jury-trial rules; thus demonstrating that those rules are not indispensable in reaching the truth:

1920, Mr. Louis Bartlett, "The Newer Justice" (Atlantic Monthly, vol. 126, No. 3, p. 296): ". . . A very significant thing about this, and one which to my mind portends a great change in the administration of our Anglo-Saxon laws, is that in the Juvenile Court, the Domestic Relations Court, and the special tribunals, such as the Interstate Commerce Commission, the method of ascertaining the facts is departing more and more from that sanctioned by law in the courts. We are all tempted to laugh when the trial-lawyer jumps up to remark that a question is 'irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial.' And yet that objection is responsible for a great many new trials, appeals and reversals, and failures of justice. The objection amounts to this: that the evidence, if given, should be disregarded in rendering a decision. And the distrust of our Courts seems to have reached the point that we fear that, if the answer is given, the judge or jury will not have sense enough to disregard it. Now the judge of the Juvenile Court listens to everything; finds out all about the child, his parents, his surroundings, and knows a lot about the relation of the child with others that he could never have learned sitting as a trial judge in a criminal case. . . . Another thing. The court itself collects in an expert way much of the evidence on which it acts, instead of depending on the testimony brought to it. The psychopathic expert, the social worker, the probation officer, are trained observers. Our Railroad Commission, through its engineering staff, collects most of the data on which it acts. It wastes little time in lawyers' wrangles over facts it has itself ascertained. These methods make for speedy judgments and fair ones. On the other hand, expert opinion, as used in the courts, is almost a byword; it is furnished by the interested parties, and experience has shown that, generally speaking, it is unreliable.

"This new method of getting information is sound common sense. It is the way we act in our ordinary affairs in reaching judgments; and used by trained minds, it presents little danger of injustice. It is the method of taking testimony used in Continental Europe, where the Roman Law furnishes the basis of the judicial systems. And we find that it is used in practice in our inferior courts, when the record is not taken by a court reporter, and that it promotes speed and, in the hands of able men, justice also.

"It is probable that this method of ascertaining the facts will find wider application as time goes on."

The other, or technical, view is that the jury-trial system of rules is the only safe method of investigation where liberty and property may be at stake; that the sound wisdom of caution which is the basis of that system is as valid for one kind of tribunal as for another; and that the judicial review of administrative officers' findings would be impracticable and ineffective without using that system as a standard for checking the regularity of the proceedings. — There is no need to quote representatives of this view; it preaches or lurks in almost every judicial opinion; and it echoes instantly in the breast of the orthodox legal practitioner.

2. The fallacy of the first, or popular, view does not lie in the assertion that the jury-trial system of rules has in its own home become technically over-developed to the point of inefficiency; for it is; and the repulsion against its excesses is natural and just. But the fallacy is rather in the second argument, viz. that the success of a few other tribunals in dispensing with the system permits the broad inference to be drawn that administrative tribunals in general (and even jury-courts) could afford to dispense with it. What are the conditions which have made this result possible in the Juvenile Courts, in the Federal Commerce Commission, and in a few other Federal tribunals? The answer must be uncertain. In the Juvenile Courts, the reason may be that there is usually no deep-seated controversy on issues of fact, and also that there are usually no professional lawyers to marshal the armed forces of technicality on either side of the issues. In the Commerce Commission, neither of these reasons applies; instead, however, it may be thought, first, that the habitually narrow range of the issue renders most of the technical rules inapplicable, and, secondly, that the smallness of the group of practitioners, and the unitary organization of the tribunal, tend to produce that personal acquaintance between bench and bar which permits most matters of proof to be taken for granted without insistence on the usual safeguards against chicanery. Similar conditions exist and may account for the similar result in the Federal Admiralty Courts, the Trade Commission, the Land Office, the Patent Office, and the Board of General Appraisers. And thus, not only do different sets of conditions exist in the Juvenile Courts and in the other tribunals, but none of these special conditions are true of the general mass of jury-trial courts; nor are they true, as a whole, of Industrial Accident Boards or of Public Utilities Commissions or of administrative tribunals in general. Therefore, a generalization from these peculiar instances cannot be made with certainty.

Moreover, the argument for the popular view forgets that there is a radical difference between conducting an inquiry of fact under the jury-trial system of Evidence and conducting it under no rules at all. Suppose that the jury-trial system be dispensed with, as proposed; what rules shall be used in their place? Certainly there are fundamental principles of caution and fairness which every serious investigator must be expected to observe. But what are they? Where are they defined? The danger in all political reform, now as always, is that we are too ready, when convinced of a fault in an institution, to abolish it without having a better substitute ready framed. And the unfortunate fact about our jury-trial system of Evidence is that there exists no other system to offer in competition for its place, — nor even the vestige of a system. No one has even proposed to condense the existing system to its essence, — to reduce it to its lowest terms of wisdom and prudence, — to define its minimum fundamentals. No such proposal is anywhere on record. And yet without it, the administrative official in general will be certain to run amuck, here and there.[2] The Federal Supreme Court has occasionally (ante, § 4*a*) pointed out what it considers to be the essentials of a fair trial of fact by administrative officials, — the opportunity to call witnesses, the opportunity to hear the evidence on the other side, and so on. But these casual designations do not cover even the fundamentals of a simple system of proof. Our administrative tribunals, in short, if we exempt them from the incubus of the jury-trial system of Evidence, can be pointed to nothing definite and knowable that will take its place. What has saved the situation, in administrative hearings, from a welter of inefficiency has been chiefly two circumstances, first, that the officials themselves have usually been lawyers whose professional experience has equipped them with the fundamentals of careful inquiry of fact; and, secondly, that the subjects of inquiry have been so limited in scope for each tribunal that a special and competent experience in that field has been soon built up.

On the whole, then, the popular view, viz. that the jury-trial system of Evidence can be generally dispensed with in administrative tribunals must be deemed to be unverified and premature.

3. On the other hand, the fallacies of the second, or technical view are plain. The jury-trial system of rules of Evidence is not the only safe system of investigation in matters of liberty and property; for other nations have had a long experience of successful justice without it. Nor is it correct to assume that the general wisdom of experience which is represented in the system at large is represented in all the detailed rules rigidly enforced; quite the contrary. What is commonly forgotten is that most of the rules — nineteen-twentieths, let us say — are merely rules of caution, i.e. they are based upon a possibility of error; so that the failure to observe the rule is perfectly consistent with a high probability of truth. The rule, for example, requiring the original of a document to be produced is merely a rule against possibilities; for thousands of banks and business houses daily deal with millions of wealth on the faith of copies, not originals; to assert that truth was certainly missed because a copy was used is an absurdity. So, too, with the hearsay rule; it aims to guard against possibilities, and is sound enough, as a rule; but all history of the past, and all public news of the present, is learned by hearsay; for less than a million of our population really knew, by personal observation, that our soldiers fought in a war with Germany; and the entire financial and economic operations of the country are built on a complex structure of hearsay which is as solid as a steel-and-concrete building.

[3] That the likelihood of this danger to executive authority is not merely imaginative or fastidious may be seen from Ex parte Ung King Seng, D. C. N. D. Cal. (1914), 213 Fed. 119; here the inspector had refused to allow any cross-examination at all of the witnesses produced for the government; and to such a pitch of callous indifference had local deportation practice come that the government counsel on argument had the hardihood to suggest that "it would be a nuisance to permit cross-examination." Cross-examination a nuisance! This amply illustrates the ease with which the best traditions of our justice can sometimes degenerate when the control of our Courts is withdrawn.

And so, the question being whether each and all of the jury-trial rules, as a system, shall be imposed upon administrative tribunals to control their investigations, we should remember, that, however wise the rules be in themselves, they are merely rules of caution, excluding possible sources of error, and that therefore a great mass of truth will still be reached without them.

A second thing to remember is that the jury-trial rules are intended for a constantly changing tribunal of fact composed of inexperienced jurymen dealing with hundreds of types of cases. When the tribunal is composed of experienced professional men, habitually inquiring day after day into the same limited class of facts (as happens with most administrative boards), an expert weighing of evidence can generally be counted upon. The cautions represented by the exclusionary jury-rules can and will be applied by such a tribunal in weighing the evidence, without actual exclusion of it. Sir Henry Maine's comment on this feature (ante, § 4 b) represents a general truth. And in a community where the major part of such offices are filled by men already trained in the law, it is certain that the general wisdom of the cautions embodied in the jury-rules of Evidence will be employed by them. It is even amusing to read the solemn sermons on unreliable evidence preached by the lawyers on the supreme courts to the lawyers on the commissions, — as if the latter did not sense the dangers quite as well, by virtue of the professional training which was their common possession.

A third thing to remember is that the jury-trial system of Evidence-rules cannot be imposed upon administrative tribunals without imposing the lawyers upon them also; and this would be the heaviest calamity. The complex mass of Evidence-rules cannot be applied except by technically trained lawyers; and, furthermore, many of these technical lawyers will belong to the over-technical type. No one can wish that the petty snarling contentiousness over technicalities of trial tactics, so typical of jury-trial, should be transferred to the administrative tribunals. And yet, how can the system be transferred without transferring the only persons who can use it? Sermonize as we may on the wisdom of the system in the abstract, it cannot be used in the abstract; and in the concrete it reeks of futile professional contentiousness. Yet one of the universally desired objects in vesting the powers of decision over new industrial and commercial problems in modern administrative boards was to avoid hampering them with the technical methods enforced by the judges in jury-trials; the language of the legislative enactments demonstrates this plainly. A survey of the practice in different States before such boards gives the impression that their failure or success in this respect may be fairly measured by the extent to which the professional assistance of lawyers has or has not continued to be necessary before them as formerly before the jury-courts. Certainly, then, to impose the Evidence-rules on administrative tribunals will inevitably mean the imposition also of the handicap of a professional body of lawyers to conduct the practice.

4. On either side of the argument from practical policy, then, fallacies appear. And yet, here as in every great question calling for action, a choice must be made; and that choice is likely to turn on the relative risk of danger, and the relative need of education, involved in the opposing fallacies.

For this particular question, the greater risk of danger, and the greater need of education, seems to be in the fallacy of the technical view, viz. the assumption that the jury-trial system of Evidence is the only safe system that can be tolerated, and therefore that it must be imposed equally on administrative tribunals. This assumption permeates the judicial opinions. It is attributable to the narrow experience of the trial lawyers who have become judges. The inveterate habit of mind cannot easily be altered when the judicial function comes to be exercised. It eulogizes reverently the mint, anise, and cummin of every detail of the system. It enshrines with sanctity each exception to an exception to an exception of a rule. It scans the findings to detect a slip in the practice, and when found it fervently dwells on the particular virtues of the violated rule. In short, it acts upon the assumption that no truth ever has been or ever can be discovered, in human controversy, except by the rigid employment of the jury-trial rules.

In this assumption that those rules are necessary safeguards of truth, the implication conveyed is that, without strict adherence to those rules, erroneous findings will abound — false claims will be sanctioned, or just liabilities will escape enforcement. But is this assumption correct? Is it certain that the jury-trial rules of Evidence do guarantee correct findings? Can any one maintain that those rules, as enforced to-day, do not constantly permit false claims of fact to stand, or do not constantly permit guilty culprits to escape? Far from it. It is tolerably obvious to practitioners that the jury-trial rules of Evidence do not have a necessary relation to correctness of verdicts, as to-day administered. Why should Courts of law assume that they do? Suppose, for example, that the lax use of Evidence rules before an industrial accident board would result occasionally in erroneous findings in favor of the claimant; is not this matched by the more than occasional sanction of false personal injury claims in jury-trials through the strict enforcement of those same rules of Evidence? Under the industrial accident laws, the physician-patient privilege is eliminated, but it applies (in most States) in jury trials of insurance-claims and personal-injury claims ; and if a balance were to be struck, by divine omniscience, between the false claims of the former sort that failed for lack of the privilege and the false claims of the latter sort that succeeded by reason of the privilege, the debit balance might easily show against the jury-trial rules. Can any jury-trial criminal court in the country assert that its verdicts, strictly reached through the rules of Evidence, touch the bull's eye of truth as often as the findings of juvenile courts? Can any commercial jury-court in the country maintain that its verdicts are more often correct than the findings of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

In short, the jury-trial rules of Evidence, as to-day enforced in courts of law, are in the position of parties throwing stones from glass houses, when they cast doubt upon the more informal evidence-methods of administrative boards. The former have no reason for setting themselves up over the latter, as a cynosure of efficiency. If this is the fact, Courts should not approach this question as though the cause of Truth were being jeopardized by the proposal to relax the rigid system of jury-trial rules before administrative boards.

5. It remains to notice a compromise attitude, adopted by some Courts in a spirit of supposed liberality, and promising to become more widely accepted, viz. the New York "residuum rule", i.e. the rule that the administrative tribunal, on the one hand, need not actually in its inquiries be limited by the jury-trial rules, but that, on the other hand, there must somewhere be found, in the mass of evidence accepted, sufficient evidence legally acceptable by jury-trial rules to sustain the finding. This rule was well expounded in the following opinion:

1915, WOODWARD, J., in Carroll v. Knickerbocker Ice Co., N. Y. Sup. App. Div., 155 Suppl. 1: "This section, obviously designed to promote informality and directness and eliminate technicality in procedure, cannot be construed to warrant the commission to make a finding and award without legal evidence to sustain it. The commission was, of course, entitled, in all its hearings relative to claims, to go to the very right of the matters at issue, and summarily search out the full facts concerning them. It would be a misfortune were the inquiry of such a board narrowly constrained by harassing formalities of procedure or insubstantial technicalities as to the admissibility of proffered proof. Both the letter and the spirit of this salutary statute excludes the idea of technicality in its administration or fettering constraints on the commission's purpose to glean all the facts and do substantial justice under the law. Accordingly the commission had the right and power, in its untrammeled discretion, to receive and admit proffered proof freely and liberally, with a view to developing all of the facts. . . . But after the commission has gathered all this data, all this information, unfettered by 'technical rules of evidence', then must come sifting and sorting; then must come assortment of wheat from chaff, demonstration from gossip, proof from 'hearsay'; and then the ascertainment of what facts have been fairly proved, under 'the maxims which the sagacity and experience of ages have established as the best means of discriminating truth from error.' (Bouvier's Law Dictionary.) No matter what proffered testimony has been taken, no matter how extraneous and immaterial many portions of the record ultimately appear, it is the residuum of legal evidence which must be decisive. There must be in the record some evidence of a sound, competent, and recognizedly probative character to sustain the findings and awards made, else the findings and award must in fairness be set aside by this court. Section 68 of the Act, then, cannot be given any force as emancipating the commission from all legal restraints as to the presence of duly proved facts as essential basis for findings. Section 68 enunciates no rule as to the probative force of testimony at all. It sanctions no departure from the traditional basis on which money or property may be awarded under legal mandate. Its scope and purpose is procedural merely; it frees the commission, in its hearings, from the haunting fear of reversible error through failure to hold the proof to technical legal requirements, both as to evidence received and evidence rejected. In other words, it does little, if any, more than to write into the procedure of this commission, and into the powers of the courts in review of awards, the wholesome standard embodied by Mr. Justice Stephen in his Indian Evidence Act of 1872 (section 167): 'The improper admission or rejection of evidence shall not be ground of itself for a new trial or reversal of any decision in any cases, if it shall appear to the court before which such objection is raised that, independently of the evidence objected to and admitted, there was sufficient evidence to justify the decision, or that, if the rejected evidence had been received, it ought not to have varied the decision.' . . . The absence of a residuum of legal proof is fatal."

Plausible as this rule seems, from the liberal point of view, yet it cannot be accepted. In the first place, it still virtually requires the tribunal to test its proceedings by the jury-trial rules, and thus holds out the temptation to practitioners to employ the whole arsenal of technical weapons and secure a record full of "errors"; thus involving the heavy handicap already pointed out (par. 3). This shortcoming has been emphasized in another judicial opinion in the same case:

1915, HOWARD, J., in Carroll v. Knickerbocker Ice Company, N. Y. Sup. App. Div., 135 N. Y. Suppl. 1 (holding sufficient a finding based on hearsay): "If we were to look at this case as we would look at an action in court, or if we were to adhere to the substantive law of evidence, it is entirely clear that the award should be instantly revoked. The proof offered was of such a character that no court would have hesitated a moment to reject it. All the rules of Evidence, the accumulation of centuries of experience and wisdom, were ignored by the commission. But was the commission not authorized to ignore them? Indeed, in order to keep step with the spirit of the law, was the commission not bound to ignore them? It is clearly evident that the great bulk of the testimony in this case was hearsay, and in some instances hearsay upon hearsay. . . . So that the question arises here whether the commission, under Section 68 of the Compensation Act, were authorized to receive the hearsay evidence and base their findings upon it. . . . As to proceedings before the commission, these two sections wholly abrogate the substantive law of Evidence — abrogate the common law, the rules of procedure formulated by the courts, and all the technicalities respected by the legal profession. The commission is authorized by this section, it seems, to make its investigation in any manner that it chooses, wholly unfettered by any law previously invented by man. This is the spirit of the statute. The commission is to be bound neither by custom nor by precedent. The trials before the commission are to be summary, speedy, and informal. The very instant that the old rules of Evidence are invoked, the informal character of the hearing disappears, and the rigid, formal rules of procedure and all the technicalities incident to the practice of the law will grow up around the commission, hampering and delaying it, working inconvenience and hardship upon the claimants, and defeating the intent of the law."

In the next place, the proposed rule rests logically on another of the fallacies already noted above, viz. that this "residuum of legal evidence", which is to be indispensable, will have some necessary relation to the truth of the finding. But the "legal" rules have no such necessary relation. In the mass, they do tend to secure a reliable body of evidence; but, taken individually, it is obviously fallacious to assume that one or more pieces of "legal" evidence are 'per se' a sufficient guarantee of truth. Suppose, for example, in a workman's compensation claim, the issue is whether the claimant is entitled as wife of the deceased, and the industrial board finds in the affirmative. In the mass of evidence, there is found a declaration of the old grandmother, residing with the family, but since deceased, that her daughter, the mother of the workman's children, is the workman's wife. This is strictly "legal" evidence, under the jury-trial rules, and would suffice to sustain the findings, under the above rule. And yet the old grandmother may have had a canny thought of the possibilities, may have spoken chiefly in her daughter's material interests, and may have deliberately falsified. And the above rule, both in theory and in practice, would treat this obviously possible falsification as saving the board's finding. On the other hand, in the same mass of evidence accepted by the board, there is an "illegal" document to which the Court will give no heed, viz. a marriage certificate from an obscure town in Italy or Carnatia, loaded with certificates and seals of a purporting priest, a notary, a mayor, and a governor, but lacking the seal of a purporting American consul; or perhaps it is a bundle of Dalmatian postmaster's receipts showing payment of wages forwarded regularly to the wife of the workman in the home village in the mountains. These documents are solemnly rejected as "illegal" or "not duly proved", and become as weightless chaff to the judicial mind. And yet, in ordinary experience, it is impossible to say that the one sort of evidence has any greater intrinsic probability of truth than the other. Both may be true; both may be false; it depends in each case. But it does not depend on the one being "legal" and the other being "illegal", tested by the jury-trial rules of Evidence. Yet the rule for a "residuum of legal evidence" rests on the assumption that the "legal" evidence is always credible and sufficient, while the "illegal" evidence is never credible nor sufficient.

This "residuum" rule, then, is decidedly not the wise and satisfactory rule for general adoption.

6. After all, why may we not courageously concede that administrative tribunals can best be left to find their facts without formal rules? The functional theory of administration has done great things for the world in all times. The formal theory of administration, in contrast, is today too much admired. We praise ourselves for having a "government of laws, not men"; but the truth is that we trust too much to laws, and the structural fetters that we impose discourage acceptance of office by the most competent men, — "men who possess opinions and a will; tall men, sun-crowned, who live above the fog, in public duty and in private thinking, — God, give us men!"

And if there is any part of administrative activity to which this independence of formal rules can most readily be conceded, it is the task of weighing evidence and deciding on facts. For there do not yet exist any known rules for controlling the correctness of that mental process. The jury trial rules merely determine what evidence may be considered; they tell us nothing as to the mental process of weighing it. The great ultimate process of reaching a conviction is not one for which we can offer the administrator any sure guide. Why not trust his expert intelligence and good faith? Let us remember that the greatest part of the community's industrial, commercial and financial activity already functions on a solid basis of fact determined without any formal rules of proof. Let us, here too, put our trust in men and minds, rather than in rules.

The wisdom of such an attitude, as harmonizing with the needs of the times, has been well expounded by a modern American thinker who never fails to voice accurately the best standards of his profession:

1922, Mr. George W. Alger, "The Letter Law and the Golden Rule" (Atlantic Monthly, Sept., p. 296): "Primitive law, the jurists tell us, was in all countries technical and formal. It dealt in ceremonies and procedures. Form came first, while justice lagged and came last. Perhaps it was the failure of law in old times to make approximation to justice, that leaves to us two great figures of personal justice: Harun-al-Rashid, and Saint Louis. Down the ages they have come to us, each called by the same undying name, 'The Just.' In themselves they unite the power of the law, and the will to do justice, not according to procedure long since gone and forgotten, but according to the Golden Rule. Under the big tree at Vincennes, history pictures to us Saint Louis dispensing the high justice, the middle justice, and the low, to those who flocked to him appealing for the righting of their wrongs. It pictures Harun as the protector of the poor, going about among his people, punishing the wrongdoer and giving justice to the oppressed.

"The Puritan, and later the Anglo-Saxon, ideal of justice resolutely supplanted the type which these historic figures embody. Ours was to be, as the ancient Charter of Massachusetts solemnly stated, a government 'of laws and not of men.' Laws should be made so that the people could read and understand them; so that standards should be set, which judges should follow and enforce. Personal justice, justice dependent alone or mainly upon the personal concept of right in the heart of the judge — a concept varying with the moral calibre of judges — was to be discarded. The law was to be, in the main, a book, — enforced, to be sure, by a person, but in accordance with the book. The whole history of Law is the struggle for a working compromise between two ideals: judicial discretion and the Saint-Louis ideal, on one hand, and the letter law, superior to and binding upon the judge, and he its sworn servant, on the other. . . .

"However much the letter law extends its precedents, however much the statute law may seek to make the standards of law concrete and definite, there is an instinct in the soul of man which bids him look, not to the unending scrolls of the law, but to a Saint Louis and a Harun; to some good man whom he knows and respects, and has confidence in, more for his character than for his learning, however great. As society became complicated, this personal ideal grew so remote as to seem altogether lost in the mazes of the letter law. It never wholly disappeared.... The question is this: How long will it be before the pendulum will swing to the other extreme — the return of the Cadi, the search for Saint Louis, the demand for personal justice administered by the good man as a substitute for our endless barren wilderness of precedents in law and a maze of indigestible statutes? . . .

"The final hope for democracy must be, not in its letter law, but in its leadership. The day must come when the people's trust must be less in law and more in men. In the last analysis, the main test that will determine the survival of democracy will be its capacity for the wise selection of men — men sufficient in character and wisdom to be trusted with the powers of the State."

§ 4c. Same: (III). State of the Law in the Various Jurisdictions; Applicability of rules in Federal Land Office, Patent Office, Commerce Commission, etc., and in State Industrial Commissions, Utilities Commissions, etc. On the foregoing grounds, therefore, both of history and of policy, it may be concluded that at common law the body of jury-trial rules of Evidence does not, as such, control the inquiries made by administrative officials, i.e. executive officials classified outside of the Judiciary department and functioning without a jury. Furthermore, a declaration, in the statute creating such officials, that their jurisdiction includes the power to make the rules of their own procedure is an implied sanction of their independence of the jury-trial rules, and removes any possible common-law doubt. And finally, a legislative declaration that such officials need not be bound by the "common law rules of Evidence", or by the "technical rules of Evidence", is an express exemption from the enforcement of that body of rules upon such officials by the Courts.

These general principles, however, have not been logically and completely carried out. In point of practice, as enforced by the Courts, the law varies with the State and with the kind of administrative tribunal; and this is natural enough, in view of the wide variances, in origin and traditions, of the several bodies.

A. Federal Officials. If one were to reflect on the extent of the transactions presented for adjudication to the Land Office, the Patent Office, the Commerce Commission, the Trade Commission, the Treasury Appraisers, the Pension Bureau, and other Federal officials, it would be apparent, even on a rough estimate, that the bulk of the quasi-judicial business done by these administrative bodies forms a respectable rival to that of the entire Federal judiciary system, — whether tested by numbers of transactions, by value of property involved, or by influence on daily welfare of the community. Virtually all of these adjudications are reached without the enforcement of the jury-trial rules of Evidence. No doubt the parties are commonly represented by professional lawyers, at least in contested cases deemed important; and no doubt there is a general and instinctive use, in such cases, of the common rules of the jury-trial system. But, in point of law, the rigid and perfunctory enforcement of the body of rules, as observable in jury-trials, is on the whole, substantially absent.

1. Patent Office. In the Patent Office (Department of the Interior), the jury-trial rules are nominally in force, by departmental regulation, — abstractly so declaring, but permitting undefined flexibility.[1] But the Federal § 4c. [1] 1916. Rules of Practice in the U. S. Patent Office (Rule 159: "Evidence touching the matter at issue will not be considered on the hearing which shall not have been taken and filed in compliance with these rules. But notice will not be taken of merely formal or technical objections which shall not appear to have wrought a substantial injury to the party raising them. . . . This rule is not to be so construed as to modify established rules of evidence, which will be applied strictly in all practice before the office."

Courts do not appear to regard the rules as compulsory;[2] and in practice they are rarely invoked.[3]

2. Land Office. In the Land Office (Department of the Interior), the jury-trial rules are not nominally in force by regulation.[4] Nor do the Courts apparently regard the jury-trial rules as binding on the Land Office;[5] and only occasionally do the Office decisions find it worth while to invoke them.[6]

3. Board of General Appraisers. The Board of General Appraisers (which is in effect a nisi prius Court of Customs Claims), and other officials of the Treasury Department, possess in various fields a finality of decision on matters of fact. The Courts seem not to have imposed the jury-trial rules of Evidence on these officials;[7] nor does their practice exact it.[8]

[2] 1859, Spear v. Abbott, C. C. D. C., Fed. Cas. 13, 222 (appellant maintained that the commissioner of patents had erroneously received in rebuttal certain depositions due to be offered in chief; Dunlop, C. J.: "Appellant invokes the protection of the rules of practice in the courts of England and this country in the trial of common-law causes before a jury; . . . but the rule has no application in equity or admiralty, or in any other than a common-law tribunal in jury causes").

[3] The following was the only gleaning from a few volumes of Patent Office Decisions, taken up casually: 1913, Goldschmidt v. Von Schutz, 192 Off. Gaz. 743, Decisions Com. Patents, 1913, p. 159 (rule admitting only rebuttal testimony in rebuttal).

A few others will be found at the appropriate places in the ensuing text and notes; see, for example, § 2065*a*, post (corroboration of claimant of prior invention).

[4] Rules of Practice in Cases before the U. S. District Land Offices, the General Land Office, and the Department of the Interior, with Amendments to July 13, 1921, Washington, 1921 (a few fundamental rules are prescribed, including the right of cross-examination, etc.).

[5] 1894, Parsons v. Venzke, 4 N. D. 452, 61 N. W. 1036 (land-office cancellation of entryman's certificate; held, "there is nothing in the point that there was no evidence before the commissioner that the entry was fraudulent, or at least no competent evidence; the Courts cannot review the decisions of the land department on the ground that the evidence was insufficient, or that only incompetent evidence was before it; the power to try questions of fact necessarily embraces the power to pass upon the weight and competency of evidence)."

[6] The following are gleaned from a few volumes taken casually: 1895, Peacock v. Shearer's Heirs, 20 Dec. Public Lands p. 213 (survivor's testimony to deceased opponent's admissions); 1900, Burton v. Howe, 29 Dec. Public Lands p. 581 (depositions taken by one party may be used by the other); 1914, Sarah Merkle's Case, 19 Dec. Pension and Bounty-Lands p. 181 (presumption of death after 7 years).

[7] 1885, Hadden v. Merritt, 115 U. S. 25 (import value of Mexican dollar as determined by the Secretary of the Treasury under Rev. St. § 3564; the Treasury Department's act held to be "the performance of an executive function, requiring skill and the exercise of judgment and discretion, which precludes judicial inquiry into the correctness of the decision"); St. 1890, June 10, St. 1897, July 24, and St. 1909, Aug. 5, Customs Administrative Act, § 14, Code 1919, § 1163 (Court of Customs Appeals may "establish rules and regulations"); 1890, Auffmordt v. Hedden, 137 U. S. 310, 11 Sup. 376 (suit to recover excess import duties paid; appellant contended that it was error for the appraiser did not afford him opportunity to confront the opposing witnesses nor "to sift evidence secretly or openly heard in opposition to him", etc.; held, that "under the statute the question of the dutiable value of the merchandise is not to be tried before the appraisers as if it were an issue in a suit in a judicial tribunal; . . . no government could collect its revenues or perform its necessary functions, if the system contended for by the plaintiffs were to prevail"); 1892, Re Muser, C. C. S. D. N. Y., 49 Fed. 831 (appraisers' consideration of evidence "in two other cases with which these importers had no concern", held not to be error); 1893, Passavant v. U. S., 148 U. S. 214, 13 Sup. 1016 (U. S. St. 1890, June 10, 26 Stat. c. 407, created a board of general appraisers, to review rulings of Treasury officials in levying duties on imports, and providing for a review of the board's decision as to "the law and the facts", but also providing that as to dutiable value the board's decision should be "final and conclusive"; held that on an issue of dutiable value the statute was valid, due provision having been made for notice and hearing by the board); 1907, Knauth v. U. S., C. C. S. D. N. Y., 155 Fed. 144 (similar evidence from other cases used before the appraisers; held that "such testimony . . . should not have been admitted", but that it did not constitute error, though it would be given very slight weight).

[8] See a pamphlet "Judicial Review in Customs Taxation", by Geo. Stewart Brown,

4. Interstate Commerce Commission. The Interstate Commerce Commission presides over a vast practice handled almost entirely by professional lawyers; and no doubt the appropriate jury-trial rules for its special kinds of issues are commonly and instinctively observed in principle. But its decisions reveal little controversy that turns on those rules.[9] Nor do the Federal Courts deem that the Commission is bound in law to follow that body of rules as such; although occasionally, where an important controversy turns essentially on the observance of some fundamental rule of fair and thorough inquiry, there appears a disposition to scrutinize the Commission's observance of it.[10]

Esq., of the Board of General Appraisers (reprinted from The Forum, July, 1918).

[9] H. C. Lust, Digest of Decisions under the Interstate Commerce Act, 1913 ff.; Interstate Commerce Reports, vol. I, App. I (Rules of Practice; no reference is made to the jury-trial rules of Evidence).

"It is perhaps not too much to say that not a single case arising before the Commission could be properly decided if the complainant, the railroad, or the Commission were bound by the rules of Evidence applying to the introduction of testimony in courts" (22d Annual Report of the Commission, p. 10).

[10] U. S. St. 1887, Feb. 1, Code 1919, § 7038 (interstate commerce commission may prescribe common carrier's rates "after full hearing"); 1903, Interstate Commerce Com. v. Baird, 194 U. S. 25, 24 Sup. 563 (rates of transportation of coal: certain contracts of purchase were refused to be produced before the Commission because irrelevant; held, that "the Commission had a right to demand their production", and that "the inquiry of a board of the character of the Interstate Commerce Commission should not be too narrowly constrained by technical rules as to the admissibility of proof; its function is largely one of investigation, and it should not be hampered in making inquiry pertaining to interstate commerce by those narrow rules which prevail in trials at common law where a strict correspondence is required between allegation and proof"); 1912, Interstate C. Com. v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 227 U. S. 88, 93, 33 Sup. 185 (under St. 1906, c. 3591, amending St. 1887, c. 104, and authorizing the I. C. C. to set aside a rate if after a hearing "the Commission shall be of the opinion that the charge was unreasonable", held (1) that though the Commission's conclusions of fact will not be reviewed "by passing upon the credibility of witnesses, or conflicts in the testimony", yet the legal effect of the evidence is a question of law; a finding without evidence is beyond the power of the Commission; . . . it cannot "capriciously make findings by administrative fiat"; (2) it is "not limited by the strict rules as to the admissibility of evidence which prevail in suits between private parties"; (3) it must nevertheless "preserve the essential rules of evidence by which rights are asserted or defended"; (4) this includes the parties' right to be "fully apprised of the evidence submitted or to be considered", and an "opportunity to cross-examine witnesses, to inspect documents, and to offer evidence in rebuttal or explanation"; and (5) that the evidence considered must therefore appear in the record to have been duly presented, to the knowledge of the parties; (6) here the evidence was held sufficient by the above tests); 1920, Spiller v. Atchison T. & S. F. R. Co., 253 U. S. 117, 40 Sup. 466; 8th C. C. A. 246 Fed. 1 (action to recover damages consisting in loss of receipts from sale of cattle, due to an illegal excess rate charged by defendant carriers; the plaintiff was the secretary of a cattle-raisers' association, acting on behalf of some 2000 shippers, who had assigned to him their claims; the shipments covered a period of two years, and went over some ten railroads; to obtain the data for proving the plaintiff's case, he caused the assistant secretary of the association to visit the various cattle-shippers and commission agents, inspect their books, and compile a schedule showing, in each instance of the illegal rates the consignor, origin, destination, car, weight, and rate paid; this compilation being shown to defendants for verification from their own books, they admitted the correctness of large numbers of the items as to cattle transported and money received by them at the illegal rate, but refused to admit the fact that any particular person had paid any of these amounts as owner or agent, or that the claims represented by the plaintiff had been duly assigned to him; the former set of facts was evidenced before the Commerce Commission solely by the assistant secretary W., who testified that he obtained his data from the original books of the original shippers and commission merchants, and was ready to procure and produce the books if necessary, though they would "almost fill a farm-wagon"; the Commission on this evidence found for the plaintiff on all items as to which the defendants admitted the movement of the freight and the receipt of the moneys; this finding was affirmed in the District Court; the Eighth

5. Immigration Bureau. The Immigration Bureau (Department of Labor) has been a storm-center for the question of finality of decision by administrative officials (ante, § 4 a). What sets it apart as anomalous in this aspect is that it deals mainly with aliens, whose rights to invoke judicial remedies may stand on a different footing from those of citizens; so that a judicial license to be more independent than other administrative officials might be expected. However, its exercise of jurisdiction also affects citizens — by birth and constitutional right — who seek entrance to the country, and thus its subjection to judicial review is in this aspect no different from other officials. Strictly distinguishing the questions of finality of ruling and of due process (ante, § 4 a), and looking only at the question of enforcement of jury-trial rules of Evidence, we may deduce from the Federal Court's utterances that those rules, as a body, are not expected to be binding on the Immigration Bureau.[11]

Circuit Court of Appeals held that the Commission's finding was not based on sufficient evidence; its opinion termed the assistant secretary's testimony "the worst kind of hearsay"; but that opinion itself showed "the worst kind" of stubborn insistence on rules of evidence in a case where their enforcement would have been almost a denial of justice because of the expense, and where substantial accuracy of the testimony affected by the rules was not disputed nor open to doubt; the Supreme Court reversed the Appellate judgment, and affirmed the District Court judgment; the opinion handsomely recognizes the Interstate Commerce Commission's moral and political right to be considered as responsible expert officials who understand the technical subject within their jurisdiction as well as or better than circuit judges, and whose estimate of the sufficiency of evidence in that technical field is entitled to a large presumption in its favor, a presumption not to be overthrown automatically whenever evidence is received that does not satisfy the artificial rules obtaining in jury trials).

[11] 1902, Lee Lung v. Patterson, 186 U. S. 168, 22 Sup. 795 (exclusion of a Chinese merchant; held (1) that the decision of the U. S. officer's ruling was conclusive, (2) that the officer's disregard of the official consular certificate, made 'prima facie' evidence by U. S. St. 1884, July 5, § 6, did not make his ruling invalid: "We cannot assent to the proposition that an officer or tribunal, invested with jurisdiction of a matter, loses that jurisdiction by not giving sufficient weight to evidence, or by rejecting proper evidence, or by admitting that which is improper"); 1906, Ex parte Watchorn, C. C. S. D. N. Y., 160 Fed. 1014 ("Doubtless the determination of the immigration authorities upon all questions of fact, even if made upon legally incompetent or inconclusive evidence, is final"; here, an alien was sought to be deported as a convict); 1912, Frick v. Lewis, 6th C. C. A., 195 Fed. 693 (deportation of alien convicted of crime: "it is not open to courts to consider either admissibility or weight of proof, according to the ordinary rules of evidence"); 1914, U. S. ex rel. Gegiow v. Uhl, 20 C. C. A., 215 Fed. 573 (habeas corpus for immigrants deported as likely to become a public charge; the immigration officer had used some information obtained from newspapers as to conditions of non-employment at the place of destination; held, not improper; "we do not assert that all of this evidence would be admissible in a court of law or equity; it is not necessary that it should be, no immigration act could be enforced which required all these facts to be established with the same formality and certainty which is required in the courts"); 1915, Healy v. Backus, 9th C. C. A., 221 Fed. 358 (deportation of an alien as likely to become a public charge; held, that the use of "affidavits, interviews, letters, and newspaper clippings", etc., as evidence, did not make the finding invalid); 1908, Lin Hip Fong v. U. S., 209 U. S. 453, 28 Sup. 576 (deportation of an alien claiming a treaty right to reside here by virtue of a certificate issued under § 3 of the Treaty of 1894 with China; the executive officer held that the certificate-right had been forfeited by failure to observe its provisions, and by fraud in obtaining it; held that there must be "some competent evidence to overcome the legal effect of the certificate", and that the absence of any recital of that evidence in the record was fatal to the ruling, although the executive officer did in fact give a hearing and evidence was presented on both sides); 1910, Re Jem Yuen, D. C. Mass., 788 Fed. 350 (deportation of a Chinese claiming to be the son of a merchant; held, that the error if any in considering "a record of proceedings of similar character" in 1908 was immaterial; whether such a record was admissible or not according to the rules of evidence observed elsewhere, is immaterial; . . . officers . . . to whom the determination of questions of

6. Sundry Officials. The Trade Commission, the Pension Bureau, and other Federal officials, adjudicate great numbers of disputed claims of various sorts; but it does not appear that the jury-trial rules of Evidence, as such, are deemed binding.[12]

The Great War produced a vast volume of disputes calling for administrative adjudication, both during and since the period of hostilities.[13] The

this kind is entrusted under statutes like those governing these proceedings are not bound by the rules of criminal procedure, nor by rules of evidence applied in courts"); 1916, Ex parte Owe Sam Goon, D. C. N. D. Cal., 230 Fed. 654 (confrontation with the principal witness required, where the Chinese alien had been resident here for 40 years); 1916, Backus v. Owe Sam Goon, 9th C. C. A., 235 Fed. 847, 853 (on the best evidence principle, the testimony to a Chinese person having entered from Mexico was held not sufficient, since better evidence was obviously available, the Court not weighing the evidence, but using the principle to reach the conclusion that "the order of deportation was arbitrary and unfair", and subject to judicial review); 1917, Chin Ah Yoke v. White, 9th C. C. A., 244 Fed. 940 (opportunity of cross-examination, held to be satisfied); 1920, U. S. v. Uhl, 20 C. C. A., 266 Fed. 34 (deportation proceedings by the commissioner of immigration under St. Oct. 16, 1918, 40 Stats. pt. 1, p. 1012; right of cross-examination not essential); 1921, White v. Chan Wy Sheung, 9th C. C. A., 270 Fed. 764 (claim to be son of U. S. citizen of Chinese race; certain statements of claimant's grandfather having been received against him, held, that "it is not open to the Courts to consider either the admissibility or the weight of proof according to the ordinary rules of evidence, and the fact that the rules of evidence as applied in courts of law are violated does not show that the hearing was unfair"); 1922, Kaneda v. U. S. 9th C. C. A., 278 Fed. 694 (exclusion as a person of moral turpitude; the board of special inquiry had considered a false sworn statement of the applicant as to having no relatives in U. S.; held, the scope of inquiry was "a matter within their sound administrative discretion; it is not for the Courts to prescribe rules of evidence for such an investigation").

P. I. 1918, Bayani v. Collector, 37 P. I. 468 (collector of customs; immigrant is entitled to a hearing, but "the procedure is not technically judicial, nor are the proceedings defined by any particular rules or statutes").

[12] In the Decisions of the Department of the Interior in Appealed Pension and Bounty Land Claims (usually cited P. D.), the rulings are made by the Assistant Attorney-General for the Interior Department, and on a few subjects — e.g. marriage — there is a close adherence to the jury-trial rules; but no general or automatic application of the body of rules is apparent.

[13] Report of the Secretary of the National War Labor Board for the 12 months ending May 31, 1919, App. II; Abstract of Awards, by Robert P. Reeder (Washington, 1920), and later reports.

The Rules of Procedure of this Board (drawn up by a professor of law, and approved by ex-President Taft, one of the joint chairmen of the Board) may be taken as samples of what an administrative board, manned by professional lawyers of liberal spirit, regards as a necessary and sufficient skeleton to control an inquiry which should be both prompt and thorough; the following passages are those dealing with Evidence (Washington, Government Printing Office, 1919, p. 14):

"Hearings. At all hearings before the full Board, before a Section of the Board, or before examiners appointed to hear the case, evidence may be introduced by oral testimony of witnesses or by depositions. Should the Board, Section, or examiners deem cross-examination necessary in case of deposition, the deponent should be summoned for the purpose and the deposition not considered as evidence until such cross-examination has been had. All testimony of witnesses shall be taken under oath or affirmation. Examiners, Sections of the Board, and the full Board shall have power to administer such oaths or affirmation.

"Hearings by Examiners. The hearing by the examiner shall be conducted in accordance with the proper course of judicial proceedings. The evidence for the complainant shall be presented, then the evidence for the respondent, and then the evidence, if any, in rebuttal. The examiner shall follow as near as may be the rules of evidence prevailing in common-law courts, with such departures therefrom as in his discretion may seem to be necessary in the cause of speedy justice. The examiner shall require witnesses to confine their testimony to statements of facts within their personal knowledge. The examiner may exercise the authority to exclude evidence palpably incompetent or irrelevant to the issue. But the party aggrieved by such ruling may save his exceptions to such exclusion of evidence or other ruling by the examiner by a writing filed with the examiner. Should the examiner deem the evidence of any person necessary who is not called by either party, he may awards of the National War Labor Board represented an effective adjudication of controversies having convulsive possibilities, but were conducted upon simple and direct methods without insistence upon jury-trial rules. The Board of Contract Adjustment was vested with powers to adjudicate upon post-war claims mounting into billions of dollars, and its volumes of opinions expounding the findings of fact and law are models of clarity and directness,—refreshing in their contrast to the futile display of technique upon Evidence rules so often seen in the opinions of Supreme Courts upon every-day cases of mercantile disputes over broken contracts.

In sum, therefore, the jury-trial rules of Evidence do not play a compulsory part, either in theory or in practice, in that extensive area of justice committed to Federal administrative officials.

B. State Officials. In the complex activities of State government, multiplied tenfold as they have been in the last generation, a survey reveals that the area of adjudication of controversies committed to administrative officials is much more extensive than we are apt to assume. These varied fields (enumerating only those in which the claims of an individual citizen may be disputed and may require adjudication) include County Government in general, Schools, Taxes, Civil Service, Eminent Domain, Drainage, Irrigation, Fences, Public Health, Highways, Professional Licenses, Public Lands, Railroads, Industrial Accidents, Public Utilities, Insurance, Banks, Fish and Game, — in short, they affect a large share of the vital processes of agriculture, commerce, and industry, having constant relation to personal security and welfare.

In most of these fields, the original tradition found them solely in administrative hands. The Courts had never had to do with them. Thus, the finality of the administrative action was almost universally recognized ; and the doctrines of certiorari, in refusing to interfere by judicial review, were carried to an almost unbelievable extent, — yet not, apparently with any untoward consequences, in spite of the common repute as to inefficiency in our local government. Thus, also, the instances in which any jury-trial rule of Evidence has even been invoked, for controlling such officials, are extremely rare.

But more recent times have seen the transfer, by legislative fiat, of two large fields of adjudication from the ordinary judicial tribunals to new administrative tribunals, viz. the service and rates of common carriers and public utilities in general, and the liabilities of employers for industrial accidents.

summon such person, examine him, and permit cross-examination.

"Continuances. The hearing, due notice of which has been given both sides, shall proceed until the case is closed. Should either party desire a continuance on the ground of inability to produce witnesses, and make a showing of due diligence, it shall be within the discretion of the examiner to grant such time as may be reasonably necessary to procure the evidence. It is of the utmost importance, however, that cases brought before the National War Labor Board should be promptly decided, and therefore this discretion to continue cases or hearings should be sparingly exercised."

The Decisions of the War Department Board of Contract Adjustment (vol. I, 1919, and later) were formulated by officials most of whose names are recognizable as those of civilian lawyers.

These two fields had of yore been left to normal judiciary disposition; and their extensive transfer (beginning in 1880 with the Federal Interstate Commerce Act, and about 1910 with the numerous State measures upon Employers' Liability) seems to have stung the Judiciary from its lethargic complacency about the certiorari writ, and to have awakened it to a sense of its duty to protect the properties and liberties of citizens in the fields which had thus been withdrawn from its jurisdiction. Hence, a stirring zeal to supervise the adjudications of these new administrative bodies, and a highly sensitive regard for the soundness of their probative processes. Hence, also, presumably, the anomaly that the judicial decisions upon jury-trial rules of Evidence before those two kinds of officials, rendered in the past decade or so, are more numerous than all the judicial rulings of a similar sort for the entire army of other kinds of officials in the previous hundred years, — although the fundamental principle involved seems to be precisely the same.

Meantime, however, the problem was complicated (for the judiciary) by expressions of legislative intention which plainly indicated that one of the deliberate legislative objects in view in this transfer of jurisdiction was the elimination of the jury-trial system of rules from the procedure of these new administrative bodies. The delays and shortcomings in the original practice of rate regulation and employers' liability involved, of course, many and complex considerations; but the obstruction caused by jury-trial rules of Evidence was (chiefly in the second field) one which plainly played an important part, in popular esteem; hence this proviso. At least a dozen Legislatures adopted it for industrial accident boards, and almost as many adopted it for public utilities commissions. The remainder (except a few, expressly retaining for public utilities commissions the usual rules of Evidence in courts) contented themselves with giving to the boards the power to make their own rules of procedure for investigations. Thus, the applicability of the body of jury-trial rules will vary, in the several States (as noted above, at the outset) according to the judicial interpretation of the common-law principle and the statutory proviso if any, and according to the kind of administrative official involved.

1. Public Utilities Commissions. Here the Legislature[14] has generally

[14] The statutes are as follows: CANADA: Alberta: St. 1915, c. 6, § 46 (public utility board may adopt its own rules for hearings, etc., "and in the conduct thereof the board shall not be bound by the technical rules of legal evidence");
British Columbia: St. 1919, c. 71, § 61 (public utilities commission "shall make its decision upon the real merits and justice of the case, and shall not be bound to follow strict legal precedent").

UNITED STATES: Alabama: Code 1907, § 5643 (State railroad commission may "regulate the mode and manner of all investigations");
Arkansas: Dig. 1919, § 1683 (State corporation commission "shall prescribe the rules of procedure and for taking of evidence"; in its hearings etc., "the Commission may not be bound by the strict technical rules of pleadings and evidence; but in that behalf it may exercise such discretion as will facilitate their efforts to understand and learn all the facts bearing upon the right and justice of the matters before them"); Colorado: Comp. St. 1921, § 2988 (State railroad commission may make rules "for its government and proceedings"); § 2947 (State public utilities commission; its hearings shall be governed "by rules of practice and proce-given to the commission the power to make its own rules; it has often declared expressly that the common-law body of rules does not bind the commission's inquiries; but it has sometimes declared exactly the contrary. (Let it be said, at this point, that nothing need turn upon the form of words used in such a declaration. The statutory phrase is sometimes that "the common law and statutory rules of Evidence" shall not apply, and sometimes that "the technical rules of Evidence" shall not apply. But the purpose is identical in all forms of the phrase. It is indefinite, to be sure; for obviously the dure to be adopted by the commission, and in the conduct thereof neither the commission nor any commissioner shall be bound by the technical rules of evidence. No informality in any proceeding or in the manner of taking testimony shall invalidate any order", etc.);

Florida: Rev. G. S. 1919, § 4416 (State railroad commission; in its jurisdiction over telegraphs and telephones, "in all matters of practice and procedure and all matters of evidence and the rules of evidence and all matters involving the effect of evidence", the law of regulation of railroads shall control); § 4618 (State railroad commission may "prescribe all rules and regulations"); § 4652 ("In all cases under the provisions of this chapter the rules of evidence shall be the same as in civil cases", except as otherwise provided);
Georgia: Rev. C. 1910, § 2641 (State railroad commission; "in all cases under the provisions of this article the rules of evidence shall be the same as in civil cases", except as provided);
Hawaii: Rev. L. 1915, § 2232 (public utilities commission may make rules, "and shall not be bound by the strict rules of the common law relating to the admission or rejection of evidence, but may exercise its own discretion in such matters with a view to doing substantial justice");
Idaho: Comp. St. 1919, § 2478 (State public utilities commission in investigations may adopt "rules of practice and procedure", and "in the conduct thereof" they shall not be "bound by the technical rules of evidence");
Kansas: Gen. St. 1915, § 8336 (State public utilities commission may "adopt reasonable and proper rules and regulations" and may "regulate the mode and manner of all investigations . . . not specifically provided for herein"); § 8392 (similar, for State railroad board);
Maine: Rev. St. 1916, c. 55, § 59 (State public utilities commission; "the practice and rules of evidence shall be the same as in civil actions", except as provided);
Maryland: St. 1910, c. 180, § 10, Ann. Code 1914, Art. 23, § 422 (State public service commission; hearings "shall be governed by rules" made by the commission; the commission "shall not be bound by the technical rules of evidence");
Michigan: Comp. L. 1915, § 8135 (State railroad commission; "the practice and the rules of evidence" shall be as in equity);
Minnesota: Gen. St. 1913, § 4177 (State railroad and warehouse commission may make rules for proceedings, "which shall conform as nearly as may be to those in use in courts, and shall conduct its proceedings in such manner as will best conduce to the proper dispatch of business and to the ends of justice"); § 4182 (the commission "shall hear evidence and otherwise investigate the matter");
Missouri: Rev. St. 1919, §§ 10433, 10520 (State public service commission may prescribe its own rules and "shall not be bound by the technical rules of evidence"; "no informality . . . in the manner of taking testimony" shall invalidate its orders);
Montana: Rev. C. 1921, §§ 3882, 3894, 3934 (State public service commission "shall have power to prescribe rules of procedure");
Nebraska: Rev. St. 1922, § 5519 (State railway commission; "in all suits arising under this chapter the rules of evidence shall be the same as in ordinary civil actions, except as otherwise provided herein"; query, whether this applies to the commission's inquiries?);
New York: Cons. L. 1909, Public Service Commissions § 20, as amended by St. 1910, c. 480, § 20 and St. 1919, c. 263 (State public service commission; hearings shall be governed by rules adopted by commission, and "in all investigations, inquiries, or hearings the commission or a commissioner, deputy commissioner or duly authorized examiner of a commission shall not be bound by the technical rules of evidence");
North Carolina: Con. St. 1919, § 1023 (State corporation commission "shall be a court of record"); § 1093 (its "rules of evidence shall be the same as in civil actions", except as otherwise provided);
North Dakota: Comp. L. 1913, § 4713 (railroad rates; hearing before railroad commissioners); § 4730 (same; violation of schedule; "the commissioners shall receive whatever evidence, statements, or arguments either party may offer pertinent to the matter; . . . the commissioners shall add . . . whatever information they may then have or can secure from any source whatsoever"); St. 1919, Feb. 25, c. 151, § 5 (State industrial commission may "make rules and regulations for its own procedure");

Legislature neither specified nor had in mind any particular rules; and to that extent the fiat was futile, in that it left the phrase to the interpretation of the very Courts whose practice it was virtually reproaching. But the general spirit is plain enough, and is identical in all instances.)

The interpretation of these statutes by the Courts has led to comparatively few utterances.[15] Apparently, the practice under them is fairly satisfactory,

Pennsylvania: St. 1913, July 26, Art. VI, § 1, Dig. 1920, § 18162, Public Service Companies (public service commission's hearings shall be governed by such rules as it adopts and prescribes);
South Dakota: Rev. C. 1919, § 9497 (State railroad commissioners' proceedings "shall conform as nearly as may be to those in use in the courts of this State"); § 9518 (State railroad commissioners, on complaint against common carrier, shall investigate "in such manner and by such means as the board shall deem proper");
Tennessee: Shannon's Code 1916, §§ 3059*a*23, 3079*a*18 (State railroad commission may "regulate the mode and manner of all investigations and hearings", and make "such rules and regulations and modes of procedure as it may deem proper for the hearing and determination of all complaints");
Texas: Rev. Civ. St. 1911, § 6655 (State railroad commission has power to adopt rules for "the mode and manner of all investigations and hearings");
Utah: Comp. L. 1917, § 4820 (State public utilities commission shall make its own rules of practice and procedure, and "the technical rules of evidence need not be applied"; "no informality . . . in the manner of taking testimony shall invalidate any decision");
Virginia: Const. 1902, § 155 (State corporation commission "shall prescribe its own rules of order and procedure", except as specified in the Constitution); § 156 (it shall give notice of hearings, with "reasonable opportunity to introduce evidence"); Code 1919, § 3711 (State corporation commission before making an order must give notice and "a reasonable opportunity to introduce evidence"); § 3723 (the said commission, on hearing of all complaints "in which it shall be called upon to decide or render judgment in its capacity as a court of record, shall observe and administer the common and statute law rules of evidence, as observed and administered by the Courts of this Commonweath"; query, whether the Legislature has power thus to control the Commission, in view of the constitutional clause supra?);
West Virginia: Code 1914, § 637, St. 1913, c. 9, § 2, as re-enacted by St. 1915, c. 8, § 2 ("2. The [State public service] commission shall prescribe the rules of procedure and for taking evidence in all matters that may come before it, and enter such final orders as may be just and lawful. . . . In the investigations, preparations and hearings of cases, the commission may not be bound by the strict technical rules of pleading and evidence, but in that behalf it may exercise such discretion as will facilitate their efforts to understand and learn all the facts bearing upon the right and justice of the matters before them");
Wyoming: Comp. St. 1920, § 5502 (public utilities commission; all hearings, etc. "shall be conducted under such rules as the commission may prescribe and adopt").

Distinguish statutes prescribing rules for proceedings in courts on appeal from the orders or rulings of boards:
Indiana: Burns' Ann. St. 1914, § 5536, St. 1913, p. 820 (in proceedings by or against the State railroad commission, in courts, "the rules of evidence shall be the same as in the trial of civil cases", except as otherwise provided);
Ohio: Gen. Code Ann. 1921, § 552 (similar).

[15] Colorado: 1918, Denver & S. L. R. Co. v. Chicago B. & O. R. Co., 64 Colo. 229, 171 Pac. 74 (railroad rates; following I. C. C. v. L. & N. R. Co., U. S., supra, as to the commission being "not limited by the strict rules" of Evidence but being bound to "preserve the essential rules" of Evidence);
Idaho: 1914, Federal Mining & Sm. Co. v. Public Util. Com., 26 Ida. 391, 143 Pac. 1173 (reasonableness of rates for power furnished; discovery of opponent's books, refused on the facts, the scope of inquiry not being sufficiently specified);
Illinois: 1915, Farmers' Elevator Co. v. Chicago R. I. & P. R. Co., 266 Ill. 567, 107 N. E. 843 (order of State Public Utilities Commission compelling track connections, under St. 1913, p. 460, objected to because made without adequate hearing; held (1) that since the hearing must be public, and upon notice and opportunity to present evidence, "while the technical rules of evidence are not required to be followed", the statutory procedure was adequate, citing the Federal rule of I. C. C. v. Baird; but (2) that in the present case the lack of opportunity to cross-examine witnesses, and to present rebuttal evidence, and the resort to a report of an anonymous investigator of the commission visiting the premises, rendered the hearing inadequate and the decision void); 1915, Chicago M. & St. P. R. Co. v. State Public U. Com., 268 Ill. 49, 57, 108 N. E. 732 (railroad rate-order sustained; "the order had a substantial basis in the evidence"); judged by those results. What that practice is, of course, varies widely with the different commissions.
Pennsylvania: 1920, Schuylkill R. Co. v. Pub.

2. Industrial Accident Boards. Here the Legislature [16] has generally

Service Com., 268 Pa. 430, 112 Atl. 5 (counsel offered a copy, verified by himself, of a contract, the original being in his client's files; held, that "the commissioners not being considered as judges learned in the law, the Legislature necessarily did not contemplate that the strict rules of evidence should be applied to their hearings");
Wisconsin: 1914, Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Railroad Commission, 156 Wis. 47, 54, 63, 66, 145 N. W. 216 (unreasonable rates; the Commission had used as evidence certain data contained in annual reports of other railroads on file with the commission; held, not improper; "the Commission is not required to proceed, in this as in other respects, with the strict formalities which obtain in courts of common law and equity jurisdiction"; whether the Commission could have used certain reports of its own examiners, without formal introduction in evidence, not decided).

[16] The statutes are as follows:

ENGLAND: St. 1919, c. 69, Industrial Courts Act, § 4 (the Minister of Labour "may make rules regulating the procedure of any court of inquiry, including rules as to the summoning of witnesses", discovery of documents, etc.).

UNITED STATES: Arizona: St. 1921, c. 103, § 9 (State industrial commission "may adopt its own rules of procedure"); § 92 (rules of evidence not to bind; like Ohio Code § 1465);
California: Here the successive amendments came as efforts to overcome the narrow judicial interpretation; St. 1913, May 26, p. 279 (Workmen's Compensation, Safety & Insurance Act; § 77, "All hearings and investigations before the commission or any member thereof, or any referee appointed thereby, shall be governed by this act and by the rules of practice and procedure adopted by the commission, and in the conduct thereof neither the commission nor any member thereof, nor any referee appointed thereby shall be bound by the technical rules of evidence. No informality in any proceeding or in the manner of taking testimony shall invalidate any order, decision, award, rule or regulation made, approved or confirmed by the commission"; St. 1915, June 3, p. 1102; in consequence of the ruling in Englebretson v. Ind. Acc. Com., infra, the foregoing § 77 was amended by adding: "nor shall any order, award, rule or regulation be invalidated because of the admission into the record, and use as proof of any fact in dispute, in the discretion of the commission, of any hearsay or testimony not competent to be admitted in a trial in court; provided, that such hearsay or testimony be or refer to the statements, written or oral, of a person who is dead or who cannot after diligent search be found, and relate directly to the injury in question"); St. 1917, May 23, p. 831 (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, & Safety Act, revising the 1913 statute, and re-enacting § 77, with strengthened phraseology, as § 60; "All hearings and investigations before the commission or any member thereof, or any referee appointed thereby, shall be governed by this act and by the rules of practice and procedure adopted by the commission, and in the conduct thereof neither the commission nor any member thereof, nor any referee appointed thereby, shall be bound by the common law or statutory rules of evidence and procedure, but may make inquiry in such manner, through oral testimony and written and printed records, as is best calculated to ascertain the substantial rights of the parties and carry out justly the spirit and provisions of this act. No informality in any proceeding or in the manner of taking testimony shall invalidate any order, decision, award, rule or regulation made, approved or confirmed by the commission; nor shall any order, award, rule or regulation be invalidated because of the admission into the record, and use as proof of any fact in dispute, of any evidence not admissible under the said common law or statutory rules of evidence and procedure"; the same statute also specified as follows: § 19*a*: "The commission may, with or without notice to either party, cause testimony to be taken, or inspection of the premises where the injury occurred to be made, or the time-books and pay-roll of the employer to be examined by any commissioner or referee appointed by the commission, and may from time to time direct any employee claiming compensation to be examined by a regular physician; the testimony so taken and the results of any such inspection or examination to be reported to the commission for its consideration"; § 19*b*: "The commission may receive as evidence, either at or subsequent to a hearing, and use as proof of any fact in dispute, the following matters, in addition to sworn testimony presented in open hearing: (1) Reports of attending or examining physicians; (2) Reports of special investigators appointed by the commission or a commissioner or referee to investigate and report upon any scientific or medical question; (3) Reports of employers, containing copies of time sheets, book accounts, reports and other records, properly authenticated; (4) Properly authenticated copies of hospital records of the case of the injured employee; (5) All publications of the commission; (6) All official publications of state and United States governments; (7) Excerpts from expert testimony received by the commission upon similar issues of scientific fact in other cases and the prior decisions of the commission upon such issues; provided, however, that transcripts of all testimony taken without notice and copies of all reports and other matters added to the record, otherwise than during the course of an open hearing, be served upon the parties to the proceeding, and opportunity be given to produce testimony in explanation or rebuttal before decision is rendered").

Colorado: Comp. St. 1921, § 4346 (State industrial commission "shall not be bound by the usual common law or statutory rules of evidence or by any technical or formal rules of procedure, other than as herein or by the rules of the commission provided; but may make such investigations in such manner as in its judgment are best calculated to ascertain the substantial rights of the parties and to carry out justly the spirit of this Act"); § 4468 (ex parte testimony shall be subject to cross-examination later);

Connecticut: Gen. St. 1918, § 5364 (workmen's compensation; commissioner "shall not be bound by the ordinary common law or statutory rules of evidence or procedure, but may make inquiry in such manner, through oral testimony or written or printed records, as is best calculated to ascertain the substantial rights of the parties and carry out justly the spirit of this Chapter"); St. 1919, April 15, c. 142, § 10, amending Gen. St. § 5358 (State compensation commissioners may "adopt and change such common rules, procedure and forms as they shall deem expedient for the purposes");

Hawaii: St. 1915, Apr. 28, No. 221, § 29 (industrial accident board may make rules; "process and procedure under this Act shall be as summary and simple as reasonably may be");

Idaho: Comp. St. 1919, § 6261 (State industrial accident board; "process and procedure under this chapter shall be as summary and simple as reasonably may be and as far as possible in accordance with the rules of equity");

Iowa: Code 1919, § 833 (State industrial commissioner; "the commissioner may make rules and regulations. . . . Process and procedure under this chapter shall be as summary as reasonably may be; . . . neither the commissioner nor the arbitration committee shall be bound by common law or statutory rules of evidence, or by technical or formal rules of procedure, but may hold such arbitrations or conduct such hearings and make such investigations and inquiries in the manner best suited to ascertain the substantial rights of the parties");

Kentucky: St. 1916, Mar. 23, p. 354, Stats. § 4930 (State workmen's compensation board may make rules; "processes and procedure under this Act shall be as summary and simple as reasonably may be");

Maine: Rev. St. 1916, c. 50, §§ 29, 34, St. 1919, c. 238, §§ 34, 37 (State industrial accident commission may make rules and regulations; on the hearing "from the evidence thus furnished the chairman shall in a summary manner decide the merits of the controversy"; "his decision, in the absence of fraud, upon all questions of fact shall be final"; the commission's procedure shall "secure a speedy, efficient, and inexpensive disposition of all proceedings");

Maryland: St. 1914, c. 800, Ann. Code 1914, Art. 101, § 10 (State industrial accident commission; "the commission shall not be bound by the usual common law or statutory rules of evidence or by any technical or formal rules of procedure");

Massachusetts: Gen. L. 1920, c. 152, § 5 (State department of industrial accidents "may make rules"; "process and procedure shall be as simple and summary as reasonably may be"; there shall be "no appeal on questions of fact");

Michigan: Comp. L. 1915, § 5457 and St. 1921, No. 60, p. 91 (State industrial accident board; "process and procedure under this Act shall be as summary as reasonably may be");

Minnesota: St. 1921, c. 82, § 53 ("The Commission, or a commissioner or a referee in making an investigation or conducting a hearing under this act shall not be bound by common law or statutory rules of evidence or by technical or formal rules of pleading or procedure, except as provided by this act; and shall make such investigation or inquiry or conduct such hearing in such manner as to ascertain the substantial rights of the parties. But all findings of fact shall be based only upon competent evidence");

Missouri: Rev. St. 1919, §§ 13643, 13655 (workmen's compensation; State commission may adopt rules and regulations for all proceedings; "all proceedings . . . shall be simple, informal, and summary, and without regard to the technical rules of evidence"); St. 1921, Mar. 28, p. 425, § 51 (like Rev. St. § 13643, 13655, which are superseded);

Montana: Rev. C. 1921, § 2938 (State industrial accident board; in the conduct of investigations and hearings "neither the board nor any member thereof shall be bound by the technical rules of evidence"; "no informality in any proceedings or in the manner of taking testimony shall invalidate any order", etc.);

Nebraska: St. 1917, p. 219, Rev. St. 1922, § 3080, par. a (compensation commissioner shall regulate "the nature and extent of the proofs and evidence and the method of taking and furnishing the same"); par. b (the commissioner "shall not be bound by the usual common law or statutory rules of evidence or by any technical or formal rules of procedure", but shall so investigate as "to ascertain the substantial rights of the parties and to carry out justly the spirit" of the statute);

Nevada: St. 1913, Mar. 15, p. 137, § 12 (State industrial commission "shall adopt reasonable and proper rules to govern its procedure, vested the board with power to make its own rules of procedure; in one half or more of the statutes it has expressly declared that the "technical" rules, or the "usual common law or statutory" rules, shall not be applicable; and in some instances it has emphasized its purpose by authorizing the board to regulate and provide for . . . the nature and extent of the proofs and evidence and the method of taking and furnishing the same, . . . the method of making investigations", etc.);

New York: St. 1914, c. 41, § 67 ("The commission shall adopt reasonable rules, not inconsistent with this chapter, regulating and providing for . . . 2. The nature and extent of the proofs and evidence, and the method of taking and furnishing the same, to establish the right to compensation"); § 68 ("The commission or a commissioner or deputy commissioner in making an investigation or inquiry or conducting a hearing shall not be bound by common law or statutory rules of evidence or by technical or formal rules of procedure, except as provided by this chapter; but may make such investigation or inquiry or conduct such hearing in such manner as to ascertain the substantial rights of the parties");
N. Dakota: St. 1919, Mar. 5, c. 162, § 4 (State workmen's compensation bureau may make rules; "process and procedure under this Act shall be as summary and simple as reasonably may be. The Bureau shall not be bound by the usual common law or statutory rules of evidence or by any technical or formal rules of procedure, other than as herein provided; but may make investigation in such manner as in its judgment is best calculated to ascertain the substantial rights of the parties and to carry out justly the spirit of this Act");
Ohio: Gen. Code Ann. 1921, § 871–9 (State industrial commission may adopt its own rules of procedure"); § 1465–44 (State industrial commission "shall adopt reasonable and proper rules to govern its procedure"); § 1465–91 ("Such board shall not be bound by the usual common law or statutory rules of evidence or by any technical or formal rules of procedure; but may make the investigation in such manner as in its judgment is best calculated to ascertain the substantial rights of the parties and to carry out justly the spirit of this act");
Oklahoma: St. 1915, c. 246, Mar. 22, Act. 4, § 7 (the State industrial commission shall "adopt reasonable rules" regulating "2, the nature and extent of the proofs and evidence, and the method of taking and furnishing the same");
Pennsylvania: St. 1919, July 21, § 15, Dig. 1920 Workmen's Comp. § 21943 (State workmen's compensation board shall make rules "for the legal and judicial procedure of the board"); St. 1919, June 26, § 6, Dig. 1920, Workmen's Comp., § 22044 (State workmen's compensation board; "neither the board nor any referee shall be bound by the technical rules of evidence in conducting any hearing or investigation, but all findings of fact shall be based only upon competent evidence");
Texas: Rev. Civ. St. 1911, § 5246–42, St. 1917, c. 103 (State industrial accident board; "process and procedure shall be as summary as may be under this Act");
Utah: Comp. L. 1917, § 3077 (State industrial commission shall give a hearing); § 3149 (it shall "not be bound by the usual common law or statutory rules of evidence or by any technical or formal rules of procedure, other than as herein provided; but may make the investigation in such manner as in its judgment is best calculated to ascertain the substantial rights of the parties and to carry out justly the spirit of this title"); St. 1919, Mar. 13, c. 63, adding Comp. L. § 3130x (State industrial commission shall adopt "regulations governing the procedure");
Vermont: Gen. L. 1917, § 5761, and St. 1919, April 8, No. 158 (State commissioner of industries "shall not be bound by common law or statutory rules of evidence or by technical or formal rules of procedure except as provided in this chapter, but may make such investigation or inquiry or conduct such hearing or trial in such manner as to ascertain the substantial rights of the parties");
Virginia: St. 1920, Mar. 15, c. 176, amending Code § 55 (State industrial commission may make rules; "processes and procedure shall be as summary and simple as reasonably may be");
West Virginia: Code 1914, § 664, St. 1913, c. 10, § 8, as amended by St. 1915, c. 9, § 8 (State compensation commissioner, in administering workmen's compensation, "shall adopt reasonable and proper rules to govern its procedure, . . . the nature and extent of the proofs and evidence, and the method of taking and furnishing the same, . . . the method of making investigations", etc.); Code 1914, § 664, St. 1913, c. 10, as amended by St. 1915, c. 9, and St. 1919, c. 131, § 44 ("The commissioner shall not be bound by the usual common law or statutory rules of evidence, but shall adopt formal rules of practice and procedure, as herein provided, and may make the investigation in such manner as in his judgment is best calculated to ascertain the substantial rights of the parties and to carry out the provisions of this act");
Wisconsin: Stats. 1919, §§ 2394–14, 2394–51 (State industrial commission "may adopt its own rules of procedure").

"make investigation in such manner as in its judgment is best calculated" to carry out the spirit of the Act.

In judicial review, however, this broad charter of independence has not always been given literal effect by the Courts. In some States the spirit and letter is observed. In others, the mental habits of the Courts are too strong to permit them to give full faith and credit to those provisions; and some of the rulings are mere treadmill applications of the jury-trial rules in a manner defeating the legislative purpose. In still other courts, the pseudo-liberal rule of "a residuum of legal evidence" (already considered, ante, § 4*b*) finds favor; and these are at present the most numerous.[17]

[17] ENGLAND: 1912, Amys v. Braton, 1 K. B. 40 (cause of employee's injury; doctor's testimony to employee's statement that he had been stung by a wasp, held inadmissible); no attempt has been made to collect here the numerous English rulings below the appellate Courts.

UNITED STATES: California: 1915, Englebretson v. Ind. Acc. Com., 170 Cal. 793, 151 Pac. 421 (cause of employee's injury; deceased employee's statements during illness, admitted by the Commission, were the only evidence; held (1) that the Compensation Act, 1913, § 77, providing that "the technical rules of evidence" shall not bind the Commission, did not avail to make the above evidence admissible, the hearsay rule not being a "technical rule"; (2) that the Commission's power under § 75 of the Act to "prescribe the nature and extent of the proofs and evidence" was void, as an unconstitutional delegation); 1915, Employers' Ass. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Com., 170 Cal. 800, 151 Pac. 423 (cause of employee's injury; evidence as in the Englebretson case, and same ruling); then the statute of 1915, quoted supra, intervened; 1916, Frankfort Gen. Ins. Co. v. Pillsbury, 173 Cal. 56, 159 Pac. 150 (percentage of cases of a specific sort of physical disability, as a basis for rating; certain cross-examination of an expert witness was disallowed by the Board's referee; held, under St. 1915, amending the Compensation Act § 77, that this was "a mere error in the taking of testimony", and would not be made a ground for review); 1916, Carstens v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 572, 158 Pac. 218 (evidence received without notice to the party opponent, held not "legal evidence", and the award void as to him); 1916, Connolly v. Ind. Com., 173 Cal. 405, 160 Pac. 239 (whether an employee was working by the day; "his status as an employee is sought to be proven by hearsay evidence, which may not be considered"); 1919, Employers' Liability Ass. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Com., 179 Cal. 432, 177 Pac. 273 (employee's death; the "evidence consisted in part of his hearsay declarations; the amendment to the law passed in 1915 expressly permits such testimony, and the evidence therefore is sufficient"); 1917, Western Indemnity Co. v. Ind. Acc. Com., 174 Cal. 315, 163 Pac. 60 ("The hearsay testimony complained of relative to the statements of the deceased employee relating directly to his injury was competent under the provisions of § 77*a* of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, as amended in 1915, St. 1915, p. 1102; we are satisfied that such provisions cannot be held invalid as opposed to any provision of our Constitution"; a curt seven-line opinion, as befitted a Court which had just received so direct a legislative rebuke as the Act of 1915); then came the statutory amendment of 1917, quoted supra; 1919, Ocean Accident & G. Co. v. Industrial Commission, 180 Cal. 389, 182 Pac. 35 (applying Stat. 1917, p. 831, § 60, to authorize the Industrial Commission to admit, in a claim of employee against employer, a deposition of a physician taken in an action by the employee against a third person);

Connecticut: 1919, Riccio v. Montano, 93 Conn. 289, 105 Atl. 625 (certain admissions before the commissioner, held receivable; referring to the informal nature of evidential inquiries provided in St. 1913, c. 138, § 25, being G. S. 1918, § 5364);

Illinois: 1916, Victor Chemical Works v. Ind. Board, 274 Ill. 11, 113 N. E. 173 (whether deceased employee had contributed to support of a relative; held, (1) "there must be evidence that is competent and legal, as tested by the usual rules for producing evidence in any legal proceeding, to sustain their findings; . . . such evidence must also be preserved and incorporated into the record"; (2) the Board should have rejected certain statements of the deceased as to sending money, this being objected to as hearsay; (3) there was "sufficient competent evidence", otherwise received, to sustain the finding); 1916, Munn v. Ind. Board, 274 Ill. 70, 113 N. E. 110 (cause of employee's injury; the Court is bound by the Board's decision "if there is any legal evidence to support it"); 1917, Goelitz Co. v. Ind. Board, 278 Ill. 164, 115 N. E. 855 (deceased employee's dependent widow; the finding's basis must "be shown by competent legal evidence, and not be based upon mere conjecture or surmise"; here the only illegal evidence was a telegram, to which no objection had been made); 1918, Peoria Cordage Co. v. Ind. Board, 284 Ill. 90, 119 N. E. 996 (cause of an employee's injury; the deceased's statements as to the cause of his finger-cut, even when made to a physician, held inadmissible); 1918, Mueller Constr. Co. v. Ind. Board, 283 Ill. 148, 159, 118 N. E. 1028 (extent of employee's disability; "there was evidence to support the finding"); 1919, Bailey v. Ind. Com. 286 Ill. 623, 626, 122 N. E. 107 (extent and cause of employee's injury; the Commission's ruling stands "if there is any legal evidence to support it"); 1919, Chicago Steel Foundry v. Ind. Com. 286 Ill. 544, 122 N. E. 550 (cause of employee's injury; "there was competent evidence in the record fairly tending to sustain the finding"); 1919, Keystone Steel & Wire Co. v. Industrial Commission, 289 Ill. 587, 124 N. E. 542 (under the Workmen's Compensation Act, the fact of deceased's contribution to the support of mother and wife in Serbia was evidenced by (1) a witness to the mother's statement that she had received $100 from her son, (2) a witness to the son's statement that he had sent $50 to the old country, and (3) a witness who saw the son get a postal order for $110 and mail the letter to his mother; the first two were held "objectionable", the third was not ruled upon); 1920, Vulcan Detinning Co. v. Ind. Com., 295 Ill. 141, 128 N. E. 917 (cause of employee's injury; though the coroner's verdict was erroneously received in evidence, held that there was sufficient other evidence; the opinion, however, goes to the point of actually weighing the evidence); 1921, Old Ben Coal Co. v. Ind. Com., 296 Ill. 229, 129 N. E. 772 (extent of disability; "the award must rest on competent legal evidence, and not on conjecture or surmise"); 1922, Republic Iron & Steel Co. v. Ind. Com., 302 Ill. 401, 134 N. E. 754;

Indiana: 1917, United Paperboard Co. v. Lewis, 65 Ind. App. 356, 117 N. E. 276 (employee's disability; "appellant also bases error on the admission of certain evidence. In doing this, it seeks to apply the strict rules in that regard adopted and enforced in courts of law. This should not be done. The Industrial Board is not a court, but an administrative body, and should not be held to the same strict rules with respect to the admission of evidence. The general rule seems to be that the admission of incompetent evidence by such boards will not operate to reverse an award, if there be any basis in the competent evidence to support it"); 1919, Hege & Co. v. Tompkins, 69 Ind. App. 273, 121 N. E. 677 (deceased's statements as to cause of injury, admitted by the Board, no objection being made; held not error, the rule being at least as liberal even in ordinary courts as to permit hearsay to be admitted in case of objection; the employer's report of the accident, received without objection, held also properly received);

Iowa: 1920, Reid v. Automatic E. W. Co., 189 Ia. 964, 179 N. W. 323 (under the statute providing that "common law or statutory rules of evidence" shall not bind commissioners in award of workmen's compensation claims, held, (1) that testimony, based on hearsay statements from an absent person injured at the same time could be considered; "we think it was the purpose of the Legislature to relax somewhat the rules of evidence"; held also (2) that an affidavit could be considered, the affiant being in military service); 1921, Flint v. Eldon, 191 Ia. 845, 183 N. W. 344 (under Code 1897, Suppl. 1913, § 2477*m*, 33, the State industrial commissioners findings of fact are final; held that (1) there must at least be evidence to support the finding, and (2) that a rule of burden of proof, requiring proof beyond a reasonable doubt as to plaintiff's death being caused by the accident, was erroneous, and that therefore the cause must be remanded "with instructions to proceed under the correct rule"); 1921, Renner v. Model Laundry C. & D. Co., 191 Ia. 1288, 184 N. W. 611 (commenting on the statute's provision as to "common law or statutory rules of evidence"; holding that a rule of burden of proof as to receipt of money, etc., was not within that provision; narrow and unsound);

Kentucky; 1918, Phil Hollenbach Co. v. Hollenbach, 181 Ky. 262, 204 S. W. 152 (there must be "competent and credible evidence"); 1921, Valentine v. Weaver, 191 Ky. 87, 228 S. W. 1036 (death of employee by blood-poisoning; on his arrival home from night-work he breakfasted and took a nap, then said "his finger was awful sore", because he "got a splinter in it down to the shop last night"; held, (1) that this statement was not admissible as a spontaneous declaration; (2) that since there was no other evidence of the cause of the injury, the award could not stand; the opinion notes that the legislative intention was to avoid "technical rules", but not that "the elementary and fundamental principles of a judicial inquiry should not be observed"; it admits that the deceased's statement as to "the how and the when of the accident" would have been admissible, but not "the where of the accident"; so that, according to the opinion, the foundations of reliable judicial inquiry into truth are not shaken by a statement that "I got a splinter in my finger last night", but at the words "down to the shop" those foundations of verity begin to rock and totter; this sort of conviction about the boundaries between fundamentals and incidentals shows how artificial and unpractical the legal mind can be);

Maine: 1919, Mailman's Case, 118 Me. 172, 106 Atl. 606 (workman's compensation; cause of injury; witnesses had been "permitted to rehearse the story of the accident as told by the deceased; this was hearsay testimony, plainly inadmissible; but the allowance of hearsay evidence by the commissioner does not require this Court to reverse his decree unless such decree was based in whole or in part upon such incompetent testimony"; here the commissioner "wholly disregarded the hearsay evidence"); 1921, Larabee's Case, 120 Me. 242, 113 Atl. 268 (cause of employee's injury; deceased's statements that "the gas almost killed me", held inadmissible; but "the receipt of hearsay evidence alone is not sufficient to require a reversal of the findings, if there is otherwise a legal basis for the conclusions of the commissioner"); 1921, Patrick v. Hain Co., 119 Me. 510, 111 Atl. 912 (there must be "sufficient evidence"); 1922, Ballou's Case, — Me. —, 116 Atl. 591 (the only question is "whether there was any legal evidence upon which the decision of the chairman could be based"; but the opinion then advances a different criterion, viz. "if it has appeared that the commissioner did not take into consideration the evidence illegally admitted, and that there is sufficient evidence outside the illegal testimony to sustain his finding of fact");

Massachusetts: 1913, Pigeon's Case, 216 Mass. 51, 102 N. E. 932 (a finding of the State industrial board will not be reversed for error of ruling on evidence, unless "the substantial rights of the parties appear to have been affected"; nevertheless, the Court then proceeded to determine a question of admissibility in point of law; here the question was whether the deceased's statement of intention was admissible under Rev. L. 1902, c. 175, § 66);
Michigan: 1914, Reck v. Whittlesberger, 181 Mich. 463, 148 N. W. 247 (cause of an employee's injury; the Board admitted the deceased employee's statement as to running a nail into his thumb; held (1) that "the rule against hearsay evidence is more than a mere artificial technicality of the law", (2) that the findings may be supported if "any competent legal evidence is produced"; (3) that here there was other legal evidence sufficient); 1915, Fitzgerald v. Lozier Motor Co., 187 Mich. 660, 154 N. W. 67 (cause of employee's injury; statements of the deceased, inadmissible as hearsay, had been received by the Board; held that "without considering the purely hearsay testimony", the question was whether there was "any competent evidence" sufficient to support the finding; following Reck v. Whittlesberger); 1917, Kinney v. Cadillac M. C. Co., 199 Mich. 435, 165 N. W. 651 (injury to workman; Reck v. Whittlesberger followed); 1921, Bresee v. Clark Eq. Co., 214 Mich. 235, 183 N. W. 19 (cause of employee's injury; finding approved, although there was "hearsay evidence in the testimony"); 1921, Kostamo v. Christman Co., 214 Mich. 652, 183 N. W. 903 (dependency; the evidence for the Board need not be direct; circumstantial evidence suffices);
Nebraska: 1920, Venuto v. Carter Lake Club, 104 Nebr. 782, 178 N. W. 760 (whether deceased left dependents; "the declarations of the deceased were incompetent as hearsay evidence");
New York: 1915, Carroll v. Knickerbocker Ice Co., Sup. App. Div., 155 N. Y. Suppl. 1 (cause of employee's injury; deceased's statement and other hearsay was admitted by the Board: held that the findings were sufficiently supported; opinion by Howard, J., quoted ante, § 4*b*; Lyon and Woodward, J. J., diss., quoted ante, § 4*b*); 1916, Carroll v. Knickerbocker Ice Co., 218 N. Y. 435, 113 N. E. 507 (under N. Y. Laws 1914, c. 41, § 21, providing that in proceedings before an industrial commission "the commission . . . shall not be bound by common law or statutory rules of evidence or by technical or formal rules of procedure, except as provided by this chapter", a finding of the mode of injury of C. "based solely on the testimony of witnesses who related what C. told them as to how he was injured", C. being now deceased, was reversed, on the ground that though hearsay evidence was made admissible, yet the statute did not "declare the probative force of any evidence", and that "there must be a residuum of legal evidence to support the claim"; which thus comes to holding that a statute which declares the legal rules to be no longer binding does nevertheless leave them binding; Seabury and Pound, J. J., diss.); 1917, Fogarty v. National Biscuit Co., 221 N. Y. 20, 116 N. E. 346 (cause of employee's death; the widow "stated what she had heard of the manner in which her husband was injured"; held, that the hearsay statement "is not affected by" Carroll v. K. I. Co., in view of the presumption here obtaining as to the cause of death); 1918, Belcher v. Carthage Machine Co., 224 N. Y. 326, 120 N. E. 735 (cause of employee's death; deceased's statements were received by the Board; held, the question being "whether an award . . . can be sustained upon hearsay evidence, uncorroborated by facts, circumstances, or other evidence", that "there is nothing to sustain the conclusion . . . other than deceased's own declaration", and that the finding could not stand; distinguishing Sorge v. Aldebaran Co., 218 N. Y. 636, and Fogarty v. National Biscuit Co., supra); 1920, Eldridge v. Endicott & Co., 228 N. Y. 21, 126 N. E. 254 (cause of employee's disease of anthrax; the place of work was a tannery, and the hides were from southern countries; held, that the Board "could not take judicial notice of the nature of these skins . . . or likelihood of inoculation of an employee", hence the finding was without "at least some evidence" to support it); 1920, Vassilakis v. Fairfax Hotel Co., N. Y. App. Div., 184 N. Y. Suppl. 774 (there must be legal evidence to sustain an award, though the Commission may also have used non-legal evidence; here the only evidence of the claimants' relationship to deceased was a certificate of a Greek town mayor, a signed statement of the widow, and certificates of marriage and baptism, all of these authenticated, but in some details not with technical completeness; "the foregoing documents may constitute evidence in Greece, but no one will contend that they possess that dignity in New York", says the Court; this was a discourteous remark, also irrelevant; J. M. Kellogg, P. J., dissents; the features of the evidence recited in his opinion serve to illustrate the world of illusion which the judicial mind, represented by the majority opinion, has so built around itself in imagining technicalities to be fundamentals); 1920, State Industrial Com. v. Stiles Co., App. Div., 184 N. Y. Suppl. 598 (death in the course of employment; rule of Carroll v. Knickerbocker Ice Co., applied; here there was "legal" evidence additional to unspecified other evidence); 1921, Grills v. Sherman-Stalter Co., Sup. App. Div., 186 N. Y. Suppl. 810 (whether deceased employee left any dependents in Italy; three certificates of birth and marriage from Italy, held to be insufficiently authenticated under C. C. P. §§ 952, 953, 956, and not to "come up to the requirements of evidence", and the award therefore reversed; how finical the judicial mind was can be seen from its remark, as to one of the certificates, that "it does not show any certificate of birth of the decedent, although it is recited that he was 'born in this town'"; this ruling illustrates the incapacity of the ordinary courts to entertain any conception of proof not fulfilling all the technicalities of the jury-trial system of rules); 1921, Schermerhorn v. General Electric Co., Sup. App. Div., 186 N. Y. Suppl. 835 (extent of employee's partial disability; the medical witnesses placed the percentage of disability in the injured hand at 25 to 33⅓%; but the deputy commissioner, after seven or eight personal inspections of the injured hand placed the percentage at 40%; held, that the deputy commissioner was given no express power by statute to use the evidence of his own senses obtainable by inspection, nor to base his finding on such evidence in so far as variant from the medical testimony, and the award was reversed; J. M. Kellogg, P. J., diss.; this ruling is the apotheosis of judicial arrogance and technicalism; whether the New York Commission is or is not too liberal in its findings does not appear; but their over-liberality would be more endurable than such jealous technical control by this Court);

Ohio: 1918, Roma v. Ind. Com., 97 Oh. 247, 119 N. E. 461 (workmen's compensation; under Gen. Code §§ 1465–91, providing that "the usual common law or statutory rules of evidence" shall not bind, said 'obiter' that "it is not to be understood that this section countenances the making a farce or mockery of a judicial proceeding; for instance, it would not justify the admission of hearsay evidence");

Oklahoma: 1921, Associated Employers' Reciprocal v. State Ind. Com., — Okl. —, 200 Pac. 862 (there must be "some evidence to support such finding");

Pennsylvania: 1918, McCauley v. Imperial Woolen Co., 261 Pa. 312, 104 Atl. 617 (whether an employee's death occurred in the course of employment; findings may be set aside if "there was no legal evidence whatever to warrant them"; deceased's statement that something "in the wool which he was carrying had torn him in the neck", had been held by the Board to be "hearsay, and, standing alone, insufficient to sustain the findings" of the referee; held, (1) that there was here sufficient other evidence on the facts; (2) that the statutory provision, St. 1915, § 428, that "the technical rules of evidence" shall not bind the Board, "do not mean that either the referee or the Board has the right to find material facts on hearsay alone; . . . for, in the first place, the rule which forbids the making of material findings on hearsay alone is more than a technical rule of evidence; and, next, there is nothing in the Act before us which justifies the conclusion that the legislature intended any such loose method for determining material facts. The Act permits liberal investigation by hearing and otherwise; but, after all the data have been gathered without regard to technical rules, then the proofs must be examined, and that which is not evidence within the meaning of the law must be excluded from consideration"); 1919, Wolford v. Geisel M. & S. Co., 262 Pa. 454, 105 Atl. 831 (declarations of deceased on the day of the accident; rule of McCauley v. Woolen Co. applied);

Rhode Island: 1922, Dugan v. Simas, — R. I. —, 116 Atl. 753 (a finding "entirely without legal evidence to support it" will not be sustained);

South Dakota: 1920, Day v. Sioux Falls Fruit Co., 43 S. D. 65, 177 N. W. 816 (appeal from an award of the Industrial Commissioner for death of an employee; evidence had been received contrary to the rules about opinion and leading questions; award affirmed; awards "should not be reversed for failure to observe the formal rules of evidence applicable on trials before law courts; unless it clearly appears that the appellant has been prejudiced thereby to such an extent as to deprive him of some substantial right");

Utah: 1918, Garfield Smelting Co. v. Ind. Com., 53 Utah 133, 178 Pac. 53 (where there is "substantial evidence" to support the findings, they will be affirmed on appeal); 1920, Ogden v. Industrial Com., 57 Utah 221, 193 Pac. 857 ("As there was some substantial competent evidence before the commission to justify its conclusion", the award stands); 1921, Rockefeller v. Ind. Com., — Utah —, 197 Pac. 1038 (death of employee; Garfield Smelting Co. v. Ind. Com. followed; here, (1) "at least four witnesses were permitted to testify to the statements made by the deceased before he

3. Sundry Officials. In the other fields of administrative adjudication there has never been any general legislative interest aroused in their procedure. Hence statutes rarely make specific provision.[18] There are indeed multifarious statutes — for example, those creating licensing boards for the professions — which make conventional provisions that a hearing shall be given, that the party may produce witnesses, that he may hear the testimony against him, and that depositions may be taken. But such statutes are concerned merely with outlining a basis of procedure, and do not purport to deal with the body of Evidence-rules as such.

In judicial review, a few Courts — chiefly in very modern times — have seen fit to test the procedure of taxing bodies by their observance of the jury-trial system of Evidence.[19] And for sundry officials — civil service boards, died; this was improper"; (2) "some of the witnesses were permitted merely to state their conclusions or inferences; this was also improper"; thus it does seem that industrial commissions are going to be almost human in their search for the facts, and are distressingly likely to shock some genuinely lawyerlike thinkers by the improprieties of mind which will no doubt be committed, unless rigid checks be imposed by the sole guardians of Truth in the Seeking, viz. the Supreme Courts of the Land); 1921, Spring Canyon Coal Co. v. Ind. Com., — Utah —, 201 Pac. 173 (rulings reviewable "if there is no substantial evidence in support of any material fact found"; 1921, Moray v. Ind. Com., — Utah —, 199 Pac. 1023 (cause of injury; there must be "some substantial legal evidence");

Wisconsin: 1915, First National Bank v. Ind. Com., 161 Wis. 526, 154 N. W. 846 (cause of employee's death; the employee had made statements to certain persons that he had pricked his thumb; whether admissible, "we need not and do not decide", because there was "ample competent evidence", and because the Commission "is not held to the same strict rule with respect to rulings on the admission of evidence as courts of law"); 1919, Eggers V. S. Co. v. Ind. Com., 168 Wis. 377, 170 N. W. 280 (that certain evidence was not "formally offered", held not error; "the proceedings before the commission are not to be hampered by useless formalities nor technicalities"); 1921, Porter v. Ind. Com., — Wis. —, 181 N. W. 317 (commission's findings accepted, "if there is any evidence to support them").

[18] Cal. St. 1913, June 13, p. 1035, No. 606, § 5 (State civil service commission, at its hearings, "shall not be bound by the technical rules of evidence");

Conn. Gen. St. 1918, § 2748 (revocation of liquor license; county commissioners shall apply "the same rules of law and evidence as the courts of this State");

Mo. Rev. St. 1919, § 12541 (State prison board of pardons may "examine witnesses according to the rules of evidence"); § 12637 (State dental board may revoke certificate after notice and public hearing; "the evidence in support of the charges shall be given by competent witnesses", and the accused may present witnesses; "the board may take oral and written proof for and against the accused", and may make "all reasonable and necessary rules and regulations for the speedy and full hearing of all complaints"); § 12683 (official court reporter may be removed by the Court upon cause shown "by competent evidence");

Nebr. St. 1921, c. 182, § 11 (State board of pardons; "the Board shall have the power to determine by its own rules what evidence it will receive");

N. Y. Court of Claims Act 1920, § 26 ("No award shall be made on any claim against the State except upon such legal evidence as would establish liability against an individual or corporation in a court of law or equity");

Wyo. Comp. St. 1920, § 699 (State land board proceedings shall be governed by rules prescribed by the board, which "shall have the same legal force and effect . . . as the code of civil procedure bears and has to civil actions").

[19] Federal: 1920, Turner v. Wade, 254 U. S. 64, 41 Sup. 27 (Ga. St. 1913, p. 123, providing for a mode of disputing tax assessments, held unconstitutional, because not requiring notice and hearing before assessment, although providing for notice and hearing afterwards before arbitrators; approving Central of Ga. v. Wright, 207 U. S. 127);

Massachusetts: 1873, Farmington R. W. P. Co. v. County Com'rs, 112 Mass. 206, 213 (county board; on certiorari, the review may include "an objection taken to the evidence for incompetency, so as to raise a legal question"); 1891, Haven v. County Com'rs, 155 Mass. 467, 29 N. E. 1083 (county board erroneously received evidence of sales of other land; held that the use of the incompetent evidence required that the proceedings be quashed);

Nebraska: 1886, State ex rel. Goff v. County Board, 20 Nebr. 595, 31 N. W. 117 (the board in reviewing assessments acted in part on their own licensing boards, county commissioners, and others — instances of like exercise of control are found, — also chiefly in very modern times.[20]

On the whole, it would seem that the vast body of disputed claims and charges, dispatched monthly and yearly by these numerous cohorts of ad-knowledge of the premises; held, that "the board is a judicial tribunal, and so far as possible must be governed by the rules relating to evidence"); 1907, Western Union Tel. Co. v. Dodge Co., 80 Nebr. 18, 113 N. W. 805 (county board of equalization received a computation of appellant's stock and bonds taken from "Poor's Manual and other standard publications"; held, that "boards of equalization are not governed in their investigation of the values of taxable property by the strict rules of evidence applied by courts of law in the trial of ordinary cases");

New Hampshire: 1912, Boston & M. R. Co. v. State, 76 N. H. 515, 85 Atl. 616 (tax commission; on appeal, "the same rules apply . . . insofar as the production of evidence is concerned, as in other judicial proceedings");
Wisconsin: 1901, State ex rel. Giroux v. Lien, 112 Wis. 282, 87 N. W. 1113 (city board of review of assessments; the reception of affidavits, held error, under a statute requiring such boards to "hear and examine any person", etc.)

[20] California: 1901, Stumpf v. Board of Supervisors, 131 Cal. 364, 63 Pac. 663 (county board's decision on formation of a sanitary district; certain witnesses before the board were not sworn; held, "as the statute did not prescribe the character of the proof by which the questions should be determined, they must be established in accordance with the rules of evidence recognized by the courts and the common law"); 1918, Lanterman v. Anderson, 36 Cal. App. 472, 172 Pac. 625 (State board of medical examiner's revocation of a license; rule about corroboration of accomplice held not applicable; "irregular method of procedure not going to the question of jurisdiction", said to be not reviewable on certiorari);
Illinois: 1884, People ex rel. Shepard v. Dental Examiners, 110 Ill. 180 (under St. 1881, May 30, authorizing the State board of dental examiners to issue licenses on certain conditions, the decision of the board as to the facts is conclusive, being a judicial determination of facts, and mandamus will not lie);
Iowa: 1920, Fronsdahl v. Civil Service Commission, 189 Ia. 1344, 179 N. W. 874 (discharge of police officer by chief of police, sustained by city civil service commission; hearsay evidence is admissible; "It is not requisite that he should have before him competent evidence, in a technical sense, of the criminal guilt of a policeman in order to justify an order of removal; . . . whether it would be competent in such a case for a civil service commission to sustain a discharge wholly upon hearsay evidence, we shall have no occasion to determine");
Minnesota: 1918, State ex rel. Burrows v. Truax, 139 Minn. 313, 166 N. W. 339 (certiorari to county commissioners, reviewing an order to establish a ditch; the board had refused to swear the witnesses; held not fatal; "the county board is not a court; its proceedings . . . are necessarily informal; the members are usually not lawyers; they are not governed by legal rules of evidence; . . . parties appear usually without attorneys"); 1919, State ex rel. Grubbs v. Schulz, 142 Minn. 112, 171 N. W. 263 (revocation of teacher's license by State superintendent of education; the witnesses were not sworn; State v. Truax, supra, approved);
Missouri: 1921, State ex rel. Johnson v. Clark, 288 Mo. 659, 232 S. W. 1031 (plaintiff's license as a physician had been suspended for 5 years by the State Board of Health, under Rev. St. 1919, § 7336, after a full hearing on a charge of unlawfully causing an abortion; order quashed, because the Board admitted (1) the attendant physician's testimony to the woman's declaration naming the relator, made 36 hours before death, but not fulfilling the rule for dying declarations, (2) a physician's testimony to the relator's repute as an abortionist; unsound; two judges diss.);
New York: 1920, Appeal of Bronx Parkway Commission, App. Div., 182 N. Y. Suppl. 760 (land-condemnation; the commissioners of appraisal are "untrammeled by any technical rules of evidence, and unrestricted to their sources of evidence"); 1921, Martin v. O'Keefe, Sup. App. Div., 187 N. Y. Suppl. 153 (dismissal of policeman for insubordination in refusing to obey an order of the police commissioner as to wearing his uniform at the trial of the former on charges, with a view to identification; dismissal reversed, on the ground that the trial was not fair); 1922, People ex rel. Packwood v. Riley, — N. Y. —, 133 N. E. 891 (city commissioner of public safety; rules of evidence applied to proceedings for discharge of chief of police);
Oklahoma: 1920, Muskogee Gas & El. Co. v. State, — Okl. —, 186 Pac. 730 ("the strict rule applicable to law courts does not prevail in legislative proceedings"; said of corporate records, offered before a commission);
Rhode Island: 1921, Glass v. State Board, — R. I. —, 115 Atl. 244 (revocation of a motor vehicle license by State board of public roads; proof held insufficient; "the bulk of the testimony in this case was mere hearsay testimony; . . . it must clearly appear that after excluding such testimony there is sufficient legal testimony to satisfy the requirement of proof by a fair preponderance of evidence").

ministrators in varied fields, manage to get adjudicated satisfactorily without enforcement by the Courts of the jury-trial rules of Evidence. Whether this can be explained without impairing the credit of that system, could not be answered without an extensive inquiry into the practice at these various tribunals in the different States.

§ 4*d*. Admiralty Courts; Military Courts; Juvenile Courts; Commercial Courts and Conciliation Courts. 1. Admiralty Courts. That the common-law jury-trial rules of Evidence are not in force for admiralty courts, either in theory or in practice, is sometimes broadly stated. More commonly, the statement is limited to prize causes only, where the practice undoubtedly reflects that liberal attitude. Historically, the absence of a jury sufficiently explains this absence of the jury-trial rules. But, in point of policy, the reasons for maintaining the practice unfettered have been from time to time expounded in ample array by eminent authorities :

1855, Dr. LUSHINGTON, in The Franciska, Spinks 287; 2 Eng. P. C. 346: "With regard to the evidence to be produced in the Admiralty Courts with respect to blockades, and, indeed, I may say all other questions of prize, I believe the practice to have been, not to entertain objections to the admissibility of the evidence offered, but to receive all that might be tendered: and certainly we have in this case the license of evidence of every kind and description which could well be offered to the consideration of the Court. I apprehend that this, so far as I know, the universal practice of the Court, was adopted for several reasons. First, because the Prize Court being, not a municipal Court, but a Court for the administration of public law, was not restrained, with regard to evidence, by those rules which are applicable to questions of municipal law. Secondly, it would be most difficult, even if possible, to have laid down any rules of evidence, because this Court, having to concern itself with the transactions of various nations, could never construct a code in conformity with all their various rules, and consequently injustice might be done by excluding, in transactions in which they were interested, proofs recognized by themselves. Thirdly, because of the extreme difficulty of procuring what we are accustomed to call the best evidence, when such evidence is to be obtained from distant countries. Fourthly, because, though the Court may receive all, it will form its own judgment, according to the circumstances of the case, of the weight to be attributed to each species of evidence, and is not supposed to be liable to the error of giving undue importance to any evidence, merely because it does not exclude it."

1922, Hon. HARRINGTON PUTNAM, of New York City, former President of the Maritime Law Association of the United States. Ms. Memorandum. "How far are the common law rules of Evidence modified in Admiralty, and particularly in causes of prize? Roughly, I should say that four influences help let down the bars in Admiralty. These are: 1. The Continental origins of Prize courts, whence we have Roman procedure; 2. The basic need for dispatch in admiralty trials; 3. Greater flexibility in dealing with foreign documents and proof; 4. The consideration that admiralty appeals can correct any errors of admission. I will try, by instances, to show my idea better.

"1. Sir Travers Twiss tells us how prize courts came into being, when the needs of civilization demanded some adjudication, so that what armed cruisers took should be subjected to open judgment in the Admiral's Court, which thus became an international court of prize: 'The process of these courts was formed after the best models which the Roman law afforded; and the regulations for prize proceedings of the fifteenth century are identical with the practice of the present time.'[1] Accordingly, on the issue of lawful prize, the proofs are primarily from the sealed papers and log books of the seized ship, with the depositions of those in its charge taken upon an inquiry before the three prize commissioners (one a retired naval officer, and one a member of the bar) under the full and searching questions known as the "Standing Interrogatories" prescribed by the Court (U. S. Rev. Stat. § 4622), the witnesses being examined without presence of counsel. Such testimony, with the log book and papers of the captured ship, forms the sole basis for condemnation. Very special circumstances only will justify allowing any proof from the captors to support their cause.[2] Upon these peculiar issues it is considered that good results do come from the Civil Law practice (which Bentham would characterize, from the method taken, as 'extraction of evidence', and as 'confessorial testimony'). The log-book and papers from the suspected vessel alone may be incriminatory as showing fraud or deception.

§ 4*d*. [1] Law of Nations, Vol. 2, p. 145.

"2. In The Peerless [3] Dr. Lushington said in 1860: 'In matters of evidence, I must look to the practice of my predecessors, and the great distinction which prevails between the description of causes which come under the cognizance of the court of Admiralty, and those in other courts. The causes over which the court of Admiralty exercises jurisdiction occur in all parts of the world, on the high seas, and in remote places. It is a well known principle confirmed by authority, that courts of Admiralty are to precede 'levato velo', that is, with the utmost expedition. In order to carry this principle into effect, this court has both in prize matters and civil suits, been accustomed to receive evidence which would not have been admitted in other courts. For instance, affidavits sworn almost in any way before justices of the peace, commissioners in clearing and so forth; even evidence not on oath, as where according to the custom of some of the States in the North of Europe the original evidence was not taken on oath, but the person giving it undertook to make oath afterwards if required. So, from the necessity of the case, all parties interested were, contrary to the laws of other courts at the time, admitted to give evidence in causes of collision, salvage and others.' (If this last sentence means that interest did not disqualify in admiralty causes, that is at variance with admiralty practice in the United States, before the disqualification was abrogated by statute.[4]) In The Franciska,[5] Dr. Lushington summed up his reasons for the greater freedom of receiving proof, the second of which was that this Court, 'having to concern itself with the transactions of various nations, could never construct a code in conformity with all their various rules; and consequently injustice might be done by excluding in transactions in which they are interested, proofs recognized by themselves.' This elasticity in admitting informal papers has been followed in the U. S. Admiralty courts, even in proceedings between private suitors.[6] In The Anna,[7] Sir Wm. Scott said of a captured vessel, brought from the Gulf of Mexico to England by a privateer: 'In such a case, if there is not the utmost formality of proof that might be required in other cases, I will not add the vexation of sending parties across the Atlantic to New Orleans, for further proof.'

"3. The feeling of the need to lower the requirements of proof in mercantile matters is shown in the Commercial Court, organized in London in 1895, to dispose of differences on contracts, such as to charter and to insure vessels. Juries may be called in, but that is the exception. By a set of liberal rules sympathetically availed of by the bar, a free and unfettered practice has been successfully maintained, which is thus described: 'In practice, logs, protests and average statements are constantly read in evidence of the facts stated therein; the evidence of foreign witnesses is received by sworn declarations or affidavit, usually communicated to the other side before an order is made for their admission as evidence, and commissions are very rarely granted, except on terms that their costs are reserved to

[2] The Aline and Fanny, Spinks 332, 10 Moore P. C. 491.

[3] Lushington, 41.

[4] See U. S. R. S. § 858; The Boston, 1 Sumner 328, Fed. Cas. No. 1673.

[5] Spinks 113, 140-141.

[6] The J. F. Spencer, 3 Ben. 337, Fed. Cas. No. 7315; The Bark Vivid, 4 Ben. 319, Fed. Cas. No. 16978; The Boskenna Bay, 22 Fed. Rep. 662, 667.

[7] C. Rob. 373, 389.

the judge at the trial and with the prospect of the party whose objection has rendered them necessary, having to pay the costs thereof in any event.' [8]

"4. In admiralty an appeal follows the civil law theory of being a new trial.[9] Thus, as a concluding ground for receiving informal evidence, Dr. Lushington contrasted the results upon appeal in his statement in The Franciska, supra: the appellate court could better correct an error 'from too great force being attributed to any species of testimony, than could remedy an evil arising from exclusion'; and the like consideration was referred to by Judge Brown, in The Baskenna Bay, supra. Of course these authorities are more applicable to informally authenticated documents than to other more irregular evidence."

In modern practice, and especially in the prize causes arising out of the World War, this special attitude of the Admiralty Court has been maintained without abatement.[10]

2. Military Courts. It might have been supposed that the military courts of the United States would have been most emphatically the ones in which the common-law jury-trial rules of Evidence would find least recognition. But the exact contrary is the case. Owing in part to the sturdy British tradition of the subordination of the military to the civil order; in part to the genius of a series of judge-advocates-general — including Holt and Crowder — who thoroughly infused a spirit of legality into the regulations, and to America's two great writers on military law — Lieber and Winthrop — whose works inculcated a similar spirit throughout the Army; in part to the constant watchful jealousy of Congress and the Congressional lawyers, to exercise control against the possibility of military abuses; and in part finally to the legalistic influence of the hundreds of civilian lawyers who helped to administer American military law in the World War, — owing to all these influences, criminal procedure in the Army has been more nearly assimilated than in any other independent court to that of the common-law courts. Moreover, because of the admirable measure (lacking in ordinary criminal trials) of recording the proceedings verbatim stenographically, it is possible for the appellate officers to check and control effectively the observance of the rules of Evidence.

[8] Scrutton, Charter Parties, Sect. XIV, p. 435 (10th edition).

[9] The Lucille, 19 Wallace, 73, 74.

[10] Besides the authority of Judge Putnam, above quoted, for American practice, the following citations show the English practice: 1908, Admiralty Short Cause Rules (Annual Practice, 1921, vol. II, p. 2372), Rule 6 ("The judge shall be at liberty to receive, call for, and act upon, such evidence, documentary or otherwise, whether legally admissible or not, as he may think fit"); 1914, The Berlin, Prob. 265 (capture of a maritime prize; Sir S. Evans: "The Prize Court is not bound by such confining fetters as our municipal Courts; . . . Dr. Lushington laid down the practice; . . . with respect to blockades, and indeed I may say all other questions of prize, I believe the practice to have been, not to entertain objections to the admissibility of the evidence offered, but to receive all that might be tendered"); 1921, The Lisa, Prob. 38. 50 (Duke, J.: "I am of opinion that the affidavit is receivable. This court is not bound by the rules of the common law as to evidence. A judge in prize may, I believe, be informed of the facts relevant to a question under trial before him by all available means of trustworthy information"). Comments on some Admiralty rules of Evidence in modern English practice may be found in the following articles: E. S. Roscoe, "Prize Court Procedure", British Year Book of International Law, 1921–22, p. 90; Thos. Baty, "Neglected Fundamentals of Prize Law", Yale L. J. XXX, 34, 47 (1920; notes radical modern changes in the World War period); H. R. Pyke, "The Law of the Prize Court" (1916; Law Quart. Rev. XXXII, 144, 165).

Before 1916, the entire body of jury-trial rules, as practiced by the Federal Courts, was the lawful guide for courts-martial. But in that year a wholesome and flexible independence was given by empowering the President to make the rules. The present status of the law is accurately stated in the following official passage:

1916, A Manual for Courts-Martial (War Department Doc. No. 560, Office of the Judge Advocate General): "§ 198. Rules of evidence for courts-martial. — Prior to the act of August 29, 1916 (Articles of War, 38), courts-martial followed in general the rules of evidence, including the rules as to competency of witnesses to testify, that are applied by Federal courts in criminal cases. These consisted of the rules of the common law as they existed in the several States at the adoption of the Federal Constitution in 1789, as modified from time to time by subsequent acts of Congress. But courts-martial were, however, not required by express statute to follow these rules, and have always been allowed to pursue a more liberal course in regard to the admission of testimony than do, habitually, the civil tribunals. Their purpose was to do justice; and if the effect of a technical rule was found to be to exclude material facts or otherwise obstruct a full investigation, it was deemed that the rule may and should be departed from. Proper occasions, however, for such departures were regarded as exceptional and unfrequent. It was believed that 'courts-martial had much better err on the side of liberality towards a prisoner than, by endeavoring to solve nice and technical refinements of the laws of evidence, assume the risk of injuriously denying him a proper latitude for defense.' (G. C. M. O. 32, 1872.) (Articles of War, 38.) And now, by the provisions of the act of August 29, 1916 'the President may, by regulations which he may modify from time to time, prescribe the procedure, including modes of proof, in cases before courts-martial, courts of inquiry, military commissions, and other military tribunals: provided, that nothing contrary to or inconsistent with these articles shall be so prescribed: provided further, that all rules made in pursuance of this article shall be laid before the Congress annually.' The modes of proof, therefore, including the rules of admissibility for witnesses and other evidence, are now by express congressional enactment placed under the authority of Executive regulation; and the rules laid down in this Manual have the force of such regulation. They therefore form the only binding rules, except such rules of evidence as are expressly prescribed (1) in the Articles of War; (2) in the Federal Constitution; and (3) in such Federal statutes as expressly mention courts-martial."

By the revised Articles of War of 1920 the same provision of 1916 (with slight modification) was continued. The Army Manual for Courts-Martial contains a succinct exposition, in 130 paragraphs, of the rules to be applied.— In a few States the military law makes provision for latitude of rules not unlike the Federal system.[11]

[11] Federal: U. S. St. June 4, 1920, Ch. V, subchapter II, Articles of War, Art. 38 ("The President may by regulations, which he may modify from time to time, prescribe the procedure, including modes of proof, in cases before courts-martial", etc.; "which regulations shall, in so far as he shall deem practicable, apply the rules of evidence generally recognized in the trial of criminal cases in the district courts of the United States"; but nothing so made shall be inconsistent with these Articles); 1920, A Manual for Courts-Martial, effective Feb. 4, 1921 (c. X, Witnesses and Depositions; c. XI, Evidence).

Louisiana: St. 1912, No. 191, § 99 ("The rules of evidence in all courts martial shall follow in general, so far as apposite, the common law rules of evidence as observed by the courts of this State in criminal cases, but a certain latitude in the introduction of evidence and the examination of witnesses by an avoidance of restrictive rules is permissible when it is in the interest of the administration of military justice");

Minnesota: Gen. St. 1913, § 2436 ("Military Courts are not bound by the technical rules of evidence prevailing in civil tribunals, and may depart therefrom when in

3. Juvenile Courts. The original reforms in the penal treatment of children preserved the theory of the criminal court. But the great innovation of principle took place in the Juvenile Court Act of Illinois, in 1890 (framed by Harvey B. Hurd), which adopted as the basis of its jurisdiction and procedure the chancery court's function as 'parens patriae.' This type of court obtained ample recognition, after the lapse of some decades, and has since then gone on supplanting the criminal type of court in all parts of the world.

Logically and practically, it is not bound in law to observe the jury-trial rules of Evidence. Nevertheless, it deals with adults in their relation to dependent and delinquent children, and must therefore at times employ repressive or compulsory measures which approach the border line of penality. For this reason, and because the responsibilities involve serious need of caution, it becomes a question how far the judge should consider himself morally bound to observe at least the fundamental framework of the jury-trial rules. There is constant pressure from lay-advisers to eliminate "technicalities." On the other hand, since the juvenile-court methods are undoubtedly due to be extended gradually to adult offenders in some fields, it is needful to build up a system that will not depart too radically from accepted traditions of criminal procedure.

The practice hitherto has been but scantily recorded and little disputed; and the Legislatures have been slow to intervene by statutes.[12] their opinion the exigencies of the case, the best interests of the service, or the ends of justice demand it"); St. 1917, c. 400, § 88 (same);

Texas: Rev. Civ. St. 1911, § 5861 ("The rules of evidence in all courts martial shall follow in general, so far as apposite, the common law rules of evidence as observed by the courts of this state in criminal cases; but a certain latitude in the introduction of evidence and the examination of witnesses by an avoidance of restrictive rules is permissible, when it is in the interest of the administration of military justice").

That the regular Courts do not attempt to review Courts-martial's rulings on the law of Evidence, is noted in R. v. Murphy, Ire. (1921), cited ante, § 4*b*.

[12] Arizona: Rev. St. 1913, P. C. § 261 (contribution to juvenile delinquency; "procedure under this chapter may be informal"; ordinary criminal procedure "may be followed, but a departure therefrom shall not be error" unless it deprives the accused of constitutional rights);
Arkansas: Dig. 1919, § 5764 ("The Court shall proceed to hear evidence");
California: 1920, Ex parte Tahbel, — Cal. App. —, 189 Pac. 804 (constitutional privilege against self-crimination applies in the juvenile court equally to juveniles; cited more fully post, § 2252);
Maryland: Ann. Code 1914, Art. 42, § 20 (the commitment of a minor to custody "shall be determined without regard to technicalities of procedure");
Massachusetts: Gen. L. 1920, c. 119, § 58 (delinquent juveniles; the Court shall "take such testimony relative to the case as shall be produced"); § 75 (criminal proceedings against juveniles; witnesses shall appear "and give evidence");
Minnesota: Gen. St. 1913, § 4060 (commitment to State training school; "the same presumption of innocence and the same rules of evidence shall prevail . . . as in the trial of criminal cases");
Missouri: Rev. St. 1919, § 2593 (juvenile delinquents; when charged with crime, "the practice and procedure . . . for criminal cases shall govern", otherwise the procedure "customary in proceedings in equity"); § 1136 (juvenile court; "the practice and procedure customary in proceedings in equity shall govern"); § 1151 (juvenile court may make its own rules of procedure);
North Carolina: Con. St. 1919, § 5047 (the Court shall "determine the case in a summary manner"); § 5061 (the Court may make "rules to regulate the procedure":
Porto Rico: St. 1915, Mar. 11, No. 37, § 16 (juvenile court; any case "may in the discretion of the Court be conducted informally");
Rhode Island: St. 1915, c. 1185 (juvenile court "need not be bound by the technical rules of evidence in receiving or admitting testimony");

The policy of the practice has been well set forth, from slightly different points of view, in the following utterances from experienced judges deeply interested in the efficiency of the juvenile Court:

1918, WINSLOW, C. J., in State v. Scholl, 167 Wis. 504, 167 N. W. 830 (rejecting an appeal by the father of two boys aged 10 and 11 who had been placed by the Juvenile Court in charge of probation officers, by reason of delinquency, under Stats. 1917, §§ 573–1 to 573–10; the order had been made after a hearing in the presence of the boys and the father, and was based largely on the probation officer's unsworn testimony, reporting the result of his investigation, including confessions of the boys to frequent prior misconduct of the sort):

"A democracy cannot long exist unless the great body of its voters be not merely intelligent, but moral. The children of to-day are the voters of to-morrow. It is the greatest concern of the state, therefore, that its children be preserved from vicious habits, for the vicious child is the father of the vicious man. The law before us may be said to be founded on these propositions. Its aim is to keep something like a parental watch over children who are neglected or wayward, or both, and hence are subject to vicious influences; to bring them and their parents or guardians before an experienced and humane judge, who shall inquire into the situation, not with the awe-inspiring and frigid methods of a criminal court, but informally and intimately, like a wise and gentle elder brother, or like the good Samaritan of Holy Writ, and who shall, when fully advised, do that which is best for the child's future, either by way of sending it to an institution or by providing for kind and tactful, but in no sense degrading, surveillance for a limited time at home. It would be a public misfortune to set aside a law so designed, even though it were not perfect in its details. Only the most weighty and convincing considerations could justify such action, and we do not think they exist here.

"The serious claims made will be briefly considered. It is said the constitutional guaranties of trial by jury and due process of law are denied. . . . The power of the state to exercise such control over the child is fully vindicated by Chief Justice Ryan in the case of Mil. Ind. School v. Supervisors, 40 Wis. 328, and it is there distinctly and eloquently held that such proceedings as these are not in any sense criminal proceedings. They are in fact simply investigations by the state into serious conditions which if unchecked may lead to the making of its children into criminals instead of law-abiding citizens. . . .

"In such investigations we know of no rule which prevents the use of investigation and unsworn testimony in ascertaining the essential facts. The desideratum is to obtain, by the use of kindness and sympathy, the confidence of the child and of its parents if possible, to convince them that the judge and probation officer are friends and not the avengers of offended law. Good results are far more likely to be obtained in this way by the use of informal methods than by bringing them into a court conducted with the form and ceremony attendant upon trials for crime, where all the proceedings suggest that the law is about to be invoked to inflict punishment upon hardened malefactors.

"It may be advisable, in cases where it seems best to take the child permanently from its parents and consign it to the care of an institution, that sworn testimony be taken and the essential facts thus proven before the final order is made, because in such case the natural

South Dakota: Rev. C. 1919, § 9998 (juvenile court; "all hearings . . . shall be informal in their nature, conducted under such rules and regulations as the Court may prescribe");
Utah: Comp. L. 1917, §§ 1816, 1820 (juvenile court; for adult misdemeanors, "the practice and procedure shall conform to the practice and procedure . . . for justice courts"; for delinquencies of children and for guardianship, "shall conform as nearly as possible" to that of district courts; and for "the delinquency of children and their disposition", exercising equity jurisdiction, the Court "to this end may adopt any form of procedure which is deemed best suited to ascertain the truth in the particular case"; the juvenile is compellable to testify, and the probation officer or other person is compellable to report the result of investigation); right of the parent to the custody of the child is invaded, and it would be desirable to avoid any question as to the validity of the order. We intimate no opinion on this point. It does not arise here. In the present case the boys were simply put on probation, and we regard the proceedings taken as entirely sufficient, although no witness was sworn. The investigations of the probation officer and the facts brought out by the kindly questioning of the judge upon the hearing substantiate the fact of delinquency fully as well as sworn testimony.
Wisconsin: 1918, State v. Scholl, 167 Wis. 504, 167 N. W. 830 (quoted supra).

"As a matter of fact there is no 'Juvenile Court' in the sense of a separate and independent court; it is so called simply for convenience, and is a jurisdiction rather than a distinct court. . . . This seems somewhat anomalous to us because we have been so long accustomed to the rigidity of our court system, but no constitutional or serious practical objection can be successfully urged against it. It is a common-sense step toward greater elasticity in the administration of the law by the courts which will doubtless be followed by many more."

1921, Hon. EDWARD F. WAITE (Judge of the Juvenile Court, Minneapolis), "How far Can Court Procedure Be Socialized without Impairing Individual Rights?" (Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology, XII, 339):

"(a) Conformity with Rules of Evidence. More serious questions arise in respect to conformity with the rules of Evidence. Speaking generally, rules of Evidence throughout the United States are the rules of the English common law, variously modified by local statutes, and uniform in their application to all courts deriving authority from the same source — the States or the Nation. I do not happen to know of any legislative rule of evidence peculiar to juvenile courts except a Minnesota statute permitting findings upon the written reports of official investigators with like effect as upon testimony received in open court in county allowance or mother's pension cases. Rules of ancient origin, approved or at least tolerated by the community for generations, encountered by the citizen whenever he resorts to other legal forums to assert or defend his rights, should not lightly be set aside in juvenile courts. The only safe practice is to observe them. If hearsay, for example, has not been found justly admissible in civil disputes and criminal trials, it is no better in juvenile court proceedings. Exceptions should be made when appropriate, and informal short cuts will often be found agreeable to all concerned; but the exception should always be recognized as an exception. No judge on any bench has need to be more thoroughly grounded in the principles of Evidence and more constantly mindful of them than the judge of a juvenile court. The boy against whom it is proposed to make an official record of misconduct, involving possible curtailment of his freedom at the behest of strangers, has a right to be found delinquent only according to law. The father, however unworthy, who faces a judicial proceeding, the event of which may be to say to him, 'This child of your loins is henceforth not your child: the State takes him from you as finally as though by the hand of death', that father may rightfully demand that the tie of blood shall be cut only by the sword of constitutional justice. Surely, those substantial rules of Evidence which would protect the boy if the state called its interference 'punishment' instead of 'protection', and would safeguard the father in the possession of his dog, should apply to issues which may involve the right of the boy to liberty within the family relationship, and the right of the father to his child. The greater the conceded discretion of the judge, and the freer he is from the vigilance of lawyers, and the less likely he is to have his mistakes corrected on appeal, so much the more careful should he be to base every judicial conclusion on evidence proper to be received in any court of justice. Otherwise the state's parental power which he embodies is prostituted; the interpreter of the law degenerates into the oriental kadi; and the juvenile court falls into suspicion and disrepute.

"(b) Investigation into Circumstances of Offense. If there is a question here, it must be as to the use to be made of information obtained rather than as to the propriety of a preliminary investigation through agents of the court. The value of such an investigation in suggesting inquiry at the hearing is obvious. But when there are issues of fact to be tried it seems to me equally plain that statements made to an investigator out of court should have no standing as evidence when they are disputed by parties in interest, who by the implications of their denial demand the same right to be confronted with the witnesses against them that is freely recognized in other judicial proceedings. Without attempting a discussion of 'due process of law', considerations of public policy seem conclusive. The undisciplined minds of the juveniles and most of the parents who come before the court cannot make clear distinctions between proceedings that are really friendly and paternal and those that are hostile, when the results may be alike in depriving them of liberty of action which they had before they came into court and are unwilling to surrender. Public opinion, too, looks askance upon any abandonment of traditional barriers against governmental interference with the citizen. However wise the judge and kind his purpose, he must have regard to both the individual and the community sense of justice; and Americans have an ingrained conviction that nothing, however well meant, ought to be forced upon them on the basis of information obtained behind their backs.

"Let it be observed that I am now discussing policy rather than constitutional rights. As respects non-criminal proceedings, I am not prepared to set limits to the power of the Legislature to enlarge and adapt to modern conditions the ancient methods of official inquisition. Professor Wigmore speaks of an increasing need 'for the more liberal recognition of an authority such as would make admissible various sorts of reports dealing with matters seldom disputable and only provable otherwise at disproportionate inconvenience and cost.' 'This policy', he says, 'when judiciously employed, greatly facilitates the production of evidence without introducing loose methods.' (Evidence, vol. III, § 1672.) It is probable that, as socialization of the courts proceeds, the tendency toward the use of this form of evidence will grow stronger; but popular prejudices must be reckoned with, and procedural convenience will be dearly bought if the cost be impairment of the general confidence in the administration of justice.

"When, however, the adjudication is made the situation changes. It has been lawfully determined that the facts warrant the interference of the Court. The nature and extent of that interference is discretionary with the judge within the limits set by the law. In exercising his discretion he may rely upon anything that brings conviction to his mind, and the parties concerned have no legal right to question the sources of his information. Here official investigation is a proper and valuable aid, whether made before or after the adjudication."

4. Commercial Courts; Courts of Conciliation. Wherever a new court, or judiciary branch, has been created or set apart, to act without a jury, and to do justice in a special class of cases by prompt dispatch of claims, there the jury-trial system of Evidence-rules does not control. History and policy alike dictate this conclusion.

In commercial causes, where the mercantile desire for prompt disposal has sometimes led to the establishment of a special court, this principle should obtain.[13]

[13] England: 1895, Commercial Causes, Notice (White, Stringer, and King's Annual Practice 1921, vol. II, p. 2370); Rule 6 (application may be made to the judge, under the Rules of the Supreme Court, or by consent, "to dispense with the technical rules of evidence, for the avoidance of expense and delay which might arise from commissions to take evidence and otherwise"). The practice under this Order can be seen in Mathews' Commercial Cases, vols. 1–26, 1895–1916 (with an Introduction in vol. I explaining the simple procedure under the Order; in half-a-dozen volumes casually selected, there was no title 'Evidence' in the Index).

So also in Canada, in proceedings to quiet title to land:

British Columbia: Rev. St. 1911, c. 192,

In small causes generally, for which courts of conciliation are rightly beginning to be used, it would be a defiance of common sense and a nullification of the main purpose, to enforce the jury-trial rules of Evidence; for the parties are expected to appear personally without professional counsel, and they cannot be expected to observe rules which they do not know.[14]

§ 4*e*. Private Arbitrators; Private Associations.

1. Arbitrators. A main object of a voluntary submission to arbitration is the avoidance of formal and technical preparation of a case for the usual procedure of a judicial trial. Moreover, though an arbitrator's award, to have compulsory effect, must receive ultimate judicial sanction, the arbitrator is himself not a judicial official, nor any official; and he investigates without a jury. On principle and policy alike, therefore, the jury-trial system of Evidence-rules ought not to be deemed to have force; and such has been the judicial conclusion.[1]

2. Private Associations. In clubs, fraternal orders, commercial boards, and the like, the contract-privilege of membership may be of great value. As an implied term of the contract, the association is not to terminate membership for cause without using some fair and apt procedure of adjudication, — an opportunity to hear the charges, to produce evidence in refutation, and so on. The Courts have always insisted on this. But neither in theory nor in policy, do the jury-trial rules of Evidence form any necessary part of the fundamentals of fair procedure for a private association :[2]

§ 9 (quieting title; like Ont. R. S. c. 123, § 9);
Newf. St. 1921, c. 21, § 8 (quieting title; like Ont. R. S. c. 123, § 9);
Ontario: Rev. St. 1914, c. 123, § 9 (quieting title; "the judge in investigating the title may receive and act upon any evidence . . . which the practice of conveyancers authorizes to be received on an investigation of title out of court, or any other evidence, whether the same is or is not receivable or sufficient in point of strict law" etc., if it "satisfies the judge" as to the facts).

[14] See the Journal of the American Judicative Society (Chicago, Herbert Harley, Secretary), 1912, passim, for accounts of these courts.

§ 4*e*. [1] ENGLAND: 1836, Symes v. Goodfellow, 2 Bing. N. C. 532 (arbitration not void because an inadmissible witness was heard); 1864, Wakefield v. Llanelly R. & D. Co., 34 Beau. 245, 249 (arbitration not void because a witness was not sworn); 1892, Keighley M. & Co. v. Bryan Durant & Co., 1 Q. B. 405, 411 (remitting an award for new evidence; Lord Esher, M. R.; "It has been argued that we ought not to remit the award unless the fresh evidence would be good evidence if the case were being tried in a court of law; but the parties have agreed to go before an umpire, who is not bound by the strict rules of evidence enforced in a court, and to be bound by his decision; and in my judgment the Court ought not to fetter the arbitrator or the parties by its own rules of evidence"); 1922, Ramsden & Co., r. Jacobs, 1 K. B. 640 (award of arbitrators set aside because "the arbitrators heard evidence of one party in the absence of the other"); 1921, Percival v. Peterborough Corp., 1 K. B. 414 (arbitrator held bound to consider certain evidence under rules expressly stated in St. 1919, Acquisition of Land Act, c. 57, s. 2).

UNITED STATES: Fed. 1914, Re Georgia & F. R. Co., D. C. S. D. Ga., 215 Fed. 195 (under U. S. St. 1913, July 15, 38 Stat. 103, Arbitration Act, an exception to the findings of the statutory arbitrators was that it was "unsupported by the testimony"; held, that "such courts are not confined . . . by technical rules of law; . . . [the parties] waived any rights to have the questions involved determined by the strict and cumbersome rules of the courts of law"); Conn. 1917, Whitney Co. v. Church, 91 Conn. 684, 101 Atl. 329 (rules of evidence not applicable in an arbitration where the parties consented to proceeding otherwise).

[2] ENGLAND: 1879, Labouchere v. Warncliffe, L. R. 13 Ch. D. 346, 352 (expulsion of Mr. Henry Labouchere from the Beefsteak Club; quoted supra).

1879, Sir George JESSEL, in Labouchere v. Earl of Warncliffe, L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 346: "'The committee are not to form an opinion until after inquiry.' What does that mean? What kind of inquiry is intended? The words do not mean that they are simply to take up a newspaper, see in it that Mr. A. B. has written a letter, or has been brought up at the police court for drunkenness, and then expel him. . . . What the rule I have quoted means is that there shall be a fair inquiry into the truth of the alleged facts. . . . What ought the committee of a club to do when the conduct of one of its members has been impugned? They ought to see what that conduct has been, and what excuse or reason can be given by the member for it; and they ought to give notice to that member that his conduct is about to be inquired into, and afford him an opportunity of stating his case to them. . . . In a case where a decision depended upon their opinion — in other words, upon their judgment — it was most important that the materials on which that judgment was formed should be accurately ascertained; and, of course, that could only be done by a proper investigation, by giving due notice to the accused and by taking — I do not say legal evidence, or that evidence not directly legal might not be admissible — but taking evidence on the question of fact before them, and satisfying themselves as to the truth. They could then form their opinion. . . . If, having given the accused fair notice, and made due inquiry, the committee came to the conclusion that the conduct of one of the members of the club was injurious to its welfare and interests, no judicial tribunal could interfere with any consequences which might arise from an opinion thus fairly formed."

1920, SEARS, J., in Cabana v. Holstein-Friesian Ass'n, Sup. Ct., 182 N. Y. Suppl. 658 (cancellation of a certificate of registration in a herd-book; requirements of a fair hearing, examined): "The association is not bound by the rules of common-law evidence. If such were the rule, almost no decision of such a body as this could be sustained. In the case of the defendant association, the directors have no power to subpœna witnesses. It may be impossible to obtain the presence of all the persons having knowledge of the circumstances. Under such circumstances, an explanation being offered, it would not be necessarily unfair to receive 'ex parte' statements and other hearsay evidence. Whether such a proceeding would be fair or not can only be determined when all the facts are before the Court, and not in such an anticipatory action as this. As a general rule it cannot be doubted that a person whose property rights are involved should be confronted by the witnesses against him, and have an opportunity to cross-examine, and a departure from this rule must be the exception."

UNITED STATES: Connecticut: 1921, Gervasi v. Societa Giuseppe Garibaldi, 96 Conn. 30, 112 Atl. 693 (expulsion from a beneficial society, whether the charges must have been presented in writing, etc.; Wheeler, C. J.: "In actions by or against fraternal organizations, their course is not to be determined by close adherence to the forms of legal procedure or to the exact observance of those rules of practice which govern in the case of public bodies");

Indiana: 1920, Gardner v. Newbert, — Ind. App. —, 128 N. E. 704 (labor union; expulsion without hearing on charges will be enjoined);

Kansas: 1907, Harris v. Aiken, 76 Kan. 516, 521, 92 Pac. 537 (explosion from a livestock exchange; argued that the committee "was influenced by information obtained from persons who did not appear at the hearing and whom he had no opportunity to cross-examine"; held, that "it was not at all necessary . . . that the ordinary rules of evidence should have been enforced");

Michigan: 1904, Derry v. Great Hive, 135 Mich. 494, 98 N. W. 23 (death claim disallowed by a committee on the ground of false representations; the medical examiner had mentioned the statement of a neighbor; "this statement would of course have been incompetent in a court of law; [but] if these proceedings are to be controlled by the rules governing suits at law, probably not one of the hearings before these orders could be sustained"); 1904, Barker v. Great Hive, 135 Mich. 499, 98 N. W. 23 (like Derry v. Great Hive; physician's affidavits had been admitted, also an unsworn physician's certificate; held (1) that the plaintiff's initial use of such evidence was an estoppel; (2) that "it is not to be supposed that in his hearing before the Great Hive strict regard will be paid to legal rules of evidence; . . . the only rule for the admission and exclusion of testimony is common fairness"); 1904, Dick v. Supreme Body, 138 Mich. 372, 101 N. W. 564 (death claim disallowed; a physician's affidavit to deceased's

§ 4*f*. Social Case-Work. If the ordinary Courts, the bulwark of our justice, can learn from other kinds of tribunals that the jury-trial rules of Evidence are not the only nor the indispensable means of arriving at truth, so too, on the other hand, all investigators having to do with inquiries into issues of human conduct can learn from the Courts that the jury-trial rules represent a vast body of accumulated experience, and that this experience has value for all such investigations and should be utilized so far as applicable.

A chief field is that large enterprise known as "social case-work", i.e. the personal administration of philanthropic help and advice, through representatives of private and public agencies, to families and individuals whose domestic affairs go wrong and are not self-corrected. The problem presented is analogous to the judicial one; for the ultimate purpose is action by the agency, and that action must depend upon ascertainment of facts, and those facts, involving human conduct and conditions, are ascertainable through much the same materials of proof as the facts of ordinary judicial litigation.

The field is extensive and important; and fortunately a leader of thought has arisen, to point out to this group of investigators the necessity for systematic study of evidence, and the utility of the principles already embodied in the jury-trial rules:

communications had been received: held, that the statutory privilege was binding for such proceedings; and the finding was void; "it is clear that the validity of adjudications of this character is not lessened by the circumstance that technical rules for the admission of evidence are disregarded; it is likewise true that within the limits of common fairness such tribunals may prescribe their own rules of evidence; but . . . they have no right to violate any law which the State power prescribes for their guidance"; unsound; the statute did not expressly apply to private associations);

Nebraska: 1917, O'Brien v. South Omaha L. S. Exchange, 101 Nebr. 729, 164 N. W. 724 (expulsion from membership in a live stock exchange; in such a hearing, "it is not required that the procedure be tested by the rigid rules of criminal pleading and practice");

New York: 1900, Kopp v. White, Sup. Sp. T., 65 N. Y. Suppl. 1017 (expulsion from a Masonic lodge; held (1) that the proceedings were governed only by the rules of the society, (2) as to certain hearsay, that "hearsay evidence is not always incompetent, but is frequently allowed in trials in courts of record, and is evidence so far as it goes, and if not objected to may in the absence of other evidence become conclusive upon the party"); 1921, Cabana v. Holstein-Friesian Ass'n, Sup. App. Div., 188 N. Y. Suppl. 277, 284 (injunction refused to plaintiff, a member of defendant record association, seeking to prevent it from canceling cattle records obtained by fraud except after a hearing of a certain sort; the defendant was willing and ready to give a hearing; the trial court provided in its order that the mode of procedure at such hearing should "accord to the plaintiff a fair and impartial trial, which, however, does not necessarily confine the board to the receiving of common-law evidence; in case any witness cannot be produced after an explanation is offered the board may in the exercise of sound discretion receive ex parte statements and other hearsay evidence coming from such absent witness; this shall be applicable to all parties appearing; but in all respects any such exercise of discretion shall be subject to the general rule above stated that the hearing shall be fair and impartial"; plaintiff appealed from the ruling that the board was not necessarily confined to common-law evidence; on appeal, it was held that the trial court "should not have passed upon that question in advance", and that part of the order was stricken out; this decision not to decide is another example of the pedantic litigation-breeding procrastination of supreme courts);

Rhode Island: 1917, Fales v. Musicians' Protective Union, 40 R. I. 34, 99 Atl. 823 (rule of notice and opportunity for cross-examination applied to proceedings of expulsion from a trade-union).

1917, Miss Mary E. Richmond, Social Case-Work (Russell Sage Foundation Publications), pp. 38, 41–45: "I. Social Evidence Differentiated; From the beginning of his task the social case worker deals with testimonial evidence in a way shaped by the end for which it was obtained; namely, the social treatment of individuals. As he proceeds he often finds himself in need of more knowledge as to the weight which should be attached to the social evidence he has gathered. Are there rules of evidence, principles of choice, that can guide him in selecting from a group of unassorted observations and testimonies those which he can rely upon from those which must be accepted with a grain of salt? If so, are these principles peculiar to social work, so that its practitioners will be obliged to dig them out from their own experience alone, or may they hope to find them already identified in law book or laboratory?

"That there are such rules to guide the social worker is intimated by a correspondent who had gone from a charity organization society to a society to protect children from cruelty. He writes:

'As a result of my experience both with C. O. S. and with S. P. C. C. investigators, there seems to me a weakness in the training of the C. O. S. district secretary, who from the nature of her duties is constantly required to weigh evidence but who has not got clearly in mind the fundamental differences between different classes of evidence and their different values. I do not now refer to the nice discriminations; those I am content to leave to trained lawyers to squabble over. Not only would the co-operation with a S. P. C. C. be at once improved, but evidence as it stands in a C. O. S. investigation would be increased in value and reduced in bulk. I confess to considerable impatience at times when I find district secretaries of some and even of great experience apparently valuing every statement equally and then adding the items together to find a total.'

"Many will share this correspondent's impatience with such arithmetic. Nevertheless, no considerable group of social case workers — whether in a society to protect children or a charity organization society or anywhere else — seem to have grasped the fact that the reliability of the evidence on which they base their decisions should be no less rigidly scrutinized than is that of legal evidence by opposing counsel. On the other hand, the question of admissibility, the rules for which were framed mainly to meet the average juryman's lack of skill in testing evidence, does not enter into the weighing of facts as gathered by an agency all in whose service are, or can be, trained to this special task. Skill in testing evidence, as leading to such proof as social workers need, is in no way dependent upon a knowledge of the legal rules of admissibility. Social evidence, like that sought by the scientist or historian, includes all items which, however trifling or apparently irrelevant when regarded as isolated facts, may, when taken together, throw light upon the question at issue; namely, as regards social work, the question what course of procedure will place this client in his right relation to society? Many an item, such as a child's delayed speech, for instance, may have no significance in itself, whereas when considered in connection with late dentition and walking and with convulsions it may become a significant part of evidence as to the child's mentality. Social evidence, then, has an advantage over legal evidence in that it can include facts of slight probative value. . . .

"In examining the reliability of evidence, social case work should make its own application of universal tests; and, coming late to the task, should be able to profit by the experiences not merely of law, but of history and of natural science. The various professions apply rules of evidence for arriving at truth, each according to its own special conditions. The scientist uses controlled experimentation because he works with material which may be brought under complete control. He may, for instance, till half of an orchard whose physical conditions, soil, grade, exposure, etc., are the same throughout. If the tilled half bears much better than the untilled, he concludes that tilling increases the product of fruit trees. When, however, the farmer in the fable digs in his orchard for buried treasure, and in place of gold finds his promised fortune in an unprecedented yield of fruit, he probably draws no causal inferences whatever.

"Should a social worker have the task of showing whether the farmer's labor had paid or not, he would get the testimony of the farmer, of his family, and his neighbors as to the previous care of the trees; their evidence as to any other measures of improvement he might have taken, such as pruning, thinning out, etc.; their recollection, corroborated by governmental reports, of weather conditions, pests, etc., of preceding years. He would take account of hearsay evidence, of persistent rumors, of the general appearance of the man's farm and home. As a result, the social worker might establish or discredit the value of tillage in this instance with a fair degree of probability.

"Suppose, on the other hand, some decision in a law court should turn on the question whether or not it was his tilling of the soil that had brought the farmer an increased yield of fruit. The court would deal in the main with the same facts as the social worker, namely, with the testimony of witnesses, with government reports, or with an inspection of the premises; the difference would be that a court would guard with scrupulous care the admission of hearsay evidence and would exclude rumors; that it would, in short, hold each witness to a responsibility for his statements, allowing him in the main to say nothing of which his own knowledge was not first-hand. This evidence might or might not satisfy the court beyond a reasonable doubt that it was justified in concluding that tillage had increased the farmer's yield. But these restrictions upon evidence are necessary in law because of the obligation the judge is under of sifting evidence for a jury who are liable to allow undue weight to items which have small value as proof. . . .

"It is clear, then, that whereas social evidence is distinguished from that used in natural science by an actual difference in the subject matter, it differs from legal evidence not in the sort of facts offered, but in the greater degree of probative value required by the law of each separate item. . . .

"In short, social evidence may be defined as consisting of any and all facts as to personal or family history which, taken together, indicate the nature of a given client's social difficulties and the means to their solution. Such facts, when duly tested in ways that fit the uses to which they are to be put, will influence, as suggested in the preceding chapter, the diagnosis of physical and mental disorders, will reveal unrecognized sources of disease, will change court procedure with reference to certain groups of defendants, and will modify methods in the school classroom. To a certain extent social evidence is already exerting this influence, but the demand for such evidence is likely far to outstrip the supply during this next decade.

"II. The Wider Use of Social Evidence. Scattered and tentative as they still are, the signs of such coming demand are nevertheless unmistakable; the uses of social evidence in the older professions are beginning to multiply, as the following illustrations will show:

A specialist in the diagnosis of feeble-mindedness committed two difficult girls to custodial care, largely on the facts supplied him from first-hand observations by a children's aid society as to the characteristics of these girls and of their families. The 'stream pictures' furnished in summaries of two case records, covering two years in one instance and nine in the other, were his most conclusive evidence.

"The nature of these 'stream pictures' may be gathered from Dr. W. E. Fernald's discussion of the evidence needed by the psychiatrist for making a diagnosis of mental defect. Some of this evidence, although obtainable by social workers, is of course medical in character, that is, delayed dentition, late walking, delayed speech, a history of convulsions in the first few years of life, the presence of degenerative stigmata. Much of it, however, is precisely the slight but cumulative evidence which social workers habitually gather as bearing on disabilities; namely, facts of family and personal history with special reference to the period of infancy and early childhood, a relatively long continuance of untidy habits (of childhood), the public school grade in relation to age, inability on the part of the patient to apply himself continuously either in school or in any other occupation without constant supervision. In some cases with only slight intellectual defect, the inability to 'make good' socially will be a deciding factor in the diagnosis. . . .

"We have also seen in the discussion of Beginnings that the Children's Courts of the United States owe their existence to social workers. These courts supplement legal evidence by social. Not only have the courts come to recognize the value of a more liberal inclusion of imperfectly relevant evidence in disposing of child offenders; they are growing to feel that even the method of gathering this evidence has an influence upon the welfare of the child. They believe that such investigation should be inspired not by the ambition to run down and convict a criminal but by a desire to learn the best way to overcome a boy's or girl's difficulties. The need of modifying in these courts the usual legal procedure is thus commented upon by Flexner and Baldwin:

'The best interests of the child make it necessary for the court to consider hearsay and other evidence of a more or less informal kind which would ordinarily under strict rules of evidence be excluded. It is of the utmost importance that the court should avail itself of just the kind of evidence that the investigator [the probation officer] presents. If it should finally be determined that the laws as drawn do not permit the introduction of such evidence, express provision should be inserted in the statutes allowing its use.'

"Another court having its origin in needs brought to light by social work is the court of Domestic Relations, which may in time be merged with the Children's Court. It suffers at present from inability to secure and use the necessary social evidence. This experiment, like many others, will continue to fall short of full usefulness until social workers develop the diagnostic skill that will enable them to offer to the court authenticated and pertinent information. The following is a case in point:

"A court of domestic relations sentenced a man for desertion and non-support on the testimony of his wife. The wife then applied to a charity organization society for relief for herself and four children. The district secretary, assuming that on the face of it this convicted man was good-for-nothing, asked her committee to arrange for assistance to the family. It was with reluctance that the secretary at the suggestion of her committee agreed to make what she regarded as a superfluous investigation of the man's side of the story. This inquiry, however, brought statements from employers, former neighbors, relatives, etc., which showed that the trouble lay not with the man, who was a decent enough fellow, but with the woman, who was probably mentally unbalanced. Instead of voting relief, therefore, the district committee asked the judge to release the man.

"In short, the secretary in question would hardly have been qualified to persuade a court of the helpfulness of social evidence, while she herself was capable of treating an inference — that as to the man's character — as if it were an evidential fact. . . .

"It would seem that social evidence is beginning to receive recognition. The endeavors of social workers are bringing to light ways of thinking and doing that prove useful in quite other fields. The fact that law, medicine, history, and psychology, in their effort to break new ground, have been opening the same vein of truth, shows a growing demand for the kind of data that social practitioners gather. The absence of any generally accepted tests of the reliability of such evidence, however, still keeps this new demand itself ill defined and unstandardized. Personal histories which might appear sufficiently authenticated to a shop manager might strike a neurologist as inadequate for conclusions, while they would certainly be open to objections from a court. Progress on the social side of these several fields of endeavor will be hastened as social workers subject their own experiences to a more critical and searching analysis."

The treatise above quoted, though a pioneer work, has in a masterly manner applied the principles of Evidence to the whole complex field of social case-work. As illustrations of the useful possibilities suggested for this field by the State Court of the decisions of other State Courts. Except in four or five States, the opinions are full of citations from other States. Those other States' decisions are not binding as precedents; their use tends to unsettle the law of the Court that resorts to them. To rely upon a ruling from another Court, not in the least binding, is of course to give a quality of optionalness in the use of precedents. And so the genuine doctrine of precedents is every day undermined by this loose resort to the law of other States. We possess all the drawbacks of having 'stare decisis', and also all the drawbacks of not having it.

The immediate causes of this loose practice are mainly two already mentioned, — the lack of thorough familiarity with the Court's own prior decisions, and the facile resort to digests and compilations.

5. A shortcoming kindred in its nature to the preceding is over-consideration of every point of law raised on the briefs. This shows faithfulness and industry; for which we should be and are grateful. But it tends to remove the decision from the really vital issues of each case, and to transform the opinion into a list of rulings on academic legal assertions. The opinion is as related to the meat of the case as a library catalogue is to the contents of the books. This is far from exercising the true and high function of the Supreme Court.

One immediate cause of it is the removal of the Supreme Court on high, away from direct touch with the arena of the litigation. In the great days of Erskine, Eldon, Garrow, and Denman, the appellate judges were also trial judges. The peculiar American separation of the trial judge from the appellate judge has tended to make the latter more and more of a legal monk, immured in a Carthusian cell and cultivating his little plot of the law's barren logic. But (as Mr. Justice Holmes has said) "other tools are needed besides logic; the life of the law has not been logic; it has been experience."

One more and a deeper cause there certainly is for this trait, — the substantial loss (temporary, let us hope) of the conception of justice, in contrast to rule of law, as an element in every case. Whenever this conception shall be restored to its due place, and judges shall be less timid about mentioning the word, this defect will lessen. Read some of the late Chief Justice Furman's recent opinions, in the Oklahoma Court of Criminal Appeal, to see how judicial law can frankly express itself in terms of justice, when needed, and yet maintain the true spirit of law. For the older generation, Lumpkin senior, of Georgia, and Doe, of New Hampshire, are good examples.

6. Finally, another shortcoming is the one-man opinion. Of course, nobody knows just how widespread this practice is. And the method of deliberation and decision of the issue, and of preparation and approval of the opinion, differs widely. But even where in name it is an adequate method, we believe that (except for a few Courts, and for a few much-controverted cases in the other Courts) the opinion is too often intellectually a one-man opinion. And that is what we lament.

The standard to seek for is that all the law of every opinion should be intelligently affirmed to be law by every member of the Court. If not, it is not Court law, but individual's law. And yet the very merit of a bench Court is that it shall represent the fusion of all the variant knowledges, experiences, temperaments, and talents of five or seven or nine representative leaders of legal thought, and thereby shall come as near to being safe and sound as human devising can make it. This standard means, for example, that if seven important issues of law are raised on appeal, and if one of them is a supposed rule that a creditor, to maintain a bill to reach a fraudulent purchaser from the debtor, must first have reduced his claim against the debtor to a judgment, then each and every member of the court who signs the opinion sanctioning or repudiating that rule must be able to say that he believes it from personal familiarity with the sources of law in his State. Anything less than this is intellectually not a full Court opinion.

That full Court opinions, in this sense, are few, is the strong impression given by the opinions themselves. The main cause for this state of things is one among the complex of causes already mentioned, — the pressure for quick despatch, created in part by the profession mobbing the appellate courts with appeals, and in part by the community's disinclination to give the judges ample time for the personal study of every case.

Two supposed shortcomings must now be mentioned, only to repudiate their existence or relative importance.

7. Corruption and political bias. Amidst the ululations of the demagogues, and the suspicions of the laity, it is a duty to express a sense of satisfaction at the lack of reasonable grounds for complaint on the score of corrupt intent and political bias. Few of us can know the hearts of any of the judges, — whether attackers or defenders. We must rely for our working estimates upon their attitudes as exhibited in their judgments of law upon the facts of the cases submitted. Those data give us no right to form any sinister impressions. On the contrary, they give us the right to be eminently satisfied, and all along the line of the States. Doubtless there are particular judgments, now and then, for which the hidden motive of one or two judges was either a corrupt subservience to political creditors or a partisan political basis. But, in the first place, these instances are negligible in estimating the mass. In the next place, they represent (so far as they have occurred) not a judicial shortcoming, but a shortage in the morality of the community; any other number of representative lawyers that might have replaced them would have contained as many men susceptible to such weaknesses. And in the third place, in their effect upon daily judicial justice as a system, they are of small consequence relatively to the habitual shortcomings already enumerated.

Whatever the significance of such instances in popular politics, they should not blind us to the great fact that the daily labors of the fifty Supreme Courts on the thousands of litigated cases are marked by conscientiousness and impartiality. Too much dust has been stirred up in public discussion on this issue. Wherever such charges are merited, they can and should be attended to on the merits of each charge. But it is unfortunate that the clouds thus raised about our judiciary have obscured the study of the real shortcomings which habitually deteriorate the system of judicial justice, as a whole and every day.

8. Economic and class bias. This is another shortcoming of which much has been made of late years. The fact, in some extent, cannot be denied. But the question is, What is its significance for the steady qualities of our judicial law?

In the first place, it was shared with the profession and the community as a whole; it was not a peculiar trait of the judicial system. For example, up to, say, A.D. 1900, there was not a voice raised to upbraid the judges with the fellow-servant rule; none of us (virtually) knew any better.

In the second place, a main occasion for the apparent contrast between judicial and public opinion has been the constitutional limitations upon legislative power, committed to the judiciary for protection. This is a peculiar governmental function, — something outside of the regular system of justice in litigation. The issue raised by it is an issue as to the wisest method for distributing political powers — not an issue as to judicial justice.

In the third place, any shortcoming in this respect, on the part of the judges when allotted that political function, is certain to be corrected by the force of public opinion, whenever that opinion has itself been clarified and focused and has spread to the incumbents of the bench. Already, indeed, the bench is seen, within a few years, to have become responsive to this public opinion. In other words, this shortcoming, being due to the judges' convictions on matters of general public conviction, is bound to right itself in due season, — whatever may be the subject of the views. But the professional, the essentially judicial, shortcomings, will never be directly affected by changes in current public opinion. They are technical, they concern the judges' way of thinking about their own specialty; hence they are esoteric; and general public conviction does not know about them and does not get at them.

This is why the shortcomings that are going to remain habitual are more to be concerned over. They are incurable, unless within the profession we set about analyzing them and seeking consciously to remove them. And this is why the emphasis has here been put upon the six traits already enumerated. They are traits of the judiciary in the core of their professional work, — traits of their way of doing justice under the law. And they are blemishes on the system, as judged by a standard which our profession is capable of appreciating and accepting.

(I) The Judicial Decisions; (B) In the Law of Evidence. What are the special traits of the judicial attitude, in Supreme Courts, in their treatment of the law of Evidence? We may assume it understood that the solid function of the law of Evidence is to assist the discovery of truth in trials, while safeguarding the jury from false estimates of evidence, by means of rules of exclusion based on long experience in jury trials.

1. Enforcement of rules regardless of Dispute over their Need. A cardinal shortcoming is the judicial habit of enforcing a rule of Evidence, regardless of whether there is any dispute as to the need of enforcing that particular rule in the case in hand. The rules of Evidence, that is, are erected into a supreme end in themselves. They are not restricted to their sole value, as tools for truth. For example, a plaintiff suing on a contract for goods offers a copy of a shipping receipt affecting part of the goods. The rule of Evidence requires that he should first show loss of the original. His showing does not disclose due diligence. The rule forecloses him; the copy is rejected; the proof fails for that part of the case. Meanwhile, the opposing counsel, except for his objection, sits silent; the Court never once asks him, "Do you really dispute the correctness of this copy? Is there any word in it that is falsified?" For all that the trial Court or the Supreme Court knows or asks, the copy may be exactly correct, and the opponent may have no 'bona fide' doubt at all on that point. If so, the rule's enforcement is a vain piece of legal tactics; for the sole and acknowledged purpose of that rule is to secure accurate copies. If in fact the rule's sole purpose is achieved, it is 'functus officio,'—ended, for that case and that offer. Why use it merely to penalize the party?

In thousands and thousands of rulings this is and long has been the way of using the rules of Evidence. No other applied science in the world uses its rules in that way. Suppose an architect were to prepare the data for sinking deep caissons in a sand subsoil, and then the drills should disclose unexpectedly that solid rock underlies one-fourth of his building area at a depth of twenty feet. Would he go on to order the caissons, wait six months for them, blast out the solid rock, and sink his caissons in spite of all? He has got his solid foundation without them; shall he needlessly spend all the time and money on them nevertheless? There is only one answer to this for the architect. But the judge with his rules of Evidence doggedly persists in the other answer.

Of late years, in England and Canada, the system of settling issues before trial by a master or judge in chambers, and the general spirit of the Rules of Court of 1883, has placed those courts (so we hear) where they should be in the present respect. But in the United States no signs anywhere appear of such a spirit. Read any brief; read any opinion. In vain you search. The wrangling at the trial, and the logic-chopping in the opinions, go on pertinaciously, regardless of whether there is any real basis for dispute as to the fact.

What is wanted is a principle something like this: A rule of Evidence need not be enforced, if the Court, on inquiry of counsel or otherwise, finds that there is no bona fide dispute between the parties as to the fact which the offered Evidence tends to prove, or that the danger against which the rule aims to safeguard does not exist for the case in hand.

Such a principle, fathfully observed by judges, would clear the air of much of the legal malaria now caused by the rules of Evidence.

2. Trial Court given no Discretion. Another marked shortcoming is the Supreme Courts' habit of treating the rules of Evidence as a rigid steel-work invariably applicable in precisely the same way. The rules are never allowed to bend. The Supreme Court, sitting up aloft, far removed in time and space from the actual trial, does not know whether the case was one in which the rules might have been allowed to bend; therefore the rules are rigidly enforced on appeal, and hundreds of new trials granted accordingly.

But this is highly academic and unpractical, — as unpractical as the chambered abstractions of any professorial dryasdust. Every man of experience knows that the rules of Evidence are based on generalities, on broad policies of experience, and are meant for typical situations, — but for those only. We all know that in the application of them, from case to case, the abstract situation, for which they are supposed to be meant, does not necessarily exist; it is varied, in the case in hand. And therefore the rule should bend. For example, one Supreme Court has a rigid rule of thumb, for proving loss of the original of a document, that some inquiry must have been made of the last possessor. This is a very sensible rule, as a rule, but to enforce it rigidly without exception, as that Court does, is the opposite of sensible.

Again, the application of most rules of Evidence to the facts depends on circumstances so varied and so elusive that no appellate court can expect to be well possessed of them from the bare record. The trial judge, on the other hand, is well possessed of them. Why should the Supreme Court insist on including that part of the work in its function? For example, a party desiring to use a copy of a lost original must show due diligence in searching for the original. This preliminary fact is best decided by the trial Court. Yet in hundreds of opinions the Supreme Courts attempt to repass on that question.

True enough, Supreme Courts are frequently found declaring that the application of a rule was "in the trial Court's discretion, unless that discretion was abused." But mostly, we regret to note, this expression is (as the Spaniards say) mere palaver. For the Supreme Court then goes on to examine elaborately the trial Court's ruling, and, as likely as not, reverses it. In other words, it is often an abuse of discretion not to agree with the Supreme Court, if the latter on its lesser information takes the opposite view. The Supreme Judicial Courts of Massachusetts and of New Hampshire, on many rules, do faithfully relegate their application to the trial judge. In no other Supreme Court is any such habitual attitude noticeable.

What is wanted is a sharp distinction, faithfully enforced, between the rule of law and its application. On the former — the tenor of the rule — the Supreme Court should determine. On the latter, the trial Court's ruling should be final. And for most rules, the principle should also be recognized that, for special reasons, an exception may always be made by the trial Court.

3. Charging the Jury on the Weight of Evidence. Another radical shortcoming is the prohibition to the trial judge (outside of the Federal Courts and those of a few Atlantic States) to express his views to the jury on the weight of the evidence in the case.

This is a large question. Many members of the bar strongly prefer this practice. Yet many others are coming to believe that the other and orthodox practice, coeval with the jury system itself, is after all the only wise one. But here it is desired merely to point out the way in which the present system maximizes the weaknesses of the rules of Evidence.

Those rules are mainly aimed at guarding the jury from the overweening effect of certain kinds of evidence. The whole fabric is kept together by that purpose. The rules are supposed to enshrine that purpose. Hence, of course, when such evidence enters in technical violation of that rule, the apprehended harm may be done, — i.e. the jury may be misled or mis-affected by it, to the hurt of the truth. And so, the harm being possibly or probably done, but incurably, now that the jury has gone, the Supreme Court can only say, "Try it over, with another jury."

But why use such a cumbrous method? Why not let the trial judge correct the possible misimpression by a few words at the trial? In hundreds of instances this can be done with entire effect and safety. Take the Opinion rule, for example. A policeman, on a murder trial, telling about the bloody hatchet he found, is asked, "Was it human blood?" and the answer gets in. "Yes, it looked to me like human blood." Instead of ordering a new trial because the jury might give to this layman's guess a value which it does not have, why not let the trial judge say to the jury in his charge: "You must not pay any attention, gentlemen, to the policeman's notion about the blood being human. He knows nothing about the difference between different kinds of blood. He is no expert in blood. You heard chemists here, on both sides, testify from their analyses and give their reasons and scientific processes. Decide from their testimony. Do not mind what the policeman thought."

Hundreds of petty slips could be amply corrected in this way. But not under our present system. No; the ponderous machine of a new trial must be laboriously set going again from the beginning; all the complicated levers, cranks, cogs, and wheels must turn once more; and vast effort and tedious time again be consumed, — all to do what could as well be done by merely removing the gag from the trial judge's mouth.

Any one who will study the opinions of Supreme Courts can satisfy himself that the permission to the trial judge to express his opinion on matters of evidence would remove a large part of the supposed harm done by trifling transgressions of the rules of Evidence, and would thus remove much of the abuse of new trials.

(II) The Law of Evidence; its Faults and its Future. Suppose that we were now to change the law of Evidence, at needful points; what changes should be made?

Before offering a critical summary of such changes, three or four general facts must be rehearsed; for perhaps we do not all realize them to be facts, and perhaps extreme partisans on either hand will benefit their cause by conceding them.

1. A complete abolition of the rules in the future is at least arguable, — not merely in theory, but in realizable fact. They are to-day largely ignored in the practice of several important jurisdictions, — in the Interstate Commerce Commission, in Patent litigation, in Admiralty trials, and in (some of) the Juvenile Courts. The extent of this practice, and its significance, has already been examined (ante, § 4*a*–4*f*). It shows that, in the United States and to-day, justice can be done without the orthodox rules of Evidence. Whether this fact will permanently demonstrate an ability to dispense with the rules, remains to be seen. Meanwhile, it must not be taken as a demonstration, but merely as a suggestion, that the thing is not so impossible as the Bar would have supposed, a few years ago.

2. To abolish the bulk of the rules now, in the ordinary courts, would be a futile attempt. To pass a law (supposing this possible, in the hasty manner of our "freak" legislation) would amount to little or nothing. You cannot by fiat legislate away the brain-coils of one hundred thousand lawyers and judges; nor the traditions embedded in a hundred thousand recorded decisions and statutes. And the plain fact is that trials are to-day being managed by these men and these books, as the living receptacle of the rules. More than this, the temperament is there, — the temperament in which the rules find a solid lodgment and nourishment. The thing has been tried in many countries and in many ages; and as a reform it has never succeeded (exceptions excepted), even when enforced by a powerful government. As an importation of alien law (which is not the case in hand), it has sometimes succeeded, but only after a century or more of slow pressure. Any one who knows our profession from within knows that it would be a vain dream to think of abolishing the rules of Evidence, as a system, until all mature practitioners and judges now alive had passed into the grave. And in the meantime, since trials must go on, a new generation will have been bred into the same system.

Furthermore, assuming that the fiat were issued and accepted, the new method would have all the risk of an experiment only. We cannot be sure how it would work. We have no experience except under the present system. The present one has some deep roots in the necessities of human nature. And, as human nature will go on just the same, can we expect to handle it without any rules at all? Certainly as much false justice may be done by a chaotic trial as by a chess-game trial. Do we know that our judges and our lawyers, as men, and without any rules, will be able and willing to manage the ordinary jury trial, in matters of proof, as successfully as (for example) the Interstate Commerce trials are managed?

And so, much as we might wish to try the experiment, and promising as the other examples may be, it is futile to plan such a radical change. We may as well realize that the change will have to come as a growth, — a growth of improvement both in the rules and in the men. And this is the way in which almost all legal progress, that was progress, has come about.

3. Most practitioners, to-day, are unskilled in the rules of Evidence. This is a hard saying; but those who ought to know report it so unanimously. The trial judges know the rules better, but still imperfectly. Is it not startling to reflect on the meaning of this?

It means, in the first place, that the rules to a large extent fail of their professed purpose. They serve, not as needful tools for helping the truth at trials, but as game-rules, afterwards, for setting aside the verdict. Neither lawyer knew them well enough to avoid numerous violations of them at the trial; but afterwards the defeated lawyer (having duly emitted a machine-gun fire of objections) studied a few of them for the purpose of pointing out on appeal his opponent's errors. If the new trial is needed because neither the successful lawyer nor the trial judge knew the niceties well enough, then by hypothesis the system of Evidence failed, after all, for that trial, to accomplish its purpose.

And, in the second place, it means that there are thousands of trials in which neither attorney knew enough either to observe the rules' niceties or even to point out his opponent's errors, and yet a verdict was reached which satisfied the judge. In other words, owing to ignorance of the rules, they were not enforced, and yet justice (presumably) was as well done as if they had been enforced. How far this is the fact, no one can know. But the widespread ignorance of the rules shows that it must be a large fact. And the moral is that we can probably get along just as well without enforcing many of the niceties of the rules.

4. The jury of laymen must be reckoned with. Our system of Admissibility is based on the purpose of saving the jurors from being misled by certain kinds of evidence. Their inexperience in analyzing evidence, and their unfamiliarity with the chicanery of counsel, distinguish them from the judge in this respect. As long, then, as the jury system is retained, certain fundamentals (at least) in our rules of Evidence must be retained.

To be sure, the jury itself might be abolished. Here we have the examples of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the others, to warrant us in supposing that the rules of Evidence might no longer be needed. Will it be, or should it be, abolished? This is a hard question, nowadays, for some to answer; for a few, it is easy. For some of those few, it is easy to answer: No.

In the first place, no one would think of abolishing jury trial merely to enable the rules of Evidence to be discarded. It would have to go by reason of its own defects, if at all.

In the next place, its own defects may be incidental and remediable, not inherent. They have never been fully examined with this distinction in mind. Some of them are obviously incidental accretions of American practice, and are no essential part of jury trial; for example, evasion of jury duty by responsible citizens, excessive challenging, over-nice disqualifications. All these have tended to reduce the intelligence of the jury; and a restoration of jurorial intelligence (which the change of these practices might effect) would render so much the more needless the precautions of the rules of Evidence.

Again, the constitutional limitations upon jury trial have prevented (except in three or four States) any experimenting with a jury system improved but not abolished. It will be time enough to flee to our Charybdis, the judge-jurors of fact, when we have sufficiently tested the possibilities of our Scylla, the lay-jurors of fact. Till then, it will be wiser to wait.

We must keep in mind, then, that the modern American jury's defects are in large part non-inherent and remediable, and that we have experimented very little with its great possibilities of improvement. How, then, can we fairly propose its radical abolition?

With this in mind, and also the vast popular agitation which must inevitably precede any radical step, it is safe to assume that jury trial will be with us for at least generations to come. If so, the improvement of the rules of Evidence must be made with the retention of the jury as a necessary condition.

5. Our system of Evidence is sound on the whole.

In the first place, it was and is based on experience of human nature, — and that is saying a great deal for it. It was not created by legislative fiat, — like our Patent law. It was not devised by chambered jurists, — like the German Civil Code. It was not (for the most part) founded on anachronistic tradition, — like some of our Property law. It simply grew. And it grew during the last two centuries, so that its human nature basis is not, in time, far enough away to be possibly out of date.

That human nature is represented in the witnesses, the counsel, and the jurors. All three, in their weaknesses, have been kept in mind by the law of Evidence. The multifold untrustworthinesses of witnesses; the constant partisan zeal, the lurking chicanery, the needless unpreparedness, of counsel; the crude reasoning, the strong irrational emotions, the testimonial inexperience, of jurors, — all these elements have been considered. Tens of thousands of trials have forced them out into the open, where thousands of judges have observed them; and their observations have profited by them, in thinking out principles and formulating rules.

All this has not been created out of nothing; it rested on a solid basis of experience in human nature at trials. And that human nature has not essentially changed. The main basis is there yet. The changes have not been in the great factors.

The rules of Evidence, then, are to have at least that presumption in their favor which sensible critics always give to the conclusions of experience, even when all of the data of that experience are not specifically known to the critic.

In the next place, that human nature, in the same factors, will always be with us. Witnesses, counsel, jurors, will continue to exhibit similar weaknesses. The trial will always be struggle, revealing nakedly those weaknesses. And there will always have to be some apparatus for testing and checking those weaknesses. We can expect to improve the apparatus, but not to ignore the weaknesses. And just as long as man continues to be a reasoning animal, and to desire to profit in his narrow personal task by the combined experience of others, just so long will trial judges crave and devise generalized rules for making some headway through the welter of lies and errors and doubts and inferences that is heaped up before them at a trial.

The lone judge seeks support and relief in these generalized rules. He cannot intellectually avoid it. Make him (and not the jurors) the judge of facts —and he will seek it just the same. For four centuries the fact-judges of Continental Europe worked with a system of self-devised mechanical rules, which they have now for a century repudiated as shackles; but what now seem shackles were but the effort of the helpless human individual, weighted down by his responsibility and his doubts, to seek relief in a system of rules. And it may safely be asserted that one reason why the modern American trial judge (since 1850) has so unduly exalted the "technicalities" of Evidence rules is that he is less sure of himself, less strong professionally and temperamentally, than his American predecessors and the English judges, and hence seeks relief and refuge in the elaborate system of rules of Evidence.

And so we may as well understand that (for some time to come) the tendency to keep a system of rules of Evidence, as a refuge for the judge in handling the problems of human nature, will be inescapable.

And, in the third place, the present rules as a whole are sensible ones. Taking each of them in the big, there is hardly one that is not based on some aspect of human nature, which needs some such a rule of warning. (Always the Opinion rule must be excepted; for that was never anything but a futile historical bastard.) And, when out of the whole bundle, we select the three or four great principles which clash most sharply with the practice of other countries, — the hearsay rule, the character rule, the privilege against self-crimination — we find that they are among the contributions of Anglo-American character to the world's types of justice; they represent deep traits, bound up with our whole attitude, — not to be lightly changed, nor without changing ourselves.

The way we abuse the rules is one thing; but the rules themselves are quite a different thing. Our abuse of them should not obscure our minds to the good sense that is in the rules. And the petty details and infinitesimal absurdities to which they have been elaborated need not force us to disown the substance of their good, — any more than the systematic excesses of college athletics oblige us to reject the sound core of physical training for youths.

6. Our judges and our practitioners must improve in spirit, as a prerequisite for any hope of real gain to be got from better rules. In the end, the man is more important than the rule. Better rules will avail little, if the spirit of using them does not also improve.

Counsel must become less viciously contentious, more skillful, more intent on substance than on skirmishing for a position. The whole condition of below-par, now noticeable, is here involved. It has many symptoms and many causes. Enough here to note that some of them directly affect counsel's handling of the Evidence rules.

Judges must become stronger and better equipped at the trial bench, and more liberal and more justice-seeking on the appellate bench. The rules must be treated only as means to an end; and this cannot be until the men on the bench see them in that light and make it a prime aim to treat them so. The rule is the complement of the man. The weaker the man, as a dispenser of justice, the more the rule is exalted and the stiffer its bonds become. Improvement of the rules will need more sympathy and intelligence to handle them effectively.

ALL THE RULES IN THE WORLD WILL NOT GET US SUBSTANTIAL JUSTICE IF THE JUDGES AND THE COUNSEL HAVE NOT THE CORRECT LIVING MORAL ATTITUDE TOWARDS SUBSTANTIAL JUSTICE.

And now, with these premises, we may survey the faults and needs of the rules of Evidence themselves.

Faults and Needs of the Rules of Evidence. A. In general. The three general defects, running through the whole system — in its use, mainly, not so much in its fabric, are: Inflexibility, Magnification of Details, and Over-Emphasis on Errors.

1. Inflexibility. This is a plain enough vice. It is due to the exaltation of the rule into an end in itself, instead of a means to an end, viz. a correct verdict.

How can this vice be got at? By applying measures which involve least change with most efficiency. These would seem to be three.

(a) The rules are now enforced, as such, regardless of whether a dispute exists in the case in hand, which the rule would serve to safeguard. This defect has been already enlarged upon (supra, I, B, 1). To remedy it, a simple expansion of the principle of Judicial Admissions will furnish the tool.

Let the Court decline to enforce the rule if, on counsel's admission, there is no need for it in the case in hand; and let the Court require counsel to make proper avowals.[2] Put in the form of a Code section, this principle might be thus phrased: "A rule of Evidence need not be enforced if the Court, on inquiry made of counsel, or otherwise, finds (a) that there is no bona fide dispute between the parties as to the fact which the offered evidence tends to prove, (b) or that the danger against which the rule aims to safeguard does not exist for the case in hand." This principle may to some seem somewhat loose. But the law of Evidence needs a good deal of loosening.

The principle of Judicial Notice can also be liberalized to give similar flexibility, as pointed out more fully in § 2571.

(b) The rules, as now enforced, are not left at all to the trial Court's determination, but are defined and applied by the appellate Court. This defect has already been noted (supra, I, B, 2). The question is how to get at it, without abdicating the appellate Court's function of defining the law. A fair and workable distinction would seem to be the distinction between the tenor of the rule itself (which is the main thing to safeguard), and its application to the specific offer. This distinction could be enforced in the following form:[3]

[2] How the Court should deal with disingenuous counsel is a large problem, which itself also needs attention. This shows how the improvement of Evidence rules is bound up with other improvements.

"1. In all rulings upon the admissibility of Evidence, the trial judge's ruling is final and absolute; subject to the following distinctions and exceptions.

"2. The trial judge is bound to obey the rules of Evidence, and therefore does not have discretion, in the sense of determining the admissibility of evidence by his personal views or changeable beliefs as to what is just.

"3. The trial judge's determination is not final (i.e. it is subject to the usual methods of appeal) in so far as his statement of the tenor of a rule of law is objected to as an erroneous statement of the rule.

"4. The trial judge's determination is final,

"(a) In the application of a rule of Evidence to a particular offer of evidence; and

"(b) In the finding of any facts preliminary to or otherwise involved in the application of the rule to the offer."

If the bench and the bar could stomach this simple dose — a mere extension of the present principle of judicial discretion — a vast mass of needless matter would be purged from our system of trials and appeals.

Here again, however, we encounter the man-element — the need of personal improvement, not merely of better rules. In many (or most?) trial courts to-day, and in many (or most?) trials, the typical incident is: Counsel A: "Now state to the jury what you thought —"; Counsel B: "Object!"; Judge: "Objection overruled!"; Counsel B: "Exception!" And so far as this blind and unintelligible canine snarling and yapping may be assumed to be an incurable trait, no rule like the above could serve. For, to that end, in the first place, both judge and counsel must know what rule is supposed to apply; and, the rule must be openly stated so as to separate the rule itself from its application. Until all court officers improve in knowledge and in spirit, no improved law can serve the situation. How disgraceful and degraded it commonly is, we seldom pause to reflect. And its worst feature is that it has dragged down our most accomplished and highminded practitioners to employ their talents in this ungentlemanly spectacle.

(c) The rules are now enforced with over-strictness, on appeal, because there is no corrective at the trial to avoid the possible misleading of the jury's mind by the violation of the rule. The trial judge being a mere umpire — and a dumb one, at that, as to the jury — the appellate Court feels obliged to order a new trial, and thus to vindicate the rule. If the appellate Court could have some assurance that the jury had been duly warned of the net value of the evidence, it would not feel bound to treat the error as vital. In other words, a large part of the sacred inflexibility of the rules, in the appellate Court's treatment, is due to the lack of any dependable corrective at the trial.

[3] In the writer's "Pocket Code of Evidence", these phrasings have already been put forward (§§ 49–52), with some comments.

That corrective is the trial Court's charge on the weight of evidence. This needed remedy has already been outlined (supra, I, B, 3). Enough to say here that the abandonment of that orthodox practice, fifty or sixty years ago, was one of the greatest mistakes the American people ever made. The sin of our fathers is now being visited upon us. And the depressing feature is the bigoted alarm which so many good practitioners feel at the proposal to revert to orthodoxy. They shudder with the needless dread of the blindfold fraternity neophyte who at his initiation extends his arm to be branded with — a lump of ice! And they seem unwilling even to reflect upon the surviving example of the Federal system; for the latter's concededly excellent method is within every one's reach to observe in a hundred courts all over the land; and yet the conservatives act as though the judge's charge on the evidence were something anachronistic and un-American, suggestible only by a revived emissary from King George the Third.

What is wanted is a general return to this safeguard of jury trial, in some such principle as this:

"The judge may express to the jury, after the close of evidence and argument, or from time to time before then, his personal opinion as to the credibility or weight of the evidence or any part of it."

The foregoing three measures, then, are both needful and practicable for removing the first great defect of our rules, their Inflexibility.

2. Magnification of Details. This next great defect is hardest to get at. It cannot, apparently, be got at directly. You cannot stop the working of logic. And if the working of that logic — say, of the rule for accounting for the absence of an original document before using a copy — leads to numerous petty detailed rules, each one unavoidable in logic, the problem of drawing a line somewhere and declaring "Here the rule shall stop; it is getting too refined and subtle and petty" — this problem is practically insoluble, considering the difficulty of reaching an agreement as to a thousand such points and as to communicating this agreement to practitioners and judges.

So the remedy must be sought by indirection. In other words, minimize the effect of such details. What specific measure could avail to this end, we are unable to suggest.

3. Over-Emphasis on Errors. This third defect lies at the doors of the appellate Courts. The nauseous and intellectually disgraceful doctrine of "reversible error" has too long stained the pages of our appellate opinions. Much has been written and legislated against it; and time will bring its complete erasure from our records. No more need be said against it here.[4]

But a warning should be sounded against futile measures. They are too commonly seen in the phrasings of legislative proposals. They commonly run: No new trial shall be granted where the errors "do not affect the substantial rights of the parties", or "do not cause any manifest wrong or injury", or "do not prejudice the defendant", etc. These abstract terms do not bind the minds of those judges who believe that there are vested individual rights in the observance of the rules of Evidence. — Another form runs: No new trial shall be granted "if the evidence erroneously admitted or excluded would not have changed the result." But this form, conversely, is too narrow; for it obliges the appellate Court to speculate upon what the jury would have done, and this speculation will easily lead to reversals on far-fetched hypotheses. — The sound form requires the appellate Court to determine according to what the jury should have done. And more than one Court has gone to this length, in these words: "We do not reverse for the error, because the verdict rendered is the only one that could have been rendered by the jury", or "because we can clearly see that a correct result was reached by the jury."

[4] See § 21 of this Treatise.

We now come to consider the specific rules of Evidence.

B. Changes in Particular Rules.

The question is to be asked, for each of the main rules: Should it be abandoned, or at least be radically altered?

The order of topics used in this Treatise may be followed. The three main groups are (in Book I, What Facts are Admissible): Part I, Rules of Relevancy; Part II, Rules of Auxiliary Probative Policy; Part III, Rules of Extrinsic Policy.

Book I. What Facts are Admissible. Part I. Rules of Relevancy, etc. Here we have three groups: Title I, Circumstantial Evidence; Title II, Testimonial Evidence; Title III, Autoptic Proference.

Title I. Circumstantial Evidence. There are here three general controlling policies, viz. the avoidance of Undue Prejudice, of Unfair Surprise, and of Confusion of Issues. But these policies result in but two main rules, and the multiplicity of sub-rules and exceptions is due to the firm instinct of Courts to avoid trespassing on these two main rules. One of them is the rule against using Personal Character; the other is the rule against using Particular Instances of External Happenings.

1. The rule against Character. This appears in two further separate rules. One forbids the use of a party's general traits of character, unless exceptionally; the other forbids evidencing it, in the excepted classes of cases, by particular instances of conduct, unless exceptionally. The former rests on the policy of avoiding Undue Prejudice; the latter rests on the same policy, plus those of avoiding Unfair Surprise and Confusion of Issues. Are these policies sound in the main, as represented in those rules?

We are convinced that the policies and the rules are sound, in the main. (1) The policy of avoiding Undue Prejudice is based on weaknesses of human nature which are to-day as obvious as ever. In criminal cases, this policy is one of those that mark off the Anglo-American system from the rest of the civilized world. Nothing in the French system attracts us to believe either that it is intrinsically better than ours, or that it would be workable in our country with our judiciary and juries. Our own rule represents a safeguard against a real danger to which the search for the truth will always be liable so long as the decision of facts is committed to any but Solomons. The failures of justice, now observable in the pursuit of offenders, are not attributable to this rule, but to many other and independent conditions. — In civil cases, the rule is equally needed, especially in personal injury cases, where emotion is apt to overpower calm reasoning. — What is needed, however, is less fetish-worship of the rule. With the proper safeguards of the judge's charge on the weight of evidence, of a sane rule for new trials for error, and the like (noted supra), little or no obstruction to justice need be apprehended from this policy. (2) The policies of avoiding Unfair Surprise and Confusion of Issues are much less important, and have been greatly overworked. The dangers they are meant to guard against are merely exceptional contingencies. Cast-iron rules are not suitable for protecting against such contingencies. Flexible rules are here the need. The principle of the trial Court's discretion (supra), with the other relaxatory rules above noted, would here furnish ample protection. Most of the thousands of rulings here involved could as well have been disposed of by those principles, and need not have cumbered our records; while the general principles would have been preserved.

2. The rule against Particular Instances of External Happenings. Of the three great policies above mentioned, here the second and third are chiefly involved, — i.e. avoiding Unfair Surprise and Confusion of Issues. Most of the rulings here recorded are far-fetched; many of them were needless obstructions to the search for truth. The policies are sound enough, — emphatically so. The evil has arisen from using the policies as inflexible rules. They apprehend merely contingencies. The current application of them is just as absurd as if a man resolved never to go out of the house in winter because he feared that he might slip down on the ice; but the sensible man goes out, keeps a watch for icy spots, and then steps around them. Here again the principle of the trial Court's discretion would bring almost all of the needed relief. Chief Justice Doe's opinions have demonstrated this, once for all.

3. Sundries. There remain the miscellaneous mass of sub-rules which are due, directly or indirectly, to the purpose of not infringing on these other main rules; e.g. the rules about admitting former crimes as evidence of Intent, etc. These present a difficult problem. As long as the above main rules of exclusion are kept, and no matter how much they are liberalized, the task of defining the boundaries will be inevitable. Our best hope is that this minor mass of quiddities can be sufficiently taken care of (i.e. to prevent obstruction) by the general safeguards already proposed — the judge's charge on the evidence, the liberal new trial rule, the trial Court's discretion, etc.

Title II. Testimonial Evidence. This includes three groups of rules, for Testimonial Qualifications, Impeachment, and Corroboration, respectively.

1. The rules requiring certain Testimonial Qualifications. Here the sound general policy suited to the times is to complete the abandonment of rules of exclusion, and to rely upon the testimony itself for criteria of its weight. For one reason, the tendency of a century past has been in this direction. For another reason, the present lines of definition of the elements which make a witness admissible are out of harmony with the teachings of science, and have become merely arbitrary. No one can maintain that there is in reality any such vital distinction as the law now draws between witnesses that may be listened to and weighed and witnesses that may not be listened to at all.

(1) In the first place, the few remaining rules of exclusion based on Mental Derangement and Immaturity may as well go. They are vain.

(2) In the next place, the rules, now remaining in some States, excluding a person Convicted of Crime, must go. They have been anachronisms for fifty years. They are arbitrary and futile obstructions.

(3) In the third place, the rule universally in force (except in four or five States) against the Survivor of a transaction with a Deceased Person, must go. It is of a piece with the long discarded disqualification of interested persons. It involves a mass of verbal technicalities, and it shuts out at least as much truth as falsehood.

(4) In the fourth place, the disqualification of Husband and Wife to testify on behalf of each other (still preserved in a minority of States) must go. It was repudiated sixty years ago in England.

(5) Finally there is the rule requiring Personal Observation by the witness' own senses. This is a healthy rule, — no wiser or safer was ever devised. It raises the quality of our verdicts, by forcing the parties to seek for the most trustworthy testimony. But it needs to be more flexible. It should have numerous general exceptions; and it should receive constant exceptions, without definition, for casual details, in every witness' testimony, where its strict enforcement is pedantic. Here, again, the principle of the trial Court's discretion, with the others already noted, would bring most of the needed relief.

(6) The rules for Refreshing and Recording Recollection are a troublesome snag. They are based, indeed, on good sense and logic. But the historic precedents have left the law much confused; its distinctions are of little real importance compared with others which modern science points out but the law does not enforce; and the present rules cannot be administered without barren technicalities, difficult to master. On the whole, they seem to do more harm than good. Reliance on cross-examination would probably answer the purpose, together with two or three simple rules that could be retained.

2. The rules excluding certain modes of Impeachment. As to general considerations, it would seem that we overwork certain modes of impeachment, and that we underestimate others. Apparently, in the Continental countries, little stress is laid on these things, — not enough, to be sure. We possess the great sound idea, viz. that you never can tell how credible a witness' assertion is until he and it have been thoroughly scrutinized in every aspect. Here modern psychological science confirms our inherited tradition.

But where we part from science is in overemphasizing certain elements and underemphasizing others.

What we overemphasize is the witness' moral character. It is needless to expound here the several details of this fallacy. "No case! Abuse the opponent's witness", — this anecdotal instruction to a certain counsel expresses truly enough the tendency too frequently seen with the mass of trial practitioners. Probatively, the cause is seldom advanced, by these methods, as much as we think.

What we underemphasize, on the other hand, is the study of the witness' personal equation as to temperament, memory, the bases of perception, etc., etc.[5] We are satisfied to use a few practical expedients — contradiction, self-contradiction, etc. — without really understanding their probative force. What we need, therefore, is to develop the study of testimony as affected by these various elements, and to lessen our reliance on the crude bludgeon of character-evidence. But this must be a development of the future.

Now as to the specific rules of exclusion. They hardly need radical change; the change should come mostly in the manner of using what is already admissible.

(1) The rule excluding proof of Specific Instances of Misconduct by extrinsic testimony does very well; it is based mainly on the sensible policies of avoiding Unfair Surprise and Confusion of Issues. The rule allowing such inquiries (in all but a few States) on cross-examination of the witness himself is a fair rule, — when left to the trial Court's discretion, and not dragged up needlessly (as it usually is) to become an appellate Court question.

(2) The rule excluding Contradiction and Self-contradictions, when evidenced by other witnesses, on "collateral" points is another healthy rule, — easy to administer if left to the trial Court's discretion.

(3) The rule requiring a Prior Inquiry to the witness before proving a self-contradiction is a sensible one; but it is enforced with needless and harmful inflexibility. It should have several general exceptions, and should be left entirely to the trial Court's discretion. That application of it to documents, known as the rule in The Queen's Case, is a lamentable error in logic and in policy, long ago discarded in England and some of our States, and should be abolished out of hand.

(4) The rule against Impeaching one's Own Witness is an irritating relic of worn-out tradition, — a relic of the Saxon days of the compurgation-system. It does as much harm as any one rule in our system. No party owns a witness, and this rule tends to cultivate the too natural features of partisanship which must always attend our system of trials. If a witness is unworthy of credit, let this be shown up, no matter who first called him. If the counsel has been guilty of disingenuous conduct, let the Court deal with him. None but fantastic reasons were ever put forward for the present rule. As great a criminal judge as Chief Justice Furman has spoken in favor of the rule: and that obsession, no doubt, is widespread. But it is an illusion, which would be dispelled by a short experience under trials without the rule.

[5] See the passages collected in the present writer's "Principles of Judicial Proof" (1913).

3. The rules excluding certain modes of Corroboration. These seem to be more or less futile, and not worth while keeping. What they now exclude would not seriously infringe on the policy of avoiding Confusion of Issues, and does involve some useful probative material. We know so little scientifically, as yet, of the logical and probative bearings of this kind of evidence that we can hardly afford to exclude any of it. One kind, in particular, the Courts perversely shut out, under the present rules, viz. a witness' identification of a party when first confronted with him before trial and freshly after the event; for the sake of eliminating this incredible perversity, it would be a fair bargain to let all these rules go, — if that were necessary.

4. The rules for Parties' Admissions should be liberalized. And yet, to enlarge their definition would, of itself, probably be of little avail. The Courts are to-day looking at this subject through the large end of the telescope; the principle looks to them unduly narrow. Their timidity at receiving agents' admissions, in particular, must improve; here the practice of courts is far away from the realities of commercial life. The subject, moreover, is to-day loaded with logical quiddities, more or less futile.

Title III. Autoptic Proference. Here we are fortunate in having withstood successfully the pressure to adopt any rule of exclusion for autoptic proference at the trial.

But for proference out of court, i.e. the jury's view of a place or object irremovable into court, we are still laboring under a rule of exclusion which is so unscientific and so unpractical that to call it childish would be unfair to the intelligence of childhood. The still prevailing limitations on juries' views come down to us from the technique of feudalism; England herself has long shaken them off; but (except in a few States) we remain supine. If a sensible man wants to make sure whether a window is broken or a house burned down, he puts on his hat and goes out and sees for himself what the fact is. But our Courts seem to regard a jury's view as if it were an act which would expose jurors to an infectious disease or a moral contamination. And all related methods, such as the impounding of an object causing damage, or the preparatory inspection of premises by witnesses, are equally frowned upon, so far as the Courts' assistance is concerned. One timid Court, for example, in the case of a boiler explosion, where the common-sensed sheriff had impounded the boiler so that proper evidence of its possible defects could be timely obtained, pronounced it a wrongful act and made the sheriff liable in damages! — This whole spirit of impotence must be abandoned. To that end, the present limitations of rule must be replaced by the unlimited English rule, which goes beyond the halfway measures now in the Codes of California and a few other States.

Part II. Rules of Auxiliary Probative Policy. Many of these are the peculiar product of the Anglo-American genius for practicality, and in principle are wise and indispensable. A few of them are barren technicalities. A few of them are the product of our American distortion of the jury-system, and their change would be bound up with other conditions.

Title I. Preferential Rules. 1. The rule for Producing the Original of a Document, where that original is available, is a rule of practical good sense, which no one need think of abandoning. And its details have been worked out, on the whole, with only rational logic and consistency. Its trouble now seems to be that there is too much logic about it, i.e. the mass of detailed applications of it form so cumbrous a mass that, though their logical connection may be unimpeachable, they are practically unmanageable. To apply the details with such minute correctness is not worth the while, in most cases.

This is a hard situation to meet, by mere rule. A few Courts have tried to cut the Gordian knot by holding the rule to be not enforceable when the document is merely "collateral"; but this, though a move in the right direction, has not been successful. Much could probably be accomplished here by the two general principles already noted, viz. judicial dispensation of the rule where the parties are really not in dispute over the probandum, etc., and trial Courts' discretion in the ruling.

2. The rule for Calling the Attesting Witness has, by legislation everywhere, already been reduced to a minimum of obstructiveness; and what remains is sound in principle. It needs only an infusion of flexibility, which the general principles already noted could presumably effect.

Title II. The Hearsay Rule. We come here to the greatest and most distinctive contribution of Anglo-American law (next after jury-trial) to trial procedure. Bentham thought this much of it, and we can afford to continue in that conviction.[6] But if it is the greatest and most valuable, it is also (like other great truths) overworshipped and overworked, — especially in its unessential details. The difficulty about it is that it has two principal aspects, one of which is vital and the other is not.

(1) The vital aspect is that we are not to credit any man's assertion until we have tested it by bringing him into court (if we can get him) and cross-examining him. Now the development of this art of cross-examination, during two centuries, is the great valuable contribution of the rule. And modern psychological science confirms emphatically this empiric result; for it has shown us something of the hundred lurking sources of error that inhere in all testimonial assertions; and we now perceive that our traditional expedient of cross-examination was the main way to get at these sources of error, and that it owes its primacy to permanent traits of the human mind. To abandon our insistence on the necessity of this test would be to surrender the best single expedient anywhere invented for getting at the truth of controversies. For this reason, the abandonment of the Hearsay rule, in this vital aspect, is unthinkable.

[6] The testimonies from various authorities, quoted in this Treatise at § 1367, deserve perusal, by any one who doubts.

(2) But it has another aspect. By the rule for a witness' qualifications, personal knowledge is required, and the two rules together work out as follows: The witness who testifies about an affray between A and B at the corner of Broad and Washington streets must have been at the corner of those streets where he could see and hear the matters he testifies to. So that if witness X begins to testify about the affray, and it appears that he saw and heard nothing of the affray itself, but merely sat next to Y in a street-car going home and heard Y's story of the affray, we discard X immediately and insist on having Y; because X would be giving us virtually nothing but Y's assertion, and we will not accept Y's assertion unless it is made here in court where we can test him and it. Now thus far we are merely enforcing the Hearsay rule in its vital aspect; i.e. we are refusing to credit Y's untested assertion, offered merely through X as a mouthpiece, — precisely as we should have refused to receive a letter written to the judge by Y. But suppose that X, the first witness, was actually at the street-corner in issue, and did see and hear the affray, and thus is fully qualified with some basis of personal observation for his assertions; then, when he launches into his story, we may expect to find interpersed in it: "As I came up to the corner, I heard the clerk in the drug store shout, 'Who threw that stone at the window?' . . . And the boy said, 'There come the police.' . . . And when he went off, a man said, 'Here is the knife he dropped', and I gave it to the policeman and said", etc., etc. It is at this point that the Hearsay rule is overworked. Logically, each one of these quoted remarks is a hearsay assertion, and we must exclude it and wait till the various persons themselves can be offered, to tell what they saw. And yet each one of these remarks has usually a very subordinate or even negligible testimonial value in itself. Their recital does not infringe upon the great spirit of the rule. Practically, the rule is not violated, in ninety-nine such cases out of a hundred. And in the hundredth, when the recited assertion has vital testimonial value, its utterer can be had and is in fact ready and is put upon the stand, so that the value of his assertion can be duly tested; and nothing is there really lost for lack of such testing, and nothing is really gained by excluding the first witness' recital of it. — Now, the foregoing misguided form of application of the Hearsay rule marks the daily testimony in hundreds of trials. One result has been to take away all natural straightforwardness from the witness' narration, and to break it up into a series of answers to bits of questions, framed by inexpert counsel. Another result has been to multiply tenfold the time and tedium of a trial. A third result has been to exclude a vast amount of useful detail of evidential facts. And, finally, a result has been to bring the Hearsay rule into disrepute, by the abuse of this its incidental and unessential feature.

What, then, shall we do with the Hearsay rule?

1. Keep it, in its vital feature.

2. In its application to former testimony and depositions, liberalize its application. An important measure would be to authorize the prosecution in criminal cases to take depositions, — an authority now lacking in most States; the amount of needless hardship inflicted by the detention of witnesses pending trial must be very great.

3. In its application to extra-judicial assertions, adopt the Massachusetts statutory exception for admitting all statements made by persons now deceased. This is merely a logical extension of the spirit of the rule; for the rule aims to insist on testing all statements by cross-examination, if they can be; i.e. if the person has passed beyond the power of the law to procure him, the test may be dispensed with. No one could defend a rule which pronounced that all statements thus untested are worthless; for all historical truth is based on un-cross-examined assertions; and every day's experience of life gives denial to such an exaggeration. What the Hearsay rule implies — and with profound verity — is that all testimonial assertions ought to be tested by cross-examination, as the best attainable measure; and it should not be burdened with the pedantic implication that they must be rejected as worthless if the test is unavailable.

4. For the same reason, all the Exceptions to the rule, now anywhere recognized, should be liberalized and enlarged, and adopted where not yet in force.

Of the specific Exceptions, only one or two need here a comment. (1) The Dying Declarations exception is by some regarded with distrust. There seems to be no good reason for this. The distrust seems to be due merely to an instinctive overworship of the value of exclusionary rules. Let some judges tell us that they have actually seen several instances of false dying declarations which have brought an unmerited fate to innocent men; then we shall begin to have some reason for hesitation. But there are no signs of any such scientific examination of the subject. (2) The use of Official Statements, e.g. by certified copies of documents, etc., is burdened unbearably, in almost all our States, by a preposterous wagon-load of crude and needless statutes, prescribing detailed rules; the broad simple rules of the British law and of a few of our States ought to be substituted. And a broad simple rule for proof by official certificate should be adopted; the modern extension of our administrative system requires some such expedient for proof of hundreds of facts never really disputed. We are here lumbering along, as if in our ancestors' stage-coach, without any of the modern conveniences and expeditious methods. (3) The exception for Statements of a Mental or Physical Condition is now reaching a state of futile intricacy. This is seen chiefly in two fields: (a) In personal injury cases, the injured person's statements of pain, etc., are hedged about with a mass of quiddities. The purpose is plain, viz. to avoid letting false claimants impose on juries. The efficacy of the effort may well be doubted; there is a risk of such imposition; but the Hearsay rule is not, and is never going to be, the main means of stopping up the risk or of revealing the imposition. Most of the rulings on this subject give the impression of being merely rulings upon cards played in a game. (b) In testamentary causes, the testator's statements are governed by a number of fine-spun rules. They are logical enough; but they let in quite as much as they exclude of the utterances that are supposed to do harm; and it may be doubted whether, in an issue so subject as this is to the jury's uncontrollable sense of justice, the Hearsay exception ever affected the result appreciably. Sir George Jessel's way of dealing with this class of evidence was, after all, as good a way as we can expect to find. (4) The Spontaneous Exclamations exception offers a large opportunity for liberalization. The way in which, in personal injury cases, the law here puts on blinders for this class of evidence, when it comes to investigating the details of the actual occurrence, would seem farcical, — if we could only stand off at a distance and look at ourselves. Jury trial, fine as it is, has a good deal to answer for; but can we censure jury trial here, merely because the judges have such an exaggerated traditional fear of the jury's emotions that they, the judges, go daft in shutting out the important facts from the jury?

5. The remaining measure needed is to devise some way of permitting qualified witnesses to narrate an occurrence without the exclusion of the incidental hearsays. The vice of the present practice is plain enough. But to frame a measure which will remove it, while keeping the essence of the Hearsay rule, is not easy.

Title III. Prophylactic Rules. Two of these call for special comment.

1. The Oath. At present, the oath needs reconsideration in three aspects.

a. Although the statutes making the oath optional ought to be re-drafted on the lines of some of the more advanced types, there should be no abolition of the oath. For its abolition, indeed, there appears to be no demand. Observation shows that the oath is still, or may be made, a real force for veracity with the great multitude of persons.

b. But the administration of the oath is to-day a travesty, a lamentable failure, — in most courts, at least. All its solemn compulsion is eliminated by the futile, irreverent, and almost blasphemous manner in which it is administered. Two or three measures, at any rate, would do much to restore its virtue. (1) It should be administered by the judge, not the clerk. (2) It should be repeated, word for word, by the witness. (3) It should be administered anew to each witness, not once only to a group. And (4) some savor of solemnness should be secured for the occasion, in one way or another. — All these things can be done by the judge without change of law. To the judges' indifference, and not to the oath itself, is mainly due the present insignificance of its function.

c. The capacity of children to take the oath is still beridden with limitations which are inappropriate in principle and futile in practice. The example of England's statute should be universally followed.

2. Discovery before Trial should be enlarged, by clearing away almost all its present limitations. Here we strike the hidden snag — and a solid one it is — of professional tradition. The partisan-contentious system of trials is the largest feature of the Anglo-American system, and is a possession which we ought not to abandon. Something is said later about this. But we can afford to part with its abuses. One of them is the gaming expedient of holding one's cards secret until the play is made.[7] Of course the conservative will urge that to disclose the cards furnishes the unscrupulous opponent with a means to cheat. This is no doubt a danger. But the answer is, first, that the danger is exaggerated; and, secondly, that the present conditions are so wrong that the other risk should now be experimented with; the presumption at least has now shifted.

What specific measures should be used? (a) In civil cases, the rule for documents and party's testimony should be enlarged to include all facts, whether bearing on the applicant's own case or not. (b) The rule for witnesses' testimony should be made to go equally far. (c) In Federal courts, discovery in all the foregoing features should be introduced; the Supreme Court having shown a lamentably reactionary attitude on this subject. (d) In all courts and all classes of cases, the rule should be extended to include discovery of premises and chattels. (e) In criminal cases, the defence should make discovery of its witnesses, equally with the prosecution.

But none of these mere rules will help much until the sporting theory ceases to dominate in counsel's motives.

Title IV. Simplificative Rules. In this field, two rules mainly need attention.

1. The rules for Order of Presenting Evidence are in general sound; they are apparently better (for us) than the Continental rules. But one of them is wholly bad, viz. the rule against putting in one's own case on cross-examination. Besides the general demerit which experience has shown in this rule, it has the peculiar fatality that it is the rule which apparently the crudest practitioner first learns and most obstreperously invokes, like a little terrier with a rat. And the judges seem to elevate it to the dignity of an Eleventh Commandment. Moreover, this rule combines with others to give some particularly obnoxious results. It must be abandoned absolutely.

2. The Opinion rule. Words fail one to express the senseless excesses of this rule. The depths of its present inanity, as a rule of Evidence for sensible men, and the copious harm done by it, are recorded in the annals of every trial. Of course, if one cannot see this, there is an end of the matter. But those who cannot see it should at least endeavor to question their own faith in the doctrine.

But how to get rid of it, is not so simple a matter to settle. It is insidiously mingled with two other rules almost inextricably.

[7] Mr. Sherman L. Whipple, of Boston, has published vigorous denunciations of the present method.

(a) The rule for expert qualifications requires that on a topic requiring special experience the witness must be shown to possess that special experience. This rule is, of course, to be kept. But what does the expert then give, as his testimony? It is commonly termed his "opinion." But this "opinion" is not what the so-called Opinion rule excludes or lets in. Hence, to abolish the Opinion rule does not affect the above rule, i.e. the rule that a witness who is not qualified by special experience, where needed, cannot testify on that subject.

(b) The rule for a witness' knowledge by personal observation excludes his "opinion" in so far as such an "opinion" may imply merely an impression based on hearsay and not personal observation. Hence, to abolish the Opinion rule would not mean abolishing this rule. For example, a witness to an affray, who merely heard the accused utter a threat the day before and testifies to it, should not be allowed to answer, "In your opinion, is the defendant guilty?" But he should be allowed (the Opinion rule being abolished, i.e. the rule prohibiting inferences from observed data), to be asked, "In your opinion, was the defendant in earnest when he uttered that threat?"

(c) The hypothetical question, which figures as one of the overworked technicalities of present practice, is not a result of the Opinion rule, but of the above rule (b). Hence, to abolish the Opinion rule does not mend this part of the situation. Medical men who have experience of the witness-stand resent with irritation the hypothetical question. Yet the necessity for it is plausible; and the medical man's disapproval of it merely shows how distinct are the conditions of a jury trial and a medical prescription. But what can be done to remedy the abuses of the hypothetical question? Several minor measures would assist; but to explain them would be out of place.

In sum, What specific measure would eliminate the Opinion rule, while preserving the other rules that ought to be preserved? Something like the following would perhaps serve; note that any such measure must contain within itself certain educative (as it were) phrases, which would point out how much was removed and how much preserved:

"An inference or opinion may always be stated by a witness; irrespective of whether

"(a) the data upon which the opinion is based are or are not capable of being so stated by him in words that the tribunal is equally capable of drawing the inference; or whether

"(b) the data are or are not stated by him before stating his inference; or whether

"(c) the inference involves the very subject of the issue, or one of the issues, before the tribunal;

"Provided that the trial judge may in his discretion exclude testimony involving an opinion or inference,

"(1) Whenever the topic is one which requires special experience for drawing the inference, and the witness is in the judge's estimation not so qualified; or

"(2) Whenever the witness has not had adequate personal observation of any data from which such inference might be drawn; and

"(3) Except that in the latter case the judge may permit the inference to be stated if the data are stated hypothetically to the witness and if he is qualified by experience to draw inferences on the subject."

However, if the present tangle cannot be successfully abated by the above or some similar rule, then we need not hesitate to cut at the root and to abolish the bad and the good together. Nothing here could be worse than the present state of things.

Among the special applications of the Opinion rule, two or three may here be noted. The rule against an opinion as to safety, care, reasonableness, etc., is one of the most obstructive, and could easily be cut out, by itself. The rule against an opinion to character is one of the most obvious violations of common-sense, — an aberration, too, from historic tradition; it can be set right without attempting to solve the rest of the problem. The rule about handwriting testimony is mingled with other rules, but can also be set right without attempting the whole problem; the English statute, already adopted in a few States, makes a good rule-of-thumb.

Title V. Quantitative Rules. Here the several rules call for distinct treatment.

1. The rules as to Required Numbers and Kinds of Witnesses are in theory unsound. When our judges resume their rightful control of trials, and when the judge's charge on the evidence is restored, we can afford to get along without most of these rules. Nevertheless, in the meantime, their vagaries do relatively little harm. Regarded as cautions of experience for judge and jury, they are (virtually all) wise and useful. Regarded as rules of the ritual, to be literally recited by the trial judge and technically enforced by the appellate Court, they degenerate into futilities. A few of them have crystallized into needless details. A few of them are a favorite theme of quibbling for some Courts. But on the whole, there is no fault to be found with their general wisdom.

2. The rule for Verbal Completeness is a sound rule, needing only that general liberalization of administration which all our rules need.

3. The rules for Authentication of Documents represent one of the most vital and creditable features of our law. Probably no other single rule, except the Hearsay rule, is so useful a safeguard against the frailties of human credulity. Experiments conducted over some years [8] have shown that jurors of the most intelligent class need these safeguards. Here, as elsewhere, a more liberal administration is needed. The chief application needing definite improvement of rule is the exception for authentication by official seal; hundreds of useless statutes cover this rule with needless and variant details; a simple statute of the English type should replace them.

[8] In the writer's law school classes.

Part III. Rules of Extrinsic Policy. This is one of the fertile places for misguided growths in the law of Evidence. Judges consider too little that this group of rules frankly aims at no purpose of reaching truth in trials, but deliberately stifles truth; and does so by setting up some other policy, over against the search for truth, as more needful and deserving of protection, for the time being, at the expense of truth. If judges thought oftener of this, they would oftener ask themselves whether this other policy really is more needful and deserving of protection, and whether the rule does really give enough such protection as to be worth while. Some such reflection would have avoided most of the excesses now noticeable in the details of these rules.

Title I. Rules of Absolute Exclusion. Here only one rule has found even a partial lodgment, and in a few Courts only; but there is a disposition there to give it undue homage. The remarks at §2183 of this Treatise will here suffice.

Title II. Rules of Privilege. Here may be seen excesses, all along the line; and yet all but one or two of the privileges are sound at the core.

1. Sundry Privileged Topics. We are fortunate in being burdened with few of these. The ancient one for the party-opponent in civil cases has now gone by the board; except that it remains, in most jurisdictions, in its application to the party's chattels and premises, and in a few jurisdictions, in its application to the party's person. It ought to be completely eliminated. It is merely another feature of the sporting theory of justice.

2. The privilege for Anti-Marital Facts has gone in some States, in civil cases; most States retain it for criminal cases. Its retention is a piece of comprehensible but quite misplaced sentimentality.

3. The privilege for Self-Criminating Facts is at last brought to the bar to defend itself, for the first time in more than two centuries. Positive signs of unfaith in it are visible, even in our own profession. But we hope that it will be acquitted, or at least placed on probation and given a warning to reform. It has for a long time been conducting itself as an undesirable citizen; but the question is whether the community does not need its talents, in spite of its past misuse of them. The significant fact that a congregation of lawyers and criminalists in Wisconsin has deliberately proposed to remove the constitutional ægis which protects it should at least force a full and frank consideration of its case by enlightened professional opinion. But we see no reason to alter the views expressed on its behalf in § 2291 of this Treatise. — The possible details of reformatory measures would here be out of place.

4. The privilege for Communications between Attorney and Client plays only a small part in the decisions, although of course it excludes a vast mass of evidence. Over against some recent arguments for its abolition,[9] we still believe in the adequacy of the arguments for its retention (set forth in § 2291 of this Treatise).

[9] Mr. Sherman L. Whipple, of Boston, in addresses before the Connecticut and the Florida Bar Associations.

5. The privilege for Marital Communications is less strongly defensible. And yet its obstruction to evidence is comparatively little. What it needs is some flexibility; the trial Court should here have liberty of discretion to make exceptions. But also it needs to be treated as a mere privilege, i.e. optional when claimed by the spouse. Most Courts erroneously treat it as an absolute rule of exclusion.

6. Jurors' Communications belong really under the Parol Evidence rule, applied to the solidity of verdicts, and need not be here considered.

7. The privilege for Official Secrets makes relatively little obstruction; but it contains the germs of a vicious growth. It has only two or three legitimate applications; and it should be watched, to prevent its spread to noxious possibilities.

8. The privilege for Communications between Physician and Patient is sound enough for an occasional and narrow application; but its illogical and indiscriminate extension has made it one of the most farcical measures of needless obstruction. In three principal classes of cases — will cases, insurance cases, and personal injury cases — it is to-day nothing but a powerful joker in a pack of cards, to be slapped triumphantly on the table whenever the game is going against one. Some judges in appellate Courts treat it with a respect which is simply incomprehensible. That any sensible system of trials should have so long retained in its law so discreditable a rule of evidence will some day be difficult to believe.

Book II. By whom Evidence must be Presented. Two general topics here deserve attention; 1. the contentious system in general; 2. the burden of proof between the parties, and the specific presumptions.

1. The Contentious System, in general. A good deal has been heard, of late, against our "contentious" system of trial procedure.[10] The word carries with it a derogatory argument. But we must distinguish, of course, between general "contentiousness", which is a fault of behavior, and "contentious procedure", which merely denotes the scientific fact that our system relies upon the parties, not the judge, to search for evidence and to present it, each in rivalry with the other. The former may be merely a remediable abuse, separable from the system itself; the latter may be a sound principle.

And in inquiring whether the procedural principle be sound, we must remember that it is a characteristic and historic feature of our system. It stands in emphatic contrast to the Continental system. Nothing is more interesting than the history of the rise and development of the inquisitorial system,[11] which now dominates on the Continent. The examining judge and the trial judge, in that system, seek before trial, and adduce at the trial, the bulk of the evidence; [12] and the parties' counsel, in this part of the litigation, act mainly as vigilant guardians. That system, too, has had its excesses, — and the very name "inquisitorial" carries in our language a repulsive flavor, due to those long past excesses. So that the ultimate question is not whether our system exhibits abuses; but whether our system, without its abuses, is better for us than would be the other system, without its abuses.

[10] Mr. Whipple, of Boston, in the addresses already cited; Mr. Herbert Harley, of Chicago, in Bulletins of the American Judicature Society; Mr. R. S. Gray, of San Francisco, and Mr. Abram Adelman, of Chicago, in the Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology, V, 654, 663; Mr. Wesley W. Hyde, of Grand Rapids, in the Illinois Law Review, VIII, 239.

The world has had plenty of experience with both systems, and the inquiry is at least open. Here it is desired merely to point out that the problem is an historic one of contrasting systems, and that to change our system is a much more radical thing than to remove the abuses.

Our system indeed will have a good deal to say for itself, when the time comes. It is intrinsically quite as efficacious as the other to "beat and boult out the truth" (in Sir Matthew Hale's quaint phrase). It is much better suited to the traditions of our bar and to the temper of our people. It is much better suited to the spirit and training of our judiciary. Indeed, any other system, for us, is inconceivable, unless times and manners change radically.

But, obviously, our system has been hard ridden. Its abuses of administration are multiple. Here, however, we are concerned only with rules of law. And the one notable improvement needed is that judges should remember that they possess the lawful power to summon witnesses and to extract testimony.[13]

In both these aspects there has long been noticeable a dangerous tendency to forget the dignified and potent traditions of our law:

(1) That the trial judge has the power to select and summon and place on the stand a witness not called by the parties, has never ceased to be our law, although the practice is now with us rare. But that a modern court could go so far (post, § 2484) as to hold that a statute applying this power in a certain class of cases is unconstitutional, would have been incredible, if it had not come to pass. One decision in one State does not bulk large. But in its revelation of the possibilities of contemporary appellate aberration it is an enormity. Practice and custom have already gone far in reducing our trial judges to the position of mere umpires; but for the judiciary to confirm this result irremediably by invoking the Constitution, thus to seal their own abdication of inherent and essential powers, is an event of disquieting omen.

(2) That the trial judge has the power to elicit evidence by questions to a witness, has also never (apparently) been doubted in law.[14] But in practice our appellate Courts are constantly rebuking our trial Courts for putting such questions. The ostensible ground for this is the infringement of the (bad and unhistoric) statutory rule against the judge's expression of an opinion

[11] Esmein's History of Continental Criminal Procedure, passim (Continental Legal History Series, 1914).

[12] Subject to modern modifications, especially in civil cases.

[13] § 2484 in this Treatise.

[14] § 784 in this Treatise.

on the weight of evidence. But this enforcement of the latter rule would never have been carried so far if the appellate Courts had been possessed of a proper respect for the trial judge's power to elicit evidence. The appellate Courts would have seen to it that this power duly held its own against the encroachments of the other rule.

So that in this field there is much lost ground to be regained. The means, however, must be more a change of appellate temper than a change of rule.

2. The Burden of Proof between the Parties. So far as theory goes, the old confusion here reigning promises soon to be dissipated. The enlightening influence of Professor Thayer's writings can be seen breaking through in many quarters of the judicial heavens. An improvement of terminology would ultimately be needed. But we could be satisfied to see the general enlightenment impending.

Nevertheless, in practice, the specific rules for burden of proof make upon us the impression of vain logical verbalities, — on the whole. They are, inherently, artificial methods of controlling the mind's operations. And when applied by a judge in a form of words which the jury is supposed to put to use in the privacy of its chamber, they are unlikely to have the supposed effect, — or indeed any effect, when they are more than the simplest rules of thumb. Comparing the amount of judicial thought expended upon them, they are probably the least worth while part of the rules of Evidence.

And yet they have a necessary place, and they are intrinsically sound enough. What to do with them, is a hard question. But it would be interesting to test them empirically, i.e. by asking one hundred trial judges whether they have ever observed that these rules had their designed effect upon the jurymen's decisions.

The foregoing dubitative remarks do not apply to these rules as rules for the judge, i.e. in so far as the judge rules as matter of law, e.g. against a plaintiff for insufficient evidence, etc. Here there seems no reason to doubt the excellence and efficacy of the present system. No doubt the same general need of liberalization is found in this field as elsewhere.

Book III. To whom Evidence must be Presented. Here the main place for improvement is the statutory rule against the judge's charge on the evidence. Enough has already been said as to this bad feature of our modern procedure. But much more will have to be said, in many quarters, before our profession can be awakened from their delusion in its favor, and induced to abandon it.

Book IV. Of what Facts no Evidence need be Presented. Judicial Notice and Judicial Admissions are the two titles of rules under this head. Both of them are beneficent devices, and the prime need is that they shall be expanded in rule and used oftener in practice. Something is said elsewhere to illustrate this (post, §§ 2571, 2597). The newly-minded judiciary, when it develops, will find these to be two of the most useful tools in our system.

In closing this critique of our present system, let the following serve as suggestions collateral to the whole of it:

1. General denunciations against the system, and general denunciations against reform of it, will do little service either way. A great national and racial system cannot be easily set aside; and its historic growth indicates that it has at least some right to exist, as it is and where it is. What is needed rather is detailed study and concrete criticism. The specific rules must be tested, in their original purpose, their workings, their fitness to survive under present conditions. Complete and long-continued discussion, by men of varied experience, along the lines here sketched in this Preface, would ultimately bring an intelligent consensus as to the parts to be preserved or emphasized and the parts to be modified or cast off.[15]

2. In any proposals of improvement, the proposer must sooner or later come down to a draft of words. And until he has tried to frame the words for his proposal, he cannot be sure that he has himself grasped it, either in its extent or in its practicability. To see poor results around us, and to assume publicly the attitude of reform, may signify both intelligence and courage. But it does not signify what is to be the tenor of the proposed reform. And until that tenor is revealed, we cannot say whether it is either desirable or feasible. All who have had experience with proposed legislation are aware of this. And their experience has taught them that there is often a large and sometimes impassable chasm between the abstract idea of a reform and the concrete words which must enact it. — These comments are offered to those who have in mind the reform of any substantial part of our system of Evidence.

3. No reform of rules of Evidence will ever of itself, i.e. as an improved rule of law, accomplish much in promoting actual justice. It may remove an intellectual error from our records. And it may of its own force effect some good for some time. But on the whole its effect must depend upon its surrounding conditions and their coincident advancement. The administration of justice, being a human affair, is not unlike the human body. The perfect operation of any one organ is dependent more or less on the general conditions of the rest of the body. And the system of Evidence is dependent upon procedure in general, upon the organization of courts, upon the personnel of the judiciary and of the bar, upon the human nature of witnesses, upon the grade of services rendered by juries, and upon the temper of the community in wanting and supporting a high and intelligent standard of justice.

Let us therefore expect that the system of Evidence, on the whole, will most readily improve when the men who administer it also improve and the system of justice as a whole advances. Sound rules of Evidence, in short, are as much a symptom as a cause of better Justice.

[15] The Committee organized (1922) by the Commonwealth Fund (New York City) for discussion and proposal of improvements in the law of Evidence will doubtless make useful recommendations.

BOOK I

WHAT FACTS MAY BE PRESENTED AS EVIDENCE (ADMISSIBILITY)

INTRODUCTION

GENERAL THEORY AND PROCEDURE OF ADMISSIBILITY

CHAPTER II.

1. General Theory

§ 9. The Two Axioms of Admissibility; I. None but Facts having Rational Probative Value are Admissible. The modern system of Evidence rests upon two axioms. These underlie its whole structure. Implicitly, but none the less actually and positively, recognized in the practice of the courts and in the utterances of the judges, they were first distinctly formulated by the great master and expounder of the history of our law of Evidence. The first is this:

I. None but facts having rational probative value are admissible. This principle is indeed axiomatic, for any system of Evidence purporting to be rational. It assumes no particular doctrine as to the kind of ratiocination implied, — whether practical or scientific, coarse and ready or refined and systematic. It prescribes merely that whatever is presented as evidence shall be presented on the hypothesis that it is calculated, according to the prevailing standards of reasoning, to effect rational persuasion:

1889, Professor James Bradley Thayer, "Presumptions and the Law of Evidence", "Law and Fact in Jury Trials", 3 Harvard Law Review 143, 4 id. 156:[1] "There is one precept to be mentioned, which is not so much a rule of evidence as a presupposition involved in the very conception of a rational system of evidence as contrasted with the old formal and mechanical systems, viz., that nothing which is not supposed to be relevant, i.e., logically probative, shall be received. . . . Reasoning, the rational method of settling disputed questions, is the modern substitute for certain formal and mechanical tests which flourished among our ancestors for centuries, and in the midst of which the trial by jury emerged. When two men to-day settle which is the 'best man' by a prize-fight, we get an accurate notion of the old Germanic trial. Who is it that 'tries' the question? The men themselves. There are referees and rules of the game, but no determination of the dispute on the grounds of reason, — by the rational method. So it was with 'trial by battle' in our old law; the issue of right, in a writ of right, including all elements of law and fact, was 'tried' by this physical struggle, and the judges of the Common Pleas sat, like the referee at a prize-fight, simply to administer the procedure, the rules of the game. So of the King's Bench in criminal appeals; and so sat Richard II at the trial of the appeal of treason between Bolingbroke and Norfolk, as Shakespeare represents it in the play. So of the various ordeals; the accused party 'tried' his own case by undergoing the given requirement as to hot iron, or water, or the crumb. So of the oath; the question, both law and fact, was 'tried' merely by the oath, with or without fellow-swearers. The old 'trial by witnesses' was a testing of the question in like manner by their mere oath. So a record was said to 'try' itself. And so when out of the midst of these methods first came the trial by jury, it was the jury's oath, or rather their verdict, that 'tried' the case. How this mode of trial came to swallow up the others, and then to lose its chief features, and become shaped into an instrument of our modern purely rational procedure, is a long story, and is not for this place. But as we use the phrase 'trial' and 'trial by jury' now, we mean a rational ascertainment of facts, and a rational ascertainment and application of rules. What was formerly tried by the method of force or the mechanical following of forms, is now tried by the method of reason."

This notable passage fitly expresses the marked spirit of our law of Evidence for the last century and a half, — that is, since the beginning of our consciousness of it as a system.[2] From the time of Erskine's eloquent, if rhetorical, pronouncement, that " the rules of Evidence are founded in the charities of religion, in the philosophy of nature, in the truths of history, and in the experience of common life",[3] the emphasis on their rationality of method has been an increasing one. The rules of Evidence, said the early Pennsylvania Court, " are founded in reason and good sense ";[4] and such utterances typify the general spirit of the modern administration of the law.

Among the innumerable indirect effects are to be noted the rules directed to prevent the jury from substituting passion and prejudice, instead of reasoning, as the foundation of their conclusion (post, § 1904); and the doctrine that even the Legislature cannot establish a rule of decision which will deprive the Judiciary of its power to investigate the facts by rational methods (post, § 1353).

§ 9. [1] These passages were substantially reproduced by the learned author, in 1898, in his Preliminary Treatise on Evidence, 264, 198.

[2] It would seem that "divine testimonies" from responses, oracles, omens, augurs, dream-interpreters, or astrologers might be resorted to in even the most developed stage of the Roman procedure: Quintilian, De Institutione Oratoria, b. V, c. VII.

[3] 1794, Hardy's Trial, 24 How. St. Tr. 966.

[4] Yeates and Smith, JJ., in 1803, in Galbreath v. Eichelberger, 3 Yeates 515.

The resort to irrational methods, however, persisted sporadically in our history till a more recent date than we are accustomed to suppose. Trial by compurgation oath (or wager of law) was not formally abolished in England until 1833.[5] Trial by duel (or wager or battle) was not forbidden by law until 1819, and at least two instances of its recognition had occurred since 1800.[6] Trial by ordeal (of water, fire, and the like), however, was longest and hardest in dying. It had, to be sure, no longer been formally permitted in the English royal courts after the ecclesiastical law forbade it in 1215.[7] But it rested on a deep-rooted superstitious instinct which from time to time, in rude and popular justice, attempted to invoke it. It is certain that in the 1600s the corpse-touching ordeal (which seems to be the most persistent of superstitions) was judicially recognized on many occasions as probative;[8] and in the 1800s, in certain of the rural communities, it has been recorded even since the middle of the century.[9] No doubt these tests, as they still linger in popular beliefs, are entitled to be used indirectly in evidence, — that is, as indications of a guilty consciousness when the test is refused (post, § 275); but this is a different thing from giving them an intrinsic probative force:

[5] Thayer Preliminary Treatise on Evidence, 34; in this treatise the history of all the earlier modes of trial is set forth.

[6] Thayer, ib. 45; 1817, Ashford v. Thornton, Woodall's Celebrated Trials, I, 39; 40 Hans. Parl. Deb. 1203–1207.

[7] Thayer, ib. 37; Pollock & Maitland, Hist. Eng. Law, II, 597; 1679, Gavan's Trial, 7 How. St. Tr. 311, 383 (the defendant, a Jesuit charged in the Popish Plot, invoked the old custom and law "for the prisoner to put himself upon the trial of ordeal, to evidence his own innocency"; L. C. J. North: "We have no such law now"; and the Court treated the request as a mere trick).

[8] 1629, Hertfordshire Murder, 13 How. St. Tr. 1325 (the accused persons were tried on an appeal before Sir Nicholas Hyde, Chief Justice, and Sir J. Maynard reports that "because the evidence was so strange, I took exact and particular notice; the minister of the parish, and his brother the minister of the adjoining parish, deposed (and their statement was apparently received without objection) that the four defendants had been taken to the exhumed body and required each of them to touch it; and when a certain one touched it, a sweat came out on the body, the color changed, the eyes opened, and the finger dropped blood upon the ground"); 1688, Standsfield's Trial, 11 How. St. Tr. 1371, 1387, 1393, 1403, 1417 (in Scotland; at the examination of a corpse two days buried, the defendant touched it in helping; and the effusion of blood that followed was treated as evidence, and it was argued by counsel that "God Almighty himself was pleased to bear a share in the testimonies which we produce"; this case is also alluded to by Scott, in the "Fair Maid of Perth").

So too the witchcraft cases involved similar credulities: 1702, Hathaway's Trial, 14 How. St. Tr. 639 (indictment as an impostor and cheat of one who claimed that a spell had taken away his power of swallowing; evidence was received for him of his expectoration of pins, etc.; but L. C. J. Holt made the issue for the jury his sanity, and not his bewitchment; the defendant was found guilty, and this trial is said to have checked the offering of such superstitious evidence).

In the Athenian Mercury, a periodical printed between 1690 and 1697 (selections reprinted as the Athenian Oracle, re-edited by J. Underhill, 1892, in the Camelot Series), appeared a paragraph on corpse-bleeding, as to which the editors assert: "Legislators have thought fit to authorise it and use this trial as an argument at least to frighten, though 'tis no conclusive one to condemn them. Yet we grant that many murders have been found out by it" (p. 108). In another passage, after an account of some trials for witchcraft in 1692, where the cold-water test was used, the correspondent queries (p. 123). "Is it lawful to attempt the discovery of witches by swimming, and how far is it an evidence against them?" To which the editor answers that "such sort of examination by swimming etc. is utterly unlawful, and a breach of the fifth commandment." Evidently the law and the custom were just coming to be heterodox in this period.

[9] 1892, Lea, Superstition and Force, 4th ed., 367; for other modern instances, see Browne's History of Maryland, 179; Bentham, Judicial Evidence, b. V, c. XVI, § 6 (Bowring's ed., VII, 101); Browne, Practical Tests, 5 Green Bag, 13, et passim.

1894, GANTT, P. J., in State v. Wisdom, 119 Mo. 539, 24 S. W. 1051 (admitting the fact that at the morgue the accused was requested, with others, to put his hand on the corpse of the murdered man, but refused): "The request to touch the body was evidently prompted by the old superstition of the ordeal of the bier in Europe in the middle ages. This superstition has come to this country with the emigration from other lands, and, although a creature of the imagination, it does to a considerable degree affect the opinions of a large class of our people. . . . The jury could consider that, while it was a superstitious test, still defendant might have been more or less affected by it. . . . There is not the slightest evidence that any member of the jury itself regarded the test itself as anything more than a groundless superstition."

The contrast, it may be noted, between employing rational and nonrational modes of proof is after all not between the use of scientific reasoning and the employment of superstitious ordeals; it is rather between employing the best standards we know and those which we realize are not the best. For instance, the acceptance of a 'judicium Dei', for the men of a certain time, was the rational and appropriate process, the method accepted and employed in every-day affairs as well as in legal proceedings.[10] It was when the combats and the ordeals came to be abused, and to be known to be abused, that these modes were no longer the best known to the times; and the passage from ordeals and oaths to the jury marked what was equivalent to a rejection of the irrational and an assent to the rational.[11] But the change here was of the outward mechanism only; the jurors themselves still were dominated by modes of argument and persuasion which we should to-day call superstitious; yet they were for the time the best, being the generally accepted. When science advanced and modes of thought improved, the time again came when the old ways were recognized as inferior; and so to-day the contrast between the best which is known to us and something inferior to that is between what we call rational and superstitious modes of thought. Thus there have been, in the history of our modes of proof, separate epochs, in each of which we progressed from what we were aware to be the inferior to what we had come to know as better; and this in a broad sense is the significance of the principle that the law of Evidence is based on the employment of rational standards.

In the present day the last remnant of the irrational element is our law of new trials (post, § 21). The primitive ordeals of fire and of water were not more calculated to deify chance or chicanery as the arbiter of litigation than is this dominant contemporaneous practice of granting new trials for an immaterial slip in the rules of Evidence. The most trifling error "works a reversal", in the same wizard-like manner that the mispronounced word in the [10] The spirit of the following passage illustrates this: 1110–1200, Prayer at the boiling-water ordeal (Howland, Translations, etc., from the Original Sources of European History, vol. IV, no. 4, p. 9): "O God, Thou who within this substance of water hast hidden Thy most solemn sacraments, be graciously present with us who invoke Thee. . . . O Thou who perceivest hidden things and knowest what is secret, show and declare this by Thy grace, and make the knowledge of the truth manifest to us to believe in Thee."

[11] A good illustration of the beginning of this consciousness is found in the Neapolitan Code of Emperor Frederic II; translated in Howland, Translations, ubi supra, 18, 21, and also given in the original in Lea, Superstition and Force, 422.

superstitious formulas of the Germanic litigation lost for the party his cause. This modern doctrine is the more discreditable of the two. They knew no better, then. We do know better; yet we preserve this technical trumpery.

§ 10. Same: II. All Facts having Rational Probative Value are Admissible, unless some Specific Rule forbids. The second axiom on which our law of Evidence rests is this: All facts having rational probative value are admissible, unless some specific rule forbids. It has been otherwise expressed as follows:

1889, Professor James Bradley Thayer, "Presumptions and the Law of Evidence" 3 Harvard Law Review 143:[1] "There is another precept which it is convenient to lay down as a preliminary one in stating the law of evidence, viz., that, unless excluded by some rule or principle of law, all that is logically probative is admissible. This general admissibility of what is logically probative is not, like the former precept, a necessary presupposition in a rational system of evidence, . . . but yet . . . it is important to notice this also as being a fundamental proposition. In a historical sense, it has not been the fundamental rule to which the various exclusions were exceptions. . . . [But] the main propositions which I have stated should, in the order of thought, be first laid down and always kept in mind."

This axiom expresses the truth that legal proof, though it has peculiar rules of its own, does not intend to vary without cause from what is generally accepted in the rational processes of life; and that of such variations some vindication may, in theory, always be demanded. In other words, in the system of Evidence the rules of exclusion are, in their ultimate relation, rules of exception to a general admissibility of all that is rational and probative.

This principle, then, does not mean that anything that has probative value is admissible; this would be an entire misconception.[2] The true meaning is that everything having a probative value is 'ipso facto' entitled to be assumed to be admissible, and that therefore any rule of policy which may be valid to exclude it is a superadded and abnormal rule. Some of these rules may be extensive in scope — the hearsay rule, for example; or their applicability may in a particular case be so plain, on the face of the offer of evidence, that the objector has no burden of proving that his rule of exclusion is applicable. Nevertheless, when the rules of Evidence are taken in view as a system, these rules of policy appear as merely so many reserved spaces in the vast territory of logically probative material:

1794, Mr. Edmund Burke, Report to the House of Commons, Debrett's History of Hastings' Trial, 1796, pt. VII, Suppl. p. xxiii, 31 Parl. Hist. 324: "Your Committee conceives that the trial of a cause is not in the arguments or disputations of the prosecutors and the counsel, but in the evidence, and that to refuse evidence is to refuse to hear the cause. Nothing, therefore, but the most clear and weighty reasons ought to preclude its production. Your Committee conceives that when evidence, on the face of it relevant, that is connected with the party and the charge, was denied to be competent, the burthen lay upon those who opposed it, to set forth the authorities, whether of positive statute, known recognized maxims and principles of law, passages in an accredited institute, code, digest, or systematic treatise of laws, or some adjudged cases, wherein the Courts have rejected evidence of that nature."

§ 10. [1] This passage was reproduced by the learned author, in 1898, in his Preliminary Treatise, 265, 268.

[2] 1838, Coleridge, J., in Wright v. Tatham, 5 Cl. & F. 670 ("the fallacy that whatever is morally convincing, and whatever reasonable beings would form their judgments and act upon, may be submitted to a jury").

Circa 1823, Mr. Justice EDWARD LIVINGSTON, Introductory Report to the Code of Evidence (Works, ed. 1872, I, 421): "Ultimately, the whole machinery of jurisprudence, in all its branches, is contrived for the purpose of enabling the judging power to determine on the truth or falsehood of every litigated proposition. This is to be done by hearing and examining evidence: that is to say, hearing and examining everything that will contribute to bring the mind to the determination required. If we refuse to hear what will, in any degree, produce this effect, we must determine on imperfect evidence; and in proportion to the importance of the matter thus refused to be heard, must evidently be the chance of making an incorrect rather than a just determination. But, as in morals, we are forbidden to do evil that good may come of it, so, in legislation, we should refrain from doing that kind of good which may produce more than its equivalent in evil. The desirable end to be attained by the admission of every species of evidence, may be more than counterbalanced in some instances, by the evil attending it; sometimes, in the shape of inconvenience and expense inseparable from its procurement; sometimes, from the danger of error arising from the deceptive nature of the evidence itself. The great art is to weigh these difficulties, and in those cases where they are most likely to preponderate, but in no others, to exclude the evidence."

1837, PARKE, B., in Wright v. Tatham, 7 A. & E. 313, 384: "One great principle in this law [of Evidence] is that all facts which are relevant to the issue may be proved."

1831, HOSMER, C. J., in State v. Watkins, 9 Conn. 53: "It is a universal rule of Evidence that all facts and circumstances, upon which reasonable presumption or inference can be founded as to the truth of the issue or disputed fact, are admissible in evidence."

1849, Mr. W. M. Best, Evidence, § 2: "Facts which come in question in courts of justice are inquired into and determined in precisely the same way as doubtful or disputed facts are inquired into and determined by mankind in general, except so far as positive law has interposed with artificial rules to secure impartiality and accuracy of decision or exclude collateral mischiefs likely to result from the investigation."

1860, BALDWIN, J., in People v. Arnold, 15 Cal. 481: "The object of a trial is to elicit the real state of the transaction, and the rules which govern or determine the introduction of testimony have relation to this end. These rules are not mere arbitrary, conventional regulations; they are founded in reason and good sense. Generally speaking, whatever has a tendency to prove a material part of the issue is admissible."

1862, POLLOCK, C. B., in Milne v. Leisler, 7 H. & N. 796: "The Courts, so far as they can, are disposed to receive in evidence whatever can throw any light on the matter in issue and advance the search after truth."

1874, APPLETON, C. J., in State v. Benner, 64 Me. 283: "It is an axiom in the law of Evidence that no testimony should be excluded unless greater evil is seen as likely to arise from its admission than from its rejection."

1876, Sir JAMES STEPHEN, Digest of Evidence, Introduction: "The great bulk of the law of Evidence consists of negative rules declaring what, as the expression runs, is not evidence. The doctrine that all facts in issue and relevant to the issue, and no others, may be proved, is the unexpressed principle which forms the centre of and gives unity to all these express negative rules."

1878, COLERIDGE, C. J., in Blake v. Assurance Co., L. R. 4 C. P. D. 94: "The law [of Evidence] . . . with a few exceptions on the ground of public policy, now is that all which can throw light on the disputed transaction is admitted, — not of course matters of mere prejudice nor anything open to real moral or sensible objection, but all things which fairly throw light on the case."

In this respect the century of the 1800s witnessed a gradual but marked improvement in the practical enforcement of this principle. "People were formerly frightened out of their wits," said Chief Justice Cockburn, in 1861, "about admitting evidence, lest juries should go wrong. In modern times we admit the evidence and discuss its weight." [3] The whole period of the reforms of 1840–1870, while it was effecting the abolition of many of the outgrown exclusionary rules, was propagating and illustrating the cardinal truth that these rules were exceptions only, and must show cause for existence.

This moral attitude toward them is one which tends constantly to be relaxed in the mechanical routine of trial practice and the complexity of modern precedents. A recollection of the sturdy utterances of one of the champions of rationalism in a past generation of judges may serve to renew our courage amidst more modern temptations:

1853–55, LUMPKIN, J., in Johnson v. State, 14 Ga. 61, and Haynes v. State, 17 id. 484: "The judges, both in England and in this country, are struggling constantly to keep open the door wide as possible, — aye, to take it off the hinges, to let in all facts calculated to affect the minds of the jury in arriving at a correct conclusion. . . . Truth, common sense, and enlightened reason, alike demand the abolition of all those artificial rules which shut out any fact from the jury, however remotely relevant, or from whatever source derived, which would assist them in coming to a satisfactory verdict. . . . This Court stands pledged, by its past history, for the abolition, to the extent of its power, of all exclusionary rules which shut out from the jury facts which may serve, directly or remotely, to reflect light upon the transaction upon which they are called upon to pass. For one case gained by improper proof, ninety-nine have been lost or improperly found on account of the parties being precluded by artificial rules from submitting all the facts to the tribunal to which is committed the decision of the cause. Verdicts, nothwithstanding their etymological meaning ('vere dico'), will never speak the truth, because juries can never measure the power and influence of motives upon the actions of men, until the door is thrown wide open to all facts calculated to assist in the slightest manner in arriving at a correct conclusion in the pending controversy."

§ 11. Classification of the Rules of Admissibility: Relevancy, Auxiliary Probative Policy, and Extrinsic Policy. It follows, from the foregoing considerations, that the rules of admissibility may be grouped under three heads, the first dealing with the probative value of specific facts, the second including artificial rules which do not profess to define probative value but yet aim at increasing or safeguarding it, and the third covering all those rules which rest on extrinsic policies irrespective of probative value.

The first group of rules (Part I, post) attempts to define, for legal purposes, the probative value which suffices to entitle a fact to be regarded as evidential. Here the law is concerned with the rules of logic and inference as applied in practical experience, i.e. with Relevancy. Circumstantial, Testimonial, and "Real" evidence are the three great classes; and each has its special problems.

The second group of rules (Part II, post) lays down auxiliary tests and safeguards, usually for particular kinds of facts, over and above the required minimum probative value. The hearsay rule, the rules of quantity, the rule of the oath, and a dozen others, belong here. An analysis of the general policy and relation of this group to the others is elsewhere made (§ 1171, post).

[3] R. v. Birmingham, 1 B. & S. 763.

These two groups together are rules of Probative Policy.

The third group of rules (Part III, post) invokes, for the exclusion of certain kinds of facts, extrinsic policies which override the policy of ascertaining the truth by all available means. These rules concede that the evidence in question has all the probative value that can be required, and yet exclude it because its admission would injure some other cause more than it would help the cause of truth, and because the avoidance of that injury is considered of more consequence than the possible harm to the cause of truth. Most of these rules consist in giving certain kinds of persons an option — i.e. a Privilege — to withhold the evidential fact. The general nature of these rules is elsewhere examined more at length (§ 2175, post).

This third group, as contrasted with the first and second, represents rules of Extrinsic Policy.

Finally a group of rules (Part IV, post) known as the Parol Evidence rule, but belonging really to the substantive law, remains to be considered, since by tradition it has been ranked among the rules of Evidence.

§ 12. Distinctions between Relevancy and Admissibility; between Proof, or Weight, and Admissibility. Admissibility, then, is a quality standing between Relevancy, or Probative Value, on the one hand, and Proof, or Weight of Evidence, on the other hand. Admissibility signifies that the particular fact is relevant and something more, — that it has also satisfied all the auxiliary tests and extrinsic policies. Yet it does not signify that the particular fact has demonstrated or proved the proposition to be proved, but merely that it is received by the tribunal for the purpose of being weighed with other evidence.

(1) But the first of these distinctions has been questioned, as a matter of theory, by distinguished authority, and in two opposite directions:

(a) It has been maintained that Relevancy is identical with Admissibility. Such is the theory upon which a notable and original work of the last century was constructed:

1876, Sir James Fitzjames Stephen, Digest of Evidence, Introduction:[1] "What then does the word [evidence] mean? The only possible answer is: It means that the one fact either is or else is not considered by the person using the expression to furnish a premiss or part of a premiss from which the existence of the other is a necessary or probable inference, — in other words, that the one fact is or is not relevant to the other. . . . The law has been worked out by degrees by many generations of judges who perceived more or less distinctly the principle on which it ought to be founded. The rules established by them no doubt treat as relevant some facts which cannot perhaps be said to be so. More frequently they treat as irrelevant facts which are really relevant, but exceptions excepted, all their rules are reducible to the principle that facts in issue or relevant to the issue, and no others, may be proved."

§ 12. [1] Another exposition of his theory is given by the learned author in his Indian Evidence Act, 122–126 (1872).

Either this generalization is wholly incorrect, or the term Relevancy must be diluted so as to lose any standard meaning of its own. That most of the characteristic rules of admissibility are rules which do not prescribe anything about the relevancy, or probative value, of the facts they exclude is undoubted. All of the rules of Privilege, for example, are of that sort. The rules for the Order of Evidence assume the evidence to be relevant. The rules for Producing Documentary Originals concedes that a copy is relevant, even when excluding the copy.

There is a group of rules defining the sufficiency of probative value, and the term Relevancy is a convenient one for them. If it be desired to enlarge that term, and make it synonymous with Admissibility, this can be done, by forced use of terms. But it is needless; and the rules for probative value, no matter what they be called, will remain distinct in nature from the other rules; and this distinction cannot be abolished merely by misusing the term Relevancy. The fallacy of that misuse has been well expounded as follows:

1889, Professor James Bradley Thayer, "Presumptions and the Law of Evidence", 3 Harvard Law Review 143:[2] "In stating thus our two fundamental conceptions, we must not fall into the error of supposing that relevancy, logical connection, real or supposed, is the only test of admissibility; for so we should drop out of sight the chief part of the law of evidence. When we have said (1) that, without any exception, nothing which is not supposed to be logically relevant is admissible; and (2) that, subject to many exceptions and qualifications, whatever is logically relevant is admissible,—it is obvious that, in reality, there are tests of admissibility other than logical relevancy. Some things are rejected as being of too slight a significance, or as having too conjectural and remote a connection; others, as being dangerous and likely to be misused or overestimated by a jury; others, as being impolitic, e.g. unsafe for the State; others, on the bare ground of precedent. . . . [The law] assuming, as it does, that in general what is evidential is receivable, is occupied in pointing out what part of this mass of matter is excluded. It denies to this excluded part, not the name of evidence, but the name of admissible evidence. Admissibility is determined, first, by relevancy — an affair of logic and not of law; — second, but only indirectly, by the law of Evidence which, in strictness, only declares whether matter which is logically probative is excluded. . . . It is here that Mr. Justice Stephen's treatment of the law of evidence is perplexing; indeed, it comes to have the aspect of a 'tour de force.'"

(b) On the other hand, it has been maintained that there are no legal rules of Relevancy at all. This favorite thesis of the great master of the history of these rules was thus stated by him:

1889, Professor Thayer, "Presumptions and the Law of Evidence," 3 Harvard Law Review 143, 145:[3] "How are we to know what these things are [that are logically probative]? Not by any rule of the law. The law furnishes no test of relevancy. For this it tacitly refers to logic, assuming that the principles of reasoning are known to its judges and ministers; just as a vast multitude of other things are assumed as already sufficiently known. . . . Admissibility is determined, first, by relevancy, — an affair of logic and not of law."

[2] This passage is also found in the learned author's Preliminary Treatise, 266.

[3] In the learned author's Preliminary Treatise, 270, this doctrine is further expounded. It was opposed by Mr. Jabez Fox, in an article entitled "Law and Logic", in 14 Harvard Law Review 39, to which a reply was made in 14 id. 139.

Here, after all, the difference is one of nomenclature only. The patent fact cannot be denied that there are thousands of judicial rulings which deal with pure questions of inference and probative value; they do this, not "tacitly" (as suggested in the passage above), but expressly. When the party is told that insanity in A cannot be inferred for the insanity of A's collateral relations, or that a consciousness of guilt can be inferred from flight, the material and method of this ruling is precisely the same as if the question were argued in a debating society or in a book of logic; the difference is that when the Court employs the process, the result is law. It is none the less law because it is also logic; and though this legal logic may lead to illogical law, still it is a legal precedent. Being a legal precedent, it must be studied and observed by the profession. As law aims to represent justice, so the rules of relevancy aim to follow the principles of natural logic; but neither the success or failure of the law to square with natural justice, nor the success or failure of the Courts to be truly logical, justify us in holding that the law is nothing but the dictates of justice and of logic. So long as Courts continue to declare in judicial rulings what their notions of logic are, just so long will there be rules of law which must be observed. For these rules the only appropriate place is the law of Evidence:

1863, BIGELOW, C. J., in Com. v. Jeffries, 7 All. 548, 563: "No rule of evidence is better settled, or more clearly founded in good sense and sound policy, than that which authorizes presumptions or inferences of fact to be deduced from the proof of certain other facts. . . . The process of ascertaining one fact from the existence of another is essential to the investigation of truth, and prevails in courts of law as well as in the ordinary affairs of life."

1876, CUSHING, C. J., in State v. Lapage, 57 N. H. 288: "Although undoubtedly the relevancy of testimony is originally a matter of logic and common-sense, still there are many instances in which the evidence of particular facts as bearing upon particular issues has been so often the subject of discussion in courts of law, and so often ruled upon, that the united logic of a great many judges and lawyers may be said to furnish evidence of the sense common to a great many individuals, and, therefore, the best evidence of what may be properly called common-sense, and thus to acquire the authority of law. It is for this reason that the subject of the relevancy of testimony has become, to so great an extent, matter of precedent and authority, and that we may with entire propriety speak of its legal relevancy."

(2) Admissibility, on the other hand, falls short of Proof or Demonstration. This is due partly to the circumstance that, in our system, the tribunal has traditionally been a divided one, so that the rule of law, uttered by the judge, merely declares what is sufficient to go to the jury, and the jury ultimately decide upon the total effect which we call Proof.

But chiefly the distinction is due to the circumstance that each evidential fact is offered separately, and the quality of complete demonstration could therefore never be expected of it. Since the production of evidence takes time, and since one piece of evidence must precede another, the rules of admissibility, if there are to be any at all, can have nothing to do with the inquiry whether certain evidence effects complete proof. Weight, Proof, Demonstration, — these terms have no application until the evidence is all introduced and the jury are ready to retire. The effect of this peculiar feature of Admissibility upon the quality of probative value required is more particularly considered in contrasting Relevancy and Weight (post, § 29).

§ 13. Multiple Admissibility; Evidence applicable to more than one Purpose. It constantly happens that a fact which is inadmissible for one purpose is admissible for other purposes; while, on the other hand, a fact which is entirely admissible, so far as some rules are concerned, is excluded because it fails to satisfy some other rule.

This paradox may be solved if we notice the analogy of candidates for an obstacle-race. Let us suppose that there are to be several races, — one for boys under sixteen years of age, one for lawyers, and one for club-members. Now the ineligibility of A for the second or the third class of entries does not prevent his entering for the first, and conceivably he may be eligible in two different classes. But if after entering the race he fails to surmount any one of the half-dozen obstacles, he loses all chance of victory. So with evidentiary facts; the rules of substantive law, of pleading, and of relevancy are the conditions of entrance; the auxiliary rules and the rules of privilege are the obstacles which must then be evaded by the relevant material.

Now the peculiar operation of the Auxiliary Rules and the rules of Extrinsic Policy (ante, § 11) is that almost all of them are limited in their application; for example, the attesting-witness rule applies only to documents required by law to be attested, the hearsay rule applies only to utterances used testimonially, and so on. In the obstacle-race, the analogy would be presented by a single racccourse, with various obstacles, some of which were required for one class of entries but not for other classes, the races to be run at one time by the entries of all classes. Two situations may be presented, which typify the usual evidential difficulties:

(1) If A is a club-member, and if one of the obstacles in the club-members' race is a stream of water, then A, if he is unable to swim, will not enter that race; yet in the other races, in which that obstacle is not required, he may be ineligible, being neither a lawyer nor under sixteen years of age, even though he be amply able to vault the hurdles or surmount the other obstacles for the other classes. So, a letter containing a testimonial statement by a person who ought to have been called to the stand, is inadmissible under the hearsay rule; and it must remain excluded, even though, had it passed the hearsay rule, it could have satisfied the rule for producing the original and the rule of authentication. In other words, so far as an evidentiary fact is offered for a particular purpose, as being material to a certain issue and relevant to a certain proposition, it must satisfy all the rules applicable to it in that capacity. In practical application this doctrine is constantly exemplified. It is sufficiently illustrated by its converse.

(2) Conversely, if A, though a club-member, is also as a lawyer eligible to enter the race not having the stream-obstacle, and would be permitted to pass over a bridge in the race for that class, it is no ground of objection to him that he cannot swim the stream as required for the club-members' class; further, it is no objection that perhaps the judges of the race will in the crowd be unable to distinguish who passed over the bridge and who swam the stream, and will by possibility award erroneously to A the prize in the club-members' class, thinking that he swam the stream. The reason is that the judges must be assumed to do their duty intelligently and to recollect that A was entered for the lawyers' race and not the club-members'. So, the letter above, if offered as an admission of the defendant, because shown to him and assented to, may be introduced without calling the writer of it, because it is no longer offered as the writer's testimony but as the defendant's admission. In other words, when an evidentiary fact is offered for one purpose, and becomes admissible by satisfying all the rules applicable to it in that capacity, it is not inadmissible because it does not satisfy the rules applicable to it in some other capacity and because the jury might improperly consider it in the latter capacity. This doctrine, though involving certain risks, is indispensable as a practical rule:[1]

1832, PARK, J., in Willis v. Bernard, 8 Bing. 376, 383: "I agree that it is more desirable that such part of the evidence as does not apply to the point to be proved should be withdrawn altogether from the consideration of the jury. But in many cases that is impossible; as in Manning v. Clement, where the plaintiff alleged that he carried on in an honest and lawful manner the trade of a manufacturer of bitters, and that the defendant libelled him in his trade by publishing that the bitters were made to adulterate porter 'per quod' the plaintiff was ruined; it was held, that under the general issue, the defendant might give in evidence that the plaintiff's trade was illegal, although in doing this it also appeared that his bitters had been condemned in the Court of Exchequer, and that the libel was true. So in the case of prisoners where confessions are given in evidence which unavoidably involve the mention of others besides the party confessing. But the jury are always cautioned to exclude the statement as against any but the party confessing. They also received a proper caution in this case, and, subject to that, the letter was properly admitted."

1870, GRAVES, J., in People v. Doyle, 21 Mich. 221, 227: "Whenever a question is made upon the admission of evidence, it is indispensable to consider the object for which it is produced, and the point intended to be established by it. . . . It frequently happens that an item of proof is plainly relevant and proper for one purpose, while wholly inadmissible for another which it would naturally tend to establish. And when this occurs, the evidence when offered for the legal purpose can no more be excluded on the ground of its aptitude to show the unauthorized fact than its admission to prove such unauthorized fact can be justified on the ground of its aptness to prove another fact legally provable under the issue."

1892, PETERS, C. J., in State v. Farmer, 84 Me. 440, 24 Atl. 985: "That evidence properly admissible for one purpose may be so perverted in its use as to affect a different and illegitimate purpose, is not altogether preventable. But such evidence cannot on that account be wholly rejected. The correction of its abuse lies in such explanation as the presiding judge may feel required to give to the jury concerning it."

Here the only question can be what the proper means are for avoiding the risk of misusing the evidence. It is uniformly conceded that the instruction of the Court suffices for that purpose; and the better opinion is that the op- ponent of the evidence must ask for that instruction; otherwise, he may be supposed to have waived it as unnecessary for his protection:[2]

§ 13. [1] Accord: 1892, Com. v. Trefethen, 157 Mass. 180, 186, 31 N. E. 961 (hearsay); 1893, Jamison v. People, 145 Ill. 357, 379, 34 N. E. 486.

1855, MASON, J., in Pegg v. Warfond, 7 Md. 582, 607: "But it has been said, that as this evidence was received for all or either of the three purposes for which it was offered, unless it was legally applicable to each, the jury might have been misled, and applied it to one of the purposes to which it did not relate. To avoid such a result, it was the duty of the counsel objecting to have pointed out specifically the purpose to which the testimony had no legal application, and to ask its exclusion for such purpose. . . . We must assume, where evidence has been offered generally, that it will be applied by the jury to the purposes to which it is legally applicable; and if counsel wish to guard against the contingency of a misapplication of the evidence by the jury, they should ask the court, as has been already said, to point out the branch of the case to which the evidence is not to be applied."

§ 14. Conditional Admissibility; Evidence admitted pending Subsequent Proof. The time for determining the admissibility of a particular fact is ordinarily the time when it is offered to the Court. But the presentation of all the evidence in a cause occupies a length of time, and some of the evidentiary facts must necessarily await the others. Moreover, the convenience of obtaining all the information of each witness by consecutive questioning, together with other reasons of practical necessity, often oblige certain facts to be presented at a particular point of time. Thus these facts, when presented, may be as yet inadmissible, that is, they may be relevant only because of their connection with other facts not yet presented. This dilemma is solved by admitting them conditionally. Being admissible only in dependence upon other facts, they are received on the assurance of counsel that the specific other facts will be duly presented at a suitable opportunity before the close of the case.

The rules for conditional admissibility thus involve the general rules for the Order of Presenting Evidence, and are better examined under that head (post, § 1871).

§ 15. Curative Admissibility; Prior Introduction of Inadmissible Evidence, as Estopping from Subsequent Objection to other Inadmissible Evidence. Does one inadmissibility justify or excuse another? If the one party offers an inadmissible fact which is received, may the opponent afterwards offer similar facts whose only claim to admission is that they negative or explain or counterbalance the prior inadmissible fact?

[2] Accord: 1920, F. v. F., 52 D. L. R. 440, N. B. (divorce for adultery); 1853, Cook v. Parham, 24 Ala. 21, 34 (reputation of an employee); 1920, Atkins v. Brett, 184 Cal. 252, 193 Pac. 251 (alienation of affections; as to the doctrine in the text, "The general correctness of this statement cannot be doubted; but we doubt if the learned author intended to say more than that the opponent of such evidence is always entitled to such an instruction for his protection if he asks for it, and that generally it will suffice"; holding that the trial judge in his discretion may sometimes exclude the evidence); 1920, Stacey v. Com., 189 Ky. 402, 225 S. W. 37 (moral character of party as witness only); 1920, Com. v. Feci, 235 Mass. 562, 127 N. E. 602 (thefts as leading to a motive for murder); 1913, Cooper v. Seaboard A. L. R. Co., 163 N. C. 150, 79 S. E. 418 (applying Court Rule 27); 1921, Roberson v. Stokes, 181 N. C. 59, 106 S. E. 151 (under Court Rule 21, "counsel who objects to evidence which is competent for one purpose but not for another must specify the ground of his objection or ask the judge to restrict it within its proper limits"); 1908, State v. Greene, 33 Utah 497, 94 Pac. 987.

Contra, semble: 1894, Dalton v. Dregge, 99 Mich. 25, 358 N. W. 57; 1903, Harrison v. Garrett, 132 N. C. 172, 43 S. E. 594.

If the opponent duly objected and was erroneously overruled in the first instance, he could not claim to present similar inadmissible facts, because his objection would (in theory) save him, on appeal, from any harm which may accrue, and he needs no other protection.

But if he did not object and except, he has no such protection; and the question thus arises whether he can protect himself at the trial by retorting in kind.

On this subject three different rules are found competing for recognition in the different jurisdictions.

(1) The first is that the admission of an inadmissible fact, without objection by the opponent, does not justify the opponent in rebutting by other inadmissible facts:

1875, LOOMIS, J., in Phelps v. Hunt, 43 Conn. 194, 199: "It is obvious that this whole subject matter, both of the direct and cross-examination, was wholly irrelevant, and ought not to have been entertained at all. . . . It is doubtless true that the inquiries ruled out on the cross-examination were in the main pertinent to the matter testified to in chief, and if the irrelevant matter in chief was allowed to have any effect it would have been more just and fair to have allowed a reasonable opportunity for cross-examination upon the same subject; and if, when the questions on the cross-examination were excluded, the plaintiff had asked the Court to reject also all the kindred matter previously received, and the Court had refused, the plaintiff would have had a just ground for a new trial. But no objection whatever was made to the testimony in chief, neither at the time it was offered nor afterwards. The auditor seems to have allowed the parties to take their own course in the testimony until specific questions were raised on the cross-examination; and the decisions then made were according to law. The plaintiff seems to assume that if the cross-examination was pertinent to the examination in chief it necessarily makes the ruling erroneous. This proposition we do not accept. Where the plaintiff stands on matters 'stricti juris', it must appear that the particular ruling complained of was erroneous in law. We cannot hold that it was error in law to rule out, objection being made, what it would have been error to admit, merely because the Court had received without objection matter just as irrelevant before. The maxim 'Similia similibus curantur', has been applied to some extent in the science of medicine, but the principle has never been recognized as applied to the cure of errors in law."

This rule is represented by some English authority and by a respectable number of American jurisdictions.[1] § 15. [1] ENGLAND: 1818, Shaw v. Roberts, 2 Stark. 455 (improper questions as to a nonsuit, held not to justify further inquiries on cross-examination); 1913, R. v. Cargill, 2 K. B. 271 (virginity of the girl, in rape under age).

UNITED STATES: Federal: 1830, Stringer v. Marshall, 3 Pet. 320, 337 (intimating that the rule might be different for "improper testimony calculated to make such an impression on the jury that no instruction given by the judge can efface it"); 1840, Philadelphia & T. R. Co. v. Stimpson, 14 Pet. 448, 461 (hearsay matter irrelevant to the cause); Georgia: 1900, Stapleton v. Monroe, 111 Ga. 848, 36 S. E. 428 (ordinarily, "there can be no equation of errors");

Illinois: 1875, Wickenkamp v. Wickenkamp, 77 Ill. 92, 96 ("This view of the question worked no hardship upon appellant; he had it in his power to exclude the improper evidence introduced by appellee from the jury upon motion, or he could have prepared an instruction directing the jury to disregard it"); 1900, Maxwell v. Durkin, 185 Ill. 546, 57 N. E. 433 (counter-evidence of character, excluded); 1913, People v. Newman, 261 Ill. 11, 103 N. E. 589 (a co-indictee having testified to police persecution as the motive for the charge, and having denied former crimes, the prosecution was not allowed to prove one of the crimes to rebut the testimony to police malice);

(2) At the other extreme is a rule which declares that in general precisely the contrary shall obtain, i.e. the opponent may resort to similar inadmissible evidence:

1875, Tilton v. Beecher, N. Y., Abbott's Rep. II, 789; on the re-direct examination of Mrs. Moulton, the witness was asked to explain why she had advised a certain thing to be done, as stated by her on cross-examination; Mr. Evarts, for the defendant, objected that her answer on cross-examination had not been asked for and was irrelevant; Mr. Fullerton, for the plaintiff: "Your Honor knows perfectly well that when my learned friend upon the other side puts a question to the witness, and gets an answer that is not responsive, or does not suit him, he moves forthwith to strike it out, and does not rest until it is stricken out. But, on the other hand, if he puts a question to a witness, and gets an answer which is not responsive, but which he deems of some advantage to himself, he then fails to make such a motion, and lets it stand, perhaps, until some future time in the case when we, by a question, seek to take advantage of the answer, and then the argument is that it is irresponsive, and that we have no right to follow up the answer. Now, when counsel puts a question and gets an answer, and does not move to strike it out, but permits that answer to stand as evidence, then it is evidence, and we have a right to explain it, if it needs any explanation. The question we now put is, why she advised or suggested this short statement." Judge NEILSON: "She may answer that."

This rule has also ample authority, and is perhaps to be regarded as the orthodox English rule.[2]

Maine: 1874, Sturgis v. Robbins, 62 Me. 289, 292 (inadmissible evidence on cross-examination does not justify a re-examination on the same subject);
Maryland: 1853, Baltimore & S. R. Co. v. Woodruff, 4 Md. 242, 255 (fire set by a locomotive; rebuttal of irrelevant facts, not allowed; "the offering of improper evidence by one of the litigant parties never can justify the introduction of similar evidence by the other party"); 1854, Mitchell v. Sellman, 5 Md. 376, 385; 1854, Warner v. Hardy, 6 Md. 525, 539 (prescriptive possession); 1916, Flaccus Glass Co. v. Gavin, 39 Md. 431, 98 Atl. 213 (contract claim);
Massachusetts: 1918, Com. v. Wakelin, 230 Mass. 567, 120 N. E. 209 (homicide);
Missouri: 1916, Buck v. St. Louis Union Trust Co., 267 Mo. 644, 185 S. W. 208 (testamentary undue influence); Pennsylvania: 1837, Smith v. Dreer, 3 Whart. 154 ("cross-examination to irrelevant matter shall not bring it into the issue").

This rule would not apply where there had been no real opportunity to object in the first instance: 1900, People v. Barone, 161 N. Y. 451, 55 N. E. 1083 (here the question in chief did not warn of the answer's incompetency; held, that the cross-examiner was not restricted to a motion to strike out).

[2] ENGLAND: 1835, Blewett v. Tregonning, 3 A. & E. 554, 581 (acts of prescriptive uses in other places than that in issue having been testified to on the defendant's cross-examination of the plaintiff's witness, the plaintiff's re-examination to explain away those acts was allowed; "the plaintiff was entitled to pursue it, unless the defendant got it struck out"); 1837, Duncombe v. Daniell, 8 C. & P. 222, 227 (matters stated in the plaintiff's opening, but not afterwards evidenced by him, allowed to be rebutted; Lord Denman, C. J.: "A statement cannot fail to make some impression and I think it competent for the opposite party to remove that impression").

CANADA: 1903, R. v. Noel, 6 Ont. L. R. 385 ("Even if inadmissible matters are introduced in cross-examination, the right to re-examine remains; . . . if it was desired to avoid re-examination upon it, it should have been expunged"; Blewett v. Tregonning followed).

UNITED STATES: Federal: 1905, Warren L. S. Co. v. Farr, 142 Fed. 116, C. C. A. (conversion); 1906, Ball v. U. S., 741 Fed. 32, 41, C. C. A. (conviction of crime, offered to discredit the accused as witness); Alabama: 1882, Ford v. State, 71 Ala. 385, 398 (rebuttal of testimony to sanity); 1889, Morgan v. State, 88 Ala. 223, 6 So. 761 ("the party first in fault cannot take any advantage of the ruling of the Court in favor of the other"; applied to the rebuttal of improper character evidence); 1891, Mobile & B. R. Co. v. Ladd, 92 Ala. 287, 9 So. 169 ("It is never erroneous to receive irrelevant evidence to rebut evidence of a like kind offered by the opposite party"; applied to the rebuttal of the irrelevant fact of the darkness of the night); 1899, McIntyre v. White, 124 Ala. 177, 26 So. 937 (wife's separate acknowledgment; irrelevant facts introduced may always

(3) A third form of rule, intermediate between the other two, is that the opponent may reply with similar evidence whenever it is needed for removing be denied); 1905, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Quinn, 145 Ala. 657, 39 So. 616 (carrier putting off a passenger before reaching destination); 1916, Murphey v. State, 14 Ala. App. 78, 71 So. 967 (murder);

Arkansas: 1905, German-Amer. Ins. Co. v. Brown, 75 Ark. 251, 87 S. W. 135 (opinion testimony); Illinois: 1914, Jones v. Sanitary District, 265 Ill. 98, 106 N. E. 473 (condition of flowage and its cause);
Indiana: 1890, Perkins v. Hayward, 124 Ind. 449, 24 N. E. 1033 ("If a party opens the door for the admission of incompetent evidence, he is in no plight to complain that his adversary followed through the door thus opened");
Iowa: Artz v. R. Co., 44 Ia. 284, 286 (personal injuries; the defendant introduced a minister of the gospel, to prove conversations with the plaintiff after the injury, who testified, among other facts, to "offering the plaintiff the consolations of religion"; having then on cross-examination denied that he had refused to pray with the plaintiff, the plaintiff was allowed to prove this refusal, and an objection of irrelevancy was overruled; "this was clearly a continuation of the subject introduced by defendant, and objection cannot now be raised by the same party to the competency of the evidence"); 1877, Hale v. Philbrick, 47 Ia. 217 (false representations); 1885, Frost v. Rosecrans, 66 Ia. 405, 407, 23 N. W. 895 (fraudulent mortgages; rebuttal of irrelevant transactions allowed, to prevent prejudice); 1896, Spaulding v. R. Co., 98 Ia. 205, 67 N. W. 227 (personal injuries; rebuttal of improper opinion testimony allowed); 1903, Hamilton v. Mendota C. & M. Co., 120 Ia. 147, 94 N. W. 282 (opinion testimony); 1904, See v. Wabash R. Co., 123 Ia. 443, 99 N. W. 106 (repairs at a crossing, contradiction allowed); 1916, Smith v. Rice, 178 Ia. 673, 160 N. W. 6 (alienation of affections);
Maine: 1851, State v. Sargent, 32 Me. 429 (here applied to an accomplice's testimony on a collateral point, because otherwise "if perceived to remain unimpeached when its truth might be tested", it might receive undue credit); 1880, Williams v. Gilman, 71 Me. 21, 23 ("If the testimony be purely collateral, it was not for the plaintiff to call out collateral facts which might prejudice, and then object to an explanation"; here applied, in an action for negligence as a veterinary surgeon, to other instances of the defendant's treatment);
Missouri: 1920, Pinson v. Jones, — Mo. —, 221 S. W. 80 (lay witnesses to testamentary capacity); 1921, State v. Ritter, 288 Mo. 381, 231 S. W. 606 (applied to rebutting evidence of character);
Nebraska: 1921, Macke v. Wagner, 106 Nebr. 282, 183 N. W. 360 (slander; rule not clear);
New Hampshire: 1830, Grafton Bank. v. Woodward, 5 N. H. 301, 309 (declarations of an agent for a contract); 1870, Janvrin v. Fogg, 49 N. H. 347 (admitting explanations of an offer of compromise improperly received);
New Jersey: 1920, State v. Engsberg, 94 N. J. L. 464, 110 Atl. 918 (inadmissible conversation; here the opponent failed to move to strike out the original irrelevancy);
New York: 1868, Blossom v. Barrett, 37 N. Y. 433, 437 (fraudulent marriage; contradiction of immaterial evidence as to property, allowed); 1873, Coleman v. People, 55 N. Y. 81, 89 (contra; "A party does not acquire the right to give immaterial evidence because his adversary has done the same thing"; evidence of the receipt of other stolen goods, held to have been improperly admitted; no authority cited); 1895, People v. Buchanan, 145 N. Y. 1, 39 N. E. 846 ("Even if the cross-examination had been as to facts not admissible in evidence, the rule seems to be that the witness may be re-examined as to evidence so given"; preceding cases ignored);
Pennsylvania: Sherwood v. Titman, 55 Pa. 77, 80 ("The defendant opened the door for the testimony, and cannot complain that it was not closed soon enough to suit him"; here applied in an action for criminal conversation); 1886, Swank v. Phillips, 113 Pa. 482, 489 (a disqualified witness of the defendant held improperly admitted, where the plaintiff had introduced another on the same subject; "that error could not be corrected by committing another"; preceding case not noticed);
Vermont: 1897, State v. Slack, 69 Vt. 486, 38 Atl. 311 (mode of attacking character of a witness); 1898, Fuller v. Valiquette, 70 Vt. 502, 41 Atl. 579 (loss of support by husband's intoxication; the plaintiff having erroneously introduced evidence of prior intoxication, the defendant was allowed to rebut this); 1915, Drown v. Oderkirk, 89 Vt. 484, 96 Atl. 11 (contract for support; rule applied to evidence about fraud in a deed);
Washington: 1896, Dutcher v. Howard, 15 Wash. 693, 47 Pac. 28 (cross-examination to irrelevant matter excuses a re-examination to the same matter);
West Virginia: 1897, Sisler v. Shaffer, 43 W. Va. 769, 28 S. E. 721 ("Strange cattle having wandered through a gap made by himself, he cannot complain").

This rule would not apply where the original fact was not actually introduced as evidence: 1844, Allen v. Hancock, 16 Vt. 230, 233 (re-examination to another instance of highway defects, not allowable if it was referred to on cross-examination merely to stimulate the witness' memory).

Compare the rules for re-examination (post, § 1896) and rebuttal (post, § 1873).

an unfair prejudice which might otherwise have ensued from the original evidence, but in no other case. This seems to be the true significance of what may be called the Massachusetts rule:[3]

1864, BIGELOW, C. J., in Mowry v. Smith, 9 All. 67: "The question then arises, how far the admission of incompetent and irrelevant evidence offered by one party, to which no objection is taken, renders it competent for the opposite party to introduce evidence of a similar character. There certainly must be some limit beyond which parties cannot be permitted to go, in extending issues of fact and bringing into a case matters which have no essential bearing on its real merits. Without indicating a general rule applicable to all cases of this nature, we think it may be safely said that a party should not be allowed to go farther than to prove facts which have a direct tendency to contradict and control the irrelevant or incompetent evidence which his adversary has introduced into the case. To this extent, it may be properly held that the latter has waived the strict rule of law applicable to such evidence, and is estopped from objecting to the proof of facts, by the opposite party, which can be properly deemed to be contradictory or in rebuttal of those offered by himself. It seems to us that the plaintiff was allowed to transcend this limit at the trial, in the in-

[3] Accord: CANADA: 1847, Connell v. Smith, 3 Kerr N. Br. 483 (refusal to perform contract of purchase; defendant's purchases at a cheaper price from other persons having been shown, he was allowed to explain the whole of these irrelevant transactions).

UNITED STATES: Federal: 1830, Stringer v. Marshall, 3 Pet. 320, 337 (see citation supra);
Alabama: 1916, Bank of Phoenix City v. Taylor, 196 Ala. 265, 72 So. 264 (money on deposit; irrelevant evidence is admissible "merely to neutralize by direct contradiction the force and effect of the evidence improperly adduced", etc.);
Colorado: 1911, Denver City T. Co. v. Hills, 50 Colo. 328, 116 Pac. 125, semble (street-car accident);
Connecticut: 1921, State v. Segar, 96 Conn. 428, 114 Atl. 389 (forgery; C's hearsay statements having been admitted for the State without objection, the defendant was allowed to introduce C's self-contradictory statements);
Illinois: 1904, Chicago City R. Co. v. Bundy, 210 Ill. 39, 71 N. E. 28 (a party introducing the opponent's admission during an offer of compromise by the former was not allowed to exclude the opponent's evidence in explanation); 1906, Mash v. People, 220 Ill. 86, 77 N. E. 92 (rule applied to justify the counsel's allusion to the defendant wife's failure to testify);
Indiana: 1903, Hoover v. State, 161 Ind. 348, 68 N. E. 591 (defendant's irrelevant beer-drinking; testimony in denial or explanation, allowed);
Maine: 1881, State v. Witham, 72 Me. 531, 535 (Peters, J.: "The introduction of immaterial testimony to meet immaterial testimony on the other side is generally within the discretion of the presiding judge. But if one side introduces evidence irrelevant to the issue, which is prejudicial and harmful to the other party, then, although it come in without objection, the other party is entitled to introduce evidence which will directly and strictly contradict it"; here, the birth of a child to an unmarried woman was improperly received to show the defendant's adultery; and evidence of other men's intercourse was received to explain away this irrelevant but prejudicial evidence);
Massachusetts: 1861, Brown v. Perkins, 1 All. 89, 96 (trespass in entering the plaintiff's shop and destroying goods; the plaintiff having volunteered the statement that no liquor was in his shop, the defendant was allowed to prove that liquor was found there; "it was too late to object to the question after he had voluntarily testified on the same subject"; but here the Court also thought the fact relevant to the issue).
Vermont: 1868, Lytle v. Bond, 40 Vt. 618 (one erroneous admission does not justify another; but where the first fact is "a circumstance morally tending to render the disputed fact more probable", the opponent has a right "to do away with the impression it may create in the minds of the jury").
Virginia: 1920, Graham v. Com., 127 Va. 808, 103 S. E. 565 (murder of an officer; to rebut defendant's irrelevant evidence as to deceased's misconduct, certain rebutting evidence was admitted).

But in the Massachusetts Court this rule does not give the opponent a fixed right to the counter-evidence; hence, if it was rejected below, the ruling will not be disturbed: 1875, Parker v. Dudley, 118 Mass. 602, 604 (bastardy; previous irrelevant improprieties of the complainant not admitted to contradict her testimony; "by failing to object to evidence on behalf of the complainant which was incompetent the respondent could not as of right claim to contradict it").

So, too, the trial Court's discretion in admitting it will not be disturbed: 1906, Bennett v. Susser, 191 Mass. 329, 77 N. E. 884.

troduction of evidence to which the defendant objected. He was not confined to disproof of the fact that he had charged the defendant with passing counterfeit money, which was the only ground of provocation which the latter had attempted to establish. The plaintiff was allowed to go much further, and to show the distinct and independent fact that the defendant had large sums of money in his possession, which he would take out in papers and show to persons about him, to the amount of several thousand dollars at a time. This was an irrelevant and immaterial fact, which not only had no bearing on the true issue between the parties, but did not tend to contradict or control the evidence which the defendant had introduced in mitigation of damages."

The source of these divergent views is apparent enough. By the Courts adopting the first rule the emphasis is placed upon the circumstance that the opponent did not in the first instance object; hence, his waiver of objection leaves him without ground for maintaining that the original evidence was a wrong which estops the original offeror from now objecting. By the Courts adopting the second rule, on the other hand, the emphasis is placed upon the original party's voluntary action in offering the evidence, by which he virtually waived future objection to that class of facts. Both these circumstances of waiver are true; it is simply a question of relative emphasis; hence the contradictory views. But it may be noted that under the first rule, in almost all the cases, the counter-evidence had been rejected below, while under the second rule, in almost all the cases the counter-evidence had been admitted below; i.e. the Courts under both rules reached practically the same result in that they refused to disturb the ruling below. This points to the true rule, namely, that since each party is alike in the condition of 'volenti non fit injuria', neither can complain of a ruling either admitting or rejecting, — a waiver being predicable of both. The matter is thus left in the hands of the trial Court. Modify this in certain cases by conceding to the opponent, as of right, to use the curative counter-evidence when a plain and unfair prejudice would otherwise have inured to him, and the rule will be sufficiently flexible.

Certain other questions, apparently related, must here be distinguished; (1) whether certain facts properly admissible in impeachment of character may be rebutted or explained in a certain manner, as by the fact of innocence of crime (post, §§ 195, 1116), or of corroborative consistent statements (post, §1122), and by explanatory evidence in general (post, §§ 1101–1144); (2) whether a collateral fact can be disproved by counter-evidence (post, §§ 1000–1015); (3) whether certain facts, in their order of presentation, may be put in on a re-examination instead of on the direct examination (post, § 1896).[4]

[4] Compare also the rules for waiver of objection (post, § 18), whose principle is here partly involved. Under that head belongs the question whether a party who has originally objected to inadmissible evidence is to be deemed to have waived the objection by subsequently introducing similar evidence himself.

For the question whether an instruction must be given upon evidence admitted for both parties outside of the pleadings, see Thompson on Trials (1880), II, § 2310; 1902, Bomar v. Rosser, 131 Ala. 215, 31 So. 430.

For the present subject in general, see Thompson, ubi supra: Elliott, General Practice (1894), II, § 592.

§ 16. Judicial Discretion as applied to Admissibility; Distinction between Discretion and Unappealable Rulings. The term "discretion", as applied to a trial Court's powers, may be used in several senses, which have not been, in our law, as often discriminated or as fully developed as they ought to be.

It may mean (1) that the trial judge is controlled by no fixed rules, but may in each case decide according to good sense and justice without regard to precedents, either by himself or by a higher Court. In this meaning, nothing is involved as to the finality of the decision; it may or may not be appealable. (2) It may mean, on the contrary, that the trial judge decides according to some rule, but that in one or another respect his decision is final; and here it may be final (a) as to the law, i.e. the tenor of the rule, (b) as to the applicability of the rule to the facts, or (c) as to the existence of the facts. The first of these meanings (1) is Discretion in the ordinary sense; the second (2) may be termed Finality of Ruling.

(1) Now Discretion, in this strict sense, is by our law not conceded to any trial judge on points of evidence, except perhaps in 'ex parte' and interlocutory proceedings.[1] The whole spirit of our law requires the observance of precedents. The propriety of improving our system in this respect is a large question, which need not be here opened; the tenor of our law is plain. It is in this view that the following utterances were made:

1824, TAYLOR, C. J., in State v. Candler, 3 Hawks 398: "The superiority of our law [of evidence] consists in its laying down the rule, with its proper exceptions and limitations, and leaving nothing to the discretion of the Court."

1867, SAWYER, J., in People v. Farrell, 31 Cal. 584 (the trial judge had declared that the rules of evidence were to an extent flexible: this the Supreme Court repudiated): "If the law had really established certain rules of evidence, the Court, as we conceive, is bound to adhere to them, not only 'in all ordinary cases', but in all cases and such rules cannot properly 'be bent when they come in contact with what may seem to the Court or jury in the particular case in hand to be 'reason and justice, so as to suit the case to which they are to be applied.'"

1896, BENET, J., in Norris v. Clinkscales, 47 S. C. 488, 25 S. E. 797: "The term 'discretion' implies the absence of a hard and fast rule. The establishment of a clearly-defined rule would be the end of discretion. And yet 'discretion' should not be a word for arbitrary will or unstable caprice. Nor should judicial discretion be, as Lord Coke pronounced it, 'a crooked cord', but rather, as Lord Mansfield defined it, the 'exercising the best of their judgment upon the occasion that calls for it', adding that 'if this discretion be wilfully abused . . . it ought to be under the control of this Court.' The Courts and text writers all concur that by 'judicial discretion' is meant sound discretion guided by fixed legal principles. It must not be arbitrary nor capricious, but must be regulated upon legal grounds, — grounds that will make it judicial. It must be compelled by conscience, and not by humor. So that when a judge properly exercises his judicial discretion he will decide and act according to the rules of equity, and so as to advance the ends of justice. There are two different kinds of discretion that may be exercised by the presiding judge, one of which is appealable, the other not. In the exercise of his exclusive right to decide a matter of fact, or to control the orderly conduct of trials, the discretion of the circuit judge will not be reviewed by this court. For example, in granting or refusing a new trial on the evidence, or in granting or refusing additional time for argument of counsel, or in deciding whether an admission or confession was made freely and voluntarily, so as to determine its admissibility as evidence, or in permitting a witness to be recalled, or in granting or refusing a motion for a continuance, or the like. In such matters no error of law can be committed, and no appeal can be taken."

§ 16. [1] Distinguish the English legislation by which the Supreme Court is given power to alter the rules of evidence: 1894, St. 57 & 58 Vict. c. 16, § 3, Judicature Act (giving power to make rules of evidence in specified cases; explained in Boerlein v. Bank, 1895, 2 Ch. 488, 491).

(2) (a) Finality, as to the tenor of the law, is in our system never conceded to the trial judge. The very constitution of courts of appeal is of itself a demonstration.

(b) But finality as to the application of the law to the facts may conceivably admit of a different result. For example, let a certified copy of a deed be offered; the question arises whether the original should be produced; assume that the law of the jurisdiction is that a copy of a document is admissible when the original is lost, and that loss consists in the inability to find after diligent and adequate search; and, further, that a recorded deed is not governed by that rule, but by the rule that the certified copy of a recorded deed may be used without proof of loss. Now here (a) the law is these rules; (b) the application of the law consists in declaring the offer to be governed by the first or the second rule; and (c) the facts consist in the diligent and adequate search followed by inability to find. Under (b), then, is the decision of the trial judge final? It might perhaps be. But in our system of law this seems never to be recognized, for rules of Evidence. If the trial judge selects the wrong rule as applicable to the case, this error is deemed open to revision:

1896, BENET, J., in Norris v. Clinkscales, supra: "To the appealable class, in this State, belong all instances of the exercise of discretion which may disclose the commission of error of law. And, without going into detail, it is enough for the purposes of this case to say that, in deciding the preliminary question whether or not there has been sufficient proof of the loss of the written instrument to justify the admission of secondary evidence of its contents, it is possible that a circuit judge may commit error of law in the violation or misapplication of the rules of evidence, and therefore his exercise of discretion may be appealed from; and the appeal will lie, not because of any so-called 'abuse of discretion', — a phrase unhappily framed, because implying a bad motive or wrong purpose, — but because his ruling may appear to have been made on grounds and for reasons clearly untenable."

(c) Finality as to the findings of fact, however, is by most Courts in theory, and by some Courts in practice, conceded to the trial judge.[2] In the instance above, for example, the facts as to a diligent and adequate search would be taken, upon appeal, as determined below.[3] This is the sensible and practical doctrine. A few Courts — notably that of New Hampshire (largely due to the influence of Chief Justice Doe) and of Massachusetts — systematically

[2] This applies, of course, to such matters of fact only as fall within the province of the judge, not the jury (post, Book III).

[3] It will be noticed, further, that the attribution, in such a case, of finality on matters of fact signifies also, in effect, that the appellate Court will not define the rule of law any more minutely; for example, a holding that the sufficiency of the search is a question of fact for the trial judge signifies that no rule requiring search in a particular place or by a particular person will be laid down.

recognize it for substantially all the rules of Evidence. On a few topics (such as the qualifications of an expert witness) almost all Courts enforce its recognition. On the remaining topics, most Courts profess an adherence to it, but nevertheless inconsistently waste their own time and that of the profession by recording at great length their opinions upon a thousand petty questions of fact preliminary to the admission of particular pieces of evidence. This is due chiefly to their usual qualification that the discretion is final unless it is "abused"; so the necessity of overhauling the facts in detail, to see whether discretion has been "abused", involves the very labor for the appellate Court and the very uncertainty for suitors which would be obviated by a doctrine of discretion, if it were worth anything at all. It is usually the appellate Court, not the trial Court, that "abuses" the doctrine of discretion. However, in theory at least, all Courts are found more or less explicitly recognizing some concession of finality to the trial judge on the matters of fact upon which the application of the rules of evidence depend:

1870, FOSTER, J., in Bundy v. Hyde, 50 N. H. 116, 120: "By discretion — judicial discetion — we mean the exercise of final judgment by the [trial] Court in the decision of such questions of fact as from their nature and the circumstances of the case come peculiarly within the province of the presiding judge to determine, without the intervention and to the exclusion of the functions of a jury."

1894, WOOD, J., in Vaughan v. State, 58 Ark. 353, 371, 24 S. W. 885: "The trial Court had a discretion [in determining the conditions preliminary to secondary evidence], which was only limited to the extent that it should not be abused. It is absolutely essential that circuit Courts be vested with such discretion. The judge is acquainted with the surroundings, sees and hears the witnesses, and is the one to be satisfied as to whether the conditions exist calling for the introduction of secondary evidence. . . . The Court should proceed cautiously and avoid capricious conclusions. Its judgment should be based upon investigations reasonable and satisfactory. It should have diligent inquiry made, or be satisfied from competent proof that inquiry would do no good. When it appears to us that such has been the course of the trial judge, we will not review his discretion to disturb his findings upon the facts before him. If the law requires certain fixed and unbending rules to be observed by the circuit judge in laying foundation for the admission of secondary evidence, then he has no discretion in the matter."[4]

2. Procedure in Questions of Admissibility

§ 17. The Offer of Evidence. The procedure in raising and deciding questions of Admissibility is a part of the general body of procedure, and could not be fully treated except in that connection. But its details often depend intimately upon the doctrines of Admissibility, and a knowledge of the rules of procedure is necessary in considering many of the applications of those principles. A short survey of the rules and their reasons is therefore necessary at this point. The procedure as a whole falls into five separate stages: the Offer of Evidence, the Objection, the Ruling, the Exception, and the Judgment of Error.

[4] Further utterances may be found in the ensuing opinions: 1895, State v. Sawtelle, 66 N. H. 488, 32 Atl. 831; 1914, Nawn v. Boston & Maine R. Co., 77 N. H. 299, 91 Atl. 181 (history of the doctrine of trial Court's discretion in this State); 1922, Dunklee v. Prior, — N. H. —, 115 Atl. 138 (opinion by Plummer, J., approving the text above); 1906, State v. Monich, 74 N. J. L. 522, 64 Atl. 1016; 1898, Martin v. Jennings, 52 S. C. 371, 29 S. E. 807.

The Offer of Evidence. The offer of evidence involves several questions, — the time of offering, the form of the offer, its tenor, and its finality. The first of these is better considered elsewhere (post, §§ 1866–1900), as a part of the general body of rules for the Order of Evidence. The other three belong properly here.

a. Form of the Offer. (1) The offer at the trial need not be in writing; it is ordinarily made by the counsel's oral calling of a witness or presentation of a document or by his oral statement of a question to a witness. But where the testimony is in the form of a deposition taken before trial, the questions are required to be in writing when the depositions are taken by the method of commission, i.e. when the counsel do not attend personally at the time of the witness' examination before the officer but prepare written interrogatories to be sent to the officer;[1] the more usual method, however, consists in an oral examination by counsel personally attending, the questions and answers being written down after utterance.[2] In either case the deposition-document is usually required to be filed with the clerk of court before trial,[3] and is always formally offered at the trial, by being read by the counsel or handed to the clerk for reading.[4]

(2) The offers of specific facts are usually separated by being embodied in single successive questions to the witness. But in the discretion of the trial Court the witness may be permitted to relate a continuous narrative without interrogation. These matters involve rather the form of the witness' narration, including the use of photographs, maps, interpreters, and the like, and are considered under the head of Testimonial Narration (post, §§ 766–812).

(3) The offer must be a presentation of evidence actually available:

1903, Ricks, J., in Chicago City R. Co. v. Carroll, 206 Ill. 318, 68 N. E. 1087 (the plaintiff having been allowed, after the close of both cases, to offer evidence of the defendant's ownership of the car on which the injury occurred, and the defendant then desiring to offer, for the first time, evidence of the due inspection of the cars, the defendant's attorney said: "We desire to offer evidence on the question of inspection", and the Court replied: "I will not receive any evidence, except as to the ownership of this line, at this stage"; this was held not a sufficient offer): "No witness was put upon the stand. No question was asked. Nothing was done, except a mere conversation or talk had between counsel for appellant and the Court. Such procedure as that does not amount to an offer of evidence, and the remarks of the Court did not amount to a refusal to admit evidence. There can be no refusal to admit that which has not been offered; and counsel cannot, by engaging in a mere conversation with the Court, although it may relate to the procedure, by merely stating § 17. [1] For the distinction between these two methods, see post, §§ 802, 1376.

[2] The rules for interrogatories are briefly considered post, §§ 802–806.

[3] The statutes on this point may be found by consulting the citations post, §§ 1380–1382.

[4] For the duty of the proponent of a document to show it to the opponent before reading it to the jury, see post, § 1861.

what he desires to do, get a ruling from the Court upon which he can predicate error. If appellant desired to make the contention it now makes, it should have at least put a witness upon the stand, and proceeded far enough till the question relative to the point it is now said it was desired to offer evidence upon was reached, and then put the question, and allowed the Court to rule upon it, and then offered what was expected to be proved by the witness, if he was not allowed to answer the question asked."

1917, MCCAMANT, J., in Columbia Realty Investment Co. v. Alameda Land Co., 87 Or. 277, 168 Pac. 64, 444 (action for brokerage commissions on sales of realty where the purchasers had defaulted and contracts been cancelled): "In rebuttal plaintiff made the following offer: 'The plaintiff at this time offers to produce witnesses and prove that all the cancellations of contracts which have been referred to in the case are the result of an interference by the Alameda Land Company . . . so that it was profitable for the purchasers to surrender the contracts and forfeit the moneys. . . .'

"Defendant contends that an offer of proof cannot be made without calling a witness and asking an appropriate question. . . . In the case at bar no witness was named, and the offer of proof was couched in the most general terms. We think that plaintiff should have named its witnesses and specified the acts of interference relied on. The offer should have named the contracts of purchase which were cancelled because of each act of interference by the defendant. Unless the calling of witnesses is waived by the court, or by the adverse party, we think the better practice is to call the witnesses relied on and ask appropriate questions. If objections are sustained to these questions, the time is ripe for an offer of proof . . . authorities are cited to the effect that, when the trial court settles a bill of exceptions reciting offer of proof, it will be assumed on appeal that the witnesses were present and the evidence was properly offered. We do not think that the certification of a bill of exceptions should be given the effect contended for. It is the practice in this State to incorporate in a bill of exceptions the objections to questions and the offers of proof in language taken from the reporter's transcript, and a trial court refusing so to do would be regarded as unfair to the unsuccessful litigant. The certification of the bill does not import a waiver by the trial court of the calling of witnesses in connection with an offer of proof."

The offer must therefore not be merely a verbal suggestion for invoking a ruling, or a promissory announcement of expected material. It need not expressly appear, however, that a witness was corporally called to the stand, unless there are circumstances to raise the presumption that the offer was improper in one or the other of these respects.[5] An elusive violation of this principle

[5] Such seems to be the result of the cases: Federal: 1884, Scotland Co. v. Hill, 112 U. S. 183, 186 ("If the offer is actually made and refused, and there is nothing else in the record to indicate bad faith, an appellate Court must assume that the proof could have been made"); 1909, Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Castle, 8th C. C. A., 172 Fed. 841 (a witness being called and a certain question being excluded, the counsel offered to prove certain other facts, without asking the appropriate questions; held sufficient); 1912, Platte Valley C. Co. v. Bosserman-Gates L. S. Co., 8th C. C. A., 202 Fed. 692, 694 ("In the Federal courts, an assignment as error of a rejection of an offer to prove certain facts without propounding any questions to a witness calculated to elicit them properly raises the issue of the admissibility", the presumption being that the offer was made in good faith); 1917, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Burns, 6th C. C. A., 242 Fed. 411 (ejectment from a railroad train; counsel's announcement of "ability to make such proof", which was "never definitely offered", held not enough); Fla. 1922, Tyson v. State, — Fla. —, 90 So. 623 (objections were sustained to questions put by counsel to witnesses as to alleged material facts; the rulings were affirmed; "the proper practice is to proffer to establish the facts relied upon as a defense by competent proof"); Ida. 1922, Mabbett v. Mabbett, 34 Ida. 611, 202 Pac. 1057 (habeas corpus by a father against a mother for the custody of a child; on the trial, and before resting, petitioner's counsel said, "I would like to ask Mrs. Mabbett (the respondent) a few questions"; to which respondent's counsel said, "We object." The court said, "I do not think occurs often on cross-examination to character, when facts of discreditable conduct are groundlessly asked about, in the hope that though denied they will be assumed by the jury as well founded (post, §§ 983, 1808). Here, since the cross-examiner is by another rule not allowed to prove such facts by ex-you can cross-examine her unless she goes on the stand herself"; McCarthy, J.: "While he did not expressly say so, it is probable that appellant's counsel desired to cross-examine the respondent as the adverse party under our statute (C. S. § 8035). . . . Does the record show a denial by the court of appellant's right to examine respondent, and resulting prejudice? Counsel did not call her to the stand, nor ask that she be sworn; did not state what questions he proposed to ask her, nor what he proposed to prove by her. The remark made by the court can hardly be called a ruling. Counsel did not assert his right in such a way as to call for a ruling"); Ind. 1919, Chicago, Indiana & L. R. Co. v. Public Service Commission, 188 Ind. 334, 123 N. E. 465 (the filing of a transcript of evidence taken before the Commission, with the clerk of the court in which action was brought, as required by St. 1913, p. 167, § 69, does not of itself make the whole or any part of the transcript evidence for either party as if introduced); Md. 1877, Eschbach v. Hurtt, 47 Md. 61, 67 (a judicial statement that certain evidence will not be admitted is not the subject of exception where it does not appear that the party at the time produced or had present a witness to the fact, or so stated to the trial Court); Minn. 1910, National Citizens' Bank v. Thro, 110 Minn. 169, 124 N. W. 965 (here two judges dissented because the colloquy at the trial showed sufficiently that the evidence ready to be offered, but not formally offered, was material); Mo. 1910, Seibel-Suessdorf C. & I. M. Co. v. Manufacturers R. Co., 230 Mo. 59, 130 S. W. 288 (a "mere expression of a desire to introduce evidence" is not enough); Mont. 1919, Juby v. Craddock, 56 Mont. 556, 185 Pac. 771 ("defendants did not call or offer to call any witness by whom the facts detailed in the offer could be proved"); Nebr. 1909, Butterfield v. Beaver City, 84 Nebr. 417, 121 N. W. 592 (questions were excluded, but the expected answer was not formally offered; held insufficient); N. Y. 1922, People v. Nunziato, 233 N. Y. 394, 135 N. E. 827 (offer held insufficient); N. Dak. 1907, Madson v. Rutten, 16 N. D. 281, 113 N. W. 872 (questions asked and rejected, but not followed by an "offer of proof", held inadequate); Or. 1920, Booth-Keely Lumber Co. v. Williams, 95 Or. 476, 188 Pac. 213 (counsel "read into the record the language of his pleading as an offer of proof"; held insufficient); 1922, Patterson v. Causey, —S. C.—, 111 S. E. 725 (grantor's capacity: here the failure to offer a witness was held fatal); P. R. 1915, People v. Diodonet, 22 P. R. 698 (assault; "where the question shows its purpose and the materiality of the evidence sought to be elicited, an offer to prove is not necessary,"); Tenn. 1878, Robinson v. State, 1 Lea 673, 674 (the party making the offer must show that he had the proper witness or the means of producing him, or in good faith so believed); Wis. 1916, Witt v. Voigt, 162 Wis. 568, 156 N. W. 954 (defendant's counsel "said in substance that he had witnesses in court . . . who would testify" etc., whereon the Court "informed him that such evidence would not be received"; held, a sufficient offer).

For additional illustrations of the application of the principle, see post, § 1808.

The following rulings seem too strict: 1884, Higham v. Vanosdol, 101 Ind. 160, 162 (the record showed that, a witness being on the stand, "the defendant offered to prove by the witness" a specific conversation set out in full; a ruling rejecting the offer was sustained, partly because "it does not appear that any question was asked the witness"); 1905, Indianapolis & M. R. T. Co. v. Hall, 165 Ind. 557, 76 N. E. 242 ("There must be a question asked which is calculated to elicit the testimony excluded"); 1904, Schilling v. Curran, 30 Mont. 370, 76 Pac. 998 (the counsel "now makes formal offer to prove that S. knew of this transaction", etc., held insufficient without calling the witness or affirmatively showing that the offer is made in good faith, etc.); 1917, Columbia Realty I. Co. v. Alameda Land Co., 87 Or. 277, 168 Pac. 64, 440 (broker's commissions; ordinarily, "an offer of proof cannot be made without calling a witness and asking an appropriate question"; quoted supra).

It has been said that on cross-examination the rule requiring an offer of proof is not applicable; 1918, Herzig v. Sandberg, 52 Mont. 538, 172 Pac. 132. But this means perhaps no more than another aspect of the general exception that on cross-examination the ulterior purpose of an apparently irrelevant question need not be disclosed, so far as required by the general principle of conditional admissibility (post, § 1871). It is of course obvious that, on the one hand, the very question by the cross-examiner to the witness is an offer of proof; and, on the other hand, that no other witness could properly be called at that moment by the cross-examiner (post, § 1885). In this aspect, the statement above would be therefore both a truism, in one sense, and incorrect, in another sense.

trinsic testimony, he is exempt from supporting his question by formal tender, and he thus abuses his advantage. Nothing but a strict exercise of judicial duty can avail to check this abuse.[6]

b. Tenor of the Offer. The general principle is that the offer must be judged exclusively by its specific contents regarded as a whole. This principle leads to several consequences.

(1) If the evidentiary fact desired to be offered is in itself apparently irrelevant, or otherwise dependent on other facts for its admissibility, the offer must contain a statement of the specific purpose, or of all the other facts necessary to admissibility. This rests on the doctrine of conditional relevancy (ante, § 14, post, § 1871).[7] A common application of this rule is found where on objection the trial Court excludes an indefinite question (e.g., "What did he say?") whose answer might or might not contain irrelevant or otherwise objectionable matters. In other words, the Court and the opponent are entitled to an offer specific enough to permit of intelligent objection and ruling; whether the offering party need specify precisely the expected answer or only the general objective of the question, and whether he needs to volunteer this or may wait until the Court requests it, and whether the context of the testimony may suffice for the purpose, — these must depend much upon the case in hand.[8]

(2) If several facts are included in the offer, some admissible and others inadmissible, then the whole (if properly objected to) is inadmissible; in other words, it is for the proponent to sever the good and the bad parts.[9]

(3) Similarly, an offer of a fact for two purposes is erroneous if the fact is inadmissible for one of the purposes, though it would have been admissible for the other if offered for that alone.[10]

[6] For the doctrine of conditional admissibility, by which an offer, positively made, is received conditionally, see ante, § 14, post, § 1871.

[7] For the rule that an offer rejected in the form of a question must show that the excluded answer would have been material, in order to justify an appeal, see post, § 20, under Exceptions.

[8] 1912, Birmingham R. L. & P. Co. v. Barrett, 179 Ala. 274, 60 So. 262 (rehearsing prior cases in this State). 1914, Hartnett v. Boston Store, 265 Ill. 331, 106 N. E. 837 (sale of firearms to a minor; a question by the plaintiff to the minor, whether he was experienced in the use of weapons, was excluded on objection; held that the plaintiff was not required to state what the expected answer was); 1905, Marshall v. Marshall, 71 Kan. 313, 80 Pac. 629 (citing cases; good opinion by Mason, J.); 1915, Rice v. Sheldon, 38 R. I. 161, 94 Atl. 711 (here a dissenting opinion exhibits the error of having a fixed rule).

This question, however, tends often to merge into that of § 20, post (embodying the answer in a bill of exceptions) and that of § 1871, post (whether there was an implied offer to prove other facts making the offer relevant), and Courts tend not to distinguish.

[9] 1921, Sage v. State, 22 Ariz. 151, 195 Pac. 534 (statutory rape); 1895, Herndon v. Black, 97 Ga. 327, 22 S. E. 924; 1885, Over v. Schiffling, 102 Ind. 191, 26 N. E. 91 (libel; offer rejected to show that the witness "communicated all these facts" to the plaintiff; not all of the facts being admissible for a privileged communication, "it was counsel's duty to specifically state the facts which they expected to show that the witness communicated to their client; . . . the Court was not bound to analyze the testimony and sift out the competent from the incompetent"); 1905, Indianapolis & M. R. T. Co. v. Hall, 165 Ind. 557, 76 N. E. 242; 1903, Farleigh v. Kelley, 28 Mont. 421, 72 Pac. 756; 1919, Juby v. Craddock, 56 Mont. 556, 185 Pac. 771.

Contra: 1910, Finch & Co. v. Zenith Furnace Co., 245 Ill. 586, 92 N. E. 521 ("We cannot adopt a view so narrow").

[10] 1855, Phillips v. Hoyle, 4 Gray Mass. 568.

(4) An offer of a fact for an inadmissible purpose A is properly excluded, though the same fact would have been admissible for purpose B.[11]

(5) Conversely, an offer of a fact admissible for purpose B is properly admitted, even though the same fact would have been inadmissible if offered for purpose A; this follows from the doctrine of multiple admissibility (ante, § 13).

c. Finality of the Offer. Evidence once offered and admitted cannot ordinarily be withdrawn by the offering party, even by allowance of the Court, without consent of the opponent, — at least, merely because the offering party changes his mind about using it.[12] But where an offer of evidence has been objected to and nevertheless admitted, the Court overruling the objection, the offering party may later, it would seem, with the Court's consent, withdraw the evidence with a view to obviating the possibility of an error of ruling; in such a case, the question then becomes one of a revocation of the ruling (post, § 19).

§ 18. The Objection. The initiative in excluding improper evidence is left entirely to the opponent, — so far at least as concerns his right to appeal on that ground to another tribunal. The judge may of his own motion deal with offered evidence; but for all subsequent purposes it must appear that the opponent invoked some rule of Evidence. A rule of Evidence not invoked is waived.[1] [11] 1849, Doe v. Beviss, 7 C. B. 456, 508 (a … as to its legal admissibility"); 1905, Deitrich v. Kettering, 212 Pa. 356, 61 Atl. 927.

Contra, but unsound: 1904, State v. Charles, 111 La. 933, 36 So. 29 (homicide; certain declarations of the deceased, offered improperly as dying declarations and 'res gestæ', admitted, being properly receivable as self-contradictions of other declarations of the deceased; no authority cited).

[12] 1908, Alabama Great S. R. Co. v. Hardy, 131 Ga. 238, 62 S. E. 71.

§ 18. [1] 1911, Diaz v. U. S., 223 U. S. 450, 32 Sup. 252 ("So, of the fact that it was hearsay, it suffices to observe that, when evidence of that character is admitted without objection, it is to be considered and given its natural probative effect as if it were in law admissible"); 1921, Sawyer v. French, — Mo. —, 235 S. W. 126 (hearsay); 1915, Forster v. Rogers, 247 Pa. 54, 93 Atl. 26 (incompetent testimony introduced without objection; the Court's refusal later to grant a motion to strike out is not reviewable); 1920, George M. Keebler, Inc. v. Land T. & T. Co., 266 Pa. 440, 109 Atl. 659 (approving Forster v. Rogers); 1908, Murella v. Reyes, 12 P. I. 1 (incompetency of witness under C. C. P. § 383); 1909, Falero v. Falero, 15 P. R. 111; 1912, Coto v. Rafas, 18 P. R. 493

Hence, any rule is waivable: see examples ante, § 7 a, post, §§ 18, 2275, 2592.

In Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. State, 107 Md. 642, 69 Atl. 439 (1908), the above passage reeve's account-book, being offered as entries against a deceased person's interest, held properly rejected, and the proposal to admit them as admissions of the lord of the manor, by reason of the book being in the latter's possession, this ground of reception, not having been urged at the trial, was rejected; "it would be manifestly unjust to allow that ground to be taken now, seeing that, if it had been so put then, it might have been explained"); 1890, Royal Ins. Co. v. Duffus, 18 Can. Sup. 711 (insurance; the finding of matches and shavings near by, being properly excluded on an offer to evidence an incendiary origin, was not allowed to be afterwards maintained as an offer to evidence the extent of the fire); 1834, Goodhand v. Benton, 6 G. & J. 481, 488 ("For the purpose for which the account was offered in evidence, we think it clearly inadmissible and approve of its rejection by the County Court. . . . In the Court's rejection of the account, they do not declare it admissible evidence for no purpose; but simply that it was inadmissible for the purpose for which it was offered. It was still open to the appellant to offer it as evidence for any other purpose for which it was legally competent. Had the defendant offered the account generally, without specifying his object, or had stated it to be to contradict or discredit the testimony of the witness given on his examination in chief, . . . there could not have been a doubt 1908, POWELL, J., in Marella v. Reyes, 12 P. I. 1, 3: "His omission to object to her operated as a waiver. The acceptance of an incompetent witness to testify in a civil suit, as well as the allowance of improper questions that may be put to him while on the stand, is a matter resting in the discretion of the litigant. He may assert his right by timely objection or he may waive it, either expressly or by silence. In any case the option rests with him. Once admitted, the testimony is in the case for what it is worth, and the judge has no power to disregard it for the sole reason that it could have been excluded, if it had been objected to, nor to strike it out on his own motion. The disqualification of witnesses, found in rules of evidence of this character, is one not founded on public policy but for the protection and convenience of litigants, and which consequently lies within their control."

The function of the objection is first to signify that there is an issue of law, and, secondly, to give notice of the terms of the issue. An objection serves, for the rules of Evidence, the same purpose as a demurrer for the rules of substantive law:

1833, SHAW, C. J., in Cady v. Norton, 14 Pick. 236: "The right to except [i.e. object] is a privilege, which the party may waive; and if the ground of exception is known and not seasonably taken, by implication of law it is waived. This proceeds upon two grounds; one, that if the exception is intended to be relied on and is seasonably taken, the omission may be supplied, or the error corrected, and the rights of all parties saved. The other is, that it is not consistent with the purposes of justice for a party, knowing of a secret defect, to proceed and take his chance for a favorable verdict, with the power and intent to annul it as erroneous and void, if it should be against him."

1835, MASON, Sen., in Gregory v. Dodge, 14 Wend. 593, 617: "If a party will not object, he admits the competency of the witness. To allow of a different rule would lead to great injustice. It is a trite, but nevertheless a very equitable saying, if a party will not speak when he ought to, he shall not be heard when he wants to speak. If no objection be made, the [other] party is well justified in supposing that it is not intended to be made."

1922, PEASLEE, J., in Tuttle v. Dodge, — N. H. —, 116 Atl. 627: "Our procedure is based upon the proposition that it should be such as justice and convenience require. One of the requisites for a full application of this principle is that errors should be corrected at the earliest practicable time, and in a manner to prevent as far as possible the waste and delay of mistrials. While in most respects the theory above indicated is followed in our practice to the fullest extent, in the matter of dealing with the argument of counsel to the jury we are far behind the reasonable and expeditious practice adopted in other jurisdictions. . . . The long-established erroneous practice here of claiming an exception without first objecting and obtaining a ruling from the presiding justice (State v. Ketchen, N. H., 114 Atl. 20) is undoubtedly responsible for the present situation. No good reason appears for continuing such practice. While so-called exceptions so irregularly taken have up to this time been considered because of the reliance of the bar upon the existing methods, the evil has increased to such an extent that it plainly calls for an abandonment of the practice at trials and in this Court of treating a so-called exception to argument which is not based upon a ruling by the trial court, as raising a question of law. The 'best inventable procedure' demands a reform in this respect upon the part of the bar, the trial court and this court. Counsel should present his objection in a form calling for a ruling by the Court, the presiding justice should allow exceptions only when they relate to a 'ruling, direction or judgment' of is quoted, and is stated not to be "in complete harmony with other writers." Nevertheless it is the only sound rule; i.e. for purposes of trial, the Court is free to act without waiting for an objection; but for purposes of appeal, a party not objecting has no standing. In the above case, this principle was satisfied, for the appealing party did object; his objection happened to be to a ruling of the Court made on its own motion; if the other party had appealed, in the above case, the principle would have prevented him from taking any benefit.

the Court (State v. Ketchen, supra), and this Court should consider such exceptions only as have been regularly taken."

The procedure for objections may be considered under five heads, — the time, the form, the tenor, the waiver, and the burden of proof.

a. Time of the Objection. The general principle governing the time of the objection is that it must be made as soon as the applicability of it is known (or could reasonably have been known) to the opponent, unless some special reason makes a postponement desirable for him and not unfair to the proponent of the evidence.

(1) For evidence first taken at the trial, the objection may be to the disqualification of a particular witness in general or to the inadmissibility of an evidentiary fact contained in a specific question or document.

An objection to a witness' disqualification in general must be made as soon as he is called to the stand and before his direct examination begins, provided his disqualification was then known. But the rule on this point has relaxed in modern times, owing to the increasing disuse of the formal 'voir dire' or preliminary questioning; and the subject is better considered in connection with the general doctrine of Testimonial Qualifications (post, §§ 486, 586).

For evidence contained in a specific question, the objection must ordinarily be made as soon as the question is stated, and before the answer is given; unless the inadmissibility was due, not to the subject of the question, but to some feature of the answer:[2]

[2] Accord: Federal: 1905, Davidson S. S. Co. v. U. S., 142 Fed. 315, C. C. A.; 1905, Shandrew v. Chicago St. P. M. & O. R. Co., 142 Fed. 320 C. C. A. ("immaterial, incompetent, and irrelevant"); Ala. 1899, Coppin v. State, 123 Ala. 58, 26 So. 333; 1905, Tutwiler C. C. & I. Co. v. Nichols, 145 Ala. 666, 39 So. 762; 1916, Western Union Tel. Co. v. Favish, 196 Ala. 4, 71 So. 183 (deposition); Cal. 1904, People v. Scalamiero, 143 Cal. 343, 76 Pac. 1098; 1907, Short v. Frink, 151 Cal. 83, 90 Pac. 200; Del. 1904, Macfeat v. Phila. W. & B. R. Co., 5 Del. Penn. 52, 62 Atl. 898; Ga. 1906, Patton v. Bank, 124 Ga. 965, 53 S. E. 664; Ill. 1921, People v. Sawhill, 299 Ill. 393, 132 N. E. 477 (expert's qualifications); Kan. 1905, State v. Castigno, 71 Kan. 851, 80 Pac. 630; Md. 1907, Dick v. State, 107 Md. 11, 68 Atl. 286; 1908, Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. State, 107 Md. 642, 69 Atl. 439 (leading questions); Minn. 1905, State v. Crawford, 96 Minn. 95,104 N. W. 822; Mont. 1903, Yoder v. Reynolds, 28 Mont. 183, 72 Pac. 417; N. J. 1919, State v. Young, 93 N. J. L. 396, 108 Atl. 215; N. Car. 1903, Dobson v. Southern R. Co., 312 N. C. 900, 44 S. E. 593; 1919, State v. Stancill, 178 N. C. 683, 100 S. E. 241 (after question answered, too late); N. Dak. 1913, State v. Reilly, 25 N. D. 339, 141 N. W. 720 (hypothetical question); Pa. 1915, Forster v. Rogers Bros., 247 Pa. 54, 93 Atl. 26 (formulating a complete rule for this State, and distinguishing prior cases); R. I. 1903, McGarrity v. R. Co., 25 R. I. 269, 55 Atl. 718; S. Dak. 1894, Vermillion Co. v. Vermillion, 6 S. Dak. 466, 61 N. W. 802; Vt. 1909, Walston v. Allen, 82 Vt. 549, 74 Atl. 225; 1915, Comstock's Adm'r v. Jacobs, 89 Vt. 133, 94 Atl. 497.

On the general subject, see the following works: 1880, Thompson, Trials, I, §§ 700, 715–720; 1894, Elliott, General Practice, II, § 594.

An objection, upon its ground becoming known, must be made within a reasonable time thereafter: 1902, North v. Mallory, 94 Md. 305, 51 Atl. 89; 1920, Mitchell v. Slye, 137 Md. 89, 111 Atl. 814; and, in any case, before the end of the trial; 1901, Brady v. Nally, 151 N. Y. 258, 45 N. E. 547, 549.

For the reservation of the right to object, see infra.

For the right to require the proponent of a document to show it to the opponent, so that he may object if necessary, see post, § 1861.

No written document offered in evidence should ever be read aloud until the opponent and the judge have had an opportunity to inspect it, so that the objections to its admissibility may be raised and determined: 1915, Martin's Estate, 170 Cal. 657, 151 Pac. 138.

1824, HOLROYD, J., in Bulkeley v. Butler, 2 B. & C. 434, 443: "If the objection was known 'a priori', it should have been made before the evidence was given. But if it was not discovered until afterwards, then the judge should have been requested to strike the evidence out of his notes; and if after that he persevered in summing it up to the jury, that would have been good ground for tendering a bill of exceptions."

1871, BARTOL, C. J., in Marsh v. Hand, 35 Md. 123, 127: "The bill of exceptions states that no notice had been given to produce the original; there was no admission or proof that the original had ever been received by the plaintiffs. It is very clear that the copy was not legal or admissible evidence. The bill of exceptions however states that it was offered, and a part of it read to the jury, when the plaintiffs' counsel made their objection. The Court decided that the objection came too late: 'that having allowed the first part of the letter to be read, the plaintiffs could not object to the reading of the balance, and that it was too late to object to the admission of the letter, in whole or in part.' . . . The rule is well settled, 'that it is the duty of counsel, if aware of the objections to its admissibility, to object to the testimony at the time it is offered to be given', and it has been embodied among the rules of the Superior Court, as follows: Rule 34. 'Every objection to the admissibility of evidence shall be made at the time such evidence is offered, or as soon thereafter as the objection to its admissibility shall have become apparent; otherwise, the objection shall be treated as waived.' This rule does not appear to us to have been infringed in this case by the appellants. It must have a reasonable interpretation. Its object is to prevent a party from knowingly withholding his objection, until he discovers the effect of the testimony, and then if it turns out to be unfavorable to interpose his objection. Such a course could not be allowed. It is very obvious from reading the bill of exceptions in this case, that such a purpose could not be justly ascribed to the plaintiffs' attorneys. There is nothing to show that they waived their objection or consented to the copy of the letter being read. It was not submitted to their inspection before it was offered, as is the usual and proper course. But it appears that in the hurry of the trial, probably from a momentary inadvertence on their part, a portion of the letter had been read to the jury, when the objection was interposed in good faith and with reasonable diligence. In our judgment it would be too strict and narrow a construction of the rule, to deny them under such circumstances, the right to make their objection."

1889, ELLIOTT, C. J., in Jones v. State, 118 Ind. 39, 20 N. E. 634: "The question was in form and substance a proper one, and of course could not have been successfully assailed, so that an objection would have been unavailing. The appellant therefore did not lose the right to move to reject the answer by failing to object to the question. Where the question is a competent one, and the answer incompetent, the correct practice is to move to strike out the answer."

Where the question is in tenor not improper, but is answered with inadmissible matter not responsive to the question, an objection made upon the answer is seasonable; its form here is a motion to strike out the answer.[3]

[3] 1913, Marinoni v. State, 15 Ariz. 94, 136 Pac. 626 (collecting cases); 1915, Hodges v. Wilson, 165 N. C. 323, 81 S. E. 340.

Distinguish the doctrine of non-responsive answers in chancery (post, § 785).

Of course, where the objection could have been made at the time of the question, a later motion to strike out need not be granted; this seems elementary logic; 1906, State v. Forsha, 190 Mo. 296, 88 S. W. 746; 1913, Sanger v. Bacon, 180 Ind. 322, 101 N. E. 1001 (no objection being made at the time of question or to answer, a later motion to strike out is too late).

This rule, as sometimes stated, is given a supplement, namely, that where objection is not made, to an obviously improper question, until the answer of the witness has been given, then the trial Court's discretion in not striking out the answer will be conclusive unless abused; 1906, State v. Hummer, 73 N. J. L. 714, 65 Atl. 249; 1919, State v. Gile, 93 Vt. 142, 106 Atl. 829 ("The answer was responsive to the question, and the objection and exception were too late"); 1919, Thayer v. Glynn, 93 Vt. 257, 106 Atl. 834. This qualification is too loose; if counsel does not make timely objection, that should be an absolute end of any prohibitory

(2) For evidence taken by deposition before trial, the general principle is that the objection should be made at the time of the taking (or in general by motion to suppress before trial [4]), if the ground of the objection was such as might have been obviated before trial, but otherwise not, because the officer has ordinarily no power to disallow answers; in other words, the objection before trial serves as a notice required by fairness to the opponent, rather than as a means of excluding the evidence or obtaining a ruling:

1835, WALWORTH, C., in Gregory v. Dodge, 14 Wend. 593, 595: "The object of requiring the objection to the competency of a witness to be made before his testimony is closed was to enable the party calling him to obviate the objection, if possible, by a release, or, if that could not be done, to give the party an opportunity of substantiating the facts by other witnesses. . . . The objection [against a deponent] to his competency and the nature of the interest or other disqualification should be distinctly stated, in the same manner as an objection to the competency of a witness is taken at the circuit: except that it will not be necessary for the party making the objection to produce his evidence in support thereof previous to the examination of the witness."

1865, FIELD, J., in York Co. v. Central R. Co., 3 Wall. 107, 113: "All objections of a formal character, and such as might have been obviated if urged on the examination of a witness, must be raised at such examination or upon motion to suppress. The rule may be different in some State courts; but this rule is more likely than any other to prevent surprise and secure the ends of justice. There may be cases where the rule should be relaxed."

1874, SWAYNE, J., in Doane v. Glenn, 21 Wall. 33, 35: "In such cases [of formal defects] the objection must be noted when the deposition is taken, or be presented by a motion to suppress before the trial is begun. The party taking the deposition is entitled to have the question of its admissibility settled in advance. Good faith and due diligence are required on both sides. When such objections, under the circumstances of this case, are withheld until the trial is in progress, they must be regarded as waived, and the deposition should be admitted in evidence. This is demanded by the interests of justice. It is necessary to prevent surprise and the sacrifice of substantial rights. It subjects the other party to no hardship. All that is exacted of him is proper frankness."

But so broad a principle is seldom stated.[5] The doctrine is usually dealt with in specific rules.[6] Objections to the procedure of taking and the form of the rule of evidence that might have been involved. The ruling in People v. Scattura, 238 Ill. 313, 87 N. E. 332 (1909), that upon an irrelevant non-responsive answer a motion to strike out, not made till the close of argument, suffices, is totally unjustifiable.

For other aspects of a motion to strike out, see post, § 19, par. (2), and infra, this section.

[4] The difference here will depend on the kind of deposition and the subject of objection. For example, an objection to the caption or other formality of course cannot be made until the document has been returned by the officer to the clerk; on the other hand, an objection to a written interrogatory in a commission is feasible before the commission is sent out.

[5] This general principle, by which the incurability of the objection is taken as the test, is found stated in the following cases also: Canada: 1914, Elgin City B. Co. v. Mawhinney, 17 D. L. R. 577, Alta. (order to use "saving all just exceptions", construed); Federal: 1865, Blackburn v. Crawfords, 3 Wall. 175, 191 (similar to York Co. v. Central R. Co., quoted supra); Illinois: 1901, Albers Commission Co. v. Sessel, 193 Ill. 153, 61 N. E. 1075 (good opinion, reviewing the Illinois rulings); 1911, Hutchinson v. Bambas, 249 Ill. 624, 94 N. E. 987 (questions as to letters not produced); 1912, Bjork v. Glos, 256 Ill. 447, 100 N. E. 233 (objections to abstracts of title, made at the time of an application for registration before a title-examiner, held insufficient, because not specifying at the time certain grounds of objection which could have been obviated).

The general subject is treated in the following works: 1880, Weeks, Depositions, §§ 389, 413, 423; 1880, Thompson, Trials, I, § 701; 1894, Elliott, General Practice, I, § 413.

[6] The statutes authorizing depositions usually lay down some rule in general and inflexible terms:

CANADA: Ont. Rules of Court 1913, No.

document must be made before trial;[7] so also objections to the manner of the interrogatories, for example, as improperly leading the deponent,[8] or to the manner of the answers, as being insufficient or irresponsive.[9] On the other hand, objections to the materiality or relevancy of particular facts need not be made until the trial.[10] The disqualification of a witness is sometimes 343; B. C. Rules of Court 1912, No. 496; N. Sc. Rules of Court 1919, No. 13; UNITED STATES: Fed. Sup. Ct. Rule (1912) No. 13; U. S. Equity Rules (1913) No. 46, No. 51; C. C. A. Rule No. 12, Ala. Code 1907, § 4042; Alaska: Comp. L. 1913, § 1488; Ariz. Rev. St. 1913, Civ. C. § 1716; P. C. § 881 (committing magistrate); Ark. Dig. 1919, § 4249; Cal. C. C. P. 1872, §§ 2025, 2032; Fla. Rev. G. S. 1919, § 2760; Ga. Rev. C. 1910, §§ 5866, 5904, 5913; Haw. Rev. L. 1915, §§ 2572, 2582; Ida. Comp. St. 1919, §§ 8020, 8021; Ind. Burns Ann. St. 1914, §§ 454, 455; Kan. G. S. 1915, § 7266; Ky. C. C. P. § 587; La. C. Pr. 1870, § 439, §§ 480, 481; Me. Rev. St. 1916, c. 112, § 18; Mass. Gen. L. 1920, c. 233, § 36; Mich. Comp. L. 1915, § 12493 (chancery); § 12497 (depositions in general); Minn. Gen. St. 1913, § 8392; Mo. Rev. St. 1919, § 5469; Nebr. Rev. St. 1922, § 8898; N. Mex. St. 1919, Mar. 10, c. 20, § 5; N. Y. C. P. A. 1920, § 305; N. C. Con. St. 1919, § 1819; N. D. Comp. L. 1913, §§ 7906, 7931 (time for taking exceptions to depositions; but the draftsman meant "objections"); Oh. Gen. Code Ann. 1921, § 11546; Texas: Rev. Civ. St. 1911, §§ 3672, 3677; Utah: Comp. St. 1917, § 7176; Vt. Gen. L. 1917, § 1933 (objections to competency of the witness may be made to the court where offered); Wash. R. & B. Code 1909, § 1244; Wis. Stats. 1919, §§ 4090–4092; Wyo. Comp. St. 1920, §§ 5850–5853.

[7] Federal: 1906, Columbus R. Co. v. Patterson, 143 Fed. 245, C. C. A.; Ala. 1919, Sovereign Camp W. W. v. Pritchett, 203 Ala. 33, 81 So. 823 (objection to deposition based on place of residence, held ineffective after trial begun, under Code § 4042); Cal. 1908, King v. Green, 7 Cal. App. 473, 94 Pac. 777; D. C. 1898, Meyer v. Rothe, 13 D. C. App. 97, 99; Ga. 1905, White v. Southern R. Co., 123 Ga. 353, 51 S. E. 411 (applying Code § 5314); Mass. 1918, Re Derinza, 228 Mass. 435, 118 N. E. 942; Mo. 1873, Delventhal v. Jones, 53 Mo. 460, 462 ("A party should not be permitted to lie by and lull his adversary into a false sense of security by failure to file any motion to suppress his depositions, thus induce him to announce himself ready for trial, and then count on springing the question of some informality on him for the first time when he offers to read those depositions in evidence"); Nebr. 1911, Essex v. Ksensky, 90 Nebr. 437, 133 N. W. 868; N. Car. 1903, Willeford v. Bailey, 132 N. C. 402, 43 S. E. 928; N. Dak. 1902, Neland v. Dealy, — N. D. —, 89 N. W. 325; Oh. 1854, Crowell v. Bank, 3 Oh. St. 406 ("Exceptions to depositions for other causes than the competency of the witness or the relevancy of the testimony should not be heard unless noted on the depositions, or notice thereof given to the opposite party before the cause is called for trial"); Okla. 1912, Eldridge v. Compton, 30 Okl. 173, 119 Pac. 1121 (defect in notary's certificate); Utah: 1908, Groot v. Oregon Short Line, 34 Utah 152, 96 Pac. 1019 (witness not reading over the deposition); Va. 1877, Hord v. Colbert, 28 Gratt. 49, 54; Wis. 1921, Erickson Co. v. Farnum, — Wis. —, 185 N. W. 177 (under Stats. § 4091).

Contra, but clearly unsound; 1853, Mills v. Dunlap, 3 Cal. 94, 96 (motion to suppress for various informalities, made on the day of filing; "the motion was prematurely made; the proper time to have objected to the introduction of the deposition as testimony was when it was offered in proof upon the trial").

[8] 1931, Woodman v. Coolbroth, 7 Greenl. Me. 181, 184; 1847, Glasgow v. Ridge, 11 Mo. 40; 1849, Walsh v. Agnew, 12 Mo. 525; 1850, Whipple v. Stevens, 22 N. H. 219, 224 (since it is an objection "which if brought to the attention of the opposite party might be obviated"); 1849, Chambers v. Hunt, 22 N. J. L. 552, 562; 1810, Sheeler v. Speer, 3 Binn. Pa. 133; 1823, Strickler v. Todd, 10 S. & R. Pa. 73; 1869, Hill v. Canfield, 63 Pa. 77, 84.

Contra, but wrong: 1823, Craddock v. Craddock, 3 Litt. 77 ("It would be obviously absurd to require the objection to be made where it could not be decided", applying this rule even to leading questions).

[9] 1846, Spence v. Mitchell, 9 Ala. 744, 749; 1856, McCreary v. Turk, 29 Ala. 244, 246; 1876, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Brown, 56 Ala. 411, 413 ("The reason of the rule is that the objection is founded on a defect which can be cured; it is unlike an objection to the relevancy or competency of the evidence"); 1912, Standard Talking M. Co. v. Matthews S. Co., 6 Ala. App. 188, 60 So. 481 (reviewing the cases); 1875, Sturm v. Ins. Co., 63 N. Y. 77, 87 ("He should take an earlier opportunity for action, so that, if [he is] successful, his opponent might move for a commission to examine his witness anew out of court or might obtain a personal attendance at the trial").

[10] 1847, Wall v. Williams, 11 Ala. 826, 834; 1859, Walker v. Walker, 34 Ala. 469, 472, semble; 1909, Floral Creamery Co. v. Dillon, 83 Conn. 65, 75 Atl. 82; 1873, McCoy v. People, 71 Ill. 111, 116, semble ("It is the duty of a party who offers to read a deposition in removable by the party, sometimes not; and hence some Courts are found insisting on objection before trial,[11] others not;[12] the truth is that it must depend on the nature of the disqualification.[13] So, too, of the auxiliary rules, such as the production of a documentary original, or its authentication; in so far as these objections may be curable in the interval before trial, they should be made before trial.[14] When the trial comes, it is necessary to make formal objection, even when objection was already made before trial,[15] because the former objection was essentially only a notice to the proponent and there was no opportunity for securing a judicial ruling upon it.

A failure to object at one trial precludes the opponent at any subsequent trial from further objection, for the reason and to the extent that a failure to object before the first trial would have precluded him;[16] and of course no evidence to know in advance that the questions and answers are relevant"); 1878, Myers v. Murphy, 60 Ind. 282, 285 ("the motion to suppress was made before the trial of the cause and at a time when the Court could not possibly know whether the depositions would be relevant or irrelevant"); 1897, Winters v. Winters, 102 Ia. 53, 71 N. W. 184 (confidential communication to a physician); 1901, Wanamaker v. Megraw, 168 N. Y. 125, 61 N. E. 112 (under C. C. P. § 611); 1904, Cudlip v. Journal Pub. Co., 180 N. Y. 85, 72 N. E. 925 (under C. C. P. § 911, since objections to a deposition need not be noted at the taking, the cross-examiner may on the trial object to parts of his cross-examination when offered by the opponent after the former's refusal to offer them).

[11] Federal: 1825, U. S. v. One Case of Hair Pencils, 1 Paine 400; 1872, Shutte v. Thompson, 15 Wall. 151, 160; Cal. 1919, People v. Hogan, 11 Cal. App. 599, 105 Pac. 933; Ill. 1863, Mosbier v. Knox College, 32 Ill. 155, 163. Mont. 1903, Bair v. Struck, 29 Mont. 45, 74 Pac. 69; Nev. 1915, McLeod v. Miller & Lux, 40 Nev. 447, 153 Pac. 556; N. Y. 1835 Gregory v. Dodge, 14 Wend. 593 (quoted supra); Pa. 1904, Mease v. United T. Co., 208 Pa. 434, 57 Atl. 820; Utah: 1919, Roe v. Schweitzer, 55 Utah 204, 184 Pac. 939 (principle applied to an offer of three witnesses after exclusion of a certain question); Wyo. 1904, Stickney v. Hughes, 12 Wyo. 397, 75 Pac. 945.

[12] Fla. 1908, Putnam v. State, 56 Fla. 86, 47 So. 864; Mass. 1829, Talbot v. Clark, 8 Pick. 51, 56 ("All question as to the form of the interrogatories should be made before the commission goes, to give the other party opportunity to vary his interrogatories; but objections to the competency of a witness should be made to the Court at the trial"); 1858, Adams v. Wadleigh, 10 Gray 360; Nebr. 1903, Woodard v. Cutter, — Nebr. —, 96 N. W. 54; Oh. 1854, Crowell v. Bank, 3 Oh. St. 406 (quoted supra, n. 7).

[13] 1901, Albers Commission Co. v. Sessel, 193 Ill. 153, 61 N. E. 1075 (incompetent survivor; the objection being here incurable).

An objection to a deposition on the ground that the witness is present in the court need not be made till then; but special circumstances affect the time of making this objection (post, § 1415).

[14] 1865, York Co. v. Central R. Co., 3 Wall. U. S. 107, 113 (see quotation supra; an objection on the ground that the original of a document, proved by copy, was not accounted for, was required to be made at the time of taking); 1916, Foldager v. Atwood-Stone Co., 38 S. D. 16, 59 N. W. 891 (applying C. C. P. § 525).

A claim of privilege involves the question of the officer's power to compel an answer (post, § 2195).

For the rules as to notice of cross-examination, see post, §§ 1377–1379.

[15] 1921, Arizona B. Copper Co. v. Dickson, 22 Ariz. 163, 195 Pac. 538 (deposition, objected to at the preliminary hearing, but not at the trial); 1920, Levy v. Doerhoefer's Ex'r, 188 Ky. 413, 222 S. W. 515; 1867, Fant v. Miller, 17 Gratt. Va. 187, 227.

[16] 1910, Belskis v. Dering Coal Co., 246 Ill. 62, 92 N. E. 575 (failure to object to a spontaneous exclamation does not bar objection at the second trial); 1862, Alverson v. Bell, 13 Ia. 308; 1856, Bartlett v. Hoyt, 33 N. H. 151, 162 ("The caption of a deposition, when it has been produced in court and the deposition which it contained has been permitted to be used unquestioned, has performed its office, and it would seem to be entirely idle . . . [to permit the opponent to object later] when he has already had that opportunity, and has in effect conceded it to be sufficient"); 1904, Meekins v. Norfolk & S. R. Co., 136 N. C. 1, 48 S. E. 501 (former testimony of one deceased between the trials; a certain hearsay part of his testimony excluded, although not objected to at the former trial); 1862, Randolph v. Woodstock, 35 Vt. 291, 294 ("The party taking it has the right to consider all objections relative to the taking waived, and may allow his witness to go out of the country, or not produce him on another trial, or take the risk of his decease, relying upon having secured his testimony").

objection at all will be heard when made for the first time in the court of appeal.[17]

b. Form of the Objection. An objection, like an offer, must be positive, not hypothetical or contingent. Hence, it cannot be reserved or postponed by notifying the Court, at the time when it should be made, that it will possibly be made in the future; [18] unless, through the length of a deposition, for example, or a complication of relevancies, it is not practicable for the opponent to know whether there is ground for objection.[19] The test is, whether he at the time of the offer knows or could know the grounds; if he does, his decision must be absolute, not contingent.[20]

The term "motion to strike out evidence" is used in some localities to represent a form of objection. It is, however, an ambiguous and unsatisfactory term, because the things signified by it are otherwise better known in orthodox practice. The following uses of the term are to be distinguished:

(1) A motion to strike out a piece of evidence which ought to have been objected to at the time of its offer is merely another term for an objection, and is governed by the rules as to the time of an objection (supra, par. a, notes 1–17).

(2) A motion to strike out evidence which was admitted conditionally on the subsequent supplying of other evidence is a mode of taking advantage of the doctrine of conditional admissibility (ante, § 14, post, § 1871).

(3) A motion to strike out a certain class of testimony which is required by law to be corroborated in order to be legally effective may be a proper method of taking advantage of such rules (post, §§ 2030–2091).

(4) A motion to strike out a document which in the course of the evidence turns out not to be properly authenticated may be a proper method of excluding it (post, §§ 2129–2169).

(5) A motion to strike out any mass of evidence which at the close of a case appears insufficient for the particular issue may serve to eliminate it; but more usually the same purpose will be better attained by a motion to take the case from the jury or by an instruction to the jury (post, §§ 2494–2496).

(6) Where the answer to an unobjectionable question is inadmissible and non-responsive a motion to strike out the answer is the proper form (supra, n. 3). But here the point is simply that the rule requiring an objection to

[17] 1920, Logan v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 293 Ill. 510, 127 N. E. 688 (contract); 1902, Stewart v. Conrad, 100 Va. 128, 40 S. E. 624; and cases cited post, par. (c).

For the reservation of objection till a deposition is read through, see post, § 19.

There is, however, a rule of general application to infants, as a part of which the Court will rule in their favor on points upon which no exception was taken on their behalf: 1904, Parker v. Safford, 48 Fla. 290, 37 So. 567.

Compare § 1076, notes 7, 8, post, and § 1063.

[18] 1835, Gregory v. Dodge, 14 Wend. 593, 595, 615 (a reservation of "every objection to the competency of the witness and all other legal exceptions", made at the outset of an examination, held insufficient when not followed by any formal and specific objection); 1906, Benton v. State, 78 Ark. 284, 94 S. W. 688 (an objection "to all evidence of actions, conversations, etc., after the commission of the offence", does not avail for subsequent testimony of the sort, unless by consent).

[19] Post, § 19, where reservation of rulings is dealt with.

[20] For conditional relevancy, see post, § 1871.

be made before the answer is uttered does not on principle apply; and the tardy motion to strike out is justified, not merely because the answer is non-responsive, but because it is inadmissible in its tenor. An unfounded notion is often seen that a non-responsive answer is in itself improper; this fallacy is examined more fully post, § 785.

c. Tenor of the Objection. An objection is either general or specific in its tenor; that is, either it declares generally that the offered evidence is inadmissible, or it declares specifically that the evidence violates a named principle or rule of evidence.

(1) General Objection. The cardinal principle (no sooner repeated by Courts than it is ignored by counsel) is that a general objection, if overruled, cannot avail:[21]

[21] Accord: CANADA: 1881, Allen v. McDonald, 20 N. Br. 533.

UNITED STATES: Federal: 1886, Noonan v. Mining Co., 121 U. S. 393, 7 Sup. 911 ("The objection 'incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant' is not specific enough"); 1890, Patrick v. Graham, 132 U. S. 627, 629, 10 Sup. 194; 1890, District of Columbia v. Woodbury, 136 U. S. 450, 462, 10 Sup. 990; 1892, Toplitz v. Hedden, 146 U. S. 252, 254, 13 Sup. 70; 1897, New York El. Eq. Co. v. Blair, 25 C. C. A. 216, 79 Fed. 896 ("a specimen of a practice not to be encouraged, which is to object with a rattle of words that conceal the real nature of an objection capable of being removed on the spot, and to announce its true character for the first time in the appellate court"); 1904, Choctaw, O. & G. R. Co. v. McDade, 191 U. S. 64, 24 Sup. 24; 1918, Shea v. U. S., 6th C. C. A., 251 Fed. 433 ("I object", held insufficient, where defendant was being cross-examined); 1919 Wayne v. Venable, 8th C. C. A., 260 Fed. 64 ("We object", held insufficient); 1922, Curtis v. North American Indian Co., 9th C. C. A., 277 Fed. 909 (objection to a certificate of incorporation because not authenticated as provided by the U. S. statutes, held not specific enough);
Alabama: 1904, Weaver v. State, 139 Ala. 130, 36 So. 717; 1907, Sanders v. Davis, 153 Ala. 375, 44 So. 979; 1921, Wigginton v. State, 17 Ala. App. 651, 87 So. 698;
Arkansas: 1914, Hammel v. St. Louis I. M. & S. R. Co., 113 Ark. 296, 168 S. W. 144 (privileged communication); California: 1897, Wise v. Wakefield, 118 Cal. 107, 50 Pac. 310 (impeaching one's own witness); 1897, Yaeger v. B. Co., — Cal. —, 51 Pac. 190 (mode of cross-examining);
Georgia: 1895, Harris v. Lumber Co., 97 Ga. 465, 25 S. E. 519 (good opinion by Lumpkin, J.); 1903, Andrews v. State, 118 Ga. 1, 43 S. E. 852;
Illinois: 1904, Illinois C. R. Co. v. Prickett, 210 Ill. 140, 71 N. E. 435 (qualified rule); 1907, Merchants' & F. State Bank v. Dawdy, 230 Ill. 199, 82 N. E. 606 (deed); 1921, People v. Jennings, 298 Ill. 286, 131 N. E. 619 (former conviction not evidence by copy of a record);
Indiana: 1905, Hicks v. State, 165 Ind. 440, 75 N. E. 641; 1907, Williams v. State, 168 Ind. 87, 79 N. E. 1079 (irrelevant and immaterial); 1915, Eckman v. Funderburg, 183 Ind. 208, 108 N. E. 577 ("incompetent and irrelevant and not tending to support any of the issues in this cause");
Iowa: 1917, Secor v. Siver, — Ia. —, 161 N. W. 769 ("incompetent and unqualified" does not suffice);
Maryland: 1855, Pegg v. Warford, 7 Md. 582, 603;
Minnesota: 1907, Goss v. Goss, 102 Minn. 346, 113 N. W. 690 (warning as to prior self-contradictions);
Missouri: 1904, Longan v. Weltmer, 180 Mo. 322, 78 S. W. 655 (hypothetical question); 1914, Hafner Mfg. Co. v. St. Louis, 262 Mo. 621, 172 S. W. 28 (Lamm, J.: "We think the time has come when, for the convenience of apt designation, this stereotyped objection may (without lowering the dignity of our case) be termed 'the three i's.' On a similar ground we may say that these i's, like the mere germinating eyes of the potato, see not, and are of little or no sensible use in the administration of justice. We have been lately over the philosophy of the matter in State v. Diesner, 255 Mo. 346, 164 S. W. 517");
Nebraska: 1904, Weatherford v. Union P. R. Co., — Nebr. —, 98 N. W. 1089; 1919, Neal v. State, 101 Nebr. 56, 175 N. W. 671;
New Jersey: 1903, State v. Hendrick, 70 N. J. L. 41, 56 Atl. 247 (pointing out special modes of curing the defect); 1905, Willet v. Morse, — N. J. L. —, 60 Atl. 362;
New York: 1913, People v. Cummins, 209 N.Y. 283, 103 N. E. 169 (equally for criminal cases);
North Dakota: 1908, Buchanan v. Minneapolis T. M. Co., 17 N. D. 343, 116 N. W. 335; 1909, Flora v. Mathwig, 19 N. D. 4, 121 N. W. 63;
Oklahoma: 1904, Enid & A. R. Co. v. Wiley, 14 Okl. 310, 78 Pac. 96; Oregon: 1914, State v. Von Klein, 71 Or. 159, 142 Pac. 549 (a general objection overruled, 1850, Lord BROUGHAM, in Bain v. Whitehaven & F. R. Co., 3 H. L. C. 1, 16; "Now is it necessary that when a party excepts to the reception of evidence, to the rejection of evidence, or to the direction of the judge given to the jury, whatever is the subject-matter of his exception, he must state the ground of his exception, otherwise he cannot except. It is not enough for him to say, 'I except to the receiving of A's evidence', or 'I except to the rejection of A's evidence', or 'I except to the first passage in the direction given by the learned judge to the jury.' If he objects to the reception of A's evidence, he must show why it should not be received, as by stating that A is an incompetent witness. If, on the other hand, he objects to the rejection of A's evidence, he must show why it should not be rejected, as, for instance, that A is a competent witness, and that his evidence is admissible, and that the rejection of his evidence is contrary to law. . . . In all these cases the ground of objection must be clearly stated, and beyond the ground of the objection thus stated, the Court is not at all bound to look."

1870, FOSTER, J., in Bundy v. Hyde, 50 N. H. 116, 121: "The exception is to the refusal of the Court to entertain such an objection [to interrogatories] unless accompanied by a specification of the grounds upon which the plaintiff claimed that the questions were incompetent. We think the judge very properly refused to entertain the objection. A judge presiding at the trial of a cause is not to be burdened with the duty of searching for objections to an inquiry put by counsel, which the opposing counsel is himself unable to discover, or which, if apparent to his own mind, he sees fit to conceal for no other purpose, apparently, than to prevent a full consideration of the objection and with the ultimate intent to take advantage of an error, in case of defeat, which might have been avoided if his views of the matter had been fairly and candidly expressed at the proper time."

1874, DUNNE, C. J., in Rush v. French, 1 Ariz. 99, 123, 25 Pac. 816: "A party wishing the benefit of the remedy must, at the time he complains, show how he is hurt; in the language of the old authorities, he must lay his finger upon the point of objection. . . . He must not merely complain in a general way, and say that to let certain evidence in will hurt his case, and that under the law it ought to be excluded, and leave the judge and opposite side in the dark as to what principle of law he relies on, and compel them to decide haphazard, or else stop the trial of the cause, with a jury waiting, while the counsel examine the whole body of the law, from the earliest judicial expositions down to the latest act of the legislature, to see if they can discover any valid objection to the testimony. The opposing counsel can make no reply to a general objection, except to throw the whole responsibility upon the judge at once, or else begin systematically and argue that under any possible objection the testimony should come in. Many trials under such a system would to testimony by a wife, who was competent to prove marriage, held insufficient where the specific objection that the husband did not consent should have been made);

Pennsylvania: 1916, Philadelphia Wrecking Co. v. Nolen, 252 Pa. 443, 97 Atl. 579 ("I object to the offer, except to the 67 tickets that we admit", held insufficient; approving the text above);
South Carolina: 1903, Colvin v. McCormick C. O. Co., 66 S. C. 61, 44 S. E. 380; Tennessee: 1880, Garner v. State, 5 Lea 213, 218 (record); 1859, Campbell v. Campbell, 3 Head 325, 329 (contents of tax-books not produced);
Texas: 1906, Newcomb v. State, 49 Tex. Cr. 550, 95 S. W. 1048 (irrelevant and immaterial);
Utah: 1896, Culmer v. Clift, 14 Utah 291, 47 Pac. 85;
Washington: 1905, State v. Nelson, 39 Wash. 221, 81 Pac. 721.
Wisconsin: 1870, Cornell v. Barnes, 26 Wis. 473, 480 ("A general objection to particular questions that they were irrelevant, or immaterial, or improper, was not sufficient");
Contra: 1870, Greenleaf v. R. Co., 30 Ia. 301, 303.

In Groh's Sons v. Groh, 177 N. Y. 8, 68 N. E. 992 (1903), the opinion commits the fallacy of assuming that the terms "immaterial", "incompetent", and "irrelevant", have distinct and fixed meanings. In truth, they are too loose and interchangeable to be treated seriously as if they signified any particular ground of objection.

The topic is dealt with in the following works: 1880, Thompson, Trials, I, § 693; 1894, Elliott, General Practice, II, § 584.

For the same reason, an objection may not be in gross to a mass of unspecified testimony. 1905, O'Brien v. Knotts, 165 Ind. 308, 75 N. E. 582 (motion to strike out all testimony on a certain subject, insufficient).

practically never end. The effect of it would be to compel one party to fight in the dark, not knowing when his opponent intended to strike, while the other would be free to choose his weapons, and the time and place to use them. Such things may do in love or war, when all things are said to be fair; but life is too short to transact business on such a system in courts of justice. . . . An objection that the testimony is 'irrelevant' without specifying wherein or how or why it is irrelevant will not be considered in the supreme court as raising any issue, if the testimony could, under any possible circumstances, have been relevant. An objection that the testimony is 'inadmissible' may be disregarded; it amounts to no more than the assertion that the evidence is illegal; the objection should fully and specifically point out how it is inadmissible. When an objection is that the evidence offered is 'incompetent and illegal', it is the duty of the Court to overrule it if the evidence was admissible for any purpose. An objection that evidence is 'incompetent' does not raise any issue as to whether the question is leading or not. The only way to raise such an issue is to object specifically that the question is leading. . . . The object of requiring the grounds of objection to be stated, which may seem to be a technicality, is really to avoid technicalities and prevent delay in the administration of justice. When evidence is offered to which there is some objection, substantial justice requires that the objection be specified, so that the party offering the evidence can remove it, if possible, and let the case be tried on its merits. If it is objected that the question is leading, the form may be changed; if that the evidence is irrelevant, the relevancy may be shown; if that it is incompetent, the incompetency may be removed; if that it is immaterial, its materiality may be established; if to the order of introduction, it may be withdrawn and offered at another time, — and thus appeals could often be saved, delays avoided, and substantial justice administered."

1898, LACOMBE, J., in Sigafus v. Porter, 28 C. C. A. 443, 84 Fed. 430, 435: "The objection was not fairly called to the attention of the judge who tried the cause. The stock objection 'incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial' covers a multitude of sins. There is hardly an objectionable question but what can be classified under one or other of these heads. Sometimes the real nature of the objection is so plain that the general phrase will be quite sufficient to indicate it; indeed, it may be quite apparent without any statement of the grounds of objection at all. But there are many other objections which rest upon some particular theory of the case, or upon some single fact in proof, which a judge may readily forget in the course of a long and intricate trial. It is only fair in such cases to require counsel to state clearly to the trial judge on what ground it is that they object. Certainly it is not fair to allow such a general dragnet as 'incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial' to be cast over every bit of evidence in the case which counsel would like to keep out, and then to permit counsel, upon careful analysis of the printed narrative of the trial, to formulate some specification of error not thought of at the time, and which, if seasonably called to the Court's attention, might have been avoided or corrected."

The only modification of this broad rule is that if on the face of the evidence, in its relation to the rest of the case, there appears no purpose whatever for which it could have been admissible, then a general objection, though overruled, will be deemed to have been sufficient: [22]

[22] This modification is recognized in the following cases: ENGLAND: 1842, Lord Trimlestown v. Kemmis, 5 Cl. & F. 749, 776.

UNITED STATES: Federal: 1897, Pittsburgh & W. R. Co. v. Thompson, 27 C. C. A. 333, 82 Fed. 720; 1901, Mine & Smelter S. Co. v. Parke & L. Co., 47 C. C. A. 34, 107 Fed. 881, 884; 1906, Sparks v. Terr., 146 Fed. 371, C. C. A. ("when the reason for the objection is readily discernible"); Alabama: 1905, Braham v. State, 143 Ala. 28, 38 So. 919; California: 1861, Nightingale v. Scannell, 18 Cal. 315, 323; 1903, Roche v. Llewellyn I. Co., 140 Cal. 563, 74 Pac. 147; 1905, Humphrey v. Pope, 1 Cal. App. 374, 82 Pac. 223 (marital communications); Florida: 1902, Kirby v. State, 44 Fla. 81, 32 So. 836; Illinois: 1862, Clauser v. Stone, 29 Ill. 114 ("the general rule is unquestionably that objections on the trial, to a paper or other evidence, must be specially pointed out, so that they may be obviated if possible: but

1874, DUNNE, C. J., in Rush v. French, 1 Ariz. 99, 123, 25 Pac. 816 : "Perhaps the only limitation it can ever require is in those exceedingly rare cases where it is apparent on the face of the proposition that it is impossible the evidence is or can be made available for any purpose. As the object of requiring a specific objection is to enable the other party to obviate it if possible, if the objection is apparent, and it is clear that the defect cannot possibly be obviated, a specific objection would not help the adverse party, and in such case a general objection would be sufficient. But of course such cases will be very rare, and a prudent practitioner will hardly risk any point on a general objection."

But when a general objection is sustained by the trial Court, it may be presumed that some valid ground was apparent to the judge without express statement; and as the exception is here to be taken by the proponent of the evidence, it is fair to insist that he should have asked for the specific ground of objection, if he did not perceive it; or should have made an offer to obviate it, if he did perceive it; or should have stated clearly the precise basis of his claim for admissibility, if he had rested on any specific ground. Hence, the general objection will suffice, if on the face of the evidence and the rest of the case there appears to be any ground of objection which might have been valid (or, otherwise stated, if there is any purpose for which the evidence would conceivably be inadmissible):[23] this rule applies only to cases where the objection can be removed by evidence, or by the act of the party under the sanction of the Court, or by the action of the Court itself"); 1903, Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Wallace, 202 Ill. 129, 66 N. E. 1096; 1907, Chicago R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Rathneau, 225 Ill. 278, 80 N. E. 119; Indiana: 1913, Dowell v. State, 181 Ind. 68, 101 N. E. 815 (conversation in absence of accused); Maryland: 1901, Brewer v. Bowersox, 92 Md. 567, 48 Atl. 1060; Massachusetts: 1908, Hubbard v. Allyn, 200 Mass. 166, 171, 86 N. E. 356 ("If competent for any purpose, it is not rendered incompetent by the fact that it also [might be used for another purpose] . . . for which alone it would not be competent"); Mississippi: 1859, Morris v. Henderson, 37 Miss. 492, 501; 1882, Heard v. State, 59 Miss. 545; 1898, Lipscomb v. State, 75 Miss. 559, 23 So. 210; New York: 1852, Merritt v. Seaman, 6 N. Y. 168, 171 (general objection held good, where it could not have been obviated except by a change of parties); North Dakota: 1915, Huston v. Johnson, 29 N. D. 546, 151 N. W. 774 (letter of plaintiff to defendant); Oregon: 1897, State v. Magone, 32 Or. 206, 51 Pac. 452; Utah: 1898, Snowden v. Coal Co., 16 Utah 336, 52 Pac. 599; Washington: 1913, State v. Shaw, 75 Wash. 326, 135 Pac. 20; Wisconsin: 1872, Ripon v. Bittel, 30 Wis. 614, 619 ("If there was any possible purpose for which the books were admissible as evidence, or any supposable state of case in which they ought to have been received, then it was not error to admit them").

On the principle of Multiple Admissibility (ante, § 13), it follows that where the opponent, without objecting, desires to restrict the evidence to its sole legitimate purpose, he must ask an instruction from the Court, otherwise he cannot complain of the possibility of the jury's having misapplied it to other and improper purposes: Cases cited ante, § 13, n. 2.

[23] 1904, Matthews v. Farrell, 140 Ala. 298, 37 So. 325 (but here the Court puts its decision on inappropriate grounds); 1918, Archer v. Sibley, 201 Ala. 495, 78 So. 849 (unlawful detainer); 1907, Short v. Frink, 151 Cal. 83, 90 Pac. 200; 1903, Spohr v. Chicago, 206 Ill. 441, 69 N. E. 515; 1904, State v. Leuhrsman, 123 Ia. 476, 99 N. W. 140; 1919, International Harvester Co. v. Chicago M. & St. P. R. Co., 186 Ia. 86, 172 N. W. 471; 1832, Comstock v. Smith, 23 Me. 202, 208 (deposition rejected; "it is not set forth that the rejection took place on account of interest in the deponent, or of informality in the caption, or for irrelevancy; . . . it should have appeared in the exceptions how and in what particulars the plaintiff was aggrieved"); 1897, Emrich v. Union Stockyard Co., 86 Md. 482, 38 Atl. 943; 1906, Luckenbach v. Sciple, 72 N. J. L. 476, 63 Atl. 244 (good opinion by Garrison, J.); 1877, Tooley v. Bacon, 70 N. Y. 34 ("When evidence is excluded upon a mere general objection, the ruling will be upheld, if any ground in fact existed for the exclusion; it will be assumed, in the absence of any request, by the opposing party or the Court, to make the objection definite, that it was understood, and that the ruling was paced upon the right ground"); 1917, Columbia Realty I. Co. v. Alameda Land Co., 87 Or. 277, 168 Pac. 64, 440 (broker's commissions); 1921, Prouty Lumber & B. Co. v. Cogan, 101 Or. 382, 200 Pac. 905 (general objection sus-

1921, BURNETT, C. J., in Prouty Lumber & B. Co. v. Cogan, 101 Or. 382, 200 Pac. 905 (sale of logs; the defendant's cross-examination of the plaintiff's witnesses was objected to as "immaterial, irrelevant, improper, incompetent, and not proper subject of cross-examination", and this objection was sustained): "It is said that the objections to the testimony were not sufficiently specific to present the question for review. . . . The general rule that objections to evidence must be specific admits of this exception: That if they cannot in any manner be obviated, or if the evidence is clearly inadmissible for any purpose, a general objection will suffice. The relevancy and materiality of testimony are measured by the issue formed by the pleadings. In the instant case the defendants denied the complaint, and made no other defense. Their offer to prove was entirely foreign to the issues thus formed. It was as if the pleadings had said: 'It is true we owe the plaintiff $3,406.20 for the rived logs in question. However, we sold those logs to the Warren-Scott Company, which in turn by the consent of ourselves and the plaintiff agreed to pay the amount to the plaintiff, and we are to be discharged.' In other words, under the general issue the defendants were attempting to prove a novation, a proposition clearly outside the pale of pleadings or evidence, a clear variance.

"There are authorities to the effect that the Court of its own motion may prevent the introduction of improper evidence. Again, it is said that a reason for the rule against general objections is that it is unfair to the trial Court to make a general objection without particular specification of the grounds of the objection. But in good reason, if the trial judge is possessed of sufficient legal acumen to recognize the validity of the legal conclusion suggested by the general objection, he is at liberty to decide the point and exclude the evidence offered. If for his own information the adverse party requires a more specific objection, he should move for the necessary specifications. He cannot speculate on the decision of the Court, and then complain that the objection is too general. It is quite as much his duty to be fair to the Court as it is that of the other party. Moreover, if he would prevail on appeal, he must put his finger on the error complained of. If the Court is informed of the vice of the testimony offered, it is not necessary for the objecting party to put into his objection a brief on the subject, or to go into tautological detail. There is no error in the record."

(2) Specific Objection. A specific objection overruled will be effective to the extent of the grounds specified, and no further. An objection overruled, therefore, naming a ground which is untenable, cannot be availed of because there was another and tenable ground which might have been named but was not:[24] tained, to defendant's cross-examination as to the novation of a claim based on a sale, held sufficient, the fact being "entirely foreign to the issues"); 1911, Rosenberg v. Sheahan, 148 Wis. 92, 133 N. W. 645.

Contra, on the facts: 1906, Hicks v. Hicks, 142 N. C. 231, 55 S. E. 106 (here the unusual suggestion is made that "the judge could have called upon the counsel to state what he expected to prove"; but why could not the counsel himself speak up, without waiting to be prodded?).

[24] Accord: ENGLAND: 1845, Ferrand v. Milligan, 7 Q. B. 730 (in proving a public right of way over the plaintiff's land, acts of repair by a township surveyor were proved by the defendant, and in rebuttal the plaintiff offered to show a contract of repair by which the plaintiff's steward agreed to pay the surveyor; the defendant's objection that the steward had no authority to make such a contract was overruled; on a motion for a new trial, the further ground of objection that the road to which the contract related was not the road in issue was repudiated, because not specified at the time of the ruling, "its admissibility having been decided upon 'alio intuitu' by the learned judge"); 1838, Williams v. Wilcox, 8 A. & E. 314, 337 ("Justice requires this, not so much to the judge, as to the opposite party, who may be willing, as in the present case would probably have been done, rather to waive the benefit of the evidence than put his verdict in peril on the issue of the objection"); 1860, Reed v. Lamb, 6 H. & N. 75, 90;

UNITED STATES: Federal: 1873, Burton v. Driggs, 20 Wall. 125, 133; 1920, Bain v. U. S., 6th C. C. A., 262 Fed. 664 (deposition of a bankrupt); Alabama: 1904, Parrish v. State, 139 Ala. 16, 36 So. 1012 (but otherwise where the nature of the answer may be presumed); Columbia (Dist.): 1908, Ferry v.

1821, GIBSON, J., in Wolverton v. Com., 7 S. & R. 273, 276 (refusing to consider an objection on appeal that the loss of an original record was not shown so as to admit secondary evidence, the objection at trial having been that parol evidence of a record was never admissible): "Now I take it to be an inflexible rule, and one of the utmost value, both in pleading and evidence, that whatever is not denied or made special ground of objection is conceded. Thus, if a party being called on for that purpose opens the particular view with which he offers any part of his evidence, or states the object to be attained by it, he precludes himself from insisting on its operation in any other direction, or for any other object; and the reason is, that the opposite party is prevented from objecting to its competency in any view different from the one proposed. In like manner, a party may be called on to state the particular ground on which he rests an objection to competency, and if it fails him, it is not error to receive the evidence, although it be incompetent on other grounds. Where, therefore, there is a special objection, or, what is the same in effect, a general objection resting, not on collateral circumstances, but on the supposed existence of an abstract principle admitting of no exception, as was the case here, every ground of exception which is not particularly occupied, is to be considered as abandoned. For instance, a deposition is offered, and it is resisted exclusively on the ground, that the witness is interested, or that the evidence is irrelevant; would it not be palpably unjust in a court of error, to listen to an objection, that it did not appear there had been proof of notice, or that the deposition had in all respects been regularly taken? If the defect were pointed out in time, it might be supplied by further proof; or if that were impossible, the party would, at least, be apprised of the danger to ultimate success, which is necessarily incurred by pressing the admission of incompetent testimony. Here, if instead of urging the abstract operation of the rule, the defendants had objected that the case did not fall within the particular exception to it, now relied on, the plaintiffs might have been prepared to show that the execution actually came to the hands of the sheriff, or that it was lost or destroyed; but, as to that, the silence of their antagonists at the trial, had a direct tendency to lead them into a surprise."

Henderson, 32 D. C. App. 41; 1919, McMahon v. Matthews, 48 D. C. App. 303; Florida: 1903, Brown v. State, 46 Fla. 159, 35 So. 82; 1907, Sims v. State, 54 Fla. 100, 44 So. 737 (judgment in a civil case, offered on charge of embezzlement); Illinois: 1873, McCoy v. People, 71 Ill. 111, 115; 1903, Illinois C. R. Co. v. Wade, 206 Ill. 523, 69 N. E. 565 (witness' contradiction); 1904, Ewen v. Wilbor, 208 Ill. 492, 70 N. E. 575; 1906, O'Donnell v. People, 224 Ill. 218, 79 N. E. 639 (conviction of crime to impeach a witness; the objection that a copy of the record should be used was not allowed to be raised on appeal); 1913, Chicago v. Gilsdorff, 258 Ill. 212, 101 N. E. 546 (objection to a deed's tenor as not giving title, held unavailable to raise an objection to the certified copy's lack of signature); Indiana: 1910, Pulley v. State, 174 Ind. 542, 92 N. E. 550 (rape complaint); 1913, Shilling v. Varner, 181 Ind. 381, 103 N. E. 404 (drainage assessment); 1919, Koehler v. State, 188 Ind. 387, 123 N. E. 111; Iowa: 1913, Seckerson v. Sinclair, — Ia. —, 140 N. W. 239 (extent of specification for objections to a hypothetical question, considered); Massachusetts: 1851, Holbrook v. Jackson, 7 Cush. 136, 154 (entries in a mortgagor's books being admitted over an unsound objection based on the ground of some of them not being original and not being made by the parties themselves, the further ground of objection that some of them were made after transfer of title, and therefore could not be used as admissions of a grantor, was repudiated, because not specified at the time of the ruling); 1906, Magnolia M. Co. v. Gale, 191 Mass. 487, 78 N. E. 128; Michigan: 1903, Weeks v. Hutchinson, 135 Mich. 160, 97 N. W. 695; Missouri: 1905, Bragg v. Metropolitan St. R. Co., 192 Mo. 331, 91 S. W. 527 (hypothetical questions; pungent opinion by Lamm, J.); New Mexico: 1921, State v. Douthitt, 26 N. M. 532, 194 Pac. 879; Oklahoma: 1914, Hartzell v. Hartzell, 42 Okl. 390, 141 Pac. 772 (an objection to the competency of a wife's evidence does not suffice to raise an objection to her incompetency as wife to testify against her husband); Oregon: 1907, Hildebrand v. United Artizans, 50 Or. 159, 91 Pac. 542 (hypothetical question); 1918, State v. Mello, 92 Or. 678, 173 Pac. 317 (murder; an objection as to rebuttal evidence offered too late, held not to avail for a defect as to relevancy of threats); Pennsylvania: 1917, Scott v. American Express Co., 257 Pa. 25, 101 Atl. 96; Porto Rico: 1909, Falero v. Falero, 15 P. R. 111, 115, 1913, Rodriguez v. Porto Rico R. L. & P. Co., 19 P. R. 613; Tennessee: 1846, Monteeth v. Caldwell, 7 Humph. 13.

Compare § 13, ante (multiple admissibility.)

1874, DUNNE, C. J., in Rush v. French, 1 Ariz. 99, 122, 25 Pac. 816: "The Supreme Court, in examining a question as to whether a ruling of the court below on an objection to evidence was correct or not, will not consider any other grounds of objection to the evidence than those urged in the court below. This rule is of universal adoption in the courts of this country. . . . Counsel are held to the grounds of objection stated at the time they call for a decision of the judge below, because they are supposed to know the law of this case and if they do not offer other objections they are supposed to waive them, and evidence admitted without vaild objection should stand." Counsel must not be permitted to wink at the introduction of evidence to which they think there is a valid objection, hoping that that it may benefit them, and if it goes the other way, move to exclude it; neither must they be permitted to plead inattention as an excuse. It is their business to be attentive on a trial, and if they miss a point by neglect, they must lose it. Neither can we allow them to strike between wind and water on the trial, and then go home to their books and study out other objections and urge them here. They must stand or fall upon the case they made below, for this court is not a forum to discuss new points of this character, but simply a court of review to determine whether the rulings of the court below on the case as presented were correct or not."

Here, also, however (as with a general objection), it would seem that the objection overruled will be effective, though naming an untenable ground, if there is no purpose at all for which the evidence could have been admissible;[25] in other words, a specific objection (like a special demurrer) is at least as good as a general objection. So, too, a specific objection sustained (like a general objection) is sufficient, though naming an untenable ground, if some other tenable one existed.[26]

In any event the offer, in relation to the opponent's specific objection, is to be construed as a single whole, just as it must be for the proponent himself (ante, § 17); so that where the objection is to a question including several [25] 1897, Presnell v. Garrison, 121 N. C. 366, 28 S. E. 409.

[26] 1916, Kansas City So. R. Co. v. Jones, 241 U. S. 181, 36 Sup. 513 (in an action in Louisiana for death of an employee, under U. S. S. April 22, 1908, declaring that contributory negligence of an employee does not bar recovery but may be considered to diminish damages, the defendant offered to show the decedent's negligence, and the plaintiff objected on the ground that such negligence was not pleaded; the objection being sustained, the plaintiff was allowed to make the objection general, "to apply to all such evidence"; the appellate Court held that the evidence was not admissible to bar recovery, but would have been admissible if offered to mitigate damage; but that because it was offered without naming that purpose the objection was sufficient; this was virtually holding that a specific objection, when sustained, though naming an untenable ground, was nevertheless effective for another untenable ground because the offeror had not specified the admissible ground; properly held erroneous; but the Court discusses it in terms of the propriety of the offer, whereas the real question seems to be the sufficiency of the objection); 1915, Eckman v. Funderburg, 183 Ind. 208, 108 N. E. 577 (witness to insanity); 1877, Eschbach v. Hurtt, 47 Md. 61, 65 (an offer of testimony to defendant's reputation among men of the same business was rejected, sustaining the erroneous ground of objection that in malicious prosecution reputation was not in issue upon damages; but the exception was overruled on appeal because the reputation among a particular class of persons was improper; "what this Court must determine is whether the testimony offered was admissible, and not whether a right or wrong reason was assigned for its rejection").

Contra, semble, where the tenable one could have been obviated at the trial: 1908, Arcola v. Wilkinson, 233 Ill. 250, 84 N. E. 264.

The following ruling seems erroneous: 1904, People v. Albers, 137 Mich. 678, 100 N. W. 908 (perjury; offer of the defendant's good character for veracity, admissible for him as defendant, but not admissible for him as witness because he did not testify; an objection to it was sustained; held erroneous, though the offering counsel did not state the specific purpose).

Compare § 13, ante (multiple admissibility).

facts [27] or to the entire testimony of a witness,[28] and names a ground tenable for one part but not for others, it is insufficient; the opponent must specify, not only his ground, but also the part of the offer to which the ground is applicable.

[27] Federal: 1828, Elliott v. Peirsol, 1 Pet. 328, 337 ("Courts of justice are not obliged to modify the propositions submitted by counsel, so as to make them fit the case; if they do not fit, that is enough to authorize their rejection"); 1866, U. S. v. McMasters, 4 Wall. 680, 682; 1908, Chicago Gt. Western R. Co. v. McDonough, 8th C. C. A., 161 Fed. 657, 671 (offer defendant's conduct in making certain repairs; motion to strike out all, held not available on appeal, because a part of the evidence was not objectionable); Alabama: 1859, Sayre v. Durwood, 35 Ala. 247, 251 (a specific objection to a question calling for an answer in part legal is ineffective; so also a motion to strike out an entire answer for a reason applicable to a part only); 1904, Kirby v. State, 139 Ala. 87, 36 So. 721; Colorado: 1893, Davis v. Hopkins, 18 Colo. 155, 32 Pac. 70; Dist. Columbia: 1918, Jackson v. U. S., 48 D. C. App. 269, 272; Florida: 1904, Markey v. State, 47 Fla. 38, 37 So. 53; 1903, Hoodless v. Jernigan, 46 Fla. 213, 35 So. 656; 1919, Atlanta & St. A. B. R. Co. v. Kelly, 77 Fla. 479, 82 So. 57; 1922, United States Fire Ins. Co. v. Dickerson, 82 Fla. 442, 90 So. 613; Georgia: 1906, Johnson v. State, 125 Ga. 243, 54 S. E. 184; Idaho: 1922, Bressau v. Herrick, — Ida. —, 205 Pac. 555; Kentucky: 1920, Hoskins v. Com., 188 Ky. 80, 221 S. W. 230 (letters containing admissions); 1921, Lowery v. Com., 191 Ky. 657, 231 S. W. 234 (confession); Louisiana: 1906, State v. Crump, 116 La. 978, 41 So. 229 (dying declaration); Mississippi: 1898, Lipscomb v. State, 75 Miss. 559, 23 So. 210 (general rule stated; but in the opinion of Magruder, J., it appears to be somewhat qualified); Montana: 1905, Thornton-Thomas M. Co. v. Bretherton, 32 Mont. 80, 80 Pac. 10 (series of documents); Nevada: 1911, State v. Smith, 33 Nev. 438, 117 Pac. 19; North Carolina: 1903, State v. Ledford, 133 N. C. 714, 45 S. E. 944; Vermont: 1921, Walls' Will, — Vt. —, 113 Atl. 822 (several letters offered together);

The following case is peculiar: 1908, Cooper v. Bower, 78 Kan. 156, 164, 96 Pac. 59, 794 (breach of marriage promise; plaintiff's question to a witness concerning the plaintiff's admissions, "what she said about any agreement with Mr. C. to marry, and his conduct in relation thereto", was admitted, overruling defendant's general objection; held that the rule requiring the objection to specify the part objected to was not applicable where the offer contained in a single oral question two or more pieces of testimony one of which was objectionable; careful opinion, by Mason, J.; but with deference it is suggested that the opinion does not adequately distinguish the respective bearings of the present principle and of that of § 17, par. b, n. 9, ante; the spirit of the present principle is to force an objector to be specific; the aim of the other principle is to force an offeror to separate his offer so that no more than their due effect will be given to objections; the other principle does not come to bear until the present one has been fulfilled; now in the case in hand the objector had not done his full duty, hence the offeror was not yet bound to do his, viz. separate the objectionable part to make his offer valid).

[28] Federal: 1839, Moore v. Bank, 13 Pet. 302, 310; 1845, Camden v. Doremus, 3 How. 515, 530 ("It could not be expected, upon the mere suggestion of an exception which did not obviously cover the competency of the evidence nor point to some definite or specific defect in its character, that the Court should explore the entire mass for the ascertainment of defects which the objector himself either would not or could not point to their view"); Alabama: 1904, Rhodes v. State, 141 Ala. 66, 37 So. 365; Connecticut: 905, Spencer's Appeal, 77 Conn. 638, 60 Atl. 289; Florida: 1904, Alford v. State, 47 Fla. 1, 36 So. 436; 1905, Freeman v. State, 50 Fla. 38, 39 So. 785; 1906, Hoodless v. Jernigan, 51 Fla. 211, 41 So. 194 (several documents); Illinois: 1861, Myers v. People, 26 Ill. 173, 176 (objection to the whole testimony of a witness, held insufficient where a part of it related to other crimes and was inadmissible); 1906, Mash v. People, 220 Ill. 86, 77 N. E. 92; 1916, People v. Walczniak, 273 Ill. 76, 112 N. E. 377 (motion to strike out all testimony, of which only parts were objectionable); Indiana: 1885, Louisville N. A. R. Co. v. Falvey, 104 Ind. 409, 3 N. E. 389 (motion to strike out certain testimony as a whole, part of which was admissible, held properly denied; "it is the duty of the party to select the competent from the incompetent testimony"); 1889, Jones v. State, 118 Ind. 39, 20 N. E. 654; Iowa: 1919, Polk Co. v. Owen, 187 Ia. 220, 174 N. W. 99; 1918, Little v. Maxwell, 183 Ia. 164, 166 N. W. 760; Kansas: 1906, State v. Simmons, 74 Kan. 799, 88 Pac. 57 (deposition); Kentucky: 1919, Gravitt v. Com., 184 Ky. 429, 212 S. W. 430; 1920, Hall v. Com., 189 Ky. 72, 224 S. W. 492 (affidavits); Maryland: 1904, Wilson v. Pritchett, 99 Md. 583, 58 Atl. 360; 1911, Russell v. Carman, 114 Md. 25, 78 Atl. 903; 1921, Nichols v. Meyer, — Md. —, 115 Atl. 786 (conversation); North Dakota: 1908, State v. Dahlquist, 17 N. D. 40, 115 N. W. 81 (freight records); Wyoming: 1906, Metz v. Willitts, 14 Wyo. 511, 85 Pac. 380.

Moreover, where a question is objected to, and the objection is properly overruled, but the answer which follows contains improper evidence, the objection to the question is of no avail; a new objection must be made specifically to the answer; because the answer contains new matter, and the nature of the alleged impropriety cannot be known until the opponent specifies it. Here the form of the objection is a motion to strike out.[29]

d. Waiver of Objection. An objection may of course be expressly waived. Of implied waivers, the usual instance is that of failure to make the objection at the proper time [30] (supra, par. 1). Of course, also, the opponent whose question calls in advance for obviously inadmissible evidence has thereby waived objection to the answer.[31] Another instance is the curing of an error of admission by the opponent's subsequent use of evidence similar to that already objected to; [32] and perhaps the prior use of similar inadmissible evidence [29] 1877, Gould v. Day, 94 U. S. 405; 1918, State v. Young, — N. J. L. —, 103 Atl. 173 (where the answer, but not the question, is improper, a motion to strike out must be made); 1911, Henderson v. Coleman, 19 Wyo. 183, 115 Pac. 439.

[30] A failure to object to a document will extend, not only to the genuineness of it, but also to an agent's authority to execute, yet not to its legal sufficiency (post, § 2132).

Usually, a failure to renew an offer, after the opponent's withdrawal of an objection improperly sustained, would be a waiver of the error; but not always: 1905, Main v. Radney, — Ala. —, 39 So. 981.

[31] 1921, State v. Dougherty, 287 Mo. 82, 228 S. W. 786 (deceased's statement as to cause of death).

It is common learning that a party obtaining a responsive answer (post, § 785) to a question asked by himself has waived objection by the very asking: 1905, O'Brien v. Knotts, 105 Ind. 308, 75 N. E. 582. Thus the only question usually can be as to responsiveness; compare supra, par. b, (6). An example of a poor ruling on this subject is seen in Bishop v. Bishop, 124 Ga. 293, 52 S. E. 743 (1905).

[32] CANADA: 1874, Smith v. Gerow, 15 N. Br. 425.

UNITED STATES: Federal: 1912, Franklin v. U. S., C. C. A., 193 Fed. 334 (handwriting testimony); Alabama: 1913, Lockridge v. Brown, 184 Ala. 106, 63 So. 524 (asking in rebuttal the same improper question already asked by the objector, held not the subject of complaint on appeal); Arkansas: 1908, St. Louis I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Flinn, 88 Ark. 505, 115 S. W. 142 (opinion testimony); California: 1921, Kinley v. Largent, — Cal. —, 200 Pac. 937 (waiver of surviving opponent's incompetency); Dakota: 1886, Gale v. Shillock, 4 Dak. 182, 29 N. W. 661 ("The general rule is that, where a party makes a valid objection to the introduction of evidence and afterwards puts in evidence proving the same facts, he waives his objection"); Indiana: 1841, Sanders v. Johnson, 6 Blackf. 50, 52 ("The defendant waived the error by introducing another deposition by the same witness testifying to the same facts contained in that which was rejected"); New York: 1842, Hayden v. Palmer, 2 Hill N. Y. 205, 209 ("This case [of a harmless error] is in principle like the case of a judge erroneously receiving evidence to a fact against the party; to which he excepts, but afterwards insists upon and proves the same fact himself; that has been often allowed to defeat the effect of the exceptions. I believe it has generally been called a waiver of the exception"); North Dakota: 1915, First State Bank v. Kelly, 30 N. D. 84, 152 N. W. 125 (note; improper evidence as to an understanding limiting liability, held not waived by a cross-examination to the inadmissible facts); Virginia: 1906, Southern W. Co. v. Blanford's Adm'x, 105 Va. 373, 54 S. E. 1 (custom as to switchlights on other railroads).

But it is otherwise where the subsequent evidence is introduced merely in self-defense, to explain or rebut the original evidence; 1900, Salt Lake City v. Smith, 43 C. C. A. 637, 104 Fed. 457; 1907, Short v. Frink, 151 Cal. 83, 90 Pac. 200; 1904, Chicago City R. Co. v. Uhter, 212 Ill. 174, 72 N. E. 195 (personal injuries; the plaintiff having introduced against objection hearsay evidence negativing prior injuries received, the defendant was held not to waive by afterwards rebutting with similar hearsay affirming the injuries); 1900, Richardson v. Webster City, 111 Ia. 426, 430, 82 N. W. 921 (objection to opinion evidence of damage, not waived by subsequent similar evidence); 1909, United R. & E. Co. v. Corbin, 109 Md. 442, 72 Atl. 606 (the mere cross-examination of the witness on the subject is not a waiver); 1906, State v. Beckner, 194 Mo. 281, 91 S. W. 892 (murder; the prosecution having erroneously introduced the defendant's bad character for violence, his rebuttal by evidence of good character held not a waiver); 1907, Cheney's Estate, 78 Nebr. 274, 110 N. W. 731 may be dealt with on the theory of waiver in advance (ante, § 15). No doubt other conduct of various sorts may require in fairness to be deemed a waiver.[33]

e. Burden of Proof. The burden of proving the grounds of an objection is ordinarily not upon the opponent; whether he objects on the ground that the original of a document is not produced, or that an attesting witness ought to be called, or that a dying declarant was not conscious of impending dissolution, the burden of establishing the preliminary facts essential to satisfy any rule of evidence is upon the party offering it. The opponent merely invokes the law; if it is applicable to the evidence, the proponent must make the evidence satisfy the law. To this general rule there are a few exceptions, based (like all solutions of the burden of proof) on experience and convenience in special classes of cases. These exceptions can better be considered in connection with the respective kinds of evidence involved; by way of example may be named the rules that a testimonial disqualification by insanity, infancy, or interest (post, §§ 484, 497, 508, 584) and the existence of an improper inducement to a confession (post, § 860) must be shown by the opponent of the evidence.

§ 19. The Ruling. The main question in regard to the judge's ruling upon an objection is whether it must be immediate upon the objection. A postponement of the time, or a subsequent revocation of the ruling, may affect the objecting party in two respects, namely, in his further management of his remaining evidence and in the impression upon the jury.

(1) An objecting opponent is entitled to an immediate ruling, before the close of the proponent's case, declaring the evidence admissible or inadmissible, either absolutely or conditionally (ante, § 14), in so far as otherwise he would be unable to know what evidence on his part in explanation or rebuttal would be needed:

1876, ALLEN, J., in Lathrop v. Bramhall, 64 N. Y. 365, 374: "The right to object to evidence as it is offered is a legal right of which the party cannot be deprived, and the right to (opinion evidence); 1921, Macke v. Wagener, 106 Nebr. 282, 183 N. W. 360 (slander); 1921, First National Bank v. Middleton, — Okl. Cr. —, 201 Pac. 683 (direct examination of a witness to an improper conversation; cross-examination to the same conversation, held not a waiver); 1900, Horres v. Chemical Co., 57 S. C. 192, 35 S. E. 500 (objection to improper opinion of speculative damages, held not waived by subsequent similar evidence).

Compare the rule for curative admissibility (ante, § 15).

Distinguish the rule that an error of exclusion is cured by the opponent's subsequent introduction of the same evidence: 1903, Lloyd v. Simons, 90 Minn. 237, 95 N. W. 903; here it is not a waiver that cures, but the immateriality of the error (post, § 21).

[33] 1922, McClenahan v. Keyes, — Cal. —, 206 Pac. 454 (taking the deposition of a plaintiff disqualified by interest is a waiver, and allows the opponent to use the deposition authorities collected); 1902, Rice v. Waddill, 168 Mo. 99, 67 S. W. 605 (taking a deposition of the opponent, though without filing it, held on the facts to be a waiver of objection to incompetency); 1905, Schutz v. Union R. Co., 181 N. Y. 33, 73 N. E. 491 ("where an objection has once been distinctly raised and overruled, it need not be repeated to the same class of evidence"); 1904, Southern L. & T. Co. v. Benbow, 135 N. C. 303, 47 S. E. 435 (an offer of a part of former testimony was rejected as being too fragmentary; the whole was then offered and admitted; this was held a waiver of the exception); 1904, Cheek v. Oak G. L. Co., 134 N. C. 225, 46 S. E. 488 (similar). R. I. St. 1909, c. 418 (cross-examination of a witness does not waive a prior exception).

The tender by an objector of an instruction limiting the evidential effect of evidence admitted against his objection is not a waiver of the objection to that ruling: 1904, Myers v. Manlove, 164 Ind. 128, 71 N. E. 893.

object and to be heard upon the objection, necessarily implies a like right to a decision by a court or referee, and the refusal to entertain an objection or to pass upon it when made is a denial of a legal right to which an exception lies. . . . The judge or referee has, within proper limits, a discretion as to the order of proof, and may permit facts to be proved provisionally, subject to the condition that other facts shall be subsequently proved which are essential to the competency of the evidence admitted. But when all the facts, upon which the party relies for the admissibility of the evidence, have been put before the Court by him and he has rested his case, the adverse party is then entitled to a definite determination as to the competency of the evidence objected to. It is then no longer a question as to the order of proof, nor is it within the discretion of the Court to postpone the decision. . . . It was their right to know before entering upon their defence what evidence they had to meet, and they were necessarily embarrassed in their defence by the refusal of the referee to pass upon the questions made. A decision adverse to the plaintiffs would not have prevented a renewed offer of evidence upon other facts appearing; and had the evidence been either rejected or admitted, the defendants might have shaped their defence entirely differently from what they were compelled to do, proceeding in ignorance of the fact whether the evidence was in or out of the case as against them." [1]

1915, MORELAND, J., in Lopez v. Valdez, 32 P. I. 644: "It appears from the record that appellee relied on certain written contracts entered into between the appellant and Marcela Emradura during her lifetime to prove the cause of action set out in the complaint. The documents themselves were not produced and when counsel for appellee sought to prove by certain witnesses the contents of these documents, without presenting facts justifying secondary evidence with reference thereto, counsel for appellant made the objection that the evidence was incompetent and improper as the documents themselves were the best evidence. Several of these objections were made, to each of which the Court, without a decision on the objections, stated: 'The objection of Mr. Reyes will be taken into consideration.' . . . A decision on these objections was thus left in abeyance and the trial terminated without a resolution of the questions presented. . . . We are of the opinion that this procedure was prejudicial to the rights and interests of the appellant. Parties who offer objections to questions on whatever ground are entitled to a ruling at the time the objection is made, unless they present a question with regard to which the Court desires to inform itself before making its ruling. In that event it is perfectly proper for the Court to take a reasonable time to study the question presented by the objection; but a ruling should always be made during the trial and at such time as will give the party against whom the ruling is made an opportunity to meet the situation presented by the ruling. The disadvantageous position in which a party may be put by the reservation of a ruling on an objection to a question is illustrated by the case in hand. If the Court had given a prompt ruling on the objections, appellant would have had no opportunity to meet the situation presented. If his objection had been overruled, he could have taken his exception and offered evidence to rebut that adduced by the objectionable questions. If the ruling had been the other way, appellee would have been under the necessity of offering the documents themselves, at which § 19. [1] This passage is from a dissenting opinion; but the majority seem to have differed merely in holding that the opponent was under the circumstances not disadvantaged by the postponement. A ruling, reserved and never rendered, upon an offer objected to and left pending, is therefore equivalent to a ruling of exclusion: 1903, Adams v. Elwood, 176 N. Y. 106, 68 N. E. 126 (following Lathrop v. Bramhall).

Compare the following case: 1906, Stitt v. Rat Portage L. Co., 98 Minn. 52, 107 N. W. 824 (collecting prior rulings in this jurisdiction).

Compare the following, said of a trial in chancery: 1904, Asbury v. Hicklin, 181 Mo. 658, 81 S. W. 390 ("The practice . . . of reserving the ruling until the decision of the case is erroneous").

But the reservation of a ruling on evidence admitted may well require that the opponent should formally except later for failure to rule, in order to raise the point on appeal: 1904, Naas v. Welter, 92 Minn. 404, 100 N. W. 211.

A Connecticut statute (Gen. St. 1918, § 5778) dealing with this subject has some purpose not obvious on its face.

time appellant would have been able to present any defense to them which the facts and circumstances might have required or permitted. There having been no decision during the course of the trial, appellant's counsel had no means of knowing what the ruling of the Court would be on the objection and, consequently, he could not know whether or not he would be compelled to meet any evidence at all; for, if the objection were sustained, then appellee had offered no competent evidence to support his case; whereas, if the objection were overruled, then appellant would not have the benefit of a ruling on his objection or of the exception taken thereto."

(2) An objecting opponent is not entitled to treat a ruling as final, and therefore he cannot complain of a subsequent revocation of a ruling, merely in so far as the temporary admission of inadmissible evidence against his objection may obtain consideration for it in the minds of the jurors; for the instruction which will accompany the subsequent striking out of the evidence must be supposed to be obeyed by the jurors; except in extreme cases which obviously call for a stricter treatment:[2]

[2] This view represents the only sound doctrine; but it is denied in several courts. Compare the following authorities:

CANADA: 1877, Wilmot v. Vanwart, 17 N. Br. 456, 462.

UNITED STATES: Federal: 1901, Throckmorton v. Holt, 180 U. S. 552, 567, 21 Sup. 474; 1909, Chicago M. v. St. P. R. Co. & Newsome, 8th C. C. A., 174 Fed. 394; 1909, Turner & American Security v. T. Co., 213 U. S. 257, 29 Sup. 420 ("the general rule is that the admission of incompetent evidence is not reversible error if it subsequently is distinctly withdrawn from the consideration of the jury"; this seems an incorrect mode of statement, for in strictness the revocation of the ruling removes the original ruling and its error); 1919, Kelly v. U. S., 6th C. C. A., 258 Fed. 392, 404; 1919, Maytag v. Cummins, 8th C. C. A., 260 Fed. 74 (here the judge's withdrawal of the evidence was held insufficient, in an action for slander, in which repetition by others had been erroneously admitted); 1920, James Stewart & Co. v. Newby, 4th C. C. A., 266 Fed. 287, 295 (personal injury); 1921, U. S. v. Boston C. C. & N. Y. Canal Co., 1st C. C. A., 271 Fed. 877, 893 (an example of the crippling of jury trial by misuse of this principle); Alabama: 1904, De Yampert v. State, 139 Ala. 53, 36 So. 772; 1914, Watson v. Adams, 187 Ala. 490, 65 So. 528; 1917, Maryland Casualty Co. v. McCallum, 200 Ala. 154, 75 So. 902; Arizona: 1919, McCann v. State, 20 Ariz. 489, 182 Pac. 96; California: 1907, People v. Solani, 6 Cal. App. 103, 91 Pac. 654; Colorado: 1905, Johnson v. People, 33 Colo. 224, 8 Pac. 133; Connecticut: 1920, Drazen v. New Haven Taxicab Co., 95 Conn. 500, 111 Atl. 86 (record of conviction, to discredit a witness); 1922, State v. Farrone, — Conn. —, 116 Atl. 336 (character evidence); Illinois: 1906, Illinois C. R. Co. v. Bailey, 222 Ill. 480, 78 N. E. 833; 1921, McKenna v. Chicago City R. Co., 296 Ill. 314, 129 N. E. 814 (personal injury); Iowa: 1903, Bell v. Clarion, —Ia. —, 94 N. W. 907; 1906, State v. Moran, 131 Ia. 645, 109 N. W. 187 (confession); 1907, Brown Land Co. v. Lehman, 134 Ia. 712, 112 N. W. 185; 1907, State v. Scott, 136 Ia. 152, 113 N. W. 758; Kansas: 1907, Guilliford v. McQuillan, 75 Kan. 454, 89 Pac. 927; Kentucky: 1904, Allen v. Com., — Ky. —, 82 S. W. 589; 1905, White v. Com., 120 Ky. 178, 85 S. W. 753; Maine: 1918, Kimball v. Davis, 117 Me. 187, 163 Atl. 154; Maryland: 1916, Rosenburg v. State, 129 Md. 418, 99 Atl. 680; 1905, Baumgartner v. Eigenbrot, 100 Md. 508, 60 Atl. 601; Massachusetts: 1912, Allen v. Boston Elevated R. Co., 212 Mass. 191, 98 N. E. 618 (medical books improperly quoted); Michigan: 1904, McNaughton v. Smith, 136 Mich. 368, 99 N. W. 382; Missouri: 1910, State v. Martin, 229 Mo. 620, 129 S. W. 881; 1910, Fuller v. Robinson, 230 Mo. 22, 130 S. W. 343; Montana: 1910, State v. Rees, 40 Mont. 571, 107 Pac. 893; Nebraska: 1920, Girch v. State, 104 Nebr. 503, 177 N. W. 798 (the opponent must ask for an instruction to disregard evidence thus struck out, if he desires such action); New Hampshire: 1909, Connecticut River Power Co. v. Dickinson, 75 N. H. 353, 74 Atl. 585; 1921, Capelle v. Trober, — N. H. —, 112 Atl. 798; New Jersey: 1915, State v. Dougherty, 86 N. J. L. 525, 93 Atl. 98 (reviewing prior cases); New York: 1901, Ives v. Ellis, 169 N. Y. 85, 62 N. E. 138; North Carolina: 1919, Stephenson v. Raleigh, 178 N. C. 168, 100 S. E. 312; N. D. 1915, Crisp v. State Bank, 32 N. D. 263, 155 N. W. 78; Ohio: 1903, Mauk v. Brundage, 68 Oh. 89, 67 N. E. 152; Oklahoma: 1906, Morgan v. Terr., 16 Okl. 530, 85 Pac. 718; Oregon: 1904, State v. Eggleston, 45 Or. 346, 77 Pac. 738; 1914, State v. Goff, 71 Or. 352, 142 Pac. 564; Porto Rico: 1913, Rivera v. Diaz, 19 P. R. 524; 1913, Marquez v. Jordi, 19 P. R. 679; Rhode Island: 1919, Demara v. Rhode Island Co., 42 R. I. 215, 107 Atl. 89; South Carolina: 1921, Templeton v.

1848, REDFIELD, J., in Northfield v. Plymouth, 20 Vt. 582, 591: "The question, made in regard to permitting the entire deposition of Dancan to be read to the jury, notwithstanding the general objection of the defendants, and the fact that it contained some irrelevant, and perhaps improper, evidence, is a question of practice, upon which the judge, who conducts the jury trial, must be allowed some reasonable discretion. If there were ample time, it might always be better to determine, in advance, how much of a deposition should be read to the jury even upon a general objection; and in practice, ordinarily, that will be done, where the objection is specific. But very often this course will require too much delay, and always the admissibility of evidence, at the opening of the case, depends so much upon what is expected to be proved thereafter, that great latitude must be allowed, or it may become necessary to reconsider the earlier determinations of the court as the trial progresses. And if improper evidence is admitted it may readily be set right in the charge. The recent English practice, upon this point, is much more liberal, than that which obtained as long ago as the time of Chief Justice Willes."[3]

1833, PARKER, J., in Hamblett v. Hamblett, 6 N. H. 333, 346: "We cannot adopt the broad principle there [in New York] laid down, as sound law, applicable to all cases. . . . [that an erroneous ruling cannot be cured by subsequent revocation and instruction]. The reason that the testimony so given in presence of the jury might have an influence, though they are directed to disregard it, would apply with equal force in all cases where anything irrelevant may have crept in during the course of the trial, and would entitle parties to a succession of new trials, until no sentence should have been uttered which by any possibility might have an undue influence, though the jurors were unconscious of any influence. It is apparent that the principle cannot be carried to this extent, and other authorities show it must fall far short of it, even if it can be supported in any degree. The rule respecting the testimony of interested witnesses, as laid down by Starkie and Phillipps, is that where it is discovered incidentally in the course of a cause that the witness is interested, his evidence will be struck out, although no objection has been made to him on the 'voir dire'. . . . So where evidence which is competent in one view, and yet from its nature or connection proves something else, which would not be competent, and which might possibly have an effect upon the jury, the evidence is admitted, and the jury directed not to regard it as Charleston & W. C. R. Co., — S. C. —, 108 S. E. 363 (personal injury; elaborate opinion by Cothran, J.); Texas: 1910, Darnell v. State, 58 Tex. Cr. 585, 126 S. W. 1122; 1916, Miller v. State, 79 Tex. Cr. 9, 185 S. W. 29 (Prendergast, J., examining the prior rulings; Harper, J., diss.); Utah: 1908, Loafbourow v. Utah L. & R. Co., 33 Utah 477, 94 Pac. 980; Vermont: 1916, Squires v. O'Connell, 91 Vt. 35, 99 Atl. 268; Virginia: 1918, Taylor v. Com., 122 Va. 886, 94 S. E. 795; Washington: 1914, State v. Gay, 82 Wash. 423, 144 Pac. 711 (statutory rape); West Virginia: 1921, Hubbard v. Equitable L. Ass. Soc., 88 W. Va. 361, 106 S. E. 786; Wisconsin: 1920, Gauerke v. Kiley, 171 Wis. 543, 177 N. W. 889 (here noting exceptionally that counsel's delay in asking for withdrawal of evidence erroneously offered by him may make the error irreparable for that jury).

Distinguish the question whether after a case has been submitted to a judge without a jury, he may cure an erroneous ruling duly excepted to, by striking out and disregarding the evidence in his deliberations: 1916, Oates v. U. S., 4th C. C. A., 233 Fed. 201; 1903, Robinson v. N. Y. El. R. Co., 175 N. Y. 219, 67 N. E. 431.

So, also, conversely, an erroneous exclusion of evidence may be cured by subsequently admitting it: 1904, Post v. Leland, 184 Mass. 601, 69 N. E. 361; 1915, Zakrzewski v. Great Northern R. Co., 131 Minn. 175, 154 N. W. 966 (if the first ruling was a ruling striking out evidence already admitted, then the ruling of reinstatement cannot be made unless the first ruling had been made after case closed; otherwise there would be no opportunity for rebuttal).

Distinguish the question whether the party objecting is entitled to do so by a motion to strike out or an instruction to disregard, made later in the cause; here, on the principle of § 18, par. a, ante, the motion or instruction comes too late, if the ground of it was knowable at the time of the offer of the testimony: 1904, Harbour v. State, 140 Ala. 103, 37 So. 330.

[3] The following case represents the early English practice: 1737, Smith v. Richardson, Willes 20, 23 ("It was said that a very great judge had frequently admitted evidence if doubtful whether it was evidence or not, and said he would afterwards tell the jury how far they ought to have regard to it; but this, though the practice of a very great man, was thought [by the present judges] to be of very dangerous consequence"); 1769, Tullidge v. Wade, 3 Wils. 18.

evidence, except for the purpose for which it is admissible. So where the confession of a prisoner implicates others, charged in the same indictment, the whole evidence is introduced, and the jury directed to disregard it as to the others. . . . Cases are of daily occurrence, also, where evidence is admitted, which, from a failure to connect it with other evidence, with which it had a necessary connection in order to be relevant, eventually turns out to be incompetent. The utmost caution cannot always prevent the introduction of evidence, which in the course of the trial is discovered to be clearly inadmissible, and if, in such cases, its introduction was to be regarded as ground for a new trial, on the application of the party objecting, the practice should be to stop the case, and begin 'de novo' to another jury, for however strongly the jury were directed to disregard the testimony, it could not be shown that it had not had an influence upon the verdict, of which the jurors were not conscious — and yet it is not believed, that a practice of stopping a trial upon such account, ever prevailed in any court. . . . This rule respecting the introduction of incompetent testimony may admit of exceptions. If the testimony be of a nature to excite popular prejudice, and if there is good reason from the verdict to suppose that it must have influenced the jury improperly, notwithstanding the direction of the judge that it was to be disregarded, such case might furnish an exception, and the granting of a new trial be a proper exercise of the discretion of the Court."

§ 20. The Exception. The exception serves a double purpose. It makes clear that the party unfavorably affected by the ruling is not satisfied but takes issue; and it sums up and preserves the precise terms of the ruling for the purposes of appeal.[1] Both of these are indispensable. Neither of them is attained by the objection alone. Yet the distinction between objection and exception tends to become confused, and in judicial opinions the rules for exceptions are sometimes spoken of when the rules for objections are really being dealt with.[2] But their functions are distinct. No matter how plain and correct the objection, the exception is still necessary, even though the objector and the exceptor be the same party:[3]

§ 20. [1] It was the latter reason which led chiefly to the statute originally providing for the mode of taking exceptions: 1285, St. 13 Edw. I, Westminster Second, c. 31 ("When one that is impleaded before any of the justices doth alledge an exception, praying that the judges will allow it, which if they will not allow, if he that alledged the exception do write the same exception and require that the justices will put to their seals for a testimony, the justices shall do so; and if one will not, another of the company shall; and if the king, upon complaint made of the justices, cause the record to come before him, and the same exception be not found in the roll, and the plaintiff shew the exception written, with the seal of the justice put to," then if the justice admit his seal genuine, the exception shall be adjudged upon).

But the term "exceptio" as originally used, by adoption from Romanesque law, had in the early usage another meaning, and the conditions of oral pleadings, then practiced, led to problems very different from the later ones of written pleadings. Hence the function of the exception has so changed that the early authorities are merely misleading. This history, and the early practice, are noticed in the following works: 1895, Pollock & Maitland, History of the English Law, II, 663–669; 1838, Chitty, General Practice, IV, c. 1, § 1; and, most acutely and lucidly, in John Maxcy Zane's article on "A Year Book of Richard II" (Michigan L. Rev. XIII, 18, No. 6, April, 1915).

[2] E.g. in Reed v. Chicago B. & O. R. Co., 98 Nebr. 19, 151 N. W. 936, special opinion of Sedgwick, J., the statement "an exception is an objection", and the remaining discussion, is calculated to obscure the real and useful distinction between them.

[3] Canada: 1855, Lawton v. Tarratt, 4 All. N. Br. 1, 21 (Gibbs v. Pike approved); United States: 1915, Atlanta & St. Andrews B. R. Co. v. Fowler, 192 Ala. 373, 68 So. 283 (an exception not announced until after the witness' answer and a motion to exclude, the objection having been duly made and overruled before the witness' answer, held too late); 1919, Walker v. State, 138 Ark. 517, 212 S. W. 319; 1903, Cady v. Cady, 91 Minn. 137, 97 N. W. 580; 1905, State v. Bailey, 190 Mo. 257, 88 S. W. 733; 1911, Harding v. Missouri Pacific R. Co., 232 Mo. 444, 134 S. W. 641 (noting that herein the procedure for opposing

1842, ABINGER, L. C. B., in Gibbs v. Pike, 9 M. & W. 351, 360: "I cannot agree to the principle of taking the statements of counsel on such a point. . . . He may tender a bill of exceptions, or he may first ask the judge to make a note of the tender, and if the request is denied, then tender his bill of exceptions."

1837, STORY, J., in Poole v. Fleeger, 11 Pet. 185, 211: "In the ordinary course of things at the trial, if an objection is made and overruled as to the admission of evidence, and the party does not take any exception at the trial, he is understood to waive it. The exception need not, indeed, then be put into form, or written out at large and signed; but it is sufficient that it is taken, and the right reserved to put it into form, within the time prescribed by the practice or rules of the court."

1922, HARRIS, J., in State v. Laundy, — Or. —, 206 Pac. 290: "What is an exception? What is its office and function? Is it nothing more than an arbitrarily prescribed ceremonial amounting to a meaningless mummery; or is it, like most rules of procedure, a rule based, not upon purely arbitrary grounds, but upon substantial reasons, and hence designed to accomplish in a logical and understandable way a definite purpose? In the language of the Code, 'an exception is an objection taken at the trial to a decision upon matter of law.' Section 169, Or. L. An exception is a protest against a ruling of the Court. It is notice to the Court and opposing counsel that the objector does not acquiesce in the ruling. When, for example, in the course of a trial an objection is made to a question asked a witness, and the Court rules on the objection, the objector may or he may not be satisfied with the ruling. If the objector is satisfied with the ruling, the Court and the opposing attorney are entitled to know it; and so, too, they are entitled to know it if the objector is not satisfied. If the objector is silent after the Court announces its ruling, the presumption is that the objector, after hearing the ruling and the reasons for it, acknowledges the correctness of the ruling and acquiesces in it; and, consequently, in order to prevent the presumption of acquiescence, the objector must ordinarily express his nonacquiescence.

"No particular form is required for expressing an exception, although the usual form is to say: 'I except', or 'I save an exception', or 'exception', or the like. Since one of the reasons for an exception is to give notice that the objector does not acquiesce in the ruling, any language which gives notice that the objector protests against the ruling and does not acquiesce in it ought to be sufficient."

The rules for taking exceptions to rulings upon evidence fall under four heads, — time, form, tenor, and confirmation.

(1) Time of the Exception. The time of the exception, in some form or other, is to be immediately upon the ruling. In special circumstances, a later time prior to the end of the trial may suffice, and local rules of court an instruction of the court and an offer of evidence is different, in that no objection is needed for the former; overruling Sheets v. Ins. Co., 226 Mo. 613, 126 S. W. 413; Woodson, J., diss.; careful opinions); 1921, State v. Prouty, 60 Mont. 310, 199 Pac. 281 (in criminal cases; St. 1915, c. 135, applies only to civil cases); 1851, Lisbon v. Bath, 23 N. H. 1, 9 (failure to note, in a bill of exceptions, a particular objection made, held a waiver of the objection); 1914, Kargman v. Carlo, 85 N. J. L. 632, 90 Atl. 292 (even since the Practice Act of 1912, § 25, abolishing bills of exception); 1904, Alden v. Trent, 178 N. Y. 535, 71 N. E. 104 (applying special Code provisions); 1913, Stroberg v. Merrill, 67 Or. 409, 135 Pac. 335 (rule applied to findings by court without jury); 1906, Morgan v. Lehigh V. C. Co., 215 Pa. 443, 64 Atl. 633 (referee); 1907, Thomas v. Com., 106 Va. 855, 56 S. E. 705.

The following seems peculiar: 1905, Close v. Chicago, 217 Ill. 216, 75 N. E. 479 (whether a city ordinance is void on its face does not need an exception, otherwise where the objection is to the insufficiency of description, etc.).

Distinguish the question whether a bill of exceptions is necessary: 1919, Buessel v. U. S., 2d C. C. A., 258 Fed. 811 (on a writ of error, a bill of exceptions must be presented, a stipulation as to contents of the record is not enough, even under U. S. St. Feb. 26, 1919, amending Jud. Code § 269, regarding merely technical errors; this ruling either violates the spirit of that Act, or else shows that the Act has failed in its professed purpose).

often make express regulations. But an immediate claim is usually necessary:

1709, Wright v. Sharp, 1 Salk. 288: "A corporation-book was offered in evidence at the assizes to prove a member of the corporation not in possession, and refused. No bill of exceptions was then tendered, nor were the exceptions reduced to writing; so the trial proceeded, and a verdict was given for the plaintiff. Next term the Court was moved for a bill of exceptions, and it was stirred and debated in Court. It was urged, that the law requires 'quod proponat exceptionem suam', and no time is appointed for the reducing it into writing, and the party is not grieved till a verdict be given against him; and the same memory that serves the judges for a new trial will serve for bills of exceptions. On the other side it was said, that this practice would prove a great difficulty to judges, and delay of justice; that the predecents and entries suppose the exception to be written down upon its being disallowed, and the statute ought to be construed so as to prevent inconvenience; besides the words of the Act [4] are in the present tense, and so is the writ formed on the Act. HOLT, C. J.: 'If this practice should prevail, the judge would be in a strange condition. He forgets the exception, and refuses to sign the bill, so an action must be brought. You should have insisted on your exception at the trial. You waive it if you acquiesce, and shall not resort back to your exception after a verdict against you, when perhaps, if you had stood upon your exception, the party had other evidence, and need not have put the cause on this point. The statute indeed appoints no time, but the nature and reason of the thing requires the exception should be reduced to writing when taken and disallowed, like a special verdict, or a demurrer to evidence; not that they need be drawn up in form; but the substance must be reduced to writing while the thing is transacting, because it is to become a record.'"

1879, BURKS, J., in Danville Bank v. Waddill, 31 Gratt. 469, 477: "In jury trials, I have always understood the rule to be, that if a party objects to a ruling of the presiding judge during the progress of the trial, either in admitting or excluding evidence, or giving or refusing instructions, or otherwise, and intends to except to such ruling, he must make known such intention at the time of the ruling, or at least before verdict, and if the bill of exceptions cannot be drawn up at once, liberty should be reserved to do so during the term, and if he neglect to prefer exceptions until after the verdict, he will not then be allowed to do so. One of the reasons for the rule requiring this promptness in taking the exception and giving notice thereof, is that an exception taken and made known for the first time at a subsequent period in the trial might affect very injuriously the rights of the opposing party; for, if he have reasonable notice of the exception, he may, perhaps, have it in his power at the time or during the trial to obviate or counteract it; and it would be unjust to allow his adversary to insist on the exception, and have the benefit of it, after, by his own negligence, or it may be by his contrivance, he has made it impossible to meet it."

(2) Form of the Exception. The exception must be written, for a main object is to preserve in it the fact and the terms of the dispute. A complete and formal writing may be postponed; but some memorandum there must be at the initial time: [5]

1838, Mr. JOSEPH CHITTY, General Practice, IV, c. 1, § 1: "A bill of exceptions need not be in complete form at the instant it is tendered; but the substance of it ought to be then put into writing, since it is to become a record. In practice, the points of the bill of excep-

[4] Quoted in note 1 supra.

[5] The practice as to bills of exception, certificates, etc., depends largely on local rules of court; compare the following: 1906, State v. Rodriguez, 115 La. 1004, 40 So. 438 (practice in criminal cases, under St. 1896, no. 113); 1906, Lemmert v. Lemmert, 103 Md. 57, 63 Atl. 380; 1904, Hillier v. Farrell, 185 Mass. 434, 70 N. E. 424 (before a master, under chancery rules 31 and 32).

tion are usually taken down in writing and signed by the counsel of each party, and the bill of exception is prepared at leisure, or at least without reprehensible hurry."

1880, STRONG, J., in Hunnicutt v. Peyton, 102 U. S. 333, 353: "It is no doubt necessary that exceptions should be taken and, at least, noted before the rendition of the verdict; but the reduction of the bills to form, and the signature of the judge to the bills, required for their attestation, or, as said in the Statute of Westminster, 'for a testimony', may be afterwards, during the term. In practice it is not usual to reduce bills of exception to form and to obtain the signature of the judge during the progress of the trial. Nor is it necessary. The Statute of Westminster did not require it. It would greatly and uselessly retard the business of courts were it required that every time an exception is taken the progress of the trial should be stayed until the bill could be reduced to form and signed by the judge. For this reason it has always been held that it need only be noted at the time it is made, and may be reduced to form within a reasonable time after the trial is over."

(3) Tenor of the Exception. The exception, as formally stated, must contain all that is necessary for determining the issue made. It must therefore include the offer of evidence, the objection with its reasons, the ruling, and the notice of exception taken. Furthermore, if the ruling was one excluding a question, so that the offering party is the exceptor, he must state the tenor of the expected answer to the question, and if the objecting party is the exceptor, then the tenor of the answer given; so that it may be seen whether this answer was favorable or unfavorable, and therefore whether he has lost by the one or been injured by the other.[6] So far as admissibility may be dependent on [6] Accord: Illustrating the case of an exception to evidence admitted: Florida: 1905, Starke v. State, 49 Fla. 41, 37 So. 850; 1905, Caldwell v. State, 50 Fla. 4, 39 So. 188 (here the objection to the question was useless, because the question was not shown, and no objection to the answer as such was made by a motion to strike out); 1906, Hoodless v. Jernigan, 46 Fla. 213, 35 So. 656, 51 Fla. 211, 41 So. 194; Indiana: 1904, Dunn v. State, 162 Ind. 174, 70 N. E. 521; Iowa: 1903, State v. Booth, 121 Ia. 710, 97 N. W. 74; 1915, American Express Co. v. Des Moines Nat'l Bank, 177 Ia. 478, 152 M. W. 625, 630 (reviewing the cases; an interesting controversy as to the precise requirements of the rule); Louisiana: 1904, State v. Lewis, 112 La. 872, 36 So. 788; Maine: 1906, Purinton v. Purinton, 101 Me. 250, 63 Atl. 925; Massachusetts: 1889, Smethurst v. Barton Sq. Church, 148 Mass. 261, 267, 19 N. E. 387; 1905, Robinson v. Old Colony St. R. Co., 189 Mass. 594, 76 N. E. 190; Oklahoma: 1919, Rhoades v. State, 16 Okl. Cr. 446, 184 Pac. 913; Utah: 1902, Rio Grande W. R. Co. v. Utah N. Co., 25 Utah 187, 70 Pac. 859; Vermont: 1862, Randolph v. Woodstock, 35 Vt. 291, 296 ("Suppose a party offers to prove by a witness some fact which is clearly improper and inadmissible, and the offer is objected to, but the inquiry is allowed, and the witness answers that he has no knowledge on the subject, is this error for which the party objecting is entitled to a new trial? We think not"); 1902, State v. Buck, 74 Vt. 29, 51 Atl. 1087.

Illustrating the case of an exception to questions excluded: Federal: 1893, Shaver v. Alterton, 151 U. S. 626, 636, 14 Sup. 442 (answer to a question in a deposition excluded, without a showing in the exception "what answer was made to that question"; "we cannot therefore say that the exclusion of the answer was prejudicial to the plaintiff"; following Packet Co. v. Clough, 20 Wall. 528; but the rule of the present case was misapplied in Buckstoff v. Russell, U. S., cited infra, this note); 1911, Harris v. Brown C. C. A., 187 Fed. 6 (stating the modified Federal form of the rule); 1917, Cole Mfg. Co. v. Mendenhall, 4th C. C. A., 240 Fed. 641 (applying Court Rule 11); Alabama: 1904, Ross v. State, 139 Ala. 144, 36 So. 718; 1909, Harris v. Basden, 162 Ala. 367, 50 So. 321; 1912, Birmingham R. L. & P. Co. v. Barrett, 179 Ala. 274, 60 So. 262 (reviewing prior cases in this State); Arkansas: 1921, Green v. Freeman, 148 Ark. 654, 227 S. W. 982 (conviction of crime); 1921, Webb v. State, 150 Ark. 75, 233 S. W. 806 (murder); California: 1919, People v. Bray, 42 Cal. App. 465, 183 Pac. 712 (certificate of death rejected; the motion was not accompanied by an affidavit as to the contents, but counsel orally stated it; held insufficient; this is too strict); Columbia (Dist.): 1907, Riddle v. Gibson, 29 D. C. App. 237, 248; 1919, M'Curley v. National Savings & Trust Co., — D. C. App. —, 258 Fed. 154; Georgia: 1903, Griffin v. Henderson, 117 Ga. 382, 43 S. E. 712 (see quotation supra); Andrews v. State, 118 Ga. 1, 43 S. E. 852 (even on cross-examination, the motion for new trial "should in some way inother evidence introduced or offered to be, that other evidence must also be set out. Finally, with reference to determining the materiality of the error if any, the tenor of sufficient of the remaining evidence must be stated; but this is a consequence of the doctrine of new trials (post, § 21) and not of the doctrine of exceptions:

1874, DUNNE, C. J., in Rush v. French, 1 Ariz. 99, 121, 25 Pac. 816: "The cases where we are called on to review rulings on the admission of evidence may be reduced to two classes: 1. When the party objecting was overruled and he appeals; 2. When the party objecting was sustained and the other side appeals. 1. In the first case, where the party objecting was overruled and he appeals, he must show by the record: (1) What the question was, and what answer was given to it, or what the evidence was which was introduced against his objection. This is important because the evidence admitted may not injure him. The answer may have been in his favor. It is not necessary that he should show clearly that he dicate when the party had been injured by the exclusion"); 1905, Macon v. Humphries, — Ga. —, 50 S. E. 986; 1904, Georgia N. R. Co. v. Hutchins, 119 Ga. 504, 46 S. E. 659; Indiana: 1883, Mills v. Winter, 94 Ind. 329, 331 (offer of witnesses to character, rejected; ruling sustained because "the party excepting should see to it that the bill of exceptions is so made up as to show affirmatively that the offer should have been sustained"); 1889, Kern v. Bridwell, 119 Ind. 226, 21 N. E. 664; 1901, Pittsburgh C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Martin, 157 Ind. 216, 61 N. E. 229 (for direct examination); 1902, Hoover v. Patton, 158 Ind. 524, 64 N. E. 10; 1903, Dunn v. State, — Ind. —, 67 N. E. 940 (reviewing the cases); Kentucky: 1904, Com. v. Bavarian B. Co., — Ky. —, 80 S. W. 772; Massachusetts: 1908, Cook v. Enterprise Transp. Co., 197 Mass. 7, 83 N. E. 325; 1921, Rosell v. Herscovitz, 237 Mass. 513, 130 N. E. 69 (letters excluded); Minnesota: 1914, Uhlman v. Farm S. & H. Co., 126 Minn. 239, 148 N. W. 102 (but otherwise for a cross-examination); 1914, In re Buck's Will, Buck v. Buck, 126 Minn. 275, 148 N. W. 117; Missouri: 1908, State v. Page, 212 Mo. 224, 110 S. W. 1057; Montana: 1908, Milwaukee G. E. Co. v. Gordon, 37 Mont. 209, 95 Pac. 995 (mining claims); Nebraska: 1901, Savary v. State, 62 Nebr. 166, 87 N. W. 34; 1904, South Omaha v. Sutliffe, 72 Nebr. 746, 101 N. W. 797; North Carolina: 1913, Smith's Will, 163 N. C. 464, 79 S. E. 977; Oklahoma: 1911, Warren v. State, 6 Okl. Cr. 1, 115 Pac. 812; 1915, White v. State, 50 Okl. 104, 150 Pac. 718; 1918, Johnson v. State, 15 Okl. Cr. 297, 176 Pac. 256; Oregon: 110, State v. Goodager, 56 Or. 198, 106 Pac. 638 (noting some exceptions to the rule, e.g. on cross-examination); Tennessee: 1905, Union R. Co. v. Hunton, 114 Tenn. 609, 88 S. W. 182 (stating the rule's limitations); Vermont: 1897, State v. Noakes, 70 Vt. 247, 40 Atl. 249; Virginia: 1904, Richmond & P. E. R. Co. v. Rubin, 102 Va. 809, 77 S. E. 834; 1920, Jeffress v. Virginia R. & P. Co., 127 Va. 694, 104 S. E. 393; West Virginia: 1904, Williams v. Belmont C. & C. Co., 55 W. Va. 84, 46 S. E. 802; Wisconsin: 1868, Dreher v. Fitchburg, 22 Wis. 675, 680; Wyoming: 1903, Keffer v. State, 12 Wyo. 49, 73 Pac. 550.

The following provisions apply generally: 1891, U. S. Circuit Court of Appeals Rules (150 Fed. XXV), Rule No. 24, Briefs ("... the error alleged is to the admission or to the rejection of evidence, the specification shall quote the full substance of the evidence admitted or rejected"); Wyo. Comp. St. 1920, § 5865 ("The exception must be stated, with the facts, or so much of the evidence as is necessary to explain it"). Distinguish the following ruling: 1893, Buckstaff v. Russell, 151 U. S. 626, 636, 14 Sup. 448 (a question without the answer, but to which a relevant answer might obviously have been made, was objected to generally, and the objection was sustained; held on writ of error that the ruling was erroneous, and that it was not necessary to set out the expected answer, but also that the rule should have been otherwise for a question asked on the taking of a deposition; here, it is submitted, the learned Court confounded two distinct rules, viz. (1) the present rule requiring the exception to show the expected answer, which rule is designed to advise the appellate court as to the prejudice if any caused by the trial Court's error, and applies equally to depositions and to 'viva voce' testimony, and (2) the rule of § 18 ante, that a general objection sustained will not suffice if on the face of the question no specific ground of objection is obvious; the latter rule was the one really involved).

The subject is treated in Elliott, General Practice (1894), II, § 587.

For the question whether in chancery admissible evidence, erroneously rejected below, should on appeal be considered, if preserved in the record, see Leavitt v. Bartholomew, — Nebr. —, 93 N. W. 856 (1901), and authorities cited.

was injured, because that would often be impossible, but he must show that the evidence was admitted against his valid objection, which, it may be, has injured him; for the object of granting a review by this Court is not to determine the abstract questions as to whether the judge below ruled correctly or not, but to give relief in case a party may have been injured by an erroneous ruling. (2) He must set out enough of the evidence to illustrate the point of his objection, and to raise the presumption that he may have been injured; but where error is shown, injury will be presumed, unless the contrary clearly appears. (3) He must show what kind of an objection was made, and to avail him here he must show that the objection as made was good. Then it is for the other party to see that the statement made contains a showing sufficient to sustain the admission of the evidence as against the objection made. The amount of showing the latter party depends upon the nature of the objection. If the party objecting interpose merely a general objection, all that is necessary is to show enough to obviate the general objection. If the objection is specific, all that is necessary is to show enough to obviate the specific objection as made. Beyond this, we cannot in reason require him to go. He should defend himself against the particular attack made, but we cannot ask him to fortify himself against all possible attacks which might have been made. 2. In the second case, where the party objecting was sustained, and the other side appeals and asks to have the ruling declared erroneous, the party appealing must see that the record shows: (1) What question he asked or what evidence he sought to introduce; (2) Sufficient of the other evidence to illustrate the admissibility of that offered; (3) That the evidence so offered was excluded; (4) That there is reasonable ground to presume that he may have been injured by such exclusion. The other party must see that the record shows good grounds of exclusion."

1903, LAMAR, J., in Griffin v. Henderson, 117 Ga. 382, 43 S. E. 712: "While the motion says what she would have testified, it does not appear that the Court was informed thereof at the time he excluded her; and therefore we are not permitted to consider this assignment of error. . . . In a few instances there may be one exception, particularly in cross-examinations, where the examining counsel may not know what the answer would be, or is exercising a right to test the witness. But ordinarily the exclusion of oral testimony can be made available as error only by asking some pertinent question, and, if an objection is sustained, informing the Court at the time what the answer would be, so that he can then determine whether the fact is or is not material. It will not do to state thereafter what the witness would have answered. . . . If a new trial should be granted because the answer was excluded, it might happen that on the second trial the question would be again propounded, allowed, and the witness give hearsay, inadmissible, or irrelevant testimony, or the answer might be harmful instead of helpful, or the witness may reply, 'I do not know', with the result that the time and money of the parties and the country has been wasted for so inconsequent a conclusion. That this is not unlikely to occur is shown by the experience of all practising lawyers, who have often seen a long and heated argument as to the right to ask a question, followed by the laughter of all bystanders when the Court held it competent, and the witness replied that he knew nothing about the matter. Parties can often agree in the presence of the Court as to what the witness would testify, or, if not, the witness or examining attorney can state what the answer would be; and, where the subject-matter is important, the judge may, in his discretion, retire the jury until its admissibility has been settled. We are well aware that the rule may be perverted into a means of getting inadmissible evidence before the jury, or, by forcing their constant withdrawal, retard the trial. The Courts must rely upon the good faith of counsel not to bring about such a result. But it would never do to grant a new trial until it appeared not only that the question was proper, but that the answer was material, and would have been of benefit to the complaining party."

(4) Confirmation by Motion for New Trial. By the orthodox English practice (doubtless still followed in some of our jurisdictions) the remedies of new trial and of bill of exceptions were regarded as alternative and mutually exclusive.[7] Moreover, the bill of exceptions came to be only rarely chosen for establishing errors in evidence-rulings, partly because of its greater formality and expense, partly because the extensive discretion in granting new trials gave an ample remedy,[8] and partly because the tradition persisted (ever since the statute of Edward I) that a bill of exceptions involved in some degree a reflection on the trustworthiness of the trial judge, as being incapable or unwilling to note correctly the point of dispute.[9] But in the United States the orthodox practice fell extensively out of use. The bill of exceptions came to be the usual method of raising questions upon evidence, — chiefly, no doubt, because the English judicial custom of taking full notes of evidence was not kept up, except in early times in a few of the older jurisdictions. The two remedies not only ceased to be mutually exclusive, but a rule arose that a bill of exceptions must be confirmed afterwards by a motion for a new trial, as a condition precedent to the consideration of the bill on appeal.[10] The reason for this rule has been thus stated:

1885, GREEN, J., in Danks v. Rodeheaver, 26 W. Va. 274, 298: "If either party were allowed to have the rulings of the Court below, which had been properly excepted to and a bill of exceptions taken at the proper time, reviewed without his making a motion for a new [7] 1818, Doe v. Roberts, 2 Chitty 272; 1828, Tidd's Practice, 9th ed., 11, 863.

[8] 1838, Chitty, General Practice, V, c. 1, § 1.

[9] Gibbs v. Pike, 9 M. & W. 351 (quoted supra); Bulkeley v. Butler, 2 B. & C. 445. Campbell says of Lord Mansfield (Lives of the Chief Justices, III, 293): "In all his time, there was never a bill of exceptions tendered to his direction." It is worth noting that the old reason, namely, distrust of the judge's accuracy, which led to the original English statute, produced recently in Louisiana, in consequence of the overt-act doctrine for a deceased's threats in homicide, a statute stiffening the practice as to the immediate recording of the evidence leading to the exception (post, § 246, n. 13).

[10] The opinion in the above case collects and examines the authorities. Accord: 1853, Phelps v. Mayer, 15 How. U. S. 160; 1905, McClintock v. Frohlich, 75 Ark. 111, 86 S. W. 1001; 1905, Spring Valley Coal Co. v. Chiaventone, 214 Ill. 314, 73 N. E. 420; 1905, Storer v. Markley, 164 Ind. 535, 73 N. E. 1081; 1921, Welch v. Jenkins, 190 Ky. 475, 227 S. W. 798; 1917, Bergh v. Calmenson, 136 Minn. 322, 162 N. W. 353; 1903, Glaser v. Glaser, 13 Okl. 389, 74 Pac. 944; 1911, James v. Jackson, 30 Okl. 190, 120 Pac. 288; 1904, Schouweiler v. McCaull, 18 S. D. 70, 99 N. W. 95; 1905, Foss v. Van Wagenen, 20 S. D. 39, 104 N. W. 605; 1917, Freeburn v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 79 Va. 789, 91 S. E. 990.

Contra: 1908, Yarber v. Chicago & A. R. Co., 235 Ill. 589, 85 N. E. 928 (overruling the prior cases; Dunn, J., in a learned opinion, reviews the history of the Illinois practice, distinguishing and repudiating various cases, and codifying the declared rule as follows: "[1] Decisions of the Court made . . . upon instructions, objections to evidence, or other matters of law arising in the cause, which have been incorporated in a bill of exceptions, may be assigned for error and reviewed by an appellate court without any motion for a new trial. [2] They are not waived by making a motion for a new trial if such motion is submitted without any points stated in writing. [3] But if a motion is made for a new trial and the grounds thereof are stated in writing, the party is limited to those reasons, and all other errors are deemed to have been waived. . . . [4] The exceptions taken to the decision of the Court in these particulars . . . are available to the appellant, whether exception was taken to the order overruling the motion for a new trial or not"); 1863 McCoy v. Julien, 15 Ia. 371, 374.

See also the following: 1904, Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Schmitz, 211 Ill. 446, 71 N. E. 1050 (motion overruled must be excepted to, etc.)

So, too, in any other form of carrying the case higher, the specific errors relied upon must be mentioned: 1905, Barker v. State, 73 Nebr. 469, 103 N. W. 71 (petition of error).

Distinguish the question whether a motion for a new trial is needed where the error alleged was a ruling that the evidence as a whole was insufficient to go to the jury; 1869, Smith v. Gillett, 50 Ill. 290, 300; this is a complicated question, involving the doctrine dealt with post, § 2494.

trial and its being overruled, he never would make such motion, when his only ground for it was these erroneous rulings against him during the trial; as, if he failed to make the motion, the appellate Court would have to presume, that such rulings were prejudicial to him; but if he be required to make such motion before he can avail himself of such rulings against him during the trial, he will afford his opponent an opportunity of having all the evidence spread upon the records, and when this is done, the appellate Court may see that these rulings at the trial were not really prejudicial to him, and in that case, though the rulings were against him, and he properly excepted to them and made them a part of the record, still the appellate Court will not reverse the case, though the rulings were erroneous, the presumption that they were prejudicial to him having been rebutted by the evidence in the case when all certified."

§ 21. The Judgment of Error; Materiality, and New Trial. An erroneous ruling having been made and excepted to, and the excepting party having received an adverse verdict on the law and the evidence, the great question on appeal [1] then becomes: Shall a new trial be granted because of the erroneous admission or exclusion of the particular piece of evidence?

It is a great question, because, although it does not directly involve the tenor of the rules of Evidence, yet the whole status of the law of Evidence, as well as the efficiency of our methods of doing justice, is dependent upon the answer. Whether that law of Evidence shall be a mere means to an end, — the end being a just settlement of particular controversies, — or whether it shall be an end in itself — an end so independent of justice, and so superior thereto, that it must be attained even at the cost of justice, — this depends practically upon whether it can be conceded that an erroneous ruling on evidence is 'ipso facto' a ground for a new trial.

1. The Orthodox English Rule, and the Exchequer Rule. The original and orthodox English rule was plain. An erroneous admission or rejection of a piece of evidence was not a sufficient ground for setting aside the verdict and ordering a new trial, unless upon all the evidence it appeared to the judges that the truth had thereby not been reached:

1807, R. v. Ball, R. & R. 133: "Whether the judges on a case reserved would hold a conviction wrong on the ground that some evidence had been improperly received, when other evidence had been properly admitted that was of itself sufficient to support the conviction, the Judges seemed to think must depend on the nature of the case and the weight of the evidence. If the case were clearly made out by proper evidence, in such a way as to leave no doubt of the guilt of the prisoner in the mind of any reasonable man, they thought that as there could not be a new trial in felony, such a conviction ought not to be set aside because some other evidence had been given which ought not to have been received. But if the case without such improper evidence were not clearly made out, and the improper evidence might be supposed to have had an effect on the minds of the jury, it would be otherwise."

§ 21. [1] The other questions on appeal concerning evidence have already been considered under other heads, — whether the record of the exception must show the evidence excluded or admitted (ante, § 20); whether an erroneous ruling can be cured by subsequent instruction of the trial Court (ante, § 19); whether a ground of objection not named upon the trial can be considered in the appellate Court (ante, § 18); and whether an erroneous ruling of admission is waived by the objector's own subsequent use of similar evidence (ante, § 18).

Such was the rule in the King's Bench, in criminal [2] as well as in civil cases.[3] Such was the rule in the Common Pleas,[4] plainly stated in Doe v. Tyler. Such was equally the practice in Chancery,[5] when issues had been sent to a jury in a common law court. All this lasted down to the decade of 1830.

In that decade the Court of Exchequer, in Crease v. Barrett,[6] announced a [2] 1781, Tinkler's Case, R. & R. 133, note (all the Judges thought the evidence of a witness of the name of Parsons ought not in strictness to have been received; but as the evidence was ample without it, "the Judges did not think themselves bound to stop the course of justice"); 1807, R. v. Ball, R. & R. 133 (quoted supra); 1809, Lord Ellenborough, D. J., in R. v. Teal, 11 East 311 ("If the evidence [as to character] had been admitted, it could have made no difference, at least it ought not to have made any difference in the verdict"); 1810, R. v. Treble, R. & R. 164, Heath, J. Though there could not at this period be a new trial in cases of felony, but only a pardon of the prisoner, still the general judicial tendency of those times to favor the escape from the gallows was such as to make up, in the judicial mind, for this difference between the modern law and the earlier law as affecting the balance of risks.

[3] 1819, Abbott, C. J., in Tyrwhitt v. Wynne, 2 B. & Ald. 554, 559 (the mere erroneous ruling of rejection "will not be sufficient, for it must be further shown and substantiated that, if they had been received, they would have led to a probable conclusion in favor of the offering party"). In Edwards v. Evans, 3 East 451, 455 (1803), occurs a premonitory instance of the later rule.

[4] 1807, Mansfield, C. J., in Horford v. Wilson, 1 Taunt. 12, 14 ("Neither will the Court set aside a verdict on account of the admission of evidence which ought not to have been received, provided there be sufficient without it to authorize the finding of the jury"); 1830, Doe v. Tyler, 6 Bing. 561 (rule explicitly approved).

So too, in the Federal Supreme Court, for new trials as distinguished from writs of error: 1828, Story, J., in M'Lanahan v. Ins. Co., 1 Pet. U. S. 170, 183 ("In such cases, the whole evidence is examined with minute care, and the inferences which a jury might properly draw from it are adopted by the Court itself; if therefore upon the whole case justice has been done between the parties, and the verdict is substantially right, no new trial will be granted, although there may have been some mistakes committed at the trial").

[5] 1805, L. C. Eldon, in Pemberton v. Pemberton, 11 Ves. 50, 52 ("if upon the whole [record] he is satisfied that justice has been done, though he may think that some evidence was improperly rejected at law, he is at liberty to refuse a new trial"); 1816, Bullen v. Michel, 4 Dow 297, 319, 330; 1826, Barker v. Ray, 2 Russ. 76; 1838, L. C. Cottenham, in Lorton v. Kingston, 5 Cl. & F. 269, 340 ("The true consideration always is whether upon the whole there appears to be such a case as enables the judge in equity satisfactorily to administer the equities between the parties without the assistance of another trial").

So, too, generally in the United States today: 1905, McClelland v. Bullis, 24 Colo. 69, 81 Pac. 771 (opinion by Bailey, J., collecting the authorities); 1903, Dowie v. Driscoll, 203 Ill. 480, 68 N. E. 56; 1904, Heyman v. Heyman, 210 Ill. 524, 71 N. E. 591; 1921, Miller v. Gordon, 296 Ill. 346, 129 N. E. 809; 1920, Bryant v. Shinnabarger, 285 Mo. 484, 227 S. W. 55; 1904, Young v. Valentine, 177 N. Y. 347, 69 N. E. 643; 1909, Walston v. Allen, 82 Vt. 549, 74 Atl. 225.

So, too, for a judge sitting without a jury: 1905, Kreiling v. Northrup, 215 Ill. 195, 74 N. E. 123 ("The rule is that no improper or immaterial evidence will be presumed to have influenced the Court in reaching a decision, where there is sufficient proper evidence to justify the judgment"); 1907, McCready v. Crane, 74 Kan. 710, 88 Pac. 748; 1904, Mankato Mills Co. v. Willard, 94 Minn. 160, 102 N. W. 202; 1904, Dennison v. Christian, 72 Nebr. 703, 101 N. W. 1045; 1916, Enyart's Estate, 100 Nebr. 337, 160 N. W. 120; 1905, State v. Harris, 14 N. D. 501, 105 N. W. 621; 1904, Godfrey v. Faust, 18 S. D. 567, 101 N. W. 718; 1905, Godfrey v. Faust, 20 S. D. 203, 105 N. W. 460 (local rule revised in statement).

[6] 1835, Crease v. Barrett, 1 C. M. & R. 919, 932 (intimating that the only cases where the error would be ineffective were where the same fact was otherwise proved or not disputed and where a verdict in favor of the defeated party "would have been clearly and manifestly against the weight of evidence and certainly set aside upon application to the Court as an improper verdict"); 1846, Hughes v. Hughes, 15 M. & W. 701 (Alderson, B., declared the rule to be that "the Court will not grant a new trial if with the evidence rejected a verdict given for the party offering it would be clearly against the weight of evidence, or if without the evidence received there be enough to warrant the verdict"; confusing two different tests, and citing Doe v. Tyler and Crease v. Barrett without discrimination); 1847, Doe v. Langfield, 16 M. & W. 497, 515 (approving Crease v. Barrett, Parke, B., applies the exception there stated, and here refuses a new trial since "no evidence was improperly rejected but such as was immaterial and if admitted would not have prevented a nonsuit").

rule which in spirit and in later interpretation signified that an error of ruling created 'per se' for the excepting and defeated party a right to a new trial. The new Exchequer rule was speedily accepted in the other courts;[7] and for something more than a generation it remained the law of England, until it was reformed away, for civil causes, in 1875.[8]

The Exchequer rule duly obtained recognition in the United States in a majority of jurisdictions. In its most extreme form, and in language exhibiting in the most radical manner the theory that the rules of Evidence form an end in themselves, the new doctrine — which had indeed given sporadic signs of independent growth — was now rapidly promulgated. During the second half of the 1800s the Exchequer heresy gained the ascendance in virtually all courts.[9]

There are, to be sure, Courts that still cling to the old-fashioned notion, resting on the orthodoxy of Doe v. Tyler, and refusing to bow the knee to the Baal-worship of the rules of Evidence.[9] A model example of such an opinion is the following:

1866, PORTER, J., People v. Fernandez, 35 N. Y. 49, 59: "The circumstances which were established by evidence, confessedly competent, were so conclusive as to the guilt of the prisoner that no honest jury could refuse to convict him of the crime. To acquit him would be to shield guilt from justice and deny the protection of law to the innocent. If, therefore, the Court below was right in holding that the judge erred in admitting additional evidence tending to the same conclusion, we think it was clearly wrong in reversing the conviction; for, upon the facts disclosed, the supposed error could work no legal injury to the prisoner. As it was shown, beyond all question, by undisputed and competent proof,

[7] 1835, Rutzen v. Farr, 4 A. & E. 53 (the Exchequer rule in Crease v. Barrett followed, and the Common Pleas rule in Doe v. Tyler rejected); 1837, Wright v. Tatham, 7 A. & E. 313, 330 (Denman, C. J. "As this Court has so lately, on full consideration, and in conformity with a decision of the Court of Exchequer, renounced the discretion which was in that case [of Doe v. Tyler] exercised, we need not repeat our reasons for holding that . . . the losing party has a right to a new trial"); 1887, Coleridge, C. J., in R. v. Gibson, L. R. 18 Q. B. D. 537, 540 ("Until the passing of the Judicature Acts, the rule was that if any bit of evidence not legally admissible, which might have affected the verdict, had gone to the jury, the party against whom it was given was entitled to a new trial").

So also in Canada: 1895, Merritt v. Hepenstal, 25 Can. Sup. 150, 152, semble; 1867, Key v. Thomson, 1 Han. N. Br. 295, 2 Han. N. Br. 224, 228; 1877, Wilmot v. Vanwart, 17 N. Br. 456, 462; 1883, Doe v. Gilbert, 22 N. Br. 576, 587.

[8] 1875, Judicature Act, 1883, Rules of the Supreme Court, Order 39, rule 6 ("A new trial shall not be granted on the ground of misdirection or of the improper admission or rejection of evidence . . . unless in the opinion of the Court to which the application is made some substantial wrong or miscarriage has been thereby occasioned on the trial"); 1893, Pearce v. Lansdowne, 69 L. T. Rep. 316; 1921, The King v. Beecham, 3 K. B. 464 (manslaughter: even if the illegal evidence had not been admitted, "still the jury must have found the defendant guilty of manslaughter").

So also in Canada: Can. Crim. Code 1892, § 746, R. S. 1906, c. 146, § 1019; N. Br. Cons. St. 1903, c. 111, § 376; Newf. Cons. St. 1916, c. 83, Ord. 35, R. 6; N. Sc. Rules of Court 1900, Ord. 37, R. 6; for rulings applying these statutes, see infra, n. 17.

The reform had originally been introduced by Mr. (later Sir) James F. Stephen: 1872, Indian Evidence Act (Stephen's ed.), § 167 ("The improper admission or rejection of evidence shall not be ground of itself for a new trial or reversal of any decision in any case, if it shall appear to the Court before which such objection is raised that, independently of the evidence objected to and admitted, there was sufficient evidence to justify the decision, or that, if the rejected evidence had been received, it ought not to have varied the decision").

[9] The cases and statutes for the several jurisdictions are collected in Note 17, at the end of the section; and the ensuing citations refer to the authorities there given.

that the accused was one of the murderers, we are under no legal or moral obligation to assume that the jury might have rendered a false verdict of acquittal but for the erroneous admission of other and needless evidence. In this respect, there is no distinction between civil and criminal cases. The reception of illegal evidence is presumptively injurious to the party objecting to its admission; but where the presumption is repelled, and it clearly appears, on examination of the whole record, beyond the possibility of rational doubt, that the result would have been the same, if the objectionable proof had been rejected, the error furnishes no ground for reversal."

2. Reason and Practical Working of the Exchequer Rule. What can be said on behalf of the Exchequer rule? The theories advanced to support it have been chiefly two. The first is the theory that a party has a legal right to the judicial observance of the rules of Evidence 'per se.' The second is the theory that the judicial consideration of the weight of all the evidence, as a motive for refusing a new trial, would be a usurpation of the jury's function. The whole doctrine, no doubt, has its deepest roots in the inveterate and unconscious professional instinct, which grows to venerate unduly the rules that form its daily mental pabulum. But there must at least be some ostensible reason; and these two have served in that capacity:

1835, PARKE, B., in Crease v. Barrett, 1 C. M. & R. 919, 932: "The rule is there laid down [in the Common Pleas] much too generally; and it is obvious that if it were acted upon to that extent, the Court would in a degree assume the province of the jury; and besides, its frequent application would cause the rules of evidence to be less carefully considered."

1918, DODD, J., in Flanagan v. Fahy, 2 Ir. R. 373: "Mr. Healy in the course of the argument made an allusion to the struggle between advocates in Court as a game; he complained that something said or done was 'not cricket,' 'was not playing the game.' There is this foundation for the remark: The object of our jurisprudence is not to get at the truth and fact in each case; it is to get at the truth and fact in accordance with settled rules regulating evidence, — rules that may seem artificial, and in some instances are illogical, but are binding upon the Court. I think it is more dignified and more illuminative to take the analogy of a struggle of war, in which each contestant relies not merely on the troops he can bring into the field, but also on the strategy with which they are handled."

1838, MORTON, J., in Ellis v. Short, 21 Pick. 142, 144: "Some of the evidence objected to was not only clearly irrelevant, but might have prejudiced the jury against the plaintiff. We therefore find ourselves constrained to grant a new trial. We regret that we find it necessary to do this; because the action involves no principle of law, is attended with an expense disproportionate to its importance, has been fully and elaborately tried, and been brought to a result, which was entirely satisfactory and which there is very little reason to suppose will be changed on another trial, by the exclusion of the evidence which was improperly admitted. The English Courts and those of some of our sister States exercise a much broader discretion in relation to the granting of new trials than we do. Their practice is to refuse new trials for the improper admission or rejection of evidence, whenever, in their opinion, such erroneous admission or rejection of evidence, whether material or immaterial, ought not to have affected the verdict, or substantial justice has been done. This seems to us to trench upon the province of the jury. How can the Court know how much influence each particular piece of evidence had upon the minds of the jury, or that the illegal evidence was not the weight, however small it may be, which turned the balance, and that without it the opposite scale would not have preponderated? To sustain a verdict, under such circumstances, may be to make a decision contrary to the convictions, which the legal evidence would have produced upon the minds of the jury. . . . It is the province of the Court to guard the decisions of the jury from the influence of foreign or irrelevant matter and preconceived opinions and prejudices; and this imposes upon it the duty, on proper occasions, of giving to the jury an opportunity to revise its decisions; but never authorizes it to weigh the evidence or to determine how they should ultimately decide upon matters of fact."

1875, DEVINE, J., in Pigg v. State, 43 Tex. 112: "The refusal of the Court to permit the witness to answer the question [an opinion as to insanity] deprived the accused of a clear legal right. How far his defence may have been prejudiced by it, we cannot say. It is sufficient to know that it was his right to have the question answered by the witness, and that it was relied on as material to his defence."

As to this theory of legal right, it may be said in reply that no man has a legal right to have his cause wrongly decided, — for that is what this "right" comes to. He has indeed a legal right to a jury trial; and he has a right to a fair trial in general. But these are ends in themselves, because the one by constitution and the other by common sense of justice becomes a paramount object. But none can justify the exaltation of the ordinary rules of Evidence, which are mere instruments of investigation, into an end in themselves. As well might a gardener cut down a thriving vine because his henchman has used a hoe instead of a spade in planting it; or a farmer bring valuable bantams to the block because they were hatched by a meddlesome duck instead of by their lawful parent. A glance at common affairs will awaken us to the intrinsic absurdity of the theory of "legal right."

As for the theory of usurpation, it ignores the doctrine and the history of the jury's function. It has always been under the control and correction of the trial judge and the appellate courts.[10] The judge determines questions of fact upon which the admissibility of evidence depends. The judge draws inferences of fact on a demurrer of evidence. The judge rules whether the whole evidence is sufficient to go to the jury, and whether the verdict is against the weight of evidence. He has never been without this revisory function. Moreover, upon a question of new trial because of erroneous ruling on evidence, the appellate Court is not asked to overturn the verdict; on the contrary, it is asked to let the verdict stand, and the precise question which the appellate Court decides is, not whether the jury have been correct or incorrect, but whether, subtracting or adding the evidence admitted or excluded, the truth seems to be identical with the jury's verdict. This is a collateral question, and is entered upon merely as a help to avoiding, if possible, the disturbance of the verdict. The "usurpation", if any, consists in setting aside the verdict, not in confirming it. The advocates of the Exchequer rule concede that, for the purpose of overturning the verdict, they may scrutinize and interfere with it, so as to say that it goes against the weight of the whole mass of evidence; yet, for the purpose of supporting the verdict, they profess to be unable to weigh a particular piece of evidence, so as to say that it ought not to have affected the same weight of evidence. This is one of the most indefensible cases of Tweedledum v. Tweedledee that has ever been sanctioned in our books.

[10] The history of this is to be found in Thayer, Preliminary Treatise on Evidence, 183–253.

As to the practical working of the Exchequer rule, the results are lamentable. Whether in civil or criminal cases, it has done more than any other one rule of law to increase the delay and expense of litigation, to encourage defiant criminality and oppression, and to foster the spirit of litigious gambling. Added to this is the indirect result produced upon the ever-lurking animal instinct of gregarious human brutality, which takes the failures of criminal justice as its pretext and sates itself with cruel lynchings. That the law has gone to the extremes of absurd and provoking technicality in applying this rule is plain enough, even in a casual glance through the reports. Some of the instances of its enforcement would seem incredible even in the justice of a tribe of African fetish-worshippers. As types of what is done in a lesser way every day in every court, they would explain well enough, even if there were no further reason, why poor men may hesitate to send their cause to trial, — why a rich oppressor or a desperate criminal may hope to tire out all endeavors to do justice on him, — why the decisive question for the suitor before litigation often is, not who is right, but who can longest endure, — why ignorant mobs have a patent pretext for distrusting the distant gallows and substituting a near-by tree or stake. Just so long as an erroneous ruling on evidence, however trifling, is described by the highest judges (and in many courts it habitually is) as "working a reversal", just so long will the reproach of technicality and futility mark our litigation. Until the rules of Evidence cease to be assimilated to the play of a hand at whist or the operations of an automatic cash-register, they must remain, as often as not, the instruments of injustice.

Nor have there been wanting sage and courageous warnings from the Bench against the downward tendencies of the modern rule. Many judges — usually, though, as dissenters — have recorded their protests against its theory and their condemnation of its results. Their words and their example have remained thus far without much avail; but the time will come when they must be heeded:

1897, BRANNON, J., diss., in State v. Musgrave, 43 W. Va. 672, 28 S. E. 813: "If we could say there was any misstep in matter of law in this long trial, it is one of very immaterial character, weighing not a feather in the trial, utterly inadequate to justify the reversal of a long, laborious trial bearing to us the face of having been full, patient, and fair. The scope of harmless error is, in these days, widening. Courts do not nowadays, even in grave trials, reverse such trials for trivial errors, evidently not affecting them; so light, and plainly playing so unimportant a part, as not to be appreciably influential or prejudicial when the whole trial, all in all, is regarded. In days gone by, technicalities and rigid procedure sprang up and were enforced to defend accused parties against the demand of monarchic power for conviction, and they then answered, 'Good purpose'; but in this country there is not the same need of them, as the danger now is that the guilty will go free, and something is necessary to protect the public against crime. The great press is declaiming against the courts for lax administration of criminal law. The New York 'World' recently stated that statistics show that for ten years past only 2.20 per cent of homicides have been punished, and that the people are afraid of the courts, and for quick justice resort to lynch law; and further says that this is attributable to the laxity and languor with which the law is enforced, the quibbles, subtleties, and technicalities of the courts fortressing criminals, and causing the administration of justice to appear a mere mockery. Such, I observe, is now almost the universal expression of the press. I would not overturn the solemn verdicts of juries rendered after fair trials, and approved by the trial court, unless I could see that on the whole case something substantially wronging the prisoner had been done. I would therefore affirm."

1898, WHITFIELD, J., diss., in Lipscomb v. State, 75 Miss. 559, 23 So. 210, 228: "It must thus be clear, beyond all cavil, that this appellate tribunal is not a helpless prisoner, bound in the fetters of some supposed hard and fast rule requiring it to reverse cases where, first, erroneous instructions have been given; or, second, proper instructions have been refused; or, third, competent testimony has been excluded; or, fourth, incompetent testimony admitted; or, fifth, improper argument has been allowed; or, sixth, the trial court has erred in its rulings on the pleadings, — on the ground, merely, that such action of the Court, of the one kind or the other, constitutes error in law merely. Every one of these propositions is laid down as settled law. . . . With all deference, it seems to me that my brethren have clearly confounded the primary function of the jury to pass on the evidence and find the defendant guilty, if satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, and the power which this appellate tribunal exercises in reviewing that finding of the jury. When the Court so reviews the finding of a jury in a criminal case, and reverses, as it repeatedly has done, on the sole ground that the evidence was manifestly insufficient to warrant the verdict of guilty, or affirm the jury's finding of guilt when that verdict is clearly right on the law applicable to the case and the competent testimony in the case, as it has also repeatedly done, this Court is not usurping the jury's primary function, and passing originally upon the guilt or innocence of the defendant, but is manifestly exercising its undoubted appellate power of reviewing and upholding or vacating the finding of the jury, as the case made may demand, in accordance with settled rules of law governing appellate jurisdiction. The practical inquiry is the true inquiry, and the practical rule must always be . . . that where substantial justice has been done, and the right result has been reached on competent testimony under the law applicable to the case, and no other reasonable verdict could be rendered than the one which was rendered, a reversal should not follow. The administration of justice is a practical thing. It should be administered in a practical way, so as, while not denying to any defendant any substantial right to which he is entitled by the law of the land, to protect society from violators of the law, and to secure the punishment of guilty men properly convicted."

1905, JAGGARD, J., in State v. Crawford, 96 Minn. 95, 104 N. W. 822: "We are satisfied that as a matter of strict technical construction there is no error in this record entitling the accused to a new trial as a matter of right. . . . The decision in this case, however, is not based upon compliance or noncompliance with technical rules of practice or evidence. Such rules are primarily different from the constitutional guaranties, without the strict observance of which punishment even by a properly constituted court is little better than the punishment by a mob. Matters of mere procedure, however, have no such sanctity. When a court exercises its traditional power to regulate a trial, to pass on the competency, materiality, or sufficiency of evidence, or the propriety of the form of a question, and to revise the action of a jury, it violates no constitutional right; nor does it when it confirms the verdict of a jury. Rules of practice and evidence are primarily designed to secure the orderly administration of the laws of the land. They serve their purpose so far as, and only so far as, they conduce to a fair trial. But, instead of serving as a means of securing justice, they have been made to usurp dominion as if their observation were the end to be attained.

"Decisions of many Courts have determined controversies concerning them as if they were the constitutional requirements, as if the object of the law was their evolution into a perfect system, and as if the function of even the highest judicial tribunals was to secure their consistent enforcement. Under the guise of protecting the 'rights of the accused', this perversion in the use of these rules has been and must be the source of wrong, alike to the accused and to the public. For, on the one hand, cases involving human lives may arise in which an appellate Court would properly feel that there was imposed on it the duty of setting aside a verdict of conviction and of granting a new trial for errors committed by the trial Court resulting in an unfair trial of the defendant, although no objection or exception was made or taken to the improper admission or exclusion of evidence, or to the improper conduct or ruling of a trial court, because of the mistake or misconduct, neglect, or incompetency of his counsel. The strict application of practice rules would then make a new and fair trial impossible. On the other hand, the exaggeration of the value of such technicalities has opened the doors for the escape of unnumbered and undoubted criminals. 'Some of the instances of enforcement would seem incredible, even in the justice of a tribe of African fetish worshipers.' (1 Wigmore on Evidence, p. 73.) There is a current impression on the part of the profession of law, and of the community in general, that all Courts are hopelessly committed to this apotheosis of an artificial system, as repugnant to common sense as it is subversive of common justice. In point of fact, this is far from being true. The original English rule was that erroneous admission or exclusion of evidence, duly objected to, would not be a basis for new trial if the rest of the testimony be sufficient to warrant the conclusion to which the jury have come. Later, and about 1835, a different rule came to be generally accepted, viz., that an error or ruling created per se for the defeated party a right to a new trial. It remained the law of England until it was reformed away for civil cases in 1875. In the United States this rule is the law in the majority of jurisdictions; but it is not sustained by the better opinion or reason and is distinctly not the law in this State."[11]

(3) Future of the Exchequer Rule. What is to be the remedy? Unfortunately, it does not seem to be merely in legislation. The fetters of the pernicious rule of the Exchequer were not forged by mere precedent, but by professional habit and tendency. They cannot be struck off by a simple statute. This has been tried; but almost in vain. There was already, at the very beginning, ample precedent and tradition for the better principle; yet the judges of the King's Bench and the Common Pleas and of our own Courts, when they could choose, made deliberate choice of the worse way. So, too, when legislation has sought to turn them back, they have persisted nevertheless, driven by this same strong professional habit of mind. In many jurisdictions statutes expressly authorized and commanded that a new trial shall be granted only when justice requires it; and their object was to abolish the Exchequer rule.[12] What was the consequence? In New York, for ex-

[11] See also strong opinions by Wallace, J., diss. in People v. Stanley (1874), 47 Cal. 113, 119; Haight, J., diss., in People v. Koerner (1897), 154 N. Y. 355, 48 N. E. 730.

[12] Form of Statutes: These statutes are of four general types, in respect to the form of rule inculcated.

A. In one form, the error of ruling is not to be ground for a reversal unless it has led to a "miscarriage of justice", or has "affected the substantial rights of the parties." This form was among the earliest, but is too broad, and proved to have no intrinsic power to help the situation. The technical legal mind can readily perceive a miscarriage of justice or an injury to substantial rights in the mere non-observance of a rule of admissibility.

B. In a second form, the burden of proof only is changed, by declaring that no error shall be presumed to have affected the substantial rights, etc. Thus the excepting party is obliged to show how the error has injured the result of the case. This form effects some good, but is unsound in principle because it does not define any standard for determining the bad effect, if any, of the error.

C. In a third type, the error is not to be ground for reversal unless it might have affected ample, both the earlier statute and the later statute proved alike ineffectual. In New Jersey the same fate ensued. Occasionally, indeed, the true spirit was for a while communicated, — as in Kentucky. But on the whole the effort has been fruitless. By an emasculating interpretation, or by a virtual obliteration, the statutes have effected little progress, — so far as their mere legislative command is concerned. Professional instinct from within, and professional pressure from without — the demands of the bar to be allowed to win by technicalities — have been too strong.

But the thing can be done. It has been done. In England, to-day, the whole odious practice of misusing the rules of evidence as petty stratagems in litigious tactics has passed away. In the reports of decisions, there now occur annually not more than a dozen rulings upon points of evidence, as against many hundreds in the reports of the United States,—and that in a community which though almost half as populous as ours is much more litigious. The reformatory legislation in England, commencing with the Common Law Procedure Act of 1852 and culminating in the Judicature Act of 1875 and the Rules of Court of 1883, seems to have been based upon a profound professional revolution, and to have signified not merely a change of rules but a change of spirit. The same thing is possible among us.

No doubt the contributing conditions to such a change must be numerous. But among the marks of regeneration there must surely be found two vital ones:

First, the judge must cease to be merely an umpire at the game of litigation. Often he is little more. This, to be sure, is in part the continuance of a tradition, inherited from the spirit of gentlemanly sportsmanship which dominated the administration of British justice. But it has been intensified, instead of lessened, by the spirit of strenuous struggle and unrestrained persistence which drives the bar of our country to wage their contests to the extreme of technicality. The judge weakly resigns himself to the position of "a mere automaton, or at most the attitude of the presiding officer of a deliberative assembly, with no greater powers than those of announcing the utterances or conclusions of others."[13] To this many circumstances conspire. But it is an old and a marked tendency among us; and, until it is rooted out, that early warning of one of the Nestors of our judiciary will still be worth heeding:

the verdict. This form adopts as its standard the jury's possible state of mind. Obviously, that is inscrutable to the Supreme Court. Hence an over-technical court is prone to declare, "We cannot say that the jury might not have been affected", etc.

D. The fourth form is represented by Sir J. F. Stephen's Indian Evidence Act, § 167 (quoted supra, n. 8), viz. the error shall not lead to reversal unless it ought to have affected the verdict. This form defines as a standard the objective facts in the case as disclosed by all the evidence when scrutinized by the Supreme Court. If in view of the whole case the Court concludes that the verdict is correct, then obviously the error of admission or exclusion affords no reason for setting that verdict aside.

This is the only form consistent with common sense and the theory of trials, — which theory is, of course, to ascertain the facts. This form, in varying terms, has been adopted by several courts — e.g. Oklahoma — and should be the basis of all future progress.

[13] 1885, Poché, J., in State v. Ford, 37 La. An. 443, 461; 1912, Young v. Corrigan, D. C. N. D. Oh., 208 Fed. 431 (above text approved by Killits, J.).

1852, NISBET, J., in Cook v. State, 11 Ga. 53, 57: "It is to be feared, in these days of reform, that the Judges will be so strictly laced, as to lose all power of vigorous and healthful action. I have but little fear of judicial power in Georgia so aggrandizing itself, as to endanger any of the powers of other departments of the government; or to endanger the life and liberty of the citizen; or to deprive the Jury of their appropriate functions. The danger rather to be dreaded in making the Judges men of straw, and thus stripping the Courts of popular reverence, and annihilating the popular estimate of the power and sanctity of the law." [14]

Secondly, the maudlin sentimentality of judges in criminal cases must cease. Reverence for the Constitution is one thing, and a respect for substantial fairness of procedure is commendable. But the exaltation of technicalities of every sort merely because they are raised on behalf of an accused person is a different and a reprehensible thing. There seems to be a constant neglect of the pitiful cause of the injured victim, and the solid claims of law and order. All the sentiment is thrown to weight the scales for the criminal — that is, not for the mere accused, who may be assumed innocent, but for the man who upon the record plainly appears to be the villain that the jury have pronounced him to be. We have long since passed the period (as a modern judge has pointed out) [15] "when it is possible to punish an innocent man; we are now struggling with the problem whether it is any longer possible to punish the guilty." The dignity, the truth, and the lofty inspiration of great constitutional principles are frittered away and degraded. While on the one hand certain fundamental ideals of political liberty have come to be lightly questioned as impracticable or cynically ignored as obsolete, on the other hand the constitutional safeguards of procedure and evidence are invoked with such fatuous philanthropy and such misplaced magnanimity that their respect is lowered and their true purposes are defeated. "I do not understand," protested a great judicial interpreter of the organic law,[16] "that the Constitution is an instrument to play fast and loose with in criminal cases, any more than in any other; or that it is the business of Courts to be astute in the discovery of technical difficulties in the punishment of parties for their criminal conduct." Yet they seem to make it their business. A false sentiment misapplies their energies. This they must unlearn. The epoch of governmental oppression has passed away; the epoch of individualistic anarchy has taken its place. They must learn the lesson of transferring the emphasis [14] The following case illustrates the way in which this has been brought about partly by the unlicensed efforts of the bar: 1897, Davis v. State, 51 Nebr. 301, 70 N. W. 984 (the trial judge's instruction was: "If the jury find from the evidence that all the incriminating circumstances . . . [leave a reasonable doubt], then you should by your verdict acquit him"; the phrase "incriminating circumstances" was objected to by the defence as unfair; but the Supreme Court rejected this claim in the following language: "It never was the intention of the law that the district judges of the state should abdicate their reason because a man was on trial charged with the commission of a crime; nor does the law of the land place the district judges in a strait-jacket in criminal trials, nor make of them mere machines to repeat certain general propositions of law in their instructions." What was needed, however, was a stern rebuke, which should fittingly condemn the unscrupulous callousness of counsel capable of obstructing the course of justice by such impudent quibbles).

[15] 1893, Freeman, J., in Roper v. Territory, 7 N. Mex. 272, 33 Pac. 1014.

[16] 1883, Cooley, J., in People v. Murray, 52 Mich. 291.

of their sympathies, — a lesson more than once read to them by the voices of their own fellow-members of the judiciary:

1805, SMITH, B., on the trial of Mr. Justice Johnson, in 29 How. St. Tr. 353: "There may indeed be a tame and creeping and tradesmanlike mode of administering the law conceived; but it is not one which meets my ideas of the duties or station of a judge. Laws are but means; and though it be not our province to legislate but to interpret, yet we should not forget or fail to further the end and object of those laws which we are called upon to construe, namely, the preservation of public morals, the promotion of social order, and the establishment of good government, of our liberties, and of the constitution."

1873, MCCOY, J., in Eberhart v. State, 47 Ga. 598, 610: "We have, however, no sympathy with that sickly sentimentality that springs into action whenever a criminal is at length about to suffer for crime. It may be a sign of a tender heart, but it is also a sign of one not under proper regulation. Society demands that crime shall be punished and criminals warned, and the false humanity that starts and shudders when the axe of justice is ready to strike is a dangerous element for the peace of society. We have had too much of this mercy. It is not true mercy. It only looks to the criminal. But we must insist upon mercy to society, upon justice to the poor woman whose blood cries out against her murderers. That criminals go unpunished is a disgrace to our civilization; and we have reaped the fruits of it in the frequency with which bloody deeds occur."

This much had to be said here, in order to redeem the law of Evidence from that reproach which belongs rather to the law of new trials.[17]

[17] The following list of decisions and statutes for the several jurisdictions is by no means complete; but it will serve to show the trend, past and present, of the various Supreme Courts in respect to ordering new trials for erroneous trial-rulings upon the law of Evidence:

CANADA: 1911, Allen v. The King, 44 Can. Sup. 331; 1915, R. v. May, 21 D. L. R. 728, B. C. (Can. Cr. C. § 1019 considered and applied); 1915, R. v. Romano, 21 D. L. R. 195, Que. (Can. Cr. C. § 1019 considered and applied); 1917, R. v. Spain, 36 D. L. R. 522, Man. (murder); 1916, R. v. Doyle, 28 D. L. R. 649, N. Sc. (stealing); 1916, R. v. Duckworth, 31 D. L. R. 570, Ont. (murder); 1919, Larson v. Boyd, 46 D. L. R. 126, Can. S. C. (false representations); 1919, Veuillette v. The King, 48 D. L. R. 158, Can. S. C. (murder); 1920, R. v. Mah Hong Hing, 53 D. L. R. 356, B. C. (wounding); 1918, Boyd v. Larson, 42 D. L. R. 516, Sask. (false representations preceding a contract); 1920, R. v. Trenholme, 61 D. L. R. 316, Que.; 1921, R. v. Sileski, 63 D. L. R. 146, Que.

FEDERAL. In the Supreme Court, the canon of Mr. Justice Story (quoted supra, n. 4), for motions for new trials, if applied to writs of error, would have set an admirable standard for the State Courts. But on the contrary the extreme theory of a party's "legal right to legal evidence" found favor: 1894. Waldron v. Waldron, 156 U. S. 380, 15 Sup. 383; 1898, Northern P. R. Co. v. Hayes, 30 C. C. A. 576, 87 Fed. 131 ("It is elementary that the admission of illegal evidence over objection necessitates a reversal"). During the latter part of the 1800s the Court was in criminal cases especially callous in pushing the technical rule to extremes, notably in its treatment of some of the rulings of the late Judge Parker, of the Western Arkansas District, one of the greatest trial judges of the Federal bench, whose work for law and order in that region was inestimable; examples may be found in Allen v. U. S. tried in 1893, reversed in 150 U. S. 551, reversed again in 157 U. S. 675, finally affirmed in 1896 in 164 U. S. 492, 17 Sup. 154; in Carver v. U. S., 160 U. S. 553, 16 Sup. 388, 1896 (a dying declaration was sanctioned as admissible, but the deceased on a subsequent day had said to an inquirer that her former declaration "was true in every particular"; this being erroneously admitted, a new trial was granted solely because of the error; later the case was again reversed in 164 U. S. 694, 17 Sup. 228); in Starr v. U. S., reversed in 1894, in 153 U. S. 614, and again in 1897, in 164 U. S. 627, 17 Sup. 223; and in Brown v. U. S., reversed three times, in 150 U. S. 93, 159 U. S. 100, and 164 U. S. 221. Of the above last three defendants (all charged with homicide) whose cases were reversed, Starr subsequently pleaded guilty to manslaughter and to several charges of robbery; Brown pleaded guilty to manslaughter; and Carver was on a third trial convicted of murder; in short, the appellate Court's total achievement proves to have consisted merely in blocking justice for several years, and to have helped to diminish in a turbulent community that respect for law and justice which the trial Court, if unhampered, was able to maintain. These cases give to volume 164 of the Federal Supreme Court reports an unenviable mark in our jurisprudence. An instance of a juster doctrine in the same Court is found in Motes v. U. S. (1899), 178 U. S. 458, 20 Sup. 993.

In the intermediate Courts the same attitude was found, in many or most of the circuits, for another generation; 1905, Sanborn, J., in Union Pacific R. Co. v. Field, 137 Fed. 14, C. C. A.; 1905, National Biscuit Co. v. Nolan, 138 Fed. 6, C. C. A. (Philips, J.: "Error presumptively works a prejudice to the party against whom it was committed"); 1906, Sparks v. Terr., 146 Fed. 371, C. C. A. (the admission of irrelevant evidence "is a violation of a legal right, and it constitutes fatal error").

The public sentiment of the bar finally made itself felt in a statute of 1919: U. S. St. 1919, Feb. 26, 40 Stat. L., amending Judicial Code § 269 ("On the hearing of any appeal, certiorari, writ of error, or motion for a new trial in any case, civil or criminal, the court shall give judgment, after an examination of the entire record before the court, without regard to technical errors or defects or to exceptions which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties").

Gradually this statute will doubtless produce a beneficent effect: 1919, Dye v. U. S., C. C. A., 262 Fed. 6; 1920, Sneierson v. U. S., 4th C. C. A., 264 Fed. 268, 275; 1920, Trieber, J., in Smith v. U. S., 8th C. C. A., 267 Fed. 665, 670 ("The evidence of the guilt of these defendants was so conclusively established that, even if there had been some error in the admission of evidence, and we do not hold that there was, the modern law so clearly stated by Judge Hook in Williams v. United States, (C. C. A.) 265 Fed. 625 (opinion filed April 29, 1920), applies; Judge Hook there said: 'Whether prejudice results from the erroneous admission of evidence at a trial is a question that should not be considered abstractly or by way of detachment. The question is one of practical effect, when the trial as a whole and all the circumstances of the proofs are regarded. . . . It is manifest that he was not prejudiced by the admission of the testimony to which reference has been made'"); U. S. St. June 4, 1920, ch. V, subchapter II, Articles of War, Art. 37 (error must have "injuriously affected the substantial rights of the accused"); 1921, Haywood v. U. S., 7th C. C. A., 268 Fed. 795 ("From recent legislation we gather the congressional intent to end the practice of holding that an error requires the reversal of the judgment unless the opponent can affirmatively demonstrate from other parts of the record that the error was harmless, and now to demand that the complaining party show to the reviewing tribunal from the record as a whole that he has been denied some substantial right whereby he has been prevented from having a fair trial"); 1921, Rich v. U. S., 8th C. C. A., 271 Fed. 566 (approving the foregoing).

ALABAMA: 1896, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Miller, 109 Ala. 500, 19 So. 989 (more than a dozen exceptions to rulings on evidence; one only of these being found wrong, though no substantial prejudice was asserted, a new trial was granted); 1896, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Malone, 109 Ala. 509, 20 So. 33 (similar; here there were twenty rulings and exceptions); 1904, Southern R. Co. v. Morris, 149 Ala. 672, 42 So. 19 (on several exceptions, the only one sustained was that, upon a proper question to a witness as to the defendant's payment of his expenses, the witness' answer showed that no more had been paid than was due; solely for failing to strike out this answer, the verdict for the plaintiff was reversed and a new trial ordered; this was a plain failure of justice); 1905, Shelton v. State, ib., 42 So. 30 (murder; out of two dozen exceptions, the verdict was set aside solely because of a charge upon confessions, the defendant's statement being finically construed not to be a confession); 1905, Smith v. State, 142 Ala. 14, 39 So. 329 (on some thirty exceptions, and twenty refused charges, the judgment was reversed solely because of an error in refusing to admit the details of the deceased's intoxication); 1906, Jacobs v. State, 146 Ala. 103, 42 So. 70 (murder; out of a dozen exceptions, the only one sustained was to a casual phrase of the judge amounting to a charge upon the evidence; and for this the verdict was set aside); 1917, Maryland Casualty Co. v. McCallum, 200 Ala. 154, 75 So. 902 (accident policy; fine dissenting opinion by Gardner, J.; a rare voice of protest in a judicial fraternity slow to reject old habits).

ARIZONA: Const. 1910, Art. I, § 22 ("No [criminal] cause shall be reversed for technical error in pleading or proceedings where upon the whole case it shall appear that substantial justice has been done"); 1919, Elmer v. State, 20 Ariz. 170, 178 Pac. 28 (rape).

CALIFORNIA: Here the Code had from the very beginning laid down a sane rule; P. C. 1872, § 1258 ("The Court must give judgment without regard to technical errors or defects, or to exceptions, which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties"). But this Code provision was virtually ignored by the Supreme Court for more than a generation; 1878, People v. Bell, 53 Cal. 119 (here the defendant's testimony that the deceased, with whose murder he was charged, was habitually profane, was erroneously allowed to be contradicted by the prosecution, and though the matter was held to have "had no reference whatever to the guilt or innocence of the defendant", a new trial was ordered, solely on this error); 1903, Rulofson v. Billings, 140 Cal. 452, 74 Pac. 35 ("A party cannot, after insisting upon the admission of improper evidence, over an objection to its admissibility, defend his course by contending that the error was harmless. . . . This Court in such cases sits only as a Court for the correction of errors. The judgment upon the facts, to which every litigant is entitled as of right absolute, is the judgment of the trial Court." Here is indeed frankly the Trilogy of Technicalism, which may be thus restated: "1. It is a crime to violate by mistake the rules of evidence; the penalty is the forfeiture of one's just rights and estates. 2. The Supreme Court is not a real Court of Justice, but only a Referee to decide Bets on Rules of Evidence. 3. Every person has an Absolute Right to profit unjustly by the trial Court's mistakes in deciding such Bets"); 1904, People v. Creeks, 141 Cal. 532, 75 Pac. 101.

The new Court of Appeal seemed to be making a better start in enforcing the rational doctrine: 1905, Greene v. Murdock, 1 Cal. App. 136, 81 Pac. 993; and a marked turn for the better was for a while observable in the Supreme Court, in People v. Weber, 149 Cal. 325, 86 Pac. 671 (1906); Dolbeer's Estate, 149 Cal. 227, 86 Pac. 695 (1906).

Then came a relapse, illustrated by the following case: 1911, People v. Coffey, 161 Cal. 433, 119 Pac. 901 (another of the Ruef-Gallagher trolley-system bribery cases; the reversal was grounded on the lack of corroboration of an accomplice; the definition of an accomplice was expounded learnedly and lengthily, and a very pretty and scientific distinction was laid down, which however was not the one used by the trial judge; thus was fatal error committed; in other words, the credibility, man to man, on all the circumstances of the case, of this witness and thus the safety of the verdict as founded on fact, was made to turn on a subtle discussion of criminal theory; it might just as well have been made to turn on the authenticity of the Pentateuch).

Then came retribution, in the shape of a Constitutional Amendment, a humiliating rebuke to all Courts of Justice, forbidding new trials except for "miscarriage of justice": Const. Art. 6, § 4½ (Nov. 3, 1914) ("No judgment shall be set aside, or new trial granted, in any case, on the ground of misdirection of the jury, or of the improper admission or rejection of evidence or for any error as to any matter of pleading, or for any error as to any matter of procedure, unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice").

The Court then acted in the full spirit of the Amendment: 1913, People v. O'Bryan, 165 Cal. 55, 130 Pac. 1042 (here the Court, speaking through Sloss, J., call attention to the constitutional amendment of 1911 forbidding new trials for errors, etc., unless involving "miscarriage of justice"; affirm that it was meant to remedy the unsatisfactory doctrine of "reversible error"; and proceed to apply it wholeheartedly and sensibly, on the canon, "If it appears to our satisfaction that the result was just, and that it would have been reached if the error had not been committed, a new trial is not to be ordered"; three judges, in a minority opinion, show a hesitation, erroneously believing that a constitutional principle was involved); 1913, People v. Fleming, 166 Cal. 357, 136 Pac. 291 (the majority ordered a new trial, for erroneous use of evidence, "in the interests of justice"; but Chief Justice Beatty, non-concurring, very properly pointed out that the term "miscarriage of justice" (Const. Art. 6, § 4½, recently added) can mean, "only the correlation of such miscarriage in cases of acquittal, viz. the conviction of a person who is innocent"); 1922, People v. Mayen, — Cal. —, 205 Pac. 435.

See the article by Professor A. M. Kidd, "Criminal Law: Miscarriage of Justice: Constitutional Amendment" (California Law Review, I, 375).

CONNECTICUT: This Court seems always to have accepted sound principles: 1885, State v. Beaudet, 53 Conn. 536, 539, 4 Atl. 237 (if evidence excluded "could not properly have changed the result, then he was not aggrieved by the ruling"); 1903, Munroe v. Hartford St. R. Co., 76 Conn. 201, 56 Atl. 498, per Hamersley, J.

FLORIDA: A statute of 1911 laid down a sound rule: St. 1911, May 26, Rev. G. S. 1919, § 2812 (no reversal of judgment for error unless "after an examination of the entire case it shall appear that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice"). This statute has been applied in the best spirit: 1918, Bailey v. State, 76 Fla. 213, 79 So. 730; 1919, Riggins v. State, 78 Fla. 459, 83 So. 267 (no reversal for technical errors "where the evidence of guilt is clear and ample, and no fundamental rights of the defendants were violated, and it appears from the whole record that such technical errors if any were not prejudicial to the defendant"); 1920, McQuagge v. State, 80 Fla. 768, 87 So. 60 (judgment will not be reversed, "even if technical errors have been committed in the rulings on questions of the admissibility of evidence, . . . where the evidence of guilt is clear, and no fundamental rights of the defendant were violated").

GEORGIA: This Court started well, but afterwards fell into the usual over-technical ways of thought: 1846, McCleskey v. Leadbetter, 1 Ga. 551, 556 ("The Courts will not set aside a verdict on account of the admission of evidence which ought to have been rejected, provided there be sufficient without it to authorize the finding"); 1906, Young v. State, 125 Ga. 584, 54 S. E. 82 (third conviction for murder; the first two were set aside for minor technicalities; this third was set aside by a majority, because the trial judge erroneously assumed that the defendant did not dispute the death of the deceased; in fact, the victim assaulted was riddled with shot "from about the middle", and at the time of this ruling his corpse had been putrefying in the graveyard for two years; yet the trial Court, in withdrawing that issue from the consideration of the jury, is deemed to have committed a fatal error; this kind of ruling is itself a putrefaction of justice).

IDAHO: Sound principles have here been placed on record: 1904, State v. Levy, 9 Ida. 483, 75 Pac. 227; 1918, Bumpas v. Moore, 131 Ida. 668, 175 Pac. 339.

ILLINOIS: Here, since People v. Cleminson, sound principles have been fully accepted, with only occasional relapses; 1908, Greinke v. Chicago City R. Co., 234 Ill. 564, 85 N. E. 327 (declines to disturb a verdict which had been "clearly established by other competent evidence"); 1911, People v. Cleminson, 250 Ill. 135, 95 N. E. 157 (errors were found, but "we cannot escape the conclusion that the verdict could not have been otherwise than 'Guilty', even if none of the errors referred to had been committed"); 1913, People v. Newman, 261 Ill. 11, 103 N. E. 589 (here the Court relapses to the mechanical theory; character-evidence erroneously admitted leads to a reversal, regardless of "what we may think of the guilt or innocence of the plaintiff in error"); 1916, People v. Duzan, 272 Ill. 478, 112 N. E. 315 (error as to reputation-evidence; but "the guilt of plaintiff in error is so conclusively shown from this record that it is not possible to conceive how the jury could have come to any other conclusion, even if they had believed" the evidence in question); 1916, People v. Montgomery, 271 Ill. 580, 111 N. E. 578 ("It was error to admit this evidence; but if it had not been received the evidence in the case was such that the jury could not reasonably have returned any other verdict than that which they did return"); 1917, People v. O'Brien, 277 Ill. 305, 115 N. E. 123 (bribery; "Where guilt is conclusively proven by competent evidence, and no other rational conclusion could be reached but that defendant is guilty, it would require more substantial errors . . . to justify a reversal"); 1917, People v. Michael, 280 Ill. 11, 117 N. E. 193 ("Courts no longer adhere to the technical rule that a judgment must be reversed where the record shows that error was committed on the trial"); 1920, People v. Lardner, 296 Ill. 190, 129 N. E. 697 ("We are convinced that plaintiff in error is guilty of the offense for which he was convicted, and we do not consider the errors occurring on the trial of sufficient importance to demand a reversal of the judgment", per Thompson, Farmer, and Duncan, JJ., diss.); 1921, People v. Cardinelli, 297 Ill. 116, 130 N. E. 355 (murder; rule in People v. Cleminson followed); 1921, People v. Lane, 300 Ill. 422, 133 N. E. 267 (murder; "it is impossible for us to know what the jury would have done, and much less our province to say what they should have done in the absence of this incompetent evidence"; backsliding; no former cases cited).

INDIANA: Burns Ann. St. 1914, § 407 (civil cases; no judgment to be reversed for error or defect not affecting "the substantial rights of the adverse party"); § 700 (civil cases; no reversal where the "merits of the cause have been fairly tried and determined in the court below"); 1903, Coppenhaver v. State, 160 Ind. 540, 67 N. E. 453; 1907, Sanderson v. State, 169 Ind. 301, 82 N. E. 525; 1921, Coff v. State, — Ind. —, 133 N. E. 3 ("if it was proved by undisputed evidence which was competent that he did those acts, a judgment of conviction should not be reversed, even if it appears that incompetent evidence tending to prove the same facts was also admitted").

IOWA: A rich piece of judicial artificiality, as it contrasts with natural justice, is found in State v. Wheeler, 129 Ia. 100, 105 N. W. 374 (1905), and State v. Brown, 130 Ia. 57, 106 N. W. 379 (1906); in the former case, a verdict of guilty was found against one Wheeler, for throwing acid in the eyes of Mrs. R., but the verdict was set aside for improper evidence; in the latter case, the jury found one Brown guilty of instigating the criminal act of Wheeler as above, and this verdict was affirmed by the Supreme Court, with the incidental statement that "there is ample evidence in the case to establish Wheeler's guilt." I.e. Wheeler was not guilty when he was himself tried, yet he was guilty when Brown was tried! Of course there is a legal twist of thought by which this can be easily explained. But the fact remains that Justice was bungled here, and that it was bungled because the judges are slaves of a machine-like method and are not bold enough as Justiciars to put two such cases together and solve them rationally and sensibly.

In civil cases, the following represents a rational view: 1906, Wiltsey's Will, 135 Ia. 430, 109 N. W. 776 ("We are not justified in reversing a case because of the improper admission of evidence, where the result could not have been different had such evidence been excluded").

KANSAS: Gen. St. 1915, § 7209 (in civil cases "a new trial shall not be granted unless . . . the Court shall be of opinion that the verdict or decision is wrong in whole or in some material part"); § 7485 ("The appellate court shall disregard all mere technical errors and irregularities which do not affirmatively appear to have prejudicially affected the substantial rights of the party complaining, where it appears upon the whole record that substantial justice has been done by the judgment or order of the trial court; and in any case pending before it, the court shall render such final judgment as it deems that justice requires, or direct such judgment to be rendered by the court from which the appeal was taken, without regard to technical errors and irregularities in the proceedings of the trial court"); ibid. § 8215 ("On an appeal, the court must give judgment without regard to technical errors or defects, or to exceptions which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties"); 1905, State v. Miller, 71 Kan. 200, 80 Pac. 51 (rape under age; the Court overruled three exceptions, but sustained the fourth and granted a new trial solely because at the trial was admitted a priest's copy, brought over by the family from Russia, of an extract of the parish-register showing the girl's age, the girl herself and both her parents having testified to her age, and the certificate being merely cumulative; the excuse is made, "How much weight may have been given by the jury, we are unable to say, etc."); 1906, Federal B. Co. v. Reeves, 73 Kan. 107, 84 Pac. 560 (among numerous alleged errors, the Court declared many of the objections "frivolous", and found only one error, and even this was by the better rule not an error; without the slightest consideration whether it could or should have affected the verdict, a new trial was ordered); 1918, State v. Peterson, 102 Kan. 900, 171 Pac. 1153.

KENTUCKY: Ky. Cr. C. 1877, § 340 ("A judgment of conviction shall be reversed for any error of law to the defendant's prejudice appearing on the record"); St. 1880, March 4 (amended by omitting "to the defendant's prejudice", and by adding: "whenever upon the consideration of the whole case the Court is satisfied that the substantial rights of the defendant have been prejudiced thereby"); 1880, Rutherford v. Com., 78 Ky. 639, 643 (dealing with the trial Court's erroneous refusal to allow the defendant to be present at a view; "If all the evidence that the jury could have received on the view . . . had been excluded, it is clear that the verdict must have been 'guilty of murder'; under such circumstances, we are authorized in saying that the record affirmatively shows that the error complained of was not 'prejudicial' to the defendant"). The interpretation of the Code provision continues to fluctuate: 1909, Hargis v. Com., 135 Ky. 578, 123 S. W. 239 (liberally treated); 1904, Marks v. Hardy's Adm'r, 117 Ky. 663, 78 S. W. 864, 1105; 1905, Whitt v. Com., — Ky. —, 84 S. W. 340 (reversal for a single error in evidence); 1916, Cavanaugh v. Com., 172 Ky. 799, 190 S. W. 123 (murder).

LOUISIANA: 1895, Miller, J., in State v. Callahan, 47 La. An. 497, 15 So. 50 ("The admission of illegal evidence in a civil case is comparatively unimportant. . . . But in a criminal case . . . it is for the jury to convict, and it is presumed to act on all the evidence submitted. . . . It is the right of the accused to be tried on legal evidence alone. . . . The conviction must be by legal evidence only"); 1906, State v. Rugero, 117 La. 1040, 42 So. 495 (verdict of manslaughter set aside solely because, on the defendant having read his affidavit for continuance on account of a witness whom he could secure "in due time for trial at this term", the prosecuting attorney read the sheriff's return for the witness as not found because out of the State in Texas; the defendant's affidavit being by fiction of law deemed conclusive, this return of the sheriff was treated as reflecting fatally upon the defendant's veracity; the prosecution having argued that this error was trivial, the Supreme Court warmly retorts, "Why jeopardize the result of a trial by insisting on evidence so utterly insignificant?)."

MARYLAND: 1904, Joseph Bros. Co. v. Schonthal I. & S. Co., 99 Md. 382, 58 Atl. 205 (good statement by McSherry, C. J.); 1921, Chiswell v. Nichols, 139 Md. 442, 115 Atl. 790.

MASSACHUSETTS: This Court early went wrong, and in some modern decisions it still shows itself as stubbornly technical as any in the country: 1808, Sewall, J., in Bartlet v. Delprat, 4 Mass. 708 ("And upon the whole, although the other facts appearing in this case leave very little doubt of the justice of the verdict, yet as the competency of the evidence excepted to is not supported by any of the authorities we have examined, we think the verdict must be set aside"); 1894, Com. v. White, 162 Mass. 403, 38 N. E. 707; 1917, Akeson v. Doidge, 225 Mass. 574, 114 N. E. 726 (declarations by a bastard's mother in travail); Gen. L. 1920, c. 231, § 132 (no new trial for erroneous rulings on evidence if "the error complained of has not injuriously affected the substantial rights of the parties").

MICHIGAN: 1905, Seymour v. Bruske, 140 Mich. 644, 103 N. W. 613 (there was one error in the admission of evidence; reversed; "the testimony . . . impresses us with the idea that the jury was not in fact prejudiced by this evidence. We cannot say, however, that it was not prejudicial. We can say that it was incompetent." And the plain-minded observer can say that such language is that of the helpless slave of a legal treadmill, not that of an administrator of justice).

MINNESOTA: 1897, Murphy v. Backer, 67 Minn. 510, 70 N. W. 799 (new trial granted solely because of a single improper contradiction of a witness on a collateral point); 1903, State v. Nelson, 91 Minn. 143, 97 N. W. 652 (good statement); 1905, State v. Crawford, 96 Minn. 95, 104 N. W. 822 (Jaggard, J., for the Court, fully and emphatically proclaims the adherence of this Court to the orthodox and enlightened rule); 1905, State v. Williams, 96 Minn. 351, 105 N. W. 265 (Start, C. J., explaining the rule laid down in the preceding cases).

MISSOURI: 1896, Gardner v. R. Co., 135 Mo. 90, 36 S. W. 214 ("The judgment was manifestly for the right party; and where such is the case, the judgment will not be reversed because some incompetent testimony was admitted"); 1903, State v. Faulkner, 175 Mo. 546, 75 S. W. 116 (St. Louis municipal corruption case; judgment reversed, apparently on no other ground than two minor errors in the rules of evidence, and a quibble upon a variance between the indictment and an instruction); 1904, State v. Schnettler, 181 Mo. 173, 79 S. W. 1123 (St. Louis bribery case; reversed on a technicality); 1904, Alexander v. Wade, 106 Mo. App. 141, 80 S. W. 19 (Bland, P. J.: "Whether or not there was error committed in the admission of evidence, the error will not avail appellant, for the reason that under the competent evidence, . . . the judgment is clearly for the right party and should not be reversed"); 1905, Swope v. Ward, 185 Mo. 316, 84 S. W. 895 (under Rev. St. 1899, § 865); 1906, State v. Barrington, 198 Mo. 23, 95 S. W. 235 (showing a healthy attitude on this subject); 1906, State v. Feeley, 194 Mo. 300, 92 S. W. 663 (sound principle); Rev. St. 1919, § 1513 (Supreme Court shall reverse for error unless for one "materially affecting the merits of the action").

The preposterously illogical result of the heresy often is that the greater the probative value of the erroneously admitted evidence, the more necessary to order a new trial; e.g., in Redmon v. Metropolitan St. R. Co., 185 Mo. 1, 84 S. W. 26, the Court, having declared a conductor's statement, made just after the accident, to have been erroneously admitted, proceeds: "Coming as it did from the conductor of the train, it was calculated to carry conviction that the cause of the accident was, etc.", and therefore "the admission of this evidence was reversible error." A system of proof pretending to call itself rational should not be found employing such a parody on reasoning. In the above opinion, the new trial was ordered for that error alone.

MONTANA: Rev. C. 1921, § 12125 (like Cal. P. C. § 1258); 1906, State v. Fuller, 34 Mont. 12, 85 Pac. 369.

NEBRASKA: Rev. St. 1922, § 8657 (in civil cases, "no judgment shall be reversed or affected by reason of . . . any error or defect in the pleadings or proceedings which does not affect the substantial rights of the adverse party"); 1886, Cobb, J., in Masters v. Marsh, 19 Nebr. 467, 27 N. W. 438 (excluding certain books of account: "While I do not think that the books would have proved any fact of the least value in the case had they been properly admitted, yet the party presenting them would scarcely be permitted to escape the consequence of an erroneous ruling on that ground"); 1894, Carpenter v. Lingenfelter, 42 Nebr. 728, 60 N. W. 1022 (new trial granted for allowing the contradiction of a witness on an immaterial point); 1906, McCook v. McAdams, 76 Nebr. 1, 106 N. W. 988 (a very pretty piece of machine-made justice; after two trials, a verdict for the plaintiff was reversed solely because of testimony to the total damage to the goods, the objections being, first, that it was an opinion, and secondly that it was based in part on cost price); 1918, Shaul v. Mann, 102 Nebr. 265, 166 N. W. 619 (judge without a jury); 1921, Macke v. Wagener, 106 Nebr. 282, 183 N. W. 360 ("The long-established rule in this State is that where immaterial and irrelevant testimony has been admitted over objection, and which may have tendency to mislead the jury, it is good ground for a new trial"; here the court apparently hesitated; but it finally threw away its chance to enlist in the ranks of progress; this particular lawsuit, having lasted six years already, now was made a fit subject for lay jesting upon the speed and certainty of legal justice; Henry had in 1915 publicly called Mary a lecher; a week later, Mary's friends, threatening Henry with something or other, obtained from him notes and a mortgage for $3000; another week later, Henry files a bill in equity for cancellation on the ground of duress; a year later, the decree is entered for Henry; two years later the Supreme Court affirms this decree; then Mary, having lost her settlement, starts suit for the original slander, and obtains a verdict for 1 cent damages; on appeal, this judgment is reversed because the pleadings in the equity case had been read to the jury in the slander case; and so, five years after the original verbalities, the wheels of justice are still grinding; is this an exhibit of efficient justice, or the reverse?).

NEVADA: State v. Williams, 28 Nev. 395, 82 Pac. 353; Rev. L. 1912, § 5066 (no judgment shall be reversed for any error "which shall not affect the substantial rights of the parties"); § 7302 (criminal cases; similar); § 7469 (similar).

NEW HAMPSHIRE: 1903, Pattee v. Whitcomb, 72 N. H. 249, 56 Atl. 459 (new trial for a single error, in excluding cumulative opinion in evidence); 1912, Holman v. Boston & M. R. Co., 76 N. H. 496, 84 Atl. 979 (this opinion shows that no Court, even in the State once honored by the tradition of the great Charles Doe, is to-day advanced enough not to need self-scrutiny for the present fault).

NEW JERSEY: St. 1894, May 9, c. 163 (new trial is to be granted where any "manifest wrong or injury" has been suffered); 1897, Kohl v. State, 59 N. J. L. 445, 37 Atl. 73 (murder; the trial judge told the jury that a question was whether there was a motive, in particular, whether the deceased had any money; the defendant's mother, with whom the deceased lived, had said on the direct examination that the deceased showed no large sums of money, and on the cross-examination, that he had no money but a dollar a week; she was then allowed to be contradicted by B. who testified that she had elsewhere said the defendant had $800; this statement, however, it was ruled, not being precisely inconsistent with her direct examination, and not being available to impeach the cross-examination where she had been made the examiner's own witness, was therefore inadmissible, and hence there was no evidence to show that he had money, except this contradiction; "for that reason alone, the judgment, in my opinion, should be reversed and a new trial granted"). This ruling apparently led to another statute, which made a further effort to control the judicial monomania (St. 1898, c. 237, § 136) by adding that "no judgment shall be reversed . . . for any error except such as shall or may have prejudiced the defendant in maintaining his defence upon the merits." This statute seems to have been followed by an improvement: 1904, State v. Simon, 71 N. J. L. 142, 58 Atl. 107.

NEW YORK: In this State there has been a vacillating progress towards liberalism: St. 1855, c. 337 (a new trial may be granted if the appellate court is satisfied "that the verdict against the prisoner was against the weight of evidence or against law, or that justice requires a new trial"); 1858, Cancemi v. People, 16 N. Y. 507 (new trial granted for an erroneous ruling on character-evidence, merely because it was "calculated to mislead the jury as to the weight which the evidence should receive"); 1873, Stokes v. People, 53 N. Y. 174 (the deceased's threats communicated were admitted, but some threats uncommunicated were erroneously rejected; a new trial was granted, although the admission of the excluded evidence would simply have added to the number of threats proved).

A statute again attempted to impose a more liberal rule, and for a while something was achieved; and then the practice fell back into the old rut: C. Cr. P. 1881, § 542 (the Court shall "give judgment without regard to technical errors or defects, or to exceptions which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties"); 1896, Gray, J., in People v. Hoch, 150 N. Y. 299, 301, 44 N. E. 976 ("The spirit of this legislation, as is its letter, is that if the accused has had a fair trial upon his accusation, and if this Court is satisfied that the conviction is sufficiently supported by competent evidence, that conviction shall stand"); 1897, People v. Conroy, 153 N. Y. 174, 185, 47 N. E. 258 (preceding case approved); 1897, People v. Burgess, 153 N. Y. 561, 47 N. E. 889 (same); 1897, People v. Strait, 154 N. Y. 165, 47 N. E. 1090 ("That statute [C. Cr. P. § 542] is but little more than a codification of the previously established rule . . . ; neither that rule nor the statute affects the well-established principle that the rejection of competent and material evidence, which is harmful to the defendant and excepted to, presents an error requiring a reversal. Such a ruling affects a 'substantial right', even though the appellate court, with the rejected evidence before it, would still come to the same conclusion reached by the jury; the defendant has the right to insist that material and legal evidence offered by him shall be received and submitted to the jury"); 1897, People v. Sutherland, 154 N. Y. 345, 48 N. E. 518 (O'Brien, J., concerning letters of a murdered paramour to show motive; "It is impossible to say with any reason that the result of the trial should have been different if the letters had not been introduced at all. If they had been excluded by the court as immaterial, the case against the defendant would have remained the same, and there is not the slightest ground for the belief that the jury could or would have rendered any other verdict").

In civil cases the Court promulgated an enlightened principle: 1906, Hindley v. Manhatten R. Co., 185 N. Y. 335, 78 N. E. 276 ("If no reasonable view of all the evidence in the record would permit a conclusion favorable to the defendants on that issue, it is clear that the erroneous rulings [of admission for the plaintiffs], did no harm, and that the judgment [for the plaintiffs] should be affirmed").

The vacillations were then resumed. In criminal cases (e.g. 1904, People v. Bonier, 179 N. Y. 315, 72 N. E. 226) the Court had observed the old rule that "a presumption of injury conclusively arises whenever it is apparent that the erroneous ruling may have affected the verdict"; yet in an opinion filed on the very same day (People v. Davey, Nov. 15, 1904, 179 N. Y. 345, 72 N. E. 244) the same Court asserted that "it has become one of the accepted maxims of our jurisprudence that appellate courts will not be astute to find mere technical errors upon which to reverse judgments"; in the Davey case, the opinion does not make a pretence of considering whether the conviction was actually just upon the evidence; its own condemnation is furnished by the language of the same Court in an opinion written by the very same judge, filed one month later (People v. Rimieri, 180 N. Y. 163, 72 N. E. 1002), and ruling the opposite way upon almost precisely the same facts (cited post, § 1157, n. 3), in which the proper criticism is made that "to hold that a jury, sitting in judgment in a case involving a human life, would be influenced by such an incident to render a verdict not warranted by the evidence, would be an unjust imputation on the system."

A turn for the good was then observable: 1908, People v. Gillette, 191 N. Y. 107, 83 N. E. 680 (murder); reaction followed: 1915, People v. Risley, 214 N. Y. 75, 108 N. E. 200 (forgery; in this case the whole Court falls back to the days of its most devoted technicalism; the new judge, Seabury, dissents in a gallant but unsuccessful effort to hold the ground won in recent years); 1915, People v. Marendi, 213 N. Y. 600, 107 N. E. 1058 (reactionary opinion by Miller, J.); 1916, People v. Swersky, 216 N. Y. 471, 111 N. E. 212; 1916, People v. Watson, 216 N. Y. 565, 111 N. E. 243, 1921, People v. Slover, 232 N. Y. 264, 133 N. E. 633 (murder; liberal test applied).

NORTH CAROLINA: 1899, State v. Jefferson, 125 N. C. 712, 34 S. E. 648 (a mob had almost lynched the accused, at the time of the arrest; but a new trial was awarded on the merest quibble of evidence, while conceding that the whole evidence "warranted conviction"); 1904, State v. Parker, 134 N. C. 209, 46 S. E. 511 (corroborating a child under ten in rape, by her prior statements; the judge's failure to charge as to the precise nature of the corroboration, though no request was made of him by defendant's counsel, and no objection taken, held ground for a new trial; a second trial also having been already ordered for a mere technicality; Clark, C. J., diss.); 1921, State v. Mundy, 182 N. C. 907, 110 S. E. 93 ("Courts do not now grant new trials for merely technical objections, unless the error is of sufficient importance to justify a belief that if the error had not been committed the result, reasonably, would have been different").

NORTH DAKOTA: 1910, State v. Staber, 20 N. D. 545, 129 N. W. 104 (different phrasings considered).

OHIO: St. 1911, p. 132, May 18, Gen. Code Ann. § 11364 (upon review of a judgment, the Court shall certify "whether or not in its opinion substantial justice has been done to the party complaining, as shown by the record of the proceedings and judgment under review"; if certifying in the affirmative, all errors shall be "deemed not prejudicial to the party complaining", and judgment shall be affirmed, or modified "if in the opinion of such reviewing court a modification thereof will do more complete justice to the party complaining"); 1922, Burke v. State, — Oh. —, 135 N. E. 644 (forgery).

OKLAHOMA: 1912, Landon v. Morehead, 34 Okl. 701, 126 Pac. 1027 (this is an extreme example of the sporting theory of litigation; a document being proved by copy, and the evidence of opponent's possession etc. being inadequate, an affidavit filed after verdict and showing the needed fact, was held not to obviate a reversal; for "the making of this subsequent affidavit could not cure the Court's error committed at the trial"; thus the Supreme Court rules exactly as if it were a question of whist).

But in criminal cases the Court of Criminal Appeal, under the leadership of (the late) Presiding Justice Furman, the greatest American criminal judge of the present generation, adopted an enlightened attitude, and promulgated one of the soundest formulas; 1912, Mitchell v. State, 7 Okl. Cr. 563, 124 Pac. 1112 ("As the verdict rendered is the only one which could have been rendered by the jury, we cannot say that the appellant has been deprived of any substantial right to his injury"); 1919, Wilson v. State, — Okl. Cr. —, 183 Pac. 613 (Rev. L. § 6005, as to a miscarriage of justice, applied to prevent a reversal where "the evidence abundantly sustains the verdict" and "the conviction was at all events inevitable"); 1919, Siebenaler v. State, 16 Okl. Cr. App. 576, 185 Pac. 448 ("Where the legal evidence in a case shows conclusively that a defendant is guilty, and where the jury could not rationally arrive at any other conclusion, ordinarily errors committed . . . will not constitute grounds for reversal").

OREGON: Laws 1920, § 1626 (criminal cases; like Cal. P. C. § 1258); 1904, Carter v. Wakeman, 45 Or. 427, 78 Pac. 362 ("When it is manifest that an error has been committed, prejudice will be presumed"); 1917, State v. Morris, 83 Or. 429, 163 Pac. 567 ("the jury could not . . . reasonably have found" otherwise).

PENNSYLVANIA: 1908, Com. v. Cate, 220 Pa. 138, 69 Atl. 322 (judgment set aside solely because of a slight verbal inaccuracy in a charge on good character; "we cannot say no harm was done appellant in this respect, although the case in other respects was tried with exemplary care, and the rulings of the learned judge were fair and impartial"; here the rules of the game must be obeyed strictly, on penalty of "tries over again"); 1921, Curtis v. Miller, 269 Pa. 509, 112 Atl. 747 ("The evidence [rejected] was merely cumulative, and, if admitted, would not have changed the result"); 1915, Com. v. Vitale, 250 Pa. 548, 95 Atl. 723 (murder; the old-fashioned technical rule at its worst).

PHILIPPINE ISL.: C. C. P. 1901, § 503 ("No judgment shall be reversed on formal or technical grounds, or for such error as has not prejudiced the real rights of the excepting party"); 1908, Paez v. Berengner, 8 P. I. 454; 1908, Chung Kiat v. Lim Kio, 11 P. I. 31.

PORTO RICO: 1903, Pereda's Succession v. Rodrigues' Succession, 3 P. R. 345; 1904, People v. Bird, 5 P. R. 387; 1907, People v. Rivera, 12 P. R. 386, 399; 1906, Horton v. Robert, 11 P. R. 168, 182; 1907, People v. Cancel, 13 P. R. 179, 187 (rape; the opinion takes the astounding view, as to erroneous charge on corroboration, that "although the error may have been in favor of the accused, still a judgment based on such palpably erroneous instructions cannot be approved"); 1910, People v. Espanol, 16 P. R. 203; 1912, People v. Calero, 18 P. R. 44, 50 (the rule in People v. Cleminson, Ill., supra, "meets our entire approbation"); 1917, People v. Julia, 25 P. R. 262, 277.

RHODE ISLAND: One of the broadest and best statements of the rule is as follows: "Where the evidence is such that a new trial would be of no avail, it will be denied, although there may have been error in the trial"; per Stiness, C. J., in Clarke v. N. Y. N. H. & H. R. Co., 26 R. I. 59, 58 Atl. 245.

South Carolina: 1839, State v. Ford, 3 Strobh. 528 (Earle, J., dissents as to the propriety of admitting certain evidence, but agrees to dismiss the motion for a new trial: for "in such a case as this, where the prisoner's guilt is very manifest . . . I think it would exhibit unnecessary squeamishness to say he has not been legally convicted on abundant evidence"); 1906, State v. Rowell, 75 S. C. 494, 56 S. E. 23 (murder; out of twelve errors only one was sustained, and that was a quibble over the trial judge's wording of his instruction as to self-defence; for this alone a new trial was ordered, though the jury had only condemned him to five years' imprisonment for manslaughter on facts which made this a paltry penalty).

South Dakota: 1904, Fowler v. Iowa Land Co., 18 S. D. 131, 99 N. W. 1095 ("Where there is sufficient evidence to sustain the judgment, independently of the evidence objected to and admitted, the admission of such evidence does not constitute reversible error").

Tennessee: Shannon's Code 1916, § 6351 (no judgment shall be reversed "unless for errors which affect the merits of the judgment"); § 6351*a* 1 (no judgment shall be set aside for errors in rulings on evidence, etc., unless "after an examination of the entire record in the case it appears that the error complained of has affected the results of the trial"). The following phrasing of the rule, under Tenn. Code, § 6351, would be the ideal one, if the last two clauses were omitted: 1904, Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Naive, 112 Tenn. 239, 79 S. W. 124 (Neil, J.: "The rule has been laid down by this Court that there can be no reversal for error in the charge of the Court below, where we can clearly see that a correct result was reached by the jury, and that an other trial with a proper charge could not change that result. The same rule must obtain where evidence was improperly excluded in the Court below, if it be perfectly apparent to this Court that the result was the correct one, that the excluded evidence could not have changed the result, and that upon a new trial . . . the jury could not fail to reach the same conclusion"); 1918, Frank v. Wright, 140 Tenn. 535, 205 S. W. 434 (personal injury).

Texas: 1906, Chancey v. State, 50 Tex. Cr. 85, 96 S. W. 12 (the judge remarked, excluding evidence of a witness' intoxication, that if he was drunk his testimony "would not amount to much"; it was held that this might apply to the defendant, who was also drunk, and on this ground alone the judgment was set aside!); 1905, Watkins L. M. Co. v. Campbell, 98 Tex. 372, 84 S. W. 424 (reversed for a single error in admitting cumulative evidence; the same pitiable 'non possumus' recurs, "It cannot be known that the jury was not influenced, etc.").

Utah: The following series of rulings in this State is commended to the judgment of the profession: 1905, State v. Shockley, 29 Utah 25, 80 Pac. 865 (this is perhaps the most glaring example of our modern failures of justice to be found in the records of a decade; the defendant, who had in July, 1903, three times robbed street cars in Salt Lake City, was charged with murder of two passengers in a fourth attempted robbery of a car in January, 1904; the defendant took the stand and confessed all the facts, endeavoring to make exculpation by declaring that he had only intended "to try to hit his arm"; the verdict was reversed by the majority, solely on two erroneous rulings of evidence, first, because the claim of witness' privilege was required to be made by the defendant himself and not his counsel, and secondly, because of improper cross-examination to past misconduct; not only were the trial Court's rulings easily supportable on orthodox principles, but the Supreme Court majority opinion gave not even one word's consideration to the question whether the alleged errors should have affected the verdict; on a perusal of the testimony of the defendant, full of the self-justifying ethics of a reckless desperado, it is hard to say whether one is more aghast at the cold-bloodedness of the robber in taking the lives of his innocent victims, or the cold-bloodedness of the Supreme Court in mechanically grinding out a reversal without a regard to the demands of justice); 1910, State v. Vance, 38 Utah 1, 110 Pac. 434 (strict muzzling rule here applied, to limit cross-examination to matters testified to on the direct examination; the Shockley case reviewed and approved); 1911, State v. Thorne, 39 Utah 208, 117 Pac. 58 (another "cold-blooded" case; the defendant was charged with murder while burglarizing; he fully admitted the burglary and the killing and even by his own story the most to be said for him was that while the deceased, the owner of the store, was backing away with his hands up as commanded, the defendant "poked" or "punched" him in the ribs, and the gun "went off", and that he did not intend to kill the man; the Court's opinion expressly concedes that "upon the undisputed evidence in the case he is shown guilty of murder in the first degree", but reverses the judgment because, partly, of an erroneous cross-examination of the accused to former crimes (which crimes we here may believe to have been committed, inasmuch as the defendant did not deny them but claimed the privilege against self-crimination); and since this cross-examination "had a tendency" to deter the jury from the recommendation to life imprisonment which they might have made, hence the reversal; the result then is that a professional thug who came to a peaceable citizen's store to rob the till, and on the citizen's submission meanly killed him, was strictly protected by the Court because

The rules of Evidence are not arbitrary. They are not in themselves mere instruments of stratagem for the bar and of logical exercitation for the judiciary. As a whole and as a system, they are founded on rational purposes and practical experience. They are always reasoned, and usually reasonable. They have a right to exist, but not to be abused. As a system and as individual rules, they must be judged by themselves, and not by the improper consequences which the law of new trials has often caused to be attributed to their enforcement. That they have often seemed technical and inconsistent is due chiefly to the habit of ignoring the study of their reasons, — which nevertheless (as the ensuing pages attempt to exhibit) have been at all times copiously vouchsafed by the judges. That they are often difficult to apply is due mainly to their inherent nature, — to the possible applicability of scores of rules of exclusion at one and the same moment to one and the same offer of evidence. That they have in many respects been unpractical and unnecessary the jury might have recommended him to mercy, but the interests of the peaceable citizen and his bereaved family, to whom the thug showed no mercy, were not regarded as at all affecting criminal law administration); 1912, State v. Romeo, 42 Utah 46, 128 Pac. 530 (in this opinion, the attitude toward the present question showed a change; the case was another one of brutal and cruel murder with robbery; there was an error in the phraseology of the trial judge's charge upon the jury's power to recommend less than the death penalty; the opinion terms the error "more technical than substantial", and proceeds: "A charge with the objectionable features eliminated would not have produced a different result"); 1916, State v. Cluff, 48 Utah 102, 158 Pac. 701 (adultery; Comp. L. 1907, § 4975, as amended by St. 1915, c. 113, applied); 1921, State v. Nell, — Utah —, 202 Pac. 7 (murder; "in this jurisdiction, presumption of prejudice from error does not obtain").

VERMONT: 1897, Cutler v. Skeels, 69 Vt. 154, 37 Atl. 228 (eighteen exceptions; a new trial granted simply because the plaintiff's counsel in his address said that he knew his clients to be of good reputation and that this was the best kind of evidence for them); 1908, Holman v. Edson, 81 Vt. 49, 69 Atl. 143 ("an improper answer by a witness to a proper question is not ground of error if given without fault of the Court or examining counsel", and when a party is the witness, "fault" is presumed: here is the perverted notion that a trial is to be had over again as a "penalty" for a "fault", — just as a misdeal in cards vitiates the hand; here a new trial was granted solely because the plaintiff when testifying made one answer based on hearsay); 1920, State v. Williams, — Vt. —, 111 Atl. 701 ("under our present practice the burden is upon the excepting party to show that he has been prejudiced by the alleged error").

VIRGINIA: Code 1919, § 6331 ("No judgment or decree shall be arrested or reversed . . . for any error committed on the trial where it plainly appears from the record and the evidence given at the trial that the parties have had a fair trial on the merits and substantial justice has been reached").

WASHINGTON: 1912, State v. Stone, 66 Wash. 625, 120 Pac. 76 (a vicious instance of the party being entitled to exact an observance of the minutest rules of the game, regardless of his guilt); 1919, State v. Herwitz, 109 Wash. 153, 186 Pac. 290 (excessive technicality in reversing because of the trial judges reference to a witness' credibility).

WEST VIRGINIA: 1905, Tucker v. Colonial F. Ins. Co., 58 W. Va. 30, 51 S. E. 86 ("If it appear to the Court on the whole matter that the verdict ought to be affirmed", no new trial will be granted); 1920, State v. Miller, 85 W. Va. 326, 102 S. E. 303; (sound rule).

WISCONSIN: 1874, Cole, J., in Schaser v. State, 36 Wis. 434 ("It may be shown by the most irrefragable proof that the defendant is guilty of the offence charged against him; but this does not justify the violation of well-settled rules of evidence in order to secure his conviction"); 1917, Hommel v. Badger State Inv. Co., 166 Wis. 235, 165 N. W. 20 (applying State § 3072 m); 1919, Beel v. Milwaukee E. R. & L. Co., 169 Wis. 408, 172 N. W. 791 (applying St. 1917, § 3072 m, in a liberal opinion by Vinje, J.); 1920, State v. Barber, — Wis. —, 179 N. W. 798 ("the defendant is entitled to have not only a fair, but a legal trial, and to have the question of his guilt or innocence determined upon evidence legally admissible to establish it"; that is the fallacy, viz., that the defendant is "entitled" to it; a party is not entitled to any rule of procedure); 1921, Behnke v. Kroening, 174 Wis. 224, 182 N. W. 837 ("the competent evidence fully sustains the Court's findings on this subject, and hence an erroneous admission of these conversations was in no way prejudicial error").

has been largely due to the occasional anachronous survival of rules which had arisen in a former epoch and had ceased to correspond to the new commercial and moral conditions, — such as the rule for attesting witnesses and the rule for disqualification by interest. But that they have gained, in great extent, the stigma of instruments of quibbling, chicane, and injustice, is due to other and extrinsic circumstances, and chiefly to the law of new trials. Like a false and artificial incubus — that spirit of darkness which visits and consorts with one against his will — the law of new trials has associated its reproach with the law of Evidence. But this identity must be constantly repudiated, in our thought of the rules of Evidence. We may then be satisfied to respect and preserve those rules for whatever is good in them; and we shall be the better able to perceive the extent of that good.

Just as English legislators, after yielding to the twenty years' pleading of Romilly, discovered after all that the enjoyment of the right of property in chattels could survive, without the fancied protection of the death-penalty for larceny, — so we shall some day awake to be convinced that a system of necessary rules of Evidence can exist and be obeyed, without affixing indiscriminately to every contravention of them the monstrous penalty of a new trial.

PART I

RELEVANCY

INTRODUCTORY: GENERAL THEORY OF RELEVANCY

CHAPTER III.

1. Kinds of Evidentiary Facts

§ 24. Classification of Evidentiary Facts; Real Evidence, or Autoptic Proference, discriminated. There are two possible modes of proceeding for the purpose of producing persuasion on the part of the tribunal as to the Proposition at issue. The first is by the presentation of the thing itself as to which persuasion is desired. The second is the presentation of some independent fact by inference from which the persuasion is to be produced. Instances of the first are the production of a blood-stained knife; the exhibition of an injured limb; the viewing of premises by the jury; the production of a document. The second falls further into two classes, according as the basis of inference is (a) the assertion of a human being as to the existence of the thing in issue, or (b) any other fact; the one is termed Testimonial or Direct Evidence, the other Circumstantial or Indirect Evidence.

Autoptic Proference. The first mode above mentioned has been termed Immediate or Direct Real Evidence.[1] "Thus," says Mr. Best,[2] "where an offence or contempt is committed in presence of a tribunal, it has direct real evidence of the fact. So formerly, on an appeal of mayhem, the court would in some cases inspect the wound, in order to see whether it were a mayhem or not. . . . Immediate Real Evidence is where the thing which is the source of the evidence is present to the senses of the tribunal." A preferable term is Autoptic Proference;[3] this avoids the fallacy of attributing an evidential quality to that which is in fact nothing more nor less than the thing itself. With reference to this mode of producing persuasion no question of relevancy arises. 'Res ipsa loquitur.' The thing proves or disproves itself. No logical process is employed; only an act of sensible apprehension occurs, — apprehension of the existence or non-existence of the thing as alleged. Bringing a knife into Court is in strictness not giving evidence of the knife's existence. It is a mode of enabling the Court to reach a conviction of the existence of the knife, and is in that sense a means of producing persuasion, yet it is not giving evidence in the sense that it is asking the Court to perform a process of inference,[4] and it therefore gives rise to no questions of relevancy.[5] There is direct apprehension and conviction as to the truth or falsity of the desired proposition.

Though the classes of things that can become the subject of Autoptic Proference are few, yet within those classes its use is common. Jury views of land, the production of movables associated with a crime, the exhibition of personal injuries, and, most of all, the perusal of documents, are the usual instances of its employment. Though a document is generally evidential only as being the assertion of its writer, yet when it becomes desirable and allowable to prove the terms of the assertion (i.e. when its existence becomes in itself a proposition), it is obvious that we must either have some one tell about its contents, which would be using testimonial evidence, or must infer its existence circumstantially from some other fact, or produce the document itself for inspection, which would be Autoptic Proference.

Furthermore, though no question of Relevancy can arise with reference to Autoptic Proference, yet there may be and are special rules for safeguarding its employment and preventing its dangers. These auxiliary rules are examined under that subject (post, §§ 1157–1168). Moreover, though Relevancy is not involved in Autoptic Proference, yet there are in other connections certain questions of relevancy which commonly arise when it is em-

§ 24. [1] Mr. Bentham, in his Treatise on Judicial Evidence (tr. Dumont, London, 1825), p. 12, used "real evidence" to mean the inferences from a 'res'; this of course is a different usage.

[2] Chamberlayne's Best on Evidence, 1893, §§ 196, 197.

[3] The propriety of these various terms is further examined in dealing with that mode of proof, post, § 1150.

[4] It might be said that the Court is to use the fact of its sense-perception as a basis of inference to a judgment; but this is a distinction of psychology which cannot be accepted in the law of Evidence, because practically the Court recognizes none such and takes the results of its senses as immediate and full knowledge.

[5] Of course, the knife might become the source of an inference, e.g. as to the nature of a wound; but in that aspect it is merely circumstantial evidence.

ployed. Some of these are, (a) Whether it is permissible to infer from voice, features, and other outward appearances, to inward qualities; this is a question of the relevancy of the former to the latter; the outward appearances are the only things autoptically presented; (b) Whether a jury may infer the race of a person from his skin-color or his hair, or may infer paternity from resemblance, and the like; these again are questions of relevancy, for the real question is whether we have a right to assume the physiological generalization that a peculiarity of features is an indication of race or of relationship; (c) Whether models, photographs, etc., may be exhibited; this involves usually the inquiry whether they are substantially correct reproductions of the original, and concerns the principle of testimonial trustworthiness. Still further, certain of the Auxiliary Rules and of the rules of Extrinsic Policy may be involved; for example, (d) Whether an accused person or a plaintiff in a suit for bodily injuries may be compelled to exhibit his person or submit to tests; (e) Whether the exhibition of certain things should be forbidden when it involves indecencies or the likelihood of unduly exciting prejudice; (f) Whether at a jury's view the hearsay rule has been violated by the reception of unsworn testimony. These are some of the instances in which Autoptic Proference is employed, and yet the rule involved is but an instance of some general principle belonging in another place.[6] § 25. Distinction between Circumstantial and Testimonial Evidence. Aside from Autoptic Proference, then, all evidence must involve an inference from some Fact to the Proposition to be proved.

The kinds of inferences, with regard to the material taken as their subject, fall naturally into two great classes; or, rather, a single special class of evidentiary facts separates itself from the mass and calls for a distinct treatment, attended as it is with uniform and peculiar qualities, affecting its probative features and long recognized in experience and acknowledged by jurists. This special class of facts is the assertions of human beings regarded as the basis of inference to the propositions asserted by them. This may be called Testimonial Evidence;[1] Direct Evidence is an alternative term sanctioned by usage, though not so satisfactory in theory. All remaining facts form a class known as Circumstantial Evidence.

The distinction has been thus stated:

1824, Mr. Thomas Starkie, Evidence, I, 13: "Where knowledge cannot be acquired by means of actual and personal observation, there are but two modes by which the exis-

[6] These various principles are considered in detail, post, §§ 1151–1168.

§ 25. [1] The word "evidence" was until the middle of the 1700s used distinctively of testimonial evidence, — circumstantial evidence being either not reckoned with or else conceived of under the term "presumptions"; hence, in the trials of that period "an evidence" is used to mean "a witness": 1628, Coke upon Littleton, 282 b; ("Evidence, 'evidentia': This word in legall understanding doth not only containe matter of record, . . . and writings under seale and other writings without seale, . . . which are called evidences, 'instrumenta'; but in a larger sense it containeth also 'testimonia', the testimony of witnesses, and other proofes to be produced and given to a jury for the finding of any issue betweene the parties. And it is called evidence, because thereby the point in issue is to be made evident to the jury"); 1746, Lord Lovat's Trial, 18 How. St. Tr. 798; 1754, Canning's Trial, 19 How. St. Tr. 478, 488, 514, 580.

ence of a bygone fact can be ascertained: 1st, By information derived either immediately or mediately from those who had actual knowledge of the fact; or, 2dly, by means of inferences or conclusions drawn from other facts connected with the principal fact which can be sufficiently established. In the first case, the inference is founded on a principle of faith in human veracity sanctioned by experience. In the second, the conclusion is one derived by the aids of experience and reason from the connection between the facts which are known and that which is unknown. In each case the inference is made by virtue of previous experience of the connection between the known and the disputed facts, although the grounds of such inference in the two cases materially differ."

1872, Sir J. F. STEPHEN, Indian Evidence Act, 38: "It will be found upon examination that inferences employed in judicial inquiries fall under two heads: —

(1) Inferences from an assertion, whether oral or documentary, to the truth of the matter asserted;

(2) Inferences from facts, which upon the strength of assertions are believed to exist,[2] to facts of which the existence has not been so asserted.

. . . This is the distinction usually expressed by saying that all evidence is either direct or circumstantial. . . . The truth is that each inference depends upon precisely the same general theory. . . . The judge hears with his own ears the statements of the witnesses and sees with his own eyes the documents produced in court. His task is to infer from what he thus sees and hears the existence of facts which he neither sees nor hears."

1873, GILPIN, C. J., in State v. Carter, 1 Houst. Cr. C. 402, 410: "As a matter of course, and from necessity, all judicial evidence must be either direct or circumstantial. When we speak of a fact as established by direct or positive evidence, we mean that it has been testified to by witnesses as having come under the cognizance of their senses, and of the truth of which there seems to be no reasonable doubt or question; and when we speak of a fact as established by circumstantial evidence, we mean that the existence of it is fairly and reasonably to be inferred from other facts proved in the case."

The special tests of this distinction and the peculiar results which follow from the segregation of assertive or Testimonial Evidence will be examined under that topic (post, § 475).

It is here necessary merely to call attention to the general nature and limits of the class first to be considered — Circumstantial Evidence. The term "circumstantial" is unfortunately but inevitably fixed upon us.[3] It must suffice here to take note that this class embraces all offered evidentiary facts not being assertions from which the truth of the matter asserted is desired to be inferred. The doubtful instances lying on the line between the two classes may be examined in connection with the assertive or testimonial class (post, § 475).

[2] This, as will be seen, is too narrow; for the tribunal may learn the fact of its own knowledge, as by a jury's view or by judicial notice.

[3] An earlier term for this class was "presumptive evidence." The distinction between "presumption" in the sense of a mere circumstantial inference and in the sense of a rule of procedure affecting the duty of proof is dealt with elsewhere under Presumptions (post, § 2490). It may be noted here that the term is often met with in the sense of "inference", as applied to the probative value of ordinary circumstantial evidence, and as distinguishing it from testimonial evidence: 1810, Boyle, C. J., in Davis v. Curry, 2 Bibb Ky. 239 ("Evidence, whether written or oral, is either positive or presumptive. Positive evidence is the direct proof of the fact or point in issue; presumptive evidence consists in the proof of some other fact or facts from which the point in issue may be inferred"); 1873, Gilpin, C. J., in State v. Carter, 1 Houst. Cr. C. Del. 402, 411 ("When the existence of the principal facts is deduced inferentially by a process of sound reasoning from facts or circumstances proved and established in the case, it is termed presumptive evidence"; and he later uses the phrase "circumstantial or presumptive evidence").

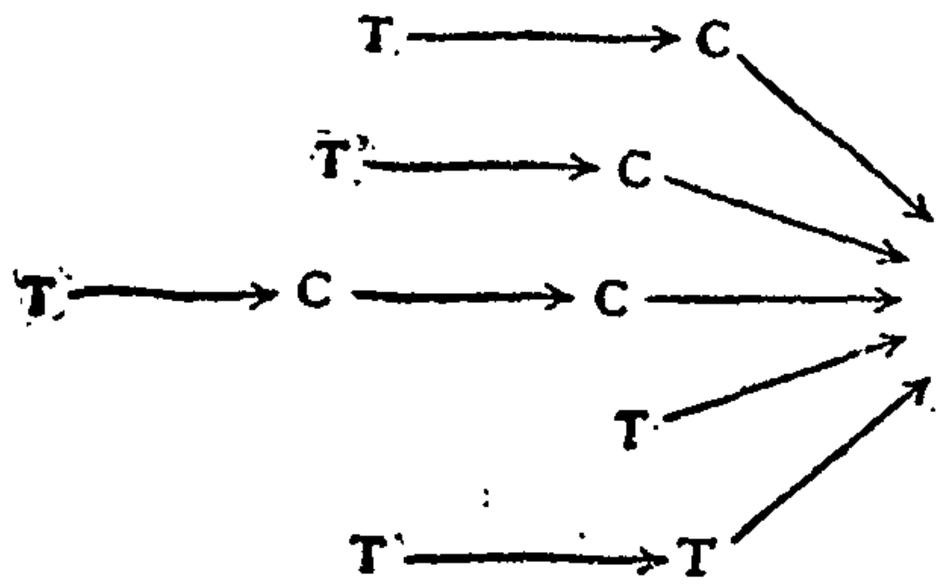
In the grouping of Circumstantial Evidence, difficulty has arisen from not keeping in mind that most circumstantial evidentiary facts must ultimately in turn become themselves a Proposition [4] and be proved by "direct" evidence, and also from confining the latter term to assertions of some main fact in issue. For example, the finding of a bloody knife upon the accused after a secret killing is a circumstance from which an important inference may be drawn; yet this fact of the finding must be proved by some person's assertion; here the special rules of assertive or testimonial evidence must be applied in receiving the assertion, and the ordinary rules of circumstantial relevancy in receiving the fact of finding, assuming it as proved by the assertion. But this mixture of both kinds is not necessary and inevitable. At one extreme, as in a jury's view of a corpse or in a matter of judicial notice, we may have a circumstance given us as the basis of inference without the intervention of an assertion. At the other extreme we may have assertions, as of the signing of a deed or of the perceived felonious abstraction of a bank-note, directly positing the main proposition of the pleadings, and needing no intervening inference, except from the fact of the assertion. But between these extremes lies the mass of ordinary evidence, for which at least two distinct steps of inference are required, — the inference from the fact of an assertion to the matter asserted, and then the inference from the matter asserted to another matter. Moreover, just as we may need even two or three inferences of the latter sort before reaching a main proposition of the pleadings, so (as in using hearsay) we may often need to use two inferences from assertions, — first from one assertion on the stand to the fact of the making of the extra-judicial assertion, and then from the latter to the truth of the matter asserted by it.

Using P to represent the Proposition to be proved, T to represent a testimonial assertion, and C to represent a circumstance, the following chart will illustrate the analysis of a typical mass of evidence for any Proposition whatever:



Now, so far as the principles of relevancy are concerned, it is apparent that it does not matter how we have come to our knowledge of these so-called "circumstances," i.e. things not assertions, — whether we get at them through believing assertions, or otherwise; what matters is the nature of the particular evidentiary fact in hand, whether it is assertive or circumstantial. In dealing with the probative value of the circumstantial class, we are to take the alleged circumstantial (or non-assertive) fact as assumedly proved, and then determine its relevancy. It is immaterial whether it has itself to be proved by testimony (as ordinarily) or by another circumstance (as often) or by the tribunal's use of its own senses or existing knowledge (as occasionally).

[4] For the distinction between a Proposition and an Evidentiary Fact, see ante, § 2.

§ 26. Relative Value of the two Classes. The rules of Admissibility have nothing to say concerning the weight of evidence when once admitted. The relative weight of circumstantial and testimonial evidence, therefore, does not present itself in this place.[1] Indeed, it can be said that there are no rules, in our system of Evidence, prescribing for the jury the precise effect of any general or special class of evidence. So far as logic and psychology assist us, their conclusions show that it is out of the question to make a general assertion ascribing greater weight to one class or to the other. The probative effect of one or more pieces of either sort of evidence depends upon considerations too complex. Science can only point out that each class has its special dangers and its special advantages.

But the question has long been discussed, within and without the profession, whether circumstantial or testimonial evidence is relatively the more persuasive;[2] and, rather to eradicate possible 'a priori' misconceptions than to declare any positive rule of law, the judicial utterances have often dealt with this question:

1838, Mr. William Wills, Circumstantial Evidence, 26: "The best writers, ancient and modern, on the subject of evidence, have concurred in treating circumstantial as inferior in cogency and effect to direct evidence; a conclusion which seems to follow necessarily from the very nature of the different kind of evidence. But language of a directly con-

§ 26. [1] For a systematic and detailed survey of the considerations affecting weight of testimony, see the following: Jeremy Bentham, Rationale of Judicial Evidence, b. IX, pt. VI, c. X (Bowring's ed. vol. VII, p. 563); Charles C. Moore, A Treatise on Facts, or the Weight and Value of Evidence (1908).

The whole subject is dealt with in a compilation by the present author, entitled The Principles of Judicial Proof, as given by Logic, Psychology, and General Experience, and illustrated in Judicial Trials (1913).

[2] The following anecdote illustrates the conventional prejudice: 1916, L. Esarey and E. V. Shockley, eds., Courts and Lawyers of Indiana (Vol. I, p. 119). "[In the trial courts of early Indiana] the following case of circumstantial evidence is culled from the same 'Sketches' as the others. It happened in Judge Eggleston's court, presided over, however, by the associates. The case was for five dollars damages for killing a dog. The plaintiff testified that he saw the defendant pick up his rifle, run across a lot, rest it on a fence, saw a flash, heard the report, saw the dog fall, went up to him, and saw the bullet hole just behind his front leg. The evidence seemed conclusive. All appeared lost, but the defendant's attorney was not disconcerted. He knew the associates had just been reading a new law book, Philipp's Evidence, which cautioned judges against the pitfalls of circumstantial evidence. He therefore recalled the witness, had him repeat his evidence and ended by asking him if he saw the bullet hit the dog. When the witness refused to testify to the fact, the lawyer casually observed to the court, 'A case of mere circumstantial evidence', and rested his cause. After due deliberation, the court announced, 'This is a plain case of circumstantial evidence, judgment for the defendant.'" trary import has been so often used of late, by authorities of no mean note, as to have become almost proverbial.

"It has been said that 'circumstances are inflexible proofs; that witnesses may be mistaken or corrupted, but things can be neither.' 'Circumstances,' says Paley, 'cannot lie.' It is astonishing that sophisms like these should have passed current without animadversion. The 'circumstances' are assumed to be in every case established, beyond the possibility of mistake; and it is implied, that a circumstance established to be true, possesses some mysterious force peculiar to facts of a certain class. Now, a circumstance is neither more or less than a minor fact, and it may be admitted of all facts, that they cannot lie; for a fact cannot at the same time exist and not exist: so that in truth the doctrine is merely the expression of a truism, that a fact is a fact. It may also be admitted that 'circumstances are inflexible proofs', but assuredly of nothing more than of their own existence: so that this assertion is only a repetition of the same truism in different terms. It seems also to have been overlooked that circumstances and facts of every kind must be proved by human testimony; that although 'circumstances cannot lie', the narrators of them may; and that, like witnesses of all other facts, they may be biased or mistaken. So far then, circumstantial possesses no advantage over direct evidence.

"A distinguished statesman and orator has advanced in unqualified terms the proposition, supported, he alleges, by the learned, that 'when circumstantial proof is in its greatest perfection, that is, when it is most abundant in circumstances, it is much superior to positive proof.' Paley has said, with more caution, that 'a concurrence of well authenticated circumstances composes a stronger ground of assurance than positive testimony, unconfirmed by circumstances, usually affords.' Mr. Baron Legge, upon the trial of Mary Blandy for the murder of her father by poison, told the jury that where 'a violent presumption necessarily arises from circumstances, they are more convincing and satisfactory than any other kind of evidence, because facts cannot lie.' Mr. Justice Buller, in his charge to the jury in Captain Donellan's case, declared, 'that a presumption which necessarily arises from circumstances is very often more convincing and more satisfactory than any other kind of evidence, because it is not within the reach and compass of human abilities to invent a train of circumstances which shall be so connected together as to amount to a proof of guilt, without affording opportunities of contradicting a great part if not all of those circumstances.'

"It is obvious that the doctrine laid down in these several passages is propounded in language which not only does not accurately state the question, but implies a fallacy, and that extreme cases — the strongest ones of circumstantial, and the weakest of positive evidence — have been selected for the illustration and support of a general position. 'A presumption which necessarily arises from circumstances', cannot admit of dispute, and requires no corroboration; but then it cannot in fairness be contrasted with and opposed to positive testimony, unless of a nature equally cogent and infallible. If evidence be so strong as necessarily to produce certainty and conviction, it matters not by what kind of evidence the effect is produced; and the intensity of the proof must be precisely the same, whether the evidence be direct or circumstantial. It is not intended to deny that circumstantial evidence affords a safe and satisfactory ground of assurance and belief; nor that in many individual instances it may be superior in proving power to other individual cases of proof by direct evidence. But a judgment based upon circumstantial evidence cannot in any case be more satisfactory than when the same result is produced by direct evidence, free from suspicion of bias or mistake.

"Perhaps no single circumstance has been so often considered as certain and unequivocal in its effect, as the anno-domini water-mark usually contained in the fabric of writing-paper, and in many instances it has led to the exposure of fraud in the propounding of forged as genuine instruments. But it is beyond any doubt (and several instances of the kind have recently occurred) that issues of paper have taken place bearing the water-mark of the year succeeding that of its distribution, — a striking exemplification of the fallacy of some of the arguments which have been remarked upon. How often has it been iterated in such cases, that circumstances are inflexible facts, and facts cannot lie!

"The proper effect of circumstantial, as compared with direct evidence, was thus more accurately stated by Lord Chief Baron Macdonald. 'When circumstances connect themselves closely with each other, when they form a large and strong body, so as to carry conviction to the minds of a jury, it may be proof of a more satisfactory sort than that which is direct. In some lamentable instances it has been known that a short story has been got by heart, by two or three witnesses; they have been consistent with themselves, they have been consistent with each other, swearing positively to a fact, which fact has turned out afterwards not to be true. It is almost impossible for a variety of witnesses, speaking to a variety of circumstances, so to concert a story, as to impose upon a jury by a fabrication of that sort, so that where it is cogent, strong, and powerful, where the witnesses do not contradict each other, or do not contradict themselves, it may be evidence more satisfactory than even direct evidence; and there are more instances than one where that has been the case.' In another case the same learned judge said, 'where the proof arises from a number of circumstances, which we cannot conceive to be fraudulently brought together to bear upon one point, that is less fallible than under some circumstances direct evidence may be.'"

1846, GIBSON, C. J., in Com. v. Harman, 4 Pa. St. 269, 271: "No witness has been produced who saw the act committed; and hence it is urged for the prisoner, that the evidence is only circumstantial, and consequently entitled to a very inferior degree of credit, if to any credit at all. But that consequence does not necessarily follow. Circumstantial evidence is, in the abstract, nearly, though perhaps not altogether, as strong as positive evidence; in the concrete, it may be infinitely stronger. A fact positively sworn to by a single eye-witness of blemished character, is not so satisfactorily proved, as is a fact which is the necessary consequence of a chain of other facts sworn to by many witnesses of undoubted credibility. . . . The only difference between positive and circumstantial evidence is, that the former is more immediate, and has fewer links in the chain of connection between the premises and conclusion; but there may be perjury in both. A man may as well swear falsely to an absolute knowledge of a fact, as to a number of facts from which, if true, the fact on which the question of innocence or guilt depends must inevitably follow. No human testimony is superior to doubt. The machinery of criminal justice, like every other production of man, is necessarily imperfect, but you are not therefore to stop its wheels. Because men have been scalded to death or torn to pieces by the bursting of boilers, or mangled by wheels on a railroad, you are not to lay aside the steam-engine. Innocent men have doubtless been convicted and executed on circumstantial evidence; but innocent men have sometimes been convicted and executed on what is called positive proof. What then? Such convictions are accidents which must be encountered; and the innocent victims of them have perished for the common good, as much as soldiers who have perished in battle. All evidence is more or less circumstantial, the difference being only in the degree; and it is sufficient for the purpose when it excludes disbelief; that is, actual, and not technical disbelief; for he who is to pass on the question is not at liberty to disbelieve as a juror while he believes as a man. It is enough that his conscience is clear. Certain cases of circumstantial proofs to be found in the books, in which innocent persons were convicted, have been pressed on your attention. These, however, are few in number, and they occurred in a period of some hundreds of years, in a country whose criminal code made a great variety of offences capital. The wonder is, that there have not been more. They are constantly resorted to in capital trials to frighten juries into a belief that there should be no conviction on merely circumstantial evidence. But the law exacts a conviction wherever there is legal evidence to show the prisoner's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt; and circumstantial evidence is legal evidence."

1850, SHAW, C. J., in Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 295, 311: "Each of these modes of proof has its advantages and disadvantages; it is not easy to compare their relative value. The advantage of positive evidence is, that it is the direct testimony of a witness to the fact to be proved, who, if he speaks the truth, saw it done; and the only question is, whether he is entitled to belief. The disadvantage is, that the witness may be false and corrupt, and that the case may not afford the means of detecting his falsehood. But, in a case of circumstantial evidence where no witness can testify directly to the fact to be proved, it is arrived at by a series of other facts, which by experience have been found so associated with the fact in question, that in the relation of cause and effect, they lead to a satisfactory and certain conclusion; as when footprints are discovered after a recent snow, it is certain that some animated being has passed over the snow since it fell; and, from the form amd number of footprints, it can be determined with equal certainty, whether they are those of a man, a bird, or a quadruped. Circumstantial evidence, therefore, is founded on experience and observed facts and coincidences, establishing a connection between the known and proved facts and the fact sought to be proved. The advantages are, that, as the evidence commonly comes from several witnesses and different sources, a chain of circumstances is less likely to be falsely prepared and arranged, and falsehood and perjury are more likely to be detected and fail of their purpose. The disadvantages are, that a jury has not only to weigh the evidence of facts, but to draw just conclusions from them; in doing which, they may be led by prejudice or partiality, or by want of due deliberation and sobriety of judgment, to make hasty and false deductions; a source of error not existing in the consideration of positive evidence."

1851, CARRUTHERS, S. J., in Coles v. Perry, 7 Tex. 109, 145, 168: "I do not yield unqualified assent to the proposition, as a rule of law, that circumstantial evidence is never to be weighed against positive testimony. There may be cases, and there are cases every day occurring, where the testimony of a witness testifying positively to an asserted fact as transpiring within his view (and honestly testifying, too) is disproved and falsified by proof of facts and circumstances known to exist, and the existence of which is wholly incompatible with the fact deposed to. In such cases, circumstantial evidence outweighs positive testimony; and I think the present one of those cases. The saying often quoted, but with the most perverse application, both in ordinary conversation and in argument at the bar, that 'circumstances never lie, but a witness may', is, when stated with legal precision, a truth."[3]

[3] See also the earlier but very instructive exposition, in 1785, by Dr. William Paley, Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy, b. VI, c. IX, par. beginning, "There are two popular maxims"; the striking passage in the argument of Attorney-General Knowlton, in Com. v. Borden, Mass., 1893, quoted in 27 Amer. Law Rev. 837; and the following opinions: 1910, State v. Marren, 17 Ia. 766, 107 Pac. 993 (propriety of giving a charge on this subject); 1905, State v. Foster, 14 N. D. 561, 105 N. W. 938 (whether an instruction must be given); 1909, Spick v. State, 140 Wis. 104, 121 N. W. 664 (excellent opinion by Marshall, J.).

The exposition of this subject which has now become the classical one is that of Furman, P. J., in Ex parte Jeffries, 1912, 7 Okl. Cr. 544, 124 Pac. 924. All laymen would profit by reading it.

The following anecdote illustrates the pervasive danger lurking in testimonial evidence, — a danger which, if laymen fully reflected upon it, would amply countervail the defects popularly ascribed to circumstantial evidence: Minneapolis "Journal", quoted in 217 Fed. (Dec. 24, 1914, flyleaf): She had witnesses. Every now and then Judge Mulqueen makes a pertinent comment on the advisability of those having eyes using them to see with, says the New York correspondent of the Cincinnati "Times-Star." He especially directs his attention toward the magistrates on the city bench, most of whom are so bound by the thongs of custom that, with all the will in the world to deal justly, they often make serious mistakes. "I had a colored woman before me to-day as a complaining witness," said Judge Mulqueen. "She had a man held for trial by a city magistrate on the charge that he had attacked her with a pair of scissors. 'He mout' near gouge mah eye out, Jedge,' she said to me. 'Jes' come at me lak a lion, he did, a-roarin', suh. He poke me in de face wiv dem scissors, Jedge, not once, but four or five times. He jes' cut up mah face lak if it was a yahd of ribbon, Jedge. The magistrate what held him

1893, Mr. Attorney-General H. M. KNOWLTON, arguing for the prosecution, in Commonwealth v. Borden, Mass., 27 American Law Review 837: "What is sometimes called circumstantial evidence is nothing in the world but a presumption of circumstances. It may be one or fifty. There is no chain about it. The word 'chain' is a misnomer, as applied to it. Talk about a chain of circumstances! When that solitary man had lived on this island for twenty years, and believed that he was the only human being there, and that the cannibals and savages that lived around him had not found him and had not come to his island, he walked out one day on the beach, and there he saw the fresh print of a naked foot on the sand. He had no lawyer, to tell him that was nothing but a circumstance! He had no distinguished counsel, to urge upon his fears that there was no chain about that thing which led him to a conclusion! His heart beat fast; his knees shook beneath him; he fell to the ground in fright, — because Robinson Crusoe knew, when he saw that circumstance, that a man had been there that was not himself! It was circumstantial evidence! It was nothing but circumstantial evidence! But it satisfied HIM!"

2. General Considerations affecting Relevancy

§ 27. Practical Necessities of Legal Controversy in general. When a fact is offered as evidence, the very offering of it is an implication that it has some bearing on the proposition at issue, — that it tends naturally to produce a conviction about that proposition. The situation is thus in its elements the same as when the persons engaged are not occupied in a legal controversy. One might suppose that the question would be essentially one of the ordinary laws of reasoning, whether it were to be decided, as here, by a judge or a jury, or by the audience of a lecturer, or by a policeman notified of an alleged misdemeanor in his district, or by a class in rhetoric. But the application of the laws of reasoning is here attended with peculiar consideration not existing for any investigation but a judicial one.

(1) The first consideration is that, so far as the tribunal can attempt expressly to deal at all with logical questions, it can do so only roughly and loosely and in a general way. To begin with, in courts as elsewhere, while the laws of reasoning must underlie inevitably all the operations of reasoning, they are, as a rule, followed instinctively and not with conscious skill. Little attempt is made deliberately to recognize or to apply them. The process of demonstration and decision in legal tribunals is an employment of the principles of reasoning upon a grander scale than is found in any other activity of life; yet the methods of logic are seldom alluded to in terms by judges or by advocates. Again, wherever a rule or a principle may be adopted in the effort to employ the recognized tests of reasoning, no attempt can be made to furnish ideal tests. Details, refinements, contingencies, exact distinctions, which the ideal principle would demand, may be and must often to dis heah court says he navah did hear tell of no more dang'rous man.'

"Then I looked her over. She had a wide, smooth, yellow face that didn't have a mark on it. I told her to repeat her story, and she went all over it again, telling how the man had slashed her face with that pair of scissors.

"'But, madam,' I said, 'there isn't a mark on your face.'

"'Marks!' said she, indignantly, 'marks! What I care for marks; lem me ask you dat? I got witnesses, I tell you.'"

be neglected in order that the test may be serviceable. Perhaps it may be necessary to take a mean of convenience, and to lay down a specific and unshifting rule which will sometimes operate arbitrarily or unequally. Where general principles are declared, they may satisfy themselves with reaching fairness in the main. Finally, the logical powers employed must be those of everyday life, not those of the trained logician or scientist. The conclusions and tests of everyday experience must constantly control the standards of legal logic. Moreover, the possibilities of fraud must exclude much that is probative but capable of abuse. These considerations rest on the circumstances of the situation, patent to all. In the main, they are created by the need of speed in the settlement of litigation, and the impossibility of expecting aught else in a proceeding where parties, witnesses, advocates, jury, and judge represent so many grades of training and accomplishment. The principles of legal proof are in fact affected by these just as we should have expected them to be. This feature of the legal rules of relevancy has been emphasized, from different points of view, by two of the most original thinkers in the law of evidence:

1872, Sir J. F. STEPHEN, Indian Evidence Act, 33: "The leading differences between judicial investigations and inquiries into physical nature are as follows: 1. In physical inquiries the number of relevant facts is generally unlimited, and is capable of indefinite increase by experiments. In judicial investigations the number of relevant facts is limited by circumstances, and is incapable of being increased. 2. Physical inquiries can be prolonged for any time that may be required in order to obtain full proof of the conclusion reached, and when a conclusion has been reached, it is always liable to review if fresh facts are discovered, or if any objection is made to the process by which it was arrived at. In judicial investigations it is necessary to arrive at a definite result in a limited time; and when that result is arrived at, it is final and irreversible with exceptions too rare to require notice. 3. In physical inquiries the relevant facts are usually established by testimony open to no doubt, because they relate to simple facts which do not affect the passions, which are observed by trained observers who are exposed to detection if they make mistakes, and who could not tell the effect of misrepresentation, if they were disposed to be fraudulent. In judicial inquiries the relevant facts are generally complex. They affect the passions in the highest degree. They are testified to by untrained observers who are generally not open to contradiction, and are aware of the bearing of the facts which they allege upon the conclusion to be established. 4. On the other hand, approximate generalizations are more useful in judicial than they are in scientific inquiries, because in the case of judicial inquiries every man's individual experience supplies the qualifications and exceptions necessary to adjust general rules to particular facts, which is not the case in regard to scientific inquiries. 5. Judicial inquiries being limited in extent, the process of reaching as good a conclusion as is to be got out of the materials is far easier than the process of establishing a scientific conclusion with complete certainty, though the conclusion arrived at is less satisfactory."

1898, Professor J. B. Thayer, Preliminary Treatise on Evidence, 271–275: "It is a proper qualification when we use the phrase legal reasoning; not because, as compared with reasoning in general, it calls into play any different faculties or involves any new principles or methods, or is the creature of technical precepts; but because in law, as elsewhere, in adjusting old and universal methods to the immediate purposes in hand special limitations, exclusions, and qualifications have to be taken into account. . . . This does not, like mathematical reasoning, have to do merely with ideal truth, with mere mental conceptions; it is not aiming at demonstration and ideally exact results; it deals with probabilities and not with certainties; it works in an atmosphere, and not in a vacuum; it has to allow for friction, for accident and mischance. Nor is it, like natural science, occupied merely with objective truth. It is concerned with human conduct, and all its elements of fraud, inadvertence, wilfulness, and uncertainty. Nor, as in history, is the purpose in hand merely that of ascertaining and setting forth the facts, or the habits, of human life and action. . . . The peculiar character and scope of legal reasoning is determined by its purely practical aims and the necessities of its procedure and machinery. Litigation imports, for the most part, as we have seen, a contest, and adversaries. It has in it, therefore, a personal element, and it requires not merely a consideration of what is just in general, but what is just as between these adversaries. It has often to be conducted with the aid of a tribunal whose peculiarities in point of number and of physical and mental capacity, and whose danger of being misled, must constantly be considered. It must shape itself to various other exigencies of a practical kind, such as the time that it is possible to allow to any particular case, the reasonable limitations of the number of witnesses, the opportunities for reply, and the chance to correct errors. It must adjust its processes to general ends, so as generally to promote justice, and to discourage evil, to maintain long-established rights, and the existing governmental order. The judicial office is really one of administration. . . . While these are some of the chief characteristics of legal reasoning, it will be noticed that they are only, in the nature of them, so many reasonable accommodations of the general process to particular subject-matters and particular aims. Amidst them all the great characteristics of the art of reasoning and the laws of thought still remain constant. As regards the main methods in hand, they are still those untechnical ways of all sound reasoning, of the logical process in its normal and ordinary manifestations; and the rules that govern it here are the general rules that govern it everywhere, the ordinary rules of human thought and human experience, to be sought in the ordinary sources, and not in law books."

§ 28. Judge and Jury as a Tribunal; Relevancy, as distinguished from Minimum Probative Value. (2) The second condition peculiar to litigious proof is that the question with which the law of Evidence in the strict sense has to do (that is, the rules regulating the production of evidence by opposing parties) is one of Admissibility, not of Demonstration or Proof (ante, § 12), — whether a particular fact is fit to be considered, and not whether it suffices for a demonstration. For example, the existence of a habit of doing a particular act under certain circumstances points forward to a doing of the act under those circumstances on a particular occasion. This is not a demonstration that the act was done, for the influence of the habit may have been counteracted by other considerations; there is not an invariable sequence. The jury may ultimately decide that the habit, with all the other circumstances, is not adequate to prove the doing; though the judge may at the outest have ruled that the course of conduct was at least sufficiently regular to have some value as an indication. The latter question is one of Admissibility, and under our system is a preliminary one for the judge only. The former question is one of completeness of proof; it is the final one, and is for the jury. Thus a peculiar and otherwise anomalous class of questions is raised. While the historian or the naturalist may as he pleases set aside and preserve data of the slightest helpfulness, or may pass judgment upon his facts immediately and finally, the legal tribunal is, with us, divided in function; the judge passes first upon the evidence and sets aside the tidbits for the jury; that which is not worth considering, for one reason or another affecting its value, never reaches the auxiliary functionaries, the jurors.

This process, then, of determining the Admissibility of evidence, as distinguished from demonstrative and conclusive quality, is from the point of view of Logic a decidedly unique process, worked out clearly in no other department of life. Little considered by our logicians, it is a commonplace in the judicial experience. It owes its persistence and emphasis (peculiar as it is to the Anglo-American legal system) in some part, no doubt, to the tradition of our practice which looks almost solely to the parties in a case for such evidence as may be mustered (post, § 2483), leaving the judge almost entirely passive; for the question of the uselessness, or the contrary, of the spending of time on evidence offered is thus constantly required to be raised and settled at the outset. But chiefly it owes its origin, maintenance, and system to the separation of function between judge and jury. If this separation of judge and jury had not existed as it has, with all its history, nothing marked would probably have developed. Under the Continental systems, in which the jury is but a recent borrowing, little of the sort appears.

(a) This second feature, to some extent, eventuates merely in another phase of the first feature, the rough and practical quality already mentioned, noticeable in the whole law of probative value; for the Court will of course allow to be considered only such evidence as is worth submitting to men who will judge only by the most common and practicable tests. But to a more important extent the effect is to require a generally higher degree of probative value for all evidence to be submitted to a jury than would be asked in ordinary reasoning. The judge, in his efforts to prevent the jury from being satisfied by matters of slight value, capable of being exaggerated by prejudice and hasty reasoning, has constantly seen fit to exclude matter which does not rise to a clearly sufficient degree of value. In other words, legal relevancy denotes, first of all, something more than a minimum of probative value. Each single piece of evidence must have a plus value.[1]

This feature is seen in the form of scores of detailed rules, applying and shaping the fundamental principles of probative value, i.e. the rules of admissibility with reference to simple relevancy. There has been a raising of the standard of probative value all along the line, — very unequal in its effects, because it has been done without system, and with numerous inconsistencies; yet almost always done in pursuance of this spirit of safeguarding the decision of the jury, and on the whole with good practical results:

1794, Mr. Edmund Burke, Report to the House of Commons, Debrett's Hastings' Trial, 1796, Part VII, Suppl. p. xliii, 31 Parl. Hist. 357: "In the trials below, the Judges decide on the competency of the evidence before it goes to the jury, and (under the correctives in the use of their discretion, stated before in this report) with great propriety and wisdom. Juries are taken promiscuously from the mass of the people; they are composed of men who in many instances, in most perhaps, were never concerned in any causes, judicially or otherwise, before the time of their service. They have generally no previous preparation or possible knowledge of the matter to be tried; and they decide in a space of time too short for any nice or critical disposition. These Judges, therefore, of necessity must forestall the evidence where there is a doubt on its competence, and indeed observe much on its credibility, or the most dreadful consequences might follow. The institution of juries, if not thus qualified, could not exist."

§ 28. [1] The degree of admissible probative value is more particularly considered, for circumstantial evidence, post, § 38, and for testimonial evidence, post, §§ 475–478.

1837, BOSANQUET, J., in Wright v. Tatham, 7 A. & E. 375: "[The Ecclesiastical Courts] are constituted upon principles very different from those which regulate the courts of common law. Where judges are authorized to deal both with the facts and the law, a much larger discretion with respect to the reception of evidence may not unreasonably be allowed than in courts of common law, where the evidence, if received by the judge, must necessarily be submitted entire to the jury. By the rules of evidence established in the courts of law, circumstances of great moral weight are often excluded, from which much assistance might in particular cases be afforded in coming to a just conclusion, but which are nevertheless withheld from the consideration of the jury upon general principles, lest they should produce an undue influence upon the minds of persons unaccustomed to consider the limitations and restrictions which legal views upon the subject would impose." [2]

1898, Professor J. B. Thayer, Preliminary Treatise on Evidence, 2: "The very structure of the system thus produced points to the reason, when we observe its constant, anxious, and over-anxious endeavor to prevent the tribunal to which the evidence is principally addressed from being confused and misled, and from dealing with questions which it has no right to deal with. It might seem strange and not worth while to keep alive so long a tribunal which has needed so much watching and so many safeguards, if one did not recall the immense persistence of legal institutions and usage, as well as the deep political significance of the jury and its relation to what is most valued in the national history and traditions of the English race. It is this institution of the jury which accounts for the common-law system of evidence, — an institution which English-speaking people have had and used, in one or another department of their public affairs, ever since the Conquest."

§ 29. Same: Relevancy, as distinguished from Weight or Proof. (b) On the other hand, the judges constantly find it necessary to warn us that their function, in determining Relevancy, is not that of final arbiters, but merely of preliminary testers, i.e. that the evidentiary fact offered does not need to have strong, full, superlative, probative value, does not need to involve demonstration or to produce persuasion by its sole and intrinsic force, but merely to be worth consideration by the jury. It is for the jury to give it the appropriate weight in effecting persuasion. The rule of law which the judge employs is concerned merely with admitting the fact through the evidentiary portal. The judge thus warns the opponent of the evidence that he is not entitled to complain of its lack of absolute demonstrative power; a mere capacity to help in demonstration is enough for its admission:

1806, Mr. W. D. Evans, Notes to Pothier, II, 157 (No. 16, § VI): "The general rules of law concerning the admission and sufficiency of evidence, and the particular conclusion which a jury may draw from the evidence before them in a particular case, are two things which, as I have already more than once observed, whilst they differ most essentially in their nature and principle, are very subject to be confounded, and which therefore in every discussion should be most carefully kept distinct."

[2] The opinions of other judges in the same report, and in the judgments delivered on appeal, in 5 Cl. & F. 670, point this out with similar tenor; thus, Lord Brougham, in Wright v. Tatham, 5 Cl. & F. 670, 769 ("From the peculiarity of the tribunal of the courts of common law have arisen nine parts out of ten of the peculiarities of our law of evidence").

1837, TINDAL, C. J., in Wright v. Tatham, 7 A. & E. 407: "The judge who presides at the trial, by admitting this evidence, is not determining, nor has he any right to determine, the question of the [testamentary] competency of the testator. That is a question which the jury are to decide, after the termination of a long course of conflicting evidence. All that the judge has to determine is whether a particular piece of evidence is at a particular period of the cause admissible for the consideration of the jury as the matter then stands."

1846, Lord BROUGHAM, in Irish Society v. Derry, 12 Cl. & F. 641, 673: "The main error which ran through the argument of the very learned and ingenious counsel . . . was that they seemed to confound the purpose for which evidence was tendered and admitted, with the admissibility of that evidence. The evidence tendered to prove any point may be perfectly inadequate to prove that point. It may be such that if the learned judge put it to the jury, as sufficient proof, his directions to them upon that point might well be a subject of exception. Yet the same evidence might be perfectly well admitted and received for such purposes to which it was strictly and correctly applicable. . . . Suppose that in a cause at Nisi Prius, the defendant produces a letter under my hand; that letter is received in evidence, though it may be very true it does not prove the fact for which purpose the defendant put it in. If the judge refuses to receive it, his direction is liable to be excepted against for that refusal. If he receives and states erroneously to the jury that it proves the point which it does not, his direction is liable to be excepted against upon another ground. But still it may be properly receivable in evidence, though it does not prove the matter, to prove which it was offered in evidence."

1829, MARSHALL, C. J., in Columbian Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 2 Pet. 44: "This blending of an objection to the admissibility of evidence in the same application which questions its sufficiency is said to be not unusual, but to confound propositions distinct in themselves. . . . It is undoubtedly true that questions respecting the admissibility of evidence are entirely distinct from those which respect its sufficiency or effect. They arise in different stages of the trial, and cannot with strict propriety be propounded at the same time." [1]

Thus, the judicial tests of Relevancy have this peculiar quality, in contrast with that of proof or evidence in general or in any other department of investigation:

(a) The required probative value is somewhat higher than it need otherwise have been, because the purpose is to select only such material as is worth laying before the jury;

(b) The required probative value, on the other hand, is far lower than full proof, because the judge merely puts upon the material its ticket of admission as relevant, and leaves the weight, or final persuasive effect, for the jury to determine.

§ 29. [1] So also: 1840, Verplanck, Sen., in Mayor v. Pentz, 24 Wend. 676 ("That distinction between admissibility and credibility which our jurisprudence has always maintained"); 1897, Brickell, C. J., in Nelms v. Steiner, 113 Ala. 562, 22 So. 435; 1905, McSherry, C. J., in Bowman v. Little, 101 Md. 273, 61 Atl. 223, 1084 (supplementary opinion). As early as 1745 Chief Justice Willes had declared that "the distinction between the competency and credit of a witness is a known distinction" (Omichund v. Barker, 1 Atk. 21); but the first emphasis on it for evidence in general seems to have been given in Mr. Burke's Report, quoted supra, § 28.

For the distinction between the admissibility of a particular piece of evidence, and the judicial control over the sufficiency of the evidence as a whole to go to the jury, see post §§ 2488, 2494.

§ 29 a. Irrelevancy and Practical Policy, distinguished. A fact may be logically relevant, and thus far admissible, and yet be excluded by reason of one of the auxiliary principles of policy dealt with in Part II (post, § 1171 ff.), particularly those of Confusion of Issues, Unfair Surprise, or Undue Prejudice (post, § 1906).

For example, the moral disposition of an accused may be probatively of considerable value as indicating the probability of his doing or not doing a particular act of crime, yet it may be excluded because of the undue prejudice liable to be caused by taking it into consideration; for its probative value may be exaggerated, and condemnation be visited upon him, not for the act, but virtually for his character (post, § 55). Again, a witness' character as to veracity is probatively capable of being evidenced by specific mendacious acts of his; but if these were allowed to be evidenced without restriction, false testimony might be brought forward, specifying time, place, and conduct, and for lack of prior notice of these supposed details, it would be impossible for him to demonstrate their falsity; thus the principle of unfair surprise would apply (post, §§ 979, 1849). Again, in proving the dangerous qualities of a place or a machine, repeated instances of its injurious operation would be of high probative value; yet the unrestricted admission of such instances might result in so multiplying the subordinate issues in a cause that confusion of mind would ensue and the main controversy would be lost sight of in the great mass of minor issues (post, §§ 443, 1863, 1906). Thus at every point the logical dictates of Relevancy are subject to be balked and counteracted by these Auxiliary general Principles of Policy.

The detailed consideration of their operation can be fully considered under the specific rules; but the following passages will suffice here to illustrate the judicial methods in allowing the one kind of principle to counteract the other:

1824, BAYLEY, J., in May v. Brown, 3 B. & C. 113, 127 (libel; the trial judge had admitted, in mitigation of damages, the general fact the plaintiff had published libels of the defendant, but not the particular libels; affirming this on appeal, the judges put the exclusion on the following grounds): "The reasons of the distinction is that the admission of evidence of particular facts would be calculated not only to produce general inconvenience, but would operate as a surprise upon the party against whom it is offered. [As to the latter,] when a party knows what the issue is, he knows on what points to prepare himself; he may also be prepared upon general points not connected with the issue; but he certainly would not be prepared upon particular points. [As to the former,] suppose, in answer to an action for a libel, the defendant gives in evidence that the plaintiff at another time published a libel of the defendant. There might be first a question whether the plaintiff did or did not publish; secondly, whether it was or was not true; and then in this action for one libel, the matter tried would be that which ought to be in issue in another action brought for another libel. Besides, if the defendant might give in evidence one libel, he might give in evidence twenty; and so instead of trying one point and one issue joined, twenty different issues would be tried at one time, the inconvenience of which would be incalculable."

1876, STONE, J., in Mattison v. State, 55 Ala. 224, 232: "In inquiries of fact dependent on circumstantial evidence for their solution, no certain rule can be laid down which will define with unerring accuracy what collateral facts and circumstances are sufficiently proximate to justify their admission in evidence. Human transactions are too varied to admit of such clear declaration of the rule. Whatever tends to shed light on the main inquiry, and does not withdraw attention from such main inquiry by obtruding upon the minds of the jury matters which are foreign or of questionable pertinency, is as a general rule admissible evidence. On the other hand, undue multiplication of the issues is to be steadily guarded against, as tending to divert the minds of jurors from the main issue."

1881, RUFFIN, J., in State v. Brantley, 84 N. C. 766: "Amongst other hazards and inconveniences, it was found that to allow evidence to be given touching every collateral matter that could be supposed, however remotely, to throw any light upon the main fact sought to be established, had the effect to render trials complicated, and to confuse and mislead, rather than enlighten, the juries, and at the same time to surprise the party on trial, who could not come prepared to disprove every possible circumstance, but only such as he might suppose to be germane and material. And therefore the main rule was adopted of restricting the inquiry to such facts as, though collateral to the matter at issue, had a visible, reasonable connection with it; not such a connection as would go to show that the two facts, the collateral one and the main one, sometimes — or, indeed, often — go together, but such as would show that they most usually do so."

1842, Edgar Poe; "The Mystery of Marie Roget." "I would here observe that very much of what is rejected as evidence by a Court is the very best of evidence to the intellect. For the Court, guided itself by the general principles of Evidence — the recognized and booked principles — is averse from swerving at particular instances. And this steadfast adherence to principle, with rigorous disregard of the conflicting exception, is a sure mode of attaining the maximum of attainable truth, in any long sequence of time. The practice, in mass, is therefore philosophical. But it is not the less certain that it engenders vast individual error."

In the natural order of treatment, all the principles and rules of Relevancy would here first be treated systematically by themselves; and then, in Part II, the various Auxiliary Rules of Policy, applying to this or that class of relevant and otherwise admissible facts, would receive in their turn a separate and systematic treatment, accompanied by a re-survey of the classes of cases in which facts already sanctioned as relevant were nevertheless excluded by the doctrines of practical inconvenience. The Testimonial Qualifications of witnesses can be so treated, as a separate subject with determinate rules, while the occasional exclusionary rules of confidential communications, self-criminating testimony, and the like, are separately treated under the rules of privilege, without misleading results. But for many classes of Circumstantial Evidence this separation of treatment would be practically inconvenient and confusing. It will therefore be desirable, in the ensuing pages, while discussing the detailed rules of Relevancy, at the same time to consider the Auxiliary Rules of Policy so far as they may affect the particular class of evidence considered. In this manner the net rule for a particular class of evidentiary facts can be set forth, though it may rest upon some combined principles of Relevancy and of Auxiliary Policy.

But it is worth while to note that such rules can be properly used only by keeping in mind the composite nature of their principles. Under differing circumstances, one or the other of the principles may cease to operate, and then the rule would vary. To recur to the simile of an obstacle race (ante, § 13); suppose a series of three races, open respectively to adults, to lawyers, and to club-members; suppose that one of the obstacles is a stream of water twenty feet deep and twenty feet across, so that no one has any chance for success who cannot swim. Now when we hear that A has failed to run in the race, although his name was entered, we cannot tell whether it is because he was disqualified as not being an adult or a lawyer or a club-member, or because he cannot swim; he may be eligible in one or in all three classes, and yet may be obliged to abandon his entry because he is no swimmer; or he may be able to swim but may be neither club-member nor lawyer nor adult. So with the exclusion of a fact to which some Auxiliary Rule of Convenience is capable of applying. The mere result of exclusion tells us nothing as to the reason or principle of exclusion. Yet it is necessary that we should know the kind of reason involved. The fact may be relevant, but in the particular instance obnoxious to some auxiliary rule of policy; if so, we may be able to use it on some occasion to which that policy does not apply. Or, the fact may be obnoxious to no such auxiliary policy, but merely irrelevant under the circumstances; if so, we may be able to cure its irrelevancy by changing the terms of our offer, and thus use it without hindrance.

It is therefore indispensable, when any fact or class of facts is found excluded, to ascertain if possible whether the reason of exclusion is based on its irrelevancy or on some auxiliary rule of policy. Without knowing these reasons, we are helpless and our rules are mere rules of thumb. In practice, Courts almost invariably indicate the reasons for exclusion. Though these reasons have seldom been much studied by the bar, the material is plentiful enough for a correct understanding of the principles concerned.

3. Modes of Inference and Types of Argument

Two preliminary matters remained to be examined: 1. What is the logical form of inference or argument employed in the use of litigious evidence? 2. What are the logical requirements, if any, as sanctioned by the Courts?

§ 30. Form of Argument is Inductive. The process of adducing evidence and passing upon probative value is and must be based ultimately on the canons of ordinary reasoning, whether explicitly or implicitly employed. It is therefore necessary to review the distinction which Logic makes between the two great types of Argument [1] or Proof, — the Deductive and the Inductive forms. Modern Logic looks at this distinction without prejudice. Its tendency is to accept both types as capable of reduction to a single one. Nevertheless the distinction is a practical and substantial one, particularly in litigious proof. It is set forth with clearness and brevity by an eminent authority:

1884, Professor Alfred Sidgwick, Fallacies, A View of Logic from the Practical Side, 212 ff.: "The real foundation of Proof is always the recognition of resemblance and difference between things or events known and observed, and those which are on their trial, — whether such recognition is based (1) on knowledge already reached and formulated in names or propositions or (2) on direct observation and experiment. In proportion as we openly and distinctly refer to known principles (already generalized knowledge) is Proof deductive; in proportion as we rapidly and somewhat dimly frame new principles for ourselves from the cases observed is Proof inductive, empirical, or (in its loosest form) analogical. . . . The whole history of the rise and growth of knowledge (it has been also already remarked) is a record of fruitful rivalry and interaction between two opposite processes. Observation of facts has demanded theory — statement of 'laws' or uniformities — to explain, and even to name, the things and events observed; theory in its turn has always been more or less liable to purging criticism of 'fact.' . . .

§ 30. [1] "Argument" is here used in the logician's sense of "a proposed inference."

"Strictly speaking all Proof, so far as really proof, is deductive. That is to say, unless and until a supposed truth can be brought under the shadow of some more certain truth, it is self-supporting or circular. Unless we have some more comprehensive and better-tested generalization within the sweep of which to bring our thesis, we reach no foundation broader than itself; no assurance beyond what may be derived from the fact that nothing has yet been found to contradict the theory. For two elements, express or implied, are required for all rationalization: (1) a Principle or abstract indication (an assertion that a certain sign is trustworthy); (2) an Application of such Principle, or an assertion that the sign is present in the case or cases contemplated by the Thesis. In other words all rationalization may be represented syllogistically. . . . Just as Explanation always demands a reference to some wider Generality than that which is to be explained, so Proof always demands a reference to some wider Generality than that which is to be proved. To explain and to prove consist essentially in this. Both are forms of 'rationalization.' But there is yet a meaning in the distinction [between inductive and deductive], and, with certain limitations and apologies, I propose to make some use of it.

"Although the dependence of any Thesis on its Reason must be rationalized — i.e. must have the underlying principle made clear — before the testing operation can be called complete, yet in regard to special dangers it makes considerable difference whether that principle is at first definitely apprehended or not, — whether (as it is commonly expressed) the Proof professes to rely (1) upon laws known or supposed to be true, or (2) upon facts observed or supposed to be observed. We must distinguish, then, as far as possible, between that kind of Proof which rests openly and distinctly upon already generalized knowledge — Deductive Proof — and that which rests upon what may be loosely described as 'isolated facts' or 'perception of resemblance and difference' or 'observation and experiment' . . . or however the phrase may run, — that which is commonly known in its highest form as Inductive Proof, and in its lowest form as the Argument from Analogy. The required limitations in preserving the distinction appear to be, in the first place, a clear recognition that although in Induction the Principle or Law connecting the cases is in the case of Inference commonly dropped out of sight, or at least left highly indistinct, yet the whole cogency of Inductive Proof depends upon the extent to which such principle is first rendered definite and then confronted with observable or admitted fact. . . . The second difficulty in preserving the distinction lies in the fact that as a rule the Empirical and Deductive processes are found in combination, both being employed on the same subject-matter. . . . These two considerations make it of course extremely difficult in practice to label every argument at once with one or the other name. Sometimes, as where the Reason is a direct statement of the Principle itself, or again where it consists of a record of some experiment, no hesitation need practically be felt as to where the danger lies; but in a large number of cases we have no means of deciding whether the argument may best be classed as empirical or deductive or both. . . . But, because the distinction breaks down when pressure is put upon it, we need not consider it wholly worthless. It possesses a solid core of applicability, and if we can be content to use it as a rough guide in finding the weak point of an argument, much value may still be extracted from it in economy of time. . . . However we choose to name the two different kinds of arguments, the distinction between them has a certain real importance, as already shown; and all that is intended to be done with it is to recognize that so far as the given argument may be seen to belong to one or the other class, so far we are already on the track of special dangers."

A brief examination will show that in the offering of evidence in Court the form of argument is always inductive. Suppose, to prove a charge of murder, evidence is offered of the defendant's fixed design to kill the deceased. The form of the argument is: "A planned to kill B; therefore, A probably did kill B." It is clear that we have here no semblance of a syllogism. The form of argument is exactly the same when we argue: "Yesterday, Dec. 31, A slipped on the sidewalk and fell; therefore, the sidewalk was probably coated with ice"; or, "Today A, who was bitten by a dog yesterday, died in convulsions; therefore, the dog probably had hydrophobia." So with all other legal evidentiary facts. We may argue: "Last week the witness A had a quarrel with the defendant B; therefore, A is probably biassed against B"; "A was found with a bloody knife in B's house; therefore, A is probably the murderer of B"; "After B's injury at A's machinery, A repaired the machinery; therefore, A probably acknowledged that the machinery was negligently defective"; "A, an adult of sound mind and senses, and apparently impartial, was present at an affray between B and C, and testifies that B struck first; therefore, it is probably true that B did strike first." In all these cases, we take a single or isolated fact, and upon it base immediately an inference as to the proposition in question.

It may be replied, however, that in all the above instances, the argument is implicitly based upon an understood law or generalization, and is thus capable of being expressed in the deductive or syllogistic form. Thus, in the first instance above, is not the true form: "Men's fixed designs are probably carried out; A had a fixed design to kill B; therefore, A probably carried out his design and did kill B"? There are two answers to this. (1) It has just been seen that every inductive argument is at least capable of being transmuted into and stated in the deductive form, by forcing into prominence the implied law or generalization on which it rests more or less obscurely. Thus it is nothing peculiar to litigious argument that this possibility of turning it into deductive form exists here also. It is not a question of what the form might be — for all inductive may be turned into deductive forms —, but of what it is, as actually employed; and it is actually put forward in inductive form. (2) Even supposing this transmutation to be a possibility, it would still be undesirable to make the transmutation for the purpose of testing probative value; because it would be useless. We should ultimately come to the same situation as before. Thus, in one of the instances above: "A repaired machinery after the accident; therefore, A was conscious of a negligent defect in it"; suppose we turn this into deductive form: "People who make such repairs show a consciousness of negligence; A made such repairs; therefore, A was conscious of negligence." We now have an argument perfectly sound deductively, i.e. if the premises be conceded. But it remains for the Court to declare whether it accepts the major premise, and so the Court must now take it up for examination, and the proponent of the evidence appears as its champion and his argument becomes: "The fact that people make such repairs indicates (shows, proves, probably shows, etc.) that they are conscious of negligence." But here we come again, after all, to an inductive form of argument. The consciousness of negligence is to be inferred from the fact of repairs, — just as the presence of electricity in the clouds was inferred by Franklin from the shock through the kite-string, i.e. by a purely inductive form of reasoning. So with all other evidence when resolved into the deductive form; the transmutation is useless, because the Court's attention is merely transferred from the syllogism as a whole to the validity of the inference contained in the major premise; which presents itself again in inductive form. For all practical purposes, then, it is sufficient to treat the use of litigious evidentiary facts as inductive in form.

§ 31. Practical Requirements of the Argument. The next inquiry is, What are the peculiar dangers of the argument, the loopholes for error, the opportunities for false inference? By ascertaining these, we shall learn what safeguards or tests may be expected to be imposed by the Courts before admitting the evidence at all, and what opportunities of counter-argument are offered to the opponent.

These peculiar dangers and necessities are thus set forth by the same eminent authority:

1884, Professor Alfred Sidgwick, Fallacies, 270: "There is at bottom one primary source of fallacy in the inductive argument, call it by whatever name may be most convenient. We may name it, for instance, the danger of overlooking plurality of causes, or of neglecting possible chance or counteraction, or the possibility of unknown antecedents, or of arguing either 'post hoc ergo propter hoc' or 'per enumerationem simplicem', or of neglecting to exclude alternative possibilities, or of forgetting that facts may bear more than one interpretation, or of stating the law too widely, or of failing to see below the surface, or — perhaps on the whole the best of all — of unduly neglecting points of difference. . . . [The form of argument is] a case or cases brought forward of which such law is asserted to be the best explanation. If, then, some better explanation is possible, the theory as stated is impeachable. . . . By the 'best' explanation is meant . . . that solitary one out of all possible hypotheses which, while explaining all the facts already in view, is narrowed, limited, hedged, or qualified, sufficiently to guard in the best possible way against undiscovered exceptions. . . . Hence, the 'best' explanation of the facts A and B and C is that explanation which, while neglecting certain points of difference among them, and thus forming some generalization, neglects only those differences which are 'unessential.' The best explanation of (i.e. generalization from) one solitary sequence observed is that which neglects only its unessential elements or features. . . . It is in every case, then, through undue neglect of the essential difference between the specific case or cases observed and the wider genus to which the assertion professes to refer, that we rise to a generalization not sufficiently guarded against possible exceptions. . . . All positive proof depends . . . on the care, the precautions with which observation has been interpreted and experiment conducted. So far only as these exclude alternative possibilities are they of real value. . . . Because all positive assertion can only justify itself . . . when mistakes have been either one by one eliminated or in a body prevented, the burden of doubt to be removed by evidence consists essentially in the group of alternative theories remaining undiscarded. . . . The important point is, always, to show that all other possible theories are weighed in the balance and found wanting, — that is to say, that all precautions have been taken against that crudest kind of unchecked generalization which the least trained mind possesses in the greatest abundance. This objection against a theory, that alternative theories are not yet discarded, appears, however, more directly applicable, more fruitful of results, against a concrete or an abstract-concrete thesis than against a directly abstract one. . . . And the right of the theory chosen, over all its possible rivals, depends entirely upon the depth of our insight into the conditions under which the experiment or observation was really made. This is the main lesson of Logic as regards Induction. . . .[1] These alternatives have to be faced as possible explanations of each observed case; and the immediate question in each case is, What certainty can we obtain that the alternative chosen is the right one out of all those conceivable? The methods of Inductive Proof may be viewed as attempts to answer this question."

The peculiar danger, then, of Inductive Proof is that there may be other explanations than the desired one for the fact taken as the basis of proof. But in the study of Logic we are concerned with discovering the defects of a mode of Proof, while, in judicial rulings upon evidence, we are concerned (ante, § 29) merely with the propriety of admitting the fact at all, — with its quality as a possible Inference, not as absolute Proof. What are the safeguards and requirements and opportunities, then, which are suggested to us for this peculiar judicial process by the nature of the inductive argument?

§ 32. Same: (1) with reference to the Proponent of Evidence. If, then, the potential defect of inductive Proof is that the fact offered as the basis of the conclusion may be open to one or more other explanations or conclusions, the test or requirement for mere Admissibility (as distinguished from Proof) must be something far short of this in strictness. The failure to exclude a single other rational hypothesis would be from the standpoint of Proof a fatal defect; and yet, if only that single other hypothesis were open, there might still be an extremely high degree of probability for the conclusion first claimed. When Robinson Crusoe saw the human footprint on the sand, he could not argue inductively that the presence of another human being was absolutely proved. There was at least (for example) the hypothesis of his own somnambulism. Nevertheless, the fact of the footprint was for his conclusion evidence of an extraordinary degree of probability, i.e. it passed beyond the line of mere Admissibility. The requirement or test, then, for this lower standard — Admissibility — would be something like this: Does the evidentiary fact point to the desired conclusion (not as the only rational hypothesis, but) as the hypothesis (or explanation) more plausible or more natural out of the various ones that are conceivable? Or (to state the requirement more weakly), is the desired conclusion (not, the most natural, but) a natural or plausible one among the various conceivable ones? In practice it will be found that the Courts vary between these two, according to the practical possibilities of producing evidence and according to the dangers of its misuse. Sometimes they require in effect that the alleged conclusion (to which the evidentiary fact is directed) must be a more probable one than others; sometimes they merely require that it must be a probable or a possible one, irrespective of the greater probability of others.[1]

§ 31. [1] P. 339.

This general judicial attitude may be illustrated from various sorts of evidentiary facts. (1) The fact that A left the city soon after a crime was committed will be received by some Courts without further conditions, while others require that his knowledge that he was suspected shall first be shown. Here the evident notion is that the mere fact of departure by one unaware of the charge is open to too many innocent explanations; but the addition of the fact that A knew of the charge tends to put these other hypotheses into the background, and makes the desired explanation or conclusion — i.e. a guilty consciousness — stand out prominently as a more probable and plausible one. Even then there are other possible hypotheses — such as a summons from a dying relative or the fear of a yellow-fever epidemic in the city; but these are not the immediately natural ones, and the greater naturalness of the desired explanation suffices to admit the evidentiary fact of flight. (2) The fact that A makes repairs after an accident tends to the probable conclusion that he is conscious of the machine's being negligently defective. It is also open to the explanation, not perhaps equally probable, that he was conscious of its being merely defective, yet not negligently so. Nevertheless, the injustice of allowing the former inference to be made, if in truth the latter should be the correct one, is so great that (in the opinion of most Courts) the evidence should be excluded. Here the notion is that the desired explanation is not so preeminently the most probable one, as against others, as to make it desirable to consider it; the standard of the requirement being somewhat higher than in the preceding instance. (3) The fact that A before a robbery had no money, but after it had a large sum, is offered to indicate that he by robbery became possessed of the large sum of money. There are several other possible explanations, — the receipt of a legacy, the receipt of a debt, the winning of a gambling game, and the like. Nevertheless, the desired explanation rises, among other explanations, to a fair degree of plausibility, and the evidence is received. (4) The fact that A, charged with stealing a suit of clothes, was a poor man is offered to show him to be the thief. Now the conclusion of theft from the mere fact of poverty is, among the various possible conclusions, one of the least probable; for the conclusions that he would preferably work or beg or borrow are all equally or more probable, and the hypothesis of stealing, being also a dangerous one to adopt as the habitual construction to be put on poor men's conduct, has the double defect of being less probable and more hard upon the innocent. Such evidence, then, is seldom admitted to show that conclusion. (5) The fact that a person of unbalanced delusions asserts on the stand that he saw A strike B would formerly have been excluded absolutely. But nowadays it is recognized that a delusion may affect the powers of observation and memory to a limited extent only, and may not concern the subject of the testimony. If it does concern that subject, the witness is excluded, because the hypothesis that the fact occurred as he states it is too feeble and improbable, alongside of the hypothesis that his delusion is the only source of his statement. But if the delusion does not concern that subject, then his statement is received, even though it is still possible that his statement has been affected by the delusion. Thus the notion is, as before, that the evidentiary fact — i.e. the assertion on the stand — will be received where the correctness of the assertion is at least one among probable hypotheses. (6) The fact that A makes his statement on the witness-stand in response to a leading question of his counsel is not received, because in experience the chances are so great that his answer is based on the counsel's suggestion and not on his own knowledge. On the other hand, where the leading question deals merely with the preliminary matters of his name, age, and residence, the answer is receivable because, there being so little motive for falsification on those subjects, the conclusion that he answered truly is far the most probable one. Still further, where the witness cannot be made to understand what the inquiry is about, his statement answering a leading question is received, because although the conclusion that he is falsifying is perhaps still as probable as ever, yet there is no other way of obtaining evidence from that source (i.e. this witness), and hence the evidentiary fact (i.e. his answer), though furnishing an inference otherwise so weak as to be inadmissible, comes in because of the paucity of material and the practical necessities of the situation. (7) Formerly the presence of a pecuniary interest of any sort sufficed to exclude a witness, i.e. to exclude the evidentiary fact of his assertion. It was always conceded (and often declared by the Courts) that the hypothesis that such persons' assertions were usually false was a contingent and less probable one; but the mere possibility that they might be false was enough to exclude them. To-day the law has harmonized its treatment of such assertions with the treatment of all other evidentiary facts, i.e. it does not allow the less probable hypothesis of falsity to exclude the evidence, particularly in view of the availability of other methods of overthrowing or confirming that hypothesis. (8) The fact that A, the witness, has had a lawsuit with B, the defendant, is offered to show that A has feelings of animosity towards B which make it probable that he cannot testify correctly against him. Most Courts admit such evidence; but the Courts that reject it do so on the expressed theory that the inference of such animosity is a forced and unnatural one, and that the mere fact of a lawsuit is consistent with so many other more probable hypotheses that the evidence does not reach a sufficient degree of probative value.

§ 32. [1] For judicial phrasings of the test for circumstantial evidence, see § 38, post.

Thus, throughout the whole realm of evidence, circumstantial and testimonial, the theory of the inductive argument, as practically applied from the standpoint of Admissibility, is that the evidentiary fact will be considered when, and only when, the desired conclusion based upon it is a more probable or natural, or at least a probable or natural, hypothesis, and when the other hypotheses or explanations of the fact, if any, are either less probable or natural, or at least not exceedingly more probable or natural. The degree of strength required will vary with different sorts of evidentiary facts, depending somewhat upon differing views of human experience with those facts, somewhat upon the practical availability of stronger facts, and somewhat upon the hardships of certain inferences in case they should be unfounded. But the general spirit and mode of reasoning of the Courts substantially illustrates the dictates of scientific logic.

§ 33. Same: Occasional Subordinate Tests; Method of Agreement and Method of Difference. The main question for the inductive argument being (in the words of Professor Sidgwick, already quoted), "What certainty can we obtain that the alternative chosen is the right one out of all those conceivable?", there have been stated by scientific logic several subordinate methods or processes of investigation which may be viewed as attempts to answer this question. Usually enumerated as five, they are reducible in essence to two, — the Method of Agreement and the Method of Difference. Occasionally they may be and are conveniently resorted to in the testing of judicial evidence.

(a) Method of Agreement. The canon which this applies may be thus stated: "Whatever circumstances can be excluded without excluding the phenomenon whose effect (or cause) is being sought; or can be absent notwithstanding its presence, are not causally connected with it. . . . The remainder, those circumstances which are not eliminated by this process, are supposed to be thus shown to be essential to the phenomenon, — to be the proved effect (or cause)." [1] From the point of view of Proof, then, when we argue that the observed instances of a, viz. a', a'', a''', being always followed by b, prove a to be the cause of b, we can avoid the danger of ignoring other causes as the true explanation, by providing that the various instances shall be attended by identically the same circumstances or conditions; then, and then only, when a, under identically the came conditions, is followed always by b, have we the right to claim that b is the effect of a and not of some other cause. Applying this method from the standpoint of mere Admissibility, we of course do not need to exclude so rigorously the possibility of other explanations; accordingly our test would be whether the evidential instances occurred under substantially similar (not identically the same) conditions, i.e. so that the supposed conclusion is at least the more probable, though not the only possible, explanation. This subordinate test — which is merely a practical aid to the ultimate or fundamental one — will naturally be most available and useful where the evidential fact consists of a supposed parallel instance. To illustrate: (1) In showing that a person's illness was due to the eating of certain food, the fact is offered that other persons were ill after eating of the same food. Here the test naturally to be applied is whether the other illnesses occurred under substantially similar conditions of time, surroundings, and symptoms. (2) To show that a portion of a pavement caused an injury because dangerous to passers-by, the fact is offered that other persons who passed fell down at that place. Here a similar test is called for. Judicial annals contain a vast variety of instances in which this same subordinate test is the natural one to be applied, and is in practice used by the Courts.[2]

§ 33. [1] Sidgwick, ubi supra, 340.

(b) Method of Difference. The canon of this method is:[3] "If an instance in which the phenomenon under investigation occurs, and an instance in which it does not occur have every circumstance in common save one, that one only occurring in the former; the circumstance in which alone the two instances differ is the effect, or the cause, or an indispensable part of the cause, of the phenomenon." As applied to the judicial purposes of Admissibility, the test of this argument becomes: In order to prove that x is the cause of b, by the fact that wherever x was present the effect b, b', b'', was found, and that wherever x was not present the different effects c or d were found, the various instances b, b', b'', c, and d are admissible if they were substantially similar to each other in all respects except the presence of x.

This test is of comparatively rare employment in judicial evidence, because it is rare that instances occur which fulfil this requirement, unless where prearranged experiments are possible. But so far as the conditions of the case admit the fulfilment of the requirement, the argument may be and is employed. To illustrate: The injury to the paint on the plaintiff's house is attributed by the defendant to sewer-gas; for this purpose, he is allowed to use the fact that "under conditions and circumstances as nearly as possible like those surrounding the plaintiff's house", except the presence of the sewer-gas, the injury to paint did not occur.[4]

The purpose in using both these subordinate tests is always the same general one, — to secure a fair probability for the claimed hypothesis, as against and in competition with other possible ones. It is enough to note here that these specific and accepted logical tests are occasionally available and are judicially applied in the admission of litigious evidence.

§ 34. Same: (2) with reference to the Opponent. It is important to notice the double treatment of which every offer of evidence may admit. Where we are dealing with the general subject of Proof in Logic, the single inquiry is whether the argument offered as involving Proof does really fulfil the logical requirements. But wherever, in the applications of logical principles to specific practical purposes, two parties are found contending, the proponent and the opponent, — as in a formal debate, a controversy of scientific investigators, and, preëminently, a trial at law, — the mode of argument must be studied from two points of view. It has been seen that, in applying the principles of logic to Admissibility, the judicial standard falls far short of the standard of complete Proof. Where even the possibility of a single other hypothesis remains open, Proof fails, though it suffices for Admissibility if the desired conclusion is merely the more probable, or a probable one, even though other hypotheses, less probable or equally probable, remain open. It is thus apparent that, by the very nature of this test or process, a specific course is suggested for the opponent. He may now properly show that one or another of these hypotheses, thus left open, is not merely possible and speculative, but is more probable and natural as the true explanation of the originally offered evidentiary fact. Thus every sort of evidentiary fact may call for treatment in two aspects: 1. What is the extent to which other hypotheses must be excluded before the fact is admissible? 2. What are the other hypotheses which are then available for the opponent as explaining away the force of the fact thus provisionally admissible?

[2] Post, §§ 441–464, in particular.

[3] Sidgwick, ubi supra, 345.

[4] 1879, Eidt v. Cutter, 127 Mass. 524; see further § 442, post, and §§ 450–464.

This second aspect of each class of facts will hereafter be treated usually, for the respective subjects of Relevancy, under the head of Explanation. To illustrate: (1) In showing the defendant's connection with a murder, the fact is admitted of the finding of a knife, bearing his name, near the body of the deceased; the defendant, to refute the claimed conclusion that he was present with the knife at the murder, will be allowed to show that he lost the knife a month before; thus giving greater color of probability to the hypothesis that some one else was present with the knife. (2) To show the defendant's animosity against the deceased, the fact of a serious quarrel ten years before is offered; some Courts will exclude this, thinking that the claimed conclusion, namely, that the animosity existed at the time of the killing, is an hypothesis of too low relative probability; other Courts will admit it, believing that this hypothesis has sufficient 'prima facie' probability, and leaving it to the opponent to show — e.g. by the fact of a reconciliation in the interim — that the fact of the quarrel does not lead to the conclusion claimed. (3) To show the injurious vibrative qualities of a bridge in causing cracks in adjacent buildings, the fact of the existence of cracks in other adjacent buildings is received; this may be explained away by the fact that the operation of a railway, and not the bridge-vibrations, had been their cause.[1] (4) A witness must be shown in advance to have had adequate opportunity to observe the facts related, and to have sufficient experience to judge, if the matter is out of the ordinary; the hypothesis that he may be mendacious by disposition, being not a normal but an exceptional one, need not be discounted in advance by showing his good character for truth; but it is left to the opponent, if this derogatory circumstance exists, to show it; a showing of bad character will tend to explain away all his assertions as those of a confirmed liar. (5) The rest of a conversation or writing, of which a part has been received as an admission, may be presented by the opponent to explain away the apparent effect of the fragment; thus, to adopt Algernon Sidney's famous illustration (frequently used by Erskine in his arguments for the accused in the sedition trials of the 1790s), the prosecution, on a charge of blasphemy, might offer a statement of the defendant: "There is no God"; but this could be instantly explained away as part of a quotation from the Bible of the passage, "The fool hath said in his heart, 'There is no God.'" Such is the complementary process of Explanation, by the opponent, as suggested by and related to the evidentiary fact received from the proponent.[2]

§ 34. [1] 1882, Abend v. Mueller, 11 Ill. App. 257.

It must be understood, of course, that the opponent's modes of opposition are not confined to this. He may also (2) deny the truth of the evidentiary fact itself; or (3) advance some new and different evidentiary fact tending to prove his own counter-proposition. But in neither case are we concerned here with any process of Explanation. In (2) there is no form of argument at all, but a simple denial of the fact; in (3) there is a wholly new argument, in which the opponent in turn becomes proponent and submits his material for admissibility according to the ordinary tests; i.e. it is an ordinary question of relevancy. To illustrate: To charge A with murder, the prosecution shows a specific threat, an old quarrel, and traces of blood on his clothes. The defendant answers: (1) Explaining away the old quarrel by showing an intervening reconciliation; explaining away the blood-traces by showing the recent killing of a chicken; this is the complementary process of Explanation suggested by the evidentiary facts of quarrel and blood, and is directed to diminishing their force; this complementary process depends for its conditions and possibilities upon those original facts; (2) Denying the specific threat; this is in itself no form of inference, and raises no question of relevancy; (3) Advancing the new facts of an alibi and of good character for peaceableness; here the defendant is simply a proponent of new evidentiary facts, just as the prosecution was for its own evidence; the question of relevancy is the ordinary one, and depends on precisely the same tests as the prosecution's original evidence.

All an opponent's modes are reducible to these three. But only in the first is he distinctively an opponent so far as the logical nature of his argument is thereby affected. In the second he does not argue at all; in the third he ceases to be an opponent, from the point of view of argument, and becomes himself the proponent of a new argument, which the original proponent may now attack as an opponent.

§ 35. Same: Occasional Subordinate Forms. It has been seen that the proponent's evidentiary fact is occasionally subjected to a subordinate test, usually involving a substantial similarity of conditions, and peculiarly useful in a few situations (ante, § 33). In the same way, the opponent, desirous of explaining away the force of an evidentiary fact by showing that another hypothesis is equally or more probable than the one claimed, finds that the process, just described in its common form, sometimes takes on a specific subordinate form peculiarly useful in certain situations. These forms, as noticed in judicial annals, seem to be practically three in number.

[2] 1870, Graves, J., in Comstock v. Smith, 20 Mich. 348: "In cases of this kind, when the question is as to the relevancy of evidence in reply, the point is not whether the evidence offered is the most convincing or persuasive, but whether it tends to cut down, limit, explain, or obviate the defence in any part of it, or to illustrate some legitimate answer to the defence. In order to be relevant, it is not requisite that the testimony should be essential. It may be cumulative, it may be supererogatory, and still be relevant."

(1) Explanation by Inconsistent Instances. Where the proposition is that y is the effect of x, and the evidentiary fact is that in instances a, a', and a'', the circumstance y followed and the circumstance x was present, a convenient way of annulling the effect of these instances is to show that in a fourth instance a''' the circumstance x was present and yet the circumstance y did not follow.[1] To illustrate: In arguing that the vibrations of the defendant's railway bridge cracked the plaintiff's buildings at the eastern end, the injured condition of various buildings at that end is received for the plaintiff; to explain this away, the fact is received for the defendant that at the western end the vibrations were even more severe and yet no buildings there were cracked.[2] The requirement for this mode of explanation is merely that the inconsistent instances shall have occurred under substantially similar conditions, so as to exclude the likelihood that any other cause — e.g. in the above illustration, the peculiar strength of the buildings at the western end — could have counteracted the operation of the supposed cause.

A chief use for this mode of argument is to demonstrate an alleged possibility or impossibility. When A's argument is that an event or deed x is possible or impossible, it is obvious that the whole force of his evidentiary facts is at once destroyed by a single instance of its impossibility or its possibility, provided the conditions are substantially similar in both cases. In this way the hypothesis originally set up as the exclusive one is shown not to be an exclusive one at all, by the fact that a contrary one has occurred in the instance offered by the opponent. A universal or absolute affirmative can be thus exploded equally well as a universal or absolute negative. It is the universality of the alleged indication that lays it open to fatal attack by an inconsistent instance. To illustrate: (a) A burglar was alleged to have entered through a certain window; but the accused affirmed the impossibility of a man's getting through it; the prosecuting attorney suddenly put the frame over the defendant's head and drew it completely down, thus disproving the alleged impossibility; (b) at a trial for murder, there was testimony that the accused was seen going up a certain hill, wearing a pepper-and-salt suit, the witness looking from the rear and facing the sun; experiments showed that under such circumstances it was impossible for an observer to distinguish any color at all; (c) at a trial for arson, the prosecution claimed that the fire was set with a candle set in a closed box so as to burn down into a bunch of shavings; experiment showed that under the conditions alleged a candle would have gone out in a shorter interval than that which must have elapsed.[3]

(2) Explanation by Dissimilarity of Conditions. Where the proponent's evidentiary fact has been admitted under the subordinate test of § 33, ante,

§ 35. [1] Sidgwick, ubi supra, 275.
[2] 1882, Abend v. Mueller, 11 Ill. App. 256.
[3] Cited by Mr. Irving Browne, Green Bag, 1893, 186 ff.

— the substantial similarity of conditions in the instances offered, — the opponent's course is naturally suggested; i.e. he may show that there is at least a residuum of dissimilar conditions which, though not originally sufficient to exclude, nevertheless suffices to diminish probative value, by making some other hypothesis a possible one, if not an equally probable one. To illustrate: (a) In arguing that arsenical wall-paper was the source of the plaintiff's illness, the fact that others living in the same house were affected by similar symptoms is received; to explain this away, evidence is received that the same symptoms customarily attend the eating of unsound oysters, and that the others, but not the plaintiff, had eaten oysters; thus the dissimilarity of conditions is emphasized as the possible source of erroneous explanation. (b) To prove the qualities of a dental invention as a pain-killer, the fact is received that the patrons of the dentist using it had suffered pain under other dentists but not under him; to explain this away, it may be shown that they had never been under him before he used this pain-killer; thus emphasizing the dissimilarity of conditions to suggest that this dentist's personal skill, and not the invention, had prevented their pain.

(3) Explanation by Cumulative Instances. Where the proposition is that y is the effect of x, and the evidentiary fact is that in instances a, a', and a'', the circumstance y followed and the circumstance x was present, another way of annulling the effect of these instances is to show that in a fourth instance a''' the circumstance y again followed, and yet the circumstance x was not present. This argument is in a manner the opposite of (1) supra, and consists in offering other instances in which the same effect is found, but without the presence of the alleged causing circumstance; and this forces us to look upon its presence in the proponent's original instances as merely accidental, and not really causative. The requirement of this argument is that the conditions of the additional instances shall be substantially similar in every respect except the alleged causing circumstance; for if they were not then the elimination of the alleged cause as harmless is not accomplished. For example, the fact of the defendant's flowage of certain lands of the plaintiff is alleged to be the cause of deterioration in their productiveness during the previous ten years; to refute this, the defendant offers the fact of similar deterioration of other lands that had not been subjected to the flowage; this is admissible only so far as the other lands are near by and presumably under the same influences of soil and climate.[4]

§ 36. Summary. It has thus been seen that every evidentiary fact or class of facts may call for two processes and raise two sets of questions: (1) the admissibility of the original fact from the proponent; (2) the admissibility of explanatory facts from the opponent. (1) The first is subjected to the test whether the claimed conclusion is a probable or a more probable one, having regard to conceivable interpretations of the fact; the rulings vary more or less upon different evidentiary facts, according to various considerations of experience; and occasionally specific subordinate tests are applied. (2) The second process consists in explaining away the original fact's force by showing the existence and probability of other hypotheses; for this purpose other facts affording such explanations are receivable from the opponent; and here also, occasionally, occur specific subordinate processes and tests. The detailed rules for the various sorts of evidence are of course more or less concrete and dogmatic; this or that evidence is or is not held to be relevant. But the principles underlying these rulings are the principles of applied logic that have just been outlined.

[4] 1838, Standish v. Washburn, 21 Pick. 237; post, §§ 443, 451.

TITLE I

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE

INTRODUCTORY:

GENERAL THEORY OF CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE

CHAPTER IV.

§ 38. Degree of Probative Value required. It has just been seen (§ 31) that the general and broad requirement for Relevancy is that the claimed conclusion from the offered fact must be a probable or a more probable hypothesis, with reference to the possibility of other hypotheses. This is not only the general principle that best describes the attitude of the Courts, but is also the expressed form of the test for specific kinds of facts.

Nevertheless, there is naturally more or less variation of language in the phrasings put forth from time to time by the Courts. The following typical passages will serve as a guide to the general spirit in which the Courts apply the test of relevancy:

1794, Gibson v. Hunter, 2 H. Bl. 298; the defendant in error offered evidence of former acts to show knowledge and intent by the opponent, and his evidence was received; his statement of the principle, thus impliedly approved by the Court, was as follows: "The defendant in error humbly submits that it is competent to a jury to find matters of fact without direct or positive testimony of those facts and upon circumstantial evidence only, although the inference or conclusion to be drawn from the circumstances proved be not absolutely certain or necessary; that it is sufficient if the circumstantial evidence be such as may afford a fair and reasonable presumption of the facts to be tried; and if the evidence has that tendency it ought to be received and left to the consideration of the jury, to whom alone it belongs to determine upon the precise force and effect of the circumstances proved and whether they are sufficiently satisfactory and convincing to warrant them in finding the fact in issue."

1806, PETERSON, J., in Smith & Ogden's Trial, Lloyd's Rep. 82: "The evidence which is offered to a Court must be pertinent to the issue or in some proper manner connected with it. It must relate and be applied to a particular fact or charge in controversy, so as to constitute a legal ground to support or a legal ground to resist the prosecution. For it would be an endless task and create inextricable confusion if parties were suffered to give in evidence to the jury whatever self-love or prejudice or whim or a wild imagination might suggest. This is an idea too extravagant to be entertained by candid and reflecting men; as it would, if carried into practice, quickly prostrate property, civil liberty, and good government. Law would become a labyrinth, a bottomless pit, and courts would be perverted from their original design and turned into instruments of injustice and oppression. A line must be drawn, — a line has been drawn on such occasions, which it becomes the duty of judges to pursue. If there be no line, anything and everything may be given in evidence. Where shall we stop? What is the rule which we find to be laid down for our guidance? The evidence must be pertinent to the issues; the witnesses must be material. If the evidence be not pertinent, nor the witnesses material, the Court ought not to receive either."

1849, BELL, J., in Stevenson v. Stewart, 11 Pa. 308: "Great latitude is allowed to the reception of indirect, or, as it is sometimes called, circumstantial evidence. . . . This indirect evidence is sometimes drawn from the experience which enables us to trace a connexion between an ascertained collateral fact and the fact otherwise undetermined; and it is more or less cogent as this connexion is known to be more or less natural and frequent. Where antecedent experience shows this mutuality of relation to be constant or with a great degree of uniformity, the inference deducible, it is said, is properly termed a presumption. But this species of proof embraces a far wider scope than this. It in fact includes all evidence of an indirect nature, whether the inferences afforded by it be drawn from prior experience, or be a deduction of reason from the circumstances of the particular case, or of reason aided by experience. In the latter aspect, it is a conclusion the value of which obviously depends on the force and directness with which it is derived from the premises conceded or proved.

"But yet the competency of a collateral fact to be used as the basis of legitimate argument is not to be determined by the conclusiveness of the inferences it may afford in reference to the litigated fact. It is enough if these may tend, even in a slight degree, to elucidate the inquiry or to assist, though remotely, to a determination probably founded in truth. Indeed, to require a necessary relation between the fact known and the fact sought would sweep away many sources of testimony to which men daily recur in the ordinary business of life; and that cannot be rejected by a judicial tribunal without hazard of shutting out the light. Merely foreign matter must be avoided; but, though in appearance foreign, if it bear at all on the main subject, it must be heard. . . . The convincing power of the influence is for the jury, when weighing the value of the fact proved, — not for the judge, in determining the bare question of its relevancy; it is sufficient for the purposes of his inquiry that it has some affinity with the principal inquiry, though this may be weak or remote."

1863, BIGELOW, C. J., in Com. v. Jeffries, 7 All. 548, 566: "To render evidence of collateral facts competent, there must be some natural, necessary, or logical connection between them and the inference or result which they are designed to establish. . . . It is sometimes difficult to mark with precision the line which separates the limits of just and reasonable inference from those of mere conjecture or surmise. This arises necessarily from the nature of indirect evidence. Being founded on the observation and experience of the mutual connection between facts and circumstances, the question of its competency is easy or difficult of solution according as such supposed connection is constant or more or less regular and frequent. But as a safe practical rule it may be laid down that in no case is evidence to be excluded of any fact or circumstances, connected with the principal transaction, from which an inference to the truth of a disputed fact can reasonably be made."

1871, COOLEY, J., in Stewart v. People, 23 Mich. 75: "The proper test for the admissibility of evidence ought to be, we think, whether it has a tendency to affect belief in the mind of a reasonably cautious person who should receive and weigh it with judicial fairness."

1875, AGNEW, C. J., in Brown v. Schock, 77 Pa. 479: "In a question of circumstantial evidence, the proof derived from the circumstances is a question of natural presumption and is to be found by the jury; the strength of this proof depends on the probability resulting from the facts. . . . It is the right of the party to have this submitted to the jury, unless it is so weak and inconclusive that as a matter of law no probability of fact can be drawn from the combined circumstances."

1875, BRICKLEY, C. J., in Levison v. State, 54 Ala. 528: "The rule is clear and well-defined that facts and circumstances which when proved are incapable of affording any reasonable presumption or inference in regard to the material fact or inquiry involved are not admissible as evidence. The difficulty lies in its application."

1895, MCCABE, C. J., in Deal v. State, 140 Ind. 354, 39 N. E. 930: "When evidence tends to prove a fact, however slight that tendency may be, it is admissible. That is the only guide the Court can have in determining the admissibility of evidence. . . . This is so for several reasons. One is that a party cannot be expected or required to prove the fact by a single item of evidence; and another reason is that the jury are the exclusive judges of the weight to be given to each item of evidence."

1902, WALKER, J., in Cohn v. Saidel, 71 N. H. 558, 53 Atl. 800 (dealing with the question whether, in an action for malicious prosecution, the present defendants' submission to nonsuit in the former action warranted a conclusion that they had no probable cause in the beginning): "The argument is that that fact alone warrants the inference of a want of probable cause. But the fact of the nonsuit alone is direct evidence of no mental state on the part of the defendants, except that they did not desire to carry on the litigation at that time. It may be said that it establishes that fact conclusively. If it does, and if it might be inferred that they became nonsuit because, as then informed, they did not think they had a probable cause of action, it is necessary to go a step further in this mental operation, and to infer from this inference that the defendants, when they brought the suits, nearly a year before, upon the information they then possessed, did not, as reasonable and prudent men, honestly believe they had a cause of action. There is no open and visible connection between the fact first proved, viz., that the defendants desired to withdraw their suits in April, 1900, and the fact to be proved, viz., that they had no probable cause of action in July, 1899. A great variety of reasons exist which may induce a plaintiff to become nonsuit, one of which may be that he has discovered or become convinced that he has no case. This, however, is but a mere conjecture. It is but one of a large number of sufficient reasons for such action. It cannot even be said to be the common or ordinary reason that induces a plaintiff to become nonsuit. In a particular case it may or it may not be true reason. Unconnected with other evidence, it is pure conjecture. But one conjecture cannot be treated as a proved fact in order to reach another conjecture. The probative bearing of the evidence upon the point in issue is not logically clear and plain, but doubtful and involved, leading to no certain result. . . . The legitimate bearing or relevancy of evidence is ascertained by logic and reason applied in the conduct of a trial by jury. If it is illogical and unreasonable to allow the jury to draw conclusions from premises based upon simple conjecture, it is also illegitimate. The most that can be claimed in favor of the refusal to give the instruction requested in this case is that it is possible the defendants may have thought they had no probable ground of action when they became nonsuit, and hence, assuming that to be true, it is possible they were of the same mind when they brought their suits. This is piling conjecture upon conjecture, and reaching a result more by guessing than by the exercise of reason and logic. In a judicial tribunal mere guesses and conjectures cannot be substituted for the legal proof which the law requires. . . . In view of the fact that the reasons for becoming nonsuit are numerous, and that the plaintiff's belief that he had no cause of action in the beginning is probably a very rare one, the above rule would not seem to be reasonable, unless it is reasonable to require the defendant to prove his nonliability in the first instance. The logic of legal procedure does not lead to such a result."

1920, TRIEBER, J., in Smith v. U. S., 8th C. C. A., 267 Fed. 665, 668 (on a charge of devising a scheme to defraud by false pretenses): "In prosecutions of this nature, great latitude in the introduction of testimony is allowed, as in most instances the offense can only be established by circumstantial evidence." In Williamson v. United States, 207 U. S. 425,

451, 28 Sup. 163, the court quoted with approval from Holmes v. Goldsmith, 147 U. S. 150, 164, 13 Sup. 288, 292:

"'As has been frequently said, great latitude is allowed in the reception of circumstantial evidence, the aid of which is constantly required, and therefore, where direct evidence of the fact is wanting, the more the jury can see of the surrounding facts and circumstances, the more correct their judgment is likely to be. "The competency of a collateral fact to be used as the basis of legitimate argument is not to be determined by the conclusiveness of the inferences it may afford in reference to the litigated fact. It is enough if these may tend, even in a slight degree, to elucidate the inquiry, or to assist, though remotely, to a determination probably founded in truth." . . . The modern tendency, both of legislation and of the decision of courts, is to give as wide a scope as possible to the investigation of facts. Courts of error are especially unwilling to reverse cases, because unimportant and possibly irrelevant testimony may have crept in, unless there is reason to think that practical injustice has been thereby caused.'"

§ 39. Same: "Collateral" Facts. The term "collateral", sometimes here employed, has two senses, and is apt to mislead unless they are discriminated.

(1) The original and dominant sense of "collateral" as here applied (its application to the impeachment of witnesses — post, § 1021 — being a totally different one) is that of "immaterial." According to the principle of § 2, ante, no propositions can be evidenced except those which are properly in issue under the substantive law and the pleadings; hence, a fact evidencing a proposition not thus properly in issue is inadmissible, because immaterial: This it was at one time common to designate by the crude term "collateral".

1849, BELL, J., in Stevenson v. Stewart, 11 Pa. 308: "It is undoubtedly a rule governing the production and admission of evidence that the evidence offered must correspond with the allegations and be confined to the point in issue. The effect is to exclude merely collateral facts, having no connexion with the subject litigated, and therefore incapable of shedding light on the inquiry or affording ground for reasonable presumption or inference."

1865, CHAPMAN, J., in Shepard v. Ashley, 10 All. 542: "One of the elementary rules of evidence is that it must be confined to the points in issue; and the reason of the rule is that the attention of juries may not be distracted nor the public time consumed needlessly."

1890, FOSTER, J., in Nickerson v. Gould, 82 Me. 512, 514, 20 Atl. 86: "The evidence must be relevant to the issue, — that is, to the facts put in controversy by the pleadings. This rule prohibits the trial of collateral issues."

(2) But occasionally the term was used to signify "remotely probative", or "indirectly connected", i.e. directed to prove a proposition in issue, and yet possessing for that purpose a weak quality of relevancy; thus the fact might be possibly relevant, if a close enough connection and a real probative value should appear:

1854, ECCLESTON, J., in Lee v. Tinges, 7 Md. 236: "There is a rule of evidence which excludes collateral facts, or such as do not afford a reasonable presumption or inference as to the principal fact or matter in dispute."

1858, WRIGHT, C. J., in State v. Hinkle, 6 Ia. 384: "Collateral facts, or those which are incapable of affording any reasonable presumption or inference as to the principal fact or matter in dispute, are excluded." [1]

The practical difference between these two senses was that in the former sense the fact was always and clearly inadmissible, while in the latter sense it might become admissible under some circumstances. A fact might thus deserve different fates, according as it was "collateral" in one or the other sense. This careless confusion of usage spread, until a kind of stigma began often to be intended in the epithet "collateral." It was appealed to in one sense in order to gain an argument involving its other sense. If an opposing counsel could stigmatize an offered fact as "collateral", he felt that he had struck a blow at its admissibility; and in this effort he had useful weapons, in the older passages in which a "collateral" fact, meaning an immaterial fact, was treated as necessarily inadmissible.[2]

What is needed, therefore, is simply a mutual understanding of the sense in which the term is being used on a particular occasion. When it is used in the second sense to express remoteness of probative value, the fact in question may or may not be admissible, according to the standard judicially declared in § 38, ante; there is nothing decisive in its "collateralness."

§ 40. Present and Future Relevancy. A fact, when offered as evidence, may not be relevant, either because it is material to a subordinate proposition whose bearing is not yet apparent, or because it is relevant only in connection with some other fact not yet offered. Thus it is not now but may later in the trial become relevant. In this situation (1) there is no objection to this fact in that it does not contain within itself all the necessary features of relevancy. It need not be 'per se' relevant:

1831, HOSMER, C. J., in State v. Watkins, 9 Conn. 53: "If the fact consist of parts, or is provable by many circumstances, each of which conduces something to the establishment of it, then each part and each circumstance is admissible, although the point will not be established until the whole fact is proved."

On the other hand (2) its relevancy must be made to appear by a preliminary and hypothetical statement of the additional facts or propositions that would make it relevant, with an engagement to make them good at the proper time:

1824, GIBSON, J., in Weidler v. Bank, 11 S. & R. 139: "The evidence, therefore, as it was offered, presented facts which, isolated as they stand in the bill of exceptions were entirely irrelevant. . . . But the plaintiff contends that this may have been only a part of the chain of his evidence, and that what was deficient might afterwards have been sup-

§ 39. [1] So also: 1873, Brooke v. Winters, 39 Md. 508 ("The rule that excludes facts because they are collateral does not apply to facts wherever existing, if they may afford any reasonable presumption as to the matter in dispute"); Cal. C. C. P. 1872, § 1868 ("Evidence must correspond with the substance of the material allegations, and be relevant to the question in dispute. Collateral questions must therefore be avoided. It is, however, within the discretion of the court to permit inquiry into collateral fact, when such fact is directly connected with the question in dispute, and is essential to its proper determination, or when it affects the credibility of a witness"); Or. Laws 1920, § 725 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 1868).

[2] Mr. Justice Doe, in Darling v. Westmoreland, 52 N. H. 405–6, has incisively exposed the fallacy of this ambiguous usage.

plied. . . . If it would be relevant, when taken in connexion with other facts, it ought to be proposed in connexion with those facts, and an offer to follow the evidence proposed with proof of those facts at the proper times. But the Court is not bound to spend its time in an inquiry which from the [present] showing of the party can produce no results. Dislocated circumstances may doubtless be given in evidence; particularly if there be no objection to the order of time; but the proposal of the evidence must contain in itself, by reference to something that has preceded it or that is to follow, information of the manner in which the evidence is to be legitimately operative."

1833, BUCHANAN, C. J., in Davis v. Calvert, 5 G. & J. 304: "It is sometimes difficult to ascertain whether a particular fact offered in evidence is connected with the issue, and will or will not become material in the progress of the investigation. In such cases, the Court not clearly seeing that it is wholly foreign and irrelevant to the issue and cannot be connected with it by evidence of other facts and circumstances, it is proper and usual in practice to admit the proof, on the assurance of the counsel who tenders it that it will turn out to be pertinent and material; otherwise, material and important testimony might frequently and injuriously be excluded, which it is the province of the Court to guard against when it may be done. . . . And when it does not clearly appear 'a priori' that a fact offered to be proved is collateral and irrelevant, there is generally less mischief to be done or apprehended by admitting it, though it should afterwards turn out to be collateral, than by the rejection of the proof of a fact only because, standing alone, it does not plainly appear to be connected with the issue, but may, when connected with other facts and circumstances, become material and important."

Nevertheless, it may sometimes be desirable for the counsel not to disclose immediately the full purpose of his inquiry, and it is usually and properly said that the discretion of the trial Court should determine whether it is better to insist on the disclosure then, or to allow the fact to come in upon the general promise of counsel to connect it. In the absence, however, of some such promise, a fact apparently irrelevant will not be treated on review as admissible because it might have been relevant on certain conditions.

Moreover, the Court will often, where the facts would be highly improper if irrelevant, require the other facts, instead of being postponed, to be first offered, so as to ensure the presence of the proper foundation and leave nothing to the sanguine expectations of counsel. This, however, is rather a question of the order of presenting evidence.

The only exception ordinarily recognized to this doctrine is made for facts sought on cross-examination, where it is often so important to conceal from the witness the bearing of his answer that great latitude is conceded.

This subject is so closely connected with the general principles governing the Order of Evidence, that the detailed rules and the authorities are considered under that head (post, § 1871).

§ 41. Circumstantial Evidence may be proved by the same Kind. It was once suggested that an "inference upon an inference" will not be permitted, i.e. that a fact desired to be used circumstantially must itself be established by testimonial evidence;[1] and this suggestion has been repeated by a few Courts, and sometimes actually enforced.[2] There is no such rule; nor can § 41. [1] 1824, Starkie, Evidence, I. 57.

[2] Federal: 1875, U. S. v. Ross, 92 U. S. 281 ("Whenever circumstantial evidence is relied upon to prove a fact, the circumstances themselves must be proved [by testimonial evidence], and not presumed [i.e. inferred from

be. If there were, hardly a single trial could be adequately prosecuted.[3] circumstantial evidence]"); 1879, Manning v. Ins. Co., 100 U. S. 693; 1903, Cunard S. S. Co. v. Kelley, 126 Fed. 610, 614, C. C. A. (U. S. v. Ross followed; here, as to an inference of knowledge of marks on goods); Connecticut: 1904, State v. Kelly, 77 Conn. 266, 58 Atl. 705 (murder; deceased's despondency, as evidence of a plan of suicide, excluded); Delaware: 1911, Roberts v. State, 2 Boyce Del. 385, 79 Atl. 396 (not decided); Illinois: 1896, Globe Accident Ins. Co. v. Gerisch, 163 Ill. 625, 45 N. E. 563) (1) that G. lifted a box of ashes was shown by the facts that he was seen filling the box with ashes, that afterwards it was seen filled on the street, and that G. usually carried it there; (2) that G. was shortly afterwards found badly strained in the abdomen was otherwise shown; but (3) the fact that he lifted the box of ashes was not allowed to be used to infer that the lift caused the strain, because of the above supposed rule); 1906, Kevern v. People, 224 Ill. 170, 79 N. E. 574 (rape); 1917, Ohio Building S. V. Co. v. Industrial Board, 277 Ill. 96, 115 N. E. 149 (death of a night watchman; principle discussed); Indiana: 1879, Biddle, J., in Binns v. State, 66 Ind. 428, 430 ("Inferences can not be drawn from inferences, . . . but inferences may be drawn from facts previously proved [i.e. by direct testimony]"); 1913, Dowell v. State, 181 Ind. 68, 101 N. E. 815 (an absurd instance of applying this doctrine to a case in which the only real doubt was whether the witness told the truth; bottles of whiskey alleged to have been sold illegally by the defendant to A, who delivered them to B, who produced them on the trial); 1915, Morgan Construction Co. v. Dulin, 184 Ind. 652, 109 N. E. 960 (defective beam); Missouri: 1909, Swearingen v. Wabash R. Co., 221 Mo. 644, 120 S. W. 773; 1921, Philips v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 288 Mo. 175, 231 S. W. 947 (accident insurance; held inadmissible to infer from a bruise to an accidental fall and thence to the fall as cause of death; the evidence in the cases shows the nonsensicality of courts continuing to promulgate this scientific and practical untruth; indeed, the very next time that the judge who wrote the opinion is ill and sends for a physician, the physician will build inference on inference on inference from symptoms, and will then prescribe belladonna or strychnia or any other potent drug on the faith of such inferences, and the judge will rise up cured and return to his bench muttering, "No inference upon an inference, mind!"); New York: 1912, People v. Razezicz, 206 N. Y. 249, 99 N. E. 557 (murder by a bomb; the present theory applied to an inference from the prior explosion of another bomb to the defendant's use of explosives; but the Court also states its attitude in the correct form that "it is unsafe to rely upon that fact as the controlling fact to establish the defendant's guilt"); 1916, People v. Van Aken, 217 N. Y. 532, 112 N. E. 380 (wife-murder; the alleged motive involved the defendant's extravagance; he had given a note for $250 and had paid it off and destroyed it before maturity; the note bore an indorsement in his wife's name, and the prosecution argued that he had forged the indorsement and that the premature payment was evidence of this, because it evidenced a desire to conceal the transaction from his wife; this and an analogous inference were held "too uncertain to be permissible"; the opinion avoids expressly sanctioning the fallacy here under consideration; but it might well enough have been repudiated; the result is sound enough in the case in hand); Oregon: 1910, State v. Lem Woon, 57 Or. 482, 112 Pac. 427, per King, J., diss.; Pennsylvania: 1860, Douglass v. Mitchell, 35 Pa. 440; 1868, McAleer v. McMurray, 58 Pa. 126, 135; 1880, Philadelphia C. P. R. Co. v. Henrice, 92 Pa. 431; 1904, Taylor v. General Acc. Ins. Co., 208 Pa. 439, 57 Atl. 830; Tennessee: 1903, East Tennessee & W. N. C. R. Co. v. Lindamood, 111 Tenn. 457, 78 S. W. 99; Vermont: 1914, Fadden v. McKinney, 87 Vt. 316, 89 Atl. 351 (trespass); Washington: 1909, Wilkie v. Chehalis Co. L. & T. Co., 55 Wash. 324, 104 Pac. 616 (an instance of another horse's fright at a pile of raw meat, excluded, by some fancied connection with the present principle); 1911, State v. Brache, 63 Wash. 396, 115 Pac. 853, semble.

Another variety of the fallacy is the following: Or. Laws 1920, § 796 ("An inference must be founded on a fact legally proved"); 1909, State v. Hembree, 54 Or. 463, 103 Pac. 1008 (wife-murder; the wife's discovery of the defendant's incest with the daughter being alleged as the motive, and the testimony to the incest not being "proved" to the Court's satisfaction, the motive-inference was held improper and hence the incest-testimony; unsound, (1) because the Court concedes that motive-proof is not indispensable, (2) because the Code provision merely means that the inference must be based on an evidenced fact as distinguished from a fact merely guessed at).

[3] 1920, Abbott, C. J., in R. v. Burdett, 4 B. & Ald. 95, 161 ("If no fact could be thus ascertained by inference in a court of law, very few offenders could be brought to punishment"); 1917, Ohio B. V. Co. v. Ind. Board, 277 Ill. 96, 115 N. E. 149 (whether an employee killed by an assault was injured in the course of employment; "it is true that Courts have frequently stated that a presumption cannot be based on a presumption . . . ; whatever the rule is or ought to be, no authority called to our attention has ever enforced it in the way" here contended for).

For example, on a charge of murder, the defendant's gun is found discharged; from this we infer that he discharged it; and from this we infer that it was his bullet which struck and killed the deceased. Or, the defendant is shown to have been sharpening a knife; from this we argue that he had a design to use it upon the deceased; and from this we argue that the fatal stab was the result of this design. In these and innumerable daily instances we build up inference upon inference, and yet no Court ever thought of forbidding it. All departments of reasoning, all scientific work, every day's life and every day's trials, proceed upon such data. The judicial utterances that sanction the fallacious and impracticable limitation, originally put forward without authority, must be taken as valid only for the particular evidentiary facts therein ruled upon.[4]

§ 42. Irrelevancy and Practical Policy, distinguished. A circumstantial fact may be logically relevant, and thus far admissible, and yet may be excluded because it is obnoxious to some consideration of Auxiliary Probative Policy, — in particular, those of Confusion of Issues, or Unfair Surprise, or Undue Prejudice. The importance of discriminating between these principles, in rulings on circumstantial evidence, has already been pointed out for evidence in general (ante, § 29 a).

§ 43. Classification of Circumstantial Evidence. There are two important considerations that affect the classification of circumstantial evidence for convenient treatment. These considerations affect with equal force the classification of testimonial evidence (post, §§ 475, 875); but their bearings are there more easily apparent, and have been unconsciously accepted without question.

(1) The starting-point of the classification should be the proposition to be proved, rather than the evidentiary fact offered. The fundamental inquiry of relevancy is (ante, §§ 2, 3) whether the claimed conclusion is a probable inference from the offered fact. Now if we take a specific conclusion (proposition, 'factum probandum') as the starting-point, and ask in turn, whether it is relevantly evidenced by fact a, fact b, fact c, and so on, we are able to compare intelligently, without repetition, the various sources from which the conclusion or proposition is capable of being inferred; for it will often happen that the precise fact a will be irrelevant, while fact a', a slightly altered circumstance, will be relevant; so that a comparison of the various circumstances or combinations of circumstances which may become or be made relevant is possible only by taking the 'factum probandum' as a starting-point or center, and swinging round the circle of the various offerable evidentiary circumstances. If, on the contrary, we were to take each particular evidentiary fact in turn as the starting-point, and ask what various conclusions it is

[4] The fallacy has been repudiated in the following case: 1897, Hinshaw v. State, 147 Ind. 334, 47 N. E. 158; 1913, State v. Fiore, 85 N. J. L. 311, 88 Atl. 1039 (citing the text above).

Compare also Gibson, C. J., quoted ante § 26, where the relative value of circumstantial and testimonial evidence is considered.

For an acute analysis of this fallacy, and a demonstration of its unsoundness, with citations of additional rulings involving it, see an article "Presumptions built on Presumptions", by Professor Wm. Trickett, of the Dickinson School of Law, in "The Forum", X, 123, March, 1906 (Carlisle, Pa.).

relevant to show, we should find that many distinct facts are available to evidence a single proposition, and thus an intelligent comparison of them would be difficult and much confusing repetition would be necessary. For these reasons, the basis of the classification should be the different kinds of propositions (' facta probanda '), so analyzed as to separate those which are essentially different in their requirements.

(2) A second consideration helps us to limit the field of classification,— the consideration that we are concerned, not with the conceivable kinds of propositions or of evidentiary facts, but only with such as have been made the subject of rules or rulings by the Courts. There are various plans of arrangement which might be justified, and there are scores of possible and curious lines of proof which the records of famous trials disclose. But we are here dealing, not with a general scheme of human life or of conceivable modes of proof, but with a limited body of rules brought forth by problems laid before the Courts for adjudication. Not every species of evidentiary fact or of inference is brought into the realm of judicial evidence, but chiefly certain common and frequently recurring matters affecting the usual crimes and civil disputes; and not every common kind of evidentiary fact is brought to the Supreme Courts for adjudication, but only those about which some doubt may be raised. Take, for instance, the proof of an alibi; until the very recent epoch of factious quibbling, a ruling upon evidence in connection with an alibi was exceedingly rare; and yet there could have been no more frequent an issue in a criminal case. Take, again, the immense number of rulings in the last half-century dealing with value-evidence; the problems and the evidence have always been conceivable, but they did not form the material of judicial rulings until disputes involving them became common, i.e. until the frequency of land-condemnation for public purposes since the era of railroads and municipal improvements, for here the values remained to be fixed by the tribunal instead of (as ordinarily) by the parties to contracts of sale.

Having in view these considerations, the most practicable classification consists in dividing the 'facta probanda' into three groups:

I. A Human Act;

II. A Human Quality, Condition, or State;

III. A Fact or Condition of External Nature.

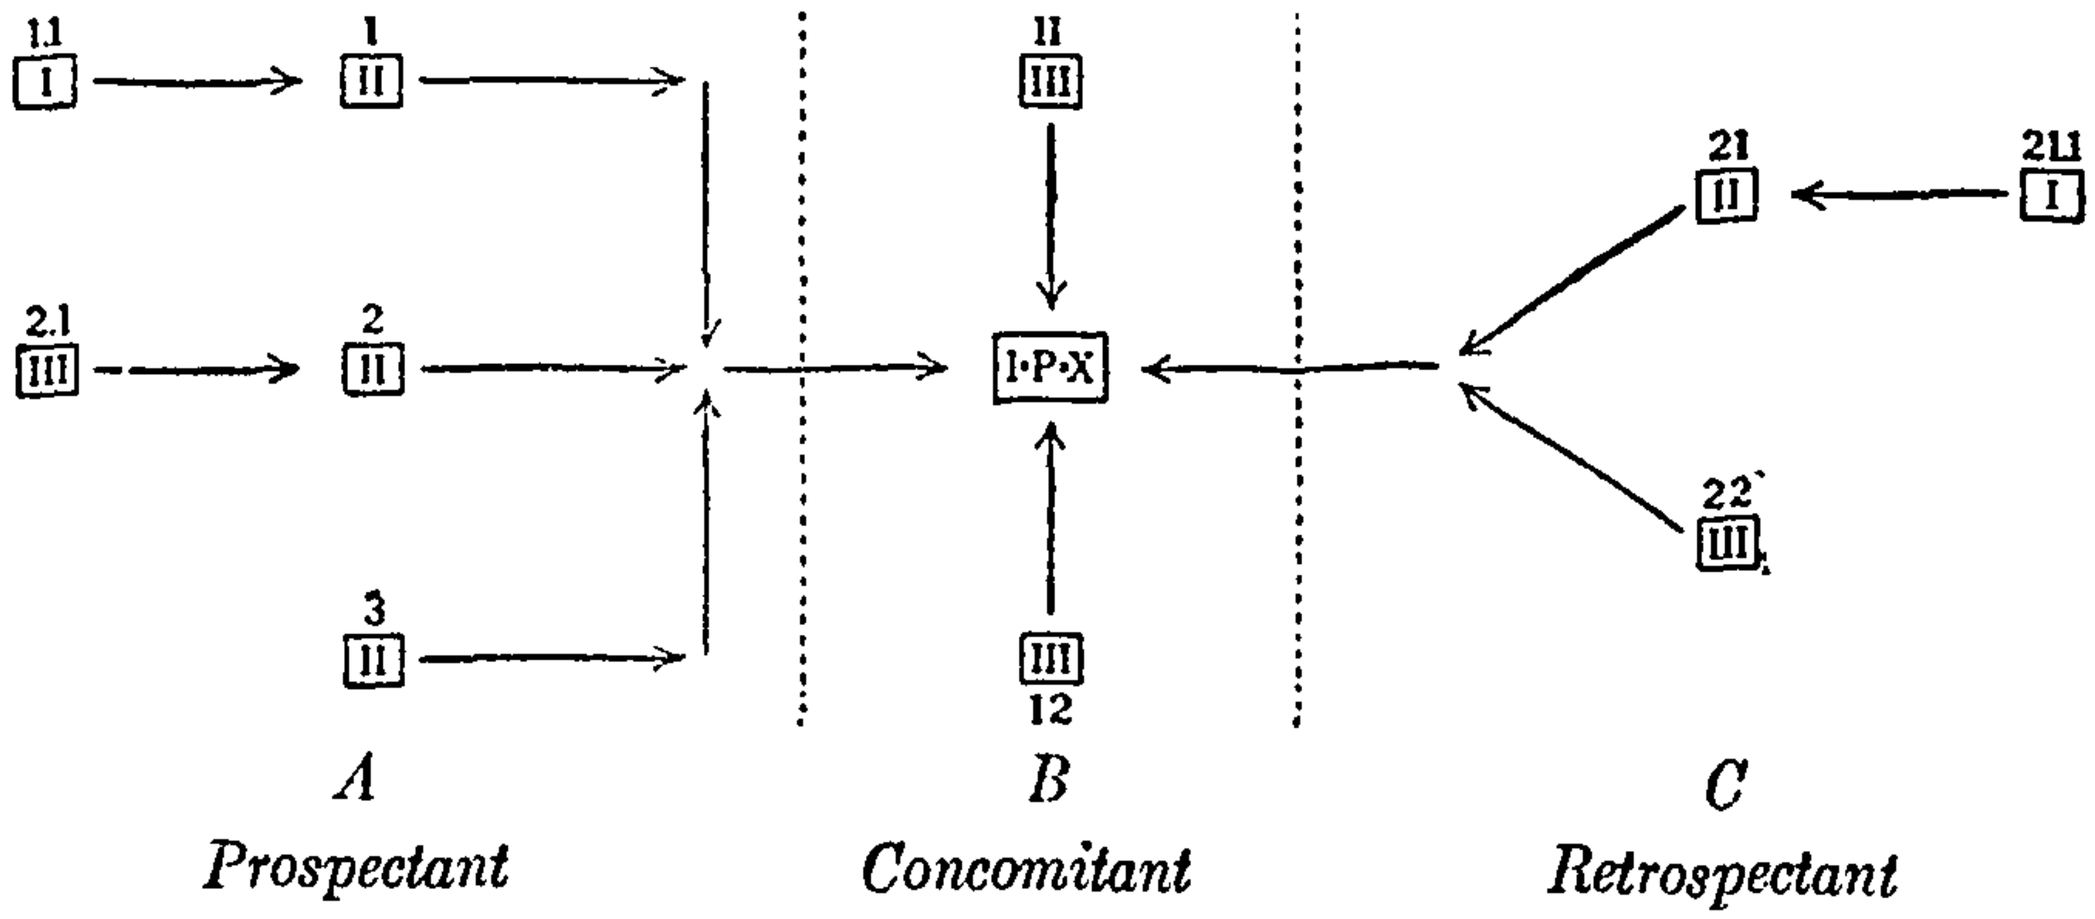
These three groups fall naturally apart, in our system, because in the first group the dominant and indirectly influential rule is the rule forbidding the admission of moral character to evidence an act, in certain classes of cases; and, in the second group, the rule excluding extrinsic testimony to particular acts of conduct holds a similar place; while in the third group the evidentiary facts and problems are almost naturally distinct from those of the first two. There are of course a few matters which do not plainly fall within one or another group; but this is inevitable under any classification.

Next, under each group, it will be convenient to arrange the evidentiary facts according as the proof or indication they afford is:

A. Prospectant;
B. Concomitant; or
C. Retrospectant.[1]

Instances under the second head are rare; an alibi is the usual one. But the distinction between the first and the third heads is always marked and often useful in hints. For instance, under Group I, above, the evidentiary facts of Character, Plan or Design, Motive, point forward to a future act; i.e. we take our stand before the time of the act, and argue that because of the person's character, design, or motive, he was likely, or not, to do the act in the future; while the fact of Consciousness of Guilt points backwards, i.e. we infer from his state of mind that he has been guilty of some crime in the past. In evidencing matters under Group II, this distinction becomes peculiarly useful; e.g. the fact of hereditary insanity as pointing forward to a defendant's insanity raises a question of relevancy essentially different from that raised by evidence of abnormal conduct exhibited at the time; so also in proving an emotion or passion (motive), evidentiary circumstances such as family relationship, need of money and the like are offered as 'a priori' indications, pointing forward to the probability of such an emotion being excited, while outward exhibitions of conduct, used for the same purpose, have an 'a posteriori' value as showing that the emotion was the probable source of the evidentiary conduct. This distinction, then, while not always an essential one, at least provides a convenient order of arrangement, and is often serviceable in emphasizing related qualities of probative value.

Of course, Group I (Human Act) is the commonest 'factum probandum' in judicial proof; in criminal cases always, and in civil cases often, it is the main issue. Taking it therefore as presenting a typical situation, the possible relations of the above classes of evidentiary facts and 'probanda' may be illustrated by the following diagram:



§ 43. [1] It is perhaps worth noting that this analysis was long ago hinted at by Burke, in his disquisition on evidence in the Report on Warren Hastings' Trial, in 1794 (31 Parl. Hist. 342); "every circumstance", he remarks, "precedent, concomitant, and subsequent, become parts of circumstantial evidence."

Suppose P, the main 'probandum' to be a killing by poison, i.e. the doing of a human act = Act X, i.e. Group I (Doing of a Human Act).

Prospectant Evidence:

1 = a plan or design to do Act X. This 1 is a Human Condition of Mind. In turn, 1 becomes a P, i.e. in Group II; and is evidenced by 1.1 = purchase of the poison, i.e. Group I (Human Act).

2 = a motive or emotion, as evidence of the Act X. This emotion is in Group II (Human Condition of Mind). In turn, 2 becomes a P, and is evidenced by 2.1, the existence of a large sum of cash in the deceased's possession, i.e. in Group III (Condition of External Nature).

3 = a disposition to kill (assuming it to be admissible); this is again a Human Condition of Mind, i.e. Group II.

Concomitant Evidence:

11 = distance between accused's and deceased's house or room, the doors being open, at the time of Act X. This is in Group III (Condition of External Nature).

12 = accused's physical capacity to force deceased to take the poison, again in Group III (or perhaps II).

Retrospectant Evidence:

21 = consciousness of guilt, i.e. in Group II (Human Condition of Mind) which in turn becomes a P, and is evidenced by 21. 1.

21.1 = hiding or running away after the event, i.e. in Group I (Human Act).

22 = money of deceased found hidden in accused's house, i.e. in Group III (Fact of External Nature).

This plotting of a typical case will serve to show

(1) that all the various kinds of evidentiary facts can be accounted for and located in the above classification; and

(2) that as each evidentiary fact in turn becomes a 'probandum', the rules appropriate to that variety of evidence can be found and their bearing ascertained.[2]

In searching, then, for the true significance of a piece of evidence, it should always be remembered that the prime question serving as the key, not merely to this classification, but at all times to the use of evidence before the Courts, is: What particular proposition is the fact offered to prove? With the aid of this question, there will be little difficulty in discovering the specific problem which any particular kind of evidence involves.

[2] In the present author's "Principles of Judicial Proof" (1913), the analysis of a mass of evidence, under the above classification, is treated in full detail, from the point of view of analyzing and weighing the probative effect in argument to a jury.

SUB-TITLE I: EVIDENCE TO PROVE A HUMAN ACT

TOPIC I: PROSPECTANT EVIDENCE

CHAPTER V.

§ 51. Classification of Prospectant Evidence. It is convenient (as pointed out ante, § 38) to arrange the order of evidentiary facts, when offered to prove the doing of a human act, according as the indication of the evidence is Prospectant, Concomitant, or Retrospectant. Evidence of the first of these three classes is much the most voluminous, so far as it raises questions of admissibility, though it is probably not the most frequent in point of actual use in trials.

Evidentiary facts having Prospectant indications are of several sorts, which may be roughly grouped as follows:

Character or Disposition;
Habit or Custom;
Emotion or Motive;
Design or Plan;
Physical Capacity (including Strength and Skill).

The nature of the argument or inference in each instance is this: Because A had a Disposition, Habit, Emotion, Design, or Capacity to do (or not to do), an act x, therefore he probably did (or did not do) the act x alleged. Observe that the party alleging the act argues that the disposition indicates a doing of the act, while the party denying the act argues that the (opposite) disposition indicates a not-doing; the nature of the argument or inference being precisely the same in both cases, the difference being in the proposition to be proved.

Of these different kinds of evidentiary facts, the tenor of our law suggests that the treatment of Character or Disposition should come first; for the practical reason that special and positive limitations are conceded to affect it, and that these limitations have sometimes mistakenly been supposed to apply to the other sorts of evidence. Indeed, the Character-rule is the dominant one for this branch of the subject.

Sub-topic A: CHARACTER OR DISPOSITION, AS EVIDENCE OF A HUMAN ACT

1. Preliminary Discriminations

§ 52. "Character" in Two Senses: Disposition, and Reputation of it. There are two distinct problems of evidence about Character, in which the common use of one word for two ideas has caused confusion: (1) Is a person's disposition — i.e. a trait, or group of traits, or the sum of his traits — relevant and admissible for certain purposes? (2) Whenever it is so admissible as an evidentiary fact and thus becomes in its turn a proposition to be proved, how is it to be evidenced, — by the community's reputation, and by that only, and on what conditions?

The first question is essentially one of Relevancy, though auxiliary policies often come in to exclude relevant character. The second question, however, is raised in an entirely different quarter; it has nothing to do with character as an evidentiary fact, but with the mode of proving character, assuming it to be properly provable either as an evidentiary fact or as an issue.

Two special problems which the second question raises are concerned with the Hearsay Rule and with the Opinion Rule. The Hearsay Rule concerns the question whether Reputation-Hearsay, when offered to show Character, forms an exception to that rule, and on what conditions the exception is allowed, — what constitutes a reputation, from how many people must it arise, in what place and at what time, and so on (post, §§ 1608–1621). The Opinion Rule raises the question whether individual testimonial opinion or estimate of character is obnoxious to that rule, and operates (if so applied) to exclude the testimony of individuals based on personal observation of another's character (post, §§ 1980–1987).

At the present point, there is no question about the mode of getting at character; we assume that it is offered to be established in some way, and we ask how far this character (or actual disposition) is relevant to the present purpose. It is as if one had to decide whether he should spend a summer vacation at the mountains or at home, and also whether he should be able, in order to reach the mountains, to take a through train or should have to change cars; both these problems may have to be settled, and the acts both of traveling and of sojourning in the mountains are closely connected in point of time; but the considerations which affect the two problems have nothing in common; if we go, we shall do so in spite of having to change cars; and if we give up our journey, we shall take no train at all. Character and Reputation are as distinct as are destination and journey. Nevertheless, the occasional use of the single term "character" for both actual disposition and reputation of it, and the circumstance that reputation is the most usual (and in some jurisdictions practically the only lawful) way of evidencing this actual disposition, has sometimes led even careful judges to define reputation and actual disposition, for all purposes of evidence, as the same, and to intimate that reputation alone is the thing involved:

1817, DUNCAN, J., in Kimmel v. Kimmel, 3 S. & R. 338: "Character and reputation are the same; the reputation which a man has in society is his character."

1854, REDFIELD, C. J., in Powers v. Leach, 26 Vt. 278: "'Character' and 'general character' are the same, of course, if by 'character' we understand the common estimation in which the man is held, by his acquaintance, for truth; and the books upon evidence so use the term. The word 'character' no doubt has an objective and subjective import, which are quite distinct. As to the object, character is its quality; as to the man, it is the quality of his mind, and his affections, capacity, and temperament. But as a subjective term, certainly in the minds of others, one's character is the aggregate or the abstract of other men's opinions of one. . . . It is the conclusion of the mind of the witness, in summing up the amount of all the reports he has heard of the man, and declaring his character for truth as held in the minds of his neighbors and acquaintances; and, in this sense, 'general character' and 'general report or reputation' are the same, as held in the books."

But this notion is certainly unfounded. The law itself clearly demonstrates this, because there is in fact more than one way of evidencing actual Character. Reputation is not the sole way. Individual estimate was formerly always available, and still is in some jurisdictions (post, § 1980). Specific acts of conduct are also available for some purposes, especially to show a witness' character (post, § 977). If reputation were the essential and relevant fact, these other modes of proving character would be impossible; for the thing they are used to prove would be unrecognized in the law of evidence. The truth is that reputation is merely one of three possible modes of proving actual Character. Even if it were the exclusive mode, by reason of considerations excluding other modes, it would be as reasonable to identify it with actual character as to identify the Red Line railroad with the town Millville simply because the other railroads to Millville have been abandoned or blockaded. Character, then, is to be considered, for the purposes of relevancy, as the actual moral or psychical disposition, or sum of traits, and is to be distinguished from reputation or any other source of evidencing Character.[1]

This the Courts have frequently emphasized:

1855, PEARSON, J., in Bottoms v. Kent, 3 Jones L. 160: "As to the mode of proving character. The word has two meanings; to this may be ascribed the confusion of ideas met with in some of the cases. 'Character: The peculiar qualities impressed by nature or by habit on the person, which distinguish him from others; these constitute his real character. The qualities which he is supposed to possess constitute his estimated character, or reputation': Webster's Dictionary. Is a man honest, is he good-natured, is he of a violent temper, is he modest and retiring or impudent and forward, — these all constitute traits of character and are facts. . . . A witness called to prove them can only give the opinion which he has formed by his observations of the conduct of the person under particular circumstances. . . . Has a man the estimated character, or reputation, of being honest, or of being good-natured, or passionate, or humane, or cruel, — this general character, as it is called, is also a fact; it is the opinion which those who are acquainted with him have formed in respect to his several traits of character. This is also a mode of proving real character, which is the object in view. But it is objectionable, because it is a mere approximation, and does not arrive at the fact itself. The opinion of a man's acquaintances that he is honest, or good-natured, etc., does not prove that he is so. Still, this mode of proof is less objectionable than that which depends on the individual opinion of witnesses, . . . therefore it is admissible in more instances than the other."

1876, BERRY, J., in State v. Lee, 22 Minn. 409: "[The relevancy of character] does not rest upon the ground that in general repute the accused possesses a disposition which would render it unlikely that he would commit the crime, but upon the fact that he possesses the disposition, — a fact of which general repute is only evidence."

1884, CAMPBELL, C. J., in Pickens v. State, 61 Miss. 567: "Reputation, which is general, prevalent, concurred in generally by those familiar with one, is presumed to be indicative of actual character."

§ 53. Conduct to evidence Character, distinguished from the Relevancy of Character itself. There is also to be distinguished the use of specific conduct to evidence Character from the admissibility of Character itself to evidence something else. Thus, the prosecution in a criminal case may sometimes use the defendant's bad character as relevant; but it is not allowed to evidence that character (as a proposition to be proved) by specific acts of misconduct (post, § 194). The reasons affecting the admissibility of this kind of evidence to show Character must be kept separate from the reasons affecting the use of Character itself as evidential. The latter may be allowable, yet the other not. In civil cases the separation is equally important. Much will always depend on whether the fact of Character is being offered as an evidentiary fact, or whether it is itself a proposition to be evidenced by conduct exhibiting the Character.

§ 52. [1] For passages further illustrating the distinction, see post, § 1608.

§ 54. Character as Evidentiary, distinguished from Character as an Issue on the Pleadings. (1) The present question is, whether a person's Character is admissible to show the doing or not-doing of an act by him. But there are two other ways in which character may be involved, — one an evidential question, the other not. (2) Whether a person's Character is evidentiary for any other purpose, e.g. a wife's character to show that the husband's alienation of affection was a natural consequence, or a deceased's character to show that the defendant was reasonably afraid of an attack by the deceased. This use is less usual, but must be distinguished as not being offered to evidence the doing of an act by the person having the character. (3) Whether a person's Character is under the legal principles and the pleadings of the case one of the issues in it; e.g. the character of a plaintiff in defamation, either as expressly brought in issue by a plea of truth, or as issuable in the assessment of damages; the character of an employee as involving the employer's liability to a fellow-servant for the selection of incompetent employees; the character of a house charged with being used for immoral traffic; and so on. Here no evidentiary use is made of the character; it merely plays a part in the legal issues of the case, and the nature of the litigation must be looked to in determining whether character is so involved. This aspect of Character as an issue in the case has constantly to be distinguished; it is fully treated post, §§ 69–79.

2. Character as evidentiary of an Act

§ 55. (1) Defendant in a Criminal Case; Relevancy of Character. The evidentiary use of character for or against a defendant in a criminal case cannot be understood without separating the principles of Relevancy and of Undue Prejudice. As already pointed out (ante, §§ 42, 43), the first inquiry for all circumstantial evidence is whether it is relevant. If it is not, it cannot come in at all, and no further question arises. But if it is relevant, it may still be obnoxious to some independent policy of exclusion, such as Confusion of Issues or Unfair Surprise or Undue Prejudice; and so far as such a doctrine applies, the evidentiary fact, though relevant (i.e. having probative value) and therefore otherwise admissible, is to be excluded. Conversely, as soon as this auxiliary policy ceases to apply, the fact, being relevant, is no longer prevented from entering. It thus becomes practically important to ascertain how far character, for the present purpose, may be, on the one hand, irrelevant, and how far, on the other hand, the objections to it may be based on grounds of auxiliary policy (ante, § 42, post, § 1904); for thus only can be understood the changing conditions of exclusion.

A defendant's character, then, as indicating the probability of his doing or not doing the act charged, is essentially relevant.

In point of human nature in daily experience, this is not to be doubted. The character or disposition — i.e. a fixed trait or the sum of traits — of the persons we deal with is in daily life always more or less considered by us in estimating the probability of his future conduct. In point of legal theory and practice, the case is no different. A defendant is allowed to invoke his own good character to aid in the demonstration of his innocence; and the prosecution is allowed to use the opposite fact for the opposite purpose. The Courts have made it clear that a defendant's character is regarded as constantly having probative value on that question:

1837, PATTESON, J., in R. v. Stannard, 7 C. & P. 674: "The object of laying the latter [character] before the jury is to induce them to believe, from the improbability that a person of good character should have conducted himself as alleged, that there is some mistake or misrepresentation in the evidence on the part of the prosecution." WILLIAMS, J.: "It is evidence to induce them to say whether they think it likely that a person with such a character would have committed the offence."

1851, ALDERSON, B., in R. v. Shrimpton, 5 Cox Cr. 387: "You say he is not likely to have committed this offence, because he is a man of good character; then, in answer to that, they say he is likely, because he is not a man of good character." CAMPBELL, C. J.: "The question in issue is the good character of the prisoner, — whether or not he was likely to commit the offence of which he was charged."

1865, WILLES, J., in R. v. Rowton, Leigh & C. 520, 540: "It is a mistake to suppose that because the prisoner only can raise the question of character, it is therefore a collateral issue. It is not. Such evidence is admissible because it renders it less probable that what the prosecution has averred is true; it is strictly relevant to the issue." COCKBURN, C. J.: "What you want to get at is the tendency and disposition of the man's mind towards committing or abstaining from the class of crime with which he stands charged."

1858, STRONG, J., in Cancemi v. People, 16 N. Y. 506: "The principle upon which good character may be proved is that it affords a presumption against the commission of crime. This presumption arises from the improbability, as a general rule, as proved by common observation and experience, that a person who has uniformly pursued an honest and upright course of conduct will depart from it and do an act so inconsistent with it. Such a person may be overcome by temptation and fall into crime, and cases of that kind often occur; but they are exceptions; the rule is otherwise. The influence of this presumption from character will necessarily vary according to the varying circumstances of different cases."

1876, BERRY, J., in State v. Lee, 22 Minn. 409: "The purpose of the evidence as to the character of the accused is to show his disposition, and to base thereon a probable presumption that he would not be likely to commit, and therefore did not commit, the crime with which he is charged."

§ 56. Same: Defendant's Good Character always admissible in his favor. Character being thus relevant, it follows that a defendant may offer his good character to evidence the improbability of his doing the act charged, unless there is some collateral reason for exclusion; and the law recognizes none such.

Up to the beginning of the 1800s, it is true, the admissibility was not recognized in this absolute form. There were two well-understood limitations, both based apparently on considerations of probative value, but both now entirely abandoned:

(1) It was once thought that character could be appealed to in capital cases only:

1802, Mr. T. McNally, Evidence, 320: "It has been heretofore held that a prisoner cannot examine to character, except 'in favorem vitæ' when charged on a capital indictment; but the rule is now wisely extended to all cases of misdemeanors. And this appears to have been the ancient practice. In R. v. Brown, 1798, . . . the point appears finally settled. . . . Lord Carlton, C. J. C. P., said he had conversed with many of the judges on the subject now before the court, who thought, as he did, that . . . evidence of such a nature might be very material; for example, suppose a man of very great property was indicted for perjury, where the object to be attained by the perjury was a mere trifle, for instance a shilling; or suppose a man to be charged with a riot or assault who was known to be of a peaceable and quiet disposition; evidence of character in such cases, directly encountering the nature of the charge in the indictment must be of the last importance. . . . Lord Kilwarden, C. J. K. B., agreed with Lord Carlton, and observed that the reason generally assigned for the admission of such evidence in capital cases only was altogether unsatisfactory to his mind. It was said to be 'in favorem vitæ', but he had no conception, according to the principles of sound sense and right reason, that character could be evidence in a case affecting the life of a man, and yet not evidence in a case affecting his freedom, his property, and his reputation."

1807, Com. v. Hardy, 2 Mass. 317; murder. PARSONS, C. J., "said that he was of opinion that a prisoner ought to be permitted to give in evidence his general character in all [criminal] cases; for he did not see why it should be evidence in a capital case and not in cases of an inferior degree. In doubtful cases, a good general character, clearly established, ought to have weight with a jury; but it ought not to prevail against the positive testimony of credible witnesses." SEWALL and PARKER, JJ., "said that they were not prepared to say that testimony of general character should be admitted in behalf of the defendant in all criminal prosecutions; but they were clearly of opinion that it might be admitted in capital cases, in favor of life."

It is now well understood to be admissible upon charges of all grades, even of mere misdemeanors.[1]

(2) It was also once thought that character was receivable in doubtful cases only, to turn the balance of evidence:

1808, Lord ELLENBOROUGH, C. J., to the jury in Davison's Trial, 31 How. St. Tr. 217: "If you do not know which way to decide, character should have an effect. But it is otherwise in cases which are clear. If it could be permitted to operate where a crime is clearly proved, it would always be brought forward; because there is hardly any one who has not at some time maintained a good character. . . . If the evidence were in even balance, character should make it preponderate in favor of a defendant; but in order to let character have its operation, the case must be reduced to that situation."

§ 56. [1] Ia. 1874, State v. Kabrich, 39 Ia. 277 (in any "public offence"); 1878, State v. Northrup, 48 Ia. 584 ("all criminal cases where the object of the prosecution is to punish the offender for the crime"); 1900, State v. Wolf, 112 Ia. 458, 84 N. W. 536; 1903, State v. Cather, 121 Ia. 106, 96 N. W. 722; Mass. 1850, Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 295, 324; Miss. 1904, Maston v. State, 83 Miss. 647, 36 So. 70; N. Car. 1857, State v. Henry, 5 Jones L. 65, 67; 1895, State v. Hice, 117 N. C. 782, 23 S. E. 357 (in this case it had been ruled below that the defendant's good character was not admissible unless he went on the stand, — a ruling exhibiting such an ignorance of fundamental notions as would seem scarcely credible, even in a time when ignorance is allowed so freely to thrust itself to the front); Or. 1897, State v. Porter, 32 Or. 135, 49 Pac. 964 ("in a criminal action"); Tenn. 1906, Powers v. State, 117 Tenn. 393, 97 S. W. 815 (and upon all parts of the defendant's conduct).

But it is now understood to be admissible without any such limitations.[2] The broad statements by some Courts that a defendant's character in criminal cases is "always admissible"[3] negative impliedly both the foregoing limitations.

Whether, when admitted, it should be given weight except in a doubtful case, or whether it may suffice of itself to create a doubt, is a mere question of the weight of evidence, with which the rules of admissibility have no concern.[4]

(3) Where the doing of the act charged is not in dispute, because conceded, it has been said that character no longer has any probative function, and should not be received, since it certainly cannot be set up merely in excuse.[5]

[2] 1899, Rowe v. U. S., 38 C. C. A. 496, 97 Fed. 779; 1873, Kee v. State, 28 Ark. 155, 164; 1865, People v. Stewart, 28 Cal. 395 (overruling People v. Josephs, 7 Cal. 129, 1857); 1864, Jupitz v. People, 34 Ill. 516, 521; 1867, Steele v. People, 45 Ill. 157; 1876, State v. Kinley, 43 Ia. 296; 1895, People v. Van Dam, 107 Mich. 425, 65 N. W. 277; 1904, Maston v. State, 83 Miss. 647, 36 So. 70; 1899, State v. Sloan, 22 Mont. 293, 56 Pac. 364; 1790, State v. Wells, 1 N. J. L. 424, 429; 1857, State v. Henry, 5 Jones L. N. C. 65, 67; 1877, State v. Laxton, 76 N. C. 216, 218; 1898, State v. Blue, 17 Utah 175, 53 Pac. 978.

[3] 1874, Hamilton v. People, 29 Mich. 198; 1883, People v. Mead, 50 Mich. 233, 15 N. W. 95; 1859, Wesley v. State, 37 Miss. 327, 352; 1883, State v. King, 78 Mo. 556; 1909, Dickenson v. State, 3 Okl. Cr. 151, 104 Pac. 923.

[4] This is a profitless question, which does not aid the jury. A discussion of the question may be found in the following cases: Federal: 1910, Searway v. U. S., 8th C. C. A., 184 Fed. 716; 1918, LeMore v. U. S., 5th C. C. A., 253 Fed. 887; 1918, Linn v. U. S., 2d C. C. A., 251 Fed. 476; 1918, Warren v. U. S., 8th C. C. A., 250 Fed. 89; Conn. 1910, State v. Alderman, 83 Conn. 597, 78 Atl. 331; 1911, State v. Brauneis, 84 Conn. 222, 79 Atl. 70; Fla. 1921, Capello v. State, 82 Fla. 313, 90 So. 191 (larceny); Ga. Brazil v. State, 117 Ga. 32, 43 S. E. 460; 1905, Nelms v. State, 123 Ga. 575, 51 S. E. 588; 1913, Taylor v. State, 13 Ga. App. 715, 79 S. E. 924; Ill. 1907, Miller v. People, 229 Ill. 376, 82 N. E. 391; 1920, People v. Fisher, 295 Ill. 250, 129 N. E. 196 (assault with intent to kill; trial Court's instruction as to probative effect of accused's character held erroneous; the opinion is hopelessly confused in its own theory of proof); Ind. 1910, Hundley v. State, 173 Ind. 684, 91 N. E. 225 (here also to be considered in mitigation); 1922, Kellar v. State, — Ind. —, 134 N. E. 881 (rape); Iowa: 1878, State v. Northrup, 48 Ia. 584; 1915, State v. Bosworth, 170 Ia. 329, 152 N. W. 581, 588; Mich. 1868, People v. Garbutt, 17 Mich. 27; 1916, People v. Humphrey, 194 Mich. 10, 160 N. W. 445; 1922, People v. Best, — Mich. —, 187 N. W. 393 (murder); Minn. 1921, State v. Dolliver, 150 Minn. 155, 184 N. W. 848; N. M. 1915, State v. McKnight, 21 N. M. 14, 153 Pac. 76 (murder); N. J. 1921, State v. Randall, 95 N. J. L. 452, 113 Atl. 231; N. Y. 1904, People v. Bonier, 179 N. Y. 315, 72 N. E. 226; 1911, People v. Conrow, 200 N. Y. 356, 93 N. E. 943 (word-juggling); Oh. 1913, State v. Hare, 87 Oh. 204, 100 N. E. 825; Pa. 1908, Com. v. Cate, 220 Pa. 138, 69 Atl. 322; 1910, Com. v. Aston, 227 Pa. 106, 75 Atl. 1017; 1919, Com. v. Stoner, 265 Pa. 139, 108 Atl. 624; 1919, Com. v. Tenbroeck, 265 Pa. 251, 108 Atl. 635; 1916, Com. v. Ronello, 251 Pa. 329, 96 Atl. 826 (murder); Utah: 1911, State v. Brown, 39 Utah 140, 115 Pac. 994 (collecting cases; three separate opinions filed; the impression is that, as said above, the discussion of this subject, however learned and interesting as a logical pursuit, is profitless; for the subtleties of the instruction are lost on the Jury); 1921, State v. Harris, — Utah —, 199 Pac. 145; Wis. 1905, Schutz v. State, 125 Wis. 452, 104 N. W. 90.

The following shrewd observation comes down to us from yore: 1664, Turner's Trial, 6 How. St. Tr. 565, 613: L. C. J. Hyde: "The witnesses he called in point of reputation, — that I must leave to you [the jury]. I have been here many a fair time. Few men that come to be questioned but shall have some come and say, 'He is a very honest man, I never knew any hurt by him.' But is this anything against the evidence of the fact?"

[5] 1807, Draper's Trial, 30 How. St. Tr. 1018 (criminal libel; "Do you think the defendant capable or incapable of publishing any statement of facts of the truth of which he was not perfectly convinced?" A. "Perfectly incapable." Lord Ellenborough: "I cannot suppose you mean it for any other purpose than as going in mitigation of punishment.

But, after all, so far as in criminal cases the criminal intent remains in issue, the good character of the defendant may be regarded as always relevant to disprove it; and the better way seems to admit it.[6]

§ 57. Same: Defendant's Bad Character may not be offered against him. There is just as much probative value in the argument, "A is quarrelsome, therefore he probably committed this assault", as in the argument, "A is peaceable, therefore he probably did not commit the assault"; and this is acknowledged in judicial opinion (ante, § 55). Here, however, a doctrine of Auxiliary Policy (ante, § 29*a*) operates to exclude what is relevant, — the policy of avoiding the uncontrollable and undue prejudice, and possible unjust condemnation, which such evidence might induce:[1]

1865, WILLES, J., R. v. Rowton, Leigh & C. 520, 540: "[Character evidence] is strictly relevant to the issue; but it is not admissible upon the part of the prosecution because (as my brother Martin says) if the prosecution were allowed to go into such evidence, we should have the whole life of the prisoner ripped up, and, as has been witnessed elsewhere, upon a trial for murder you might begin by showing that when a boy at school the prisoner had robbed an orchard, and so on through the whole of his life; and the result would be that the man on his trial might be overwhelmed by prejudice, instead of being convicted by that affirmative evidence which the law of this country requires. The evidence is relevant to the issue, but is excluded for reasons of policy and humanity; because although by admitting it you might arrive at justice in one case out of a hundred, you would probably do injustice to the other ninety-nine." MARTIN, B.: "There would be great danger that the prisoner would be tried on the evidence of character, instead of on that bearing more directly upon the offence charged."

1840, VERPLANCK, Sen., in People v. White, 24 Wend. 574: "The rule and practice of our law in relation to evidence of character rests on the deepest principles of truth and justice. The protection of the law is due alike to be righteous and unrighteous. The sun of justice shines alike for the evil and the good, the just and the unjust. Crime must be proved, not presumed; on the contrary, the most vicious is presumed innocent until proved guilty. The admission of a contrary rule, even in any degree, would open a door not only to direct oppression of those who are vicious because they are ignorant and weak, but even to the operation of prejudices as to religion, politics, character, professions, manners, upon the minds of honest and well-intentioned jurors."

. . . It cannot be offered in the shape of a defence. Good God! because one man says a thing and because I may believe what he says, am I at liberty to disseminate it all over the world? There is no color for it. I receive this for the purpose of mitigation of punishment. If the fact of publication were doubtful, and if it were referred to a man [as defendant] who had such a character given to him, this would be evidence to go to the jury in answer to the charge, and in that way it would be most material. But here you do not dispute that fact").

[6] 1873, Kee v. State, 28 Ark. 155, 164 (here, to disprove malice in murder); 1851, Davis v. State, 10 Ga. 103, 105 (murder); 1904, Maston v. State, 83 Miss. 647, 36 So. 70 (even where insanity is the defence); 1913, Gilbert v. State, 8 Okl. Cr. 543, 128 Pac. 1100 (manslaughter; held erroneous to reject defendant's good character until defendant had testified or had offered some evidence of self-defence).

Whether the accused's good character should be presumed is noticed post, § 290.

In Texas, a statute of 1919 (c. 78, "Dean Law") provides for a suspended sentence, but only on proof of no prior conviction; under this statute, the accused's good character, though admissible after proof of no prior conviction, is not admissible until then, being immaterial: 1921, Hadnot v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 233 S. W. 1102.

§ 57. [1] The reasons for the rule were well and concisely put in a letter from the celebrated Dr. Parr to Sir S. Romilly, in 1811 (Life of Romilly, 3d ed., II, 180). Compare also the passages quoted § 194, post.

1872, DOE, J., in Darling v. Westmoreland, 52 N. H. 401, 406: "[There is] an exception (which is a peculiarity of precedents of English origin) excluding relevant evidence of a defendant's general and notorious disposition to commit such crimes or torts as that with which he is charged. . . . That such evidence is relevant, the law acknowledges by receiving, in criminal cases and in some civil cases, evidence of a defendant's good character in his favor, and allowing such evidence to be rebutted; and by receiving evidence of the character of witnesses and of other persons. The exclusion of such evidence is a plain departure from the general principle which admits relevant and material evidence. There is reason to believe that this exception originated in a usurpation of legislative power by English judges, led by a merciful impulse to mitigate the cruelty of a bloody criminal code by throwing obstacles in the way of its operation."

1895, PECKHAM, J., in People v. Shea, 147 N. Y. 78, 41 N. E. 505: "Two antagonistic methods for the judicial investigation of crime and the conduct of criminal trials have existed for many years. One of these methods favors this kind of evidence, in order that the tribunal which is engaged in the trial of the accused may have the benefit of the light to be derived from a record of the whole past life of the accused, his tendencies, his nature, his associates, his practices, and, in fine, all the facts which go to make up the life of a human being. This is the method which is pursued in France, and it is claimed that entire justice is more apt to be done where such course is pursued than where it is omitted. The common law of England, however, has adopted another, and, so far as the party accused is concerned, a much more merciful doctrine. . . . In order to prove his guilt, it is not permitted to show his former character, or to prove his guilt of other crimes, merely for the purpose of raising a presumption that he who would commit them would be more apt to commit the crime in question."

1884, Anon., Ten Years a Police Court Judge, by Judge Wiglittle, p. 166: "Take, for instance, an illustration of the uncasable crimes, the following: A man has had his horse stolen out of the barn. No matter whether a good horse or poor, here is something that law is bound to take notice of — that is to say, law is bound to open its ears and hearken to all that may be said on the subject. The fact that the horse is stolen is indisputable, because the owner avers it. So far so good. Here is a foundation for a case, and nothing is lacking but the superstructure. For the rearing of that the grave inquiry arises, Who stole the beast? The owner has not the slightest doubt in his mind that Ned Hubbard is the thief, and against Ned Hubbard he wants a warrant. 'What, Mr. Johnson, is the basis of your belief in Ned Hubbard's culpability?' 'Why, it is just like him.' 'Anything more?' 'Yes; he was seen 'round my barn.' 'Has he since departed the vicinage, or does he continue at his usual place of abode?' 'Oh! he's round the same as ever, and that's just like him too. He's throwing dust, but he dusted off with the horse all the same.' 'Do you trace him to any act of taking or having the animal in his possession?' 'Well, no; as to that I can't say I do; but just put a warrant on him, and he'll show the white feather fast enough. I know him.' 'But no warrant should issue against a fellow-citizen unless for probable cause, as shown by evidence more or less specific, tending to incriminate him.' 'Fellow-citizen! The place for such fellow-citizens as Ned Hubbard is State prison.' 'Granted, if he have done aught to send him thither.' 'Well, I've told you what I know about it.' 'True; but have you told me aught that is specific or even specious?' 'You're the judge, I suppose.' 'Exactly.' Exit Mr. Johnson, who goes abroad to disseminate prejudice against the court. He wants to know what a police court is for if not to do justice. . . . The effect of all this wanting to know is to Johnsonize a fraction of the community. . . . No judge is so imperturbable as not to be ruffled a little by teapot tempests.

"Accordingly, it may as well be confessed that sometimes, not often, but once in a while, judges have been known, when in a very peace-loving mind, to issue warrants upon the application of cave-wind Johnsons to avoid the sputtering of the familiar kitchen utensil, though the evidence was manifestly insufficient to warrant the warrant. This is not as it should be, because it makes unwarranted expense for the State, and tends to lessen in public esteem the Ned Hubbards who, in legal eye at least, are entirely crimeless."

This policy of the Anglo-American law is more or less due to the inborn sporting instinct of Anglo-Normandom — the instinct of giving the game fair play even at the expense of efficiency of procedure. This instinct asserts itself in other departments of our trial-law to much less advantage. But, as a pure question of policy, the doctrine is and can be supported as one better calculated than the opposite to lead to just verdicts. The deep tendency of human nature to punish, not because our victim is guilty this time, but because he is a bad man and may as well be condemned now that he is caught, is a tendency which cannot fail to operate with any jury, in or out of Court. There are also indirect and more subtle disadvantages.[2] Our rule, then, firmly and universally established in policy and tradition, is that the prosecution may not initially attack the defendant's character.[3]

§ 58. Same: Prosecution may Rebut. After a defendant has attempted to show his good character in his own aid, prosecution may in rebuttal offer

[2] As suggested by Sir J. F. Stephen, quoted post, § 2251.

The contrasting system in Continental procedure is noticed post, § 194.

[3] California: 1872, People v. Fair, 43 Cal. 137, 149 (murder by a mistress; here the defendant had offered evidence that the acts of the deceased had ruined her prospects in life, and the prosecution's rebuttal evidence that her character for chastity was already bad was held improperly received; this is clearly wrong, for it tended to show that an alleged fact relied on by the defendant was false and there was no other way of showing its falsity); Georgia: 1916, Smoot v. State, 146 Ga. 76, 90 S. E. 715 (murder); Indiana: 1915, Stewart v. State, 184 Ind. 337, 111 N. E. 307 (nor is the status of the prosecution's introduction of this evidence changed by the defendant's subsequent use of evidence of good character); Iowa: 1874, State v. Kabrich, 39 Ia. 277; Kansas: 1900 State v. Beaty, 62 Kan. 266, 62 Pac. 658 (larceny; the bad character of the defendant's associates, excluded); Kentucky: 1915, Romes v. Com., 164 Ky. 334, 175 S. W. 669 (receipt of bribe at an election; reputation "as a man that would accept a bribe for his vote", excluded; how the prosecuting attorney of Pike County in this day and generation could contemplate offering such testimony, or the circuit judge could receive it, is a question which suggests interesting possibilities); 1920, Owens v. Com., 188 Ky. 498, 222 S. W. 524 (possession of intoxicating liquor with intent to sell; "reputation as a bootlegger", excluded); Maine: 1862, State v. Tozier, 49 Me. 404; Massachusetts: 1763, R. v. Donks, 1 Quincy 90; 1850, Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 295, 325; Missouri: 1866, State v. Creson, 38 Mo. 372; New York: 1835, People v. White, 14 Wend. 113; 1840, People v. White, 24 Wend. 524, and passim; 1887, People v. Sharp, 107 N. Y. 427, 457, 14 N. E. 319; North Carolina: 1829, State v. Merrill, 2 Dev. 269, 277; 1847, State v. O'Neal, 7 Ired. 251; 1850, Fain v. Edwards, 11 Ired. 307; Oklahoma: Cantrell v. State, 12 Okl. Cr. 534, 159 Pac. 1092 (illegal conveyance of liquor; defendant's reputation as a bootlegger, excluded).

Note however that under some of the modern statutes (post, § 1620), admitting the defendant's reputation on a charge of keeping a house of prostitution, the prosecution may offer it in chief. Compare also § 78, post (keeping a house of prostitution).

Sometimes a case falls near the line of other principles: 1897, Downey v. State, 115 Ala. 108, 22 So. 479 (gaming; question to the defendant, whether he followed gambling for a livelihood, excluded; compare §§ 92, 300, post); 1880, State v. Moelchen, 53 Ia. 310, 313, 5 N. W. 186 (the defendant's previous occupation in Europe as a soldier, admitted; that it should be argued that he was "trained to scenes of blood and carnage", would be improper; but this was not necessarily involved in the evidence).

For the question whether the defendant's failure to produce evidence of good character is to be understood as an admission that his character is bad, see post, § 290.

For the use of bad character and of conviction of specific offences to affect the sentence imposed, after a finding of guilty, see post, § 196.

as evidence his bad character.[1] The true reason for this seems to be, not any relaxation of the principle just mentioned, i.e. not a permission to show the defendant's bad character, but a liberty to refute his claim that he has a good one. Otherwise a defendant, secure from refutation, would have too clear an unscrupulous license to impose a false character upon the tribunal.[2]

§ 59. Same: Kind of Character. What limitations on these uses of a defendant's character are imposed by the principle of relevancy? In the first place, the character or disposition offered, whether for or against him, must involve the specific trait related to the act charged:[1]

§ 58. [1] 1722, Page, J., cited in Vin. Abr. XII, 48, tit. Evidence ("In criminal cases, when the prisoner calls persons to his reputation, this gives an handle to the Crown to give evidence of the prisoner's reputation"); 1865, R. v. Rowton, Leigh & C. 520 (Martin, B., who expressed a contrary opinion, asserted that "in no single recorded instance during the whole of that period [two hundred years] has evidence of general bad character been given in reply to evidence of the prisoner's good character"; but it was pointed out by Cockburn, C. J., and Willes, J., (1) that where good character could be shown, of course evidence of bad character would usually only be available in case these witnesses were false, and in such a case the prosecution's customary warning of rebuttal-testimony would deter the use of the defence's testimony; and (2) that the mention of rebutting evidence of the sort, as allowable, by the great lawyer-writers on Evidence of the early century, showed a practice, and not merely a principle). This case disposes of the contrary ruling in R. v. Burt, 5 Cox Cr. 284, 1851, Martin, B., and Erle, J. (giving no reasons, but apparently moved by considerations affecting the right of counsel to reply as based on the order of testimony).

In the United States, the propriety of such evidence has been uniformly conceded: Federal: 1858, Clifford, J., in U. S. v. Holmes, 1 Cliff. 111, 15 Fed. Cas. 382 ("Such evidence is never admitted until the accused . . . has laid the foundation for its introduction by offering evidence to show that he is of good character, and then the counterproof is properly admitted as rebutting testimony"); Ga. 1919, Barnes v. State, 24 Ga. App. 372, 100 S. E. 788 (here the defendant in his own unsworn statement alleged his good reputation, without calling other witnesses to the fact); Mass. 1807, Parsons, C. J., in Com. v. Hardy, 2 Mass. 317 ("Whenever the defendant chooses to call witnesses to prove his general character to be good, the prosecutor may offer witnesses to disprove their testimony); N. Y. 1908, People v. Hinksman, 192 N. Y. 421, 85 N. E. 676 (defendant voluntarily took the stand, and after stating that he was once convicted of larceny, said, "I have been a good boy ever since"; held that testimony of his bad reputation was not thereby made admissible in rebuttal; this is decidedly over-strict; Gray, J., diss.).

[2] E.g. Erle, J., in R. v. Rowton, supra ("If the prisoner, having a bad character, misleads the Court, . . . the false impression should be removed"); 1851, Alderson, B., and Campbell, C. J., in R. v. Shrimpton, 2 Den. Cr. C. 322; Clifford, J., in U. S. v. Holmes, supra. In Lord Mansfield's phrase (2 Atk. 339), the defendant, by going into his own character, gives "a challenge to the prosecutor."

Under the English Criminal Evidence Act, 1898 (61–2 Vict. c. 36, § 1), the question constantly arises whether the accused who testifies has permitted the prosecution to evidence his bad character. But the cases are more conveniently considered post, § 194 a and § 2276, n. 5.

§ 59. [1] ENGLAND: 1701, Captain Kidd's Trial, 14 How. St. Tr. 146 (murder; Kidd: "My lord, I have witnesses to produce for my reputation; . . . I can prove what service I have done for the king [as a king's officer, before I turned pirate]"; L. C. B. Ward: "What would that help you in this case of murder?)"; 1865, Martin, B., in R. v. Rowton, Leigh & C. 520, 537 (it must be "good character with respect to the species of crime charged against him"; Cockburn, C. J., was contra, but this is opposed to his remarks quoted ante, § 55).

UNITED STATES: Federal: 1909, Harper v. U. S. 8th C. C. A., 170 Fed. 385, 390 (false entry in a bank report; the defendant's character for "morality and sobriety", excluded). Alabama: 1883, Kilgore v. State, 74 Ala. 7 (it must be a trait "having reference and analogy to the subject of the prosecution"); 1889, Morgan v. State, 88 Ala. 223, 6 So. 761 (assault with intent to kill; character for truth, excluded); 1897, Balkum v. State, 115 Ala. 117, 22 So. 532 (battery upon a woman; character for "running after women" admitted); 1905, Smith v. State, 142 Ala. 14, 39 So. 329 (homicide; defendant's character for honesty excluded);
Arizona: 1894, Chung Sing v. U. S., — Ariz. —, 36 Pac. 205 (selling spirits to Indians; character as a law-abiding citizen, excluded); Arkansas: 1873, Kee v. State, 28 Ark. 155, 164 (the character must be "such as would make it unlikely that the defendant would be guilty of the particular crime with which he is charged");

1663, Dover's Trial, 6 How. St. Tr. 539, 552; seditious publication; a witness testified that the defendant was a faithful member of the train-band. L. C. J. HYDE: "Do not mistake yourself. The testimony of your civil behavior, going to church, appearing in the trained bands, going to Paul's, being there at common service, — this is well. But you are not charged for this. A man may do all this, and yet be a naughty man in printing abusive books, to the misleading of the king's subjects."

California: 1857, People v. Josephs, 7 Cal. 129 (attempt to rape; character for "morality and good behavior", and "general character", excluded, because the character ought to "bear some analogy and reference to the nature of the charge"); 1865, People v. Stewart, 28 Cal. 395 (murder; character for peace and quiet admitted); 1872, People v. Fair, 43 Cal. 137, 147 (murder by a mistress; the defendant's character for unchastity not relevant to the act; "It is incorrect to say that the general character of the prisoner is received even in his own behalf"; it must be "general character as to the trait involved in the offence charged"); 1879, People v. Casey, 53 Cal. 360 (it must be "in respect to the particular trait involved in the inquiry"); 1882, People v. Doggett, 62 Cal. 27, 29 ("traits involved in the charge"); 1901, People v. Chrisman, 135 Cal. 282, 67 Pac. 136 (larceny; defendant's habits "as to steadiness, drinking, or anything of that sort", excluded);
Georgia: 1899, Dorsey v. State, 108 Ga. 477, 34 S. E. 135 (on a charge of rape, the defendant, a negro, was shown to have followed the woman, a white, for some distance; held that "under the conditions surrounding the two races in this State", the negro race of the defendant and the white race of the woman could be considered as tending to rebut the explanation that he might be following merely to solicit consent to intercourse without force; this ruling will no doubt pass, in some communities; but all such race generalizations are dangerous: it would be equally logical, on a prosecution for lynching a negro, to hold that the white race of the defendant was some evidence that he was a member of the lynching mob); 1914, Frank v. State, 141 Ga. 243, 80 S. E. 1016 (murder while attempting rape; the defendant having put in his general good character, his bad character for lasciviousness was then shown by the prosecution);
Idaho: 1913, State v. Allen, 23 Ida. 772, 131 Pac. 1112 (but deprecating theoretical strictness in applying the principle);
Illinois: 1884, Tedens v. Schumers, 112 Ill. 263, 267; 1905, Wistrand v. People, 218 Ill. 323, 75 N. E. 891 (rape; character as a "peaceable and quiet citizen", excluded); 1921, People v. Redola, 300 Ill. 392, 133 N. E. 292 (larceny; defendant's good reputation as a "peaceable and law-abiding citizen", held inadmissible, peaceableness being irrelevant; prior rulings explained);
Indiana: 1874, Fletcher v. State, 49 Ind. 124, 131; 1879, State v. Bloom, 68 Ind. 54 (larceny; the defendant's evidence of good character limited to "honesty and integrity"); 1893, Carr v. State, 135 Ind. 1, 34 N. E. 533 (murder by poisoning; character for peace and quietude admissible);
Indian Terr.: 1907, Harper v. U. S., 7 Ind. Terr. 437, 104 S. W. 673 (false entries; reputation for "morality and sobriety", held properly excluded);
Iowa: 1856, Gordon v. State, 3 Ia. 410, 415; 1876, State v. Kinley, 43 Ia. 295 (veracity, admitted on a perjury charge); 1879, State v. Curran, 51 Ia. 112, 117 (seduction; character for virtue admitted, but not general good moral character); 1898, State v. Heacock, 106 Ia. 191, 76 N. W. 654;
Kentucky: 1920, Denton v. Com., 188 Ky. 30, 221 S. W. 202 (murder; "his good moral character as well as his character for peace and quietude", allowed);
Louisiana: 1852, State v. Parker, 7 La. An. 83, 88 (murder; character not restricted to peace and quietness, but may include kindness as a husband and father, honesty and integrity and purity of morals; yet the character admissible is defined by the majority of the Court merely as "such particular moral qualities as have pertinence to the charges"); 1905, State v. Bessa, 115 La. 239, 38 So. 985 (assault with intent; character for honesty and industry, excluded); 1906, State v. Griggsby, 117 La. 1046, 42 So. 497 (murder; defendant's character for honesty and trustworthiness, excluded);
Michigan: 1868, People v. Garbutt, 17 Mich. 9, 16 (murder; defence, insanity; the defendant's reputation in the civil war as "a good and valiant soldier", excluded);
Mississippi: 1899, Westbrooks v. State, 76 Miss. 710, 25 So. 491 (illegal sale of liquor; defendant's general good character excluded); 1904, Maston v. State, 83 Miss. 647, 36 So. 70 (murder; character for "peace or violence", and a "peaceable and law-abiding citizen", admitted); 1905, Horton v. State, 84 Miss. 473, 36 So. 1033 (rape; character for peace or violence, admissible);
Missouri: 1858, State v. Dalton, 27 Mo. 15 (assault with intent to kill; character for peace, but not for industry, admitted); 1883, State v. King, 83 Mo. 556; 1903, State v. Auslinger, 171 Mo. 600, 71 S. W. 1041 (illegal voting; defendant's character for industry, held irrelevant; the Court is not bound to instruct upon irrelevant evidence of character, under Rev. St. 1899, § 2627, as amended by Laws 1901, 1794, Mr. ERSKINE, arguing in Hardy's Trial and Horne Tooke's Trial, 24 How. St. Tr. 1076, 25 id. 348: "The meaning of witnesses to character is this; for instance, put the case of a man who is charged with a crime of a particular description, — suppose a man charged with an unnatural crime; would it be any evidence at all to that man's character that he paid his bills regularly, and that he was not a dishonest man, or anything of that sort? No; your examination to character must always be analogous to the nature of the charge; and you would there inquire whether he was a man of chastity; you would in-

p. 140, relating to written instructions); 1903, State v. Thornhill, 174 Mo. 364, 74 S. W. 832 (defendants' repute as gamblers, admitted in rebuttal of their repute for honesty and integrity);
Nebraska: 1895, Basye v. State, 45 Nebr. 261, 63 N. W. 811 (character for honesty and integrity, on a charge of murder excluded);
Montana: 1919, State v. Popa, 56 Mont. 587, 185 Pac. 1114 (murder; reputation for honesty and integrity, excluded);
Nevada: 1880, State v. Pearce, 15 Nev. 188, 190 ("the particular trait of character at issue" is the kind admissible);
New Jersey: 1899, State v. Snover, 63 N. J. L. 382, 43 Atl. 1059 (carnal knowledge of one under age of consent; character for "morality, virtue, and honesty in living", admitted); 1904, State v. Brady, 71 N. J. L. 360, 59 Atl. 6 (rape; defendant's general reputation, excluded);
New Mexico: 1911, Terr. v. Pierce, 16 N. M. 10, 113 Pac. 591 (assault; character for truth and veracity, excluded); 1915, State v. McKnight, 21 N. M. 14, 153 Pac. 76 (murder by husband and wife; defence, the deceased's attempt to rape the wife; the wife's good character for chastity and conjugal fidelity, excluded);
New York: 1907, People v. Van Gaasbeck, 189 N. Y. 408, 82 N. E. 718 (homicide);
North Carolina: 1918, State v. McKinney, 175 N. C. 784, 95 S. E. 162 (bad reputation for selling liquor, admitted, on a charge of having liquor in his possession); 1920, State v. McMillan, 180 N. C. 741, 105 S. E. 403 (illegal making of liquor; defendants having introduced character, the State was allowed to show that "their characters were bad for making whisky"); 1922, State v. Saleeby, — N. C. —, 110 S. E. 844 (possession of liquor; defendant's bad character for selling liquor, admitted);
Pennsylvania: 1860, Cathcart v. Com., 37 Pa. 108, 111 (wife-murder; character as a "kind-hearted man" excluded, but character for "peaceableness and regularity of conduct" admitted; this is finical);
Texas: 1898, Poyner v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. 640, 48 S. W. 516 (incest; character as to "gentlemanly deportment and good moral character, allowed"); 1907, Saye v. State, 50 Tex. Cr. 569, 99 S. W. 551 (negligent homicide by a deputy sheriff; defendant's character as a cautious and prudent officer, admitted); 1913, Bishop v. State, 72 Tex. Cr. 1, 160 S. W. 705 (seduction; defendant's general character as a peaceable, law-abiding citizen, not merely as a moral and chaste person, admissible); 1921, Freddy v. State, 89 Tex. Cr. 53, 229 S. W. 533 (murder; general repute as a "peaceable, law-abiding citizen", admitted);
Utah: 1921, State v. Thompson, — Utah —, 199 Pac. 161 (indecent assault: defendant's reputation as to personal morality, not admitted unless limited to sexual morality);
Washington: 1900, State v. Surry, 23 Wash. 655, 63 Pac. 557 (assault and battery while making an arrest; defendant's character as a conservative and conscientious peace officer, excluded; this is unsound); 1915, State v. Schuman, 89 Wash. 9, 153 Pac. 1084 (policeman levying tribute on prostitutes; defendant's character as faithful police officer, excluded; unsound);
West Virginia: 1905, State v. Moyer, 58 W. Va. 146, 52 S. E. 30 (embezzlement; character for honesty, admissible).

Contra, but inconsistent with other rulings supra in the same jurisdictions: 1894, Funderberg v. State, 100 Ala. 36, 14 So. 877 (general good character, admitted); 1863, Hopps v. People, 31 Ill. 385 (murder; the defence being insanity, the defendant's character "as a man and a citizen" was admitted); 1863, State v. Knapp, 45 N. H. 157 (rape; general good character of the defendant for morality having been received, the State was allowed to show his bad reputation as an illegal liquor seller).

The prosecution's rebutting repute may be of the specific trait, even though the defendant's evidence was of general character: 1910, Com. v. Maddocks, 207 Mass. 152, 93 N. E. 253 (illegal sale of liquor; after the defendant's evidence of general reputation, held proper for the prosecution to introduce "his reputation as to being a law-abiding person in relation to the liquor law", but only to rebut the defendant's reputation-evidence; citing the text above); 1898, State v. Hairston, 121 N. C. 582, 28 S. E. 493 (only general character may be offered; but the opponent on cross-examination may ask as to the specific trait; a peculiar little quirk, which must add interest to the game of law as here played); 1912, State v. Wilson, 158 N. C. 599, 73 S. E. 812 (State v. Hairston approved); 1907, Schulz v. State, 133 Wis. 215, 113 N. W. 428 (whether on a charge of bribery the character inquired into may be, not merely the general trait of integrity, but also the specific one of being a corruptionist, not decided; careful opinion by Winslow, J.).

quire into his regard for women, into his morals, and into his conversation, so as it might rebuff any such horrible and detestable idea having passed in his mind, that he was a man capable in the ordinary course of his life of entertaining such opinions and making use of such expressions. So if a man is indicted for any other offence, if a man is indicted for a robbery, I say I will show you that he was not a necessitous man, that he possessed a large fortune at that time, that he was a man whose ideas were moral and totally contrary to any such practice. That is the nature of character. . . . I speak to a most honorable person upon the bench, who lately tried Mr. Purefoy for the murder of Colonel Roper in a duel. What were the questions asked as to his character? Were they whether he was a good officer? Drilled his company well? Was a well-bred man? Whether he paid his debts? No; but whether he was a man of humanity. A gentleman came from a great distance to testify that humanity was the paramount characteristic of his disposition."

1817, Turner's Trial, 32 How. St. Tr. 1007; high treason. Mr. Cross (for the defence): "What has been his general character as far as you have known him?" Mr. Gurney (opposing): "I submit to your lordships that the proper question is as to loyalty." Mr. Denman (for the defence): "If he is generally a respectable man, an inference arises that he is a loyal man." Mr. Gurney: "If a man is indicted for felony, evidence is produced to his honesty; if for rape, to his chastity; and so on." Mr. Justice ABBOTT: "As far as my experience goes, the inquiry into character is always adapted to the charge". Mr. Denman: " . . . A man who had conducted himself peaceably and respectably was not likely to enter into wild schemes." Mr. Justice ABBOTT: "The question was objected to as too general and therefore not applicable; it was not whether he was a peaceable man, but as to his general character."

1889, MCCLELLAN, J., in Morgan v. State, 88 Ala. 224, 6 So. 761: "The object and effect of such evidence is to disprove guilt by furnishing a presumption that the defendant would not have committed the offence; and hence the character sought to be proved must be such as would make it unlikely that the party would do the controverted act."

In the orthodox common-law practice, this principle was carried so far that the inquiry could be specifically directed to the defendant's capacity for committing the particular crime, and not merely to the abstract trait involved;[2] but this practice seems to have fallen into disuse.[3]

A certificate of honorable discharge from the United States Army or Navy, assuming it to be admissible by exception to the hearsay rule (post, § 1675 a), should be liberally construed, i.e. as importing not merely general good character, or the specific traits mentioned, but any other of the fundamental moral traits that may be relevant in criminal cases. The soldier is in an environment where all weaknesses or excesses have an opportunity to betray themselves. He is carefully observed by his superiors, — more carefully than falls to the lot of any member of the ordinary civil community; and all his delinquencies and merits are recorded systematically from time to time on his "service record", which follows him throughout his army career and serves as the basis for the terms of his final discharge.[4] The certificate of discharge, therefore, is virtually a summary of his entire service conduct.

[2] E.g.: 1803, Hedge's Trial, 28 How. St. Tr. 1403 ff. ("Do you believe, from what you know of their character, that the defendants are capable of committing a gross fraud upon their employers?"); and other earlier trials cited supra, and the cases cited post, § 1981, n. 3.

[3] 1905, State v. Bessa, 115 La. 259, 38 So. 985 ("Do you believe that a man like him would commit, etc.?" excluded).

[4] U. S. Army Regulations, ed. 1917, §§ 104, 105, 139–150.

When it is "honorable" in its import, it implies a career successfully negativing all of the more common traits involved in criminal charges. In this respect it is therefore more comprehensive than the ordinary community-repute (post, § 1608) to general good character, and is entitled to be used on behalf of an accused on virtually any specific charge of serious crime. In view of the high moral value attached to an honorable discharge in the military community, and of the vast numbers of men who saw service in the World-War, it is fitting that the evidential import of such certificates should be liberally recognized.[5]

§ 60. Same: Time and Place of Character. This, as a question of Relevancy, is simple enough. (1) Character in one place stands on precisely the same footing as character in another place. The person is the same wherever he is, and it is with the person that the trait is concerned. (2) Character at an earlier or later time than that of the deed in question is relevant only on the assumption that it was substantially unchanged in the meantime; i.e. the offer is really of character at one period to prove character at another, and the real question is of relevancy of this evidence to prove character, not of the character to prove the act; it therefore more properly involves the principle of § 191, post.

Most of the doubts, however, raised by a variation of time or of place have no concern with relevancy, but with the hearsay use of Reputation to evidence Character. Thus, a reputation 'post litem motam' may be untrustworthy; a reputation in a community other than the defendant's home may be ill-founded. These problems are therefore all discussed in connection with the Reputation-exception to the Hearsay Rule (post, §§ 1615–1618).

§ 61. Same: Defendant as a Witness. When a defendant in a criminal case takes the stand in his own behalf, he occupies a double position. As a defendant, his character cannot be attacked by the prosecution; as a witness, it can be. The question is whether the former position should be so strictly guarded as to require the exclusion of evidence properly admissible against him in the latter capacity; this question can be better examined in connection with the impeachment of witnesses; and it is therefore dealt with post, §§ 890, 2277. How far the defendant, by taking the stand, waives the privilege against self-crimination is a still different question, dealt with post, § 2276.

§ 62. (2) Character of Complainant in Rape and similar Crimes. The reasons of Auxiliary Policy which affect the use of a defendant's character by the prosecution are peculiar to that use, and do not affect the use of character as against other persons in a criminal case wherever it may be relevant.

One of these relevant uses is that of the character of a rape-complainant for chastity. The non-consent of the complainant is here a material element; and the character of the woman as to chastity is of considerable probative value in judging of the likelihood of that consent:

[5] The cases are placed post, § 1675 a; the opinions seldom distinguish whether they are ruling upon the present principle or of that of the hearsay exception.

1846, PLATT, B., in R. v. Ryan, 2 Cox Cr. 115 (admitting testimony to the "decency and propriety" of the general conduct of the prosecutrix, an idiot): "It is important to consider whether a young person in such a state of incapacity was likely to consent to the embraces of this man; because if her habits, however irresponsible she might be, were loose and indecent, there might be a probability of consent being given and a jury might not think it safe to conclude that she was not a willing party."

1856, ISHAM, J., in State v. Johnson, 28 Vt. 514: "In all cases of this character, the assent of the witness to the act is the material matter in issue, and on that question the defence generally rests on circumstantial testimony. In determining that question, which is purely a mental act, it is important to ascertain whether her consent would from her previous habits be the natural result of her mind, or whether it would be inconsistent with her previous life and repugnant to all her moral feelings. Such habits as are imputed to the witness by this inquiry have a tendency to show such consent as the natural operation of her propensities, and rebut the inference or necessity of actual violence."

1895, GAROUTTE, J., in People v. Johnson, 106 Cal. 289, 39 Pac. 622: "This class of evidence is admissible for the purpose of tending to show the non-probability of resistance upon the part of the prosecutrix; for it is certainly more probable that a woman who has done these things voluntarily in the past would be much more likely to consent than one whose past reputation was without blemish, and whose personal conduct could not truthfully be assailed. In other words, this class of evidence goes to the question of consent only."

The admissibility, on a rape charge, of the complainant's character for chastity or unchastity is generally conceded;[1] and her habits as a pros-

§ 62. [1] Accord: ENGLAND: 1843, R. v. Tissington, 1 Cox Cr. 48, Abinger, C. B. ("general want of decency"); 1851, R. v. Clay, 5 Cox Cr. 146, Patteson, J.; 1847, Camp v. State, 3 Kelly 417, 420.

UNITED STATES: Alabama: 1887, McQuirk v. State, 84 Ala. 435, 438, 4 So. 775;
Arkansas: 1855, Pleasant v. State, 15 Ark. 624, 643, 653;
California: 1856, People v. Benson, 6 Cal. 221, 223; 1899, People v. Shea, 125 Cal. 151, 57 Pac. 885 (following People v. Benson; McFarland, J., diss.);
Florida: 1895, Rice v. State, 35 Fla. 236, 17 So. 286;
Georgia: P. C. 1910, § 1019 (quoted post, § 64); 1902, Seals v. State, 114 Ga. 518, 40 S. E. 731;
Illinois: 1873, Shirwin v. People, 69 Ill. 56, 59; 1876, Dimick v. Downs, 82 Ga. 573;
Indiana: 1861, Wilson v. State, 16 Ind. 393, semble; 1884, South Bend v. Hardy, 98 Ind. 582; 1885, Anderson v. State, 104 Ind. 471, 4 N. E. 63, 5 N. E. 711;
Iowa: 1848, Carter v. Cavenaugh, 1 Greene Ia. 171, 175, semble;
Kentucky: 1907, Lake v. Com., — Ky. —, 104 S. W. 1003;
Massachusetts: 1880, Com. v. Harris, 131 Mass. 336;
Michigan: 1888, People v. McLean, 71 Mich. 310, 38 N. W. 917; 1907, People v. Ryno, 148 Mich. 137, 111 N. W. 740;
Mississippi: 1895, Brown v. State, 72 Miss. 95, 16 So. 202;
Missouri: State v. Duffey, 128 Mo. 549, 31 S. W. 98;
New Hampshire: 1861, State v. Forschner, 43 N. H. 89;
New Jersey: 1885, O'Blenis v. State, 47 N. J. L. 279;
New York: 1857, People v. Jackson, 3 Park. Cr. 398; 1838, People v. Abbot, 19 Wend. 197; 1874, Woods v. People, 55 N. Y. 515;
North Carolina: 1846, State v. Jefferson, 6 Ired. 305; 1868, State v. Cherry, 63 N. C. 32; 1897, State v. Hairston, 121 N. C. 579, 28 S. E. 492 (general character allowed, but not character for virtue, on the singular ground that the offering party may only ask for general character, though the witness, "of his own motion, may say in what respect it is good or bad"; a novel and groundless quibble);
Ohio: 1858, McCombs v. State, 8 Oh. St. 643, 646; 1862, McDermott v. State, 13 Oh. St. 331, 335;
Tennessee: 1874, Titus v. State, 7 Baxt. 132, 135;
Utah: 1898, State v. McCune, 16 Utah 170, 51 Pac. 818 (character for chastity);
Vermont: 1856, State v. Johnson, 28 Vt. 512 (Bennett, J., dissenting on another point); 1867, State v. Reed, 39 Vt. 417;
West Virginia: 1906, State v. Detwiler, 60 W. Va. 583, 55 S. E. 654; 1922, State v. Golden, — W. Va. —, 111 S. E. 320; Wisconsin: 1864, Watry v. Ferber, 18 Wis. 500, 502 (civil action for rape; the woman's character held admissible, and equally in criminal cases).

titute are usually regarded as equivalent to a general trait of character.[2]

The same doctrine should apply to a charge of enticement for prostitution, because the question is whether the woman went of her own impulses or yielded to persuasion.[3] But it should not apply in rape where the woman is below the age of consent;[4] and perhaps not in a charge of mere assault with intent to commit rape, or of indecent assault, or the like.[5]

Contra, excluding bad character: 1877, State v. Morse, 67 Me. 429.

Occasionally, too, a Court has been misled by the doctrine about presuming a witness' character to be good, and has therefore erroneously excluded the complainant's good character unless her character has first been impeached by the defendant: 1918, Patrick v. State, 135 Ark. 173, 204 S. W. 852 (seduction); 1918, Lockett v. State, 136 Ark. 473, 207 S. W. 55 (assault to rape; explaining Patrick v. State); 1921, Smith v. State, 150 Ark. 193, 233 S. W. 1081; 1898, People v. Kuches, 120 Cal. 566, 52 Pac. 1002 (admitting good character in rebuttal of alleged lewd conduct); 1900, People v. O'Brien, 130 Cal. 1, 62 Pac. 297 (where the Court inconsistently held that there was no such strict presumption in a criminal case, and yet that evidence of good character was inadmissible; the opinion is confused in its notion of presumptions); 1920, Allen v. State, 150 Ga. 706, 105 S. E. 369; 1921, Loyd v. State, 150 Ga. 803, 105 S. E. 465 (rape; prosecutrix' general good moral character admitted because impeached in defendant's testimony); 1903, Baker v. State, 82 Miss. 84, 33 So. 716 (excluded, except after impeachment by the defendant).

[2] England: 1829, R. v. Barker, 3 C. & P. 589, Park and Parke, JJ. (that the prosecutrix had on one occasion acted the prostitute, admitted, after hesitation arising from R. v. Hodgson, post, § 200; perhaps in effect only a ruling as to testimonial discredit); 1871, R. v. Holmes, 12 Cox Cr. 143, per Kelly, C. B. ("the associate of common prostitutes, and such evidence of general loose character"); 1887, Stephen, J., in R. v. Riley, 16 Cox Cr. 195.

United States: 1855, Pleasant v. State, 16 Ark. 624, 643, 653, supra, semble; 1877, State v. Shields, 45 Conn. 256, 257, 260, 263 (former prostitution admitted, but the purpose not made clear); 1895, Rice v. State, 35 Fla. 236, 17 So. 286 (admitting "promiscuous intercourse with men, or common prostitution"); 1888, People v. McLean, Mich., supra; 1895, Brown v. State, Miss., supra; 1838, People v. Abbot, N. Y., supra; 1874, Woods v. People, N. Y., supra; 1846, State v. Jefferson, N. C., supra; 1913, State v. Apley, 25 N. D. 298, 141 N. W. 740 (general unchastity, and resort to houses of prostitution, admitted); 1874, Titus v. State, Tenn., supra; 1856, State v. Johnson, Vt., supra.

Here the general habit must be distinguished from particular acts of unchastity, the admissibility of which has been much controverted (post, § 200).

The complainant's association with unchaste persons is near the line, but ought to fall under the present principle: 1871, R. v. Holmes, cited above, contra; 1862, Eddy v. Gray, 4 All. Mass. 435, 439 (bastardy; bad character of the young men she associated with, excluded); 1900, State v. Taylor, 57 S. C. 483, 35 S. E. 729 (reputation of the house of complainant's abode, excluded).

[3] 1899, Gore v. Curtis, 81 Me. 403, 405, 17 Atl. 314 (indecent assault and battery, and solicitation to commit adultery; the plaintiff's character for unchastity admitted); 1890, Brown v. State, 72 Md. 468, 475, 20 Atl. 140, 180 (applying the rule to the case of female minor charged to have been enticed for purposes of prostitution; but confusing the question with that of discrediting a witness); Brown v. State, 72 Md. 477 (admitting the minor's previous recent residence in a house of prostitution).

It should apply also in a civil action for rape: Contra: 1908, Harris v. Neal, 153 Mich. 57, 116 N. W. 535 (civil action for rape; the plaintiff's bad reputation for chastity, excluded, following the general rule for civil cases; yet the unsoundness of that rule as an inflexible one is here illustrated, for nobody has doubted that in a criminal prosecution the same evidence would be regarded as useful).

[4] 1895, People v. Johnson, 106 Cal. 289, 39 Pac. 622; 1903, People v. Wilmot, Cal. 72 Pac. 838; 1911, People v. Gray, 251 Ill. 431, 96 N. E. 268; 1907, State v. Blackburn, — Ia. —, 110 N. W. 275, semble; 1893, People v. Abbott, 97 Mich. 484, 485, 56 N. W. 862; 1898, State v. Whitesell, 142 Mo. 467, 44 S. W. 332; 1900, State v. Hilberg, 22 Utah 27, 61 Pac. 215. Contra: Tenn.: Shannon's Code 1916, § 6456 (rape under age: "the female's reputation for the want of chastity, at and before the time of the commission", admissible when the female is over 14);

Here the girl's good character is inadmissible also, except as supporting her testimonial character: 1908, Leedom v. State, 81 Nebr. 585, 116 N. W. 496.

[5] Admitted: England: 1817, R. v. Clarke, 2 Stark. 243; Canada: 1897, Gross v. Brodrecht, 24 Ont. App. 687 (indecent assault); United States: 1912, State v. Dipley, 242 Mo.

The only difficulty in applying the principle is to distinguish between the use of Character, as bearing on consent, and the use of specific acts of unchastity as a means of evidencing the character itself. The latter kind of evidence being in many jurisdictions excluded (post, § 200), the woman's character as evidenced by reputation is alone admissible in those jurisdictions; and it thus becomes necessary therein to discriminate between the general character or trait of unchastity and the specific acts of unchastity.[6]

§ 63. (3) Uncommunicated Character of Deceased in Homicide. When the issue of self-defence is made in a trial for homicide, and thus a controversy arises whether the deceased was the aggressor, one's persuasion will be more or less affected by the character of the deceased; it may throw much light on the probabilities of the deceased's action: [1]

461, 147 S. W. 111 (assault with intent to rape; admitted, on the principle of § 1106, and strangely ignoring the present principle); 1893, Shields v. State, 32 Tex. Cr. 498, 502, 23 S. W. 893; 1903, Barton v. Bruley, 119 Wis. 326, 96 N. W. 815 (indecent assault).

Excluded: 1811, Davenport v. Russell, 5 Day 145, 148. Here though it is not admissible to evidence the woman's consent, which is not in issue, yet it might be relevant to show the defendant's natural expectation of her consent, on the principle of § 402, post.

For the question whether the complainant in rape or bastardy can be impeached as a witness by general bad character, see post, § 923.

The following case is peculiar: 1906, State v. Romero, 117 La. 1003, 42 So. 482 (carnal intercourse with consent; the prosecutrix' unchaste character, not admitted for defendant).

[6] See the citations in note 2, supra.

§ 63. [1] It may be noted that the doctrine is of course equally applicable in civil cases where a similar controversy arises (as in Williams v. Fambro, infra); it is also to be noted that the trait of character must be that of quarrelsomeness, turbulence, or violence: Alabama: 1839, Findlay v. Pruitt, 9 Port. 195, 199 (assault and battery; the plaintiff's reputation for a theft, held improperly admitted as a justification); 1872, Fields v. State, 47 Ala. 603 (the deceased's character as a "violent, turbulent, revengeful, bloodthirsty, dangerous man", held admissible for "determining the turpitude of the crime and what should be the measure of the punishment to be inflicted"; no authorities cited); 1875, Eiland v. State, 52 Ala. 333 (character from the present point of view ignored); 1880, Roberts v. State, 68 Ala. 165 (same, semble); 1888, Hussey v. State, 87 Ala. 134, 6 So. 420 (question stated, but not decided); 1921, Lambert v. State, 205 Ala. 547, 88 So. 347 (repute, not personal knowledge, is the essential thing; unsound); Arkansas: 1874, Palmore v. State, 29 Ark. 248, 262, 263 (admitted as tending to explain "the conduct of the deceased at the time"); 1921, Trotter v. State, 148 Ark. 466, 231 S. W. 177 (murder; deceased's reputed character only, admissible to show knowledge: here the witness' opinion of deceased's character was excluded); 1921, Fisher v. State, 149 Ark. 48, 231 S. W. 181 (deceased's peaceable character, not admissible, except to rebut defendant's evidence of deceased's violent character; here, evidence as to carrying a pistol, held not sufficient);
California: 1858, People v. Murray, 10 Cal. 309 (admissible "when the circumstances of the contest are equivocal" as to self-defence; but whether the present principle is intended by the Court is not clear);
Florida: 1899, Copeland v. State, 41 Fla. 320, 26 So. 319 (admissible only as significant of conduct of deceased at the time of the killing; character for "general cussedness", or for immorality, excluded);
Georgia: 1860, Williams v. Fambro, 30 Ga. 233 (admitting the turbulent character of a slave, to show that he was probably killed, as claimed by the defendant, in an act of insubordination; see quotation supra); 1903, Dannenberg v. Berkner, 118 Ga. 885, 45 S. E. 682 (the plaintiff having made no attack, his character not known to the defendant was held inadmissible); 1920, Brooks v. State, 150 Ga. 732, 105 S. E. 362 (excluded, where there was no evidence of deceased's aggression);
Idaho: 1907, State v. Barber, 13 Ida. 65, 88 Pac. 418 (not admitted where there was "no question as to who was the aggressor");
Indiana: 1905, Osburn v. State, 164 Ind. 262, 73 N. E. 601 (excluded, where the defendant was the aggressor on uncontradicted evidence);
Iowa: 1907, State v. Rutledge, 135 Ia. 581, 113 N. W. 461;
Kansas: 1870, State v. Spendlove, 44 Kan. 1, 24 Pac. 67 (admissible, under the limitation, apparently, that the question as to the aggressor must be in doubt);
Kentucky: 1896, Com. v. Hoskins, — Ky. —, 35 S. W. 284 (violent character admitted, but not mere bad moral character);

1860, STEPHENS, J., in Williams v. Fambro, 30 Ga. 233, 235 (admitting the turbulent character of a slave, as indicating that he was killed in an act of insubordination, as claimed by the defendant W.): "To prove a proneness to insubordination, to be sure, does not prove an act of insubordination, but it does increase the probability of the story where there is, as there was in this case, other evidence suggestive of such an act. Such a story of the rebellion [as the defendant's], if told by a witness or indicated by circumstances ought to be more easily believed concerning a violent, turbulent negro, than concerning a meek, humble one. I think that any mind in search of truth in such a case, or finding itself in doubt, would want to know the character of the negro. . . . [The defendant]

Louisiana: 1878, State v. Burns, 30 La. An. 679 (the character of the deceased is said to be excluded as a general rule, with a possible exception for communicated character; the early cases under § 246, post, are assumed as authorities); State v. Johnson, 30 La. An. 921 (intimating admissibility in a doubtful case, to show that the deceased had probably quarrelled with and been killed by some one else); 1883, State v. Garic, 35 La. An. 970, 971 (a charge that it "tended to indicate that he [the deceased] was the assailant, and that the assault was felonious", apparently approved); 1893, State v. Nash, 45 La. An. 1137, 1141, 13 So. 732, 734 (uncommunicated character, excluded); 1900, State v. Robinson, 52 La. An. 616, 27 So. 124 (admissible; no precedents cited); 1919, State v. Vaughn, 145 La. 31, 81 So. 745 (excluded, no issue of self-defence being raised);

Maryland: 1877, Costley v. State, 48 Md. 175 (peculiar facts; the jealous character of the deceased, not admitted to show that the killing was the result of a quarrel arising from the deceased's jealousy of the defendant's intimacy with his wife);

Michigan: 1868, People v. Garbutt, 17 Mich. 9, 15 (excluded; obscure);

Minnesota: 1860, State v. Dumphey, 4 Minn. 438, 445 (admissible where there is a doubt as to the premeditation of the defendant; but no distinction is made as to the deceased's knowledge of the character, and the opinion is not clear);

Mississippi: 1849, Jolly v. State, 13 Sm. & M. 223 (general dangerous character admissible "when the manner of the homicide is not fully known"); 1859, Wesley v. State, 37 Miss. 327, 346 (declared inadmissible, but with intimations that in a case of doubt it might be received; Jolly v. State not cited);

Missouri: 1853, State v. Jackson, 17 Mo. 544 (obscure); 1886, State v. Rider, 90 Mo. 61, 1 S. W. 825, semble ("in determining the question as to who was the assailant", character admissible); 1906, State v. Feeley, 194 Mo. 300, 92 S. W. 663 (deceased's reputed character, admissible on the present principle; repudiating State v. Kennade, 121 Mo. 405, 26 S. W. 347); 1912, State v. Barrett, 240 Mo. 161, 144 S. W. 485 (State v. Kennade reinstated, and the present doctrine repudiated; it is strange that the Court is unable to see the point);

Montana: 1914, State v. Jones, 48 Mont. 505, 139 Pac. 441;

New Jersey: 1790, State v. Wells, 1 N. J. L. 424, 429 (admitted);

New York: 1876, Thomas v. People, 67 N. Y. 224, semble (admitted); 1886, People v. Druse, 103 N. Y. 655, 8 N. E. 733 (same); 1904, People v. Rodawald, 177 N. Y. 408, 70 N. E. 1 (excluded);

North Carolina: 1820, State v. Tackett, 1 Hawks 210, 213, 216 (murder of a slave; the deceased's disposition as a turbulent and insolent man, admitted); 1827, Pierce v. Myrick, 1 Dev. 345 (trespass for killing the plaintiff's negro; to rebut evidence of the killing being done in defence, evidence was received of the "peaceable and submissive character", "general good character and orderly deportment" of the slave); 1843, State v. Tilly, 3 Ired. 424 (murder of his employer by an overseer; because (1) no case of self-defence was made out, (2) it would show only arrogant language, (3) it was not properly proved, evidence was excluded of the deceased being "high-tempered, oppressive, and overbearing towards his overseers"; no precedents cited); 1848, State v. Barfield, 8 Ired. 344, 349 (murder; the character of the deceased as "violent, overbearing, and quarrelsome", excluded, because it would be admissible, if at all, only where the evidence was purely circumstantial; State v. Tackett distinguished); 1855, Bottoms v. Kent, 3 Jones L. 154 (the preceding cases, except Pierce v. Myrick, noticed, and the rule stated obiter as absolute, that "evidence of the general character of the deceased as to temper and violence is inadmissible"); 1859, State v. Hogue, 6 Jones L. 381, 384 (the character of the deceased, who had attacked the defendant, excluded; "there may be exceptions to the rule; State v. Tackett is admitted to be one"); 1859, State v. Floyd, 6 Jones L. 392, 395, 398 (the temper and disposition of the deceased for violence, excluded, the parties having voluntarily engaged in a fight; no precedents cited); 1877, State v. Turpin, 77 N. C. 473, 480 (the general character of the deceased for violence admitted, apparently on the conditions that self-defence be in issue and that the evidence be circumstantial; the precedents examined and summed up); 1880, State v. Chavis, 80 N. C. 357 (self-defence in issue; the deceased's general charac-

Williams' knowledge or ignorance [of the character] has nothing to do with that bearing of the character which I have pointed out. The sole purpose for which character was admissible in this case on the question of justification was, from the negro's general readiness for rebellion, to render more probable the evidence which tended to show an act of rebellion at the time he was killed; and this probability is evidently not affected in the slightest degree by Williams' previous knowledge. The light comes from the fact that the negro was one who was apt or likely to do such an act as the one imputed to him, and not from Williams' knowledge of the fact."

There ought, of course, to be some other appreciable evidence of the deceased's aggression, for the character-evidence can hardly be of value unless there is otherwise a fair possibility of doubt on the point; moreover, otherwise the deceased's bad character is likely to be put forward to serve improperly as a mere excuse for the killing, under the pretext of evidencing his aggression, and it is often feasible to obtain untrustworthy character-testimony for that purpose. In short, the same reasons for caution apply as in the case of uncommunicated threats when offered as involving a design of aggression, and thus evidencing a probable aggression, on the part of the deceased (post, § 110).

The reason for the hesitation, once observable in many Courts, in recognizing this sort of evidence, and the source of much confusion upon the subject, was the frequent failure to distinguish this use of the deceased's character from another use, perfectly well-settled, but subject to a peculiar limitation not here necessary, — the use of communicated character for violence to show the reasonableness of the defendant's apprehension of violence (post, § 246). As the purpose there is to show the defendant's state of mind, it is obvious that the deceased's character, as affecting the defendant's apprehensions, must have become known to him; i.e. proof of the character must ter for violence excluded, on the authority of Hogue's and Barfield's cases; Turpin's case recognized, but treated as dealing with some different question); 1897, State v. Byrd, 121 N. C. 684, 28 S. E. 353 (admissible only where the evidence of the killing is wholly circumstantial; opinion obscure); 1899, State v. McIver, 125 N. C. 645, 34 S. E. 439 (vicious temper and violence in anger, admitted); 1905, State v. Exum, 138 N. C. 599, 50 S. E. 283 (rule of State v. Turpin applied); 1913, State v. Blackwell, 162 N. C. 672, 78 S. E. 316 (admissible "when the evidence is wholly circumstantial and the character of the encounter is in doubt"; former cases summed up; query whether the opinion means "or" for "and"; Hoke, J., concurring, in repudiation of the first limitation);

Ohio: 1860, Gandolfo v. State, 11 Oh. St. 114, 118 (generally inadmissible); 1875, Marts v. State, 26 Oh. St. 162, 168 (declared inadmissible, without discussion);
Oklahoma: 1905, Sovereign Camp v. Welch, 16 Okl. 188, 83 Pac. 547 (see the citation post, § 64, n. 3);
Oregon: 1907, State v. Thompson, 49 Or. 46, 88 Pac. 583 (admissible);
Pennsylvania: 1863, Com. v. Ferrigan, 44 Pa. 388 (general deportment for violence, rejected, there being no evidence as to a necessity for self-defence);
South Dakota: 1909, State v. Raice, 24 S. D. 111, 123 N. W. 708 (excluded, where self-defence was not in issue);
Tennessee: 1846, Copeland v. State, 7 Humph. 479, 495 ("the character of the deceased" treated as throwing light on the question whether she was the agressor; no objection of law had been raised); 1872, Williams v. State, 3 Heisk. 376, 396 (the deceased's violent character treated in the same way; no objection of law had been raised);
Texas: 1854, Henderson v. State, 12 Tex. 525, 530 (not admissible "as affording presumptive evidence that the party injured was the aggressor"; for it would be "very remote and merely possible conjecture"; but here there was no evidence of aggression by the deceased);
West Virginia: 1918, State v. McCausland, 82 W. Va. 525, 96 S. E. 938 (deceased's violent character for many years past, admissible).

indispensably be accompanied by proof of its communication to the defendant; else it is irrelevant. In the present use, this additional element of communication is unnecessary; for the question is what the deceased probably did, not what the defendant probably thought the deceased was going to do. The inquiry is one of objective occurrence, not of subjective belief. This distinction, however, was in early rulings not always appreciated by the Courts, nor clearly laid before them by counsel. Hence, an early ruling excluding the present use of the evidence cannot always be taken as a repudiation of the present principle, but is often merely a ruling that the offer does not satisfy the doctrine of communicated character; and such a Court may in future recognize the present doctrine if the distinction is pressed upon it. Apart from a few such precedents, the principle is now generally accepted.

The State also can of course offer the deceased's peaceable character, when the issue of self-defence has been raised, even though the defendant has not first introduced the deceased's violent character;[2] though most Courts thus far are singularly loath to accept this dictate of logic and fairness. — The same question may arise where the homicide is said to have been provoked by some other immoral act of the deceased.[3]

[2] Accord: Indiana: 1858, Dukes v. State, 11 Ind. 557, 565; 1892, Fields v. State, 134 Ind. 46, 56, 32 N. E. 780; 1899, Thrawley v. State, 153 Ind. 375, 55 N. E. 95 (the defendant's issue as to deceased's aggression sufficing to raise the question); Oregon: 1914, State v. Wilkins, 72 Or. 77, 142 Pac. 589; 1920, State v. Holbrook, 98 Or. 43, 192 Pac. 640; W. Virginia: 1921, State v. Arrington, 88 W. Va. 152, 106 S. E. 445 (murder; deceased's good character, admitted after evidence of his threats against defendant);

Contra: Arizona: 1920, De Woody v. State, 21 Ariz. 613, 193 Pac. 299 (murder; evidence of aggression alone, and a plea of self-defence, not sufficient for admitting deceased's peaceable character); Arkansas: 1905, Bloomer v. State, 75 Ark. 297, 87 S. W. 438; Illinois: 1885, Davis v. People, 114 Ill. 86, 29 N. E. 192; 1907, Kelly v. People, 229 Ill. 81, 82 N. E. 198 (Hand, C. J., diss. on the facts); Kansas: 1874, State v. Potter, 13 Kan. 414; 1911, State v. Truskett, 85 Kan. 804, 118 Pac. 1047; Kentucky: 1914, Childers v. Com., 161 Ky. 440, 171 S. W. 149 (an astounding ruling on the facts); Mississippi: 1920, Richardson v. State, 123 Miss. 232, 85 So. 186 (deceased's peaceful character, excluded, though defendant had testified to an act of aggression by deceased; this case in its circumstances again exhibits the shockingly unfair nature of this rule; why do Courts feel themselves bound by the shackles of a senseless chain which they themselves locked and can unlock?); Missouri: 1906, State v. Feeley, 194 Mo. 300, 92 S. W. 663 (but the State may use character for peaceableness in general, in rebuttal, even though the defendant has offered only the deceased's character for quarrelsomeness when in liquor); 1913, State v. Reed, 250 Mo. 379, 157 S. W. 316 (murder; the defendant testified that the deceased was trying to rob him; the State then offered the good repute of the deceased for peace and quietness; excluded; State v. Feeley, supra, distinguished; the opinion clearly perceives the relevancy of the evidence, but weakly invokes a dread of "making a precedent which would open up a Pandora's box of collateral issues"; "there are always many collateral issues that resourceful attorneys could inject into all kind of suits"; is it not a pity that these resourceful attorneys are not matched by resourceful judges? And is it the law's fault that the resourceful judge is not permitted to checkmate the chicanery of the resourceful attorney?); 1915, State v. Ross, — Mo. —, 178 S. W. 475; Texas: The rule in Texas on this point rests on the statute, P. C. 1895, § 713, quoted post, § 246, and its singular interpretation is noticed in the citations ib., Rev. P. C. 1911, § 1143; Utah: 1911, State v. Vacos, 40 Utah 169, 120 Pac. 497; Washington: 1894, State v. Eddon, 8 Wash. 292, 294, 36 Pac. 139, Hoyt, J., diss.

[3] Texas: 1904, Melton v. State, 47 Tex. Cr. 451, 83 S. W. 822 (defendant killed deceased for insulting his wife; the prosecution was not allowed to introduce the deceased's character for courtesy to ladies); 1904, Orange v. State, 47 Tex. Cr. 337, 83 S. W. 385 (defendant killed deceased for incest with his daughter the wife of defendant; deceased's character for unchastity, admitted to show the probability of the incest); 1906, Gregory v. State, 50 Tex. Cr. 73, 94 S. W. 1041 (murder;

The use of particular acts of violence by the deceased rests on a different principle (post, §§ 198, 248); as also the use of the deceased's physical strength (post, § 84).

§ 64. (4) Parties in Civil Causes; Character generally excluded. It is to-day generally said that (subject to specific exceptions, some of them doubtful) the character of a party in a civil cause is inadmissible; i.e. that it cannot be used, as it is for or against a defendant in a criminal case, to indicate the likelihood that the act in issue was or was not done. This is laid down as a general rule, to which a specific exception, if any, must be clearly made out. This result, to be sure, was not always so clearly an accepted one.[1] But the State alleged that the motive was a quarrel over rents; the defendant alleged that it was his discovery of the deceased in intended adultery with his wife; after evidence of the latter fact, the State was not allowed to show the deceased's good reputed character for chastity and virtue, such evidence being admissible only if the defendant had offered the deceased's reputed bad character for chastity; of such a rule, all that can be said is that it would be regarded as abominable, in any other community; apparently, the innocent dead are to receive no right to defend themselves in this court).

Compare the interesting point, raised in the Thaw Case, as to contradicting the truth of the provocation in such an issue (post, § 262).

§ 64. [1] The notion that character might be resorted to is often advanced by counsel in the early 1800s; but the mainstay of this claim seems always to have been Ruan v. Perry, whose subsequent repudiation in its own court is seen in the line of New York cases following: 1805, Ruan v. Perry, 3 Caines 120 (the defendant, a naval officer, had ordered the plaintiff's vessel, a neutral, to lie to, and had taken her out of her course, by reason of which she was captured by a belligerent; the plaintiff charged fraudulent collusion with the belligerent captain; and the defendant's good character was received because the evidence was purely circumstantial; Tompkins, J.: "In actions of tort, and especially charging a defendant with gross depravity and fraud, upon circumstances merely, as was the case here, evidence of uniform integrity and good character is oftentimes the only testimony which a defendant can oppose to suspicious circumstances"); 1827, Fowler v. Ins. Co., 6 Cow. 673 (defence of fraud, in an action on an insurance-policy; the plaintiff's good character was excluded; Savage, C. J.: "A specific fraud is charged, that must be met on its own merits, unless supported only by circumstances, as in the case of Ruan v. Perry. . . . Every man must be answerable for every improper act; and the character of every transaction must be ascertained by its own circumstances, and not by the character of the parties"); 1832, Townsend v. Graves, 3 Paige Ch. 453, 455, Walworth, Ch. (character admissible in cases of "a crime, or any other act involving moral turpitude", if evidenced only "by circumstantial evidence or by the testimony of witnesses of doubtful credit"); 1837, Gough v. St. John, 16 Wend. 645 (action for false representations as to a third person's solvency; the defendant's good character for honesty and fairness in dealing was excluded; Cowan, J.: "Such evidence [for character] is, in general, confined to criminal prosecutions involving the question of moral turpitude. . . . The case of Ruan v. Perry is to the contrary; but that is virtually exploded. . . . I mean to be understood as speaking of the general distinction; I know there are exceptions; they lie in that class of actions, or rather of issues, where the general character is drawn in question by the pleadings or the points involved in a cause", naming slander, criminal conversation, and breach of marriage-promise, as some of the instances"); 1851, Pratt v. Andrews, 4 N. Y. 496 (inadmissible; general statement).

A generation later finds an uncertainty of utterance in this State: 1894, Bowerman v. Bowerman, 76 Hun N. Y. 46, 50 (copartnership accounting; the case turned on an account stated by the deceased partner W. D. B. in 1882, said by the surviving partner to have been wilfully false; other evidence was incomplete; held that the reputation of W. D. B. for honesty and integrity was admissible; "it is not usually the case that men with a reputation for honesty and integrity embark in a scheme of persistent fraud"; no authority cited; opinion approved on appeal in 145 N. Y. 598, 40 N. E. 163); 1911, McKane v. Howard, 202 N. Y. 181, 95 N. E. 642 (breach of promise of marriage; plea, fornication before promise; the plaintiff's good reputation for chastity not admitted to show the improbability of her doing such acts; but the opinion carelessly makes the broad but incorrect statement that this "has been the law from the earliest period"); 1912, Noonan v. Luther, 206 N. Y. 105, 99 N. E. 178 (assault and battery; defendant pleaded that plaintiff was disorderly while on his premises; her prior good habits, not admitted for plaintiff).

it is to-day almost everywhere accepted, subject to one or two occasional exceptions.

The reasons for this exclusion differ wholly from the reasons forbidding the prosecution's use of the character of an accused person; the two rules have nothing in common. The reasons advanced for the present rule are of two chief sorts:

(1) A party's character is usually of no probative value. Where the issue is whether a contract was made or broken, whether money was paid or property improved by mistake, whether goods were illegally converted or a libel published, there no moral quality in the act alleged, or at any rate any moral quality that may have been present is ignored by the law; and moral character can therefore throw no light on the probability of doing or not doing. In torts involving violence or actual fraud, such a moral quality may appear; but, apart from these, it is (almost without exception) either nonexistent or immaterial:

1854, MARTIN, B., in Attorney-General v. Radloff, 10 Exch. 97: "In criminal cases evidence of the good character of the accused is most properly and with good reason admissible in evidence, because there is a fair and just presumption that a person of good character would not commit a crime. But in civil cases such evidence is with equal good reason not admitted, because no presumption would fairly arise, in the very great proportion of such cases, from the good character of the defendant, that he did not commit the breach of contract or of civil duty, alleged against him.

1791, Thompson v. Church, 1 Root 312: 'qui tam' for an assault; the defendant's character as a malicious, quarrelsome man was rejected. Per CURIAM: "The general character is not in issue. The business of the court is to try the case, and not the man; and a very bad man may have a very righteous cause."

1826, MARSHALL, C. J., in Etting v. Bank, 11 Wheat. 59, 73 (action on an indorsement of a note as surety, against which the indorser set up a fraudulent concealment of material facts): "If this case depended on the deservedly high character of the individuals who were engaged on the part of the Bank in the transactions in which the suit originated, — if elevation above the possibility of suspicion that they could have meditated anything believed by themselves to be legally or morally wrong could decide it, this cause would not have required the great efforts that have been bestowed upon it. The names which appear on this record[2] can never be connected with actual fraud; nor would any difficulty be found in protecting them from the imputation, were it possible that it could be made. But judicial inquiries are into the rights of the parties; and although high and honorable character has and ought to have great influence in weighing testimony in which that character is in any manner involved, yet, when the inferences from that testimony are drawn by others, and a Court is required to pronounce the law arising upon them, character is excluded from the view of the judge, and legal principles alone can be acknowledged as his guide."

The meat of this reason is found in the expression of the Connecticut Court, that "a very bad man may have a very righteous cause."

[2] The counsel in the case were Daniel Webster, Roger B. Taney, William Wirt, and Thomas Addis Emmet.

(2) But there is, additionally, a complex reason of Auxiliary Policy (ante, § 29*a*), which has been pointed out by several Courts as equally sufficient for exclusion:

1820, HOSMER, C. J., in Stow v. Converse, 3 Conn. 345 (the plaintiff's good character not received to rebut a slander): "It is not only in contravention of the fundamental rule that evidence shall be confined to the issue, to admit such testimony; but it would be infinitely dangerous to the administration of justice. Instead of meeting a charge of misconduct by testimony evincive of not having misconducted, general character would become the principal evidence in most cases; and he who could throng the court with witnesses to establish his reputation in general would shelter himself from the wrongs he had perpetrated."

1847, WARDLAW, J., in Smets v. Plunket, 1 Strobh. 372, 375: "The evidence tendered towards this purpose [of showing the plaintiff incapable of fraud charged in a set off], if it could have laid bare the heart of the plaintiff, and ascertained really the strength of his moral principles, would have been highly influential. But examinations in court into general character, according to reputation, usually distinguish only between two classes, the good and the bad, without wise discriminations between the infinite degrees and varieties which exist of either class. Of most persons there is really no general reputation as to character, and of some the general reputation is widely different from the truth, which a full knowledge of their motives, principles, and habits would disclose. Sometimes upon trials the good are overthrown by unexpected assault, and often the bad are burnished and strengthened by the ready testimony which their influence procures in their favor; whilst many of their neighbors, who think ill of them, shrink from being examined, or being examined, cannot say that the suspicions which they entertain, and which they feel rather than know that others entertain also, have been uttered so as to constitute a bad reputation. In investigations concerning character, feeling and prejudice are more frequently exhibited than in inquiries upon any other subject. The number of witnesses is often extended far beyond the limit which upon other topics the Court would indulge; and if there be contrariety of opinion, the matter is usually left at last in great uncertainty. If in every case where an act of dishonesty is imputed, the imputation may be met by such evidence, then there are few cases into which such evidence might not be introduced; trials would be insupportably tedious; and the result of a trial would as often depend upon the popularity of a party as upon the merits of his case. These considerations suggest the propriety of adhering closely to the rules which have been established to regulate the admission of evidence of reputation concerning general character."

1864, ALDIS, J., in Wright v. McKee, 37 Vt. 163: "Many considerations concur in rejecting such evidence in civil cases. Evidence of this character has but a remote bearing as proof to show that wrongful acts have or have not been committed; and the mind resorts to it for aid only when the other evidence is doubtful and nicely balanced; it may then perhaps suffice to turn the wavering scales; very rarely can it be of substantial use in getting at the truth. It is uncertain in its nature, both because the true character of a large portion of mankind is ascertained with difficulty; and because those who are called to testify are reluctant to disparage their neighbors, — especially if they are wealthy, influential, popular, or even only pleasant and obliging. It is mere matter of opinion, and in matters of opinion men are apt to be greatly influenced by prejudice, partisanship, or other bias, of which they are unconscious; and in cases which are not quite clear they are apt to agree with the first one who speaks to them on the subject or to form their opinion upon the opinions of others. The introduction of such evidence in civil causes wherever character is assailed would make trials intolerably long and tedious and greatly increase the expense and delay of litigation. It is a kind of evidence that is easily manufactured, is liable to abuse, and if in common use in the courts, as likely to mislead as to guide aright."

These two reasons combined seem to justify the fixed policy of our law in excluding the character of the parties to a civil cause when offered to prove or disprove the doing of an act.[3]

[3] In the following cases the evidence was excluded, except where otherwise stated; the cases involving negligence, defamation, malpractice, and the complainant's character in bastardy, are dealt with post, §§ 65–68; certain rulings for homicide in self-defence, involving the plaintiff's character, have been noted in § 63, ante;

Federal: 1804, Ketland v. Bisselt, 1 Wash. C. C. 144, semble (evidence of good character excluded, because character had not been impeached); 1902, Morgan v. Barnhill, 55 C. C. A. 1, 118 Fed. 24 (civil action for homicide);
Alabama: 1837, Ward v. Herndon, 5 Port. 382, 385 (false representations); 1917, Parker v. Newman, 200 Ala. 103, 75 So. 479 (alienation of husband's affections; defendant's "general character", admitted for her);
Alaska: Comp. L. 1913, § 1503 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2053);
Arkansas: 1896, Powers v. Armstrong, 62 Ark. 267, 35 S. W. 228 (good character to rebut a charge of fraudulent purchase);
California: C. C. P. 1872, § 2053 ("evidence of the good character of a party is not admissible in a civil action . . . unless the issue involves his character"); 1894, Anthony v. Grand, 101 Cal. 235, 237, 35 Pac. 859 (battery; defendant's peaceable character excluded); 1907, Van Horn v. Van Horn, 5 Cal. App. 719, 91 Pac. 250 (divorce for adultery; respondent's good character not admitted, under C. C. P. § 2053);
Colorado: 1916, DeWeese v. People, 61 Colo. 140, 156 Pac. 594 (violation of a city ordinance by fraudulently selling spoiled meat; defendant's character for honesty and fair dealing, admitted; the opinion erroneously treats the issue as a civil one, and also reveals misinformation as to the modern New York doctrine);
Connecticut: 1786, Woodruff v. Whittlesey, Kirby 60, 62 (fraudulent transfer of property); 1820, Stow v. Converse, 3 Conn. 345 (quoted supra); 1828, Humphrey v. Humphrey, 7 Conn. 117 (divorce for adultery); Gen. St. 1918, § 6014 (in bastardy proceedings, "evidence of the good character of the accused for morality and decency prior to the alleged commission of the offence", is admissible, subject to rebuttal); § 5467 (in proceedings for disbarment, etc., of an attorney-at-law, "evidence tending to show the general character, reputation and professional standing" is admissible);
Georgia: Code 1910, § 5745, P. C. 1910, § 1019 ("The general character of the parties" is inadmissible, "unless the nature of the action involves such character and renders necessary or proper the investigation of such conduct"); 1861, Boatright v. Porter, 32 Ga. 130, 140 (bad character of intermediate party in chain of title, excluded); 1890, Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Sheppard, 85 Ga. 751, 766, 12 S. E. 18 (character of plaintiff in insurance claim, the defendant alleging her husband to be still alive); 1909, McClure v. State Banking Co., 6 Ga. App. 303, 65 S. E. 33 (plea of 'non est factum' to a note; payee's reputation for bad character as a forger, admitted; good opinion);
Idaho: Comp. St. 1919, § 8040 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2053);
Illinois: 1869, Sprague v. Craig, 51 Ill. 288, 294 (breach of promise of marriage; defence, acts of unchastity; the plaintiff allowed to show her good character, "for the purpose of rendering it improbable that the charge is well-founded"); 1876, Crose v. Rutledge, 81 Ill. 266 (crim. con.; defendant's bad character for chastity, excluded);
Indiana: 1832, Rogers v. Lamb, 3 Blackf. 155 (malicious prosecution); 1841, Walker v. State ex rel. Corbin, 6 Blackf. 4 (bastardy); 1855, Church v. Drummond, 7 Blackf. 19 (fraudulent transfer); 1865, Cox v. Pruitt, 25 Ind. 92, 94 (seduction); 1877, Gebhart v. Burket, 57 Ind. 379, 385 (civil arson); 1882, Haymond v. Saucer, 84 Ind. 3, 14 (similar to Sprague v. Craig, Ill., supra); 1883, Houser v. State, 93 Ind. 231 (bastardy); 1898, Vansickle v. Shenk, 150 Ind. 413, 50 N. E. 381 (action to set aside fraudulent transfer; the grantor's reputation for honesty, excluded); 1899, Hilker v. Hilker, 153 Ind. 425, 55 N. E. 81 (divorce, alleging wife's adultery; wife's character for chastity admissible on her behalf "to disprove the acts charged");
Iowa: 1881, Barton v. Thompson, 56 Ia. 571 (admitted only "where intention is the point in issue, and the proof consists of slight circumstances"; here excluded in an action for malicious burning); 1886, Stone v. Ins. Co., 68 Ia. 737, 742, 28 N. W. 47 (defence of wilful burning, to an action for insurance-money; the plaintiff's good character excluded); 1913, Phelps v. Chicago R. I. & P. R. Co., 162 Ia. 123, 143 N. W. 853 (battery by a railroad conductor on a passenger, the conductor being deceased at the time of the trial; the conductor's character for peaceableness held not admissible);
Kansas: 1882, Simpson v. Westenberger, 28 Kan. 756 (transferee in fraud of creditors); 1917, Colvin v. Wilson, 100 Kan. 247, 164 Pac. 284 (indecent assault; defendant's reputation as a "moral, chaste, and law-abiding citizen", excluded; unsound); Kentucky: 1892, Evans v. Evans, 93 Ky. 510, 20 S. W. 605 (divorce; "in civil actions, evidence of general reputation is not admissible,

It is possible, however, to maintain that the reasons of policy should be yielded to in ordinary civil cases only; and that where a moral intent is marked except when directly in issue"); 1905, Mattingly v. Shortell, 120 Ky. 52, 85 S. W. 215 (plea of payment; the party's character for honesty, not admitted); 1915, Lenihan v. Com., — Ky. —, 176 S. W. 948 (disbarment; "where the nature of the accusation puts in issue the honesty, probity, and good moral character of the accused", he may offer his good character in evidence);

Louisiana: 1914, Gould v. Bebee, 134 La. 123, 63 So. 848 (destruction of timber; defendant's character for honesty and honor, excluded);

Maine: 1829, Potter v. Webb, 6 Me. 14, 16, 18 (good character to disprove fraud in procuring a decree); 1841, Low v. Mitchell, 18 Me. 372, 374 (bastardy proceedings); 1849, Thayer v. Boyle, 30 Me. 475, 480 (trespass); 1877, Soule v. Bruce, 67 Me. 584 (trespass for battery);

Massachusetts: 1855, Heywood v. Reed, 4 Gray 574, 576, 581 (assignee in fraud of creditors); 1891, Day v. Ross, 154 Mass. 14, 27 N. E. 676 (good character for peaceableness, in an action for battery); 1897, Geary v. Stevenson, 169 Mass. 23, 47 N. E. 508 (the plaintiff's character, in an action for imprisonment, inadmissible, even though the offence set up in justification involves a crime);

Michigan: 1886, Fahey v. Crotty, 63 Mich. 383, 29 N. W. 876 (battery; the defendant's good character, excluded; but where "wrong intention or moral turpitude" is in issue and is evidenced only circumstantially, character is admissible); 1897, Munroe v. Godkin, 111 Mich. 183, 69 N. W. 244 (assumpsit for labor); 1897, Kingston v. R. Co., 112 Mich. 40, 70 N. W. 315 (personal injury); 1902, Adams v. Elseffer, 132 Mich. 100, 92 N. W. 772 (assumpsit by an employer against his clerk for misappropriating moneys; defendant's good character excluded); 1908, Harris v. Neal, 153 Mich. 57, 116 N. W. 535 (civil action for rape; the plaintiff's bad repute for chastity, excluded);

Minnesota: 1877, Schnek v. Hagar, 24 Minn. 339, 344 (action by a female minor for indecent assault; the defendant's character for chastity and morality, admitted in his favor); 1900, Hein v. Holdridge, 78 Minn. 468, 81 N. W. 522 (father's action for daughter's seduction; defendant's character for chastity admitted, because the charge "involved the commission of a crime by him": see quotation supra); 1919, Nickolay v. Orr, 142 Minn. 346, 172 N. W. 222 (indecent assault; defendant's good moral character is admissible, but not his bad character except in rebuttal);

Mississippi: 1884, Leinkauf v. Brinker, 62 Miss. 255 (sale in fraud of creditors; the vendee's good character for honesty and fair dealing);

Missouri: 1875, McKern v. Calvert, 59 Mo. 242 (seduction); 1877, Dudley v. McCluer, 65 id. 241 (equitable proceeding to set aside a settlement obtained by fraud); 1892, Vawter v. Hultz, 112 Mo. 633, 639, 20 S. W. 689 (action for death of plaintiff's husband; defendant's peaceable character excluded); 1915, Davenport v. Silvery, — Mo. —, 178 S. W. 168 (assault and battery; plea, self-defence; defendant allowed to introduce plaintiff's bad character for turbulence);

Montana: Rev. C. 1921, § 10670 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2053);

Nebraska: 1895, Stoppert v. Nierle, 45 Nebr. 105, 63 N. W. 382 (civil action for filiation of a bastard); 1909, Collister v. Ritzhaupt, 83 Nebr. 794, 120 N. W. 489 (bastardy; defendant's character for chastity, excluded);

New Hampshire: 1830, Washburn v. Washburn, 5 N. H. 195 (divorce on the ground of the wife's adultery; the wife's character for unchastity); 1838, Matthews v. Huntly, 9 N. H. 146, 148; 1866, Boardman v. Woodman, 47 N. H. 120 (the sanity of a testatrix was impeached by showing that she had charged one S. with fraud in a transaction and the character of S. for honesty was offered; excluded, as not allowable in a civil case to rebut a charge of fraud); 1897, Warner v. Warner, 69 N. H. 137, 44 Atl. 908 (divorce for adultery; respondent's character as to virtue and chastity, admissible in trial Court's discretion);

New Jersey: 1912, Rittenhofer v. Cutter, 83 N. J. L. 613, 83 Atl. 873 (battery in an arrest for a trespass; the defendant's peaceful and law-abiding disposition, excluded, no immoral or malicious motive being in issue);

New York: (see the citations supra, note 1);

North Carolina: 1840, McRea v. Lilly; Ired. 118 (seduction; the defendant's general character as a "modest and retiring man", excluded); 1848, Beal v. Robeson, 8 Ired. 276 (malicious prosecution; the defendant had prosecuted for robbery; the plaintiff offered evidence that the defendant had merely fallen while drunk; the defendant's general character for sobriety, excluded); 1855, Bottoms v. Kent, 3 Jones L. 154 (the propounder of a will, alleged by the caveator to have procured it by threats, not allowed to show his "easy, quiet temper and facile disposition"); 1898, Marcom v. Adams, 122 N. C. 222, 29 S. E. 333 (land sold; defendant's bad character, excluded); 1922, McKay's Will, — N. C. —, 111 S. E. 5 (contest of will, on the ground of undue influence; good character of caveators excluded); 1922, Merrill v. Tew, — N. C. —, 110 S. E. 850 (breach of contract of sale of potatoes; party's reputation as to dealings in potatoes, excluded);

North Dakota: 1899, Kinneberg v. Kinneberg, 8 N. D. 311, 79 N. W. 337 (assault with intent to rape; defendant's character for chastity, and prominent in the nature of the issue, the defendant's good moral character should be received as in criminal cases. This view has in more modern opin-excluded); 1914, State v. Brunette, 28 N. D. 539, 150 N. W. 271 (bastardy proceedings; the defendant's character for "chastity and virtue", excluded);

Oklahoma: 1905, Sovereign Camp v. Welch, 16 Okl. 188, 83 Pac. 547 (whether the deceased insured, killed by E., was killed while "in violation of the law" under the policy; the deceased's character as a peaceful law-abiding citizen admitted; following Scott v. Fletcher, Tenn., infra); 1914, Hammett v. State, 42 Okl. 384, 141 Pac. 419 (civil action for penalty for violation of liquor law; defendant's good character excluded);
Oregon: Laws 1920, § 865 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2053); 1896, Munkers v. Ins. Co., 30 Or. 211, 46 Pac. 850 (defence alleging a wilful firing by the plaintiff in an action on a policy; the plaintiff's character excluded);
Pennsylvania: 1819, Nash v. Gilkeson, 5 S. & R. 352 (assumpsit for money had and received; the defendant's good character excluded); 1819, Dietrick v. Dietrick, 5 S. & R. 208 (good character to rebut a charge of fraud, not admissible, because "a man having a good character may commit a fraud"; but here, a will being attacked on the ground of fraudulent and undue influence by the devisee, in misrepresenting to the testator the moral character of the disinherited son's wife, her real character was allowed to be shown, as in issue upon the falsity of the representations); 1823, Anderson v. Long, 10 S. & R. 55, 60 (debt on bond; defence, fraud; the defendant's good character excluded, because not put in issue); 1825, Nussear v. Arnold, 13 S. & R. 323, 328 (same point, where the devisees had falsely represented their own characters); 1854, Porter v. Seiler, 23 Pa. 424, 429 (trespass for stabbing; the injury had been given while the plaintiff was attempting by force to get possession of a carriage in which the defendant was; the defendant's character for peaceableness, the plea being self-defence, was rejected; the doctrine that it was receivable where the evidence was conflicting, expressly denied); 1855, Leckey v. Bloser, 24 Pa. 401, 406 (breach of marriage-promise; plaintiff's good character not admitted to rebut evidence of her improper conduct); 1877, Battles v. Laudenslager, 84 Pa. 446, 452 (a sharer in the fraud, not a party to the case); 1885, American Fire Ins. Co. v. Hazen, 110 Pa. 530, 537 (wilful burning by the insured as a defence by the insurer; the insured's reputation for honesty, peace, and good order, excluded);
Philippine Isl.: C. C. P. 1901, § 344 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2053, improving the last three words to read "involved is character");
Porto Rico: Rev. St. & C. 1911, § 1528 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 2053);
Rhode Island: 1901, Markey v. Angell, 22 R. I. 343, 47 Atl. 882 (assault and battery);
South Carolina: 1825, Rhodes v. Bunch, 3 McC. 66, semble (trespass, with justification); 1847, Smets v. Plunket, 1 Strobh. Eq. 372 (assumpsit; the defendant, in set-off, claimed a balance due from sales by the plaintiff, as commission-agent, which he had falsely suppressed; the plaintiff's good character was excluded; "in civil cases . . . evidence as to that character [of a party] cannot be offered to contradict an imputation of dishonesty or even of fraud"; quoted supra); 1901, Marshall v. Mitchell, 59 S. C. 523, 38 S. E. 158 (services to deceased; reputation of deceased for prompt payment, not admitted to show payment);
Tennessee: 1809, Scott v. Fletcher, 1 Overton 488 ("in questions of tort, or quasi tort, where the injury is doubtful, character may be given in evidence"; Powel, J., doubted); 1870, Henry v. Brown, 2 Heisk. 213 (trespass for killing a heifer; defendant's good character for honesty, admitted; since "the charge is one involving moral turpitude"; Ruan v. Perry followed); 1872, Spears v. Ins. Co., 1 Baxt. 370 (insurance action; defence, the plaintiff's arson; the plaintiff's good character for honesty, admitted); 1889, Rogers v. Stokes, 87 Tenn. 215, 11 S. W. 215 (payee's fraud in the renewal of notes; the payee's good character for honesty, admitted); 1890, McBee v. Bowman, 89 Tenn. 140, 14 S. W. 481 (alleged forgery of a later will by a claimant; the claimant's good character admitted); 1902, Continental Bank v. First Nat'l Bank, 108 Tenn. 374, 68 S. W. 497 (false representations; "the rule in Tennessee is that in cases where a party is charged with a great moral wrong, he may introduce evidence of good character"); Vermont: 1859, Lander v. Seaver, 32 Vt. 114 (trespass for a beating by the defendant as schoolmaster; the trial court having made the issue to turn on the presence of malice, the defendant's character as a "mild and moderate master" was held properly admitted for this purpose; but not upon the question whether a beating was given); 1864, Wright v. McKee, 37 Vt. 161 (trover against a carrier for negligently losing a package of money; the facts were such that if the plaintiff's version were true, the defendant had been guilty of embezzlement; the defendant's good character was rejected as not admissible in civil cases; quoted supra); 1905, Coruth v. Jones, 77 Vt. 441, 60 Atl. 814 (assault and battery; defendant's character as a peaceable man, excluded); 1916, Russ v. Good, 90 Vt. 236, 97 Atl. 987 (assault and battery; plea, self-defence; defendant's character as a quarrelsome man, not admitted); 1917, Sanders v. Burnham, 91 Vt. 480, 100 Atl. 905 (aliena-ions seemed to gain ground, and if only it can be phrased in a definite rule it is worth recognizing:[4]

1900, START, C. J., in Hein v. Holdridge, 78 Minn. 468, 81 N. W. 522. "There would seem to be no logical reason why the same rule should not apply to civil actions in which the defendant is charged with a crime. . . . The rule seems to be one of practical convenience, for the purpose of avoiding the confusion of issues. On principle, however, it would seem that there ought to be exceptions to this general rule. . . . Inasmuch as the general rule is not based upon any philosophical reason, but is merely one of convenience, it ought not to be applied to cases where justice to the defendant requires that the inconvenience arising from a confusion of the issues should be disregarded, and he be permitted to give evidence of his previous good character, or, in other words, that such evidence ought to be received in a civil action when it is of a character to bring it within all of the reasons for admitting such evidence in criminal cases. Civil actions for an indecent assault, for seduction and kindred cases, are of this character; for such cases are not infrequently mere speculative and blackmailing schemes. The consequences to the defendant of a verdict against him in such a case are most serious, for the issue as to him involves his fortune, his honor, his family. From the very nature of the charge, it often happens that an innocent man can only meet the issue by a denial of the charge, and proof of his previous good character. Ought a defendant in such a case to be deprived of the right to lay before the jury evidence of his previous good character, because it will tend to confuse the issue, while a defendant in a case where the State charges him with a simple assault, involving no more serious consequences than the payment, perhaps, of a fine of five dollars, is accorded the absolute right to give such evidence? . . . [But the doctrine] ought not to be extended to civil actions where the issue relates to a simple assault, or to the fraud, deceit, or negligence of the defendant, or to similar actions, for they are not within the reasons we have suggested for the admission of evidence of good character in exceptional civil actions."

1909, McClure v. State Banking Co., 6 Ga. App. 303, 65 S. E. 33; the bank sued McClure on a note made payable to one Turner and indorsed by him to the bank; the defendant claimed that the note was a forgery, and that Turner had committed the forgery. He offered to prove, in support of this contention, that the general reputation of Turner was very bad and that he bore the general reputation of having been engaged in the business of committing forgeries. The trial Court declined to allow the proof. POWELL, J., "The rule prevailing in England and in most of the American States, that evidence of character is not usually received when offered for the purpose of throwing light on the probability of the doing of a certain act by the person whose character is in question, is not of force in this state. The contrary doctrine has been recognized in our jurisprudence from a very early date. Frequently this kind of evidence has a distinct relevancy and a high degree of probative value, because it tends to make the question involved in the issue more or less probable in favor of one side of the case or the other. Even those Courts and text-writers who support and lay down the proposition that the evidence is not admissible do not put it on the ground that the evidence lacks relevancy or probative value, but rather rely on the ancient and well-established character of the rule itself. The Courts of this State, out of deference to the policy expressed in the maxim 'Let there be light', have rejected the old rule, which has long outlived the reason from which it sprang.

"In the case at bar the maker of the note claimed that Turner had forged his signature. Now, if Turner were a man of good character, this fact would have made the defendant's tion of husband's affections; acts of intoxication, etc., by defendant, excluded);

Washington: 1903, Poler v. Poler, 32 Wash. 400, 73 Pac. 372 (divorce for sodomy; respondent's character as a "law-abiding and moral man", excluded);
West Virginia: 1918, Hess v. Marinari, 81 W. Va. 500, 94 S. E. 968 (assault; defendant's good character for peace and quiet, admitted, approving the text above; leading opinion by Ritz, J.).

[4] The cases are cited supra, n. 3.

contention very improbable. . . . On the other hand, proof that Turner was a man of bad character, and especially that he had the general reputation of being a frequent and notorious forger, would tend to make the defendant's contention that the signature to the note was a forgery more probable."

§ 65. Same: Character of a Defendant or a Plaintiff charged with Negligence. A few Courts have shown an inclination to admit, exceptionally, the character of a person charged with a negligent act (contributory negligence, if a plaintiff), as throwing light on the probability of his having acted carelessly on the occasion in question; provided that the other evidence leaves the matter in great doubt, or that the other evidence is purely circumstantial, or (as sometimes put) that there are no eye-witnesses testifying. The mainstay of this exceptional doctrine seems to have been the 'obiter' suggestion in Tenney v. Tutile.[1] Such evidence is no doubt likely to be of some probative value in such cases, and under the above limitations is hardly contrary to the ordinary policy of avoiding confusion of issues (ante, § 64). As a matter of law, however, the doctrine is maintained in a few jurisdictions only, and has been expressly repudiated in many.[2]

§ 65. [1] 1861, Tenney v. Tuttle, 1 All. Mass. 185 (the defendant, in action for injuries caused by a runaway horse, left standing untied, in the street, offered to show "his own character as a careful, prudent, and cautious man", as bearing on the question of whether he used ordinary care on this occasion; Metcalf, J., excluding it: "When the precise act or omission of a defendant is proved, the question whether it is actionable negligence is to be decided by the character of that act or omission, and not by the character for care and caution that the defendant may sustain. If such evidence . . . is ever admissible in a case like this, we incline to the opinion that it is only when the plaintiff attempts to prove the defendant's negligence by merely circumstantial evidence, or, perhaps, by witnesses shown to be of doubtful veracity").

[2] ENGLAND: 1889, Stephen, J., in Brown v. R. Co., L. R. 22 Q. B. D. 393 (character for negligence, inadmissible);

UNITED STATES: Federal: 1896, Central Vt. R. Co. v. Ruggles, 21 C. C. A. 575, 75 Fed. 953 (intemperate habits of a watchman to show a specific failure of duty, excluded); 1898, Harriman v. Pullman P. C. Co., 29 C. C. A. 194, 85 Fed. 353 (employee's careful character, excluded); 1913, Arizona & N. M. R. Co. v. Clark, 9th C. C. A., 207 Fed. 817, 823 (whether plaintiff was a careful or negligent engineer, excluded; the opinion shows ignorance of the different principles involved);
Arkansas: 1907, St. Louis I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Inman, 81 Ark. 591, 99 S. W. 832 (contributory negligence; deceased's character as a "cautious, careful, and prudent man", excluded);
California: 1893, Towle v. P. I. Co., 98 Cal. 342, 33 Pac. 207 (careful character of defendant's employee, excluded, distinguishing Ficken v. Jones, 28 Cal. 618); 1911, Carr v. Stern, 17 Cal. App. 397, 120 Pac. 35 (defendant's driver's character for skill and efficiency, excluded);
Connecticut: 1874, Morris v. East Haven, 41 Conn. 252 (contributory negligence; plaintiff's character for prudence, shown from personal opinion, excluded); 1902, Mears v. R. Co., 75 Conn. 171, 52 Atl. 610 (whether a piano was carefully moved on a rainy day; "nor did proof of the care he generally took on rainy days legitimately tend to show the care he actually took on any particular rainy day"; it is singular that such language can be put forth from the bench by those who in other relations would by their own actions repudiate it as illogical; this was an offer of habit);
Florida: 1886, Saussy v. R. Co., 22 Fla. 327, 329 (reputation of the defendant's servant, who caused the harm, excluded);
Idaho: 1913, Denbeigh v. Oregon-Washington R. & Nav. Co., 23 Ida. 663, 132 Pac. 112 (engineer's reputation for care and prudence, excluded);
Illinois: 1883, Chicago, R. I. & P. Co. v. Clark, 108 Ill. 113 (a brakeman's character as to being "habitually prudent, cautious, and temperate", held admissible, unless there had been "witnesses who saw the infliction of the injury"); 1893, Toledo, St. L. & K. C. R. Co. v. Bailey, 145 Ill. 159, 162, 33 N. E. 1089 (careful character of plaintiff's intestate, admitted, there being no eye-witnesses); 1898, Illinois C. R. Co. v. Ashline, 171 Ill. 313, 49 N. E. 521 (that the deceased, killed by a train, "was a man of careful habits", admissible where there are no eye-witnesses, "we are inclined to think"); 1900, Chicago & Alton R. Co. v. Pearson, 184 Ill. 386, 56 N. E. 633 (deceased's habits of

The chief difficulty here is (1) to determine whether the fact offered is really character (Disposition) or only a Habit, i.e. of prudent or negligent methods. The latter should in any case be admitted; and a comparison of the doctrine as to Habit (post, §§ 92, 96, 97) will show how many instances fall close to the line.

intemperance, excluded, where eye-witnesses of his conduct about the time of injury were available); 1901, Salem v. Webster, 192 Ill. 369, 61 N. E. 323 (plaintiff's habit as to rapid driving, admissible only "where there is no direct testimony as to the conduct at a particular time"); 1904, Illinois C. R. Co. v. Prickett, 210 Ill. 140, 71 N. E. 435 (engineer killed by the explosion of his locomotive boiler; there being no eye-witness of his conduct, his character, for carefulness was admitted); 1906, Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Wilson, 225 Ill. 50, 80 N. E. 56 (death on a railroad track; no eye-witness of the actual moment of injury having testified, the "careful habits of the deceased" were admitted); 1909, Collison v. Illinois Central R. Co., 239 Ill. 532, 88 N. E. 251 (admissible, semble); 1914, Newell v. Cleveland C. C. & St. L. R. Co., 261 Ill. 505, 104 N. E. 223 (where there are no eye-witnesses, the deceased's habits of care, etc., are admissible); 1915, Casey v. Chicago Railways Co., 269 Ill. 386, 109 N. E. 984 ("habits of the deceased as to care", etc., may suffice to prove the exercise of care); 1916, Greene v. Fish Furniture Co., 272 Ill. 148, 111 N. E. 725 (rule applied to admit character of an employee in an action for his death caused by lack of a fire-escape, there being no eye-witnesses); 1920, Moore v. Bloomington D. v. C. R. Co., 295 Ill. 63, 128 N. E. 721 (death at a railroad crossing; deceased's habits of care, admitted, there being no testimony of eye-witnesses); 1921, Petro v. Hines, 299 Ill. 236, 132 N. E. 462 (death of a pedestrian at a railroad crossing; in applying the eye-witness rule, the mere argument that a purporting eye-witness may be falsifying as to his presence does not authorize the rule to be applied as though there were no eye-witness; deceased's habits of care, here excluded); 1921, Soucie v. Payne, 299 Ill. 552, 132 N. E. 779 (death at a railroad crossing; plaintiff offered the deceased's repute for due care, on the assumption that there was no eye-witness; defendant tendered the train-engineer as being an eye-witness, but plaintiff declined to call him, and the trial Court admitted the character on the theory that there appeared to have been no eye-witness; afterwards the engineer testified on call of defendant: and the trial Court then struck out the evidence as to plaintiff's character: held, correct in both rulings; the question illustrates the barren technicalities to which this form of rule leads);

Indiana: 1871, Pittsburg, F. W. & C. R. Co. v. Ruby, 38 Ind. 295, 311, semble (of a railroad employee, to show negligence at a particular time, excluded);

Iowa: 1893, Hall v. Rankin, 87 Ia. 261, 264, 54 N. W. 217 (action against a druggist for giving poison instead of medicine; defendant's careful character, excluded); 1899, McKay v. Johnson, 108 Ia. 610, 79 N. W. 390 (whether an engine's poor working was due to the plaintiff's mismanagement; plaintiff's character as a competent engineer, excluded; this is unsound);

Kansas: 1890, Southern Kans. R. Co. v. Robbins, 43 Kan. 145, 148 (the contributory negligence of an injured party; his character for care or the opposite, excluded; yet "exceptions are made in some cases where there are no eye-witnesses of the accident, and better evidence cannot be obtained"; here there were eye-witnesses); 1898, Erb v. Popritz, 59 Kan. 264, 52 Pac. 871 (careful character of the injured person, excluded); 1911, Saunders v. Atchison T. & S. F. R. Co., 86 Kan. 56, 119 Pac. 255 (defendant's engineer's character for carefulness, not admissible as evidence of being careful on a given occasion); 1913, Fike v. Atchison T. & S. F. R. Co., 90 Kan. 409, 133 Pac. 871 (whether the deceased, in using the railroad crossing, "always drove carefully watching for dangers"; there were no eye-witnesses of the deceased's conduct at the time of the injury; point not decided);

Maine: 1852, Lawrence v. Mt. Vernon, 35 Me. 100, 104 (competency of the plaintiff's driver, to disprove contributory negligence, excluded); 1880, Dunham v. Rackliff, 71 Me. 345, 349 (careless character of the defendant's driver, as showing negligence at the time, excluded); 1885, Chase v. Maine Central R. Co., 77 Me. 262 (deceased's general character for carefulness, excluded, though there were no eye-witnesses);

Maryland: 1906, American Straw B. Co. v. Smith, 94 Md. 19, 50 Atl. 414 (defendant's driver's competence as a driver, excluded); 1908, Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. State, 107 Md. 642, 69 Atl. 439 (deceased's habits as a careful driver, excluded, though there were no eye-witnesses);

Massachusetts: 1824, Com. v. Worcester, Thacher Cr. C. 100, 102 (on a charge of violating an ordinance by driving at a trot in a city, the defendant's character as a careful driver was excluded, apparently because the carelessness of his act was immaterial); 1838, Adams v. Carlisle, 21 Pick. 146 (Shaw, C. J.: "that the person driving was commonly careful and skilful" is admissible to show care at a particular time); 1855, Baldwin v. R. Co., 4

It is necessary also to distinguish two other questions, not always kept separate in discussion: (2) whether in proving a negligent character, specific former acts of negligence may be used; this assumes the character to be admissible, and deals only with a mode of getting at it (post, § 199); (3) whether an employee's negligent character or his negligent acts are admissible to charge the employer with the knowing retention of an incompetent employee; this is concerned with character as in issue, not as evidentiary to an act (post, §§ 80, 249, 250).

§ 66. Same: Character of a Plaintiff in Defamation to prove his Innocence. When A is said by B to have been guilty, e.g., of murder or of forgery, and in a suit for defamation is met by a plea of truth, so that the issue is whether A

Gray 333 (negligent character of the plaintiff's driver, to show actual carelessness; excluded only when proved by reputation, but not when proved by one having personal knowledge); 1856, Robinson v. F. & W. R. Co., 7 Gray 92, 95 (admissibility doubted); 1861, Tenney v. Tuttle, 1 All. 185 (see citation supra); 1861, Gahagan v. R. Co., 1 All. 187 (keeping cars improperly across the highway; Tenney v. Tuttle followed); 1872, McDonald v. Savoy, 110 Mass. 49 (a plaintiff bound to prove due care in driving was not allowed, by a majority of the Court, to show "that he was commonly careful and skilful in driving his team"; following Tenney v. Tuttle); see also Whitney v. Gross, Hatt v. Nay, cited post, § 80, not expressly dealing with this question;

Minnesota: 1898, Fonda v. R. Co., 71 Minn. 438, 74 N. W. 166 (general incompetency of motorman, excluded);

Missouri: 1896, Culbertson v. R. Co., 140 Mo. 35, 36 S. W. 834 (that a switchman was drunk at the time of giving a signal; excluded, because the fact of giving it was undisputed, and the only question was his negligence under the circumstances);

New Hampshire: 1873, State v. M. & L. Railroad, 52 H. N. 6549, semble (of an employee, to show whether he did or did not act carelessly, excluded); 1913, Greenwood v. Boston & M. R. R., 77 N. H. 101, 88 Atl. 217 (deceased's character for carefulness, excluded, though there were no eye-witnesses).

New York: 1871, Warner v. R. Co., 44 N. Y. 465, 471 (former intemperate habits of a flagman on duty, held inadmissible to show neglect on the occasion in question; yet here the evidence of his drunkenness at the time and other facts affecting his conduct were fully before the jury; Hunt, C., dissenting);

Pennsylvania: 1874, Hays v. Miller, 77 Pa. 238 (counter-claim for injury caused by a collision with the plaintiff's tow-boat, while towing barges for the defendants; after evidence by the defendants tending to show that the plaintiff's servants carelessly caused the collision, the plaintiff offered to rebut by showing that the servants were "competent, skilful, and careful officers"; held, improper; for though the defendants might have rested their case on the plaintiff's selection of incompetent servants and the issue of their incompetence might thus have become legally material, yet here the only argument was from general character to conduct on the particular occasion, and this was held improper; "the jury will not confine the evidence of character to its true bearing upon the fact of negligence in the particular case, but set it up as per se a justification of the master"); 1888, Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Colvin, 118 Pa. 230, 12 Atl. 337 (a flagman's reputation, not received to show him careless at the time in issue);

South Carolina: 1903, Reeves v. Southern R. Co., 68 S. C. 89, 46 S. E. 543 (train running past a signal; engineer's testimony that he had never done it, excluded; improperly treated as a question of character); 1904, Bedenbaugh v. Southern R. Co., 69 S. C. 1, 48 S. E. 53 (injury of a person on a railroad track; the plaintiff's general intoxicated habits excluded, there being direct testimony of his condition at the time; erroneous);

Texas: 1898, Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Johnson, 92 Tex. 380, 48 S. W. 568 (plaintiff engineer's negligent habits, excluded; but certain exceptions are recognized);

Vermont: 1884, Bryant v. R. Co., 56 Vt. 710, 712 (fire set by locomotive; the section-man's good character for care and prudence, excluded);

Virginia: 1913, Southern R. Co. v. Rice's Adm'x, 115 Va. 235, 78 S. E. 592 (that the engineer was a "fast runner", excluded);

Washington: 1898, Carter v. Seattle, 19 Wash. 597, 53 Pac. 1102 (plaintiff's character for sobriety, not admitted to negative the fact of intoxication, treated as a question of negligence); 1919, Chilberg v. Parsons, 109 Wash. 90, 186 Pac. 272 (automobile collision; testimony to the "rate of speed at which defendant had been accustomed to drive his car", excluded);

For habits of intemperance, see also post, §§ 85, 96.

committed the crime of murder or of arson, it is supposed by some Courts that A should be allowed to invoke his good character for peaceableness or for honesty, as bearing on the probability of his having committed the crime which B is trying to prove against him. There is much reason for assimilating the situation to that of an accused person and taking it out of the rule applicable ordinarily to parties in civil cases, — not only because the plaintiff is repudiating an accusation of crime, but because an unfavorable outcome affects his character to a degree equivalent to a punishment and carries a significance wholly absent after the loss of an ordinary civil suit:

1824, Mr. Thomas Starkie, Evidence, II, 305, 643: "Where, indeed, the defendant justifies the slander which conveys an imputation of dishonesty, the case may admit of a very different consideration, for there the party is charged with a crime, and in such a case character affords just the same presumption of innocence as if the party had been tried for the offence."

1853, NASH, C. J., in Sample v. Wynn, 1 Busbee 321 (charge of bestiality; plea of truth): "The nature of the crime charged upon the plaintiff is of the most odious character, the preferring of which is calculated to banish the individual charged from the ordinary intercourse of his fellow men, to brand him with an offence more odious than that which drove Cain into the wilderness and made him a wanderer upon the face of the earth. . . . The crime charged is detestable and there is but one witness to the foul deed. In such a case, how can the purest man that lives shield himself from the effects of malice or revenge if not permitted to resort to such evidence?"

The only answer to this argument seems to be that it puts the plaintiff in a position relatively too favorable, as against the defendant, who already has the burden of proving his plea of truth:

1838, PARKER, C. J., in Matthews v. Huntly, 9 N. H. 146 (charge of perjury; plea of truth; the plaintiff's general good character was rejected; after quoting the remark of Starkie, supra): "A party undertaking to justify, in an action of slander, should undoubtedly satisfy a jury of the fact; but he should not be held to make out the charge beyond all reasonable doubt, because the plaintiff is not on trial for the crime, and, whatever the verdict may be, in punishment or disability is incurred by him. And this being so, the plaintiff should not be permitted to avoid the evidence offered, in any other manner than he could be permitted to avoid similar evidence in any other civil suit. There is no hardship in this. A party may in many instances trust to his general character to exonerate him in public estimation from a charge or suspicion of particular misconduct; but if he brings a suit for the injury sustained by such charge, and the adverse party relies for justification upon its truth, the latter ought in justice to have that fact tried in the same way other facts are tried in civil cases."

With such plausible arguments on either side, it is natural that the state of the law in the various jurisdictions should differ.[1]

§ 66. [1] ENGLAND: 1825, Cornwall v. Richardson, 1 Ry. & Mo. 305, Abbott, C. J. (stealing money; excluded); 1833, Powell v. Harper, 5 C. & P. 589 (libel charging the plaintiff with receiving stolen goods; justification; the plaintiff's "general character for honesty" was admitted on his behalf);

UNITED STATES: Alabama: 1900, Hereford v. Combs, 126 Ala. 369, 28 So. 582 (perjury admissible); Connecticut: 1820, Stow v. Converse, 3 Conn. 343, semble (to disprove a charge of infidelity, the plaintiff was allowed to give evidence of his "uniform profession, conduct, and conversation"; but to disprove a charge of exacting money illegally as an official, evidence of his character for honesty was rejected, as unavailable in civil cases to disprove an act); Delaware: 1841, Parke v.

There is, however, no reason why the defendant should be thus exceptionally allowed to use the plaintiff's bad character as evidence of his probable guilt; and it is generally agreed that this use is inadmissible.[2]

Distinguish from the present subject the question whether the plaintiff's reputation may be considered in mitigation of damages (post, § 70).

§ 67. Same: Character of Defendant in Malpractice. Where the action is for malpractice of a physician or other person engaging to use skill, the defendant's possession of due skill is usually put in issue under substantive law

Blackiston, 3 Harringt. 373, 375, Layton, J., diss. (excluded); Indiana: 1843, McCabe v. Platter, 6 Blackf. 405 (unchastity, excluded); 1844, Byrket v. Monohon, 7 Ind. 84 (perjury; admitted on the theory that he could show it if criminally prosecuted for perjury); 1861, Miles v. Vanhorn, 17 Ind. 249 (unchastity; excluded, following the McCabe case); 1867, Harm v. Wilson, 28 Ind. 301 (larceny; excluded, because there was no justification); 1873, Wilson v. Barnett, 45 Ind. 163, 168 (merely establishes the doctrine that one justifying a slanderous charge of crime must prove it beyond a reasonable doubt, as in criminal cases); 1876, Downey v. Dillon, 52 Ind. 442, 452 (citing the preceding case, admits the plaintiff's good character in a slander suit for a charge of perjury, distinguishing the earlier cases on this principle); 1877, Gebhart v. Burket, 57 Ind. 381 (preceding case approved); Iowa: 1887, Hanners v. McClelland, 74 Ia. 319, 37 N. W. 389 (excluded); Maryland: 1915, Bavington v. Robinson, 127 Md. 46, 95 Atl. 1067 (slander by charge of stealing, with a justification; plaintiff's good reputation as to honesty and integrity, admitted); Massachusetts: 1827, Harding v. Brooks, 5 Pick. 244 (slander, charging the plaintiff as "a liar, a knave, and a rascal"; justification; the plaintiff's evidence of good character was received, in order by "proof of the general tenor of his conduct and character to repel such imputations"; and it was apparently used to repel charges of specific misconduct); 1913, Stearns v. Long, 215 Mass. 152, 102 N. E. 326 (undecided; here excluded, because no crime was charged, and because the character-trait offered was not Mich. relevant); Michigan: 1918, Rowe v. Myers, 204 Mich. 374, 169 N. W. 823 (slander of chastity; plea, truth; plaintiff's good repute for chastity, admitted; Kovacs v. Mayoras, 175 Mich. 582, distinguished); New Hampshire: 1839, Chesley v. Chesley, 10 N. H. 327, 330 (excluded); 1851, Severance v. Hilton, 24 N. H. 148 (excluded); New York: 1848, Houghtaling v. Kilderhouse, 1 N. Y. 530 (poisoning the defendant's horses; plea of truth; plaintiff's good character excluded); 1851, Pratt v. Andrews, 4 N. Y. 496 (preceding case approved); North Carolina: 1859, Burton v. March, 6 Jones L. 409, 412 (larceny, excluded).

[2] ENGLAND: 1822, Jones v. Stevens, 11 Price 235, semble; 1825, Cornwall v. Richardson, 1 Ry. & Mo. 305, Abbott, C. J.;

UNITED STATES: Del. 1841, Parke v. Blackiston, 3 Harringt. 373, 375; Mass. 1834, Com. v. Snelling, 15 Pick. 337, 343 (criminal libel; bad character of the libellee, not admissible to show the truth of the charge of gaming and drugging a horse, whether in a civil or in a criminal case); 1843, Stone v. Barney, 7 Metc. 86, 92 (it is receivable even where the defendant justifies by pleading truth, but is used solely on the question of damages, i.e. assuming that the jury find the words to be false, then they use the plaintiff's character in assessing damages, but not till then; "it would be the duty of the Court to advise the jury that it could not be used to sustain the justification, but was properly introduced because both questions were before them, and if the justification failed, upon the evidence applicable thereto, they would consider the evidence of the character of the plaintiff in assessing damages . . . , but for other purposes the evidence would be irrelevant"); Mich. 1897, Finley v. Widner, 112 Mich. 230, 70 N. W. 433; Ohio: 1831, Dewit v. Greenfield, 5 Oh., Pt. 1, 226 (perjury; the plaintiff's bad character for veracity, excluded).

Contra: Ga. 1897, Cox v. Strickland, 101 Ga. 482, 28 S. E. 655 (frequent arson; plaintiff's bad character admissible on plea of truth); Mich. 1892, Sanford v. Rowley, 93 Mich. 119, 52 N. W. 1119 (perjury and lying; on a plea of truth, the plaintiff's bad reputation for veracity was admitted).

That the defendant may not here use the plaintiff's bad character to show the probability of his having done the things alleged in the slander, seems implied also in the decisions (post, § 73) denying the use of such character on a plea of justification when offered in mitigation of damages; for as the objection to that course is merely the possible misapplication of the character-evidence to the justification-plea (i.e. to prove the truth of the charge), the clear implication is that such an application would be inadmissible. Those, moreover, must be cases where the character would be usable evidentially to prove a specific act, for of course if the charge had touched the general character, it would have come directly in issue under the justification of truth.

and the pleadings, and hence may of course be proved on the principle of §§ 70–79, post. But apart from this, and assuming that the question is whether he did a particular act involving unskilful or improper methods, it would seem that his habitual qualities, if properly evidenced by repute or otherwise (post, §§ 1621, 1987), were admissible as indicating his probable conduct; for it is a habit and training, rather than a moral trait, that is involved, and thus the principle of §§ 83, 92, post, should control, and not the Character-rule. There is, however, little useful authority on the point.[1]

§ 68. (5) Character of Third Persons (Adultery, Illegitimate's Inheritance, Bastard's Filiation, Forged Will, Other Persons' Crimes). Where the character offered is that of a third person, not a party to the cause, the reasons of policy (noted ante, § 64) for exclusion seem to disappear or become inconsiderable; hence, if there is any relevancy in the fact of character, i.e. if some act is involved upon the probability of which a moral trait can throw light, the character may well be received. On this principle it has been admitted to evidence the illegitimacy of one claiming an inheritance,[1] to evidence the adultery of a co-respondent in divorce or other third person,[2] and to show a § 67. [1] Cal. 1902, Baker v. Borello, 136 Cal. 160, 68 Pac. 591 (reputed skill of a physician, admitted, as involved in the plaintiff's duty to employ a reputable physician to attend to his injury); Conn. 1812, Grannis v. Branden, 5 Day 260, 271 (malpractice by a surgeon and midwife; after evidence by the defendant of his professional skill and character, the plaintiff was allowed to show that the defendant was without proper training, having formerly been a dancing-master, etc.; following the analogy of the rule in criminal cases); N. C. 1824, Jeffries v. Harris, 3 Hawks 105 (assumpsit for services as a physician; the plaintiff's poor character as a physician excluded, because "not put in issue by the nature of this action"; aliter, semble, if the plaintiff had represented himself as of a certain grade of skill); Pa. 1845, Mertz v. Detweiler, 8 W. & S. 376, 378 (action for malpractice; the defendant's evidence as to his skill and character as a surgeon, held "irrelevant"; "it may be said that his general qualifications might serve to shed light on the propriety of his practice in this particular instance, but it is light which would be less likely to lead to a sound conclusion than to lead astray").

Distinguish the use of particular acts of incompetency (post, §§ 202, 208).

The following statute belongs here: Conn. Gen. St. 1918, § 5467 ("general character, reputation, and professional standing" of an attorney to be admissible in a proceeding for his removal, etc.).

§ 68. [1] 1732, Pendrell v. Pendrell, 2 Stra. 925 (issue to try heirship; the defendant was allowed "to prove the mother to be a woman of ill-fame", as tending to show the plaintiff a bastard); 1810, Banbury Peerage Case, in App. to LeMarchant's Gardner Peerage Case, 458; 1856, Legge v. Edmonds, 26 L. J. Ch. 125, 135 (legitimacy as affecting title); 1904, Kennington v. Catoe, 68 S. C. 370, 47 S. E. 719 (title depending on legitimacy of a son born eleven months after marriage; character of the mother for chastity about the time of gestation, but not otherwise, admitted against the son).

Contra, as to particular acts: 1903, State v. Hendrick, 70 N. J. L. 41, 56 Atl. 247 (conspiracy between two men and a woman to obtain an inheritance from B. by fraudulently pretending a marriage between B. and the woman and producing a child as B.'s heir; acts of criminal intimacy between the woman and certain third persons, excluded, as against the two men; erroneous; this was good evidence of her likelihood to defraud in the manner alleged, and was also admissible under the principle of § 133, post).

Compare the citations post, § 134 (adultery as evidence of illegitimacy).

[2] Ala.: 1860, Blackman v. State, 36 Ala. 295, 297 (adultery with a woman M.; the reputation of M. for unchastity, admitted as corroborative evidence); Ark. 1918, McDonald v. Louthen, 136 Ark. 338, 206 S. W. 674; Ga. 1906, Sutton v. State, 124 Ga. 815, 53 S. E. 381 (fornication with A.; reputation of A. as a prostitute, and of her house as a bawdy-house, admitted); Mass. 1868, Clement v. Kimball, 98 Mass. 535 (action for boarding the defendant's wife; defence, separation and adultery; the bad reputation of chastity of men who visited the wife while so separated, excluded, because no other evidence of adultery was offered as a foundation; but "such testimony often becomes competent when there is other evidence in the case to show relations different parentage for a bastard in filiation proceedings;[3] and the principle may equally apply (subject to the limitations of §§ 139–142, post) to evidence the commission of any crime by a third person, particularly the forging or coercing of a will or deed,[4] and in sundry other situations.[5] of an equivocal character"); 1880, Com. v. Gray, 129 Mass. 476 (on a charge of adultery against a husband, after showing suspicious association with a woman, the character of the woman as a prostitute or the contrary may be shown); Mich. 1877, Marble v. Marble, 36 Mich. 386 (divorce for adultery; "reputation", of an unspecified sort, admissible as "subsidiary" evidence; Clement v. Kimball approved); Vt. 1913, State v. Nieburg, 86 Vt. 392, 85 Atl. 769 (adultery with X; X's unchaste repute, admitted); 1913, State v. Snyder, 96 Vt. 449, 85 Atl. 984 (same).

Contra: 1920, Kelley v. State, 146 Ark. 509, 226 S. W. 137 (murder of Q., for having illicit relations with defendant's wife; the prosecution disputing O's misconduct, evidence of O's reputed character for morality was not admitted for the State; "the manifest purpose was to lead the jury to believe that . . . it was not probable that he would have been guilty of adultery"; quite so; the logic of some courts, when they exclude evidence just because it would be probative, is indeed amusing, — or will in some future generation be so esteemed); 1907, Van Horn v. Van Horn, 5 Cal. App. 719, 91 Pac. 250 (divorce for adultery; respondent's good character, not admitted under C. C. P. § 2053); 1901, Guinn v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 65 S. W. 376 (adultery; character of the third person, excluded).

Some of the cases cited under § 228, n. 6, post (insanity evidenced by conduct), belong here also, perhaps.

The following ruling is uniquely astonishing: 1918, Reed v. State, 98 Oh. 279, 120 N. E. 701 (attempted burglary; to show other intent, viz. to visit the complaining witness illicitly, the defendant introduced evidence of her implied invitation to him; in rebuttal, the prosecution offered the witness' general reputation for chastity; held improperly admitted, because the evidence "in no wise assailed the community reputation of the prosecuting witness", and judgment reversed solely on this account; alas, for the protection of virtuous women's characters in this State under such a decision!).

[3] 1811, Fall v. Overseers, 3 Munf. 495, 497, 502, 505 (complainant in bastardy prosecution; the woman's bad character for virtue admitted, apparently to prove the probability of another's parentage). The following case could have been decided on this principle: 1855, Zitzer v. Merkel, 24 Pa. 408 (seduction; the daughter's good character for chastity not admitted to disprove specific unchastities alleged by the defendant). Contra: 1904, People v. Wilson, 136 Mich. 298, 99 N. W. 6 (bastardy; the woman's repute for unchastity about the time of begetting, excluded).

Compare the citations in § 133, post (acts of unchastity, on an issue of bastardy, etc.).

[4] Accord: 1916, Hurst v. Evans, 1 K. B. 352 (insurance against burglary; whether the robbery of the insured's safe was committed with the complicity of M. his employee; M.'s association "with notorious and highly skilled safe-breakers", admitted); 1906, Ford v. Ford, 27 D. C. App. 401, 411 (good repute of a notary certifying to an acknowledgment alleged to be false); 1906, Hannah v. Anderson, 125 Ga. 407, 54 S. E. 131 (caveators alleged fraud and threats by the propounder of a will; his good character admitted); 1918, State v. Johnson, 24 N. M. 11, 172 Pac. 189 (murder of H.; plea, that H. had insulted defendant's wife; deceased's general reputation for morality and decency, admitted; but the opinion erroneously invokes the rule of § 63 ante); 1820, Rowt's Adm'r v. Kile's Adm'r, Gilmer, Va. 202 (as part of the evidence to show that a third person had forged the instrument sued on, evidence of the person's "infamous character" held admissible; but this ruling was made before the modern doctrine was settled); 1903, Ward v. Brown, 53 W. Va. 227, 44 S. E. 488 (undue influence; good character of deceased attorney preparing the will, admitted, as an exception to the general rule).

Contra: 1905, West v. Houston Oil Co., 136 Fed. 343, 348, C. C. A. (alleged forgery of a certificate of acknowledgment; the notary's reputation as a forger, excluded; unsound); 1910, Quinalty v. Temple, 5th C. C. A., 176 Fed. 67 (title to land; the plaintiff's title turned on whether Q. died seised; defendant traced title through a deed of 1837 from F., citing a deed to him from Q., but no deed from Q. to F. was found; the recital in F.'s deed being admitted in evidence, the defendant offered to show (1) F.'s character for honesty, and (2) Q.'s character as a spendthrift, to evidence the probable deed from Q. to F., and the correctness of F.'s recital; excluded; reason, the old starched and stilted doctrines about character-evidence; one of them became here particularly ludicrous, viz. that character-evidence "would greatly increase the expense and delay of litigation", for here the Court ordered the whole pack of cards to be dealt over again by ordering a new trial solely for this error, and thus "greatly increased the expense and delay of litigation", by years of time and bags of money, to punish the defendant for wasting one hour at the original trial; the case was one of the really obvious opportunities for breaking through a rule of thumb and letting in the evidence; it

§ 68 a (6) Character of Animals. The character or disposition of an animal is no less relevant than that of a human being, as indicating his probable conduct on a particular occasion, and it is open to none of the objections of auxiliary policy (ante, §§ 57, 64) which affect the use of a party's character. It is therefore commonly conceded to be admissible.[1] The hesitation sometimes observed in the rulings has been due to the time at which the disposition is predicated in the offer; but here, as with human character (ante, § 60), the existence of a trait at a given time is evidence that it existed also for a reasonable time before and afterwards, and within liberal limits should therefore be received.[2]

3. Character as evidentiary for Other Purposes

§ 69. Character as evidencing a Third Person's Belief, Knowledge, or Motive. The evidentiary uses of Character just examined have the purpose in each case of indicating the likelihood that the person to whom the character is attributed did or did not do an act alleged. But a person's character may was precisely the kind where common sense would welcome the evidence); 1903, McElroy v. Phink, 97 Tex. 147, 76 S. W. 753; 77 S. W. 1025 (character for integrity of a deceased third person, said to have destroyed improperly a lost will, excluded).

Compare the rule for impeaching the character of an attesting witness (post, § 1514), for skill of a draftsman of a document (post, § 87), for corroborating a witness (post, § 1106), for character as a motive for murder (post, § 390, n. 1); and some of the cases ante, § 64, n. 3.

[5] The following rulings seem sound: 1903, Burnett v. People, 204 Ill. 208, 68 N. E. 505 (murder by persuading the deceased woman to a joint suicide; the deceased's good character for chastity, held inadmissible); 1902, State v. Chanute, 65 Kan. 682, 70 Pac. 870 (illegal sale of liquor; that the buyer, who did not testify, was a "spotter", inducing sales for the purpose of prosecution, excluded). 1905, Toliver v. State, 142 Ala. 3, 38 So. 801 (robbery; character of H., with whom defendant was at the time, excluded).

The character of an accomplice or co-conspirator is hardly to be deemed relevant, except for or against himself when tried jointly: 1907, Schultz v. State, 133 Wis. 215, 113 N. W. 428 (bribery; good character of an alleged co-conspirator, excluded).

§ 68 a. [1] 1878, Maggi v. Cutts, 123 Mass. 535 (viciousness of a horse); 1897, Broderick v. Higginson, 169 Mass. 482, 48 N. E. 269 (habit of a dog to attack passing teams, admissible to show that he did it on a particular occasion).

Contra, 1868, East Kingston v. Towle, 48 N. H. 57, 65 (the bad character of the defendant's dog as to sheep-killing, not admitted to evidence that he had killed particular sheep; Doe, J., dissenting; this would probably not be followed in the same Court to-day); 1896, Kelly v. Alderson, 19 R. I. 544, 37 Atl. 12 (a dog's character for peaceableness not admitted to show that the dog probably did not bite till assaulted; "this would set up the character of the dog against the plaintiff's oath", — an amusing piece of judicial reasoning).

[2] 1900, Walrod v. Webster Co., 110 Ia. 349, 81 N. W. 598 (of horses after an accident, admitted); 1861, Chamberlain v. Enfield, 43 N. H. 356, 360 (his disposition for skittishness six or eight months after an accident, admitted, since "it may be safely laid down as a general rule (having its exceptions, no doubt) that neither horses nor men entirely change their characters, their habits, or their manners, in that space of time"); 1865, Whittier v. Franklin, 46 N. H. 23, 26; 1898, Stone v. Langworthy, 20 R. I. 602, 40 Atl. 832 (character of a horse subsequent to an accident, excluded as of "slight practical value"); 1888, Turnpike Co. v. Hearn, 87 Tenn. 291, 10 S. W. 510 (whether a horse was unmanageable; his disposition before and after the accident admitted); 1898, Dover v. Winchester, 70 Vt. 418, 41 Atl. 445 (sheep-killing; dog's character since the time, admissible).

Distinguish the proof of an animal's character when in issue: 1901, Willet v. Goetz, 125 Mich. 581, 84 N. W. 1071 (dog; here his good character was excluded, because the 'scienter' had been clearly shown otherwise by vicious acts); 1898, Citizens' R. T. Co. v. Dew, 100 Tenn. 317, 45 S. W. 790 (ancestry of a dog, admitted to show his value).

Distinguish also the use of particular instances of conduct to evidence the animal's character (post, § 201), and also to evidence the owner's knowledge of that character (post, § 251).

also have other evidentiary uses; and it is worth while here to point out the principles which they involve:

(1) Character as affecting another Person's Belief or Reasonable Grounds for Belief. There are several situations of this kind. Usually the character will be relevant only so far as attended with a reputation; for by means of the reputation the other person's belief or knowledge is best shown:

(a) Character of a deceased person, as indicating a defendant's apprehension of aggression from the deceased (post, § 246);

(b) Character of an arrested person, as indicating another person's reasonable ground for believing a charge of crime and for causing his arrest (post, § 258);

(c) Character of an employee, as indicating his employer's knowledge of his incompetence (post, § 249).

(2) Character as indicating a Motive; this is an occasional use having various aspects (post, § 389).

4. Character as an Issue in the Case

§ 70. (1) Plaintiff's Reputed Bad Character as mitigating Damages for Defamation. Where A sues B for defamation, and the issue is as to the proper amount of compensation, the question arises whether it is fair to measure his compensation by the quality of his original actual standing in the community, and, in particular, whether the fact that he had little or no reputation to lose may be considered as good reason for diminishing the damages accordingly. This question, it will be seen, is not one of the law of Evidence, i.e. character or reputation for character is not offered as having probative value to evidence the probability of something else. A principle of the law of Damages is involved, i.e. whether compensation shall be regulated according to a certain fact, namely, quality of reputation; if yes, reputation becomes material; if no, reputation is immaterial, and will not be considered. It must also be noticed that we are no longer dealing with actual character, but with reputed character; and, furthermore, that this reputation is not offered evidentially (ante, § 52), but as an element brought into issue by the law of the case. The propriety of considering this element in fixing compensation must here be considered (though it is no question of Evidence), for the purpose of distinguishing those precedents which involve it from those which involve genuinely a question of Evidence.

(1) Whether in an action for defamation the defendant may use the plaintiff's poor reputation (or lack of reputation) to mitigate the damages has been one of the most controverted questions in the whole law. The arguments on each side are so strong, and the balance of convenience is so clear, according to the point of view taken, that it is no wonder that Courts have taken radically opposite views. The argument in favor of considering reputation has been thus expressed:

1818, Mr. Holt, note in Holt's N. P. 308: "The ground of the action on the case for a libel is the 'quantum' of injurious damage which the person libelled either has or may be presumed to have sustained from the libellous matter. . . . [Thus] the reputation can not be said to be injured where it was before destroyed. The plaintiff has previously extinguished his own character. He has, therefore, no basis for an action to recover compensation for the loss of character and its consequential damage. The law considers him as bringing an action of damage to a thing which does not exist."

1882, CAVE, J., in Scott v. Sampson, L. R. 8 Q. B. D. 491: "Speaking generally, the law recognizes in every man a right to have the estimation in which he stands in the opinion of others unaffected by false statements to his discredit, and if such false statements are made without lawful excuse, and damage results to the person of whom they are made, he has a right of action. The damage, however, which he has sustained must depend almost entirely on the estimation in which he was previously held. He complains of an injury to his reputation, and seeks to recover damages for that injury; and it seems most material that the jury who have to award those damages should know, if the fact is so, that he is a man of no reputation. 'To deny this would', as is observed in Starkie on Evidence, 'be to decide that a man of the worst character is entitled to the same measure of damages with one of unsullied and unblemished reputation. A reputed thief would be placed on the same footing with the most honorable merchant, a virtuous woman with the most abandoned prostitute. To enable the jury to estimate the probable quantity of injury sustained, a knowledge of the party's previous character is not only material but seems to be absolutely essential.' It is said that the admission of such evidence will be a hardship upon the plaintiff, who may not be prepared to rebut it; and under the former practice, where the damages could not be pleaded to, and general evidence of bad character was allowed to be given under a plea of not guilty, there was something in this objection, which, however, is removed under the present system of pleading, which requires that all material facts shall be pleaded; and a plaintiff who has notice that general evidence of bad character will be adduced against him, can have no difficulty whatever, if he is a man of good character, in coming prepared with friends who have known him to prove that his reputation has been good."

1818, 1820, NOTT, J., in Buford v. M'Luny, 1 Nott & M. 269, Sawyer v. Eifert, 2 id. 515: "In every action at law the object is to recover reparation for some injury sustained. And where the injury is to property, the value of the article is the principal object of inquiry. And I can see no good reason why the value of character may not be investigated as well as that of any other commodity, when the reparation of character is the object of this suit. . . . It is said it would be taking a person by surprise thus to permit an inquiry into his character. But if the character of a witness, who is called upon in Court and compelled to give evidence without any previous notice, is not shielded from such an attack, how much less ought a party who has voluntarily brought his character into Court claim such an exemption? He commences with stating that he is a person of good name, fame, and reputation, and he ought to be always prepared to defend his allegation. A person is presumed to be always prepared to defend his general character, if he has a good one; if he has not, it ought to be exposed. . . . I hold that a woman ought not to be taken from the stews and brothels of a town, to be placed alongside of the most respectable ladies who equally adorn our drawing-rooms and our churches; nor that the high priest of vice and corruption should be ranked with the pious priest of the parish or the respectable bishop of the diocese. Where a person's character is such that he cannot safely trust it to a court and jury, slander can do him but little injury; and a person who is neither ashamed nor afraid to expose his character to the eye of the public ought not to be permitted to shelter it under the forms of law from the eye of a jury."

The meat of this argument is that a person should not be paid for the loss of that which he never had. The opposing argument lays stress on the abuses to which the use of such evidence is open:

1822, Jones v. Stevens, 11 Price 235, 256, 269, slander, charging the plaintiff with being a disreputable and unprofessional attorney; testimony to his general bad character and reputation as an attorney was held inadmissible under the general issue; GRAHAM, B.: "There is a full concurrence of opinion amongst the whole Court that such general evidence of bad character is not admissible, . . . and that principally on the grounds that a party can not be expected to be prepared to rebut it, and that, if it were to be received, any man might fall a victim to a combination made to ruin his reputation and good name, even by means of the very action which he should bring to free himself from the effects of malicious slander." GARROW, B.: "If ever it should [become the law that such evidence should be admissible], the libeller will become a much more general character than we find him now; for he will derive protection and impunity from the apprehension and dread, with which the object of his malice would naturally be possessed, of resorting for redress to courts of justice to vindicate his name, where it would be permitted to the defendant to bring forward testimony of general bad character which from its nature it would be impossible to disprove; whereby they in effect become the means of putting the libels of which they complain on the records of the courts of giving a wider circulation to the calumnies contained in them."

1806, LIVINGSTON, J., in Foot v. Tracy, 1 Johns. 46: "I am now satisfied that more mischief will follow from an adoption of such a rule than by excluding the investigation altogether, except when presented as a complete justification in the form of a special plea. . . . It is answered that a person of bad fame has no right to bring a suit, or, if he does, that he cannot expect the same compensation as those who have a character to lose. But no one, however low a man's reputation be, has a right to publish slanders of him, or to charge him with crimes of which he is innocent. If he confines himself to the truth, he can plead it; but if he will deal in general invective, or indulge his wit and venom by travelling out of the record, he must abide by the consequence. Nothing is better settled than that the truth of a libel or of slander cannot be relied on, in justification, unless pleaded. What is not permitted, then directly, ought not to be tolerated in any other way. . . . [This result] will only impose on those who choose to publish their animadversions on the crimes or failings of others, which occupy so great a portion of our public papers, the task of proving by particular facts the truth of what they assert. Nor is there any hardship in this. Those who sport with the feelings of others, under the professions of zeal for the public good, on no other basis than that of common fame, which is not always an infallible guide, cannot complain if courts require from them, on these as on most other occasions, some better proof of their calumnies than general opinion. If every man who does not enjoy an unblemished reputation, or has the misfortune to be disesteemed by his neighbors, were fair game, in a country where the liberty of the press is so much perverted and abused, few indeed would escape."

1818, CHEVES, J., dissenting, in Buford v. M'Luny, 1 Nott & M. 272: "1. It is alleged that the pleadings put the character of the plaintiff in issue. Now it is not true, in point of law, that the character of the plaintiff is put in issue . . . [since a plea denying the allegation would be demurrable]. 2. But it is said that the foundation of the damages given in actions of slander is the actual injury suffered by the plaintiff in his character. This is not true; it is upon the presumption of loss (little more than a legal fiction), and not upon the actual loss, that actions of slander are principally founded. . . . Are not the heaviest damages given when the slander is uttered against unsullied and impregnable character, — where the malice of the calumniator has been shot 'like a pointless arrow from a broken bow'? To the tottering and questionable character, the shafts of the slanderer are fatal and ruinous, . . . in such cases we know that the damages are usually nominal, though the injury is immeasurable and intolerable. Is it not, then, amusing ourselves with a phantom, when we suppose that the actual loss sustained by the sufferer is the real foundation of damages in actions of slander? There must be other and higher principles on which they are founded. Is it not obvious that the foundation of these damages is to be discovered in the general sanctity of character, which is considered as a shield, not against irreparable injury only, but against every possible assault upon the hallowed blessing of a good name? Even the wicked and the worthless are allowed this protection, as the infidel was once permitted to enter the Christian sanctuary. . . . Ought [the defendant] not to be subjected to heavier penalties for thus oppressing the fallen, perhaps the broken-hearted and repentant and reforming offender, than if he had, with equal malice but with less meanness, attacked the highest and most irreproachable man in the community? I should say he ought. [3.] But if the admission of this evidence were clear, according to analogy and theory, it ought to be rejected in practice from its immateriality to a fair defence, and from the abuses of which it will be susceptible. It is immaterial, because, as far as such a cause should operate, it has its full influence (and too much) through the knowledge of the jury. . . . It is susceptible to the greatest abuses. The person, not of unblemished reputation, must suffer every calumny that the tongue can utter, in silence; for if he seek redress against any specific slander, he must suffer the defects of his character to be exhibited and proclaimed in a court of justice by as many witnesses as the fears or malice of the defendant may choose to call. A man laboring under a neighborhood calumny, though perfectly innocent, must be the victim of every specific slander that may be uttered against him. He dare not enter the portals of a court of justice, or he will be doomed to eternal infamy by a thousand tongues."

§ 71. Same: the Question as affected by the Pleadings. The state of the pleadings may affect the situation radically, by giving opportunity for different issues and policies. There are four conceivable cases:

(a) General issue pleaded; the amount of damages being customarily herein issuable, the plaintiff's bad repute is offered in mitigation;

(b) Justification of truth pleaded; the defamatory charge specific (e.g. "A stole a horse from B"); the plaintiff's bad character offered to show the probability of the theft;

(c) Justification pleaded; the charge specific; the plaintiff's bad repute offered in mitigation of damages, anticipating a possible finding against the defendant on the plea;

(d) Justification pleaded; the charge general (e.g. "A is a thief"); the plaintiff's bad reputed character offered as involved in the plea.

(a) This is the ordinary case, raising the general question; the passages quoted in the preceding section deal with this case. It is the most favorable for the defendant, for here his claim is not affected by any possible impropriety of pleading, except the supposed argument of surprise, discussed above by the judges.

(b) This is a purely evidentiary use of character, and has been already elsewhere examined (ante, § 66).

(c) Here the question is (1) whether as a matter of pleading the issue of damages can properly be raised under a plea of justification, and (2), even if it is theoretically possible, whether it is not practically better to exclude the element of repute, because of the probable abuse of the opportunity by those who would make no real attempt to prove truth but would simply abuse the plaintiff's reputed character, and because a mere direction to the jury not to consider such character except in mitigation of damages would hardly be sufficient to keep them from letting it affect their verdict on the plea of truth.[1]

(d) Here, since the defamatory charge is general, and the reputed character is offered as showing the very fact in issue, the defendant seems to be safe; yet it is sometimes argued that, to avoid abuse of the situation and to prevent surprise, he can never even plead in justification the fact of general character, but must affirm specific acts and prove them as such.[2] It will be noticed (post, § 73) that the jurisdictions are divided as to case (a); that only the Courts which admit in case (a) need to discuss case (c), and here again there is a division; that only the Courts that exclude in case (a) are likely to care to raise the question of case (d), and that the result of exclusion therein is rarely reached. It will also be noticed that the effect of excluding in both (a) and (d) is practically to prevent a defendant from using the plaintiff's bad character at all, either in justification or in mitigation.

§ 72. Same: Kind of Character, Particular or General. A further question that arises in those jurisdictions where the plaintiff's bad character is admitted in mitigation is whether general bad character can alone be used, or whether bad character for the particular trait involved in the defamation can alone be used. Most Courts, instead of allowing the use of either or both, prefer to make the use of one sort exclusive. The argument that general character alone should be considered is expounded as follows:

1847, COULTER, J., in Steinman v. McWilliams, 6 Pa. St. 175: "Can evidence of separate and particular departments of character be lawfully allowed? . . . How is character estimated? Certainly by its general import. It will not do to take up the Decalogue and inquire whether a man is generally reputed as addicted to fornication or adultery, to profane swearing, Sabbath-breaking. . . . If this mode of destroying character was allowed in our courts, the standing of all men would be in peril. We have but few Catos among us; and if we had more, such individuals would hardly seek redress in our courts. But the law is not made for the protection of such men, but for the protection of that middle class all the world over, who have a sense of truth, honor, and virtue, and who are yet not above the infirmities of life; whose sensibility as to the value of character, and whose liability to err, make them more susceptible of wounds from the shaft of slander. The thousand of wagging tongues of this world, sometimes in sport and sometimes in malice, make free with some department or quality of character of good men in the main; and if malice were allowed to seize hold of these reports and embody them in a court of justice to destroy character, few men would be safe. The truth is that it is only in general character that a man finds his true level in society; and that alone ought to mark his value."

§ 71. [1] For the best exposition of this case, see M'Nutt v. Young, 8 Leigh 542 (1837).

[2] The reasons are set forth in the following leading case: 1787, J'Anson v. Stuart, 1 T. R. 748, 752 (slander by charging the plaintiff as a "notorious swindler and common informer"; Ashurst, J.: "The defendant . . . when he took upon himself generally to justify the charge, must be prepared with the facts which constitute the charge, in order to enable him to maintain the plea. Then he ought to state those facts specifically, to give the plaintiff an opportunity of denying them; for the plaintiff cannot come to the trial prepared to justify his whole life"; Buller, J.: "If the plaintiff has been guilty of any act of swindling, the defendant must be taken to know them. He could not prove the justification, as he has pleaded it, by general evidence; but he has no justification unless he can prove the special instances; and, knowing them, he ought to put them on the record, that the plaintiff might be prepared to answer them"; here the plea was held bad on demurrer).

This argument is answered as follows, by those who claim that a reputation for the particular trait involved is equally open to examination:

1864, STRONG, J., in Conroe v. Conroe, 47 Pa. 202: "A man may have many virtues and consequently a good general reputation, and yet be notorious for a single vice. If his virtues be called in question, it is an injury; but if only his vice be asserted, his injury is less. . . . [The plaintiff's] averment is not that her reputation for all the virtues which go to make up good character is fair, but that her reputation for chastity was sound; and it is that, she complains has been taken from her. Its real value was therefore a proper subject of inquiry."

The argument that the reputation for the particular trait alone should be considered is thus set forth:

1871, LYON, J., in Wilson v. Noonan, 27 Wis. 614: "It is said that a person who brings such an action puts his reputation in issue; but it seems to be more accurate to say that he thereby puts it in issue in the particular wherein he claims that it has been assailed. Human reputation is complex in its nature. Because a man has a single vice, or even more than a single vice, it does not follow from that circumstance that he is totally depraved. . . . He may be an incorrigible liar, and yet strictly honest in all his dealings. He may be a great scoundrel in pecuniary matters, and yet perfectly chaste. . . . Where a person's character for truth and veracity is falsely assailed, and he brings his action against the assailant to recover damages therefor, if his reputation for truth and veracity is good, on what sound principle can it be said that if such plaintiff is unchaste, or dishonest in business matters, or covetous, profane, or a sabbath-breaker, the damages to which he would otherwise be entitled shall be reduced to a nominal sum?"

§ 73. Same: State of the Law in the Various Jurisdictions.[1] (1) So far as concerns the question at large, as affected by the pleadings (ante, §§ 70, 71), it will be noticed that to-day, in case (a), the repute is in most of the juris-

§ 73. [1] ENGLAND AND CANADA: (1) Character in mitigation or justification: (a) England: The earlier rulings all inclined to admit bad repute, under the general issue, in mitigation: 1716, Dennis v. Pawling, Vin. Abr. "Evidence", I, b, 16 (XII, 159); 1908, Knobell v. Fuller, Peake, Add. Cas. 139, Lord Kenyon, C. J.; 1803, R. v. Waring, 5 Esp. 13, Lord Alvanley, C. J.; 1809, Leicester v. Walter, 2 Camp. 251, Mansfield, C. J.; 1810, Williams v. Callender, Holt N. P. 307, note, Lord Ellenborough, C. J.; 1813, Anon v. Moor, 1 M. & S. 284, K. B.; 1811, Snowdon v. Smith, 1 M. & S. 286, note, Chambre, J., semble; 1817, Newsam v. Carr, 2 Stark. 70, Wood B.; 1817, Mills v. Spencer, Holt N. P. 533, Gibbs, C. J., semble; 1822, Waithman v. Weaver, 11 Price 257, note, Abbott, C. J., doubtful; 1824, Ellershaw v. Robinson, 2 Stark. Ev. 641, n., Holroyd, J.; and the same opinion was indicated under the next rulings (c), refusing to receive it under a justification. Then came a series of rulings excluding it: 1822, Jones v. Stevens, 11 Price 235; 1859, Bracegirdle v. Bailey, 1 F. & F. 536, Byles and Willes, JJ.; 1863, Myers v. Currie, 22 N. C. Q. B. 470; but the more recent opinion looks upon the earlier line as orthodox, and receives the evidence: 1882, Scott v. Sampson, L. R. 8 Q. B. D. 491; Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, Order XXXVI, Rule 37 (in defamation, where the truth is not pleaded, the defendant may not in chief offer in mitigation evidence "as to the character of the plaintiff, without the leave of the judge," unless on 7 days' notice of particulars; quoted post, § 209);

Canada: Statutory rules now usually admit it, subject to a notice of particulars: Alberta: Rules of Court 1914, No. 198 (like Ont. Rule 158); B. C. Rules of Court 1912, No. 461 (like Ont. R. 158); Ont. Rules of Court 1913, R. 158 (where truth is not pleaded, character is not receivable in mitigation unless on seven days' notice of particulars); Man. Rev. St. 1913, c. 46, R. 485 (like Ont. Rule 158); Newf. Cons. St. 1916, c. 83, Ord. 32, R. 22 (like Ont. Rule 158, requiring two days' notice); N. Sc. Rules 1900, Ord. 34, R. 30 (like Ont. Rule 158).

(c) Its use under a justification was once thought improper: 1811, Snowden v. Smith, M. & S. 286, note, Chambre, J.; but later the rulings were all in the other direction: 18—, Kirkman v. Oxley, 2 Stark. Ev. 306, k, Heath, J.; 1826, Mawby v. Barber, 2 Stark. Ev. 641, e, Lord Tenterden, C. J.; 1836, Moore v. Oastler, 2 Stark. Ev., Lord Denman, C. J., and Parke, dictions admitted; that only the Courts which admit in case (a) need to discuss case (c), and that here again the repute is commonly admitted; that the question in case (d) is not likely to be raised except in the few Courts that exclude in case (a), — although in England (a) is admitted and (d) is excluded. It may also be noted that the effect of excluding in both (a) and (d) is practically to prevent a defendant from using the plaintiff's bad repute at all, either in justification or in mitigation.

B.; 1837, Hardy v. Alexander, 2 Stark. Ev., Coltman, J.; 1833, Powell v. Harper, 5 C. & P. 590, 592, Parke, B.; Mr. Starkie also approved these rulings, believing it sufficient for the Court to tell the jury to apply the evidence only on the question of damages.

(d) The exclusion of character on a justification of a general charge was supposed to have been settled by the following line of cases: 1787, J'Anson v. Stuart, 1 T. R. 748 (quoted supra, § 71); 1822, Jones v. Stevens, 11 Price 235, 273; 1842, Hickinbotham v. Leach, 10 M. & W. 361, Parke, B.; 1893, Zierenberg v. Labouchere, 2 Q. B. 183, 186 (approving J'Anson v. Stuart).

(2) Kind of Character. The particular trait, as well as the general character, seems to be admissible: 1833, Powell v. Harper, 5 C. & P. 590, 592 (honesty); the exclusion of "particular credit" in Dennis v. Pawling, Vin. Abr. "Evidence," I, b, 16 (1716), vol. XII, 159, seems not to refer to the present subject, but to discrediting a witness by particular acts.

UNITED STATES: Alabama: (1) (a); admitted; the limitation specified is intended to prevent the defendant's abuse of this opportunity by taking advantage of the destruction of a reputation destroyed by himself: 1834, Commons v. Walters, 1 Port. 322, 327 (but not after the date of the charge); 1836, Waters v. Jones, 3 Port. 442, 450; 1846, Bradley v. Gibson, 9 Ala. 408; 1849, Scott v. McKinnish, 15 Ala. 665 (but not after the date of the charge).

Arkansas: (1) (a): 1918, McDonald v. Southen, 136 Ark. 368, 206 S. W. 674 (slander; general issue and justification; admissible, to mitigate damages).

Connecticut: (1) (a) admitted: 1792, Brunson v. Lynde, 1 Root 354; Seymour v. Merrills, Root 459; 1794, Austin v. Hanchet, 2 Root 148; 1820, Stow v. Converse, 3 Conn. 346; 1822, Treat v. Browning, 4 Conn. 414; 1825, Bennett v. Hyde, 6 Conn. 24.

Delaware: (1) (a) inconsistent rulings: 1838, Waples v. Burton, 2 Harringt. 446 (admissible); 1841, Parke v. Blackiston, 3 Harringt. 373, 375 (inadmissible, following, Jones v. Stevens); (c) same condition; Waples v. Burton, supra; Parke v. Blackiston, supra.

Illinois: (1) (a) and (c) admitted: 1842, Young v. Bennett, 5 Ill. 43, 47 (even where a plea of justification has been put in); 1858, Sheahan v. Collins, 20 Ill. 328, 1905, Dowie v. Priddle, 216 Ill. 553, 75 N. E. 243 (excluded).

Indiana: (1) (a) and (c): 1825, Henson v. Veatch, 1 Blackf. 371 (left undecided); 1841, Sanders v. Johnson, 6 Blackf. 52 (left undecided at least where the plea is justification); 1842, Burke v. Miller, 6 Blackf. 155 (said obiter to be admissible on the general issue); 1843, McCabe v. Platter, 6 Blackf. 405 (held admissible even under a justification); 1867, Bickenstaff v. Perrin, 27 Ind. 528 (admissibility recognized).

Iowa: (1) (a): 1887, Hanners v. McClelland, 74 Ia. 318, 322, 37 N. W. 389 (admitted); 1921, Sclar v. Resnick, 192 Ia. 669, 185 N. W. 273 (slander; plaintiff's bad character admitted in mitigation, regardless of malice).

Kansas: 1912, Wood v. Custer, 86 Kan. 387, 121 Pac. 355 (slander charging cattle-stealing; reputation also as to integrity and as to being a cattle-thief, admitted).

Kentucky: (1) (a) admitted: 1810, Eastland v. Caldwell, 2 Bibb 21, 23; 1880, Campbell v. Bannister, 79 Ky. 209; 1896, Ratcliff v. Courier-Journal, 99 Ky. 416, 36 S. W. 177; (2) (b); particular trait only: Eastland v. Caldwell, supra.

Louisiana: (1) (a) admitted: 1828, Kendrick v. Kemp, 6 Mart. N. S. La. 500;

Maine: (1) (a) admitted: 1839, Smith v. Wyman, 16 Me. 14 (chastity);

Massachusetts: (1) (a) admitted: 1810, Wolcott v. Hall, 6 Mass. 518 (Parsons, C. J.: "he ought not to obtain large damages, if his character is of little or no estimation in society"); 1817, Ross v. Lapham, 14 Me. 279 (but excluding evidence of the plaintiff's being an atheist); 1825, Bodwell v. Swan, 3 Pick. 376 (Parker, C. J.: "To a reputation already soiled, the injury is small"); 1834, Com. v. Snelling, 15 Pick. 337, 344; 1843, Stone v. Varney, 7 Metc. 86; 1863, Chapman v. Ordway, 5 All. 595; 1863, Parkhurst v. Ketchum, 6 All. 406; 1874, Peterson v. Morgan, 116 Mass. 350; 1875, Clark v. Brown, 116 Mass. 509; 1881, Hastings v. Stetson, 130 Mass. 76, 78; (c) admitted: Stone v. Varney, supra (quoted supra, § 66); (2) general character and particular trait admitted: Clark v. Brown, supra.

Michigan: (1) (a) admitted: 1877, Proctor v. Houghtaling, 37 Mich. 41, 44; 1883, Bathrick v. Detroit Post, 50 Mich. 629, 642 (reputation before publication of the charge); 1897, Finley v. Widner, 112 Mich. 230, 70 N. W.

(2) As to the kind of repute receivable, the exclusive admissibility of general character is no longer the law anywhere; the exclusive admissibility of the particular trait is maintained in perhaps half of the jurisdictions, and in the others the admissibility of both is recognized.

433; 1897, Fowler v. Fowler, 113 Mich. 575, 71 N. W. 1084; 1897, Georgia v. Bond, 114 Mich. 196, 72 N. W. 232; (2) inconsistent rulings; 1883, Bathrick v. Post, supra (particular trait only); 1894, Thibault v. Sessions, 101 Mich. 279, 290, 59 N. W. 624 (general character only).

Minnesota: (1) (a): 1868, Simmons v. Holster, 13 Minn. 249, 257 (not decided); 1921, Nett v. Bonfig, — Minn. —, 185 N. W. 956 (slander; denial; plaintiff's bad reputation admissible, but not rumors of his guilt);

Mississippi: (1) (a) admitted: 1859, Powers v. Presgroves, 38 Miss. 227, 241; Missouri: (1) (a) admitted: 1822, Anthony v. Stephens, 1 Mo. 254; (2) particular trait only: Anthony v. Stephens, supra.

New Hampshire: (1) (a) admitted: 1833, Lamos v. Snell, 6 N. H. 413; 1851, Severance v. Hilton, 24 N. H. 148; (2) general character and particular trait also: Lamos v. Snell, supra.

New Jersey: (1) and (2); General bad character is admissible: 1855, Sayre v. Sayre, 25 N. J. L. 235 (exhaustive opinion by Green, C. J.);

N. Mexico: Annot. St. 1915, § 4155 ((c) "defendant may plead both truth and mitigating circumstances," "and whether he prove the justification or not, he may give mitigating circumstances in evidence").

New York: (1) (a) admissible, since the first case: 1806, Foot v. Tracy, 1 John. 46 (undecided; Kent, C. J., and Thompson, J., for, and Livingston, J., and Tompkins, J., against receiving it); 1824, Paddock v. Salisbury, 2 Cow. 811; 1829, Douglass v. Tousey, 2 Wend. 352 (since "defendants might indirectly contribute to the reputation of the plaintiff's bad character for the very purpose of reducing the damages in actions of slander already instituted against them", the reputation offered cannot be of the character after the words were uttered); 1829, King v. Root, 4 Wend. 139; 1847, Hamer v. McFarlin, 4 Den. 509; (c) admitted: King v. Root, supra; Hamer v. McFarlin, supra ("[The other view] assumes that the jury could not discriminate between the proof offered to sustain the justification and that which relates to the damages merely; but I think the evil apprehended is more imaginary than real").

North Carolina: (1) (a) admitted: 1802, Vick v. Whitfield, 2 Hayw. 222; 1853, Sample v. Wynn, Busbee 320;

Ohio: (1) (a) admitted: 1831, Dewit v. Greenfield, 5 Oh. 225; 1846, Fisher v. Patterson, 14 Oh. St. 418, 425.

Pennsylvania: (1) (a) admitted, but (b) doubtful: 1823, Anderson v. Long, 10 S. & R. 61, obiter; 1833, Smith v. Ruckecker, 4 Rawle 295 (undecided); 1835, Henry v. Norwood, 4 Watts 347, 350; 1847, Steinman v. McWilliams, 6 Pa. 170, 174 (admissible where a plea of not guilty is recorded; on a justification only, no decision given, the case going off on another point); 1864, Conroe v. Conroe, 47 Pa. 198 (admissible on the general issue; but apparently not on a justification alone); 1865, Moyer v. Moyer, 49 Pa. 210 (admitted; nothing said as to the bearing of pleadings); (2) The rulings have veered entirely around, originally admitting general character only, but now admitting only particular traits: 1833, Smith v. Ruckecker, 4 Rawle 295 (charge of whoring; evidence of the plaintiff's reputation for thieving, excluded); 1847, Steinman v. McWilliams, 6 Pa. 170, 175 (refusing to confine the plaintiff to reputation for veracity only, in an action for charging perjury; overruled in effect by the following cases, admitting particular traits); 1864, Conroe v. Conroe, 47 Pa. 198 (chastity); 1865, Moyer v. Moyer, 49 Pa. 210 (general character excluded, and only the particular trait admitted; Steinman v. McWilliams and Conroe v. Conroe cited but misread).

South Carolina: (1) (a) admitted; 1818, Buford v. M'Luny, 1 Nott & M. 268; 1820, Sawyer v. Eifert, 2 Nott & M. 511; 1833, Anon., 1 Hill S. C. 251, 253; 1836, Randall v. Holsenbake, 3 Hill. 177; (2) admitting general character and particular traits also: 1818, Buford v. M'Luny, 1 Nott & M. 268, 270 (it is not allowable "for instance, where a person is accused of stealing, to prove by way of mitigation that he had committed murder or that he was a drunkard or a gambler; but the evidence must go to show that his character is so bad that he might well be suspected of the particular offence charged, and could not be injured by the report").

Texas: A peculiar rule here applies to criminal libel for defaming a woman's chastity; by Penal Code 1895, § 751, Rev. P. C. 1911, § 1178, "the general reputation for chastity of the female alleged to have been slandered may be inquired into"; this is held to mean that on proof of the woman's bad repute for chastity the defendant is entitled to acquittal: 1909, Dobbs v. State, 55 Tex. Cr. 483, 117 S. W. 799.

Virginia: (1) (a) admitted: 1837, M'Nutt v. Young, 8 Leigh 542; 1839, Lincoln v. Chrisman, 10 Leigh 338, 342 (except, possibly, where the slander charges nothing affecting the moral character); 1867, Adams v. Lawson, 17 Gratt. 259, semble; (c) admitted: 1837, M'Nutt v. Young, 8 Leigh 542 (perhaps the best single case on the subject); (2) admitting general

§ 74. Same: Rumors of the Crime charged, as affecting Reputation. In thus seeking to mitigate damages by showing the plaintiff's reputation to be susceptible of little or no injury, the defendant will sometimes attempt to attain his purpose by showing less than a total lack of reputation for general character or for the particular trait. If, for instance, the charge was that the plaintiff stole a horse, the defendant will offer to show that there was a prevalent rumor or a common belief that the plaintiff stole the horse; thus, the defendant will assert, his false charge could not have hurt the plaintiff by causing a belief in his guilt, because there was already a common belief in it, or at least a rumor of it. The argument for permitting this has never been better put than in the following passage:

1860, PIGOT, C. B., dissenting, in Bell v. Parke, 11 Ir. C. L. 413, 425: "It is by putting extreme cases that the application of a principle can often be most clearly tested; let me put the case that I shall now describe. Suppose this to have happened: a gentleman employed in a railway-office is found in the office murdered, and circumstances of the very strongest suspicion attach upon one individual; the case is tried, the facts are fully investigated, the individual is acquitted; but there exists generally, in the community at large, a moral conviction that the party charged is guilty. . . . He is entitled to the benefit of his acquittal, and to the presumption of innocence which the law casts round one whose guilt has not been proved; no man can be justified in calling him a 'murderer', — nay, the general impression may, if the truth were clearly known, be unjust. But, rightly or wrongly, he has lost his good name, and there exists a general reputation that he was guilty of the specific offence which I have described. . . . Is it just or reasonable that a man so covered with the reputation of having been guilty of an atrocious crime should be entitled to as large a measure of damages, for being called a murderer, as a person of unblemished fame, upon whose character the breath of slander had never been blown? . . . Suppose two successive cases presented in succession to the same jury; in one, the alleged murderer is plaintiff, in the other, the plaintiff is a man without a stain upon his character; I do not think it just or reasonable (and I cannot think that it will ultimately be established as the law of England) that the same measure of damages should be applied to each."

character and particular traits also: 1837, M'Nutt v. Young, 8 Leigh 542; 1839, Lincoln v. Chrisman, 10 Leigh 343.

Vermont: (1) (a) and (2): 1802, Smith v. Shumway, 2 Tyler 74 (bad general character excluded).

West Virginia: (1) (a) admitted: 1869, Shroyer v. Miller, 3 W. Va. 158, 161.

Wisconsin: (1) (a) admitted, but (b) unsettled: 1867, B—— v. I——, 22 Wis. 372 (chastity; both general issue and justification pleaded); 1871, Wilson v. Noonan, 27 Wis. 599, 612 (official integrity); 1880, Maxwell v. Kennedy, 50 Wis. 645, 7 N. W. 657, semble (horse-stealing); 1898, Caudrian v. Miller, 98 Wis. 164, 73 N. W. 1004; (2) neither rule apparently settled upon: 1860, Haskins v. Lumsden, 10 Wis. 359, 369 (admissibility of general character doubted); 1867, B—— v. I——, supra (admissibility of general bad character assumed, for both general issue and justification); 1871, Wilson v. Noonan, supra (reserving the question whether general character may be shown; and intimating the negative); 1880, Maxwell v. Kennedy, supra (obscure); 1882, Campbell v. Campbell, 54 Wis. 90, 97, 11 N. W. 456 (poisoning; general character admissible, no distinction being made as to particular traits); 1906, Earley v. Winn, 129 Wis. 291, 209 N. W. 633 (slander that plaintiff whipped her mother; reputation as to ill-treating her mother, admitted; the rule being that the reputation is confined to "the fault or trait of character involved in the offence charged", citing some of the above cases as authority for this); 1877, Kimball v. Fernandez, 41 Wis. 329 (habit of evil conduct charged; single instances allowed to be proved; whether in justification only or on general issue, not decided).

Distinguish the defendant's offer of his own bad repute, as indicating that his utterance was not believed and thus did no harm: 1881, Hastings v. Stetson, 130 Mass. 76, 78.

But there are grave objections to permitting such a practice, as the following passages make clear:

1860, FITZGERALD, B., in Bell v. Parke, 11 Ir. C. L. 413, 420: "A reputation there may be as to general character; and as general character is affected by a slander, it may be natural to show, by rumors or otherwise, what that reputation is. But there cannot, as it appears to me, by reputation as to the guilt of a particular offence, in the sense in which reputation is understood in the law of evidence."

1882, CAVE, J., in Scott v. Sampson, L. R. 8 Q. B. D. 491: "It would seem that such evidence [rumors and suspicions as to the truth of the charge made by the defendant], is not admissible, as only indirectly tending to affect the plaintiff's reputation. If these rumors and suspicions have in fact affected the plaintiff's reputation, that may be proved by general evidence of reputation. If they have not affected it, they are not relevant to the issue. To admit evidence of rumors and suspicions is to give any one who knows nothing whatever of the plaintiff, or who may even have a grudge against him, an opportunity of spreading, through the means of the publicity attending judicial proceedings, what he may have picked from the most disreputable sources, and what no man of sense who knows the plaintiff's character would for a moment believe in. Unlike evidence of general reputation, it is particularly difficult for the plaintiff to meet and rebut such evidence; for all those who know him best can say is that they have not heard anything of these rumors. Moreover, it may be that it is the defendant himself who has started them"; a question to a witness, whether he had heard anywhere the story which was the libel in question before he saw it in the defendant's journal, was excluded.

1836, GIBSON, C. J., in Long v. Brougher, 5 Watts 440: "Surely it does not lessen the injury that the plaintiff's character, bleeding from a thousand wounds, has received only the finishing blow from the defendant. Who can say that it would not have weathered the storm had it not sunk at last under the accumulated weight of the defendant's wrongs? I am unable to see the justice of estimating character by fragments, or of treating as matter of extenuation the fact that the injured party had suffered the same prejudice from another. The blow may fall heavier on sensibilities morbid from the repetition of injury. The principle has no analogue in any other part of the law; for in the pursuit of reparation for trespass to my person, I am not to be told that my battered carcass was of little worth to me by reason of a previous beating. . . . In that predicament the condition of the sufferer is an aggravation of the wrong; inasmuch as the residue of a man's soundness, whether of body or character, is the more valuable to him, because it is all that he has to depend on. . . . Now it seems to be irreconcilable to the dictates of justice that previous outrage should be made an invitation to aggression by cheapening the consequences of it to the prepetrator, . . . [or] that a stale and exploded accusation may be made a pretext for its repetition."

The better arguments seem to require the exclusion of such evidence; and this is the result in the great majority of jurisdictions. The difficulty is, however, to draw the line between a mere rumor of the particular act charged and a general loss of reputation as to the particular trait involved in it; for the latter, as already seen (ante, § 73) is received in most jurisdictions. Thus in King v. Root, infra, the libel had charged the plaintiff with being in a state of beastly intoxication, and it was held that mere rumors of the act charged were inadmissible, while a bad reputation for excessive intoxication would be admissible. So far, then, as rumors of the sort have in effect destroyed the plaintiff's reputation to a real extent, it is proper enough to receive them; for this is only saying what all concede, that his reputation may be shown.

But the distinctions drawn and the phrasings used in the various decisions and jurisdictions differ considerably.[1] It may be noticed, however, that § 74. [1] ENGLAND: The reception of such evidence goes back to the case of Leicester v. Walter, 2 Camp. 251 (1809: libel; general issue; the right to dispute the damages under the general issue, being conceded, Mansfield, C. J., received evidence of "a general suspicion of the plaintiff's character", "general rumor", etc., "to show that he could receive little injury", "provided the reports got into many men's mouths"; follow Eamer v. Merle, unreported, by Lord Ellenborough, C. J., in which the damages upon a slander charging insolvency were mitigated by "rumors in circulation" to the effect); the subsequent treatment of the subject is well analyzed by Cave, J., summing up the cases in Scott v. Sampson, L. R. 8 Q. B. D. 491 (1882): "While such evidence appears to have been admitted by Lord Ellenborough, C. J., in Eamer v. Merle (not reported), and by Cresswell, J., with the approbation of Wightman, J., in Richards v. Richards, 2 Moo. & Rob. 557, and while its admissibility was supported by Pigot, C. B., in Bell v. Parke, 11 Ir. C. L. R. 413, it, was doubted by Abbott, C. J., in Waithman v. Weaver, 11 Price 257 n. and by Coleridge, J., in Nye v. Thompson, 16 Q. B. 175, and it was held inadmissible by Fitzgerald and Hughes, B. B., in Bell v. Parke, and by the whole Court of Exchequer, in Jones v. Stevens, 11 Price 235"; he then mentions Leicester v. Walter, 2 Camp. 251, as an early ruling of a peculiar sort; the only case omitted by the learned judge is Anon. v. Moor, 1 M. & S. 284, which received "reports in the neighborhood." The rule of exclusion seems settled for England by Scott v. Sampson.

CANADA: 1885, McGregor v. McArthur, 5 U. C. C. P. 493 (breach of promise; obscure).

UNITED STATES: Federal: 1900, Sun Print. & P. Ass'n v. Schenck, 40 C. C. A. 163, 98 Fed. 925 (prior rumors of the act, excluded); Alabama: 1834, Commons v. Walters, 1 Port. 323 (charge of receiving stolen goods; general suspicion in the neighborhood, before the charge, held admissible, as involving, "loss of character"); 1846, Bradley v. Gibson, 9 Ala. 406 (charge that the plaintiff was a hog thief and had left Mississippi to avoid a trial for hog-stealing; such reports excluded, except that after showing bad general character, the reports might perhaps have been used to indicate its extent; the preceding case thus explained); Holley v. Burgess, 9 Ala. 730 (approving Bradley v. Gibson); California: 1901, Hearne v. De Young, 132 Cal. 357, 64 Pac. 576 (mere rumors of the act in question, excluded); Colorado: 1913, Meeker v. Post P. & P. Co., 55 Colo. 355, 135 Pac. 457 (rumors, etc., excluded, no issue of mitigation of damages being made under the pleading); Connecticut: 1820, Bailey v. Hyde, 3 Conn. 463, 466 ("reports in the neighborhood that he had been guilty of practices similar", admissible if they have circulated so far "as to have blemished the plaintiff's character"); 1822, Treat v. Browning, 4 Conn. 408, 414 (reports admitted as affecting the damages by amounting to "common fame or reputation"; purporting to follow Leicester v. Walter; here the slander was that the plaintiff had a bastard child); Georgia: 1897, Cox v. Strickland, 101 Ga. 482, 28 S. E. 655 (charge of arson; rumors of various arsons, excluded); Illinois: 1858, Sheahan v. Collins, 20 Ill. 328 (obscure ruling, but semble excluded); 1873, Strader v. Snyder, 67 Ill. 404, 410 (general repute as to the fact charged, excluded); Indiana: 1825, Henson v. Veatch, 1 Blackf. 371 (left undecided); 1841, Sanders v. Johnson, 6 Blackf. 54 (the mere existence of reports imputing the crime, without any showing as to their generality or their effect on the reputation, excluded, at least where the plea is justification); 1854, Kelley v. Dillon, 5 Ind. 428 (same as next case); 1867, Bickenstaff v. Perrin, 27 Ind. 528 (general suspicion or rumor of the acts imputed, but not the mere existence of a rumor or suspicion, admissible); Iowa: 1887, Hanners v. McClelland, 74 Ia. 320, 322, 37 N. W. 389 (rumors excluded, distinguishing Bar v. Hack, 46 Ia. 310, and in effect overruling it on this point); 1912, Mills v. Flynn, 157 Ia. 477, 137 N. W. 1082 (Hanners v. McClelland followed); 1913, Ott v. Murphy, 160 Ia. 730, 141 N. W. 463 (rumors excluded); Kentucky: 1910, Morgan v. Lexington Herald Co., 138 Ky. 637, 128 S. W. 1064 (admitted); Louisiana: 1828, Kendrick v. Kemp, 6 Mart. N. S. 500 (that "the people of St. H. were in the habit of" abusing the plaintiff, excluded); Massachusetts: excluded in the following cases: 1810, Wolcott v. Hall, 6 Mass. 518; 1822, Alderman v. French, 1 Pick. 1, 17; 1843, Stone v. Varney, 7 Metc. 91; 1848, Watson v. Moore, 2 Cush. 140; 1874, Peterson v. Morgan, 116 Mass. 350; Michigan: 1877, Proctor v. Houghtaling, 37 Mich. 41, 44 (excluding "particular suspicions"); 1897, Wolff v. Smith, 113 Mich. 359, 70 N. W. 1010, semble (same); Minnesota: 1868, Simmons v. Holster, 13 Minn. 249, 257 (not decided); Mississippi: 1859, Powers v. Presgroves, 38 Miss. 227, 241 (excluded); Missouri: 1822, Anthony v. Stephens, 1 Mo. 254 (current report as to the fact charged, excluded); 1843, Moberly v. Preston, 8 Mo. 462, 466, semble (same); New Hampshire: 1827, Mason v. Mason, 4 N. H. 114, semble (common report, excluded); 1852, Dame v. Kenney, 25 N. H. 318 (reports excluded, even though they actually affect the reputation); New York: 1829, King v. Root, 4 Wend. 129, 140 (rumors excluded; but reputation for the class of act admitted, if "of the same quality or degree some Courts recognize a third sort of thing, a reputation as to the act charged, — lying between a mere rumor as to the act, on one hand, and a reputation as to the particular trait involved, on the other; but this variation seems anomalous and unsound.

This use of such rumors, as negativing the harm done to the plaintiff's reputation, is to be distinguished from two other uses of similar facts, arising chiefly under the substantive law of Defamation, but also forming the subject of much controversy in the past: (1) Conduct or rumored conduct of the plaintiff offered as constituting the defendant's grounds for suspecting the plaintiff of the offence charged, and thus indicating the absence of malice and going in mitigation of damages; the argument against this is that such matter, so far as it amounts to anything substantial, should be made to support a plea of truth; (2) the fact that the defendant did not originate the charge, but merely heard it from others, offered to negative malice and mitigate damages; the argument against this is that a wise policy will not regard it as an extenuation. Both these subjects belong to the law of Defamation; and, as the cases treating them are not likely to be confounded with evidentiary rulings upon character or repute, it is unnecessary to deal with them here. Moreover, the use of particular acts of misconduct to evidence the character or reputation usable under the principles of the preceding sections, though it involves an evidentiary question, is governed by wholly different considerations (post, §§ 207, 209).

§ 75. (2) Plaintiff's Reputed Bad Character as mitigating Damages in Other Actions (Seduction, Crim. Con., Indecent Assault, Breach of Marriage Promise, Malicious Prosecution, etc.). It is obvious that, on the principle so generally accepted for an action of Defamation, the plaintiff's reputed charged in the libel"; i.e. the damages for a charge of beastly intoxication not to be mitigated by reputation for the free use of liquors; but Mather, Sen., argues forcefully to the contrary, in dissenting at 158); 1838, Kennedy v. Gifford, 19 Wend. 298, 301 (reputation as to the charge, as well as rumors, excluded); North Carolina: 1826, Nelson v. Evans, 1 Dev. 9 (charge of theft; "general opinion and belief" of the plaintiff's guilt, admitted); 1861, Luther v. Skeen, 8 Jones L. 356 (reports of specific misconduct, excluded); Ohio: 1831, Dewit v. Greenfield, 5 Oh. 226 (general suspicion as to the plaintiff's guilt of the act charged, admissible); 1846, Fisher v. Patterson, 14 Oh. 418, 425 (general reputation of a different analogous act, excluded); 1855, Van Derveer v. Sutphin, 5 Oh. St. 293, 298 (reports in general circulation as to the facts charged, excluded); Pennsylvania: 1833, Smith v. Ruckecker, 4 Rawle 295 (charge to whoring; rumors as to the plaintiff's illicit intercourse, excluded); 1836, Long v. Brougher, 5 Watts 439 (reports of the same crime, excluded; quoted supra); South Carolina: 1831, Freeman v. Price, 2 Bail. 115 ("whether he had never heard anything against the reputation of the plaintiff", excluded; distinguishing it from the fact that the plaintiff "was generally suspected of the fact charged"; but the latter is not allowed in the authority cited); 1833, Anon., 1 Hill S. C. 251, 253 (apparently contradictory, in allowing suspicious facts to be shown; but the doctrine of suspicion as an excuse was probably in the court's mind); 1836, Randall v. Holsenbake, 3 Hill S. C. 177 (may prove suspicious facts, as in preceding case; also "that the plaintiff was generally reported and suspected to be guilty of the crime imputed to him"); Wisconsin: 1860, Haskins v. Lumsden, 10 Wis. 359 (mere rumors excluded; "the existence of unfavorable and defamatory rumors and reports [as to the fact charged] is one thing, and a real loss of character and standing in [the] community quite another"); 1906, Earley v. Winn, 129 Wis. 290, 109 N. W. 633 (slander that plaintiff whipped her mother; Haskins v. Lumsden followed).

character may be considered, in mitigation of damages, in any other action in which the law of Damages recognizes the harm to reputation as one of the elements of recovery.

This has always been conceded for the action of seduction, for here the disgrace to the father must naturally be less or lacking if the daughter is already of bad reputation for chastity; her previous bad reputation may therefore be shown.[1] In the same way, in a husband's action for criminal conversation, the wife's previous bad reputation may be shown.[2] Here and in the preceding action, the father's or husband's own reputation is, as such, apparently immaterial; but a distinction is to be made as to his actual conduct or character, for this, while not necessarily an excuse for the defendant, may well serve in mitigation, inasmuch as the loss of his wife's or daughter's virtue can mean little to a person of his behavior; thus the reputation is here received as evidence of the actual character.[3]

The reputed character of the plaintiff in an action for breach of promise

§ 75. [1] ENGLAND: 1808, Bamfield v. Massey, 1 Camp. 460, Lord Ellenborough, C. J.: 1814, Dodd v. Norris, 3 id. 519, same judge; 1840, Carpenter v. Wall, 11 A. & E. 804.

CANADA: 1876, McCreary v. Grundy, 39 U. C. Q. B. 316, 325.

UNITED STATES: Ala. 1830, Drish v. Davenport, 2 Stew. 226, 270; Conn. 1811, Davenport v. Russell, 5 Day 145, 148; Del. 1851, Robinson v. Burton, 5 Harringt. 335, 337; Ill. 1874, White v. Murtland, 71 Ill. 250, 264; Ind. 1859, Shattuck v. Myers, 13 Ind. 50; 1868, Bell v. Rinker, 29 Ind. 269; 1884, South Bend v. Hardy, 98 Ind. 580; Iowa: 1848, Carter v. Cavanaugh, 1 Greene 171, 175, semble; Mass. 1807, Boynton v. Kellogg, 3 Mass. 189 (excluded so far as the bad character was acquired in consequence of the seduction); Minn. 1904, Wyman v. Lynde, 93 Minn. 257, 101 N. W. 163 (assault and criminal abuse; the daughter's subsequent character, excluded); Mo. 1875, McKern v. Calbert, 59 Mo. 242 (excluded; whether as negativing an essential element of the plaintiff's case, viz. his daughter's chastity, or in mitigation of damages, does not appear); N. Y. 1805, Akerley v. Haines, 2 Caines 292 (contra, unchaste character of the daughter immaterial, as the loss of service is the basis of the claim); 1851, Pratt v. Andrews, 4 N. Y. 495, Bronson, C. J., semble (admissible); Pa. 1863, Hoffman v. Kemerer, 44 Pa. 452; 1858, Tenn. Reed v. Williams, 5 Sneed 580, 582; 1858, Thompson v. Clendening, 1 Head 287, 296 (but not after the time of seduction); Wis. 1864, Watry v. Ferber, 18 Wis. 500, 503.

For the woman's character, as a main part of the issue and not merely as mitigating damages, in a criminal prosecution or her own statutory action by the woman for seduction, see post, § 79.

Compare also the rulings on character as a motive (post, § 390, n. 1).

[2] 1824, Starkie, Evidence, II, 305; 1811, Davenport v. Russell, 5 Day Conn. 145, 148; 1876, Crose v. Rutledge, 81 Ill. 266; 1906, Hardwick v. Hardwick, 130 Ia. 230, 106 N. W. 639 (loss of consortium; plaintiff's bad moral character, admitted); 1851, Pratt v. Andrews, 4 N. Y. 495, Bronson, C. J. (approving Bamfield v. Massey and Dodd v. Norris); 1823, Anderson v. Long, 10 S. & R. Pa. 61; 1816, Ligon v. Ford, 5 Munf. Va. 10, 16.

Apparently the wife's or daughter's actual character would also be material as mitigating the injury to feelings (McKern v. Calvert, supra).

For the use of particular acts as showing this actual character of the daughter, see post, §§ 210, 211.

Compare also the cases cited post, § 390, (character as a motive).

[3] Conn. 1832, Norton v. Warner, 9 Conn. 172 (general moral character excluded; although his character as a husband is to be considered); Del. 1851, Robinson v. Burton, 5 Harringt. 335, 338 (reputation here not admitted to show the dissolute character of the father to mitigate damages in an action for seduction, because it "can be proved by particulars"); Tenn. 1858, Reed v. Williams, 5 Sneed 580, 582 (admitted); 1858, Thompson v. Clendening, 1 Head 287, 296 (admitted; but not the mother's reputation); 1900, Spellings v. Parks, 104 Tenn. 351, 58 S. W. 126 (seduction; bad reputation of plaintiff's mother, inadmissible).

For the use of particular acts as showing this actual character of the father, see post, §§ 210, 211.

of marriage,[4] or for indecent assault,[5] or for malicious prosecution,[6] is necessarily involved in the measurement of damages; but not in the ordinary tort-actions for violence.[7] Yet where injury to earning-capacity is involved, the actual character may be material,[8] and conceivably also the reputed character for skill and the like.

§ 76. (3) Plaintiff's Reputed Good Character as affecting Damages in Defamation, Seduction, Crim. Con., etc. That the plaintiff under the foregoing doctrine may refute the imputations cast on his reputed character, by showing his good reputed character, is not doubted. But whether he may go into it until it has been attacked has been the subject of much difference of opinion. The better rule seems to be that his reputation is assumed to be good, and that he has therefore no need to sustain it until it has been attacked.[1]

[4] 1855, McGregor v. McArthur, 5 U. C. C. P. 493; 1912, Young v. Corrigan, U. S. D. C. N. D. Ohio, 208 Fed. 431; 1860, Burnett v. Simpkins, 24 Ill. 267; 1873, Williams v. Hollingsworth, 6 Baxt. Tenn. 12, 16; 1920, Ganerke v. Kiley, 171 Wis. 543, 177 N. W. 889 (loss of reputation by reason of the breach, admissible for the plaintiff; birth of a child, or pregnancy, admissible to evidence loss of reputation).

Distinguish the following use: 1917, D. v. B., 38 D. L. R. 243, Ont. (breach of promise of marriage; repute of plaintiff's community as to her unchastity, consequent upon defendant's breach; decision not clear).

Distinguish here the use of the woman's bad character as an excuse for the breach (post, § 77).

[5] Here both the actual and the reputed character would have a bearing: 1897, Gross v. Brodrecht, 24 Ont. App. 687; 1889, Gore v. Curtis, 81 Me. 403, 405, 17 Atl. 314 (indecent assault; the plaintiff's character for unchastity, admitted); 1893, Miller v. Curtis, 158 Mass. 127, 130, 32 N. E. 1039 (indecent assault; damages to feelings; the plaintiff's virtue or the reverse, as affecting her shocked feelings, semble, admissible); 1882, Mitchell v. Work, 13 R. I. 645 (same; "the mental sufferings of a vulgar and licentious woman from an indecent assault would be less than that of a modest and virtuous woman"); 1903, Barton v. Bruley, 119 Wis. 326, 96 N. W. 815.

For the use of particular acts to evidence this character, see post, § 212.

[6] 1907, Emory v. Eggan, 75 Kan. 82, 88 Pac. 740; 1849, Bacon v. Towne, 4 Cush. Mass. 240; 1907, Conklin v. Consolidated R. Co., 196 Mass. 302, 82 N. E. 23 (assault, arrest, and malicious prosecution); 1919, Boyers v. Lindhorst, 280 Mo. 5, 216 S. W. 536 (malicious prosecution; general bad repute, admissible); 1901, Hiersche v. Scott, — Nebr. —, 95 N. W. 494 (reputation of the plaintiff for insanity, admitted in an action for maliciously instituting proceedings to commit); 1920, Schreiner v. Hutter, 104 Nebr. 539, 177 N. W. 826 (abuse of process; plaintiff's bad repute, excluded, under the pleadings); 1900, Drummond v. Henderson, 62 Oh. 136, 56 N. E. 650 (malicious prosecution, against a magistrate; plaintiff's bad reputation for honesty admitted); 1891, Wolf v. Perryman, 82 Tex. 112, 120, 17 S. W. 772.

Distinguish here the use of the plaintiff's bad character as evidencing reasonable ground of suspicion (post, § 258).

[7] 1921, Meints v. Huntington, 8th C. C. A., 276 Fed. 245 (battery and false imprisonment, committed on an alleged disloyalist by alleged loyalists; "reputation or character of the litigants", i.e. plaintiff, held inadmissible; unsound, because here the circumstances might have justified exemplary damages, but for the plaintiff's disloyal character); 1851, Corning v. Corning, 6 N. Y. 97 (battery; excluded). Contra: 1920, Wrabek v. Suchomel, 145 Minn. 468, 177 N. W. 764 (assault and battery on a public occasion; plaintiff's bad reputation as a law-abiding citizen, admitted under a general denial).

[8] 1895, Wright v. Crawfordsville, 142 Ind. 636, 639, 42 N. E. 227 ("vicious habit of becoming intoxicated", provable as affecting earning capacity of deceased in action for death).

§ 76. [1] DEFAMATION: Excluded before attack: Fed. 1918, Buckeye Cotton Oil Co. v. Sloan, 6th C. C. A., 250 Fed. 712 (not decided; but here the cross-examination had attacked plaintiff's character); 1917, Washington Post Co. v. Chaloner, 47 D. C. App. 66 (charge of murder; plea of truth; admitted); Del. 1841, Parke v. Blackiston, 3 Harringt. 373, 375 (absolutely, because the defendant is not allowed to attack it); Ind. 1843, McCabe v. Platter, 6 Blackf. 405; 1861, Miles v. Vanhorn, 17 Ind. 249; 1867, Hann v. Wilson, 28 Ind. 301; Mass. 1827, Harding v. Brooks, 5 Pick. 244, semble; Mont. 1916, Fowlie v. Cruse, 52 Mont. 222, 157 Pac. 958 (but here merely instructing the jury under Rev. C. § 8026);

§ 77. (4) Party's Bad Character as an Excuse, or as otherwise in Issue; Breach of Promise of Marriage. The character of a plaintiff, reputed or actual, may come into issue, under the substantive law and the pleadings, and thus becomes material. No principle of evidence is involved, until the question arises as to the mode of evidencing the character (post, §§ 202–208).[1]

In the action for breach of promise of marriage, to begin with, the actual bad character of the plaintiff as to chastity may be an excuse for terminating the contract, and is therefore material.[2]

§ 78. Same: Character of Houses of Ill-fame or of their Inmates; Gambling Houses; Liquor Resorts; etc. In prosecutions for keeping a bawdy-house or house of ill-fame, or a place of resort for gambling, liquor-selling, or the

N. H. 1851, Severance v. Hilton, 24 N. H. 148; 1852, Dame v. Kenney, 25 N. H. 324 (improper evidence of rumors is sufficient to constitute an attack); Oh. 1893, Blakeslee v. Hughes, 50 Oh. 490, 34 N. E. 793; Or. 1893, Cooper v. Phipps, 24 Or. 357, 362, 33 Pac. 985; Pa. 1902, Clark v. North American Co., 203 Pa. 346, 53 Atl. 237 (it is immaterial whether the impeachment is made directly or by insinuation on cross-examination); 1906, Burkhart v. North American Co., 214 Pa. 39, 63 Atl. 410 (Clark v. North American Co. followed).

Admitted: 1803, R. v. Waring, 5 Esp. 13, Alvanley, L. C. J.; 1813, Givens v. Bradley, 3 Bibb Ky. 192, 195, semble; 1835, Williams v. Greenwade, 3 Dana 432 (general issue; good character admissible "in aggravation", before attack); 1915, Deitchman v. Bowles, 166 Ky. 285, 179 S. W. 249; 1894, Stafford v. Journal Ass., 142 N. Y. 598, 37 N. E. 625 (admitted on the facts); 1853, Sample v. Wynn, Busbee N. C. 322; 1867, Adams v. Lawson, 17 Gratt. Va. 250, 258; 1869, Shroyer v. Miller, 3 W. Va. 158, 161.

Not decided: 1913, Stearns v. Long, 215 Mass. 152, 102 N. E. 326.

Distinguish the following: 1915, Wilson v. Sun Pub. Co., 85 Wash. 503, 148 Pac. 774 (defamation; the plaintiffs were partners and the libel was on their restaurant business; reputation of "one of the partners", excluded, on the issue of damages, only joint reputation being admissible; unsound, because untrue to human nature).

SEDUCTION: Excluded before attack: 1808, Bamfield v. Massey, 1 Camp. 460, Ellenborough, L. C. J.; 1814, Dodd v. Norris, 3 Camp. 520, same judge; 1876, Burke v. Scribner, 16 N. Br. 652 (breach of promise; after cross-examination to prior unchastity, the plaintiff's good character was admitted); 1907, Colburn v. Marble, 196 Mass. 376, 82 N. E. 28 (particular acts of unchastity do not constitute such an attack); 1851, Pratt v. Andrews, 4 N. Y. 493, Bronson, C. J., semble (particular acts of misconduct do not constitute such an attack).

CRIMINAL CONVERSATION: 1800, R. v. Francis, 3 Esp. 116, Lord Kenyon, C. J. (the defendant pleaded the prosecutor's dissipated character, etc., in mitigation; but as his witnesses denied this, the prosecutor was not allowed to go into it); 1851, Pratt v. Andrews, N. Y. supra.

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION: 1855, Goldsmith v. Picard, 27 Ala. 142, 147, 153 (malicious attachment, whereby the plaintiff's business was injured; his good reputation as a merchant admitted).

SUNDRIES: 1813, Givens v. Bradley, 3 Bibb 192, 195 (battery; excluded).

§ 77. [1] The following cases illustrate the variety of issues: 1776, Martyn v. Hind, Cowp. 437, 441 (the plaintiff's character and conduct as a justification for the defendant's removal of the plaintiff, suing for dismissal from his curacy); 1893, People v. Gates, 46 Cal. 52 (a statute punishing "open and notorious cohabitation"; the notoriety is provable as a fact in issue).

The use of character to evidence reasonable grounds for belief (in malicious prosecution and the like) is dealt with post, §§ 246–258.

[2] 1801, Foulkes v. Sellway, 3 Esp. 236; 1796, Woodard v. Bellamy, 2 Root Conn. 354; 1897, Smith v. Hall, 69 Conn. 651, 38 Atl. 386 (the bad character of the plaintiff being pleaded in defence, evidence of her good character was admitted in rebuttal); 1907, Colburn v. Marble, 196 Mass. 376, 82 N. E. 28 (collecting the cases as to the various excuses of this sort); 1875, Von Storch v. Griffin, 77 Pa. 504.

So also for alienation of affections: 1920, Justice v. Clinard, 142 Tenn. 208, 217 S. W. 663 (alienation of affections).

But if actual unchastity is the defence, reputed chastity is not material in rebuttal: 1911, McKane v. Howard, 202 N. Y. 181, 95 N. E. 642 (on a plea of the plaintiff's prior fornication, in defence to an action for breach of promise, the plaintiff's good repute for chastity is inadmissible).

For the use of particular acts as showing chastity — character, see post, § 206.

like, it is often difficult to distinguish whether a question of Evidence or a question of Criminal Law is involved; and much will depend on the elements of the crime as determined by the wording of the statute and by its judicial construction.

(a) Character of the House. If it distinctly appears in the statute that the repute of the house is the essential criminal fact, so that merely to keep a house of that reputation is the offence, then the reputation is a fact in issue, and the reputation may be shown, irrespective of the actual character or use of the house.[1] But if the actual character or use of the house is also or alone an element of the crime, then the question of the use of reputation is an evidentiary one, i.e. whether reputation, as an exception to the Hearsay rule, may be used to evidence the character; this is dealt with post, § 1620.[2]

(b) Character of the Inmates. A house of ill-fame, or disorderly or bawdy house, signifies a house commonly resorted to or lived in by prostitutes for purposes of prostitution; thus, one element in the offence of keeping it may be the kind of persons resorting to or living in it. Now it is usually understood by Courts that this element of the crime involves, not merely the actual but also the reputed character of these persons as prostitutes; in which case their reputed character becomes a fact in issue; and this is the general result of the precedents.[3] It is of course conceivable that a Court may hold their § 78. [1] 1913, Massee v. Williams, 6th C. C. A., 207 Fed. 222 (undecided); 1846, Caldwell v. State, 17 Conn. 467, 472; 1873, State v. Morgan, 40 Conn. 44 (a statute punishing the keeping of a place "reputed" to sell liquors); State v. Buckley, 40 Conn. 246; 1880, State v. Thomas, 47 Conn. 546; 1909, State v. Anderson, 82 Conn. 111, 72 Atl. 648 (but if the actual character is disputed, then the reputation becomes merely evidential, and the actual character must be found); 1879, King v. State, 17 Fla. 183, 190 ("ill-fame"; reputation admitted both of the house and of the individuals who resort to it); 1894, State v. West, 46 La. An. 1009, 1015, 15 So. 418 (reputation of the house, with other facts, admitted to show it to be disorderly), 1914, State v. Fanning, 97 Nebr. 224, 149 N. W. 413 (opinion somewhat indefinite as to the points decided); 1893, State v. Hull, 18 R. I. 207, 26 Atl. 191 (reputation of the house or of its frequenters, admissible, but not of the defendant); 1873, Morris v. State, 38 Tex. 603 ("house for the purpose of public prostitution"; reputation admitted as "the subject of the inquiry"); 1875, Sylvester v. State, 42 Tex. 496 (same); 1872, State v. Brunell, 29 Wis. 435 (not clear whether reputation is treated as evidential or in issue).

Of course the actual character, or use, of the house may also be shown (where the terms of the statute do not exclusively make repute the element).

Whether this actual use may be shown by particular instances of prostitution, etc., is discussed post, § 204.

Whether knowledge may be shown by reputation, is noticed post, § 254.

Whether the Legislature may constitutionally make the fact of reputation alone a crime, is considered post, § 1354.

[2] There is also a third conceivable situation, viz., that the house must be one of prostitution both actually and by repute; in this case the reputation is in issue on the latter element, but the evidentiary question may arise whether it is also usable to prove the former.

[3] In most of the ensuing cases the distinction is not made, and the inmates' "character" is admitted: 1833, U. S. v. Stevens, 4 Cr. C. C. 341 (on a count charging the defendant with suffering persons of ill-fame to come together, the reputation of the visitors of the house was admitted); 1920, Thaler v. U. S., 6th C. C. A., 261 Fed. 746 (assisting patronage of a house of ill-fame, under U. S. St. May 18, 1917, § 13; reputation of defendant's house-detective as a panderer, admitted); 1876, Wooster v. State, 55 Ala. 221; 1919, Batesville v. Smythe, 138 Ark. 276, 211 S. W. 140; 1899, Demartini v. Anderson, 127 Cal. 33, 59 Pac. 207; 1866, State v. Jerome, 33 Conn. 265, 269; 1900, Howard v. People, 27 Colo. 396, 61 Pac. 595 (as well as that of the defendant); 1918, Graul v. U. S., 47 D. C. App. 543, 548 (reputa-actual character to be the essential thing, and then the evidentiary question is again raised, whether the reputation may be used to prove this. Since, however, the propriety of thus using the reputation is plain (post, § 1620, under the Hearsay rule), the distinction ought to be practically of little consequence.

§ 79. Same: Criminal Prosecution or Statutory Action for Seduction. Where by statute the crime of seduction is established or an action given to the woman, three cases arise. (1) Either the statute (as occasionally) describes the woman as of "chaste repute"; or (2) it describes her as of "chaste character"; or (3) it does not make any limitation of the sort. In the latter case, however, the Courts have almost uniformly (post, § 205) implied into the statute the requirement of (2); so that (2) and (3) stand practically on the same footing. Now in (1) the reputation is the thing in issue; the actual character is immaterial. The reputation is therefore provable without doubt; and the only question that can arise is whether particular acts of unchastity are usable (post, § 205). In (2) the actual character is the matter in issue. One question is whether particular acts of unchastity are usable to show it; this is dealt with elsewhere (post, § 205). Another question is whether reputation may be used to show the actual character; this involves the exception to the Hearsay rule, and is therefore discussed elsewhere (post, § 1620). Another question is whether the chastity is presumed, i.e. whether the burden of producing evidence of unchastity is on the defendant, and whether the prosecution must or may evidence the woman's good character before it has been disputed by the defendant's evidence (post, § 2528); or similar question arises where the issue is merely as to damages (ante, § 76), but the solution is not necessarily the same.

tion of some inmates three or four years before, admitted as evidencing defendant's knowledge); 1879, King v. State, 17 Fla. 183, 190 (see citation supra); 1898, Shaffer v. State, 87 Md. 124, 39 Atl. 313; 1856, Com. v. Kimball, 7 Gray Mass. 328; 1861, Com. v. Gannett, 1 All. Mass. 7; 1875, Com. v. Cardoze, 119 Mass. 210; 1906, State v. Hoyle, 98 Minn. 254, 107 N. W. 1130; 1895, State v. Hendricks, 15 Mont. 194, 39 Pac. 94; 1851, Clementine v. State, 14 Mo. 113; 1860, State v. M'Gregor, 41 N. H. 407, 412; 1915, State v. Koettgen, 88 N. J. L. 51, 95 Atl. 747 (Swayze, J.: "Thieves and prostitutes do not gather at a church"); 1920, State v. Ingram, 180 N. C. 672, 105 S. E. 3 (drunken character of frequenters of defendant's pool-room, admitted); R. I. Gen. L. 1909, c. 108, § 3 (quoted post, § 1620); 1893, State v. Hull, 18 R. I. 207 (see citation supra); 1838, State v. McDowell, Dudley S. C. 345, 349 ("when the facts are proved that the defendants, common prostitutes, occupied particular houses . . . , a strong presumption of the character of the houses was raised").

Whether the character or occupation of such inmate may be shown by particular instances of prostitution, etc., is discussed post, § 204.

The character of the defendant himself may not be used against him as defendant (ante, § 57), but his character as an inmate may well be; hence a variance of rulings: 1919, Batesville v. Smythe, 138 Ark. 276, 211 S. W. 140 (admitted, when the accused is an inmate); 1901, State v. Beebe, 115 Ia. 128, 88 N. W. 358 (whether the defendant's reputation for unchastity is receivable, not decided); 1893, State v. Hull, R. I., supra (excluded); 1900, Howard v. People, Colo., supra (admitted); 1900, Dailey v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 55 S. W. 823 (admitted).

Compare the cases cited post, § 1620 (reputation).

The same issues might arise on a charge of keeping a house for illegal gaming; but usually the statute does not make repute a part of the issue, and the question of knowledge (post, § 254) or intent (post, § 367) is the important one.

§ 80. Same: Character of an Employee, as affecting the Employer's Liability. By the law of Torts and Agency, an essential fact in the liability of an employer may be the employee's character as an incompetent person (through negligence, intemperance, and the like), and the employer's knowledge of this incompetence. Thus the employee's character becomes a fact in issue, and will usually be evidenced through his reputation.[1] There is here no doubt, and no question of Evidence. But the employer's knowledge of this character is also a fact in issue, and the same reputation may serve also to show this knowledge; this is an evidentiary question of the mode of evidencing Knowledge (dealt with post, § 249). Besides these aspects, however, there are also occasional instances in which an employee's character may in other ways become material under the issues.[2] § 80. [1] For evidence by Reputation, see post, §§ 1608–1621 (Hearsay Rule); for evidence by Specific Acts of Negligence, see post, § 208; for evidence by Individual Opinion, see post, §§ 1984, 1987 (Opinion Rule). For the wholly different question, whether the employee's character may be used to argue that he was or was not negligent on a given occasion, see ante, § 65.

[2] 1904, Gould v. Magnolia Metal Co., 207 Ill. 172, 69 N. E. 896 (discharge of an employee for moral misconduct; the reputation for unchastity of his women associates, held material); 1911, Saunders v. Atchison T. & S. F. R. Co., 86 Kan. 56, 119 Pac. 552 (fire set by locomotives; engineer's character for care and skill, admissible as a part of the facts rebutting the presumption of negligence); 1896, Louisville Ins. Co. v. Monarch, 99 Ky. 578, 36 S. W. 563 (the competency of the captain and crew of a steamboat lost, as showing that she was properly manned and therefore seaworthy); 1874, Cleghorn v. R. Co., 56 N. Y. 44 (that the culpable employee was known to the defendant to be of intemperate habits, admitted as involving a culpability of the defendant which would support exemplary damages).

TOPIC I (continued): PROSPECTANT EVIDENCE OF A HUMAN ACT

CHAPTER VI.

Sub-topic B: PHYSICAL CAPACITY, SKILL, OR MEANS

Sub-topic C: HABIT OR CUSTOM

Sub-topic D: DESIGN OR PLAN

Sub-topic E: EMOTION OR MOTIVE

Sub-topic B: PHYSICAL CAPACITY, SKILL, OR MEANS, AS EVIDENCE OF AN ACT DONE

§ 83. General Principle. As indicating the likelihood of a person doing or not doing an act in question, his physical capacity (or lack of it), his technical skill (or lack of it), and his possession (or lack) of the appropriate means or tools, are usually of sufficient probative value to be admissible. The circumstances of each case usually make it clear whether one of these data is there relevant; and no more detailed rules need to be laid down, nor has any important controversy arisen over the relevancy of this species of evidence.

The considerations that have led to exclusion of such facts in a few instances have usually been considerations affecting some other use or aspect of the evidence, with which the present use was confounded. Thus, the rules against the use of a party's character as evidence (ante, §§ 55, 64) have sometimes been thought to require exclusion of facts wrongly construed as equivalent to character. Again, the rule against using an accused person's specific misconduct to show character (post, § 193), and limiting such misconduct, when used to show intent, by strict conditions (post, § 300), may sometimes be thought to operate against the fact of possession of criminal tools or other means. The general impropriety of using against an accused person either character, or specific misconduct to show character, is so constantly in the mind of Courts that they occasionally ignore the possibilities of evidence from the present point of view, and, by a wrong construction of the purpose of the evidence, feel bound to apply to it exclusionary rules that have no concern with it. This much must be kept in mind as a key to rulings which are otherwise inexplicable and ought not to stand as precedents.

As a general principle, then, the existence or lack of the physical capacity, skill, or means to do an act is admissible as some evidence of the possibility or probability of the person's doing or not doing it:[1]

1879, TAYLOR, J., in Ingalls v. State, 48 Wis. 647, 651, 4 N. W. 785: "There can be no doubt as to the right of a person accused of crime to show that at the time of its commission he was physically incapable of committing it. There can be no doubt of the right of the accused to show that he was at the time prostrated by a disease which rendered it highly improbable that he could have endured the exertion and labor necessary to commit the crime. . . . In such case the intoxication is not shown for the purpose of excuse or mitigation of the offence charged, but as evidence tending to show that he was not present and did not commit the acts constituting the offence. Evidence of this kind would have but little weight against direct evidence showing the actual presence of the accused at the time and place when and where the crime was committed; but, certainly, in the absence of any such direct evidence, the accused may give in evidence any fact which would have a natural tendency to render it improbable that he was there and did the acts complained of; and the fact that drunkenness was the thing which tended to prove such improbability, can make no difference. If a man by voluntary drunkenness renders himself incapable of walking for a limited time, it is just as competent evidence tending to show that he did not walk during the time that he was so incapable, as though he had been so rendered incapable by paralysis of his limbs from some cause over which he had no control."

The inference from heredity belongs under this principle. Its propriety has been conceded, with certain limitations, as evidence of paternity and race (post, § 165), of insanity (post, § 232) and of long life (post, § 223).

§ 84. Strength. The physical strength of a person may be of probative value to show that he was peculiarly capable or peculiarly incapable of doing the act in question.[1] How to evidence the strength is a different question;

§ 83. [1] The contrary broad statement in Costelo v. Crowell, 139 Mass. 591, 2 N. E. 698 (1885), is unquestionably unsound, and is negatived by every day's trials.

§ 84. [1] 1792. Goodtitle v. Braham, 4 T. R. 498 (physical inability from old age of a testator to write as long a document as the alleged will, admitted); 1838, Ellis v. Short, 21 Pick. 142 (bodily strength of a person arrested, as indicating the struggles made and therefore the force necessary to detain him, admitted); 1895, Thiede v. Utah, 11 Utah 241, 94 Pac. 837, 139 U. S. 510, 16 Sup. 62 (that the defendant was a powerful man, admitted, the death-wound having been caused by a blow requiring strength); 1897, State v. Cushing, 17 Wash. 544, 50 Pac. 512 (physical strength; notice necessary where the fact of his strength was not otherwise material).

the use of specific feats or other instances of strength may be proper (post, § 220); a precedent admitting such evidence will usually be a precedent on the present subject also.

§ 85. Intoxication. A condition of intoxication by alcoholic liquor, as involving a peculiar condition of the body and faculties, may be of probative value as showing that the person could or could not do the act in question.[1] How to evidence intoxication or intemperance is a different question (post, § 235). Intemperance, or a habit of drinking, is not always to be distinguished from an intoxicated condition, but its evidential use rests often on a different principle (post, § 96).

§ 86. Mental Powers. The strength or feebleness of the mental or intellectual faculties may have probative value to show that an act was or was not done which required a certain amount or quality of such ability. The commonest use of this sort of evidence is in controversies over undue influence in executing a will; for the mental condition may indicate whether on a given occasion the testator succumbed to the influence. There may, however, be other situations where similar facts would be relevant.[1] In cases of undue influence, the usual evidentiary question is whether a previous or subsequent mental condition may be used to show the condition at the time in question (post, § 230).

§ 87. Skill, Technical Knowledge. The possession or lack of a special skill, dexterity, or knowledge, may be of probative value to show the probable § 85. [1] Indiana: 1895, Wright v. Crawfordsville, 142 Ind. 636, 42 N. E. 227 (admitting intoxication at the time of plaintiff's injury, to show probable contributory negligence); Kansas: 1872, State v. Horne, 9 Kan. 128 (admitting intoxication at the time of a homicide, as showing incapacity to attack, etc.); Massachusetts: 1883, Com. v. Ryan, 134 Mass. 223 (confirmed habits of drunkenness and debauchery as likely to cause death, admitted); New Hampshire: 1843, Cummings v. Nichols, 13 N. H. 429 (Parker, C. J.: "If intemperance tends to produce irritability of the nervous system, weaken the muscular action, and impair the mental faculties — all which is controverted by few at the present day, — evidence of its existence in any particular case certainly has a tendency to show that the labor and services of the subject of it are of less value, other things being equal"); 1902, Guertin v. Hudson, 71 N. H. 505, 53 Atl. 736 (injury to a wagon-party in a highway; the party's intoxication, and their destination to a road house for a debauch, held admissible to show probable contributory negligence); Tennessee: 1890, Franklin v. Franklin, 90 Tenn. 49, 16 S. W. 557 (that a person who was alleged to have forged the will in question had used morphine and whiskey "to such excess as to impair his mind and affect his moral character, thus rendering him capable of perpetrating crimes which in a normal state he would have avoided"; held, admissible to show general criminal irresponsibility, but not to show specific capacity to commit a forgery); Wisconsin: 1879, Ingalls v. State, 48 Wis. 647, 650 (larceny by cutting a hole in a window-pane, unfastening the window, and entering and taking certain goods in a store without disturbing other goods; evidence admitted that the defendant was at the time so drunk as to be incapable of the intelligent action thus required: see quotation ante, § 83).

Compare also the cases dealing with intemperance as a question of negligence (ante, § 65).

§ 86. [1] Perhaps the following cases belong here: 1897, Davis v. State, 51 Nebr. 301, 70 N. W. 984 (train-wrecking on Thursday; "the superstition or belief of [the defendant] D. that Thursday was a lucky day for him, and that anything he attempted on that day would succeed", admitted); 1847, Kauffman v. Swar, 5 Pa. St. 230 (action on a lost bond; plea, payment in full; replication, fraudulent procurement of a receipt in full; "the plaintiff's case was to be supported by proof of fraudulent practice, involving a great variety of transactions on the intellect of a weak and intemperate man; and to support it, required evidence of his general habits, thoughtlessness, and extravagance in transactions to many of which the defendant was not a party").

doing or not doing of an act requiring such skill or knowledge. Of the scores of daily instances in trials, uses that have called for rulings are chiefly those of knowledge of poisons or the like,[1] skill in imitation of handwriting,[2] an experience in drafting wills and other legal documents.[3] Often this sort of evidential fact is not to be distinguished from Character on the one hand — as in the case of a physician's skill (ante, § 67) — and from Habit on the other hand (post, §§ 92–98).

How the skill or knowledge is to be evidenced is another question. Whether skill in imitation of handwriting may be evidenced by particular instances is a mooted subject (post, § 221). Mere knowledge, as distinguished from skill, involves similar controversies (post, §§ 259, 266), especially in regard to particular instances of forgery and the like (post, § 309).

§ 88. Means, Tools, Apparatus. The previous possession or lack of special means, tools, apparatus, and the like, may be of probative value to show the doing or not doing of an act requiring such means.[1] Here, however, the § 87. [1] 1781, Donellan's Trial, Eng. (murder by poisoning; in the library at the house of the defendant was a volume having the pages cut at a single place; at this place, the effect of the poison in question was described); 1833, Thompson v. Mosely, 5 C. & P. 501 (alteration of a bill by chloride of soda; evidence received that the alleged alterer was a surgeon and acquainted with that substance).

[2] 1892, Croom v. Sugg, 110 N. C. 259, 14 S. E. 748 (bond said to be a forgery; "it would unquestionably have been competent to prove . . . that the plaintiff . . . was unusually clever in imitating the handwriting of others").

Contra: 1860, Dow's Ex'r v. Spenny's Ex'r, 29 Mo. 390 (skill in imitating handwriting, not admitted to show forgery).

[3] England: 1220, Richard, Prior v. Moses, Riggs' Select Pleas, etc., of the Jewish Exchequer (Selden Soc. XV, 1905, p. 4; forgery of a deed of debt purporting to be signed by Thomas, Prior of a convent; the plaintiff "says that the said Prior Thomas was a good and discreet and excellent clerk, and not the man to make a charter containing bad Latin as this charter does"); 1872, R. v. Castro, alias Tichborne (education and experience used as negativing the authorship of documents; see citation, post, § 270).

Canada: 1886, Scott v. Crerar, 11 Ont. 541, 553, 562, 14 Ont. App. 152 (libel in anonymous typewritten circulars sent to lawyers, imputing to the plaintiff improper professional conduct; the similarity of phrases therein to phrases recently used by the defendant in conversation, held admissible; but not the opinion of a witness, based on the style of expressions, that the defendant was the author; Rose, J., diss. on the latter point, in a sensible opinion; on appeal, the ruling below was held erroneous in excluding evidence, though the language of the opinion shows no essential difference of views; the report's failure to state precisely the evidence offered leaves the ruling obscure).

United States: 1906, Atkins v. Best, 27 D. C. App. 148, 153 (that a testatrix was "an unskilled person, . . . unlearned in the law", considered, in interpreting the will); 1903, Thurston's Adm'r v. Prather, — Ky. —, 77 S. W. 354 (execution of a will; that the testator "was a learned lawyer", considered); 1897, Gable v. Rauch, 50 S. C. 95, 27 S. E. 555 (the draughtsman of a will, who attested it; his experience and character as probate judge, etc., admitted to show that he "would see to it that the will was properly executed", the compliance with legal requirements being in issue); 1901, Claflin's Will, 73 Vt. 129, 50 Atl. 815 (testator's experience and habit of drawing wills, admitted to show probable due execution; compare the similar use of a style of spelling, post, § 99).

Not decided: 1898, Throckmorton v. Holt, 12 D. C. App. 552, 581 (forgery of a will; the "legal attainments and literary culture and style of the testator", offered to show a certain will not to have been written by him; not decided).

Contra: 1901, Throckmorton v. Holt, 180 U. S. 552, 21 Sup. 474 (will of a Judge Advocate General of the U. S.; opinion as to its genuineness by a witness familiar with his style of composition, that the purporting will was not genuinely his, excluded; unsound: no authority cited).

Compare here the cases cited post, §§ 270, 413, 2024, 2148, 2149.

§ 88. [1] England: 1792, R. v. Lambe, Peake N. P. 141 (forgery of a bank-note by tracing with a camel-hair pencil; the possession of drawings in ink of the design on a bank-note admitted); 1808, R. v. Ball, 1 Camp. 324 (uttering a forged bank-note; possession of appropriate tools, admitted); 1839, Griffits negative fact is the one which usually supports this argument; and the more prominent significance of the affirmative fact — e.g. the prior possession of a gun or knife — will usually be its indication of a design or plan to use it for the act in question (post, §§ 237, 304).

§ 89. Possession or Lack of Money as affecting the Probability of a Loan, Payment or the like. A man destitute of property or credit cannot lend a large sum of money; his lack of the capacity to make such a loan is of some probative value to show that he did not make it:

1729, Hales' Trial, 17 How. St. Tr. 293; forgery of a promissory note for £4700, payable to Samuel Lee; to show that the payee could not have lent such a sum, counsel asked: "Is Lee a man of worth?" Witness: "No, sir; he is not worth £5 in the world." Counsel: "What say you to this, Mr. Hales? . . . This note, they say that you published it as a true note, how should it come to pass that such a poor person as this Lee is should indorse over such a note to you?"

1860, PIGOT, C. B., in Dowling v. Dowling, 10 Ir. C. L. 236, 239, 244: "It has been the constant practice of judges to receive such evidence . . . ; proof that a party was in such circumstances that he could not has been received as evidence that he did not pay the money in question. . . . It is said that evidence of this kind will be a surprise upon the parties; and so it sometimes may be. . . . [But] few cases can be imagined in which a party may not be surprised by unexpected evidence produced by his adversary. . . . There would be little safety against unfounded demands supported by reckless swearing if circumstances of this kind, not too remote, could not be submitted to the judgment and common sense of a jury."

Such a lack of money or other resources is therefore relevant to show the improbability of the making of such a loan or payment.[1] It is possible that

v. Payne, 11 A. & E. 131 (plea of forgery to an action against the acceptor of a bill; evidence was rejected that the plaintiff had been in possession of a mass of bills among which were three with the defendant's forged acceptance, and that these had been circulated; this is unsound).

United States: 1895, Thomas v. State, 107 Ala. 13, 18 So. 229 (previous possession of a jug which was used to saturate with oil the place set on fire, admitted); 1874, People v. Brotherton, 47 Cal. 402 (possession of a material which would remove ink from checks similar to the one alleged to have been altered by defendant, admitted); 1870, Com. v. Choate, 105 Mass. 451 (arson; the prior possession of a peculiar kind of apparatus adapted for setting the fire in question, as showing "the requisite skill, materials, tools, and opportunity", admitted); 1889, Miller v. S. P. Co., 118 N. Y. 199, 23 N. E. 462 (to show that the defendant had the means of preventing an accident caused by the giving way of a stick of wood used as the toggle for a rope, the fact was admitted that thereafter a capstan bar near by was used and stood the strain); 1895, Nicholas v. Com., 91 Va. 741, 21 S. E. 364 (admitting the possession of an auger fitting a hole in the bottom of a boat which the defendant was charged with sinking).

§ 89. [1] ENGLAND: 1762, Lane v. Dighton, 1 Ambl. 409, 413 (evidence received that "before that time he was a poor person, and not able to pay for them [estates] out of his own money"); 1774, Mayor of Hull v. Horner, Cowp. 102, 109 (Lord Mansfield, C. J.; payment may be disproved "by showing the party not to have been in circumstances to pay"); 1805, Lench v. Lench, 10 Ves. Jr. 511, 518; 1808, Williaume v. Gorges, 1 Camp. 217; 1812, Fladong v. Winter, 19 Ves. Jr. 196; 1837, Grenfell v. Girdlestone, 2 Y. & C. 662, 681.

UNITED STATES: Indiana: 1905, Henderson v. Henderson, 165 Ind. 666, 75 N. E. 269 (whether B. had deposited $1300; her lack of money at the alleged time, admitted); Massachusetts: 1866, Stebbins v. Miller, 12 All. 591, 594, 597; 1867, Winchester v. Charter, 97 Mass. 140, 143; 1868, Atwood v. Scott, 99 Mass. 177; 1871, Woodward v. Leavitt, 107 Mass. 453, 458; 1894, Bliss v. Johnson, 162 Mass. 323; Michigan: 1894, Rosenthal v. Bishop, 98 Mich. 527, 531, 57 N. W. 573 (an $1100 order for whiskey by a druggist; the limited business of the druggist, considered, as making it unlikely); New Hampshire: 1851, Demeritt v. Miles, 22 N. H. 523, 528; 1855, Wiggin v. Plumer, 31 N. H. 251, 268; New York: 1880, Pontius v. People, 82 N.

there are limits to this use of the evidence; but the circumstances of each case will suggest them, and no general exception seems to have been laid down.[2] As to the time of the lack of money, it may of course be so far anterior as to have no significance to the evidence; but the mere fact that the impecunious condition is anterior in time does not render it inadmissible.[3] This must be distinguished from the general question how far anterior possession is admissible to show present possession (post, § 379).

The possession of money will usually not be admissible as making probable the payment or loaning of money.[4] But where the lack of money is alleged,

Y. 339, 349 (lack of means admitted to disprove the lending of $4000); Pennsylvania: 1852, Strimpfler v. Roberts, 18 Pa. 283, 296 (resulting trust in lands purchased in the name of a clerk; to show that the clerk did not buy them for himself, evidence was received of his inability to pay the large sums actually paid by him); 1861, Stauffer v. Young, 39 Pa. 455, 461, 462 (pecuniary inability to make an alleged loan, admitted); Washington: 1896, Moore v. Palmer, 14 Wash. 134, 44 Pac. 142 (defendant's high financial standing and plaintiff's small means, to show that defendant would probably not have given an alleged large note to plaintiff, admitted); West Virginia: 1886, State v. Henderson, 29 W. Va. 147, 164, 1 S. E. 225 (forgery of a receipt; that the party whose name was receipted was in embarrassed circumstances and unable to pay such a sum, admitted); Wisconsin: 1884, Nash v. Hoxie, 59 Wis. 384, 386, 18 N. W. 408 (contract by the defendant to deliver logs to be sawed by the plaintiff; to disprove the making of the contract, the defendant's lack of logs such as alleged was rejected; this is sound; compare § 392, post); 1899, Williams v. Williams, 102 Wis. 246, 78 N. W. 419 (loan; the alleged lender's lack of means and the borrower's possession of ample means, admitted in disproof); 1904, Rickeman v. Williamsburg C. F. Ins. Co., 120 Wis. 655, 98 N. W. 960 (over-insurance; the insured's financial condition, admitted to show the improbability of carrying a large stock of goods).

Contra, but unsound: 1902, People v. Lapique, 136 Cal. 503, 69 Pac. 226, semble (forgery of a note in M.'s name; M.'s pecuniary condition, held inadmissible); 1861, Clark v. Fletcher, 1 All. Mass. 53, 56 (action for work done in tanning; evidence by the defendant of the plaintiff's insolvency, not admitted to show that the plaintiff had no teams with which he could have done the work; but evidence of the plaintiff's prior sale of all his teams was admitted for that purpose); 1901, Perkins v. Humes, 200 Pa. 235, 49 Atl. 934 (insolvency of payee, and possession of funds by alleged maker, not admitted on an issue of execution of notes).

For lack of money as a motive for crime, see post, § 392.

[2] 1870, Sherwood, J., in Woods v. Gummert, 67 Pa. 137: ("Surely it is not to be inferred from this that wherever a plaintiff brings an action for goods sold and delivered, or money lent and advanced, or paid out, laid out, and expended, that it is competent to the defendant to give evidence of the pecuniary inability of the plaintiff, and thus raise an issue entirely collateral. What legitimate inference in such case can be drawn from the insolvency of the plaintiff? Men heavily indebted, and even keeping their creditors at bay, often have large transactions in borrowing and lending, and are possessed of considerable sums of money"; but he intimates the propriety of such evidence in some cases); 1844, Rowe v. Polkinghorne, 1 C. & K. 618 (smallness of income, to disprove a large purchase, excluded; but received to show that the wedding dresses supplied to the alleged debtor's daughter were more likely to have been supplied on the credit of the daughter's future husband than on the defendant's credit).

These instances, however, involve rather the question of motive (post, § 392).

[3] 1860, Pigot, C. B., in Dowling v. Dowling, 10 Ir. C. L. 236, 243 ("It is said that this will open a wide issue for the jury as to time. Unquestionably it will; but it must be left to the discretion of the judge to take care that the evidence shall be confined within reasonable limits. Instances might be put in which it would be mere folly to give the slightest weight to such evidence, or indeed to admit it at all. . . . In the case of a merchant in extensive trade, no one would think it material to prove that thirty years ago he acted as a porter, in order to negative his ability to pay a debt or make a loan a year before the trial").

Accord: 1860, Dowling v. Dowling, supra (inability seven years before, with proof of intervening condition, admitted); 1851, Demeritt v. Miles, 22 N. H. 523, 528 (lack of money fifteen months before, admitted).

[4] 1868, Atwood v. Scott, 99 Mass. 177 (because "experience is not sufficiently uniform to raise a presumption that one who has the means of paying a debt will actually pay it"); 1876, Higgins v. Andrews, 121 Mass. 293; 1918, Farmer v. Williams, 92 Vt. 132, 102 Atl. 932 (payment of money borrowed; defendant's possession of money, here excluded).

as showing probable non-payment, this lack may be denied by evidence to the contrary, i.e. by proving possession.[5] Moreover, where the presumption of payment from lapse of time is sought to be raised, one way of supporting it is by showing that there were no obstacles in the interval to the collection of the claim, and, in particular, that the debtor was solvent and possessed of assets sufficient to satisfy the debt; this, however, is a different use of the evidence (post, §§ 224, 2517).

With what facts — e.g. the non-payment of a debt — this insolvency or destitution is to be evidenced, is a different question (post, § 224). The sudden possession of money, after the date of a theft, by one who had no money before it, as indicating an unlawful acquisition, also raises a different question (post, § 154). Still other distinct inquiries are whether poverty should be considered, as indicating a motive for crime (post, § 392); and whether there is to be a presumption of payment by lapse of time (post, § 2517).

Sub-topic C: Habit or Custom

§ 92. General Principle. Of the probative value of a person's habit or custom, as showing the doing on a specific occasion of the act which is the subject of the habit or custom, there can be no doubt. Every day's experience and reasoning make it clear enough:

1861, Flandrau, J., in Walker v. Barron, 6 Minn. 508, 512: "[Customs] may, like any other facts or circumstances, be shown when their existence will increase or diminish the probabilities of an act having been done or not done, which act is the subject of contest."

1873, Sargent, C. J., in State v. Railroad, 52 N. H. 528, 532: "It would seem to be axiomatic that a man is likely to do or not to do a thing, or to do it or not to do it in a particular way, [according] as he is in the habit of doing or not doing it."

1887, Sherwood, J., in Mathias v. O'Neill, 94 Mo. 527, 6 S. W. 253 (admitting evidence of a bookkeeper's custom of handing over collateral notes to the teller, as indicating that it was done in this instance): "It is really immaterial, under the authorities cited, whether he was able to do more than to verify his entries and prove his invariable custom. These things being proven, the presumption arises therefrom that the usual course of business was pursued in this particular instance. Every one is presumed to govern himself by the rules of right reason, and consequently that he acquits himself of his engagement and duty. . . . Whenever it is established that one act is the usual concomitant of another, the latter being proved, the former will be presumed; for this is in accord with the experience of common life. It is simply the process of ascertaining one fact from the existence of another."

There is, however, much room for difference of opinion in concrete cases, owing chiefly to the indefiniteness of the notion of habit or custom. If we conceive it as involving an invariable regularity of action, there can be no doubt that this fixed sequence of acts tends strongly to show the occurrence of a given instance. But in the ordinary affairs of life a habit or custom seldom has such an invariable regularity. Hence, it is easy to see why in a given instance something that may be loosely called habit or custom should be rejected, because it may not in fact have sufficient regularity to make it probable that it would be carried out in every instance or in most instances. Whether or not such sufficient regularity exists must depend largely on the circumstances of each case.[1]

[5] 1876, Higgins v. Andrews, 121 Mass. 293; 1851, Wiggin v. Plumer, 31 N. H. 251, 269; 1916, Gilfillan v. Gilfillan's Estate, 90 Conn. 94, 96 Atl. 704 (contract for board of intestate; to rebut an assertion that plaintiff was repaying a loan with services, her possession of ample money was admitted).

There are two other difficulties that arise in connection with such evidence, both of them, however, depending on other doctrines of Evidence. (1) The idea of habit is sometimes difficult to distinguish from that of Character; — for example, where a negligent habit is charged; and if it is interpreted in the latter aspect, it may of course become obnoxious to the rule against the use of a party's character in civil cases (ante, § 65). (2) Assuming the relevancy of a Habit or Custom, the proof of it may often have to be made by marshalling various evidential instances as the basis of an inference to a habit or custom; this question — how to evidence Habit or Custom — is also a different one, dealt with elsewhere (post, §§ 370, 377). — Habit of making a record as a basis for testifying from refreshed recollection, is also a different question (post, §§ 98, 747).

§ 93. Miscellaneous Instances. Subject to the foregoing distinctions, the admissibility of a person's habit, usage, or custom as evidence that he did or did not do the act in question may be said to be universally conceded.[1] Yet

§ 92. [1] From the point of view of logic and psychology as applicable to argument before the jury (not the rules of Admissibility), see the materials collected in the present author's "Principles of Judicial Proof, as given by Logic, Psychology, and General Experience, and illustrated in Judicial Trials" (1913), §§ 130–136.

§ 93. [1] For cases of negligent or careful habit in personal injury cases, see also the rulings cited post, § 97: ENGLAND: 1795, Lucas v. Novosilieski, 1 Esp. 296 (to prove payment of wages, evidence was offered of the defendant's custom of paying the workmen every Saturday night, and of the plaintiff's presence waiting with the rest; admitted, "as he worked under the same terms with the other workmen"); 1811, Evans v. Birch, 3 Camp. 10 (action against a milk-carrier for moneys not turned over to his employer; the regular course of business in paying over the receipts daily, admitted as showing payment); 1829, Sellen v. Norman, 4 C. & P. 81, note (course of paying wages every Saturday night, admissible).

UNITED STATES: Federal: 1822, Bouldin v. Massie's Heirs, 7 Wheat. 153 (habit of never recording without a document of transfer, admitted; 1907, Chitwood v. U. S., 8th C. C. A., 153 Fed. 551 (stealing contents of mail; the defendant contended that the letter was open when it arrived; evidence of the habitual arrival of torn mail packages during two months prior was held admissible); 1909, Security Mutual L. I. Co. v. Klentsch, 8th C. C. A., 169 Fed. 104 (whether a premium had been paid; insured's custom as to paying by cash or by check, admitted);
Alabama: 1877, Fincher v. State, 58 Ala. 221 ("The place at which F. [the accused] kept his gun and the habits of the family as to rising, when Mrs. D. [the witness] lived there [six months before], have a very remote bearing, if any, on the fact of where the gun was on the night preceding and the morning of the murder, and on the fact of whether the State's witnesses, members of the family, were up at a particular hour that morning", and were rejected); 1902, Hartsell v. Masterson, 132 Ala. 275, 31 So. 618 (defendant's custom to employ his clerks by the year, not admitted on the question whether the plaintiff's employment was by the month or the year); 1905, Carwile v. State, 148 Ala. 576, 39 So. 220 (deceased's habit as to carrying a billbook, admitted);
Connecticut: 1913, Moffit v. Connecticut Co., 86 Conn. 527, 86 Atl. 16 (whether a car stopped at a corner and plaintiff boarded it; invariable custom of the cars to stop at another and not that corner, admitted); Georgia: 1895, Grantham v. State, 95 Ga. 459, 22 S. E. 281 (habit of gambling with X, as indicating that goods of X were obtained from him in gaming and not by burglary, admitted; compare § 85, ante); 1897, White v. State, 100 Ga. 659, 28 S. E. 423 (habit of carrying a pistol with one charge only, admitted to show that it was so carried till the the distinctions named, as well as the individual circumstances going to affect the regularity of the habit, will from time to time effect its exclusion. Courts vary, moreover, in their liberality of application of the principle. It may moment of killing, and thus that it was not fully loaded and then partly fired); 1898, Oliver v. State, 106 Ga. 142, 32 S. E. 18 (carrying concealed weapon; habit of carrying it openly, not admitted for defendant);

Illinois: 1865, American Express Co. v. Haggard, 37 Ill. 465, 469, 472 (non-delivery of a package; custom of the plaintiff's drivers in delivering, admitted; also, in rebuttal, past thieving habits of the particular driver); 1901, Sorenson v. Sorenson, 189 Ill. 179, 59 N. E. 555 (habitual partisan affiliations of a voter, admitted to evidence the tenor of his vote); 1914, Rexroth v. Schein, 206 Ill. 97, 69 N. E. 247 (party affiliations are evidence of voting for the party nominees; cases collected);
Indiana: 1870, Foltz v. State, 33 Ind. 215 (business habits, admitted to evidence the selling of cigars);
Iowa: 1861, Smith v. Clark, 12 Ia. 32 (whether a parol acceptance of a draft had been made; the defendant's custom to accept in writing only, admitted); 1874, Beiderbecke v. Transp. Co., 39 Ia. 500 (whether goods were to be delivered at D.; previous habit of the parties as to delivering goods, admitted); 1888, Riordan v. Guggerty, 74 Ia. 693, 39 N. W. 107 (the destruction of a telegram-original, evidenced by a custom of the office to destroy all such papers after six months); 1912, Frederickson v. Iowa C. R. Co., 156 Ia. 26, 135 N. W. 12 (deceased's habit at a railway crossing, admitted);
Kansas: 1899, Missouri P. R. Co. v. Moffatt, 60 Kan. 113, 55 Pac. 837 (former careful custom of deceased in approaching a railroad-crossing, admitted);
Kentucky: 1899, Tunks v. Vincent, 106 Ky. 829, 51 S. W. 622 (a voter's regular party, admitted to show his vote);
Maryland: 1837, Pocock v. Hendricks, 8 G. & J. 421, 427, 433 (whether a conveyance had been executed absolutely or conditionally, and whether it had been read over to the illiterate grantor; the habit of the draughtsman, a magistrate, to ask grantors whether they wished an absolute or a conditional conveyance, and to read over documents to the grantor before execution, excluded);
Massachusetts: 1901, Perlstein v. Express Co., 177 Mass. 530, 59 N. E. 194 (prescribed routes for defendant's drivers, admitted to show that the presence of one driver at a certain place was not in the course of duty);
Michigan: 1877, Hamilton v. Billingsley, 37 Mich. 109 (to show that H. did not promise to go to a place on Sunday, the fact that he was a strict observer of the Sabbath was rejected);
Minnesota: 1908, Rogers v. Clark Iron Co., 104 Minn. 198, 116 N. W. 739 (custom as to use of forms for soldiers' homestead scrip, admitted);
Missouri: 1862, Goodfellow's Exr's v. Meegan, 32 Mo. 230, 281, 284 (that it was not the custom for pasturers to become responsible for cattle, excluded); 1920, Lock v. Chicago B. & Q. R. Co., 281 Mo. 532, 219 S. W. 919 (injury by stumbling over a brakebeam between tracks in a railroad yard; the habit of defendant's employees to leave materials scattered over the yard, admitted on the issue of the location of the brakebeam);
Nebraska: 1894, Lincoln V. P. & P. B. Co. v. Buckner, 39 Nebr. 83, 85, 57 N. W. 749 (injury from a pile of ashes; habitual deposit of ashes at that place, admitted to show defendant to be the source); 1898, Gate City Abstract Co. v. Post, 55 Nebr. 742, 76 N. W. 471 (to show the indexing of a judgment on the day of filing, the clerk's uniform custom received); 1898, Barr v. Post, 56 Nebr. 698, 77 N. W. 123, semble (that "he never used profane language", admissible, to show non-user on a particular occasion);
New Hampshire: 1877, Hall v. Brown, 58 N. H. 93 (injury at a highway blockaded by a train; to disprove the blockade, evidence was admitted of a practice of managing trains so as not to obstruct the highway); 1877, State v. Shaw, 58 N. H. 73 (a course of liquor-sales in a preceding month, admitted to show a specific sale; "where there is a question whether a particular act was done, the existence of any course of business according to which it naturally would have been done is a relevant fact"); 1900, Smith v. R. Co., 70 N. H. 53, 47 Atl. 290 (death at a crossing; deceased's "uniform habit of slackening the speed of his horse" at the crossing, admitted to show "that he did so on his fatal trip"); 1903, Stone v. R. Co., 72 N. H. 206, 55 Atl. 359 (habitual speed of a particular train at a certain point, admitted); 1904, Wright v. Davis, 72 N. H. 448, 57 Atl. 335 (making of a loan; the alleged borrower's habit of depositing at a bank, admitted). 1905, Tucker v. B. & M. R. Co., 73 N. H. 132, 59 Atl. 943 (deceased's habit to stop and look at a crossing; Smith v. R. Co., followed); 1909, Bourassa v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 75 N. H. 359, 74 Atl. 590 (like Smith v. R. Co.);
New York: 1864, Dubois v. Baker, 30 N. Y. 369 (habit of carrying an inkstand, not admitted to show that it was in his possession on a certain day);
North Carolina: 1860, Ashe v. De Rosset, 8 Jones L. 240 (whether a receipt for rice was given by a miller; his habit to give a receipt, admitted); 1868, Vaughan v. R. Co., 63 N. C. 11 (whether goods had been received by a rail-be noted here, however, that the prohibitions of the Opinion rule about testimony to usage or custom (post, § 1955), and as to the Parol Evidence rule concerning usage (post, §§ 2440, 2464), are not here involved in any way.

§ 94. Course of Dealing in Sales and Agencies. Where a transaction of selling, or of authorizing an agent to sell, has taken the form of a usual and fixed course of business between two persons, this habit is admissible to indicate the probable tenor of a particular transaction; the circumstances will determine whether in a given case the relations have reached a sufficient degree of fixity to become relevant.[1] The usual doubt here, however, arises in road company; its habit to weigh and mark goods when received, admitted, as showing that they would have been found marked); 1899, White v. Tripp, 125 N. C. 523, 34 S. E. 686 (whether a promise was to pay the debt of another; "usage and method of keeping accounts in such cases", admitted as corroborative; 1906, Barrott v. Atlantic & N. C. R. Co., 140 N. C. 546, 53 S. E. 432 (expulsion from a car for lack of a ticket; conductor's habit as to taking tickets, admitted); 1915, Fourth National Bank v. Wilson, 168 N. C. 557, 84 S. E. 866 (custom of a bank as to sending notice of dishonor, admitted);

North Dakota: 1904, Nelson v. Grondahl, 12 N. D. 130, 100 N. W. 1093 (notary's habit to present notes for payment at the place where payable, admitted);

Oregon: 1900, Wade v. R. Co., 36 Or. 311, 59 Pac. 875 (whether speed of cars on a particular occasion may be evidenced by customary speed, not decided);

Pennsylvania: 1850, Schoneman v. Fegley, 14 Pa. St. 376, 380 (whether a receipt was given for a payment; the person's usual practice of giving receipts, excluded, where the witness had no memory as to the specific act in question; explained in Meighen v. Bank, infra, as based on the witness' failure to give direct testimony to which the habit could be corroborative); 1855, Meighen v. Bank, 25 Pa. 288, 291 (whether a deposit was received; the habit of the cashier to enter deposits daily, and the absence of an entry, admitted to show no receipt of a claimed deposit, as corroborating the direct testimony; Schoneman v. Fegley explained); 1898, Wheeler v. Ahlers, 189 Pa. 138, 42 Atl. 40 (alteration of note by maker after indorsement; a card in the maker's writing, showing a practice in changing figures, admitted); 1898, Morris v. Guffey, 188 Pa. 534, 41 Atl. 731 (defendant's printed form of lease, not admitted to show terms of a particular lost lease); 1905, Custer v. Fidelity M. A. Ass'n, 211 Pa. 257, 60 Atl. 776 (custom to attach a copy of the application to an insurance policy, excluded, as not sufficient of itself, on the theory of Schoneman v. Fegley, supra);

Tennessee: 1833, Leiper v. Erwin, 5 Yerg. 97 (that a creditor was habitually prompt in collecting, admitted to evidence the payment of a debt, other circumstances corroborating); 1881, Bender v. Montgomery, 8 Lea 591 (similar);

Texas: 1896, McCray v. R. Co., 89 Tex. 168, 34 S. W. 95 (the duties of brakemen generally, inadmissible without showing that the same practice prevailed on all roads);

Utah: 1916, Beaureguard v. Gunnison City, 48 Utah 515, 160 Pac. 815 (illegal voting; partisan affiliations are evidence of the tenor of a person's vote);

Vermont: 1867, Hine v. Pomeroy, 24 Vt. 211, 214, 219 (whether an attorney had directed a process-server to take N. and M. as receiptors; his uniform course of business to give no instructions as to receiptors, admitted as corroborative); 1901, Scott v. Bailey, 73 Vt. 49, 50 Atl. 557 (issue of payment; defendant's habit to pay the plaintiff personally, excluded); 1917, Dionne v. American Express Co., 91 Vt. 521, 101 Atl. 209 (loss of goods; defendant's habit never to receive goods for transportation without giving a receipt, excluded; unsound);

Virginia: 1920, Graham v. Com., 127 Va. 808, 103 S. E. 565 (homicide of an officer while arresting defendant's sister; to rebut defendant's evidence of deceased's use of violent and profane language to the woman at the time; the State was allowed to introduce witnesses who "never heard him make use of an oath");

For other examples, which involve the use of particular instances to evidence a habit or general plan, see post, §§ 373, 377. For the use of particular instances in criminal cases, see post, §§ 300–367.

For a habit of intoxication, see ante, §§ 65, 85, post, § 96.

§ 94. [1] ENGLAND: 1866, Howard v. Sherward, L. R. 2 C. P. 148 (whether the defendant's servant, who had warranted a horse sold to the plaintiff, had authority to do so was disputed; and to show the probable non-existence of it, evidence was offered of a usage among horse-dealers not to warrant under the circumstances: the Court found that there was an ostensible authority, and therefore, per Willes, J., the usage "if not objectionable on the ground of remoteness, which I think it was, after all only amounted to a tacit direction the attempt to evidence this fixity by particular instances of the repetition of the transaction (post, §§ 372, 377).

§ 95. Course of the Mail and Telegraph. The fixed methods and systematic operation of the Government's postal service have been long conceded to be evidence of the due delivery to the addressee of mail matter placed for that purpose in the custody of the authorities. The conditions are that the mail matter shall appear to have conformed to the chief regulations of the service, namely, that it shall have been sufficiently prepaid in stamps, correctly addressed, and placed in the appropriate receptacle.[1] from the principal to his agent not to warrant on this particular occasion", and was therefore legally ineffective).

UNITED STATES: Federal: 1863, Schuchardt v. Allens, 1 Wall. 359, 363, 368 (false warranty, alleging the defendant warranted an article as fit to be used in the plaintiff's business; a broker was allowed to testify what kind of the article "he had been in the habit of selling the plaintiffs"); Connecticut: 1896, Plumb v. Curtis, 66 Conn. 154, 33 Atl. 998 ("The jury, in the case at bar, were to determine whether it was probable that the plaintiff, after charging all the materials furnished on the order of Simeon Plumb for the construction of three houses in Bridgeport, to the defendant, as the principal for whom Plumb acted, and for whom it was not denied that he had authority to act, proceeded to furnish like materials for the construction of five other houses in Bridgeport on the order of Plumb, and to charge them to the defendant, when he really gave credit to Plumb, and dealt with him as the only party to the transaction. . . . If he has been selling to him the same line of goods previously, as an agent for a responsible principal, and claims that the sales in question were made in the same way and under the same circumstances, any evidence which renders a change of credit improbable is relevant to an inquiry as to whether such a change was made"); Pennsylvania: 1896, Hamilton v. Hastings, 172 Pa. 308, 34 Atl. 43 (to show the parties included in a sale, evidence of the state of accounts and of the former course of dealings was admitted "as tending to make the proposition in controversy more or less probable").

§ 95. [1] This is universally conceded, and the strength of the evidence is even raised to a presumption (post, § 2534); the following list of citations does not attempt to be complete, because the decisions frequently involve also the matter of substantive law mentioned in note 6, infra:

ENGLAND: 1795, Saunderson v. Judge, 2 H. Bl. 509 (notice to an indorser; on objection that "it was not proved that the defendant received the letter which was put into the post-office", held that "the sending the letter by the post was sufficient evidence of notice"); 1836, Shipley v. Todhunter, 7 C. & P. 680, 686; 1834, Warren v. Warren, 1 C. M. & R. 250, 252 (Parke, B.: "If a letter is sent by the post, it is 'prima facie' proof, until the contrary be proved, that the party to whom it is addressed received it in due course").

UNITED STATES: Federal: 1876, U. S. v. Babcock, 3 Dill. C. C. 571; 1883, Rosenthal v. Walker, 111 U. S. 185, 193, 4 Sup. 382; 1897, Dunlop v. U. S., 165 U. S. 486, 17 Sup. 175 (the course of delivery in the post-office, admitted as indicating that certain papers had come through the mail); 1905, Davidson S. S. Co. v. U. S., 142 Fed. 315, 318, C. C. A.; Alabama: 1915, Corry v. Sylvia Y Cia, 192 Ala. 550, 68 So. 891 (posting in mailbox); Arkansas: 1904, Planters' Mut. I. Ass'n v. Green, 72 Ark. 305, 80 S. W. 151; 1905, Merchants' Exch. Co. v. Sanders, 74 id. 16, 84 S. W. 786; California: C. C. P. 1872, § 1963 (par. 24); Georgia: 1904, National Bldg. Ass'n v. Quin, 120 Ga. 358, 47 S. E. 962; 1906, Burch v. Americus G. Co., 125 Ga. 153, 53 S. E. 1008; Illinois: 1892, Young v. Clapp, 147 Ill. 176, 190, 35 N. E. 372; 1896, Ashley Wire Co. v. Ill. Steel Co., 164 Ill. 149, 158, 45 N. E. 410; 1906, Clark v. People, 224 Ill. 554, 79 N. E. 941; Iowa: 1890, Pennypacker v. Ins. Co., 80 Ia. 56, 45 N. W. 408; 1896, Goodwin v. Assur. Soc., 97 Ia. 226, 66 N. W. 157; 1899, Watson v. Richardson, 110 Ia. 673, 80 N. W. 407; Kentucky: 1885, Sullivan v. Kuykendall, 82 Ky. 483; 1904, Bloom v. Wanner, — Ky. —, 77 S. W. 931 (notice); 1909, Continental Ins. Co. v. Hargrove, 131 Ky. 837, 116 S. W. 256; 1922, Proctor v. Ray, 194 Ky. 746, 240 S. W. 1063 (and the addressee's denial of receipt of the letter does not necessarily take away the effect of this evidence); Louisiana: 1921, McWilliams v. Reith, 149 La. 298, 88 So. 913 (postage not being stated to have been prepaid, no presumption arises; unsound); Maine: 1896, Chase v. Surry, 88 Me. 468, 34 Atl. 270; Maryland: 1901, Bostain v. Separator Co., 92 Md. 483, 48 Atl. 75; Massachusetts: 1810, Munn v. Baldwin, 6 Mass. 316; 1870, Huntley v. Whittier, 105 Mass. 391 (distinguishing this rule and that of constructive notice, or due diligence, for commercial paper); 1895, McDowell v. Ins. Co., 164 Mass. 444, 41 N. E. 665; Michigan: 1901, Lowry v. Saginaw S. P.

The habit of a private person or commercial house, doing systematically a similar service, is equally relevant; the principle has been applied to an express carrier's delivery of packages[2] and to a telegraph company's transmission of telegrams.[3]

The same application of the principle would admit a private person's usual course of business to evidence any act of delivery or transmission, such as the sending of a notice, or the placing of letters in the mailbox; the only differences are, first, that the fact of the governmental system will be judicially noticed without further evidence (post, § 2575), and secondly, that the course of business of an individual may under the circumstances not appear sufficiently fixed to be of probative value.[4] A consequence of the combination

Co., 128 Mich. 246, 87 N. W. 194; 1906, Long Bell L. Co. v. Nyman, 145 Mich. 477, 108 N. W. 1019; Minnesota: 1893, Dade v. Ins. Co., 54 Minn. 336, 56 N. W. 48 (proofs of loss); 1922, Rasmussen v. McComb, — Minn. —, 187 N. W. 513 (advertising contract); Missouri: 1868, Phillips v. Scott, 43 Mo. 86, 89; Nebraska: 1899, National Mas. A. Ass'n v. Burr, 57 Nebr. 437, 77 N. W. 1098; 1912, Omaha v. Yancy, 91 Nebr. 261, 135 N. W. 1044; New Jersey: 1897, State v. Howell, 61 N. J. L. 142, 38 Atl. 748; New Mexico: 1913, Feder Silberberg Co. v. McNeil, 18 N. M. 44, 133 Pac. 975 (mere mailing, without proof of proper address, insufficient); North Carolina: 1905, Sherrod v. Farmers' M. F. I. Ass'n, 139 N. C. 167, 51 S. E. 910 (insurance notice); 1916, Lynch v. Johnson, 171 N. C. 611, 89 S. E. 61 (mailing a deed); North Dakota: Comp. L. 1913, § 7936, par. 24; N. D. St. 1897, c. 110, § 3 (24); Oregon: Or. Laws 1920, § 799, par. 24; Pennsylvania: 1893, Jensen v. McCorkell, 154 Pa. 323, 325, 26 Atl. 366., 1905, Neubert v. Armstrong W. Co., 211 Pa. 582, 61 Atl. 123 (demand-letter); 1906, Beeman v. Supreme Lodge, 215 Pa. 627, 64 Atl. 792 (the due mailing, etc., at 9 A. M. in Philadelphia is evidence of delivery to destination in the same city on the same day); Philippine Islands: C. C. P. 1901, § 334, par. 22 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 1963, par. 24); 1913, U. S. v. Kosel, 24 P. I. 594 (fraud); Porto Rico: Rev. St. & C. 1911, § 1470 (like Cal. C. C. P. § 1963); Rhode Island: 1857, Russell v. Buckley, 4 R. I. 525 (even for letters containing money); Utah: 1898, Brown v. Frat. A. Assoc., 18 Utah 265, 55 Pac. 63; Vermont: 1844, Oaks v. Weller, 16 Vt. 63, 70; 1897, McDermott v. Jackson; Wisconsin: 97 Wis. 64, 72 N. W. 375; 1899, Small v. Prentice, 102 Wis. 256, 78 N. W. 415.

Contra: 1846, Allen v. Blunt, 2 Woodb. & Man. 121, 131 (mailing said to be not sufficient; it would be "a presumption contradicted daily by the immense dead-letter collections never received by correspondents"); 1913, Com. v. O'Bryan, U. & Co., 153 Ky. 406, 155 S. W. 1126 (failure to file a statement in a public office; the mere mailing of the statement without other evidence, held inadmissible; unsound).

[2] Cases cited ante, § 93, passim.

[3] Can.: N. Br. Cons. St. 1903, c. 127, § 36 (the delivery and receipt of a message at a telegraph-office for transmission shall be evidence of its transmission and its receipt by the addressee); 1888, White v. Flemming, 20 N. Sc. 335 (Com. v. Jeffries, infra, followed); U. S.: 1896, Eppinger v. Scott, 112 Cal. 369, 44 Pac. 723; 1863, Com. v. Jeffries, 7 All. Mass. 548, 563 (transmission by the operator in Boston of a message, relevant to show its receipt by the addressee in New York); 1897, Perry v. Bank, 53 Nebr. 89, 73 N. W. 538; 1885, Oregon S. S. Co. v. Otis, 100 N. Y. 446, 452, 3 N. E. 485; 1899, Western Twine Co. v. Wright, 11 S. D. 521, 78 N. W. 942.

The course of business in telephone transmission is equally relevant; but this is complicated with other principles, and is dealt with post, § 2155.

[4] ENGLAND: 1815, Hetherington v. Kemp, 4 Camp. 193 (to show the sending of a letter, the usage of the counting-house in placing the letters on a table, and the testimony of the partner as to his habit of posting them, admissible); 1837, Hart v. Alexander, 7 C. & P. 746, 751 (whether a circular announcing a dissolution of partnership was sent; "the practice of the house to send circulars on every change in the firm", admitted; Lord Abinger, C. B.: "That does not show that a particular person received a circular, except upon the presumption that a jury may make upon the general habit").

UNITED STATES: Federal: 1825, Coyle v. Gozzler, 2 Cr. C. C. 625 (to show the making and mailing of a notice on a specified day, the notary's habit of giving notice on the day of making the demand was received); 1876, U. S. v. Babcock, 3 Dillon 571, 575 (telegrams delivered to a door-keeper accustomed to distribute despatches to defendant's office, admitted); 1922, U. S. v. Rice, D. C. S. D. Tex., 281 Fed. 326 (mode of sending notice by the Texas Adjutant-General for the U. S. provost-marshall-general's office to registrants for miliof these two applications of the principle is that, upon proper evidence of the habit of an individual commercial house as to addressing and mailing, the mere execution of a letter in the usual course of business may be evidence of its subsequent receipt by the addressee.[5]

Certain other principles must here be distinguished. (1) By the law of commercial paper, actual receipt of notice of dishonor is, in certain conditions, tary service, held sufficient to evidence the preparing and mail of a notice to H.); California: 1915, American Can Co. v. Agricultural Ins. Co., 27 Cal. App. 647, 150 Pac. 996 (insurance company's custom of sending expiration notices, admitted); Georgia: 1906, Burch v. Americus G. Co., 125 Ga. 153, 53 S. E. 1008 (business habit as to using only government-stamped envelopes, admitted to show that a particular letter was stamped); 1920, Rawleigh Med. Co. v. Burney, 25 Ga. App. 20, 102 S. E. 358 (usage as to mailing letters from a box in a grocery store, held not sufficient on the facts; most instances of this type of decision are too strict, going against the probabilities of daily experience); Kentucky: 1866, Trabue v. Sayre, 1 Bush 129, 131 (to prove the writing and mailing of a notice, the habits of a notary and of the respective bank-officers having the duty of preparing and mailing notices were received); Maine: 1862, Union Bank v. Stone, 50 Me. 595, 597, 601 (the "usual course of proceeding and customary habits of business" of a notary and his clerk, admitted to show the giving of notice); Maryland: 1831, Flack v. Green, 3 G. & J. 474 (to prove the forwarding of a notice, the general course of business of the firm to forward such notices, excluded); 1848, Bell v. Bank, 7 Gill 216, 227 (to prove the mailing of a notice, the invariable habit of the bank-messenger charged with that duty to mail such notices, admitted; explaining the ruling in Flack v. Green as based on the indefiniteness of the proof of the habit); 1859, Brailsford v. Williams, 15 Md. 150, 152, 159 (to prove the mailing of a notice, the custom of the firm to leave letters on the desk for the clerk to mail, held not sufficient; the clerk whose duty it was to mail the letters should have been called); Massachusetts: 1837, Dana v. Kemble, 19 Pick. 112, 114 (letter left at a hotel, where the usage was regularly to distribute letters so left; held sufficient); Minnesota: 1903, Dowagiac M. Co. v. Watson, 90 Minn. 100, 95 N. W. 884 (business custom of the plaintiff to mail notices of acceptance of contracts, excluded on the facts); Missouri: 1920, Pierson-Lathrop Grain Co. v. Barker, — Mo. App. —, 223 S. W. 941 (custom to sign letters with instructions as to mailing, held insufficient on the facts; another example of over-strict ruling); 1920, Locke v. Woodman, — Mo. App. —, 225 S. W. 353 (custom of a business office, held sufficient on the facts); New York: 1810, Miller v. Hackley, 5 Johns. 375, 384 (the habit of a notary as to giving notice on the same day as demand, admitted to show that notice was given); 1826, Thallheimer v. Brinckerhoff, 6 Cow. 101 (whether a letter was sent; the clerk's invariable custom to mail letters as soon as copied, admitted); 1891, Beakes v. Da Cunha, 126 N. Y. 293, 27 N. E. 251 (whether notices were mailed on the 20th of the month; the person's habit to be at home on the 20th of each month for the purpose of transacting the business of that kind, admitted); 1910, Gardam & Son v. Batterson, 198 N. Y. 175, 91 N. E. 371 (whether certain letters of the defendant had been mailed; the defendant himself testified that he was the head of a company, that he put all letters on a desk-tray to be mailed by an employee; that a clerk "periodically through the day" gathered up the mail and posted it; held, purporting to follow Hetherington v. Kemp, that the evidence was insufficient, because it was essential to call the clerk, whose duty it was to collect and mail, and obtain his testimony that "he had invariably collected the letters upon the defendant's desk and had posted them"; "there was the gap in the proof." Having regard to the habits of commercial houses, does not this smack of Carlyle's "owl-eyed pedantry"?); Wisconsin: 1920, Federal Asbestos Co. v. Zimmerman, 171 Wis. 594, 177 N. W. 881 (letter from plaintiff to defendant; copy excluded, because no proof of mailing of original; the evidence consisted of a detailed statement by plaintiff of the office system of employees as to dictating, signing, sealing, and mailing of letters; the plaintiff testified that he remembered dictating this letter, but did not testify as to signing it or ever seeing it later; held insufficient for lack of "testimony from which it might be inferred that the custom in this particular instance had been followed"; this type of ruling is finical and unpractical; it brings the law into distrust among business men, who not only rely upon such evidence but know that it often represents the most that is honestly obtainable; standards of probative value in court must have some fair relation to standards accepted outside).

[5] 1879, Trotter v. MacLean, L. R. 13 Ch. D. 574, 580; 1922, Myers v. Moore-Kile Co., 5th C. C. A., 279 Fed. 233 (business usage as to mailing letters, here held sufficient); 1897, McKay v. Myers, 168 Mass. 312, 47 N. E. 98 (usual course of business, as indicating the mailing of a letter of which a copy had been kept).

unnecessary; the payee's due diligence (or, as sometimes improperly termed, the indorsee's constructive notice) suffices; hence a rule of commercial paper that the mere fact of seasonably mailing the notice suffices in law.[6] Here the fact of mailing is not used evidentially at all; for the receipt of the notice is not desired to be proved. (2) The receipt of a letter or telegram through the mails or telegraph-office may suffice as evidence of the genuineness of the letter or telegram, as being really sent by the person purporting to be its author; this rests on peculiar considerations and involves the principle of Authentication (post, §§ 2153, 2154). (3) When a letter is received through the mail, and the receiver desires to establish the time and place of posting, the postmark on the envelope is evidential. This involves two inquiries, first, whether the postmark may be assumed to be genuine, under the principles of Authentication (post, § 2152), and secondly, whether, under the exception to the Hearsay rule, the postmark, if genuine, can be treated as an official certificate of the act of marking and therefore be used as testimony without calling the postmaster himself to the stand (post, § 1674).

§ 96. Habit of Intemperance. In general, it would seem that, while a habit or fixed principle of abstaining from liquor would have value to show probable sobriety on a given occasion, yet "habits" of intemperance or intoxication could not be used for the contrary purpose; for the term "habit" here signifies thereby frequent indulgences, and not constant or periodical intoxication. If indeed a steady practice of intoxication can be shown, it would be equally probative. By reason of this looseness of meaning in the word "habit", the judicial applications of the principle are by no means uniform.[1]

[6] 1846, Woodcock v. Houldsworth, 16 M. & W. 124 (Parke, B.: "He has done all that was usual and necessary; and he does not guarantee the certainty or correctness of the post-office delivery"); 1848, Dunlop v. Higgins, 1 H. L. C. 381, 398; 1821, Hartford Bank v. Stedman, 3 Conn. 489; 1858, Loud v. Merrill, 45 Me. 516, 520.

§ 96. [1] ENGLAND: 1849, Alcock v. Assur. Co., 13 Q. B. 292 (the question was whether a stranded ship might have been got off without total loss if the captain had exercised good judgment at the time; evidence was received of his previous "drunken habits", as "tending to show that he probably was drunk, or that, in consequence of former drunkenness, his perceptions were imperfect"; this involves both the present use and that of § 85, ante).

UNITED STATES: Federal: 1866, Thompson v. Bowie, 4 Wall. 467, 471 (action on notes; defence, that they were given for gambling debts; the fact that the defendant when drunk had a habit of gambling, excluded, though the notes were in the handwriting of a professional gambler and were payable to the keeper of a gambling house, and although the opinion, by Davis, J., concedes that "it is highly probable that the notes were executed by him for a gaming consideration"; this is a discreditable decision; Grier, J., diss.); 1896, Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Henthorne, 19 C. C. A. 623, 73 Fed. 634 (intemperate habits of an engineer, not received to show that he was drunk at the time in question); California: 1894, Cosgrove v. Pitman, 103 Cal. 268, 273, 37 Pac. 232 (habit of intemperance, admissible to show intoxication at a given time); Kentucky: 1903, Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Riddle, — Ky. —, 72 S. W. 22 (whether the injured person was intoxicated at the time; testimony "that he was a perfectly sober man, and that he [the witness] had never seen him take a drink in his life", excluded; this is not common sense); Maine: 1898, Sullivan v. Sullivan, 92 Me. 84, 42 Atl. 230 (divorce for habits of intoxication; defendant's reputation for sobriety before marriage, not admitted as tending to disprove the charge; treated as a question of character); Massachusetts: 1862, Heland v. Allen, 3 All. 407, 408 (habits of sobriety or general character as a temperate man, not admissible to show that a plaintiff was not drunk at a given time); 1875, McCarty v. Leary, 118 Mass. 509, 510 (same); 1898, Edwards v. Worcester, 172 Mass. 104, 51 N. E. 447 (plaintiff's habits of sobriety, as tending Distinguish the evidential use (ante, § 85) of a condition of intoxicated incapacity as indicating that a certain act was or was not done while in that condition.

§ 97. Habit of Negligence or Care. Negligence is, in one aspect, the not-doing of a particular act; but in another and more correct aspect, it is the doing of one act in a manner which amounts to negligence in that some other act is omitted which ought to have accompanied it. There is no reason why such a habit should not be used as evidential, — either a habit of negligent action or a habit of careful action:[1] to negative his intoxication, excluded); 1910, Com. v. Rivet, 205 Mass. 464, 91 N. E. 877 (murder; deceased being found dead alone, his frequent custom of intoxication and of getting into a fight when drunk, offered for defendant to evidence that deceased "came to his death by having got into a fight when drunk", excluded; this ruling might have been correct on the principle of § 142, post, but the Court justifies it with the preposterous assertion that "the fact that a person's habits or character are such that he would be apt to do an act is not competent evidence that he did the act"; it is apparently hard to dislodge some shibboleths); Michigan: 1897, Kingston v. R. Co., 112 Mich. 40, 70 N. W. 315, 74 N. W. 230 (whether the plaintiff was drunk at the time of the accident; previous habits of intoxication excluded); Missouri: 1896, Lane v. R. Co., 132 Mo. 4, 33 S. W. 645 (Sherwood, J., delivering the opinion, but no other judges concurring on this point: "the habit of intoxication, when once proven to exist, is presumed to continue, and raises, in the case of an accident, a presumption of negligence, which stands until rebutted. . . . If evidence of the intemperate habits of a conductor of a railroad company may be gone into, in order to charge his employer with his negligence in case of an accident, though no intoxication be shown on that particular occasion, it is difficult to see why, in fairness and upon principle, the like rule should not prevail, and similar evidence be admitted, and similar consequences follow, where a railroad company pleads the contributory negligence of one injured by its train"); New York: 1871, Warner v. R. Co., 44 N. Y. 465 (previous habits of intoxication, not admitted to show intoxication at a particular time); 1874, Cleghorn v. R. Co., 56 N. Y. 44, 46 (same); Pennsylvania: 1868, Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Books, 57 Pa. 339, 343 (evidence admitted of the intemperate habits of the conductor of the defendant's train; "it would cast upon the defendants the burthen of proving that he was not intoxicated at the time, and had used due care"); 1876, Huntington B. T. M. R. Co. v. Decker, 82 Pa. 119, 124 (superintendent's intemperate habits excluded, because he was not the cause of the injury; but the conductor's intemperate habits admitted, as "raising a presumption of negligence"); Vermont: 1895, Smith's Ex'r v. Smith, 67 Vt. 443, 32 Atl. 256 (habits of intoxication, admitted to show intoxication at a given time, a certain amount of other evidence being first offered).

Some of the above rulings, it will be observed, are based upon a confusion of the present principle with that of the Character rule (ante, § 64).

Distinguish the fact of intemperance as constituting incompetence under the fellow-servant rule or under the rule for exemplary damages; 1872, Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Sullivan, 63 Ill. 293, 297 (an employee's intemperate habits, known to the employer, used as fixing his liability for the employee's incompetence); 1881, Michigan C. R. Co. v. Gilbert, 46 Mich. 176, 182, 9 N. W. 243 (same); 1885, Hilts v. R. Co., 55 Mich. 437, 444, 21 N. W. 878 (same); 1874, Cleghorn v. R. Co., 56 N. Y. 44, 46 (admissible, if known to the employer, as ground for exemplary damages).

§ 97. [1] ENGLAND: 1916, Joy v. Phillips Mills & Co., 1 K. B. 849 (workmen's compensation; deceased, a stable boy, was found dead from the kick of a horse in the stable; on the issue whether the kick was received in the course of employment, the deceased's habit of teasing the horses, admitted; "especially in these cases under the workmen's compensation Act, the books are full of cases where evidence as to the habits or practice of the deceased, or even of his class, has been admitted, both in favor of the applicant and against him or her"); UNITED STATES: Alabama: 1920, Jackson v. Vaughn, 204 Ala. 543, 86 So. 469 (injury by automobile; "that defendant always blew his horn in turning around the corner", excluded; no authority cited); California: 1921, Wallis v. Southern Pacific Co., 184 Cal. 662, 195 Pac. 408 (death by a railroad collision; that decedent "not only at this crossing, but elsewhere, was in the habit of stopping his team", etc., held admissible, regardless of whether there were eye-witnesses; prior rulings considered; the opinion does not sufficiently distinguish between this specific habit-evidence and that of general careful or negligent character; the eye-witness qualification has been advanced for the latter rule,

1873, SARGENT, C. J., in State v. M. & L. Railroad, 52 N. H. 528, 532, 549 (indictment for negligently running over a person at a crossing; one of the issues was whether the bell had been rung and the whistle sounded; evidence was received that the same train, run by the same engineer and fireman, had sometimes passed the same crossing during the preceding year without those precautions; the testimony as to the actual doing or omitting on this occasion being in conflict): "It would seem to be axiomatic that a man is likely to do or not to do a thing, or to do it or not to do it in a particular way, as he is in the habit of doing or not doing it. But this must be understood of acts which are done or omitted to be done without any particular intent or purpose to injure any one; it cannot apply to acts that are done intentionally, wilfully, or maliciously, because such acts are done with a specific object in view, and they are performed, not by force of habit, but with a definite purpose. . . . But when the question is, did these servants of the road, without any intention whatever and through mere negligence or carelessness, omit to give these signals on that occasion, we think the inquiry was properly made as to what they had done before in that regard, and whether they had or had not grown habitually negligent of the requirements of the road in that particular. In this view of the case, we think the evidence was admissible, — not as evidence of character, not as evidence of fitness or unfitness, but simply as having some tendency to show that on this particular occasion these agents were more probably negligent and careless because they had before frequently neglected the same duty with impunity and had thus become habitually negligent in that regard."

The real difficulties here seem to be two: Is it possible to believe that careless action can ever be anything more than casual or occasional? If it is, are we not really predicating a careless disposition, rather than a genuine but has not played a part in the former rule); 1921, Starr v. Los Angeles R. Co., 187 Cal. 270 201 Pac. 599 (injury by starting of a car while the passenger was alighting; conductor's habit of sitting in the car and talking to passengers, excluded); Georgia: 1893, Tennessee V. & G. R. Co. v. Kane, 92 Ga. 187, 192, 18 S. E. 18 (action for the death of an engineer; defence, his own negligent act in using excessive speed; the engineer's habitual use of excessive speed, excluded on the facts; prior rulings discussed); Kansas: 1899, Missouri P. R. Co. v. Moffatt, 60 Kan. 113, 55 Pac. 837 (cited ante, § 93, n. 1); Massachusetts: 1885, Whitney v. Gross, 140 Mass. 232, 5 N. E. 619 (distinguishing carelessness in driving a horse down hill on former occasions and training the horse so that he habitually broke into a rapid rate of speed, the latter being admissible); 1894, Brouillette v. R. Co., 162 Mass. 198, 204, 206, 38 N. E. 507 (the plaintiff's repeated boasts "about his ability to keep out of the way of trains and not get hurt", admitted, as bearing upon his "carefulness or readiness to take risks"); Missouri: 1913, Hodges v. Hill, 175 Mo. App. 441, 161 S. W. 633 (collision between plaintiff's mare and defendant's buggy; that plaintiff's son, riding the mare, was in the habit of riding there at high speed, admitted; careful opinion by Sturgis, J.); Montana: 1897, Mulville v. Ins. Co., 19 Mont. 95, 47 Pac. 651 (that the deceased made a practice of jumping on trains while in motion, excluded); New Hampshire: 1873, State v. M. & L. Railroad, 52 N. H. 528 (admitted; see quotation supra); 1878, State v. B. & M. Railroad, 58 N. H. 410 (similar); 1877, Hall v. Brown, 58 N. H. 93 (cited ante, § 93, n. 1); 1900, Smith v. R. Co., 70 N. H. 53, 47 Atl. 290 (cited ante, § 93, n. 1); 1905, Tucker v. B. & M. R. Co., 73 N. H. 132, 59 Atl. 943 (cited ante, § 93, n. 1); 1909, Bourassa v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 75 N. H. 359, 74 Atl. 590 (like State v. M. & L. R. Co.); New York: 1912, Zucker v. Whitridge, 205 N. Y. 50, 98 N. E. 209 (injury by a street-car at a crossing; the habit of the plaintiff in taking precautions when approaching a railway track, held not admissible where there were four eye-witnesses); Oklahoma: 1916, St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Hodge, 53 Okl. 427, 157 Pac. 60 (boy hurt by a train while trespassing; the boy's habit of "crawling underneath the cars whenever he found the tracks blocked", held not improperly excluded on the facts; citing the above text with approval); Pennsylvania: 1896, Baker v. Irish, 172 Pa. 528, 532, 33 Atl. 558 (that the plaintiff "before the accident made a practice of attempting to jump out of the elevator" before it stopped; rejected, because too remote to show that he did so on this occasion).

For the use of particular instances to evidence the careful or careless habit, see post, §§ 199, 376.

habit, and then are we not violating the rule against Character in civil cases (ante, § 64) in employing such evidence? These doubts serve to explain the precedents that exclude such evidence; but the doubts are not well founded, and that such evidence is often of probative value, and is not attended by the inconveniences of Character evidence.

§ 98. Habit as a substitute for Present Recollection. It will be seen, in examining the qualifications of witnesses (post, §§ 734, 747) that a past recollection may be resorted to, if known to have been accurately recorded at the time; and one of the permissible ways for the witness to guarantee the accuracy of his record is to vouch for a habit of accurate recording. But theoretically such testimony may be resolved into circumstantial evidence of habit, neglecting the use of the record; or the record may be wanting, and thus the circumstantial evidence of habit alone is practically available. Thus, a notary may testify that his habit is always to mail a notice of protest, and this habit alone (apart from or in the absence of a minute of the sending) would be receivable to indicate the probability that a specific notice was sent:[1]

1867, STRONG, J., in Eureka Ins. Co. v. Robinson, 56 Pa. 264 (admitting evidence of the company's custom to send a notice, as indicating that the notice was sent): "We think it not uncommon in practice to corroborate the defective memory of a witness by proof of what was his habit in similar circumstances. Thus, a subscribing witness to a will or a bond, if unable to recollect whether he saw the testator or obligor sign the instrument or heard it acknowledged, is often permitted to testify to his own habit never to sign as a witness without seeing the party sign whose signature he attests or hearing that signature acknowledged. And it seems to be persuasive and legitimate supporting evidence."

§ 99. Traits of Handwriting and Spelling, to evidence Authorship of a Writing. When we are shown a signature, and, without having seen X write it, or handle the document, we infer nevertheless from the appearance of the writing that X was the writer, our process of thought is that, since X has a peculiar style or habit of handwriting known to us in its features, therefore, whenever he writes, the writing must bear these peculiar marks, and thus a writing bearing these marks was the product of his hand. Just as we think, of a deed of violence, "This man's character, his plan, his emotions, would be likely to lead him to this deed," so we argue, "This man's handwriting would result in his penning such a signature as the one in issue." It is commoner to evidence the authorship of a signature by the direct testimony of those who declare it to resemble the general qualities of the alleged person's handwriting as known to them; there the style of writing is not expressly offered in evidence, but is merely the ground of their competency to testify. When handwriting is offered circumstantially in evidence, it is § 98. [1] 1909, State v. Day, 108 Minn. 121, 121 N. W. 611 (custom in administering an oath); 1832, Den v. Downam, 1 Green N. J. 142 (posting an advertisement of sheriff's sale; the sheriff's testimony to his "constant practice to do it [post it], without a single exception ever known by me", admitted).

The principle is further exemplified by the citations post, § 747, and also by the cases cited under the attesting-witness rule (post, § 1302).

The presumption from regular performance of official duty (post, § 2534) rests on the present principle.

expressly described or shown to the jury as the source of their inference; for thus only does the trait of the handwriting become available for them as the basis of an inference.

Now, the relevancy of handwriting-traits, as of probative value to show whether or not a given act of writing was done by the person alleged, has always been conceded, since the beginning of the 1700s. The difficulty that has arisen over handwriting-evidence has not been over the relevancy of handwriting-traits to show the authorship of writing but over the mode of evidencing them by circumstantial evidence, and that is by examining one or more specimens of the writing of the person in question and drawing inferences as to its peculiar traits (on the principle of § 383, post). This, however, being a different question from the present one, and complicated by many collateral considerations, is treated elsewhere (post, §§ 1996–2021). The qualifications of witnesses to speak as to handwriting-traits involve also distinct questions (post, §§ 693–709).

A person's mode of spelling is also a trait which evidences whether or not a document with words spelled in a given way was probably executed by him. Spelling and handwriting alike seem to be more or less personal and physical traits, like corporal strength and manual skill, in their probative bearing. A peculiar mode of spelling has always been treated as relevant to evidence a document's authorship; but the subject is more conveniently dealt with in connection with the rules for handwriting (ante, § 87, post, § 2024).

Sub-topic D: DESIGN OR PLAN

§ 102. General Principle. The presence of a design or plan to do or not to do a given act has probative value to show that the act was in fact done or not done. A plan is not always carried out, but it is more or less likely to be carried out. The existence of the plan is always used in daily life as the basis of an inference to the act planned. There is no question about the relevancy in general of such evidence:

1853, BIGELOW, J., in Cook v. Moore, 11 Cush. 213, 216: "The existence in the mind of a deliberate design to do a certain act, when once proved, may properly lead to the inference that the intent once harbored continued and was carried into effect by acts long subsequent to the origin of the motive by which they were prompted."

The probative value of such a design or plan, for the purpose of admissibility, will depend chiefly on two elements, either of which may be very weak in a given instance, — the fixedness or absolute quality of the design, i.e. its subjection to no contingencies or conditions; and the specific direction of it to the act in question, i.e. its application, not merely to a class of acts indefinitely foreseen, but to the exact deed in question.[1] The only questions of relevancy that have arisen are due to the probative importance of these elements.

§ 102. [1] From the point of view of logic and psychology as applicable to argument before the jury (not the rules of Admissibility), see the materials collected in the present author's "Principles of Judicial Proof, as given by Logic, Psychology, and General Experience, and illustrated in Judicial Trials" (1913), §§ 121–129.

§ 103. Discrimination of other Principles. It is necessary first to distinguish, from the relevancy of Design or Plan, certain very different evidential questions:

(1) Hearsay expressions of Design. When it is sought to evidence a design or plan by expressions of the person alleged to have entertained it, the question immediately arises whether the Hearsay rule applies and whether such expressions may enter under some exception to it (post, §§ 1725, 2726). This has nothing to do with the relevancy of the design itself, when properly evidenced.

(2) Conduct as evidence of Design. The design or plan being assumed to be relevant, a common source of evidencing it is the conduct of the person, i.e. not express assertions of it, but conduct circumstantially indicating it. This raises questions of relevancy, but very different ones from the relevancy of the design itself to evidence an act; just as the admissibility of conduct to evidence character raises different questions from the admissibility of character to evidence an act. Not only in theory, but in view of practical results, these two things are constantly to be distinguished; for, however relevant the design, the evidence to establish it may be inadmissible (post, §§ 237, 304).

(3) Design or Intention, distinguished from Intent. The probative feature of an intention or design is its direction forward to the accomplishment of a purpose by action. That is why it is relevant to show the later doing of the act. This is a different thing from Intent, in the legal sense, i.e. the state of mind which accompanies an act and imparts to it a criminal or innocent quality. The two things are as different as the design with which a man buys a good cigar and his state of mind later when he is smoking it. His plan is, when buying, to smoke it; later, when his design is being fulfilled, his smoking is accompanied by sentiments of comfort and self-satisfaction. But his design may be frustrated and yet the accompanying sentiments may be experienced; as, if he loses the cigar and a friend gives him another. Or his design may be carried out, but the sentiments not be experienced; as, if the cigar turns out to be a poor one. So, too, a person may design to write a document and this design is relevant to show that he did later write it; but his intent, while writing it, to make false representations depends on different considerations. Again, a person may design to take another's property, and this design is relevant to show the subsequent taking; but whether the taking was under a claim of right or with felonious intent involves a different mental state. In short, the importance of Design, plan, or intention is chiefly its evidentiary aspect, as looking forward and tending to prove the act in question; while the important aspect of Intent is chiefly not an evidentiary one at all, but one of substantive law, as a state of mind accompanying the act in question and necessary to its legal effect. Occasionally, to be sure, Intent has an evidentiary significance, — as where an intent at an earlier time is used to indicate the existence of the same intent at a later time, but here the evidentiary use is to prove another mental state or condition, and not an act. The practical consequences of this distinction between Design and Intent are elsewhere dealt with (post, §§ 242, 300–371).

§ 104. Miscellaneous Instances. There is no situation in which a design to do an act would be irrelevant to show the doing of the act.[1] Since the chief difficulty is usually as to the Hearsay rule, the precedents under the exception for Statements of Intention (post, §§ 1725, 1726) are also material; for a ruling admitting expressions of design under that exception to the rule is usually a precedent also for the relevancy of the design.

§ 105. Threats of one charged with Crime or Tort. A threat to do a criminal or tortious act is in general admissible [1]; the threat being receivable under § 104. [1] Federal: 1905, The San Rafael, 141 Fed. 270, 278, C. C. A. (whether a person was lost at sea on a certain vessel and trip; his expression of intent to travel thither at that time, etc., admitted); Alabama: 1895, Burton v. State, 107 Ala. 68, 18 So. 240 (the intention of a witness, not now to be found, as showing that he had left the State, admitted); Connecticut: 1881, State v. Smith, 49 Conn. 380 (murder of a chief of police making an arrest, the deceased's intention, on leaving his house, "to go to arrest Chip Smith", admitted); Iowa: 1884, State v. Jones, 64 Ia. 349, 352, 17 N. W. 911, 20 N. W. 470 (murder; deceased's intention to go to a place to buy cattle, admitted to show the reason of his presence near defendant's house); 1898, State v. Smith, 106 Ia. 701, 77 N. W. 499 (husband-poisoning; defendant's declarations, in seeking to hire rooms, that herself and her daughter would be alone, admitted); Kentucky: 1899, Throckmorton v. Com., — Ky. —, 49 S. W. 474 (Federal license to sell liquor, admissible to show probable possession); Maryland: 1895, Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. State, 81 Md. 371, 32 Atl. 202 (an intention of taking a railroad journey, admitted to show that the deceased was proceeding to get a ticket); Massachusetts: 1885, Com. v. Cotton, 138 Mass. 502 (keeping liquor with intent to sell; the defendant was driving a wagon of liquors through a no-license suburb of a city; evidence admitted of orders from his employers to go through that suburb without selling and to sell only upon reaching the region where sales were allowed); 1897, Inness v. R. Co., 168 Mass. 433, 47 N. E. 193 (intention to take the cars, admitted to show later conduct); 1901, Com. v. O'Brien, 179 Mass. 533, 61 N. E. 213 (intention of going with a certain object, admitted); Nebraska: 1894, Houston v. Gran, 38 Nebr. 687, 691, 57 N. W. 403 (damage by sale of liquor; defendant's instructions to his servants not to sell to the deceased, not admissible to disprove the sale; unsound); Wisconsin: 1908, Barker v. Western Union Tel. Co., 134 Wis. 147, 114 N. W. 439 (damage by loss of patronage; a patron's intention to accept the plaintiff's services is evidence that the services would have been accepted).

Compare the rulings upon conduct as evidence of design (post, §§ 237, 304).

§ 105. [1] The following miscellaneous examples raise no difficulty: ENGLAND: 1760, Earl Ferrer's Trial, 19 How. St. Tr. 919 (killing);

CANADA: 1911, Allen v. King, 44 Can. Sup. 331 (cross-examination of accused to threats as testified to by a witness at the police court, not now called, held improper);

UNITED STATES: Ala. 1896, Wilson v. State, 110 Ala. 1, 20 So. 415; 1904, Pitts v. State, 140 Ala. 70, 37 So. 101; 1921, Nickerson v. State, 205 Ala. 684, 88 So. 905 (murder; "I will work 40 years in the penitentiary and give $4000 to get to kill you", admitted); Ark. 1883, Casat v. State, 40 Ark. 517 (killing); Colo. 1889, Babcock v. People, 13 Colo. 521, 29 Pac. 817 (killing); Ga. 1877, Fulton v. State, 58 Ga. 224 (arson); Ill. 1887, Spies v. People, 122 Ill. 1, 12 N. E. 865, 17 N. E. 898, passim (killing); 1893, Painter v. People, 147 Ill. 462, 35 N. E. 64; 1902, Henry v. People, 198 Ill. 162, 65 N. E. 120; Ind. 1871, Cluck v. State, 40 Ind. 263, 270; Iowa: 1895, State v. Windahl, 95 Ia. 470, 64 N. W. 420 (killing); 1897, State v. Millmeier, 102 Ia. 692, 72 N. W. 275; 1905, State v. Thompson, 127 Ia. 440, 103 N. W. 377 (assault with intent); La. State v. Edwards, 34 La. An. 1012 (arson); 1884, State v. Birdwell, 36 La. An. 859, 861; 1896, State v. Pain, 48 La. An. 311, 19 So. 138; Me. 1848, New Gloucester v. Bridgham, 28 Me. 68; Mass. 1869, Com. v. Madan, 102 Mass. 1 (killing); Mich. 1897, People v. Holmes, 111 Mich. 364, 69 N. W. 501; Minn. 1895, State v. Hayward, 62 Minn. 474, 65 N. W. 63 (killing); Miss. 1905, Johnson v. State, 85 Miss. 572, 37 So. 926 (threats, and an attempt to secure help in the intended killing, admitted); 1905, Sinclair v. State, 87 Miss. 330, 39 So. 522; Mo. 1895, State v. Harlan, 130 Mo. 381, 32 S. W. 997 (killing); Nebr. 1905, Schroeder v. Blum, 74 Nebr. 60, 103 N. W. 1073 (malicious prosecution on a charge the Hearsay exception or as an admission, and the design, thus evidenced, being relevant under the present principle:

1668, Standsfield's Trial, 11 How. St. Tr. 1371, 1373, 1377, 1385 (Scotland); parricide; it was proved that the defendant, who had been disinherited by his father, "did declare, threaten, and vow at several times that he would cut his throat", and did "swear, if he had a sword, he would run it through him", and the like. Mr. Hume, arguing for defendant: "[These circumstances] are but very remote and uncertain. For, as to that expression that the defender is alleged to have threatened his father's death, it is the opinion of all lawyers who have written upon the subject that that is but a very remote presumption. And as Carpzovius expresses it (pt. 3, qu. 121, no. 51): 'Quod est indicium admodum periculosum quippe cum homines sæpe nil minus faciant quam quod minas exequantur, et iracundia agitatus minas de crimine perpetrando sæpe jactet, ipso tamen animo fervore paulo post discusso, cohibeat manus, et abstineat a facinore illo, quod forsan ab alio postea committitur.'" The King's Advocate, in reply: "And whereas it is answered to this qualification [i.e. circumstance] that the saying that a son would cut a father's throat is but a remote circumstance, it is replied that the law and all lawyers do agree that 'minæ præcedentes et damnum sequentum' is a most pregnant qualification [i.e. circumstance] of that party's crime, especially where the threats were to cut a father's throat, which of itself was so horrid and unnatural a villainy that it cannot be doubted he who durst vow it wanted but an occasion to act it, and it is acknowledged, that though this be the clearest presumption, of assault with a gun; threats of the now plaintiff, made before the alleged assault, but not communicated to the now defendant until after the prosecution, and therefore inadmissible if offered on the principle of § 258, n. 2, post, held admissible on the present principle). North Carolina: 1847, State v. Shepherd, 8 Ired. 195 (the fact that the deceased had bought the defendant's land at a sheriff's sale, that the defendant had threatened him with death if he took a deed, and that he had just taken the deed, admitted); 1880, State v. Norton, 82 N. C. 628 (assault and battery on S., the defendant's words two weeks before, when showing a pistol, that "if S. ever crossed his path he would send him to hell", rejected, because "neither malice nor intent nor knowledge nor motive forms any ingredient of the offence"); 1882, State v. Skidmore, 87 N. C. 509, 512 (approving State v. Norton obiter; citing no other cases); 1887, State v. Thompson, 97 N. C. 496, 1 S. E. 921 (arson; threats to do injury to the son and the grandson of the occupant, admitted as showing general ill-will to the family, and a motive); 1892, State v. Rhodes, 111 N. C. 647, 15 S. E. 1038 (arson; threats of harm against the son of the owner, admitted); 1895, State v. Goff, 117 N. C. 755, 23 S. E. 355 (threat to kill, as showing the defendant the aggressor; admitted with the obscure distinction that "while this was not competent as evidence of motive, it was admissible to show temper"); 1895, State v. Lytle, 117 N. C. 799, 23 S. E. 476 (threat to burn a house, admitted; but semble, not where the doing by the defendant is not disputed); 1896, State v. Mace, 118 N. C. 1244, 24 S. E. 798 ("Damn Bango Branch and everybody that lives on it; . . . I intend to kill some man this night", admitted, in the light of other circumstances); 1901, State v. Hunt, 128 N. C. 584, 38 S. E. 473 (declarations that he would go to the place where deceased was and "raise some hell", admitted); 1915, State v. Shouse, 166 N. C. 306, 81 S. E. 333 (that he "never expected to rest until he had killed two more", admitted; but why does the opinion, in view of the above line of decisions, cite merely a compilation of anonymous authorship for the singular proposition that "general threats to kill, not shown to have any reference to the deceased, are not admissible"?); Tenn. 1872, Maxwell v. State, 3 Heisk. 420; Tex. 1920, Sapp v. State, 87 Tex. Cr. 606; 223 S. W. 459 (wife-murder; wife's declarations of her state of mind, admitted); Vt. 1905, State v. Atkins, 77 Vt. 215, 59 Atl. 826 (breach of the peace by driving a wagon into collision); Wash. T. 1888, White v. Terr., 3 Wash. T. 397, 403, 19 Pac. 37 ("admissible in all cases"); Wisconsin: 1920, State v. Barber, — Wis. —, 179 N. W. 798 (assault with intent to rape a woman boarding with defendant; conditional threat 15 months before, held not too remote in trial Court's discretion).

Distinguish the question of a co-indictee's threats: 1901, State v. Weaver, 165 Mo. 1, 65 S. W. 308 (co-indictee's threats, inadmissible where no conspiracy at the time was shown; see post, § 1079); 1906, State v. Quen, 48 Or. 347, 86 Pac. 791 (threats of a third person, in the accused's presence, with no evidence of conspiracy, excluded).

yet 'per se' it is not full probation, for though the son had both vowed and resolved, yet by an accident he might have been prevented. But the presumption at least lays the burden."

1810, Chief Justice SWIFT, Evidence, 136: "When one threatens to do an injury to another, and that or a similar injury afterwards happens, this furnishes ground to presume that he who threatened the fact was the perpetrator or instigator."

1873, GROVER, J., in Stokes v. People, 53 N. Y. 175: "Threats to commit the crime for which a person is upon trial are constantly received as evidence against him, as circumstances proper to be considered in determining the question whether he has in fact committed the crime; for the reason that the threats indicate an intention to do it, and the existence of this intention creates a probability that he has in fact committed it."

1892, SHIRAS, J., in Worth v. R. Co., 51 Fed. 173: "It is also said [by counsel] that a threat to do an act in the future is not proof that the person will in fact do the act threatened. It may not be proof conclusive, but it may be evidence competent to be considered with other facts in determining the question. Thus, if the two persons who made the threats in question had been charged, either civilly or criminally, with the tort of having wrecked the train, can it be questioned that on the trial of the case evidence of the threats made by them would have been competent as tending to show their complicity in the wrong done?"

Such threats may also be circumstantially evidential of hatred, ill-feeling, or malice towards the injured person; in this way they are evidence to show Emotion (post, § 394), while the emotion itself is evidential (post, § 117) as an independent circumstance to show the act. But the practical difference is that almost any antagonistic expression may serve to denote ill-feeling, and rules can hardly be laid down for such evidence; while, on the other hand, regarding the expressions as indicating a design, the nature of the design may seriously affect its relevancy. That which would suffice as evidence of ill-feeling may show no design, or a design too indefinite to be relevant. Again, the expressions may be regarded as showing intent, or malice in the legal sense of a deliberate intent to do the act charged, and the presence of this intent at a former time may be evidential (post, § 242) of a later intent at the time of the act. The practical difference is (1) if the doing of the act is conceded, then the design is no longer needed to prove it; but the same evidence of expressions may still be useful to show intent; (2) in an offence where intent is immaterial, the intent-evidence is immaterial, yet the design to do the act may still be relevant.

These are not much more than quibbles, for no harm is ordinarily done by admitting superfluous evidence; but if these quibbles are to be raised, they should be solved correctly; and the peculiar doctrines resulting from the raising of these quibbles are sometimes found to be hopelessly inconsistent and unsound.

§ 106. Same: Generic Threats. It has been noted (ante, § 103) that the more specific a design is, the greater its probative value. There may come a point at which the design is too indefinite in its indications to be of any probative value; but the mere fact that it is generic, i.e. points towards a class of acts, however broad, does not in itself destroy its relevancy, provided the purpose might naturally include the act charged.[1]

§ 106. [1] ENGLAND: 1873, R. v. Hagan, 12 Cox Cr. 357 (murder of a child brought up in the defendant's family; his remark a fortnight before, "The child is no good; he is eating the other children's food", admitted).

UNITED STATES: Federal: 1898, Stevenson v. U. S., 29 C. C. A. 600, 86 Fed. 106 (murder of a deputy marshal; threat made three months before "to kill the next damn marshal that arrested him", excluded; preposterous ruling); 1900, Bird v. U. S., 180 U. S. 356, 21 Sup. 403 (quarrels and threats of assault upon another member of the same party of voyagers about a month before, excluded, partly as being a separate criminal act and partly as too remote; only two precedents cited for the first reason, and none for the second; opinion valueless);

Alabama: 1877, Commander v. State, 60 Ala. 1, 7 (murder; threat to kill any one who sued him under like circumstances, admitted, the deceased having sued him); 1881, Redd v. State, 68 Ala. 492, 497 (murder of a negro paramour; statements that "he did n't mind killing a negro, if he fooled with him, any more than he would a buck-rabbit", excluded); 1882, Ford v. State, 71 Ala. 385, 396 (to kill some one, admitted); 1885, Clarke v. State, 78 Ala. 474, 477 (murder; threats against a third person, received exceptionally, because the defendant shot the deceased, mistaking him for the third person); 1895, Prater v. State, 107 Ala. 26, 18 So. 239 (arson; that the defendant belonged to a band of "white caps" who had posted threats to burn down the houses of a certain class of persons of whom the owner of the burned house was one, admitted); 1896, Drake v. State, 110 Ala. 9, 20 So. 450 ("I will see you later", said after a quarrel, admitted); 1897, Linehan v. State, 113 Ala. 70, 21 So. 497 (that "he would show O. [the deceased] how to throw slurs on him", admitted); 1897, Burton v. State, 115 Ala. 1, 22 So. 585 (that he would "shoot some one", admitted); 1901, Caddell v. State, 129 Ala. 57, 30 So. 76 (threats to kill "anybody that interfered", admitted); 1904, Pitts v. State, 140 Ala. 70, 37 So. 101 (merely asking for a pistol is no more than a general threat); 1904, Harbour v. State, 140 Ala. 103, 37 So. 330 ("I will stamp the life out of somebody", excluded);

Arizona: 1918, Sparks v. State, 19 Ariz. 455, 171 Pac. 1182 (murder; "Courts will not exclude threats because of their remoteness");

California: 1896, People v. Craig, 111 Cal. 460, 465, 44 Pac. 186 (threats that "something would happen sure before it would end", and on certain conditions "he would put a hole through them", speaking of the members of a family, admitted on a charge of wife-killing); 1899, People v. Gross, 123 Cal. 389, 55 Pac. 1054 (that he would "wipe out the name" of the deceased's family, admitted); 1904, People v. Suesser, 142 Cal. 354, 75 Pac. 1093 (threats against D. and A., admitted, the deceased F. having been killed while preventing the execution of these threats); 1916, People v. Wilt, 173 Cal. 477, 160 Pac. 561 ("I will get my revenge on that bunch"); 1921, Cordts v. Superior Court, — Cal. App. —, 200 Pac. 726 (homicide of a police officer in a motor-car collision; "if anybody undertakes to stop me, I will put on all the gas I have and run them down", admitted);

Colorado: 1899, Moore v. People, 26 Colo. 213, 57 Pac. 857 (that "he would get the son of a bitch yet", admitted);

Columbia (Dist.): 1881, Guiteau's Trial, D. C., II, 95 (that the defendant in 1872 or 1873 said he would "shoot some of our public men", "would imitate Wilkes Booth", admitted);

Connecticut: 1880, State v. Hoyt, 47 Conn. 518, 522, 539 (murder of father; the defendant's declaration, "I don't know but I shall kill some one in a week", admitted);

Florida: 1866, Dixon v. State, 13 Fla. 636, 645 (the deceased being a policeman, threats of violence against "policemen", shortly before, admitted to show intent);

Georgia: 1876, Stafford v. State, 55 Ga. 591, 593 (murder and robbery; a plan, of a week or so before, to rob others, admitted); 1878, Shaw v. State, 60 Ga. 246, 250 (wife-murder by beating; a declaration, four years before, by the defendant while beating her, that he had a right to beat her, admitted); 1897, Shaw v. State, 102 Ga. 660, 29 S. E. 477 (train-wrecking; defendant's statement that "he was going to have a wreck of his own some day", received); 1899, Harris v. State, 109 Ga. 280, 34 S. E. 583 (murder of negro; defendant's remark, just before, "A negro took my woman, and I am gwine over there and get me a negro", admitted); 1905, Rawlins v. State, 124 Ga. 31, 52 S. E. 1 (threats against the father of the children killed, admitted); 1912, Helms v. State, 138 Ga. 826, 76 S. E. 353 (murder);

Idaho: 1898, State v. Davis, 6 Ida. 159, 53 Pac. 678 (murder of sheep-man; threats against sheep-men generally, admitted); 1897, State v. Larkins, 5 Ida. 200, 47 Pac. 945 (murder, "I have a dirty piece of business to do to-night", admitted); 1917, State v. Rogers, 30 Ida. 259, 163 Pac. 912 (murder: "if there is any cutting done, I will be there", excluded);

Illinois: 1886, Schoolcraft v. People, 117 Ill. 271, 277, 7 N. E. 649 (that "some serious", would occur, admitted); 1920, People v. Steinkraus, 291 Ill. 283, 126 N. E. 202 (murder; intention to hold up another man that day, and willingness to "hold up a man with a gun and rob him", excluded; the present line of authorities not considered); 1920, People v.

In evidencing the existence of this general design, use is made of conduct or expressions, as evidence of the state of mind, and it is often a question

Sorrells, 293 Ill. 591, 127 N. E. 651 (homicide of wife; threat intimating injury to the mother-in-law, excluded; erroneous on the facts); 1918, People v. Scott, 281 Ill. 465, 120 N. E. 553 (homicide by a school board official of a pupil's parent; the deceased's statement, "There is going to be hell at the schoolhouse", etc., held inadmissible; astounding);

Indiana: 1893, Parker v. State, 136 Ind. 284, 287, 35 N. E. 1105 (threats to get even with a certain class of persons, which included the deceased, admitted); 1902, Wheeler v. State, 158 Ind. 687, 63 N. E. 975 (threats against persons eating food intended for defendant's children, the deceased being such a person, admitted); 1903, Starr v. State, 160 Ind. 661, 67 N. E. 527 (threat to kill "the s— of a b—", admitted); 1910, Porter v. State, 173 Ind. 694, 91 N. E. 310 (wife-murder; the defendant's statement that "there was nothing too low down for him to do", excluded, as involving his character); 1910, Miller v. State, 174 Ind. 255, 91 N. E. 930 (after arrest, "when I get out of this, I will get even with some of them", excluded);

Iowa: 1894, State v. Pierce, 90 Ia. 506, 512, 58 N. W. 891 (threats to kill any person who interfered in a certain way, admitted); 1896, State v. Helm, 97 Ia. 378, 66 N. W. 751 (a threat that "some of the C. boys would die with their boots on some of these days", the deceased being a C.; admitted, but perhaps only as a self-contradiction); 1896, Laird v. Ass. Co., 98 Ia. 495, 67 N. W. 385 (an angry husband to the deceased, his wife, "You 'll run against a stump yet"); 1899, State v. Lightfoot, 107 Ia. 344, 78 N. W. 41 (indefinite threats admitted);

Kansas: 1872, State v. Horne, 9 Kan. 123, 128 (hostile desire to find the deceased, "By God, we want to see him", admitted);

Kentucky: 1896, Brooks v. Com., 100 Ky. 194, 37 S. W. 1043 ("he wanted some damned man to jump on him, so that he could kill him", admitted); 1901, Quinn v. Com., — Ky. —, 63 S. W. 792 (murder; threats "that he would kill or be killed before he would go to the workhouse", admitted); 1914, Combs v. Com., 160 Ky. 386, 169 S. W. 879 (murder; that he would his father as soon as anyone else, admitted);

Maryland: 1916, Frick v. State, 128 Md. 122, 97 Atl. 138 (manslaughter by a railroad policeman; "the next one he caught on the car he was going to shoot", admitted); 1916, Frick v. State, 128 Md. 122, 97 Atl. 138 ("remoteness . . . makes no difference as to competency");

Massachusetts: 1869, Com. v. Madan, 102 Mass. 1 (murder; threats to have revenge against certain witnesses, the deceased being one, admitted); 1887, Com. v. Chase, 147 Mass. 597, 18 N. E. 565 (threats of harm to a person who had testified against the defendant, admitted to show that the defendant was the one who burned the former's barn); 1890, Com. v. Quinn, 150 Mass. 401, 23 N. E. 54 (arson; the defendant's threats, after being formerly charged with robbery by the owner of the burned building, to "make him sweat for it", admitted);

Minnesota: 1906, State v. Yates, 99 Minn. 461, 109 N. W. 1070 (arson for insurance; the defendant's statement, about a year before, to a friend who had a stock of goods, "Why don't you get everything you have got here insured for $800 or $1000 and in four or five days after you get the insurance all right set them afire?" excluded though the opinion concedes that it "tended to characterize her as an incendiary, willing to burn property for the purpose of the insurance thereon"; this is one of the most depressing rulings in our records); 1922, State v. Miller, — Minn. —, 186 N. W. 803 (murder; defendant's prior statement that he had a right "to shoot a sewing-machine agent P., who persisted in calling at his home in his absence . . . and would do so if he came again", P. not being the deceased in question, excluded, because tending rather to show a vicious disposition);

Missouri: 1879, State v. Guy, 69 Mo. 430 (a threat to kill an unnamed person, admitted); 1883, State v. Dickson, 78 Mo. 438, 449 ("he shall not eat my bread and meat much longer", etc.); 1883, State v. Grant, 79 Mo. 113, 137 (murder of a policeman; threats against "policemen", admitted); 1885, State v. McNally, 87 Mo. 649 ("going to have blood before morning", admitted); 1885, Culbertson v. Hill, 87 Mo. 553, 555 ("general or special"); 1889, State v. Crawford, 99 Mo. 74, 12 S. W. 354 (vague threats, admitted); 1895, State v. Fitzgerald, 130 Mo. 407, 32 S. W. 1113 (threats to kill some one and then himself, admitted); 1899, State v. Cochran, 147 Mo. 504, 49 S. W. 558 (that he "would like to kill some damned old Grand Army man", and "would like to kill somebody before the week was out", admitted, though the deceased was not a member of the G. A. R.); 1906, State v. Feeley, 194 Mo. 300, 92 S. W. 663 (a threat showing "general malice" and a disposition "to an act which was criminal" is admissible);

Montana: 1909, State v. Hanlon, 38 Mont. 557, 100 Pac. 1035 ("I am coming back and drive all you old-timers out of the camp", admitted);

Nebraska: 1903, Keating v. State, 67 Nebr. 560, 93 N. W. 980 (general expressions of a plan to rob, admitted);

Nevada: 1880, State v. Hymer, 15 Nev. 49, 54, per Beatty, C. J. (murder; statements, about three hours before, "It is the first time I have been drunk since I have been in town; I got drunk just to kill two or three —— in this whether the weakness of the inference lies in this evidence of the actual state of mind (post, § 238), or in the present inference from the mental conditown, and I'll do it, too", admitted: distinguishing State v. Walsh, 5 Nev. 315, 1869, in which a threat was uttered against "a party" who had been talking about his wife, but the person was not identified with the deceased);

New Hampshire: 1898, State v. Davis, 69 N. H. 350, 41 Atl. 267 (illegal sale of liquor; a letter declaring a general intention not to open a hotel unless he sold liquor in it, admitted; also a conversation telling a prospective tenant that he would have to sell liquor, admitted);
New Mexico: 1921, State v. Bailey, — N. M. —, 198 Pac. 529 ("He said he would protect his ground; if he couldn't by law, he would with his gun");
New York: 1865, People v. Kennedy, 32 N. Y. 141 (threats by the defendant, a discharged farm-hand, to do all the damage he could to the employer and to destroy his property, admitted to connect the defendant with the burning of the other's barn); 1873, Stokes v. People, 53 N. Y. 174 (general threats; he "would beggar him first and then kill him"; "I go prepared for him all the time; so sure as my name is Jim Fisk I will kill him"; per Grover, J., "the difference is only in degree" between these and more specific designs); 1874, Weed v. People, 56 N. Y. 628 (abortion; evidence admitted, after connecting the defendant with the act, of an advertisement issued by him, about two years before, offering advice and assistance in the procuring of miscarriages); 1897, People v. Sutherland, 154 N. Y. 345, 48 N. E. 518 (murder by shooting; showing a pistol on the same day shortly before, remarking, "This means business some day", received); 1898, People v. Decker, 157 N. Y. 186, 51 N. E. 1018 (taking up a revolver, and saying to a wife, "I have your medicine if you do not do as I say", admitted); 1906, People v. Johnson, 185 N. Y. 219, 77 N. E. 1164 (threats five months before, repeated, admitted);
North Carolina: (see citations ante, § 105);
Ohio: 1865, Mimms v. State, 16 Oh. St. 221, 230 (threat to rob A, not admissible to show the killing of A, unless A was both robbed and killed);
Oklahoma: 1912, McDaniel v. State, 8 Okl. Cr. 209, 127 Pac. 358;
Oregon: 1919, State v. Merls, 92 Or. 678, 182 Pac. 153 (homicide of husband by wife; defendant's threats against another member of the family, held inadmissible);
Pennsylvania: 1865, Hopkins v. Com., 50 Pa. 9 (murder; the defendant, a sailor, had been in irons for turbulence; and after being released, and less than an hour before the killing, declared that he would kill somebody before twenty-four hours; admitted, for it was not "necessary that the premeditated malice should have selected its victim"; here the only issue was that of the degree of homicide;) 1882, Abernethy v. Com., 101 Pa. 322, 324, 328 (threats to kill "somebody", admissible: but here they were followed by a specifying of a third person, and hence were held improperly considered); 1918, Com. v. Delfino, 259 Pa. 272, 102 Atl. 949 (murder; threats more than two years before, admitted);
South Dakota: 1895, State v. Isaacson, 8 S. D. 69, 65 N. W. 430 (charge of poisoning a horse: threats during the preceding year to kill animals of that person admitted);
Tennessee: 1844, Kinchelow v. State, 5 Humph. 9, 12 (larceny of a bag of flour, a proposal of the defendant to the witness, on the night of the larceny, to "join him in various schemes of forgery, larceny, kidnapping, etc." excluded);
Texas: 1892, Massey v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. 371, 379, 20 S. W. 758 (declaration that he intended to rape some person, admitted); 1898, Holley v. State, 39 Tex. Cr. 301, 46 S. W. 39 (threats not directed to deceased by name, inadmissible, unless otherwise shown to have signified or included him); 1914, Hiles v. State, 73 Tex. Cr. 17, 163 S. W. 717 (murder); 1921, Green v. State, 90 Tex. Cr. 149, 233 S. W. 962 ("You come over Sunday and we will beat hell out of him", admitted);
Utah: 1911, State v. Vacos, 40 Utah 169, 120 Pac. 497 ("I will get him to-night", admitted);
Vermont: 1878, State v. Smalley, 50 Vt. 736, 738, 749 (arson of the defendant's own house, to defraud the insurer; evidence of threats to be revenged on other persons, rejected, though the houses of the others had also been burned);
Virginia: 1910, Hardy v. Com., 110 Va. 910, 67 S. E. 522;
Washington: 1902, State v. Gates, 28 Wash. 689, 69 Par. 385 (general threats against any person running into defendant's fishing net, admitted);
Wisconsin: 1861, Benedict v. State, 14 Wis. 423 (murder; threats that a knife exhibited by him "would probably be the death of some person before the week was out", and the like, admitted; "such declarations . . . are not to be excluded because they are general, or because the accused did not choose fully to divulge his plans").

Compare, with the above cases, those cited post, §§ 363, 396 (intent or motive from conduct) where other principles may lead to different results; and also the cases cited post, § 237, especially n. 7, "Evidence of Design or Plan."

The following ruling is unique: 1907, Conklin v. Consolidated R. Co., 196 Mass. 302, 82 N. E. 23 (assault by a car-conductor on a passenger; to show that the conductor began the affray, the conductor's statement, shortly before, that he would "assault some one on the car before he got through", was excluded; the opinion concedes its relevancy, but tion to the doing of an act. The precedents under both heads may be concerned.

§ 107. Same: Conditional Threats. It has been pointed out (ante, § 103) that the probative value of a design involves some notion of positiveness or absoluteness. The mere fact, however, that it is expressed in the alternative or with a condition or contingency does not destroy its probative value; but the intervening fulfillment of the condition should ordinarily be shown, if it occurred.[1]

§ 108. Same: Time of Threats. The element of fixedness is lacking, and the probative value disappears, if the threats were made at such a time anterior that the design cannot possibly be supposed to have continued throughout the interval. But no mere distance of time in itself should make the threats irrelevant. A design once formed may continue.[1] The defendant excludes it because it did not satisfy the rule for agents' admissions; this perverse ruling is calculated to shake one's faith in the possibility of ever improving our law of evidence, for it ignores the simple and fundamental principle of multiple relevancy, ante, § 13).

§ 107. [1] Ala. 1881, Redd v. State, 68 Ala. 492, 496 (Brickell, C. J.: "Whatever may be its force, whether absolute or conditional, whether it indicates a purpose only contemplated or fully matured, it is admissible"); Ark. 1896, Phillips v. State, 62 Ark. 119, 34 S. W. 539 (that he "would make his wife come back home to him or beat her to death", admitted); Ga. 1878, Everett v. State, 62 Ga. 65, 70 (murder of a paramour; threats three years before that he would kill her before any other man should have her, admitted); Ky. 1902, Abbott v. Com., — Ky. —, 68 S. W. 124 (murder of a brother-in-law the day after his marriage; defendant's threats, a year before, to kill the deceased if he married the former's sister, admitted); Mass. 1896, Com. v. Crowe, 165 Mass. 139, 42 N. E. 563 (threat to burn the building "unless his mother got something out of the property", admitted, though she did get something out of the property); Mo. 1882, State v. Johnson, 76 Mo. 121, 124 (threat "to fix him if he fooled with him", admitted); State v. Adams, 76 Mo. 357 (similar); 1883, Carver v. Huskey, 79 Mo. 509 ("if they hunted in that neighborhood with hounds, he would kill them", admitted); Mont. 1899, State v. Sloan, 22 Mont. 293, 56 Pac. 364 (conditional threats, admitted); Pa. 1898, Com. v. Farrell, 187 Pa. 408, 41 Atl. 382 (defendant "swore he would get B.'s money, if he had to kill the old man to do so"; not admitted as evidence of defendant's robbery and murder of B., because "there is no legal presumption that such a threat will be executed"; a ruling supremely ridiculous); Vt. 1892, State v. Bradley, 64 Vt. 468, 470, 24 Atl. 1053 (murder of a paramour; threats six or eight months before, to kill her if she left him, admitted, "proof tending to show that the condition had transpired having been introduced"); 1895, State v. Bradley, 67 Vt. 465, 32 Atl. 240 (threats to kill under certain circumstances, admitted); 1911, State v. Averill, 85 Vt. 115, 81 Atl. 461 (murder); Va. 1910, Hardy v. Com., 110 Va. 910, 67 S. E. 522.

§ 108. [1] Alabama: 1881, Redd v. State, 68 Ala. 492 (see quotation supra); 1889, Barnes v. State, 88 Ala. 204, 207, 7 So. 38 (rape; expressions, uttered three months before, admitted); California: 1867, People v. Cronin, 34 Cal. 190, 200, 205 (lapse of time affects weight only; threats to kill, made nearly a year before, admitted); 1882, People v. Hong Ah Duck, 61 Cal. 387 (same principle; here threats to kill, made about a month before, were admitted); Columbia (Dist.): 1880, U. S. v. Neverson, 1 Mackie, D. C. 152, 169 (admitting threats made the summer before a killing in January); Florida: 1903, Johns v. State, 46 Fla. 157, 35 So. 71 (threats three weeks before, admitted); Georgia: 1896, McDaniel v. State, 100 Ga. 67, 27 S. E. 158 (threats "a considerable period beforehand", admitted); Kentucky: 1902, Abbott v. Com., — Ky. —, 68 S. W. 124 (threats a year before, admitted); Massachusetts: 1859, Com. v. Goodwin, 14 Gray 55 (arson; threats of revenge one or two years before, admitted; admissibility "would not be affected" by "the length of time which intervened"); 1890, Com. v. Quinn, 150 Mass. 401, 23 N. E. 54 (arson; threats three years before; admitted in trial Court's discretion); 1892, Com. v. Holmes, 157 Mass. 233, 239, 32 N. E. 6 (wife-murder; threats at various times during nine years, admitted; their "remoteness" "was for the Court, in the exercise of its discretion"); 1896, Com. v. Crowe, 165 Mass. 139, 42 N. E. 563 (a threat fourteen months before, admitted, the ill-feeling having continued); 1900, Com. v. Corkery, 175 Mass. 460, 56 N. E. 711 (larceny; declarations three months before, admitted); Minnesota: 1896, Hale v. Life Ins. Co., 65 may use the lapse of time as a circumstance explaining away the significance of the threats by indicating the probable abandonment of the design:

1881, BRICKELL, C. J., in Redd v. State, 68 Ala. 492, 496 (murder of a paramour; threats made two years before were admitted): "The length of time elapsing between the making of the threat and the criminal act, when the crime is to be proved only by circumstantial evidence, is of importance in determining the weight to be accorded to it. . . . If a long period intervenes, during which there were opportunities of doing the threatened injury, and there was no attempt to do it, and no repetition of the threat, it would be but a slight circumstance in connecting the accused with the injury, and there would be more reason for regarding it as having been a mere careless, thoughtless utterance, or idle bravado, or ebullition of temporary passion. The length of time would impair its probative force, but would not render it inadmissible. So the probative force of the threat would be increased if it was frequently repeated during the whole time intervening . . . and the same cause for ill-will and hate continued to exist; then it could be imputed to a malignant spirit, and a purpose that may have been vacillating but at last became fixed and settled."

1896, START, C. J., in Hale v. Life Ins. Co., 65 Minn. 548, 68 N. W. 182 (in an action on an insurance policy, excluding threats of the deceased to commit suicide): "The declarations must, in order to be admissible in evidence, bear a reasonably close relation, in point of time, to the alleged act. The reason for the rule suggests and enforces the necessity of this relation between the declaration of the party and the doing of the alleged act by him. They must be so near in point of time as to justify a reasonable probability, in connection with the other evidence in the case, that the party in fact carried his declared intention into execution. No definite rule applicable to all cases can be laid down as to when, and when not, such declarations will be received. It is a matter largely in the sound discretion of the trial Court in each particular case."

§ 109. Same: Explaining away Threats. Under the principle of Explanation (ante, § 34), the defendant may of course attempt to explain away the design-evidence. Thus, he may show that the lapse of time probably led to the abandonment of the design; or that it did not apply to the act charged; or that it was otherwise without real significance.[1]

§ 110. Uncommunicated Threats by the Deceased against one charged with Homicide; General Principle. Where on a charge of homicide the excuse is self-defence, and the controversy is whether the deceased was the aggressor, the deceased's threats against the accused are relevant. The deceased's design to do violence upon the defendant is of some value to show

Minn. 548, 68 N. W. 182 (see quotation supra); Missouri: 1882, State v. Adams, 76 Mo. 357 (lapse of time held immaterial; followed in later cases); 1883, State v. Grant, 79 Mo. 137; 1883, Carver v. Huskey, 79 Mo. 509; 1885, State v. McNally, 87 Mo. 650; 1897, State v. Wright, 141 Mo. 333, 42 S. W. 934; 1905, State v. Coleman, 186 Mo. 151, 84 S. W. 978 (threats eighteen months before, admitted); Montana: 1889, Terr. v. Roberts, 9 Mont. 12, 14, 22 Pac. 132 (threats about two months before the shooting, admitted; "mere lapse of time does not exclude" such evidence); New Hampshire: 1898, State v. Davis, 69 N. H. 350, 41 Atl. 267 (discretion of trial Court controls); North Carolina: 1905, State v. Exum, 138 N. C. 599, 50 S. E. 283 (threats nine months before, admitted); 1916, State v. Merrick, 172 N. C. 870, 90 S. E. 257 (murder; threats made "within 6 or 12 months", admitted); Vermont: 1892, State v. Bradley, 64 Vt. 466, 470, 24 Atl. 1053 (murder; threats of six or eight months before, admitted; time goes "not to the admissibility but to the weight").

§ 109. [1] 1855, Atkins v. State, 16 Ark. 581 (explanation of circumstances under which threats to kill were uttered by defendant); 1846, State v. Duncan, 6 Ired. N. C. 236, 239 (evidence that the defendant was accustomed when angry to make threats of violence without carrying them out, excluded; unsound).

that on the occasion in question he did carry out, or attempt to carry out, his design. Moreover, it is the fact of his design, irrespective of its communication to the defendant, that is evidential:

1860, BALDWIN, J., in People v. Arnold, 15 Cal. 481: "[The defendant urged] that this assault was not made by him, but that it was made by Sweeney [the deceased]; and to prove this, he proposed to show that Sweeney had armed himself with this pistol, that he had borrowed it, and that it was found at the place of the rencounter. He was permitted to show these facts, but he proposed to show a further fact, and that was that, at the time of Sweeney's getting the pistol, he declared what he meant to do with it. . . . This leads to the inquiry, whether the fact that A procures a weapon for a particular purpose conduces at all to show, in a question of conflicting proofs as to the manner in which he used it, what that manner was. We apprehend that if a man goes into a house, borrows a gun, goes out with it, saying that he means to use it on another, and a rencounter happens between him and that other, and the witnesses who see the difficulty differ, or the circumstances are equivocal, as to which one of the two commences the affray, that some light might be thrown upon this question, conducing to or towards its solution, by the proof of these facts as to A's procuring it and his motives in doing so. The jury might possibly, with some reason, conclude that as the weapon was procured for this purpose of assault on another, that purpose was fulfilled; that the assault, in other words, was made in pursuance of the intended purpose when the weapon was procured, and especially if other facts in corroboration of this conclusion existed. It is true there would be nothing conclusive in this. But the fact of the conclusiveness of this proof to establish the proposition which it is introduced to prove is not the decisive question; that question is, whether this item of fact be matter proper to be considered by the jury in arriving at their conclusion upon this mooted point. And we have no doubt that it is."

1873, GROVER, J., in Stokes v. People, 53 N. Y. 174: "[Why are such threats if communicated admissible?] For the reason that threats made would show an attempt to execute them probable,when an opportunity occurred, and the more ready belief of the accused would be justified to the precise extent of this probability. But an attempt to execute threats is equally probable, when not communicated to the party threatened, as when they are so; and when, as in this case [of self-defence alleged] the question is whether the attempt was in fact made, we can see no reason for excluding them in the former that would not be equally cogent for the exclusion of the latter."

1892, RANEY, C. J., in Wilson v. State, 30 Fla. 242, 11 So. 556: "The principle of the admission of threats under such circumstances is that they tend to show that it was the intention of the deceased at the time of the meeting to attack the accused, or that he was seeking the latter's life, and hence they tend to prove that the former brought on the conflict, and consequently are relevant evidence. The philosophy of the matter is that where there has been an encounter, and it is not shown by direct evidence who was the assailant, threats of an intention to assail are some evidence of an assault having been made by the one who made the threats."

§ 111. Same: Discriminations and Limitations. This evidence is now conceded to be admissible, by virtually all Courts.[1] But the following discriminations must be noted:

§ 111. [1] The rulings in the various jurisdictions are as follows:
Federal: 1876, Wiggins v. Utah, 93 U. S. 465 (the question who fired the first shot being in dispute, held that on the evidence the trial judge improperly treated the defendant's aggression as being beyond doubt, and therefore wrongly excluded the evidence of the threats of the deceased; Clifford, J., dissents, apparently only because there was no evidence rendering the defendant's aggression doubtful); 1895, Allison v. U. S., 160 U. S. 203, 16 Sup. 252 (admissible where there is a doubt); 1915, Trapp v. Terr., 8th C. C. A., 225 Fed. 968

(1) The use of communicated threats to show the defendant's apprehension of violence is to be distinguished (post, § 247), because the principle is different and does not need the limitations of the present doctrine.

1889, LUCAS, J., in State v. Evans, 33 W. Va. 426, 10 S. E. 792: "Evidence of communicated threats is intended to shed light upon the mental attitude of the prisoner towards the deceased when the homicide occurred; uncommunicated threats are evidence of the mental attitude of the deceased towards the prisoner."

(murder of M.; threats of M. against defendant's father, not communicated to defendant, held admissible on the present principle, defendant being at the time at home with his father); Alabama: 1851, Powell v. State, 19 Ala. 577, 581 (a suggestion that there might be a proper use for uncommunicated threats); 1853, Carroll v. State, 23 Ala. 37 (threats two weeks before offered "to show the character of the conduct of the deceased" in his trespass; excluded, because the deceased actually used no violence, and because the threats should be nearer in time to the affray, and be part of the 'res gestæ'); 1873, Burns v. State, 43 Ala. 374 (threats uncommunicated are admissible when they "form part of the 'res gestæ'", on the theory that they "show the mental status of the deceased and his motive in going" to the place, and thus they "may enable the jury to determine who was the aggressor"; here threats made the same afternoon were received, and threats made the day before were rejected); 1880, Roberts v. State, 68 Ala. 163 (repudiating former limitations; the essential condition is that "the deceased had sought a conflict with the accused, or was making some demonstration, or overt act of attack" at the time of the killing; if so, "uncommunicated threats, recently made, are admissible for the purpose of showing the 'quo animo' of such demonstration or attack", or for "corroborating those that are communicated", or, where the aggressor is doubtful, "to show who was probably the first assailant"); 1881, Green v. State, 69 Ala. 7 (preceding case affirmed); 1896, Gunter v. State, 111 Ala. 23, 20 So. 632 (admitted); 1899, Henson v. State, 120 Ala. 316, 25 So. 23 (mere general threat, not applying to defendant, excluded);

Arkansas: 1855, Atkins v. State, 16 Ark. 568, 584 (present principle not considered); 1859, Coker v. State, 20 Ark. 53, 55 (same); 1860, Pitman v. State, 22 Ark. 353, 356 (recognizing the present principle, and admitting uncommunicated threats made on the day of the killing, as manifesting "the use he [the deceased] intended to make of the pistol, etc.", "the motive that was taking him to G.", and "his hostile feelings" towards the defendant); 1879, Harris v. State, 34 Ark. 469, 472 (no rule attempted, but the preceding case approved; the deceased's non-aggression being clearly shown, the threats were rejected); 1904, Lee v. State, 72 Ark. 436, 81 S. W. 385;

California: 1860, People v. Arnold, 15 Cal. 476, 481 (admitted; but semble only where the evidence was conflicting as to the aggressor); 1869, People v. Scoggins, 37 Cal. 676, 684, 696 (admitted, where there is other evidence — no definite measure being given — that the deceased was the aggressor); 1880, People v. Alivtre, 55 Cal. 263 (the preceding cases approved; no specific rule laid down); 1880, People v. Travis, 56 Cal. 251, 253 (threats admissible, semble; no authorities cited); 1880, People v. Carlton, 57 Cal. 83 (following Arnold's Case); 1906, People v. Lamar, 148 Cal. 564, 83 Pac. 993;

Colorado: 1878, Davidson v. People, 4 Colo. 145 (former threat admitted "to show that at the time of the meeting the deceased was seeking the defendant's life"; here, in view of the existence of a long-standing feud and of threats at the time); 1889, Babcock v. People, 13 Colo. 515, 521, 29 Pac. 817 (length of time does not exclude; here, a year before);

Delaware: 1905, State v. Powell, 5 Penn. Del. 24, 61 Atl. 966 (murder with a knife; the deceased's admissions that she had poisoned the defendant's coffee, and was going to kill the defendant, admitted);

Florida: 1886, Bond v. State, 21 Fla. 738, 751 (admissible when so near the time of the killing as to be part of the transaction, or when the question of the aggression "is in any manner of doubt"); 1891, Garner v. State, 28 Fla. 113, 133, 9 So. 835 (same); 1892, Wilson v. State, 30 Fla. 234, 242, 11 So. 556 (same); 1894, Steele v. State, 33 Fla. 348, 350, 14 So. 841, semble (same); 1896, Lester v. State, 37 Fla. 382, 20 So. 232 (as showing that "the deceased was shot while he was in the act of endeavoring to carry out the threat"); 1903, Fields v. State, 46 Fla. 84, 35 So. 185 (threats, and the habit of going armed, admissible, where there is "doubt as to who began the difficulty");

Georgia: 1846, Reynolds v. State, 1 Kelly, 222, 230, semble (admitting evidence that the deceased had armed himself just before the affray); 1848, Monroe v. State, 5 Ga. 85, 138, semble (self-defence; admitted to show "the state of feeling of the parties towards each other at the time of the act"); 1855, Haynes v. State, 17 Ga. 465, 482 (self-defence; "It is important to ascertain the temper and conduct of the parties, to determine who was most likely to have brought about the emergency";

Nevertheless, as so few Courts in the beginning perceived the present use of threats, it was natural that some confusion should arise in the process of establishing the distinction, especially through the erroneous application of rulings from other jurisdictions. The distinction itself rests on the same principle as that between character used to show the probability of the deceased's act, and communicated character used to show the defendant's apprehensions (ante, § 63). Occasionally a Court still applies the same tests to both uses, communicated and uncommunicated; but the distinctness of the two uses is now generally understood. — The use of the deceased's expressions as evidence of prior ill-feeling or malice should also be here distinguished (post, § 396).

admitting threats); 1855, Keener v. State, 18 Ga. 194, 224, 228 (admitting evidence of threats to show the deceased's "evil intent" in going to where the defendant was; "remoteness or nearness of time" is immaterial as to admissibility); 1858, Hawkins v. State, 25 Ga. 207, 210 (the deceased's prior design to kill the defendant, excluded, the deceased being unarmed at the time of the killing); 1859, Lingo v. State, 29 Ga. 470, 483 (the doctrine ignored); 1869, Hoye v. State, 39 Ga. 718, 722 (Keener's Case held not applicable, as the deceased was unarmed at the time of the killing; prior threats excluded); 1871, Pound v. State, 43 Ga. 88, 129 (what the deceased said when taking an axe to the field; admissible according to circumstances); 1873, Peterson v. State, 50 Ga. 142 (recognizing Keener's Case, but regarding it as not to be extended); 1891, Vaughn v. State, 88 Ga. 731, 736, 16 S. E. 64 (excluded, where there was no hostile conduct at the time; the defendant's unsworn statement not sufficient to lay this foundation); 1892, May v. State, 90 Ga. 793, 797, 17 S. E. 108 (admitted where the aggressor was in doubt, Keener's Case approved; Vaughan's Case distinguished); 1893, Pittman v. State, 92 Ga. 480, 17 S. E. 856 (preceding case approved); 1904, McKinney v. Carmack, 119 Ga. 467, 46 S. E. 719 (rule applied); 1906, Warrick v. State, 125 Ga. 133, 53 S. E. 1027 (prior cases reviewed, and the ruling in McKinney v. Carmack approved "as stating both the general rule . . . and the exceptional instance"); 1910, Rouse v. State, 135 Ga. 227, 69 S. E. 180;

Illinois: 1850, Campbell v. People, 16 Ill. 1 (admitted as furnishing "a reasonable inference that the deceased sought the defendant for the purpose of executing those threats"); 1870, Williams v. People, 54 Ill. 422, 426 (admitted); 1892, Siebert v. People, 143 Ill. 571, 590, 32 N. E. 431 (approving Campbell v. People); 1907, Neathery v. People, 227 Ill. 110, 81 N. E. 16 (admitted);

Indiana: 1871, Holler v. State, 37 Ind. 57, 60; 1881, Combs v. State, 75 Ind. 217 ("they supply grounds for an inference that the deceased was the assailant"); 1891, Bowlus v. State, 130 Ind. 227, 229, 28 N. E. 1115 (no rule particularized); 1898, Ellis v. State, 152 Ind. 326, 52 N. E. 82 (excluded here because there had been no aggression on the defendant); 1908, Duncan v. State, 171 Ind. 444, 86 N. E. 641 (but here excluded because evidence by hearsay only); 1917, Houe v. State, 186 Ind. 139, 115 N. E. 81 (threats of a co-conspirator, excluded for lack of evidence of an overt act);

Indian Terr.: 1899, Helms v. U. S., 2 Ind. T. 595, 52 S. W. 60 (deceased's hostile feelings, admissible, if self-defence is in issue); 1905, Burroughs v. U. S., 6 Ind. T. 164, 90 S. W. 8 (decedent's threats admissible, even where the issue is provocation to manslaughter, and not self-defence);

Iowa: 1875, State v. Woodson, 41 Ia. 428 (left undecided); 1876, State v. Maloy, 44 Ia. 104, 114 (excluded under the other principle, without noticing the present one); 1877, State v. Elliott, 45 Ia. 490 (excluded, unless, semble, the question of self-defence is in issue); 1907, State v. Blee, 133 Ia. 725, 111 N. W. 19 (admissible; "the precise question is now before this Court for the first [!] time"); 1916, State v. Menilla, 177 Ia. 283, 158 N. W. 645 ("age and remoteness of threats bear only upon their probative value, and not upon their admissibility");

Kansas: 1879, State v. Brown, 22 Kan. 222 (admissible when the question of aggression is "in any manner of doubt", or to corroborate communicated threats); 1880, State v. Scott, 24 Kan. 68, 70 (approving State v. Brown); 1890, State v. Spendlove, 44 Kan. 1, 24 Pac. 67 (same);

Kentucky: 1855, Cornelius v. Com., 15 B. Monr. 539, 546 (admissible because "his intention to make an attack on the accused was an important matter, as well as the belief of the existence of such an intention"; also to corroborate the testimony as to communicated threats); 1890, Sparks v. Com., 89 Ky. 644, 20 S. W. 167 (threats by deceased showing his plan of aggression, admitted); 1897, Young v. Com., — Ky. —, 42 S. W.

(2) A necessary condition of relevancy of uncommunicated threats is that the fact of killing is conceded, and is justified as done in self-defence, and that the virtual controversy is whether there was in truth any need for defence, i.e. whether the deceased was the aggressor. This is universally settled, expressly or by implication.

(3) There is much opportunity for abuse of this sort of evidence. Not only may it be manufactured; but, even when genuine, it may be employed improperly to help the defendant by way of justification, — in certain communities at least, where the Courts have been compelled repeatedly to make clear the law that a threat to shoot another is no justification for the latter to kill on sight. For these reasons various limitations have been attempted:

1141 (threats admitted); 1897, Tudor v. Com., — Ky. —, 43 S. W. 187 (doctrine conceded; but where the defendant interfered in a fight between deceased and T., the deceased's threats against D. were excluded); 1901, Hollingsworth v. Warnock, — Ky. —, 65 S. W. 163 (here excluded as too general); 1887, Hart v. Com., 85 Ky. 77, 2 S. W. 673 (uncommunicated threats, admitted); 1905, Wheeler v. Com., 120 Ky. 697, 87 S. W. 1105 (Young v. Com. followed); 1907, Com. v. Thomas, — Ky. —, 104 S. W. 326 (generic threats, admitted); 1921, Duke v. Com., 191 Ky. 138, 229 S. W. 122 (murder of W.; to prove that W. had been convicted of being accessory to shooting the accused; the clerk's testimony to the conviction, and the indictment only without the judgment, were held not sufficient);

Louisiana: 1851, State v. Bradley, 6 La. An. 554, 560 (excluding the evidence as an attempt at a plea of justification); 1869, State v. Gregor, 21 La. An. 475 (excluded, but this principle not considered); 1878, State v. Ryan, 30 La. An. 1177 (excluded; no reason given); 1881, State v. Fisher, 33 La. An. 1344 (same); 1888, State v. Williams, 40 La. An. 168, 170, 3 So. 629 (citing decisions in other jurisdictions, but not the above cases, and admitting the evidence as "corroborating the evidence as to the communicated threats", and "establishing the purpose with which the deceased provoked the rencontre", and "confirming the reality of the danger" apprehended by the defendant); 1892, State v. Walsh, 44 La. An. 1122, 1131, 11 So. 811 (the trial Court's recital as to whether a foundation was laid is conclusive); 1893, State v. Harris, 45 La. An. 842, 845, 13 So. 199 (the rule of the preceding case recognized); 1893, State v. Depass, 45 La. An. 1151, 1152, 14 So. 77 (excluded, because the defendant's aggression was clear; no preceding case cited); 1895, State v. King, 47 La. An. 28, 16 So. 566 (threats offered to show merely "who was the aggressor", excluded, the matter being treated as governed by the overt-act rule of communicated threats, post, § 247, and the Williams Case not being cited); 1896, State v. Compagnet, 48 La. An. 1470, 21 So. 46 (admitted, under the overt-act rule, semble); 1897, State v. Pruett, 49 La. An. 283, 21 Sl. 842 (see § 247, post); 1903, State v. Harrison, 111 La. 304, 35 So. 560 ("some hostile demonstration" must be shown); 1915, State v. Wooten, 136 La. 291, 67 So. 366 (admissible, even though there are eye-witnesses);

Maryland: 1880, Turpin v. State, 55 Md. 462, 473, semble (admissible only in case of doubt as to the aggressor);

Michigan: 1868, People v. Garbutt, 17 Mich. 9, 15 (excluded; obscure); 1878, People v. Lilly, 38 Mich. 277 (preceding deportment admitted as indicating his deportment at the time of the affray); Brownell v. People, 38 Mich. 736, semble (same); 1893, People v. Palmer, 96 id. 580 (admissible; no limitations stated); 1895, People v. Palmer, 105 Mich. 568, 63 N. W. 656 (similar);

Minnesota: 1860, State v. Dumphey, 4 Minn. 438, 449 (uncommunicated threats excluded; the present principle not considered);

Mississippi: 1859, Newcomb v. State, 37 Miss. 383, 400, 404 (uncommunicated threats, excluded, but the present principle not considered); 1877, Johnson v. State, 54 Miss. 430 (the whole subject reviewed in the light of the Wiggin's Case, U. S., supra, and the evidence held admissible only where there is doubt as to who was the aggressor, i.e. ordinarily, when there are no witnesses to the act, but not even then, if a lying-in-wait otherwise appears; the opinion of Chalmers, J., is one of the best on the subject); 1877, Holly v. State, 55 Miss. 424, 428 (citing no precedents, and apparently applying the same rule as for communicated threats, q. v. in § 247, post); Kendrick v. State, 55 Miss. 436, 450 (approving Johnson's Case, and applying the same rule, though with a rider admitting such evidence where "peculiar circumstances" demand it); 1885, Moriarty v. State, 62 Miss. 654, 661 (applying the same rule, apparently, as in the case of communicated threats, q. v., in § 247, post); 1896, Prine v. State, 73 Miss. 838, 19 So. 711 (admitted, under the rule of Johnson's Case); 1906, Brown v. State, 88 Miss. 166, 40 So. 737

(a) The evidence of threat is inadmissible where there is clear evidence that the defendant was the aggressor. Most jurisdictions adopt this rule, and none seem to negative it. (b) Furthermore, the threat is only admissible (as most Courts provide) where there is some other evidence of an aggression by the deceased. This is usually expressed by saying that there must have been some "demonstration of hostility", or, more shortly, some "overt act", by the deceased. It is difficult to say whether this limitation originated in the 'res gestæ' notion (infra) or in a rule of criminal law that an overt act is a necessary element of the justification of self-defence, or merely in a general policy of preventing the abuse of this evidence. At any rate, it seems a satisfactory limitation, provided the multiplication of quibbles as to "overt acts" is avoided by leaving the whole matter in the hands of the trial judge; for it prevents the defendant from trying to use the threats as a mere pretext

(prior threats, and details of prior quarrels, admissible, following Holly's Case, supra; the majority opinion, however, errs on another point, noted post, § 396); 1911, Echols v. State, 99 Miss. 683, 55 So. 485;
Missouri: 1871, State v. Sloan, 47 Mo. 604, 609 (admitted, in effect overruling McMillen v. State, 1850, 13 Mo. 30); 1876, State v. Elkins, 63 Mo. 159, 164 (admitted in doubtful cases, where the issue is self-defence); 1877, State v. Taylor, 64 Mo. 358, 361 (excluded, because no question of self-defence arose); State v. Brown, 64 Mo. 367, 375 (admitted); 1877, State v. Alexander, 66 Mo. 148, 161 (admissible where there is "evidence tending to show" the deceased to be the aggressor; "unless an attempt be made to execute the threat", it is irrelevant); 1879, State v. Guy, 69 Mo. 435 (excluded; obscure); 1882, State v. Eaton, 75 Mo. 586, 590 (admitted, semble); 1885, State v. McNally, 87 Mo. 650 (threats received); 1886, State v. Rider, 90 Mo. 54, 60, 1 S. W. 825 (admitting threats without restriction, to determine who was the assailant, but pointing out that they constitute no legal justification without an overt act); 1888, State v. Rider, 95 Mo. 476, 484, 8 S. W. 723 (threats apparently usable to show whether the deceased did make the first assault, and the requirement that there must be other evidence of aggression apparently repudiated); 1897, State v. Thomas, 138 Mo. 168, 39 S. W. 459, semble (inadmissible, where no other evidence of aggression is offered); 1898, State v. Hopper, 142 Mo. 478, 44 S. W. 272 (the vagueness of the threat held here to affect its weight only); 1901, State v. Smith, 164 Mo. 567, 65 S. W. 270 (admissible only "in case the evidence leaves a doubt as to whether the defendant or the deceased was the aggressor"); 1907, State v. Kelleher, 201 Mo. 614, 100 S. W. 470 (admissible); 1910, State v. Sovern, 225 Mo. 580, 125 S. W. 769 (instructions discussed);
Montana: 1901, State v. Shadwell, 26 Mont. 52, 66 Pac. 508 (threats held admissible; overt-act rule defined in detail); 1903, State v. Felker, 27 Mont. 451, 71 Pac. 668 (prior threats admitted; no definite rule stated);
New Jersey: 1824, State v. Zellers, 7 N. J. L. 237 (excluded; the point apparently not considered); 1907, State v. Scaduto, 74 N. J. L. 289, 65 Atl. 908 (uncommunicated threats held admissible if "there was an overt act of attack" and "the defendant at the time of the collision was in imminent danger"; the latter clause is hardly required; State v. Zellers practically repudiated, though not cited);
New Mexico: 1911, Terr. v. Trapp, 16 N. M. 700, 120 Pac. 702 (there must be other evidence of aggression);
New York: 1873, Stokes v. People, 53 N. Y. 174 (see quotation supra);
North Carolina: 1877, State v. Turpin, 77 N. C. 473, 479 (admitted as tending to show prior attack, the evidence being wholly circumstantial; also as corroborating communicated threats); 1882, State v. Skidmore, 87 N. C. 509, 511, 512 (mayhem; self-defence in issue; threats of the prosecutor, two weeks before, excluded; citing only State v. Norton, ante, § 105); 1897, State v. Byrd, 121 N. C. 684, 28 S. E. 353 (admissible only where the evidence of the killing is wholly circumstantial; opinion obscure); 1911, State v. Baldwin, 155 N. C. 494, 71 S. E. 212 (admitted); 1920, State v. Hines, 179 N. C. 758, 103 S. E. 374 (inadmissible, when offered "only to show self-defence"; citing State v. Blackwell, ante, § 63, and State v. Byrd, supra);
Ohio: 1850, Stewart v. State, 19 Oh. 302 (admitted);
Oklahoma: 1910, Saunders v. State, 4 Okl. Cr. 264, 111 Pac. 965 (above doctrine approved); 1921, Agent v. State, — Okl. Cr. —, 194 Pac. 233 (murder of W., the defendant asserted that he mistook W. for S. who had threatened him; uncommunicated threats of S., excluded); Oregon: 1894, State v. Tarter, 26 Or. 38, 41, 37 Pac. 53 (admissible where self-defence is in issue; also to corroborate communicated threats; also where the aggressor is doubtful for justifying the killing of one who was making no actual attempt to injure him. (c) Another condition, sometimes suggested, but inconsistent with and more stringent than the preceding one, is that the threat should be received only when there is no other direct evidence as to who was the aggressor, i.e. when there were no eye-witnesses. Perhaps in practice a combination of (b) and (c) would be the best; i.e. to admit the evidence when by eye-witnesses there was some other evidence of the deceased's aggression, or when there were no eye-witnesses to the affair.

(4) Another and additional use, independent of the preceding, receives the uncommunicated threat in "confirmation" or " corroboration " of communicated threats. This is usually coupled with one of the preceding limitations as an alternative condition of admission.

(5) The doctrine of 'res gestæ' is sometimes appealed to as the ground of receiving the evidence; and the same notion underlies the occasional suggestion that the threats " characterize " the deceased's conduct. This employment of 'res gestæ' as a veil for obscurity of thought is elsewhere examined (post, § 1795); and it is enough here to say that it has no possible application to this kind of evidence, and cannot be made to fit its rules; the sooner such phrases are abandoned, the better for clearness of legal thought.

(6) In some jurisdictions it is impossible to ascertain the exact rule. Previous precedents are ignored, inconsistent tests laid down in succeeding rulings, decisions in other jurisdictions are cited to the exclusion of local precedents; and the oftener the matter comes up for a ruling, the more it is obscured.

on the evidence); 1907, State v. Thompson, 49 Or. 46, 88 Pac. 583 (uncommunicated threats, admissible);
Pennsylvania: 1881, Nevling v. Com., 98 Pa. 322, 337 (point not raised);
South Carolina: 1890, State v. Bodie, 33 S. C. 130, 11 S. E. 624 ("there may be cases in which uncommunicated threats might be competent"); 1895, State v. Faile, 43 S. C. 52, 20 S. E. 798 (admissible; but, semble, there must be other evidence of the deceased's aggression); 1907, State v. Emerson, 78 S. C. 83, 58 S. E. 974 (murder of a woman's father; whether the deceased knew of illicit relations between defendant and the woman, excluded);
Tennessee: 1846, Copeland v. State, 7 Humph. 479, 495 (the deceased's threats were treated by the Court as throwing light on the question of her aggression; no objection of law had been raised); 1872, Williams v. State, 3 Heisk. 376, 396 (the deceased's threats were treated as indicating that he was the aggressor; no objection of law having been made);
Texas: 1920, Ott v. State, — Tex. —, 222 S. W. 261 (murder of husband by wife; plea, self-defence; husband's uncommunicated threat, admitted); 1921, Watt v. State, 90 Tex. Cr. 403, 235 S. W. 888 (murder; uncommunicated threats of deceased, admitted; affirming Stewart v. State, 36 Tex. Cr. 130, 35 S. W. 985);
Vermont: 1847, State v. Goodrich, 19 Vt. 116, 120, semble (self-defence; a declaration of the injured person, while on his way to the defendant's house, that he wanted some powder to blow it up, admitted);
Washington: 1888, White v. Terr., 3 Wash. T. 397, 403, 19 Pac. 37 ("admissible in all cases, whether or not the deceased was the first assailant and whether or not the deceased" made a demonstration at the time of the killing); 1896, State v. Cushing, 14 Wash. 527, 45 Pac. 45 (approving the preceding); 1897, State v. Cushing, 17 Wash. 544, 50 Pac. 512, semble (excluded);
West Virginia: 1875, State v. Abbott, 8 W. Va. 743 (admissible to show the deceased's state of mind, but only after communicated threats have been shown); 1889, State v. Evans, 33 W. Va. 417, 425, 10 S. E. 792 (same); 1906, State v. Trail, 59 W. Va. 175, 53 S. E. 17 (murder of B.; B.'s prior declaration that he was going to defendant's to debauch his daughter if he could get defendant drunk, excluded, not being communicated to defendant; Sanders, J., diss. and properly). 1921, State v. Arrington, 88 W. Va. 152, 106 S. E. 445 (murder; uncommunicated threats admitted, to show deceased's aggression).

(7) The prosecution may of course rebut the evidence of threats by counter-testimony of the deceased's peaceful plans.[2] It would seem also that, whenever the deceased's aggression is in issue, the prosecution could begin with its evidence of peaceful plans.

(8) There may be sundry other cases in which the threats of a deceased person would be relevant apart from the present doctrines.[3]

(9) The threats of a third person may also be admitted, where it is desired to show that he, and not the accused, was the aggressor.[4]

(10) In other issues in which the aggression of the plaintiff or prosecuting witness is material, his threats are admissible on the foregoing principles.[5]

§ 112. Plans and Intentions as to Wills, Contracts, Deeds. Where the issue is whether a will was executed, or whether a will was revoked, or whether a will was made in a certain tenor or provision (as where an alteration is at issue), the plan or design or prior intention of the testator is relevant to show the doing or not doing of this alleged act, as of any other act. The argument is, "Because he planned to make a will, or planned to revoke a will, or planned to will property to A, therefore he probably carried out this plan." The relevancy of such a plan is well established:[1]

[2] 1880, People v. Carlton, 57 Cal. 83, 85; 1891, People v. Powell, 87 Cal. 348, 362, 25 Pac. 481 (the deceased's declarations that he had no arms; his habit of not carrying them; and his refusal to carry them, excluded); 1904, Taylor v. State, 121 Ga. 348, 49 S. E. 303; 1899, State v. Chaffin, 56 S. C. 431, 33 S. E. 454 (deceased's expressions negativing hostile intent, admissible in rebuttal); Contra: 1920, People v. Wansker, App. Term, 181 N. Y. Suppl. 783 (homicide by a woman; defence that the deceased, her landlord, was attempting rape; in rebuttal, the deceased's statement that he was afraid the defendant would "frame up" something on him, and his request to T. to come and stay with him while defendant was there, excluded; erroneous; this evidence directly rebutted the state of mind suggested by defendant's evidence; such a ruling would choke off the vindication of any innocent deceased and virtually would assist "frame-ups" by professional criminals); 1919, Lopez v. State, 85 Tex. Cr. App. 402, 212 S. W. 954 (deceased's intention to rendezvous with his wife, not admitted as explaining his presence to be due to this plea and not to his former threats to kill defendant, excluded; unsound; a good example of the artificial strait-jacket method of criminal trial favored by some courts).

[3] 1854, Com. v. Wilson, 1 Gray Mass. 339 (where the defendant claimed to have done the killing under an insane delusion that the deceased was conspiring against him, the deceased's uncommunicated hostile expressions were admitted for the State, to show that there was real ground for the defendant's feeling and that it was no insane delusion). Compare § 231, post (insanity evidenced by conduct).

[4] 1905, State v. Gaylord, 70 S. C. 415, 50 S. E. 20; and compare the cases cited post, § 140.

[5] 1905, State v. Atkins, 77 Vt. 215, 59 Atl. 826 (breach of the peace by intentional collision; the prosecuting witness' threats of running into the defendant, admitted, to show aggression).

§ 112. [1] Accord: ENGLAND: 1873, Keen v. Keen, L. R. 3 P. & D. 107 (Hannen, J.: "[A statement by the testator as to his alteration of mind tends to show] intention, from which the fact of destruction may be inferred, there being other circumstances leading to the same conclusion"); 1877, Dench v. Dench, L. R. 2 P. D. 60, 64 (to determine whether an alteration favoring H. D. was made before execution, prior declarations in H. D.'s favor were received); 1880, Gould v. Lakes, L. R. 6 P. D. 1 (Hannen, J.: "In considering whether or no several pieces of paper constitute the will, evidence would be admissible to show that it was the intention of the testator to make dispositions in conformity with those which are found upon the several sheets of paper. . . . The question of law would not be different if the suggestion were that the first sheet was a forgery or an interpolation by somebody after the event"; following Sugden v. St. Leonards); and the cases quoted in the text.

UNITED STATES: Connecticut: 1905, Spencer's Appeal, 77 Conn. 638, 60 Atl. 289 (revocation; general principle stated); Delaware: 1855, Davis v. Rogers, 1 Houst. 44, 74, 93 (the testator was said to be blind, and his intelligent execution was denied; his previous expressions

1851, Lord CAMPBELL, C. J., in Doe v. Palmer, 16 Q. B. 747 (issue whether an alteration in a will was made by the testator before or after execution): "[We may consider] whether if in a will which is not in the handwriting of the testator an alteration appears, evidence might be received of previous declarations by him that he intended to dispose of the property in the manner in which it is disposed of by the will in its altered form. If the draft of the will could be produced, corresponding with the will in its altered form, would it not be admissible evidence, and might not the jury infer from it that before the will was executed the draft and the will had been compared and the mistake rectified? Would not written or verbal instructions from the testator to his solicitor to draw the will in the altered form be equally admissible? In what respect do such verbal instructions differ, for this purpose, from a contemporaneous declaration by the testator to another person that he had determined in his will to dispose of his property in the manner carried into effect by the will as altered? . . . It would not be very creditable to the law if such evidence were to be excluded, as a legal inference might be fairly drawn from it respecting of intention, instructions, and depositions, admitted to show his state of mind when signing); Kentucky: 1922, Atherton v. Gaslin, 194 Ky. 460, 239 S. W. 771 (forgery of a will; testator's prior declarations of intention received; citing with approval the text above, and declining to follow Throckmorton v. Holt, U. S.); Maryland: 1883, Hoppe v. Byers, 60 Md. 393 (intention before the execution of a will to make one of a certain tenor, held admissible to show that a document offered as a will is genuine and not forged, when other evidence of genuineness is also offered; following Sugden v. St. Leonards, and Gould v. Lakes); Massachusetts: 1862, Converse v. Allen, 4 All. 512 (to show that the omission as legatees of children born illegitimate, was not accidental, previous declarations of intention were admitted; Bigelow, C. J.: "They tended to prove that [the testator] had then a fixed design in regard to the disposition of the estate, by which the appellants would be excluded from any share therein"); 1900, Wilton v. Humphreys, 176 Mass. 253, 57 N. E. 374 (whether a marginal addition to a codicil in different ink, the codicil reciting a part of the prior will, was there before execution; the testator's oral statement of the terms of the part thus recited, made two weeks before, held properly excluded in the trial Court's discretion, the will itself being in the testator's possession at the time of executing the codicil, and the prior declaration being therefore of little value on the facts); 1913, Aldrich v. Aldrich, 215 Mass. 164, 102 N. E. 487 (intent to revoke; compare the citations post, § 1737, n. 3); Michigan: 1882, Hope's Appeal, 48 Mich. 520, 12 N. W. 682 (plan to change an existing will, admitted as bearing on the execution of an alleged later will); Missouri: 1897, Gordon v. Burris, 141 Mo. 602, 43 S. W. 642 (undue influence; the devisees' plan to prevent the testatrix from leaving property to the plaintiff, admitted); New Jersey: 1910, State v. Ready, 78 N. J. L. 599, 75 Atl. 564 ("whether a person's intention to make a will, or to make a will of a particular purport, can be shown by his antecedent declarations of that intention", answered in the affirmative, "when not too remote to be material"); North Dakota: 1920, Ostlund v. Ecklund, 45 N. D. 76, 176 N. W. 350 (declarations of intention made two hours before signing the will, excluded because the only issue was as to the fulfilment of the formalities of execution); Pennsylvania: 1896, Gardner v. Gardner, 177 Pa. 218, 35 Atl. 558 (testator's plan admitted, as pointing to non-revocation); 1899, Swope v. Donnelly, 190 Pa. 417, 42 Atl. 882 (genuineness of a will; declarations of testamentary intentions at various preceding times, excluded as too vague; opinion ill-considered); S. Dakota: 1920, State v. Nieuwenhuis, 43 S. D. 198, 178 N. W. 976 (forgery of will; prior expression of intention to make such a will, admitted); Texas: 1879, Johnson v. Brown, 51 Tex. 80 (testator's declarations admitted, on the question of a will's genuineness).

The only case ever intimating the contrary seems to be: 1901, Throckmorton v. Holt, 180 U. S. 552, 21 Sup. 474 (excluding ante-testamentary declarations of intention, since "there is no good ground for the distinction" between these and subsequent ones; citing only Stevens v. Vancleve, 4 Wash. C. C. 262, post, § 1738, and making the surprising statement that the "weight of authority" so agrees; the opinion hopelessly ignores the various distinct kinds of testamentary declarations; Harlan, White, and McKenna, JJ., diss.; Brown, J., accord as to the result of the case only). Cited post, § 1734, n. 2. In State v. Ready, N. J. supra, the learned chief justice's statement that on this rule "judicial sentiment is altogether out of harmony" and "courts are divided", is comprehensible only as an expression of delicate consideration for the Federal Supreme Court's lonesome decision of Throckmorton v. Holt; for the fact seems to be that Throckmorton v. Holt is the only case ever decided to the contrary; and the New Jersey opinion itself points out the inadequacy of the citations in Throckmorton v. Holt to sustain its decision.

the priority of two events, that is to say, the making of the alteration and the execution of the will, and I am not aware of any principle, rule of law, decided case, or dictum against the admissibility of such evidence. . . . They demonstrate that the alteration is not an afterthought."

1876, JESSEL, M. R., in Sugden v. St. Leonards, L. R. 1 P. D. 154 (admitting ante-testamentary declarations of a lost will's provisions): "It is not strictly evidence of the contents of the instruments; it is simply evidence of the intention of the person who afterwards executes the instrument. It is simply evidence of probability, — no doubt of a high degree of probability in some cases, and of a low degree of probability in others. The cogency of the evidence depends very much on the nearness in point of time of the declaration of intention to the period of the execution of the document." MELLISH, L. J.: "The declarations of the testator as to what he intended to put in his will, made either contemporaneously with or prior to the execution of his will, are obviously evidence which may corroborate the other testimony as to what is contained in the will, . . . because it is more probable that the testator has than that he has not made a particular devise or a particular bequest when he has told a person previously that he intended to make it, inasmuch as it shows that he had it in his mind to make such a will at the time he made that declaration."

Two other principles are to be discriminated. (1) The admissibility of the expressions or utterances themselves, to evidence the testator's plan, under an exception to the Hearsay rule, is well established, but raises a different question; the distinction between the various hearsay kinds of ante- and post-testamentary declarations is elsewhere discussed, with a survey of the subject (post, §§ 1734–1740). (2) The relevancy of mental condition at one time to show it at a later or earlier one is elsewhere treated (post, §§ 233, 241).

The same principle which admits a testator's designs as to a will serves also to admit the design of a person to make a gift [2] or to execute a contract.[3] Here, however, the usual source of difficulty is the use of particular instances of conduct to evidence this design or plan (post, §§ 238, 371, 377).

§ 113. Plans of Suicide by the Deceased, in a charge of Homicide. Where on a charge of homicide the defence offers the hypothesis of suicide to explain the death of the person whose killing is charged, one of the relevant pieces

[2] 1846, Powell v. Olds, 9 Ala. 861, 864 (intention as to the nature of a gift afterwards made, admitted); 1899, Kyle v. Craig, 125 Cal. 107, 57 Pac. 791 (whether a deed was given on a certain condition in view of death; grantor's intention held relevant); 1886, Woodcock v. Johnson, 36 Minn. 217, 219 (issue whether a deed was forged; the fact "that he had previously directed the deed to be prepared precisely as it was executed, and with intent to execute it, would add probability to the testimony of those witnesses who testified that he directed his name to be signed to the deed"); 1898, Fellows v. Fellows, 69 N. H. 339, 46 Atl. 474 (whether a discharge was executed by a bondholder; his declarations of intention to do so, admitted).

Compare the verbal act rule, post, § 177.

[3] 1862, Kumler v. Ferguson, 7 Minn. 442 (to show the consideration actually paid, the preceding negotiations admitted); 1899, Aikin v. Oil Co., 189 Pa. 39, 41 Atl. 997 (terms of a contract; promise to sign a contract with certain terms, admitted); 1877, Torrey v. Nixon, 43 Wis. 142 (oral lease; disputed whether it was to P. or to N.; an unexpected written lease to P., admitted as showing the probabilities).

Contra: 1878, Richardson v. Robbins, 124 Mass. 105 ("previous talk of the parties", excluded to prove terms of a lost deed).

Compare the use of value as showing a motive for the price of a sale (post, § 392).

The parol evidence rule (post, § 2430) would of course exclude prior negotiations when offered in competition with the terms of an existing document, and not, as here, merely to show what the terms of a lost document are.

of evidence to show the suicide is a plan of suicide. This fact, however, has been sometimes excluded, not because irrelevant, but because a certain quantity of other evidence of suicide may be required before this can be received. This requirement is elsewhere discussed (post, § 143).

Sub-topic E: Emotion or Motive

§ 117. General Principle. The term "motive" is commonly used in a confusing way, as if there were but one thing and one evidential question involved. But there are two things, and two distinct evidential steps.

(1) We may argue, first, that since a specific emotion or passion is likely to lead to the doing of the appropriate act — for example, desire for money to theft or robbery, or angry hostility to an act of violence — the presence of such an emotion in the person in question is likely to lead to the deed in question. In this step of the argument we assume the emotion as a fact, proved somehow or other. Just as a specific sort of disposition, of habit, of plan, is likely to lead to the appropriate act, so a specific sort of emotion or passion has a similar evidential bearing. The basis of this inference is the living, impelling, active emotion, seeking for an outlet in action.

But this emotion must in its turn be proved, — just as character, design, capacity, must be proved. This is the next step, and evidentially a very different one. Usually the evidence is circumstantial; and of two sorts, (a) conduct of the person, and (b) events about him tending to excite the emotion. In (a) his conduct is the expression and effect of the existing internal emotion. In (b) the outward facts are such as may be the stimulus and cause of the emotion. But what conduct and what outer events are of value as showing the probable existence of the emotion is a different question from the relevancy of the emotion to show the probability of an act induced for it. The latter (which is the present subject) raises practically no evidential disputes; the former raises a host of them (post, §§ 385–406).

The unfortunate ambiguity in the word "motive" thus reveals itself. That which has value to show the doing or not doing of the act is the inward emotion, passion, feeling, of the appropriate sort; but that which shows the probable existence of this emotion is also termed — when it is of the sort (b) above, i.e. some outer fact — the "motive." For example, the prosecution of A by B in a suit at law may be said to have been a "motive" for A's subsequent burning of B's house. But in strictness the external fact of B's suit cannot be A's "motive"; for the motive is a state of mind of A; the external fact does tend to show the excitement of the hostile and vindictive emotion, but it is not identical with that emotion.

This use of the word "motive" thus tends to obscure the double evidential step involved; for when it is said that B's suit may be offered in evidence as the "motive" for A's burning, we are apt to conceive ourselves as inferring directly from the suit (as the evidentiary fact) to the burning (as the proposition to be proved); when in truth there are two steps involved, — from the lawsuit to the emotion, and the emotion to the act. Although the evidential questions connected with the latter inference are practically none, nevertheless the true nature of the evidentiary questions connected with the former inference is much obscured when we fail to understand clearly what it is that we are trying to infer. Thus, the question of Relevancy in the above illustration is, whether the fact of a lawsuit is of real probative value to show the probable excitement of a violently vindictive desire to destroy the opponent's property, and this inference may not be an admissible one.

It ought, therefore, to be clearly understood that the "motive", in the correct sense is the emotion supposed to have led to the act, and that the external fact is merely the possible exciting cause of this "motive", and not identical with the "motive" itself; and the evidentiary question is, not whether that external fact is admissible as a motive, but whether it is admissible to show the probable existence of the emotion or "motive." It would be more conducive to clearness of thought if the word "motive", so misleading in its popular associations, could be abandoned altogether in discussing evidential questions.[1]

§ 118. Motive always Relevant, but never Essential. (1) Conceiving an emotion, then, as a circumstance showing the probability of appropriate ensuing action, it is always relevant:

1868, WOODRUFF, J., in Kennedy v. People, 39 N. Y. 245, 254: "It is always a just argument on behalf of one accused that there is no apparent motive to the perpetration of the crime. Men do not act wholly without motive. On the other hand, proof of motive tends in some degree to render the act so far probable as to weaken presumptions of innocence and corroborate evidences of guilt."

1897, DALE, C. J., in Son v. Terr., 5 Okl. 526, 49 Pac. 923: "Motive to commit crime, if shown, may in many cases be sufficient alone, almost, to induce a belief of guilt. Upon the other hand, where no motive for the commission of a crime can be shown it is almost impossible to convince the mind of guilt. Men do not ordinarily commit grave crimes unless there is in their minds a motive strong enough to overcome the natural repugnance against crime, and the fear of punishment which usually follows detection. This view of this question is so universally recognized as being true that it has become incorporated into the law, and in almost all cases where the guilt of a defendant depends upon the facts and circumstances in proof in the case the Court instructs the jury to consider the motive or lack of motive which the proof shows may or may not exist in the mind of a defendant on trial charged with crime."

All the questions of relevancy, then, can be, and should be for simplicity's sake, resolved into questions of the relevancy of the evidence to show this emotion (post, §§ 385–406). Thus, the relevancy of an intrigue by an alleged wife-murderer with a paramour raises the question, not whether lust is a sufficient emotion for murder, but whether the intrigue was a sufficient circumstance to excite a murderous impulse or emotion.

§ 117. [1] From the point of view of logic and psychology, see the materials collected in the present author's "Principles of Judicial Proof, as given by Logic, Psychology, and General Experience, and illustrated in Judicial Trials" (1913), §§ 101–115.

(2) It is sometimes popularly supposed that in order to establish a charge of crime, the prosecution must show a possible motive. But this notion is without foundation. Assuming for purposes of argument that "every act must have a motive", i.e. a prior conscious impelling emotion (which is not strictly correct), yet it is always possible that this necessary emotion may be undiscoverable, and thus the failure to discover it does not signify its non-existence. The kinds of evidence to prove an act vary in probative strength, and the absence of one kind may be more significant than the absence of another; but the mere absence of any one kind cannot be fatal. There must have been a plan to do the act (we may assume); the accused must have been present (assuming it was done by manual action); but there may be no evidence of preparation; or there may be no evidence of presence; yet the remaining facts may furnish ample proof. The failure to produce evidence of some appropriate motive may be a great weakness in the whole body of proof;[1] but it is not a fatal one, as a matter of law. In other words, there is no more necessity, in the law of Evidence, to discover and establish the particular exciting emotion, or some possible one, than to use any other particular kind of evidential fact:[2]

1894, HARLAN, J., in Pointer v. U. S., 151 U. S. 396, 413, 14 Sup. 410, approving the following charge by PARKER, J.: "'The law does not require impossibilities. The law recognizes that the cause of the killing is sometimes so hidden in the mind and breast of the party who killed that it cannot be fathomed; and, as it does not require impossibilities, it does not require the jury to find it. Yet, if they do find it, it simply becomes an item of evidence in the case, which is only evidentiary at best, — that is, it is only an item of evidence going to show whether a particular party may have committed an act, and sometimes going to show the characteristics of that act.' It is not indispensable to conviction that the particular motive for taking the life of a human being shall be established by proof to the satisfaction of the jury. The absence of evidence suggesting a motive for the commission of the crime charged is a circumstance in favor of the accused, to be given such weight as the jury deems proper; but proof of motive is never indispensable to conviction."

1902, PRENTICE, J., in State v. Rathbun, 74 Conn. 524, 51 Atl. 540: "The State was under no obligation to show a motive for the commission by the accused of the crime charged, much less a sufficient or adequate one. While it is a recognized rule of human conduct that crime is the response of the evil mind to some temptation, and that men of sound mind are rarely, if ever, prompted to commit crime without some impelling motive, it does not follow, and it is not the law, that the prosecution, to justify a conviction in a given case, must be so successful in fathoming the mysteries of the human mind and in revealing the possibly hidden secrets influencing it as to develop and disclose to the jury a motive suffi-§ 118. [1] 1898, State v. Foley, 144 Mo. 600, 46 S. W. 733.

It is sometimes said that the Court must charge that the absence of any apparent motive is evidence for the defendant: 1910, Porter v. State, 173 Ind. 694, 91 N. E. 340. But all such detailed charges are poor policy.

[2] Accord: 1900, Brunson v. State, 124 Ala. 37, 27 So. 410; 1897, People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179, 48 Pac. 75; 1922, Williams v. State, 152 Ga. 498, 110 S. E. 286 (murder); 1921, State v. Ward, 119 Me. 482, 111 Atl. 805 (murder); 1920, Com. v. Feci, 235 Mass. 562, 127 N. E. 602 (murder); 1916, State v. Santino, — Mo. —, 186 S. W. 976 (arson); 1919, State v. Dooms, 280 Mo. 84, 217 S. W. 43 (murder); 1900, State v. Lucey, 24 Mont. 295, 61 Pac. 994; 1904, Robinson v. State, 71 Nebr. 142, 98 N. W. 694 (murder); 1904, State v. Jaggers, 71 N. J. L. 281, 58 Atl. 1014 (murder); 1917, People v. Seppi, 221 N. Y. 62, 116 N. E. 793 (homicide); 1885, State v. Green, 92 N. C. 779, 782; 1919, State v. Wiseman, 178 N. C. 784, 101 S. E. 629 (murder); 1877, Lanahan v. Com., 84 Pa. 80, 87; 1903, Cupps v. State, 120 Wis. 504, 97 N. W. 210.

cient and adequate for the commission of the offence. Recognizing the fact that crimes are generally committed from some motive, evidence tending to show the existence or non-existence of such motive is held to be admissible, and often forms an important factor in the inquiry as to the guilt or innocence of an accused. For the purpose of this evidential inquiry the sufficiency of the motive is most pertinent. It is pertinent, however, only in so far as it tends to furnish evidence indicative of guilt, or the reverse, to be considered and weighed in connection with the other evidence in the case. The other evidence may be such as to justify a conviction without any motive being shown. It may be so weak that, without a disclosed motive, the guilt of the accused would be clouded by a reasonable doubt."

(3) An emotion may impel against as well as towards an act. Thus, a defendant's strong feeling of affection for a deceased person would work against the doing of violence upon him, and would thus be relevant to show the not-doing. This is also the significance of evidence that there was "no apparent motive" for a murder; for a state of emotional indifference — i.e. the absence of any anger, jealousy, or the like — is almost equally powerful in its operation against a deed of violence.[3] Sometimes, of course, such evidence merely negatives an alleged murderous emotion, or negatives the tacit possibility of it; but there is also this affirmative aspect to the argument, namely, that emotional indifference makes against crimes.

(4) Where the doing of the act is conceded, and the dispute turns on an issue such as self-defence, there is in strictness no materiality for evidence which tends merely to prove the doing of the act, and, in particular, there is no evidential function remaining for the fact of emotion or motive. It does not necessarily follow that in criminal cases all such evidence should be excluded; for there are no pleadings to make clear what is conceded and what is not, and it is possible that the defence would improperly take advantage of the apparent failure of proof of the act. It has occasionally been said that the superfluousness of the evidence, and the possible unnecessary prejudice it might create against the defendant, require its exclusion;[4] but this seems an unwise rule.

§ 119. "Motive" as a Fact in Issue. In the proper sense of "emotion", a "motive" can seldom be a fact in issue under the substantive law. But in some of its loose popular senses, "motive" is frequently in issue, and these uses must be distinguished from the evidentiary use of emotion or "motive" as tending to prove the doing of an act. (1) "Motive" may be in issue, in the sense of good or bad faith; as where the motive of a transfer is charged to have been in fraud of creditors. (2) "Motive" may be in issue, in the sense of purpose aimed at in an act — a sense not materially different from the preceding one. (3) "Motive" may be in issue, in the sense of reason or ground for conduct; as where the motive of a wife for leaving her husband is disputed, or of employees for leaving their employer. (4) "Motive" may be in issue, in the sense of malice or criminal intent. The modes of evidencing these various states of mind are elsewhere dealt with (post, §§ 244–406).

[3] 1861, People v. Ah Fung, 17 Cal. 377; and the quotations supra.

[4] 1895, People v. Gress, 107 Cal. 461, 40 Pac. 752 (that the accused had endeavored to seduce the deceased's wife); 1913, People v. Cummins, 209 N. Y. 253, 103 N. E. 169 (not decided).

SUB-TITLE I (continued): EVIDENCE TO PROVE A HUMAN ACT

TOPIC II: CONCOMITANT EVIDENCE (OPPORTUNITY, ALIBI, ETC.)

CHAPTER VII.

§ 130. General Principle. It has already been noted (§ 43), that convenience requires the groupings of the various kinds of evidentiary facts according as they come, in time, before, at, or after the act to be evidenced. The various facts of the first or Prospectant class have been examined (ante, §§ 51–119). The second or Concomitant class may now be considered. There is no radical distinction between the classes; they serve as convenient ways of subdividing the great mass of evidentiary facts and of associating those which are most closely related.

A fact having a Concomitant indication is one which is thought of as being in existence at the time of and in connection with the act to be proved; the logical indication or inference is that the person bearing that fact as a mark is thereby to be associated more or less closely with the act. There is a negative as well as an affirmative form of inference; the two being related much in the same way as good character (ante, § 55) points forward to the non-doing of a crime, while bad character points forward to its doing. In the Concomitant inference, there is the affirmative form, e.g. X was at the place of the murder, therefore he may have committed it; and the negative form, e.g. X was at a different place at the time of the murder, therefore he did not commit it. The theory of the former is that the fact of presence at the time is more or less intimately and necessarily associated with the doing of the act; the theory of the latter is that the fact of absence at the time is more or less certainly inconsistent with the doing of the act. Under each form of argument, there are opportunities for explaining away by other hypotheses the significance of the evidentiary fact, on the general theory of Explanation (ante, § 34).

So far as the scope of evidentiary facts is concerned (where the doing of a given act is disputed), the present class usually comprises a great number of circumstances in the ordinary trial; but the occasions for laying down rules of evidence are comparatively few. Interesting illustrations from celebrated trials might be multiplied almost without number.[1] But the present purpose is merely to examine such rules of limitation as may have been prescribed by the Courts.

A. OPPORTUNITY

§ 131. Nature of the Argument. When an act is done, and a particular person is alleged to have done it (not through an agent but personally), it is obvious that his physical presence, within a proper range of time and place, forms one step on the way to the belief that he did it. It is true that another person may have done it, but the former is at least within the limited number of persons who could have done it, and thus is fit to become a subject for further investigation.

Under the evidential canon that to a fair extent the possibility of other hypotheses must be first excluded (ante, § 31), it might be asked whether the mere possibility involved in Opportunity is not too slender, whether something more than mere opportunity — for example, exclusive opportunity — should not first be shown. The answer to this is that, by the very showing of an opportunity, countless hypotheses are negatived; and the person charged, who might otherwise have been one of innumerable other persons at the time, is shown to have been one of the limited number who are in a position to do this particular act. In short, opportunity alone, and not exclusive opportunity, is a sufficient showing for admissibility.

The circumstances involving Opportunity will of course vary with the facts of each case; and no rule of evidence seems to have been laid down. That the offer involves incidentally the doing of another crime by the defendant does not affect its propriety.[1] Since the showing of Opportunity leaves open all the hypotheses of other persons' equal opportunity, it is proper for the proponent of the evidence to strengthen it by cutting off, so far as possible, these other hypotheses, i.e. by showing that the person charged was one of a few only, or the sole person, having the opportunity. In other words, while the proponent need not, he may always show exclusive opportunity.[2]

§ 130. [1] From the point of view of logic and psychology as applicable to argument before the jury (not the rules of Admissibility), see the materials collected in the present author's "Principles of Judicial Proof, as given by Logic, Psychology, and General Experience, and illustrated in Judicial Trials" (1913), §§ 55–81.

§ 131. [1] 1858, State v. Wentworth, 37 N. H. 196, 211 (indictment for placing an obstruction, viz. two stones, on a railroad track; evidence of the placing of iron rails on the track by the defendant not far away and within two hours of the placing in issue, admitted to show that the defendant was "in a situation to place the obstructions on the track").

For the authorities upon the general principle that the incidental use of other crimes is immaterial, see post, § 216.

§ 132. Explaining away; Equal Opportunity for others. If A is shown to have been in a building when a murder was committed, he immediately becomes — so to speak — an eligible person for the charge; he may have done the deed. If, now, admitting this fact, i.e. Opportunity, he seeks to diminish its probative significance, an effective and usual way will be to show that there were in the same building, at the same time, two or ten or five hundred other persons. In so doing, he has pointed out the possibility of two or ten or five hundred other hypotheses, equally possible with that charged against him. The equal strength of these other hypotheses (as noted ante, § 34, in dealing with the logical theory of relevancy) takes away the significance of the fact of his opportunity, just in proportion to the number and degree of naturalness of the other hypotheses, i.e. the hypotheses that each of the other persons had an equal opportunity. Such is the principle of explaining away Opportunity. Moreover, as counter-explanations which equally satisfy the evidentiary fact may always be offered, and without limit, there is no restriction on proving the presence of other persons having the same or approximate opportunities, — a principle will be seen (post, § 139) to be of much consequence. The practical employment of this method of weakening the proponent's evidence of Opportunity is frequent enough; but it seldom calls for judicial ruling.[1]

§ 133. Same: Other Intercourse with Complainant in Bastardy, Seduction, or Rape. On this principle it is permissible to show, in a filiation suit or bastardy prosecution, that the mother had intercourse with another man about the time designated by the period of gestation, for this predicates an equal

[2] 1897, People v. Van Horn, 119 Cal. 323, 51 Pac. 538 (murder by an officer of an arrested person; defence, that a mob took the man from the defendant and killed him; the region being sparsely settled, the prosecution was allowed to show, in disproving the mob-story, that various persons living in the region were not near the place at the time in question); 1866, Miller v. People, 39 Ill. 466 (the prosecution showed that no other persons of the description of the robbers, except the defendants, were in the neighborhood at the time in question).

The following ruling seems to ignore this perfectly accepted principle: 1878, State v. England, 78 N. C. 552 (evidence that tracks did not fit the defendant's brother's foot, excluded; "A did not commit the offence, therefore B did", held an unsound argument; misled by the rulings of the same Court cited post, § 142).

§ 132. [1] 1847, Pollard v. Lively, 4 Gratt. Va. 73, 77 (to show that there was a second person in existence named B. P., a deed executed by one B. P. and probated was received).

The feasibility of self-infliction of harm seems to come under this principle: 1895, State v. Lee, 65 Conn. 265, 280, 30 Atl. 1110 (a showing that wound could have been self-inflicted, allowed); 1875, Hitchcock v. Burgett, 38 Mich. 504 (explaining a renewed injury by the plaintiff's negligent abandonment of splints and crutches, instead of the defendant's careless surgery).

Sundry analogous cases: 1885, Quinn v. Higgins, 60 Wis. 667, 24 N. W. 482 (the non-union of bones in a fracture having been charged to the defendant's unskilful setting, evidence was admitted of non-union occurring through other causes than improper setting); 1852, Lush v. McDaniel, 13 Ired. N. C. 487 (to show that a warranty of soundness in a slave was not broken, evidence that the venereal disease affecting her was not known to exist in the region of the vendor's plantation but did exist in the region of the vendee's, 75 miles distant).

possibility of conception through some one else's act.[1] It would seem that the mere fact of intimate association, or at least of improper familiarities, would be admissible, because this makes at least possible the agency of some specific other man.[2] The time of the other intercourse should not

§ 133. [1] Federal: 1809, U. S. v. Collins, 1 Cr. C. C. 592 (admissible, if "not more than twelve months nor less than six months before the birth of the child"); Alabama: 1915, Smith v. State, 13 Ala. App. 411, 69 So. 406 (excluded, when not within the period); Arizona: 1922, Fuller v. State, — Ariz. —, 205 Pac. 324 (rape under age; other intercourse about the time of conception, admissible, a child having been born and attributed to the defendant); Arkansas: 1910, Adams v. State, 93 Ark. 260, 124 S. W. 766 (seduction; admitted, but only on the principle of § 1007, post); 1910, Belford v. State, 96 Ark. 274, 131 S. W. 953 (here admitted when appropriate to the time of conception); California: 1910, Gird's Estate, 157 Cal. 534, 108 Pac. 499; Illinois: 1874, White v. Murtland, 71 Ill. 250, 261 (seduction; loss of service through pregnancy; intercourse with others admissible to show the defendant not the cause of the pregnancy); Indiana: 1841, Walker v. State, 16 Blackf. ("about the time" of begetting); 1853, Hill v. State, 4 Ind. 112 (same); 1859, Townsend v. State, 13 Ind. 357 ("a period of time that would render it not improbable"); 1880, Whitman v. State, 69 Ind. 448 (extended to the woman's action for seduction, where pregnancy by the defendant would enter into the damages); 1883, Benham v. Richardson, 91 Ind. 82 (admitted); 1905, Walker v. State, 165 Ind. 94, 74 N. E. 614 (bastardy; admitted); Iowa: 1895, State v. Wickliff, 95 Ia. 386, 64 N. W. 283 (admitted); 1899, State v. Scevers, 108 Ia. 738, 78 N. W. 705 (admissible if relating to period of gestation); 1906, Kesselring v. Hummer, 130 Ia. 145, 106 N. W. 501 (seduction, with birth of a child as aggravation; intercourse with a third person within the period, admitted); Kentucky: 1824, Ginn v. Com., 5 Litt. 300 ("about the same time she charges him"); Maryland: 1918, Jones v. State, 132 Md. 142, 103 Atl. 459 (bastardy in 1915; complainant's prior pregnancy by another man in January, 1915, excluded); Massachusetts: 1862, Eddy v. Gray, 4 All. 435, 439 (excluded, if "at any point of time more than ten calender months before the birth of the child"; unless gestation is shown to have been unusually protracted); 1875, Sabins v. Jones, 119 Mass. 167, 170 (excluded, because not within the proper period); 1877, Force v. Martin, 122 Mass. 5 (excluding the evidence because no time was stated); 1879, Ronan v. Dugan, 126 Mass. 176 (same); Mississippi: 1859, Anon., 37 Miss. 54, 58 (admitted); Nebraska: 1895, Stoppert v. Nierle, 45 Nebr. 105, 63 N. W. 382 ("at or near the time"); 1901, Erickson v. Schmill, 62 Nebr. 368, 87 N. W. 166 (similar); 1903, Gatzemeyer v. Peterson, 68 Nebr. 832, 94 N. W. 974 (cross-examination as to keeping company with other men, held not improperly excluded on the facts); 1914, Koepke v. Delfs, 95 Nebr. 619, 146 N. W. 962; New York: 1890, Young v. Johnson, 123 N. Y. 226, 25 N. E. 363 (admitted; here the action was a civil one for rape, but pregnancy was laid as damage and proved as a fact); North Carolina: 1876, State v. Bennett, 75 N. C. 305 (excluded, Rodman, J.: "It would only tend to prove the psychological fact that two men may have connexion with a woman about the same time, and one of them get her with child; it would not tend to rebut the presumption that the defendant was the one"); 1878, State v. Britt, 78 N. C. 439, 442 (admitted, questioning the preceding case, but distinguishing it because here the defendant totally denied his own intercourse with the woman); 1880, State v. Parish, 83 N. C. 613 (without other evidence, "insufficient to overcome the statutory presumption [of the woman's oath], and by itself incompetent"); 1899, State v. Warren, 124 N. C. 807, 32 S. E. 552 (intercourse with the mother by a third person about the time of begetting, admissible; conflict of previous cases examined); Porto Rico: 1913, Rivera v. Diaz, 19 P. R. 525 (admitted); 1914, Rico v. Lopez, 21 P. R. 201, 208 (affirming Rivera v. Diaz); South Dakota: 1916, State ex rel. Kühl v. Chambers, 37 S. D. 555, 159 N. W. 113 (C. C. P. § 809 held not to enlarge the rule to admit other acts of unchastity for any other purpose); Utah: 1915, State v. Hammond, 46 Utah 249, 148 Pac. 420 (bastardy; distinguishing the principle of § 398, post); Vermont: 1856, State v. Johnson, 28 Vt. 512, 517, 523 (admitted); Virginia: 1811, Fall v. Overseers, 3 Munf. 495, 502, 505 (admissible, per Roane, J.; yet excluded, per Brook, J., since the defendant had admitted his own intercourse, — a clearly unsound ruling); Wisconsin: 1891, Humphrey v. State, 78 Wis. 571, 47 N. W. 836 (admitted); 1906, Busse v. State, 129 Wis. 171, 108 N. W. 64.

[2] Accord: 1902, Kelly v. State, 133 Ala. 195, 32 So. 56; 1890, Maynard v. People, 135 Ill. 416, 433, 25 N. E. 740 (bastardy; that the woman was "out late at night with men and boys" about the time in question, admissible); 1905, Walker v. State, 165 Ind. 94, 74 N. E. 614 (with other evidence); 1895, State v. Wickliff, 96 Ia. 386, 64 N. W. 283; 1918, De Mund v. State, 167 Wis. 40, 166 N. W. 328.

Contra: 1877, Rawles v. Ford, 56 Ind. 433 (bastardy; the complainant's declarations of preference for another man, at the time of be reckoned by any fixed rule; nor have the Courts attempted rigidly to prescribe one.[3]

But the issue of paternity must be involved. This is necessarily true of a filiation suit or bastardy prosecution, and also of a father's action for seduction where pregnancy is alleged as the cause of loss of service.[4] In a prosecution, however, for rape, incest, rape under age, or adultery, paternity not being in issue, but merely the defendant's act of intercourse, the paternity and therefore the intercourse of another man is immaterial; [5] unless, indeed, the prose-alleged intercourse, excluded); 1882, Houser v. State, 86 Ind. 231 (bastardy; that the complainant kept company with other men about the alleged time of intercourse, excluded).

Occasionally, a statute has enlarged the scope of the evidence to include unchastity in general: S. D. Rev. C. 1919, § 2983 (bastardy proceedings; "previous unchastity of the female", admissible).

[3] See the quotations in the note supra; the following case contains the best statement: Benham v. Richardson, Ind., supra, n. 1, Best, C. ("The limit within which this enquiry may be made, is not, however, settled. This must necessarily depend upon the circumstances of each particular case. If conception is claimed to occur from a single act of coition the date of which is fixed, there is but little difficulty in determining the period within which this enquiry may be made; but if it follows three or four different acts of sexual intercourse occurring at different times, and a fully developed child is born less than nine months thereafter, the enquiry ought to embrace a greater period of time, especially before the alleged acts of intercourse").

[4] Cases cited supra, n. 1.

Compare State v. Hendrick, N. J. L. (1903), and other cases cited ante, § 68, nn. 1, 2, 3.

[5] Accord: Eng. 1913, R. v. Cargill, 2 K. B. 271 (rape under age; extrinsic evidence of intercourse of others with the girl, excluded, even though the prosecution had without objection introduced evidence of her virginity); UNITED STATES: Fed. 1917, Rose v. U. S., 9th C. C. A., 240 Fed. 685 (carnal knowledge under age; cross-examination of prosecutrix to prior lascivious conduct, excluded): Ala. 1921, Bryan v. State, — Ala. App. —, 89 So. 893 (rape under age; the female's "relationship with other men", excluded); Ariz. 1921, Sage v. State, 22 Ariz. 151, 195 Pac. 534 (statutory rape; cross-examination to former acts of unchastity and living in house of prostitution, not allowable); Conn. 1909, State v. Rivers, 82 Conn. 454, 74 Atl. 757 (rape under age; inadmissible, except to impeach the witness); D. Col. 1912, Kidwell v. U. S., 38 D. C. App. 566 (rape under age; cross-examination to acts of intercourse with others, held allowable, the prosecutrix here being pregnant); 1913, Sacks v. U. S., 41 D. C. App. 34 (rape under age; unchaste conduct of the woman, excluded; citing a Missouri case and ignoring Kidwell v. U. S.); Ida. 1921, State v. Farmer, 34 Ida. 370, 201 Pac. 33 (rape under age; the girl's improper conduct with other men, excluded); Ind. 1910, Heath v. State, 173 Ind. 296, 90 N. E. 310 (rape under age; excluded); 1916, Harper v. State, 185 Ind. 322, 114 N. E. 4 (rape followed by pregnancy; intercourse with another man at the appropriate time, admitted); 1918, Barker v. State, 188 Ind. 263, 120 N. E. 593; Md. 1919, Ran v. State, 133 Md. 613, 105 Atl. 867 (statutory rape; prior intercourse with another man, excluded); Mass. 1875, Com. v. O'Connor, 107 Mass. 219; Me. 1881, State v. Witham, 72 Me. 531, 535; Minn. 1921, State v. McPadden, 150 Minn. 62, 184 N. W. 568; 1922, State v. Perry, — Minn. —, 186 N. W. 311 (rape under age; illicit relations with other men, excluded); N. H. 1915, State v. Tetrault, 78 N. H. 14, 95 Atl. 669 (rape under age; the female's absence from home with other men, excluded); N. Dak. 1913, State v. Apley, 25 N. D. 298, 141 N. W. 740 (rape under age; undecided; sensible opinion by Goss, J.; here held admissible to explain medical testimony to physical condition, as in Note 6, infra); Oh. 1915, Angeloff v. State, 91 Oh. 361, 110 N. E. 936 (rape under age; result of a physical examination in jail submitted to without objection is admissible); S. Dak. State v. Rash, 27 S. D. 185, 130 N. W. 91 (rape under age; prosecutrix' unchaste conduct, excluded); Wash. 1914, State v. Gay, 82 Wash. 423, 144 Pac. 711 (rape under age; intercourse with another man, excluded).

Contra: 1917, State v. Brooks, 181 Ia. 874, 165 N. W. 194 (where force in fact is charged); 1906, State v. Gerike, 74 Kan. 196, 87 Pac. 759 (rape under age, with pregnancy; the woman's intimate association at night with other men, admitted; no precise rule stated); 1911, State v. Swindall, 129 La. 760, 56 So. 702 (incest); 1906, State v. Mobley, 44 Wash. 549, 87 Pac. 815 (rape under age, with pregnancy; the woman's habit of staying away from home till after midnight, received).

This view may be justified, and is perhaps preferable to that stated above in the text, on the ground that, though paternity is not in issue, yet, since there must have been intercourse with some one, it is more likely that it cution by inviting the issue, makes counter-evidence admissible (on the principle of § 15, ante).[6]

Certain other evidential uses of similar facts are here to be distinguished, such as the use of other acts of intercourse by a complainant in rape, to indicate her disposition or motive to consent (post, §§ 200, 402), and the use of particular instances of unchaste conduct to impeach the credit of a woman-witness (post, § 987); for both of these uses have their peculiar limitations, which may or may not in a given case be more favorable to admissibility than the present principle. In view of the danger to innocent men from the fabrications of a certain pathological type of feminine nature, well-known to psychologists,[7] it seems desirable to give liberal opportunity for placing before the jury the entire facts as to the complaining witness' chastity, in all issues of this kind; and this from the point of view of weighing her credit (post, § 987), without regard to relevancy under the present principle.

§ 134. Same: Adultery to show Illegitimacy. On the same principle, in an issue of illegitimacy, the wife's adultery would be evidential to show the paternity of her child to be her paramour's. But this is forbidden, except on certain conditions, by the so-called presumption of legitimacy (post, § 2527). The reason is that this fact does not actually prove the illegitimate paternity, but merely makes it possible or probable; and such an uncertainty of conclusion would be practically undesirable where an issue of inheritance is involved, especially in a country like England, where the interests of landed estates and the system of primogeniture were so important; while the paternity of an unmarried woman's child involves no such weighty considerations of general policy. Accordingly, the presumption of legitimacy forbids any investigation into the illegitimate paternity of a child born after marriage, except where the husband's non-access (post, § 137) during the period of gestation makes his paternity impossible, and thus the identity of the real father becomes a minor and corroborative fact only.

B. ESSENTIAL INCONSISTENCY

§ 135. General Principle. It has been already pointed out (ante, § 130) that there is a negative form of the Concomitant inference, which is indeed, if was exclusively with some other person, on the principle of §§ 400, 402, par. (1) (a), post.

So also the same considerations apply in abortion: 1913, Meno v. State, 117 Md. 435, 83 Atl. 759 (cited more fully post, § 390 n.).

[6] 1881, State v. Witham, supra; 1903, Knowles v. State, 44 Tex. Cr. 322, 72 S. W. 398 (admitted on a charge of rape under the age of consent, when offered to contradict the prosecutrix' testimony that the defendant was the father of her child; Brooks, J., diss.).

Occasionally some other issue makes it relevant: 1850, Nugent v. State, 18 Ala. 521 (abuse of a child S. by an attempt to know carnally; the existence in S. of venereal disease and of bruises being shown, the defendant was allowed to offer evidence of intercourse with S. by others, as showing the possibility of others being the cause); 1904, State v. Bebb, 125 Ia. 494, 101 N. W. 189 (like People v. Craig, Mich.); 1898, People v. Craig, 116 Mich. 388, 74 N. W. 528 (carnal knowledge of minor while a member of family; intercourse of prosecutrix with others, admitted to account for pregnancy proved); 1921, State v. McPadden, 150 Minn. 62, 184 N. W. 568.

[7] William Healy, Pathological Lying, etc., The Individual Delinquent, passim, cited post, § 875.

not the more common, at least the more effective one. It may be termed the argument from Essential Inconsistency.

Its usual theory is that a certain fact cannot coexist with the doing of the act in question, and, therefore, that if that fact is true of a person of whom the act is alleged, it is impossible that he should have done the act. The form sometimes varies from this statement; but its nature is the same in all forms. The inconsistency, to be conclusive in proof, must be essential, i.e. absolute and universal; but since, in offering evidence, we are not required to furnish demonstration but only fair ground for inference (ante, §§ 32, 38), the fact offered need not have this essential or absolute inconsistency, but merely a probable or presumable inconsistency; and its evidentiary strength will increase with its approach to absolute or essential inconsistency.

There are five common cases of this form of the argument (though more are conceivable): 1. The absence of the person charged in another place (Alibi); 2. The absence of a husband (non-access) — a variety of the preceding; 3. The survival of an alleged deceased person after the supposed time of death; 4. The doing of a crime by a third person; and, 5. The self-infliction of the harm alleged, — resting on the same principle as the preceding instance.

§ 136. Alibi. The theory of an alibi is that the fact of presence elsewhere is essentially inconsistent with presence at the place and time alleged, and therefore with personal participation in the act. Thus, the evidentiary fact is a new affirmative proposition, considered as a 'factum probandum', though its logical operation is a negative one:

Ante 1726, GILBERT, C. B., Evidence, 145: "[The proof of an opponent] is not properly the proof of a negative, but the proof of the same proposition totally inconsistent with what is affirmed; . . . as if the defendant be charged with a trespass, . . . and if the fact be proved, he can only prove a proposition inconsistent with the charge, and that he was at another place at the time when the fact is supposed to be done, or the like."

1762, FOSTER, J., Crown Law, 3d ed. 368: "If it [alibi] appeareth to be founded in truth, it is the best negative evidence that can be offered. It is really positive evidence which in the nature of things necessarily implieth a negative."

1850, SHAW, C. J., in Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 295, 318; Bemis' Rep., 369: "When a fact has occurred, with a series of circumstances preceding, accompanying, and following it, we know that these must all have been once consistent with each other; otherwise the fact would not have been possible. Therefore, if any one fact necessary to the conclusion is wholly inconsistent with the hypothesis of the guilt of the accused, it breaks the chain of circumstantial evidence, upon which the inference depends; and, however plausible or apparently conclusive the other circumstances may be, the charge must fail. Of this character is the defence usually called an alibi; that is, that the accused was elsewhere at the time the offence is alleged to have been committed. If this is true, it being impossible that the accused could be in two places at the same time, it is a fact inconsistent with that sought to be proved, and excludes its possibility." [1]

It is obvious that the alibi argument is relevant only for disproving personal participation (in a broad sense) in the act, and does not affect an alleged cooperation as principal ordering the act elsewhere by an agent. Just what modifications might be necessary in the alibi argument where action is predicated at a distance without an agent but through thought-transference, may be left for determination until the practicability of such action is judicially accepted.

§ 136. [1] Compare also Bentham, Rationale of Judicial Evidence, b. V, c. XVI, § 11 (Bowring's ed. vol. VII, p. 112).

The only question of a rule of admissibility that seems to arise is whether the alibi must be such as absolutely to preclude the possibility of presence at the alleged time and place of the act. It is sometimes said that this much must be shown.[2] Such expressions, however, seem in truth to refer only to the weight of the alibi argument, by pointing out that it falls short of complete proof except on those conditions. If they were intended to mean anything more, they are clearly unsound,[3] and would exclude nine alibi arguments out of ten. Even as affecting the weight of the argument (with which we have in this place no concern), such statements seem erroneous; for an alibi may not involve absolute impossibility, but only high improbability, and yet be convincing. The matter may be thus demonstrated. Suppose we are to argue that X's footprint near the house of a murder is evidentiary of his presence; no one would contend that in proving this fact as a 'factum probandum' complete proof is necessary; any evidence that it is probably his footprint would be admissible. So, when the fact of X's presence elsewhere is offered in disproof of his participation any evidence rendering this fact probable is receivable.[4] There is no reason why, in proving the subsidiary fact of alibi, any different rule should be applied than is applied to the proof of other subsidiary facts. Thus, if X was at the other place one hour before the act, we argue that probably he was still there at the exact time, and hence that he could not have been at the place charged.[5]

It may be added that the argument of alibi is not in theory confined to criminal acts, but may be equally applied to the disproof of civil acts, such as the execution of a deed.[6]

Distinguish, as involving other principles, the evidential effect of the fabrication of an alibi (post, § 279), and the question of the burden of proving an alibi (post, § 2512).

§ 137. Non-access of Husband to show Illegitimacy. Since legitimacy of offspring implies a begetting by the husband, it would be relevant, in dis-

[2] 1873, Agnew, J., in Briceland v. Com., 74 Pa. 463, 469 ("When a defence rests on proof of an alibi, it must cover the time when the offence is shown to have been committed, so as to preclude the possibility of the prisoner's presence at the place of the murder; . . . for if it be possible that he could have been at both places, the proof of the alibi is valueless)."

[3] Accord: 1879, Stuart v. People, 42 Mich. 255, 260, 3 N. W. 863; 1898, Ford v. State, 101 Tenn. 545, 47 S. W. 703.

[4] Thus all facts tending to show his presence elsewhere are admissible: 1894, State v. Delaney, 92 Ia. 467, 61 N. W. 189 (the defendant was in a room in a house; evidence admitted of the impossibility of passing to the street without waking other inmates).

[5] The full logical effect of an alibi, however, arises only when by ordinary exertion the person could not have changed his place in season: 1898, Peyton v. State, 54 Nebr. 188, 74 N. W. 597 (instruction held too strict in requirements).

[6] 1897, Brown v. Tourtelotte, 24 Colo. 204, 50 Pac. 195 (signing of a note); 1867, Doe v. Stevens, 36 Ga. 463, 473 (execution of deed); 1884, Nash v. Hoxie, 59 Wis. 384, 386, 18 N. W. 408 (contract).

proving legitimacy, to use his absence from the wife at the probable time of begetting as showing the impossibility of the act of begetting. For reasons of policy, however (already noted in § 134), it was long forbidden to employ this mode of proof, except in a very restricted form, namely, that the husband was not at the time 'infra quattuor maria.' This doctrine has in modern times been much relaxed, if not entirely abandoned, so that the argument from non-access is now fully available. The scope of the doctrine is dealt with in connection with the presumption of legitimacy (post, § 2527).

§ 138. Survival of the alleged Deceased. Where the 'corpus delicti' is disputed, and, for example, in a charge of homicide the alleged deceased is claimed by the defendant not to have been killed, the argument is obviously available that he is still alive, or was alive after the time of the supposed death, for this would be absolutely inconsistent with his death as supposed:

1762, FOSTER, J., Crown Law, 3d ed., 367: "A is convicted upon circumstantial evidence, strong as that sort of evidence can be, of the murder of B. C is afterwards indicted as accessory to this murder; and it cometh out upon the trial by incontestable evidence that B is still living. Lord Hale somewhere mentioneth a case of this kind. Is C to be convicted or acquitted? The case is too plain to admit of a doubt."

1850, SHAW, C. J., in Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 295; Bemis' Rep. 269, 295, 475: "It may be as well to consider now as at any other time that ground of defence on the part of the prisoner which has been denominated — not perhaps with precise legal accuracy — an alibi; that is, that the deceased was seen elsewhere out of the Medical College after the time when (by the theory of the proof on the part of the prosecution) he is supposed to have lost his life at the Medical College. It is like the case of an alibi in this respect, that it proposes to prove a fact which is repugnant to and inconsistent with the facts constituting the evidence on the other side. . . . Although the time alleged in the indictment is not material, and the act done at another time would sustain it, yet in point of evidence it may become material; and, in the present case, as all the circumstances shown on the other side, and relied upon as proof, tend to the conclusion that Dr. Parkman was last seen entering the Medical College, and that he lost his life therein, if at all, the fact of his being seen elsewhere afterwards would be so inconsistent with that allegation that (if made out by satisfactory proof) we think it would be conclusive in favor of the defendant."[1]

§ 139. Commission of Crime by a Third Person. If X is charged with homicide, committed by himself alone, and it is shown in disproof that Y did the killing, X is clearly exonerated; for the fact that Y has done it is inconsistent with and exclusive of X's guilt:

1833, GASTON, J., in State v. May, 4 Dev. 328, 338 (larceny of a slave): "The criminal act imputed to the prisoner might as readily be committed by many as by one. . . . Both [W. M. and the defendant] might be guilty, or both might be innocent; and a common guilt or a common innocence was as presumable as the guilt of one only. . . . But proof that certain acts constituting a part of the criminal transaction itself were done by W. M. might have been of high importance to the prisoner by removing so much of the inference of guilt as would be raised were those acts brought home to him. . . . Proof that the taking was by other than the prisoner perhaps might repel this inference [of guilt], — not because the guilt of one shows the innocence of the other, but because proof that specific acts were done by one weakens or removes the presumption that the same acts were done by another."

§ 138. [1] In this case the prosecution were not allowed to show that the testimony of survival might be explained away by showing that there was another person in Boston easily mistakable for Dr. Parkman: a ruling which seems erroneous.

There are, of course (as the preceding passage shows), cases in which X is by hypothesis in some way an accomplice of Y, either at a distance or as a personal sharer; and there is even the rare case of independent and double felonious acts upon the same object. To such cases the argument cannot apply. Apart from them, it is as cogent as an alibi. If the Man with the Iron Mask was the Duc de Vermandois, he could not have been the Général de Bulonde; and if the Tichborne claimant was Arthur Orton, he could not have been Roger Tichborne.

The question that arises, from the point of view of the rules of Evidence, is whether, in evidencing this doing by a third person as a fact of disproof, any unusual requirements should be made as to the strength of the evidence before it can be admitted. Thus, to prove A guilty of murder, evidence of his threats (i.e. a design) to commit it are always admissible (ante, § 105); now, if the fact to be proved is that B committed the murder (as inconsistent with A's guilt), why should not B's threats be admitted, without further restriction, as A's are? It is true that evidence of B's threats alone would not go far towards proving B's commission; but it is not a question of absolute proof nor even of strong probability, but only of raising a reasonable doubt as to A's commission; and for this purpose the slightest likelihood of B's commission may suffice or at least assist. The evidence of B's threats, to be sure, may, in a given instance, be too slight to be worth considering: but it seems unsound as a general rule to hold that mere threats, or mere evidentiary facts of any one sort, are to be rejected if unaccompanied by additional facts pointing towards B as the doer. Nevertheless, most Courts have shown an inclination to make some such restriction, and to insist that two or more kinds of evidentiary facts pointing towards B must be offered, and that one kind alone will not be received. It is difficult to see the object of this restriction, because if the evidence is really of no appreciable value, no harm is done in admitting it; while if it is in truth calculated to cause the jury to doubt, the Court should not attempt to decide for the jury that this doubt is purely speculative and fantastic, but should afford the accused every opportunity to create that doubt. A contrary rule is unfair to a really innocent accused.

§ 140. Same: Threats by a Third Person. Threats are perhaps the commonest kind of evidence offered for this purpose. The rulings differ widely in their effect; but in general a wholly unnecessary strictness is shown, and the illiberal attitude of some Courts in this respect towards accused persons is in singular contrast with the maudlin tenderness otherwise often exhibited.[1]

§ 140. [1] Federal: 1891, Alexander v. U. S., 138 U. S. 353, 355, 11 Sup. 350 (the defendant and the deceased were seen together just before the latter's disappearance; evidence of threats by H. against the deceased, H. then being in search of the deceased, who was supposed to have eloped with H.'s wife, held admissible, subject to a certain discretion in the trial Court as to remoteness); 1892, Worth v. R. Co., 51 Fed. 171 (action by a passenger injured by the derailment of a car; evidence of the design of outsiders to wreck the train by derailment was admitted, no conditions being laid down, but other evidence being presented of the existence of a motive in certain outsiders, and of the presence of suspicious persons at the place); Alabama: 1914, Spicer v. State, 188 Ala. 9, 65 So. 972 (threats of a third person, admitted); Arkansas: 1911, McElroy v. State, 100 Ark. 301, 140 S. W. 8 (threats by third persons, excluded, no other evidence of their complicity being offered); California: 1861, People v. Williams, 18 Cal. 193 (threats to kill, by a third person, admitted); Connecticut: 1885, State v. Beaudet, 53 Conn. 543, 4 Atl. 237 (unspecified threats of a third person against the assaulted party, excluded; partly because too vague, partly because hearsay, partly because not accompanied by other evidence of the third person's guilt; opinion inconclusive and unsound); Illinois: 1886, Schoolcraft v. People, 117 Ill. 271, 277, 17 N. E. 649 (murder; the deceased's statement that certain third persons, "whose wives he had been running after, would kill him some day", excluded); 1894, Carlton v. People, 150 Ill. 181, 188, 37 N. E. 244 (arson; threats of third person to burn all the property of the injured person, excluded); 1916, People v. King, 276 Ill. 138, 114 N. E. 601 (murder of a police officer, the issue being the identity of the slayer; threats of F., made some time previous, against the officer, excluded); Indiana: 1901, Keith v. State, 157 Ind. 376, 61 N. E. 716 ("isolated threats by third parties is not admissible"); Kentucky: 1878, Morgan v. Com., 14 Bush 106, 112 (murder; threats against the deceased's life, by a third person present at the affray, admitted, the third person being first shown present and thus by possibility connected with the act); Massachusetts: 1916, Bradford v. Boston & M. R. Co., 225 Mass. 129, 113 N. E. 1042 (fire set by the defendant to the T. factory and spreading to the plaintiff's house; defendant contended that the fire started in the T. factory; D. the treasurer of the T. Co. was a witness for plaintiff, and there was evidence of his starting the fire; the fact that the T. plant had also burned the year previous was admitted, "as explaining the motive and intent of D."; this is sensible, but is not consistent with Noyes v. Boston & M. R. Co., post, § 199*a*; Missouri: 1889, State v. Crawford, 99 Mo. 74, 80, 12 S. W. 354 (arson; threats of burning by a third person, rejected as 'res inter alios', — as if the law of judgments had any connection with the process of drawing an inference; this ground of decision is absurd, for it would exclude the whole process of proof that another was the guilty person); 1896, State v. Taylor, 136 Mo. 66, 37 S. W. 907 (burglary; threats by another person to commit such a burglary, excluded, unless perhaps an overt act, etc., had followed); North Carolina: 1846, State v. Duncan, 6 Ired. 236, 239; 1877, State v. Davis, 77 Ired. 483 (for these two cases, see post, § 142); Oregon: 1893, State v. Fletcher, 24 Or. 295, 300, 33 Pac. 575 (threats, etc., by a third person, excluded; there must be "some appropriate evidence directly connecting that person with the corpus delicti"); Pennsylvania: 1919, Com. v. Bednorciki, 264 Pa. 124, 107 Atl. 666 (third person's threats excluded, because no other evidence, except opportunity, was offered); Texas: 1881, Dubose v. State, 10 Tex. App. 246 (homicide; third person's "motive, threats, and opportunity to kill", admissible); 1920, Taylor v. State, 87 Tex. Cr. 330, 221 S. W. 611 (homicide; the mere fact of animus by third persons against the deceased, without showing also threats and opportunity, excluded); Washington: 1906, State v. McLain, 43 Wash. 267, 86 Pac. 390 (arson; mere threats of a third person, excluded); West Virginia: 1871, Crookham v. State, 5 W. Va. 510, 513 (prior threats to kill, and subsequent immediate flight, of a third person, excluded as "not pertinent"); Wisconsin: 1899, Buel v. State, 104 Wis. 132, 80 N. W. 78 (murder; threats of third persons against the deceased, excluded).

§ 141. Same: Motive of a Third Person. A motive as evidence is perhaps not of such value as a threat; yet Courts seem more inclined to receive it.[1] There is no reason for requiring that it be coupled with other evidence in order to be admissible.

Compare § 68, ante (character of a third person).

The following case is peculiar: 1910, R. v. McNulty, 22 Ont. L. R. 350 (murder by defendant man of illegitimate child of M. by him; the paternity being in issue as a motive, defendant's calling of third persons to prove their intercourse with M., who on cross-examination had denied it, excluded; grounds obscure; unsound).

§ 141. [1] Federal: 1918, Griffin v. U. S., 1st C. C. A., 248 Fed. 6 (mailing obscene letters; the motive of the third persons to mail such letters to the addressee, held not improperly excluded in discretion); Alabama: 1902, Tatum v. State, 131 Ala. 32, 31 So. 369 (deceased's declarations of a difficulty with R., and facts indicating a motive in R., held inadmissible); 1904, Bowen v. State, 140 Ala. 65, 37 So. 233 (murder; facts showing a motive in third persons, excluded); 1904, Walker v. State, 139 Ala. 56, 35 So. 1011 (murder; a third person's motive, without other connecting evidence, excluded); 1910, McDonald v. State, 165 Ala. 85, 51 So. 629 (evidence of third person's motive, with evidence of bloodhound's trailing of him, admitted); Georgia: 1852, Crawford v. State, 12 Ga. 142, 145 (murder; the identity of the assailant not being directly testified to, evidence was admitted that just previously the deceased had had a quarrel with third persons); 1896, McElhannon v. State, 99 Ga. 672, 26 S. E. 501 (malicious mischief; motive in the prosecuting witness, admitted); Illinois: 1912, People v. Pezutto, 255 Ill. 583, 99 N. E. 677 (murder; quarrels, etc., of deceased with third persons, held properly limited by the trial Court in its discretion); Louisiana: 1854, State v. D'Angelo, 9 La. An. 46 (murder; that the deceased "had innumerable enemies", excluded as too vague; a showing that one or more designated enemies were present at the time of the killing would perhaps be admitted); 1878, State v. Johnson, 30 La. An. 921 (murder, no eye-witnesses being present; evidence received, on the peculiar circumstances, of quarrels by the deceased, shortly previous, with other persons who had "more reason for committing the murder than the accused"); Massachusetts: 1881, Com. v. Abbott, 130 Mass. 475 (murder of a woman; evidence was offered, to fix the murder on a third person, that her husband had quarrelled with her, and that a stranger was seen near the place on the day of the killing; Colt, J.: "The existence of ill-feeling as a motive for the commission of crime will not alone justify submitting to a jury the question of the guilt of a person entertaining such a feeling. It becomes material only when offered in connection with other evidence, proper to be submitted, showing that the person charged with such ill-feeling was in fact implicated in the commission of the crime. . . . The mere claim made by counsel that there are circumstances which tend to implicate the person charged is not enough; there must be proof of such circumstances, or an offer to prove. The evidence that a stranger was in town at the time of the murder does not alone implicate the husband"); Missouri: 1906, State v. Barrington, 198 Mo. 23, 95 S. W. 235 (murder; certain threats by third persons against the deceased, excluded); Oklahoma: 1915, Irvin v. State, 11 Okl. Cr. 301, 146 Pac. 453 (murder; evidence which "casts a bare suspicion upon another" is inadmissible); 1922, Phillips v. State, — Okl. Cr. —, 203 Pac. 902 (murder; ill-feeling in the neighborhood, not designating any particular person, excluded); South Carolina: 1905, State v. Gaylord, 70 S. C. 415, 50 S. E. 20 (threats, etc., of a third person received; here, to show that the third person, not the defendant, was the aggressor; compare § 112, n. 6, ante); Texas: 1906, Porch v. State, 50 Tex. Cr. 335, 99 S. W. 102 ("there must be something more than mere motive" evidenced against the third person); 1917, Taylor v. State, 81 Tex. Cr. 359, 195 S. W. 1147 (murder; motive of members of deceased's own family, admitted); Vermont: 1922, State v. Long, — Vt. —, 115 Atl. 734 (murder; the deceased's husband's criminal intimacy with another woman, as evidencing his motive to be the slayer, not admitted, there being no other evidence as to his being the slayer); Washington: 1920, Sound Timber Co. v. Danaher Lumber Co., 112 Wash. 314, 192 Pac. 941 (damage by fire; rule applied); Wyoming: 1903, Horn v. State, 12 Wyo. 80, 73 Pac. 705 (motive and opportunity of a third person; "much must depend on the circumstances of each case"; here excluded).

§ 142. Same: Miscellaneous Facts. Of the other kinds of evidence indicating a third person as the doer of the act, it can only be said that the inclination should always be to admit any one of them, unless totally without probative suggestion.[1] In particular, the conviction of another person for the

§ 142. [1] ENGLAND: 1890, R. v. Dytche, 17 Cox Cr. 39 (felonious wounding; evidence that other persons, already convicted for the offence, were present and made the assault, and not the now defendants, admitted).

UNITED STATES: Alabama: 1846, Smith v. State, 9 Ala. 990, 995 (conduct of another to be admitted in rare cases only; Goldthwaite, J., dissenting); 1875, Levison v. State, 54 Ala. 519, 527 ("The evidence of the guilt must relate to the 'res gesta', and not to the declarations or conduct of the party on whom it is attempted to cast suspicion, subsequent to and having no immediate connection with the crime"; here excluding the flight of a third person); 1895, Whitaker v. State, 106 Ala. 30, 17 So. 456 (unexplained flight of a third person, excluded); 1895, Crawford v. State, 112 Ala. 1, 20, 21 So. 214 (murder; W.'s concealment of himself, held irrelevant on the facts, the defendant's actual deed of shooting being uncontroverted); 1911, McGehee v. State, 171 Ala. 19, 55 So. 159 (inculpatory conduct of a third person, excluded); 1915, Terry v. State, 13 Ala. App. 115, 69 So. 370 (murder; the flight of one H., with other evidence as to his guilt, admitted on the facts); Georgia: 1862, Phillips v. State, 33 Ga. 281, 287 (larceny; pleased conduct of a third person upon the discovery of the article on the defendant's premises, the third person having been present at the time of the theft, admitted); Indiana: 1900, Green v. State, 154 Ind. 655, 57 N. E. 637 (a dying declaration naming B., and not the defendant, as the murderer, B.'s threats, motive, and doings were admitted to prove B. the murderer, though not B.'s subsequent admissions of guilt); 1910, Stout v. State, 174 Ind. 395, 92 N. E. 161 (murder; that one B. had bought a revolver of similar calibre, and that bloodhounds had trailed him after the same crime (assuming that it is predicated as the deed of one person, not of joint actors) should be received;[2] no technicality of the law of judgments should stand in the way; indeed, it is difficult to see why such a judgment should not be pleaded in bar. Certainly, the law must in some manner avoid the absurdity of convicting two persons for the same crime committable by one only. This same singular and inexcusable attitude of the Courts is seen also in the exclusion of a third person's confession of guilt under the exception to the Hearsay rule (post, § 1476), and of a suicide's declarations (post, § 143).

murder, not admitted, no offer of other evidence against B. being promised); Iowa: 1885, McPherrin v. Jennings, 66 Ia. 626, 24 N. W. 242 (death by unknown cause was rejected as an explanation of the plaintiff's horse's death); 1922, State v. Banoch, — Ia. —, 186 N. W. 436 (larceny; mere presence and departure of an unknown third person, excluded); Kentucky: 1813, Logan v. Steele, 3 Bibb 230 (trespass by burning a barn and killing horses: the plaintiff having proved threats by the defendant, the defendant was allowed to prove that other enemies of the plaintiff "had also threatened to injure his property"); 1908, Etly v. Com., 130 Ky. 723, 113 S. W. 896 (wife-murder; sundry evidence pointing to another person, held improperly excluded); Massachusetts: 1881, Com. v. Abbott, 130 Mass. 475 (cited ante, § 142); Michigan: 1913, People v. Emmons, 178 Mich. 126, 144 N. W. 479 (sale of fermented cider; evidence that other persons had the means of adulterating the cider sold, held admissible); Missouri: 1897, State v. Hack, 118 Mo. 92, 23 S. W. 1089 (third person's admissions of the larceny, excluded); North Carolina: 1833, State v. May, 4 Dev. 328, 331 (stealing a slave; evidence that another person, who lived near the slave, while the defendant lived at a distance, had been included in the original warrant for arrest, but had then fled the State, confessing himself guilty, excluded; but "direct evidence connecting W. with the 'corpus delicti' would certainly have been admissible"; the offered evidence, if not followed by evidence of an "overt act", was merely 'res inter alios acta'); 1846, State v. Duncan, 6 Ired. 236, 239 (accessory to murder; threats and arrest of other persons, excluded); 1873, State v. White, 68 N. C. 158 (larceny; suspicious conduct, and flight from the State, of a third person, excluded); 1874, State v. Haynes, 71 N. C. 79 (conduct of another person, before and after the crime, admitted); 1875, State v. Bishop, 73 N. C. 44, 46 (larceny; the familiarity of a third person with the premises, and his suspicious conduct on the night of the larceny, excluded); 1877, State v. Davis, 77 N. C. 483 (murder; threats of a third person, and his departure for the deceased's house, excluded, on the reasoning of State v. May); 1880, State v. Baxter, 82 N. C. 602 (larceny; another person's suspicious conduct, excluded); 1912, State v. Millican, 158 N. C. 617, 74 S. E. 107 (arson; the defendant's offer to show that during the time after their imprisonment other fires occurred in the same town; unsound; the offer here may have been defective in form, but the opinion's reasoning on the relevancy of such evidence shows a singular ignorance of the facts of crime and of the elements of logic); South Carolina: 1895, State v. Wallace, 44 S. C. 357, 22 S. E. 411 (a prosecuting witness was said to be the real thief, and other receipts of stolen property by him were admitted); Vermont: 1864, State v. Barron, 37 Vt. 57, 60 (illegal sale of liquor; a habit of "gentlemen in travelling about the country to carry spirituous liquors in bottles with them", not admitted to explain the source of bottles found in the defendant's public-house); 1883, Lewis v. Barker, 55 Vt. 23 (that a clerk in defendant's store had refused to work for him the day after it was burned; not admitted to show that the clerk had burned it); 1900, State v. Totten, 72 Vt. 71, 47 Atl. 105 (robbery; certain conduct of a third person indicating his guilt, excluded); Virginia: 1820, Rowt's Adm'r v. Kile's Adm'r, Gilmer, Va. 202 (action on an instrument of defendant; evidence of its forgery by the son of the payee, admissible; after "the agency of that person" in the forgery is made out, then that person's skill in imitating the hand in question would be admissible); West Virginia: 1871, Crookham v. State, 5 W. Va. 510, 513 (stabbing; threats and flight of another person, excluded).

[2] Contra: 1898, Chamberlain v. Pierson, 31 C. C. A. 157, 87 Fed. 420 (injury by derailment; to exonerate the defendant's employees, a conviction of third persons for causing the derailment was excluded); 1897, State v. Smarr, 121 N. C. 669, 28 S. E. 549 (that another had been convicted of the burglary charged, inadmissible).

But of course mere suspicion is nothing: 1899, Brown v. State, 120 Ala. 342, 25 So. 182 (merely showing that another was suspected, excluded).

Nor can the prosecution show that another person was acquitted, because this leaves still open the defendant's share in the act (except for the purpose mentioned in note 4, infra): 1893, People v. Mitchell, 100 Cal. 328, 334, 34 Pac. 698.

The general principle is applicable, it may be noted, equally to civil cases, such as the trespasses of animals.[3] Moreover, on the principle noticed already for the argument of opportunity (ante, § 132) the prosecution may in advance negative the argument by showing that other possible persons did not do the act.[4]

The fact of mistaken identity seems also to be relevant in this connection; the argument is that a third person, not the one charged, was really involved, and the fact of the existence of a third person capable of being mistaken for the one charged is some evidence that he possibly or probably did the things attributed to the person charged.[5]

§ 143. Suicide, or other Self-Infliction of Harm; Suicidal Plans. If the deceased, with whose death the defendant is charged, committed suicide, obviously the defendant could not have killed the deceased. There ought to be no doubt about the admissibility of plans or desires to commit suicide, even where no other evidence of its particular probability or feasibility is offered. Its improbability or non-feasibility should be matter for rebuttal, and should not exclude the evidence of its probability. That the evidence may be manufactured is no reason for its exclusion; for it may also not be manufactured, and if not, it is most cogent. The distance in time ought not to exclude the evidence of plans; for it does not exclude evidence of a defendant's threats (ante, § 108). That the deceased's hearsay statements of plan are admissible under an exception to the Hearsay rule, is plain (post, § 1725).

The relevancy of plans of suicide has been well expounded in the following passage:

1892, FIELD, C. J., in Com. v. Trefethen, 157 Mass. 180, 31 N. E. 961: "The nature of the case proved by the Commonwealth was such that it was not impossible that she had committed suicide. If it could be shown that she actually had an intention to commit suicide, it would be more probable that she did in fact commit it than if she had no such intention. . . . It may be true that an unmarried woman pregnant with child, if she has an intention to commit suicide, does not always carry that intention into effect, although she have an opportunity; but it is impossible to say that the actual existence of such an intention does not tend to throw some light upon the cause of death of such a woman when found dead under circumstances not inconsistent with the theory of suicide. . . . If it could be shown that during the week before her death she had actually attempted to drown herself, and had been prevented from doing so, it seems manifest that this fact, according to the general experience of mankind, would have some tendency to show that she might have made a second attempt."

[3] 1895, Green v. Skoqvist, 57 N. J. L. 617, 31 Atl. 228 (trespass by cattle; the trespassers of other persons' cattle, admitted);

Contra, but wrong: 1898, Dover v. Winchester, 70 Vt. 418, 41 Atl. 445 (sheep-killing; killing of other sheep by other dogs, not admissible to negative the guilt of defendant's dogs).

[4] 1897, Bram v. U. S., 168 U. S. 532, 18 Sup. 182 (where the probabilities lay between three persons).

[5] The argument is of course a common one, and only seldom has a ruling upon it been necessary: 1882, White v. Com., 80 Ky. 484 (mistaken identity allowed to be shown); 1881, State v. Witham, 72 Me. 531, 536 (adultery; testimony by a neighbor that the defendant had several times talked with the woman at her gate in the evenings of certain months; counter-testimony was admitted by a nearer neighbor that a person, not the defendant, had talked there during the same time; Peters, J., "Of course, both statements cannot be true; still it cannot reasonably be said that the truth of the one would not lessen the probability of the truth of the other").

Such evidence has constantly been admitted, as the annals of celebrated trials illustrate; until the squeamish doubtings of modern times, hesitating to accept the suggestions of natural logic, and not happening to be provided with justifying authority, furnished a few instances of rejection; but such rulings are without support from any point of view.[1]

§ 144. Same: Motive for Suicide. For the same reason, an emotion or feeling impelling to suicide is relevant; and facts tending to show the existence of such an emotion — either events, e.g. the pregnancy of a seduced woman, or conduct, e.g. exhibitions of melancholy or despair (two kinds of evidence dealt with post, §§ 391, 394) — should be received to show it. Contrary facts tending to show emotions averse to suicide would be equally admissible.[1]

§ 143. [1] ENGLAND: 1699, Spencer Cowper's Trial, 13 How. St. Tr. 1166 (murder, the issue being whether the deceased had committed suicide or was killed; evidence was received of her being melancholy and depressed; "she said her distemper lay in her mind, . . . and the sooner it did kill her the better; . . . she neglected herself in doing those things that were necessary for her health, in hopes it would carry her off, and often wished herself dead").

UNITED STATES: Federal: 1917, Brawner v. Royal Indemnity Co., 5th C. C. A., 246 Fed. 637 (life policy, issue of suicide; deceased's expressions of inclination to suicide, admitted); Florida: 1917, Kersey v. State, 73 Fla. 832, 74 So. 983 (murder of wife by shooting; deceased's statements of having taken poison with suicidal intent, excluded, because the death was by gunshot and the shooting could not have been done by herself; unsound); Illinois: 1859, Jumpertz v. People, 21 Ill. 408 (intention to commit suicide, and consistency of the mode of death with suicide, admitted); 1892, Siebert v. People, 143 Ill. 571, 584, 32 N. E. 431 (statements of suicidal intent excluded; no ruling on the question of relevancy); 1917, People v. Ahrling, 279 Ill. 70, 116 N. E. 764 (cited post, § 1726); Indiana: 1909, Carter v. State, 172 Ind. 227, 87 N. E. 1081 (cited more fully post, § 238, n. 6); Iowa: 1912, State v. Beeson, 155 Ia. 355, 136 N. W. 317 (cited more fully post, § 1725, n. 1); Kansas: 1896, State v. Asbell, 57 Kan. 398, 46 Pac. 770 (admitted, there being a possibility of suicide); Louisiana: 1851, Preston, J., in State v. Bradley, 6 La. An. 559 (putting as admissible the supposed fact of a letter being found on the person of the deceased declaring an intention to commit suicide); Massachusetts: 1882, Com. v. Felch, 132 Mass. 32 (abortion; to show a self-abortion by the deceased, her "purpose and intent" "would be if known a material aid in coming to a correct conclusion"; but her declarations of purpose were excluded); 1892, Com. v. Trefethen, 157 Mass. 180 (intention to commit suicide, the defendant being the deceased's seducer, admitted; overruling Com. v. Felch; see quotation supra); Minnesota: 1896, Hale v. Life Co., 65 Minn. 548, 68 N. W. 182 (insurance policy; the deceased's threat to commit suicide, not admitted to show suicide, because made two years before); Missouri: 1894, State v. Punshon, 124 Mo. 448, 457, 27 S. W. 1111 (threats of deceased wife to kill herself, excluded, on the ground of hearsay); 1896, State v. Punshon, same decision affirmed on second trial, 133 Mo. 44, 34 S. W. 25; 1895, State v. Fitzgerald, 130 Mo. 407, 32 S. W. 1113 (excluded, unless accompanied by an attempt to execute them; overruling State v. Ludwig, 70 Mo. 412); 1915, State v. Ilgenfritz, 263 Mo. 615, 173 S. W. 1041 (murder; deceased's threats of suicide, held admissible; overruling State v. Punshon and State v. Fitzgerald); New York: 1890, Smith v. Benef. Soc., 123 N. Y. 85, 25 N. E. 197 (suicide as a defence to an insurance policy; the deceased's design to commit suicide before taking out the policy, admitted); Ohio: 1872, Blackburn v. State, 23 Oh. St. 146, 149, 165 (intention more than six years before, admitted); Tennessee: 1884, Boyd v. State, 14 Lea 161, 177 (a disposition and intention to commit suicide, held admissible, "as there is no direct testimony as to the fact of the homicide"); Vermont: 1896, State v. Fournier, 68 Vt. 262, 35 Atl. 178 (question left undecided); 1898, State v. Marsh, 70 Vt. 288, 40 Atl. 836 (deceased's declarations that he was giving his horse arsenic as medicine, offered to show that he had it and might have used it himself, excluded).

Compare the citations post, § 1725 (declarations of intention to suicide).

§ 144. [1] 1699, Spencer Cowper's Trial, Eng. (see citation ante, § 143); 1904, State v. Kelly, 77 Conn. 266, 58 Atl. 705 (deceased's despondency several months before, excluded; unsound); 1859, Jumpertz v. People, 21 Ill. 408 (evidence admitted of mental condition of cheerfulness, or the contrary, pointing towards or against suicide); 1896, State v. Punshon, 133 Mo. 44, 34 S. W. 25 (the deceased's "disordered condition of mind", excluded); 1872, Blackburn v. State, 23 Oh. St. 165 (a previous melancholy disposition, tending to suicide, admitted; the interval between the death and the time testified to affecting only the weight of the evidence); 1884, Boyd v. State, 14 Lea Tenn. 161, 177 (melancholy or despondent disposition relevant on the question whether suicide was committed; Deaderick, C. J.: "The conditions and surroundings at the time of death may be looked into if of a character likely to impel suicide"); 1899, Morrison v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. 473, 51 S. W. 358 (deceased's cheerful behavior up to time of death, admitted to disprove suicide); 1898, State v. Marsh, 70 Vt. 288, 40 Atl. 837 (state of health of deceased, considered).

Compare the citations post, § 391 (motive for suicide).

SUB-TITLE I (continued): EVIDENCE TO PROVE A HUMAN ACT

TOPIC III: RETROSPECTANT EVIDENCE (TRACES,—MATERIAL, ORGANIC, AND MENTAL)

CHAPTER VIII.

§ 148. General Principle. The convenience has already been explained (ante, § 43) of grouping the various kinds of evidentiary facts according as they come, in time, before, at, or after, the act to be proved. There have now been considered the various kinds of evidentiary facts in the first two groups, i.e. facts having Prospectant and Concomitant indications; there remains the third group, namely, facts having a Restrospectant indication.

The inference here looks backward from the evidentiary fact to the alleged act; i.e. taking our stand at the fact offered, we infer from it that at some previous time the act was or was not done.

The common feature of this group of evidentiary facts is that they are all open to a similar source of weakness, and thus offer to the opponent a general mode of explaining away (ante, § 34) their force. Thus, if, to show that A on January 1 stole a bicycle, there is offered the fact of his possession of the bicycle on June 1, the probative force of this fact rests on the assumption that the hypothesis that will explain his possession is that he obtained the bicycle by stealing it. But there are also in truth other possible hypotheses, for example, that it was given or sold to him by the thief or by a purchaser from the thief, or that he found it. The question of admissibility is whether the hypothesis of his stealing is, among all hypotheses, 'prima facie' sufficiently prominent to make the fact admissible (on the general theory of Relevancy, ante, § 31); and, if it is admissible, the opponent may show that one of the other hypotheses is in truth a much more probable explanation (on the theory of Explanation, ante, § 34). So, if in proving the doing of an act by A as a mark of his former existence as B, there is offered (as in the Tichborne case) the fact that A has a recollection of the event, or if, to disprove it, we offer the fact that A has no recollection of it, the opponent may show, in the first instance, that the recollection has come, not from having done the act, but from having heard or read about it; and, in the second instance, that the lack of recollection is due, not to not having done the act, but to the natural fading of memory.

In short, the tests of Relevancy and the opportunities of Explanation are of the same general nature in this group of evidentiary facts. The general argument runs: Is the trace one whose possession (or lack of possession) by the person charged could be explained by the operation of other causes than the doing (or not doing) of the act in question?[1]

The kinds of facts may best be roughly subdivided according to the mode in which such causes might operate, i.e. according as the connection between the evidentiary trace and the act in question is mechanical, organic, or mental. The typical case of the first is the possession of stolen goods; of the second sort, corporal resemblance of child to parent; of the third sort, consciousness of guilt.

a. MECHANICAL TRACES

§ 149. Miscellaneous Instances in Criminal Cases; Identity-Evidence distinguished. The presence upon the person or premises of articles, fragments, stains, tools, or any other resulting circumstance, is constantly employed as the basis of an inference that the person did an act with which these circumstances are associated. In general, however, few questions of relevancy arise.[1] There are innumerable instances in the records of celebrated

§ 148. [1] From the point of view of logic and psychology as applicable to argument before the jury (not the rules of Admissibility), see the materials collected in the present author's "Principles of Judicial Proof, as given by Logic, Psychology, and General Experience, and illustrated in Judicial Trials" (1913), §§ 138–155.

§ 149. [1] Federal: 1909, Sorenson v. U. S., 8th C. C. A., 168 Fed. 785 (burglary; possession of revolver, nitroglycerine, etc., 18 days later, excluded on the facts); Ala. 1892, Gilmore v. State, 99 Ala. 154, 159, 13 So. 536 (boot-tracks); 1897, Thornton v. State, 113 Ala. 43, 21 So. 356 (book and pencil); 1909, Phillips v. State, 162 Ala. 14, 50 So. 194 (human trials; but their relevancy is so patent that no occasion is given for rulings of law:

> "Who finds the heifer dead and bleeding fresh,
> And sees, fast by, a butcher with an axe,
> But will suspect 'twas he that made the slaughter?"
>
> William Shakspeare, Henry VI., Pt. II, III, 2.

1850, Mr. W. Wills, Circumstantial Evidence, 3d ed., 96: "In a case of burglary, the thief had gained admittance to the house by means of a penknife, which was broken in the attempt, and part left in the window-frame; the broken knife was found in the pocket of the prisoner, and perfectly corresponded with the fragment. . . . In another case, identification was established by the correspondence of the wadding of fire-arms with part of a torn letter found in the prisoner's possession; and in a case on the Northern circuit, where a man had been shot by a ball, the wadding of the pistol, which stuck in the wound, was found to be part of a ballad, which corresponded with another part found in the pocket of the prisoner."

(1) The few rulings recorded are merely the occasional instances in which such questions have been (usually quite without necessity) pushed to a decision in the higher Court.

(2) It is to be noted that (on the principle of § 34, ante) the opponent may always explain away the indication by showing other hypotheses for the presence of the trace, — as where, on a charge of murder, the presence of blood-stains is explained by the killing of a chicken, or the presence of a weapon by the owner's previous loan of it to another person. It is also to be noted that an argument may be based negatively on such traces, — as where it is shown, on a charge of murder, that the murderer must have been stained with blood, while the accused bears no blood-stains and therefore could not have done the killing. To this also there is a counter-argument (of Explanation) that the absence of such traces can be accounted for by their intervening destruction.

(3) The question may be asked, What is the distinction between evidence of Traces and evidence of Identity? For example, to prove a murder, evidence tracks); Fla. 1893, Whetston v. State, 31 Fla. 240, 250, 12 So. 661 (shoe-tracks excluded, because having no marked peculiarities); Iowa: 1907, State v. Kehr, 133 Ia. 35, 110 N. W. 149 (burglary while armed with a revolver; the possession of a revolver when arrested two months later, excluded; this is finical); Kan. 1905, State v. McAnarney, 70 Kan. 679, 79 Pac. 137 (blood-stains on trousers; excluded here, because the trousers had been placed in contact with the deceased's bloody clothing before chemical testing); Ky. 1900, Ireland v. Com., — Ky. —, 57 S. W. 616 (slungshot, excluded on the facts); Me. 1870, State v. Kingsbury, 58 Me. 238, 243 (fire set by kerosene; presence of kerosene stains on a shirt admitted); Mass. 1850, Webster's Trial, 5 Cush. 295, 318, Barnes' Rep., 84 (the lower jaw of the deceased, etc., found on the defendant's premises); Mo. 1898, State v. Miller, 144 Mo. 26, 45 S. W. 1104 (pistols); N. Y. 1908, People v. Del Vermo, 192 N. Y. 470, 85 N. E. 690 (knife like that with which a killing was done); N. Dak. 1897, State v. Campbell, 7 N. D. 58, 72 N. W. 935 (burglary; various tools, etc., admitted); S. Dak. 1898, State v. Garrington, 11 S. D. 178, 76 N. W. 326 (sack of defendant found on premises the next day, admitted); Tex. 1899, Pike v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. 613, 51 S. W. 395 (the fact of the sale of some liquor being admitted, the presence of drunken men about the defendant's store was admitted to show that the liquor was intoxicating; compare R. v. Burton, cited post, § 152 and the cases in § 153); Utah: 1906, State v. Freshwater, 30 Utah 442, 85 Pac. 447 (defective typewriter showing the mark on a letter); Va. 1898, McBride v. Com., 95 Va. 818, 30 S. E. 454 (certain traces held inadmissible).

is offered that a gun found in the defendant's possession is exactly fitted by the bullet found in the body of the deceased; what kind of evidence is this? The truth is that this evidentiary fact is really double and involves both kinds of inferences. The nature of the argument to prove Identity (post, § 411) is that a certain fact offered is an essential mark of sameness of person, — in this instance, that the fit of the bullet is a necessary and unique mark of the slayer. The weakness of this type of argument is that the mark may not be necessarily associated with one person but may be common to a number of persons; and hence the mode of dealing with such evidence is to show that other persons also have the same mark, — here, that other persons in the neighborhood possessed guns of the same bore. Now the argument from Traces assumes that the argument to identity has been settled and accepted, i.e. here it assumes that the use of the gun in question is an essential or sufficient mark of the murderer, and it then sets about to prove that the accused possessed that mark, i.e. used that gun; and to do this it offers the fact of its subsequent finding in the accused's possession. Here the weakness of the argument is an entirely new and different one, namely, the trace of subsequent possession does not necessarily indicate a use at the time of the murder, since the gun may be one which the accused has recently borrowed, or it may be his own gun which was lent to another person at the time of the murder. Thus, there are two wholly different evidentiary questions involved in the use of this evidence, — first, the question of Identity, whether this individual gun is a necessary mark of the slayer; and secondly, the question of Traces, whether its subsequent possession evidences its use at the time of the murder. The present type of argument, then, — the argument from Traces to a former act, — is a distinct argument from that of Identity. Although in some instances the same circumstance offered may give rise to both arguments, this is by no means necessary or usual, and there is no essential connection between the two kinds of arguments.

§ 150. Brands on Animals and Timber. When an animal is found in B's possession, and the animal bears a brand or other mark, and one of the issues is whether A is the owner of the animal, it is a natural and immediate inference that the animal belongs to the person whose brand it bears, and, if that brand is A's, then to A. This inference, however, while sufficiently probable in the light of practical experience, is in truth a composite one, made up of two steps: (1) first, the inference, from the presence of A's usual mark, that A placed this particular mark, — a genuine argument under the present principle, from a trace to the source of the trace; and (2) secondly, the inference from the fact that A placed it there, to the fact of his ownership of the animal. The latter step of inference is the vital one; it is perhaps not less natural than the former, but it is more serious in its effect. Its real probative foundation is that of the well-established presumption of ownership from possession (post, § 2515).

Courts have usually held, when the question was raised, that the inference of ownership may be drawn, as a matter of common law;[1] and it has been universally conceded that the presence of the brand is evidence of identity (i.e. of the animal being one of those originally branded by the brand-user) even though not of ownership. The larger scope of the evidence has been generally confirmed by legislation. In most of the stock-raising communities, the brand on animals is made evidence of ownership; though in order to encourage registration and thus prevent confusion, the rule is applied only to brands duly registered by law.[2]

§ 150. [1] 1900, R. v. Forsythe, 4 N. W. Terr. Can. 398 (a brand is on common law principles evidence of ownership; Rouleau, J., diss.; best opinion on the subject, by McGuire, J.); 1886, People v. Bollinger, 71 Cal. 17, 11 Pac. 799; (larceny; "an earmark used by the alleged owners of the hogs was some evidence of ownership"); 1907, State v. Wolfley, 75 Kan. 403, 89 Pac. 1016 (on common-law principles a brand may be evidence of ownership as well as of identity); 1865, Plummer v. Newdigate, 2 Duv. Ky. 1 (a brand "U. S." is admissible as evidence of ownership, but is not 'per se' sufficient evidence); 1886, State v. Cardelli, 19 Nev. 319, 10 Pac. 433, semble (at common law a cattle-brand may be some evidence of ownership); 1888, Stewart v. Hunter, 16 Or. 62, 16 Pac. 876 ("Branding stock furnishes evidence of its ownership").

Contra: 1872, Peoples v. Devault, 11 Heisk. 431 (a "U. S." brand is not evidence of ownership unless shown to have been put on by U. S. officers).

For the use of an unrecorded brand as indicating a scheme to suppress evidence of larceny, see post, § 278.

[2] It should be remembered that some of the ensuing decisions interpret earlier statutes which may have been changed in the interval: CANADA: Dom. R. S. 1906, c. 146, Crim. C. § 989, (in criminal cases, the presence upon cattle of a duly recorded brand or mark is to be evidence of ownership); Alta. St. 1913, 2d sess., c. 24, § 5 (brand not vented shall be evidence of ownership by registered brand-owner); Br. C. St. 1914, 4 Geo. V, c. 9, § 5 (stock-brand not vented to be evidence of ownership, if recorded and uncancelled); Man. R. S. 1913, c. 25, § 8 (cattle-brand duly allotted shall be evidence of ownership, where title to cattle is involved); N. W. Terr. Cons. Ord. 1898, c. 76, § 5, St. 1900, c. 22, § 5 ("the presence of a recorded brand on any stock" shall be evidence of the ownership of the animal); Ontario: St. 1919, c. 70, Brand Act, § 4 (certificate of recorded brand of stock shall be evidence of "the ownership of such certificate" with further proof of authenticity); Saskatchewan: R. S. 1920, c. 123, § 5 (duly recorded brand shall be "'prima facie' evidence of the ownership by the owner of such brand of the animal bearing the same").

UNITED STATES: Arizona: Rev. St. 1913, Civ. c. § 3760 (on trial for violation of the stock laws, the presence of brand or earmark "claimed by the accused to be his brand or mark", though not recorded, is evidence of conversion; and the ownership of live-stock from a foreign State, etc., "may be shown by the marks or brands thereupon" though not recorded); § 3757 (official record of live-stock brands, proved by certified copy, is 'prima facie' evidence of all the facts required to be entered in said book", and of the rights of the person named, or of the assignee on proof of assignment, "to use said brand", etc.); § 3758 (brand or earmark duly recorded is prima facie evidence that the animal "is the property of the owner of such brand and earmark", except when the animal is one seized pursuant to this law, and except for fresh brands upon mavericks, etc.); 1901, Brill v. Christy, 7 Ariz. 217, 63 Pac. 757 (statute held not to make the recorded brand evidence of ownership); 1914, Marley v. State, 15 Ariz. 495, 140 Pac. 215 (St. 1905, c. 51, §§ 66, 67, and St. 1912, c. 4, p. 13, as to brand evidence of ownership, considered); California: Pol. C. 1872, § 3168 (county recorder's certified copy of recorded cattle brand or mark is evidence "as to the ownership of all animals legally marked or branded"); § 3172 (in action to recover possession, "the mark or brand is prima facie evidence that the animal belongs to the owner of the mark or brand"); Colorado: Comp. St. 1921, § 3119 (earmarks may be used in evidence "in connection with the owner's recorded brand"); § 3126 (in all suits or criminal proceedings involving the title to animals, a certified copy of the record of a brand shall be "prima facie evidence of the ownership of such animal"); 1895, Chesnut v. People, 21 Colo. 512, 523, 42 Pac. 656 (recorded brand, admissible "merely as a mark of identification"); 1897, Brooke v. People, 23 Colo. 375; 48 Pac. 502 (unrecorded brand; same);
Idaho: Comp. St. 1919, §§ 1920, 1924, 1927 (in all proceedings where title or right of possession is involved, the brand on an animal, if duly recorded, shall be 'prima facie' evidence that "the animal belongs to" the brand-owner and that the latter has the right of possession at the time of action; "no evidence of ownership of stock by brands or for the purpose of identification shall be permitted" unless the brand is recorded; the State recorder's certified copy of the record, or the original certificate, shall be evidence of the right to use the brand; "parol evidence shall be inadmissible to prove the ownership of a brand"); § 1944 (brandbook, recording animals to be removed from State, to be "evidence of the facts recited therein"); 1907, State v. Dunn, 13 Ida. 9, 88 Pac. 235 (under the statute oral evidence of the ownership of a brand is inadmissible; since the statute, "still the brand itself may serve as the means to the owner himself for the identification of the animal"; compare § 1639, post); 1920, State v. Grimmett, 33 Ida. 203, 193 Pac. 380 (larceny; unrecorded brand admissible to evidence identity, though not ownership, under St. 1913, c. 171, p. 543, amending Rev. C. 1908, § 1228);

Illinois: Rev. St. 1874, c. 88, § 3 (county clerk's record of stock brands and marks, admissible);

Missouri: Rev. St. 1919, § 4251 ("If any dispute shall arise about the question of whose any particular mark or brand may be, it shall be decided by the record of the clerk [of the county court]"; an interesting specimen of primitive legislative modes of expression);

Nebraska: § 90 (ownership of cattle, horses, mules, and swine in issue; the recorded brand to be 'prima facie' evidence of "ownership of the person whose brand it may be"); § 106 (on trial of offences concerning cattle running at large, etc., "proof of brand shall be deemed 'prima facie' evidence of ownership of such stock)";

Nevada: Rev. L. 1912, § 7172 (on trial of offences concerning animals running at large upon a range, "the brand and other marks upon such animal shall be prima facie evidence of ownership"); § 2237 (on trial of actions for possession of any animal marked or branded as provided by statute, "the mark and brand" shall be primary evidence of ownership); § 2234 (certified copy by recorder under seal of recorded mark and brand, to be evidence of ownership in "any action" of all animals legally marked and branded); 1886, State v. Cardelli, 19 Nev. 319, 10 Pac. 433 (an unrecorded brand may be evidence of ownership)

New Mexico: Annot. St. 1915, § 118 (no brand not lawfully recorded "shall be recognized as evidence of ownership of the horses", etc.); § 122 (in prosecutions for cattle-offences, certified copy of the registered brand "shall be sufficient to identify all horses" etc., and "shall be prima facie proof that the person owning the recorded brand is the owner of the animal branded with such brand"); 1891, Pryor v. Portsmouth C. Co., 6 N. Mex. 44, 27 Pac. 327 (instruction under the statute construed); 1892, Terr. v. Chavez, 6 N. Mex. 455, 30 Pac. 902 (the brand is evidence equally for an assignee of it); 1901, Gale v. Salas, 11 N. Mex. 211, 66 Pac. 520 (statute applied); 1909, Terr. v. Valles, 15 N. Mex. 228, 103 Pac. 984 (larceny; unrecorded brand is evidence of identity);

North Dakota: Comp. L. 1913, § 2596 (certificate of record of brand or mark of stock by commissioner of agriculture and labor, to be "evidence of ownership"); § 2597 (vent-brand to be "prima facie evidence of the sale or transfer of such stock"); § 2605 (where a certificate of brand or mark is lost or destroyed, "the original brand records only shall be prima facie evidence of ownership, except where a fact can otherwise be established");

Oklahoma: Comp. St. 1921, § 4028 (recorded brand on stock, to be evidence of ownership); 1906, Hurst v. Terr., 16 Okl. 600, 86 Pac. 280 (larceny of cattle; an unrecorded brand is evidence of ownership; the statutory rule merely provides an additional, not an exclusive sort of evidence, Texas rulings distinguished);

Oregon: Laws 1920, § 9162, as amended by St. 1921, Feb. 21, c. 151 ("No evidence of ownership of stock by brand, or for the purpose of identification, shall be permitted" unless the brand is recorded: except as in § 1968); § 1968 (for animals other than sheep, goats, or hogs, earmarks "shall be taken in evidence in connection with the owner's recorded brand", when title is in issue; for sheep, hogs, and goats, earmarks as well as brands etc. "shall be considered in evidence" when title is in issue, even though not recorded); 1899, State v. Hanna, 35 Or. 195, 57 Pac. 629; State v. Morse, 35 Or. 462, 57 Pac. 631; 1914, State v. Henderson, 72 Or. 201, 143 Pac. 627 (unrecorded brand is admissible to identify); 1920, State v. Moss, 95 Or. 616, 188 Pac. 702 (where two brands are found, one older than the other, the presumption of ownership attaches to the earlier brand); 1917, State v. Randolph, 85 Or. 172, 166 Pac. 555 (under St. 1915, c. 33, an unrecorded braad cannot be used to evidence either identity or ownership; history of the legislation examined); 1919, State v. Warner, 91 Or. 11, 178 Pac. 221 (larceny; under St. 1915, c. 33, § 3, all evidence of ownership or identification founded on an unrecorded brand is excluded; Bean, J., diss. because here there was other evidence than the unrecorded brand);

South Dakota: Rev. C. 1919, § 8135 (in civil action involving title, recorded brand on animal is "prima facie evidence of the ownership of the person whose brand it may be"; and "proof of the right of any person to use any brand shall be made by a copy of the record of the same", etc.);

Texas: (recorded brand on stock is evidence of ownership); Rev. Civ. St. § 7160 ("No brands except such as are recorded by the officers named in this chapter shall be recognized in law as any evidence of ownership of the cattle, horses, or mules upon which the same may be used"); St. 1913, c. 69, p. 129 (amending Rev. Civ. St. § 7160, by providing "that this shall not apply in criminal cases"); 1898, Turner v. State, 39 Tex. Cr. 327, 45 S. W. 1020 (larceny; brand recorded after the date of the alleged taking is not evidence of ownership under the statute; moreover, as evidence of identity it is unnecessary; prior cases on the latter point disapproved); 1900, Welch v. State, 42 Tex. Cr. 338, S. W. 46 (preceding case approved, but treated as holding that the unrecorded or subsequently recorded brand is at least evidence of identity); 1899, Chowning v. State, 41 Tex. Cr. 81, 51 S. W. 946 (like Welch v. State; repudiating Tittle v. State, 30 Tex. App. 597); 1900, Walton v. State, 41 Tex. Cr. 454, 55 S. W. 566 (recorded brand is evidence of ownership, even in a county other than where recorded); 1903, Swan v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 76 S. W. 464 (Turner case cited, but held not to exclude but merely to limit the purpose of a multiple brand as evidence); 1903, Sapp v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 77 S. W. 456 (Turner and Welch Cases, supra, both approved).

The same policy has led, in timber-producing communities, to similar legislation for marks on logs and timber.[3]

Utah: Comp. L. 1917, § 211 (State livestock board secretary's record of marks and brands; certified copy "shall be deemed evidence in law");

Washington: R. & B. Code 1909, § 3158 (recorded stock-brand, to be evidence of ownership of animal);

Wyoming: Comp. St. 1920, § 7474 (on any indictment, "proof of the brand thereon shall be sufficient to identify all classes of live-stock, and proof of the ownership of such brand shall by prima facie evidence of the ownership of such live stock"); (live-stock brands; § 3095 certified copy of recorded brand to be "prima facie evidence" of the ownership of such animal by the party whose brand or mark it might be, and shall be taken as evidence of ownership in all civil or criminal proceedings "when the title to the animal is involved or proper to be proved, when such claim is sustained and corroborated with other evidence"); 1916, Harris v. State, 23 Wyo. 487, 153 Pac. 881 (larceny; certified copy of recorded brand, admitted, under St. 1913, c. 126, and Comp. St. 1910, § 6177).

Distinguish here the inference of larceny of cattle from the possession of stock misbranded with the defendant's brand placed over another brand. Here the inference is from the act of misbranding the stock to the act of stealing, i.e. the inference from defendant's conduct in fabricating evidence of his ownership so as to conceal the evidence of actual ownership by another. This inference belongs therefore under the principle of § 278, post (fabrication of evidence as an implied admission). But it rests on the additional assumption that the defendant himself effected or was privy to the misbranding, and not merely on the fact of the misbranding or of the finding of such stock in defendant's possession. Hence the ruling in State v. Moss, 95 Or. 616, 188 Pac. 702 (1920), cited post, § 278, n. 6.

[3] CANADA: R. S. 1906, c. 146, Crim. C. § 990 (in trials for certain offences concerning timber, a duly registered timber-mark shall be evidence of ownership of the timber).

UNITED STATES: Ark. Dig. 1919, § 8407 (logs and timber "having any such recorded mark impressed or fixed thereon shall be presumed to belong" to the person recorded for that mark); Fla. Rev. G. S. 1919, § 2396 ("Any log found" bearing recorded brand "shall be deemed prima facie to be the property of such person"): § 3903 (official stamp "appearing upon timber or lumber adrift", to be evidence of ownership); Minn. Gen. St. 1913, § 5471 (recorded log-mark on logs to be evidence of ownership); Mo. Rev. St. 1919, § 10322 (recorded mark on logs, lumber, etc., to be evidence of ownership); § 5727 (recorder of deeds' record of flour-brands, provable by certified copy); N. Mex. Annot. St. 1915, § 3377 (log-brands; "the certificate of the recorded brand and the proof of the brand upon any such product shall be prima facie evidence of the ownership thereof"); N. Y. Com. L. 1909, Navigation, § 73 (presence of recorded mark on floating logs or timber, presumptive evidence of ownership of party recording); North Carolina: Con. St. 1919, § 3989 (timber marked with registered trade-mark is presumed to be "the property of the proprietor of such trademark"); Oh. Gen. Code Ann. 1921, § 6232 (registered trade-mark on timber, to be prima facie evidence of trade-mark proprietor's ownership of timber); Or. Laws 1920, § 7651 (recorded mark on log or timber, to be evidence of ownership); Philippine Islands: Admin. C. 1917, § 517 (registered brand of animals; the copy issued to the owner is to be "a certificate of ownership, which certificate shall be 'prima facie' evidence that the animal is the property of the person therein named as owner"); 1908, Catabian v. Tungcul, 11 P. I. 49; Wash. R. & B. Code 1909, § 7094 (recorded mark on logs or timber afloat, to be evidence of ownership); W. Va. Code 1914, c. 62E, § 16, St. 1882, c. 119 (trade-mark on timber; the timber presumed to be "the property of the proprietor of such trade-mark"); Wisconsin: Stats. 1919, § 1739 (recorded mark on logs or timber afloat, raises presumption of ownership).

Distinguish the question whether the official register of brands or marks is admissible to show a person to be entitled to use the brand recorded as his; this is usually dealt with in the same legislation, but it falls under another principle (post, § 1647).

§ 150*a*. Tags, Signs, and Number-Plates on Automobiles, Railroad Cars, Ships, and other Vehicles and Premises. The foregoing principle is equally applicable to other marks on property, provided only in common experience the particular kind of mark is associated with ownership or control of the person signified by the mark. Thus, the name or number marked on a shop, a ship, a railroad car, or other chattel or structure, may be admissible to show that person's ownership or control.[1] In particular, the number-plate borne on an automobile is admissible to show that the person who originally registered that number as owner is the owner of the car bearing that number-plate.[2] This would be plain on principle at common law; yet only a few

§ 150a*. [1] Canada: 1921, R. v. Hayton, 57 D. L. R. 532, Ont. (keeping liquor; the brand "liquor" on a box, held not sufficient evidence of contents); Illinois: 1903, Chicago City R. Co. v. Carroll, 206 Ill. 318, 68 N. E. 1087 (injury by defendant's railroad car; that the cars running on the line where the plaintiff was injured bore the inscription "Chicago City R. Co.", admitted); 1895, Pittsburgh, F. W. & C. R. Co. v. Callaghan, 157 Ill. 406, 41 N. E. 909 (lettering on locomotive cab, held to be evidence of ownership by purporting owner); Iowa: 1913, Howell v. Mandelbaum & Sons, 160 Ia. 119, 140 N. W. 397 (name on a wagon, held evidence of ownership; cases collected); Kansas: 1907, State v. Ford, 76 Kan. 424, 91 Pac. 1056 (keeping a place for illegal sale of liquor; bills of sale of liquor found in the defendant's cash register, naming him as vendee, admitted, as analogous to the circumstantial evidence of tags on goods); Mass. 1859: Stearns v. Doe, 12 Gray 482, 486 (port-name on stern of vessel); 1883, Com. v. Collier, 134 Mass. 203, 205 (label on barrel); 1900, Ingraham v. Chapman, 177 Mass. 123, 58 N. E. 171 (presence of name on a dog's collar is some evidence of the person's ownership; "it is like the case of a brand or mark upon cattle"); 1916, Robinson v. Doe, 224 Mass. 319, 112 N. E. 1007 (battery by a man alleged to be an agent of the deft circus-owner; the signs on wagons, etc., and the men's uniforms, etc., held to be sufficient evidence of defendant's identity as owner and employer); 1922, Eshenwald v. Suffolk Brewing Co., — Mass. —, 134 N. E. 642 (personal injury caused by defendant's wagon; the marked name on the wagon, etc., admitted as evidence of ownership); Mich. 1918, Theisen v. Detroit T. & T. Co., 200 Mich. 136, 166 N. W. 901 (agency evidenced by defendant's letterhead bearing agent's name); N. Y. 1910, People v. Hill, 198 N. Y. 64, 91 N. E. 272 (murder; keys with tag bearing defendant's name found at the place; held doubtful; this case shows how different a man the judge is when reasoning about his own affairs at home and reasoning in the judicial strait-jacket; suppose he had forbidden a certain young man to court his daughter and then one morning found on the parlor floor by the sofa a bunch of keys with the tabooed young man's name; would he hold that "there was some doubt whether the evidence was properly admitted"?); Or. Laws 1920, § 8776 (fraudulent use of food container; stamped name on container, presumed to be that of the owner); W. Va. Code 1914, c. 62E, § 22, St. 1897, c. 15 (bottle bearing trademark, presumed to be the property of trademark owner).

[2] Conn. St. 1921, c. 400, § 45 (motor-vehicles; "proof of the registration number of any motor vehicle therein concerned [i.e. violation of law] shall be prima facie evidence in any criminal case that the owner was the operator thereof"); Mass. 1910, Trombley v. Stevens-Duryea Co., 206 Mass. 516, 92 N. E. 764 (an automobile, occupied by the driver only, injured the plaintiff; held (1) that the number borne on the car with the certificate of registration of the defendant, who was not the driver, were sufficient evidence of the defendant's ownership or right to possession; (2) that the driver's possession of the automobile was no evidence that he was the agent or servant of the owner; the Court's opinion is on the latter point, inconsistent, for after first stating the question to be "whether there was evidence for the jury", it proceeds to rule that "there is no presumption"; whichever ruling the Court meant to make, it is unsound as a matter of practical experience, which is the basis of all presumptions); Mich. 1918, Hatter v. Dodge Bros., 202 Mich. 97, 167 N. W. 935 ("a proof of the license number upon an automobile . . . identifies both vehicle and ownership"); Minn. Gen. St. 1913, § 2643 (in proceedings against the registered owner of a of the elaborate motor-vehicle statutes expressly so declare. But the apparent caution exercised by watchful devotees of automobilist interests in keeping such a provision out of the statutes should not permit the common-law principle to be ignored by the courts; for it is a dictate of common sense.

The principle of Explanation (ante, § 149, 34) leaves the opponent free to point out any facts which in the case in hand weaken the inference from general experience.

But a caution is necessary in extending the analogy of these brand and mark cases to the use of tags, labels, bills of sale, and other documents.[3] The basis of the inference in the brand cases is the known custom that only the owner ordinarily imprints a brand or mark of his initials, name, etc. But when e.g. a bill of sale for liquor sold by Roe to J. S. is found on J. S.'s premises, the inscription to J. S. is by custom the statement of the vendor, hence is (even when authenticated) no more than the vendor's hearsay statement; hence, its only available status, prima facie, is that of an admission of J. S.; to bring it to this point, the principles of §§ 260 and 1073, post, must be invoked and satisfied.

§ 151. Postmarks on Envelopes. The postmark on an envelope is, upon the same principle, admissible to show that the envelope bearing it had passed through the hands of the postal officials at the time and place indicated. Here, however, the question separates itself more distinctly into two others, — first, whether the postmark may be assumed genuine, without more evidence (post, § 2152), and if so, whether the postmark, regarded as a statement of the postal official, may be admitted under the Hearsay exception for official statements (post, § 1674). This analysis might be applicable equally to the brands of stock and timber; but it seems not to have been made, and its recognition for postmarks only is due to the course of early English rulings.

§ 151*a*. Fingerprints; Footmarks. (1) The inference from fingerprints, in its present aspect, is no different from the inference from any other Trace, e.g. a paint-smear or a torn coat. The peculiar strength of this evidence motor-vehicle, "the fact that such motor-vehicle has upon it the registration-number assigned to such owner under this Act shall be prima facie evidence that such motor-vehicle belonged to such registered owner"); N. Mex. St. 1912, c. 28, § 4 ("in any controversy respecting the identity or ownership or control of an automobile, the number borne by it shall be prima facie evidence that it was owned and operated by the person to whom the license therefor was issued"); N. D. Comp. L. 1913, § 2976 (in actions against registered owner of motor-vehicle, the presence on the vehicle of the registration number assigned under the statute is evidence "that such motor-vehicle belonged to such registered owner"); Pa. St. 1919, June 30, § 30, Dig. 1920, § 995, automobiles (motor vehicles; "the registration number displayed on such motor vehicle shall be prima facie evidence that the owner of such vehicle was then operating the same"; with detailed rule for overcoming the presumption); Wyo. Comp. St. 1920, § 3484 ("in any controversy respecting the identity or ownership or control of any motor vehicle, the number borne by it shall be prima facie evidence that it was owned and operated by the person to whom the certificate of registration therefor was issued").

Distinguish the question whether the ownership of the car is evidence of the agency of the driver (post, § 2509).

[3] As applied in State v. Ford, Kan., supra, n. 1.

lies rather in the Identity inference; for the use of all evidence from Traces involves commonly both inferences at the same time (as noted ante, § 149). Fingerprints as evidence can therefore better be considered under Identity (post, § 413*a*).[1]

(2) The inference from footmarks is also no different, in its present aspect, from the inference from other Traces. Here, too, the Identity inference plays an important part, in that the Identity inference (in contrast to the use of fingerprints) is apt to be specially weak, because open to special dangers. It is therefore considered under Identity (post, § 413*b*).

§ 152. Possession of Stolen Chattels. On a charge of taking goods, the fact that A was found, subsequently to the taking, in possession of the goods taken is relevant to show that he was the taker. It is true that several other hypotheses are conceivable as explaining the fact of his possession; nevertheless the hypothesis that he was the taker is a sufficiently natural one to allow the fact of his possession to be considered as evidentiary. There has never been any question of this:

1866, POLLOCK, C. B., in R. v. Exall, 4 F. & F. 922 (burglary; the three accused were seen near the place on the night in question, and the next morning the watch was found on Exall): "The law is that if, recently after the commission of the crime, a person is found in possession of the stolen goods, that person is called upon to account for the possession, — that is, to give an explanation of it which is not unreasonable or improbable. The strength of the presumption which arises from such possession is in proportion to the shortness of the interval which has elapsed. If the interval has been only an hour or two, not half a day, the presumption is so strong that it almost amounts to proof, because the reasonable inference is that the person must have stolen the property; in the ordinary affairs of life, it is not probable that the person could have got possession of the property in any other way. . . . Such evidence is, no doubt, not conclusive. As an illustration of this, I may mention that I remember hearing the late Baron Gurney say that he once picked up something lying in the road and observed, 'Now if this has been stolen and I am found with it, I might be charged with the robbery.' The other circumstances in the case, however, will always aid or rebut the presumption, and it is not the less evidence because it is not conclusive evidence. It is some evidence, if its weight depends upon the circumstances, and especially on the nature of the possession, whether it is open and avowed or secret and concealed, and what is the nature of the account given of it. What the jury have to consider in each case is, what is the fair inference to be drawn from all the circumstances before them, and whether they believe the account given by the prisoner is under the circumstances reasonable and probable or otherwise."

The use of this sort of evidence goes back as far as any in our law; for in the earlier system of Germanic law the possession of goods stolen gave rise to a peculiar and particularly speedy mode of procedure unfavorable to the accused. In modern times the fact of recent possession is also given a procedural effect, in that it casts upon the defendant the duty of producing an explanation, in default of which the case may be closed adversely to him.

151a. [1] Whether the object — door, table, etc. — on which the fingerprints were impressed must be produced in proving them, depends upon the general principle as to the production of chattels (post, § 1182).

This effect of the evidence as a presumption or as sufficient ('prima facie') evidence is dealt with elsewhere (post, § 2513).

The inquiry is here as to the admissibility of the evidence, and only one or two questions capable of dispute have ever been suggested. The time of the subsequent possession is immaterial; the lapse of a long interval opens a greater possibility of innocent explanations, and may prevent the raising of a presumption of law, but does not alter the relevancy of the fact.[1] Possession by a husband can probably not be used against the wife, unless the husband is shown to be ignorant of the presence of the articles.[2] The possession of goods of the same kind as the general class of goods from which the taking was done is receivable, even though the specific quantity or any quantity of the general mass cannot be identified or discovered or shown to be missing.[3] But these and other questions are almost invariably discussed in judicial opinions from the point of view of the legal presumption to be attached to the evidence (post, § 2513), and not as involving a question of admissibility. Where a presumption is held to be created, the admissibility of the evidence is of course conceded; but where the presumption is refused, it is sometimes difficult to say whether the inadmissibility of the evidence is also intended to be declared.

§ 153. Possession of Chattels as indicating other Crimes than Larceny. Wherever goods have been taken as a part of the criminal act, the fact of the subsequent possession is some indication that the possessor was the taker, and therefore the doer of the whole crime. Thus such possession is receivable to prove the commission of other acts than the simple crime of larceny. It is receivable to show the commission of a burglary,[1] a forgery,[2] a counter-

§ 152. [1] 1862, R. v. Wilson, 2 F. & F. 123, Bramwell, B. (said to be "strong evidence", if "shortly after" the stealing; here seventeen months after; yet the evidence was used); 1846, Com. v. Montgomery, 11 Metc. 534, 537 ("at a period somewhat distant", sufficient).

[2] See post, § 2513.

[3] England: 1854, R. v. Burton, Dears. Cr. C. 282 (larceny of pepper; the defendant was found coming out of the warehouse with pepper in his pockets of a sort similar to that on the next floor above in the warehouse, but it could not be shown that any pepper was missing; Maule, J., admitting the evidence: "If a man go into the London Docks sober without means of getting drunk, and comes out of one of the cellars very drunk wherein are a million gallons of wine, I think that would be reasonable evidence that he had stolen some of the wine in that cellar, though you could not prove that any wine was stolen or any wine was missed"); 1881, Sartin v. State, 7 Lea Tenn. 679 (stealing M's horse; the defendant when found was riding M's mule, and evidence was received of the stealing of M's mule on a day subsequent to that charged, in company with C, who when found was riding M's horse charged to have been stolen by the defendant); 1898, Parker v. U. S., 1 Ind. Terr. 592, 43 S. W. 858 (larceny of cattle; defendant's possession of other stolen cattle not received to identify those charged, because not taken from the same place).

For other cases concerning the possession of stolen goods as evidence of crime on other evidential principles, see post, §§ 218, 414.

§ 153. [1] 1904, McCormick v. State, 141 Ala. 75, 37 So. 377 (watch); 1905, Flanagan v. People, 214 Ill. 170, 73 N. E. 347; and cases cited post, § 2513, n. 8; 1878, Short v. State, 63 Ind. 376, 380; 1804, Com. v. Millard, 1 Mass. 6; 1922, State v. Crawford, — Utah —, 206 Pac. 717 (robbery; revolver found in defendant's room 40 days later, excluded on the facts).

[2] 1861, Com. v. Talbot, 2 All. Mass. 161 (possession of a forged document by one claiming a benefit under it, admitted, to show forgery); 1885, State v. Yerger, 86 Mo. 33, 39 (possession of forged instrument is evidence of forgery of it).

feiting,[3] a murder,[4] a liquor-selling,[5] or any other crime in which either a chief or a subordinate result might be the possession of a material article. For the same reason, the possession of burglar's tools is relevant to show that the possessor committed burglary, provided it first appears that the burglary was committed with such tools.[6]

§ 154. Possession of Money to evidence Larceny, etc. The mere possession of money is in itself no indication that the possessor was the taker of money charged as taken, because in general all money of the same denomination and material is alike, and the hypothesis that the money found is the same as the money taken is too forced and extraordinary to be receivable. Where the denominations of the money found and the money taken correspond in a fairly close way, the fact of the finding of that specific money would have probative value and be relevant, because the money found is fairly marked as identical with the money taken.

Another mode, however, of making the fact of money-possession relevant is to show its sudden possession, i.e. to show that before the time of taking the person was without money, while immediately after that time he had a great deal; this reduces the hypotheses to such as involve sudden acquisition, and a dishonest acquisition thus becomes a natural and prominent hypothesis. On such conditions the possession of unidentified money becomes relevant.[1]

[3] 1815, R. v. Fuller, R. & R. 308, by all the Judges (admitted to show a procuring with intent to utter).

[4] 1905, People v. Jackson, 182 N. Y. 66, 74 N. E. 565 (murder; the defendant's possession of the deceased's watch and pocket-book, admitted); 1857, Williams v. Com., 29 Pa. 102, 103, 106 (murder; possession of money and watch of the deceased, admitted; "possession of the fruits of crime is of great weight in establishing the proof of murder, where that crime has been accomplished with robbery").

[5] Going into a place sober and coming out drunk evidences the obtaining of liquor therein: 1854, Maule, J., in R. v. Burton, Dears. Cr. C. 282 (quoted ante, § 152); 1859, Com. v. Taylor, 14 Gray Mass. 26; 1867, Com. v. Kennedy, 97 Mass. 224; 1889, Com. v. Finnerty, 148 Mass. 165, 19 N. E. 215; 1893, Com. v. Hurley, 158 Mass. 159, 33 N. E. 342.

The following rulings probably depend upon the same principle: 1860, Com. v. Maloney, 16 Gray Mass. 20 (goings in and comings out of numbers of persons with jugs, etc., admitted to show liquor-selling); 1889, Com. v. Finnerty, 148 Mass. 165, 19 N. E. 215 (admitting the mere fact of frequent goings in and comings out, as under certain circumstances indicating the sale of liquor within); 1893, Com. v. Brothers, 158 Mass. 206, 33 N. E. 386 (same); 1899, Pike v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. 613, 51 S. W. 395 (cited ante, § 149).

[6] 1865, People v. Winters, 29 Cal. 658 (but first it must be shown that a burglary was committed, and by the aid of such tools; otherwise "there is no connection, probable or possible, between it and an offence confessedly committed without the aid of such tools"); 1882, People v. Hope, 62 Cal. 291, 295 (same in substance); 1890, People v. Sansome, 84 Cal. 449, 453, 24 Pac. 143 (same principle applied); 1879, State v. Morris, 47 Conn. 179, 181 (burglary while armed; the possession of arms after emerging from the house admitted as evidence of their possession while in it); 1884, State v. Franks, 64 Ia. 39, 42, 19 N. W. 832; 1866, State v. Harrold, 38 Mo. 496, 498 (burglary; the finding of the goods stolen, and of the burglar's tools, admitted); 1872, State v. Dubois, 49 Mo. 573 (finding of burglars' tools, admitted).

Distinguish the admission of burglar's tools, possessed before the act, to show a design (post, § 238, ante, § 88).

§ 154. [1] CANADA: 1914, R. v. Minchin, 15 D. L. R. 792, Alta. (theft of public moneys; the accused's deposits and withdrawals of amounts in bank account, admitted, though in themselves "absolutely immaterial", to show that the money went into his possession and not that of fellow-employees; Beck, J., diss.; Stuart, J., concurring, said: "The case [of Williams v. U. S., infra] is criticised severely and perhaps with justice in W. on Evidence, § 154, in a note; the criticism is apparently very sound, but the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States is impressive"); 1918, R. v. Minchin, 18 D. L. R. 340, Can.

§ 155. Same: Discriminations as to Stolen Chattels and Money. The use of possession of stolen goods to show their stealing must be distinguished from the use of possession of other stolen goods to show a knowing receipt of stolen goods, the object there being to show knowledge or intent (post, § 323). The relevancy of lack of money to show a motive for stealing (post, § 392) or to show incapacity to pay or to lend (ante, § 89) involves also different questions. Whether a person may be tried under the same indictment for stealing and for knowing receipt of stolen goods, and be found guilty as an accessory of the theft, raises questions of criminal pleading.

§ 156. Possession of Receipt or Instruments of Debt, to show Payment. The payee of money naturally leaves behind him in the hands of the payor some document by way of receipt or evidence of payment. (1) Where this document is a signed acknowledgment, — in the strict sense, a receipt, — it is receivable as an Admission.[1] (2) Where this document is merely the instrument of liability itself, customarily surrendered to the obligor upon satisfaction made, — e.g. a promissory note, a bond, — the possession of the instrument by the obligor may be relevant to show a past transaction of discharge. The circumstances in each case, however, must determine; for

Sup. (stealing money while an official; bank-book of defendant showing an unexplained excess of deposits, held not erroneously admitted; but the judges differed in their reasoning; no authority on this point cited).

UNITED STATES: Federal: 1897, Williams v. U. S., 168 U. S. 382, 18 Sup. 92 (extortion; large bank deposits by the defendant, about the times of the alleged offence, and in excess of his salary, held improperly submitted to the jury as evidence of dishonest acquisition, because there was no necessary connection between this excess and the alleged extorted sums; the Court treats the question as though the jury had been told that this proved guilt, though the trial Court merely said "you are at liberty to infer" an unfavorable explanation; the opinion is valueless and illustrates this Court's frequent confusion of the admissibility of evidence and its effect as a presumption); Alabama: 1897, Leonard v. State, 115 Ala. 80, 22 So. 564 (possession of money after a larceny, admitted); 1900, Turner v. State, 124 Ala. 59, 27 So. 272 (possession of money after a larceny, excluded on the facts); 1901, Leath v. State, 132 Ala. 26, 31 So. 108 (forgery; mere possession of a smaller sum of money, held inadmissible; a strained ruling); Illinois: 1853, Gates v. People, 14 Ill. 433, 438 (that the defendant before a murder and robbery had no money, but after it had some resembling that taken, admitted); Kansas: 1877, State v. Grebe, 17 Kan. 458, 460 (larceny; possession of money by one who had been poor, admitted); Massachusetts: 1846, Com. v. Montgomery, 11 Metc. 534, 537 (larceny of bank bills and checks; principle applied); 1854, Boston & W. R. Co. v. Dana, 1 Gray 101 (embezzlement; insolvency before entering the employment and subsequent possession of property far exceeding his earnings in the employment, admitted; leading opinion); 1898, Com. v. Mulrey, 170 Mass. 103, 49 N. E. 91 (false pretences by a city official having a salary of $1,200; deposits in bank at the time charged too large to be accounted for by his salary, received); 1902, Com. v. Devaney, 182 Mass. 33, 64 N. E. 402 (robbery); 1905, Com. v. Tucker, 189 Mass. 457, 76 N. E. 127 (murder; the accused's lack of money before the crime and possession of it afterwards, and the loss of money from the house of the victim, admitted); 1911, Com. v. Richmond, 207 Mass. 240, 93 N. E. 816; New York: 1886, New York & B. F. Co. v. Moore, 102 N. Y. 667, 6 N. E. 293 (civil action for embezzlement by an employee); 1905, People v. Gaffey, 182 N. Y. 257, 74 N. E. 836 (forgery; the defendant's small salary and large deposits, admitted to show the probable mode of disposition of the cash-stealings covered by the forged notes; the Court seems to err in calling this "evidence of motive"); Washington: 1898, State v. Burns, 19 Wash. 52, 52 Pac. 316 (possession of any money when arrested, admitted).

Distinguish the use of lack of money to show motive (post, § 392).

§ 156. [1] For admissions in general as open to explanations, see post, § 1058.

For receipt as not conclusive but open to denial by parol evidence, see post, § 2432.

For a receipt in unproved handwriting, as presumptively authenticated, see post, § 2148.

For a receipt of a third person, as not admissible without calling him to the stand, see post, § 1456.

the party offering the evidence must be one who would naturally have received the instrument from the party now seeking for payment.[2] Counter-explanations may be shown by circumstances explaining the possession otherwise, as where the debtor has access to the place of custody of the instrument. But in judicial opinions few questions here arise except upon the propriety of creating a presumption of payment (post, § 2518), for this requires a much stronger quality of probative value than mere admissibility.[3]

§ 157. Possession or Existence of a Document, to show Execution, Delivery, or Seisin. The possession or existence of a document is connected with a number of inferences, most of them resting on the present principle, but some of them requiring for convenience to be treated elsewhere in connection with other principles.

(1) The existence of a document purporting to be signed by A is under all circumstances some evidence of A's genuine execution of it. But the question which has naturally arisen is whether under certain circumstances it is sufficient evidence of A's execution. That it is sufficient, in combination with one or more circumstances, is well recognized in a few classes of cases. The age of the document, together with its custody, and (if it is a deed of land) with the fact of possession of the land, suffices for its authentication (post, § 2137); the official custody of a purporting official document equally suffices (post, § 2158); the imprint of an official seal will often suffice to authenticate (post, § 2161); and the course of the mails may suffice for a reply-letter (post, § 2153). All these rules, however, are auxiliary rules of sufficiency, not rules of admissibility. It is necessary here merely to note that the rules are founded on an inference applying the present principle.

(2) The existence of a document in a certain kind of place — such as the grantee's custody or office of registry — may be sufficient evidence of the delivery of the document, so far as its delivery may be material. Here the usual question is not of the admissibility of the fact (which is conceded), but of its sufficiency to raise a presumption of law (post, § 2520).

(3) The existence of a document in the house or among the goods of A may be offered as evidence that A has had possession of it, or has otherwise dealt with it.[1] Here the question is genuinely one of mere admissibility; and it is

[2] Instances of the use of this evidence: 1800, Egg v. Barnett, 3 Esp. 196 (possession of a bill of exchange, bearing the plaintiff's indorsement as payee and the defendant's name as drawer); 1809, Sluby v. Champlin, 4 Johns N. Y. 461, 468 (possession by surety of a bond for duties and of the collector's receipt).

[3] This explains the apparent illiberality of the following ruling: 1810, Lord Ellenborough, C. J., in Pfial v. Vanbatenberg, 2 Camp. 439 (excluding the mere bill of exchange, when offered by the acceptor against the drawer to prove payment; "Show that the bills were once in circulation after being accepted, and I will presume that they got back to the acceptor's hands by his having paid them. But when he merely produces them, how do I know that they were ever in the hands of the payee, or any indorsee, with his name upon them as acceptor? It is very possible that when they were left for acceptance he refused to deliver them back, and, having detained them ever since, now produces them as evidence of a loan of money").

§ 157. [1] 1843, R. v. O'Connor, 4 State Tr. N. S. 935, 1045 (sedition; Rolfe, B.: "If time elapses between the apprehension of the party and his being taken away, and you find documents afterward in his possession, 'non constat' but they came there afterwards"); 1848, R. v. O'Brien, 7 State Tr. 1, 100, 193 (documents found in a portmanteau of the defendant after usually answered by holding that the fact of the document's discovery in that condition is admissible, provided the place was actually in A's control and provided the lapse of time has not made too probable the hypothesis of other persons' intrusion:

1581, Campion's Trial, 1 How. St. Tr. 1050, 1061; Campion the Jesuit being charged with treason in seducing subjects to take an oath of obedience to the Pope, Anderson, Queen's counsel, said: "These papers, thus found in houses where you were, show that for ministering such oaths you are a traitor. . . . For if a poor man and a rich man come both to one house, and after their departure a bag of gold be found hidden, forasmuch as the poor man had no such plenty and therefore could leave no such bag behind him, by common presumption it is to be intended that the rich man only, and no other, did hide it. So you, a professed papist, coming to a house, and there such reliques found after your departure, how can it otherwise be implied than that you did both bring them and leave them there; so it is flat they came there by means of a papist, 'ergo' by your means." Campion: "Your conclusion had been necessary if you had also showed that none came into the house, of my profession, but I."

From the foregoing inference must be distinguished the inference, from the existence of a document in A's possession, to his knowledge of its contents (post, § 260) or, still further, to his approval of the contents as his admission (post, § 1073).

(4) The existence of a document of ownership of land (a deed, lease, or license) may be evidence that the maker of the document had possession of the land at the time of making it. This doctrine, now well settled in English law, is applicable in proof of title by adverse possession in prior generations, where no evidence has survived except the documents themselves which embodied acts of claim of ownership.[2] It used to be said occasionally that the

he had been arrested and others had had access to it, received); 1897, State v. Shive, 58 Kan. 783, 51 Pac. 274 (robbery; near the place was found an envelope addressed to one defendant bearing the return-request of the other; excluded, because no possession of the envelope by either was shown).

[2] The line of cases is as follows: ENGLAND: 1783, Clarkson v. Woodhouse, 5 T. R. 412, 3 Doug. 189 (a custom to hold land exempt from common right; to show prescriptive exercise, leases of 71 and 123 years of age were received; Lord Mansfield, C. J.: "They are so old that nobody can speak to possession under them"); 1808, Rogers v. Allen, 1 Camp. 309 (alleged licenses of fishing and dredging, dated from 1661 to the end of that century, were objected to because no rent appeared to have been paid under them; Heath, J., thought this not necessary, "as they were of such an ancient date that it could not reasonably be supposed that evidence of such payments was still preserved; however, to give any weight" to them, the receipt of payment, or other acts of ownership, must be shown "in later times"); 1809, Doe v. Askew, 10 East 520 (to prove a custom of a widow's holding during chaste viduity, entries in the manor book of successions to estates so described were admitted, although no instances of the acting upon the custom by forfeiture for unchastity were testified to); 1829, Coombs v. Coether, M. & M. 398, semble (old lease-copies; possession not necessary for chapter-house leases, which were like public records); 1842, Doe v. Pulman, 3 Q. B. 622 (a counterpart of a lease, admitted, as equivalent to it, without accounting for the original lease or showing possession); 1862, Malcomson v. O'Dea, 10 H. L. C. 593, 614 (Willes, J.: "Ancient documents . . . purporting on the face of them to show exercise of ownership, such as a lease or a license, may be given in evidence without proof of possession or payment of rent under them, as being in themselves acts of ownership and proof of possession; this rule is sometimes stated with the qualification, provided that possession is proved to have followed similar documents, or that there is some proof of actual enjoyment in accordance with the title to which the documents relate"); 1878, Bristow v. Cormican, L. R. App. Cas. 641, 653 (see quotation supra); 1899, Blandy-Jenkins v. Dunraven, 2 Ch. 121 (ancient agreement in settlement of litigation deed was itself an act of possession; but this is incorrect; it is merely evidence of possession, in the nature of a trace or mark such as only a possessor is likely to have. The limitations of the doctrine are thus expounded:

1878, CAIRNS, L. C., in Bristow v. Cormican, L. R. 3 App. Cas. 641, 653, 668: "Old leases have always been considered to be admissible as being evidence facts of ownership. . . . [The circumstances of giving and taking them] are real transactions between man and man not intelligible except on the footing of title, or at least an honest belief in title." Lord BLACKBURN: "Inasmuch as after long time all the witnesses who could prove such possession are dead, the law permits ancient documents, either with or without evidence of ancient payment of rent, to be given as evidence from which the jury may properly draw an inference that there was such possession. For in the ordinary course of things men do not make leases unless they act on them, and lessees do not pay rent unless they are in possession, so that the ancient payment of rent adds weight to the ancient indenture."

1847, COLLIER, C. J., in Doe v. Eslava, 11 Ala. 1028, 1039: "Ancient documents, it is said, are allowed to support ancient possession, though these documents are not proved to be part of any 'res gesta.' They are admitted in such cases as forming a part of every legal transfer of title and possession by act of parties. . . . Care is first taken to ascertain their genuineness; and this is shown prima facie by proof that the document comes from the proper custody or by otherwise accounting for it."

This doctrine is in itself simple, and the only difficulty has arisen in distinguishing it from two superficially related principles which usually come into application in the same sort of litigation. (a) One of these is the doctrine (referred to supra, par. 1) of presuming the genuineness of ancient deeds. As a part of that doctrine it has in some Courts been laid down that possession of the land must have been enjoyed by the grantee before his alleged ancient deed can be presumed genuine (post, § 2142); in that rule, then, it is the land-possession which is evidence of the document's genuineness; while in the present rule it is the document which is evidence of the land-possession. Moreover, in that rule it is the grantee's possession which is material, while in the present rule it is the lessor's or grantor's. Thus the two rules are really for trespass, admitted as "evidence of an act of possession"; following Malcomson v. O'Dea);

CANADA: 1885, Esterbrooks v. Towse, 24 N. Br. 387, 398 (defendant claimed under the son of C, who had been in possession, presumably under a purchase from B, who had a power of attorney to sell, given by the administrator of A, the original grantee; all the parties prior to defendant being deceased, B's indorsement on the original grant to A, which was in C's possession, that B had sold the land to C, was held admissible, though on varying grounds; Wetmore, J., diss.).

UNITED STATES: Federal: 1889, Baeder v. Jennings, 40 Fed. 199 (certain old documents of title admitted as evidence of possession); 1918, Virginia & W. Va. Coal Co. v. Charles, D. C. W. D. Va., 251 Fed. 83, 122 (ancient land-titles: "the English doctrine referred to in W. on Evidence, § 157, does not seem to be at all applicable to the situation before us"); Massachusetts: 1870, Boston v. Richardson, 105 Mass. 351 (licenses, etc. of the city made 67 and more years ago, to use certain land, objected to because "no acts were proved to have been done under them"; the licenses were received, "at least when taken in connection with the evidence of the subsequent occupation", because "it would be impossible to supply the proof required"); 1905, Murphy v. Com., 187 Mass. 361, 73 N. E. 524 (boundary of town land; certain leases, town votes, and treasurer's entries, not all ancient, admitted to show "actual possession by the town, through its lessees, under a claim of title"); Texas: 1904, State v. Bruni, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 2, 83 S. W. 209 (ancient deeds admitted to show possession and other acts of ownership).

Whether payment of taxes (as evidenced by tax-receipts) is evidence of possession of the land, has been a large question; see the following opinion, and cases cited: 1904, Chastang v. Chastang, 141 Ala. 451, 37 So. 799.

concerned with different evidential purposes, and rest on independent grounds. (b) The other principle is that of using deeds, or other land-documents, ancient or modern, as verbal acts accompanying an act of possession and signifying the scope of the claim of possession (post, § 1778). Here the possessor may be grantee or grantor; his possession is, with reference to the document, neither evidence of it nor evidenced by it; the document's genuineness or validity is immaterial; it merely colors and defines his claim, as a verbal part of his act of adverse possession.

(5) Finally, the reverse of the preceding inference (4) may be made; i.e. from the present possession of land the inference that there once existed a deed of it, now lost, may be made:

1844, GILCHRIST, J., in New Boston v. Dunbarton, 15 N. H. 201, 205: "The jury may find, from the facts in a case, that a certain deed once existed, although there be no direct evidence of its execution. Where parties have occupied land and have conducted themselves precisely as they would have done if a deed had been made, it may be left to the jury to say whether a deed under which one of the parties claims ever had an existence. . . . Whether a fact which is unknown is to be presumed from its usual connection with other facts which are known would seem to be properly in all cases a question for the jury."

This is the logical foundation of the presumption of a lost grant, which after long service has finally degenerated into a mere rule of substantive law (post, § 2522), although the living principle of the original inference is still occasionally open to application.[3] It may be noted here that this inference, of a document's execution from the fact of land-possession, has no relation to the inference of possession of the whole of a piece of land from possession of a part (post, § 378).

§ 158. Negative Traces: (1) Lack of News, to show Death or Loss. Where certain results would have followed if an act or an event had occurred (or not occurred), the absence of those results is some indication that the act or event has not occurred (or occurred).

A common class of evidence of this sort is that of lack of news to show probable death of a person or the probable loss of a ship; for as it is usual for living persons to be heard from directly or indirectly, by persons having an interest in knowing, and for ships' officers to leave word of their journey at the ports they touch or with the other ships they pass, the lack of any such news indicates their non-existence. Such evidence has always been received.[1] It

[3] 1869, Goodell v. Labadie, 19 Mich. 88 (agreement to exchange lands; deed performing this agreement by one party admitted to show probable performance by the other also); 1844, Downing v. Pickering, 15 N. H. 344, 350 (possession, plus an agreement to make the deeds, sufficient on the facts to go to the jury).

§ 158. [1] A good example of such evidence in its various possibilities will be found in the Tichborne Case, R. v. Castro, Charge of C. J. Cockburn, passim. Other examples are as follows: 1763, Rowe v. Hasland, 1 W. Bl. 404, Lord Mansfield, C. J. (that a person "has not been heard of for many years", admissible to show death; here the person had lived in Liverpool); 1815, Watson v. King, 1 Stark. 121 (loss of a ship; evidence admitted that she had been last seen in a tempest in March, 1814, and never since heard from; Lord Ellenborough, C. J., "observed that this was the kind of proof usually given in actions against insurers, where the vessel is proved to have sailed and has not been heard of for two or three years").

Compare the cases cited post, § 664 (negative testimony).

is usually discussed, however, with reference to the legal presumption of death, founded on this evidence (post, § 2531). The fact of lack of news is admissible without regard to the time elapsed, and is not limited by the seven-year-period required for the presumption. In counter-explanation (ante, § 34) such facts as the infrequency of communication from the place the person went to, the fixed determination of the person to give up all connection with his former home, and the like, may of course be used to explain away the force of the fact of lack of news.[2]

So, too, fictitious nature of a name, or the non-existence of an alleged person of a certain name and residence, may be evidenced by the failure to find any such person after diligent search.[3]

§ 159. Same: (2) Lapse of Time, to show Payment. It is a natural propensity of creditors to seek to realize their claims, when left unsatisfied, by process of law, within a fair space of time. When it is found, after some time, that a creditor has not resorted to law for the realization of his claim, there is a natural inference that this failure was due to the lack of right and necessity to resort to law, i.e. that the claim had been satisfied by payment. The fact may be explained away by showing a more probable hypothesis (ante, § 34), for example, the insolvency of the debtor, his absence, or other circumstance likely to prevent the creditor from proceeding even though the claim was unpaid. The general evidentiary fact, however — lapse of time — is also the foundation of a legal presumption of payment (post, § 2517), and plays very little part in the theory of admissibility.

§ 160. Same: (3) Lost Will; Lost Documents in general; Debtor's Fraud in Possession; Sundry Instances. There are various other situations in which a retrospectant inference is permissible from the absence of certain results to the absence of certain causes. Most of these raise no doubt of admissibility and are commonly of importance only in the rules of presumption or elsewhere; the chief of these are the inference, from the non-discovery of a will once existing, to the testator's revocatory destruction of it (post, § 2523), the inference from the non-discovery of any document and the lapse of time, to the loss of the document (post, §§ 1195, 2522), and the inference, from a debtor's continued possession of property, after its mortgage or sale, of his fraudulent intent to defraud creditors by the transfer (post, §§ 336, 1082, 1779). In

[2] That the evidence of inability to find a person is not hearsay, see post, § 1789.

[3] 1907, Phelps v. Nazworthy, 226 Ill. 254, 80 N. E. 756 (whether a deed-grantee was a fictitious person; that no person by that name had ever lived in the township, admitted); 1858, State v. Wentworth, 37 N. H. 217; and cases cited post, §§ 1313, 1725, 1789, and 2531, n. 7.

Contra: 1906, Taylor v. State, 50 Tex. Cr. 381, 97 S. W. 474 (forgery of names of persons said to be fictitious; the sheriff's returns of "not found" on subpœnas issued in various countries for these persons as witnesses, excluded; such a ruling may be a suitable part of some little esoteric game of quibbles; but it is so vast a distance sundered from the world of common sense as to create a suspicion that the Court is under some mistake as to the nature of the objective, called Truth, which it was placed there to ascertain).

That a voter, alleged to have voted illegally as a non-resident, cannot be found or heard of on diligent search in the district, is another example of the principle; but some Courts are pedantically strict in their application of it: 1905, State v. Rosenthal, 123 Wis. 442, 102 N. W. 49.

general, that a certain effect was not seen or heard by those who would naturally have seen or heard it had its cause occurred is some evidence of the non-occurrence.[1] But, though this situation can thus be treated as permitting an inference from circumstantial evidence, it is usually more natural to treat it as involving testimonial evidence; i.e. the argument is that witness A is qualified to testify that act X was not done by B, because A would have seen or heard it if it had been done; A's statement that it was not done is therefore receivable; thus, the principle of testimonial knowledge is here the controlling one (post, § 671).

b. Organic Traces

Next are to be considered those retrospectant inferences which rest for their validity, not upon mechanical associations of effect and cause, but upon the working of organic natural laws, and usually upon some physiological principle. The fact offered as evidence is traced back to its cause through some physiological process to the originating act.

§ 163. Birth during Marriage, to show Legitimacy. When a child X is born to a wife A married to a husband B, it is natural to infer that the intercourse which begot the child was the intercourse of the husband B, i.e. that the child is legitimate. It is true that this inference is less strong where the birth occurs very shortly after marriage; but even here the likelihood that the pre-marital intercourse was B's is greater than that it was another man's. It is also true that, even where the birth occurs a year or more after the marriage, it is possible that the begetting intercourse was another man's; but it is still exceedingly more likely that it was that of B the husband. Upon this likelihood is founded a rule of procedure, namely, the presumption of legitimacy (post, § 2527). No controversy of admissibility arises.

§ 164. Same: Adultery of the Mother, to show Illegitimacy. A birth during marriage having been shown by the proponent of legitimacy, the opponent, according to the theory of explanation (ante, § 34), would ordinarily be allowed to show that the birth could be accounted for otherwise than by the husband's begetting, i.e. could show the mother's intercourse with another man, about the probable time of conception, as accounting for the birth. In the same way, a person charged as the father of an unmarried woman's child might explain away the evidentiary fact of the birth of a child by showing the fact of her intercourse with other men about the time. This form of argument, however, seems more correctly to fall under the theory of multiple opportunity, and the rule of law accordingly is examined under that head (ante, §§ 133, 134).

§ 160. [1] 1805, R. v. Long Buckby, 7 East 45 (the fact that a document required to be stamped and sealed is not found recorded as so treated, admissible to show that it was not stamped); 1894, State v. Delaney, 92 Ia. 467, 61 N. W. 189 (to show that a person could not have left the house during the night, the fact admitted that other inmates were so situated that they must have been awakened, but were not); 1920, Davin v. Isman, 228 N. Y. 1, 126 N. E. 257 (whether a deceased mortgagor had received no consideration therefor, the deed reciting the receipt of $6500; absence of any record of receipt of such a sum in the records of the banks used by the mortgagor, excluded; unsound).

§ 165. Physiological and Mental Traits, as evidencing Ancestry by reason of Heredity. If by heredity a physiological or mental trait is transmitted so as to be perceptible and identifiable, then the presence of that trait in a given person will be some evidence of a specific ancestry; and, conversely, a given ancestry will be evidence of the recurrence of the trait in a specific descendant.

In a few classes of cases, where the traits are marked and easily identifiable, general popular experience has found that such an inference, resting on hereditary transmission, is worth considering. Thus far the only ones so recognized are the inferences as to longevity (post, § 223), paternity, indicated by external corporal features (post, § 166), race, indicated in like manner (post, § 167), and insanity (post, § 231). The inference of transmissible moral character (post, § 190) has not been recognized. This sanction or denial of such an inference has thus far, of course, been based solely on general popular experience.

But the progress of science has shown, in the field of heredity, that the transmission takes place more or less according to definite principles, and also that the traits transmitted include minute and normal elements, and not merely grossly obvious or abnormal features. Hence, it may become possible by analysis to determine the evidential significance of a great variety of physiological elements, and thus in general to make inferences as to ancestry:

1921, Dr. Charles B. Davenport, "Heredity" (Proceedings of International Eugenics Conference, N. Y., 1921; Eugenics Record Office, N. Y.): "Some of the results of analytical study of these eugenical data are fairly well established. A few clearly simple Mendelian traits have been found. Such is eye color in which brown is dominant over its absence. It is possible that in some cases additional factors may be present, but the rule serves as a first approximation. Dominant, also, appears to be curliness of the hair as contrasted with recessive straight. And there are various diseases and defects that appear either as simple dominants or recessives, such as abnormalities in number and form of fingers and toes, which are mostly dominant over the normal condition; various defects of the eyes such as cataract, certain types of congenital deafness, various abnormalities of skin, and hair and nails.

"Other, and probably many other, traits are due to multiple factors — so often this is true as to suggest the hypothesis that in mammals, as contrasted with insects, traits are genetically relatively complex. Thus stature and build and proportions of parts and pigmentation of hair and skin are dependent on multiple factors. Indeed, there seems to be evidence that negro skin color is dependent upon two pairs of factors which merely reinforce each other.

"Other traits are associated with sex in the remarkable fashion called sex-linked. That is, they are usually found only in the male sex and are inherited through the mother, though she, herself, is not affected. In such cases one usually finds male relatives of the mother who are affected. Such are color blindness, hemophilia and atrophy of the optic nerve. The facts of sex-linked heredity bring home, even to the layman, the lesson that heredity is a matter of the gametes; and that bodily appearance often gives no hint of the nature of the particular germ-cells carried and, in so far, of what the inheritance shall be. The parents of an albino may have pigmented hair and skin, but both carry gametes which lack the capacity of forming pigment.

"Our knowledge of the inheritance of these physical traits is sufficiently precise to be applied practically in cases of doubtful parentage. If the child, the known mother and both of the putative fathers can be seen, and some inquiry be made as to family stock of the three adults, a decision can generally be rendered with a high degree of certainty ranging from 75 to 99 per cent. For usually, there will not be one critical trait merely, but several traits whose combined evidence will be overwhelming. Already the Eugenics Record Office has been asked to answer certain questions about the inheritance of traits in a case of a claimant who maintained that he was the son of a wealthy man who died without known heirs. As lawyers get more used to the idea of utilizing the advances of knowledge for evidence, it is probable that eugenical knowledge will be more and more called upon."

It is, however, necessary to point out, to scientists as well as to Courts, the danger of hasty use of such supposed discoveries in judicial inquiries of fact. In the first place, the data for exact observation hitherto have been found chiefly in the vegetable and animal world, and not in human beings. In the next place, the scope of observation has been inadequate for determining veritable laws in so complex a subject. In the third place, the scientist's "laws" represent the general truths averaged from a mass of instances, and do not represent the invariable result in individual instances; i.e. in one thousand cases, a "law" might be discernible, and yet in fifty or a hundred of those instances it might not operate because of counteracting and unknown considerations; hence, a scientific generalization is seldom to be treated as a certain indication for the individual case.

For these reasons, Science must show that it has attained definite and dependable results, accepted in general consensus, before it can expect Law to rely upon its discoveries.[1]

§ 166. Resemblance of Child, to show Paternity. If the corporal traits of the progenitor are or may be transmitted to the progeny, then a specific corporal trait of the progeny may point back to a person of similar trait as

§ 165. [1] For example, the accomplished scientist from whose essay the above quotation is made, has stated to the present writer that the data whence those generalizations are drawn are as yet unpublished, and yet he advances publicly the claim that "a decision can generally be rendered [in certain conditions] with a high degree of certainty, ranging from 75 to 99 per cent." To expect that so extraordinary a discovery, in a field of knowledge hitherto dark and undecipherable, will be accepted for any practical purpose without making a complete disclosure of the entire data and thus enabling others to test the logic of the generalizations, is of course out of the question.

The following newspaper dispatch illustrates the risks of premature reliance upon promising scientific enthusiasms: "San Francisco, Sept. 1, 1921: — Science, art and the law are one in declaring Julius B. Sorine the father of the third child of his divorced wife, despite the woman's assertion to the contrary, but the court's ruling, handed down today, denied his petition for custody of the child. Dr. Albert Abrams reported to the court that a test of the blood of father and son provided positive proof, in his opinion, that the child was Sorine's. Haig Patigian, a sculptor, by a series of facial sketches similar to those used in the famous Singsby case in England, told the court the child resembled Sorine. In the decision of Judge Graham today the court declared that irrespective of these tests, the child was born during the lawful wedlock of the parties, but ruled the child should remain in the mother's care."

In the following article will found an account of a case in Argentina where the judge was presented with expert opinions as to the physiological traits of identity in a filiation proceeding, and declared them insufficient in the present state of knowledge; Quesada, "La prueba scientifica de la filiacion natural" (Revista de criminologia psiquiatria y medicina legale, 1919, nos. 31, 34, 35).

the progenitor, on the condition that the person so charged as progenitor is within the number of those who by association and opportunity may have had intercourse; for otherwise the possible number of similar persons would leave open too many hypotheses. The propriety of the inference rests on the supposed physiological fact that bodily traits may be transmitted by procreation. The validity of this physiological principle, and therefore the propriety of the inference, is and always has been a matter of common knowledge and general action thereon:

1598, William Shakspeare, King John, Act I, Scene 1 (the king hears a lawsuit between Philip Faulconbridge, the supposed Bastard son of Sir Robert Faulconbridge's wife by Richard the Lion-hearted, and Robert Faulconbridge, his younger brother, who claims the estates):

Bastard: "But that I am as well begot, my liege, . . .
Compare our faces and be judge yourself
If old Sir Robert did beget us both
And were our father and this son like him."
Elinor (queen-mother of Richard): "He hath a trick of Cœur-de-Lion's face;
The accent of his tongue affecteth him.
Do you not read some tokens of my son
In the large composition of this man?"
Bastard (who is more interested in proving himself Richard's son): "Sir Robert could do well; marry, to confess,
Could he get me? Sir Robert could not do it;
We know his handiwork. Therefore, good mother,
To whom am I beholding for these limbs?
Sir Robert never holp to make this leg." [1]

1769, Lord MANSFIELD, C. J., in the Douglas Peerage Case, 2 Hargr. Collect. Jurid. 402: "I have always considered likeness as an argument of a child's being the son of a parent; and the rather as the distinction between individuals in the human species is more discernible than in other animals. A man may survey ten thousand people before he sees two faces perfectly alike; and in an army of an hundred thousand men every one may be known from another. If there should be a likeness of features, there may be a discriminancy of voice, a difference in the gesture, the smile, and various other things; whereas a family-likeness generally runs through all these; for in everything there is a resemblance, as of features, size, attitude, and action. . . . If Sir John Stewart, the most artless of mankind, was actor in the enlevement of Mignon and Sanry's [the supposed parents'] children, he did in a few days what the acutest genius could not accomplish for years. He found two children, the one the finished model of himself, and the other the exact picture in miniature of Lady Jane. It seems nature had implanted in the children what is not in the parents; for it appears in proof that in size, complexion, stature, attitude, color of the hair and eyes, nay and in every other thing, Mignon and his wife, and Sanry and his spouse, were 'toto cœlo' different from and unlike to Sir John Stewart and Lady Jane Douglas. Among eleven black rabbits, there will scarce be found one to produce a white one."

1859, FOWLER, J., in Gilmanton v. Ham, 38 N. H. 108, 113: "The practice of bringing before the jury, on trials for bastardy, the child whose paternity is sought to be established, when living, has been almost universal in this State, from the earliest recollection of the oldest practitioners. . . . If the child were referred to at all, its general appearance, its complexion and features, might properly be commented upon; and we think, under the well-established physiological law that like begets like, and that generally there is a striking resemblance, more or less strong and striking, between the parent and his child, it was a fair matter of argument before the jury, by the counsel on both sides, whether or not there had been anything in the complexion, appearance, and features of the child which the witness had produced and identified before them, tending to indicate its other parent."

§ 166. [1] So also in Richard the Second, IV, 2; Henry the Fourth, part one, II, 5; Winter's Tale, II, 5.

The English practice seems always to have admitted this evidence without question.[2] In the United States the early practice was probably the same; but as the chief use of the evidence was found in filiation proceedings, to charge the defendant with the paternity of a bastard, the possible abuses of the evidence led to an unfortunate questioning of its validity under any circumstances:

1888, Foster, J., in Clark v. Bradstreet, 80 Me. 454, 456, 15 Atl. 56: "While it may be a well-known physiological fact that peculiarities of form, feature, and personal traits are oftentimes transmitted from parent to child, yet it is equally true as a matter of common knowledge that during the first few weeks, or even months, of a child's existence, it has that peculiar immaturity of features which characterize it as an infant, and that it changes often and very much in looks and appearance during that period. Resemblance can then be readily imagined. . . . And in a trial in bastardy proceedings the mere fact that a resemblance is claimed would be too likely to lead captive the imagination of the jury, and they would fancy they could see points of resemblance between the child and the putative father."

Now it must be noted that this opinion (which is representative of others) does not dispute the validity of the inference from resemblance of features to paternity; its quarrel is with the difficulty of establishing the fact which is the foundation of the inference, namely, the resemblance. The answers to this objection are several: (1) The fanciful acceptance of a resemblance — which is the danger feared — is only likely where the child is so young as to have no decidedly marked features; and it is both proper and feasible to obviate this objection by excluding the evidence where the child is too young, either by leaving the matter to the trial Court's discretion, or by fixing a

[2] England: 16—, Piercy's Case, 12 How. St. Tr. 1199 ("This James Piercy was a truck-maker in the Strand; . . . one of his arguments to make you believe him a true descendant of the Piercys was that he was born with a mole on his body, as other of the Piercys had been, like a half-moon; the crescent being the crest of the Piercys earls of Northumberland"); 1743, Annesley v. Anglesea, 17 How. St. Tr. 1139, 1318, 1324; 1769, Douglas Peerage Case (quoted supra); 1797, Day v. Day, Trial, 3d ed., 327, quoted in Nicolas, Adulterine Bastardy, 140, and Hubback, Succession, 384 (Heath, J., received "evidence that the defendant bore a strong resemblance to his supposed father", and in summing up "admitted that resemblance was frequently fanciful, and therefore the jury should be well convinced that it did exist; but if they were so convinced, it was impossible to have stronger evidence"; this latter part of the remark of Mr. J. Heath has sometimes been omitted, when the former part was quoted, by Courts opposed to the use of the evidence, e.g. in Jones v. Jones, infra; Heath, J.'s ruling is also given in the abridged report of the case in Craik's English Causes Célèbres, 215, 223); 1837, Andrews v. Askey, 8 C. & P. 7, 9 (used without objection); 1827, 1836, Morris v. Davis, 3 C. & P. 214, 5 Cl. & F. 163 (legitimacy; "the defendant's counsel much relied . . . on the circumstance of personal resemblance that was proved by several witnesses to exist" between the plaintiff and the mother's paramour; on appeal, similar evidence was admitted on both sides without question).

Canada: 1853, Doe v. Marr, 3 U. C. C. P. 36, 51 (inheritance; to show the defendant a bastard, his resemblance to S. and not to the husband M. was held admissible, as "auxiliary evidence").

specific minimum age. (2) The physiological principle being perfectly well settled, it is poor policy to exclude invariably a piece of evidence that will usually be useful merely because it may occasionally be abused. (3) The Opinion rule cannot avail to exclude testimony to resemblance, because matters of identity, similarity, and the like are well settled to be not obnoxious to that rule (post, § 1974).

1916, ELLIS, J., in Flores v. State, 72 Fla. 302, 73 So. 234 (holding that the exhibition of a child not yet 3 months old, on an issue of paternity, was erroneous): "The sound rule is to admit the fact of similarity of specific traits, however presented, provided the child is in the opinion of the trial court old enough to possess settled features or other corporal indications. . . . [Thus] the objection to the evidence on account of its inherent weakness and unreliability would be largely, if not entirely, removed. In the first place, the trial Court would have passed upon the question as to whether the child possessed features or other corporal indications of sufficient development to permit a comparison between them and those of the defendant. In the second place, the particular features or other corporal traits claimed to be possessed by the child would be by the adoption of the rule brought specifically to the jurors' attention, and the comparison made with reference only to such features or corporal traits. It seems to us that to permit an issue of such grave consequences to be determined against a defendant in a bastardy proceeding upon the imaginary, fancied, or notional general resemblance between a child of a week old, or even a few months old, and the defendant in such proceedings, would be to place the defendant at a disadvantage which he could not possibly overcome."

Some Courts in the United States now exclude this kind of evidence, partly through misunderstanding the precedents in its favor, partly for the reasons above quoted.[3] Moreover, by a curious contrariety of views, in some in-

[3] The rulings in the various jurisdictions are as follows: Federal: 1809, U. S. v. Collins, 1 Cr. C. C. 592 (excluded, from witnesses);
Alabama: 1875, Paulk v. State, 52 Ala. 427, 429 (lack of resemblance to the defendant, or resemblance to another man who had opportunities of intercourse, admissible; but not resemblance to the children of the other man, because they might have their features from their mother; semble, also that resemblance may not be shown by testimony); 1902, Kelly v. State, 133 Ala. 195, 32 So. 56 (bastardy; child about a year old, allowed to be shown to the jury); 1913, Watts v. State, 8 Ala. App. 264, 63 So. 18 (seduction; exhibition of child, and testimony to its paternity allowed); 1920, Tarver v. State, 17 Ala. App. 424, 85 So. 855 (seduction; child exhibited to jury);
Arkansas: 1910, Adams v. State, 93 Ark. 260, 124 S. W. 766 (seduction; resemblance of a child a few months old, testified to);
California: 1889, Re Jessup, 81 Cal. 408, 417, 21 Pac. 976 (inheritance; resemblance, as shown by photographs, allowed to be used to show paternity; inspection in Court declared much more valuable; semble, the opinion of witnesses, inadmissible); 1911, People v. Richardson, 161 Cal. 552, 120 Pac. 20 (child 5½ months old, allowed to be exhibited as evidence of paternity);
Connecticut: 1905, Shailer v. Bullock, 78 Conn. 65, 61 Atl. 65 (bastardy; exhibition of the child — here 10 months old — allowed);
Florida: 1916, Flores v. State, 72 Fla. 302, 73 So. 234 (bastardy; a child "within a few days of being 3 months old", held improperly exhibited, as too young; citing the above text with approval);
Georgia: 1854, Wright v. Hicks, 15 Ga. 160, 172 (legitimacy; resemblance of the child to the alleged paramour, considered); 1904, McCalman v. State, 121 Ga. 491, 49 S. E. 609 (testimony to resemblance excluded; following Hanawalt v. State, Wis.; Chandler, J., diss.);
Indiana: 1862, Risk v. State, 19 Ind. 152 (age unstated; propriety of evidence doubted, because of the uncertainty of a mere infant's features, and because "it would involve the necessity of giving the alleged father in evidence"); 1870, Reitz v. State, 33 Ind. 187 (same);
Iowa: 1874, Stumm v. Hummel, 39 Ia. 478, 480 (criminal conversation; resemblance assumed to be relevant); 1878, State v. Danforth, 48 Ia. 43, 47 (child three months old; resemblance excluded, there being no corroborating evidence); 1880, State v. Smith, 54 Ia. 104, 6 N. W. 153 (child two years and one month old; resemblance allowed to be considered as a general principle, the child stances, the evidentiary fact of resemblance is excluded only when offered through testimony of those who have seen the child; in other instances, only when offered by the presentation of the child in court. The partial exclusion of the former mode of evidence is based chiefly on the Opinion rule — the fallacy of which, in this application, needs no further exposition; and partly also on the ease with which a resemblance can be affirmed in general terms, but the simple correction for this danger is to require detailed statements of specific traits, for the force of the inference rests on these and not on a general resemblance. The partial exclusion of the other mode of evidence — presentation of the child in court — rests on no good reason what-being of sufficient age); 1900, State v. Harvey, 112 Ia. 416, 84 N. W. 535 (exhibition of child under two years, held improper); 1911, State v. Nathoo, 152 Ia. 665, 133 N. W. 129 (rape; the child's resemblance to the Hindoo defendant; not decided);

Kansas: 1895, Shorten v. Judd, 56 Kan. 43, 42 Pac. 337 (admitted);
Maine: 1839, Keniston v. Rowe, 16 Me. 38 ("it was not the color or any peculiarity of conformation or form of features as matters of fact that were proposed to be proved; it was to prove a resemblance, which is matter of opinion", and therefore inadmissible); 1888, Clark v. Bradstreet, 80 Me. 454 (a child six weeks old; resemblance, whether by exhibition or by testimony held irrelevant, apparently irrespective of the child's age);
Maryland: 1876, Jones v. Jones, 45 Md. 144, 151 (inheritance; "When the parties are before the jury, and the latter can make the comparison for themselves, whatever resemblance is discovered may be a circumstance, in connection with others, to be considered"; but resemblance being "notional" and "fanciful", it cannot be shown by testimony);
Massachusetts: 1862, Eddy v. Gray, 4 All. 435, 438 (excluded; here offered by witnesses, and declared obnoxious to the Opinion rule); 1876, Finnegan v. Dugan, 14 All. 197 (admitted as relevant; here the child was shown to the jury; no authorities cited); 1869, Young v. Makepeace, 103 Mass. 50, 54 (child shown to the jury; but testimony to the dissimilarity between the child and a third person, not present, but alleged by the defendant to be the real father, excluded; reasons confused and exact rule left obscure; Finnegan v. Dugan not cited); 1894, Farrell v. Weitz, 160 Mass. 288, 35 N. E. 783 (likeness not allowed to be shown by photograph of third person alleged as the father by defendant; semble, comparison by actual presence allowable);
Michigan: 1884, People v. White, 53 Mich. 537 (resemblance of a young infant; "we do not well see how the jury could be prevented from noticing the child, which was properly enough in court"); 1896, People v. Wing, 115 Mich. 690, 74 N. W. 179 (bastardy; People v. White followed);
New Hampshire: 1859, Gilmanton v. Ham, 38 N. H. 108, 113 (resemblance allowed to be considered; here by exhibition); 1900, State v. Saidell, 70 N. H. 174, 46 Atl. 1083 (resemblance on exhibition to jury, allowed to be considered); 1905, State v. Danforth, 73 N. H. 215, 60 Atl. 839 (rape; rule of the foregoing cases confined; here the child was exhibited and its peculiarities pointed out; the rule as stated above in the text "appears reasonable");
New Jersey: 1888, Gaunt v. State, 50 N. J. L. 490, 495, 14 Atl. 600 (fornication; resemblance admissible, without any apparent limitations; "the illusory nature of such resemblances rather imposing a duty on the Court in conjunction with the admission of the proof, than militating against the relevancy of the inquiry"; resemblance to be available either by inspection or through witnesses);
North Carolina: 1872, State v. Woodruff, 67 N. C. 89, semble (admissible); 1878, State v. Britt, 78 N. C. 439, 442 (resemblance to a third person, the alleged father, admitted); 1888, State v. Horton, 100 N. C. 443, 6 S. E. 238 (State v. Woodruff followed);
Ohio: Crow v. Jordan, 49 Oh. St. 655, 32 N. E. 750 (child allowed to be exhibited);
Oregon: 1908, Anderson v. Aupperle, 51 Or. 556, 95 Pac. 330 (seduction; infant of less than 3 months, exhibited; State v. Danforth, N. H., followed); 1913, State v. Russell, 64 Or. 247, 129 Pac. 1051 (incest; child of 14 months allowed to be exhibited);
Tennessee: 1846, Cannon v. Cannon, 7 Humph. 410, 411 (distribution of estate; resemblance used to evidence illegitimacy);
Texas: 1892, Higginbotham v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 20 S. W. 360 (admitted); 1899, Hilton v. State, 41 Tex. Cr. 190, 53 S. W. 113 (adultery; resemblance of child seven months old, excluded);
Utah: 1901, State v. Neel, 23 Utah 541, 65 Pac. 494 (illicit intercourse; child not allowed to be exhibited, following Hanawalt v. State infra);
Wisconsin: 1895, Hanawalt v. State, 64 Wis. 84, 24 N. W. 489 (excluded, where the child was less than a year old; but perhaps admissible for an adult; the jury's inspection disapproved).

ever, and is further considered under the principle involved (post, § 1160). The sound rule is to admit the fact of similarity of specific traits, however presented, provided the child is in the opinion of the trial Court old enough to possess settled features or other corporal indications.

It is to be noted that the evidence is relevant not merely in bastardy proceedings, but also in trying the legitimacy of a child born during marriage, whenever the presumption of legitimacy allows the issue to be raised (post, § 2527), as well as occasionally in other proceedings.

§ 167. Corporal Traits, to show Race or Nationality. A physiological principle, similar to the preceding one, but attended usually with more clearly marked results, tells us that the progeny of persons of one race receive from the progenitors certain corporal traits very different from the traits transmitted from a progenitor of another race. The presence of these peculiar traits of the race is therefore evidential to show a progenitor of the race bearing those traits. The admissibility of this evidence has never been doubted by Courts; though its use, since the abolition of slavery in this country, is now very rare, because the issues in which it is relevant can only be uncommon.[1] There seems no reason why similar evidence should not occasionally be usable to show foreign birth or origin from a foreign nation, even though from a people of the same race.[2]

§ 168. Birthmarks, to show Events during Pregnancy; Venereal Disease, to show Adultery; Pregnancy, to show Intercourse. There remain some other

§ 167. [1] CANADA: B. C. Rev. St. 1911, C. 78, § 23 (the Court or jury "may infer as a fact the nationality or race of the person in question from the appearance of such person"); U. S. Federal: 1904, U. S. v. Hung Chang, 134 Fed. 19, 23 (Chinese descent, evidenced by appearance); Arkansas: 1861, Daniel v. Guy, 23 Ark. 50, 51 (foot-formation, admitted as evidential of negro race); Georgia: 1856, Bryan v. Walton, 20 Ga. 480, 508 (complexion, etc., of alleged slaves, considered to prove ancestry); Illinois: 1916, People v. Kingcannon, 276 Ill. 251, 114 N. E. 508 (rape under age, followed by birth of a child; polydactylism of the child and of the defendant, with evidence that such a feature is heritable, held admissible to evidence paternity); Indiana: 1864, Nave's Adm'r v. Williams, 22 Ind. 370 (color and features, to show race, admitted); Kentucky: 1835, Gentry v. McGinnis, 3 Dana Ky. 382, 388 (white color of an alleged slave, received to show white ancestry; "a black or mulatto complexion is prima facie evidence" of slavery, black ancestors being necessarily slaves, and "one apparently a white person or an Indian", is prima facie free); 1839, Chancellor v. Milly, 9 Ky. 24 (appearance of an alleged slave, received to infer ancestry); Maine: 1888, Clark v. Bradstreet, 80 Me. 454, 457 (complexion, etc., admissible in determining race); Missouri: Rev. St. 1919, § 3513 (illegal mixed marriage; jury "may determine the proportion of negro blood in any party to such marriage from the appearance of such person"); New Jersey: 1826, Fox v. Lambson, 8 N. J. L. 275, 277 (black color raises a presumption of slavery); North Carolina: 1897, Warlick v. White, 76 N. C. 175, 178 (color of a child, to show black blood, and therefore illegitimacy, admitted); South Carolina: 1846, White v. Collector, 3 Rich. 138, 140 (color admissible to evidence race); Virginia: 1806, Hudgins v. Wrights, 1 Hen. & M. 134, 137 (long, straight, black hair, and copper complexion, for Indians, and flat nose, woolly hair, and color of complexion, for negroes, admissible to show ancestry); 1811, Hook v. Pagee, 2 Munf. 379, 383 (complexion of an alleged slave, admitted to show ancestry); 1827, Gregory v. Baugh, 4 Rand. 611, 613 (complexion, etc., assumed proper to determine Indian ancestry).

The same principle should apply to the resemblance of an animal, as evidence of its pedigree: 1904, Brady v. Shirley, 18 S. D. 608, 101 N. W. 886, semble (qualities of a horse, admitted on the question of its siring by a Hambletonian).

[2] 1856, Dennis v. Brewster, 7 Gray 351, 353 (foreign birth; arrival as a child on a ship, foreign appearance, speech, and gestures, dark complexion, etc., held sufficient).

common instances of this form of inference: (1) That a shock received by the mother during pregnancy may leave a mark upon the child has long been a popular belief. Should it ever receive scientific sanction in any defined terms, the child's corporal mark after birth may be taken as evidential of the act which produced it.[1]

(2) That the existence of venereal disease in a husband is some evidence of an act of adultery on his part has always been conceded;[2] it is merely a question of the strength of the explanatory circumstances.

(3) So, too, in prosecutions for rape, rape under age, and seduction, the pregnancy is admissible as evidence at least of the intercourse; the accused's identity being provable by other evidence.[3]

§ 168. [1] Anon., cited by Irving Browne, Green Bag, 1892, V, 555 (Mercer Co., Pa.; the complainant charged an assault upon her two weeks before by the defendant in a lonely house; the defendant was held for trial, but three weeks before it occurred, the complainant was delivered of a child, and on the child's throat and wrist appeared marks of a thumb, etc., such as the complainant had alleged).

[2] 1794, Popkin v. Popkin, 1 Hagg. Eccl. 765, 767 ("Whether this disease is [sufficient] evidence of adultery may depend upon circumstances"); 1916, Sheffield v. Beckwith, 90 Conn. 93, 96 Atl. 316 (alienation of wife's affections; like Johnson v. Johnson, N. Y.); 1922, Riley v. State, — Ga. —, 111 S. E. 729 (rape under age; venereal disease in the defendant and then in the victim, admitted to evidence the act); 1835, Johnson v. Johnson, 14 Wend. N. Y. 637, 639, 641 (venereal disease contracted by a husband during the wife's absence is evidence of his adultery); 1912, U. S. v. Tan Teng, 23 P. I. 145, 153 (gonorrhea in the victim of a rape).

[3] Accord: California: 1904, People v. Tibbs, 143 Cal. 100, 76 Pac. 904 (seduction under promise of marriage; birth of a child as shown by its presence in court, admitted); 1909, People v. Soto, 11 Cal. App. 431, 105 Pac. 420 (pregnancy admissible to prove the act charged; but not, as here, the birth of a child from a prior act of intercourse used evidentially); Colorado: 1919, Laycock v. People, 66 Colo. 441, 182 Pac. 880 (rape under age; pregnancy, admitted, in connection with other acts); Columbia (Dist.): 1912, Kidwell v. U. S., 38 D. C. App. 566 (rape under age); 1920, Terr. v. Fong Yee, 25 Haw. 309 (seduction); Idaho: 1911, State v. Henderson, 19 Ida. 524, 114 Pac. 30 (rape under age; birth of a child, admitted); Iowa: 1906, State v. Dolan, 132 Ia. 196, 109 N. W. 609 (seduction; an obscure ruling, which finds fault with the trial court for not clearly instructing the jury; birth is said to be admissible as evidence of a seduction, but not of the defendant's being the seducer); 1907, State v. Nugent, 134 Ia. 237, 111 N. W. 927 (seduction; birth of a child, admitted); 1908, State v. Blackburn, 136 Ia. 743, 114 N. W. 531 (rape under age; birth of child, held to be not corroborative of woman's testimony; following State v. Coffman, 112 Ia. 8, but ignoring the above two cases); 1909, State v. Hunt, 144 Ia. 257, 122 N. W. 902 (seduction; birth of a child held "corroborative of the prosecutrix as to the corpus delicti", though not as connecting the defendant; Dolan and Nugent cases not cited); 1911, State v. Nathoo, 152 Ia. 665, 133 N. W. 129 (carnal knowledge of an insensible female; the fact of a birth was held admissible as corroborative, if intercourse was otherwise proved); Kansas: 1904, State v. Walke, 69 Kan. 183, 76 Pac. 468 (statutory rape); 1905, State v. Miller, 71 Kan. 200, 80 Pac. 51 (same); 1906, State v. Gereke, 74 Kan. 196, 86 Pac. 160, semble (rape under age; birth of a child, admitted); Michigan: 1905, People v. Stisson, 140 Mich. 216, 103 N. W. 542 (incest); Missouri: 1906, State v. Palmberg, 199 Mo. 233, 97 S. W. 566 (rape under age; birth of child, admitted); Nebraska: 1904, Woodruff v. State, 72 Nebr. 815, 101 N. W. 1114 (rape under age); South Dakota: 1912, State v. Holter, 30 S. D. 353, 138 N. W. 953 (seduction; plaintiff's pregnancy admitted); Texas: 1920, Klepper v. State, 87 Tex. Cr. 597, 223 S. W. 468 (seduction); Utah: 1906, State v. Thompson, 31 Utah 228, 87 Pac. 709 (adultery with a single woman; her pregnancy admitted as corroborating her, but not as connecting the defendant); Washington: 1903, State v. Fetterly, 33 Wash. 599, 74 Pac. 810 (rape under age; Fullerton, C. J.: "It conclusively proves her testimony to the effect that the crime charged was committed, and the truth of that lends credence to her testimony to the effect that the person she names is the guilty party"; said of the birth or miscarriage of a child); 1905, State v. Nelson, 39 Wash. 221, 81 Pac. 721 (adultery; birth of child twenty months after husband's absence, admitted); and some cases cited post, § 398; 1909, State v. McCool, 53 Wash. 486, 102 Pac. 422 (rape under age; admitted, but held not sufficient corroboration under the rule of § 2062, post).

Contra: 1906, Kevern v. People, 224 Ill. 170, 79 N. E. 574, semble (rape); 1918, Jordan

(4) So, also, a result of any disease, subsequent to a time in issue, may evidence its prior existence.[4]

c. MENTAL TRACES

§ 172. General Principle. The struggle of a victim for his life, and the act of taking his life, may leave upon the perpetrator indelible traces of blood, wounds, or rent clothing, which point back to the deed as done by him; these traces come from a mechanical contact with the body, weapons, and other things involved in the deed, and they remain upon him or are divested from him by a mechanical process. But a deed may also leave traces upon the doer through other than a mechanical process, i.e. through a mental or moral, i.e. psychological process. These traces may be as significant in their way as the others, — perhaps more so; and they may be equally relevant evidentially to show their bearer to be the doer of the act. These traces, like those of the other sorts, may be employed either affirmatively or negatively. The presence of such a trace may be used as indicating the doing of the act by the person bearing it; and the absence of the trace may be used as indicating the not doing it by the person not bearing the trace. The traces of this mental or psychological sort will be some form of a mental condition, — memory, belief, consciousness, knowledge, or whatever other name may be more usual and appropriate.

How to evidence this mental condition — by conduct or the like — is a different question. There is here evolved simply the question, When is memory, consciousness, and the like, relevant to show the doing of a past act? The evidencing of this mental condition raises different and more complicated questions as to the significance of conduct; hence a consideration of the state of the law upon the various uses of the present sort of evidence can best be made in connection with the rules of conduct-evidence. Those rules in their details are elsewhere examined (post, §§ 265–293). It is enough here to summarize the chief types of inference of the present sort, and thus to exhibit the place of this inference in the general doctrine of Relevancy.

§ 173. Consciousness of Guilt. The commission of a crime leaves usually upon the consciousness a moral impression which is characteristic. The innocent man is without it; the guilty man usually has it. Its evidential value has never been doubted. The inference from consciousness of guilt to "guilty" is always available in evidence. It is a most powerful one, because the only other hypothesis conceivable is the rare one that the person's consciousness is caused by a delusion, and not by the actual doing of the act. The difficulty in connection with this evidence is, not its own relevancy to show the doing of the act — that is universally conceded — but the mode of proving this consciousness of guilt in its turn by other evidence. There are two processes or inferences involved, — from conduct to consciousness of guilt, and then from consciousness of guilt to the guilty deed. The latter, belonging here, gives rise to no disputed questions of evidence. The former gives rise to many questions, due to the variety of conduct offerable in evidence. These questions are dealt with (post, §§ 273–291), in discussing evidence of consciousness or knowledge in general. It is worth while here to note this double step of inference involved; for it exhibits the true significance of the evidential use of conduct as indicating consciousness of guilt.

v. Com., 180 Ky. 379, 202 S. W. 896 (seduction); 1906, People v. Brown, 142 Mich. 622, 106 N. W. 149 (rape under age in June, 1904, the statutory age being reached on July 15, 1904; pregnancy in March and May, 1905, excluded; a queer decision, the present question not being distinguished from others involved).

[4] Cases cited post, § 225, n. 1.

§ 174. Consciousness of Innocence. Just as the lack of mechanical or corporal traces may be used negatively (ante, § 158) to show the non-doing of an act, so the lack of guilty consciousness may be useful to show innocence of a crime. This lack of guilty consciousness — in other words, this consciousness of innocence — seems not to have been doubted by Courts as having in itself evidential value. But, assuming it to be relevant, a difficulty arises in the proof of it as a proposition, — the difficulty that the conduct offered to evidence it is so likely to be feigned and artificial. The disputed question, then, whether the conduct of an accused person is admissible in his favor, involves a doubt, not as to the evidential value of consciousness of innocence as indicating non-doing, but as to the evidential value of conduct as showing consciousness of innocence, — a problem elsewhere examined (post, § 293).

§ 175. Belief or Recollection of Personal Doings, as Evidence of Identity. All personal deeds are likely to leave some sort of a mark in the recollection or belief. The presence of that mark is some indication of the doing of the act recollected, and the absence of the mark is some evidence of the non-doing of the act. Where a person's identity is in issue, his recollection or non-recollection of experiences known to have occurred to the person with whom he is to be identified may often serve as useful evidence. For the reasons already stated, the rulings on this subject can best be examined elsewhere (post, § 270).

§ 176. Same: Legitimacy, as evidenced by Parent's Conduct; Marriage, by "Habit"; Testamentary Execution, by the Deceased's Belief. Among the most notable facts of life which are certain to leave marked traces on those into whose experience they enter are the facts of marriage, of the birth of children, and of the execution of a testament. Long tradition has recognized this, and has in these cases sanctioned the inference from subsequent belief or recollection to the prior act or experience. But the real difficulty lies in the inference from conduct to that belief, and, for the reason already noted, the details of the law can best be examined in another place, — the inference to Legitimacy, under § 269, to Marriage, under § 268, and to Testamentary Execution, under § 271.

§ 177. Conduct of Animals, as evidencing a Human Act; Tracking by Bloodhounds. If the instinct or habit of animals can in a given case be supposed to be sensitive to the dealings of men with them, it would seem that the conduct of an animal may be trusted evidentially as indicating the human act which would naturally have caused the animal's conduct.[1] Such indications may be of two kinds:

(1) The behavior of the animal may be a trick or other action expressly taught or implicitly acquired during his past association with a particular person; the possession of such a trick by a given animal will therefore serve to identify him as having been in that person's possession. This evidential use is well established in judicial practice, though it has seldom been brought before courts of appeal.[2]

(2) The behavior of the animal may be the result of an impression made on some peculiarly strong sense by a casual outward event or human act, incapable of being perceived by the human senses. The behavior of a horse in the vicinity of a concealed beast of prey is an instance of this. The custom, in certain of our communities, of tracking fugitives by bloodhounds, rests on a similar trait of those animals. It is conceded by most Courts that the fact that a well-trained and well-tested bloodhound of good breed, after smelling a shoe or other article belonging to the doer of a crime, has tracked definitely to the accused, is admissible to show that the accused was the doer of the criminal act.[3]

§ 177. [1] For animal's conduct as evidencing the character or disposition of the animal, see post, § 201.

[2] Circa 1530, More's "Life of Sir Thomas More", quoted in Campbell's "Lives of the Chancellors", II, 37 (story of the beggar-woman's little dog, who was bought from a thief by the Chancellor's wife; the Chancellor allowed her to prove property by the dog's recognition of her); 1800, Anon., in Twiss' Life of Lord Eldon, I, 354 (quoted post, § 1154); 1888, State v. Ward, 61 Vt. 185, 17 Atl. 483 (where a complicated set of turnings on different roads must have been followed by the incendiary, evidence was admitted that the defendant's horse shortly after took the same turning without guidance); 1894, Chicago Herald, May 31 (a German saloonkeeper in Chicago lost his parrot; in the possession of an American saloonkeeper a similar parrot was found; the ownership of this parrot was claimed by both parties, each affirming that he had possessed and trained the parrot for a long time, and that the parrot would show the effect of this training in his language; at the trial before Justice of the Peace Eberhardt, the parrot would not speak; he was therefore committed temporarily to the custody of a police-captain; "Captain Barcel will keep the bird in custody, and will keep his ears strained to catch either 'Set 'em up again', or 'Unser bier ist gut' "); 1900, Boston Transcript, Dec. 12 (in East Orange, N. J.; the larceny of a carrier pigeon by B. from E. was charged; the defendant claiming to be owner, the pigeon was released, and alighted later in E.'s barn); 1907, State v. Hunter, 143 N. C. 607, 56 S. E. 547 (Chief Justice Clark reminds us of "the classical incident of Ulysses, on his return from his memorable wanderings, being recognized by his dog Argos (who died from joy), when his family and his followers knew him not", and "the more modern incident of Aubry's dog of Montargis, who procured the confession of his master's murderer by his recognition of him").

Compare the following: 1905, Miller v. Terr., 9 Ariz. 123, 80 Pac. 321 (larceny of a colt; testimony from stockmen who had observed the animal's conduct that "the colt belonged to a certain mare which it had been following", admitted).

Compare the unsound ruling in State v. Landry, 29 Mont. 218, 74 Pac. 418 (1903), cited post, § 1163, n. 6.

[3] Alabama: 1890, Simpson v. State, 111 Ala. 6, 20 So. 572, semble (that bloodhounds had tracked the defendant from the place of the crime, admitted, the dog's habit being never to leave a human track once scented); 1892, Hodge v. State, 98 Ala. 10, 11, 13 So. 385 (murder; that a trained dog had followed the trail to the defendant's house, admitted, on the facts); 1905, Little v. State, 145 Ala. 662, 39 So. 674

Nevertheless, in actual usage, this evidence is apt to be highly misleading, to the danger of innocent men. Amidst the popular excitement attendant upon a murder and the chase of the suspect, all the facts upon which the trustworthiness of the inference rests are apt to be distorted in the testimony. Moreover, the very limited nature of the inference possible is apt to be overestimated, — a consequence dangerous when the jurors are moved by local

(the animal must be shown to have been trained to track human beings and to be able to do so accurately); 1906, Richardson v. State, 145 Ala. 46, 41 So. 82 (tracing by hounds; admitted); 1906, Hargrove v. State, 147 Ala. 97, 41 So. 972 (burglary; trailing of accused by bloodhounds, shown to be trained to the purpose, admitted); 1909, McDonald v. State, 165 Ala. 85, 51 So. 629 (admitted; here the uncertainty of the evidence was exhibited by the dogs' trailing of two different persons); Arkansas: 1916, Padgett v. State, 125 Ark. 471, 188 S. W. 1158 (assault; bloodhound evidence admitted); 1921, West v. State, 150 Ark. 555, 234 S. W. 997 (rape; tracing by trained dog, admitted); Florida: 1903, Davis v. State, 46 Fla. 137, 35 So. 76 (burglary; trailing by dogs is admissible, on certain conditions indicating "that reliance may reasonably be placed upon the accuracy of the trailing"); 1904, Davis v. State, 47 Fla. 26, 36 So. 170 (former opinion applied); Georgia: 1915, Fite v. State, 16 Ga. App. 22, 84 S. E. 485 (bloodhound trailing, held admissible, under strict conditions specified); 1915, Aiken v. State, 16 Ga. App. 848, 86 S. E. 1076 (burglary; as to bloodhound evidence, "we adopt the rule laid down in Pedigo's Case", Ky., infra); Illinois: 1914, People v. Pfanschmidt, 262 Ill. 411, 104 N. E. 804 (murder and arson, trailing by a bloodhound, by means of a horse-and-buggy scent, to the accused's camp, held not admissible, partly because the conditions here were too full of obstacles to make the trailing trustworthy, and also on the ground that "the trailing of either a man or an animal by a bloodhound should never be admitted in any case"); Indiana: 1910, Stout v. State, 174 Ind. 395, 92 N. E. 161 (trailing of another person than the accused; the present question not decided); 1917, Ruse v. State, 186 Ind. 237, 115 N. E. 778 (crime unspecified: the trailing by bloodhounds was held inadmissible; Sairy, C. J., and Myers, J., diss.); Iowa: 1904, McClurg v. Brenton, 123 Ia. 368, 98 N. W. 881 (where the defendant had trespassed on the plaintiff's premises, looking for stolen fowls, and led by bloodhounds, the Court disparaged such methods); Kansas: 1911, State v. Adams, 85 Kan. 435, 116 Pac. 608 (murder; tracking of accused by bloodhounds, held allowable, on a showing that the dogs are qualified by breed and training, and that "the person testifying is reliable"); 1914, State v. Mooney, 93 Kan. 353, 144 Pac. 228 (State v. Adams, followed); 1917, State v. Sweet, 101 Kan. 746, 168 Pac. 1112 (murder; "bloodhound evidence" admitted pursuant to the limitations of State v. Adams and State v. Mooney, supra); Kentucky: 1898, Pedigo v. Com., 103 Ky. 41, 44 S. W. 143 (admitted; DuRelle, J.: "It is difficult to lay down a general rule as to the introduction of testimony of this kind. . . . We think it may be safely laid down that, in order to make such testimony competent, even when it is shown that the dog is of pure blood, and of a stock characterized by acuteness of scent and power of discrimination, it must also be established that the dog in question is possessed of these qualities, and has been trained or tested in their exercise in the tracking of human beings, and that these facts must appear from the testimony of some person who has personal knowledge thereof. We think it must also appear that the dog so trained and tested was laid on the trail, whether visible or not, concerning which testimony has been admitted, at a point where the circumstances tend clearly to show that the guilty party had been, or upon a track which such circumstances indicated to have been made by him"; Guffy, J., diss., in an able opinion); 1904, Allen v. Com., — Ky. —, 82 S. W. 589 (rule of Pedigo v. Com. applied to exclude such evidence where the dog's qualities were not sufficiently shown); 1905, Denham v. Com., 119 Ky. 508, 84 S. W. 538 (Pedigo v. Com. followed); 1909, Sprouse v. Com., 132 Ky. 269, 116 S. W. 344 (trailing by hounds from a burned house to defendant's house; excluded, partly because the skill of the hounds was not sufficiently shown, and partly because due precautions for accuracy were not taken); 1916, Blair v. Com., 171 Ky. 319, 188 S. W. 390 (Pedigo v. Com. rule applied, here excluding the evidence); 1922, Meyers v. Com., — Ky. —, 240 S. W. 71 (arson; applying the rule of Pedigo v. Com., supra, but announcing that bloodhound evidence alone "would be insufficient to convict", i.e. to identify the accused; it seems odd that any court could deliberate one moment over such a preposterous assertion as the contrary); Louisiana: 1919, State v. King, 144 La. 430, 80 So. 615 (murder, bloodhound evidence admitted, on conditions showing reliability of the animal); Minnesota: 1921, Crosby v. Moriarty, 148 Minn. 201, 181 N. W. 199 (action for arson; conduct of bloodhounds in tracing the perpetrator, excluded on the facts); Missouri: 1912, State v. Rasco, 239 Mo. 535, 144 S. W. 449 (murder; trailing by bloodhounds, allowed on the testimony to prejudice.[4] Hence Courts do well to insist on the strictest fulfilment of the above conditions of admissibility; and additional requirements are sometimes made. The hesitation shown in some Courts to the use of this evidence is due to the risks of its misuse by the jury; for in some regions of our country the mysteriously accurate operation of the dogs' senses has given rise to a superstitious faith in the dogs' inerrant inspiration, and this gross popular creed might in a jury mislead them into giving excessive credit to the evidence of the dogs' itinerary.

their habits and skill); Nebraska: 1903, Brott v. State, 70 Nebr. 395, 97 N. W. 593 (behavior of bloodhounds in trailing the defendant, held inadmissible on the facts; Sullivan, C. J.: "That the bloodhound is frequently wrong is a fact well attested by experience. . . . It is unsafe evidence, and both reason and instinct condemn it"); North Carolina: 1901, State v. Moore, 129 N. C. 494, 39 S. E. 626 (that a bloodhound trailed and pointed out the defendants, charged with larceny of meat and other things, was held inadmissible on the facts, without denying that it might be a "circumstance to be considered in connecting a person with an act"); 1907, State v. Hunter, 143 N. C. 607, 56 S. E. 547 (arson; trailing by a trained bloodhound, admitted); 1908, State v. Freeman, 146 N. C. 615, 60 S. E. 986 (burglary; a dog's trailing of the defendant, by shoe-scent, admitted); 1919, State v. Yearwood, 178 N. C. 813, 101 S. E. 513 (arson; trail by bloodhounds, admitted, after proof of their training and reputation); 1921, State v. Robinson, 181 N. C. 516, 106 S. E. 155 (assault; conduct of bloodhounds, admitted on the facts); Ohio: 1907, State v. Dickerson, 77 Oh. 34, 82 N. E. 969 (trailing of a murderer by a bloodhound held admissible, provided that the particular dog was trained in tracking human beings and had in experience been found reliable, this reliability being testified to from personal knowledge, and that the dog had been laid on the trail at a point or track clearly indicated as the guilty party's; the pedigree, etc., of the dog to be admissible in corroboration); South Carolina: 1916, State v. Brown, 103 S. C. 437, 88 S. E. 21 (arson; bloodhound evidence sanctioned, because Crim. Code § 945 authorizes the use of dogs for tracking lawbreakers; here held inadmissible because the dogs were not set on the track within the period of efficiency); Texas: 1904, Parker v. State, 46 Tex. Cr. 461, 80 S. W. 1008 (bloodhound's tracking of defendant admitted; rule of Pedigo v. Com., Ky., approved).

[4] The limitations are well stated by Mr. E. Austin Freeman, in one of the detective stories in his volume entitled "The Singing Bone" (London, 1914). This story, entitled "A Case of Premeditation", is quoted in part in the Illinois Law Review, IX, 192.

TITLE I (continued): CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE

SUB-TITLE II: EVIDENCE TO PROVE A HUMAN QUALITY OR CONDITION

CHAPTER IX.

§ 190. Nature of this Class of Evidence. 1. The reasons for dividing into three groups the whole subject of Circumstantial Evidence have been already stated (ante, § 43). The groups being distinguished according to the propositions to be proved, the second group is now to be considered, namely, Evidence to prove a Human Quality, Condition, or other attribute.

This group of propositions (facta probanda) separates itself from the first (Human Acts) with fair distinctness, first, because the circumstances available as evidence are usually distinct for the two groups, but chiefly because certain general considerations of Auxiliary Policy, as well as of Relevancy, run through the present group, constantly reappearing, and not only making various analogies useful, but rendering it impossible to understand the rules of Evidence for certain kinds of propositions without considering those for others. The distinction between the two groups is by no means an artificial one, but is fully in harmony with the attitude of the Courts towards the problems involved.

2. The various conceivable propositions to be proved may be reduced to the following well-defined sorts:

Moral Character or Disposition;	Motive or Emotion;
Physical and Mental Capacity;	Habit or Custom, and Possession;
Design or Plan, and Intent;	Traits of Handwriting;
Knowledge, Belief, or Consciousness;	Identity.

A different analysis and order of treatment is conceivable; but with reference to the usefulness of putting in proximity those matters which throw light upon each other, this division and this order seem the most practical.[1]

3. It will be understood that we are here not concerned how the above human qualities come to be propositions for proof (ante, § 2). We are concerned only to learn what facts will be admissible evidentially to prove the quality proposed for proof. For instance, Character may be in issue through the pleadings in a suit for slander on a plea of justification, or in an action for personal injury as an element of the defendant's liability for an incompetent servant; or it may be used, not as in issue under the pleadings, but as evidential, to prove a human act, for example, the good character of a defendant in a criminal case or his bad character in rebuttal. So, also, Knowledge may be in issue in a suit to set aside a purchase in fraud of creditors, or it may be evidential only, as when it is offered to prove the doing of a past act as a mark of identity (post, § 270). In all these instances the quality which is termed Character, Knowledge, or the like, has somehow come into the case as a proposition to be proved; and the question how to evidence it presents itself equally whether the 'factum probandum', when once proved, is going in turn to be used itself evidentially to show some other fact, or is one of the very ultimate propositions made material by the pleadings. It is true that by tradition or by policy the mode of proof available in the one case may sometimes not be available in the other; but this is only an incidental and not a necessary or common feature.

§ 190. [1] From the point of view of logic and psychology as applicable to argument before the jury (not the rules of Admissibility), see the materials collected in the present author's "Principles of Judicial Proof, as given by Logic, Psychology, and General Experience, and illustrated in Judicial Trials" (1913), §§ 28, 84–98.

4. Three species of evidential facts are available to show a human quality or condition:

(1) Conduct; this is the expression, in outward behavior, of the quality or condition operating to produce those effects. These results are the traces by which we may infer the moving cause. In point of time, conduct is closely associated with the internal condition giving rise to it; nevertheless, the indication is strictly not a concomitant, but a retrospectant one (ante, § 43), because the argument is backwards from effect (conduct) to cause (internal condition).

(2) External facts (prospectant) pointing forward to the probable coming into existence of the quality; for example, the victim's gold, as pointing forward to the defendant's probable desire to rob him, or the reputation of A's insolvency, as pointing forward to B's probable receipt of knowledge of it. In using this evidence, we take our stand beforehand and argue that the evidential fact probably gave rise to the emotion, knowledge, or intent to be proved. The indication is thus prospectant; while that of conduct is retrospectant.

(3) There is also a third sort of fact, having either a prospectant or a retrospectant indication, and not exactly corresponding to either of the preceding sorts, namely, prior or subsequent condition, as showing condition at a given time. Thus, to prove insanity, we may offer (1) conduct as the effect illustrating its cause, mental aberration, (2) circumstances of unsuccessful business, domestic troubles, and the like, tending to bring on insanity; and (3) prior or subsequent insanity, pointing forwards or backwards to insanity at the time in question. So also, to show a husband's desire or motive to get rid of his wife, we may offer (1) his conduct exhibiting such a desire, (2) the existence of a paramour, tending to create such a desire, and (3) a prior desire, as pointing forward to its continued existence at the time in question. A similar general question presents itself in all evidence of this third sort, namely, how far before or after the time in question the survey may extend in considering the fact of prior or subsequent condition.

For some subjects, all three of these sorts of evidence are available, perhaps with equal frequency; for others only one or two of them are available, at least usually; thus, to evidence character, facts of the second sort do not come into play at all, — unless the principles of heredity one day become so clearly ascertainable as to offer a sure basis of argument from ancestry. It is enough to note that in taking up the different 'facta probanda' a convenient order of arrangement of the evidential facts may be based on this triple division.

5. The distinction between a pure principle of Relevancy and a doctrine of Auxiliary Policy (expounded ante, § 42) is in the present subject of constant importance. Our first question, for any kind of evidence, must be, Is it Relevant, i.e. has it probative value enough to be considered? But even when it is relevant and would so far be admissible, it may still be shut out by some auxiliary policy forbidding confusion of issues, undue prejudice, or unfair surprise (post, § 1904). It is practically necessary to treat in one place the two sets of considerations, Relevancy and Auxiliary Policy, as applied to the same piece of evidence; but it must not be forgotten that the two are entirely distinct in function.

Topic I: EVIDENCE TO PROVE CHARACTER OR DISPOSITION

§ 191. Kinds of Evidence. It is here assumed that Moral Character or Disposition is somehow in the case to be proved, — either as material under the pleadings or as evidential to prove something else (ante, § 54). The question then here arises, What evidential facts may be used to prove it?

Of the three sorts of facts just described, the second sort (prospectant) is here wholly unavailable; there is no external fact from which we can argue forward that a person will have a certain character. Heredity, as a biological indication that an ancestor's trait will recur in a descendant, is as yet not accepted by science in any details available for judicial proof (ante, § 165). Only in the case of insanity (post, § 231), longevity (post, § 223), and of a few marked physiological traits (ante, §§ 166, 167), has such a use of heredity been given recognition. No doubt in juvenile court practice the family record is studied by the judge, but hardly for mere evidential purposes. Some day in this field a body of data will be accumulated from which evidential principles may be drawn.

The third sort of fact, prior or subsequent character, as indicating character at the time in question, is undoubtedly available evidence; but its use is so complicated with the question of using Reputation (under the Hearsay exception) at a prior or subsequent time, that both subjects can best be examined together; accordingly the use of prior or subsequent character, to evidence character at the time in question, is there dealt with (post, § 1617).

The material here to be considered, therefore, is the first sort of evidence, i.e. conduct, — the sort by far the commonest and the only one that raises questions of serious difficulty. Under what condition, then, is conduct admissible to evidence Character?

1. Conduct to show Character of a Defendant in a Criminal Case

§ 192. Nature of the Inference; an Act is not evidential of another Act. At the outset of this entire prospectant class of inferences, it must be noted that, where the doing of an act is the proposition to be proved, there can never be a direct inference from an act of former conduct to the act charged; there must always be a double step of inference of some sort, a 'tertium quid.' In other words, it cannot be argued: "Because A did an act X last year, therefore he probably did the act X as now charged." Human action being infinitely varied, there is no adequate probative connection between the two. A may do the act once, and may never do it again; and not only may he not do it again, but it is in no degree probable that he will do it again. The conceivable contingencies that may intervene are too numerous.

Thus, whenever resort is had to a person's past conduct or acts as the basis of inference to a subsequent act, it must always be done intermediately through another inference. It may be argued: "A once committed a robbery; (1) therefore he probably has a thieving disposition; (2) therefore he probably committed this robbery"; or "(1) therefore he had some general design to commit certain robberies; (2) therefore he probably carried out that design and committed this robbery." Or it may be argued: "A gave money to his poor friend B; (1) therefore A probably is of a benevolent disposition; (2) therefore A probably did not commit the present robbery"; or "(1) therefore he probably had a kindly feeling towards B; (2) therefore he probably did not rob B." The impulse to argue from A's former bad deed or good deed directly to his doing or not doing of the bad deed charged is perhaps a natural one; but it will always be found, upon analysis of the process of reasoning, that there is involved in it a hidden intermediary step of some sort, resting on a second inference of character, motive, plan, or the like. This intermediate step is always implicit, and must be brought out.

The result is that, when the ultimate proposition to be proved is the doing of an act by a defendant, and resort is had evidentially to his past conduct, this is not in order to argue directly from act to act, but in order, by the past act, to evidence character, design, motive, or some other quality, and through that quality to infer that it led to the act charged. To make available such evidence of past conduct or acts, some use for it must be found as evidencing Character either Character (as here), or else Design, Motive, Intent, or some other quality (post, §§ 300–371).

This principle has long been accepted in our law. That "the doing of one act is in itself no evidence that the same or a like act was again done by the same person", has been so often judicially repeated that it is a commonplace:

1872, AGNEW, J., in Shaffner v. Com., 72 Pa. 65: "It is a general rule that a distinct crime, unconnected with that laid in the indictment, cannot be given in evidence against a prisoner. . . . Logically the commission of an independent offence is not proof in itself of the commission of another crime."

1893, KNOWLTON, J., in Miller v. Curtis, 158 Mass. 127, 129: "That a person has committed one crime has no direct tendency to show that he committed another similar crime which had no connection with the first."

1896, MARTIN, J., in People v. McLaughlin, 150 N. Y. 365, 386, 44 N. E. 1017: "It is an elementary principle that the commission of one crime is not admissible in evidence to establish the guilt of a party of another."

§ 193. Particular Bad Acts to show the Defendant's Character; (1) Relevancy. It has already been seen (ante, § 58) that if a defendant in a criminal case chooses to offer his good character (for the appropriate trait) as an argument that he probably did not commit the offence charged, the prosecution may by counter-evidence dispute the existence in him of the good character thus alleged; and it has also been seen that the fact thus to be proved or disproved is the real disposition or Character, of which reputation or anything else is merely evidence (ante, § 52).

The question thus arises how the Character is to be proved or disproved. It has been noted (ante, §§ 52, 53) that there are three conceivable ways of evidencing it: (1) Reputation of the community; this is open to the objection of being Hearsay, and is dealt with post, § 1608; (2) Personal Knowledge or Opinion of those who know the defendant; this is open to the objection of the Opinion rule, and is dealt with post, § 1980; (3) Particular Acts of Misconduct, exhibiting the particular trait involved. This last sort of evidence is now to be considered.

The law here declares a general and absolute rule of exclusion. It is forbidden, in showing that the defendant has not the good character which he affirms, to resort to particular acts of misconduct by him.

Is this prohibition based on the Irrelevancy of such evidence, or on some reason of Auxiliary Policy (ante, § 42) which assumes its relevancy but sees reasons of policy for its exclusion? That such former misconduct is relevant, i.e. has probative value to persuade us of the general trait or disposition, cannot be doubted. The assumption of its probative value is made throughout the judicial opinions on this subject;[1] and the following acute analysis makes it entirely clear:

> 1876, State v. Lapage, 57 N. H. 275, 299; on a charge of murder committed in an attempt to rape, the fact of the defendant's recent rape of another person was offered, Mr. Norris arguing for the defence: "Making no point of remoteness in time or space, let us see how well this evidence will bear analyzing. Premise to be proved: he committed a rape, in no way, except in kind, connected with this crime. Inference: a general disposition to commit this kind of offence. Next premise: this general disposition in him. Inference: he committed this particular offence. . . . It may be tried by the common test of the validity of arguments. Some men who commit a single crime have, or thereby acquire, a tendency to commit the same kind of crimes; if this man committed the rape, he might therefore have or thereby acquire a tendency to commit other rapes; if he had or so acquired such a tendency, and if another rape was committed within his reach, he might therefore be more likely to be guilty; if more likely to be guilty of rape, and if there was murder committed in perpetrating or attempting to perpetrate rape, he might therefore be more likely to be guilty of this rape, and hence of this murder; a sort of an 'ex-parte' conviction of a single rape, from which the jury are to find a general disposition to that kind of crimes, in order to help them out in presuming the commission of another rape as a mo-

§ 193. [1] For example, in the quotations in the next section, and also in the following: 1851, R. v. Shrimpton, 2 Den. Cr. C. 322 (Campbell, L. C. J.: "The question in issue is the good character of the prisoner; surely, whether the prisoner had been previously convicted is relevant to that"; Alderson, B.: "The prisoner raises the question of character, and the evidence of his former conviction is brought to show what his character really is").

For the psychological aspects of conduct as evidencing character, in point of probative value and irrespective of the rules of Evidence, see the present author's "Principles of Judicial Proof" (1913), §§ 84–98.

tive or occasion of the murder. We can find nothing like it in the books." LADD, J.: "But it is nevertheless argued on behalf of the State (if I have not wholly misapprehended the drift of the argument) that the evidence was admitted because, as matter of fact, its natural tendency was to produce conviction in the mind that the prisoner committed rape upon his victim at the time he took her life. . . . I shall not undertake to deny this. If I know a man has broken into my house and stolen my goods, I am for that reason more ready to believe him guilty of breaking into my neighbor's house and committing the same crime there. We do not trust our property with a notorious thief. We cannot help suspecting a man of evil life and infamous character sooner than one who is known to be free from every taint of dishonesty or crime. We naturally recoil with fear and loathing from a known murderer, and watch his conduct as we would the motions of a beast of prey. When the community is startled by the commission of some great crime, our first search for the perpetrator is naturally directed, not among those who have hitherto lived blameless lives, but among those whose conduct has been such as to create the belief that they have the depravity of heart to do the deed. This is human nature — the teaching of human experience. If it were the law, that everything which has a natural tendency to lead the mind towards a conclusion that a person charged with crime is guilty must be admitted in evidence against him on the trial of that charge, the argument for the State would doubtless be hard to answer. If I know a man has once been false, I cannot after that believe in his truth as I did before. If I know he has committed the crime of perjury once, I more readily believe he will commit the same awful crime again, and I cannot accord the same trust and confidence to his statements under oath that I otherwise should. . . . Suppose the general character of one charged with crime is infamous and degraded to the last degree; that his life has been nothing but a succession of crimes of the most atrocious and revolting sort: does not the knowledge of all this inevitably carry the mind in the direction of a conclusion that he has added the particular crime for which he is being tried to the list of those who have gone before? Why, then, should not the prosecutor be permitted to show facts which tend so naturally to produce a conviction of his guilt? The answer to all these questions is plain and decisive: The law is otherwise."

In the Continental traditions of criminal trials, this class of evidence is given great consideration, and is freely used. The following passages illustrate the part it plays at a trial:

French Trials. (1) Trial for the Murder of the Baroness de Valley. (1896, Paris; Albert Bataille, "Causes Criminelles et Mondaines", 1896, p. 249.) [On June 16, 1896, Baroness de Valley was found strangled in her apartment in Paris. She was rich, and made a business of lending her money at usurious rates. Robbery was the object of her murderers. A party of several young fellows, Kiesgen, Ferrand, Lagueny and Truel, were charged with the murder. One of them, Kiesgen, son of a merchant, appeared well dressed and well brought up; he had no occupation and his father furnished him with pocket-money. The others were of not so respectable surroundings. Presiding Judge POUPARDIN thus conducted the opening examination at the trial, on November 24.]

JUDGE. "None of you have a criminal record; but that is far from saying that you have a good record.

"You, Kiesgen, seem to have a mode of life not at all creditable. You frequent the low saloons of the Latin Quarter. You were an habitué of the Harcourt Café. You have been getting all the money you could from women. Your mistress, Jeanne Prevost, alias Margot, gave you 15 francs a day from her earnings as a prostitute. You are a panderer of the worst sort. In your cell at Mazas Prison, you kept writing to Margot, asking her to send you cash. Unfortunately for you, she was at that time herself in St. Lazare Prison (Laughter in the audience).

"As for you, Truel, alias Julian, alias Curlyhead, you are the son of a mechanical draftsman at Charenton. After having a job as apprentice-draftsman in a factory, you were discharged for a brutal assault. After that you lived off your mother, . . . Then you became an habitué, like Kiesgen, of the saloons and women of the Latin Quarter. You seem to have been one of a gang of bicycle thieves. In short, after starting as an honest workingman, you gave up that pursuit, and became an agent for houses of ill-fame. You see what you have been brought to by bad company.

"You, Lagueny, like your fellow-defendants, are scarcely twenty years old. You are the natural son of an unfortunate woman who died insane, two years ago, at the St. Anne Asylum. During all your boyhood you were left by her to loaf on the streets. You picked up a living by hawking things now and then; selling newspapers, sometimes dogs, sometimes peddling olives at restaurant-doors; sleeping in the public refuges. At twelve years of age, a charitable society had you baptized in the Sacred Heart Church at Montmartre, and next day you partook of your first communion. Your mother seems to have done some questionable errands for Baroness Valley, and told you that the Baroness was your godmother. You, ever since you became a young man, have been an agent for the assignations of girls in the Latin Quarter. That was where you made the acquaintance of Kiesgen and of Julien the Curlyhead. To them you made the proposal to go and rob the Baroness. She had always showed a kind interest in you; she used to give you odd change."

Lagueny. "Gave me money? Well, I guess not! The old skinflint! She would even pick up old crusts of bread in the street."

JUDGE. "Well, at any rate, your mother used to be her housekeeper, and the Baroness sometimes gave you a lunch."

. . . . . .

[Then the evidence directly to the crime was put in.

Nov. 25. The jury found three of the defendants guilty. But in view of the youth and lack of a criminal record for Kiesgen and Truel (the two who did the actual killing), they recommended those two for leniency. Both were sentenced to hard labor for life. . . .

Lagueny, who had proposed the robbery, was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment, Ferrand to five years, and Durlin was acquitted.]

. . . . . .

(2) Trial for Blackmailing Max Lebaudy. (1896, Paris; Albert Bataille, "Causes Criminelles et Mondaines", 1896, p. 95.) [Max Lebaudy was a young millionaire, foolish and extravagant. About the years 1894–5, he became the prey of a number of blackmailers, some of them journalists, some ex-military men, some mere adventurers. Several different widespread intrigues against him were unearthed. He was bled for various sums, — fr. 30,000; 10,000; 40,000; etc. Various well-known personages, political, literary, and dramatic, more or less innocent, were more or less involved in the scandals.

On March 30, 1896, the trial began, under Presiding Judge PLANTEAU.]

Examination of Viscount Ulrich de Civry.

JUDGE. "You took part in the war of 1870, and I am bound to say that you behaved very creditably. Leaving the army in 1873, with the rank of cavalry quartermaster, you went back to journalism, and were at last accounts chief editor of the Army Echo. You also went into politics; and were candidate for the Assembly at Yvonne in 1893.

"But I am obliged to remind you that you have a record in the criminal court. In 1876, the Paris Court of Appeals sentenced you to one year's imprisonment for illegally wearing military uniform. In 1880, the same Court sentenced you to two months for unlawful eloignment of goods under attachment."

Civry. "My counsel will explain about those convictions."

JUDGE. "But those are not all. You were convicted by default, in 1877, at the Seine Assize Court, of robbery, and were sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment with hard labor. They had to extradite you from England, and the penalty was commuted to three years. But the judgment was set aside on technical grounds; you had a new trial at Melun, and the public prosecutor withdrew his charge, and you were of course acquitted.

"To get the money for your legal expenses, you had borrowed large sums, through several notaries. One of these notaries has himself just been convicted at the Seine Assize Court. The sums you thus borrowed amounted in notes for more than fr. 1,000,000, nominally, though you yourself received only some fr. 500,000."

[The judge then entered into details of the Hennion case, reading from the records. Hennion was a young man of means from the provinces, who had become entangled in the usurers' and speculators' clutches by the medium of Viscount Civry, and the Viscount had narrowly escaped another criminal sentence.]

JUDGE. "The judgment of the Court there said: 'Hennion's ruin was obviously due to the machinations of unscrupulous adventurers, among whom figured Ulrich de Civry. Unfortunately, the Penal Code does not reach all forms of dishonesty.'

"Well, in spite of these unsavory incidents in your past, you maintained something of a position in a certain section of Parisian society. When you left your regiment in 1891, you were adjutant. What is your business now?"

Civry. "Horse-trading."

JUDGE. "That is not a business. It is reported that you do not do much of anything, and are living as a parasite off other persons. You spent two years in Normandy with an old chum from your regiment, Mr. Davout, but he finally gave you to understand, in correct but unmistakable manner, that you had reached the limits of his hospitality. You then came back to live in Paris, where you ran up debts, even with the house-porter."

Civry. "That was for my room-breakfasts. And I did not have time to pay him; they arrested me too soon." (Laughter in the audience).

[On March 26, the verdict and judgment were rendered.

Joseph de Civry, Georges de Labruyère, Chiarosolo, Rosenthal, and Carle des Perrières were acquitted.

Ulrich de Civry and Cesti were found guilty, and sentenced to thirteen months in jail and 500 francs fine.]

§ 194. Same: (2) Reasons of Policy. It may almost be said that it is because of this indubitable Relevancy of such evidence that it is excluded. It is objectionable, not because it has no appreciable probative value, but because it has too much. The natural and inevitable tendency of the tribunal — whether judge or jury — is to give excessive weight to the vicious record of crime thus exhibited, and either to allow it to bear too strongly on the present charge, or to take the proof of it as justifying a condemnation irrespective of guilt of the present charge. Moreover, the use of alleged particular acts ranging over the entire period of the defendant's life makes it impossible for him to be prepared to refute the charges, any or all of which may be mere fabrications. These reasons of Auxiliary Policy (post, § 1863), directed to prevent the risks of reaching verdicts through insufficient evidence, have operated to exclude that which is in itself relevant.

In early practice this class of evidence was resorted to without limitation.[1]

§ 194. [1] It is clear that before 1670–1680 the accused's prior record of misconduct could be considered: 1669, Hawkins' Trial, 6 How. St. Tr. 921, 935, 949 (larceny; details of a larceny from another person at another time, allowed to be given; L. C. B. Hale: "This, if true, would render the prisoner now at the bar obnoxious to any jury"); 1684, Hampden's Trial, cited post (the judge, in excluding such evidence invokes a "case lately adjudged in this court"). The case of Faulconer (1653; 5 How. St. Tr. 323, 354), which Sir J. Stephen has cited (Hist. Cr. Law, I, 368) as an early instance of such evidence, is hardly in point;

But for more than two centuries, ever since the liberal reaction which began with the Restoration of the Stuarts, this policy of exclusion, in one or another of its reasonings, has received judicial sanction, more emphatic with time and experience. It represents a revolution in the theory of criminal trials, and is one of the peculiar features, of vast moment, which distinguishes the Anglo-American from the Continental system of Evidence:[2]

1684, WITHINS, J., in Hampden's Trial, 9 How. St. Tr. 1053, 1103: "You know the case lately adjudged in this Court; a person was indicted of forgery, we would not let them give evidence of any other forgeries but that for which he was indicted, because we would not suffer any raking into men's course of life to pick up evidence that they cannot be prepared to answer to."

1692, HOLT, L. C. J., in Harrison's Trial, 12 How. St. Tr. 833, 864, 874 (charge of murder; a witness was called to speak of some felonious conduct of the defendant three years before): "Hold, hold, what are you doing now? Are you going to arraign his whole life? How can he defend himself from charges of which he has no notice? And how many issues are to be raised to perplex me and the jury? Away, away! That ought not to be; that is nothing to the matter."

1847, PARKE, B., in Att'y-Gen'l v. Hitchcock, 1 Ex. 93: "We cannot enter into a collateral question as to the man's having committed a crime on some former occasion, one reason being that it would lead to complicated issues and long inquiries; and another, that a party cannot be expected to be prepared to defend the whole of the actions of his life."

1851, R. v. Oddy, 2 Den. Cr. C. 264, CAMPBELL, L. C. J.: "The moral weight of such evidence in any individual case would no doubt be great. But the law is a system of general rules; and it does not admit such evidence, because of the inconvenience which would result from it." Mr. Pickering, for the prosecution: "But in several analogous cases the law does admit such evidence, notwithstanding the inconvenience; and there the inconvenience, which is confessedly the only ground of exclusion, is tolerated in order that justice may not be defeated. The inconvenience is put upon two grounds; first, that of the prisoner being taken by surprise; secondly, of many different issues being raised." CAMPBELL, L. C. J.: "Yes; that is so." Mr. Pickering: "If in such cases [as previous utterings of forgeries to show intent] justice is not permitted to be defeated by the argument drawn from the inconvenience of raising different issues, why should it in the present case?" . . . CAMPBELL, L. C. J.: "It would have been evidence of the prisoner being a bad man, and likely to commit the offences there charged. But the English law does not permit the issue of criminal trials to depend on this species of evidence."

for here the trial was for perjury, and the evidence was offered as "proofs to the credit of Faulconer", i.e., rather looking upon him as a witness to be impeached. Lord Campbell, on the other hand (Lives of the Chief Justices, III, 24), erroneously gives Harrison's Trial, in 1692 (cited post) as the first case of exclusion. But at any rate the older practice died hard and slowly: 1695, R. v. Hains, Comb. 337 ("If the defendant give evidence of a general reputation, it may be answered by particular instances on the other side for the King").

Yet it is odd to find the following anachronistic remark in a judgment of Lord Mansfield, in 1742 (Clark v. Periam, 2 Atk. 339): "If there is a criminal prosecution, and the prisoner in order to strengthen the evidence for his character enters into particular facts to support it, this is called a challenge to the prosecutor, and then he may likewise examine to particular facts."

[2] When Campbell visited Paris, in 1819, and the French lawyers "laughed at our strictness" in excluding hearsay, "I retorted by pointing out the injustice of their practice" in character-evidence (Life of L. C. Campbell, I, 364).

For some examples of French trials, see Stephen's History of the Criminal Law, I, Appendix: Wigmore's Select Cases on the Law of Evidence, 2d ed. 1914, pp. 58–62; and the citations post, § 2251, note 12.

In some of the opinions in R. v. Bond, 1906, 2 K. B. 389, 408, reference is made to the contrasting French principle.

1865, WILLES, J., in R. v. Rouvton, L. & C. 520, 541: "[Evidence of particular acts] is excluded, partly for the reason [irrelevancy] already given, and partly because no notice has been given to the other side that such an inquiry is going to be made. . . . The impossibility of giving such notice with respect to the prisoner's conduct would exclude such evidence, even if it were not excluded by general rules of policy."

1858, Mr. John Norton Pomeroy, arguing in People v. Stout, 4 Park. Cr. 97: "In its administration of criminal jurisprudence, the civil law allows and requires such evidence. It investigates the antecedent character, disposition, habits, associates, business, — in short, the entire history of an accused person, to discover whether it is probable that he would commit the alleged crime. English and American criminal law, in its practical administration, confines itself to the investigation of the very crime charged, and restricts judicial evidence to circumstances directly connected with and necessary to elucidate the issue to be tried. These two systems are diametrically opposed to each other, and whatever may be said of their comparative merits, the rule of the common law is so firmly established that it lies at the very foundation of criminal procedure, as an inseparable element of trial by jury. Trained judicial minds may be able to eliminate from a mass of irrelevant and general criminative facts those which directly bear upon the crime charged against the prisoner; but the very character of juries, and the theory of trial by jury, require that all prejudicial evidence tending to raise in their minds an antipathy to the prisoner, and which does not directly tend to prove the simple issue, should be carefully excluded from them."

1873, ALLEN, J., in Coleman v. State, 55 N. Y. 70: "A person cannot be convicted of one offence upon proof that he committed another, however persuasive in a moral point of view such evidence may be. It would be easier to believe a person guilty of one crime if it was known that he had committed another of a similar character, or indeed of any character. But the injustice of such a rule in courts of justice is apparent. It would lead to convictions upon the particular charge made by proof of other acts in no way connected with it, and to uniting evidence of several offences to produce conviction of a single one."

1882, DEVENS, J., in Com. v. Jackson, 132 Mass. 20: "The objections to the admission of evidence as to other transactions, whether amounting to indictable crimes or not, are very apparent. Such evidence compels the defendant to meet charges of which the indictment gives him no information, confuses him in his defence, raises a variety of issues, and thus diverts the attention of the jury from the one immediately before it; and by showing the defendant to have been a knave on other occasions, creates a prejudice which may cause injustice to be done him."

1887, THAYER, J., in State v. Saunders, 14 Or. 300, 309, 12 Pac. 441: "Place a person on trial upon a criminal charge, and allow the prosecution to show by him that he has before been implicated in similar affairs (no matter what explanation of them he attempts to make), it will be more damaging evidence against him and conduce more to his conviction than direct testimony of his guilt in the particular case. Every lawyer who has had any particular experience in criminal trials knows this, — knows that juries are inclined to act from impulse, and to convict parties accused, upon general principles. An ordinary juror is not liable to care about such a party's guilt or innocence in the particular case, if they think him a scapegrace or vagabond. That is human nature."

1903, Hon. A. C. PLOWDEN, "Grain or Chaff; the Autobiography of a Police Magistrate", c. XI, p. 142: "Another circuit hero carved a niche for himself in the temple of Fame by a splendid disregard of what I might call the ordinary conventions of a criminal court. B— was not remarkable for too much devotion to his profession. . . . On a certain occasion at Gloucester, B— was instructed to prosecute a man for burglary. Now if there is one elementary principle in criminal procedure more widely known and sacredly more observed than another, it is that the antecedents of a prisoner, if unfavorable, should be religiously kept a secret from the jury, until after they have delivered their verdict. . . . Of this sacred rule B— quickly showed, to the consternation of the prisoner, that he was because the guilt of one shows the innocence of the other, but because proof that specific acts were done by one weakens or removes the presumption that the same acts were done by another."

There are, of course (as the preceding passage shows), cases in which X is by hypothesis in some way an accomplice of Y, either at a distance or as a personal sharer; and there is even the rare case of independent and double felonious acts upon the same object. To such cases the argument cannot apply. Apart from them, it is as cogent as an alibi. If the Man with the Iron Mask was the Duc de Vermandois, he could not have been the Général de Bulonde; and if the Tichborne claimant was Arthur Orton, he could not have been Roger Tichborne.

The question that arises, from the point of view of the rules of Evidence, is whether, in evidencing this doing by a third person as a fact of disproof, any unusual requirements should be made as to the strength of the evidence before it can be admitted. Thus, to prove A guilty of murder, evidence of his threats (i.e. a design) to commit it are always admissible (ante, § 105); now, if the fact to be proved is that B committed the murder (as inconsistent with A's guilt), why should not B's threats be admitted, without further restriction, as A's are? It is true that evidence of B's threats alone would not go far towards proving B's commission; but it is not a question of absolute proof nor even of strong probability, but only of raising a reasonable doubt as to A's commission; and for this purpose the slightest likelihood of B's commission may suffice or at least assist. The evidence of B's threats, to be sure, may, in a given instance, be too slight to be worth considering: but it seems unsound as a general rule to hold that mere threats, or mere evidentiary facts of any one sort, are to be rejected if unaccompanied by additional facts pointing towards B as the doer. Nevertheless, most Courts have shown an inclination to make some such restriction, and to insist that two or more kinds of evidentiary facts pointing towards B must be offered, and that one kind alone will not be received. It is difficult to see the object of this restriction, because if the evidence is really of no appreciable value, no harm is done in admitting it; while if it is in truth calculated to cause the jury to doubt, the Court should not attempt to decide for the jury that this doubt is purely speculative and fantastic, but should afford the accused every opportunity to create that doubt. A contrary rule is unfair to a really innocent accused.

§ 140. Same: Threats by a Third Person. Threats are perhaps the commonest kind of evidence offered for this purpose. The rulings differ widely in their effect; but in general a wholly unnecessary strictness is shown, and the illiberal attitude of some Courts in this respect towards accused persons is in singular contrast with the maudlin tenderness otherwise often exhibited.[1]

§ 140. [1] Federal: 1891, Alexander v. U. S., 138 U. S. 353, 355, 11 Sup. 350 (the defendant and the deceased were seen together just before the latter's disappearance; evidence of threats by H. against the deceased, H. then being in search of the deceased, who was supposed to have eloped with H.'s wife, held admissible, subject to a certain discretion in the trial Court as to remoteness); 1892, Worth v. R. Co., 51 Fed. 171 (action by a passenger injured by the derailment of a car; evidence of the design of outsiders to wreck the train by derailment was admitted, no conditions being laid down, but other evidence being presented of the existence of a motive in certain outsiders, and of the presence of suspicious persons at the place); Alabama: 1914, Spicer v. State, 188 Ala. 9, 65 So. 972 (threats of a third person, admitted); Arkansas: 1911, McElroy v. State, 100 Ark. 301, 140 S. W. 8 (threats by third persons, excluded, no other evidence of their complicity being offered); California: 1861, People v. Williams, 18 Cal. 193 (threats to kill, by a third person, admitted); Connecticut: 1885, State v. Beaudet, 53 Conn. 543, 4 Atl. 237 (unspecified threats of a third person against the assaulted party, excluded; partly because too vague, partly because hearsay, partly because not accompanied by other evidence of the third person's guilt; opinion inconclusive and unsound); Illinois: 1886, Schoolcraft v. People, 117 Ill. 271, 277, 17 N. E. 649 (murder; the deceased's statement that certain third persons, "whose wives he had been running after, would kill him some day", excluded); 1894, Carlton v. People, 150 Ill. 181, 188, 37 N. E. 244 (arson; threats of third person to burn all the property of the injured person, excluded); 1916, People v. King, 276 Ill. 138, 114 N. E. 601 (murder of a police officer, the issue being the identity of the slayer; threats of F., made some time previous, against the officer, excluded); Indiana: 1901, Keith v. State, 157 Ind. 376, 61 N. E. 716 ("isolated threats by third parties is not admissible"); Kentucky: 1878, Morgan v. Com., 14 Bush 106, 112 (murder; threats against the deceased's life, by a third person present at the affray, admitted, the third person being first shown present and thus by possibility connected with the act); Massachusetts: 1916, Bradford v. Boston & M. R. Co., 225 Mass. 129, 113 N. E. 1042 (fire set by the defendant to the T. factory and spreading to the plaintiff's house; defendant contended that the fire started in the T. factory; D. the treasurer of the T. Co. was a witness for plaintiff, and there was evidence of his starting the fire; the fact that the T. plant had also burned the year previous was admitted, "as explaining the motive and intent of D."; this is sensible, but is not consistent with Noyes v. Boston & M. R. Co., post, § 199*a*; Missouri: 1889, State v. Crawford, 99 Mo. 74, 80, 12 S. W. 354 (arson; threats of burning by a third person, rejected as 'res inter alios', — as if the law of judgments had any connection with the process of drawing an inference; this ground of decision is absurd, for it would exclude the whole process of proof that another was the guilty person); 1896, State v. Taylor, 136 Mo. 66, 37 S. W. 907 (burglary; threats by another person to commit such a burglary, excluded, unless perhaps an overt act, etc., had followed); North Carolina: 1846, State v. Duncan, 6 Ired. 236, 239; 1877, State v. Davis, 77 Ired. 483 (for these two cases, see post, § 142); Oregon: 1893, State v. Fletcher, 24 Or. 295, 300, 33 Pac. 575 (threats, etc., by a third person, excluded; there must be "some appropriate evidence directly connecting that person with the corpus delicti"); Pennsylvania: 1919, Com. v. Bednorciki, 264 Pa. 124, 107 Atl. 666 (third person's threats excluded, because no other evidence, except opportunity, was offered); Texas: 1881, Dubose v. State, 10 Tex. App. 246 (homicide; third person's "motive, threats, and opportunity to kill", admissible); 1920, Taylor v. State, 87 Tex. Cr. 330, 221 S. W. 611 (homicide; the mere fact of animus by third persons against the deceased, without showing also threats and opportunity, excluded); Washington: 1906, State v. McLain, 43 Wash. 267, 86 Pac. 390 (arson; mere threats of a third person, excluded); West Virginia: 1871, Crookham v. State, 5 W. Va. 510, 513 (prior threats to kill, and subsequent immediate flight, of a third person, excluded as "not pertinent"); Wisconsin: 1899, Buel v. State, 104 Wis. 132, 80 N. W. 78 (murder; threats of third persons against the deceased, excluded).

§ 141. Same: Motive of a Third Person. A motive as evidence is perhaps not of such value as a threat; yet Courts seem more inclined to receive it.[1] There is no reason for requiring that it be coupled with other evidence in order to be admissible.

Compare § 68, ante (character of a third person).

The following case is peculiar: 1910, R. v. McNulty, 22 Ont. L. R. 350 (murder by defendant man of illegitimate child of M. by him; the paternity being in issue as a motive, defendant's calling of third persons to prove their intercourse with M., who on cross-examination had denied it, excluded; grounds obscure; unsound).

§ 141. [1] Federal: 1918, Griffin v. U. S., 1st C. C. A., 248 Fed. 6 (mailing obscene letters; the motive of the third persons to mail such letters to the addressee, held not improperly excluded in discretion); Alabama: 1902, Tatum v. State, 131 Ala. 32, 31 So. 369 (deceased's declarations of a difficulty with R., and facts indicating a motive in R., held inadmissible); 1904, Bowen v. State, 140 Ala. 65, 37 So. 233 (murder; facts showing a motive in third persons, excluded); 1904, Walker v. State, 139 Ala. 56, 35 So. 1011 (murder; a third person's motive, without other connecting evidence, excluded); 1910, McDonald v. State, 165 Ala. 85, 51 So. 629 (evidence of third person's motive, with evidence of bloodhound's trailing of him, admitted); Georgia: 1852, Crawford v. State, 12 Ga. 142, 145 (murder; the identity of the assailant not being directly testified to, evidence was admitted that just previously the deceased had had a quarrel with third persons); 1896, McElhannon v. State, 99 Ga. 672, 26 S. E. 501 (malicious mischief; motive in the prosecuting witness, admitted); Illinois: 1912, People v. Pezutto, 255 Ill. 583, 99 N. E. 677 (murder; quarrels, etc., of deceased with third persons, held properly limited by the trial Court in its discretion); Louisiana: 1854, State v. D'Angelo, 9 La. An. 46 (murder; that the deceased "had innumerable enemies", excluded as too vague; a showing that one or more designated enemies were present at the time of the killing would perhaps be admitted); 1878, State v. Johnson, 30 La. An. 921 (murder, no eye-witnesses being present; evidence received, on the peculiar circumstances, of quarrels by the deceased, shortly previous, with other persons who had "more reason for committing the murder than the accused"); Massachusetts: 1881, Com. v. Abbott, 130 Mass. 475 (murder of a woman; evidence was offered, to fix the murder on a third person, that her husband had quarrelled with her, and that a stranger was seen near the place on the day of the killing; Colt, J.: "The existence of ill-feeling as a motive for the commission of crime will not alone justify submitting to a jury the question of the guilt of a person entertaining such a feeling. It becomes material only when offered in connection with other evidence, proper to be submitted, showing that the person charged with such ill-feeling was in fact implicated in the commission of the crime. . . . The mere claim made by counsel that there are circumstances which tend to implicate the person charged is not enough; there must be proof of such circumstances, or an offer to prove. The evidence that a stranger was in town at the time of the murder does not alone implicate the husband"); Missouri: 1906, State v. Barrington, 198 Mo. 23, 95 S. W. 235 (murder; certain threats by third persons against the deceased, excluded); Oklahoma: 1915, Irvin v. State, 11 Okl. Cr. 301, 146 Pac. 453 (murder; evidence which "casts a bare suspicion upon another" is inadmissible); 1922, Phillips v. State, — Okl. Cr. —, 203 Pac. 902 (murder; ill-feeling in the neighborhood, not designating any particular person, excluded); South Carolina: 1905, State v. Gaylord, 70 S. C. 415, 50 S. E. 20 (threats, etc., of a third person received; here, to show that the third person, not the defendant, was the aggressor; compare § 112, n. 6, ante); Texas: 1906, Porch v. State, 50 Tex. Cr. 335, 99 S. W. 102 ("there must be something more than mere motive" evidenced against the third person); 1917, Taylor v. State, 81 Tex. Cr. 359, 195 S. W. 1147 (murder; motive of members of deceased's own family, admitted); Vermont: 1922, State v. Long, — Vt. —, 115 Atl. 734 (murder; the deceased's husband's criminal intimacy with another woman, as evidencing his motive to be the slayer, not admitted, there being no other evidence as to his being the slayer); Washington: 1920, Sound Timber Co. v. Danaher Lumber Co., 112 Wash. 314, 192 Pac. 941 (damage by fire; rule applied); Wyoming: 1903, Horn v. State, 12 Wyo. 80, 73 Pac. 705 (motive and opportunity of a third person; "much must depend on the circumstances of each case"; here excluded).

§ 142. Same: Miscellaneous Facts. Of the other kinds of evidence indicating a third person as the doer of the act, it can only be said that the inclination should always be to admit any one of them, unless totally without probative suggestion.[1] In particular, the conviction of another person for the

§ 142. [1] ENGLAND: 1890, R. v. Dytche, 17 Cox Cr. 39 (felonious wounding; evidence that other persons, already convicted for the offence, were present and made the assault, and not the now defendants, admitted).

UNITED STATES: Alabama: 1846, Smith v. State, 9 Ala. 990, 995 (conduct of another to be admitted in rare cases only; Goldthwaite, J., dissenting); 1875, Levison v. State, 54 Ala. 519, 527 ("The evidence of the guilt must relate to the 'res gesta', and not to the declarations or conduct of the party on whom it is attempted to cast suspicion, subsequent to and having no immediate connection with the crime"; here excluding the flight of a third person); 1895, Whitaker v. State, 106 Ala. 30, 17 So. 456 (unexplained flight of a third person, excluded); 1895, Crawford v. State, 112 Ala. 1, 20, 21 So. 214 (murder; W.'s concealment of himself, held irrelevant on the facts, the defendant's actual deed of shooting being uncontroverted); 1911, McGehee v. State, 171 Ala. 19, 55 So. 159 (inculpatory conduct of a third person, excluded); 1915, Terry v. State, 13 Ala. App. 115, 69 So. 370 (murder; the flight of one H., with other evidence as to his guilt, admitted on the facts); Georgia: 1862, Phillips v. State, 33 Ga. 281, 287 (larceny; pleased conduct of a third person upon the discovery of the article on the defendant's premises, the third person having been present at the time of the theft, admitted); Indiana: 1900, Green v. State, 154 Ind. 655, 57 N. E. 637 (a dying declaration naming B., and not the defendant, as the murderer, B.'s threats, motive, and doings were admitted to prove B. the murderer, though not B.'s subsequent admissions of guilt); 1910, Stout v. State, 174 Ind. 395, 92 N. E. 161 (murder; that one B. had bought a revolver of similar calibre, and that bloodhounds had trailed him after the same crime (assuming that it is predicated as the deed of one person, not of joint actors) should be received;[2] no technicality of the law of judgments should stand in the way; indeed, it is difficult to see why such a judgment should not be pleaded in bar. Certainly, the law must in some manner avoid the absurdity of convicting two persons for the same crime committable by one only. This same singular and inexcusable attitude of the Courts is seen also in the exclusion of a third person's confession of guilt under the exception to the Hearsay rule (post, § 1476), and of a suicide's declarations (post, § 143).

murder, not admitted, no offer of other evidence against B. being promised); Iowa: 1885, McPherrin v. Jennings, 66 Ia. 626, 24 N. W. 242 (death by unknown cause was rejected as an explanation of the plaintiff's horse's death); 1922, State v. Banoch, — Ia. —, 186 N. W. 436 (larceny; mere presence and departure of an unknown third person, excluded); Kentucky: 1813, Logan v. Steele, 3 Bibb 230 (trespass by burning a barn and killing horses: the plaintiff having proved threats by the defendant, the defendant was allowed to prove that other enemies of the plaintiff "had also threatened to injure his property"); 1908, Etly v. Com., 130 Ky. 723, 113 S. W. 896 (wife-murder; sundry evidence pointing to another person, held improperly excluded); Massachusetts: 1881, Com. v. Abbott, 130 Mass. 475 (cited ante, § 142); Michigan: 1913, People v. Emmons, 178 Mich. 126, 144 N. W. 479 (sale of fermented cider; evidence that other persons had the means of adulterating the cider sold, held admissible); Missouri: 1897, State v. Hack, 118 Mo. 92, 23 S. W. 1089 (third person's admissions of the larceny, excluded); North Carolina: 1833, State v. May, 4 Dev. 328, 331 (stealing a slave; evidence that another person, who lived near the slave, while the defendant lived at a distance, had been included in the original warrant for arrest, but had then fled the State, confessing himself guilty, excluded; but "direct evidence connecting W. with the 'corpus delicti' would certainly have been admissible"; the offered evidence, if not followed by evidence of an "overt act", was merely 'res inter alios acta'); 1846, State v. Duncan, 6 Ired. 236, 239 (accessory to murder; threats and arrest of other persons, excluded); 1873, State v. White, 68 N. C. 158 (larceny; suspicious conduct, and flight from the State, of a third person, excluded); 1874, State v. Haynes, 71 N. C. 79 (conduct of another person, before and after the crime, admitted); 1875, State v. Bishop, 73 N. C. 44, 46 (larceny; the familiarity of a third person with the premises, and his suspicious conduct on the night of the larceny, excluded); 1877, State v. Davis, 77 N. C. 483 (murder; threats of a third person, and his departure for the deceased's house, excluded, on the reasoning of State v. May); 1880, State v. Baxter, 82 N. C. 602 (larceny; another person's suspicious conduct, excluded); 1912, State v. Millican, 158 N. C. 617, 74 S. E. 107 (arson; the defendant's offer to show that during the time after their imprisonment other fires occurred in the same town; unsound; the offer here may have been defective in form, but the opinion's reasoning on the relevancy of such evidence shows a singular ignorance of the facts of crime and of the elements of logic); South Carolina: 1895, State v. Wallace, 44 S. C. 357, 22 S. E. 411 (a prosecuting witness was said to be the real thief, and other receipts of stolen property by him were admitted); Vermont: 1864, State v. Barron, 37 Vt. 57, 60 (illegal sale of liquor; a habit of "gentlemen in travelling about the country to carry spirituous liquors in bottles with them", not admitted to explain the source of bottles found in the defendant's public-house); 1883, Lewis v. Barker, 55 Vt. 23 (that a clerk in defendant's store had refused to work for him the day after it was burned; not admitted to show that the clerk had burned it); 1900, State v. Totten, 72 Vt. 71, 47 Atl. 105 (robbery; certain conduct of a third person indicating his guilt, excluded); Virginia: 1820, Rowt's Adm'r v. Kile's Adm'r, Gilmer, Va. 202 (action on an instrument of defendant; evidence of its forgery by the son of the payee, admissible; after "the agency of that person" in the forgery is made out, then that person's skill in imitating the hand in question would be admissible); West Virginia: 1871, Crookham v. State, 5 W. Va. 510, 513 (stabbing; threats and flight of another person, excluded).

[2] Contra: 1898, Chamberlain v. Pierson, 31 C. C. A. 157, 87 Fed. 420 (injury by derailment; to exonerate the defendant's employees, a conviction of third persons for causing the derailment was excluded); 1897, State v. Smarr, 121 N. C. 669, 28 S. E. 549 (that another had been convicted of the burglary charged, inadmissible).

But of course mere suspicion is nothing: 1899, Brown v. State, 120 Ala. 342, 25 So. 182 (merely showing that another was suspected, excluded).

Nor can the prosecution show that another person was acquitted, because this leaves still open the defendant's share in the act (except for the purpose mentioned in note 4, infra): 1893, People v. Mitchell, 100 Cal. 328, 334, 34 Pac. 698.

The general principle is applicable, it may be noted, equally to civil cases, such as the trespasses of animals.[3] Moreover, on the principle noticed already for the argument of opportunity (ante, § 132) the prosecution may in advance negative the argument by showing that other possible persons did not do the act.[4]

The fact of mistaken identity seems also to be relevant in this connection; the argument is that a third person, not the one charged, was really involved, and the fact of the existence of a third person capable of being mistaken for the one charged is some evidence that he possibly or probably did the things attributed to the person charged.[5]

§ 143. Suicide, or other Self-Infliction of Harm; Suicidal Plans. If the deceased, with whose death the defendant is charged, committed suicide, obviously the defendant could not have killed the deceased. There ought to be no doubt about the admissibility of plans or desires to commit suicide, even where no other evidence of its particular probability or feasibility is offered. Its improbability or non-feasibility should be matter for rebuttal, and should not exclude the evidence of its probability. That the evidence may be manufactured is no reason for its exclusion; for it may also not be manufactured, and if not, it is most cogent. The distance in time ought not to exclude the evidence of plans; for it does not exclude evidence of a defendant's threats (ante, § 108). That the deceased's hearsay statements of plan are admissible under an exception to the Hearsay rule, is plain (post, § 1725).

The relevancy of plans of suicide has been well expounded in the following passage:

1892, FIELD, C. J., in Com. v. Trefethen, 157 Mass. 180, 31 N. E. 961: "The nature of the case proved by the Commonwealth was such that it was not impossible that she had committed suicide. If it could be shown that she actually had an intention to commit suicide, it would be more probable that she did in fact commit it than if she had no such intention. . . . It may be true that an unmarried woman pregnant with child, if she has an intention to commit suicide, does not always carry that intention into effect, although she have an opportunity; but it is impossible to say that the actual existence of such an intention does not tend to throw some light upon the cause of death of such a woman when found dead under circumstances not inconsistent with the theory of suicide. . . . If it could be shown that during the week before her death she had actually attempted to drown herself, and had been prevented from doing so, it seems manifest that this fact, according to the general experience of mankind, would have some tendency to show that she might have made a second attempt."

[3] 1895, Green v. Skoqvist, 57 N. J. L. 617, 31 Atl. 228 (trespass by cattle; the trespassers of other persons' cattle, admitted);

Contra, but wrong: 1898, Dover v. Winchester, 70 Vt. 418, 41 Atl. 445 (sheep-killing; killing of other sheep by other dogs, not admissible to negative the guilt of defendant's dogs).

[4] 1897, Bram v. U. S., 168 U. S. 532, 18 Sup. 182 (where the probabilities lay between three persons).

[5] The argument is of course a common one, and only seldom has a ruling upon it been necessary: 1882, White v. Com., 80 Ky. 484 (mistaken identity allowed to be shown); 1881, State v. Witham, 72 Me. 531, 536 (adultery; testimony by a neighbor that the defendant had several times talked with the woman at her gate in the evenings of certain months; counter-testimony was admitted by a nearer neighbor that a person, not the defendant, had talked there during the same time; Peters, J., "Of course, both statements cannot be true; still it cannot reasonably be said that the truth of the one would not lessen the probability of the truth of the other").

Such evidence has constantly been admitted, as the annals of celebrated trials illustrate; until the squeamish doubtings of modern times, hesitating to accept the suggestions of natural logic, and not happening to be provided with justifying authority, furnished a few instances of rejection; but such rulings are without support from any point of view.[1]

§ 144. Same: Motive for Suicide. For the same reason, an emotion or feeling impelling to suicide is relevant; and facts tending to show the existence of such an emotion — either events, e.g. the pregnancy of a seduced woman, or conduct, e.g. exhibitions of melancholy or despair (two kinds of evidence dealt with post, §§ 391, 394) — should be received to show it. Contrary facts tending to show emotions averse to suicide would be equally admissible.[1]

§ 143. [1] ENGLAND: 1699, Spencer Cowper's Trial, 13 How. St. Tr. 1166 (murder, the issue being whether the deceased had committed suicide or was killed; evidence was received of her being melancholy and depressed; "she said her distemper lay in her mind, . . . and the sooner it did kill her the better; . . . she neglected herself in doing those things that were necessary for her health, in hopes it would carry her off, and often wished herself dead").

UNITED STATES: Federal: 1917, Brawner v. Royal Indemnity Co., 5th C. C. A., 246 Fed. 637 (life policy, issue of suicide; deceased's expressions of inclination to suicide, admitted); Florida: 1917, Kersey v. State, 73 Fla. 832, 74 So. 983 (murder of wife by shooting; deceased's statements of having taken poison with suicidal intent, excluded, because the death was by gunshot and the shooting could not have been done by herself; unsound); Illinois: 1859, Jumpertz v. People, 21 Ill. 408 (intention to commit suicide, and consistency of the mode of death with suicide, admitted); 1892, Siebert v. People, 143 Ill. 571, 584, 32 N. E. 431 (statements of suicidal intent excluded; no ruling on the question of relevancy); 1917, People v. Ahrling, 279 Ill. 70, 116 N. E. 764 (cited post, § 1726); Indiana: 1909, Carter v. State, 172 Ind. 227, 87 N. E. 1081 (cited more fully post, § 238, n. 6); Iowa: 1912, State v. Beeson, 155 Ia. 355, 136 N. W. 317 (cited more fully post, § 1725, n. 1); Kansas: 1896, State v. Asbell, 57 Kan. 398, 46 Pac. 770 (admitted, there being a possibility of suicide); Louisiana: 1851, Preston, J., in State v. Bradley, 6 La. An. 559 (putting as admissible the supposed fact of a letter being found on the person of the deceased declaring an intention to commit suicide); Massachusetts: 1882, Com. v. Felch, 132 Mass. 32 (abortion; to show a self-abortion by the deceased, her "purpose and intent" "would be if known a material aid in coming to a correct conclusion"; but her declarations of purpose were excluded); 1892, Com. v. Trefethen, 157 Mass. 180 (intention to commit suicide, the defendant being the deceased's seducer, admitted; overruling Com. v. Felch; see quotation supra); Minnesota: 1896, Hale v. Life Co., 65 Minn. 548, 68 N. W. 182 (insurance policy; the deceased's threat to commit suicide, not admitted to show suicide, because made two years before); Missouri: 1894, State v. Punshon, 124 Mo. 448, 457, 27 S. W. 1111 (threats of deceased wife to kill herself, excluded, on the ground of hearsay); 1896, State v. Punshon, same decision affirmed on second trial, 133 Mo. 44, 34 S. W. 25; 1895, State v. Fitzgerald, 130 Mo. 407, 32 S. W. 1113 (excluded, unless accompanied by an attempt to execute them; overruling State v. Ludwig, 70 Mo. 412); 1915, State v. Ilgenfritz, 263 Mo. 615, 173 S. W. 1041 (murder; deceased's threats of suicide, held admissible; overruling State v. Punshon and State v. Fitzgerald); New York: 1890, Smith v. Benef. Soc., 123 N. Y. 85, 25 N. E. 197 (suicide as a defence to an insurance policy; the deceased's design to commit suicide before taking out the policy, admitted); Ohio: 1872, Blackburn v. State, 23 Oh. St. 146, 149, 165 (intention more than six years before, admitted); Tennessee: 1884, Boyd v. State, 14 Lea 161, 177 (a disposition and intention to commit suicide, held admissible, "as there is no direct testimony as to the fact of the homicide"); Vermont: 1896, State v. Fournier, 68 Vt. 262, 35 Atl. 178 (question left undecided); 1898, State v. Marsh, 70 Vt. 288, 40 Atl. 836 (deceased's declarations that he was giving his horse arsenic as medicine, offered to show that he had it and might have used it himself, excluded).

Compare the citations post, § 1725 (declarations of intention to suicide).

§ 144. [1] 1699, Spencer Cowper's Trial, Eng. (see citation ante, § 143); 1904, State v. Kelly, 77 Conn. 266, 58 Atl. 705 (deceased's despondency several months before, excluded; unsound); 1859, Jumpertz v. People, 21 Ill. 408 (evidence admitted of mental condition of cheerfulness, or the contrary, pointing towards or against suicide); 1896, State v. Punshon, 133 Mo. 44, 34 S. W. 25 (the deceased's "disordered condition of mind", excluded); 1872, Blackburn v. State, 23 Oh. St. 165 (a previous melancholy disposition, tending to suicide, admitted; the interval between the death and the time testified to affecting only the weight of the evidence); 1884, Boyd v. State, 14 Lea Tenn. 161, 177 (melancholy or despondent disposition relevant on the question whether suicide was committed; Deaderick, C. J.: "The conditions and surroundings at the time of death may be looked into if of a character likely to impel suicide"); 1899, Morrison v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. 473, 51 S. W. 358 (deceased's cheerful behavior up to time of death, admitted to disprove suicide); 1898, State v. Marsh, 70 Vt. 288, 40 Atl. 837 (state of health of deceased, considered).

Compare the citations post, § 391 (motive for suicide).

SUB-TITLE I (continued): EVIDENCE TO PROVE A HUMAN ACT

TOPIC III: RETROSPECTANT EVIDENCE (TRACES,—MATERIAL, ORGANIC, AND MENTAL)

CHAPTER VIII.

§ 148. General Principle. The convenience has already been explained (ante, § 43) of grouping the various kinds of evidentiary facts according as they come, in time, before, at, or after, the act to be proved. There have now been considered the various kinds of evidentiary facts in the first two groups, i.e. facts having Prospectant and Concomitant indications; there remains the third group, namely, facts having a Restrospectant indication.

The inference here looks backward from the evidentiary fact to the alleged act; i.e. taking our stand at the fact offered, we infer from it that at some previous time the act was or was not done.

The common feature of this group of evidentiary facts is that they are all open to a similar source of weakness, and thus offer to the opponent a general mode of explaining away (ante, § 34) their force. Thus, if, to show that A on January 1 stole a bicycle, there is offered the fact of his possession of the bicycle on June 1, the probative force of this fact rests on the assumption that the hypothesis that will explain his possession is that he obtained the bicycle by stealing it. But there are also in truth other possible hypotheses, for example, that it was given or sold to him by the thief or by a purchaser from the thief, or that he found it. The question of admissibility is whether the hypothesis of his stealing is, among all hypotheses, 'prima facie' sufficiently prominent to make the fact admissible (on the general theory of Relevancy, ante, § 31); and, if it is admissible, the opponent may show that one of the other hypotheses is in truth a much more probable explanation (on the theory of Explanation, ante, § 34). So, if in proving the doing of an act by A as a mark of his former existence as B, there is offered (as in the Tichborne case) the fact that A has a recollection of the event, or if, to disprove it, we offer the fact that A has no recollection of it, the opponent may show, in the first instance, that the recollection has come, not from having done the act, but from having heard or read about it; and, in the second instance, that the lack of recollection is due, not to not having done the act, but to the natural fading of memory.

In short, the tests of Relevancy and the opportunities of Explanation are of the same general nature in this group of evidentiary facts. The general argument runs: Is the trace one whose possession (or lack of possession) by the person charged could be explained by the operation of other causes than the doing (or not doing) of the act in question?[1]

The kinds of facts may best be roughly subdivided according to the mode in which such causes might operate, i.e. according as the connection between the evidentiary trace and the act in question is mechanical, organic, or mental. The typical case of the first is the possession of stolen goods; of the second sort, corporal resemblance of child to parent; of the third sort, consciousness of guilt.

a. MECHANICAL TRACES

§ 149. Miscellaneous Instances in Criminal Cases; Identity-Evidence distinguished. The presence upon the person or premises of articles, fragments, stains, tools, or any other resulting circumstance, is constantly employed as the basis of an inference that the person did an act with which these circumstances are associated. In general, however, few questions of relevancy arise.[1] There are innumerable instances in the records of celebrated

§ 148. [1] From the point of view of logic and psychology as applicable to argument before the jury (not the rules of Admissibility), see the materials collected in the present author's "Principles of Judicial Proof, as given by Logic, Psychology, and General Experience, and illustrated in Judicial Trials" (1913), §§ 138–155.

§ 149. [1] Federal: 1909, Sorenson v. U. S., 8th C. C. A., 168 Fed. 785 (burglary; possession of revolver, nitroglycerine, etc., 18 days later, excluded on the facts); Ala. 1892, Gilmore v. State, 99 Ala. 154, 159, 13 So. 536 (boot-tracks); 1897, Thornton v. State, 113 Ala. 43, 21 So. 356 (book and pencil); 1909, Phillips v. State, 162 Ala. 14, 50 So. 194 (human trials; but their relevancy is so patent that no occasion is given for rulings of law:

> "Who finds the heifer dead and bleeding fresh,
> And sees, fast by, a butcher with an axe,
> But will suspect 'twas he that made the slaughter?"
>
> William Shakspeare, Henry VI., Pt. II, III, 2.

1850, Mr. W. Wills, Circumstantial Evidence, 3d ed., 96: "In a case of burglary, the thief had gained admittance to the house by means of a penknife, which was broken in the attempt, and part left in the window-frame; the broken knife was found in the pocket of the prisoner, and perfectly corresponded with the fragment. . . . In another case, identification was established by the correspondence of the wadding of fire-arms with part of a torn letter found in the prisoner's possession; and in a case on the Northern circuit, where a man had been shot by a ball, the wadding of the pistol, which stuck in the wound, was found to be part of a ballad, which corresponded with another part found in the pocket of the prisoner."

(1) The few rulings recorded are merely the occasional instances in which such questions have been (usually quite without necessity) pushed to a decision in the higher Court.

(2) It is to be noted that (on the principle of § 34, ante) the opponent may always explain away the indication by showing other hypotheses for the presence of the trace, — as where, on a charge of murder, the presence of blood-stains is explained by the killing of a chicken, or the presence of a weapon by the owner's previous loan of it to another person. It is also to be noted that an argument may be based negatively on such traces, — as where it is shown, on a charge of murder, that the murderer must have been stained with blood, while the accused bears no blood-stains and therefore could not have done the killing. To this also there is a counter-argument (of Explanation) that the absence of such traces can be accounted for by their intervening destruction.

(3) The question may be asked, What is the distinction between evidence of Traces and evidence of Identity? For example, to prove a murder, evidence tracks); Fla. 1893, Whetston v. State, 31 Fla. 240, 250, 12 So. 661 (shoe-tracks excluded, because having no marked peculiarities); Iowa: 1907, State v. Kehr, 133 Ia. 35, 110 N. W. 149 (burglary while armed with a revolver; the possession of a revolver when arrested two months later, excluded; this is finical); Kan. 1905, State v. McAnarney, 70 Kan. 679, 79 Pac. 137 (blood-stains on trousers; excluded here, because the trousers had been placed in contact with the deceased's bloody clothing before chemical testing); Ky. 1900, Ireland v. Com., — Ky. —, 57 S. W. 616 (slungshot, excluded on the facts); Me. 1870, State v. Kingsbury, 58 Me. 238, 243 (fire set by kerosene; presence of kerosene stains on a shirt admitted); Mass. 1850, Webster's Trial, 5 Cush. 295, 318, Barnes' Rep., 84 (the lower jaw of the deceased, etc., found on the defendant's premises); Mo. 1898, State v. Miller, 144 Mo. 26, 45 S. W. 1104 (pistols); N. Y. 1908, People v. Del Vermo, 192 N. Y. 470, 85 N. E. 690 (knife like that with which a killing was done); N. Dak. 1897, State v. Campbell, 7 N. D. 58, 72 N. W. 935 (burglary; various tools, etc., admitted); S. Dak. 1898, State v. Garrington, 11 S. D. 178, 76 N. W. 326 (sack of defendant found on premises the next day, admitted); Tex. 1899, Pike v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. 613, 51 S. W. 395 (the fact of the sale of some liquor being admitted, the presence of drunken men about the defendant's store was admitted to show that the liquor was intoxicating; compare R. v. Burton, cited post, § 152 and the cases in § 153); Utah: 1906, State v. Freshwater, 30 Utah 442, 85 Pac. 447 (defective typewriter showing the mark on a letter); Va. 1898, McBride v. Com., 95 Va. 818, 30 S. E. 454 (certain traces held inadmissible).

is offered that a gun found in the defendant's possession is exactly fitted by the bullet found in the body of the deceased; what kind of evidence is this? The truth is that this evidentiary fact is really double and involves both kinds of inferences. The nature of the argument to prove Identity (post, § 411) is that a certain fact offered is an essential mark of sameness of person, — in this instance, that the fit of the bullet is a necessary and unique mark of the slayer. The weakness of this type of argument is that the mark may not be necessarily associated with one person but may be common to a number of persons; and hence the mode of dealing with such evidence is to show that other persons also have the same mark, — here, that other persons in the neighborhood possessed guns of the same bore. Now the argument from Traces assumes that the argument to identity has been settled and accepted, i.e. here it assumes that the use of the gun in question is an essential or sufficient mark of the murderer, and it then sets about to prove that the accused possessed that mark, i.e. used that gun; and to do this it offers the fact of its subsequent finding in the accused's possession. Here the weakness of the argument is an entirely new and different one, namely, the trace of subsequent possession does not necessarily indicate a use at the time of the murder, since the gun may be one which the accused has recently borrowed, or it may be his own gun which was lent to another person at the time of the murder. Thus, there are two wholly different evidentiary questions involved in the use of this evidence, — first, the question of Identity, whether this individual gun is a necessary mark of the slayer; and secondly, the question of Traces, whether its subsequent possession evidences its use at the time of the murder. The present type of argument, then, — the argument from Traces to a former act, — is a distinct argument from that of Identity. Although in some instances the same circumstance offered may give rise to both arguments, this is by no means necessary or usual, and there is no essential connection between the two kinds of arguments.

§ 150. Brands on Animals and Timber. When an animal is found in B's possession, and the animal bears a brand or other mark, and one of the issues is whether A is the owner of the animal, it is a natural and immediate inference that the animal belongs to the person whose brand it bears, and, if that brand is A's, then to A. This inference, however, while sufficiently probable in the light of practical experience, is in truth a composite one, made up of two steps: (1) first, the inference, from the presence of A's usual mark, that A placed this particular mark, — a genuine argument under the present principle, from a trace to the source of the trace; and (2) secondly, the inference from the fact that A placed it there, to the fact of his ownership of the animal. The latter step of inference is the vital one; it is perhaps not less natural than the former, but it is more serious in its effect. Its real probative foundation is that of the well-established presumption of ownership from possession (post, § 2515).

Courts have usually held, when the question was raised, that the inference of ownership may be drawn, as a matter of common law;[1] and it has been universally conceded that the presence of the brand is evidence of identity (i.e. of the animal being one of those originally branded by the brand-user) even though not of ownership. The larger scope of the evidence has been generally confirmed by legislation. In most of the stock-raising communities, the brand on animals is made evidence of ownership; though in order to encourage registration and thus prevent confusion, the rule is applied only to brands duly registered by law.[2]

§ 150. [1] 1900, R. v. Forsythe, 4 N. W. Terr. Can. 398 (a brand is on common law principles evidence of ownership; Rouleau, J., diss.; best opinion on the subject, by McGuire, J.); 1886, People v. Bollinger, 71 Cal. 17, 11 Pac. 799; (larceny; "an earmark used by the alleged owners of the hogs was some evidence of ownership"); 1907, State v. Wolfley, 75 Kan. 403, 89 Pac. 1016 (on common-law principles a brand may be evidence of ownership as well as of identity); 1865, Plummer v. Newdigate, 2 Duv. Ky. 1 (a brand "U. S." is admissible as evidence of ownership, but is not 'per se' sufficient evidence); 1886, State v. Cardelli, 19 Nev. 319, 10 Pac. 433, semble (at common law a cattle-brand may be some evidence of ownership); 1888, Stewart v. Hunter, 16 Or. 62, 16 Pac. 876 ("Branding stock furnishes evidence of its ownership").

Contra: 1872, Peoples v. Devault, 11 Heisk. 431 (a "U. S." brand is not evidence of ownership unless shown to have been put on by U. S. officers).

For the use of an unrecorded brand as indicating a scheme to suppress evidence of larceny, see post, § 278.

[2] It should be remembered that some of the ensuing decisions interpret earlier statutes which may have been changed in the interval: CANADA: Dom. R. S. 1906, c. 146, Crim. C. § 989, (in criminal cases, the presence upon cattle of a duly recorded brand or mark is to be evidence of ownership); Alta. St. 1913, 2d sess., c. 24, § 5 (brand not vented shall be evidence of ownership by registered brand-owner); Br. C. St. 1914, 4 Geo. V, c. 9, § 5 (stock-brand not vented to be evidence of ownership, if recorded and uncancelled); Man. R. S. 1913, c. 25, § 8 (cattle-brand duly allotted shall be evidence of ownership, where title to cattle is involved); N. W. Terr. Cons. Ord. 1898, c. 76, § 5, St. 1900, c. 22, § 5 ("the presence of a recorded brand on any stock" shall be evidence of the ownership of the animal); Ontario: St. 1919, c. 70, Brand Act, § 4 (certificate of recorded brand of stock shall be evidence of "the ownership of such certificate" with further proof of authenticity); Saskatchewan: R. S. 1920, c. 123, § 5 (duly recorded brand shall be "'prima facie' evidence of the ownership by the owner of such brand of the animal bearing the same").

UNITED STATES: Arizona: Rev. St. 1913, Civ. c. § 3760 (on trial for violation of the stock laws, the presence of brand or earmark "claimed by the accused to be his brand or mark", though not recorded, is evidence of conversion; and the ownership of live-stock from a foreign State, etc., "may be shown by the marks or brands thereupon" though not recorded); § 3757 (official record of live-stock brands, proved by certified copy, is 'prima facie' evidence of all the facts required to be entered in said book", and of the rights of the person named, or of the assignee on proof of assignment, "to use said brand", etc.); § 3758 (brand or earmark duly recorded is prima facie evidence that the animal "is the property of the owner of such brand and earmark", except when the animal is one seized pursuant to this law, and except for fresh brands upon mavericks, etc.); 1901, Brill v. Christy, 7 Ariz. 217, 63 Pac. 757 (statute held not to make the recorded brand evidence of ownership); 1914, Marley v. State, 15 Ariz. 495, 140 Pac. 215 (St. 1905, c. 51, §§ 66, 67, and St. 1912, c. 4, p. 13, as to brand evidence of ownership, considered); California: Pol. C. 1872, § 3168 (county recorder's certified copy of recorded cattle brand or mark is evidence "as to the ownership of all animals legally marked or branded"); § 3172 (in action to recover possession, "the mark or brand is prima facie evidence that the animal belongs to the owner of the mark or brand"); Colorado: Comp. St. 1921, § 3119 (earmarks may be used in evidence "in connection with the owner's recorded brand"); § 3126 (in all suits or criminal proceedings involving the title to animals, a certified copy of the record of a brand shall be "prima facie evidence of the ownership of such animal"); 1895, Chesnut v. People, 21 Colo. 512, 523, 42 Pac. 656 (recorded brand, admissible "merely as a mark of identification"); 1897, Brooke v. People, 23 Colo. 375; 48 Pac. 502 (unrecorded brand; same);
Idaho: Comp. St. 1919, §§ 1920, 1924, 1927 (in all proceedings where title or right of possession is involved, the brand on an animal, if duly recorded, shall be 'prima facie' evidence that "the animal belongs to" the brand-owner and that the latter has the right of possession at the time of action; "no evidence of ownership of stock by brands or for the purpose of identification shall be permitted" unless the brand is recorded; the State recorder's certified copy of the record, or the original certificate, shall be evidence of the right to use the brand; "parol evidence shall be inadmissible to prove the ownership of a brand"); § 1944 (brandbook, recording animals to be removed from State, to be "evidence of the facts recited therein"); 1907, State v. Dunn, 13 Ida. 9, 88 Pac. 235 (under the statute oral evidence of the ownership of a brand is inadmissible; since the statute, "still the brand itself may serve as the means to the owner himself for the identification of the animal"; compare § 1639, post); 1920, State v. Grimmett, 33 Ida. 203, 193 Pac. 380 (larceny; unrecorded brand admissible to evidence identity, though not ownership, under St. 1913, c. 171, p. 543, amending Rev. C. 1908, § 1228);

Illinois: Rev. St. 1874, c. 88, § 3 (county clerk's record of stock brands and marks, admissible);

Missouri: Rev. St. 1919, § 4251 ("If any dispute shall arise about the question of whose any particular mark or brand may be, it shall be decided by the record of the clerk [of the county court]"; an interesting specimen of primitive legislative modes of expression);

Nebraska: § 90 (ownership of cattle, horses, mules, and swine in issue; the recorded brand to be 'prima facie' evidence of "ownership of the person whose brand it may be"); § 106 (on trial of offences concerning cattle running at large, etc., "proof of brand shall be deemed 'prima facie' evidence of ownership of such stock)";

Nevada: Rev. L. 1912, § 7172 (on trial of offences concerning animals running at large upon a range, "the brand and other marks upon such animal shall be prima facie evidence of ownership"); § 2237 (on trial of actions for possession of any animal marked or branded as provided by statute, "the mark and brand" shall be primary evidence of ownership); § 2234 (certified copy by recorder under seal of recorded mark and brand, to be evidence of ownership in "any action" of all animals legally marked and branded); 1886, State v. Cardelli, 19 Nev. 319, 10 Pac. 433 (an unrecorded brand may be evidence of ownership)

New Mexico: Annot. St. 1915, § 118 (no brand not lawfully recorded "shall be recognized as evidence of ownership of the horses", etc.); § 122 (in prosecutions for cattle-offences, certified copy of the registered brand "shall be sufficient to identify all horses" etc., and "shall be prima facie proof that the person owning the recorded brand is the owner of the animal branded with such brand"); 1891, Pryor v. Portsmouth C. Co., 6 N. Mex. 44, 27 Pac. 327 (instruction under the statute construed); 1892, Terr. v. Chavez, 6 N. Mex. 455, 30 Pac. 902 (the brand is evidence equally for an assignee of it); 1901, Gale v. Salas, 11 N. Mex. 211, 66 Pac. 520 (statute applied); 1909, Terr. v. Valles, 15 N. Mex. 228, 103 Pac. 984 (larceny; unrecorded brand is evidence of identity);

North Dakota: Comp. L. 1913, § 2596 (certificate of record of brand or mark of stock by commissioner of agriculture and labor, to be "evidence of ownership"); § 2597 (vent-brand to be "prima facie evidence of the sale or transfer of such stock"); § 2605 (where a certificate of brand or mark is lost or destroyed, "the original brand records only shall be prima facie evidence of ownership, except where a fact can otherwise be established");

Oklahoma: Comp. St. 1921, § 4028 (recorded brand on stock, to be evidence of ownership); 1906, Hurst v. Terr., 16 Okl. 600, 86 Pac. 280 (larceny of cattle; an unrecorded brand is evidence of ownership; the statutory rule merely provides an additional, not an exclusive sort of evidence, Texas rulings distinguished);

Oregon: Laws 1920, § 9162, as amended by St. 1921, Feb. 21, c. 151 ("No evidence of ownership of stock by brand, or for the purpose of identification, shall be permitted" unless the brand is recorded: except as in § 1968); § 1968 (for animals other than sheep, goats, or hogs, earmarks "shall be taken in evidence in connection with the owner's recorded brand", when title is in issue; for sheep, hogs, and goats, earmarks as well as brands etc. "shall be considered in evidence" when title is in issue, even though not recorded); 1899, State v. Hanna, 35 Or. 195, 57 Pac. 629; State v. Morse, 35 Or. 462, 57 Pac. 631; 1914, State v. Henderson, 72 Or. 201, 143 Pac. 627 (unrecorded brand is admissible to identify); 1920, State v. Moss, 95 Or. 616, 188 Pac. 702 (where two brands are found, one older than the other, the presumption of ownership attaches to the earlier brand); 1917, State v. Randolph, 85 Or. 172, 166 Pac. 555 (under St. 1915, c. 33, an unrecorded braad cannot be used to evidence either identity or ownership; history of the legislation examined); 1919, State v. Warner, 91 Or. 11, 178 Pac. 221 (larceny; under St. 1915, c. 33, § 3, all evidence of ownership or identification founded on an unrecorded brand is excluded; Bean, J., diss. because here there was other evidence than the unrecorded brand);

South Dakota: Rev. C. 1919, § 8135 (in civil action involving title, recorded brand on animal is "prima facie evidence of the ownership of the person whose brand it may be"; and "proof of the right of any person to use any brand shall be made by a copy of the record of the same", etc.);

Texas: (recorded brand on stock is evidence of ownership); Rev. Civ. St. § 7160 ("No brands except such as are recorded by the officers named in this chapter shall be recognized in law as any evidence of ownership of the cattle, horses, or mules upon which the same may be used"); St. 1913, c. 69, p. 129 (amending Rev. Civ. St. § 7160, by providing "that this shall not apply in criminal cases"); 1898, Turner v. State, 39 Tex. Cr. 327, 45 S. W. 1020 (larceny; brand recorded after the date of the alleged taking is not evidence of ownership under the statute; moreover, as evidence of identity it is unnecessary; prior cases on the latter point disapproved); 1900, Welch v. State, 42 Tex. Cr. 338, S. W. 46 (preceding case approved, but treated as holding that the unrecorded or subsequently recorded brand is at least evidence of identity); 1899, Chowning v. State, 41 Tex. Cr. 81, 51 S. W. 946 (like Welch v. State; repudiating Tittle v. State, 30 Tex. App. 597); 1900, Walton v. State, 41 Tex. Cr. 454, 55 S. W. 566 (recorded brand is evidence of ownership, even in a county other than where recorded); 1903, Swan v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 76 S. W. 464 (Turner case cited, but held not to exclude but merely to limit the purpose of a multiple brand as evidence); 1903, Sapp v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 77 S. W. 456 (Turner and Welch Cases, supra, both approved).

The same policy has led, in timber-producing communities, to similar legislation for marks on logs and timber.[3]

Utah: Comp. L. 1917, § 211 (State livestock board secretary's record of marks and brands; certified copy "shall be deemed evidence in law");

Washington: R. & B. Code 1909, § 3158 (recorded stock-brand, to be evidence of ownership of animal);

Wyoming: Comp. St. 1920, § 7474 (on any indictment, "proof of the brand thereon shall be sufficient to identify all classes of live-stock, and proof of the ownership of such brand shall by prima facie evidence of the ownership of such live stock"); (live-stock brands; § 3095 certified copy of recorded brand to be "prima facie evidence" of the ownership of such animal by the party whose brand or mark it might be, and shall be taken as evidence of ownership in all civil or criminal proceedings "when the title to the animal is involved or proper to be proved, when such claim is sustained and corroborated with other evidence"); 1916, Harris v. State, 23 Wyo. 487, 153 Pac. 881 (larceny; certified copy of recorded brand, admitted, under St. 1913, c. 126, and Comp. St. 1910, § 6177).

Distinguish here the inference of larceny of cattle from the possession of stock misbranded with the defendant's brand placed over another brand. Here the inference is from the act of misbranding the stock to the act of stealing, i.e. the inference from defendant's conduct in fabricating evidence of his ownership so as to conceal the evidence of actual ownership by another. This inference belongs therefore under the principle of § 278, post (fabrication of evidence as an implied admission). But it rests on the additional assumption that the defendant himself effected or was privy to the misbranding, and not merely on the fact of the misbranding or of the finding of such stock in defendant's possession. Hence the ruling in State v. Moss, 95 Or. 616, 188 Pac. 702 (1920), cited post, § 278, n. 6.

[3] CANADA: R. S. 1906, c. 146, Crim. C. § 990 (in trials for certain offences concerning timber, a duly registered timber-mark shall be evidence of ownership of the timber).

UNITED STATES: Ark. Dig. 1919, § 8407 (logs and timber "having any such recorded mark impressed or fixed thereon shall be presumed to belong" to the person recorded for that mark); Fla. Rev. G. S. 1919, § 2396 ("Any log found" bearing recorded brand "shall be deemed prima facie to be the property of such person"): § 3903 (official stamp "appearing upon timber or lumber adrift", to be evidence of ownership); Minn. Gen. St. 1913, § 5471 (recorded log-mark on logs to be evidence of ownership); Mo. Rev. St. 1919, § 10322 (recorded mark on logs, lumber, etc., to be evidence of ownership); § 5727 (recorder of deeds' record of flour-brands, provable by certified copy); N. Mex. Annot. St. 1915, § 3377 (log-brands; "the certificate of the recorded brand and the proof of the brand upon any such product shall be prima facie evidence of the ownership thereof"); N. Y. Com. L. 1909, Navigation, § 73 (presence of recorded mark on floating logs or timber, presumptive evidence of ownership of party recording); North Carolina: Con. St. 1919, § 3989 (timber marked with registered trade-mark is presumed to be "the property of the proprietor of such trademark"); Oh. Gen. Code Ann. 1921, § 6232 (registered trade-mark on timber, to be prima facie evidence of trade-mark proprietor's ownership of timber); Or. Laws 1920, § 7651 (recorded mark on log or timber, to be evidence of ownership); Philippine Islands: Admin. C. 1917, § 517 (registered brand of animals; the copy issued to the owner is to be "a certificate of ownership, which certificate shall be 'prima facie' evidence that the animal is the property of the person therein named as owner"); 1908, Catabian v. Tungcul, 11 P. I. 49; Wash. R. & B. Code 1909, § 7094 (recorded mark on logs or timber afloat, to be evidence of ownership); W. Va. Code 1914, c. 62E, § 16, St. 1882, c. 119 (trade-mark on timber; the timber presumed to be "the property of the proprietor of such trade-mark"); Wisconsin: Stats. 1919, § 1739 (recorded mark on logs or timber afloat, raises presumption of ownership).

Distinguish the question whether the official register of brands or marks is admissible to show a person to be entitled to use the brand recorded as his; this is usually dealt with in the same legislation, but it falls under another principle (post, § 1647).

§ 150*a*. Tags, Signs, and Number-Plates on Automobiles, Railroad Cars, Ships, and other Vehicles and Premises. The foregoing principle is equally applicable to other marks on property, provided only in common experience the particular kind of mark is associated with ownership or control of the person signified by the mark. Thus, the name or number marked on a shop, a ship, a railroad car, or other chattel or structure, may be admissible to show that person's ownership or control.[1] In particular, the number-plate borne on an automobile is admissible to show that the person who originally registered that number as owner is the owner of the car bearing that number-plate.[2] This would be plain on principle at common law; yet only a few

§ 150a*. [1] Canada: 1921, R. v. Hayton, 57 D. L. R. 532, Ont. (keeping liquor; the brand "liquor" on a box, held not sufficient evidence of contents); Illinois: 1903, Chicago City R. Co. v. Carroll, 206 Ill. 318, 68 N. E. 1087 (injury by defendant's railroad car; that the cars running on the line where the plaintiff was injured bore the inscription "Chicago City R. Co.", admitted); 1895, Pittsburgh, F. W. & C. R. Co. v. Callaghan, 157 Ill. 406, 41 N. E. 909 (lettering on locomotive cab, held to be evidence of ownership by purporting owner); Iowa: 1913, Howell v. Mandelbaum & Sons, 160 Ia. 119, 140 N. W. 397 (name on a wagon, held evidence of ownership; cases collected); Kansas: 1907, State v. Ford, 76 Kan. 424, 91 Pac. 1056 (keeping a place for illegal sale of liquor; bills of sale of liquor found in the defendant's cash register, naming him as vendee, admitted, as analogous to the circumstantial evidence of tags on goods); Mass. 1859: Stearns v. Doe, 12 Gray 482, 486 (port-name on stern of vessel); 1883, Com. v. Collier, 134 Mass. 203, 205 (label on barrel); 1900, Ingraham v. Chapman, 177 Mass. 123, 58 N. E. 171 (presence of name on a dog's collar is some evidence of the person's ownership; "it is like the case of a brand or mark upon cattle"); 1916, Robinson v. Doe, 224 Mass. 319, 112 N. E. 1007 (battery by a man alleged to be an agent of the deft circus-owner; the signs on wagons, etc., and the men's uniforms, etc., held to be sufficient evidence of defendant's identity as owner and employer); 1922, Eshenwald v. Suffolk Brewing Co., — Mass. —, 134 N. E. 642 (personal injury caused by defendant's wagon; the marked name on the wagon, etc., admitted as evidence of ownership); Mich. 1918, Theisen v. Detroit T. & T. Co., 200 Mich. 136, 166 N. W. 901 (agency evidenced by defendant's letterhead bearing agent's name); N. Y. 1910, People v. Hill, 198 N. Y. 64, 91 N. E. 272 (murder; keys with tag bearing defendant's name found at the place; held doubtful; this case shows how different a man the judge is when reasoning about his own affairs at home and reasoning in the judicial strait-jacket; suppose he had forbidden a certain young man to court his daughter and then one morning found on the parlor floor by the sofa a bunch of keys with the tabooed young man's name; would he hold that "there was some doubt whether the evidence was properly admitted"?); Or. Laws 1920, § 8776 (fraudulent use of food container; stamped name on container, presumed to be that of the owner); W. Va. Code 1914, c. 62E, § 22, St. 1897, c. 15 (bottle bearing trademark, presumed to be the property of trademark owner).

[2] Conn. St. 1921, c. 400, § 45 (motor-vehicles; "proof of the registration number of any motor vehicle therein concerned [i.e. violation of law] shall be prima facie evidence in any criminal case that the owner was the operator thereof"); Mass. 1910, Trombley v. Stevens-Duryea Co., 206 Mass. 516, 92 N. E. 764 (an automobile, occupied by the driver only, injured the plaintiff; held (1) that the number borne on the car with the certificate of registration of the defendant, who was not the driver, were sufficient evidence of the defendant's ownership or right to possession; (2) that the driver's possession of the automobile was no evidence that he was the agent or servant of the owner; the Court's opinion is on the latter point, inconsistent, for after first stating the question to be "whether there was evidence for the jury", it proceeds to rule that "there is no presumption"; whichever ruling the Court meant to make, it is unsound as a matter of practical experience, which is the basis of all presumptions); Mich. 1918, Hatter v. Dodge Bros., 202 Mich. 97, 167 N. W. 935 ("a proof of the license number upon an automobile . . . identifies both vehicle and ownership"); Minn. Gen. St. 1913, § 2643 (in proceedings against the registered owner of a

of the elaborate motor-vehicle statutes expressly so declare. But the apparent caution exercised by watchful devotees of automobilist interests in keeping such a provision out of the statutes should not permit the common-law principle to be ignored by the courts; for it is a dictate of common sense.

The principle of Explanation (ante, § 149, 34) leaves the opponent free to point out any facts which in the case in hand weaken the inference from general experience.

But a caution is necessary in extending the analogy of these brand and mark cases to the use of tags, labels, bills of sale, and other documents.[3] The basis of the inference in the brand cases is the known custom that only the owner ordinarily imprints a brand or mark of his initials, name, etc. But when e.g. a bill of sale for liquor sold by Roe to J. S. is found on J. S.'s premises, the inscription to J. S. is by custom the statement of the vendor, hence is (even when authenticated) no more than the vendor's hearsay statement; hence, its only available status, prima facie, is that of an admission of J. S.; to bring it to this point, the principles of §§ 260 and 1073, post, must be invoked and satisfied.

§ 151. Postmarks on Envelopes. The postmark on an envelope is, upon the same principle, admissible to show that the envelope bearing it had passed through the hands of the postal officials at the time and place indicated. Here, however, the question separates itself more distinctly into two others, — first, whether the postmark may be assumed genuine, without more evidence (post, § 2152), and if so, whether the postmark, regarded as a statement of the postal official, may be admitted under the Hearsay exception for official statements (post, § 1674). This analysis might be applicable equally to the brands of stock and timber; but it seems not to have been made, and its recognition for postmarks only is due to the course of early English rulings.

§ 151*a*. Fingerprints; Footmarks. (1) The inference from fingerprints, in its present aspect, is no different from the inference from any other Trace, e.g. a paint-smear or a torn coat. The peculiar strength of this evidence motor-vehicle, "the fact that such motor-vehicle has upon it the registration-number assigned to such owner under this Act shall be prima facie evidence that such motor-vehicle belonged to such registered owner"); N. Mex. St. 1912, c. 28, § 4 ("in any controversy respecting the identity or ownership or control of an automobile, the number borne by it shall be prima facie evidence that it was owned and operated by the person to whom the license therefor was issued"); N. D. Comp. L. 1913, § 2976 (in actions against registered owner of motor-vehicle, the presence on the vehicle of the registration number assigned under the statute is evidence "that such motor-vehicle belonged to such registered owner"); Pa. St. 1919, June 30, § 30, Dig. 1920, § 995, automobiles (motor vehicles; "the registration number displayed on such motor vehicle shall be prima facie evidence that the owner of such vehicle was then operating the same"; with detailed rule for overcoming the presumption); Wyo. Comp. St. 1920, § 3484 ("in any controversy respecting the identity or ownership or control of any motor vehicle, the number borne by it shall be prima facie evidence that it was owned and operated by the person to whom the certificate of registration therefor was issued").

Distinguish the question whether the ownership of the car is evidence of the agency of the driver (post, § 2509).

[3] As applied in State v. Ford, Kan., supra, n. 1.

lies rather in the Identity inference; for the use of all evidence from Traces involves commonly both inferences at the same time (as noted ante, § 149). Fingerprints as evidence can therefore better be considered under Identity (post, § 413*a*).[1]

(2) The inference from footmarks is also no different, in its present aspect, from the inference from other Traces. Here, too, the Identity inference plays an important part, in that the Identity inference (in contrast to the use of fingerprints) is apt to be specially weak, because open to special dangers. It is therefore considered under Identity (post, § 413*b*).

§ 152. Possession of Stolen Chattels. On a charge of taking goods, the fact that A was found, subsequently to the taking, in possession of the goods taken is relevant to show that he was the taker. It is true that several other hypotheses are conceivable as explaining the fact of his possession; nevertheless the hypothesis that he was the taker is a sufficiently natural one to allow the fact of his possession to be considered as evidentiary. There has never been any question of this:

1866, POLLOCK, C. B., in R. v. Exall, 4 F. & F. 922 (burglary; the three accused were seen near the place on the night in question, and the next morning the watch was found on Exall): "The law is that if, recently after the commission of the crime, a person is found in possession of the stolen goods, that person is called upon to account for the possession, — that is, to give an explanation of it which is not unreasonable or improbable. The strength of the presumption which arises from such possession is in proportion to the shortness of the interval which has elapsed. If the interval has been only an hour or two, not half a day, the presumption is so strong that it almost amounts to proof, because the reasonable inference is that the person must have stolen the property; in the ordinary affairs of life, it is not probable that the person could have got possession of the property in any other way. . . . Such evidence is, no doubt, not conclusive. As an illustration of this, I may mention that I remember hearing the late Baron Gurney say that he once picked up something lying in the road and observed, 'Now if this has been stolen and I am found with it, I might be charged with the robbery.' The other circumstances in the case, however, will always aid or rebut the presumption, and it is not the less evidence because it is not conclusive evidence. It is some evidence, if its weight depends upon the circumstances, and especially on the nature of the possession, whether it is open and avowed or secret and concealed, and what is the nature of the account given of it. What the jury have to consider in each case is, what is the fair inference to be drawn from all the circumstances before them, and whether they believe the account given by the prisoner is under the circumstances reasonable and probable or otherwise."

The use of this sort of evidence goes back as far as any in our law; for in the earlier system of Germanic law the possession of goods stolen gave rise to a peculiar and particularly speedy mode of procedure unfavorable to the accused. In modern times the fact of recent possession is also given a procedural effect, in that it casts upon the defendant the duty of producing an explanation, in default of which the case may be closed adversely to him.

151a. [1] Whether the object — door, table, etc. — on which the fingerprints were impressed must be produced in proving them, depends upon the general principle as to the production of chattels (post, § 1182).

This effect of the evidence as a presumption or as sufficient ('prima facie') evidence is dealt with elsewhere (post, § 2513).

The inquiry is here as to the admissibility of the evidence, and only one or two questions capable of dispute have ever been suggested. The time of the subsequent possession is immaterial; the lapse of a long interval opens a greater possibility of innocent explanations, and may prevent the raising of a presumption of law, but does not alter the relevancy of the fact.[1] Possession by a husband can probably not be used against the wife, unless the husband is shown to be ignorant of the presence of the articles.[2] The possession of goods of the same kind as the general class of goods from which the taking was done is receivable, even though the specific quantity or any quantity of the general mass cannot be identified or discovered or shown to be missing.[3] But these and other questions are almost invariably discussed in judicial opinions from the point of view of the legal presumption to be attached to the evidence (post, § 2513), and not as involving a question of admissibility. Where a presumption is held to be created, the admissibility of the evidence is of course conceded; but where the presumption is refused, it is sometimes difficult to say whether the inadmissibility of the evidence is also intended to be declared.

§ 153. Possession of Chattels as indicating other Crimes than Larceny. Wherever goods have been taken as a part of the criminal act, the fact of the subsequent possession is some indication that the possessor was the taker, and therefore the doer of the whole crime. Thus such possession is receivable to prove the commission of other acts than the simple crime of larceny. It is receivable to show the commission of a burglary,[1] a forgery,[2] a counter-

§ 152. [1] 1862, R. v. Wilson, 2 F. & F. 123, Bramwell, B. (said to be "strong evidence", if "shortly after" the stealing; here seventeen months after; yet the evidence was used); 1846, Com. v. Montgomery, 11 Metc. 534, 537 ("at a period somewhat distant", sufficient).

[2] See post, § 2513.

[3] England: 1854, R. v. Burton, Dears. Cr. C. 282 (larceny of pepper; the defendant was found coming out of the warehouse with pepper in his pockets of a sort similar to that on the next floor above in the warehouse, but it could not be shown that any pepper was missing; Maule, J., admitting the evidence: "If a man go into the London Docks sober without means of getting drunk, and comes out of one of the cellars very drunk wherein are a million gallons of wine, I think that would be reasonable evidence that he had stolen some of the wine in that cellar, though you could not prove that any wine was stolen or any wine was missed"); 1881, Sartin v. State, 7 Lea Tenn. 679 (stealing M's horse; the defendant when found was riding M's mule, and evidence was received of the stealing of M's mule on a day subsequent to that charged, in company with C, who when found was riding M's horse charged to have been stolen by the defendant); 1898, Parker v. U. S., 1 Ind. Terr. 592, 43 S. W. 858 (larceny of cattle; defendant's possession of other stolen cattle not received to identify those charged, because not taken from the same place).

For other cases concerning the possession of stolen goods as evidence of crime on other evidential principles, see post, §§ 218, 414.

§ 153. [1] 1904, McCormick v. State, 141 Ala. 75, 37 So. 377 (watch); 1905, Flanagan v. People, 214 Ill. 170, 73 N. E. 347; and cases cited post, § 2513, n. 8; 1878, Short v. State, 63 Ind. 376, 380; 1804, Com. v. Millard, 1 Mass. 6; 1922, State v. Crawford, — Utah —, 206 Pac. 717 (robbery; revolver found in defendant's room 40 days later, excluded on the facts).

[2] 1861, Com. v. Talbot, 2 All. Mass. 161 (possession of a forged document by one claiming a benefit under it, admitted, to show forgery); 1885, State v. Yerger, 86 Mo. 33, 39 (possession of forged instrument is evidence of forgery of it).

feiting,[3] a murder,[4] a liquor-selling,[5] or any other crime in which either a chief or a subordinate result might be the possession of a material article. For the same reason, the possession of burglar's tools is relevant to show that the possessor committed burglary, provided it first appears that the burglary was committed with such tools.[6]

§ 154. Possession of Money to evidence Larceny, etc. The mere possession of money is in itself no indication that the possessor was the taker of money charged as taken, because in general all money of the same denomination and material is alike, and the hypothesis that the money found is the same as the money taken is too forced and extraordinary to be receivable. Where the denominations of the money found and the money taken correspond in a fairly close way, the fact of the finding of that specific money would have probative value and be relevant, because the money found is fairly marked as identical with the money taken.

Another mode, however, of making the fact of money-possession relevant is to show its sudden possession, i.e. to show that before the time of taking the person was without money, while immediately after that time he had a great deal; this reduces the hypotheses to such as involve sudden acquisition, and a dishonest acquisition thus becomes a natural and prominent hypothesis. On such conditions the possession of unidentified money becomes relevant.[1]

[3] 1815, R. v. Fuller, R. & R. 308, by all the Judges (admitted to show a procuring with intent to utter).

[4] 1905, People v. Jackson, 182 N. Y. 66, 74 N. E. 565 (murder; the defendant's possession of the deceased's watch and pocket-book, admitted); 1857, Williams v. Com., 29 Pa. 102, 103, 106 (murder; possession of money and watch of the deceased, admitted; "possession of the fruits of crime is of great weight in establishing the proof of murder, where that crime has been accomplished with robbery").

[5] Going into a place sober and coming out drunk evidences the obtaining of liquor therein: 1854, Maule, J., in R. v. Burton, Dears. Cr. C. 282 (quoted ante, § 152); 1859, Com. v. Taylor, 14 Gray Mass. 26; 1867, Com. v. Kennedy, 97 Mass. 224; 1889, Com. v. Finnerty, 148 Mass. 165, 19 N. E. 215; 1893, Com. v. Hurley, 158 Mass. 159, 33 N. E. 342.

The following rulings probably depend upon the same principle: 1860, Com. v. Maloney, 16 Gray Mass. 20 (goings in and comings out of numbers of persons with jugs, etc., admitted to show liquor-selling); 1889, Com. v. Finnerty, 148 Mass. 165, 19 N. E. 215 (admitting the mere fact of frequent goings in and comings out, as under certain circumstances indicating the sale of liquor within); 1893, Com. v. Brothers, 158 Mass. 206, 33 N. E. 386 (same); 1899, Pike v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. 613, 51 S. W. 395 (cited ante, § 149).

[6] 1865, People v. Winters, 29 Cal. 658 (but first it must be shown that a burglary was committed, and by the aid of such tools; otherwise "there is no connection, probable or possible, between it and an offence confessedly committed without the aid of such tools"); 1882, People v. Hope, 62 Cal. 291, 295 (same in substance); 1890, People v. Sansome, 84 Cal. 449, 453, 24 Pac. 143 (same principle applied); 1879, State v. Morris, 47 Conn. 179, 181 (burglary while armed; the possession of arms after emerging from the house admitted as evidence of their possession while in it); 1884, State v. Franks, 64 Ia. 39, 42, 19 N. W. 832; 1866, State v. Harrold, 38 Mo. 496, 498 (burglary; the finding of the goods stolen, and of the burglar's tools, admitted); 1872, State v. Dubois, 49 Mo. 573 (finding of burglars' tools, admitted).

Distinguish the admission of burglar's tools, possessed before the act, to show a design (post, § 238, ante, § 88).

§ 154. [1] CANADA: 1914, R. v. Minchin, 15 D. L. R. 792, Alta. (theft of public moneys; the accused's deposits and withdrawals of amounts in bank account, admitted, though in themselves "absolutely immaterial", to show that the money went into his possession and not that of fellow-employees; Beck, J., diss.; Stuart, J., concurring, said: "The case [of Williams v. U. S., infra] is criticised severely and perhaps with justice in W. on Evidence, § 154, in a note; the criticism is apparently very sound, but the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States is impressive"); 1918, R. v. Minchin, 18 D. L. R. 340, Can.

§ 155. Same: Discriminations as to Stolen Chattels and Money. The use of possession of stolen goods to show their stealing must be distinguished from the use of possession of other stolen goods to show a knowing receipt of stolen goods, the object there being to show knowledge or intent (post, § 323). The relevancy of lack of money to show a motive for stealing (post, § 392) or to show incapacity to pay or to lend (ante, § 89) involves also different questions. Whether a person may be tried under the same indictment for stealing and for knowing receipt of stolen goods, and be found guilty as an accessory of the theft, raises questions of criminal pleading.

§ 156. Possession of Receipt or Instruments of Debt, to show Payment. The payee of money naturally leaves behind him in the hands of the payor some document by way of receipt or evidence of payment. (1) Where this document is a signed acknowledgment, — in the strict sense, a receipt, — it is receivable as an Admission.[1] (2) Where this document is merely the instrument of liability itself, customarily surrendered to the obligor upon satisfaction made, — e.g. a promissory note, a bond, — the possession of the instrument by the obligor may be relevant to show a past transaction of discharge. The circumstances in each case, however, must determine; for

Sup. (stealing money while an official; bank-book of defendant showing an unexplained excess of deposits, held not erroneously admitted; but the judges differed in their reasoning; no authority on this point cited).

UNITED STATES: Federal: 1897, Williams v. U. S., 168 U. S. 382, 18 Sup. 92 (extortion; large bank deposits by the defendant, about the times of the alleged offence, and in excess of his salary, held improperly submitted to the jury as evidence of dishonest acquisition, because there was no necessary connection between this excess and the alleged extorted sums; the Court treats the question as though the jury had been told that this proved guilt, though the trial Court merely said "you are at liberty to infer" an unfavorable explanation; the opinion is valueless and illustrates this Court's frequent confusion of the admissibility of evidence and its effect as a presumption); Alabama: 1897, Leonard v. State, 115 Ala. 80, 22 So. 564 (possession of money after a larceny, admitted); 1900, Turner v. State, 124 Ala. 59, 27 So. 272 (possession of money after a larceny, excluded on the facts); 1901, Leath v. State, 132 Ala. 26, 31 So. 108 (forgery; mere possession of a smaller sum of money, held inadmissible; a strained ruling); Illinois: 1853, Gates v. People, 14 Ill. 433, 438 (that the defendant before a murder and robbery had no money, but after it had some resembling that taken, admitted); Kansas: 1877, State v. Grebe, 17 Kan. 458, 460 (larceny; possession of money by one who had been poor, admitted); Massachusetts: 1846, Com. v. Montgomery, 11 Metc. 534, 537 (larceny of bank bills and checks; principle applied); 1854, Boston & W. R. Co. v. Dana, 1 Gray 101 (embezzlement; insolvency before entering the employment and subsequent possession of property far exceeding his earnings in the employment, admitted; leading opinion); 1898, Com. v. Mulrey, 170 Mass. 103, 49 N. E. 91 (false pretences by a city official having a salary of $1,200; deposits in bank at the time charged too large to be accounted for by his salary, received); 1902, Com. v. Devaney, 182 Mass. 33, 64 N. E. 402 (robbery); 1905, Com. v. Tucker, 189 Mass. 457, 76 N. E. 127 (murder; the accused's lack of money before the crime and possession of it afterwards, and the loss of money from the house of the victim, admitted); 1911, Com. v. Richmond, 207 Mass. 240, 93 N. E. 816; New York: 1886, New York & B. F. Co. v. Moore, 102 N. Y. 667, 6 N. E. 293 (civil action for embezzlement by an employee); 1905, People v. Gaffey, 182 N. Y. 257, 74 N. E. 836 (forgery; the defendant's small salary and large deposits, admitted to show the probable mode of disposition of the cash-stealings covered by the forged notes; the Court seems to err in calling this "evidence of motive"); Washington: 1898, State v. Burns, 19 Wash. 52, 52 Pac. 316 (possession of any money when arrested, admitted).

Distinguish the use of lack of money to show motive (post, § 392).

§ 156. [1] For admissions in general as open to explanations, see post, § 1058.

For receipt as not conclusive but open to denial by parol evidence, see post, § 2432.

For a receipt in unproved handwriting, as presumptively authenticated, see post, § 2148.

For a receipt of a third person, as not admissible without calling him to the stand, see post, § 1456.

the party offering the evidence must be one who would naturally have received the instrument from the party now seeking for payment.[2] Counter-explanations may be shown by circumstances explaining the possession otherwise, as where the debtor has access to the place of custody of the instrument. But in judicial opinions few questions here arise except upon the propriety of creating a presumption of payment (post, § 2518), for this requires a much stronger quality of probative value than mere admissibility.[3]

§ 157. Possession or Existence of a Document, to show Execution, Delivery, or Seisin. The possession or existence of a document is connected with a number of inferences, most of them resting on the present principle, but some of them requiring for convenience to be treated elsewhere in connection with other principles.

(1) The existence of a document purporting to be signed by A is under all circumstances some evidence of A's genuine execution of it. But the question which has naturally arisen is whether under certain circumstances it is sufficient evidence of A's execution. That it is sufficient, in combination with one or more circumstances, is well recognized in a few classes of cases. The age of the document, together with its custody, and (if it is a deed of land) with the fact of possession of the land, suffices for its authentication (post, § 2137); the official custody of a purporting official document equally suffices (post, § 2158); the imprint of an official seal will often suffice to authenticate (post, § 2161); and the course of the mails may suffice for a reply-letter (post, § 2153). All these rules, however, are auxiliary rules of sufficiency, not rules of admissibility. It is necessary here merely to note that the rules are founded on an inference applying the present principle.

(2) The existence of a document in a certain kind of place — such as the grantee's custody or office of registry — may be sufficient evidence of the delivery of the document, so far as its delivery may be material. Here the usual question is not of the admissibility of the fact (which is conceded), but of its sufficiency to raise a presumption of law (post, § 2520).

(3) The existence of a document in the house or among the goods of A may be offered as evidence that A has had possession of it, or has otherwise dealt with it.[1] Here the question is genuinely one of mere admissibility; and it is

[2] Instances of the use of this evidence: 1800, Egg v. Barnett, 3 Esp. 196 (possession of a bill of exchange, bearing the plaintiff's indorsement as payee and the defendant's name as drawer); 1809, Sluby v. Champlin, 4 Johns N. Y. 461, 468 (possession by surety of a bond for duties and of the collector's receipt).

[3] This explains the apparent illiberality of the following ruling: 1810, Lord Ellenborough, C. J., in Pfial v. Vanbatenberg, 2 Camp. 439 (excluding the mere bill of exchange, when offered by the acceptor against the drawer to prove payment; "Show that the bills were once in circulation after being accepted, and I will presume that they got back to the acceptor's hands by his having paid them. But when he merely produces them, how do I know that they were ever in the hands of the payee, or any indorsee, with his name upon them as acceptor? It is very possible that when they were left for acceptance he refused to deliver them back, and, having detained them ever since, now produces them as evidence of a loan of money").

§ 157. [1] 1843, R. v. O'Connor, 4 State Tr. N. S. 935, 1045 (sedition; Rolfe, B.: "If time elapses between the apprehension of the party and his being taken away, and you find documents afterward in his possession, 'non constat' but they came there afterwards"); 1848, R. v. O'Brien, 7 State Tr. 1, 100, 193 (documents found in a portmanteau of the defendant after usually answered by holding that the fact of the document's discovery in that condition is admissible, provided the place was actually in A's control and provided the lapse of time has not made too probable the hypothesis of other persons' intrusion:

1581, Campion's Trial, 1 How. St. Tr. 1050, 1061; Campion the Jesuit being charged with treason in seducing subjects to take an oath of obedience to the Pope, Anderson, Queen's counsel, said: "These papers, thus found in houses where you were, show that for ministering such oaths you are a traitor. . . . For if a poor man and a rich man come both to one house, and after their departure a bag of gold be found hidden, forasmuch as the poor man had no such plenty and therefore could leave no such bag behind him, by common presumption it is to be intended that the rich man only, and no other, did hide it. So you, a professed papist, coming to a house, and there such reliques found after your departure, how can it otherwise be implied than that you did both bring them and leave them there; so it is flat they came there by means of a papist, 'ergo' by your means." Campion: "Your conclusion had been necessary if you had also showed that none came into the house, of my profession, but I."

From the foregoing inference must be distinguished the inference, from the existence of a document in A's possession, to his knowledge of its contents (post, § 260) or, still further, to his approval of the contents as his admission (post, § 1073).

(4) The existence of a document of ownership of land (a deed, lease, or license) may be evidence that the maker of the document had possession of the land at the time of making it. This doctrine, now well settled in English law, is applicable in proof of title by adverse possession in prior generations, where no evidence has survived except the documents themselves which embodied acts of claim of ownership.[2] It used to be said occasionally that the

he had been arrested and others had had access to it, received); 1897, State v. Shive, 58 Kan. 783, 51 Pac. 274 (robbery; near the place was found an envelope addressed to one defendant bearing the return-request of the other; excluded, because no possession of the envelope by either was shown).

[2] The line of cases is as follows: ENGLAND: 1783, Clarkson v. Woodhouse, 5 T. R. 412, 3 Doug. 189 (a custom to hold land exempt from common right; to show prescriptive exercise, leases of 71 and 123 years of age were received; Lord Mansfield, C. J.: "They are so old that nobody can speak to possession under them"); 1808, Rogers v. Allen, 1 Camp. 309 (alleged licenses of fishing and dredging, dated from 1661 to the end of that century, were objected to because no rent appeared to have been paid under them; Heath, J., thought this not necessary, "as they were of such an ancient date that it could not reasonably be supposed that evidence of such payments was still preserved; however, to give any weight" to them, the receipt of payment, or other acts of ownership, must be shown "in later times"); 1809, Doe v. Askew, 10 East 520 (to prove a custom of a widow's holding during chaste viduity, entries in the manor book of successions to estates so described were admitted, although no instances of the acting upon the custom by forfeiture for unchastity were testified to); 1829, Coombs v. Coether, M. & M. 398, semble (old lease-copies; possession not necessary for chapter-house leases, which were like public records); 1842, Doe v. Pulman, 3 Q. B. 622 (a counterpart of a lease, admitted, as equivalent to it, without accounting for the original lease or showing possession); 1862, Malcomson v. O'Dea, 10 H. L. C. 593, 614 (Willes, J.: "Ancient documents . . . purporting on the face of them to show exercise of ownership, such as a lease or a license, may be given in evidence without proof of possession or payment of rent under them, as being in themselves acts of ownership and proof of possession; this rule is sometimes stated with the qualification, provided that possession is proved to have followed similar documents, or that there is some proof of actual enjoyment in accordance with the title to which the documents relate"); 1878, Bristow v. Cormican, L. R. App. Cas. 641, 653 (see quotation supra); 1899, Blandy-Jenkins v. Dunraven, 2 Ch. 121 (ancient agreement in settlement of litigation deed was itself an act of possession; but this is incorrect; it is merely evidence of possession, in the nature of a trace or mark such as only a possessor is likely to have. The limitations of the doctrine are thus expounded:

1878, CAIRNS, L. C., in Bristow v. Cormican, L. R. 3 App. Cas. 641, 653, 668: "Old leases have always been considered to be admissible as being evidence facts of ownership. . . . [The circumstances of giving and taking them] are real transactions between man and man not intelligible except on the footing of title, or at least an honest belief in title." Lord BLACKBURN: "Inasmuch as after long time all the witnesses who could prove such possession are dead, the law permits ancient documents, either with or without evidence of ancient payment of rent, to be given as evidence from which the jury may properly draw an inference that there was such possession. For in the ordinary course of things men do not make leases unless they act on them, and lessees do not pay rent unless they are in possession, so that the ancient payment of rent adds weight to the ancient indenture."

1847, COLLIER, C. J., in Doe v. Eslava, 11 Ala. 1028, 1039: "Ancient documents, it is said, are allowed to support ancient possession, though these documents are not proved to be part of any 'res gesta.' They are admitted in such cases as forming a part of every legal transfer of title and possession by act of parties. . . . Care is first taken to ascertain their genuineness; and this is shown prima facie by proof that the document comes from the proper custody or by otherwise accounting for it."

This doctrine is in itself simple, and the only difficulty has arisen in distinguishing it from two superficially related principles which usually come into application in the same sort of litigation. (a) One of these is the doctrine (referred to supra, par. 1) of presuming the genuineness of ancient deeds. As a part of that doctrine it has in some Courts been laid down that possession of the land must have been enjoyed by the grantee before his alleged ancient deed can be presumed genuine (post, § 2142); in that rule, then, it is the land-possession which is evidence of the document's genuineness; while in the present rule it is the document which is evidence of the land-possession. Moreover, in that rule it is the grantee's possession which is material, while in the present rule it is the lessor's or grantor's. Thus the two rules are really for trespass, admitted as "evidence of an act of possession"; following Malcomson v. O'Dea);

CANADA: 1885, Esterbrooks v. Towse, 24 N. Br. 387, 398 (defendant claimed under the son of C, who had been in possession, presumably under a purchase from B, who had a power of attorney to sell, given by the administrator of A, the original grantee; all the parties prior to defendant being deceased, B's indorsement on the original grant to A, which was in C's possession, that B had sold the land to C, was held admissible, though on varying grounds; Wetmore, J., diss.).

UNITED STATES: Federal: 1889, Baeder v. Jennings, 40 Fed. 199 (certain old documents of title admitted as evidence of possession); 1918, Virginia & W. Va. Coal Co. v. Charles, D. C. W. D. Va., 251 Fed. 83, 122 (ancient land-titles: "the English doctrine referred to in W. on Evidence, § 157, does not seem to be at all applicable to the situation before us"); Massachusetts: 1870, Boston v. Richardson, 105 Mass. 351 (licenses, etc. of the city made 67 and more years ago, to use certain land, objected to because "no acts were proved to have been done under them"; the licenses were received, "at least when taken in connection with the evidence of the subsequent occupation", because "it would be impossible to supply the proof required"); 1905, Murphy v. Com., 187 Mass. 361, 73 N. E. 524 (boundary of town land; certain leases, town votes, and treasurer's entries, not all ancient, admitted to show "actual possession by the town, through its lessees, under a claim of title"); Texas: 1904, State v. Bruni, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 2, 83 S. W. 209 (ancient deeds admitted to show possession and other acts of ownership).

Whether payment of taxes (as evidenced by tax-receipts) is evidence of possession of the land, has been a large question; see the following opinion, and cases cited: 1904, Chastang v. Chastang, 141 Ala. 451, 37 So. 799.

concerned with different evidential purposes, and rest on independent grounds. (b) The other principle is that of using deeds, or other land-documents, ancient or modern, as verbal acts accompanying an act of possession and signifying the scope of the claim of possession (post, § 1778). Here the possessor may be grantee or grantor; his possession is, with reference to the document, neither evidence of it nor evidenced by it; the document's genuineness or validity is immaterial; it merely colors and defines his claim, as a verbal part of his act of adverse possession.

(5) Finally, the reverse of the preceding inference (4) may be made; i.e. from the present possession of land the inference that there once existed a deed of it, now lost, may be made:

1844, GILCHRIST, J., in New Boston v. Dunbarton, 15 N. H. 201, 205: "The jury may find, from the facts in a case, that a certain deed once existed, although there be no direct evidence of its execution. Where parties have occupied land and have conducted themselves precisely as they would have done if a deed had been made, it may be left to the jury to say whether a deed under which one of the parties claims ever had an existence. . . . Whether a fact which is unknown is to be presumed from its usual connection with other facts which are known would seem to be properly in all cases a question for the jury."

This is the logical foundation of the presumption of a lost grant, which after long service has finally degenerated into a mere rule of substantive law (post, § 2522), although the living principle of the original inference is still occasionally open to application.[3] It may be noted here that this inference, of a document's execution from the fact of land-possession, has no relation to the inference of possession of the whole of a piece of land from possession of a part (post, § 378).

§ 158. Negative Traces: (1) Lack of News, to show Death or Loss. Where certain results would have followed if an act or an event had occurred (or not occurred), the absence of those results is some indication that the act or event has not occurred (or occurred).

A common class of evidence of this sort is that of lack of news to show probable death of a person or the probable loss of a ship; for as it is usual for living persons to be heard from directly or indirectly, by persons having an interest in knowing, and for ships' officers to leave word of their journey at the ports they touch or with the other ships they pass, the lack of any such news indicates their non-existence. Such evidence has always been received.[1] It

[3] 1869, Goodell v. Labadie, 19 Mich. 88 (agreement to exchange lands; deed performing this agreement by one party admitted to show probable performance by the other also); 1844, Downing v. Pickering, 15 N. H. 344, 350 (possession, plus an agreement to make the deeds, sufficient on the facts to go to the jury).

§ 158. [1] A good example of such evidence in its various possibilities will be found in the Tichborne Case, R. v. Castro, Charge of C. J. Cockburn, passim. Other examples are as follows: 1763, Rowe v. Hasland, 1 W. Bl. 404, Lord Mansfield, C. J. (that a person "has not been heard of for many years", admissible to show death; here the person had lived in Liverpool); 1815, Watson v. King, 1 Stark. 121 (loss of a ship; evidence admitted that she had been last seen in a tempest in March, 1814, and never since heard from; Lord Ellenborough, C. J., "observed that this was the kind of proof usually given in actions against insurers, where the vessel is proved to have sailed and has not been heard of for two or three years").

Compare the cases cited post, § 664 (negative testimony).

is usually discussed, however, with reference to the legal presumption of death, founded on this evidence (post, § 2531). The fact of lack of news is admissible without regard to the time elapsed, and is not limited by the seven-year-period required for the presumption. In counter-explanation (ante, § 34) such facts as the infrequency of communication from the place the person went to, the fixed determination of the person to give up all connection with his former home, and the like, may of course be used to explain away the force of the fact of lack of news.[2]

So, too, fictitious nature of a name, or the non-existence of an alleged person of a certain name and residence, may be evidenced by the failure to find any such person after diligent search.[3]

§ 159. Same: (2) Lapse of Time, to show Payment. It is a natural propensity of creditors to seek to realize their claims, when left unsatisfied, by process of law, within a fair space of time. When it is found, after some time, that a creditor has not resorted to law for the realization of his claim, there is a natural inference that this failure was due to the lack of right and necessity to resort to law, i.e. that the claim had been satisfied by payment. The fact may be explained away by showing a more probable hypothesis (ante, § 34), for example, the insolvency of the debtor, his absence, or other circumstance likely to prevent the creditor from proceeding even though the claim was unpaid. The general evidentiary fact, however — lapse of time — is also the foundation of a legal presumption of payment (post, § 2517), and plays very little part in the theory of admissibility.

§ 160. Same: (3) Lost Will; Lost Documents in general; Debtor's Fraud in Possession; Sundry Instances. There are various other situations in which a retrospectant inference is permissible from the absence of certain results to the absence of certain causes. Most of these raise no doubt of admissibility and are commonly of importance only in the rules of presumption or elsewhere; the chief of these are the inference, from the non-discovery of a will once existing, to the testator's revocatory destruction of it (post, § 2523), the inference from the non-discovery of any document and the lapse of time, to the loss of the document (post, §§ 1195, 2522), and the inference, from a debtor's continued possession of property, after its mortgage or sale, of his fraudulent intent to defraud creditors by the transfer (post, §§ 336, 1082, 1779). In

[2] That the evidence of inability to find a person is not hearsay, see post, § 1789.

[3] 1907, Phelps v. Nazworthy, 226 Ill. 254, 80 N. E. 756 (whether a deed-grantee was a fictitious person; that no person by that name had ever lived in the township, admitted); 1858, State v. Wentworth, 37 N. H. 217; and cases cited post, §§ 1313, 1725, 1789, and 2531, n. 7.

Contra: 1906, Taylor v. State, 50 Tex. Cr. 381, 97 S. W. 474 (forgery of names of persons said to be fictitious; the sheriff's returns of "not found" on subpœnas issued in various countries for these persons as witnesses, excluded; such a ruling may be a suitable part of some little esoteric game of quibbles; but it is so vast a distance sundered from the world of common sense as to create a suspicion that the Court is under some mistake as to the nature of the objective, called Truth, which it was placed there to ascertain).

That a voter, alleged to have voted illegally as a non-resident, cannot be found or heard of on diligent search in the district, is another example of the principle; but some Courts are pedantically strict in their application of it: 1905, State v. Rosenthal, 123 Wis. 442, 102 N. W. 49.

general, that a certain effect was not seen or heard by those who would naturally have seen or heard it had its cause occurred is some evidence of the non-occurrence.[1] But, though this situation can thus be treated as permitting an inference from circumstantial evidence, it is usually more natural to treat it as involving testimonial evidence; i.e. the argument is that witness A is qualified to testify that act X was not done by B, because A would have seen or heard it if it had been done; A's statement that it was not done is therefore receivable; thus, the principle of testimonial knowledge is here the controlling one (post, § 671).

b. Organic Traces

Next are to be considered those retrospectant inferences which rest for their validity, not upon mechanical associations of effect and cause, but upon the working of organic natural laws, and usually upon some physiological principle. The fact offered as evidence is traced back to its cause through some physiological process to the originating act.

§ 163. Birth during Marriage, to show Legitimacy. When a child X is born to a wife A married to a husband B, it is natural to infer that the intercourse which begot the child was the intercourse of the husband B, i.e. that the child is legitimate. It is true that this inference is less strong where the birth occurs very shortly after marriage; but even here the likelihood that the pre-marital intercourse was B's is greater than that it was another man's. It is also true that, even where the birth occurs a year or more after the marriage, it is possible that the begetting intercourse was another man's; but it is still exceedingly more likely that it was that of B the husband. Upon this likelihood is founded a rule of procedure, namely, the presumption of legitimacy (post, § 2527). No controversy of admissibility arises.

§ 164. Same: Adultery of the Mother, to show Illegitimacy. A birth during marriage having been shown by the proponent of legitimacy, the opponent, according to the theory of explanation (ante, § 34), would ordinarily be allowed to show that the birth could be accounted for otherwise than by the husband's begetting, i.e. could show the mother's intercourse with another man, about the probable time of conception, as accounting for the birth. In the same way, a person charged as the father of an unmarried woman's child might explain away the evidentiary fact of the birth of a child by showing the fact of her intercourse with other men about the time. This form of argument, however, seems more correctly to fall under the theory of multiple opportunity, and the rule of law accordingly is examined under that head (ante, §§ 133, 134).

§ 160. [1] 1805, R. v. Long Buckby, 7 East 45 (the fact that a document required to be stamped and sealed is not found recorded as so treated, admissible to show that it was not stamped); 1894, State v. Delaney, 92 Ia. 467, 61 N. W. 189 (to show that a person could not have left the house during the night, the fact admitted that other inmates were so situated that they must have been awakened, but were not); 1920, Davin v. Isman, 228 N. Y. 1, 126 N. E. 257 (whether a deceased mortgagor had received no consideration therefor, the deed reciting the receipt of $6500; absence of any record of receipt of such a sum in the records of the banks used by the mortgagor, excluded; unsound).

§ 165. Physiological and Mental Traits, as evidencing Ancestry by reason of Heredity. If by heredity a physiological or mental trait is transmitted so as to be perceptible and identifiable, then the presence of that trait in a given person will be some evidence of a specific ancestry; and, conversely, a given ancestry will be evidence of the recurrence of the trait in a specific descendant.

In a few classes of cases, where the traits are marked and easily identifiable, general popular experience has found that such an inference, resting on hereditary transmission, is worth considering. Thus far the only ones so recognized are the inferences as to longevity (post, § 223), paternity, indicated by external corporal features (post, § 166), race, indicated in like manner (post, § 167), and insanity (post, § 231). The inference of transmissible moral character (post, § 190) has not been recognized. This sanction or denial of such an inference has thus far, of course, been based solely on general popular experience.

But the progress of science has shown, in the field of heredity, that the transmission takes place more or less according to definite principles, and also that the traits transmitted include minute and normal elements, and not merely grossly obvious or abnormal features. Hence, it may become possible by analysis to determine the evidential significance of a great variety of physiological elements, and thus in general to make inferences as to ancestry:

1921, Dr. Charles B. Davenport, "Heredity" (Proceedings of International Eugenics Conference, N. Y., 1921; Eugenics Record Office, N. Y.): "Some of the results of analytical study of these eugenical data are fairly well established. A few clearly simple Mendelian traits have been found. Such is eye color in which brown is dominant over its absence. It is possible that in some cases additional factors may be present, but the rule serves as a first approximation. Dominant, also, appears to be curliness of the hair as contrasted with recessive straight. And there are various diseases and defects that appear either as simple dominants or recessives, such as abnormalities in number and form of fingers and toes, which are mostly dominant over the normal condition; various defects of the eyes such as cataract, certain types of congenital deafness, various abnormalities of skin, and hair and nails.

"Other, and probably many other, traits are due to multiple factors — so often this is true as to suggest the hypothesis that in mammals, as contrasted with insects, traits are genetically relatively complex. Thus stature and build and proportions of parts and pigmentation of hair and skin are dependent on multiple factors. Indeed, there seems to be evidence that negro skin color is dependent upon two pairs of factors which merely reinforce each other.

"Other traits are associated with sex in the remarkable fashion called sex-linked. That is, they are usually found only in the male sex and are inherited through the mother, though she, herself, is not affected. In such cases one usually finds male relatives of the mother who are affected. Such are color blindness, hemophilia and atrophy of the optic nerve. The facts of sex-linked heredity bring home, even to the layman, the lesson that heredity is a matter of the gametes; and that bodily appearance often gives no hint of the nature of the particular germ-cells carried and, in so far, of what the inheritance shall be. The parents of an albino may have pigmented hair and skin, but both carry gametes which lack the capacity of forming pigment.

"Our knowledge of the inheritance of these physical traits is sufficiently precise to be applied practically in cases of doubtful parentage. If the child, the known mother and both of the putative fathers can be seen, and some inquiry be made as to family stock of the three adults, a decision can generally be rendered with a high degree of certainty ranging from 75 to 99 per cent. For usually, there will not be one critical trait merely, but several traits whose combined evidence will be overwhelming. Already the Eugenics Record Office has been asked to answer certain questions about the inheritance of traits in a case of a claimant who maintained that he was the son of a wealthy man who died without known heirs. As lawyers get more used to the idea of utilizing the advances of knowledge for evidence, it is probable that eugenical knowledge will be more and more called upon."

It is, however, necessary to point out, to scientists as well as to Courts, the danger of hasty use of such supposed discoveries in judicial inquiries of fact. In the first place, the data for exact observation hitherto have been found chiefly in the vegetable and animal world, and not in human beings. In the next place, the scope of observation has been inadequate for determining veritable laws in so complex a subject. In the third place, the scientist's "laws" represent the general truths averaged from a mass of instances, and do not represent the invariable result in individual instances; i.e. in one thousand cases, a "law" might be discernible, and yet in fifty or a hundred of those instances it might not operate because of counteracting and unknown considerations; hence, a scientific generalization is seldom to be treated as a certain indication for the individual case.

For these reasons, Science must show that it has attained definite and dependable results, accepted in general consensus, before it can expect Law to rely upon its discoveries.[1]

§ 166. Resemblance of Child, to show Paternity. If the corporal traits of the progenitor are or may be transmitted to the progeny, then a specific corporal trait of the progeny may point back to a person of similar trait as

§ 165. [1] For example, the accomplished scientist from whose essay the above quotation is made, has stated to the present writer that the data whence those generalizations are drawn are as yet unpublished, and yet he advances publicly the claim that "a decision can generally be rendered [in certain conditions] with a high degree of certainty, ranging from 75 to 99 per cent." To expect that so extraordinary a discovery, in a field of knowledge hitherto dark and undecipherable, will be accepted for any practical purpose without making a complete disclosure of the entire data and thus enabling others to test the logic of the generalizations, is of course out of the question.

The following newspaper dispatch illustrates the risks of premature reliance upon promising scientific enthusiasms: "San Francisco, Sept. 1, 1921: — Science, art and the law are one in declaring Julius B. Sorine the father of the third child of his divorced wife, despite the woman's assertion to the contrary, but the court's ruling, handed down today, denied his petition for custody of the child. Dr. Albert Abrams reported to the court that a test of the blood of father and son provided positive proof, in his opinion, that the child was Sorine's. Haig Patigian, a sculptor, by a series of facial sketches similar to those used in the famous Singsby case in England, told the court the child resembled Sorine. In the decision of Judge Graham today the court declared that irrespective of these tests, the child was born during the lawful wedlock of the parties, but ruled the child should remain in the mother's care."

In the following article will found an account of a case in Argentina where the judge was presented with expert opinions as to the physiological traits of identity in a filiation proceeding, and declared them insufficient in the present state of knowledge; Quesada, "La prueba scientifica de la filiacion natural" (Revista de criminologia psiquiatria y medicina legale, 1919, nos. 31, 34, 35).

the progenitor, on the condition that the person so charged as progenitor is within the number of those who by association and opportunity may have had intercourse; for otherwise the possible number of similar persons would leave open too many hypotheses. The propriety of the inference rests on the supposed physiological fact that bodily traits may be transmitted by procreation. The validity of this physiological principle, and therefore the propriety of the inference, is and always has been a matter of common knowledge and general action thereon:

1598, William Shakspeare, King John, Act I, Scene 1 (the king hears a lawsuit between Philip Faulconbridge, the supposed Bastard son of Sir Robert Faulconbridge's wife by Richard the Lion-hearted, and Robert Faulconbridge, his younger brother, who claims the estates):

Bastard: "But that I am as well begot, my liege, . . .
Compare our faces and be judge yourself
If old Sir Robert did beget us both
And were our father and this son like him."
Elinor (queen-mother of Richard): "He hath a trick of Cœur-de-Lion's face;
The accent of his tongue affecteth him.
Do you not read some tokens of my son
In the large composition of this man?"
Bastard (who is more interested in proving himself Richard's son): "Sir Robert could do well; marry, to confess,
Could he get me? Sir Robert could not do it;
We know his handiwork. Therefore, good mother,
To whom am I beholding for these limbs?
Sir Robert never holp to make this leg." [1]

1769, Lord MANSFIELD, C. J., in the Douglas Peerage Case, 2 Hargr. Collect. Jurid. 402: "I have always considered likeness as an argument of a child's being the son of a parent; and the rather as the distinction between individuals in the human species is more discernible than in other animals. A man may survey ten thousand people before he sees two faces perfectly alike; and in an army of an hundred thousand men every one may be known from another. If there should be a likeness of features, there may be a discriminancy of voice, a difference in the gesture, the smile, and various other things; whereas a family-likeness generally runs through all these; for in everything there is a resemblance, as of features, size, attitude, and action. . . . If Sir John Stewart, the most artless of mankind, was actor in the enlevement of Mignon and Sanry's [the supposed parents'] children, he did in a few days what the acutest genius could not accomplish for years. He found two children, the one the finished model of himself, and the other the exact picture in miniature of Lady Jane. It seems nature had implanted in the children what is not in the parents; for it appears in proof that in size, complexion, stature, attitude, color of the hair and eyes, nay and in every other thing, Mignon and his wife, and Sanry and his spouse, were 'toto cœlo' different from and unlike to Sir John Stewart and Lady Jane Douglas. Among eleven black rabbits, there will scarce be found one to produce a white one."

1859, FOWLER, J., in Gilmanton v. Ham, 38 N. H. 108, 113: "The practice of bringing before the jury, on trials for bastardy, the child whose paternity is sought to be established, when living, has been almost universal in this State, from the earliest recollection of the oldest practitioners. . . . If the child were referred to at all, its general appearance, its complexion and features, might properly be commented upon; and we think, under the well-established physiological law that like begets like, and that generally there is a striking resemblance, more or less strong and striking, between the parent and his child, it was a fair matter of argument before the jury, by the counsel on both sides, whether or not there had been anything in the complexion, appearance, and features of the child which the witness had produced and identified before them, tending to indicate its other parent."

§ 166. [1] So also in Richard the Second, IV, 2; Henry the Fourth, part one, II, 5; Winter's Tale, II, 5.

The English practice seems always to have admitted this evidence without question.[2] In the United States the early practice was probably the same; but as the chief use of the evidence was found in filiation proceedings, to charge the defendant with the paternity of a bastard, the possible abuses of the evidence led to an unfortunate questioning of its validity under any circumstances:

1888, Foster, J., in Clark v. Bradstreet, 80 Me. 454, 456, 15 Atl. 56: "While it may be a well-known physiological fact that peculiarities of form, feature, and personal traits are oftentimes transmitted from parent to child, yet it is equally true as a matter of common knowledge that during the first few weeks, or even months, of a child's existence, it has that peculiar immaturity of features which characterize it as an infant, and that it changes often and very much in looks and appearance during that period. Resemblance can then be readily imagined. . . . And in a trial in bastardy proceedings the mere fact that a resemblance is claimed would be too likely to lead captive the imagination of the jury, and they would fancy they could see points of resemblance between the child and the putative father."

Now it must be noted that this opinion (which is representative of others) does not dispute the validity of the inference from resemblance of features to paternity; its quarrel is with the difficulty of establishing the fact which is the foundation of the inference, namely, the resemblance. The answers to this objection are several: (1) The fanciful acceptance of a resemblance — which is the danger feared — is only likely where the child is so young as to have no decidedly marked features; and it is both proper and feasible to obviate this objection by excluding the evidence where the child is too young, either by leaving the matter to the trial Court's discretion, or by fixing a

[2] England: 16—, Piercy's Case, 12 How. St. Tr. 1199 ("This James Piercy was a truck-maker in the Strand; . . . one of his arguments to make you believe him a true descendant of the Piercys was that he was born with a mole on his body, as other of the Piercys had been, like a half-moon; the crescent being the crest of the Piercys earls of Northumberland"); 1743, Annesley v. Anglesea, 17 How. St. Tr. 1139, 1318, 1324; 1769, Douglas Peerage Case (quoted supra); 1797, Day v. Day, Trial, 3d ed., 327, quoted in Nicolas, Adulterine Bastardy, 140, and Hubback, Succession, 384 (Heath, J., received "evidence that the defendant bore a strong resemblance to his supposed father", and in summing up "admitted that resemblance was frequently fanciful, and therefore the jury should be well convinced that it did exist; but if they were so convinced, it was impossible to have stronger evidence"; this latter part of the remark of Mr. J. Heath has sometimes been omitted, when the former part was quoted, by Courts opposed to the use of the evidence, e.g. in Jones v. Jones, infra; Heath, J.'s ruling is also given in the abridged report of the case in Craik's English Causes Célèbres, 215, 223); 1837, Andrews v. Askey, 8 C. & P. 7, 9 (used without objection); 1827, 1836, Morris v. Davis, 3 C. & P. 214, 5 Cl. & F. 163 (legitimacy; "the defendant's counsel much relied . . . on the circumstance of personal resemblance that was proved by several witnesses to exist" between the plaintiff and the mother's paramour; on appeal, similar evidence was admitted on both sides without question).

Canada: 1853, Doe v. Marr, 3 U. C. C. P. 36, 51 (inheritance; to show the defendant a bastard, his resemblance to S. and not to the husband M. was held admissible, as "auxiliary evidence").

specific minimum age. (2) The physiological principle being perfectly well settled, it is poor policy to exclude invariably a piece of evidence that will usually be useful merely because it may occasionally be abused. (3) The Opinion rule cannot avail to exclude testimony to resemblance, because matters of identity, similarity, and the like are well settled to be not obnoxious to that rule (post, § 1974).

1916, ELLIS, J., in Flores v. State, 72 Fla. 302, 73 So. 234 (holding that the exhibition of a child not yet 3 months old, on an issue of paternity, was erroneous): "The sound rule is to admit the fact of similarity of specific traits, however presented, provided the child is in the opinion of the trial court old enough to possess settled features or other corporal indications. . . . [Thus] the objection to the evidence on account of its inherent weakness and unreliability would be largely, if not entirely, removed. In the first place, the trial Court would have passed upon the question as to whether the child possessed features or other corporal indications of sufficient development to permit a comparison between them and those of the defendant. In the second place, the particular features or other corporal traits claimed to be possessed by the child would be by the adoption of the rule brought specifically to the jurors' attention, and the comparison made with reference only to such features or corporal traits. It seems to us that to permit an issue of such grave consequences to be determined against a defendant in a bastardy proceeding upon the imaginary, fancied, or notional general resemblance between a child of a week old, or even a few months old, and the defendant in such proceedings, would be to place the defendant at a disadvantage which he could not possibly overcome."

Some Courts in the United States now exclude this kind of evidence, partly through misunderstanding the precedents in its favor, partly for the reasons above quoted.[3] Moreover, by a curious contrariety of views, in some in-

[3] The rulings in the various jurisdictions are as follows: Federal: 1809, U. S. v. Collins, 1 Cr. C. C. 592 (excluded, from witnesses);
Alabama: 1875, Paulk v. State, 52 Ala. 427, 429 (lack of resemblance to the defendant, or resemblance to another man who had opportunities of intercourse, admissible; but not resemblance to the children of the other man, because they might have their features from their mother; semble, also that resemblance may not be shown by testimony); 1902, Kelly v. State, 133 Ala. 195, 32 So. 56 (bastardy; child about a year old, allowed to be shown to the jury); 1913, Watts v. State, 8 Ala. App. 264, 63 So. 18 (seduction; exhibition of child, and testimony to its paternity allowed); 1920, Tarver v. State, 17 Ala. App. 424, 85 So. 855 (seduction; child exhibited to jury);
Arkansas: 1910, Adams v. State, 93 Ark. 260, 124 S. W. 766 (seduction; resemblance of a child a few months old, testified to);
California: 1889, Re Jessup, 81 Cal. 408, 417, 21 Pac. 976 (inheritance; resemblance, as shown by photographs, allowed to be used to show paternity; inspection in Court declared much more valuable; semble, the opinion of witnesses, inadmissible); 1911, People v. Richardson, 161 Cal. 552, 120 Pac. 20 (child 5½ months old, allowed to be exhibited as evidence of paternity);
Connecticut: 1905, Shailer v. Bullock, 78 Conn. 65, 61 Atl. 65 (bastardy; exhibition of the child — here 10 months old — allowed);
Florida: 1916, Flores v. State, 72 Fla. 302, 73 So. 234 (bastardy; a child "within a few days of being 3 months old", held improperly exhibited, as too young; citing the above text with approval);
Georgia: 1854, Wright v. Hicks, 15 Ga. 160, 172 (legitimacy; resemblance of the child to the alleged paramour, considered); 1904, McCalman v. State, 121 Ga. 491, 49 S. E. 609 (testimony to resemblance excluded; following Hanawalt v. State, Wis.; Chandler, J., diss.);
Indiana: 1862, Risk v. State, 19 Ind. 152 (age unstated; propriety of evidence doubted, because of the uncertainty of a mere infant's features, and because "it would involve the necessity of giving the alleged father in evidence"); 1870, Reitz v. State, 33 Ind. 187 (same);
Iowa: 1874, Stumm v. Hummel, 39 Ia. 478, 480 (criminal conversation; resemblance assumed to be relevant); 1878, State v. Danforth, 48 Ia. 43, 47 (child three months old; resemblance excluded, there being no corroborating evidence); 1880, State v. Smith, 54 Ia. 104, 6 N. W. 153 (child two years and one month old; resemblance allowed to be considered as a general principle, the child stances, the evidentiary fact of resemblance is excluded only when offered through testimony of those who have seen the child; in other instances, only when offered by the presentation of the child in court. The partial exclusion of the former mode of evidence is based chiefly on the Opinion rule — the fallacy of which, in this application, needs no further exposition; and partly also on the ease with which a resemblance can be affirmed in general terms, but the simple correction for this danger is to require detailed statements of specific traits, for the force of the inference rests on these and not on a general resemblance. The partial exclusion of the other mode of evidence — presentation of the child in court — rests on no good reason what-being of sufficient age); 1900, State v. Harvey, 112 Ia. 416, 84 N. W. 535 (exhibition of child under two years, held improper); 1911, State v. Nathoo, 152 Ia. 665, 133 N. W. 129 (rape; the child's resemblance to the Hindoo defendant; not decided);

Kansas: 1895, Shorten v. Judd, 56 Kan. 43, 42 Pac. 337 (admitted);
Maine: 1839, Keniston v. Rowe, 16 Me. 38 ("it was not the color or any peculiarity of conformation or form of features as matters of fact that were proposed to be proved; it was to prove a resemblance, which is matter of opinion", and therefore inadmissible); 1888, Clark v. Bradstreet, 80 Me. 454 (a child six weeks old; resemblance, whether by exhibition or by testimony held irrelevant, apparently irrespective of the child's age);
Maryland: 1876, Jones v. Jones, 45 Md. 144, 151 (inheritance; "When the parties are before the jury, and the latter can make the comparison for themselves, whatever resemblance is discovered may be a circumstance, in connection with others, to be considered"; but resemblance being "notional" and "fanciful", it cannot be shown by testimony);
Massachusetts: 1862, Eddy v. Gray, 4 All. 435, 438 (excluded; here offered by witnesses, and declared obnoxious to the Opinion rule); 1876, Finnegan v. Dugan, 14 All. 197 (admitted as relevant; here the child was shown to the jury; no authorities cited); 1869, Young v. Makepeace, 103 Mass. 50, 54 (child shown to the jury; but testimony to the dissimilarity between the child and a third person, not present, but alleged by the defendant to be the real father, excluded; reasons confused and exact rule left obscure; Finnegan v. Dugan not cited); 1894, Farrell v. Weitz, 160 Mass. 288, 35 N. E. 783 (likeness not allowed to be shown by photograph of third person alleged as the father by defendant; semble, comparison by actual presence allowable);
Michigan: 1884, People v. White, 53 Mich. 537 (resemblance of a young infant; "we do not well see how the jury could be prevented from noticing the child, which was properly enough in court"); 1896, People v. Wing, 115 Mich. 690, 74 N. W. 179 (bastardy; People v. White followed);
New Hampshire: 1859, Gilmanton v. Ham, 38 N. H. 108, 113 (resemblance allowed to be considered; here by exhibition); 1900, State v. Saidell, 70 N. H. 174, 46 Atl. 1083 (resemblance on exhibition to jury, allowed to be considered); 1905, State v. Danforth, 73 N. H. 215, 60 Atl. 839 (rape; rule of the foregoing cases confined; here the child was exhibited and its peculiarities pointed out; the rule as stated above in the text "appears reasonable");
New Jersey: 1888, Gaunt v. State, 50 N. J. L. 490, 495, 14 Atl. 600 (fornication; resemblance admissible, without any apparent limitations; "the illusory nature of such resemblances rather imposing a duty on the Court in conjunction with the admission of the proof, than militating against the relevancy of the inquiry"; resemblance to be available either by inspection or through witnesses);
North Carolina: 1872, State v. Woodruff, 67 N. C. 89, semble (admissible); 1878, State v. Britt, 78 N. C. 439, 442 (resemblance to a third person, the alleged father, admitted); 1888, State v. Horton, 100 N. C. 443, 6 S. E. 238 (State v. Woodruff followed);
Ohio: Crow v. Jordan, 49 Oh. St. 655, 32 N. E. 750 (child allowed to be exhibited);
Oregon: 1908, Anderson v. Aupperle, 51 Or. 556, 95 Pac. 330 (seduction; infant of less than 3 months, exhibited; State v. Danforth, N. H., followed); 1913, State v. Russell, 64 Or. 247, 129 Pac. 1051 (incest; child of 14 months allowed to be exhibited);
Tennessee: 1846, Cannon v. Cannon, 7 Humph. 410, 411 (distribution of estate; resemblance used to evidence illegitimacy);
Texas: 1892, Higginbotham v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 20 S. W. 360 (admitted); 1899, Hilton v. State, 41 Tex. Cr. 190, 53 S. W. 113 (adultery; resemblance of child seven months old, excluded);
Utah: 1901, State v. Neel, 23 Utah 541, 65 Pac. 494 (illicit intercourse; child not allowed to be exhibited, following Hanawalt v. State infra);
Wisconsin: 1895, Hanawalt v. State, 64 Wis. 84, 24 N. W. 489 (excluded, where the child was less than a year old; but perhaps admissible for an adult; the jury's inspection disapproved).

ever, and is further considered under the principle involved (post, § 1160). The sound rule is to admit the fact of similarity of specific traits, however presented, provided the child is in the opinion of the trial Court old enough to possess settled features or other corporal indications.

It is to be noted that the evidence is relevant not merely in bastardy proceedings, but also in trying the legitimacy of a child born during marriage, whenever the presumption of legitimacy allows the issue to be raised (post, § 2527), as well as occasionally in other proceedings.

§ 167. Corporal Traits, to show Race or Nationality. A physiological principle, similar to the preceding one, but attended usually with more clearly marked results, tells us that the progeny of persons of one race receive from the progenitors certain corporal traits very different from the traits transmitted from a progenitor of another race. The presence of these peculiar traits of the race is therefore evidential to show a progenitor of the race bearing those traits. The admissibility of this evidence has never been doubted by Courts; though its use, since the abolition of slavery in this country, is now very rare, because the issues in which it is relevant can only be uncommon.[1] There seems no reason why similar evidence should not occasionally be usable to show foreign birth or origin from a foreign nation, even though from a people of the same race.[2]

§ 168. Birthmarks, to show Events during Pregnancy; Venereal Disease, to show Adultery; Pregnancy, to show Intercourse. There remain some other

§ 167. [1] CANADA: B. C. Rev. St. 1911, C. 78, § 23 (the Court or jury "may infer as a fact the nationality or race of the person in question from the appearance of such person"); U. S. Federal: 1904, U. S. v. Hung Chang, 134 Fed. 19, 23 (Chinese descent, evidenced by appearance); Arkansas: 1861, Daniel v. Guy, 23 Ark. 50, 51 (foot-formation, admitted as evidential of negro race); Georgia: 1856, Bryan v. Walton, 20 Ga. 480, 508 (complexion, etc., of alleged slaves, considered to prove ancestry); Illinois: 1916, People v. Kingcannon, 276 Ill. 251, 114 N. E. 508 (rape under age, followed by birth of a child; polydactylism of the child and of the defendant, with evidence that such a feature is heritable, held admissible to evidence paternity); Indiana: 1864, Nave's Adm'r v. Williams, 22 Ind. 370 (color and features, to show race, admitted); Kentucky: 1835, Gentry v. McGinnis, 3 Dana Ky. 382, 388 (white color of an alleged slave, received to show white ancestry; "a black or mulatto complexion is prima facie evidence" of slavery, black ancestors being necessarily slaves, and "one apparently a white person or an Indian", is prima facie free); 1839, Chancellor v. Milly, 9 Ky. 24 (appearance of an alleged slave, received to infer ancestry); Maine: 1888, Clark v. Bradstreet, 80 Me. 454, 457 (complexion, etc., admissible in determining race); Missouri: Rev. St. 1919, § 3513 (illegal mixed marriage; jury "may determine the proportion of negro blood in any party to such marriage from the appearance of such person"); New Jersey: 1826, Fox v. Lambson, 8 N. J. L. 275, 277 (black color raises a presumption of slavery); North Carolina: 1897, Warlick v. White, 76 N. C. 175, 178 (color of a child, to show black blood, and therefore illegitimacy, admitted); South Carolina: 1846, White v. Collector, 3 Rich. 138, 140 (color admissible to evidence race); Virginia: 1806, Hudgins v. Wrights, 1 Hen. & M. 134, 137 (long, straight, black hair, and copper complexion, for Indians, and flat nose, woolly hair, and color of complexion, for negroes, admissible to show ancestry); 1811, Hook v. Pagee, 2 Munf. 379, 383 (complexion of an alleged slave, admitted to show ancestry); 1827, Gregory v. Baugh, 4 Rand. 611, 613 (complexion, etc., assumed proper to determine Indian ancestry).

The same principle should apply to the resemblance of an animal, as evidence of its pedigree: 1904, Brady v. Shirley, 18 S. D. 608, 101 N. W. 886, semble (qualities of a horse, admitted on the question of its siring by a Hambletonian).

[2] 1856, Dennis v. Brewster, 7 Gray 351, 353 (foreign birth; arrival as a child on a ship, foreign appearance, speech, and gestures, dark complexion, etc., held sufficient).

common instances of this form of inference: (1) That a shock received by the mother during pregnancy may leave a mark upon the child has long been a popular belief. Should it ever receive scientific sanction in any defined terms, the child's corporal mark after birth may be taken as evidential of the act which produced it.[1]

(2) That the existence of venereal disease in a husband is some evidence of an act of adultery on his part has always been conceded;[2] it is merely a question of the strength of the explanatory circumstances.

(3) So, too, in prosecutions for rape, rape under age, and seduction, the pregnancy is admissible as evidence at least of the intercourse; the accused's identity being provable by other evidence.[3]

§ 168. [1] Anon., cited by Irving Browne, Green Bag, 1892, V, 555 (Mercer Co., Pa.; the complainant charged an assault upon her two weeks before by the defendant in a lonely house; the defendant was held for trial, but three weeks before it occurred, the complainant was delivered of a child, and on the child's throat and wrist appeared marks of a thumb, etc., such as the complainant had alleged).

[2] 1794, Popkin v. Popkin, 1 Hagg. Eccl. 765, 767 ("Whether this disease is [sufficient] evidence of adultery may depend upon circumstances"); 1916, Sheffield v. Beckwith, 90 Conn. 93, 96 Atl. 316 (alienation of wife's affections; like Johnson v. Johnson, N. Y.); 1922, Riley v. State, — Ga. —, 111 S. E. 729 (rape under age; venereal disease in the defendant and then in the victim, admitted to evidence the act); 1835, Johnson v. Johnson, 14 Wend. N. Y. 637, 639, 641 (venereal disease contracted by a husband during the wife's absence is evidence of his adultery); 1912, U. S. v. Tan Teng, 23 P. I. 145, 153 (gonorrhea in the victim of a rape).

[3] Accord: California: 1904, People v. Tibbs, 143 Cal. 100, 76 Pac. 904 (seduction under promise of marriage; birth of a child as shown by its presence in court, admitted); 1909, People v. Soto, 11 Cal. App. 431, 105 Pac. 420 (pregnancy admissible to prove the act charged; but not, as here, the birth of a child from a prior act of intercourse used evidentially); Colorado: 1919, Laycock v. People, 66 Colo. 441, 182 Pac. 880 (rape under age; pregnancy, admitted, in connection with other acts); Columbia (Dist.): 1912, Kidwell v. U. S., 38 D. C. App. 566 (rape under age); 1920, Terr. v. Fong Yee, 25 Haw. 309 (seduction); Idaho: 1911, State v. Henderson, 19 Ida. 524, 114 Pac. 30 (rape under age; birth of a child, admitted); Iowa: 1906, State v. Dolan, 132 Ia. 196, 109 N. W. 609 (seduction; an obscure ruling, which finds fault with the trial court for not clearly instructing the jury; birth is said to be admissible as evidence of a seduction, but not of the defendant's being the seducer); 1907, State v. Nugent, 134 Ia. 237, 111 N. W. 927 (seduction; birth of a child, admitted); 1908, State v. Blackburn, 136 Ia. 743, 114 N. W. 531 (rape under age; birth of child, held to be not corroborative of woman's testimony; following State v. Coffman, 112 Ia. 8, but ignoring the above two cases); 1909, State v. Hunt, 144 Ia. 257, 122 N. W. 902 (seduction; birth of a child held "corroborative of the prosecutrix as to the corpus delicti", though not as connecting the defendant; Dolan and Nugent cases not cited); 1911, State v. Nathoo, 152 Ia. 665, 133 N. W. 129 (carnal knowledge of an insensible female; the fact of a birth was held admissible as corroborative, if intercourse was otherwise proved); Kansas: 1904, State v. Walke, 69 Kan. 183, 76 Pac. 468 (statutory rape); 1905, State v. Miller, 71 Kan. 200, 80 Pac. 51 (same); 1906, State v. Gereke, 74 Kan. 196, 86 Pac. 160, semble (rape under age; birth of a child, admitted); Michigan: 1905, People v. Stisson, 140 Mich. 216, 103 N. W. 542 (incest); Missouri: 1906, State v. Palmberg, 199 Mo. 233, 97 S. W. 566 (rape under age; birth of child, admitted); Nebraska: 1904, Woodruff v. State, 72 Nebr. 815, 101 N. W. 1114 (rape under age); South Dakota: 1912, State v. Holter, 30 S. D. 353, 138 N. W. 953 (seduction; plaintiff's pregnancy admitted); Texas: 1920, Klepper v. State, 87 Tex. Cr. 597, 223 S. W. 468 (seduction); Utah: 1906, State v. Thompson, 31 Utah 228, 87 Pac. 709 (adultery with a single woman; her pregnancy admitted as corroborating her, but not as connecting the defendant); Washington: 1903, State v. Fetterly, 33 Wash. 599, 74 Pac. 810 (rape under age; Fullerton, C. J.: "It conclusively proves her testimony to the effect that the crime charged was committed, and the truth of that lends credence to her testimony to the effect that the person she names is the guilty party"; said of the birth or miscarriage of a child); 1905, State v. Nelson, 39 Wash. 221, 81 Pac. 721 (adultery; birth of child twenty months after husband's absence, admitted); and some cases cited post, § 398; 1909, State v. McCool, 53 Wash. 486, 102 Pac. 422 (rape under age; admitted, but held not sufficient corroboration under the rule of § 2062, post).

Contra: 1906, Kevern v. People, 224 Ill. 170, 79 N. E. 574, semble (rape); 1918, Jordan

(4) So, also, a result of any disease, subsequent to a time in issue, may evidence its prior existence.[4]

c. MENTAL TRACES

§ 172. General Principle. The struggle of a victim for his life, and the act of taking his life, may leave upon the perpetrator indelible traces of blood, wounds, or rent clothing, which point back to the deed as done by him; these traces come from a mechanical contact with the body, weapons, and other things involved in the deed, and they remain upon him or are divested from him by a mechanical process. But a deed may also leave traces upon the doer through other than a mechanical process, i.e. through a mental or moral, i.e. psychological process. These traces may be as significant in their way as the others, — perhaps more so; and they may be equally relevant evidentially to show their bearer to be the doer of the act. These traces, like those of the other sorts, may be employed either affirmatively or negatively. The presence of such a trace may be used as indicating the doing of the act by the person bearing it; and the absence of the trace may be used as indicating the not doing it by the person not bearing the trace. The traces of this mental or psychological sort will be some form of a mental condition, — memory, belief, consciousness, knowledge, or whatever other name may be more usual and appropriate.

How to evidence this mental condition — by conduct or the like — is a different question. There is here evolved simply the question, When is memory, consciousness, and the like, relevant to show the doing of a past act? The evidencing of this mental condition raises different and more complicated questions as to the significance of conduct; hence a consideration of the state of the law upon the various uses of the present sort of evidence can best be made in connection with the rules of conduct-evidence. Those rules in their details are elsewhere examined (post, §§ 265–293). It is enough here to summarize the chief types of inference of the present sort, and thus to exhibit the place of this inference in the general doctrine of Relevancy.

§ 173. Consciousness of Guilt. The commission of a crime leaves usually upon the consciousness a moral impression which is characteristic. The innocent man is without it; the guilty man usually has it. Its evidential value has never been doubted. The inference from consciousness of guilt to "guilty" is always available in evidence. It is a most powerful one, because the only other hypothesis conceivable is the rare one that the person's consciousness is caused by a delusion, and not by the actual doing of the act. The difficulty in connection with this evidence is, not its own relevancy to show the doing of the act — that is universally conceded — but the mode of proving this consciousness of guilt in its turn by other evidence. There are two processes or inferences involved, — from conduct to consciousness of guilt, and then from consciousness of guilt to the guilty deed. The latter, belonging here, gives rise to no disputed questions of evidence. The former gives rise to many questions, due to the variety of conduct offerable in evidence. These questions are dealt with (post, §§ 273–291), in discussing evidence of consciousness or knowledge in general. It is worth while here to note this double step of inference involved; for it exhibits the true significance of the evidential use of conduct as indicating consciousness of guilt.

v. Com., 180 Ky. 379, 202 S. W. 896 (seduction); 1906, People v. Brown, 142 Mich. 622, 106 N. W. 149 (rape under age in June, 1904, the statutory age being reached on July 15, 1904; pregnancy in March and May, 1905, excluded; a queer decision, the present question not being distinguished from others involved).

[4] Cases cited post, § 225, n. 1.

§ 174. Consciousness of Innocence. Just as the lack of mechanical or corporal traces may be used negatively (ante, § 158) to show the non-doing of an act, so the lack of guilty consciousness may be useful to show innocence of a crime. This lack of guilty consciousness — in other words, this consciousness of innocence — seems not to have been doubted by Courts as having in itself evidential value. But, assuming it to be relevant, a difficulty arises in the proof of it as a proposition, — the difficulty that the conduct offered to evidence it is so likely to be feigned and artificial. The disputed question, then, whether the conduct of an accused person is admissible in his favor, involves a doubt, not as to the evidential value of consciousness of innocence as indicating non-doing, but as to the evidential value of conduct as showing consciousness of innocence, — a problem elsewhere examined (post, § 293).

§ 175. Belief or Recollection of Personal Doings, as Evidence of Identity. All personal deeds are likely to leave some sort of a mark in the recollection or belief. The presence of that mark is some indication of the doing of the act recollected, and the absence of the mark is some evidence of the non-doing of the act. Where a person's identity is in issue, his recollection or non-recollection of experiences known to have occurred to the person with whom he is to be identified may often serve as useful evidence. For the reasons already stated, the rulings on this subject can best be examined elsewhere (post, § 270).

§ 176. Same: Legitimacy, as evidenced by Parent's Conduct; Marriage, by "Habit"; Testamentary Execution, by the Deceased's Belief. Among the most notable facts of life which are certain to leave marked traces on those into whose experience they enter are the facts of marriage, of the birth of children, and of the execution of a testament. Long tradition has recognized this, and has in these cases sanctioned the inference from subsequent belief or recollection to the prior act or experience. But the real difficulty lies in the inference from conduct to that belief, and, for the reason already noted, the details of the law can best be examined in another place, — the inference to Legitimacy, under § 269, to Marriage, under § 268, and to Testamentary Execution, under § 271.

§ 177. Conduct of Animals, as evidencing a Human Act; Tracking by Bloodhounds. If the instinct or habit of animals can in a given case be supposed to be sensitive to the dealings of men with them, it would seem that the conduct of an animal may be trusted evidentially as indicating the human act which would naturally have caused the animal's conduct.[1] Such indications may be of two kinds:

(1) The behavior of the animal may be a trick or other action expressly taught or implicitly acquired during his past association with a particular person; the possession of such a trick by a given animal will therefore serve to identify him as having been in that person's possession. This evidential use is well established in judicial practice, though it has seldom been brought before courts of appeal.[2]

(2) The behavior of the animal may be the result of an impression made on some peculiarly strong sense by a casual outward event or human act, incapable of being perceived by the human senses. The behavior of a horse in the vicinity of a concealed beast of prey is an instance of this. The custom, in certain of our communities, of tracking fugitives by bloodhounds, rests on a similar trait of those animals. It is conceded by most Courts that the fact that a well-trained and well-tested bloodhound of good breed, after smelling a shoe or other article belonging to the doer of a crime, has tracked definitely to the accused, is admissible to show that the accused was the doer of the criminal act.[3]

§ 177. [1] For animal's conduct as evidencing the character or disposition of the animal, see post, § 201.

[2] Circa 1530, More's "Life of Sir Thomas More", quoted in Campbell's "Lives of the Chancellors", II, 37 (story of the beggar-woman's little dog, who was bought from a thief by the Chancellor's wife; the Chancellor allowed her to prove property by the dog's recognition of her); 1800, Anon., in Twiss' Life of Lord Eldon, I, 354 (quoted post, § 1154); 1888, State v. Ward, 61 Vt. 185, 17 Atl. 483 (where a complicated set of turnings on different roads must have been followed by the incendiary, evidence was admitted that the defendant's horse shortly after took the same turning without guidance); 1894, Chicago Herald, May 31 (a German saloonkeeper in Chicago lost his parrot; in the possession of an American saloonkeeper a similar parrot was found; the ownership of this parrot was claimed by both parties, each affirming that he had possessed and trained the parrot for a long time, and that the parrot would show the effect of this training in his language; at the trial before Justice of the Peace Eberhardt, the parrot would not speak; he was therefore committed temporarily to the custody of a police-captain; "Captain Barcel will keep the bird in custody, and will keep his ears strained to catch either 'Set 'em up again', or 'Unser bier ist gut' "); 1900, Boston Transcript, Dec. 12 (in East Orange, N. J.; the larceny of a carrier pigeon by B. from E. was charged; the defendant claiming to be owner, the pigeon was released, and alighted later in E.'s barn); 1907, State v. Hunter, 143 N. C. 607, 56 S. E. 547 (Chief Justice Clark reminds us of "the classical incident of Ulysses, on his return from his memorable wanderings, being recognized by his dog Argos (who died from joy), when his family and his followers knew him not", and "the more modern incident of Aubry's dog of Montargis, who procured the confession of his master's murderer by his recognition of him").

Compare the following: 1905, Miller v. Terr., 9 Ariz. 123, 80 Pac. 321 (larceny of a colt; testimony from stockmen who had observed the animal's conduct that "the colt belonged to a certain mare which it had been following", admitted).

Compare the unsound ruling in State v. Landry, 29 Mont. 218, 74 Pac. 418 (1903), cited post, § 1163, n. 6.

[3] Alabama: 1890, Simpson v. State, 111 Ala. 6, 20 So. 572, semble (that bloodhounds had tracked the defendant from the place of the crime, admitted, the dog's habit being never to leave a human track once scented); 1892, Hodge v. State, 98 Ala. 10, 11, 13 So. 385 (murder; that a trained dog had followed the trail to the defendant's house, admitted, on the facts); 1905, Little v. State, 145 Ala. 662, 39 So. 674

Nevertheless, in actual usage, this evidence is apt to be highly misleading, to the danger of innocent men. Amidst the popular excitement attendant upon a murder and the chase of the suspect, all the facts upon which the trustworthiness of the inference rests are apt to be distorted in the testimony. Moreover, the very limited nature of the inference possible is apt to be overestimated, — a consequence dangerous when the jurors are moved by local

(the animal must be shown to have been trained to track human beings and to be able to do so accurately); 1906, Richardson v. State, 145 Ala. 46, 41 So. 82 (tracing by hounds; admitted); 1906, Hargrove v. State, 147 Ala. 97, 41 So. 972 (burglary; trailing of accused by bloodhounds, shown to be trained to the purpose, admitted); 1909, McDonald v. State, 165 Ala. 85, 51 So. 629 (admitted; here the uncertainty of the evidence was exhibited by the dogs' trailing of two different persons); Arkansas: 1916, Padgett v. State, 125 Ark. 471, 188 S. W. 1158 (assault; bloodhound evidence admitted); 1921, West v. State, 150 Ark. 555, 234 S. W. 997 (rape; tracing by trained dog, admitted); Florida: 1903, Davis v. State, 46 Fla. 137, 35 So. 76 (burglary; trailing by dogs is admissible, on certain conditions indicating "that reliance may reasonably be placed upon the accuracy of the trailing"); 1904, Davis v. State, 47 Fla. 26, 36 So. 170 (former opinion applied); Georgia: 1915, Fite v. State, 16 Ga. App. 22, 84 S. E. 485 (bloodhound trailing, held admissible, under strict conditions specified); 1915, Aiken v. State, 16 Ga. App. 848, 86 S. E. 1076 (burglary; as to bloodhound evidence, "we adopt the rule laid down in Pedigo's Case", Ky., infra); Illinois: 1914, People v. Pfanschmidt, 262 Ill. 411, 104 N. E. 804 (murder and arson, trailing by a bloodhound, by means of a horse-and-buggy scent, to the accused's camp, held not admissible, partly because the conditions here were too full of obstacles to make the trailing trustworthy, and also on the ground that "the trailing of either a man or an animal by a bloodhound should never be admitted in any case"); Indiana: 1910, Stout v. State, 174 Ind. 395, 92 N. E. 161 (trailing of another person than the accused; the present question not decided); 1917, Ruse v. State, 186 Ind. 237, 115 N. E. 778 (crime unspecified: the trailing by bloodhounds was held inadmissible; Sairy, C. J., and Myers, J., diss.); Iowa: 1904, McClurg v. Brenton, 123 Ia. 368, 98 N. W. 881 (where the defendant had trespassed on the plaintiff's premises, looking for stolen fowls, and led by bloodhounds, the Court disparaged such methods); Kansas: 1911, State v. Adams, 85 Kan. 435, 116 Pac. 608 (murder; tracking of accused by bloodhounds, held allowable, on a showing that the dogs are qualified by breed and training, and that "the person testifying is reliable"); 1914, State v. Mooney, 93 Kan. 353, 144 Pac. 228 (State v. Adams, followed); 1917, State v. Sweet, 101 Kan. 746, 168 Pac. 1112 (murder; "bloodhound evidence" admitted pursuant to the limitations of State v. Adams and State v. Mooney, supra); Kentucky: 1898, Pedigo v. Com., 103 Ky. 41, 44 S. W. 143 (admitted; DuRelle, J.: "It is difficult to lay down a general rule as to the introduction of testimony of this kind. . . . We think it may be safely laid down that, in order to make such testimony competent, even when it is shown that the dog is of pure blood, and of a stock characterized by acuteness of scent and power of discrimination, it must also be established that the dog in question is possessed of these qualities, and has been trained or tested in their exercise in the tracking of human beings, and that these facts must appear from the testimony of some person who has personal knowledge thereof. We think it must also appear that the dog so trained and tested was laid on the trail, whether visible or not, concerning which testimony has been admitted, at a point where the circumstances tend clearly to show that the guilty party had been, or upon a track which such circumstances indicated to have been made by him"; Guffy, J., diss., in an able opinion); 1904, Allen v. Com., — Ky. —, 82 S. W. 589 (rule of Pedigo v. Com. applied to exclude such evidence where the dog's qualities were not sufficiently shown); 1905, Denham v. Com., 119 Ky. 508, 84 S. W. 538 (Pedigo v. Com. followed); 1909, Sprouse v. Com., 132 Ky. 269, 116 S. W. 344 (trailing by hounds from a burned house to defendant's house; excluded, partly because the skill of the hounds was not sufficiently shown, and partly because due precautions for accuracy were not taken); 1916, Blair v. Com., 171 Ky. 319, 188 S. W. 390 (Pedigo v. Com. rule applied, here excluding the evidence); 1922, Meyers v. Com., — Ky. —, 240 S. W. 71 (arson; applying the rule of Pedigo v. Com., supra, but announcing that bloodhound evidence alone "would be insufficient to convict", i.e. to identify the accused; it seems odd that any court could deliberate one moment over such a preposterous assertion as the contrary); Louisiana: 1919, State v. King, 144 La. 430, 80 So. 615 (murder, bloodhound evidence admitted, on conditions showing reliability of the animal); Minnesota: 1921, Crosby v. Moriarty, 148 Minn. 201, 181 N. W. 199 (action for arson; conduct of bloodhounds in tracing the perpetrator, excluded on the facts); Missouri: 1912, State v. Rasco, 239 Mo. 535, 144 S. W. 449 (murder; trailing by bloodhounds, allowed on the testimony to prejudice.[4] Hence Courts do well to insist on the strictest fulfilment of the above conditions of admissibility; and additional requirements are sometimes made. The hesitation shown in some Courts to the use of this evidence is due to the risks of its misuse by the jury; for in some regions of our country the mysteriously accurate operation of the dogs' senses has given rise to a superstitious faith in the dogs' inerrant inspiration, and this gross popular creed might in a jury mislead them into giving excessive credit to the evidence of the dogs' itinerary.

their habits and skill); Nebraska: 1903, Brott v. State, 70 Nebr. 395, 97 N. W. 593 (behavior of bloodhounds in trailing the defendant, held inadmissible on the facts; Sullivan, C. J.: "That the bloodhound is frequently wrong is a fact well attested by experience. . . . It is unsafe evidence, and both reason and instinct condemn it"); North Carolina: 1901, State v. Moore, 129 N. C. 494, 39 S. E. 626 (that a bloodhound trailed and pointed out the defendants, charged with larceny of meat and other things, was held inadmissible on the facts, without denying that it might be a "circumstance to be considered in connecting a person with an act"); 1907, State v. Hunter, 143 N. C. 607, 56 S. E. 547 (arson; trailing by a trained bloodhound, admitted); 1908, State v. Freeman, 146 N. C. 615, 60 S. E. 986 (burglary; a dog's trailing of the defendant, by shoe-scent, admitted); 1919, State v. Yearwood, 178 N. C. 813, 101 S. E. 513 (arson; trail by bloodhounds, admitted, after proof of their training and reputation); 1921, State v. Robinson, 181 N. C. 516, 106 S. E. 155 (assault; conduct of bloodhounds, admitted on the facts); Ohio: 1907, State v. Dickerson, 77 Oh. 34, 82 N. E. 969 (trailing of a murderer by a bloodhound held admissible, provided that the particular dog was trained in tracking human beings and had in experience been found reliable, this reliability being testified to from personal knowledge, and that the dog had been laid on the trail at a point or track clearly indicated as the guilty party's; the pedigree, etc., of the dog to be admissible in corroboration); South Carolina: 1916, State v. Brown, 103 S. C. 437, 88 S. E. 21 (arson; bloodhound evidence sanctioned, because Crim. Code § 945 authorizes the use of dogs for tracking lawbreakers; here held inadmissible because the dogs were not set on the track within the period of efficiency); Texas: 1904, Parker v. State, 46 Tex. Cr. 461, 80 S. W. 1008 (bloodhound's tracking of defendant admitted; rule of Pedigo v. Com., Ky., approved).

[4] The limitations are well stated by Mr. E. Austin Freeman, in one of the detective stories in his volume entitled "The Singing Bone" (London, 1914). This story, entitled "A Case of Premeditation", is quoted in part in the Illinois Law Review, IX, 192.

TITLE I (continued): CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE

SUB-TITLE II: EVIDENCE TO PROVE A HUMAN QUALITY OR CONDITION

CHAPTER IX.

§ 190. Nature of this Class of Evidence. 1. The reasons for dividing into three groups the whole subject of Circumstantial Evidence have been already stated (ante, § 43). The groups being distinguished according to the propositions to be proved, the second group is now to be considered, namely, Evidence to prove a Human Quality, Condition, or other attribute.

This group of propositions (facta probanda) separates itself from the first (Human Acts) with fair distinctness, first, because the circumstances available as evidence are usually distinct for the two groups, but chiefly because certain general considerations of Auxiliary Policy, as well as of Relevancy, run through the present group, constantly reappearing, and not only making various analogies useful, but rendering it impossible to understand the rules of Evidence for certain kinds of propositions without considering those for others. The distinction between the two groups is by no means an artificial one, but is fully in harmony with the attitude of the Courts towards the problems involved.

2. The various conceivable propositions to be proved may be reduced to the following well-defined sorts:

Moral Character or Disposition;	Motive or Emotion;
Physical and Mental Capacity;	Habit or Custom, and Possession;
Design or Plan, and Intent;	Traits of Handwriting;
Knowledge, Belief, or Consciousness;	Identity.

A different analysis and order of treatment is conceivable; but with reference to the usefulness of putting in proximity those matters which throw light upon each other, this division and this order seem the most practical.[1]

3. It will be understood that we are here not concerned how the above human qualities come to be propositions for proof (ante, § 2). We are concerned only to learn what facts will be admissible evidentially to prove the quality proposed for proof. For instance, Character may be in issue through the pleadings in a suit for slander on a plea of justification, or in an action for personal injury as an element of the defendant's liability for an incompetent servant; or it may be used, not as in issue under the pleadings, but as evidential, to prove a human act, for example, the good character of a defendant in a criminal case or his bad character in rebuttal. So, also, Knowledge may be in issue in a suit to set aside a purchase in fraud of creditors, or it may be evidential only, as when it is offered to prove the doing of a past act as a mark of identity (post, § 270). In all these instances the quality which is termed Character, Knowledge, or the like, has somehow come into the case as a proposition to be proved; and the question how to evidence it presents itself equally whether the 'factum probandum', when once proved, is going in turn to be used itself evidentially to show some other fact, or is one of the very ultimate propositions made material by the pleadings. It is true that by tradition or by policy the mode of proof available in the one case may sometimes not be available in the other; but this is only an incidental and not a necessary or common feature.

§ 190. [1] From the point of view of logic and psychology as applicable to argument before the jury (not the rules of Admissibility), see the materials collected in the present author's "Principles of Judicial Proof, as given by Logic, Psychology, and General Experience, and illustrated in Judicial Trials" (1913), §§ 28, 84–98.

4. Three species of evidential facts are available to show a human quality or condition:

(1) Conduct; this is the expression, in outward behavior, of the quality or condition operating to produce those effects. These results are the traces by which we may infer the moving cause. In point of time, conduct is closely associated with the internal condition giving rise to it; nevertheless, the indication is strictly not a concomitant, but a retrospectant one (ante, § 43), because the argument is backwards from effect (conduct) to cause (internal condition).

(2) External facts (prospectant) pointing forward to the probable coming into existence of the quality; for example, the victim's gold, as pointing forward to the defendant's probable desire to rob him, or the reputation of A's insolvency, as pointing forward to B's probable receipt of knowledge of it. In using this evidence, we take our stand beforehand and argue that the evidential fact probably gave rise to the emotion, knowledge, or intent to be proved. The indication is thus prospectant; while that of conduct is retrospectant.

(3) There is also a third sort of fact, having either a prospectant or a retrospectant indication, and not exactly corresponding to either of the preceding sorts, namely, prior or subsequent condition, as showing condition at a given time. Thus, to prove insanity, we may offer (1) conduct as the effect illustrating its cause, mental aberration, (2) circumstances of unsuccessful business, domestic troubles, and the like, tending to bring on insanity; and (3) prior or subsequent insanity, pointing forwards or backwards to insanity at the time in question. So also, to show a husband's desire or motive to get rid of his wife, we may offer (1) his conduct exhibiting such a desire, (2) the existence of a paramour, tending to create such a desire, and (3) a prior desire, as pointing forward to its continued existence at the time in question. A similar general question presents itself in all evidence of this third sort, namely, how far before or after the time in question the survey may extend in considering the fact of prior or subsequent condition.

For some subjects, all three of these sorts of evidence are available, perhaps with equal frequency; for others only one or two of them are available, at least usually; thus, to evidence character, facts of the second sort do not come into play at all, — unless the principles of heredity one day become so clearly ascertainable as to offer a sure basis of argument from ancestry. It is enough to note that in taking up the different 'facta probanda' a convenient order of arrangement of the evidential facts may be based on this triple division.

5. The distinction between a pure principle of Relevancy and a doctrine of Auxiliary Policy (expounded ante, § 42) is in the present subject of constant importance. Our first question, for any kind of evidence, must be, Is it Relevant, i.e. has it probative value enough to be considered? But even when it is relevant and would so far be admissible, it may still be shut out by some auxiliary policy forbidding confusion of issues, undue prejudice, or unfair surprise (post, § 1904). It is practically necessary to treat in one place the two sets of considerations, Relevancy and Auxiliary Policy, as applied to the same piece of evidence; but it must not be forgotten that the two are entirely distinct in function.

Topic I: EVIDENCE TO PROVE CHARACTER OR DISPOSITION

§ 191. Kinds of Evidence. It is here assumed that Moral Character or Disposition is somehow in the case to be proved, — either as material under the pleadings or as evidential to prove something else (ante, § 54). The question then here arises, What evidential facts may be used to prove it?

Of the three sorts of facts just described, the second sort (prospectant) is here wholly unavailable; there is no external fact from which we can argue forward that a person will have a certain character. Heredity, as a biological indication that an ancestor's trait will recur in a descendant, is as yet not accepted by science in any details available for judicial proof (ante, § 165). Only in the case of insanity (post, § 231), longevity (post, § 223), and of a few marked physiological traits (ante, §§ 166, 167), has such a use of heredity been given recognition. No doubt in juvenile court practice the family record is studied by the judge, but hardly for mere evidential purposes. Some day in this field a body of data will be accumulated from which evidential principles may be drawn.

The third sort of fact, prior or subsequent character, as indicating character at the time in question, is undoubtedly available evidence; but its use is so complicated with the question of using Reputation (under the Hearsay exception) at a prior or subsequent time, that both subjects can best be examined together; accordingly the use of prior or subsequent character, to evidence character at the time in question, is there dealt with (post, § 1617).

The material here to be considered, therefore, is the first sort of evidence, i.e. conduct, — the sort by far the commonest and the only one that raises questions of serious difficulty. Under what condition, then, is conduct admissible to evidence Character?

1. Conduct to show Character of a Defendant in a Criminal Case

§ 192. Nature of the Inference; an Act is not evidential of another Act. At the outset of this entire prospectant class of inferences, it must be noted that, where the doing of an act is the proposition to be proved, there can never be a direct inference from an act of former conduct to the act charged; there must always be a double step of inference of some sort, a 'tertium quid.' In other words, it cannot be argued: "Because A did an act X last year, therefore he probably did the act X as now charged." Human action being infinitely varied, there is no adequate probative connection between the two. A may do the act once, and may never do it again; and not only may he not do it again, but it is in no degree probable that he will do it again. The conceivable contingencies that may intervene are too numerous.

Thus, whenever resort is had to a person's past conduct or acts as the basis of inference to a subsequent act, it must always be done intermediately through another inference. It may be argued: "A once committed a robbery; (1) therefore he probably has a thieving disposition; (2) therefore he probably committed this robbery"; or "(1) therefore he had some general design to commit certain robberies; (2) therefore he probably carried out that design and committed this robbery." Or it may be argued: "A gave money to his poor friend B; (1) therefore A probably is of a benevolent disposition; (2) therefore A probably did not commit the present robbery"; or "(1) therefore he probably had a kindly feeling towards B; (2) therefore he probably did not rob B." The impulse to argue from A's former bad deed or good deed directly to his doing or not doing of the bad deed charged is perhaps a natural one; but it will always be found, upon analysis of the process of reasoning, that there is involved in it a hidden intermediary step of some sort, resting on a second inference of character, motive, plan, or the like. This intermediate step is always implicit, and must be brought out.

The result is that, when the ultimate proposition to be proved is the doing of an act by a defendant, and resort is had evidentially to his past conduct, this is not in order to argue directly from act to act, but in order, by the past act, to evidence character, design, motive, or some other quality, and through that quality to infer that it led to the act charged. To make available such evidence of past conduct or acts, some use for it must be found as evidencing Character either Character (as here), or else Design, Motive, Intent, or some other quality (post, §§ 300–371).

This principle has long been accepted in our law. That "the doing of one act is in itself no evidence that the same or a like act was again done by the same person", has been so often judicially repeated that it is a commonplace:

1872, AGNEW, J., in Shaffner v. Com., 72 Pa. 65: "It is a general rule that a distinct crime, unconnected with that laid in the indictment, cannot be given in evidence against a prisoner. . . . Logically the commission of an independent offence is not proof in itself of the commission of another crime."

1893, KNOWLTON, J., in Miller v. Curtis, 158 Mass. 127, 129: "That a person has committed one crime has no direct tendency to show that he committed another similar crime which had no connection with the first."

1896, MARTIN, J., in People v. McLaughlin, 150 N. Y. 365, 386, 44 N. E. 1017: "It is an elementary principle that the commission of one crime is not admissible in evidence to establish the guilt of a party of another."

§ 193. Particular Bad Acts to show the Defendant's Character; (1) Relevancy. It has already been seen (ante, § 58) that if a defendant in a criminal case chooses to offer his good character (for the appropriate trait) as an argument that he probably did not commit the offence charged, the prosecution may by counter-evidence dispute the existence in him of the good character thus alleged; and it has also been seen that the fact thus to be proved or disproved is the real disposition or Character, of which reputation or anything else is merely evidence (ante, § 52).

The question thus arises how the Character is to be proved or disproved. It has been noted (ante, §§ 52, 53) that there are three conceivable ways of evidencing it: (1) Reputation of the community; this is open to the objection of being Hearsay, and is dealt with post, § 1608; (2) Personal Knowledge or Opinion of those who know the defendant; this is open to the objection of the Opinion rule, and is dealt with post, § 1980; (3) Particular Acts of Misconduct, exhibiting the particular trait involved. This last sort of evidence is now to be considered.

The law here declares a general and absolute rule of exclusion. It is forbidden, in showing that the defendant has not the good character which he affirms, to resort to particular acts of misconduct by him.

Is this prohibition based on the Irrelevancy of such evidence, or on some reason of Auxiliary Policy (ante, § 42) which assumes its relevancy but sees reasons of policy for its exclusion? That such former misconduct is relevant, i.e. has probative value to persuade us of the general trait or disposition, cannot be doubted. The assumption of its probative value is made throughout the judicial opinions on this subject;[1] and the following acute analysis makes it entirely clear:

> 1876, State v. Lapage, 57 N. H. 275, 299; on a charge of murder committed in an attempt to rape, the fact of the defendant's recent rape of another person was offered, Mr. Norris arguing for the defence: "Making no point of remoteness in time or space, let us see how well this evidence will bear analyzing. Premise to be proved: he committed a rape, in no way, except in kind, connected with this crime. Inference: a general disposition to commit this kind of offence. Next premise: this general disposition in him. Inference: he committed this particular offence. . . . It may be tried by the common test of the validity of arguments. Some men who commit a single crime have, or thereby acquire, a tendency to commit the same kind of crimes; if this man committed the rape, he might therefore have or thereby acquire a tendency to commit other rapes; if he had or so acquired such a tendency, and if another rape was committed within his reach, he might therefore be more likely to be guilty; if more likely to be guilty of rape, and if there was murder committed in perpetrating or attempting to perpetrate rape, he might therefore be more likely to be guilty of this rape, and hence of this murder; a sort of an 'ex-parte' conviction of a single rape, from which the jury are to find a general disposition to that kind of crimes, in order to help them out in presuming the commission of another rape as a mo-

§ 193. [1] For example, in the quotations in the next section, and also in the following: 1851, R. v. Shrimpton, 2 Den. Cr. C. 322 (Campbell, L. C. J.: "The question in issue is the good character of the prisoner; surely, whether the prisoner had been previously convicted is relevant to that"; Alderson, B.: "The prisoner raises the question of character, and the evidence of his former conviction is brought to show what his character really is").

For the psychological aspects of conduct as evidencing character, in point of probative value and irrespective of the rules of Evidence, see the present author's "Principles of Judicial Proof" (1913), §§ 84–98.

tive or occasion of the murder. We can find nothing like it in the books." LADD, J.: "But it is nevertheless argued on behalf of the State (if I have not wholly misapprehended the drift of the argument) that the evidence was admitted because, as matter of fact, its natural tendency was to produce conviction in the mind that the prisoner committed rape upon his victim at the time he took her life. . . . I shall not undertake to deny this. If I know a man has broken into my house and stolen my goods, I am for that reason more ready to believe him guilty of breaking into my neighbor's house and committing the same crime there. We do not trust our property with a notorious thief. We cannot help suspecting a man of evil life and infamous character sooner than one who is known to be free from every taint of dishonesty or crime. We naturally recoil with fear and loathing from a known murderer, and watch his conduct as we would the motions of a beast of prey. When the community is startled by the commission of some great crime, our first search for the perpetrator is naturally directed, not among those who have hitherto lived blameless lives, but among those whose conduct has been such as to create the belief that they have the depravity of heart to do the deed. This is human nature — the teaching of human experience. If it were the law, that everything which has a natural tendency to lead the mind towards a conclusion that a person charged with crime is guilty must be admitted in evidence against him on the trial of that charge, the argument for the State would doubtless be hard to answer. If I know a man has once been false, I cannot after that believe in his truth as I did before. If I know he has committed the crime of perjury once, I more readily believe he will commit the same awful crime again, and I cannot accord the same trust and confidence to his statements under oath that I otherwise should. . . . Suppose the general character of one charged with crime is infamous and degraded to the last degree; that his life has been nothing but a succession of crimes of the most atrocious and revolting sort: does not the knowledge of all this inevitably carry the mind in the direction of a conclusion that he has added the particular crime for which he is being tried to the list of those who have gone before? Why, then, should not the prosecutor be permitted to show facts which tend so naturally to produce a conviction of his guilt? The answer to all these questions is plain and decisive: The law is otherwise."

In the Continental traditions of criminal trials, this class of evidence is given great consideration, and is freely used. The following passages illustrate the part it plays at a trial:

French Trials. (1) Trial for the Murder of the Baroness de Valley. (1896, Paris; Albert Bataille, "Causes Criminelles et Mondaines", 1896, p. 249.) [On June 16, 1896, Baroness de Valley was found strangled in her apartment in Paris. She was rich, and made a business of lending her money at usurious rates. Robbery was the object of her murderers. A party of several young fellows, Kiesgen, Ferrand, Lagueny and Truel, were charged with the murder. One of them, Kiesgen, son of a merchant, appeared well dressed and well brought up; he had no occupation and his father furnished him with pocket-money. The others were of not so respectable surroundings. Presiding Judge POUPARDIN thus conducted the opening examination at the trial, on November 24.]

JUDGE. "None of you have a criminal record; but that is far from saying that you have a good record.

"You, Kiesgen, seem to have a mode of life not at all creditable. You frequent the low saloons of the Latin Quarter. You were an habitué of the Harcourt Café. You have been getting all the money you could from women. Your mistress, Jeanne Prevost, alias Margot, gave you 15 francs a day from her earnings as a prostitute. You are a panderer of the worst sort. In your cell at Mazas Prison, you kept writing to Margot, asking her to send you cash. Unfortunately for you, she was at that time herself in St. Lazare Prison (Laughter in the audience).

"As for you, Truel, alias Julian, alias Curlyhead, you are the son of a mechanical draftsman at Charenton. After having a job as apprentice-draftsman in a factory, you were discharged for a brutal assault. After that you lived off your mother, . . . Then you became an habitué, like Kiesgen, of the saloons and women of the Latin Quarter. You seem to have been one of a gang of bicycle thieves. In short, after starting as an honest workingman, you gave up that pursuit, and became an agent for houses of ill-fame. You see what you have been brought to by bad company.

"You, Lagueny, like your fellow-defendants, are scarcely twenty years old. You are the natural son of an unfortunate woman who died insane, two years ago, at the St. Anne Asylum. During all your boyhood you were left by her to loaf on the streets. You picked up a living by hawking things now and then; selling newspapers, sometimes dogs, sometimes peddling olives at restaurant-doors; sleeping in the public refuges. At twelve years of age, a charitable society had you baptized in the Sacred Heart Church at Montmartre, and next day you partook of your first communion. Your mother seems to have done some questionable errands for Baroness Valley, and told you that the Baroness was your godmother. You, ever since you became a young man, have been an agent for the assignations of girls in the Latin Quarter. That was where you made the acquaintance of Kiesgen and of Julien the Curlyhead. To them you made the proposal to go and rob the Baroness. She had always showed a kind interest in you; she used to give you odd change."

Lagueny. "Gave me money? Well, I guess not! The old skinflint! She would even pick up old crusts of bread in the street."

JUDGE. "Well, at any rate, your mother used to be her housekeeper, and the Baroness sometimes gave you a lunch."

. . . . . .

[Then the evidence directly to the crime was put in.

Nov. 25. The jury found three of the defendants guilty. But in view of the youth and lack of a criminal record for Kiesgen and Truel (the two who did the actual killing), they recommended those two for leniency. Both were sentenced to hard labor for life. . . .

Lagueny, who had proposed the robbery, was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment, Ferrand to five years, and Durlin was acquitted.]

. . . . . .

(2) Trial for Blackmailing Max Lebaudy. (1896, Paris; Albert Bataille, "Causes Criminelles et Mondaines", 1896, p. 95.) [Max Lebaudy was a young millionaire, foolish and extravagant. About the years 1894–5, he became the prey of a number of blackmailers, some of them journalists, some ex-military men, some mere adventurers. Several different widespread intrigues against him were unearthed. He was bled for various sums, — fr. 30,000; 10,000; 40,000; etc. Various well-known personages, political, literary, and dramatic, more or less innocent, were more or less involved in the scandals.

On March 30, 1896, the trial began, under Presiding Judge PLANTEAU.]

Examination of Viscount Ulrich de Civry.

JUDGE. "You took part in the war of 1870, and I am bound to say that you behaved very creditably. Leaving the army in 1873, with the rank of cavalry quartermaster, you went back to journalism, and were at last accounts chief editor of the Army Echo. You also went into politics; and were candidate for the Assembly at Yvonne in 1893.

"But I am obliged to remind you that you have a record in the criminal court. In 1876, the Paris Court of Appeals sentenced you to one year's imprisonment for illegally wearing military uniform. In 1880, the same Court sentenced you to two months for unlawful eloignment of goods under attachment."

Civry. "My counsel will explain about those convictions."

JUDGE. "But those are not all. You were convicted by default, in 1877, at the Seine Assize Court, of robbery, and were sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment with hard labor. They had to extradite you from England, and the penalty was commuted to three years. But the judgment was set aside on technical grounds; you had a new trial at Melun, and the public prosecutor withdrew his charge, and you were of course acquitted.

"To get the money for your legal expenses, you had borrowed large sums, through several notaries. One of these notaries has himself just been convicted at the Seine Assize Court. The sums you thus borrowed amounted in notes for more than fr. 1,000,000, nominally, though you yourself received only some fr. 500,000."

[The judge then entered into details of the Hennion case, reading from the records. Hennion was a young man of means from the provinces, who had become entangled in the usurers' and speculators' clutches by the medium of Viscount Civry, and the Viscount had narrowly escaped another criminal sentence.]

JUDGE. "The judgment of the Court there said: 'Hennion's ruin was obviously due to the machinations of unscrupulous adventurers, among whom figured Ulrich de Civry. Unfortunately, the Penal Code does not reach all forms of dishonesty.'

"Well, in spite of these unsavory incidents in your past, you maintained something of a position in a certain section of Parisian society. When you left your regiment in 1891, you were adjutant. What is your business now?"

Civry. "Horse-trading."

JUDGE. "That is not a business. It is reported that you do not do much of anything, and are living as a parasite off other persons. You spent two years in Normandy with an old chum from your regiment, Mr. Davout, but he finally gave you to understand, in correct but unmistakable manner, that you had reached the limits of his hospitality. You then came back to live in Paris, where you ran up debts, even with the house-porter."

Civry. "That was for my room-breakfasts. And I did not have time to pay him; they arrested me too soon." (Laughter in the audience).

[On March 26, the verdict and judgment were rendered.

Joseph de Civry, Georges de Labruyère, Chiarosolo, Rosenthal, and Carle des Perrières were acquitted.

Ulrich de Civry and Cesti were found guilty, and sentenced to thirteen months in jail and 500 francs fine.]

§ 194. Same: (2) Reasons of Policy. It may almost be said that it is because of this indubitable Relevancy of such evidence that it is excluded. It is objectionable, not because it has no appreciable probative value, but because it has too much. The natural and inevitable tendency of the tribunal — whether judge or jury — is to give excessive weight to the vicious record of crime thus exhibited, and either to allow it to bear too strongly on the present charge, or to take the proof of it as justifying a condemnation irrespective of guilt of the present charge. Moreover, the use of alleged particular acts ranging over the entire period of the defendant's life makes it impossible for him to be prepared to refute the charges, any or all of which may be mere fabrications. These reasons of Auxiliary Policy (post, § 1863), directed to prevent the risks of reaching verdicts through insufficient evidence, have operated to exclude that which is in itself relevant.

In early practice this class of evidence was resorted to without limitation.[1]

§ 194. [1] It is clear that before 1670–1680 the accused's prior record of misconduct could be considered: 1669, Hawkins' Trial, 6 How. St. Tr. 921, 935, 949 (larceny; details of a larceny from another person at another time, allowed to be given; L. C. B. Hale: "This, if true, would render the prisoner now at the bar obnoxious to any jury"); 1684, Hampden's Trial, cited post (the judge, in excluding such evidence invokes a "case lately adjudged in this court"). The case of Faulconer (1653; 5 How. St. Tr. 323, 354), which Sir J. Stephen has cited (Hist. Cr. Law, I, 368) as an early instance of such evidence, is hardly in point;

But for more than two centuries, ever since the liberal reaction which began with the Restoration of the Stuarts, this policy of exclusion, in one or another of its reasonings, has received judicial sanction, more emphatic with time and experience. It represents a revolution in the theory of criminal trials, and is one of the peculiar features, of vast moment, which distinguishes the Anglo-American from the Continental system of Evidence:[2]

1684, WITHINS, J., in Hampden's Trial, 9 How. St. Tr. 1053, 1103: "You know the case lately adjudged in this Court; a person was indicted of forgery, we would not let them give evidence of any other forgeries but that for which he was indicted, because we would not suffer any raking into men's course of life to pick up evidence that they cannot be prepared to answer to."

1692, HOLT, L. C. J., in Harrison's Trial, 12 How. St. Tr. 833, 864, 874 (charge of murder; a witness was called to speak of some felonious conduct of the defendant three years before): "Hold, hold, what are you doing now? Are you going to arraign his whole life? How can he defend himself from charges of which he has no notice? And how many issues are to be raised to perplex me and the jury? Away, away! That ought not to be; that is nothing to the matter."

1847, PARKE, B., in Att'y-Gen'l v. Hitchcock, 1 Ex. 93: "We cannot enter into a collateral question as to the man's having committed a crime on some former occasion, one reason being that it would lead to complicated issues and long inquiries; and another, that a party cannot be expected to be prepared to defend the whole of the actions of his life."

1851, R. v. Oddy, 2 Den. Cr. C. 264, CAMPBELL, L. C. J.: "The moral weight of such evidence in any individual case would no doubt be great. But the law is a system of general rules; and it does not admit such evidence, because of the inconvenience which would result from it." Mr. Pickering, for the prosecution: "But in several analogous cases the law does admit such evidence, notwithstanding the inconvenience; and there the inconvenience, which is confessedly the only ground of exclusion, is tolerated in order that justice may not be defeated. The inconvenience is put upon two grounds; first, that of the prisoner being taken by surprise; secondly, of many different issues being raised." CAMPBELL, L. C. J.: "Yes; that is so." Mr. Pickering: "If in such cases [as previous utterings of forgeries to show intent] justice is not permitted to be defeated by the argument drawn from the inconvenience of raising different issues, why should it in the present case?" . . . CAMPBELL, L. C. J.: "It would have been evidence of the prisoner being a bad man, and likely to commit the offences there charged. But the English law does not permit the issue of criminal trials to depend on this species of evidence."

for here the trial was for perjury, and the evidence was offered as "proofs to the credit of Faulconer", i.e., rather looking upon him as a witness to be impeached. Lord Campbell, on the other hand (Lives of the Chief Justices, III, 24), erroneously gives Harrison's Trial, in 1692 (cited post) as the first case of exclusion. But at any rate the older practice died hard and slowly: 1695, R. v. Hains, Comb. 337 ("If the defendant give evidence of a general reputation, it may be answered by particular instances on the other side for the King").

Yet it is odd to find the following anachronistic remark in a judgment of Lord Mansfield, in 1742 (Clark v. Periam, 2 Atk. 339): "If there is a criminal prosecution, and the prisoner in order to strengthen the evidence for his character enters into particular facts to support it, this is called a challenge to the prosecutor, and then he may likewise examine to particular facts."

[2] When Campbell visited Paris, in 1819, and the French lawyers "laughed at our strictness" in excluding hearsay, "I retorted by pointing out the injustice of their practice" in character-evidence (Life of L. C. Campbell, I, 364).

For some examples of French trials, see Stephen's History of the Criminal Law, I, Appendix: Wigmore's Select Cases on the Law of Evidence, 2d ed. 1914, pp. 58–62; and the citations post, § 2251, note 12.

In some of the opinions in R. v. Bond, 1906, 2 K. B. 389, 408, reference is made to the contrasting French principle.

1865, WILLES, J., in R. v. Rouvton, L. & C. 520, 541: "[Evidence of particular acts] is excluded, partly for the reason [irrelevancy] already given, and partly because no notice has been given to the other side that such an inquiry is going to be made. . . . The impossibility of giving such notice with respect to the prisoner's conduct would exclude such evidence, even if it were not excluded by general rules of policy."

1858, Mr. John Norton Pomeroy, arguing in People v. Stout, 4 Park. Cr. 97: "In its administration of criminal jurisprudence, the civil law allows and requires such evidence. It investigates the antecedent character, disposition, habits, associates, business, — in short, the entire history of an accused person, to discover whether it is probable that he would commit the alleged crime. English and American criminal law, in its practical administration, confines itself to the investigation of the very crime charged, and restricts judicial evidence to circumstances directly connected with and necessary to elucidate the issue to be tried. These two systems are diametrically opposed to each other, and whatever may be said of their comparative merits, the rule of the common law is so firmly established that it lies at the very foundation of criminal procedure, as an inseparable element of trial by jury. Trained judicial minds may be able to eliminate from a mass of irrelevant and general criminative facts those which directly bear upon the crime charged against the prisoner; but the very character of juries, and the theory of trial by jury, require that all prejudicial evidence tending to raise in their minds an antipathy to the prisoner, and which does not directly tend to prove the simple issue, should be carefully excluded from them."

1873, ALLEN, J., in Coleman v. State, 55 N. Y. 70: "A person cannot be convicted of one offence upon proof that he committed another, however persuasive in a moral point of view such evidence may be. It would be easier to believe a person guilty of one crime if it was known that he had committed another of a similar character, or indeed of any character. But the injustice of such a rule in courts of justice is apparent. It would lead to convictions upon the particular charge made by proof of other acts in no way connected with it, and to uniting evidence of several offences to produce conviction of a single one."

1882, DEVENS, J., in Com. v. Jackson, 132 Mass. 20: "The objections to the admission of evidence as to other transactions, whether amounting to indictable crimes or not, are very apparent. Such evidence compels the defendant to meet charges of which the indictment gives him no information, confuses him in his defence, raises a variety of issues, and thus diverts the attention of the jury from the one immediately before it; and by showing the defendant to have been a knave on other occasions, creates a prejudice which may cause injustice to be done him."

1887, THAYER, J., in State v. Saunders, 14 Or. 300, 309, 12 Pac. 441: "Place a person on trial upon a criminal charge, and allow the prosecution to show by him that he has before been implicated in similar affairs (no matter what explanation of them he attempts to make), it will be more damaging evidence against him and conduce more to his conviction than direct testimony of his guilt in the particular case. Every lawyer who has had any particular experience in criminal trials knows this, — knows that juries are inclined to act from impulse, and to convict parties accused, upon general principles. An ordinary juror is not liable to care about such a party's guilt or innocence in the particular case, if they think him a scapegrace or vagabond. That is human nature."

1903, Hon. A. C. PLOWDEN, "Grain or Chaff; the Autobiography of a Police Magistrate", c. XI, p. 142: "Another circuit hero carved a niche for himself in the temple of Fame by a splendid disregard of what I might call the ordinary conventions of a criminal court. B— was not remarkable for too much devotion to his profession. . . . On a certain occasion at Gloucester, B— was instructed to prosecute a man for burglary. Now if there is one elementary principle in criminal procedure more widely known and sacredly more observed than another, it is that the antecedents of a prisoner, if unfavorable, should be religiously kept a secret from the jury, until after they have delivered their verdict. . . . Of this sacred rule B— quickly showed, to the consternation of the prisoner, that he was profoundly ignorant. Having touched on the main features of the charge, he proceeded: 'And now, gentlemen, I come to a very important fact. I am sorry to tell you, though it must make your duty easier, that the prisoner has been previously convicted —' The judge who was trying the case — Baron Bramwell — hastily interposed: 'Mr. B —, you must not say that!' 'Oh, but' retorted the unabashed counsel, 'I can prove it, my lord.' 'Mr. B —,' again interposed the learned judge sternly, 'I am amazed at you! I forbid your doing anything of the kind!' Whereupon B—, even more amazed than the judge, exclaimed reproachfully, 'But here they are!' And before he could be stopped, he held up to the jury, amid much laughter from the Bar, a long list of convictions, with the prisoner's photograph at the top; at the same time casting a withering glance of reproof both at the Bench and at the Bar for what he considered had been a most unmeaning interruption. Needless to say that, in spite of an appeal from the learned judge to the jury to disregard these damning proofs, the jury in double quick time returned a verdict of 'Guilty'; and the prisoner had just reason to regret that his fate had been placed in the hands of a counsel who, with all his sporting instincts, had not grasped the truth that a prisoner, however bad, is entitled to have a run for his money."

1921, BRICKEN, P. J., in Dennison v. State, 17 Ala. App. 674, 88 So. 211 (larceny of an automobile): "The rule, which requires that all evidence which is introduced shall be relevant to the guilt or the innocence of the accused, is always applied with considerable strictness in criminal proceedings. The wisdom and justice of this, at least from the defendant's standpoint, are self-evident. The defendant can with fairness be expected to come into court prepared to meet the accusations contained in the indictment only, which in this case was the larceny of the Dodge automobile. On this account, all the evidence offered by the State should consist wholly of facts which were within the range and scope of the allegations contained in the indictment upon which he is being tried. The evidence introduced over the defendant's objection relating to other offenses than that charged in the indictment no doubt alarmed the suspicions of the jury, or at least it may have had that effect, and inclined them the more readily to believe in the guilt of the defendant of the offense charged, and rendered the jury less inclined to listen or give proper weight and consideration to whatever was offered or said in his defense. For it is well known, in fact a matter of common knowledge, that the large majority of persons of average intelligence are untrained in logical methods of thinking, and are therefore prone to draw illogical and incorrect inferences and conclusions without foundation. It is also a matter of common knowledge that from such persons jurors are selected. And like others they will very naturally believe that a person is guilty of the offense with which he is charged if it is proved to their satisfaction that he has committed a similar offense, or any offense of an equally heinous character. So, as before stated, the general rule in this connection forbids the introduction of evidence which will show, or tend to show, that the accused has committed any crime wholly independent of the offense for which he is on trial."[3]

The reasons thus marshalled in various forms are reducible to three: (1) The over-strong tendency to believe the defendant guilty of the charge merely because he is a likely person to do such acts; (2) The tendency to condemn, not because he is believed guilty of the present charge, but because he has escaped unpunished from other offences; both of these represent the principle of Undue Prejudice (post, § 1904);

[3] See also a good opinion by Dodge, J., in Paulson v. State (1903), 118 Wis. 89, 94 N. W. 771.

That the jurors' knowledge of an accused's criminal record would in actual experience, not merely in theory, affect their conclusions, and that the guilty and the innocent are alike affected by this ignorance of the jurors, or by their knowledge if incidentally obtained, may be seen from the instances collected in Mr. Arthur Train's invaluable book, "The Prisoner at the Bar", pp. 155–169 (1906).

(3) The injustice of attacking one necessarily unprepared to demonstrate that the attacking evidence is fabricated; this represents the principle of Unfair Surprise (post, § 1849). It is also said, by some judges, (4) that the Confusion of new Issues is a reason for avoiding such evidence; but this can play but a small and cumulative part, since this reason could be obviated, as it is with witnesses (post, § 979), by excluding extrinsic testimony and allowing proof by a record of prior conviction, or cross-examination, where the defendant waives his privilege by taking the stand; yet these means are never allowed. Thus it seems clear that the doctrine of Confusion of Issues (post, §§ 1863, 1904), while it would operate to the extent of excluding extrinsic testimony, is nevertheless not in itself controlling and does not account for the full scope of the rule. The other reasons are the vital ones.

These reasons, it may be noted, represent general policies and constant quantities in our law of Evidence, and reappear individually in other parts of it.[4] For example, the third — but not the first or the second — reappears in the use of particular misconduct against a witness; but it is there allowed to be satisfied by forbidding extrinsic testimony, while admitting judgments of conviction and cross-examination of the witness himself (post, § 979). Again, the first two reasons apply also, though not in equal strength, to the prosecution's use of general character against a defendant (ante, § 57); and accordingly that is forbidden except where the defendant has himself challenged inquiry into his character. Again, the third reason finds an analogy in the law of criminal pleading, in the rule that on an indictment charging only a single offence the issue must be confined to that offence, and no election is allowed to lay before the jury a number of such offences from which they are to select the one best proved.[5]

Furthermore, it is to be noted, the judicial exposition of these reasons shows the fallacy of supposing, as some do, that the object of the rule is merely to show mercy to the guilty one, to give him a final chance for life and liberty by artificially handicapping the prosecution, — thus importing into courts of justice the notions of sportsmanship. On the contrary, the object is to prevent a person not guilty of the present charge from being improperly found guilty of it. If it be said that nevertheless this is still a spirit of kindness to the guilty, seeking to prevent his being punished now for what he has formerly done, the answer is that we are nevertheless protecting a person who is theoretically innocent of the present charge from being now found guilty of a past crime which he was not aware would be charged against him and which he has no opportunity to show to be fabricated. There is quite enough maudlin pity for criminals in our law in other respects; and we ought not to give sup-

[4] Compare the general principles examined post, §§ 1863, 1904.

[5] See U. S. v. Mitchell, 2 Dall. 348, 357; State v. Bates, 10 Conn. 372, where the similarity of the reasons may be noticed. In these cases of course there is no attempt to argue evidentially from one offence to the other.

port to that tendency by claiming on such grounds the doctrine here involved, — a doctrine which is in truth mainly designed to protect the innocent and not the guilty.

The rule of exclusion thus expounded is so firmly established that it would be held to prevail even in jurisdictions where no express enunciation of it has been made.[6] It is constantly assumed or laid down in the rulings which

[6] The practical bearing of the rule, it is to be noted, is to exclude this class of facts on rebuttal by the prosecution; for the use of bad character in any form is already forbidden to the prosecution until the defendant has opened the subject (ante, § 57);

CANADA: 1888, R. v. Triganzie, 15 Ont. 294, 299 (excluding a prior conviction for a similar crime).

UNITED STATES: Alabama: 1856, Franklin v. State, 29 Ala. 20; 1859, Dupree v. State, 33 Ala. 388 (that the defendant was an escaped convict); 1887, Steele v. State, 83 Ala. 25, 3 So. 547; 1889, Moulton v. State, 88 Ala. 116, 6 So. 758; Morgan v. State, 88 Ala. 224, 6 So. 761; 1895, Murphy v. State, 108 Ala. 10, 18 So. 557 (that the witness, as sheriff, had often had a warrant out against the defendant); California: 1888, People v. Dye, 75 Cal. 108, 112, 16 Pac. 537; 1898, People v. Lynch, 122 Cal. 501, 55 Pac. 248; 1900, People v. Lee Dick Lung, 129 Cal. 491, 62 Pac. 71; Illinois: 1869, McCarty v. People, 51 Ill. 231; 1871, Sutton v. Johnson, 62 Ill. 209; Indiana: 1895, Griffith v. State, 140 Ind. 163, 39 N. E. 440; Iowa: 1887, State v. Sterrett, 71 Ia. 387; 32 N. W. 387; 1890, State v. McGee, 81 Ia. 17, 19, 46 N. W. 764; 1895, State v. Tippet, 94 Ia. 646, 63 N. W. 445; 1905, State v. Thompson, 127 Ia. 440, 103 N. W. 377; Kansas: 1901, State v. Kirby, 62 Kan. 436, 63 Pac. 752; 1918, State v. Smith, 103 Kan. 148, 174 Pac. 551 (murder); Kentucky: 1882, White v. Com., 80 Ky. 485; 1898, Ballowe v. Com., — Ky. —, 44 S. W. 646; Louisiana: 1893, State v. Donelon, 45 La. An. 744, 754, 12 So. 922; 1903, Cook v. State, 111 La. —, 35 So. 665 (but a character for violence when drinking is not within the prohibition of specific acts); Massachusetts: 1807, Com. v. Hardy, 2 Mass. 317 (Parsons, C. J.: "in such case there can be no examination as to particular acts"); 1876, Com. v. O'Brien, 119 Mass. 342 (here, a good character for peace and quiet, attempted to be disproved by showing a conviction for assault); Michigan: 1878, Brownell v. People, 38 Mich. 732, 736; Minnesota: 1921, State v. Nelson, 148 Minn. 285, 181 N. W. 850 (murder); Mississippi: 1890, Kearney v. State, 68 Miss. 233, 238; 8 So. 292; Missouri: 1866, State v. Harrold, 38 Mo. 497; 1882, State v. Turner, 76 Mo. 351; Nebraska: 1881, Olive v. State, 11 Nebr. 1, 27, 7 N. W. 444; 1894, Patterson v. State, 41 Nebr. 538, 59 N. W. 917; 1895, Basye v. State, 45 Nebr. 261, 63 N. W. 811; New Hampshire: 1844, State v. Renton, 15 N. H. 174; New Jersey: 1900, Bullock v. State, 65 N. J. L. 557, 47 Atl. 62; New Mexico: 1904, U. S. v. Densmore, 12 N. M. 99, 75 Pac. 31; New York: 1832, Townsend v. Graves, 3 Paige, Ch. 453, 455; 1835, People v. White, 14 Wend. 113; 1887, People v. Sharp, 107 N. Y. 427, 457, 467, 14 N. E. 319; 1888, People v. Greenwall, 108 N. Y. 301, 15 N. E. 404; 1904, People v. Rodawald, 177 N. Y. 408, 70 N. E. 1 (specific acts excluded, "because each specific act shown would create a new issue"; apparently unsound, because here the record of conviction for assault was offered, and the defendant's knowledge that the deceased had been in the State prison, though not a knowledge of the nature of his crime); 1908, People v. Jones, 191 N. Y. 291, 84 N. E. 61 (former conviction, excluded); 1918, People v. Richardson, 222 N. Y. 103, 118 N. E. 514 (keeping a disorderly house; cited more fully post, § 987); North Carolina: 1822, State v. Twitty, 2 Hawks 248, 258; 1855, Bottoms v. Kent, 3 Jones L. 156; 1877, State v. Laxton, 67 N. C. 218; 1888, State v. Bullard, 100 N. C. 486, 488, 6 S. E. 191 (but confusing the question with that of impeaching a witness' character); Oregon: 1897, State v. Moore, 32 Or. 65, 48 Pac. 468; Rhode Island: 1892, State v. Ellwood, 17 R. I. 763, 766, 24 Atl. 782; South Carolina: 1905, State v. Dean, 72 S. C. 74, 51 S. E. 524 (specific acts of prior violence on others, excluded); 1906, State v. Andrews, 73 S. C. 257, 53 S. E. 423 (specific acts of violence, excluded, unless admissible on the principle of § 248, post); Wisconsin: 1895, Fosdahl v. State, 89 Wis. 482, 62 N. W. 185 (prior convictions).

The only modern instance of a contrary view seems to be the following, which must be regarded as a casual inadvertence: 1840, Story, J., in Bottomley v. U. S., 1 Story 135, 145, 1 Fed. 688 (importation of goods by bribery of the deputy-collector; other false entries were admitted as tending to overcome the "ordinary presumption of law in favor of . . . [the official's] general character being elevated above" such a fraud, so that "he who has the baseness to accept a bribe . . . in one case, withdraws from himself all the sanctity of his official character in other cases of a similar nature").

Compare the distinctions of § 988, post (accused's bad reputed acts, on cross-examination of a witness to good repute).

But as a sign of the times, revealing a willingness to allow inroads on the rule, see expound all the ensuing distinctions arising from the use of conduct to evidence Intent, Plan, or some other fact than Moral Character.

§ 194*a*. Same: Exceptions under English Criminal Evidence Act of 1898. The English Criminal Evidence Act of 1898, in removing the accused's incompetence to testify (post, § 488), made a broad exception, in spirit, to this traditional rule about character. The effect of that statute is that under certain conditions the accused's record of prior penal convictions does get before the jury, and is considered by them as character evidence affirmatively pointing to guilt. The statute does not say that the penal record is to be considered for that purpose, but the statute-makers knew that it would be so considered. Nominally, then, the prior penal record is admitted either to rebut and disprove the testimonial good character of the accused or for some other evidential purpose; but these purposes are supposed to be so limited that safeguards are set against the unlimited use and unsafe misuse of such evidence against an habitual offender.

What are those purposes? The statute (set out in full, post, § 488) thus enumerates them:[1]

§ 1, Sub-section (f): "A person charged and called as a witness in pursuance of this Act shall not be asked, and if asked shall not be required to answer, any question tending to show that he [X] has committed or been convicted of or been charged with any offence other than that wherewith he is then charged, or [Y] is of bad character, unless —

"(i) the proof that he has committed or been convicted of such other offence is admissible evidence to show that he is guilty of the offence wherewith he is then charged; or

"(ii) he has personally or by his advocate [A] asked questions of the witnesses for the prosecution with a view to establish his own good character, or [B] has given evidence of his good character, or [C] the nature or conduct of the defence is such as to involve imputations on the character of the prosecutor or the witnesses for the prosecution; or

"(iii) he has given evidence against any other person charged with the same offence."

Here are five distinct evidential purposes:

(1) The first, that of par. (i), is the ordinary use of other offences to show intent, motive, plan, etc. (post, §§ 300–416). Such evidence would have been admissible in any event; the statute merely avoids any doubt as to the propriety of asking for it from the accused himself.[2]

(2) The second purpose, that of the first clause of par. (ii), clause [A], is the present principle, i.e. the rebuttal of his alleged good character by the fact of former specific bad acts. Here a definite change is made in the prior law, insofar as the accused has taken the stand. The distinction between this and the French rule is that this rule does not permit the use of prior offences the dissenting opinion of McBride, C. J., in State v. Start, 1913, 65 Or. 178, 132 Pac. 512 (cited more fully post, § 360, n. 2).

§ 194*a*. [1] St. 61–2 Vict. c. 36, § 1.

[2] Note that whenever such prior offences are thus relevant, the further objection to asking the accused himself about them, that he is privileged not to criminate himself, is expressly met and removed by sub-section e (quoted post, § 2276, n. 5).

The cases under this section are placed elsewhere under the respective rules of Admissibility which they invoke, chiefly the rule for admitting other offences to evidence Intent, Plan, etc. (post, §§ 318–367).

until and unless the accused invokes an alleged good character. Nevertheless, the jury's use of such evidence is likely go beyond that of mere rebuttal, and to weigh the probability that a prior offender would again offend.

(3) The third purpose, that of the second clause of par. (ii), clause [B], is not a novelty in principle; it enables the prosecution to contradict his witnesses to good reputed character, but by specific bad acts, and not merely by contrary repute.[3] This is effected in American practice by cross-examination of his witnesses to good repute (post, § 988); but the English rule is much broader in scope.

(4) The fourth purpose, that of the third clause of par. (ii), clause [C], is also a novelty in the law; it allows the accused's general character to be impeached by prior bad acts, whenever he raises the issue of the credibility of the prosecution's witnesses as affected by their character. This is already permissible in the United States (post, § 987), but only to affect the accused's character as a witness. The statute's permission is much narrower, in that it applies only when the character of the prosecution's witnesses has been impeached; and is somewhat broader (than in many of the United States), in that it permits any former offence to be inquired about, regardless of the grade of the crime.[4]

[3] The cases construing this part of the statute are as follows: 1851, R. v. Shrimpton, 2 Den. Cr. C. 319, 5 Cox Cr. 387 (under St. 1836, c. 111, quoted post, § 196, n. 1; the phrase "give evidence of his good character" includes testimony of good character obtained from an opposing witness on cross-examination); 1909, Solomon's Case, 2 Cr. App. 80 (evidence as to recent employment is not evidence of character; whether telling the arresting officer, "I am a respectable man", etc., and putting that in evidence, is evidence of character, not decided); 1910, R. v. Ellis, 2 K. B. 747 (meaning of par. (ii) as to "good character", carefully expounded); 1920, The King v. Wood, 2 K. B. 179 (indecent assault; there were two counts, the assaults being on different persons; that of the first count was later in time than that of the second; on trial of the second count, under sect. 1*f*, sub-sect. ii, held that the conviction for an offence later in time was admissible); 1921, The King v. Beecham, 3 K. B. 464 (manslaughter by a motor-car; defendant, taking the stand, on cross-examination answered that he "did not care for driving at a high rate of speed"; prior convictions for driving at excessive speed were then evidenced to discredit him, under sect. 1*f*, sub-sect. ii; held improper; unsound).

[4] The cases construing this part of the statute are as follows: Eng. 1904, R. v. Rouse, 1 K. B. 184, 20 Cox Cr. 592 (false pretences; the accused, on cross-examination, answered alleging the prosecutor to be a liar; further cross-questions as to the accused being convicted of drunkenness, etc., were held improper; but the Chief Justice added that "we are not laying down any general rule"); 1905, R. v. Bridgwater, 1 K. B. 131, 20 Cox Cr. 737 (on a charge of stealing, cross-examination to a prior conviction was held not justified, on the facts, by the clause as to "imputations on the character of the witnesses for the prosecution"); 1909, Preston's Case, 2 Cr. App. 24, 1 K. B. 568 (cross-examination to previous convictions, not allowed where the defendant's testimony discredited the prosecution's witnesses only in regard to the trustworthiness of an identification); 1909, Stratton's Case, 3 Cr. App. 255 (answer by the accused, referring to a prosecutor: "Then you say he is not telling the truth? — He is not", does not justify cross-examination to character; L. C. J. Alverstone: "There could have been no unfairer instance of cross-examination"); 1909, Grout's Case, 3 Cr. App. 64 (defendant's asserting that the constable is "telling lies", held not to entitle prosecution to cross-examination to previous convictions); 1909, Jones' Case, 3 Cr. App. 67 (rape on defendant's daughter; defendant's assertion that his wife induced the children to trump up the story, held on the facts to entitle prosecution to such cross-examination); 1910, Wright's Case, 5 Cr. App. 131 (under St. 1898, § 1 (f), the accused's testimony that he was cajoled into signing a confession, held an imputation against the prosecution's witness, so as to permit cross-examination to prior convictions; the ruling is totally unsound, and the opinion by Darling, J., superficially dismisses the prior rulings); 1910, Morgan's Case, 5 Cr. App. 157 (cross-examination to another crime, held on

(5) The fifth purpose, that of par. (iii), is a novelty, in form, but it is virtually another use of the fourth purpose, viz. it aims to throw light on the accused's character, whenever he raises an issue as to the credibility of an accomplice. Theoretically, this par. (iii) should have been included in the third clause of par. (ii).

The use made of an accused's record under the modern English statute is well illustrated in the following case:

1911, Steinie Morrison's Trial, p. 277 (Notable English Trials Series, 1922); the accused, charged with a brutal murder, was an old offender in burglaries and the like; as the defence had discredited the character of the prosecution's witnesses, the prosecution had used its right, under the Act, to show the accused's former convictions.

Mr. Muir—"Your lordship indicated that with regard to the question of previous convictions you would address some observations to the jury by way of caution."

Mr. Justice Darling—"I am much obliged to the learned counsel for the prosecution. I did say that I would refer to the question of previous convictions. . . . That was done because he insisted, and his counsel insisted, upon an attack upon the character of a witness, possibly of more than one witness, for the Crown, an attack which brought the defence into the position that they had lost the protection given to the prisoner by the Criminal Evidence Act of 1898. If it had not been for those attacks you would have known nothing about this . . . Gentlemen, the caution I meant to give you is this: It must not be allowed to prejudice or warp your judgment, and, believe me, no one is more conscious than I am of the danger that such knowledge as you now have should warp the judgment not only of you but of myself. It is almost impossible to put as good a construction now upon the most innocent thing that that man may do as it was when you believed him to be an unconvicted man. But, gentlemen, bear in mind that the only use to be made of these previous convictions is to show that when you have to rely upon his word as contradicting something stated by somebody else, or as alleging something which is not corroborated, you have not the word of a person who has done nothing wrong, who has never told any lie, and who has never broken the laws of England; you have only the word of a man whose past career has been what you know it to have been."

the facts not to be justified by any imputation on the prosecution's witness); 1911, Seigley's Case, 6 Cr. App. 106 (cross-examination to prior convictions allowed); 1911, Rappolt's Case, 6 Cr. App. 106 (cross-examination to prior convictions allowed, where the defendant testified that the prosecuting witness was a "horrible liar"); 1911, Morrison's Case, 6 Cr. App. 159, 169 (similar, where a principal witness' character was "violently attacked"); 1912, Westfall's Case, 7 Cr. App. 176 (cross-examination to drunkenness of prosecuting witness, etc., held not an imputation entitling to cross-examination to defendant's prior convictions); 1912, R. v. Hudson, 7 Cr. App. 256, 2 K. B. 464 (larceny; when the defendant through counsel has accused the prosecution's witnesses of having themselves committed the act charged, he may be cross-examined to prior convictions; prior cases examined and distinguished); 1913, Watson's Case, 8 Cr. App. 249 (rule applied); 1914, Cohen's Case, 10 Cr. App. 91, 99 (subornation of perjury; rule applied to allow cross-examination to prior conviction when an attack is made on an accomplice's character "upon matters other than those which had been opened by the prosecution"); 1920, R. v. Biggin, 1 K. B. 213 (murder; defence, improper solicitation by the deceased; questions to the accused on cross-examination as to a criminal mode of livelihood, held not admissible, the deceased not being the prosecutor; this seems an unsound reason; the sufficient reason is that the questions had nothing to do with the deceased's character). An able criticism of the fairness of this part of the Act is made by Mr. H. F. Moulton in his edition of Steinie Morrison's Trial in 1911 (Morrison's Trial, Introd. p. xvii, Notable English Trials Series, 1922; the ruling that gave rise to the criticism is reported at pp. 173–180).

The practice under the Statute of 1898 is critically discussed by Messrs. E. E. Williams and H. Cohen in an article entitled "Prisoners' Evidence and Previous Offences" (1917, Law Quart. Rev., XXXIII, 53).

In Pennsylvania, a statute has dealt with the same subject in provisions closely following the English Act in part.[5] But the model is not to be recommended for further imitation; its modifications of the common-law rules do not reveal themselves without careful study and would in the United States lead to complex technicality and confusion in their interpretation.

§ 195. Particular Good Acts, to show Defendant's Character. Do any of the foregoing reasons apply to exclude the use by the defendant of his own particular good acts to evidence the good character which he is allowed to invoke? They do not seem to; and the propriety of the defendant's use of such evidence has been more than once judicially commended:

1786, R. v. Brecknock, McNally's Evidence, 322; indictment for murder; the witness, a clergyman, "being examined to the character of the prisoner, said he believed him to be the last man in the world who would have a thirst of blood, and he would give particular instances"; these instances being objected to, the offering counsel's argument was sustained, that "this rule as to particular instances does not hold when you call a witness to support a man's character, for then . . . the witness may give his reasons for entertaining a good opinion of him."

1852, PRESTON, J., in State v. Parker, 7 La. An. 88: "It appears to me so reasonable and humane that I cannot think it inconsistent with the rules of evidence. The effort to avoid collateral issues seems sometimes to have excluded from the jury-box what every juryman would wish to learn, and to have trenched closely upon the principles of humanity. It is but the just reward of many good actions that they should be of some avail to a man in his utmost need, especially when by invoking their aid he throws himself open to all the opprobrium that can be cast upon him by the character he has acquired by his evil deeds."

That such was the practice up to the close of the 1700s is clear.[1] But, after a time, two of the reasons already noted, surprise and confusion of issues, came to be thought applicable to a defendant's evidence of particular acts in his own favor:

1660, Peters' Trial, 5 How. St. Tr. 1116, 1137; murder of King Charles. Peters: "I have here a seal that the earl of Norwich gave me to keep for his sake for saving his life, which I will keep as long as I live." L. C. B. BRIDGMAN: "I am not willing at all to inter-

[5] Pa. St. 1911, Mar. 15 (quoted post, § 488); 1915, Com. v. Garanchoskie, 251 Pa. 247, 96 Atl. 513 (murder; "other crimes not connected with the case on trial", admitted on cross-examination of accused, under St. 1911, Mar. 15, § 1, the accused having called witnesses to his good reputation; but the opinion misunderstands the scope of the statute, by referring to it as changing the rule of certain former opinions excluding former convictions "for the purpose of affecting his credibility"; the statute includes former acts tending to show bad character as an accused; the opinion also forbids proof of the acts by other witnesses, under the statute).

§ 195. [1] 1696, Lowick's Trial, 13 How. St. Tr. 292 (how the defendant once heroically saved people's lives); 1742, Mansfield, L. C. J., in Clarke v. Periam, 2 Atk. 339; 1753, Murphy's Trial, 19 How. St. Tr. 725 (Mr. Laroche: "This is the second time I have come from Bristol to London to speak to Mr. Noads' character [jointly indicted]. I knew him at Bristol; . . . he behaved so well there that the gentleman recommended him to my brother-in-law, Mr. Henry Casamaijor, to transact his great affairs"; Mr. Alderman Ironside: "Mr. Noads has been concerned in an affair where I am interested, in which he has always acted with great diligence and prudence. I have trusted him with large sums of money; it has been in his power to have injured us, but I never had any occasion or room to doubt his honesty"); 1786, R. v. Brecknock, Ire. (cited supra).

rupt you or hinder you; [but] that which you speak of, doing good services, is not at all to the point. We do not question you for what good you have done, but for the evil you have done."

1794, EYRE, L. C. J., in Horne Tooke's Trial, 25 How. St. Tr. 359 (rejecting certain specific instances of conduct "in respect of the particularity of it"): "General character is general character; and it is not a collection of many moral or religious acts of a man's life, but the result of all. General character may be opposed by evidence; but if you are on the part of the prisoner to go into all the particulars of his life which are in his favor, you will have an undue advantage in that respect, because the crown cannot be prepared to oppose that evidence. We have very often gone into too many particulars upon evidence of general character; but whenever that point has been discussed, it has been found that the true way of examining to character was to the general character."

1808, Alexander Davison's Trial, 31 How. St. Tr. 187; fraud in public accounts by a former commissary-general. Lord Moira sworn (formerly general-in-command): "I never had the remotest ground for suspicion. . . . Shall I state the particulars?" L. C. J. ELLENBOROUGH: "One is very unwilling to diminish the scope of these inquiries, but the general inquiry is as to the general character." John Martin Leake sworn; examined by Mr. Holroyd: "I believe you are one of the comptrollers of the army accounts?" I am"; "In that character have you at any time had Mr. Davison's accounts before you?" "Yes"; "Have those been examined by you?" L. C. J. ELLENBOROUGH: "I really must interfere. It would be dangerous as a precedent to permit particular instances to be given in evidence where there can have been no notice. General evidence of general character is admissible; but this is certainly contrary to all rule." Mr. Holroyd: "I ask this question to show Mr. Leake's means of knowledge." L. C. J. ELLENBOROUGH: "You ask as to his knowledge of the examination of public accounts. Now would it be proper to try a collateral issue for which the other side cannot be prepared? It is as clear a rule of evidence as can be that you must not examine to particular facts." . . . Mr. Holroyd: "I ask this only as introductory of general character." L. C. J. ELLENBOROUGH: "If you mean only to ask whether the witness has had such means of knowing him as to form the judgment he is about to give, I have no objection to that." Mr. Holroyd: "Had you opportunities, from examining Mr. Davison's accounts, of knowing his general character?" "I have seen many of his accounts, and many of them were extremely regular; in the years 1794, 1795, and 1796, they were before the comptrollers." L. C. J. ELLENBOROUGH: "I cannot admit this; you must go into general character."

By the opening of the 1800s, this had become established as the law of England.[2] Nevertheless (as illustrated in the last passage above), the orthodox doctrine, that a witness to character could speak from personal knowledge of his disposition (post, § 1981), was conceded to allow such a witness, to some extent, to explain his reasons for his estimation of character by stating whatever striking conduct within his knowledge evinced the settled trait of character. Unfortunately, this orthodox and wise doctrine has itself been discarded in all but a few jurisdictions, and with it the availability of the present sort of facts given as the ground of such knowledge. Were the orthodox doctrine again to prevail, such evidence commends itself as valuable and just, for the reasons above stated by Mr. J. Preston; and the objections of Surprise and Confusion of Issues would be practically obviated by the limitations under which it would thus be used.

[2] 1787, Buller, J., in J'Anson v. Stuart, 1 T. R. 754; 1794, Horne Tooke's Trial, 25 How. St. Tr. 359 (L. C. J. Eyre intimates that the former practice is now definitely abandoned); 1798, O'Connor's Trial, 27 How. St. Tr. 31 (Earl of Moira: "I do not feel myself at all competent to speak to Mr. O'Connor's general character [for loyalty] from the little acquaintance I have had with him, but from a particular occasion —"; Mr. Garrow: "His lordship cannot state any particular fact"; Mr. Plumer argued for admitting the conversations as an expression of opinion; Buller, J.: "Suppose a man were indicted for murder, and he could bring a person to prove a particular act of humanity, you could not conceive that would be evidence"); 1808, Davison's Trial (quoted supra); 1809, Jones' Trial, 31 How. St. Tr. 309, 310; 1865, R. v. Rowton, Leigh & C. 541 (Willes, J.: "Evidence of particular acts is excluded, because a robber may do acts of generosity, and the proof of such acts is therefore irrelevant to the question whether he was likely to have committed a particular act of robbery"; yet Cockburn, C. J., more correctly said: "The prisoner cannot give evidence of particular facts, although one fact would weigh more than the opinion of all his friends and neighbors").

There is in this country some early authority for its use;[3] but most Courts would to-day undoubtedly forbid it.[4] If, however, the prosecution has improperly used specific acts of misconduct against the defendant, the defendant should certainly be allowed to deny or explain it, on the principle of curative admissibility (ante, § 15).[5] Moreover, there are other principles by which a defendant may occasionally avail himself of conduct as evidence in his favor, — in particular, of conduct indicating consciousness of innocence (post, § 293), of utterances asserting his innocence (post, §§ 1142, 1731, 1732, 1785), and, in sedition charges, of conduct indicating a loyal state of mind (post, § 369).

§ 196. Particular Misconduct of the Defendant (1) to Impeach his Credit as a Witness, or (2) to Increase his Sentence; (3) Juvenile Delinquents. (1) Where the defendant chooses to take the stand as a witness, he occupies two positions, — that of a defendant and that of a witness. In the former aspect, particular bad acts of his, as exhibiting character, cannot be used at all, whether shown by extrinsic testimony or brought out by cross-examination. But in the latter aspect such acts may be brought out (under certain limitations) by his cross-examination or by record of conviction (post, § 979–981). The question arises whether when he takes the stand, he should be treated as defendant or as witness, — whether policy requires that the former or the latter capacity should prescribe the rule for his treatment. This ques-

[3] 1810, Swift, Evidence, 141; 1830, Com. v. Robinson, Thacher Cr. C. 236, Thacher, J., semble; 1852, State v. Parker, 7 La. An. 83, 88 (murder of a woman; per Preston, J., only, evidence that he was "one of the last men who would willingly shed a woman's blood" received, with such good acts as form the "reasons of the witness for testifying to the good character", following R. v. Brecknock, which with the others "I do not find overruled"; but the majority speak of "general character" as alone admissible).

[4] 1888, Hussey v. State, 87 Ala. 133, 6 So. 420 (that he was a church member, excluded; this ruling is intelligible enough from either standpoint); 1898, State v. Ferguson, 71 Conn. 227, 41 Atl. 769 (assault with intent; questions by defendant's counsel as to never having been in quarrels before, excluded); 1897, Smalls v. State, 102 Ga. 31, 29 S. E. 153 (peaceable character of defendant while in jail, excluded), 1901, State v. Dexter, 115 Ia. 678, 87 N. W. 417; 1882, White v. Com., 80 Ky. 485 (good acts excluded, for the reasons of small probative value, confusion of issues, and surprise to the Commonwealth); 1913, People v. Bollman, 178 Mich. 159, 144 N. W. 537 (seduction); 1899, State v. Brooks, 23 Mont. 146, 57 Pac. 1038 (that the defendant had preached in church, excluded); 1920, Baker v. State, 87 Tex. Cr. 305, 221 S. W. 607 (manslaughter; defendant's "intense patriotism", leading up to the affray, excluded on the facts); 1900, State v. Coates, 22 Wash. 601, 61 Pac. 726.

[5] 1881, Olive v. State, 11 Nebr. 1, 27, 7 N. W. 444 (murder; why the defendant had on another occasion drawn a revolver on some one, allowed). Contra: 1895, Griffith v. State, 140 Ind. 163, 39 N. E. 440, semble.

tion can best be examined in dealing with the rules for witnesses' character (post, § 890).

Furthermore, the act of taking the stand in his own favor is to some extent a waiver of his privilege against self-crimination. Wherever it is treated as not being a waiver of the privilege so far as former crimes are asked after, this privilege alone would suffice to exonerate him from answering; and some Courts dispose of the question from this point of view alone (post, § 2277). But this (as noted in that place) is a superficial and inadequate way of disposing of it, for two reasons: (1) The privilege merely allows the defendant to decline to answer; it does not say whether the matter can be asked after, or whether it can properly be used even if the privilege is not claimed; which is the present question. (2) The privilege covers only criminating matters; while the present rule, if it applies, forbids inquiring into or using any misconduct whatever, whether criminal or not, as a source of exhibiting character Hence the whole question must be determined independently of the bearing of a waiver of privilege.

(2) Under enlightened modern legislation for habitual criminals, the tribunal is authorized to increase the sentence of one whose offence, when established, is found to be the second or a later offence of the sort. The proof of the prior offence for that purpose does not militate against the rule forbidding the use of prior misconduct to evidence character, provided the purpose is kept distinct. But there are three types of these statutes.

(a) One of these, observing the spirit of the character-rule, permits the fact of prior conviction to be found by the judge or the jury upon proof reserved until a verdict of guilty has first been found by the jury:[1]

§ 196. [1] ENGLAND: The practice prior to the statute of 1836 is to be seen from R. v. Jones, 6 C. & P. 391; then follows: 1836, St. 6 & 7 W. IV, c. 111 reciting that by a statute of 7 & 8 Geo. IV, c. 28, § 11, increased punishment was allowed for the subsequent felony, "and whereas since the passing of the said act the practice has been on the trial of any person for any such subsequent felony to charge the jury to inquire at the same time concerning such previous conviction, and whereas doubts may be reasonably entertained whether such practice is consistent with a fair and impartial inquiry as regards the matter of such subsequent felony, and it is expedient that such practice should from henceforth be discontinued", it is enacted that the jury shall not "inquire concerning such previous conviction until after they shall have inquired concerning such subsequent felony and shall have found such person guilty of the same", and that the reading of the statement of prior conviction in the indictment shall also be deferred; provided however that "if upon the trial of any person for any such subsequent felony as aforesaid, such person shall give evidence of his or her good character, it shall be lawful for the prosecutor in answer thereto to give evidence of the indictment and conviction of such person for the previous felony." This statute was reenacted in St. 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, § 9, which was repealed and replaced in 1861 by St. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, § 116, and c. 99, § 37, which substitutes "offence" for felony; the provision was construed in the following cases: 1851, Anon., 5 Cox Cr. 268; 1851, R. v. Shrimpton, 2 Den. Cr. C. 319, 5 Cox Cr. 387 (the statute phrase "if such person shall give evidence of his good character" includes testimony of good character obtained from an opposing witness on cross-examination).

The subject is now governed by St. 1908, 8 Edw. VII, c. 59 (Prevention of Crime Act) § 10: "In the proceedings on the indictment the offender shall in the first instance be arraigned on so much only of the indictment as charges the crime, and if on arraignment he pleads guilty or is found guilty by the jury, the jury shall, unless he pleads guilty to being a habitual criminal, be charged to inquire whether he is a habitual criminal, and in that case it shall not be necessary to swear the jury again: Provided that a charge of being a habitual criminal shall not be inserted in an indictment (a) Without the consent of the Director of Public Prosecutions; and (b) Unless not less than seven days' notice has been given to the proper officer of the court by which the offender is to be tried, and to the offender, that it is intended to insert such a charge; and the notice to the offender shall specify the previous convictions and the other grounds upon which it is intended to found the charge."

1890, BELCHER, C. C., in People v. Sansome, 84 Cal. 449, 451, 24 Pac. 143: "The evident purpose of the provision of the Code above quoted was to keep from the jurors all knowledge that the person on trial before them had been previously convicted of criminal offence; and this is based upon the well-settled and familiar principles of law and right. In the first place, it is elementary law that every one accused of crime is presumed to be innocent until proved to be guilty, and is entitled to a fair and impartial trial before an unbiased jury. In the next place, it is well known that ordinary jurors are more ready to believe the accused guilty if it be understood by them that he has suffered a previous conviction for a similar offence."

The procedure under this statute is elaborately discussed in Turner's Case, 1909, 3 Cr. App. 103, [1910] 1 K. B. 346.

It will be noticed that the concluding provision of St. 1836, permitting the prosecution to show prior conviction on the issue of Not Guilty when the accused offers good character, has been here omitted, and is transferred into the Criminal Evidence Act 1898; for its construction under that Act, see ante, § 194*a*.

CANADA: Dom. Rev. St. 1906, c. 152, § 128 (offences under the Temperance Act; procedure of proving prior offences prescribed), Crim. Code 1892, § 676, R. S. 1906, c. 146, §§ 963, 964 (substantially like the preceding, for criminal cases generally); Man. Rev. St. 1913, c. 117, § 206 (liquor offences; like Ont. R. S. 1914, c. 215, § 88; N. Br. 1912, R. v. Matheson, N. Br. S. C., 2 D. L. R. 835 (liquor offences; other rulings collected); N. W. Terr. Cons. Ord. 1898; c. 89, § 105 (like Ont. R. S. 1914, c. 215, § 88); N. Sc. St. 1918, c. 8, § 47 (liquor offences); Ont. Rev. St. 1914, c. 215, § 88 (in trials for liquor offences, prior convictions shall not be inquired into till after conviction for the subsequent offence; procedure prescribed), 1888, R. v. Triganzie, 15 Ont. 294 (statute construed); 1917, R. v. Harris, 40 D. L. R. 684, Ont. (illegal keeping of liquor; the trial Court held not authorized to consider another offence for the purpose of increasing the sentence); P. E. I. St. 1918, c. 1, § 108 (like Ont. 1914, c. 215, § 88); Saskatchewan: R. S. 1920, c. 194, § 84 (liquor offences; like Ont. R. S. c. 215, § 88); Yukon: St. 1920, c. 9, § 7 (liquor offences).

UNITED STATES: California: P. C. 1872, § 1093, par. 1 ("If the indictment or information be for felony, the clerk must read it, and state the plea of the defendant to the jury; and in cases where it charges a previous conviction, and the defendant has confessed the same, the clerk in reading it shall omit therefrom all that relates to such previous conviction"); § 1025 (a defendant on pleading must be asked as to prior convictions; if he "pleads not guilty, and answers that he has suffered the prior conviction, the charge of the previous conviction must not be read to the jury, nor alluded to on the trial"); 1890, People v. Sansome, 84 Cal. 449, 24 Pac. 143 (where the trial judge alluded to it; see quotation supra); 1891, People v. Wheatley, 88 Cal. 117, 26 Pac. 95; 1895, People v. Thomas, 110 Cal. 42, 42 Pac. 456; 1904, People v. Smith, 143 Cal. 597, 77 Pac. 449; Hawaii: Rev. L. 1915, § 3818 (after plea of guilty or conviction, a previous conviction of the same offence may be proved; except that if on the main trial good character is offered, the prosecutor is entitled "in answer thereto to give evidence of the conviction of such person for the previous offence or offences before such verdict of guilty shall be returned; and the jury shall enquire concerning such previous conviction or convictions at the same time that they enquire concerning such subsequent offence"); Oklahoma: Comp. St. 1921, § 2771 ("after a plea or verdict of guilty . . . the Court upon the suggestion of either party that there are circumstances which may properly be taken into view, either in aggravation or mitigation of the punishment, may in its discretion hear the same summarily at a specified time and upon such notice to the adverse party as it may direct"); 1899, Walburn v. Terr., 9 Okl. 23, 59 Pac. 972 (under Stats. § 5286, allowing facts of aggravation to be considered by the judge after plea or verdict of guilty, evidence of misconduct, given before verdict and without instructions to disregard, is improper); Texas: 1914, Williamson v. State, 74 Tex. Cr. 290, 167 S. W. 360 (theft; cross-examination to various arrests of defendant, allowed, before the jury's retirement for the general verdict, to affect a plea for suspension of sentence but not to affect credit as a witness); Washington: St. 1903, c. 86, R. & B. Code 1909, § 2178 (the prior conviction is to be inquired into after plea or conviction of guilt of the subsequent offence; procedure prescribed); West Virginia: Code 1918, c. 32 A, § 3; 1920, State v. Savage, 86 W. Va. 655, 104 S. E. 153 (statute applied; but here the defendant's admission of the prior conviction was excluded on a technicality not inferior to the superstitious formalism of the Middle Ages).

(b) The other type of statute, apparently formed by the supposed requirements of the unwise rule (existing in some jurisdictions) which allows the jury to fix a criminal sentence, permits the fact of prior conviction to be considered by the jurors before verdict;[2] this method is decidedly an inferior one.

1899, DuRelle, J., in Hall v. Com., 106 Ky. 894, 51 S. W. 804: "It is earnestly urged that it was error to permit the introduction of evidence of former convictions at all until the jury should have first found her guilty under the charge for which she was then being tried; that it amounted to the admission of testimony to impeach her general character, which she had not put in issue, and enabled the commonwealth to show her to the jury in the light of a common thief, and rebut the presumption of innocence which the law gives her by evidence in chief upon a trial for grand larceny. It is painfully apparent that, with the circumstances shown as to the loss of the money, and evidence of two former convictions for grand larceny, the accused, who is an ignorant negro woman, had not the slightest chance that an average jury would entertain a reasonable doubt of her guilt, while, without the evidence of former convictions, there was a possibility that they might do so. There is a considerable force, therefore, in the proposition urged, that this procedure denied the accused a fair trial of the offence whereof she was accused. But the statute as to habitual criminals (Ky. St. § 1130) seems to have created an additional and higher degree of offence, viz. the commission of a felony, having been theretofore twice convicted of a felony, etc. To show the accused guilty of this degree of the offence charged, it is necessary to show the former convictions; and this, of course, is bound to prejudice the accused, — just as evidence showing malice is bound to prejudice the defendant in a murder case, — but it may be shown to make out a higher degree of the offence, which authorizes the severer punishment. . . . The statute requires the jury to find the fact of the former convictions. There is no provision for a separate trial of the fact of former conviction, nor do we think the statute intended there should be one. The law seems to work a hardship, but it is a hardship the Legislature alone can remedy."

(c) A third type of statute applies to juvenile offenders only, and in juvenile courts forbids any subsequent use of the proceedings, for this or other purpose, except in the same court on a later appearance of the same delinquent.[3]

[2] Federal: 1922, Massey v. U. S., 8th C. C. A., 281 Fed. 293 (liquor offence; the information, charging a prior conviction, allowed to be ready; cases collected); Illinois: Rev. St. 1874, c. 38, § 473, Laws 1883, p. 76 ("On any trial for any of said offences", burglary, etc., a former conviction "may be used in evidence against such party", provided the judgment is "set forth in apt words in the indictment"); § 477, Laws 1889, p. 112 (the prison record and criminal history of any one indicted under the foregoing statute "may be given in evidence upon any trial . . . for the purpose of proving a former conviction"); Iowa: Code 1919, § 9046 (burglary, etc.); Kentucky: Stats. 1915, § 1130 (where sentence is to be increased for former conviction, "judgment in such cases shall not be given for the increased penalty unless the jury shall find, from the record and other competent evidence, the fact of former convictions"); 1899, Hall v. Com., 106 Ky. 894, 51 S. W. 804 (see quotation supra); Maryland: Ann. Code 1914, Art. 27, § 662 (record of former convictions may be proved on an indictment under the habitual criminal act); New York: C. Cr. P. 1881, § 513 (against a person adjudged an habitual criminal and afterwards charged with crime, previous character may be proved as if he had first offered evidence thereon); 1898, People v. Sickles, 156 N. Y. 541, 51 N. E. 288 (the fact of former conviction may be put in before verdict rendered, because "the prior conviction enters as an ingredient into the criminality of the prisoner"; Bartlett, J., dissenting); Virginia: 1909, Wright v. Com., 109 Va. 847, 65 S. E. 19 (in capital cases, prior convictions are not admissible under the statute; Keith, P., dissenting in a careful opinion); Wisconsin: 1909, Howard v. State, 139 Wis. 529, 121 N. W. 133 (under St. 1898, § 4736, providing that the accused may admit the former convictions; they should not afterwards be evidenced nor commented on before the jury).

[3] Alabama: Code 1907, § 6464, as amended by St. 1915, No. 510, p. 577, § 14 (juvenile court; statements, etc., of a child under 14, "or any statement made by any person, officer, or the Court, shall never be legal or competent

This measure is a deduction from the modern enlightened principle of reforming the juvenile offender and then protecting him from afterwards being dragged back into the criminal class by the automatic operation of the law for habitual offenders.

§ 197. Rumors of Misconduct, as testing a Witness supporting Character. When the defendant offers his good character and a witness testifies to the defendant's good reputation for the trait in question, one way of testing the honesty and accuracy of the witness' assertion of the prevalence of this reputation is to find out from him whether this or that rumor of flagrant misconduct has come to his notice. If one or more such rumors are known evidence against the child" in any court; no adjudication shall disqualify for civil service, etc., nor be denominated a conviction); Colorado: Comp. L. 1921, § 654 (delinquent children; "a disposition of any child under this Act, or any evidence given in such cause", shall not in any other proceeding "be lawful or proper evidence against such child for any purpose whatever, except in subsequent cases against the same child under this Act"); Connecticut: St. 1921, c. 336, §§ 18, 19 (juvenile court; the adjudication shall not be deemed a conviction of crime; the disposition of a child, and the evidence, except in certain cases, "shall be inadmissible in any criminal proceedings against such child"); D. Columbia: Code 1919, p. 394, U. S. St. 1916, Apr. 27 (juvenile court judgment against a child shall not "be denominated a conviction"); Hawaii: Rev. L. 1915, § 2284; Idaho: Comp. St. 1919, § 1010 (like S. D. Rev. C. § 9972); Kentucky: Stats. 1915, § 331e (the disposition shall not be evidence against such child "in any civil, criminal, or other cause . . . for any purpose whatsoever"); Me. Rev. St. 1916, c. 144, § 8 (commitment to State juvenile school shall not be "used as a criminal record against him"; Mass. Gen. L. 1920, c. 119, § 60 (delinquent juveniles; disposition of the child, or any evidence given, shall not be evidence against him in any other proceeding except as a juvenile); Michigan: Comp. L. 1915, § 2011 (juvenile delinquent; "a disposition of any child under this Act, or any evidence given in any such cause", is not thereafter admissible against him, except in proceedings under this Act); Minnesota: Gen. St. 1913, § 7162 (juvenile court; disposition of a child under this Act shall not "be lawful or proper evidence against such child for any purpose", except under this Act); St. 1917, c. 397, § 19 (same); Missouri: Rev. St. 1919, § 1135 (juvenile court; "any disposition of any delinquent child under this article", or any evidence given, shall not be admitted in any other court against him); Nevada: Rev. L. 1912, § 728 (juvenile court; the "disposition of any child under this act, or any evidence given in such cause, shall not, in any civil, criminal, or other cause or proceeding whatever, be lawful or proper evidence against such child", except in similar proceedings); New Hampshire: St. 1917, c. 31 (juvenile court; the fact of arrest shall not be admissible in any subsequent proceeding, except while the juvenile is on probation or within 2 years after discharge from institution; "every such record of proceedings shall become a sealed record and no longer accessible to any person"); New Jersey: Comp. St. 1910, Crim. Proc. § 207 (juvenile courts; fact of conviction shall not be admissible in evidence, except during period of probation or in subsequent proceedings in juvenile court); St. 1916, c. 212, Mar. 18 (no conviction of juvenile offender in juvenile court "shall be admissible in evidence" in any proceeding except during period of probation or within two years after discharge); 1919, Kozler v. New York Tel. Co., 93 N. J. L. 279, 108 Atl. 375 (applying the foregoing statute to exclude the record of conviction for theft of telephone property, in an action to recover a reward for information; the statute held valid both as an evidence statute and as an amnesty statute); North Carolina: Consol. L. 1919, § 5042 (juvenile court; no adjudication of a child therein shall "be denominated a conviction"); Porto Rico: St. 1915, Mar. 11, No. 37, § 24 (juvenile court; no judgment, etc., or evidence shall be "legal or proper evidence against such child for any purpose whatsoever", except in subsequent cases against the same child under this Act"); So. Dak. Rev. C. 1919, § 9972 (juvenile court; "the disposition of any child under this article, or any evidence given in such cause, shall not in any civil, criminal, or other cause or proceeding, in any court, be lawful or proper evidence against such child for any purpose, except in subsequent cases against the same child under this article"); West Virginia: St. 1919, c. 111, § 1 (juvenile court; "a deposition [Sic? disposition] of any child under this Act of [or?] any evidence given in such cause shall not, in any civil, criminal or other cause or proceeding whatever in any court be lawful or proper evidence against such child", except in another case in this court).

to him, obviously his broad assertion of the prevalence of good reputation is more or less inconsistent with his knowledge of such rumors. The purpose of the inquiry is to show that one knowing of certain rumors has nevertheless rashly asserted a reputation inconsistent with the rumors. Thus, the defendant's misconduct is not inquired after as a fact, to show his character; but as a rumor, to discredit the witness' assertion. A question, therefore, which does not expressly refer to the witness' hearing of the conduct as rumored, is improper, because it aims apparently at the conduct as a fact showing the defendant's character.

Precisely the same principle is applicable to the cross-examination of one testifying to a witness' reputed character; and the precedents are dealt with under that head (post, § 988).

2. Conduct to show Character of Other Persons evidentially used

It has been seen (ante, §§ 62–68) that a person's character, as evidential to show his doing of an act, may occasionally be used for others than the accused in a criminal case. When character is thus evidential, may it be evidenced by particular acts of the person whose character is to be proved?

§ 198. Character of Deceased, in Homicide, from Particular Acts of Violence. When the turbulent character of the deceased, in a prosecution for homicide, is relevant (ante, § 63), there is no substantial reason against evidencing the character by particular instances of violent or quarrelsome conduct. Such instances may be very significant; their number can be controlled by the trial Court's discretion; and the prohibitory considerations applicable to an accused's character (ante, § 194) have here little or no force.[1]

§ 198. [1] Accord: 1902, State v. Beird, 118 Ia. 474, 92 N. W. 694 (good opinion, by McClain, J.); 1907, State v. Blee, 133 Ia. 725, 111 N. W. 19 (recent assault by the deceased, admitted; citing seven cases from other jurisdictions, but not State v. Beird, supra); 1899, State v. McIver, 125 N. C. 645, 34 S. E. 439 (an unmerciful beating to an employee on the same morning, admitted); 1906, McQuiggan v. Ladd, 79 Vt. 90, 64 Atl. 503 (battery; plea, self-defence, the plaintiff being intoxicated and in that condition quarrelsome, his repute being known to defendant; prior instances of quarrelsomeness when intoxicated, admissible, though not known to defendant); 1912, State v. Waldron, 71 W. Va. 1, 75 S. E. 558 (murder; violent acts of deceased, just beforehand, unknown to defendant, admitted; careful opinion by Miller, J., approving the above text; Williams, J., diss.).

Contra: Ala.: 1915, Bullington v. State, 13 Ala. App. 61, 69 So. 319 (homicide; deceased's "specific acts", excluded); 1915, Pollard v. State, 12 Ala. App. 82, 68 So. 494; 1916, Smith v. State, 197 Ala. 193, 72 So. 316; Ga. 1899, Thornton v. State, 107 Ga. 683, 33 S. E. 673; 1903, Andrews v. State, 118 Ga. 1, 43 S. E. 852; 1918, Fountain v. State, 23 Ga. App. 113, 98 S. E. 178; Mich. 1904, People v. Farrell, Mich. 127, 100 N. W. 264; Minn. 1904, State v. Ronk, 91 Minn. 419, 98 N. W. 334 (acts of violence towards third persons, excluded); Miss. 1868, Com. v. Andrews, Davis' Rep. 128, 156 (murder, said by defendant to have been committed in defence from an assault by the deceased for the purpose of buggery; evidence of the deceased's conduct indicating a passion and disposition to sodomy and buggery was excluded, except so far as it involved prior attempts by deceased on defendant); N. Y. 1886, People v. Druse, 103 N. Y. 655, 8 N. E. 733 (instances of treating his domestic animals with cruelty, excluded); 1903, People v. Gaimiri, 176 N. Y. 84, 68 N. E. 112 (specific acts of violence to a third person, excluded); Oh. 1907, State v. Roderick, 77 Oh. 301, 82 N. E. 1082, semble (inadmissible).

Distinguish the use of such instances to show the accused's apprehensions of violence (post § 248).

§ 199. Negligence of Party in Civil Cases, from Particular Negligent Acts. It has been seen (ante, § 65) that in a few jurisdictions the character of a defendant (or of his employee) or of a plaintiff for negligence or prudence may be used to show that he probably was not or was careful on a given occasion. Is it proper to evidence that character by particular instances of the trait?

The reason of Undue Prejudice, which applied to a defendant in a criminal case (ante, § 194), has here a corresponding application, though a less dangerous one. The reason of Unfair Surprise is also applicable; for the party charged cannot even guess the time, place, and occasion that may be predicated for his supposed act, and has no means of showing the testimony to be fabricated. The reason of Confusion of Issues also operates, for disputes over other carelessness would soon obscure the main issue. Add to this that a careless act or two may be done by the most prudent person, and that particular instances, unless repeated and emphatic, throw little light on the general disposition. For these reasons, almost all Courts exclude such evidence, whatever their views may be (ante, § 65) as to the propriety of using the character, if otherwise evidenced, to show the probability or improbability of carelessness on a particular occasion.[1]

§ 199. [1] Federal: 1894, Southern Bell T. & T. Co. v. Watts, 13 C. C. A. 579, 66 Fed. 460 (negligence in adjusting a telephone wire; former similar carelessness by the same employee of the defendant, excluded, except to contradict his testimony as to the possibility of certain harm); 1896, Central Vt. R. Co. v. Ruggles, 21 C. C. A. 575, 75 Fed. 953 (fire caused by heated bearings; the stoppage of the oil-pipes by carelessness three years before, not admitted to show former carelessness, but admitted to show a tendency of the machinery);
Arkansas: 1894, Little R. & M. R. Co. v. Harrell, 58 Ark. 454, 468, 24 S. W. 883, 25 S. W. 117 (prior negligent acts of the defendant's enployee, not admissible to show negligence at the time); 1899, St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Stroud, 67 Ark. 112, 56 S. W. 870 (former misconduct by defendant's employee, excluded);
California: 1896, Pacheco v. Mfg. Co., 113 Cal. 541, 45 Pac. 833 (the faulty breaking of other shears in the same way as that by which the plaintiff was injured, excluded); 1896, Howland v. R. Co., 115 Cal. 487, 47 Pac. 255 (another collision, wholly unconnected, excluded);
Columbia (District): 1914, Fountaine v. Washington R. & E. Co., 42 D. C. App. 295 (plaintiff's frequent prior acts of jumping on a car while in motion, excluded);
Connecticut: 1874, Morris v. East Haven, 41 Conn. 252, 254 (contributory negligence; former instances of care or negligence, inadmissible); 1897, Laufer v. Traction Co., 68 Conn. 475, 37 Atl. 379 (street-railroad injury; carefulness of defendant at other times, excluded); 1903, Munroe v. Hartford St. R. Co., 76 Conn. 201, 56 Atl. 498 (collision of a street-car with a wagon; the motorman's negligence when employed on another line, excluded); 1921, Richmond v. Norwich, 96 Conn. 582, 115 Atl. 11 (injury by rifle shots from a guard placed in war-time by defendant at the reservoir; specific acts of the guard, not admitted to show his incompetence);
Georgia: 1890, Augusta S. R. Co. v. Randall, 85 Ga. 297, 11 S. E. 706 (previous care in selecting drivers, excluded, because the issue was as to a specific act of the driver); 1898, Atlanta C. S. R. Co. v. Bates, 103 Ga. 333, 30 S. E. 41 (injury in alighting from a car; instances of plaintiff's careless alighting at other times, excluded);
Idaho: 1894, Rumpel v. R. Co., 4 Ida. 13, 35 Pac. 700 (blockading of streets by the same railroad at other times, not admitted to show negligence);
Indiana: 1871, Pittsburg, F. W. & C. R. Co. v. Ruby, 38 Ind. 295, 311 (excluding former acts of a railroad employee, to show negligence at a particular time);
Iowa: 1901, Dalton v. R. Co., 114 Ia. 257, N. W. 272 (injury while driving across a railroad track; prior instances of plaintiff's having slept while riding in his buggy, excluded, partly because there were eye-witnesses);
Kansas: 1890, Southern Kans. R. Co. v. Robbins, 43 Kan. 145, 149, 23 Pac. 113 (former acts of negligence inadmissible to show contributory negligence);
Kentucky: 1906, Lexington R. Co. v. Herring, — Ky. —, 96 S. W. 558 (injury on a street-car while entering; that the plaintiff had been "frequently seen getting on and off street-cars while in motion", excluded);

Certain other possible uses of particular acts of negligence or carefulness are here to be distinguished:

(1) Where the character is not offered evidentially to prove an act, but is already in issue as a material proposition under the pleadings — as where the incompetency of an employee is for a fellow-servant the ground of the employer's liability, or where a physician is sued because though incompetent he held himself out as competent, — particular instances of carelessness or the reverse may conceivably be resorted to. The answer there need not be the same as here, because here the jury might be too apt to infer directly from the former careless act to the present one, while there the sole object is to prove the general trait and the proof stops there. The doctrine is examined elsewhere (post, § 208).

Maryland: 1886, Baltimore Elev. Co. v. Neal, 65 Md. 438, 452, 5 Atl. 338 (former acts of negligence, excluded);
Massachusetts: 1856, Robinson v. F. & W. R. Co., 7 Gray 92, 95 (negligence of the defendant's servants; prior negligent acts in running the train on other occasions, excluded, as involving collateral and confusing issues, and as "having no legal or logical tendency to prove the point in issue"); 1874, Maguire v. R. Co., 115 Mass. 239 (negligent stopping of street-car; former negligent stopping by the same driver, excluded); 1885, Whitney v. Gross, 140 Mass. 232, 5 N. E. 619 (former negligent overloading of a wagon excluded, to show negligent overloading on this occasion); 1887, Hatt v. Nay, 144 Mass. 186, 10 N. E. 807 (specific acts of negligence excluded on the grounds of surprise and of confusion of issues); 1894, Connors v. Morton, 160 Mass. 333, 35 N. E. 860 (same); 1896, Lewis v. Gaslight Co., 165 Mass. 411, 43 N. E. 178 (negligent laying of gaspipes in one place to show negligent laying in the case in hand, inadmissible); 1897, Olsen v. Andrews, 168 Mass. 261, 47 N. E. 90 (while "specific acts of negligence cannot be introduced to show the incompetency of a servant", yet "when conduct tending to show his qualifications or his physical fitness or unfitness for his work is properly before a jury upon one of the issues of the case", they may "consider it on the question of his competency"; here admitting evidence of nervous conduct and other singular behavior shortly before the accident, the foreman having testified to notice to the superintendent of this conduct); 1920, Kodra v. Middlesex & B. S. R. Co., 235 Mass. 176, 126 N. E. 278 (injury to the plaintiff's horse, said to have been negligently allowed to stray in the highway; that the horse had been "loose in the highway a great many times that summer", excluded; distinguishing the principle of § 201, post);
Michigan: 1868, Detroit & M. R. Co. v. Van Steinburg, 17 Mich. 111 (former negligence inadmissible; but here admitted to rebut the defendant's evidence of his employee's good character); 1881, Michigan C. R. Co. v. Gilbert, 46 Mich. 176, 179, 9 N. W. 243 (yard-master's negligence; former acts of negligence not admitted to show negligence at the time in question); 1899, People v. Thompson, 122 Mich. 411, 81 N. W. 344 (negligent management of boiler; negligent absence of defendant from boiler-room on other occasions, inadmissible, except as showing that he had been warned of the danger of absence);
Minnesota: 1898, Fulmore v. R. Co., 72 Minn. 448, 75 N. W. 589 (motorman's negligent management shortly before the act charged, perhaps admissible);
New Hampshire: 1879, Plummer v. Ossipee, 59 N. H. 59 (Allen, J.: "The defendants claimed that the plaintiff's husband was a fast and careless driver, and introduced in evidence particular instances of his fast and careless driving. The plaintiff was permitted to testify to other instances of his careful driving. . . . The evidence was relevant to the question of the husband's character for driving safely or otherwise"); 1903, Stone v. R. Co., 72 N. H. 206, 55 Atl. 359 (injury at a railroad crossing; that the plaintiff had on former occasions driven carefully at the crossing, admitted);
New Jersey: 1920, Quellmalz v. Atlantic Coast El. R. Co., 94 N. J. L. 474, 110 Atl. 914 (blowing out of a controller-box; defendant's failure to purchase any new boxes for three years prior, excluded);
New York: 1871, Warner v. R. Co., 44 N. Y. 465, 471 (former neglect or drunkenness of a flagman on duty, held inadmissible); 1874, Baulec v. R. Co., 59 N. Y. 360 (semble, excluded; see quotation, post, § 250); 1911, Engel v. United Traction Co., 203 N. Y. 321, 96 N. E. 731 (that the motorman had been discharged for another negligent act, excluded);
Ohio: 1882, Desbrack v. State, 38 Oh. St. 365 (murder by poisoning; the attending physician's mistake was set up as the real cause of death; a druggist who had supplied the physician having testified to his carefulness, the defendant was allowed to show, on cross-

(2) Where a person's character is required, by the law of the case, to be known to a defendant in order to make the latter liable, the doing by the former of a careless act may be thought to be sufficient, if known to the defendant, to put him upon inquiry and charge him with notice of the former's incompetency. This is not inconsistent with rejecting particular acts as evidence of the objective fact of incompetency; for while a single act might be unsatisfactory evidence of a general trait, yet, if this general trait is otherwise proved, the same single act might well suffice to warn the defendant and put him upon inquiry and thus charge him with notice of the other person's incompetency. This use of single acts as involving notice is dealt with elsewhere (post, § 250).

(3) A person's habit (ante, § 98, post, § 375) or capacity to act (post, § 219) may be evidenced by particular instances of conduct which are liable to be confused with conduct indicating moral character.

§ 199*a*. Character of Third Persons, from Particular Acts. In other issues, wherever the moral character of a third person would be relevant under § 68, ante, may that character be evidenced by particular instances? There is no reason for making here an inflexible rule; sometimes such evidence would be valuable and unobjectionable.[1] examination that on several occasions prescriptions had been sent to him by the physician with mistakes such as "would have killed the patient", that he had returned them, and that the physician had admitted the mistakes and made corrections);

Oklahoma: 1917, Oklahoma R. Co. v. Thomas, 63 Okl. 219, 164 Pac. 120 (personal injury to a mine employee; his prior acts of negligence, excluded);
Oregon: 1913, Gynther v. Brown & McCabe Co., 67 Or. 310, 134 Pac. 1186 (former mistakes of an engineer in interpreting signals, admitted to show the signal-system defective, but not to show the negligence of the engineer);
Pennsylvania: 1898, Woeckner v. Motor Co., 187 Pa. 206, 41 Atl. 28 (loss of services of child; to show negligent guarding by the plaintiff, previous "disconnected" acts excluded); 1896, Baker v. Irish, 172 Pa. 528, 532, 33 Atl. 558 (cited ante § 98, n. 1); 1906, Veit v. Class & N. B. Co., 216 Pa. 29, 64 Atl. 871 (explosion of a boiler, the pump and valve having been plugged and tied, and the deceased being an employee about the engine; the fact that he had several times before plugged the pump, etc., excluded; unsound);
Rhode Island: 1903, Dyer v. Union R. Co., 25 R. I. 221, 55 Atl. 688 (defendant's failure to signal at other street-crossings, inadmissible);
South Carolina: 1898, Mack v. R. Co., 52 S. C. 323, 29 S. E. 905 (injury on a track not at a crossing; failure of the engineer to sound warning at previous crossings, admitted to show recklessness);
Texas: 1895, Cunningham v. R. Co., 88 Tex. 534, 31 S. W. 629 (excluding evidence of specific acts of negligence as showing negligent habits; but perhaps this case means only to admit such evidence where the character is in issue on the pleadings; see quotation, post, § 208); 1898, Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Johnson, 92 Tex. 380, 48 S. W. 568 (plaintiff engineer's previous negligent conduct, excluded; certain exceptions recognized);
Utah: 1896, Sullivan v. Salt Lake, 13 Utah 122, 44 Pac. 1039 (former careless management of freight cars in the same way, excluded); 1899, Stoll v. Daly Min. Co., 19 Utah 271, 57 Pac. 295 (prior accidents to plaintiff in a mine, excluded); 1900, Konold v. R. Co., 21 Utah 379, 60 Pac. 1021 (railroad employee's entries: incorrectness on other occasions, by him or other employees, excluded);
Virginia: 1906, Southern R. Co. v. Blanford's Adm'x, 105 Va. 373, 54 S. E. 1 (negligence of a switchman; cited more fully post, § 987, n. 1);
Washington: 1893, Christensen v. U. T. Line, 6 Wash. 75, 82, 32 Pac. 1018 (that a motorman had run at too high speed at other times, excluded); 1902, Atherton v. Tacoma R. & P. Co., 30 Wash. 395, 71 Pac. 39 (similar to Christensen v. U. T. Line, supra).

§ 199*a*. [1] 1912, Noyes v. Boston & Maine R. Co., 213 Mass. 9, 99 N. E. 457 (action for value of a house-loss by fire set from the defendant's locomotive; the origin of the fire being disputed, the defendant offered to show numerous instances of the incendiary disposition of the plaintiff's son, as tending to show him to be the author; excluded; this is a good example of the unsound rigidity of the character rule).

§ 200. Character of Complainant in Rape, etc., from Particular Acts of Unchastity. It is generally accepted (ante, § 62) that the bad character for chastity of the complainant in a rape charge is relevant and admissible to show the probability of her consent to the intercourse. In evidencing this character, may particular acts of the woman's unchastity be resorted to, as showing her to be a person more prone than another to have consented?

No question of evidence has been more controverted. The relevancy of the fact is seldom doubted; but the arguments of Unfair Surprise, Undue Prejudice, and Confusion of Issues (post, § 1863) are thought to form serious objections. The classical opinion in favor of admissibility is the following:

1838, COWEN, J., in People v. Abbot, 19 Wend. 194: "The prosecutrix is usually, as here, the sole witness to the principal facts, and the accused is put to rely for his defence on circumstantial evidence. Any fact tending to the inference that there was not the utmost reluctance and the utmost resistance is always received. . . . The connection must be absolutely against the will; and are we to be told that previous prostitution shall not make one among those circumstances which raise a doubt of assent? That triers should be advised to make no distinction in their minds between the virgin and a tenant of the stew, — between one who would prefer death to pollution, and another who, incited by lust and lucre, daily offers her person to the indiscriminate embraces of the other sex? And will you not more readily infer assent in the practised Messalina in loose attire, than in the reserved and virtuous Lucretia? . . . [After referring to evidence of common prostitution as admissible,] It has been repeatedly adjudged that in the same view you may also show a previous voluntary connection between the prosecutrix and the prisoner. Why is this? Because there is not so much probability that a common prostitute or the prisoner's concubine would withold her assent as one less depraved; and may I not ask, does not the same probable distinction arise between one who has already submitted herself to the lewd embraces of another, and the coy and modest female severely chaste and instinctively shuddering at the thought of impurity? Shall I be answered that both are equally under the protection of the law? That I admit, and so are the common prostitute and the concubine. If either have in truth been feloniously ravished, the punishment is the same. But the proof is quite different. It requires that stronger evidence be added to the oath of the prosecutrix in one case than in the other."

The reasoning of the exclusionary rule is represented in the following passages:

1857, STRONG, J., in People v. Jackson, 3 Park. Cr. 398 (here the question was asked whether the prosecutrix had had intercourse with Dr. M. her betrothed, while on the voyage to New York, and the Court called attention to the circumstances as being peculiar; but added): "In any case, a single aberration from virtue, in one whose general character for chastity is otherwise unimpeachable, would raise so slight an inference, if any, of non-resistance to a brutal outrage from a person (or indeed any one except him to whom she had already yielded) that it would not justify a departure from the ordinary rules of evidence. Besides, if proof of particular instances should be admissible, rebutting evidence would be allowable, and thus there might be one or more collateral issues to occupy the time and divert the attention of the jury. Such would be the evils if the prosecution could require previous and timely notice of the particulars of the intended attack upon the conduct of the complainant; but as no such notice can be exacted, there would be no means of meeting the evidence, often of the dissolute companions of the accused, however mistaken or corrupt it might be, and thus the character of an innocent and greatly abused female might be sacrificed and the ends of public justice be defeated."

1895, SIDDON, J., in Rice v. State, 35 Fla. 236, 17 So. 286: "The fact that a woman may have been guilty of illicit intercourse with one man is too slight and uncertain an indication to warrant the conclusion that she would probably be guilty with any other man who sought such favors of her. If she was a woman of general bad reputation for chastity, or had been guilty of acts of lewdness with the defendant, the case would be different. In the first instance, the evidence would bear directly upon the question as to whether such a woman would be likely to resist the advances of any man; and, in the second, as to whether having yielded once to the sexual embraces of the defendant, she would not be likely to yield again to the same person. The greatest objection to such testimony is that it introduces collateral issues, which have no direct bearing upon the defendant's guilt."

The better view seems to be that which admits the evidence. Between the evil of putting an innocent or perhaps an erring woman's security at the mercy of a villain, and the evil of putting an innocent man's liberty at the mercy of an unscrupulous and revengeful mistress, it is hard to strike a balance. But, with regard to the intensity of injustice involved in an erroneous verdict, and the practical frequency of either danger, the admission of the evidence seems preferable. In the opposing judicial opinions the writers respectively assume that the man is innocent and that the woman is wronged; and on these inconsistent assumptions, the conclusion reached by each is fair enough. But the real question is, Which state of fact is the commoner and the one most needing our protection? The answer to this must depend more or less on the experience and the sentiments of each community.

The English precedents were for some time opposed to the use of such evidence; but it now seems to be admissible, subject to a limitation intended to avoid the objections of Unfair Surprise and Confusion of Issues, i.e. by allowing only the inquiry on cross-examination of the complainant, and by excluding extrinsic testimony.[1]

§ 200. [1] England: 1812, R. v. Hodgson, R. & R. 211, by all the judges (that the prosecutrix had had connection with another man a year before; excluded on the ground of surprise; but apparently treated only as affecting her testimonial discredit); 1817, R. v. Clarke, 2 Stark. 243, Holroyd, J. (same; but perhaps meant only as a ruling on testimonial discredit); 1834, R. v. Martin, 6 C. & P. 562, Williams, J. (whether the prosecutrix had previously had intercourse by consent with the accused, allowed: "I must say I never could understand the case of R. v. Hodgson, . . . it does appear to me to be not quite in strict accordance with the general rules of evidence"); 1843, R. v. Tissington, 1 Cox Cr. 48, Abinger, C. B. (citing Wood, B.; acts of solicitation by her to other men, rejected); 1843, R. v. Robbins, 1 Cox Cr. 55; 2 Moo. & Rob. 512 (former connection with other men, admitted; Coleridge, J., with Erskine, J., after the citation of the conflicting rulings: "It is not immaterial to the question whether the prosecutrix has had this connection against her consent, to show that she has permitted other men to have connection with her, which on cross-examination she has denied"; used as "a fact from which the jury may draw conclusions as to the probabilities of her story"); 1846, R. v. Page, 2 Cox Cr. 133 (rape by a father; former intercourse of the daughter with the father without making complaint, admitted); 1870, R. v. Cockcroft, 11 Cox Cr. 410, Willes, J., and Martin, B. (excluded; but Willes, J., would allow the question to be put on cross-examination); 1871, R. v. Holmes, 12 Cox Cr. 137 (before five judges; the question may be put to the prosecutrix, subject to her privilege not to answer; but no other evidence may be received; the reason given is that of surprise; but the Court confuses the question with that of discrediting a witness, and speaks of "contradictions" on collateral matters as not allowable); 1887, R. v. Riley, 16 Cox Cr. 191 (excluded).

Canada: 1877, Laliberté v. R., 1 Can. Sup. 117, 131, 139, 142, 144 (the prosecutrix may be asked as to connection with other men, but a negative answer cannot be contradicted; 1897, Gross v. Brodrecht, 24 Ont. App. 687 (allowable on cross-examination only; here, indecent assault); 1910, R. v. Muma, 22 Ont.

The state of the law in the various jurisdictions of this country is not uniform; but the exclusionary rule prevails, in some form, in the greater number of jurisdictions.[2]

L. R. 225, 229 (rape on Jan. 31; defence, consent; on Feb. 8 the woman, before then unmarried, was married to V.; cross-examination of the prosecutrix as to having lived with V. as his wife prior to Feb. 8, was held improper; the above cases ignored, and no authority cited; truly the perversity of some courts in some plain things transcends belief).

[2] Alabama: 1887, McQuirk v. State, 84 Ala. 435, 438, 4 So. 775 (excluded); 1908, Griffin v. State, 155 Ala. 88, 46 So. 481 (cross-examination to intercourse subsequent to the date charged, excluded, on the facts; Arkansas: 1855, Pleasant v. State, 15 Ark. 624, 643 (excluding outside testimony, because of the particular-act rule; and excluding cross-examination, because of the witness' disgrace-privilege, thus admitting in the latter case if the privilege is waived); 1904, Plunkett v. State, 72 Ark. 409, 82 S. W. 845 (excluded, on a charge of rape under age); California: 1856, People v. Benson, 6 Cal. 221 (admitting "particular acts of lewdness"); 1898, People v. Kuches, 120 Cal. 566, 52 Pac. 1002 (habitual telling of lewd stories, not accompanied by lewd demeanor, not admissible); 1900, People v. Benc, 130 Cal. 159, 62 Pac. 404 (excluded, even on cross-examination); 1904, People v. Stratton, 141 Cal. 604, 75 Pac. 166 (excluded, on a charge of incest); Connecticut: 1877, State v. Shields, 45 Conn. 256, 257, 260, 263 (former intercourse with others admitted, but on no clear principle); Florida: 1895, Rice v. State, 35 Fla. 236, 17 So. 286 (excluded); 1915, Tully v. State, 69 Fla. 662, 68 So. 934 (rape; cross-examination of complainant to loose conduct with other men, excluded); Georgia: 1904, Black v. State, 119 Ga. 746, 47 S. E. 370 (acts of intercourse with a third person T., offered by his testimony, excluded); Idaho: 1911, State v. Henderson, 19 Ida. 524, 114 Pac. 30 (excluded); Illinois: 1873, Shirwin v. People, 69 Ill. 56 (inadmissible; but admitted here to explain away the fact that the prosecutrix lacked the physiological marks of virginity, — a reason which would seem to be equally available in all such cases); 1876, Dimick v. Downs, 82 Ill. 533 (obscure); 1919, People v. Allen, 289 Ill. 218, 124 N. E. 329 (rape; whether specific acts of unchastity evidenced by other witnesses, were admissible, not decided; but such acts must be prior to the date of the intercourse charged); Indiana: 1861, Wilson v. State, 16 Ind. 393 (admitted); 1884, South Bend v. Hardy, 98 Ind. 582 (same); 1888, Bedgood v. State, 115 Ind. 275, 278, 17 N. E. 621 (question evaded; such intercourse with a member of the defendant's party here admitted, as tending to contradict on a material point); Iowa: 1897, State v. McDonough, 104 Ia. 6, 73 N. W. 357 (excluded); 1907, State v. Blackburn, — Ia. —, 110 N. W. 275 (rape under age; excluded on the principle of § 1001, post, without noticing the present principle); Kansas: 1895, State v. Brown, 55 Kan. 766, 42 Pac. 363 (excluded); Kentucky: 1892, Cargill v. Com., 93 Ky. 578, 581, 20 S. W. 782 (excluded; but here also because the charge was of detaining for prostitution against her will; the latter ground of distinction is unsound); 1897, Brown v. Com., 102 Ky. 227, 43 S. W. 214 (undue liberties allowed to others, received); 1911, Stewart v. Com., 141 Ky. 522, 133 S. W. 202 (detaining with intent to rape; "specific acts of adultery by the prosecutrix with other men. . . . either by other witnesses or by her on cross-examination if he can", held admissible); 1919, Gravitt v. Com., 184 Ky. 429, 212 S. W. 430 (lewd acts with third parties, shortly before, admitted); Louisiana: 1903, State v. DeHart, 109 La. 570, 33 So. 605 (incest; carnal intercourse by the woman with other men, held inadmissible); 1906, State v. Romero, 117 La. 1003, 42 So. 482 (carnal knowledge with consent; the prosecutrix' unchaste conduct, not admitted for the defendant; this is a curious ruling, for it excludes for the defendant that which would have been relevant for the prosecution); Massachusetts: Com. v. Regan, 105 Mass. 593, semble (excluded); 1872, Com. v. McDonald, 110 Mass. 405 (undecided); 1880, Com. v. Harris, 131 Mass. 336 (excluded); 1893, Miller v. Curtis, 158 Mass. 127, 131, 32 N. E. 1039 (excluded); Michigan: 1871, Strang v. People, 24 Mich. 1, 6 (inadmissible, semble, by outside evidence; but questions to the prosecutrix are proper); 1888, People v. McLean, 71 Mich. 309, 38 N. W. 917 (approving the preceding; but also stating, without noting the conflict, that the question cannot be put on cross-examination); 1893, People v. Abbott, 97 Mich. 484, 486, 56 N. W. 862 (excluded); Mississippi: 1859, Anon., 37 Miss. 58, semble (inadmissible); 1895, Brown v. State, 72 Miss. 997, 17 So. 278 (undecided); Missouri: 1898, State v. Whitesell, 142 Mo. 467, 44 S. W. 332 (excluded, on a charge of rape under the age of consent); New Hampshire: 1861, State v. Forschner, 43 N. H. 89 (excluded); 1863, State v. Knapp, 45 N. H. 154, semble (same); New Mexico: 1899, Terr. v. Pino, 9 N. M. 598, 58 Pac. 393 (excluded); New York: 1838, People v. Abbot, 19 Wend. 192, 194 (admissible; see quotation supra); 1857, People v. Jackson, 3 Park. Cr. 398 (inadmissible); 1874, Woods v. People, 55 N. Y. 517 (undecided); North Carolina: 1846, State v. Jefferson, 6 Ired. 305 (kissing and other liberties, excluded); 1857, State v. Henry, 5 Jones L. 65, 70 (an act of lewdness, excluded,

In actions for indecent assault, it would seem that the same principles apply; and the same attitudes would be taken upon this as upon rape.[3] In bastardy or seduction, where pregnancy is a part of the issue, similar evidence may be used for another purpose (ante, § 133). In rape under age, the female's consent being immaterial, her unchaste conduct is for that reason immaterial, on grounds independent of those stated in the text above; and this is generally conceded (ante, § 133, note 5). In seduction, where the statute makes "prior chaste character" a part of the issue, the fact of prior intercourse may become admissible (post, § 205).

The following distinctions are here important:

(1) Historically, the vacillation and the obscurity in the English precedents, and the misconception in some American rulings, were due to the failure to distinguish a second question which usually presents itself at the same time, viz., How far may the character of the woman as a witness be attacked by particular instances of unchaste conduct? In the early 1800s it was already settled (1) that particular acts of misconduct presented by outside testimony could not be used, but were available through cross-examination only (post, § 979); and it was just being settled (2) that only misconduct affecting veracity-character could be so used against a witness (post, §§ 922, 982). Thus the effect of the first rule would be to exclude all extrinsic testimony of particular misconduct of the woman; while the effect of the second because not known to the defendant); 1868, State v. Cherry, 63 N. C. 32 (whether she had not been delivered of a bastard child, and whether she had not had intercourse with other men, admitted, as affecting credibility, on the doctrine of State v. Patterson, § 982, post, and without noticing State v. Jefferson, supra; but in the Jefferson case the cross-examination was not objected to and it was extrinsic evidence that was excluded, while here both question and extrinsic evidence were held proper; so that the two cases may be reconciled); Ohio: 1858, McCombs v. State, 8 Oh. St. 643, 646 (excluded); 1862, McDermott v. State, 13 Oh. St. 332 (same); Oregon: 1901, State v. Ogden, 39 Or. 195, 65 Pac. 449 (inadmissible, even on cross-examination); Porto Rico: 1910, People v. Español, 16 P. R. 203 (rape; cross-examination to intercourse with other men, before and after, allowable); Rhode Island: 1893, State v. Fitzsimon, 18 R. I. 236, 240, 27 Atl. 446 (excluded); South Dakota: 1904, State v. Smith, 18 S. D. 341, 100 N. W. 740 (excluded, on cross-examination, on a charge of rape under age of consent, and semble, also of rape generally); Tennessee: 1874, Titus v. State, 7 Baxt. 132 (admissible); Texas: 1905, Nolen v. State, 48 Tex. Cr. 436, 88 S. W. 242 (admissible); Vermont: 1856, State v. Johnson, 28 Vt. 512 (not allowed with extrinsic evidence, on the usual ground of surprise; but allowed on cross-examination, because "she is able to give satisfactory explanations, if such explanations can be made"; Bennett, J., dissented, because "no such presumption [of general unchastity] should be allowed to arise from a particular instance of an illicit connection with another person", i.e. the ground of irrelevancy); 1867, State v. Reed, 39 Vt. 417 (admissible); 1894, State v. Hollenbeck, 67 Vt. 34, 30 Atl. 696 (same); 1905, State v. Stimpson, 78 Vt. 124, 62 Atl. 14 (cross-examination of the prosecutrix to former acts of prostitution, not allowed on a charge of rape under age, consent being immaterial); Washington: 1913, State v. Holcomb, 73 Wash. 652, 132 Pac. 416 (excluded, even on cross-examination); West Virginia: 1919, State v. Kittle, 85 W. Va. 116, 101 S. E. 70 (rape; former acts of intercourse with other men, admissible to evidence character; rule settled for this State); Wisconsin: 1864, Watry v. Forbes, 18 Wis. 500, 502 (civil action for rape; intercourse with others, admissible as "tending to disprove the probability of the use of force"; whether admissible on the criminal charge, not decided).

[3] 1889, Gore v. Curtis, 81 Me. 403, 17 Atl. 314 (indecent assault and battery and solicitation to adultery; the plaintiff's prior acts of unchastity excluded); 1893, Miller v. Curtis, 158 Mass. 127, 129, 32 N. E. 1039 (same, semble). But not on a charge of carnal abuse of a female under age: 1921, Davis v. State, 150 Ark. 500, 234 S. W. 482.

rule might be to exclude even on cross-examination any inquiry into acts of unchastity. Moreover, the rule forbidding collateral contradiction (post, § 1003) was thought to have a bearing. Having regard to what was then passing in the minds of English judges, the earlier exclusion of the present class of evidence seems to have proceeded from the point of view of the rules about impeaching witnesses. Later, the consideration that there was another point of view became clearer to them, and thus the rulings changed. That the two points of view differ practically in their results is obvious. If regard is had solely to the witness-character of the woman, and we ignore her chastity-character as bearing on consent, the evidence will be excluded in two situations in which it would otherwise be admissible, viz., (a) where the woman does not take the stand as a witness, and (b) where she does take the stand in a jurisdiction (post, § 922) in which veracity-character and not general bad character of a witness is admissible, except in jurisdictions (post, § 982) where acts of unchastity in a woman are regarded as relevant to veracity-character. But modern psychology warns us to be liberal in investigating the moral attributes of women who make complaints of sexual outrages (ante, § 62).

(2) It has been seen (ante, § 62) that the general character of the woman for unchastity is in such cases almost universally received. The question then arises whether the fact of being a professional prostitute is to be assimilated to such a general character; or whether it is to be regarded merely as particular misconduct, and therefore in most jurisdictions inadmissible. With reference to its real significance, and the absence of the dangers of Unfair Surprise and Confusion of Issues, it ought to take the former rank; and this is the general conclusion (ante, § 62).

(3) Other intercourse with the defendant himself is sometimes offered in such cases, but involves in truth a different principle. Such conduct is not intended to show a general willingness or disposition to commit acts of unchastity, but merely an emotion towards the particular defendant tending to allow him to repeat the liberty; it is thus not only more cogent as evidence, but is not open to the objections advanced against evidence of intercourse with third persons; and its admissibility has always been conceded (post, §§ 399, 402).

§ 201. Disposition of an Animal, from its Behavior in Particular Instances. However correct the notion may be psychologically, we are usually more inclined, in the case of animals, to trust individual instances of conduct as illustrating disposition. "In proportion to the element of personality, of the interjection of the free will of a human being, we become more certain of the effects of the causative force and more ready to admit it."[1] Moreover, the doctrines of auxiliary policy (ante, § 199) are less applicable to such evidence. The doctrine of Undue Prejudice (ante, § 194) does not apply; for we do not recognize the animal as entitled to that careful protection from unfair condemnation which we accord to the accused human being. The doctrine of Unfair Surprise offers less of an objection than otherwise, because the possible range of the evidence is much smaller. The doctrine of Confusion of Issues still remains applicable, but the new issues that might be involved are in no way capable of the complexity and variety that are involved in proving the character-acts of a human being. For these reasons it is generally conceded that, in proving the disposition of an animal, particular instances of its conduct are admissible:[2]

§ 201. [1] Mr. Barrows, in 14 Amer. L. Rev. 358.

1864, BIGELOW, C. J., in Todd v. Rowley, 8 All. 51, 58 (to show the timid and unsafe character of the plaintiff's horse, instances were admitted of his having shied so frequently, before and after the time of the injury, as to indicate a vicious habit): "The habit of an animal is in its nature a continuous fact, to be shown by proof of successive acts of a similar kind. Evidence having been first offered to show that the horse had been restive and unmanageable previous to the occasion in question, testimony that he subsequently manifested a similar disposition was competent to prove that his previous conduct was not accidental or unusual, but frequent and the result of a fixed habit at the time of the accident."

3. Conduct to show Character in Issue

§ 202. General Principle. In the numerous classes of cases in which Character may be established, not as evidential of the doing of an Act (ante,

[2] Eng. 1866, Worth v. Gilling, L. R. 2 C. P. 3 (attempts of a dog to bite, to show its ferocious nature admitted); U. S. Ill. 1913, Mithen v. Jeffery, 259 Ill. 372, 102 N. E. 778 (after plaintiff's evidence of two instances of vicious conduct, defendant was allowed to offer, through various witnesses, the conduct of the dog on numerous occasions, amounting to an offer of uniform good disposition); Ky. 1911, Mayfield Lumber Co. v. Lewis' Adm'r., 142 Ky. 727, 135 S. W. 420 (horse's bad conduct after an accident, admitted); Me. 1873, Whiteley v. China, 61 Me. 202 (conduct of a horse in similar places immediately before and after an accident, admitted to show injury to his temper and amiability to control); Mass. 1864, Todd v. Rowley, 8 All. 51 (see quotation supra); 1878, Maggi v. Cutts, 123 Mass. 535 (admitting a horse's vicious conduct); 1897, Broderick v. Higginson, 169 Mass. 482, 48 N. E. 269 (habit of an animal may be shown by "frequent observation of particular instances"); 1905, Palmer v. Coyle, 187 Mass. 136, 72 N. E. 844 (injury by a vicious horse; former vicious acts of the horse, admitted); Mont. 1885, Kennon v. Gilmer, 5 Mont. 257, 265, 5 Pac. 847, affirmed in 131 U. S. 22, 9 Sup. 696 (injury by a carrier using horses alleged to be unsafe; evidence of the horses shying before and after the time in question, admitted); N. H. 1861, Chamberlain v. Enfield, 43 N. H. 356, 360 (acts of skittishness, admitted); 1865, Whittier v. Franklin, 46 N. H. 23, 26 (vicious acts, admitted); 1868, East Kingston v. Towle, 48 N. H. 57, 65 (the issue being whether the defendant's dog had killed the plaintiff's sheep, evidence of former sheep-killings by the dog was not admitted; Doe, J., dissenting; this ruling would probably not be followed in this jurisdiction to-day); Or. 1915, Marks v. Columbia Co. L. Co., 77 Or. 22, 149 Pac. 1041 (injury by a skittish horse; subsequent conduct of the horse, admitted); R. I. 1898, Stone v. Langworthy, 20 R. I. 602, 40 Atl. 832 (conduct of the horse when driven by another, the day before, admitted to show his traits); 1899, Stone v. Pendleton, 21 R. I. 332, 43 Atl. 643 (a horse's prior conduct during the same drive, admitted to show its gentle disposition); 1900, Buckley v. Express Co., 22 R. I. 358, 48 Atl. 7 (prior instance of a horse's propensity to run away, admitted); Vt. 1898, Dover v. Winchester, 70 Vt. 418, 41 Atl. 445 (sheep-killing; defendant's evidence that his dogs did not kill any of his own sheep, and plaintiff's evidence that sheep-killing dogs never killed their owner's sheep, admitted).

As to the range of time of such acts, the trial Court's discretion should control, having regard to the time of probable permanency of disposition: 1878, Maggi v. Cutts, 123 Mass. 535 ("the limit of time within which such misbehavior may be proved must depend largely upon the discretion of the presiding judge").

For the use of an animal's acts to show the owner's notice of his propensity, see post, § 251; for the use of an animal's acts to show the frightening quality of an external object, see post, § 458.

For the use of an animal's general disposition, as evidencing his probable conduct on a particular occasion, see ante, § 68.

§§ 55–68) nor as affecting Notice or Belief (post, §§ 246–258), but because by the principles of substantive law it is one of the propositions in issue (ante, §§ 70–80), the reasons which affect the use of particular acts to evidence the character may not apply as they do to such acts used as evidence of a defendant's or of other persons' character used evidentially (ante, §§ 192–201).

It is indispensable to examine the precise application of these reasons to this class of cases. (1) The doctrine of probative value, or Relevancy, remains the same; conduct is here as elsewhere a legitimate basis for inference to disposition or character. (2) The doctrine of Undue Prejudice disappears (except in a few instances), since there is no defendant (except in those instances) to be condemned penally and therefore likely to suffer unjustly for past misdeeds. Moreover, the risk of hasty and unjustifiable inference from one past act to the present act charged (ante, § 194) is wanting, since the ultimate thing to be proved is not the doing of an act, but a disposition. (3) The doctrine of Unfair Surprise remains the same, in one aspect, and yet not the same. Its application is not the same, in the sense that there is no prior notice that character would be offered evidentially; for here the law of the case warns beforehand that character will be an issue in it. But its application does remain the same, in the sense that there can be no anticipation as to the time, place, and kind of act that will be predicated as showing the character; and thus the impossibility of being prepared to disprove fabricated testimony and the unfairness of such a situation (ante, § 194, post, § 1849) remain precisely the same. It is this double aspect of the surprise-argument that causes most of the conflict of rulings upon this subject. (4) The doctrine of Confusion of Issues (ante, § 194, post, § 1904) is no longer so serious an objection, because, since a specific character is usually the issue, the use of particular instances of such a character keeps the general trend of the investigation within the lines of that issue as marked out by the substantive law of the case, and does not tend to such diversion of attention as would be possible in proving (for example) the character of an accused person. (5) There is a greater practical necessity for the use of specific instances of conduct, in this class of cases. In the preceding topics, where character is merely evidential of the act in issue, there will always be a dozen other and more cogent facts evidencing this act, and the restriction of the evidence of Character to reputation-evidence cuts off only a trifling portion of the total available evidence for the main issue. But where Character itself is the main issue (or one of them), the exclusion of the particular instances of conduct would leave the proving party restricted solely to reputation-evidence as the single evidential source available for getting at the main issue (or one of the issues) in the case (since Opinion is excluded, post, § 1980); and the generally indecisive and inferior nature of reputation-evidence makes it an unsatisfactory source to serve as the exclusive one available. Thus, there is here, as there is not in the former topics, a certain necessity for the use of particular acts or conduct, i.e. the loss of it would be felt as it would not be in the other cases.

It may be seen, then, that (apart from the doctrine of Unfair Surprise) everything points towards the propriety of allowing the use of particular instances of conduct to prove character wherever character is by the law of the case a proposition to be proved. This was the orthodox common-law view, enunciated in general and unequivocal terms:

1742, L. C. HARDWICKE, in Clark v. Periam, 2 Atk. 337 (cross-bill to cancel a bond because given 'ex turpi causa', to wit, for criminal conversation with a lewd woman, the plaintiff): "The counsel insist . . . that the plaintiff is not entitled to examine to anything but her character in general, because it is impossible for Mrs. C. to be prepared to give an answer to the particular facts charged; for though everybody is supposed to be ready, to support a general character, yet not a particular fact. . . . As to the reason of the thing: In criminal prosecutions it comes in only collaterally and incidentally and is not the particular thing to be tried; and when that is the case, they are not supposed to be prepared with evidence. But compare this with cases where the character is the particular issue to be tried; suppose in the case of an indictment for keeping a common bawdy-house, without charging any particular fact; though the charge is general, yet at the trial you may give in evidence particular facts and the particular time of doing them; the same rule as to keeping a common gaming-house. This is the practice in all cases where the general behavior or quality or circumstance of the mind is in issue; as for instance, in 'non compos mentis', it is the experience of every day, that you give particular acts of madness in evidence, and not general only, that he is insane; so where you charge that a man is addicted to drinking, and liable to be imposed upon, you are not confined in general to his being a drunkard, but particular instances are allowed to be given. . . . Wherever the general life or conversation is put in issue, it is notice to the person who is charged that she should be prepared to take off the weight of that evidence; but where it comes in collaterally you shall be confined to general evidence. This seems to me to be the distinction, and the grounds of it; and if I was of a different opinion, I should overturn the constant course of this court and make the greatest confusion."

1811, ROANE, J., in Fall v. Overseers, 3 Munf. 495, 505: "In all cases in which the general character or behavior is put in issue, evidence of particular facts may be admitted; for whatever is material to the issue each party must come prepared to prove or to deny."[1]

The doctrine is found constantly repeated in these broad terms, though seldom expressly decided except in connection with the particular classes of cases ensuing. It represents a general policy and tendency, which connects, supports, and explains the various instances in which such evidence is admitted.

Nevertheless, it cannot be stated in these broad terms as an invariable rule. There are one or two settled exceptions to it; and there are other disputed instances in which some Courts refuse to accept it. This opposing tendency has occasionally, in modern times, gone so far that even the general validity of the doctrine is repudiated, — chiefly on the ground that it involves all the serious dangers protected against by the doctrine of Unfair Surprise:

1893, KNOWLTON, J., in Miller v. Curtis, 163 Mass. 127, 131, 32 N. E. 1039: "It is a general rule, which has been adhered to with great strictness in this Commonwealth, that when character is in issue, it may be shown only by evidence of general reputation, and not by proof of specific acts. . . . The principal reason for this rule is that a multiplicity of issues would be raised if special acts, covering perhaps a lifetime, could be shown. It might be necessary to go into the circumstances attending each act before it could be determined what its nature was and what effect should be given to it. It would be impossible for the opposing party to come prepared to meet evidence upon matters in regard to which he had no notice, and great injustice might be done by bearing biased and false testimony to which no answer could be made."

§ 202. [1] Accord: 1767, Buller, Trials at Nisi Prius, 295; 1835, People v. White, 14 Wend. 113 (because character is not collateral, and "it is impossible without particular facts to prove the charge"; no examples mentioned).

This passage is assuredly unsound as a statement of the general rule. The common law began rather with the doctrine of Lord Hardwicke as the general rule; and the exceptions, whether universally or only locally recognized can hardly be said to justify a statement that the general rule favors exclusion rather than admission. The only satisfactory mode of decision is to consider by itself each instance where character may be in issue, note the application of the various reasons, and solve the problem for that instance; bearing always in mind these two general tendencies or policies operating respectively for admission and for exclusion.

The various instances fall into a natural grouping according as character is an issue (1) by the substantive law of the case, i.e. as involved in the cause of action, or (2) by the remedial law, i.e. as affecting the mitigation of damages. In the latter group the various instances are apt to have something in common; in the former group the peculiar substantive law of each case is of prime consequence.

§ 203. "Common" Offender (Cheats, Liquor-sellers, Barrators, Gamblers, Drunkards, etc.). The typical case, to which Lord Hardwicke's rule applies, and for which it is as good law to-day as it ever was, is that of a charge of being a "common" offender of one sort or another, — a common cheat, a common gambler, a common drunkard, and the like. The peculiarity of the issue is that it involves not so much the inward disposition or trait of the person charged as his habitual doing of certain outward acts; and thus, while the issue is traditionally said to involve "character", it really involves rather a repetition of conduct as the thing to be proved. Thus, while reputation as to this course of conduct may be an admissible sort of evidence (post, § 1620), the most natural and cogent sort will be a series of particular acts of the kind charged. The only question would be as to the sufficiency of the number of these acts to justify the epithet of "common" or "habitual"; and this will not affect the admissibility of any particular instance (unless so far as the statute specifies a minimum number), but will be a matter for the jury, under instructions of law from the judge. The objection of surprise may sometimes be a serious one; but the necessity of the situation must control, and in some instances the danger of surprise is obviated by requiring prior notice of the alleged instances that will be relied on.

For this purpose, then, evidence of particular acts is always admissible.[1]

§ 203. [1] England: 1767, Buller, Nisi Prius, 296; 1802, McNally, Evidence, 324 (both these writers declare the general doctrine; in barratry, notice of the specific acts charged is necessary); 1808, R. v. Roberts, 1 Camp. 399 (indictment for "conspiracy to carry on the

There may also be analogous instances in which the issue is practically the same, though not arising in a criminal charge against the person as defendant.[2] Distinguish here the use of particular instances to prove Habit in the strict sense, as not involving character (post, § 376).

§ 204. House of Ill-fame. It has already been seen (ante, § 78) that, apart from statutes constituting the repute of the house as the sole element of the crime of professional pandering, the character or use of the house and the character or occupation of the inmates may come into issue. Two questions having a bearing here are thus presented. (1) May particular instances of prostitution in the house be offered, as showing its habitual use or character? (2) May particular acts of prostitution by the inmates be offered, as showing their occupation or character as prostitutes? Both these questions should be answered in the affirmative, for the same reason as in the preceding class of cases; the considerations affecting the question are practically identical.[1] business of a common cheat"; "cumulative instances are necessary to prove the offence").

United States: 1920, McNutt v. U. S., 8th C. C. A., 267 Fed. 670 (carrying on illegal liquor business without paying tax; "one or two sales of liquor are not sufficient"); 1922, Lewinsohn v. U. S., 7th C. C. A., 278 Fed. 421 (injunction against a liquor nuisance; one sale may suffice); 1864, Ingram v. State, 39 Ala. 247, 253 (doctrine recognized for a common barrator, common seller of liquor, etc.); 1911, Martin v. State, 2 Ala. App. 175, 56 So. 64 (keeping a gaming table for gaming); 1895, Wright v. Crawfordsville, 142 Ind. 636, 642, 42 N. E. 227 (habit of intoxication, provable by specific acts); 1834, Com. v. Moore, 2 Dana Ky. 402 (common gambler); Com. v. Hopkins, 2 Dana Ky. 419 (same); 1904, State v. Behan, 113 La. 701, 37 So. 607 (keeping a house for illegal faro-banking; dealing faro in the same place ten or fifteen days before, admitted); 1878, World v. State, 50 Md. 49, 54 (under St. 1864, c. 38, on a charge of being a "common thief", acts other than of stealing are not admissible, nor any acts done before the statutory period); 1855, Com. v. Whitney, 5 Gray Mass. 85 (common drunkard; no particular number of instances are necessary or sufficient); 1873, Com. v. McNamee, 112 Mass. 285 (in proving the defendant a "common drunkard", the facts of intoxication five to seven times within four months, sufficient to support a finding of "habitual drunkenness").

Compare the cases cited post, § 367, n. 3 (prior offences to show intent in illegal gaming).

[2] 1876, Smith v. State, 55 Ala. 11 (where a statute forbade selling liquor to a person of "known intemperate habits"); 1852, McMahon v. Harrison, 6 N. Y. 443, 447 (incompetency as administrator because of professional habits of gambling; his habits in November, 1348, when last heard from, "presumptive evidence" of similar habits in July, 1850).

§ 204. [1] (1) Acts of prostitution to show the use of the house: 1900, Howard v. People, 27 Colo. 396, 61 Pac. 595 (keeping a house of ill-fame; acts of any time within the statutory period, admitted, the offence being a continuing one; former convictions for similar offences, admitted); 1846, Caldwell v. State, 17 Conn. 467, 473 (resort by particular prostitutes); 1918, People v. Berger, 284 Ill. 47, 119 N. E. 975 (keeping a house of ill-fame; conversations of inmates, not admissible; here received, however, on the principle of § 1071, post); 1896, Egan v. Gordan, 65 Minn. 505, 68 N. W. 103 (in an action to recover rent); 1860, State v. M'Gregor, 41 N. H. 407, 412 (acts of prostitution); 1920, State v. Morris, 94 N. J. L. 19, 108 Atl. 765 (keeping a disorderly house; "acts of a disorderly character by persons in the house, and what was said by them at the time as a part of those acts", admitted); 1863, Harwood v. People, 26 N. Y. 190 (repeated arrests, at the house, of persons before convicted as prostitutes); 1863, Kenyon v. State, 26 N. Y. 203, 209 ("particular facts, . . . such as the harboring of unchaste persons"); 1896, Lanpher v. Clark, 149 N. Y. 472, 44 N. E. 182; ("such specific acts of immorality and impropriety" on the keeper's part "as tend to furnish a reasonable inference as to the real character of the place"); 1903, People v. Glennon, 175 N. Y. 45, 67 N. E. 125 (admitted, on a charge of the defendant patrolman's neglect of duty in failing to arrest the persons keeping such a house); 1846, State v. Patterson, 7 Ired. N. C. 70.

(2) Acts of prostitution to show the occupation of persons resorting to the house: Accord: 1915, State v. Koettgen, 88 N. J. L. 51, 95 Atl. 747 (keeping a disorderly house; "acts and sayings", admitted, "to show the character of the people, and hence of the place where they gather; . . . thieves and prostitutes do not gather at a church"); Contra: 1861, Com. v. Gannett, 1 All. Mass. 7; 1908,

§ 205. Seduction; Statutory Action or Prosecution. Where by statute the seduction of an unmarried woman is made a crime against the State or a cause of civil action for the woman, the character of the woman is usually treated by the statute as affecting the crime or wrong, and becomes a proposition to be proved (ante, § 79). Under such statutes several questions arise, involving the present principle:

(1) Where the statute applies to women of "chaste character", does this signify the actual inward character or disposition? If so, particular acts of unchastity are certainly relevant to disprove this actual character. Although the objection of Unfair Surprise is here as elsewhere a serious one, the practical necessity for resorting to this kind of evidence, and its cogency if believed, are perhaps greater than in any of these kindred topics. Accordingly, it is generally conceded that such instances may be offered by the defendant.[1]

(2) Where the statute applies to women of "good repute for chastity", it is clear that by the statutory terms the reputation is the thing in issue; and a particular act is obviously irrelevant to show reputation. Such acts are therefore inadmissible under these statutes.[2]

State v. Baans, 77 N. J. L. 123, 71 Atl. 111 (conviction of several inmates, excluded; the opinion is valueless, confusing obviously distinct things, and apparently prepared in a great hurry; the only point that could properly have been made, namely, that of § 1270, post, is not noticed); 1915, State v. Littman, 88 N. J. L. 392, 96 Atl. 66 (keeping a disorderly house; "conduct and conversation" of persons frequenting it, held admissible only because such acts of misconduct were charged in the indictment, but not to evidence the reputation of the frequenters; the Court of Errors and Appeals here corrects the rule declared by the Supreme Court in State v. Littman, 86 N. J. L. 453, 92 Atl. 580; nothing said about State v. Koettgen, supra).

§ 205. [1] Iowa: 1857, Andre v. State, 5 Ia. 389; 1865, State v. Carron, 18 Ia. 372, 375; 1871, State v. Shean, 32 Ia. 88, 92 ("It will not do if she possesses a reputation for chastity; she must be really so"); 1871, State v. Higdon, 32 Ia. 252 (same); 1880, West v. Druff, 55 Ia. 335, 336, 7 N. W. 636 ("conversations, acts, and associations are manifestations of character, and constitute the true index of the heart"); 1905, State v. Hummer, 128 Ia. 505, 104 N. W. 722 (nature of chastity defined); 1922, State v. Davis, — Ia. —, 187 N. W. 692 (but here also admitting for the defendant the woman's illicit relations with specific other men after the alleged seduction, to disprove the fact of her reliance on the promise to marry); Minnesota: 1860, State v. Timmens, 4 Minn. 325, 334 (since there may be reformation); Missouri: 1892, State v. Biize, 111 Mo. 464, 471, 20 S. W. 210; Nebraska: 1904, Woodruff v. State, 72 Nebr. 815, 101 N. W. 1114 ("specific acts of lewdness" are admissible); New York: 1853, Crozier v. People, 1 Park. Cr. 453 (contra, Safford v. People, 1 Park. Cr. 478, and Carpenter v. People, 8 Barb. 608, on the ground that the statutory term "chaste" may still be appropriately used of a woman who has had one act of illicit intercourse; but these are now practically repudiated by the next case); 1863, Kenyon v. State, 26 N. Y. 203, 203 ("specific acts of lewdness", admissible); Oklahoma: 1909, Marshall v. Terr., 2 Okl. Cr. 136, 101 Pac. 139 ("chaste" is "a condition actually existing"); 1911, Hast v. Terr., 5 Okl. Cr. 162, 114 Pac. 261; Tennessee: 1873, Love v. Masoner, 6 Baxt. 24, 33; Washington: 1910, State v. Dacke, 59 Wash. 238, 109 Pac. 1050 (rape under age); 1911, State v. Workman, 66 Wash. 292, 119 Pac. 751 (statutory rape).

For the use of reputation in rebuttal in such cases, see post, § 1620. Of course, the women may call other witnesses to deny such acts insinuated on her cross-examination: 1922, Polk v. State, — Tex. Cr. —, 238 S. W. 934.

[2] 1885, State v. Bryan, 34 Kan. 63, 69, 8 Pac. 260 (because the statute affects "any female of good repute"); 1907, Russell v. State, 77 Nebr. 519, 110 N. W. 380 (excluded); 1881, Zabriskie v. State, 43 N. J. L. 640, 646 ("There is a distinction between actual personal virtue and 'good repute for chastity' as used in our statute; . . . it does not necessarily follow that they are co-existent"); 1896, Foley v. State, 59 N. J. L. 1, 35 Atl. 105 ("where the legislative language is unmistakably clear, it is the duty of the Court to enforce it in that sense"); 1907, State v. Slattery, 74 N. J. L. 241, 65 Atl. 866 (Foley v. State followed); 1876, Bowers v. State, 29 Oh. St. 542, 545 (the statute applied to "any female of good repute for chastity"; other illicit intercourse excluded; Welch, C. J.: "If she has repented of

(3) Where the statute prescribes nothing expressly as to the woman's chastity, shall a requirement of actual chastity be implied into the statutory elements of the crime or the wrong? Having regard to the purpose of the statute and to the singular consequences of omitting such a requirement, it seems highly proper to make the implication:[3]

1876, MARSTON, J., in People v. Clark, 33 Mich. 112, 118: "In most of the States their statute makes the seduction of a woman of 'previous chaste character' an indictable offence, while there are no such words, nor any of like import, in ours; and the Courts [in those States] have held that the words 'previous chaste character' mean that she shall possess actual personal virtue, in distinction to a good reputation, and that a single act of illicit connection may therefore be shown on behalf of the defendant. . . . The object of this statute was not to punish illicit cohabitation; its object was to punish the seducer who by his arts and persuasions prevails over the chastity of an unmarried woman. . . . If, however, she had already fallen, [there is no seduction.] . . . Then the chastity of the female at the time of the alleged act is in all cases involved."

1883, SMITH, J., in Polk v. State, 40 Ark. 482, 486 (a statute punished "carnal knowledge of any female by virtue of any feigned or pretended marriage", etc.): "In every prosecution for seduction the character of the seduced female is involved in the issue; and character means in this connection, not her general reputation in the community, but the possession of actual personal chastity; . . . the Legislature never intended to send a man to the penitentiary for having had illicit connection with a prostitute or a woman of easy virtue where she had consented, even under a promise of marriage."

(4) In the first and third cases preceding, does a "chaste character" mean merely the physical condition of virginity, or does it signify the moral disposition to be chaste? If the former, then nothing short of intercourse would be relevant; if the latter, then any lewd behavior would be relevant. The latter interpretation is generally accepted:[4] her past error and by her upright walk acquired an unimpeachable reputation for chastity, the law protects her against the man who overcomes her good resolves by a promise of marriage").

In Missouri the opposite view is now taken: 1883, State v. Brassfield, 81 Mo. 151, 157 ("There is a material difference between our statutes and those statutes under which such evidence has been held admissible in other States"); 1885, State v. Patterson, 88 Mo. 88, 95, 100 ("Our statute is worded a little differently, but in substance and effect is the same" as the others; in State v. Brassfield "we went too far"; Henry, C. J., diss., in a good opinion); 1888, State v. Wheeler, 94 Mo. 252, 7 S. W. 103 (preceding case approved).

[3] Alabama: 1883, Wilson v. State, 73 Ala. 527, 533 (the statute applied to "any unmarried female"; held that "the statute is for the protection of the chastity of unmarried women, and the existence of the virtue at the time of the intercourse is a necessary ingredient of the offence"; but here an amendment had expressly so provided); 1888, Hussey v. State, 86 Ala. 34, 36, 5 So. 484; 1888, Munkers v. State, 87 Ala. 94, 97, 6 So. 357; 1896, Bracken v. State, 111 Ala. 68, 20 So. 636, semble; 1898, Smith v. State, 118 Ala. 117, 24 So. 55 (inquiry is as to actual chastity; in rebuttal, good character since the time of seduction is inadmissible); 1898, Suther v. State, 118 Ala. 88, 24 So. 43; Arkansas: 1883, Polk v. State, Ark. (quoted supra); 1903, Walton v. State, 71 id. 398, 75 S. W. 1; Hawaii: 1896, Woodward v. Republic, 10 Haw. 416 (admitting particular acts); Iowa: 1913, State v. McClure, 159 Ia. 351, 140 N. W. 203; Michigan: 1873, People v. Brewer, 27 Mich. 133, 135, semble; 1876, People v. Clark, 33 Mich. 112, 118 (holding, nevertheless, that there may be a reformation, and thus that "if she has repented of that act and reformed, she may again be seduced"); 1879, People v. Knapp, 42 Mich. 267, 268, 3 N. W. 927; 1882, People v. Squires, 49 Mich. 487, 488, 13 N. W. 828 (maintaining that there may be a reformed chastity); South Carolina: 1909, State v. Turner, 82 S. C. 278, 64 S. E. 424 (seduction: under St. 1905, Feb. 22, the State need not prove chastity).

[4] Accord: 1888, Hussey v. State, 86 Ala. 34, 36, 5 So. 484, semble (acts of indecency); 1883, Polk v. State, 40 Ark. 482, 487 ("particular acts of immorality or indecorum"); 1857, Andre v. State, 5 Ia. 389, 395 (quoted supra);

1857, WOODWARD, J., in Andre v. State, 5 Ia. 389, 395: "The statute is for the protection of the pure in mind, for the innocent in heart, who may have been led astray. . . . [Obscenity of language, indecency of conduct, and undue familiarity with men] serve to indicate the true character; they become exponents of it; and a defendant is not punished for an act with one whose conversation and manners may even have suggested the thought, and opened the way to him, as he would be for the same act with one innocent in mind and manners."

(5) In any case, acts of unchastity after the seduction have no relevancy.[5]

§ 206. Excuse for Breach of Promise of Marriage. The unchaste character of the promisee, whether existing and concealed before the promise or supervening after the promise, may be treated as the breach of a condition or representation, and therefore as an excuse for refusal to fulfil the promise of marriage. In such a case, the unchaste character may be shown by a particular act of intercourse with another or by other lewd behavior, for the same reasons as in the preceding topic.[1] The use of such conduct as affecting the mitigation of damages (post, § 213) raises slightly different questions.

§ 207. Justification of Defamation of Character. Where a defendant in an action for defamation pleads the truth of his charge, and the charge is not of a specific act of misconduct, but of a general bad character or trait or habit or course of dealings, the proper mode of proof for him, is often not an easy matter to discern. On the one hand, it is clear that, where he charges a habit or occupation or course of dealings, he must be allowed to use specific instances of it as cumulatively assisting to substantiate the general charge; and this, on the principle of § 202, ante, seems to be conceded generally.[1] On the other 1865, State v. Carron, 18 Ia. 372, 375; 1871, State v. Shean, 32 Ia. 88, 90 ("acts of lewdness and immodesty"); 1871, State v. Higdon, 32 Ia. 262, 264 semble.

Contra: 1898, People v. Kehoe, 123 Cal. 224, 55 Pac. 911 (seduction; "unchaste character" may be shown only by intercourse, not by mere indecencies).

[5] 1896, Bracken v. State, 111 Ala. 68, 20 So. 637; 1883, Polk v. State, 40 Ark. 482, 478; 1897, People v. Wade, 118 Cal. 672, 50 Pac. 841; 1913, Bray v. U. S., 39 D. C. App. 600 (seduction; the woman's intercourse with others subsequent to the seduction, excluded here on the facts); 1898, Keller v. State, 102 Ga. 506, 31 S. E. 92; 1876, People v. Clark, 33 Mich. 112, 117; 1905, People v. Cordova, 9 P. R. 311; 1914, State v. Jones, 80 Wash. 585, 142 Pac. 35 (criminal seduction; subsequent intercourse with another man, excluded).

Other intercourse with the defendant himself may also be admissible as throwing light upon the incidental question, which arises under some statutes, whether the seduction was upon a promise of marriage (post, §§ 399, 401).

For particular acts as admissible to mitigate damages in the parent's action for seduction, see post, § 210.

On a charge of adultery, the woman's previous intercourse with others than the defendant is of course immaterial: 1879, People v. Knapp, 42 Mich. 267, 268, 3 N. W. 927.

§ 206. [1] 1801, Foulkes v. Sellway, 3 Esp. 236 (the plaintiff's bad character in defence to an action on a promise of marriage; evidence of an act of gross misconduct received); 1796, Woodard v. Bellamy, 2 Root Conn. 354 ("particular instances of unchastity" admitted); 1873, Sheahan v. Barry, 27 Mich. 217, 221 (considered here from the point of view both of excuse and of mitigation); 1895, Stratton v. Dole, 45 Nebr. 472, 63 N. W. 87 (same).

§ 207. [1] ENGLAND: 1880, R. v. Labouchere, 14 Cox Cr. 419, 428, 43 (libel charging that the prosecutor gained his livelihood in 1878 by card-sharping; evidence admitted of his having so gained a living in 1876 and 1877; to show this habit in given years, evidence of two instances of card-sharping was received, and it was left to the jury to say whether they would infer that the prosecutor, as charged, "lived by card-sharping"); 1915, Maisel v. Financial Times, 3 K. B. 336 (libel, with justification; the statement being that plaintiff was of a character and repute to misappropriate funds of the O. T. G. Co., particular acts of a similar kind within 2 or 3 months after publication were held admissible; earlier cases not cited); hand, so far as his charge concerned, not merely some outward course of conduct, but the plaintiff's inward and moral disposition — character, in the strict sense — he is met by a doctrine which tells him (from the point of view of the surprise-argument) that this is unfair, that no plaintiff can be prepared to meet evidence ranging over his whole life, and that a simple and just mode of adducing the supposed facts is to plead them specifically as supporting the truth of the charge.[2] The difficulty is to draw the line between the two rules, and to determine when the charge involves disposition or trait of character and when it involves merely a habit or course of dealings. No Court seems yet to have furnished a satisfactory solution of this difficulty.

It is after all chiefly one of pleading, for no one can doubt that, to prove a bad trait of character as charged, specific instances of its exhibition are relevant, and a mode of pleading which avoids the objection of unfair surprise would obviate the only impropriety of such evidence.[3]

UNITED STATES: Ill. 1905, Dowie v. Priddle, 216 Ill. 553, 75 N. E. 243, semble (the proof under the plea, held here not to meet the defamatory statements sued for); Ky. 1896, Ratcliff v. Courier-Journal, 99 Ky. 416, 36 S. W. 177 (libel; to prove a charge that the plaintiff "has been in more rows than any other one man in this country", evidence was admitted of "many instances of quarrels and disturbances" in which he had taken part); N. Y. 1896, Lampher v. Clark, 149 N. Y. 472, 44 N. E. 182 (a charge of keeping a disorderly house; "such specific acts of immorality and impropriety on the part of the plaintiff as to furnish a reasonable inference as to the real character of the place", admitted); 1911, McKane v. Howard, 202 N. Y. 181, 95 N. E. 642 (particular instances of fornication, admissible).

Contra: 1907, Colburn v. Marble, 196 Mass. 376, 82 N. E. 28.

[2] England: 1822, Jones v. Stevens, 11 Price 235 (charge of being a disreputable attorney; particular acts excluded on the ground of surprise, the reason being the same as under § 71, ante, where a quotation is given; the Court went even further, and declined to allow a truth-justification of a general charge to be supported by general evidence of bad character, its policy being to force all justifications of general slander to plead specific acts of the nature charged; these acts if thus pleaded, could be used to prove the charge true); 1882, Scott v. Sampson, 8 Q. B. D. 491 (libel for charging that the plaintiff had obtained £500 from G. under a threat of publishing certain facts, and had systematically abused his position as a dramatic critic and a journalist for the purpose of extorting money; the question was asked the plaintiff whether he had used his position as critic of the Daily Telegraph to injure or annoy an actor; Cave, J.: "Mr. Willes supported the question on the ground that it was material to the justification, as showing that the plaintiff had abused his position as critic for other purposes than that of extorting money; viz., for the purpose of grossly abusing a man whom he personally disliked. Lord Coleridge held — as I think rightly — that the question was not admissible as tending to prove justification; the natural meaning of the libel being that the witness abused his position as a critic for the purpose of extorting money. Mr. Willes now contends that it was also admissible as evidence tending to show the plaintiff's general bad character. I am of opinion that . . . as evidence of particular facts tending to show the plaintiff's disposition, it is therefore inadmissible"); Eng. Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, Order XXXVI, Rule 37 (quoted post, § 209).

Ireland: 1904, Hewson v. Cleeve, L. R. 2 Ire. 536, 542 (on a general charge of swindling, justified, particulars must be notified; J'Anson v. Stuart, cited ante, § 73, and subsequent cases and statutes, commented on).

United States: 1899, Swan v. Thompson, 124 Cal. 193, 56 Pac. 878 (charge of being a drunkard; specific acts of drunkenness "not included within the lines marked out by the plea of justification", excluded); 1899, McGee v. Baumgartner, 121 Mich. 287, 80 N. W. 21 (specific acts excluded); 1907, Smithy v. Pinch, 148 Mich. 670, 112 N. W. 686 (charge of being a "low woman"; on a plea of truth, specific acts excluded); 1906, Pier v. Speer, 73 N. J. L. 633, 64 Atl. 161 (slanderous charge of fornication and bastardy; under a plea of justification, an offer to prove the plaintiff to have had gonorrhœa, not admitted on the facts); 1914, State v. Jones, 80 Wash. 588, 142 Pac. 35 (here allowed on cross-examination).

[3] In the following instances there were such specific instances pleaded: 1902, Cunningham v. Underwood, 53 C. C. A. 99, 116 Fed. 803, 809 (libel charging the plaintiff with "im-

§ 208. Incompetence of Employee. In evidencing the incompetency of an employee, as a fact which if known to the employer may make him liable for injury to a fellow-employee, there is not always the same necessity for evidence of particular acts of incompetence, because in many jurisdictions personal opinion of those who know him is received (post, § 1984). Moreover, the possible range of the evidence is greater, and emphasizes the argument of Unfair Surprise, as well as that of Undue Prejudice (ante, § 94). Finally, there may be a limitation from the point of view of Relevancy, since an act of mere negligence does not in itself show incompetence, nor does a single act of any sort necessarily show a lack of the general trait in question. These reasons have led some Courts to forbid this mode of proof:

1887, DEVENS, J., in Hatt v. Nay, 144 Mass. 186, 10 N. E. 807: "Because a servant may have been guilty of negligence on certain specified occasions, it by no means follows . . . that he might not ordinarily be a careful and skilful workman and properly employed as such. The investigation of other individual acts of alleged carelessness on the foreman's part would necessarily have a tendency to confuse the case by collateral inquiries, to protract it infinitely if those inquiries were carefully made, and to mislead and distract a Court or jury from the true issue."

There is, however, much to be said for the opposite view. A single act may signify little, but two or three of an extreme quality would signify everything. Fabricated testimony could be exposed, if notice were required and time were allowed. Proof by reputation is inconclusive, and needs to be reenforced. There is a danger of being too cautious in excluding evidence:

1895, DENMAN, J., in Cunningham v. R. Co., 88 Tex. 534, 31 S. W. 629: "The pleadings and evidence, however, raise the issue as to Rownie's competency as a car inspector, which involves, first, his skill; and, second, his attentiveness to duty. If he was lacking in either of these qualities, he could not be said to be competent to perform the important duties required of him. It is a matter of common knowledge that some persons are by nature inattentive or thoughtless, and, as a result thereof, frequently neglect the performance of important duties, without an intention so to do. This mental quality can only be evidenced by the outward acts of the person, and, where its existence or nonexistence is in issue, evidence of such acts is admissible. If Rownie was an inattentive or thoughtless person, such mental quality was a relevant fact upon the issue as to whether he probably inspected the cars on the particular morning of the accident. . . . Thus it seems that frequent failures to perform this duty at different times would be competent evidence tending to prove this mental condition, and we see no reason why such omissions subsequent to the time of the accident would be less competent than similar omissions prior to the time of the accident. The question here is the existence or nonexistence of a mental condimoral", "dishonest", and "dishonorable" conduct; defendant allowed, on a plea of truth, to prove "specific instances of just such conduct as a defence, the justification having been pleaded with sufficient particularity); 1868, Talmadge v. Baker, 22 Wis. 625 (Cole, J.: "The plaintiff in effect says, 'You have defamed my character by charging me generally with a propensity to steal [the charge was, "He is in the habit of picking up things"]'. 'True,' the defendant replies, 'I have so charged, and I propose to make good my words by showing that you have been guilty of various larcenies mentioned in my answer' "); 1906, Earley v. Winn, 129 Wis. 291, 109 N. W. 633 (slander that plaintiff whipped her mother; particular other violent acts to her mother, excluded; but this seems inconsistent with Talmadge v. Baker, supra, which is not cited).

For the use of other instances of adultery or incest, where such conduct has been charged by the defendant in defamation, see post, § 400.

tion or quality of the servant; inattentiveness or thoughtlessness, rendering him incompetent, such incompetency being direct evidence on the main issue in the case. We see no reason why specific acts cannot be given in evidence upon such issue, just as they could upon the issue of testamentary or contractual capacity."

The latter view seems on the whole the better; but the direct rulings are comparatively few.[1]

The state of the law is complicated by the frequent failure to distinguish two other related questions: (1) Whether, when character is offerable evidentially to prove the negligent act of a defendant or a plaintiff or a defendant's employee, this character may be shown by particular negligent acts (ante, § 199); the evidence here is of a narrower scope, but is offerable upon more numerous issues, than in the above case; (2) Whether particular acts of an employee may be used to show knowledge of his incompetency by his employer

§ 208. [1] California: 1892, Smith v. Whittier, 95 Cal. 279, 292, 30 Pac. 529 ("Previous negligent acts", admissible); 1893, Holland v. Southern P. Co., 100 Cal. 240, 34 Pac. 666 (specific acts of an engineer, held admissible to show incompetence; but a single act is insufficient of itself); Delaware: 1901, Giordano v. Brandywine Granite Co., Del., 3 Pennewill 423, 52 Atl. 332 (admissible); Illinois: 1899, Consolidated Coal Co. v. Seniger, 170 Ill. 370, 53 N. E. 733 (mine-engineer's competency; his prior conduct admitted to show his "fitness or unfitness"); 1903, Metropolitan W. S. E. R. Co. v. Fortin, 203 Ill. 454, 67 N. E. 977 (motorman of an elevated railroad; "that he had run past signals, had jerked the train he was pulling, and had been laid off and reprimanded" on former occasions, admitted); 1905, Staunton Coal Co. v. Bub, 218 Ill. 125, 75 N. E. 770 (injury in a mine by an engineer's negligence in hoisting the cage; the engineer's habitual hoisting of the cage without signal, admitted to show his incompetence); 1906, Joseph Taylor Coal Co. v. Dawes, 220 Ill. 145, 77 N. E. 131 (injury to a mine-workman by the lowering of the cage at a speed exceeding the statutory rate; that "the engineer repeatedly lowered the cage" at excessive speed, held not admissible on the present principle, but admissible to show a knowing and wilful violation of the statute, on the principle of § 367, post); Maine: 1916, Wing v. Bradstreet & Sons Co., 115 Me. 394, 99 Atl. 36 (incompetency of a fellow-servant; a prior accident 5 years before, held insufficient); Maryland: 1893, Baltimore v. War, 77 Md. 593, 598, 27 Atl. 85 (two or three accidents to the employee's elevator-cage the day before, excluded; no authority cited); Massachusetts: 1885, Keith v. N. H. & N. Co., 140 Mass. 175, 179, 3 N. E. 28 (admissible sometimes; here, the acts of a car-inspector, to show incompetency); 1887, Hatt v. Nay, 144 Mass. 186, 10 N. E. 807 (specific acts of negligence excluded; see quotation supra); 1893, Kennedy v. Spring, 160 Mass. 203, 205, 35 N. E. 779 (inadmissible; following Hatt v. Nay); 1894, Connors v. Morton, 160 Mass. 333, 35 N. E. 860 (same); 1910, Grebenstein v. Stone & Webster Eng. Co., 205 Mass. 431, 91 N. E. 411 ("evidence of a specific act of negligence" of a fellow-servant, not admissible); 1911, Leary v. Webber Co., 210 Mass. 68, 96 N. E. 136 (Hatt v. Nay followed); Minnesota: 1898, Morrow v. R. Co., 74 Minn. 480, 77 N. W. 303 (former conduct admitted to show incompetency); New Jersey: 1897, State v. Swett, 61 N. J. 457, 38 Atl. 969 (incompetency to produce good material, set up as defence to an action for discharging an employee; good similar work by the plaintiff in another factory, admitted, citing Baulec v. R. Co., N. Y., post, § 250); New York: 1897, Youngs v. R. Co., 154 N. Y. 764, 77 Hun 612, 49 N. E. 1106 (specific acts, receivable to show incompetency); 1898, Park v. R. Co., 155 N. Y. 215, 49 N. E. 674 (same); Pennsylvania: 1911, Rosenstiel v. Pittsburg R. Co., 230 Pa. 273, 79 Atl. 556; 1917, Brown v. Westinghouse E. & M. Co., 256 Pa. 403, 100 Atl. 970; Texas: 1888, Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Patton, — Tex. —, 9 S. W. 175 (repeated acts of carelessness by employee, admitted); 1895, Cunningham v. R. Co., 88 Tex. 534 (see quotation, supra); 1898, Galveston H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Davis, 92 Tex. 372, 48 S. W. 570 (single instances of a conductor's incompetence, excluded); Washington: 1902, Green v. Western Amer. Co., 30 Wash. 87, 70 Pac. 310 ("specific acts of incompetency of the pit boss", held admissible); 1905, Conover v. Neher R. Co., 38 Wash. 172, 80 Pac. 281 (two prior acts of an engineer, admitted to show incompetence); 1905, Dossett v. St. Paul & T. L. Co., 40 Wash. 276, 82 Pac. 273 (similar); 1914, Johansen v. Pioneer Mining Co., 77 Wash. 421, 137 Pac. 1019 ("numerous acts" of negligence by defendant's employee, admitted).

(post, § 250). In the former case the evidence is inadmissible in most jurisdictions; in the latter, it is admissible in most jurisdictions; while in the present case it is admitted in the majority of courts.

§ 208*a*. Incompetence of Physician or other Professional Person. Where the unskilfulness of a physician, or other professional person bound to furnish a certain quality of skill, is in issue as a part of the substantive law, it would seem that the foregoing considerations apply, and that specific instances, if sufficiently marked, should be receivable.[1]

§ 209. Mitigation of Damages: (1) Defamation. It has already been seen that, exceptions and conditions apart, the reputed character of a plaintiff in an action of defamation is generally admissible in mitigation of damages, as involving the amount of his harm suffered (ante, §§ 70–73). So long as proof of Character is made by reputation only, the true nature of the situation does not call for more accurate analysis; because, whether the reputation is itself the material fact or is merely evidence of actual character, in either case it is receivable. But when particular acts of misconduct are offered in mitigation of damages, it then becomes necessary to determine whether actual Character, or Reputation (ante, § 52), is the ultimate fact in respect of which the harm is suffered; for if it is the latter, then particular acts of misconduct are irrelevant; they have no bearing on reputation.

That Reputation is the ultimate fact seems clear. The harm for which compensation is asked is the loss of social relations, as involved in the diminished reputation of the plaintiff. The condition of that reputation shows the extent of his loss. In this view, particular acts of misconduct, if they have not affected his reputation, have no bearing on the issue; and if they have affected it, the reputation alone suffices to show this.—It might be argued that the injury is also regarded as in part the wound to the feelings, the mental suffering, and that a person guilty of misconduct could not suffer as deeply as an innocent person from a false charge of like misconduct. This argument, however, has never been advanced. It ignores the fact that the injury to feelings which the law of defamation recognizes is not the suffering from the mere making of the charge, but is that suffering which is caused by other people's conduct towards him in consequence of it; which brings the question back again to the point of view of reputation alone.

After all, then, the fundamental reason for the rejection of particular misconduct in mitigation of damages is that these facts of misconduct are wholly without bearing on the proposition in issue; that is, they show merely, in the neat phrase of Mr. Justice Cave, "not that the plaintiff has not, but that he ought not to have, a good reputation"; and no further reason need be sought.

It is important to recognize this; because other reasons, particularly those of Unfair Surprise and of Confusion of Issues, have also been advanced for the exclusion of such evidence, — reasons which assume that actual character is in issue and that particular acts, though relevant, are excluded by these considerations of Auxiliary Policy. But if these were true and effective reasons, they would also operate to exclude similar evidence when offered in other cases to mitigate damages where actual character, and not reputation, was really in issue, — as in the topics of the ensuing sections, where nevertheless evidence of such particular misconduct is concededly proper. Thus, if actual character for chastity is not to be proved, in mitigation of damages, by particular acts in an action for defamation, the same reasons should presumably impel the same Court to exclude the same evidence offered for the same purpose in an action for seduction; yet the same Court constantly excludes in the former action what it admits in the latter. The inevitable conclusion, and the true solution of the apparent inconsistency, is that different reasons are operating. In the action for defamation, the true and controlling reason is the immateriality of particular acts of misconduct. Thus a Court which excludes such evidence in that action, while it might or might not also exclude it in the other actions, is not inconsistent in admitting it in the latter.

§ 208*a*. [1] Compare the cases cited in the following places: ante, §§ 67, 87, post, § 221.

In actions of defamation, then, such evidence is universally regarded as improper.[1] The following passages illustrate the various reasons that have been judicially advanced:

§ 209. [1] Compare with the following cases the distinctions of those cited ante, § 73:

ENGLAND: 1716, Dennis v. Pawling, Vin. Abr., "Evidence", I, b. 16 ("The baron would not allow . . . any particular credit to be given of the plaintiff, but if the defendant had a mind to examine to this, the question must be general"); 1701, Smithies v. Harrison, Vin. Abr., "Evidence", I, b. 15, semble (same); 1767, Buller, Nisi Prius, 9, semble (same); 1797, Knobell v. Fuller, Peake Add. Cas. 139 (slander charging the obtaining money for procuring pardons; general issue; to mitigate the damages, Lord Kenyon, C. J., received evidence of facts pointing towards the plaintiff having done such things); 1822, Jones v. Stevens, 11 Price 235 (excluded; see quotation supra); 1836, Moore v. Oastler, 2 Stark. Ev. 641, note e, Lord Denman, C. J., and Parke, B. (excluded); 1859, Bracegirdle v. Bailey, 1 F. & F. 536, Byles and Willes, JJ. (same); 1882, Scott v. Sampson, L. R. 8 Q. B. D. 491 (same; see quotation supra); Rules of Court, 1883, Order XXXVI, Rule 37 ("In actions for libel or slander, in which the defendant does not by his defence assert the truth of the statement complained of, the defendant shall not be entitled on the trial to give evidence in chief, with a view to mitigation of damages, as to the circumstances under which the libel or slander was published, or as to the character of the plaintiff, without the leave of the judge, unless seven days at least before the trial he furnishes particulars to the plaintiff of the matters as to which he intends to give evidence").

UNITED STATES: Conn. 1792, Seymour v. Merrills, 1 Root 459 (excluded, "except those charged by the words", i.e. under a justification); Del. 1838, Waples v. Burton, 2 Harringt. 446 (excluded); Ill. 1858, Sheahan v. Collins, 20 Ill. 329 (excluded); Ky. 1880, Campbell v. Bannister, 79 Ky. 208 (excluded); Me. 1839, Smith v. Wyman, 16 Me. 14 (charge, "you are a whore"; the "utmost latitude of examination", as to the plaintiff's having lived in a house of ill-fame, etc., admitted); Mass. 1825, Bodwell v. Swan, 3 Pick. 376 (excluded, on the ground of surprise); 1863, Chapman v. Ordway, 5 All. 595 (excluded); 1863, Parkhurst v. Ketchum, 6 All. 406 (same); 1881, McLaughlin v. Cowley, 131 Mass. 70, 72 (charge of murder and adultery; the plaintiff's former plea of guilty to an indictment for cheating, excluded); 1893, Miller v. Curtis, 158 Mass. 127, 131, 32 N. E. 1039 (same); Mass. Gen. L. 1920, c. 231, § 94 (in defamation, defendant may show "in mitigation of damages and in rebuttal of evidence of actual malice, acts of the plaintiff which create a reasonable suspicion that the matters charged against him by the defendant are true"); Mich. 1877, Proctor v. Houghtaling, 37 Mich. 41, 44 (excluded); 1911, Wells v. Toogood, 165 Mich. 677, 131 N. W. 124 (excluded); N. H. 1833, Lamos v. Snell, 6 N. H. 413 (charge of stealing and being "thievish"; that the plaintiff harbored thieves, excluded); N. J. 1855, Sayre v. Sayre, 25 N. J. L. 235 (excluded); 1906, Pier v. Speer, 73 N. J. L. 633, 64 Atl. 161 (excluded); 1910, Fodor v. Fuchs, 79 N. J. L. 529, 76 Atl. 1081

1822, Jones v. Stevens, 11 Price 235, 265 (charge of being a disreputable and unprofessional attorney). RICHARDS, C. B.: "I cannot . . . allow defendants to impeach all the transactions of a man's life who may have occasion to seek redress in courts of justice and throw on him the difficulty of showing an uniform propriety of conduct during all his existence. It would be impossible for any man to come prepared to meet such a charge." WOOD, B.: "If, as contended for, you could call witnesses, upon the plea of not guilty, to contradict the general introductory words [of the declaration as to the plaintiff's good character], what would be the consequence? We should have counsel getting up and saying, 'The plaintiff has alleged', as in the present declaration, 'that he is a good, honest, just, and faithful subject of the realm. I propose to call twenty witnesses to prove that he is an immoral, dissolute man; twenty more to prove that he has committed acts of dishonesty; twenty more to prove that he is not a faithful subject, by proving that he has been guilty of sedition, treasonable practices, and even high treason.' Did any one ever hear such stuff as this? It might do in a farce upon the stage meant to excite laughter, but it surely cannot be tolerated in a court of justice."

1882, CAVE, J., in Scott v. Sampson, L. R. 8 Q. B. D. 491: "As to the third head, or evidence of facts and circumstances tending to show the disposition of the plaintiff, both principle and authority seem equally against its admission. At the most it tends to prove not that the plaintiff has not, but that he ought not to have, a good reputation; and to admit evidence of this kind is in effect, as was said in Jones v. Stevens, to throw upon the plaintiff the difficulty of showing an uniform propriety of conduct during his whole life. It would give rise to interminable issues which would have but a very remote bearing on the question in dispute, which is to what extent the reputation which he actually possesses has been damaged by the defamatory matter complained of."

1836, EARLE, J., in Randall v. Holsenbake, 3 Hill S. C. 177: "The defendant may justify and prove the plaintiff guilty of the crime imputed to him. If he be afraid to hazard that course, he may under the general issue (as from a masked battery), prove, in mitigation of damages, facts and circumstances going to show a ground of suspicion and belief. He may prove that the plaintiff was generally reported and suspected to be guilty of the crime imputed to him. And he may prove that the plaintiff is a person of general bad character, and although he may not have committed that particular crime, yet he is not entitled to damages. This, in all conscience, ought to satisfy the most voracious appetite for defamation. To allow the defendant, in an action for words imputing one crime, and under the general issue which simply denies the speaking, to prove that the plaintiff had been guilty of any other crime, even of the same nature, would be to deliver the plaintiff bound hand and foot to his adversary. It would render nugatory all the forms of practice and pleading which experience has found necessary for the investigation of truth and to promote the ends of justice; for the plaintiff never could know what hidden transactions the industrious malice of his adversary might be prepared to drag to light."

The same rule should apply in malicious prosecution, and in any analogous action, where reputation pure and simple is admissible in mitigation of damages.[2]

(excluded); N.Y. 1806, Foot v. Tracy, 1 Johns. 46 (excluded); 1827, Root v. King, 7 Cow. 635 (same); 1829, King v. Root, 4 Wend. 160, semble (same); 1904, Cudlip v. Journal Pub. Co., 180 N. Y. 85, 72 N. E. 925 (excluded); N. Car. 1802, Vick v. Whitfield, 2 Hayw. 222 (excluded); Oh. 1831, Dewit v. Greenfield, 5 Oh. 226 (excluded); 1846, Fisher v. Patterson, 14 Oh. 418, 425 (same); Pa. 1835, Henry v. Norwood, 4 Watts 347, 349 (excluded on the ground of surprise); R. I. 1896, Folwell v. Journal Co., 19 R. I. 551, 37 Atl. 6 (excluded); S. Car. 1820, Sawyer v. Eifert, 2 Nott & M. 511, 515 (excluded, qualifying Buford v. M'Luny, 1 Nott & M. 268, 271); 1836, Randall v. Holsenbake, 3 Hill S. C. 177 (same); Wis. 1871, Wilson v. Noonan, 27 Wis. 598, 603, 610 (excluded); 1890, Muetze v. Tuteur, 77 Wis. 236, 243, 46 N. W. 123 (destruction of credit alleged; the number of the plaintiff's creditors, excluded).

[2] 1920, Banfill v. Byrd, 122 Miss. 288, 84 So. 227 (action for unlawful search of plaintiff's hotel for intoxicating liquor; reputation of the house as a "place of evil resort", admitted in mitigation of damages, but not "specific acts

Distinguish the use of prior libels by the plaintiff upon the defendant, offered in mitigation.[3]

§ 210. Same: (2) Father's Action for Seduction of Daughter. The father's claim against the seducer of his daughter is based primarily on the loss of her services; but he is allowed to include also, in the items of his loss for which compensation may be claimed, (a) the impairment of the family honor or reputation, and (b) the mental suffering experienced by him in the loss of his daughter's chastity. Thus whatever affects either of these two elements is material to the issue, so far as the estimation of damages is concerned.

From the point of view of (a) the daughter's prior reputation, as involving the family reputation, is material (ante, § 75). From the point of view of (b) the daughter's prior actual chaste character, as affecting the prior condition of his feelings, is also material (ante, § 75). Now particular acts of unchastity of the daughter are not relevant to show her reputation, but they are relevant to show her actual character.[1] For the latter purpose, then, the only question is whether, from the point of view of the arguments of Unfair Surprise and Confusion of Issues (ante, § 194), such evidence should be excluded. It is generally conceded that these reasons do not stand in the way; and this conclusion seems just. Particular acts of unchastity by the daughter are therefore admissible.[2] of evil conduct" therein by third persons, unless known to and acquiesced in by the defendant; the opinion ranges too indiscriminately over the other doctrines about specific acts, citing e.g. McQuiggan v. Ladd, Vt., and State v. Roderick, Oh., ante, § 198, whose theory is entirely different; and the qualification as to knowledge and acquiescence is unfounded in principle); 1891, Wolf v. Perryman, 82 Tex. 112, 120, 17 S. W. 772 (excluded).

[3] 1809, Finnerty v. Tipper, 2 Camp. 73 (defendant in his journal had charged the plaintiff with crime; plaintiff had proposed as a question in his debating society, "Whether the editor of S. journal or a notorious pickpocket were the greater nuisance to society"; and had caused boards announcing this to be carried through the street, and at the debate had argued in favor of the pickpocket; Mansfield, C. J.: "If a man is in the habit of libelling others, he complains with a very bad grace of being libelled himself. . . . But I cannot say that he loses his right to maintain an action"; though damages might thereby be mitigated).

§ 210. [1] 1873, Love v. Masoner, 6 Baxt. 24, 29, 33 (Nicholson, C. J.: "The injury complained of by the plaintiff was the loss of a virtuous daughter and of her companionship and example to the other children and the wound to the feelings of the parent produced by this injury; the rejected proof, however, would show that plaintiff was under a delusion as to the virtue of his daughter, that she had already surrendered her chastity before she yielded to the embrace of the defendant").

[2] ENGLAND: 1808, Bamfield v. Massey, 1 Camp. 460 (having a child by another man); 1814, Dodd v. Norris, 3 Camp. 519 (immodest conduct with defendant); 1823, Bate v. Hill, 1 C. & P. 100 (same, and improper company of others); 1837, Andrews v. Askey, 8 C. & P. 7, Tindal, C. J.; 1836, Verry v. Watkins, 7 C. & P. 308, Alderson, B. (particular acts of unchastity by the daughter with third persons); 1840, Carpenter v. Wall, 11 A. & E. 803 (that the daughter "went about in a light manner" speaking of the father of her child); 1850, Thompson v. Nye, 16 Q. B. 175.

UNITED STATES: Ala. 1830, Drish v. Davenport, 2 Stew. 266, 270, semble; Del. 1851, Robinson v. Burton, 5 Harringt. 335, 333 (improper conduct); Ill. 1874, White v. Murtland, 71 Ill. 250, 264 (acts "of immorality or indecorum"; but only be for the seduction, apparently because the father's loss then began); Ind. 1859, Shattuck v. Myers, 13 Ind. 50; 1868, Bell v. Rinker, 29 Ind. 269 (contra not citing the preceding case); Smith v. Yaryan, 69 Ind. 448, semble (contra); 1884, South Bend v. Hardy, 98 Ind. 580, 582 (going back to the first case); Pa. 1855, Zitzer v. Merkel, 24 Pa. 408, semble; 1863, Hoffman v. Kemerrer, 44 Pa. 452 (contra; either on cross-examination or by outside evidence; reputation is the only mode of proof); Tenn. 1858, Reed v. Williams, 5 Sneed 580, 582 (admissible, by outside testimony); 1858, Thompson v. Clendening, 1 Head 287, 295 (admitted); 1860, Lea v. Henderson, 1 Cold. 146, 150 (excluded, because the reputation is

That the father's reputation, as affecting his loss of reputation, is equally in issue, and that his actual character, as affecting the extent of his mental suffering, is equally in issue, has already been seen (ante, § 75). To show this actual character, particular acts of his own unchastity would seem to be receivable, for the same reasons as above.[3]

§ 211. Same: (3) Husband's or Wife's Action for Crim. Con. Alienation of Affections. In the husband's action for criminal conversation or for alienation of affections, the actual character both of his wife and of himself are material to the issue (ante, § 75). For the same reasons therefore as in the foregoing topic, her character may be evidenced by particular acts of unchaste conduct;[1] and his character may be evidenced in the same way.[2]

In the wife's action for alienation of affections, the same considerations would apply;[3] but not in her action for loss of pecuniary support.[4]

§ 212. Same: (4) Indecent Assault. In a civil action for assault, where the assault is claimed to have been made for indecent purposes, the actual chaste character of the woman is material as affecting the extent of the shock foundation of the claim, and is not thereby necessarily injured); 1873, Love v. Masoner, 6 Baxt. 24, 33 (admissible, repudiating the preceding case).

Of the following rulings the second is of course the better: 1813, Dodd v. Norris, 3 Camp. 519 (loss of service by seduction: to explain away the improper conduct of the plaintiff's daughter, a witness, with the defendant, evidence of a prior promise of marriage by him was rejected, and evidence only of an honorable paying of addresses was admitted, since otherwise the promise might be taken as an element in the recovery; the ruling is anomalous and poor); 1851, Robinson v. Burton, 5 Harringt. Del. 335, 339, cited supra (to explain away acts of familiarity with the defendant by the daughter in an action for seduction, evidence was admitted that a promise of marriage had been made).

For particular acts of intercourse with others as explaining away the defendant's responsibility for her pregnancy, see ante, § 133.

Compare also the cases upon character as motive (post, § 390).

[2] 1851, Robinson v. Burton, 5 Harringt. 335, 338 (the dissolute character of the father allowed to be shown by "any facts showing him to be of dissolute habits", or "his general habits of association with improper persons", or "declarations or conversations").

Contra: 1858, Reed v. Williams, 5 Sneed 580, 582 (excluded: venereal disease); 1858, Thompson v. Clendening, 1 Head 287, 296 excluded; adultery).

§ 211. [1] 1767, Buller, Nisi Prius, 27 (the wife's misconduct before marriage, etc., admissible to show no loss of affection and thus mitigate damages); 1797, Elsam v. Faucett, 2 Esp. 563 (subsequent misconduct of a seduced wife not admissible in mitigation of damages); 1850, Thompson v. Nye, 16 Q. B. 175, per Erle, Coleridge, and Wightman, JJ. (admitted); 1906, Smith v. Hockenberry, 138 Mich. 129, 101 N. W. 207, 109 N. W. 23 (the wife's criminal intimacy with other men, before the act in question, but not afterwards, admissible; also her intimacy with lewd women); 1820, Terre v. Summers, 2 Nott & M. S. C. 269, 271 (both before and after leaving the husband; here, admitting intercourse with other men than the defendant).

Compare the cases cited post, § 390, n. 1 (character as motive).

[2] 1790, Hodges v. Windham, Peake 39 (here the husband's formerly suffering his wife's adultery with others was allowed to be an excuse for the defendant, — a doctrine probably unsound; but the admissibility of such conduct in mitigation would not have been doubted); 1801, Wyndham v. Wycombe, 4 Esp. 16 (the husband's open and notorious infidelity, admitted as a defence, — a doctrine going even further than the use of such facts in mitigation); 1802, Bromley v. Wallace, id. 237 (similar facts allowed in mitigation but not in excuse); 1811, Fall v. Overseers, 3 Mumf. 495, 505, semble (wife's adultery, admissible, per Roane, J.).

[3] 1900, Wolf v. Frank, 92 Md. 138, 48 Atl. 132 (wife's unchaste conduct before separation, admitted to mitigate damages in her action for loss of husband's society); 1904, Angell v. Reynolds, 26 R. I. 160, 58 Atl. 625 (wife's action for alienation of affections; the husband's unchaste conduct with other women, admitted).

[4] 1901, Kolb v. R. Co., 23 R. I. 72, 49 Atl. 392 (widow's action for husband's death; that plaintiff bore an illegitimate child since his death, not admitted in mitigation of damages).

to her feelings and thus the proper damages to be given (ante, § 75). The unchaste character of the woman may be shown by particular acts, for the same reasons as in the preceding topics.[1]

§ 213. Same: (5) Breach of Promise of Marriage. For the same reasons as before, the unchaste character of the promisee of marriage, which is admissible in mitigation of damages (ante, § 75), may be shown by particular acts of unchastity.[1] Their use as evidencing character when offered to excuse the breach has been already noticed (ante, § 206).

4. Conduct independently usable evidentially for Other Purposes than to show Character (Design, Intent, Motive, etc.)

§ 215. General Principle. Suppose A to be charged with robbing the till in a store of which he is a sale-clerk; and suppose the facts to be offered against him (1) of having stolen the key of the till in the preceding week; (2) of having falsified his sale-book recently; (3) of having suffered large losses in gambling. From the point of view of the foregoing subject, these acts would all tend to show that he was of a dishonest and reckless disposition, and therefore disposed to steal from the till if opportunity offered. But from that point of view such acts would be wholly inadmissible, either in proving the act charged in opening, or in rebutting his evidence of good character (ante, § 194).

But that is not the only possible point of view. These acts may be relevant in other ways to show the commission of the crime, without in any way employing or suggesting their inference as to his character. They may justify other inferences which go to show his doing of the act charged. Thus, the purloining of the key may found an inference of Design or Plan, — a plan to use the key in some unlawful way for obtaining access to the till; or it may show Knowledge, — knowledge of the whereabouts of the till and of its valuable contents. So the falsification of his sale-book may show a Motive, — the desire to prevent his larcenies from being discovered; or it may show Design, — a general design to obtain money from his employers unlawfully. So the gambling losses may show Motive in another way, — the need and desire of money at any cost, to pay his losses. Whatever tended ordinarily to show such Knowledge or Design or Motive would otherwise § 212. [1] Accord: 1882, Mitchell v. Work, 13 R. I. 645 (indecent assault; that "the plaintiff had been unchaste in her relations with men", admitted, as "specific acts"); 1864, Watry v. Ferber, 18 Wis. 500, 503 (same, semble); 1903, Barton v. Bruley, 119 Wis. 326, 96 N. W. 815 (acts of lewdness only, not beer-drinking, admissible).

Contra: 1889, Gore v. Curtis, 81 Me. 403, 405, 17 Atl. 314 (indecent assault and battery and solicitation; the plaintiff's prior intercourse with others, inadmissible); 1893, Miller v. Curtis, 158 Mass. 127, 130, 32 N. E. 1039 (indecent assault; whether particular acts of lewdness are admissible to show the plaintiff's character, as affecting the shock to her feelings; semble, inadmissible).

§ 213. [1] 1373, Sheahan v. Barry, 27 Mich. 217, 221; 1895, Stratton v. Dole, 45 Nebr. 472, 63 N. W. 875; 1915, Gerlinger v. Frank, 74 Or. 517, 145 Pac. 1069 (cross-examination to illicit intercourse with other men, allowed).

Contra: 1907, Colburn v. Marble, 196 Mass. 376, 82 N. E. 28, semble (including immodest conduct).

have been admissible; and these acts are merely instances, from a variety of evidence, of classes of facts which would be evidential for their respective purposes.

Now this double or multiple possibility of use is an extremely common feature of Evidence. The well established principle of Multiple Admissibility, applied in numerous ways, declares that the inadmissibility of an evidential fact for one purpose does not prevent its admissibility for any other purpose otherwise proper (ante, § 13). In other words, if one door of entrance is closed to it, this does not prevent its entrance by other doors which may still remain open. Any other result would be unpractical and unreasonable in the highest degree. It would be as singular as a prohibition to a lame man to become a bookkeeper or a physician because he was incapable of becoming a circus-rider.

This eligibility of evidence for one purpose, despite its ineligibility for another, is illustrated throughout the whole law of Evidence. Reputation may be used, if it is a fact in issue, although it might not be admissible as hearsay to prove the fact reputed (ante, § 78). The unchaste acts of a complainant in rape may be admitted to disclose her unchaste character as evidence of consent (ante, § 200), although the same acts could not be received to impeach her veracity as a witness (post, § 987). Acts of an employee may be received to show the employer's knowledge of his incompetency (post, § 250), although they might not be admissible to show the employee's negligent character (ante, § 199). The misconduct of a defendant testifying for himself may be asked about to impeach his character as a witness (post, § 890), although they would not be received to show his character as an accused (ante, § 194). The uncommunicated threats or the character of a deceased person may be received to show him the aggressor in an affray (ante, § 110), although they would be inadmissible to show the defendant's belief in an impending attack (post, § 247). A testator's remarks about his relatives would be received to show the normal state of his affections, although they might be inadmissible to show directly the fact of duress (post, § 1734). In scores of these instances the principle is illustrated and established. Our law of Evidence, as a workable system, would be impossible without it.

So far, then, as this general principle is concerned, the fact that a defendant's acts of misconduct would be inadmissible as showing his bad character does not in the slightest stand in the way of receiving the same acts in evidence if they are evidential for other purposes.

§ 216. Criminality of Conduct Immaterial, if it is otherwise Relevant. Is there, then, any reason why, for this particular class of facts, an exception should be made to the general canon of multiple admissibility, and facts relevant for some other purpose be rejected because they would be inadmissible if offered to show a bad character?

In the great majority of instances in which such an exception has been sought to be established, the facts of conduct thus objected to are crimes; for obviously such conduct presents the clearest case in which the evidence is obnoxious to the character-rule, and the case in which the fact, if offered to show character, would most tellingly violate the spirit and the reasons of that rule. The question thus in effect becomes: Is the criminality of conduct a reason for excluding that conduct (when offered against an accused person) if it would be otherwise relevant and admissible?

Now the possibility of the abuse or misapplication of such evidence is no sufficient reason for making such an exception. This possibility exists equally for all the other cases above-mentioned; and it is always open to the opponent, here as there, to have the jury fully instructed in the limited purpose and use of the evidence. Such an instruction, it is always understood, is a safeguard against abuse or misunderstanding. If it be said that here, in the case of an accused person, where past crimes are offered, there is greater danger of such abuse and greater risks of harm in case of abuse, there are two answers. One is dogmatic, that there is no difference in the rules of evidence for criminals and for civil cases (ante, § 4). The other is practical, that an exception such as is here suggested would handicap the State in its prosecution of the man of cumulative criminal daring. The greater the criminal brought to bar, the more closely the traces of his crimes were involved in other misdeeds, the more stupendous his scheme of crime culminating in the act charged, so much the more safe and invulnerable would he have rendered himself, if the law were made thereby to lose this evidential material. By every spot of blood with which he taints the steps of his criminal progress, he succeeds in increasing the safety of his new crimes. This is an ample reason, if no other were even conceivable, for refusing to make an exception, already antagonistic to principle and obnoxious to practical procedure. "No man," in the neat phrase of Mr. Justice Brewer, "can by multiplying crimes diminish the volume of testimony against him."

It may be additionally noted that the chief reason for the character-rule, namely, the doctrine of Unfair Surprise (ante, § 194; post, § 1849) does not, after all, apply here; for it is plain that this class of facts does not range over the whole scope of the defendant's life (as character-evidence of particular misconduct would), but bears only on the immediate antecedents and concomitants in time of the act charged, — plan, knowledge, motive, intent, and the like; and there is thus ample warning beforehand of this scope of the inquiry.

This much attention to the suggested exception is called for, because the effort to secure it and the inclination to ask for it seems to be so persistent and so common at the Bar; and not because its validity has ever been recognized or implied. On the contrary, no fallacy has been more frequently or more distinctly struck at by denial, by argument, by explanation, on the part of the Courts. It has been rebuffed, rebuked, repudiated, discredited, denounced, so often that it ought by this time to have been abandoned forever.[1] That it does still crop up again from time to time is apparently due in part to the inherent difficulty of distinguishing between conduct as showing character and conduct as showing other things; but also to the failure to appreciate that the rejection of past misconduct by the character-rule is never due simply to the incidental circumstance that it is misconduct, but to the fact that it is offered to show character and that herein consists its impropriety. If there is any other material or evidential proposition, for which it is relevant, and if it is offered for that purpose, it is receivable, and its quality as misconduct or crime does not stand in the way. The persistency of this fallacy, and its lack of foundation in law make it worth while to exhibit fully, from the utterances of the judges, their constant repudiation of the notion that the criminality of conduct offered for some relevant purpose is any objection to its reception:[2]

§ 216. [1] 1878, Lord Coleridge, C. J., in Blake v. Ass. Soc., 14 Cox Cr. 254 ("In any but an English court, and to any one but an English lawyer, the controversy whether this evidence is admissible or not, would seem, I imagine, supremely ridiculous; because it is admitted that it is most cogent and material to the plaintiff's claim").

[2] Accord: ENGLAND: 1804, R. v. Whyley, 2 Leach 4th ed. 985, 986; 1825, Burrough, J., in R. v. Moore, 2 C. & P. 235; 1836, R. v. Rooney, 7 C. & P. 517; 1843, Maule, J., in R. v. Tissington, 1 Cox Cr. 12; 1846, Maule, J., in R. v. Dosset, 2 C. & K. 306, 2 Cox Cr. 243; 1848, Erle, J., in R. v. Bleasdale, 2 Cr. & K. 765; 1849, Pollock, C. B., in R. v. Geering, 18 L. J. M. C. 215; 1861, R. v. Weeks, Leigh & C. 18, 21, by five judges; 1864, Willes, J., in R. v. Reardon, 4 F. & F. 79; 1878, Blake v. Assur. Co., L. R. 4 C. P. D. 94, 102.

UNITED STATES: Federal: 1893, Moore v. U. S., 150 U. S. 57, 61, 14 Sup. 26; 1900, Wolfson v. U. S., 41 C. C. A. 422, 101 Fed. 430; 1906, Thompson v. U. S., 144 Fed. 14, 18, C. C. A.; Arkansas: 1884, Melton v. State, 43 Ark. 367, 371; 1889, Billings v. State, 52 Ark. 303, 309, 12 S. W. 574 (disposing of the apparently contrary notion in Endaily v. State, 39 Ark. 280); California: 1865, People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507, 515 (the fact that an indictment is pending on the other charge is immaterial); 1885, People v. Cunningham, 66 Cal. 668, 670, 4 Pac. 1144, 6 Pac. 700, 846; 1887, People v. Rogers, 71 Cal. 565, 567, 12 Pac. 679; 1894, People v. Lane, 101 Cal. 513, 517, 36 Pac. 16; 1894, People v. Tomlinson, 102 Cal. 19, 24, 36 Pac. 506; 1896, People v. Craig, 111 Cal. 460, 468, 44 Pac. 186; 1896, People v. Sanders, 114 Cal. 216, 46 Pac. 153; 1897, People v. Ebanks, 117 Cal. 652, 49 Pac. 1049; People v. Wilson, 117 Cal. 688, 49 Pac. 1054; 1897, People v. Winthrop, 118 Cal. 85, 50 Pac. 390; 1899, People v. Pette, 123 Cal. 373, 55 Pac. 993; 1905, People v. Cook, 148 Cal. 334, 83 Pac. 43; 1906, People v. Soeder, 150 Cal. 12, 87 Pac. 1016; 1920, People v. Nakis, 184 Cal. 105, 193 Pac. 92 (murder; stealing of the pistol by defendant on a prior occasion, admitted); Florida: 1898, Roberson v. State, 40 Fla. 509, 24 So. 474; Illinois: 1889, Farris v. People, 129 Ill. 521, 529, 21 N. E. 821; 1893, Painter v. People, 147 Ill. 463, 35 N. E. 64; 1897, Williams v. People, 166 Ill. 132, 46 N. E. 749; 1899, Schintz v. People, 178 Ill. 320, 52 N. E. 903; 1902, Henry v. People, 198 Ill. 162, 65 N. E. 120; 1903, Glover v. People, 204 Ill. 170, 68 N. E. 464; Iowa: 1899, State v. Wrand, 108 Ia. 73, 78 N. W. 788; Kansas: 1874, State v. Folwell, 14 Kan. 105, 109; 1878, State v. Adams, 20 Kan. 311, 319; 1904, State v. Franklin, 69 Kan. 798, 77 Pac. 588; Kentucky: 1908, Welch v. Com., — Ky. —, 108 S. W. 863 (motive); Maine: 1881, State v. Witham, 72 Me. 531, 534; Massachusetts: 1869, Thayer v. Thayer, 101 Mass. 114; 1870, Com. v. Choate, 105 Mass. 458; 1877, Com. v. Scott, 123 Mass. 235; 1878, Com. v. Bradford, 126 Mass. 17, 45; 1882, Com. v. Jackson, 132 Mass. 45; 1884, Com. v. Corkin, 136 Mass. 429; 1886, Com. v. Blood, 141 Mass. 570, 575, 6 N. E. 769; 1888, Com. v. Schaffner, 146 Mass. 515, 16 N. E. 280; 1902, Higlister v. French, 180 Mass. 299, 62 N. E. 264; Michigan: 1878, People v. Marble, 38 Mich. 117, 123; 1882, People v. Hensler, 48 Mich. 49, 52, 11 N. W. 804; 1896, People v. Macard, 109 Mich. 623, 67 N. W. 968; Missouri: 1866, State v. Harrold, 38 Mo. 497; 1879, State v. Nugent, 71 Mo. 136, 141; Nevada: 1905, State v. Roberts, 28 Nev. 350, 82 Pac. 100 (stolen coins, identifying the defendants charged with murder); New Hampshire: 1872, Darling v. Westmorland, 52 N. H. 401, 406 (quoted post); 1898, State v. Davis, 69 N. H. 350, 41 Atl. 267; New Jersey: 1838, State v. Robinson, 16 N. J. L. 508; 1905, State v. Hummer, 72 N. J. L. 328, 62 Atl. 388; New Mexico: 1900, Terr. v. McGinnis, 10 N. M. 269, 61 Pac. 208; New York: 1858, People v. Stout, 4 Park. Cr. 71, 114, 128, 138; 1874,

1860, WILLIAMS, J., in R. v. Richardson, 2 F. & F. 346: "There is no principle of law which prevents that being put in evidence which might otherwise be so, merely because it discloses other indictable offenses. . . . Evidence which is admissible for such a purpose is not the less so because it tends to prove the commission of other felonies by the prisoner."

1865, WILLES, J., in R. v. Rowton, Leigh & C. 520, 541: "There are cases in which it is allowable to go into the prisoner's antecedents, as for the purpose of showing that he has had opportunities of committing the offence, or that in a particular instance his act could not have been accidental. But these cases only establish the principle that a relevant fact which incidentally casts a slur upon the prisoner is not thereby rendered inadmissible when it is part of the direct evidence in the case."

1829, BROCKENBROUGH, J., in Walker's Case, 1 Leigh 576: "It is proper that the chain of evidence should be unbroken. If one or more links of that chain consist of circumstances which tend to prove that the prisoner has been guilty of other crimes than that charged, . . . there is no reason why the criminality of such intimate and connected circumstances should exclude them, more than other facts apparently innocent. Thus, if a man be indicted for murder, and there be proof that the instrument of death was a pistol, proof that that instrument belonged to another man, that it was taken from his house on the night preceding the murder, that the prisoner was there on that night, and that the pistol was seen in his possession on the day of the murder just before the fatal act was committed, is undoubtedly admissible, although it has the tendency to prove the prisoner guilty of a larceny. Such circumstances constitute a part of the transaction; and whether they are perfectly innocent in themselves, or involve guilt, makes no difference as to their bearing on the main question which they are adduced to prove. But if the circumstances have no intimate connection with the main fact, if they constitute no link in the chain of evidence; then, supposing them innocent, their admission, to be sure, may do no harm, yet they ought to be excluded, because they are irrelevant; but if they denote other guilt, they are not only irrelevant, but they do injury, because they have a tendency to prejudice the minds of the jury, and for this additional reason they ought to be excluded."

1858, JOHNSON, J., in People v. Wood, 3 Park. Cr. 681: "The proper inquiry, when the circumstance is offered, is, Does it fairly tend to raise an inference in favor of the existence of the fact proposed to be proved? If it does, it is admissible whether such fact or circumstance be innocent or criminal in its nature. It does not lie with the prisoner to object that the fact proposed as a circumstance is so heinous in its nature and so prejudicial to his character that it shall not be used against him, if it bears upon the fact in issue. The atrocity of the act cannot be used as a shield under such circumstances, or as a bar to its legitimate use by the prosecution. If it could, many criminals might escape just and merited punishment solely by means of their hardened and depraved natures.

1874, KINGMAN, C. J., in State v. Folwell, 14 Kan. 109: "It would be a singular rule of law that a person accused of a grave crime could compel the exclusion of important and relevant testimony merely by committing two felonies at the same time or so nearly connected that the one could not be proven without also proving the other."

Weed v. People, 56 N. Y. 628; 1874, Coleman v. People, 58 N. Y. 556, 560; 1880, Pierson v. People, 79 N. Y. 436; 1895, People v. Shea, 147 N. Y. 78, 41 N. E. 508; 1896, People v. McLaughlin, 150 N. Y. 336, 44 N. E. 1017; 1897, People v. Peckens, 153 N. Y. 576, 47 N. E. 883; North Dakota: 1896, State v. Kent, 5 N. D. 516, 67 N. W. 1052; Oregon: 1881, State v. Wintzingerode, 9 Or. 153, 158; 1905, State v. Rea, 46 Or. 620, 81 Pac. 822 (larceny of a horse; another larceny involving an admission by the defendant, received); Pennsylvania: 1863, Com. v. Ferrigan, 44 Pa. 386; 1878, Turner v. Com., 86 Pa. 70; South Carolina: 1839, State v. Ford, 3 Strobh. 517, 524; Vermont: 1876, State v. Bridgman, 49 Vt. 212; Virginia: 1829, Walker's Case, 1 Leigh 576; 1847, Burr v. Com., 4 Gratt. 534; 1867, Adams v. Lawson, 17 Gratt. 259, semble.

For the use of other crimes as stated in a defendant's confession of the crime charged, see also post, § 2100.

1876, CUSHING, C. J., in State v. Lapage, 57 N. H. 288: "I think we may assume, in the outset, that it is not the quality of an action, as good or bad, as unlawful or lawful, as criminal or otherwise, which is to determine its relevancy. I take it to be generally true, that any act of the prisoner may be put in evidence against him, provided it has any logical and legal tendency to prove any matter which is in issue between him and the State, notwithstanding it might have an indirect bearing, which in strictness it ought not to have, upon some other matter in issue."

1878, BREWER, J., in State v. Adams, 20 Kan. 319: "Whatever testimony tends directly to show the defendant guilty of the crime charged is competent, though it also tends to show him guilty of another and distinct offence. A party cannot by multiplying crimes diminish the volume of competent testimony against him."

1888, C. ALLEN, J., in Com. v. Robinson, 146 Mass. 571, 16 N. E. 452: "While it is well settled in this Commonwealth that on the trial of an indictment the government cannot be allowed to prove other independent crimes for the purpose of showing that the defendant is wicked enough to commit the crime on trial, this rule does not extend so far as to exclude evidence of acts or crimes which are shown to have been committed as part of the same common purpose or in pursuance of it. . . . In such a case it makes no difference whether the preliminary acts are criminal or not; otherwise, the greater the criminal, the greater his immunity. Such preliminary acts are competent because they are relevant to the issue on trial; and the fact that they are criminal does not render them irrelevant. Suppose, for further example, one is charged with breaking a bank, and there is evidence that he had made preliminary examinations from a neighboring room; that his occupation of such room was accomplished by a criminal breaking and entering would not render the evidence incompetent."

1893, BEATTY, C. J., in People v. Walters, 98 Cal. 138, 141, 32 Pac. 864, and People v. Tucker, 104 Cal. 440, 442, 38 Pac. 195: "It is true that in trying a person charged with one offence it is ordinarily inadmissible to offer proof of another and distinct offence; but this is only because the proof of a distinct offence has ordinarily no tendency to establish the offence charged. But whenever the case is such that proof of one crime tends to prove any fact material in the trial of another, such proof is admissible; and the fact that it may tend to prejudice the defendant in the minds of the jurors is no ground for its exclusion. . . . When such evidence is offered, the same considerations arise as upon the offer of other testimony: Is the evidence relevant and competent? Does it tend to prove any fact material to the issues?"

Occasionally this principle is spoken of as though it involved an exception to some otherwise general rule.[3] The truth is, however, that it is itself an illustration of the general principle, to which the Character-rule is the exception. That general principle (ante, § 10) is that all facts affording any reasonable inference as to the act charged are relevant and admissible, including facts showing design, motive, knowledge, or the like, where these matters are in issue or relevant. To this general principle there is the important exception (ante, § 194), that conduct tending and offered to show bad moral character as evidence is inadmissible. Thus, so long as we avoid the realm of this exception and do not seek to attack the defendant's character, we are within the scope and sanction of the great general principle. We are in no sense saved by a mere exception; and we are further reënforced by the fun-

[3] Thus, in People v. Cunningham, 66 Cal. 671, 4 Pac. 1144, 6 Pac. 700, 846, supra, it is said that "as a general rule no evidence can be introduced respecting any other crimes than that charged", except as far as it "tends to prove the crime alleged."

damental canon (ante, § 13) that admissibility for one purpose is not affected by inadmissibility for another:

1842, STORY, J., in Wood v. U. S., 16 Pet. 360: "They constitute exceptions to the general rule excluding evidence not directly comprehended within the issue; or rather, perhaps, it may with more certainty be said, the exception is necessarily embodied in the very substance of the rule; for whatever does legally conduce to establish the points in issue is necessarily embraced in it, and therefore a proper subject of proof, whether it be direct or only presumptive."

1872, DOE, J., in Darling v. Westmorelaud, 52 N. H. 401, 412: "It is sometimes erroneously supposed that such evidence is excluded because it is 'collateral.' The true reason seems to be the exception (established by ancient English, and adopted without due consideration by modern American authorities) which excludes evidence of a prisoner's character and disposition for the commission of such a crime as that alleged in the indictment on which he is being tried, and the fact that although the Courts who introduced the exception might trust themselves to weigh evidence of other crimes, solely on the question of physical strength or other question on which it might be competent, they would not trust juries. It is evident that the exception, not being sufficiently emphasized as an exception and a very peculiar one, has produced much confusion, by seeming to countenance the idea that the law has an antipathy against experimental knowledge in general."

1921, PARKER, J., in State v. Bassett, 26 N. M. 476, 194 Pac. 867 (admitting evidence of a second abortion performed, to show intent): "These various statements of the so-called exceptions to the general rule are but statements that any evidence which tends to show the guilt of the person on trial is admissible, regardless of the fact that it may show the guilt of the defendant of another crime. If it is necessary or proper to show motive, intent, absence of mistake or accident, a common scheme or plan, the identity of the person charged, it is necessary or proper to show the same because it tends to show the guilt of the accused. In such cases other acts or crimes may be shown if they are relevant, regardless of their criminal character."

On the other hand, where the facts offered consist of past misconduct, whether criminal or not, and being offered to show design, motive, intent, knowledge, or the like, are determined not to be relevant for any such purpose, it follows, as of course, that they are also obnoxious to the character-rule and must be excluded. If they had been innocent (as Mr. Justice Brockenbrough points out above), " yet they ought to be excluded, being irrelevant "; but where they involve past misconduct, " they are not only irrelevant, but they do injury", because they prejudice the accused by invoking his character, "and for this additional reason they ought to be excluded."

They are admitted, then, whenever they are relevant otherwise than to character; and if they are not so relevant, they are excluded for the double reason of irrelevancy for the one purpose and impolicy for the other. Thus the only legitimate bearing of the Character-rule is to impel to a greater caution in determining their relevancy in a given instance; because if we are too liberal or loose, in not exacting an adequate degree of Relevancy or probative value for the allowable purposes, we admit evidence whose dominant bearing is a dangerous and forbidden one. But while greater care and caution is thus called for in applying to this class of evidence the tests of relevancy for design, motive, and the like, those tests themselves remain the same in scope, and, when once satisfied, avail to admit the evidence. Whatever avenues of relevancy — Design, Motive, Knowledge, Identity, and so on — were open to this class of facts before, are open to them still. We are merely to scrutinize more carefully their right to enter these avenues, because of the harm that may be done by erroneous or over-loose interpretation:

1854, Scott, J., in Austin v. State, 14 Ark. 559: "It is certainly true as a general rule, both in civil and criminal cases, that the evidence must be confined to the point in issue; and in criminal cases there is perhaps a greater necessity, if possible, than in civil proceedings to enforce the rule. But in neither class of cases does this rule exclude all evidence that does not bear directly upon the issue; on the contrary, all evidence is admissible which tends to prove it, and no facts are forbidden to be shown except such as are incapable of affording any reasonable presumption or inference in elucidation of the matters involved in the issue."

1861, 1863, Bigelow, C. J., in Com. v. Shepard, 1 All. 581, and Com. v. Jeffries, 7 All. 567: "It is a dangerous species of evidence, not only because it requires a defendant to meet and explain other acts than those charged against him and for which he is on trial, but also because it may lead the jury to violate the great principle that a party is not to be convicted of one crime by proof that he is guilty of another. For this reason, it is essential to the rights of the accused that, when such evidence is admitted, it should be carefully limited and guarded by instructions to the jury, so that its operation and effect may be confined to the single legitimate purpose for which it is competent. . . . If it be asked what limit is to be placed on the range of such an inquiry, the answer is obvious: It cannot be extended to facts or circumstances which do not naturally or necessarily bear on the issue to be established, precisely as evidence of all collateral facts and circumstances must be confined to the proof of those which have a legitimate and direct connection with the principal transaction."

§ 217. Summary of other Modes of Relevancy. What are these other avenues of Relevancy by which such conduct may enter evidentially? They are limited only by the matters which, in the words of Mr. J. Bigelow, "naturally or necessarily bear on the issue to be established." These modes will be found throughout the whole scope of the system of relevancy, and the utility of such evidence may appear at any point. Nevertheless, the commonest instances of its use occur in the ensuing topics, because the matters there to be proved are those for which conduct most commonly serves as evidence. These matters may here be briefly enumerated, illustrating how under each head an act of misconduct may be, among other kinds of facts, relevant:

Capacity (physical strength or the like): on a charge of placing a large stone on a railroad track, the previous felonious placing of a rail on the track shows the defendant's strength-capacity for the act;

Habit or Custom: to show a habit of omitting a signal at a railroad-crossing, previous instances of its omission are relevant;

Design or Plan: to show a plan to rob a safe, the stealing of the key would be relevant; or to show a plan to murder a whole family and obtain their insurance-money, the killings of other insured members of the family would be admissible;

Knowledge or Belief: to show knowledge of the counterfeit quality of a bank-bill, a former unsuccessful attempt to pass a similar one is relevant;

Intent: to show intentional falsification of accounts, former incorrect entries of a similar sort tend to negative mistake;

Motive: to show a probable desire in a husband to get rid of his wife, an adulterous relation with another woman is relevant;

Identity: to assist in identifying a murderer, the commission of another murder by the defendant is relevant, if it appears that the same person committed both.

In all these instances, and in others less frequent, the misconduct of a defendant may become relevant otherwise than as showing Character. In the following chapters the bearing of the present principle is amply illustrated.

§ 218. Res Gestæ and Acts a part of the Issue; Inseparable Crimes. There is, however, an additional class of cases in which the misconduct of a defendant may be received, irrespective of any bearing on character, and yet not as evidential of one of the above matters (design, motive, or the like), or as relevant to any particular subsidiary proposition. That class includes other criminal acts which are an inseparable part of the whole deed. Suppose that A is charged with stealing the tools of X; the evidence shows that a box of carpenter's tools was taken, and that in it were the tools of Y and Z as well as of X; here we are incidentally proving the commission of two additional crimes, because they are necessarily interwoven with the stealing charged, and together form one deed. The other two crimes are not offered as affecting A's character, nor do they affect his character; because all were done, if at all, as parts of a whole, and if we believe, or disbelieve his doing of one part, we believe or disbelieve his doing of all. The two other crimes do not affect his character in the way forbidden by the reasons of the character-rule (ante, § 194) — i.e. by way of undue prejudice, in that we might condemn him now, though innocent of the act charged, because we are prejudiced by his former crimes; nor by way of unfair surprise, in that he cannot be prepared to defend himself against evidence of former misconduct of which he had no notice. While thus, on the one hand, these concomitant crimes are not obnoxious to the reasons of the character-rule, so also they are necessarily gone into in proving the entire deed of which the act charged forms a part. There is therefore not only a necessity for proving them, but no objection against proving them.[1]

§ 218. [1] ENGLAND: 1831, R. v. Salisbury, 5 C. & P. 155 (stealing bank-notes from a letter; the stealing of others from another letter, and replacing them by the ones in issue, admitted as a part of the transaction); 1862, R. v. Cobden, 2 F. & F. 833 (burglary; evidence of three other burglaries by the defendants on the same night was admitted, partly because "so intermixed that it is impossible to separate them", partly to explain the disposal of the property taken).

UNITED STATES: Alabama: 1906, Hammond v. State, 147 Ala. 79, 41 So. 761 (shooting the deceased's brother immediately after shooting the deceased; admitted); California: 1899, People v. Piggott, 126 Cal. 509, 59 Pac. 31 (general principle stated); 1906, People v. McClure, 148 Cal. 418, 83 Pac. 437 (killing another person in the same affray; admitted); 1908, People v. Manasse, 153 Cal. 10, 94 Pac. 92 (shooting of H. and C. as "a part of the same transaction"); 1910, People v. Crowley,

It is sometimes said that such acts are provable as a part of the 'res gestæ.' But this phrase is unsatisfactory, first, because it is obscure and indefinite, and needs further definition and translation before either its reason or its scope can be understood; and, secondly, because its very looseness and obscurity lend too many opportunities for its abuse. It is not too much to say that it is nowadays most frequently used merely as a cover for loose ideas and ignorance of principles. It is occasionally used to admit acts whose real function is to show Intent or Motive or Design. But the result is only to 13 Cal. App. 322, 109 Pac. 493 (another murder at the same time); Florida: 1898, Roberson v. State, 40 Fla. 509, 24 So. 474 (finding stolen goods under a warrant to search for other stolen goods; nature of the warrant, excluded, because of the intimation of other crimes; unsound); Hawaii: 1898, Republic v. Tsunikichi, 11 Haw. 341, 344 (killing of a child at the same time with that of a woman, admitted); 1899, Republic v. Yamane, 12 Haw. 189, 217 (assault on another person at the same time, admitted); Illinois: 1914, People v. Harrison, 261 Ill. 517, 104 N. E. 259 (kidnapping a girl; the physicians' description of the physical condition of the girl after her return, mentioning a swollen face, fingerprints on the neck, and a rape, excluded so far as describing the rape appearances; absurd; why not also exclude the swollen face and the finger-prints?); 1916, People v. Murphy, 276 Ill. 304, 114 N. E. 609 (killing of another person, admitted because inseparable from the killing charged); Indiana: 1885, Turner v. State, 102 Ind. 425, 1 N. E. 869 (the possession of another stolen book, admitted, as contradicting the defendant's account of how he came into possession of the lot of books among which was the one charged); Kentucky: 1909, Bennett v. Com., 133 Ky. 452, 118 S. W. 332 (defacing branded railroad ties); 1913, May v. Com., 153 Ky. 141, 154 S. W. 1074 (murder; killing of another person at the same moment, admitted); Louisiana: 1852, Terrell v. Allen, 7 La. An. 47, 48 (inveigling and stealing a slave; the capture of the slave in the defendant's quarters, admitted, though involving the crime of harboring; Preston, J.: "The same evidence that tends to prove one crime often tends to prove another; the firing a gun may tend to prove an attempt to kill, or manslaughter, by an actual killing; so the felonious taking of goods may be offered to prove a burglary as well as larceny"); 1857, State v. Munco, 12 La. An. 625 (charge of firing a gun with intent to kill; the fact of the other person being wounded, and a distinct crime shown, held admissible as a part of the proof of the offence charged); 1882, State v. Vines, 34 La. An. 1079, 1083 (another killing at the same time, by a member of the same party lying in wait, admitted); 1904, State v. Robinson, 112 La. 939, 36 So. 811 (shooting a second person, a moment later; admitted); Massachusetts: 1849, Com. v. M'Pike, 3 Cush. 181, 184 (manslaughter; to show the assault which ensued in the death, a conviction for it was received, with other evidence, but this was not to be used to show "his disposition to engage in such assaults"); 1888, Com. v. Schaffner, 146 Mass. 515, 16 N. E. 280 (on a charge of coloring milk, evidence of the milk being also of bad quality, held not inadmissible because it concerned a separate offence not necessarily involved); Missouri: 1896, State v. Perry, 136 Mo. 126, 37 S. W. 804 (that other persons were killed within a few moments of the same time, admitted); 1906, State v. Vaughan, 200 Mo. 1, 98 S. W. 2 (murder of a prison-guard in escaping; the killing of two other guards at the same time, admitted); Montana: 1904, State v. Howard, 30 Mont. 518, 77 Pac. 50 (robbery of a mail clerk; the robbery of the baggage-car, etc., at the same time, admitted); New Mexico: 1906, Terr. v. Livingston, 13 N. M. 318, 84 Pac. 1021 (horse and mule stolen at the same time); 1908, Terr. v. Caldwell, 14 N. M. 535, 98 Pac. 167 (other calves stolen at the same time); New York: 1908, People v. Rogers, 192 N. Y. 331, 85 N. E. 135 (assault upon three persons); 1910, People v. Hill, 198 N. Y. 64, 91 N. E. 272 (murder; two burglaries, admitted, to explain the finding of three revolvers); Oklahoma: 1912, Starr v. State, 7 Okl. Cr. 574, 124 Pac. 1109 (other cattle stolen at the same time); Oregon: 1897, State v. Porter, 32 Or. 135, 49 Pac. 964 (three persons killed within a few moments; the circumstances and conditions of all three deaths admissible); 1899, State v. Wong Gee, 35 Or. 276, 57 Pac. 914 (another assault by defendant at the same time, admitted); 1899, State v. Hanna, 35 Or. 195, 57 Pac. 629 (stealing of third person's horses at same time, admitted); Pennsylvania: 1898, Com. v. Roddy, 184 Pa. 274, 39 Atl. 211 (murder; traces of the escaping murderer, involving the stealing of another person's property, received); 1919, Com. v. Coles, 265 Pa. 362, 108 Atl. 826 (murder of policeman; another homicide just before, admitted as inseparably connected); South Carolina: 1907, State v. Kenny, 77 S. C. 236, 57 S. E. 859 (murder and larceny at the same time); Utah: 1896, State v. Hayes, 14 Utah 118, 46 Pac. 752 (three men killed under the same circumstances; the deaths of two admitted on a make rulings on evidence arbitrary and chaotic, when we ignore the correct purposes of admission and substitute an indefinite and meaningless phrase of this sort. The term 'res gestæ' should be once for all abandoned as useless and vicious. Let it be said that such acts are receivable as "necessary parts of the proof of an entire deed", or "inseparable elements of the deed", or "concomitant parts of the criminal act", or anything else that carries its own reasoning and definition with it; but let legal discussion sedulously avoid this much-abused and wholly unmanageable Latin phrase.[2] charge of killing the third); Washington: 1895, State v. Craemer, 12 Wash. 217, 40 Pac. 945 (where an infant child was killed at the same time as the mother, all the circumstances were received); 1911, State v. McDowell, 61 Wash. 398, 112 Pac. 521 (indecent assault); 1914, State v. Conroy, 82 Wash. 417, 144 Pac. 538 (robbery of two persons at the same time).

For other instances involving the stealing of chattels from the same lot, see ante, § 152 (possession of stolen chattels) and post, § 414 (identity of chattels).

For other instances involving contemporaneous homicides, see post, § 363 (other acts to show intent).

Throughout the various classes of crimes dealt with in §§ 309–367, post, will be found further instances.

For other instances of proof of an inseparable crime, see post, § 414 (evidence of identity).

For the use of an accused's confession of other crimes, see post, § 2100.

[2] Its abuse in other senses is dealt with post, §§ 1757, 1767.

SUB-TITLE II (continued): EVIDENCE TO PROVE A HUMAN QUALITY OR CONDITION

TOPICS II, III, IV, V: EVIDENCE TO PROVE PHYSICAL OR MENTAL CAPACITY, DESIGN, OR INTENT

CHAPTER X.

Topic II: EVIDENCE TO PROVE PHYSICAL CONDITION OR CAPACITY (STRENGTH, SKILL, HEALTH, ETC.)

§ 219. General Principle. It has been already noted (ante, § 190) that physical Capacity or Condition, like most other human attributes, may be evidenced in three ways: (1) by conduct or other manifestations indicating their inward source; (2) by external facts pointing forward to the existence of the quality or condition; (3) by the prior or subsequent existence of the quality or condition, pointing forward or backward to its existence at the time in question. The considerations which affect the validity of the various inferences are simple, depending chiefly on ordinary experience and common sense, and cause little difficulty.[1] The doctrine just examined (ante, § 216), that the criminality of conduct which is in itself relevant is no objection to its reception, is frequently illustrated; and the necessity for applying it and for distinguishing the character-rule (ante, § 194) has given the occasion for most of the rulings. The policies of Unfair Surprise, Undue Prejudice, and Confusion of Issues (ante, §§ 194, 202) are here occasionally applicable. But they have ordinarily no real force. The trial Court's discretion is best trusted to determine their validity in the light of the circumstances of each case.

§ 220. Power or Strength, from Instances of Conduct exhibiting it. Where a person's physical power or strength is a proposition to be proved, instances of the person's conduct and acts, manifesting the existence in him of such power or strength, are the natural and proper evidence of it. In limiting the use of this evidence, the trial Court's discretion should control — a principle fully established in New Hampshire.[1]

§ 221. Skill or Means, from Instances of its Exercise. The possession of instruments adapted to do an act in question is evidence of capacity or ability to do it.[1] The skill to do the act may be evidenced by previous or subse-

§ 219. [1] From the point of view of logic and psychology as applicable to argument before the jury (not the rules of Admissibility), see the materials collected in the present author's "Principles of Judicial Proof, as given by Logic, Psychology, and General Experience, and illustrated in Judicial Trials" (1913), §§ 73–81.

§ 220. [1] Iowa: 1905, State v. Donovan, 128 Ia. 44, 102 N. W. 791 (seduction under hypnotism; defendant's power evidenced by other instances); Massachusetts: 1838, Ellis v. Short, 21 Pick. 142 (false arrest; to prove the plaintiff's strength and power of violent resistance when drunk, the fact of his having on a former occasion when drunk thrown stones and resisted arrest with violence was excluded; unsound); New Hampshire: 1858, State v. Wentworth, 37 N. H. 196, 211 (indictment for placing an obstruction, viz. two stones of considerable size, on a railroad track; the fact of the placing of iron rails on the track, near by, about the same time, by the defendant, was admitted as showing that the defendant "had the strength and ability to place them there"); 1863, State v. Knapp, 45 N. H. 148, 149, 154 (rape; to show the defendant's "capacity of overcoming such resistance as the prosecutrix might have offered", evidence was received that he had once "taken a barrel of flour up in his hands before him and carried it several rods", had "carried a barrel of sugar some ten rods on his shoulder", etc.); 1879, Hilliard v. Beattie, 59 N. H. 462, 465 (the rate of pulse of other healthy men subjected to the same conditions as the plaintiff was held properly excluded in the trial Court's discretion); New York: 1895, People v. Corey, 148 N. Y. 476, 42 N. E. 1066 (the condition of the defendant, charged with murder, the act of stabbing being conceded, and his affection by syphilis, was held unnecessarily and improperly admitted to show his capacity to commit the assault, on the principle that it merely prejudiced the jury, and that "illegal evidence which has a tendency to excite the passions, arouse the prejudice, awaken the sympathies, or warp or influence the judgment of the jurors, in any degree, cannot be considered as harmless"); Washington: 1897, State v. Cushing, 17 Wash. 544, 50 Pac. 512 (strength-tests, excluded, except on cross-examination to test accuracy).

For the relevancy of physical capacity, when properly evidenced, to show the doing or not-doing of an act, see ante, §§ 84, 85.

Compare also the instances cited post, § 460 (measures of skilfulness, etc.), some of which illustrate equally the present principle.

§ 221. [1] 1921, Carter v. State, 26 Ga. App. 253, 105 S. E. 652 (selling whisky; that "stills were around the defendant's house", admitted); 1876, Com. v. Brown, 121 Mass. 71 (abortion; the possession of a "speculum chair" and other instruments, admitted, as showing that the defendant had "the means and opportunity to commit the offence charged").

For other ruling, see ante, §§ 87, 88, and post, § 238; some of the rulings are difficult to place, as the evidential fact has often more than one aspect.

quent conduct exhibiting it.[2] Skill or competence may also to some extent be inferred from ordinary appearance and conduct.[3]

That a physician's competence or skill may be evidenced by marked instances of the presence or absence of it seems clear from the present point of view; but a confusion of moral character with technical skill has occasionally led to the judicial treatment of such evidence under the character-rules (ante, §§ 208, 67, 87).[4]

[2] 1885, Belt v. Lawes, Eng., described in Montague Williams' Reminiscences, II, 222 (libel, for charging that the plaintiff, a sculptor, did not make the works of art put forth by him as his own, but merely employed others and took their productions; the plaintiff was ordered by the judge to execute a second bust of a person of whom there was already in existence a bust claimed by the plaintiff to be his work; this the plaintiff did in a room adjoining the Court, under conditions arranged to prevent fraud; and the resulting bust "went a long way to determine the result of the trial", which was a verdict for £5000); 1885, Costelo v. Crowell, 139 Mass. 588, 2 N. E. 698 (defence of forgery to a promissory note; evidence rejected of the plaintiff's having shown a person how to imitate notes by tracing; the character-rule was invoked as excluding evidence of "capacity and means" where directed to the act in issue and not the intent of the doer; the ruling is unsound).

Compare the analogous cases cited ante, § 87, post, §§ 238, 309, 460, 461.

[3] 1885, Keith v. N. H. & N. Co., 140 Mass. 175, 180, 3 N. E. 28 ("the appearance and conduct [upon the stand] of a railroad car-inspector", admissible "to aid the jury in determining whether he was a person of suitable qualifications and of sufficient intelligence to be entrusted with so responsible a duty"; the "principle applies where the inquiry . . . relates to intelligence and understanding as well as to physical capacity"; 1890, Peaslee v. R. Co., 152 Mass. 155, 158, 25 N. E. 71 (sanctioning the preceding, where there is other evidence of incompetency); 1897, Olsen v. Andrews, 168 Mass. 261, 47 N. E. 90 (see the citation ante, § 199; here nervous conduct, etc., was admitted to show unfit physical condition of an employee).

[4] The rulings are therefore by no means consistent: England: 1807, R. v. Williamson, 3 C. & P. 635 (a midwife indicted for childbed-death caused by negligence; fourteen women were called, and six examined, who had been delivered by the accused; Ellenborough, L. C. J.: "From the evidence of the witnesses on his behalf it appears that he had delivered many women at different times, and from this he must have had some degree of skill"); 1831, R. v. Long, Old Bailey, before Bayley, B., Pelham's Chronicles of Crime, ed. 1891, II, 217, 227 (trial of a quack physician, for manslaughter by improper treatment; the accused called one Mr. A., who testified that "he had several times been under the care of the prisoner; he had an asthma, and subsequently a determination of blood to the head. The Attorney-General here interfered, and submitted that the course of the present examination ought to be confined to the general character of the prisoner; in which the Court, after hearing arguments from Mr. Alley and Mr. Phillips, acquiesced. Mr. Phillips endeavored to shake this decision, contending that as the indictment raised the question whether Mr. Long was grossly ignorant, or had been grossly careless, it was impossible to establish his innocence otherwise than by showing, as he verily believed they could, that he was both learned and skilful, and most attentive and humane in his practice of the healing art. Mr. Baron Bayley: 'We cannot go into specific cases; we must confine ourselves to general evidence.' Mr. Phillips resumed his argument at length; but the Attorney-General in reply said that if his learned friends found themselves at liberty to go into all the successful cases of the prisoner, he should go into his several failures in practice. The Court having repeated its former decision, the examination of Mr. A. was resumed, and he stated that the prisoner had attended him for several disorders, and he had the fullest reason to be satisfied with his skill, care, and attention. Mrs. A., the wife of Gen. A., Miss R., her sister, Mrs. P., Mrs. M., Mrs. Mc., and a vast number of other ladies and gentlemen were then examined, and every one bore testimony in the strongest manner to the skill, assiduity, and humanity of the prisoner, and to the extraordinary success which had uniformly attended his practice"; notice that what was excluded was only the details of particular cases, the general success of the accused's treatments being received); 1848, R. v. Whitehead, 3 C. & K. 202, Maule, J. (particular instances inadmissible; though the doctrine seems to have been violated in this very case); Canada: 1869, Key v. Thomson, 1 Ham. N. Br. 295, 301 (malpractice; defendant's successful similar treatment of other cases, admitted to show the incorrectness of the plaintiff's witnesses' testimony as to the unskilfulness of his treatment); United States: 1898, Lacy v. Kossuth Co., 106 Ia. 16, 75 N. W. 689 (incompetency of physician, under statute; particular acts excluded); 1905, Shockley v. Tucker, 127 Ia. 456, 103 N. W. 360 (negligent use of X-ray instrument by a physician; other instances of injury caused by the defendant with such instruments, excluded; no authority cited); 1882, Dresbrack v. State, 38 Oh. St. 365 (see citation ante, § 199).

§ 222. Age, from Appearance; Voice, from Utterances; Sight, from things seen. Experience teaches us that corporal appearances are approximately an index of the age of their bearer, particularly for the marked extremes of old age and youth. In every case such evidence should be accepted and weighed for what it may be in each case worth. In particular, the outward physical appearance of an alleged minor may be considered in judging of his age;[1] a contrary rule would be pedantically over-cautious.[2]

The quality of a voice may be evidenced by instances of utterance. But here the questions that have arisen concern rather the requirement of the oath (post, § 1824), the opinion rule (post, § 1977), the possibility of accurate knowledge founded on hearing only (post, § 660), and the relevancy of identifying circumstances (post, § 413).

The capacity of sight may be indicated by instances of its exercise; but this can best be considered in dealing with the modes of evidencing distance and other external facts (post, § 457).

Compare also the citations ante, §§ 67, 87, and post, § 457.

§ 222. [1] Canada: Dom. St. 1900, c. 46, R. S. 1906, c. 146, Crim. C. § 984 (in proving the age of a young person, on certain charges, the judge or jury "may infer the age from the appearance of the boy, girl, child, or young person"); Sask.: R. S. 1920., c. 192, § 128 (children's court; the judge may presume from appearance that the child is under a specified age);

United States: Black v. Pate, 130 Ala. 514, 30 So. 434 (age of a voter); 1899, Jones v. State, 106 Ga. 365, 34 S. E. 174 (rape of girl of fifteen years; appearance of the girl, allowed to be considered in determining capacity to consent); 1896, Republic v. Parsons, 10 Haw. 601, 606 (sexual intercourse under age); 1904, Wistrand v. People, 213 Ill. 72, 72 N. E. 748 (testimony to appearance may be evidence of age); 1909, People v. Davidson, 240 Ill. 191, 88 N. E. 565 (keeping a minor in a house of ill-fame; a person who has seen the woman may testify to her apparent age); Kan. G. S. 1915, § 6386 (offenses concerning dependent children, of specified age; "if the child appears to the Court to be under that age", this raises a presumption); 1898, Com. v. Hollis, 170 Mass. 433, 49 N. E. 632 (girl said to be under sixteen; jury allowed to consider appearance); 1902, People v. Elco, 113 Mich. 519, 91 N. W. 755; (criminal intercourse with a girl under sixteen); 1889 Elsner, v. Supreme Lodge, 98 Mo. 645, 11 S. W. 991; 1900, State v. Thomson, 155 Mo. 300, 55 S. W. 1013; 1915, State v. Koettgen, 88 N. J. L. 51, 95 Atl. 747 (keeping a disorderly house; age of persons there resorting, allowed to be testified to by persons inferring from appearance; approving the above text); N. Y. C. P. A. 1920, § 334, & Cons. L. 1909, Penal § 817 (appearance to be evidence to the Court on dispute as to child's age); 1913, People v. Kaminsky, 208 N. Y. 389, 102 N. E. 515 (juvenile offender under 16; age may be determined by inspection of the accused in court); 1851, State v. Arnold 13 Ired. N. C. 184, 192 (inspection of a defendant to judge whether he was under fourteen); 1893, Jones v. State, 32 Tex. Cr. 108, 22 S. W. 149 (seiling liquor to a minor; the buyer's appearance, admissible); 1903, Earl v. State, 44 Tex. Cr. 467, 72 S. W. 175; Utah Comp. L. 1917, § 1845 (offenses against children under specific age; child's appearance under that age, to raise a presumption); 1888, Hermann v. State, 73 Wis. 248, 250, 41 N. W. 171 (knowing enticement of minor female; her appearance before jury allowed to be considered, her age being otherwise shown, as indicating whether the defendant must have known her to be a minor).

Compare the doctrine as to exhibiting the person to the jury, post, § 1160.

[2] This is apparently the rule in Indiana; some of the rulings intimate an even more unjustifiable doctrine, namely, that the appearance of the person cannot be considered even in determining whether the liquor-seller acted in good faith in treating the person as an adult: 1876, Ihinger v. State, 53 Ind. 251, 253 (appearance before the jury, rejected; but testimony to appearance held competent, the issue being the defendant's good faith in selling liquor to an alleged minor); 1878, Robinius v. State, 63 Ind. 235, 237 (selling liquor to a minor; appearance rejected); 1878, Swigart v. State, 64 Ind. 598 (same); 1885, Bird v. State, 104 Ind. 385, 389, 3 N. E. 827 (same); 1887, Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Wood, 113 Ind. 544, 550, 14 N. E. 572, 16 N. E. 197 (same, but treated as exceptional).

§ 223. Health or Disease, from Appearance, Occupation, or Heredity. Corporal appearances and conduct as indications of the inward health or lack of it are relevant.[1] The questions which arise in connection with such evidence are due to other considerations than relevancy; these may involve the propriety of inspection of an injured body by the jury (post, § 1158), or the competency of lay witnesses to testify to health or disease, by interpreting corporal appearances (post, § 568), or the application of the opinion rule to testimony about appearances of health or disease (post, §§ 1974, 1975), or the application of the hearsay rule, or its exceptions, to the person's statements of pain or injury (post, §§ 1718, 1790).

Physical capacity may also be evidenced by the hereditary existence of a certain quality;[2] and the same test of admissibility would here be applied as for insanity (post, § 232). Capacity may also sometimes be evidenced 'a priori' (on the principle noted ante, § 190) by circumstances likely to result in a physical injury or degeneration, — as when "expectation of life", in insurance cases, is affected by the hazardous circumstances of one's occupation.[3]

§ 224. Pecuniary Capacity, from Borrowing or Non-Payment. It has already been seen (ante, § 89) that a person's pecuniary capacity to pay a debt or to lend money is relevant to the probability of his paying or lending. To show his pecuniary condition as to this capacity, his conduct in borrowing or not paying thus becomes relevant. Nevertheless, a line is to be drawn; for the mere failure (for example) to pay a specific debt may be open to so many other explanations than total lack of the means (on the logical principle of § 32, ante) that it would have no appreciable probative value. There

In these rulings (except in the first) there is apparently no discrimination between the use of appearance before the jury and testimony to appearance; but possibly it is the former only (as in the first ruling) that is intended to be excluded.

For a consideration of this erratic doctrine that inspection by the jury is improper, see post, § 1160.

For the use of such evidence to show the liquor-seller's belief, see post, § 257.

§ 223. [1] 1867, R. v. Zeigert, 10 Cox Cr. 547 (murder by starving a child; the child's asking for bread admitted as an "act"); 1881, Cowley v. People, 83 N. Y. 477 (cited post, § 225).

For intemperance, see post, § 235.

For instances of subsequent disease, see post, § 225, n. 1.

[2] 1902, Birmingham Southern R. Co. v. Cuzzart, 133 Ala. 262, 31 So. 979 (injury to eyes; to prove the plaintiff's injury due to other causes, the defendant was not allowed to show the existence of eye ailments in other members of the plaintiff's family, without evidence of the "descendible quality" of such ailments); 1906, Haynes v. Waterville & O. St. R. Co., 101 Me. 335, 64 Atl. 614 (personal injuries and expectancy of life; the ages of the plaintiff's father and grandfather at death, admitted; "a descent from robust, long-lived stock gives greater promise of long life than descent from frail, short-lived ancestry, other things being equal"); 1905, Sterling v. Union Carbide Co., 142 Mich. 284, 105 N. W. 755 (personal injury; ancestral long life, admitted as evidence of plaintiff's expectancy of life).

But it remains true, as to the specific trait of longevity, that ancestral longevity is not of much weight in estimating the probability of life of a particular person, because too many other circumstances combine to effect the total chance of survival of a particular person; see Hamilton v. Michigan C. R. Co., 135 Mich. 95, 97 N. W. 392 (1903), and § 232, post.

[3] 1893, Birmingham M. R. Co. v. Wilmer, 97 Ala. 165, 170, 11 So. 886 (that the plaintiff was in an extra hazardous occupation, admitted); 1893, Townsend v. Briggs, 99 Cal. 481, 485, 34 Pac. 116 (the injured plaintiff's expectation of life being in issue, any facts about him lessening that expectation are admissible; here, his drinking habits).

is room for much variety of circumstance in such evidence, and the discretion of the trial Court should control.[1]

§ 225. Prior or Subsequent Condition. In showing the existence at a given time of any physical condition (skill, strength, health, or the like), the existence of such a condition at a prior or subsequent time (being one of the classes of evidence noted ante, § 190) is evidential.[1] The limits of time over which such evidence may range must depend on the circumstances of each case as to the probability of intervening changes, and should be left entirely within the discretion of the trial judge. Other and analogous illustrations of the doctrine of prior and subsequent condition may be found elsewhere (post, §§ 233, 379, and 437).

TOPIC III. EVIDENCE TO PROVE MENTAL CAPACITY

